The “complacents” are usually described as “technocrats” and “careerists”.They are considered to be “apparatchiks”, lacking any political fibre, owingtheir position and the privileges and advantages – often undeserved – thatthey enjoy, entirely to it.

They will only be able to conceal and perpetuate those benefits as long as the Party remains a bunker. Any opening up, any movement towards a little good governance, transparency, and accountability, would be the endof them. They are also haunted by the implacable rule of “winner takes all” that has accompanied every previous regime change. However, their attitude is ambivalent. On the one hand, they are tooth and nail defendersof the EPRDF’s monopoly of power, and therefore equally implicated in therepression.
On the other hand, they ascribe responsibility for the crisis to excessive central power, claiming that it hinders regional authority. In order to reverse this imbalance, and thereby strengthen their own positions, theyare taking advantage of the outbreaks of ethno-nationalisms, notably byattempting to exploit the corresponding popular demands to their own advantage, up to and including the serious slide into anti-Tigrayan sentiment.

“The fate of Ethiopia would be determined by its periphery”
In Oromya, at least part of the OPDO, right up to leadership level, encouraged the opposition to the Addis Ababa Master Plan, the scheme toextend the capital’s administrative scope into adjacent areas of Oromya, which triggered near universal unrest across the whole State.

The same actors then did everything they could to prevent Oromya being placed under military command from Addis Ababa and then, having failed,to put a stop to it. At least locally, the authorities – necessarily members of OPDO – and the militias – under their sole control – went so far as to lend the protesters a hand.

This ethno-nationalist outbreak contributed to the appointment of LemmaMegersa and Workneh Gebeyehu to the leadership of the OPDO, after theforced resignation of numbers one and two Muktar Kedir and Aster Mamo,who were seen as puppets of Addis Ababa. The new duo are long-time members of the security services, but are said to be protégés of Abadula Gemadah, the OPDO’s only strongman, hence formerly sidelined by MelesZenawi. The main thing is that the OPDO was able to assert its autonomyby electing leaders without external pressure or diktat.

In the Amhara region, it is equally unquestionable that the big initial demonstrations, though officially banned, were held with the support or tacit approval of part of the ANDM. At least at local level, the authorities and the security forces allowed “ethnic cleansing” against Tigrayans to take place, prompting 8000 to flee to Tigray.[10] Gedu Andergatchew, ANDM strongman, who is accused of having at least turned a blind eye, isstill in place.

Even in Tigray, the regional authorities – “TPLF Mekele” – are playing thenationalist card. Abay Woldu, President of the region and Chairman of theTPLF, went so far as to declare that the integrity of Tigray was non negotiable, in a clear allusion to Tigray’s retention of the Wolkait area, whose restoration is demanded by some Amhara, and despite Addis Ababa’s call for the Amhara and Tigrayan governments to negotiate this long standing issue.

This firmness played a big part in the shift in at least part of Tigrayan opinion, expressed with rare vehemence by some circles. They vilified the “TPLF Mekele”, despised for its lack of education and impotence. They placed all their hopes in the Tigrayan old guard, “TPLF Addis”. According to them, only this old guard could bring about the democratization essential to the survival of the regime and, in the long term, the Tigrayanminority’s control over its own affairs. The same old guard, they now complain, has doubly betrayed the Tigrayan people: by evolving into an oligarchy that neglects the latter’s economic aspirations; and by turning its back on their national interests.

On the first point, they rightly emphasize that Tigray still lags behind interms of development. But at the same time Tigrayan businessmen aresaid to earn exorbitant profits from undeserved privileges. In fact, the paradox is only apparent: there is so little potential in Tigray that they invest elsewhere.

Regarding the “national betrayal”, these critics highlight the old guard’sloyalty to its Marxist past, claiming that they remain “internationalist”, “cosmopolitan”, and “universalist” out of political ambition and materialinterest. Addis Ababa offers positions and advantages that Tigray, poorand small as it is, would be hard put to provide. The more the balance between centre and periphery shifts towards the centre, the more attractive these positions and advantages become. In short, the view isthat the old guard has yielded to a centuries-old tradition of Ethiopian history: letting itself be “assimilated” by the centre and prioritizing the latter’s interests over those of the periphery. As the historian Haggai Erlich has written, “a central position” in Addis Ababa has always been preferable to remaining a “chief in a remote province”.[11]

In consequence, these Tigrayans feel they have no other choice than to take charge of their own destiny and count only on themselves, i.e. something like building a “fortress Tigray”. It is up to the new generation to take over from the old, which has given up, even if this means embracing the “narrow nationalism" of which its critics accuse it. This goesas far as to see a re-emergence of the hope of reunifying Tigrayans on both sides of the Ethiopia/Eritrea border into a single nation state.

In this view, the other regions' demands for self-rule should therefore be heard. Central government should be content with "regulating", "balancing", "moderating", "arbitrating", "coordinating", etc. That it shouldbe headed by an Oromo prime minister would be in the natural order of things, since Ormoya has the largest population, and would help to calm feelings in the region. In short, one Tigrayan intellectual has joked, a new Age of the Princes would be established, but one in which the Princes did not fight amongst themselves,[12] more seriously going on to express thewish that, for the first time in history, "the fate of Ethiopia would be determined by its periphery".

State of emergency

The indignation aroused by the carnage in Bishoftu during the traditional Oromo annual festival (October 2),[13] the widespread destruction that followed the call for "five days of rage" in response, made the ruling power's paralysis even more untenable. At the same time, the series of internal consultations within the EPRDF was coming to an end. The package of measures announced on October 9 reflects the shakiness of the snatched compromise. However acute their lack of mutual trust, the political currents and/or the ethnic components of the EPRDF had to arriveat an agreement: they knew that they had "to work together or else to sink together".

The state of emergency was proclaimed in order "to deal with anti-peace elements that… are jeopardising the peace and security of the country".[14] Commentators see it as evidence that the regime was "overwhelmed". But it adds little, whether to the existing legislative arsenal,[15] or to the operational capacities of the security forces since, inpractice, they have never seen themselves as severely restricted by the law.

The first objective is to instil fear and uncertainty, especially as several provisions are so vague that they can be interpreted in almost any way.They are now in everyone's mind. For example, for the first time, long- standing informants have cancelled interviews because of the potential risk.

The second objective is to give the military the legal sanction that armychief Samora Yunus was demanding as a condition of continuing to maintain internal order.

However, this proclamation also demonstrates that the centre has won a round in its trial of strength with the peripheries. The state of emergency places all the forces of order under the authority of a federal Command Post, with Hailemariam Dessalegn at its head and the Minister of Defense as its secretary. They thus control the mono-ethnic Special Regional Policein each state, who with 80,000 members far outnumber the Federal Police(around 40,000), and even more so the Army Special Force (the famous Agazi red berets, around 4000). The 500,000 or so militiamen also come under their authority. That is why the proclamation encountered ferociousopposition within the OPDO and ANDM.

Essentially, however, the state of emergency is a show of strength. Not only to try to reassure increasingly nervous foreign investors,[16] but above all to convince the population of the regime's determination to recover total control of the entire country by any means – the obsessionof any Ethiopian ruling power worthy of the name – and, at the same time, to make its promise of reforms credible. Otherwise, it would have been perceived as a capitulation. Sebhat Nega, patriarch of the TPLF, explained that the purpose of the state of emergency was "to create asituation to make us able to reform".[17]

Ultimately, the aim of the compromise reached within the party was to drive a wedge between the "violent, extremist and armed struggle" – to be repressed through the state of emergency – and the "democratic peaceful engagement" expressed by so many demonstrators – holding outa hand via reform.[18]

"Leadership has miserably failed"
Interviews with senior officials cast light on the analysis that the leadership as a whole finally agreed upon. Emollient though it may be, they are all now sticking by it and keeping their previous disagreements tothemselves.[19]

The analysis goes as follows: the spirit and letter of the constitution are perfect, as are therefore the federal structure, the format of the institutions, the political line. The latter is not "based on ideology but on the natural laws of development", as it previously was on Marxist "science". "Show me a developing country anywhere in the world which has a political strategy and guidelines as well articulated as Ethiopia!" This perfection has accomplished "miracles". The current crisis is simply "the price of our successes". It was preceded and will be followed by others, because it is nothing more than a stage, unremarkable and inevitable, on the path that will undoubtedly culminate in the nation catching up with developed countries in the next few decades.

However, this stage, like any other, requires "adjustments", especially asthe society – richer, more educated, more mature – has become a "demanding society". The young in particular, the spearhead of protest, are making demands that are socio-economic rather than political. The regime is facing "challenges" for having failed to make these adjustmentsin time.

The main problem is deficiencies in implementation. In sum, things havegone off the rails because of human failings. Yielding to corruption, bad governance, lack of accountability, etc., "leadership at various levels of the government structure has miserably failed to fully and timely[sic] address the demands made and the questions raised by the people".[20]The response to the crisis must therefore take two forms. First a massivepurge at all levels of the Party, regional governments, the administration.Then, "to delineate" – the new watchword – the Party from the government, from the Assemblies, from justice, etc. in order to develop asystem of checks and balances, since the self-correcting mechanisms within the Party have proved inadequate.
For youth employment, a "Mobile Youth Fund" funded to the tune of 500million dollars – some 4% of the annual budget – will be created, thoughthe details are vague and it will take several years before its effects are felt. Above all, it is part of a largely endogenous strategy of industrialization, focused on Small and Medium Enterprises (SME) on theedge of the rural areas, whereas heated debate continues within the leadership with those who advocate prioritizing foreign investment in "Industrial Parks".

In strictly political terms, "our democratization process is still nascent. Itis moving in the right direction, but it has not yet come up with inclusiveengagement", stated the PM.[21] Electoral law will be reformed to introduce an element of proportional representation into majority rule.
However, the next elections are in 2020, and the dozens of opposition MPspresent before the 2005 elections could do almost nothing to temper the authoritarianism of the regime. The essential thing is "to discuss… with all stakeholders" in all possible and imaginable "debating platforms", "assemblies", "fora", but with no specific goal or timetable, and under the sole authority of the EPRDF. A promise reiterated year after year, without impact. One of the essential causes of the crisis, its federal dimension, is covered in a single short sentence in the 15 pages of President Mulatu's speech: "more should be done for the effective implementation of the federal system". In any case, "Ethiopia is an idol… and exemplary for the world for peaceful [interethnic] coexistence", declares the State Minister for Federal Affairs.[22]

Anticipating the worst
What emerges from all the interviews with nonofficial contacts is that theexpectation of a symbolic gesture, one that would be significant and haveimmediate impact, proving that the regime had grasped the essence of the crisis and wishes sincerely to address it, has not been met.

According to them, the regime is relying first on repression, and on reforms only as a "footnote". Merera Gudina, a long-standing leader of theopposition, sums up the general sentiment: "too little, too late".[23] Nothing has been done to reach out to either the main opposition forces, even the legal opposition, nor the civil society or the media, quite the contrary. This could be envisaged only after the end of the state of emergency, Hailemariam is said to have told one figure from the international community.

These interlocutors share the dark pessimism of an editorial in the Washington Post: "the state of emergency will bottle up the pressures even more, increasing the likelihood they will explode anew… It won't work".[24] According to this view, the chances of a genuine opening up onthe part of the regime are so small that there is a high probability that the worst will happen: a threat to the very survival of the country, the onlyquestion being when this dislocation would occur.

While the official media bang on about the "strong commitment" of the leadership "to make its promise of deep reform a reality",[25] interviewswith top officials provide hints of the form and scope of reform, which remain consistent with the official analysis of the crisis.

Focus on "service delivery"

There is no urgency: change will be "an ongoing endless process". The first specific deadline is in seven months, in June 2017, to report back onthe purge and examine a document currently in preparation, on what theEPRDF should become in the next ten years.

In this view, the crisis is not systemic. So neither the constitution, nor theinstitutions, nor the political line will be touched. How could the latter be challenged since it obeys universal "laws"? For that reason, regardless of all the promised "discussions", no convincing reasons are given for the much touted opening up to entail any restructuring of the political arena.

The EPRDF alone, as sectarian as ever, has understood and applies these"laws", whereas the opposition parties oppose or reject them. The EPRDFalone has the near monopoly of skills needed to implement them, skills that the other parties lack. In short, the opposition is still not "constructive". If the regime needs to become more inclusive, it is essentially in material terms, by sharing the cake more fairly through improvements in "service delivery".

To do this, it is necessary and sufficient to put an end to individual erringthrough the self-reform of the EPRDF, i.e. reform by and for the Party itself. To achieve the famous "delineation", MPs, judges, ministers, civil servants, etc. would split themselves in two, remaining obedient to the Party but putting their mission first. Why would they do this, given that they never have before? "Because they have become aware of the crisis",is the explanation. So responding to the crisis requires no systemic reshaping through the establishment of independent counterforces. A U- turn in individual behaviour will be enough.

The EPRDF sticks to the same age-old paradigm. Since Ethiopia is still at aprecapitalist stage, the intelligentsia is the only social group capable of setting the path to follow and leading the way. The EPRDF contains its best elements. Ethnic identities continue to be society's main structuring factor. The EPRDF alone represents them. As one senior official confirmed,it is not until the country enters a capitalist stage that pluralism will imposed itself: with the emergence of social classes, each will construct itsown political party to express its interests. What the EPRDF is still seeking is not simultaneous development AND democracy, but development THENdemocracy.

In this respect, the arrival of technocrats – brandishing the indispensable PhD and with no major party position – was widely interpreted as evidence of a new openness in the cabinet reshuffle. Yet it perpetuates themonopoly rule of the "intellocracy".

The paradox of the strongman

The consensus reached on October 9 is fragile and hence precarious. Nothing proves that the "reformers" have won the long-term game, though they have scored a point. Deep down, they do not share the same views. They lack a standout personality to act as a leader.

They have a clear view of where they want to go, which is to apply the constitution to the letter, but over a very long timescale and with no precise and concerted idea of the steps needed to get there. As for their rank-and-file adherents, they make no secret of still embracing the same paradox: we need reforms, but we need a new strongman to manage andimpose them, for fear that they will otherwise lead to chaos.

On the opposition side, all the Oromo we spoke to emphasized the generational gap between the educated youth, broadly aged 16 to 25, spearhead of the protests notably in Oromya, and their elders. The latter are ambivalent. They feel a sincere empathy for the grievances and aspirations of the younger generation, but have reservations, even hostility, regarding the violent methods sometimes employed. In some cases they even physically opposed attempts at destruction during the "five days of rage".[26] They remain traumatized by the Civil War under the previous regime, the Derg. Then they acquired military know-how thatthe young activists don't have.

The latter also lack coordination and leadership. For all these reasons, a historian of armed popular uprisings in Ethiopia in the twentieth century has concluded that it is unlikely that the protests could become a significant guerrilla campaign, or that a sustained armed peasant upsurge

- a “jacquerie” could occur.

As for the pockets of insurrection that have appeared in the Amhara region, they mainly affect areas where the authorities’ control has alwaysbeen weak, even essentially formal.

Ethiopian history teaches that a regime only falls if its forces of repression, or at least part of them, turn against it. Today, apart from afew unconfirmed incidents, cohesion seems to be holding, say experts close to them. It might only break down if the EPRDF became divided tothe point of being torn apart by centrifugal forces. However, the military command has always let it be known that it would intervene before this happened, as ultimate saviour of the regime. Under these circumstances,steady deterioration – a kind of rotting, seems a possible scenario.

Under these circumstances, steady deterioration – a kind of rotting, seemsa possible scenario. Without any substantive resolution, the regime could re-establish law and order, as the first effects of the state of emergency seem to suggest. The reforms would not tackle the core problems. The ruling power would remain contested and delegitimized but, in the absence of an alternative, Ethiopians would toe the line. Investors would remain cautious, not to say skittish, affecting economic growth. But neither of the two opposing camps would gain the upper hand, any more than they would reach a constructive compromise. Ultimately, what might possibly occur is a classic scenario in Ethiopian history: the demise of one strongman, followed by a period of great disorder until a new strongman takes up the reins.

DIASPORA

November 24, 2016

Ethiopians across the world have been protesting. During a year of anti- government protests throughout Ethiopia, its global diaspora, particularlythat in the US, has been deeply involved – and not just vocally, writes Addis Ababa-based journalist James Jeffrey. Twitter and Facebook have been blocked since a six-month state of emergency was imposed last month as the government tries to restore order across the country's two most populous regions of Oromia and Amhara.

There are also internet blackouts, primarily targeting mobile phone data, which is how most Ethiopians get online – and is for many residents of the capital, Addis Ababa, the most frustrating effect of the security clampdown.

The ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) hassingled out social media as playing a key role in the latest unrest which broke out in November 2015 and which resulted in millions of dollars' worth of damage across Oromia, the region where the protests began.

But internet restrictions may have less to do with silencing Ethiopians at home than with stymieing influence from abroad where those in the diaspora energetically follow and respond to events. "The diaspora have the freedom to speak freely, assemble and organise under the constitutions and laws of the countries in which they reside," says Alemante Selassie, emeritus professor at the William and Mary Law Schoolin the US. "The diaspora can speak truth to power in ways that is not imaginable in their own homeland."

'Filling the void'

Ethiopia's global diaspora is estimated to be two-million strong, with the highest numbers in the US, totalling anything from 250,000 up to about one million. Under the state of emergency, there is tight security aroundthe country "The protesters are their brothers, sisters, aunts, uncles, classmates, neighbours and former colleagues," says Hassan Hussein, anEthiopian academic and writer based in the US state of Minnesota.

"Most activists in the diaspora are people pushed out of the political process and into exile by the current regime in Ethiopia," says MohammedAdemo, an Ethiopian-born journalist in Washington DC. "So they see themselves as stakeholders in the efforts to shape the country's future."

Nowadays they are joined by writers, bloggers and journalists who, alongwith hugely popular satellite television channels broadcast from the US, provide significant coverage about the protests.

"The Oromo has no independent voice at home, all the local media outlets,already too few, are either driven out of the country or state-owned," Mr Hassan says. "The diaspora is simply filling this huge void."

But diaspora influence goes well beyond media coverage. Huge amounts of money are remitted from the US back to Ethiopia. The Oromo are proudof their cultural traditions and enjoy opportunities to celebrate that heritage "With the intensification of protests for the past 12 months, the level has probably increased considerably," says Eloi Ficquet, former director of the French Centre for Ethiopian Studies in Addis Ababa.

Opposition groups in Ethiopia gain significant funding from anti-EPRDF diaspora sources because of scant local options. Consequently, accordingto some, this financial dependency hinders them from attempting politicalcompromise and engagement with the ruling party, which already makes it hard enough. “The government suppresses the peaceful political partiesin this country and people became very hopeless about peaceful political struggle,” says Lidetu Ayele, founder of the local opposition Ethiopia Democratic Party. “So they start listening to political parties across the Atlantic.”

Bogus information

Ethiopia does not just lack effective local opposition. Local independent media does exist – often written in Amharic, hence not noticed by manylabelling Ethiopia one of the world’s most-censored countries – but remains severely hampered compared to state media.

“The government hasn’t allowed an independent media to develop so people turn to diaspora news,” commented an Ethiopian journalist with alocal daily newspaper at an October government press conference. “The government has created this problem for themselves.”

And many in Ethiopia, both locals and foreigners, agree it has become a problem because of the volume of inaccurate or bogus information channelled by social media and overseas activists, often with an all too combustible effect on the ground. Violence at the beginning of October was precipitated by overseas activists calling for “five days of rage” in response to a deadly stampede at an Oromo religious festival after policeand protestors clashed.

However, others argue the protests have sprung organically from a populace bearing numerous longstanding grievances. “They feel left out ofthe so-called Ethiopian economic miracle that the Western press touts ad nauseam despite the grinding poverty all around the country, especially the Amhara region,” Prof Alemante says.

Among those active on Ethiopia’s social media scene, there is also exasperation at the government’s blinkered approach to the dynamics ofmodern communication. “They could probably debunk about half the disinformation if they used social media to provide basic answers,” says Addis Ababa-based blogger Daniel Berhane.

But instead the government relies on its monopoly of television and radiowhile leaving social media uncontested, or for now blocked. “If government does respond, usually it’s too late and the accusation has been accepted as fact,” Mr Daniel says. “Foreign correspondents mostly cover only protests in Addis Ababa,” Mr Mohammed says. “The diaspora has been instrumental in raising awareness about atrocities taking place[elsewhere] in Ethiopia and reporting on protests," the journalist says.

The state of emergency appears to be having the desired effect of restoring order – for now. The EPRDF conducted a significant cabinet reshuffle at the end of October, while promising further reforms.But the general consensus appears that no-one has a clue what may happen next."Ethiopia has an enormous and complex set of problems," says Endalk Chala, one of the founders of the Ethiopian Zone 9 blogging collective.

He is currently studying in the US and remains in exile following the arrests in 2014 of several his fellow Zone 9 bloggers, some of whom arestill facing trial. "But the government embarked on prescribing simple solutions such as declaring a state of emergency and electoral reforms,"he says. "They must bring all concerned Ethiopian opposition political groups both home and abroad to the negotiation table."

ETHIO/CUBA RELATION

Fidel Castro, Cuban Revolutionary Who Defied U.S., Dies at 90

By ANTHONY DePALMA, New York TimesNovember 26, 2016

A spotlight shone on him as he swaggered and spoke with passion untildawn. Finally, white doves were released to signal Cuba's new peace.
When one landed on Mr. Castro, perching on a shoulder, the crowd erupted, chanting "Fidel! Fidel!" To the war-weary Cubans gathered thereand those watching on television, it was an electrifying sign that their young, bearded guerrilla leader was destined to be their savior.

Most people in the crowd had no idea what Mr. Castro planned for Cuba. Amaster of image and myth, Mr. Castro believed himself to be the messiah of his fatherland, an indispensable force with authority from on high to control Cuba and its people.

He wielded power like a tyrant, controlling every aspect of the island's existence. He was Cuba's "Máximo Lider." From atop a Cuban Army tank, he directed his country's defense at the Bay of Pigs. Countless details fell to him, from selecting the color of uniforms that Cuban soldiers wore in Angola to overseeing a program to produce a superbreed of milk cows. Hepersonally set the goals for sugar harvests.

He personally sent countless men to prison. But it was more than repression and fear that kept him and his totalitarian government in power for so long. He had both admirers and detractors in Cuba and around the world. Some saw him as a ruthless despot who trampled rightsand freedoms; many others hailed him as the crowds did that first night, as are revolutionary hero for the ages.

Even when he fell ill and was hospitalized with diverticulitis in the summerof 2006, giving up most of his powers for the first time, Mr. Castro tried todictate the details of his own medical care and orchestrate the continuation of his Communist revolution, engaging a plan as old as the revolution itself. By handing power to his brother, Mr. Castro once more raised the ire of his enemies in Washington. United States officials condemned the transition, saying it prolonged a dictatorship and again denied the long-suffering Cuban people a chance to control their own lives.

But in December 2014, President Obama used his executive powers to dialdown the decades of antagonism between Washington and Havana by moving to exchange prisoners and normalize diplomatic relations betweenthe two countries, a deal worked out with the help of Pope Francis and after 18 months of secret talks between representatives of both governments.

Though increasingly frail and rarely seen in public, Mr. Castro even then made clear his enduring mistrust of the United States. A few days after President Obama's highly publicized visit to Cuba in 2016 — the first by asitting American president in 88 years — Mr. Castro penned a cranky response denigrating Mr. Obama's overtures of peace and insisting that Cuba did not need anything the United States was offering.

To many, Fidel Castro was a self-obsessed zealot whose belief in his own destiny was unshakable, a chameleon whose economic and political colorswere determined more by pragmatism than by doctrine. But in his chest beat the heart of a true rebel. "Fidel Castro," said Dr. Henry M. Wriston, president of the Council on Foreign Relations in the 1950s and early '60s, "was everything a revolutionary should be."
Mr. Castro was perhaps the most important leader to emerge from Latin America since the wars of independence in the early 19th century. He wasdecidedly the most influential shaper of Cuban history since his own hero, José Martí, struggled for Cuban independence in the late 19th century. Mr.Castro's revolution transformed Cuban society and had a longer-lasting impact throughout the region than that of any other 20th-century Latin American insurrection, with the possible exception of the 1910 Mexican Revolution.

His legacy in Cuba and elsewhere has been a mixed record of social progress and abject poverty, of racial equality and political persecution, ofmedical advances and a degree of misery comparable to the conditions that existed in Cuba when he entered Havana as a victorious guerrilla commander in 1959.
That image made him a symbol of revolution throughout the world and aninspiration to many imitators. Hugo Chávez of Venezuela considered Mr. Castro his ideological godfather. Subcommander Marcos began a revolt inthe mountains of southern Mexico in 1994, using many of the same tactics. Even Mr. Castro’s spotty performance as an aging autocrat in charge of a foundering economy could not undermine his established image.

But beyond anything else, it was Mr. Castro’s obsession with the United States, and America’s obsession with him, that shaped his rule. After he embraced Communism, Washington portrayed him as a devil and a tyrantand repeatedly tried to remove him from power through an ill-fated invasion at the Bay of Pigs in 1961, an economic embargo that has lasteddecades, assassination plots and even bizarre plans to undercut his prestige by making his beard fall out. Mr. Castro’s defiance of American power made him a beacon of resistance in Latin America and elsewhere, and his bushy beard, long Cuban cigar and green fatigues became universal symbols of rebellion.

Mr. Castro’s understanding of the power of images, especially on television, helped him retain the loyalty of many Cubans even during the harshest periods of deprivation and isolation when he routinely blamed many of Cuba’s ills on America and its embargo. And his mastery of wordsin thousands of speeches, often lasting hours, imbued many Cubans with his own hatred of the United States by keeping them on constant watch for an invasion — military, economic or ideological — from the north. Surgeon jailed in Ethiopia faces new charges

What does a heart surgeon and an arson got in common or a trumped upcharge?

By Radio Sweden November 27, 2016

A cardiac surgeon from Sweden already imprisoned in Ethiopia for severalyears could be charged with additional crimes, reports Swedish Television.

Fikru Maru was jailed in 2013 and later sentenced to four years and eightmonths for having knowledge of corruption between a minister and a prosecutor. Maru has always denied any wrongdoing. Now, he could be charged in connection with a fire at his prison that killed dozens of inmates in September.

The details surrounding the fire are unclear but Swedish Television in Gävleborg reports that Ethiopian authorities have charged some 38 prisoners in court for causing the deadly blaze. Maru is believed to be oneof them. "They have apparently decided that he will not leave the country," said Maru's lawyer Hans Bagner to news agency TT.

Maru, who is reported to be seriously ill, has served much of his sentence and had hoped to be released early on account of good behavior. The newallegations would greatly complicate his release, Bagner said. Patric Nilsson, an under secretary at the Swedish Foreign Ministry, said the officehas information that an indictment may be on the way. He said the government is working on the case.

Maru's "condition is serious and it is vital that we, together with his family,try to find some solutions so that he can be cared for," Nilsson told TT.

ETHIO/CUBA BILATERAL RELATION

Fidel may be gone, but his legacy lives on

The Washington Post November 27, 2016

On every stage where a Latin American leader launched into soaringoratory against the imperialists, Fidel Castro was present.

In every lonely jungle hideout where olive-drab guerrillas plotted their fight, Castro kept them company. In every country where revolutionariesand communists dreamed of creating a workers' paradise, Castro was a guiding light.

No single figure did more to define generations of Latin Americans who sought political upheaval than Castro. His anti-American rants inspired followers in countries that also saw resources sucked away by local elitesin cahoots with the mighty United States. In nations with extreme inequality, governments took lessons from his state-run economic model.For modern-day strongmen looking for high-minded justifications to seizecontrol of parliaments, courts and the press, he was the man.

These days, many Latin American countries' political and economic ties with Cuba have weakened because of painful recessions and voters' rejection of leftist governments. Leftists in Latin America have little interest in armed revolution anymore. Still, Cuba's influence in the regionendures, both because of its advances in education and health care and because of its example of fierce independence. "Yesterday the greatest ofall Latin Americans died," former Brazilian president Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva wrote on his Facebook page Saturday.

In the 60 years since Castro and his comrades sailed to Cuba from thecoast of Mexico to launch their unlikely rebellion, his story has been anexample for leftists in the region who took up arms against their governments.

Former UN Secretary-general told, “Today I mourn the loss of a friend, thelate Cuban leader Fidel Castro. Securing the welfare of the Cuban people and ensuring the independence of his nation shaped much of Fidel Castro's thinking and many of his actions. Whether one shared his political views or disagreed with them, Fidel Castro was one of Latin America's most remarkable leaders. In the course of his long life he overcame countless adversities and rarely chose the easy and comfortable path. I met Fidel Castro many times over the years and came to appreciate hisextraordinary intellect, sharp mind, and his ability to engage in constructive dialogue. Farewell Fidel!”

You can run, but you can't hide! After Years on the Run, EshetuAlemu Will Face Trial

November 29, 2016 by Eléonore Coeuret

After years on the run to evade justice, a member of former Ethiopian ruler Mengistu Haile Mariam’s Government faces trial for his role in the1970s genocide in the country.

Eshetu Alemu’s trial began in The Hague on 21 November 2016.

Eshetu Alemu is brought to trial for war crimes committed in Ethiopia during the Mengistu era in Gojjam Province. This case is the result of a year-long investigation. Even if Ethiopia has requested extradition there isno treaty to that effect.

Eshetu Alemu has Ethiopian origin but also holds the Dutch nationality. Hewas serving as a member of the Provisional Military Administrative Councilduring the reign of the Duerg, the Coordinating Committee of the Armed Forces, Police, and Territorial Army that ruled Ethiopia from 1974 to 1987 and which elected Mengistu Haile Mariam’s as its chairman.

He has already been convicted and sentenced to death in absentia in Ethiopia on December 12, 2006 by the Duerg-Tribunal in its 12 years ‘RedTerror’ trials, during which former President Mengistu was also convicted for genocide. Eshetu Alemu was among the dozens of the dreaded council’s members who fled into exile.

The International Crime Chamber in the District Court of The Hague (“Rechtbank ‘s-Gravenhage”) is dealing with the case. The District Courtof The Hague additionally hears matters related to international criminallaw and international law more generally.

Eshetu Alemu is presumably involved in:

• Imprisonment and maltreatment of 321 people between February andAugust 1978

• Torture of 9 prisoners between February and August 1978

• Murder of 75 prisoners from August 1978

Moreover, eleven Ethiopian’s witnesses will be questioned in the UnitedStates of America by one judge, one prosecutor and one Dutch lawyer residing in the United States.

During the reign of Duerg, the estimated number of killing amounted to about 50,000 dissident students, political opponents and members of theEthiopian middle class.

The majority of those murders took place during the 1977-1978 ‘Red Terror’, which was a campaign of urban counter-insurgency waged by theDuerg in the main cities of Ethiopia during which excessive violence was used to terrify the population and eliminate dissent.

According to Human Rights Watch, the Red Terror was one of the most systematic usGambian President, Yahya Jammeh Calls President-elect ToConcede Defeat

Gambian ruler Yahya Jammeh has conceded defeat to rival Adama Barrowafter the presidential polls.

Gambia’s electoral commission says opposition candidate Adama Barrowwon an upset victory in the country’s presidential poll, beating longtime ruler Jammeh after 22-year reign. Of conceding defeat, just as Nigeria’sformer President, Goodluck Jonathan did after the 2015 presidential elections: es of mass murder by the state ever witnessed in Africa.

Leading opposition leader Merera Gudina arrested after EU visit

Gudina accused of 'violating state of emergency' by attending European Parliament hearing in Brussels.Ethiopia has arrested leading opposition leader Merera Gudina after he returned from a trip to Europe. Gurdina wasarrested upon his arrival at the airport in the capital Addis Ababa, according to the English private magazine Addis Standard. Gudina had travelled to Brussels where he alleged, during a hearing at the European Parliament, that Ethiopian security forces had committed human rights violations during recent unrest in the country.
It is believed Gudina called for the parliament in Addis Ababa to be dissolved and for the establishment of a transitional government, theopposition website Ethiopian Satellite Television ESAT reported.

ESAT added Gudina was arrested by the command post, founded to oversee the implementation of a state of emergency Ethiopia declared inOctober following months of anti-government protests in Oromia and Amhara regions.

Media outlets affiliated with the government had been campaigning for hisarrest, claiming Gudina had violated the state of emergency by attending the hearing at the European parliament, ESAT continued.

Professor Berhanu Nega, the leader of Patriotic Ginbot 7 – which Ethiopialabelled as a terrorist organisation – and Olympic marathon silver medallist Feyisa Lilesa were also present at the hearing.

Lilesa failed to return to Ethiopia after he staged a protest against allegedhuman rights abuses committed by his government earlier this year. The runner crossed his arms over his head after he crossed the finish line of the men's marathon in Rio de Janeiro on 21 August. Ethiopia security forces have detained leading opposition figure Prof. Merera Gudina upon his arrival at airport.

Ethiopia updates : Arrest of opposition leader an outrageousassault on freedom of expression

December 1, 2016,

Reacting to news of the arrest of Ethiopian opposition leader Merera Gudina, Amnesty International's Deputy Director for East Africa, the Hornand the Great Lakes, Michelle Kagari said: "The arrest of Merera Gudina isan outrageous assault on the right to freedom of expression and should sound alarm bells for anyone with an interest in ending the deadly protests that have rocked Ethiopia over the past year."

"This is a move that will exacerbate, rather than ease, the underlying tensions currently simmering in the country. Instead of resorting to further repression and clamp-downs, the Ethiopian government must urgently and meaningfully address the human rights grievances that arefuelling unrest."

The ethnic-Afar & The Unity of Ethiopia:

The Afar, also known as the Danakhil, are an ethnic group largely found innortheastern Ethiopia. The Afar people predominately live in the Afar Region of Ethiopia and in northern Djibouti, although some also inhabit the southern point of present Eritrea.

“The people of Afar, like any other Ethiopians, are proud of their heritage and history. We are one with all Ethiopians. No one can make excuses andtake this identity from the Afar people. Only the forces who are anti-Afar people will make claims of separation. We will not hesitate to expose themfor what they are. This must be done for the unity of our people.” said Sultan Hanfare Ali Mirrah Hanfare, the traditional leader of the Afars in Ethiopia. The Afar of Ethiopia, Djibouti and Eritrea and the Saho of Ethiopia and Eritrea are linguistically and, depending on the area, culturally and traditionally similar.

Merera Gudina’s arrest signals end of Oromo opposition in Ethiopia

December 1, 2016

(OPride) — Ethiopian security forces on Wednesday arrested prominentOromo opposition leader, Merera Gudina, upon his return from a trip toBrussels, where he met with EU parliamentarians. He is accused of violating Ethiopia’s six-month state of emergency decreed in October.

Merera’s crime?

Being pictured with Oromo athlete and Olympic hero Feyisa Lilesa and theleader of the opposition Patriotic Ginbot 7, Berhanu Nega, during a November 9 hearing at the European Parliament. Among other things, themartial law forbids “communicating” with groups that Ethiopia considers terrorists and anti-peace elements.

Merera, chairman of the Oromo Federalist Congress (OFC), the only Oromo opposition in Ethiopia, has been a fixture in Ethiopian politics sincethe 1960s and a vocal critic of the incumbent regime. He is also the vice- chairman of Ethiopia’s main legal opposition party, the coalition EthiopianFederal Democratic Unity Forum (MEDREK). Merera, a former member of parliament, is known for his sharp and witty rebuke of those in power, which he often deployed eloquently while speaking to foreign journalists.

With Merera’s arrest, now almost all of OFC’s senior leadership is in jail. Six of Merera’s colleagues, including Deputy Chairman Bekele Gerba and Assistant General Secretary Dejene Xafa, are on terrorism trial accused ofinciting the Oromo protests. The party’s general secretary Bekele Nega has been under virtual house arrest since December 2015. Most of the party’s rank-and-file, as well as district level officers, are also behind bars.

The ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) follows a two-pronged strategy with respect to the opposition. Through itsrhetoric, EPRDF says it seeks a robust multi-party democracy and usually laments the lack of a vibrant opposition. However, it waits "for the opposition to grow legs, and then cut them off" — leaving a few leaders like Merera "floating in the air." In fact, while the authorities repeatedly accused Gerba and other OFC leaders for being rabble-rousers, they conveniently pointed to Merera as evidence of their tolerance for peacefulopposition. "Look," EPRDF's public relations spin doctors argued, "we are not against all opposition. For example, Dr. Merara, a vocal critic of the government, walks free."

Now it appears that both the heads and legs of the Oromo opposition havebeen cut off. Merera's arrest may herald the end of Oromo legal opposition as we know it. His arrest came on the same day that Ethiopia's defense minister and secretary of the command post, Siraj Fergessa, held talks with the opposition. The next time Ethiopian authorities want to sit down with the Oromo opposition in the country, they might as well meet the leaders where they are—at Qilinto or Maekelawi prisons.

In a letter addressed to Federica Mogherini, the Vice-President of European Commission, European parliament member Ana Maria Gomes,who invited Merera to Brussels, called for "a more stringent approach" from the EU, adding the Ethiopian government " is not listening" to callsthat it "address the grievances of the population, open democratic spaceand respect the population's fundamental freedom." The EPRDF regime is struggling to contain sustained and widespread protests in Oromia and Amhara states, which together pose the most serious threat to its power in its quarter of a century rule. More than 1,000 people have been killed in Oromia alone since the protests began inNovember 2015. Since the imposition of martial law, the regime disclosedthat it detained 11,000 people. In reality, tens of thousands have been arrested across Oromia and Amhara regions in connection with the protests.

The state of emergency has brought about a temporary lull in street protests. But, away from the glare of media and amid internet shutdown and restrictive emergency measures, security forces have continued theirunprecedented witch-hunt against activists, journalists and artists.

EPRDF leaders, embroiled in growing internal discord, appear unable and unwilling to heed the protesters' demands. Instead, they continue to applyband-aid solutions such as a symbolic cabinet shuffle, which ignore the protesters' calls for systemic changes. The ongoing crackdown has brought the country to a standstill. Investors are increasingly skittish. Theeconomy has taken a huge nose dive.

Ethiopia's military rulers cannot arrest their way out of the current crisis.The tide is turning against the possibility of a nonviolent solution to Ethiopia's political crisis. In his 2014 book, Ethiopia's Chaotic Political Journey and My Memoirs, Merera wrote, "a starving society left with nothing to eat will eat its leaders."

As the military expenditure from the state of emergency deployment pilesup and loss of foreign investment takes increasing toll, his warnings may soon prove prophetic. Unless the ruling party reverses course, Ethiopia's crisis likely to go from bad to worse.

HISTORICIZE

Dr. (HAKIM) WORKINEH EHSETE (1865-1960s?) - FIRST WESTERNTRAINED ETHIOPIAN PHYSICIAN/SURGEON

Reminiscenses by Prof Richard Pankhurst:

Historian, author and commentator Professor Richard Pankhurst talks about the renowned intellectual, statesman, diplomat and Ethiopia's firstwestern trained physician, Hakim Workneh Eshete (also known as Dr.
Charles Martin). In an article published in the Capital newspaper, the mostprolific writer on Ethiopian historical matters reviews two recent books that saw the light of the day on the historical figure.

Hakim Workneh, aka Dr Charles Martin, was the first Ethiopian I ever met,and the first Ethiopian doctor to give me medical advice – albeit only onceor twice during my childhood. Hakim Workneh, who was an important figure in Ethiopian history, is the subject of two recent biographies. He came from a prominent Gondar family that, for one reason or another –we do not know precisely why – was attached to Emperor Tewodros's court at Maqdala.

The family was there at the historic moment when Robert Napier's expedition launched its assault on the Emperor's citadel. Workneh, then about three years old, was in the care of his aunt, herself little more thana child, who, on hearing the noise of battle, fled the scene. This was not surprising, as an Ethiopian royal chronicle of this time reports that the commotion was terrible. Workneh meanwhile realizing that he had been abandoned by his guardian, rushed about like a mad thing, looking for anyone he knew – but to no avail.

The British, seeing him in this condition, jumped to the conclusion that hemust be an orphan. This, given the large number of Ethiopians killed in the preceding fighting, was not an unreasonable supposition.Several British officers, feeling a sense of responsibility for the assumed “orphan” − and lacking any way of ascertaining his identity, thought it best to take him back with them to India, from where their expedition had emanated. There, they proposed to give him a Christian education. Though already baptized in Ethiopia, the waif was accordingly re-baptized in India – and was educated at the expense of two British officers, Colonels Chamberlainand Martin. He was accordingly re-named Charles Martin.

In the years that followed, Martin, as we must now call him, received a good education, partly under the auspices of the British-based Church Missionary Society, from which he learnt the “golden rule” to “do as you would be done by”. He went to school in India, Burma and Britain. This enabled him to qualify in due course as Ethiopia’s first modern-trained physician and surgeon. His story is told in two recent monographs. The first, in Amharic, is thus widely accessible in Ethiopia. It is by Ato Tadele Bitul and is entitled YeAzazh Hakim Warqnah Eshetu YeHiwyot Tarik (Addis Ababa, 2000). The second, by Professor Peter Garretson, entitled AVictorian Gentleman & Ethiopian Nationalist. The Life & Times of Hakim Warqnah, Dr. Charles Martin (James Currey, London, 2012). Professor Garretson had access to Hakim Workneh’s diaries and was thereby able toprovide a more in-depth account of this remarkable son of Ethiopia.

On acquiring his medical qualifications Martin, accepted a medical post with the British colonial administration in Burma. This assured him relativeprosperity, but tied him to British employment. He did not however forget his Ethiopian identity – and dreamt of one day visiting his ancient motherland.

The opportunity to do just that seemed to strike in March 1896 when Menelik defeated the Italians at the battle of Adwa, and there appeared apossibility of a European-trained physician being sent out to treat the Ethiopian wounded, who were entirely lacking in modern medical facilities.The young Ethiopian patriot took the leave to which he was entitled, packed his bags, and set forth for Africa, but travelled only as far as the port of Zeila in the then British Somali Protectorate. There, his leave from the Burma-based British medical service expired – and he felt obliged to abandon his planned journey to his beloved, but seemingly elusive Motherland. All, however, was not lost, for while in Zeila he met the British Commissioner, John Lane Harrington, who was subsequently appointed the first British envoy to Ethiopia. He told Menelik of his medicalcompatriot in far-off Asia. The Emperor, a great modernizer, was naturallymuch fascinated – and facilitated Martin’s eventual home-coming.

All this, dear reader, was a far more complicated story than I present to you here. Suffice it to say that

Martin was discovered by his Ethiopian family from whom he learnt that his original name was Workneh. He duly entered Menelik's service – which posed no small problem as employmentin Ethiopia was traditionally rewarded by land grants rather than a monthly wage to which the good young Ethiopian doctor was accustomedto in Burma and India. Workneh, as we now know him, nonetheless elected to return to Ethiopia, and on retiring from British Colonial Medical Service decided to settle there for good. He gradually emerged as one of the country's great modernizing spirits.

Workneh, who subsequently entered the service of Ras Teferi Mekonnen (the future Emperor Haile Selassie), accompanied the latter on his ground-breaking European tour of 1924. A notable advocate of modern education, Workneh was critical of the Egyptian teachers in the old Menelik School, founded by the monarch of that name in 1908, and urgedTeferi to establish a more modern Europe-oriented school: the Teferi Mekonnen School at which he served as administrator. He was a keen supporter of English rather than the prevailing French, as Ethiopia's foreign language of instruction.

Workneh was one of the foremost Ethiopian opponents of slavery and theslave trade, and on being appointed governor of Chercher Province, in theeast of the country, did much to bring both these institutions in that region to an end. All in all, he gained a reputation as a progressive administrator.

He is however probably best remembered, as I remember him personally,as perhaps Ethiopia's ablest and most loyal pre-war diplomat – who was appointed as his country's Minister, i.e. Ambassador, to Britain in 1935, now seeming so long ago. As such his views on the evolution of Anglo- Ethiopian relations (reproduced by Garretson) are worthy of attention.

The Destabilizations In Djibouti And Ethiopia Are Being ExploitedAgainst China

BY Andrew Korybko

The northeastern reaches of the African continent have been maligned in the Western imagination as a place of dire suffering, war, and famine, butsomewhat surprisingly, the region had remained relatively stable over thepast decade, barring of course a few exceptions. All of that now seems ready to be reversed, however, with destabilizing events returning as the regional norm. Whereas the previous ten years of moderate stability and growth can be attributed to China's positive involvement in the Horn, the forthcoming years of uncertainty are directly linked to the US and Saudi Arabia's efforts to dislodge China from the region and bring it closer to theunipolar fold. As a result, it can objectively be proclaimed that the New Cold War between the unipolar and multipolar blocs has officially penetrated this part of Africa.

This briefing isn't structured to be an in-depth report on the region and itshistorical development and intra-regional relations, but rather a run-downof what's happening in the Horn of Africa and why. For that reason, it shouldn't be taken to be absolutely comprehensive in its scope, and forthcoming research might be necessary to shed light on a few of its political-strategic nuances. The purpose is simply to bring attention to thelatest developments in this part of the world and explain how they relate to one of the New Cold War's objectives in 'containing China'.

Here's what's been transpiring lately in each of the Horn of Africa states, with additional analysis about how this relates to the larger proxy strugglethat's presently being waged:

Sudan

This country used to be mostly independent in its foreign policy dealings and has historically been a victim of the US' covert subterfuge, but in recent years, the government has drifted ever closer to Saudi Arabia, one of the US' prime Lead From Behind proxies and Sudan's maritime neighbor across the Red Sea. To condense a few decades of history into a short summary, Sudan has faced numerous CIA-sponsored insurgencies throughout the decades due to its rich natural resource wealth, with the two most notable being the ones fought in South Sudan and Darfur. After the former's US-overseen succession, the separatist sentiment migrated across the new frontier and has now infected South Kordofan and Blue Nile states, while low-intensify violence continues to occasionally plague Darfur. As a result of Khartoum's handling of the Darfur Separatist War, President Omar al-Bashir has been accused of war crimes and is subject to ICC arrest, although numerous states continue to flaunt the Western- controlled court's politically motivated order. The US has also placed thecountry on the State Department's "state sponsors of terrorism" list in order to enact sanctions and up the asymmetrical pressure against its legitimate government.

South Sudan's secession in 2011 deprived Sudan of the oil wealth on which it previously used to rely, giving it power only over the transit routes through which the resource must pass in order to reach its Red Seaexport terminals. In a short period of time, the two states predictably emerged at odds with another over this arrangement, thus inflicting mutually disadvantageous economic pain on each of them (and much to the US' divide-and-rule benefit). Crippled even further by the monumentaldrop in oil prices over the past year, Sudan has been forced into a precarious pecuniary position that's compelled its government to backtrack on its formerly multipolar policies and fall under the guiding sway of Saudi Arabia. For example, the New York Times revealed in 2013 that Sudan was actively participating as a covert weapons conduit to Syrian-based terrorists, and in early 2015 it joined the Saudis' War on Yemen in exchange for $2.2 billion. In mid-December, it also jumped on the bandwagon and became party to Riyadh's "anti-terrorist" coalition.

Being so chummy with the unipolar world's most notorious Mideast proxy, it's little wonder then that Sudan's director of the National Intelligence andSecurity Services has oddly taken to bragging about his organization's positive relationship with the CIA. Sudan has been geopolitically, economically, and 'judiciously' (in terms of the US-influenced ICC warrant)abused to such an extent by the US that its leadership has developed a form of Stockholm Syndrome and is now groveling at the feet of its oppressors. It believes that blindly currying favor with Saudi Arabia, it's new patron (and in such a role only because the US' economic war againstit has placed it in a situation so desperate so as to make it receptive to Riyadh's outreaches [note: this is an explanation not an excuse]), will somehow translate into a lessening of the US' asymmetrical war against itand reprieve it of the unwarranted punishment that it's been undergoing. Little does Sudan realize, however, that the chief reason for its latest woes has been because the US wants to pressure it to renege on its strategic cooperation with China and submit wholly to the Saudis' Wahhabist authority instead. The US won't stop until Chinese influence is totally ejected from the country and replaced by its Saudi counterparts, and even then, there's no guarantee that it'll abstain from supporting future separatist wars if it believes the geostrategic dividends to be worth it.

Eritrea

The author published a long-running analysis on this country's unexpectedrelationship with the GCC and the consequences that it could have for Ethiopia, and it's kindly requested that the reader reference this for full details. As an abridged summary, Eritrea's economic desolation and international 'isolation' (it's sanctioned by the UNSC for its supposed support of Al Shabaab terrorists in Somalia) have put it in an unenviable position that's made its leadership eager to clinch partnerships wherever possible, even with the Saudis and their GCC ilk. For this reason, Eritrea ishosting a UAE naval facility and allowing its airspace (and some reports even say, 400 of its own troops as well) to be used in the War on Yemen, completely reversing whatever accolades it was previously given for takinga strong stand against 'imperialism'. Of extraordinarily relevant note, Eritrea is also engaged in a heated rivalry with its former ruler Ethiopia, and this tense dynamic continually holds out the threat of spilling over into armed violence in the future. With Eritrea now under the GCC's protective wing, Asmara might feel emboldened to provoke Ethiopia in thecontext of the unresolved Badme village dispute (the cause of the bloody 1998-2000 war).

Djibouti

This tiny former French colony is one of the most strategic naval outposts in the world, playing host to American, French, and Japanese bases, with a Chinese facility slated to join it in the near future. It's also the only reliable access point for interacting with the burgeoning Ethiopian market,predicted to be one of the world's fastest growing economies in the future.To facilitate Ethiopia's development, China, one of the country's most prized strategic partners, is building a railroad from Djibouti to the capital of Addis Ababa. This transnational connective infrastructure project could rightly be termed the "Horn of Africa Silk Road" for the prosperity that it's envisioned to bring to all of those who participate in it. Just as much as the Horn needs China's regional Silk Road, so too does China need the Horn's marketplace, since outbound investment is the main reason why the One Belt One Road global project was initiated in the first place. This corner of Africa (Ethiopia to be specific) is supposed to function as an integral destination for Chinese investment projects and real-sector economic interaction and will play a key role in China's balanced growth inthe future years to come. This strategic imperative makes Djibouti even more important to China than initially meets the eye, and considering this factor as well as China's forthcoming base in the country, it's somewhat expected that the US would try to destabilize the government there as a form of asymmetrical punishment.

Lo and behold, that's exactly what's been happening in Djibouti over the past week. A "religious celebration" (curiously with no other details aboutthis event described) turned into an all-out anti-government riot during which over a dozen people were killed and a handful of "opposition" leaders arrested shortly thereafter. The US has made an effort to vocally condemn the government's response to the crisis and urge it to release the jailed "opposition" leaders and "exercise restraint" ahead of a presidential election in April. For its part, the government blames the violence on people "who act from abroad" and want to "destabilize [the] nation and sow divisions". Analyzing the coverage over what's happened and taking into account the US' history of regime change provocations, it seems very probable that a Wahhabist or Muslim Brotherhood gathering inthe capital was to blame for the unrest, as no unipolar outlet dared to mention any other details about the "religious celebration" that sparked the whole conflagration (a tactic that's usually employed when their own radical terrorist proxies are to blame). Also, Djibouti has earned the consternation of Saudi Arabia and its GCC allies for resisting their appeals to open a base there for use in the War on Yemen, ergo why they had to seek out Eritrea's assistance instead. Qatar is also "monitoring" the Eritrean-Djiboutian border since 2010 as part of its UN responsibilities in mediating the 2008 crisis between the two, so it's already within easy operational range of managing a Muslim Brotherhood uprising if it so chooses.

To make matters even more gripping, Djibouti for some reason decided tojoin the Saudis' "anti-terrorist" coalition, but in hindsight, this might proveto be its leadership's ultimate misstep. With the country at mercy of Riyadh's definition of "terrorism", any justifiable statements it makes about the "religious celebrators" being Wahhabi or Muslim Brotherhood terrorists will fall on deaf ears and be discredited by Djibouti's own "anti- terrorist" coalition members. At the same time, the anti-government provocation that just took place might even form an eventual pretext for aunilateral Saudi-led "anti-terrorist" 'intervention' there in order to capture the country's strategic infrastructure and misappropriate it from China (in accordance with the US' wishes). Additionally, the upcoming April presidential election is a 'trigger' event for 'justifying' a Color Revolution and all of the resultant tangential destabilization that comes with it. The objective, naturally, is to overthrow long-serving President Ismail Omar Guelleh (in office sine 1999) and replace him with a pro-US/GCC puppet (a Djiboutian version of Yemen's Hadi) or subserviate him into complying with the unipolar world's anti-Chinese wishes.

Ethiopia

This millennia-old country's strategic significance vis-à-vis China was already touched upon in the above subsection and is explored thoroughly in the earlier cited article about the GCC's new relationship with Eritrea, but expanding on this a bit, it looks probable that Ethiopia could become acontinental leader if it continues along its state-driven development trajectory. Addis Ababa has very close ties with Beijing, but at the same time, it's also warming up to Washington, having hosted President Obamaduring his summer visit to the country earlier this year, the first-ever for asitting US President. Ethiopia also invaded Somalia in 2006 to remove the Islamic Courts Union from power, thereby demonstrating that it had an overlap of military-strategic interest with the US, which also wanted the group overthrown, and didn't shy away from doing its bidding. Nearly a decade later, China visibly has more influence over Ethiopia and it appearsthat this will remain a constant so long as the present government is able to maintain power, but therein lays the supreme structural vulnerability.

Simmering domestic discontent fueled by ethnic tension, NGOs, and foreign patrons is threatening to violently return the formerly war-torn country back to its fratricidal past. The Oromo ethnicity, the largest plurality in the country at around 35% of the population, has been fiercelyprotesting against the government's plans to take and develop some of their land around the capital. Nearly 100 people have since been killed, with the government accusing the protesters of attacking police during their uncontrollable rioting around this contentious issue. The Oromo havevowed to continue their protests and the crisis is primed for rapid escalation in the coming weeks.

The Huffington Post, generally known as the mouth piece for part of the US establishment's hyper liberal-progressive 'values-based' policies, even ran an attack piece against Ethiopia earlier this week, thereby demonstrating that a strong level of social and psychological conditioning is underway in order to prepare the American public and others for a possibly prolonged destabilization. Foreign Policy also jumped in the mix and wrote its own anti-government piece about the protests, obviously motivated by the implicitly anti-Chinese consequences that this developingcrisis could engender. It's even conceivable that the ongoing revolt could evolve into an all-out anti-government insurgency that links up with other ethnic groups (most likely the Ogaden-based Somalis), tactically mirroringthe Ethiopian Civil War that preceded it. The difference between then and now, however, would be that the insurgency wouldn't be based in the northern part of the country, but the central-eastern portions of it, and might even involve Al Shabaab. Speaking of the latter, there's also the chance that the jihadist factor could play a large role, too, and the bombing of an Addis Ababa mosque earlier this month might not be 'coincidental' when seen in the larger scope of events that have since been unleashed.

To revert back to the focus on the Oromo protests, the reason that they could be a trigger for a large-scale nationwide destabilization is because Ethiopia's capital is completely surrounded by their ethnic-based state, and thus, any municipal expansion in one of Africa's fastest-growing metropolises must inevitably encroach on their territory. By and large, thisplausibly sounds like a legitimate enough reason to protest, but the finer details raise questions about the movement's legality. The Ethiopian Constitution, agreed to after the civil war and which granted the main ethnic groups their constituent identity-based states, stipulates that private individuals don't have any land rights and that it is the state's responsibility to allocate territory as is seen fit. As controversial as this may sound to outsiders, one would do well to remember that this is the official law of the land and was agreed to by all of the victorious parties that emerged from the civil war. It wasn't a problem at all until Western- sponsored NGOs came into the country and started politicizing the issue among the Oromo ethnicity, knowing full well that sooner or later the Constitution's stipulation would have to be applied to their territory as thecapital inevitably grew past its rigidly defined municipal boundaries.

Somalia

The last piece of the Horn of Africa puzzle to be involved in the latest boutof regional destabilization is Somalia. The UN has recognized that the country is no longer a failed state but a "recovering, fragile country", though this has no impact whatsoever on the socio-political vulnerabilitiesthat make the country susceptible to external destabilization. Al Shabaab continues to use the nation's territory as a base for attacking Kenyan interests, and this has the potential to draw the East African state deeper into the "recovering, fragile country's" domestic affairs under an anti- terrorist aegis. For example, Kenya responded to the latest failed terror attack against a busload of people by bombing targets in southern Somalia, which is sure to draw the ire of Al Shabaab and circuitously inspire more attacks.

The author doesn't mean at all to condemn or criticize the Kenyan authorities for their action, but simply to draw attention to the fact that Al Shabaab is the perfect "Reverse Brzezinski" vehicle for tricking neighboring states into preplanned quagmires. Al Shabaab is closely linked with Qatar, and this fact has even been reported on by Western media outlets like the Washington Post. The author spoke at length about the connection between Qatar, Eritrea, and Al Shabaab in his earlier piece for Katehon about the GCC's involvement in Eritrea, but the main idea wasthat Doha wants to use its terrorist proxies as a weapon against Ethiopia, and the group's Somali ethnicity might be used to attract adherents of the "Greater Somalia" idea to engage in guerrilla warfare in the Somali- populated Ogaden region of Ethiopia.

To address the Kenyan connection, this country is being targeted by Al Shabaab and its US and Gulf sponsors because of its close infrastructure cooperation with China. Beijing is building a railroad (the "East African SilkRoad") that will connect the port of Mombasa with Nairobi and Uganda, thereby helping to tap into the resources (both natural and in terms of labor) that are present in Africa's Great Lakes region. Along the northern coast of Kenya and closer to the Somali-populated formerly titled North Eastern Province (Kenya now has a plethora of counties in place of its previous provinces), China is investing almost half a billion dollars in LamuPort as part of its strategy of engagement with the country. Somalia, therefore, occupies a very strategy position in destabilizing both of China'sregional Silk Road ambitions, and it shouldn't be seen as a random event that the country signed on to the Saudis' "anti-terrorist" coalition.

The Somali government is obviously against its territory being used by any sort of terrorist group and for whatever destabilizing ends they or their patrons may have in mind, but it's so weak and near-powerless that it's not in any realistic position to prevent this from happening regardless.The new federalization of the country, which is still being progressively institutionalized, doesn't substantially cover the separatist and largely independent Puntland and Somaliland regions, and from the vantage pointof the federal government in Mogadishu, the priority is in restoring the country's territorial integrity first (now that an internationally recognized, albeit symbolic, 'national' government has been installed) and only then going against the terrorist groups active on its territory. Until that time arrives, and realistically speaking it will likely be a long way's off in the future, then Somalia will continue to be the springboard for terrorist groups like Al Shabaab to continue carrying out their patrons' orders in destabilizing Ethiopia and Kenya, all with the larger (if formally unstated) intent of fulfilling the US' goal to 'contain China' and evict it from the region.

The Saudis' "Anti-Terrorist" Coalition As Part Of TheEncirclement Of Ethiopia

Everything that's been described thus far has been a verifiable chronicle ofthe GCC using regional springboards (Eritrea and Somalia) and provocations (like in Djibouti) to further their implicit anti-Ethiopian goals.Even if that isn't the immediate intent of their actions (though it convincingly does look to have played a guiding role), given these states' junior status to the US unipolar hegemon, sooner or later they'll be called to act on the geostrategic advantages that they've obtained in order to carry out Washington's regime change agenda in destabilizing Ethiopia. Aswas argued throughout this piece, the whole reason for that is because the over 100 million people living in this Horn of Africa state are a critical marketplace that China absolutely must tap into in order to sustain its balanced growth in the coming decades and bring substance to its One Belt One Road strategy on the continent. Considering this, then the strategic situation looks increasingly dire for the China-Ethiopia Partnership, with the Gulf States having encircled most of the country through their official engagements with Sudan, Eritrea, Djibouti, and Somalia in some capacity or another (be it the War on Yemen like with Eritrea, the "anti-terrorist" coalition like Somalia, or a hybrid of both such as in Sudan).

The geopolitics of the Horn of Africa are dramatically shifting, having always been a subject of out-of-regional rivalry for some time, but never to the degree that they presently are nowadays. The end of the Cold War brought about an end to the US-Soviet competition in the region and mostly gave the US the advantageous momentum needed to carry out its hegemonic designs there. The "War on Terror" concentrated America's focus in the heart of the Mideast (Iraq), though with time and the Pentagon's heel-dragging conventional retreat, this focus was progressively widened once more to include the "Greater Mideast", which geographically includes a large part of the Horn of Africa, and taking asidethe religious-'civilizational' inferences, unquestionably incorporates Ethiopia as well. The period between 2001 and 2015 was the strategic window of opportunity through which China entered the Horn of Africa andbegan swaying Sudan, Ethiopia, and Djibouti (to an extent) away from theunipolar umbrella and towards the multipolar vision, although it eventuallyproved to be ideologically (although not pragmatically) unsuccessful in thecase of Sudan, which has now quite literally sold out to the Saudis. Be that as it is, China is clearly the chief economic actor in the region, although Saudi Arabia is now rushing to play catch-up by using its oil largesse (despite the presently low price and its steadily dwindling financial reserves) to buy new friends in this geostrategic region. Both Riyadh and Beijing understand quite rightly how important the Horn of Africa is, as this region of the world abuts the only maritime gateway between the EU and the Indian Ocean, and henceforth to Southeast and East Asia.

The Saudi-Chinese Cold War In The Horn Of AfricaSaudi Inroads:

Understood in the manner that it's been argued to this point, the Horn of Africa is the newest battleground in the New Cold War, with a subsect competition, the Saudi-Chinese Cold War, being the driving factor behind the region's forthcoming destabilization. The US is incapable of dedicatingthe required about of its time and resources towards carrying out the mission of blocking China in this geo-critical area, ergo why it has subcontracted these responsibilities to its Lead From Behind partners in the Gulf, Saudi Arabia, and Qatar Each of these has their own motivationsfor positioning themselves in such a way as to pressure Ethiopia at a future time, and this is being done despite the Saudis' strategic agricultural cooperation with the country. In fact, it can even be argued that the Saudis are engaging in a 'good cop, bad cop' type of routine vis- à-vis Ethiopia with Qatar, since Doha has had rocky relations with Addis Ababa before, but Riyadh is officially in its good graces and was even invited by the Prime Minister to invest more in the country back in October. This is a clear sign that Ethiopia doesn't quite recognize the danger that is developing around it or that it is trying to be diplomatically

'polite' to the point of publicly avoiding any antagonizing and unconstructive statements about the nearby hegemon (though it did warnthe GCC against using their Eritrean port for anti-Ethiopian ends). As a matter of fact, Ethiopia needs capital investment from all sources, not justChina, so in a pecuniary sense, it's open to Gulf money so long as it's depoliticized, and especially if this helps to mitigate any disruptive scenarios that might be planned against it by intertwining it and the investor state in a relationship of complex interdependence.

Normative Differences:
Before continuing, it's insightful to describe a curious element of the identity dichotomy between the two rivals, Saudi Arabia and China. SaudiArabia is a Wahhabist state driven by violent evangelizing principles, whereas China is officially an atheist state that pragmatically accommodates for the plurality of beliefs within it and has no atheisticallyproselytizing designs on its partners. Most of the countries in the Horn of Africa are Muslim, and even majority-Christian Ethiopia has a substantial Muslim minority, yet this religious factor seems not to play a determiningrole whatsoever in why Sudan and Djibouti started enhancing their cooperation with China. If anything, it proves that Samuel Huntington's thesis about a "Clash of Civilizations" is a cursory surface assessment about demographic similarities between select partners but not an actual 'law' of international relations that can withstand the type of scrutiny currently being applied against it. Nothing in his writings explains why atheist China was the premier partner of Sharia-adhering Sudan for mostof the 2000s, for example, but his thoughts do play a role in the current radicalization of religious elements in these majority-Muslim countries.
Partly because of this, Ethiopia is predicted to feel even closer with China in the future (aside from all of the other reasons it has for this [strategic, economic, political, etc.]) because Beijing is ardently opposed to any formof religious extremism, especially those that eventually take the form of terrorism.

Hybrid War Threat:

That being said, as seen through a geopolitical-strategic prism, Saudi Arabia is obviously angling to position itself in as advantageous of a placeas possible for pressuring Ethiopia in the future, and this is why Addis Ababa needs Beijing so much. Bridging the two partners is Djibouti, whichto remind the reader, is about to play host to China's first-ever foreign military base and is the terminal point for the Djibouti-Addis Ababa railroad that China is financing. It's also no coincidence that "religious celebrations" (which can only be Muslim in this context since Djibouti is overwhelmingly a Muslim state) suddenly turned into violent anti- government riots just a few months prior to a presidential election that the US may be trying to sabotage. Sudan, Eritrea, and Somalia are peripheral partners in the US/GCC plan for containing Ethiopia, and it looks like attention is now being placed on the geostrategic chokepoint of Djibouti, the narrow bottleneck connecting the Ethiopian economy with itsChinese counterparts.

It can't be ruled out that the destabilization in Djibouti will find a way to become transnational, most likely through the exploitation of the Afar ethnicity (35% of the Djibouti population) and their neighboring communities in Eritrea and Ethiopia. The former has a small proportion of this demographic while the latter has an entire state dedicated to them, but altogether, they form a geographically wide 'stateless nation' that could potentially be riled up into action by radical imams and/or Western NGOs. The broadening of Djibouti's destabilization to Afar minority groups in Eritrea and Ethiopia might prove to be the spark that's needed to returnthe two rivals to the brink of a mutually disastrous war, whereby anti- Ethiopian Oromo and Somali elements could be called upon to assist in thestruggle and open up a debilitating second front.

Concluding Thoughts

The Horn of Africa has returned to capturing global headlines with domestic disturbances in Djibouti and Ethiopia seemingly popping out of nowhere. The truth, however, is much more complicated and nefarious, aspreexisting and legitimate internal grievances stand to be exploited by foreign actors with their own self-interested geopolitical agendas. Sadly, as is typically the case in these situations, this state of affairs has already proven itself capable of leading to bloodshed and claiming people's lives, unnecessarily and purposefully escalating what otherwise could have beenlow-intensify political engagements.

Everything that's happening in these two countries can't be separated from the international context in which they occurred, which is the US' larger New Cold War against multipolar Great Powers like China, in the specific context of which it seeks to use Saudi Arabia and the GCC as the Lead From Behind designee for evicting Beijing from the Horn of Africa. Itgoes without saying that AFRICOM is playing a coordinating role in managing the GCC and NGO actions in this broad theater and most likelyin these two specific instances, with Saudi Arabia being subcontracted responsibility for bringing Sudan, Eritrea, and Somalia into the militant fold.

The Horn of Africa has historically laid at the crossroads of Africa and theMideast, but as the world enters 2016, it has also found itself as the crossroads of unipolarity and multipolarity, destabilization and development, and the path that it takes is dependent on the course that the New Cold War's latest proxy rivalry runs in the coming future.

The GCC Is Expanding To Eritrea, And It's Not Good For Ethiopia

BY Andrew Korybko

Add to it the Qatari soldiers that have already been present on the groundfor a few years to "mediate" the border dispute with Djibouti, and the most important members of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) have unexpectedly converged in what many might think to be among one of themost unlikeliest of places. While it may have been difficult to foresee this happening, in hindsight it actually makes quite a lot of sense, and contrary to the conventional assessment that this is about Yemen, the argument can be made that it's also just as much about Ethiopia as well.

Unbeknownst to many, Qatar is the "ox driving the cart" in this case, and whether they like it or not, the rest of the GCC states will be reluctantly forced to follow its destabilizing lead if Doha decides to throw Ethiopia intochaos.

The research expands on the briefing first laid out by South Front and should be seen as a continuation of their original work. It begins by setting the context for what's been going on along the Horn of Africa latelyand how the GCC's military advances fit into the larger context of recent history. The piece then investigates the levers of influence for how Qatar could destabilize Ethiopia as well as its radical ideological motivations for doing so. Finally, the article concludes with a scenario study of how Qatar could engineer an Unconventional War to bring down Africa's next up-and-coming power.

The Crowded CoastGeostrategy:

The Horn of Africa is one of the most geostrategic regions in the world due to its location along the Bab-el-Mandeb strait that connects the Gulf of Aden with the Red Sea. In a broader context, one can say that it's one oftwo maritime chokepoints (the other being the Suez Canals) that link Europe with South, Southeast, and East Asia, and until the Northern SeaRoute becomes operable sometime in the next decade, all sea-bound trade between the EU and these corners of Eurasia must transit through its narrow passage. As could be expected, this makes control over the strait a heightened prize for any power or combination thereof, and it's not for naught that most Great Powers scrambled their navies to the region over the past decade ostensibly to "combat piracy".

Come One, Come All:

What was really happening was that the US was trying to militarize the waterway under the auspices of countering "Somali pirates", which it must be reminded, were bogeymen that were blown completely out of proportion by the Western mainstream media for premeditated geopolitical ends. The US wanted to create the conditions where the rest of the world would accept the continuous presence of its fleet operating inthese strategic international waters, but precisely because their legal status, it meant that any other fleet could do the same thing on identical grounds, which is exactly what happened. While the UK and French navieswere obviously there to support their American 'big brother', Russia, China, India, and Iran also sailed their ships there too, but for the purposeof both watching the West and symbolically showing that they won't allow NATO to completely control this space.

The Strategic Illusion:

While the "pirate" hype has largely died down and the multilateral naval positioning over the Bab-el-Mandeb has markedly subsided since its frenzied height in the late 00s, the importance of the strait obviously hasn't changed, and the American-initiated competition over its control merely took on another form and amphibiously migrated landward. The US joined its French partners in Djibouti by moving into Camp Lemonnier in 2001 (Paris never left the country after independence), thus giving it anon-land presence from which to project naval power if it chose to do so. Italso opened up "anti-terror" facilities in Yemen during this time as well, but just like with the Djibouti base, these could also achieve the dual purpose of influencing the strait. With both of these power nodes already occupied by the US prior to the "anti-piracy race", it might seem strange why America started such a game in the first place, but more than likely, it did so as a manifestation of the "exceptional" hubris of the Bush Administration that was also continued during the early reign of his successor.

Thus, while the non-NATO states may have felt they somehow lessened the US' control over Bab-el-Mandeb by placing and then removing their navies from the Gul f of Aden, it was all just a carefully crafted illusion (one which hopefully resulted in the multipolar states acquiring some degree of useful information about the Western fleets). The US still retained its positions in Djibouti and Yemen, albeit without the ability to directly apply the same amount of force had its naval presence still been there in the same capacity, so nothing really changed in a simple strategicsense. That status of affairs would remain until the Yemeni Revolution finally succeeded in casting off the American- and Saudi-installed government in early 2015, which dramatically led to the US having to evacuate its military personnel from the country. For the first time since the end of the Cold War (when the Soviets had a naval base in Aden), theUS didn't' fully control the Bab-el-Mandeb, and the strategic panic that this produced is partly why Saudi Arabia made the fateful and ill-planned decision to invade Yemen.

Bab-el-Mandeb And The War On Yemen:

The Saudis and their lackeys have succeeded in blockading the Yemeni coast and conquering Aden, thus returning most of the unipolar world's control over their lost 'real estate' in this ultra-strategic region, but capitalizing on their unofficial casus belli to make sure that they can indefinitely retain control there, the GCC decided to 'jump the pond' to theHorn of Africa, hence its interactions with Eritrea and the contracting of Amara's 'services'. In a sense, Eritrea is envisioned as being the Gulf's "back-up Yemen", a friendly territory under its proxy influence from whichpunitive measures can be launched against the people of Yemen if they ever do succeed in once more nearly liberating the entirety of their country.

So long as Eritrea is under the GCC's sway, then from a strategic-logisticalstandpoint, the Yemeni War of Independence will be all the much harder to win because the Saudis' and their bloc have a 'rear guard' base almost directly abutting the country. The GCC's actions in Eritrea can thus be seen as a type of "double insurance" in making sure that as many of the Yemenis remain under the Gulf boot for as long as possible, with such an unnecessary strategic consideration being seen as coming from a position of fear and weakness on their part, not strength. They fear the Yemeni militias so much that they're preemptively creating this 'rear guard' supplyand logistics facility in Eritrea "just in case" a counter-offensive one day manages to unsuspectingly cripple their occupying forces.

It's appropriate at this juncture to take stock of all the international military forces currently present along the Horn of Africa. The Saudis and Emiratis now have a naval presence in Eritrea, and as South Front reported (and which was verified separately this summer), the UAE is alsoseeking to open a naval base in Berbera along the northern coast of Somalia in the breakaway Somaliland region. The US and France have an on-ground presence in Djibouti, but they're also joined by the Japanese, which opened their first military base abroad since World War II in 2011 under the opportunistic 'justification' of "anti-piracy". They might, however, soon be joined by China, if the rumors of Beijing eyeing the country for its first overseas base are true. China could of course call uponthe convenient slogan of "anti-piracy" to justify any possible forthcoming presence, but no matter what its stated grounds for doing so are, such a base would serve the additional purpose of safeguarding the Chinese- financed Djibouti-Addis Ababa railroad to the fastest-growing economy in the world and the headquarter state of the African Union.

Gulf Interests Move Inland

Now's a good time to elaborate more in-depth about the continental African interests that the Gulf States seek to pursue through their partnership with Eritrea. To be more specific, it's better to look closely at Qatar's geopolitical objectives in this case, since the tiny emirate ironicallyleads the regional pack in its preexisting involvement in East Africa.

Eritrean Backgrounder:

This coastal state is one of the world's newest, having gained its independence from Ethiopia in 1993 after fighting a three-decade-long war to achieve it. Peace came only after the government in Addis Ababa, at that time run by a military entity known as "The Derg", was dissolved in1987 and its leader Mengistu Haile Mariam was ousted in 1991 by a coalition of ethno-centric rebel groups. Due to the near-continuous fighting that took place on its territory, post-independence Eritrea was a wreck, but President Isais Afwerki helped to achieve stability and elevatedliving conditions, as attested to by journalist Andre Vltchek who visited a year ago. Nevertheless, the economy is in dire straits and Eritrea is largelyisolated from the world community, partly due to the border disputes it has with all of its neighbors, and also because of successful Ethiopian lobbying against it. According to Ethiopia, Eritrea supports a variety of anti-government rebel groups and even has links to Al Shabaab inSomalia.

The Qatari Connection:

The last point is extremely contentious and has never fully been proven,although to clarify a bit, a Wikileaked US diplomatic cable quoted the Somalian President accusing Qatar in 2009 of using Eritrea as a financialconduit for Al Shabaab. Considering Doha's support to other terrorist groups such as ISIL, this doesn't seem implausible, and it might even bethat rerouted Qatari funds channeled through Eritrea (which might have received a modest cut) could be to blame for why Ethiopia would allege that its nemesis was aiding terrorists.

No matter what shape it takes, Eritrea's direct or indirect links to Al Shabaab are one of the reasons why the UNSC initiated an arms embargo on the country in 2009 that was just renewed last month. In this connection it's relevant to remind one of Qatar's role in the region, and it'sthat it was asked to deploy "peacekeepers" along the Eritrean-Djibouti border by each of their governments in 2010 to assist in "mediating" their border dispute. One can cynically suggest that this provided nothing morethan the perfect cover for Qatar to continue supporting Al Shabaab, whichas was mentioned above, it had already been doing for some time. The reason Qatar supports this terrorist group is because it's basically a regional franchise of ISIL, and a faction of Al Shabaab had just pledged allegiance to its Arab "brothers" late last month. These two groups pursue the same radical Islamic goals that Qatar has been patronizing for years through its sponsorship of the Muslim Brotherhood, and ISIL and Al Shabaab are pretty much the more visibly militant and globally notoriousarm of the Brotherhood in this respect.

The Afro-Eurasian Caliphate:

To get a fuller grasp of why Qatar is promoting terrorism in East Africa, one should understand the macro-regional context of Doha's ideological ambitions. The peninsular pipsqueak uses its financial largesse to flex power disproportionate to its tiny size, and it manifests this through support of a hodgepodge of ultra-extreme Islamic groups, all of which areclassified as terrorists by Russia: the Muslim Brotherhood; the Taliban; ISIL in Syria, Iraq, Libya, and Sinai; and Boko Haram. Each of these terrorist groups is active in a certain geographic area, with the only 'missing link' being the southern vector, ergo the ideological/militant 'necessity' of Al Shabaab. Altogether, these terrorist organizations represent the 'foot soldiers' of a transnational caliphate project that Qatarand its US ally would like to see expand all throughout the central pivot ofAfro-Eurasia, the "Greater Middle East" of Central Asia, the 'conventional' Mideast, North Africa, and East Africa. While its current prospects of success have dramatically dimmed ever since Russia's anti-terrorist intervention in Syria, it still remains possible for Qatar and the US to actualize some aspects of this grand strategy in certain corners of their operational theater, which in this context is the Horn of Africa.

Double-Sided Chaos:

The introduction of "managed chaos" to the region via the Qatari- supported Al Shabaab terrorist group serves two main purposes. The firstone is to pressure Ethiopia, which the US may feel more inclined to do if the country moves more solidly in a pro-Chinese direction in the future, and the second is to perversely use the presence of Al Shabaab to deepenits security relationship with Ethiopia by being the arsonist-firefighter thatcreates a problem and then 'helps resolve' it afterwards. It's useful to recall that the US contracted Ethiopia to invade Somalia in 2006 in order to destroy the Islamic Courts Union (ICU), a precursor of Al Shabaab, which thus strengthened the partnership between the two. Also, by keeping Islamic terrorism alive in Somalia, to whatever extent it's presentat a given moment, the US can keep the 'justification' open for selectivelyintervening in the country with drone strikes or commando raids, thus entrenching its presence in the region and turning the criminal into the 'cop'.

The Enemy Of My Enemy:

Rewinding the focus back to Eritrea, Asmara is passively tolerant of Qatar's Al Shabaab patronage because it could supplement its grand strategic goal of destabilizing Ethiopia. To explain, Ethiopia has previouslyintervened in Somalia against Islamic terrorists before and subsequently occupied the country, and the idea that its forces could continue to do so again in the future, and thus be bunkered down in another potential quagmire and spread thin in critical (and rebellious-prone) interior regions, excites Eritrean strategists. Furthermore, as will be explained more fully in the third section, there's the potential for Al Shabaab terrorists to become the "freedom fighter" figureheads for the Somali population in Ethiopia's eastern provinces, formally the Somali Region butalso known as Ogaden. Eritrea's most important objective is to have ethno-centric regions inside of its former colonizer achieve independence in the same manner that it did – through prolonged and militant struggle against the central government – so that its rival can never be in a position to threaten it again (let alone exist in its current state). If the Somali region just so happens to be the spark needed to set the whole federal haystack alight, then so be it, as Asmara's reckoning goes, whether its Qatari-supported terrorism that initiates the destructive domino effect that they expect or an indigenous ethno-centric uprising.

The Big Picture:

To bring everything together in a more simple understanding, Qatar has taken the lead in destabilizing the Horn of Africa out of ideological and unipolar-loyalty reasons, and it's using its "legal" presence in Eritrea to facilitate this. The War on Yemen provided the other main GCC states of Saudi Arabia and the UAE with a 'plausible justification' for also 'getting in on the action', knowing just as well as Qatar does that Eritrea is a 'double-hinged' state that can be used to simultaneously project maritime and continental influence, with the latter case being against Ethiopia.

Concerning the GCC's newest geopolitical target, it's one of the world's most promising emerging economies, and from a Gulf perspective, it couldalso be useful in satisfying their African-directed agricultural and construction-outsourcing needs. Placing their forces in Eritrea, Ethiopia's arch-rival and hated foe, is designed to put pressure on the rising, albeit potentially unstable, continental power and thus make it more amenable to whatever their forthcoming grand interests may be. Also, by making Eritrea an integral part of their regional military architecture, the Gulf States are essentially declaring that any aggression against it would also endanger their own interests, thereby blanketing Asmara with a de-facto security guarantee and altering Addis Ababa's perceived existing strategic balance of power (which it had earlier assumed was relatively even).

By itself and approached from a purely geopolitical standpoint, it's theoretically possible for Saudi Arabia and the UAE to maintain this new status quo between Eritrea and Ethiopia (perhaps even exploit it and eachof those two states to their own advantage if shrewd diplomacy is applied), but the presence of Qatar, the ‘loose cannon’, means that the entire arrangement is inherently unstable and subject to sudden change. Qatar has proven itself much more prone to impromptu outbursts of rhetorical rage than any of the other Gulf States, and its comparatively younger leader (only 35 years old) is much less versed in the art of statecraft than his peers. Being so hot-headed and already harboring an inferiority complex vis-à-vis his larger and more mature neighbors, QatariEmir Tamim bin Hamad Al Thani is inclined to give the full terrorist ‘go- ahead’ whenever he feels like it (or if he ‘thinks’ it would be of strategic use for him), meaning that a Qatari-sponsored Islamic destabilization of Ethiopia cannot at all be discounted, and must be astutely prepared for bythe country’s authorities.

Towards The Unconventional War ScenarioGCC Support:

The final section of the research discusses the Unconventional War scenario that Qatar could help engineer alongside Eritrea and Al Shabaab(one of its ideological ‘children’, it could be argued) to throw Ethiopia intochaos. Once this process begins, Saudi Arabia and the UAE could be expected to assist Qatar and this scenario to some extent, knowing that Doha is much too tiny and inexperienced to ever fully control the larger developments that it helps to unleash (the “Arab Spring” Color Revolutions are a case in point), and they thus want to be in a position togain as much self-benefit from what may turn out to be an irreversible course of events. Correspondingly, with these self-motivated interests in mind, they could act as force multipliers in their own way for advancing the chaos that Qatar created, thereby ushering in a chain reaction that could lend crucial and ultra-destructive force to the scenario that will be discussed.

Consequences:

The full consequences of Ethiopian chaos won’t be discussed in the scope of this article, but they can be assumed to have the risk of virally spreading through parts of the North and East African regions (since Ethiopia is of the latter but capable of influencing the former through its border with the rebellious Blue Nile state of Sudan), and would at the veryleast impact the country’s 95 million or so citizens to an undetermined extent (to say nothing of the transnational social implications). Also, with China’s economy becoming more dependent for growth on trade with Africa, any significant disruption in Ethiopia, Beijing’s prized partner nowadays, could directly ripple back to the East Asian giant and negativelyaffect it to a degree, all depending of course on the preexisting level of Chinese-Ethiopian trade. The higher that Ethiopia rises in terms of international significance (be it diplomatic, economic, military, etc.), the harder its fall could be and the further the aftershocks would travel acrossthe globe, thus suggesting that the (US-advised) Qatari destabilization of Ethiopia could be timed to achieve maximum effect depending on its relationship to various actors (in this case, likely China) at the given moment.

Identity Cleavages:

The greatest and most imminent threat to Ethiopia lays in the sphere of ethno-separatism, the sentiment of which has continued to boil even after the Cold War-era civil war was brought to a close. Part of the reason for this is that Eritrea's independence set a dangerous precedent for the militant representatives of the country's disaffected ethnic groups, which itseems include just about every single one of them in some capacity or another (even the dominant Oromo and Amhara pluralities). The reason for this is that Ethiopia is a hyper-eclectic country with a wide array of identities within its federal structure, and in such a situation, it's always difficult for any governing authority (let alone what some rebel groups allege is the present Tigrean-dominated one) to strike the perfect balance between each of them and leave everyone satisfied. This preexisting state of divisive affairs was utterly exacerbated by the Ethiopian Civil War that broke out against The Derg, where ethnic-affiliated rebel groups banded together in order to overthrow the central governing authority. The militant comradery that developed within each identity community as a result heightened the self-awareness that each of them felt about their differences and thus made a post-war federal structure the only realistic means of keeping the country together, especially after Eritrea's successful secession in 1993.

The identity divide was so entrenched in Ethiopia after the civil war that the new federal units were formed around ethnic affiliation. Here's a mapof them as taken from Wikipedia:

The CIA World Factbook lists the ethnic proportions as being "Oromo 34.4%, Amhara (Amara) 27%, Somali (Somalie) 6.2%, Tigray (Tigrinya)6.1%", followed by a multitude of others that compose minimal percentages. Altogether, these four groups form a little less than three- quarters of Ethiopia's population, mostly concentrated in a north-south belt stretching between Tigray, Amhara, western Oromia, and northeast Southern Nations, Nationalities, and Peoples Region.

Adding another crucial demographic layer to Ethiopia is the percentage ofChristians (Ethiopian Orthodox and Protestant) and Muslims in the country, which is 62% to 33.9%, respectively, or almost 2:1. The following map demonstrates the geographic divide over religion and showshow this has a distinct overlap with certain federal units:

The Afar and Somalis are a very small minority of the population and by themselves cannot account for the 33.9% of Muslim adherents in Ethiopia,and as the above map indicates, many believers in this religion live intertwined with Christians in Oromia, the most populous region. By itself and with the absence of context, this isn't anything particularly relevant toEthiopia's stability, but recalling how Qatar and its Saudi ally have been front and center in provoking a clash of civilizations through their support of Islamic terrorism, this demographic factor becomes perhaps one of the most important of all. Al Shabaab in Somalia is pretty much one of Qatar'sproxy creations, just as ISIL is, and its proximity and ethnic overlap with the Somali Region is a definite cause for concern.

Unconventional War:

The Basics

Taken together, a Qatari-orchestrated jihadist-separatist war emanating from the Somali Region could prove to be the catalyst that sets off a whole conflagration of nationwide conflict. This initial Unconventional War has a very real risk of occurring due to the doubly second-class status thatSomalis feel they are afforded due to both their ethnicity and Muslim faith.Al Shabaab's terrorist war in neighboring Somalia actually began as an Islamic-tinted national liberation movement in response to Ethiopia's 2006occupation, but it rapidly descended into the jihadist nightmare that lay atthe core of its proponents' true vision. Although it showed its true colors and most undoubtedly scared away many possible supporters that would have otherwise flocked to it for its originally marketed national liberation agenda, it still commands some indigenous support inside Somalia, thus raising the risk that it could also do the same amongst the Somali community in Ethiopia that might still consider itself occupied (or be led tothink in such terms).

Carving Out The Caliphate

The concept here is that Qatar would use jihadism to radicalize separatist Somalis in getting them to become diehard supporters of the cause, holding out the carrot of a Greater Somalia if they're successful. This irredentist dream would neatly overlap with Qatar's own of creating a proxy caliphate in the Horn of Africa, but it also places limits on the primary geographic area of focus for its terrorist campaign. However, withthe nature of terrorism inherently being that it knows no borders, it's of course possible that attacks could take place in the densely populated andcentrally positioned Oromia Region, which could have the effect of sharpening the Christian-Muslim divide in the area and prompting copycat and reprisal attacks. The destructive chain reaction that this might setoff could only realistically be put to rest by a heavy-handed military response, albeit one which may scare investors right out of the country and lead to Western condemnation. In and of itself, whether or not the jihadist-separatist war succeeds in its stated goals, it would still accomplish what might have been the indirect (perhaps even actual) objective all along of weakening Ethiopia and possibly even China's position in the continent depending on the degree of closeness and importance that Addis Ababa occupies for Beijing by that time (which is expected to be ever increasing).

Eritrea's Strategy

Regardless of whether or not Qatar ever goes forward with the previously described scenario, that won't in any way prevent Eritrea from continuing with its own, as it bases its national security on keeping the Ethiopian military distracted and divided through its support of 'stand-alone' and unified rebel movements so that it can't ever solidly converge against the country. Eritrea would like to one day liberate the city of Badme that Ethiopia has refused to cede to its control after the Algiers Agreement ended their bloody and stalemated 1998-2000 war and a Hague border commission ruled that it's Eritrean territory, and it might be using its support of various rebel groups as a means of pressuring Addis Ababa into acceding to its international legal obligation.

Eritrea's Tactics

Asmara's aspirations are to assist neighboring Tigray Region fighters in their quest for independence, mirroring Eritrea's own, in order to create abuffer state that would insulate it from any future aggression from the rump Ethiopian state. At the same time, however, Eritrea also has ties with rebel groups operating deeper in the country, and if significant battlefield coordination can ever be maintained between Eritrea and the Oromo separatists (the ethnic group of which is the most populous and geographically central in the country), then it would go a very long way towards giving Asmara a lever with which it can trigger serious damage toEthiopia's national unity. Some Oromo might be attracted to the nationalist rhetoric coming from their militant-separatist counterparts thatallege that the group is being exploited to support the minor peripheral ethnicities, and any visible "Tigrean-dominated government" crackdown on their civilian representatives might add credence to this belief. Eritrea might even 'get lucky' if the current tribal violence in South Sudan motivates a spillover effect into the neighboring Southern Nations, Nationalities, and People's Region (home to 45 different ethnic groups) orGambela Region that 'naturally' creates the state-fragmenting process that it and Qatar and looking to achieve for their own respective ends.

Doha's Double-Crossing

On a final note, concerning any strategic Eritrean-Qatari collaboration in a future destabilization campaign against Ethiopia, the potential exists for Doha to stab its 'ally' in the back if its jihadist campaign is 'too successful'.Eritrea might ironically be even more susceptible than Ethiopia is to an Islamic terrorist campaign because it has a similar proportion of Muslims that are also living in a similar economically challenging environment, andthus, might be ripe for ideological-religious manipulation under the 'proper circumstances'. Additionally, the Muslim Afar living in the east partially represent Eritrea's version of Ethiopia's ethno-religious identity overlap that the latter has with the Somali Muslims, thus potentially leading to thesame type of strategic vulnerabilities in this scenario. This factor could also be used by Qatar to manipulate Eritrea and keep its leadership in check, just in case the improbable happens and for whatever reason it decides to turn its back on its new patron.

On the flip side of things, so long as Asmara remains a loyal client of the Emir (which doesn't seem set to change since it desperately needs the money and diplomatic support), it shouldn't have anything to worry about.Eritrea is also much smaller than Ethiopia in both demographic and geographic terms, so it's a lot easier for the state to exercise supervisory control over what's going on and nip the jihadist process right in the bud before it fully blooms. However, as chaotic processes always prove themselves to be time after time again, once the genie is let out of the bottle, it's impossible to stuff it back in, and even if Qatar doesn't plan for it to happen, the jihad it unleashes in Ethiopia could also infect Eritrea in no time.

Concluding Thoughts

While it may not seem like it at first, the GCC's military-logistical move into Eritrea is predicated just as much on influencing Ethiopia as it is about dominating Yemen. The Saudis and Emiratis may have just recentlyincorporated Eritrea into their coalition framework, but Qatar has been cultivating close ties with Asmara for the past 5 years as part of its "mediation" role in resolving the Djibouti border dispute, which incidentally saw it deploy 200 troops to the country. This means that the Muslim Brotherhood-espousing state is in a position to project its ideologythroughout the region and intensify cooperation with its Al Shabaab proxyin nearby Somalia. The Saudis and Emiratis may initially be adverse to Qatar 'rocking the boat' in the region until after they've already tapped allof its economic benefit (which could take decades), but given Doha's emotional- and ideological-driven foreign policy, it might do just that because it senses a 'good opportunity' here or there for furthering its self-interested geopolitical project.

In such circumstances, the GCC wouldn't be able to indefinitely hold out the threat of Islamic-inspired terrorist destabilization as a means of blackmailing the world's fastest-growing economy and one of Africa's up- and-coming powers, but would have to reluctantly join in the Qatari- initiated unrest so as to secure whatever benefits they can while there's still the 'opportunity' to do so. The ethnic, social, and religious cleavages already prevalent (and even overlapping in some cases) in Ethiopia provide more than enough domestic 'gunpowder' for a strategically placedspark to set the whole powder keg aflame, with the only fail-safe solution being for Addis Ababa to overwhelmingly respond with military force. Sucha reaction might predictably scare away the investors that are needed to keep the 'Ethiopian miracle' alive, and the combination of capital outflow plus military suppression (no matter how justified it may seem) might further exacerbate the domestic differences in the country and place themin a perpetual process of worsening, up to the point of the country approaching the geopolitical abyss of dissolution along preexisting ethnic- federative lines.

Any disruption of Ethiopia's stability could also be used as an indirect means of attacking Chinese interests in Africa, since Beijing has invested billions in helping the country rise and is expected to become increasingly dependent on its African economic partnerships in order to sustain its owngrowth at home. Large-scale unrest in Ethiopia could thus offset China's plans for cooperating with the country on a high-level strategic basis, and it would thus lose not only a crucial marketplace for its goods or an attractive investment destination, but also its place in influencing the African Union right at its headquartered source in Addis Ababa. Therefore, many layers of intrigue blanket the possibility that Qatar may lead the GCC into a proxy confrontation with Ethiopia, be it out of its own regard oracting on behalf of American 'advice', which could see the Gulf using the country of Eritrea alongside Al Shabaab jihadists to dislodge China from itsmost important foothold in Africa.

Ethiopia Turmoil Threatens Unlikeliest Airline Success Story

By Liezel Hill, Bloomberg December 12, 2016

Ethiopia, indelibly linked with images of grinding poverty and famine, hasquietly built one of Africa's rare corporate success stories with the continent's only consistently profitable airline shuttling passengers from around the world through its hub in Addis Ababa.

Yet just as state-owned Ethiopian Airlines starts to vie with the likes of Dubai-based Emirates, outbreaks of violence around ethnic and human- rights protests have claimed an estimated 500 lives since June, threatening to deter travelers and undermining the political stability that helped it flourish. It's also grappling with the challenges of doing businessin the region, with more than $200 million in ticket payments tied up in countries including Nigeria and Angola, which the airline says is putting pressure on its liquidity.

Chief Executive Officer Tewolde GebreMariam insists the unrest and a subsequent state of emergency imposed Oct. 8 is a “non-issue” for the airline, which links almost 70 African cities to destinations in Europe, North and South America, the Middle East and Asia. The executive, whohas run Ethiopian since 2011, is determined to push ahead with an expansion for a company that could be the last hope for a viable Africanaviation industry.

“The reality on the ground is peaceful. It’s business as usual,” the CEO said in an interview at the airline’s headquarters at Bole International Airport in Addis Ababa days after the start of restrictions. That remains the case still, he said by e-mail on Thursday, citing an 18 percent year-on-year increase in October passenger traffic. “We have not seen measurable changes.”

Lost Continent

That doesn’t mean the company is out of the woods, as many of thosepassengers would have likely booked tickets before the crisis escalatedand Western countries issued travel warnings. The bigger test will ultimately come if security measures are lifted as planned in April.

Ethiopian’s ability to weather the crisis and continue with its ambitiousplans is critical for the continent’s aviation sector after corruption and missteps undermined peers. African airlines now account for about 20 percent of air traffic to and from the continent, down from 60 percentthree decades ago, according to Tewolde.

Hard-currency shortages that mean ticket debts are withheld in some countries have also prompted outside carriers to reduce links, and the continent will be the only unprofitable airline region this year and next, according to International Air Transport Association projections publishedlast week.

In contrast to the failure of Nigerian Airways or the politically led stagnation at unprofitable South African Airways, Ethiopian has benefited from less interference and kinder tax rates, helping to boost net income for the past three years. In fiscal 2015, profit jumped 12 percent to 3.53 billion Ethiopia birr ($160 million), backed by a 6 percent gain in revenue.

With a modern fleet including Boeing Co.’s latest 787 Dreamliners, a network spanning Los Angeles to Tokyo and a successful hub model that’slured an international clientele, two-thirds of whom change for onward destinations, Ethiopian is on the cusp of becoming a significant force in global aviation.

Rallying Point

The carrier is already a rallying point on the continent. It has invested inTogo-based Asky Airlines, giving it a hub in West Africa, and bought a stake in Malawian Airlines in the south. Tewolde, 50, is seeking a similararrangement in the central African region, and pursuing partnerships in countries including Ghana, Uganda and Zambia. He has also called on carriers to pool resources to defend their market share and says recent moves towards more liberal air service agreements between African countries are a cause for optimism.

Addis Ababa has also become a center of expertise for the industry, with arecently expanded pilot school and world-class maintenance facilities that service planes from as far afield as Mozambique and Nigeria.

Those gains may be under threat. The Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front, in power since 1991, when it ousted a Marxist militaryregime partly blamed for the 1980s famine, responded to the unrest by declaring the six-month state of emergency. While it since lifted some restrictions after a period of calm, the situation may still make changingplanes in Addis Ababa less appealing, especially after countries includingthe U.S. issued travel warnings.

"The whole Ethiopia-rising story, including the airline, faces a credibilitychallenge," said Nemera Gebeyehu Mamo, an Ethiopian who teaches economics at the University of London's School of Oriental and African Studies. "The government can only reassure its customers or tourists if it'swilling to address the political demands."

'African Emirates'

Passengers have no shortage of alternatives. Emirates, the biggest long- haul airline, Qatar Airways and Etihad Airways PJSC of Abu Dhabi all offerdozens of African routes from huge hubs in the Persian Gulf. Turkish Airlines is also making inroads with 50 destinations on the continent afterflights to Zanzibar start Monday, according to a statement on its website.

Founded in 1945, Ethiopian ranks as Africa's biggest carrier by passengertraffic, ahead of South African Airways, EgyptAir, Royal Air Maroc and Kenya Airways, according to IATA. Tewolde remains unbowed by the challenges, pressing ahead with expansion plans, including promising additions to a 51-strong aircraft order backlog and announcing new destinations including Oslo, Jakarta, Singapore and Chengdu.

Despite the current political issues, the company has the prerequisites toremain a formidable competitor and challenge established Gulf carriers, Nico Bezuidenhout, SAA's former acting CEO who now runs low-cost African carrier Fastjet Plc, said in an interview.

Ethiopian has an enviable position with consistent state backing, unparalleled management continuity and a hub at a natural crossroads, so“I may as well be talking about Emirates,” he said.

Do Ethiopia’s Oromo People Have A Better Altternative For ModernDemocracy?

HOW AFRICA Commentary December 15, 2016

Ethiopia’s Oromo people made headlines around the world when peaceful protests turned violent against government land use changes, prompting astate of emergency.

Now Oromo voices are being heard thanks to an entity more oftenassociated with boosting tourism than governance — UNESCO.

Ethiopians rejoiced when the traditional Oromo governance system, known as Gada, was inscribed on UNESCO's list of intangible cultural heritage of humanity. The announcement was made during the 11th session of UNESCO's Intergovernmental Committee for the Safeguardingof Intangible Cultural Heritage, held in Ethiopia.

UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation, is a special agency of the U.N. created to build the defensesof peace in the minds of men. Built over generations, the traditional Oromo Gada governance system contains regulatory measures for conflict resolution, questions of religionand women's rights.

"In contrast to the modus operandi employed by the current, authoritariangovernment, the Gada form of governance contains provisions guaranteeing an effective system of 'checks and balances,' the separation of powers and an institutionalized opposition – all of which provides safeguards against totalitarianism and a governmental abuse of power," according to the U.N.

When UNESCO announced it was listing the Gada system as an intangiblecultural heritage, Ethiopians rejoiced, the Ethiopian Herald reported. SaraDubee, head of the West Arsi Culture and Tourism Office, said the Oromo people have been subjected to marginalization and subjugation during theformer regimes. "The day is special to me and the people of Oromo. The day is a most awaited one in the history of Oromo. Oromo people have paid all the sacrifice to see the day."

Gada has some features that differ from western democracies, according to Waltainfo. One is the distribution of power. Researchers say western democracies are deficient in distributing power. Those in power control most of the authority and wealth of the country. The young, poor and theelders are politically and economically marginalized in Western democracies.

The Oromo make up about 35 percent of Ethiopia's population, which nowexceeds 102 million, according to Worldometers.

Ethiopia already has eight cultural and one natural site designated as UNESCO World Heritage Sites — the most of any African country. Moroccohas the second highest.

The Gada system developed from knowledge gained by community experience over generations, UNESCO wrote on its website, according toWaltoinfo.com. Gada is practiced in Northern Kenya as well as Ethiopia.

The system serves as a mechanism for enforcing moral conduct, buildingsocial cohesion, and expressing forms of community culture.

In addition to distribution of power, another distinctive Gada feature thatsets it apart from Western democracy is a testing period for elected leaders. Researchers say Gada believes in rigorous practical testing of candidates before they assume office, unlike western democracy, which relies almost exclusively on election.
Even though the Gada system is considered an intangible heritage,Ethiopians say the UNESCO designation will stimulate tourism.

“The Oromo people have sustained their authenticity for so long. We believe the values attached to the Gada system deserve to be safeguarded, nurtured, shared and spread across the world,” said Hirut Woldemariam, culture and tourism minster, Ethiopian Herald reported.

People can learn from the system, said Lemma Megerssa, Oromia state chief. “The adoption would increase our responsibility of safeguarding andpromoting the convention, the system would be a center of tourist attraction.”

Oromo artist Mohammed Tawil said, “Our forefathers should be honoredfor their priceless endeavors in handing over the culture and identity of the system.”

“The Gada System is the true manifestation of the identity of the Oromopeople,” Oromo artist Tadele Gemechu told the Ethioian Herald. “We should preserve it. UNESCO’s inscription could overturn the business-as-usual way of handing the values of the heritage. The government and research institutions should look ways how to bolster and promote the assets of (gada) system.”

The Oromo people have suffered a lot, said Atsede Kadire. “The Oromos have original and unique heritages that could take into account the wholeform of life. The Gada system is one of the heritages that binds all. Gadasystem could be one of the bases for modern democracy.”

The UNESCO designation is a milestone and “a huge step to beef up ourtourism industry because the world will come to learn about the Gada system from the community,” Kadire told Ethiopian Herald.

Ethiopia’s UNESCO World Heritage Sites and dates of designation includethe following:

• Aksum (in1980)
• Fasil Ghebbi, Gondar Region (in 1979)
• Harar Jugol, the Fortified Historic Town (in 2006)
• Konso Cultural Landscape (in 2011)
• Lower Valley of the Awash (in 1980)
• Lower Valley of the Omo (in 1980)
• Rock-Hewn Churches, Lalibela (in 1978)
• Tiya (in 1980)
• Simien National Park (in 1978)

Here’s what UNESCO had to say about the Gada system, according toWaltainfo.com:
Gada is organized into five classes with one of these functioning as theruling class consisting of a chairperson, officials and an assembly. Eachclass progresses through a series of grades before it can function in authority with the leadership changing on a rotational basis every eightyears.

Class membership is open to men, whose fathers are already members,while women are consulted for decision-making on protecting women’s rights. The classes are taught by oral historians covering history, laws, rituals, time reckoning, cosmology, myths, rules of conduct, and the function of the Gada system.

Meetings and ceremonies take place under a sycamore tree (consideredthe Gada symbol) while major clans have established Gada centers andceremonial spaces according to territory. Knowledge about the Gada system is transmitted to children in the home and at school.

Various sources indicated that the Gada system has the principles of checks and balances (through periodic succession of every eight years), and division of power (among executive, legislative, and judicial branches), balanced opposition (among five parties), and power sharing between higher and lower administrative organs to prevent power from falling into the hands of despots. Other principles of the system include balanced representation of all clans, lineages, regions and confederacies, accountability of leaders, the settlement of disputes through reconciliation,and the respect for basic rights and libertie.

"የቋንቋ ትምህርት መጀመሬን ምእንዳይሰሙብኝ ለማድረግ ተጣጥሬ ሁ። ዳሩ ግን ተደብቆ የሚቀር ነገር ስለሌለ ወሬውን ሰምተው ጠሩኝና እያዘኑ ክፉኛ ገሠጹኝ። ዳግመኛ ወደዚያ ስፍራ እንዳትመለስ ብለውም አስጠነቀቁኝ። እንግዲህ የተፈሪ መኮንን ተማሪ ቤት እስከ ተከፈተ ድረስ የቋንቋ ትምህርቴን አቋርጬ ተቀመጥሁ። ጌታ አለቃ ገብረ መድኅን ይህን ማድረጋቸው በእርሳቸው አስተያየት እኔን ለመጥቀም እንጂ ለክፋት እንዳላደረጉት ሕሊናዬ ስላወቀ አላዘንሁባቸውም። "

My take on the Ethiopian Airlines story

Ethiomedia Commentary December 14, 2016

Ethiopian Airlines from its humble beginnings in 1946 has come a longway to be the most profitable airline in Africa. TWA, American Pilots, Ethiopian workers and Emperor Haile Sellasie worked very hard to establish one of the first airlines on the continent of Africa.

Ethiopian Airlines has been through many difficult periods in its 70 yearsof existence. Among other things, Ethiopia went through a violent communist revolution in 1974, and in 1975 there was a major war with Somalia. The Marxist military government was overthrown in 1991, and Eritrea, a province of Ethiopia, broke away in the same year.

Much of Ethiopia’s socialist economy failed but Ethiopian Airlines was ableto survive and thrive. Ethiopian Airlines in 2016, directly provided jobs for7000+ people and indirectly thousands more.

In recent years the Airline has grown under the leadership of Tewolde GebreMariam. Tewolde started out in ticket sales with the company andhas worked his way up to become the CEO. One can’t help but be impressed by the growth of the Airline and his personal success. The Airline now has 77 airplanes, has received numerous awards around theworld. Ethiopian Airlines Aviation Academy has in the meantime trainedover 750 individuals in different fields.

However, the comment in the Bloomberg article where CEO Tewolde GebreMariam stated “ that the recent unrest and subsequent state of emergency imposed Oct. 8 is a “non-issue” for the airline.” It is difficult tocomprehend that the leader of the biggest industry in Ethiopia would say this is a “non-issue” when over 500 people have lost their lives, 11000 incarcerated and millions lost in destroyed property. The truth is we are alltied together. The Airline is going to need people to feel secure to travel inand out of Ethiopia. Without security people are not going to buy your tickets and as the CEO you should demonstrate a little Corporate SocialResponsibility and compassion.

Task Force for Human Rights and Justice in Ethiopia – Europe

Petitions to condem the vicious and malicious attack against The hon. EMP Ana MariaGomes by Surrogates of the brutal regime in Ethiopia.

SOCIAL MEDIA UPDATES December 14, 2016

Following a litany of gross violation of human rights and political repression for over 25 years, Ethiopians have been protesting since November 2015 for their human dignity, constitutional rights and against economic and political marginalisation. The brutal repressive regime responded using brute force killing thousands and sent over 11, 000 innocent citizens to various prisons around the country·

On October 9th 2016 the regime, which has lost its legitimacy to rule, declared a six-month country wide state of emergency to inculcate fear among citizens. The state of emergency has effectively put the country under TPLF military rule have shut down mobile Internet service, blockedsocial media and prohibited public gatherings. The despised minority regime keeps committing crimes against humanity as it fights for its survival.

On December 1st, 2016 Dr. Merara Gudina, Chairman of the Oromo Federalist Congress (OFC) was arrested upon his return to Ethiopia from Brussels after attending a hearing on the political situation in Ethiopia. MsAna Maria Gomes wrote to Federica Mogherini, High Representative of theUnion for Foreign Affairs and Vice President of the Commission[2], to take strong measures against the Ethiopian government which has absolute disregard for the respect of human rights, namely freedom of speech.

In an absolute travesty of events, the brutal regime has mobilized its surrogates who were granted political asylum under false pretence of fleeing from persecution in Ethiopia and living in Europe in freedom; to launch a petition campaign against the European Parliament and Ms. AnaMaria Gomes for demanding that Ethiopia respect international human rights norms that it is bound to uphold under the Cotonou Agreement.

We the undersigned and the European Task Force for Human Rights andJustice in Ethiopia fully support the request of Ms Ana Maria Gomes, calling for the European Parliament to take a strong action against the repressive regime in Ethiopia and demanding the immediate and unconditional release of Dr. Merara Gudina.

We strongly condemn the malicious smear campaign against a highly respected member of an EU Parliamentarian by the brutal minority regimeof Ethiopia. Ms Ana Maria Gomes is an ardent defender of human rights, freedom and democracy speaking against repression and injustice in Ethiopia. As the distinguished statesman Edmund Burke once said, "All tyranny needs to gain a foothold is for people of good conscience to remain silent".

Abstract: This is a brief biographical account of Zemenfes Kidus Abraha,(Gorfu), an Ethiopian author of several spiritual books, the most prominent of which is: Tegsatsna Mikir (Reproof and Advice), a book thatexposed many of the traditional practices of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church unsupported by the Bible. Zemenfes Kidus Abraha faced persecution and imprisonment, and his book was confiscated and banned from the market for twelve years. After a lengthy court trial that ended at the Imperial Crown Court, he won over his adversaries and wasexonerated.

Self-exiled Prince urges EU to exclude aid from bad governmentsin Africa

By DW Staff Writer December 16, 2016

Prince Dr. Asfawossen Asserate Kassa, the grand-nephew of Emperor Haile Sellasie, has pleaded with Europeans and the European Union to stop supporting bad governments in Africa, according to an interview withDeutsche Welle.

He said bad governments in Africa have received 3 trillion dollars from allover the world over the course of three decades but nothing has changedin the life of the ordinary African.

Dr. Asserate says giving money and weapons to dictatorial Africangovernments is not a good way to invest.

He says that "Africa's rulers are promoting migration. Asserate believes that there's only way to stop this: European states must stand together,and stop cooperating with these dictators," according to DW.

The European taxpayer's money should not be used to strengthen Africandespots. Our tax dollars should be used to promote good governance in Africa, Dr Asserate also mentioned tribalism and lawlessness as major problems in Africa today.

Dr. Asserate cited Tanzania and Swaziland as examples of good governance. With time Africans are capable of learning and practicingdemocracy.

Background: Dr Asfawossen Asserate lost his father, Ras Asserate Medhin Kassa, inNovember 1974 when the Derg military dictatorship took over power and executed 60officials of Emperor Haile Selassie's government. He left the country and settled in Germany, where he became a business consultant and bestselling author who speaksimpeccable German.

Ethnic tensions in Gondar reflect the toxic nature of Ethiopian politics

By William Davison, Bloomberg December 23, 2016

From uneven development to authoritarian government, the morass ofissues facing the city of Gondar offer a snapshot of Ethiopia's wider problems

In Gondar, a city in Ethiopia's northern highlands, a lone tourist pauses totake a photo of a fortress built more than two centuries ago. Nearby, pasta row of gift shops, lies the wreck of a coach torched during unrest in August.

Gondar, known as “Africa’s Camelot”, was once the centre of the Ethiopianempire – at a time when that empire was defined mainly by Amhara traditions.

Today, the city is facing new tensions that have a complex history. A territorial dispute between elites here in the Amhara region and those inneighbouring Tigray has been simmering for at least 25 years.

Tigrayans have been accused by opponents of wielding undue influence over Ethiopia’s government and security agencies since 1991. In recent months, these and other grievances have led to protests, strikes, vandalism and killings in Gondar, causing a drastic reduction in foreign visitors to the tourism-dependent city and an exodus of fearful Tigrayans.

Shops and schools have reopened in Gondar, after the authorities reasserted control in urban areas by declaring a state of emergency on 8October. But sporadic clashes with the military continue in the countryside.

“We don’t feel like it is our country. We feel like it is the time when the Italians invaded. We are like second-class citizens,” says a prosperous local businessman. Like all interviewees, he requested anonymity due to fear of reprisals from the authorities. Europeans never colonised Ethiopia,but Mussolini’s army occupied the country from 1936 to 1941.

Gondar’s predicament is a microcosm of Ethiopia’s: a toxic brew of unevendevelopment, polarised debate amid a virtual media vacuum, contested history, ethnic tensions, a fragmented opposition and an authoritarian government. Ethiopia’s rulers show few signs of being able to solve the morass of problems, which many believe the government itself caused.

Trouble began in Gondar in July, when word went around that the authorities intended to arrest Col Demeke Zewdu, a former rebel and retired military officer.When security forces tried to arrest Zewdu, who is amember of a committee campaigning over the contested Wolkait territory,armed Amharas protected him and several people, including security officers, were killed.

Wolkait is an administrative district in Tigray that borders Amhara. The committee says Wolkait and others areas were taken out of Gondar’s control by the Tigrayan People’s Liberation Front in 1992, when Ethiopia was divided into a federation along ethno-linguistic lines. Allied rebels ledby the TPLF, who unseated a military regime in 1991, introduced the system and still monopolise power.

Critics of the committee point out that a 1994 census found more than 96% of the people of Wolkait were Tigrayan , and that the complaints of annexation stem from the town of Gondar, not the district itself. The activists say the TPLF moved Tigrayans into the area during the rebellion.

The issue struck a chord in Gondar. After Demeke's arrest, rural militiamen paraded through the city on 31 July, firing bullets into the air during a large, peaceful demonstration. It is thought that the demonstration was facilitated by the Amhara wing of the TPLF-founded Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) – a four-partycoalition that, along with allied organisations, controls all the country's legislative seats.

A Tigrayan lecturer at Gondar University said he abhors Ethiopia's ethnicised politics and believes jostling between the Amhara and Tigrayan EPRDF wings lay behind the Gondar violence. The TPLF is the predominantparty in the EPRDF, and Amhara National Democratic Movement politiciansare seeking greater power, he said. "I don't believe in parties which are organised on ethnicity. I prefer it to be based on the individual." An end toethnic politics would make a resolution of the Wolkait issue possible, he believes.

Among activists from Amhara, disavowal of the ethnicity-based system is at the crux of disagreements over how to oppose the EPRDF. Because federalism formally protects the rights of communities marginalised duringprevious eras, when Ethiopia was a unitary state, promoting national unityat the expense of ethnic autonomy is often cast as regressive.

Groups promoting Amhara identity within a democratised federation are therefore at odds with those focused on national cohesion, according to Wondwesen Tafesse, a commentator on Amhara issues. "Since most diaspora Amharas support Ethiopianist political parties, they seem to havethis fear in the back of their mind that a resurgent Amhara nationalism, and the possible emergence of a strong Amhara political organisation, might undermine their political designs," said Wondwesen.

In the weeks after Demeke's detainment, there was more unrest, amid allegations that Tigrayan businesses were being targeted and Tigrayansattacked. People in Gondar say the companies were targeted because of their connections with the regime, rather than the owners' ethnicity.

Unrest in Amhara was preceded by protests by the Oromo, Ethiopia's largest ethnic group, who also complain of marginalisation and repression.In response, the government has reshuffled officials – and intensified repression. During the state of emergency, the government has sent at least 24,000 people to camps for indoctrination under rules that allow the suspension of due process. According to the Association for Human Rightsin Ethiopia, security forces killed some 600 demonstrators over the past year.

Since the beginning of November, a new federal cabinet has been announced and similar changes made in the Amhara government. But while maladministration and corruption were tagged as the pre-eminent problems, there is little evidence of officials being punished, or of policy reforms. An Amhara government spokesman said systemic changes werenot required.

In August, on the outskirts of Gondar near Demeke's neighbourhood, a crowd looted Baher Selam hotel. It was targeted following a rumour thatthe Tigrayan security officers allegedly involved in the operation to arrestthe colonel were staying there.

Near the wrecked hotel, an elderly lady was roasting coffee beans. On themorning of the incident she was coming home from church when she heard gunshots.Business has since declined and large numbers of unemployed young people have been mobilised against the government, she said.

People here believe Wolkait was part of Gondar throughout history. "Ifthey take that place, where else are they going to take?" the woman asked. "The situation is not going to go back to normal. If you light a match, it's small – but it can burn a whole area."

Abstract: This article, written 25 years ago and now presented with some additionalmateria,l attempts to indicate the emergence of new forms of inquiry in Ethiopia and in Europe. The Ethiopian philosopher, Zara Yacob and Rene Descartes, the French philosopher lived contemporaneously. Moreover, they both made similar inquiries about the existence of God. Based on their approaches to their inquiries, this paper makes a brief introduction to a subject that needs more examination by comparing the differences of the theories of both philosophers and how their approaches have deeper consequences to the latter societies they represented.

Backtalk; Yifter, Always Running for Ethiopia, Now Runs Far AwayFrom It

By Paul Gains, New York Times (OCT. 26, 1997)

A hero's welcome awaited the double gold medal winner Miruts Yifter when he returned home to Ethiopia from the 1980 Moscow Olympics. Thousands lined the streets and he was given a car, a luxury villa and a Government position promoting athletics. Yifter, who came from humblebeginnings, should have had a storybook ending to his athletic success. Life, however, is not so cut and dried.

Three months ago, the most feared distance runner of his time fled to Canada, leaving behind friends and family to seek political asylum a worldaway from the troubles in his homeland.

Last year, hundreds of political prisoners in Ethiopia were detained withouttrial, according to Amnesty International. Many were tortured. Journalists,teachers and union leaders have been imprisoned. Others have simply disappeared. Most telling, Ethiopia is one of only two African nations thatdid not ratify the African Charter on Human and Peoples Rights.

Yifter, who had lost his job as a coach with the Ethiopian national team, and friends say he was beaten by security forces there, fled to the tightly knit Ethiopian community in Toronto, where he once again has been givena hero's welcome, as well as an apartment, furniture and a lawyer to represent his case before the Canadian Refugee Board.

"First of all, I am here to save my life because of the fear I have of the Government," Yifter said through an interpreter. His words are chosen slowly and spoken deliberately. Beneath his Adidas track suit, his shins are horrifically scarred -- the result, the interpreter said, of the recent beating. Yifter is reluctant to speak about the incident, the interpreter made clear, both because he does not want to say something that mightput his family in jeopardy and because authorities ignored him when he reported the incident.

Ethiopia has been in a state of political upheaval since leftist military officers overthrew Emperor Haile Selassie in 1974 and ruled with Stalinisttactics until 1991, when Prime Minister Meles Zenawi came to power afterprolonged guerrilla warfare. He has systematically removed opposition to his regime while insuring representatives of his regional tribe are given top positions.

Yifter has the same ethnic background as Zenawi. His crime, he says, hasbeen refusing to endorse this ethnic discrimination.

"Throughout my life I was running for the people of Ethiopia and for my beloved flag," Yifter said. "The reason I have left my country is that people who were educated, people who had every kind of talent, becauseof their ethnic background, the Government has removed them. They have been fired. These people I have seen them on the street with their kids begging. So I don't get peace of mind. The Government is unfair."

Many others have also left for foreign destinations. Tekeye Gebrselassie,older brother of the Olympic 10,000-meter champion Haile Gebrselassie,has lived in the Netherlands for the last five years, according to Jos Hermens, Haile Gebrselassie's agent. The younger Gebrselassie is also based in the Netherlands. Hermens said two of Yifter's eldest sons -- he has eight children -- sought asylum there in 1992.

Yifter's friend and mentor, Mamo Wolde, winner of the 1968 Olympic marathon, has been imprisoned without trial for four years. Despite appeals from the International Olympic Committee and the InternationalAmateur Athletics Federation, the Ethiopian Government refuses clemency.
The Ethiopian Ambassador to Canada, Dr. Fekade Godamu, offers a different view of the situation. Gedamu says many famous people arebeing used by unscrupulous opponents of the Government.

He laughs at Yifter's claims.
"Beatings?" he asked. "It is a big country and a great deal of things happen in the outlying areas where there is opposition to the Government.A great deal of people lie and exaggerate. This is just an example. You can be beaten by gangsters. To say he is running for his life is sheer exaggeration. I don't think his family is in any danger. How can he be a threat to the Government?

"The Mamo Wolde case was different. He participated in the Red Terror period. For two or three years, 1977 to 1979, people -- women and children -- were rounded up and killed by the former Government.

Theyare in court now, I think. Mamo Wolde signed an execution order for a youth."

Godamu said the Government has been slow to bring Wolde and others totrial because it has been overwhelmed by the number of cases. "Justice will be done," Gedamu said.

Yifter said: "It is very hard to predict what kind of action the Governmentwill take now because this kind of Government is like a snake; you don't know which way they go. They have the power. They can do what they want."

Yifter's difficulties heightened two and a half years ago when he wastransferred -- without warning, he says -- from his coaching job to ameaningless position with the Ministry of Culture.

The agent, Hermens, remembers the last time he saw Yifter. That was inFebruary when Hermens visited Ethiopia. He recalls Yifter as being unhappy.

Told of Hermens's comments, Yifter responded: "I am always happy. I amnot worrying about money and whether I got it or not. What I have done you never get with money. I am a person who made history, so that is worth more than money. And, secondly, Haile Gebrselassie has followed inmy footsteps and become a famous person in the world. I am his role model. That is worth a million dollars."

Still, Yifter looks tired and overweight as he sits at a friend's dining table,discussing his journey. He is quick to smile, but tears appear in his eyes when he recalls the moment he decided to flee Ethiopia. An invitation to appear as guest of honor in a North American Ethiopian Sports Festival inLos Angeles gave him the break he was looking for.
"I didn't indicate anything to my family," he said quietly. "I didn't want emotions to become involved. There is a saying in Ethiopia that if a manwants to do something he must keep things in his heart. It hurts me deeply, deeply to leave my beloved country and my beloved family. It istotally sad. I have no words to explain."

On his left hand he wears a large ring commemorating his three victories at the famed San Blas Half Marathon in Puerto Rico. His phenomenal finishing kick also won him two gold medals at each of the 1977 and 1979World Cup of Athletics and earned him the nickname Yifter the Shifter.
Like most of his belongings, the medals remain at home in Addis Ababa.

It is easy to forget that Yifter's first appearance in the Olympics was in Munich in 1972 when he took the bronze medal in the 10,000 meters. Hemissed the start of the 5,000-meter final through his own error.

If not for political meddling, he could surely have added to his Olympic medal collection. The African boycott of the Montreal Games in 1976 robbed him of a matchup with Lasse Viren. And, in 1984, Yifter says he had prepared to emulate Wolde and the great Abebe Bikila by running themarathon in Los Angeles. That was the year the Soviet Bloc pulled out.
The Ethiopians, then under Marxist rule, followed suit.

Although Yifter doesn't know exactly how old he is -- record-keeping in the rural area where he was raised was spotty -- he believes he is in his late 50s. If his claim is upheld by the refugee board and he is allowed to stay in Canada, he would like to coach again. It is all he has trained to do.He has advised most of the top Ethiopian runners. And, there is no doubt he would bring a different perspective to Canada's lethargic distance running program.

While he awaits his refugee hearing and whatever else the future mightbring, Yifter says he has come to terms with all that has happened.

"I have started a new life and in order to start a new life you have to go up and down," he said. "I love my country; that is why I wear the flag," he said, pointing to the emblem on his track suit. "I used to travel all overthe world for this flag, so now I carry it everywhere."

Farewell: Ato Emmanuel Abraham:
A Teacher, Head Master, Ambassador plenipotentiary, Minister, who Shaped a Fortunate Generation in Chercher, Harargeh, Dies at103

By Paulos Assefa December 27, 2016

Ato Emmanuel Abraham, a prominent educator and watershed political figure during Haile Selassie’s Government, died at the age of 103. He hada long career span as a Minister before the Derg dislodged the despotic regime from effective political power in 1974.

Ato Emmanuel Abraham died of natural causes, said a relative. He wasburied at Petros-Paulos Church in Addis Ababa on Thursday 13 October2016, where a mammoth crowd paid condolences.

Emmanuel Abraham, fate’s favorite from day one, was born into a family of Oromo ancestry on March 17, 1913 in a hamlet at Benti Adere in Boji, Wollega, in the house of his grandfather Malimo Gaama. He was the only surviving child of Ato Abraham Tato and Woizero Quantu Malimo, whose three siblings; two sisters and a brother, all perished in infancy. His formaleducation was in the Swedish Evangelical Mission where he proved himselfto be prodigiously clever. In 1925, as luck would have it, he replaced a candidate in Nekemte whose mother was unwilling to let her only son go on scholarship to remote Addis Ababa, to the newly opened modern Tefferi Makonen School (TMS). Among his contemporaries were Major General Wakjira Serada, Haddis Alemayehu, Abossey Dufera, Almayehu Kitata, Gobenna Ayana, Bharu Kabba, Woldemariam Nemerra and Teffera Estephanos, among others. It was also here in TMS that Emmanuel, without excessive exertion, passed with flying colors all subjects and wonan award and accolades from Emperor Haile Selassie.

In his memoir, he described vividly how after his graduation, he became aprotégé of the Governor of Chercher Disrtict, Azazh Worqneh Eshete aka Dr. Charles (Workneh) Martins, who recognized Emmanuel's capabilities while he was a director of TMS. At the end of 1931, he took Emmanuel, when he was appointed Governor of Chercher, to the formerly called Asseb Tefferi (modern-day Chiro), a politically complicated place and diverse city, 325 km away from Addis Ababa and west of Hararghe to starta modern school. Despite initial difficulties and disappointments largely placed on him from regressive and reactionary minded segments of the population, Emmanuel made his auspicious beginning with exuberant vitality and astuteness in December 1st 1931 with a cornucopia of merely 15 students ranging from 7- to 18- years- old (one of whom was this writer's father). To this day, his students recall him endearingly and with infectious enthusiasm as Gash Emmanuel as they relay the story of that school to their children and grandchildren, describing how Emmanuel flunghimself into teaching with great gusto and skill. Outside the class room, there was carpentry, soccer, billiards to play, songs and military marches, all new at that time. Besides Emmanuel, Tewodros Martin (the Anglo- Ethiopian), Olana Daniel, Betera Sadiq Kassa, Major Bekele Deboch and Abossey Dufera, two other teachers with unfailing patience, gave themselves generously and were always willing to help regenerate the youth.

It quickly became clear that most parents' fear of the old religious order was in danger in that school was unfounded. The clamor for modern education was in earnest and student enrollment grew exponentially yearafter year. Also, more importantly, parents complied when asked to fundgenerously, while Worqneh as Governor of Chercher paid from his personal accounts to cover expenses for text books that were bought in from overseas. On top of this, Emmanuel's reputation as a Head Master soared to prominence as he established a genuine rapport with the inhabitants. A sharp change in his career occurred when Dr. Hakim Worqneh took him under his wing to the United Kingdom in mid- 1935, where he became Ethiopian Chief Minister in London.

Before the Italian invasion in 1935, besides instilling a respect for correctEnglish grammar and rudimentary lessons in arithmetic, geography and science the school intensely nurtured the students with a succinct roadmap and the proper mindset for the future development of themselves as individuals and of the country at a large. A most telling example of this was that one of Emmanuel's pupils, Belachew Wondimu died heroically while defending the town against the Fascist onslaught.
Others fought by joining their parents in a guerrilla war from the mountains of Chercher as patriots during the five years occupation. In1941, when British King's African Rifles (KAR) troops came as victors, these students played a crucial role in administration as there was a highdemand for English translators and interpreters. Decades later, some of Emmanuel's fellow students became high-profile senior civil service servants, Generals, Governor, lawyers, chef de train and district school supervisors, among other things. Despite the school's stunning achievement over a span of nearly four years, none of the teachers, foremost Emmanuel, were ever self-congratulatory. With characteristic modesty, he would unassumingly talk of his stellar achievements: the years at Chercher were among the happiest of his life. Correspondingly, he was remembered with enormous gratitude and discerning appreciationby his students.

Early in his career in London, Emmanuel carried a heavy responsibility on his thin shoulders as a secretary and amanuensis for nearly four years, taking directives from Hakim Worqneh, drafting letters and memorandum to the high officials and translate impromptu Amharic to English vice-versaas the war intensified between Italy and Ethiopia. Since he was intellectually voracious, he hunts every book store and library for his reading and goes to plays, museums and cultural events, which were plentiful. More importantly, the defining moment of his life was when he became a lifetime member of the United Society for Christian Literature It was at this critical juncture that, Emmanuel was noticed by the late Hiruy Woldselassie (a foreign Minister) who had discerned his great capacity for hard work and recommend him to the Emperor, shortly after his influentialpatron Worqneh left for India in 1939. During his stay in London, besides Amanuel Gabera Selassie, a fellow coreligionist of an Eritrean descent, an employee of British Embassy in Addis Ababa, that was to figure significantly in his life. It was here also he met and be friended the literaryscholar Siraq Hiruy, studying in Brasenose College, Oxford for his degree. What even more interesting that he worked closely with the famous Ms.
Sylvia Pankhurst (a mother of the renowned Professor Richard Pankhurst)as she single-handedly campaigned for public opinion against Italian aggression. Emmanuel after he went through the unbearable blitz, food rationing, hardship and nostalgia, bone-numbing cold weather, the Emperor grudgingly conceded to his appeal, brought him back home in April 1943 to Addis Ababa, and to became his General Director of Ministerof Education.

It was fairly evident from the start that Emanuel, who was eminently qualified for that position, faced difficult hurdles like those of his predecessor, Makonen Desta of Harvard, in the shape of Ras Kassa HailueDarge, a notorious eugenist and arch reactionary and the Bishop of the Orthodox Church, who had nursed habitually an outdated paranoia about Oromos being in a unique- enviable political position. Nothing prepared Emmanuel for what he would confront. Employees at his Ministry by- passed him to report directly to the Emperor. It was like a never ending grudge kept alive by hard edge dynastic arrogance and their-too- often- willing accomplices. He refuted this stupefying charge that there were numerically less enrollments of the student population of Amharas than Oromos under Emmanuel administration. The problem was that none of itwas true. The Emperor saw the list of students where the number of Amhara comprised disproportionately higher than any other ethnic groupscombined together, he staunchly sided with Emmanuel. Best of all, as thefunds from national coffer increased schools were accessible to all the provinces in the country. That was a significant development for the nation that was kept illiterate for centuries by priests and Shieks. He was also falsely accused of sending abroad for scholarship academically outstanding and meritorious students from poor family background ratherthan the patrician caste, whose academic performances were less than zero. As a matter of fact, those who had vaccinations preparatory to go inabroad were replaced at the last minute by patrician families. In June 6, 1947, the Emperor capitulated to the jingoistic pressure of a group of inflexible hardliners and the tewahado religious zealots removed him withback-handed compliments and kept him in limbo for two years without offering him a position. Such, at any rate, was the bane of precarious political life under repressive feudalistic traditions.

Meanwhile, Emmanuel settled into a respectable marriage to Ms. ElleniAlemayehu of a Gonderi descent of noble family for 55 years. She precedes him in death by fourteen years. The couple had two sons, Amenti and Dawit, two daughters, Ruth and Sarah, and grandchildren.One of his grandchildren is Ms. Naomi Eskender Desta, the apple of hiseye, an alumnus of Swarthmore College and Massachusetts Institute ofTechnology (MIT).

During this time, Emmanuel who hated idleness started working tirelesslyand endlessly, bringing his expertise honed by life time experience to Mekane Yesus Church ((EECMY) and brought it abreast of International Community of the Lutheran Churches. Since he had a vocation for writingand editing he immediately started translating the book Diplomacy from English to Amharic that was essential to enlighten for those who were running the country's foreign policy and members of Parliaments, among others for the benefit of the nation. Prior to this, he was also one of the delegates sent to San Francisco to sign the United Nations Charter on June 26, 1945.

From 1949 through 1959, Emmanuel became Ambassador, Envoy Plenipotentiary to India, Italy and England in succession. With his elegance and always courtly manners he played a prominent role in Rome where the bitter legacy of 5 years of fascist entanglement had to be sort out. He represented the Emperor and his country with great diplomatic skill. And foreigners who interacted with him particularly in London duringthose tumultuous years admired him as the greatest ambassador that Ethiopia ever had. After his diplomatic postings were over, Emanuel's star was again in the ascent as the Organization of African Unity (OAU) was in the throes of birth. He assumed the position of a Minister in his Majesty's private cabinet from 1959-61, where vile political intrigues were rife. Then, he became a full-fledged Minister for Posts Offices, Telegraphs, and Telephones for six years; Minister of Communications for three years; andfinally was the Minister of Mines for 5 years until the government unsuspecting and with its hands in its pockets was overthrown in 1974 forits bungling incompetency. He was imprisoned by the Provincial Military Administrative Council (PMAC) for 9 months as a high-ranking member ofthe imperial government for malfeasance while in office. He was released on January 7th 1975 with effusive apology by the military officials with fellow Ministers Menasse Lemma (an Egyptian born), Salah Hinit, Bitwoded Asfaha Woldemichael, among others.

Shortly afterwards, he served his church as president of the EECMY for tenstraight years. He was also an executive committee member of the World Lutheran Church, where he played a significant role bringing the All-Africa Conference to this august body. In 1985, after he relinquished this post, Emmanuel with his encyclopedic memory decided to write his personal memoir, which had been incubating in his mind for years. The Norwegian Lutheran Church provided funds to defray the cost of publication.

Over the subsequent years, his book "Reminiscence of My Life", was published in 1995 in Oslo: Lund forlag. That the reader's reaction was staggering was an understatement. It was elegantly well-written, in termsof a firsthand account of the imperial government from a minister. The insight he brought to this picture (the outsider as insider) is what caught the attention of these generation defrauded by Mengistue Haile Mariam and worst of all, spearheaded by the raciest views of Meles Zenawi and his cohorts currently running the country like German Nazi-Concentration-Camps with an Electronic Police State. Most significantly, his memoir illuminates what has been elided from Ethiopians collective consciousness as a nation. The author received rave review from noted luminaries such as Professor Emeritus Taddesse Tamrat, a foremost historian on Church and State in Ethiopia. Subsequently, this book was avidly read by university students and received the critical attention it deserved here and abroad. The memoir was praised for its even-handed and unbiased presentation. It was out ofprint, now re- issued by Red Sea Press, New Jersey, and also translated into Amharic for the general public and published by Addis Ababa University Press.

Throughout his whole long life, Emmanuel knew he was an Oromo and Protestant. In a country predominately ruled by Amhara and Orthodox Christians for a century, this knowledge had never plagued him or turnedhim a disaffected man. Far from it, he was never a bitter man, unlike other non-Amhara, who converted their traditional religion and Amharizedtheir names to ingratiate themselves with dominant culture. He remained true to himself - an authentic human being. Even more, he was generous to a fault. For this, I had firsthand experience while interviewing him for abook project that had taken a phenomenal amount of his time a few yearsago. At times, he was victimized by some people who took undue advantage over him. One illustrious example of this: a person approachedhim with the legitimate grievance that he did not get a promotion for years, unlike his peers and colleagues with good family connections, which, of course, made this man even more envious and bitter. Emanuel intercede on behalf of this wretched fellow and did his best to further his career, going so far to help him boost his self-confidence and lacerated ego. Unbeknownst to him, this man was the lowest scum and extravagantly ambitious, who could not work with others as equal. The irony of it was that this vicious Frankenstein's Monster-like-character quickly turned to collude with Emmanuel's adversaries and brought grave charges and imputations against him. Nevertheless, Emanuel took this situation with inward smile and philosophical indifference

A mother of two grown-up children recounted an episode to me in which,Emanuel go beyond the call of duty to help people. She was his secretaryfor a few years after graduating from Commercial School. She announcedto Emmanuel she was going to marry a young man within a few days.
Shortly after he congratulated her went to announce this good news to hiswife, Woizero Elleni. On hearing this, she prepared a sumptuous lunch in honor of this bride. After the lunch was over, he excused himself to go to the bedroom to take a cat nap, and let the two ladies chat by themselves. In the meanwhile, his wife took this young lady by the hand into the kitchen and did what mothers do with their daughters advising her on withthe day-to- day relationship in a married life. Finally, Elleni gave her a gift before she said good bye to the bride. En route from his residence to the office, Emanuel, who tend to speak carefully and laconically took a turn, advising her as he did years later with his own daughter Sahara before hermarriage to Admiral Eskunder Desta. For this gesture, she always mentioned him with reverence as a father figure for his sage council since she lost both parents in her early years.

Nor was this all. Emmanuel with great patience and good humor put up with a former Minister of a short-lived Endalkchew Makonnen cabinet, anAmhara of Gonderi ancestry. This person, who had been to school in America was scandalized when he was young by the loose sexual mores among the Oromos, where he grew up, compared to more repressive culture of his Amhara parents. Oblivious of how he was taking up Emmanuel's time for such a trivial matter, he importuned him to explainthis cultural phenomenon to him how. Never stern and aloof, always affable, Emmanuel undertook patiently to explain out of compassion for this Minister's coming book for his incredulous reader.
Emmanuel at age 102, whose output never faltered, was giving an interview as a repository of modern Ethiopian history without losing hisearly sprightliness. In Mesfin Fanta's words, a Vice Minister who workedunder him: "Emmanuel died as he lived, a truly great man".

INTERVIEW

With Dr. Fitigu Tadesse; retired diplomat and a member ofdistinguished family of the Bete-Israel

By Arefayné Fantahun Wednesday, January 4th, 2017

Dr. Fitigu Tadesse was born in 1939 in Azezo, Gondar town and raised inAddis Ababa. He was educated at the French Lycée Gebre-Mariam. Uponcompleting high-school he went to Israel and studied at the Bar Ilan University of Tel Aviv where he graduated in political science. He received international relations master’s degree there in 1963. He also received hisPHD from the University of Strasbourg, France in international relations in1968. He joined the Ethiopian Ministry of Foreign Affairs in early 70’s and he had ambassadorship positions in Djibouti and Italy and he had also served as the Vice President of Africa Programmes of the UK-based, The Hunger Project. Fitigu’s manner, his gestures, and his voice recall the vanished provincial of his childhood, where the bourgeoisie retained tracesof cosmopolitan culture. The son of a government official and Minister in Emperor’s Haile Selassie’ era, he spent his early years speaking Amharic with his parents, Hebrew with his relatives, and French and English at school. Ambassador Fitigu was interviewed in November 2016 in Addis Ababa Tennis Club’s garden.

Your father Tadesse Yakob was State Minister at the Prime Minister's office during the Emperor Haile Selassie' era. He had theBete Israel (the Falasha) origin. Could you please start by telling us about this heritage of yours?

We were members of the Bete-Israeli family, what we call them EthiopianJews, though we don't know it much. I don't have any recollections of that. My father's family became Christian three or four generations beforehim. And his father was at the court of Emperor Tewdros. And as such, hewould not be at higher situation unless he became Christian. So, he adopted the state religion to climb up the higher ladder. My father had anuncle called Tamrat Emmanuel, who when he was young, sent from Gondar to a church school in Debre Tabor, to learn Geez, and Scriptures at the age of seven. And apparently while in Debre Tabor, he met a Swedish missionary, and that mission fellow was impressed with his Geez proficiency. They took him with in that mission.

He went from the Ethiopian Orthodox Church School to the Swedish mission school without formally changing his religion. And he learned English, and all that. And for higher study, the Swedish mission sent him to Asmara, which was under Italian rule. He went to a formal school there,Italian school, Caponi. He learned Italian and at a certain point, he became erudite, very knowledgeable in Geez, English and Italian. From there he came back to his mother, and after what he told me later on, he heard rumour that his father was a Falasha. The family didn't talk much about it because the grand-father became Christian and a member of the high court of Atse Tewodors. So this minority should not be mentioned and all that. He was troubled by the fact that the family was hiding this inheritance. He went to see the Governor of Gondar to discuss the plight of the Falasha and while he was roaming there with the governor, he heard that a certain Jacques Faitlovitch, a Polish Jew who had studied at the school for oriental languages at the Sorbonne in Paris, was there to undertake a research about the Falasha community. The two met and struck a friendship, intellectual friendship at that. They decided to undertake to study together and they met Falashas in remote villages. They found that they were praying in Geez but a little bit in Hebrew also, though their religious practices did not always conform to rabbinic Judaism. It was explained that they were away for the 2,000 years and obviously, they forgot some aspects of the customs.

First, they decided to take three or four people to Europe for study. Somebody called Aleka Gete was the kind of head of that community. Oneof them, Yona Bogale was sent to Germany while Aleka Gete went to London. Tamrat headed to Paris with Faitlovitch. They could really garner the support of the Jews and recognition. Since then, Prof. Tamrat becamereally involved in that and devoted his life to the community. And finally, in 1934, they opened a school, a Hebrew school here, not very far from Merkato, to teach the history of the Jewish people and to preserve the community's own religious traditions. They had many students. That closed down in 1935 when Italy invaded Ethiopia. Prof. Tamrat went back to Paris as a refuge and stayed there until 1943. He came back.

He was a big influence on your life?

In a certain way. When I was looking at Prof. Tamrat, it was like I was looking at people like Corneille, like Jean Jacque Rousseau, somebody whowas really theoretically very deep, democrat, without probably the knowledge of applying those theories into practice. He was not an office person but an intellectual who went from house to house to tell stories, todebate. I didn't live with him.

Your parents brought you to Addis Ababa when you were a child. You had a secular upbringing but with some knowledge of religionfrom your relatives?

I came to Addis Ababa and then we were living in Kazanchis area. I wentfor the year to Princess Zenebework School, I guess. I don't even quite remember, I was too young. In early 49, I think the Lycée Français was opened. And my father, who studied in Cairo, who was Arabophone and Francophone said he would send us there. And we went there. So my formative years really come from that the French school and we finished our Baccalauréat. Yona Bogale who was sent to Germany and after Second World War came back to Ethiopia and he started continuing that Hebrew School. It was more or less working. In 1956 Israel was already born and many Jews were going by thousands and all that. In Ethiopia, Emperor Haile Selassie refused to send the Falashas to the young nation.He said "Just forget it. I am myself a Jew, Moa Anbesa. The entire Ethiopian people is descended from the people of Israel. You don't take my people, not even a single one,"

Well, that is actually what I personally feel.

However, the Emperor was willing to the idea of a group of young Ethiopian Jews going there to study on the condition that they return to Ethiopia to serve as teachers. After all, the Emperor, said his government was sending young people to Europe and the US for education. In 1955, Ibecame among the twelve Ethiopian Jews who were chosen by Yona Bogale to go to Israel. So we went there. Since most of them came from the countryside and lacked languages, since I spoke French and English, Ibecame the de facto leader of the group. I remember when we arrived in Israel, they asked us what our feelings were. I spoke in French, "Je suis heureux d'être en Israël. j'ai beaucoup entendu parler de ce pays. En tantque éthiopien, j'espère que nous serons bien intégrés et que nous auronsl'occasion pour aller à l'école comme tout le monde. » (I am happy to be in Israel. I have heard a lot about this country. As an Ethiopian, I hope that we will be well integrated and that we will have the opportunity to goto school like everyone else.) I was surprised myself I could speak such athing.

We started learning Hebrew, which we did for a year. They said if i had togo further, I had to take matriculation exam. I did and passed the exam, to their surprise. They didn't know what to do because what they had in mind was to teach us Hebrew so that we could go back home and teach the language to the rest of the Falasha.

You were not so enthusiast to do that?

No, I joined the University of Bar Ilan in Tel Aviv and I got my bachelor's degree in political science, minoring in economics. And I did in international relations master's degree in Israel from 1958- 63. After my Master's degree, I did not want to go Gondar to teach Hebrew. I told themthey had enough people that they brought from Gondar. I was thinking about going to the political establishment in Ethiopia. My father at that time was State Minister at the Prime Minister Aklilu Habte-Wold's office.And I wrote to the Ethiopian Ministry of Education saying that I was among the 66 who finished Baccalauréat and since I was Falassha I came to Israel but I wanted to go to France. The response was positive and theytold me that I was entitled. They sent me to the University of Strasbourg and I stayed there from 1963-68, I did my PHD in international relations. The title of my thesis was "La politique Française en ethiopie 1933- 1936". When I came back to Ethiopia in 1968, I was assigned to work at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. I went to see Dr. Tesfaye Gebreezgi, the Minister of State under Ketema Yifru.

Before you start telling us about your diplomatic careers, if I takeyou back to questions of the authenticity and origins of the Judaism of the Falashas. What is your take? Do you believe they are true Jews?

No, I don't. For me, they are autochthone people who were converted to Judaism through contacts with merchants and intermarriage. Jews who came to Ethiopia in medieval times married Ethiopian women and they were made to adopt Judaism, particularly their insistence on respecting Sabbath, which was not specific to Ethiopian Jews. For me Ethiopia is mycountry, I have always felt Ethiopian. That was why I came back.

In the Ethiopian orthodox tradition, there has been practices suchas Mitswat, in which believers go churches and give out handoutsto needy people, which is incorporated from Jews tradition.

Many things are Jews tradition because it is the first religion in the world.Jesus was a Jew. He wanted to change the status quo, he was someone who wanted to introduce a different approach to Judaism. But otherwise,there was only Judaism. At the start, there was no Buddhism, no Islam.

There have been people in Ethiopia who have been marginalizedas Falashas. The Agew and kimant people more or less went through similar experience. Perhaps you'd like to comment on that.

A little bit less. More emphatically on the Ethiopian Jews, to the extent that they did not have a place to bury their dead. That only stopped during Mengistu's time. Emperor Haile Selassie was saying, "Well, we will try to teach our people. They should know that the Bete Israel are the original people of the world". But nothing was done on the ground. But most importantly, beyond this happening and that, the Ethiopian Jews funnily enough are so much attached to Judaism, to Israel. They don't even know Judaism. But the thing is for a foreigner, you cannot but acceptthat these people must be Jews. Why are they so attracted to Israel?
Today they have all kinds of special problems there in Israel there butthey have strong attachment to that land.
You've never been considered as sell-out by other EthiopiansJews?
Not a sell-out. I rather remember the great respect they bestowed me. Ofcourse, they knew that I was ambitious. For reasons I was arguing with the government of Israel. I've never felt a Falasha. Even in Israel, I was never one to wear a keppa. I was tolerated because the Israelis had also their own suspicion that a black could not be Jew.
Tell me about your stay in Strasbourg where you did your doctoralstudies. Being black and Jew in France, how was it like?

In France, it was different. There were strong Jewish communities thereand I've never felt any prejudice there. There were some incidents, of course. For instance, once in Strasbourg, where there was a large Jews community, someone at the entrance of a synagogue asked me where I came from and what I was doing there. This is Jews temple, he told me.When I told him that I was a Jew, his response was, “Vous. C’est pas possible.” (You a Jew, that isn’t be possible). And I had to tell him that Iwas joking. For him, there were French Jews who survived from Shoah, Polish or German Jewish, but to see a black who said he was Jewish did not correspond with his vision.

So when you returned to Ethiopia, you were assigned to work atthe Ministry of Foreign Affairs. You said you went to see Dr.
Tesfaye Gebreezgi. That was the start of your diplomatic career?
Yes. I sat for an exam with other educated people. They gave us lots of questions about the Red Sea, Eritrea’s future and Ethiopia’s role, how thecountry could save itself from the threats here and there. I mean, it was very interesting. People wrote three or four pages. I think in an hour, I wrote eighteen or twenty pages. It was a flow, something I knew.
Particularly I put the issue of Djibouti. One issue that might bring us and how to deal with that. Dr. Tesfaye was very happy. (Dr. Tesfaye studied atCornell University, he had a PHD from there. He was Ethiopia’s permanentrepresentative at the UN for many years.) He brought me to meet his boss, Ato Ketema who said this was the problem that they had and told me to start the following day. I started in the African Department under Ambassador Mengiste Desta. I became the specialist related to Djibouti. I forwarded my idea that that there was nothing that said that when Franceleft it would go to Ethiopia. But because of the good relationship, we had to make sure that Charles de Gaul understood that he was the only one who could sign an agreement with Emperor Haile Selassie or give a letter of intention or a letter of support that if there was this situation where Djibouti would become independent, to make sure that it didn’t included inSomalia. That Ethiopia had a natural and overwhelming national interest and that in the past the Vichy government of France has blocked all the armament that Ethiopia needed to defend itself against. Because of that interms of offsetting that establishing a new relationship between France and Ethiopia, we should have that approach. And I think finally they reported that to Emperor Haile Selassie. De Gaulle already said that France’s preference was for Djibouti to become part and parcel of Ethiopia. When he resigned on 1969, he was replaced by Pompidou who launched what they called “la politique arabe de la France”, mostly motivated by France’s focus on Arab countries markets. Somalia became member of the Arab League and Somalia was claiming Ogaden and Djibouti. The French didn’t want to get involved there. So finally, we didn’tknow how to handle that. At that time Ahadu Sabure (renowned journalist) was Ethiopia’s Ambassador to Djibouti. He was sending letters to Addis Ababa saying he had had enough, after five years of service there. Ahadu’s attribute was that he was half-Somalia as his mother was Somalian. He spoke Somalia. When he left, he recommended that I shouldreplace him. And then, Ahadu was summoned by Prime Minister Endalkachew Mekonnen and was assigned as Minister of Information.

Then Endalkachew urged me to go to Djibouti as an ambassador. I wouldindeed be interested to go on the condition that a new policy was draftedbecause my worry was that the uprising against the Emperor was on full swing and the military was busy in different fronts and the country was becoming friable. When I was in the process of preparing the new policy,Endalkachew was thrown into prison. Then the military took over and at that time the Djibouti issue became urgent as Somalia started attacking Ethiopia. So it was at his time that I assumed my duties as an ambassador there.

Did the Derg officials set out a plan for the future of Djibouti?

Not actually. Some of the Derg officials asked what we would do with Djibouti. Some of them had a fixation on annexing Djibouti. Djibouti is ours, they said. I told them it was not ours yet we would try to make it ours, if we followed a very good internal policy. I really worked hard with the French to make sure that Djibouti would never join Somalia when France would grant it its independence. So what was decided was Djiboutiwould have a guaranteed independence, guarantee from Ethiopia, guarantee from Somalia. Each could involve in military intervention if the other should threaten Djibouti's independence. Since the Somali population had long dominated the territory's politics, this agreement wasa triumph for Ethiopia. All we wanted was an international agreement which allowed Ethiopia to intervene in case of military intervention from Somalia. The Somalians raised hell, saying it was neo-colonialism.

When Somali declared full-scale war against Ethiopia, I was busy sendinginformation to Addis Ababa. I established some good contacts and I had two deputies, one Issa and another Afar working for me. One of the deputies was trying to garner the support of Afar population and the otherthat of the Issa. Because we were telling them that Ethiopia was their ancestral home for both ethnic groups. When the referendum was conducted on June 1977, even though Somalia was overwhelming, because, many Somalians infiltrated into the country to change the result of the referendum. We did the same on our side, making the people on the border area vote but not as much as the Somalis. Finally, the country voted for independence. And the French said that Djibouti would be a sovereign state and that would be guaranteed by the United Nations. Theytried to seek a more harmonious relationship between the two ethnic groups, and it was decided that the president would be from the majority,Issa and the deputy from Afar, an arrangement which is not changed to this day. That way there was a balance. Our policy was finally a success inmaking sure that Djibouti didn't go to Somalia. Of course today, Somalia itself is in precarious situation.

What is your recollections of Ketema Yifru who was Minister ofForeign Affairs from 1971–1974?

Ketema Yifru was the new generation Foreign Minister. Young, educated, devoted to the Emperor, but with that devotion, what I saw was that, he could convince easily the Emperor to have an independent foreign policy from the Americans. He pushed the Emperor for non-alignment, not to callWashington to say shall we vote this way or that way. The Emperor by definition, by historical and natural inclination was a reactionary person and he was natural ally to America. And yet he became non-aligned. Whatdoes that mean? The country was aligned neither with the American nor with the Soviet, the two blocks. It was a great success for Ketema Yifru. Itwas like having the patriarch of Ethiopia pray with the Muslim head. Ethiopia depended on America on everything. Yet the non-alignment policy was not to support the Americans or the Soviets. And the Emperor liked Ketema very much. Is it because he was from Harar also? May be. But he was competent and he had an astute tactical mind. He brought Dr.Tesfaye Gebreezgi from New York to Addis Ababa. So the foreign office became an office of young intellectual people. The speeches that we prepared for the Emperor, when he was at the advanced age of 75, 80 were dynamic. There were conservative noblemen who were saying why these young people are making the Emperor say such things. Talking about his commitment to Africa and its plights. Africa this, Africa that.

Ketema Yifru took advantage of the Emperor to advance his pan African's views. One example, I remember was at meeting at the Organization of the African Unity when he attacked Ian Smith of the Rhodesia (today's Zimbabwe) who unilaterally declared independence from Britain in 1965 and for several years fought a bitter war against African nationalist guerrillas. Ketema Yifru openly condemned British government and the Ethiopian nobility who were at the meeting were flabbergasted. They wentto the Emperor to let him that his minister had the audacity to insult the Emperor's ally, Great Britain. "You're getting old and this kids are turning you around," one of the nobles who would say to the Emperor. But the Emperor remained firm and told the nobles that, "we have to stand with African countries."

How long did you stay in Djibouti? Where did you go after that?

Three years. After Djibouti I came to Addis Ababa and I continued workingfor the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. I served as head of the African and Middle East department for a year. After that, President Mengistu asked me to go to Rome as an Ambassador. And I asked why. Because, he said, we had problem there with Eritrean and Tigran liberation movements freely roaming and we wanted you to establish friendly relationship with the Italian government to stop that. Mengistu said he knew I spoke Italian. It was true I studied Italian in Bologna for a while.

When was this?

So the Red Terror wasn't over yet.

It was not. I felt very bad for the country because young people were killed left and right. I personally refused to be member of Meison (the Amharic acronym for the All-Ethiopia Socialist Movement).Haile Fida who felt anybody who put his foot in France for at least twenty-four hours had to be member of the Meison urged me many time to join the party. (HaileFida was a pro-Derg intellectual who studied in France and served as leader of the Ethiopian Student Movement in Europe). In our student daysin France, I was arguing with him and others and I was saying that Ethiopia needed parliamentary monarchy, not Marxist revolution. I arguedsaying that the point which rallied all of was the Emperor. But anyway I was hurt by the fact that things turned violent and this one was killing theother one, because of part differences. It was a pity.

You were transferred to Italy? Who was the ambassador in Romebefore you?

There wasn't ambassador for some time. The last one was Zewde Retaduring the Emperor's time who left the post after the change of government and decided to stay in exile.

So, I left for Rome with my wife and children. ….You know we did a good job. There was famine back home and I made sure that I got a lot of foodaid to Ethiopia. Some of it was apparently sold while it was in the middle of the sea, though it was transported by Ethiopian ship.

One thorny issue was the Eritrean Liberation Front (EPLF) had an office inRome, with its flag flying which was against the international law. When Ienquired left and right, I was told that the EPLF people had some good networks in the Italian foreign office, some of the Italian officials were born in Asmara during the colony's time.

I went to the foreign office and met the Foreign Minister to discuss with him on the issue. I first thanked him for all the assistance they provided to us. And I raised about EPLF office with its flag. Have you recognized therepublic of Eritrea? I asked him and he said he was not aware of it. Then Idropped some names of his staff who were born in Eritrea and who were ostensibly backing the scessionasit movement, based on my information. Within a week, the office was closed. There was also another TPLF office, which they were using to collect money from their supporters. It was also closed. So during my stay in Rome for four years, from 1978-82, I made itdifficult the free movement of the secessionist groups. Only individuals were coming and going like Isaias Afewerki who had an Iraqi diplomatic passport. I couldn't do anything about it. Meles used to come also.

How did your term at Rome come to an end?

I had a problem with a certain cadre who was working at the embassy andwas urging me join the Workers' Party of Ethiopia, known then as Isepa. I categorically refused. I told him that I was a career diplomat and I was working for my country, and I was not obliged to be member of Isepa.

Then things got serous and I fired this cadre and he went back to Ethiopia, an act that infuriated his bosses in Addis Ababa. Then a decisioncame from Addis that I was replaced by a loyal member of the party, a certain Girma. That was my departure with the government, who later accused me of forsaking "the revolution".

And then?

I decided to stay in Rome and I started working for General Electric as consultant, which I did for five years. Then I was moved to New York and worked for the same company for a year. Then, I joined Hunger Project, an international NGO that works that mobilizes and empowers local peopleto meet all their basic needs on a sustainable basis. The projects' board ofdirectors was Javier Pérez de Cuéllar (the fifth Secretary-General of the United Nations for two terms from 1982 to 1991.) I started out as Director for Africa, and after two years I became the Vice President of Africa Programmes until my retirement in 2010.

(Dr. Fitigu today lives in Addis Ababa with his wife and children and often travels to New York where he keeps an apartment there. The person who arranged this interview for mewas his daughter, Yodit Fitigu who herself in an interesting person. She is researcher with a background in socio-cultural anthropology working in the humanitarian and development sectors. She is an expert in migration including, labor migration, human trafficking, and mixed migration. Yodit has worked extensively in Ethiopia, Niger, Haiti, Peru, and Georgia.)

Ethiopia, irreplaceable player in Horn of Africa's peace andstability – French envoy

The French ambassador to Ethiopia has underlined the indispensable roleAddis Ababa plays in matters to do with regional peace and security.

Frederic Bontems made the observation during a meeting on TuesdayDecember 3, 2017 in the Ethiopian capital with his counterpart, Dr Workneh Gebeyehu. The French envoy said it was important to have Ethiopia on board various international issues.

The two according to the Foreign Ministry discussed bilateral, regional andglobal issues of mutual interest. Bontems also extended words of congratulations to Ethiopia on official assumption of its seat as a non- permanent member of the United Nations Security Council (UNSC).

He said France – a permanent member of the UNSC, would continue to work with Ethiopia and to also extend the boundaries of their cooperation on different levels. The Ethiopian top diplomat described France as a ‘dependable friend of Ethiopia’ stressing that they were keen to work withFrance at the UNSC.

Another key area of cooperation that was discussed was the upcoming France-Africa Forum scheduled to take place in the Malian capital Bamakoin May 2017.

Ethiopia’s role in maintaining regional peace was buttressed months back by the Head of African Futures and Innovation at the Institute for SecurityStudies Jakkie Cilliers in an exclusive interview with Africanews said, “Ethiopia is an important player in terms of peace and security on the African continent.

‘‘It has been for a number of years the largest troops contributor on peacekeeping in Africa. It hosts the African Union and in the horn of Africa, it is extremely significant in Somalia, in Sudan and elsewhere.

‘‘So I think that this reflects in a sense Ethiopia’s status as a, emergingpeace and security power in Africa,” Cilliers added.

Ethiopia despite suffering from protests as a result of anti-government sentiments in two main regions – Oromo and Amhara, has been a strongforce in mediating in the South Sudan political crisis and in maintaining peace in neighbouring Somalia.
They are also in the forefront of the regional peace and security group, the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD). The country iscurrently under a 6-month state of emergency aimed at quelling the protests.

Ethiopians unite to celebrate Christmas at iconic town of Lalibela

Abdur Rahman Alfa Shaban

07/01/2017 Ethiopia

Christians in Ethiopia are celebrating Christmas today. The birth of Jesus is a big deal in the Horn of Africa nation which is steep in religious historydating centuries back.

The celebration is referred to as Gena. Around this time all Christiansunite to celebrate the birth of Jesus Christ.

At Lalibela town for instance, the state-affiliated Fana Broadcasting Corporate (FBC) reports that many of the faithful will gather around therock-hewn churches amid the flood of foreign tourists who visit the country at this time Lalibela is a town in northern Ethiopia famous for monolithic rock-cut churches. It is one of Ethiopia's holiest cities, second only to Aksum, and acenter of pilgrimage.

Ethiopia's tourist website wrote about Christmas, ''Gena or Ledet (7 January), the Ethiopian equivalent to Christmas, is preceded by an all-night vigil following 43 days of fasting that culminate.

''It is a family-oriented holiday, but in some areas it is marked by traditional dancing or a hockey-like game called Yegenna Chewata, supposedly played by the local shepherds on the night Jesus was born. Itis traditional to eat the national dish doro wot (chicken stew) over Gena.''

Many Orthodox Christians celebrate Christmas on January 7. Among others, those in Russia, Ukraine, Serbia, neighbouring Egypt, Belarus,Georgia, Kazakhstan, Macedonia and Maldova.

Coptic Christians celebrate the birth of Jesus Christ on january 7 accordingto the Julian calendar that pre-dates the commonly observed Gregorian calendar.e.

Ethiopia targets opposition who met with European lawmakers

January 9, 2017 ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP) — Ethiopia said Monday it will not release a leading opposition figure detained under the country's state of emergencyafter meeting with European lawmakers in Belgium.

Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn told reporters that Merara Gudina ofthe Oromo Federalist Congress party instead will face justice.

"Individuals in the European Parliament who are harboring anti-peaceelements cannot save those who trespass the law of the country," theprime minister said.

Merara is one of 22,000 people the prime minister said were detained under the state of emergency declared in October after widespread, sometimes deadly anti-government protests. The government has saidseveral thousand have since been released.

Merara was arrested immediately after he returned from Belgium, where he met with the lawmakers about the state of emergency. He was accusedof meeting with members of an armed Ethiopian opposition group in Brussels, an act banned under the emergency law.

Photos posted on social media show him sitting next to Birhanu Nega, leader of the armed opposition group called Ginbot 7 that mainly operates from Eritrea, and Feyisa Lilesa, the Ethiopian marathon runner who crossed his wrists in a sign of protest while crossing the finish line at theRio Olympic Games.

The Association for Human Rights in Ethiopia said the state of emergency's wide-ranging restrictions have severely affected freedoms ofexpression and assembly. "Tens of thousands of individuals have been arrested arbitrarily" and dissent and independent reporting have been quashed, it said. The state of emergency is set to end in May.

A LIFE IN ETHIOPIAN MUSIC

Ali Kaifa: the man who built Ethiopia's Motown

Tuesday, September 13th, 2016Arefayné Fantahun

When we hear a great music, the trend here is that to think of the recordas having solely originated from the imagination of the musician. But thatobviously ignores the role of the producer, who transforms the musician'seffort into the sound we experience. The contributions that Ali Abdela Kaifa (better known as Ali Tango), has made to the modern Ethiopian music is significant, a fact that has been acknowledged, for instance, by an Ethiopian music expert Francis Falceto, who included many of Ali's records on the compilation series of Ethiopiques CDS. Many of the musician's greatest songs owe their sound and character to the highly influential and longs-serving Ali Tango's behind-the-scenes work.

A pillar of the Addis Ababa music scene in the 70's, 80's and 90's, Ali Kaifa's prodigious output was the result of his skill at organization and self-discipline. His label, Kaifa has become a successful independent record label in Ethiopia, producing some of the greatest, most uplifting and most enduring popular music in history. Ali, who was born in Jimma,located at 335 kilometers south west of Addis Ababa, to an Ethiopian mother and Yemeni father, started out assisting his father in the coffee trade in his teen years, going to school for a half day. A football fan and enthusiast since his school days, Ali played for St. George along with thethen prominent players such as Netsere Wolde Selassie and Mengistu Worku. He also encouraged his younger brother Ahmed Buker to play forSt. George, who a few years later proved to be one of the team's best players, representing the Ethiopian National Team.

Ali's father inculcated in his children the values of strong family and hardwork. Ali's siblings followed in their father's footsteps as strivers and entrepreneurs. The younger brother Mohammed was on his way to becoming a successful businessman, importing the fashionable Seiko watch, and taking the name Mohammed Seiko along the way, associatedwith the product. For Ali, when the coffee trade declined, in later effort tocarve out his livelihood, he became an agent for Sony, distributing radio and television.

After a fateful encounter of listening to the captivating sound of GetachewKassa's a Tizita song, Ali was hooked to the sound of local music. He decided to venture into the world of music business, eventually transforming Calypso Music shop that his mother bought into Tango Musicshop in the early 70's, a shop which would become his professional address for more than three decades "Coincidentally, my shop was locatedin the centre of Piazza in front of Amha's Harambe shop and I used to sell many of Amah's records, which gave me insight into the potential of the music business," Ali recalls. This sharpened his urge to record and produce music albums in reel, thus adding to the budding music recordingindustry, then dominated by Amha Eshete and Phillips Ethiopia.

When Ali decided to record music he first thought of Getachew Kassa whomade an impression on him and he has remained a reference point to whom Ali could turn on. But that was not to be as he would learn that Getachew already made a deal with Harambe Music, but all the same he went on securing legal license and recording for others. He launched his label proper, Kaifa Records would alter become an integral force in the development of the modern music recording.

One of the first artists he recorded on vinyl was Alemayehu Borobor's Belaya Belaya, after watching the artist's performance on TV. Alemayehu was a backing vocalist with the Ibex Band, and his work had a moderate success. "It had modest reception, not as much as I expected to," Ali says. He continued all the same releasing other vinyl records by prominent musicians such as Ayalew Mesfin, Alemayehu Eshete, BizuneshBekele, Tamrat Ferenji, Muluken Melesse and Atselefetch Ashene.
Some of these vinyl dating to 1976-78 were reissued with an altered tracklisting as Ethiopiques 13, Ethiopian Grooves, the Golden Seventies in 2002. (Danny A. Mekonnen in his paper "ETHIO-GROOVE ON THE WORLDSTAGE Music, Mobility, Mediation" Callaloo 33.1 (2010) points out that the compilation Ethiopian Groove: The Golden Seventis, produced by Falceto, consists of reissued material from the 1970s, including two tracks by pop diva Aster Aweke. The compilation Ethiopian Groove was followed in 1997by Ethiopiques 1: The Golden Years of Modern Ethiopian Music.)

After the 1974 revolution, the pioneering Amha Records was closed andits owner, Amha Eshete relocated to the US.

However, the demand for fresh recordings continued and Kaifa records thrived on to fulfill the demand to accompany the clandestine lock-in parties that replaced the night scenes of years earlier. From the 1978 onwards, Kaifa switched its attention from vinyl to the cheaper medium ofcassettes, a technology that started making a massive impact on music distribution in the country. Ali understood the accelerating importance of popular culture, felt that he was in the right place at the right time to take up the torch for the music recording. Since then, Ali recorded and produced a number of artists and launched the careers of acts as Ali Birra,Neway Debebe, Hamalmal Abate, Kiros Alemayehu, and Sofia Atsebeha.

(The Walias band)
Among those successful artists whose career was launched by Kaifa records was Aster Aweke. “The idea of finding women to act as chorus for the Walias band whose record that I was producing in 1974 occurred to the band members. (The Walias Band was an active band from the early 1970s, until the beginning of the 1990s, comprising a collection of the finest young music talents of the country). Accordingly, they asked aroundand they brought three girls with them. One of those girls were none other than Aster Aweke,” Ali recalls. “I thought she had a lot of promise and I asked her if she was interested to work with me. As I came to learn she was then working temporarily for Hager Fikir theatre. She welcomed the idea and I recorded her songs on vinyl,” Ali continues. “It was not thatmuch successful because people complained her voice wouldn’t come out. I proposed she team up with the late Woubishet Fisseha and I gave them a space in my house so that they could rehearse together, which they did for a year. I recorded an original cassette for her, finally getting satisfactory versions of the songs. Since I really believed that she was destined to be a star, I did a lot to promote her works through radio and TV commercials. I gave her lots of advice about stage manners,” he says. Aster Aweke’s and Woubishet Fiseha’s albums were printed in 1975.
Aster’s development was gradual rather than revolutionary and Ali carriedon making her records and recorded four more cassettes and two singles of her

(Aster later found herself in great demand, being asked to sing at partiesand at clubs around the capital. She eventually immigrated to the UnitedStates in 1982, first settling in California and then in Washington, D.C., where one of the largest Ethiopian expat communities existed. Aster became the first Ethiopian whose recordings were distributed internationally by a major record label, with her album released by Iain Scott at Triple Earth Records in UK in 1989.)

(Among the greatest productions of Ali Tango, Mahmoud Ahmed's LP "Eremela mela" (KF 20) became the very first recording of modern Ethiopian music released outside of Ethiopia and worldwide in 1986.). Another musician who generated excitement almost immediately recording with Kaifa Records was Oromo singer Ali Birra. Ali Birra, who joined the Imperial Body Guard Band in 1966, first recorded with Kaifa Records in 1977. The recordings made him one of the best known artists in the town,kick-starting his long and prolific career.

"When I first met Ali Birra, his fame was restricted to his native town DireDawa. Initially I was not willing to take a chance by recording him. But he insisted that I record him and I gave in. To my surprise, it became an instant hit in Addis Ababa and elsewhere in the country. He started working in a night club," Ali recalls. Ali would depart for the United States,joining the growing refuge artists in the United States.

Another musician who emerged in the period and whose instrumental music Ali recorded in 1977 was a keyboardist Hailu Mergia, who was accompanied by the famous Walias' band and Mulatu Astake. Ali first noticed Hailu's development when he spent hours in the audience duringthe band engagement and the participation of the arranger and pianist Girme Beyene would bring the work critical and popular acclaim. Three decades later and the tape was rediscovered by producer Brian Shimkovitz, founder of a small record label called Awesome Tapes from Africa, and reissued it, generating newer interest in the work. (In 1981, Hailu Mergia travelled to the United States where he was booked to play with the Walias band and then settled in Washington. For about 20 yearsin Washington, Hailu made money playing with another band and managing a nightclub. When those jobs ended, he became a taxi driver.)

Another relative new comer whom Ali met in the early 85 was Neway Debebe, who was working at Cinema Ras as a songwriter and stage vocalist. "I got in touch with him. I came to learn that it was him who wrote the lyrics and composed the melody for Tsehay Yohannes's 'Yaz Yaz'which was a hit then. The other music producers turned him down. Your voice is forceful, and is more suited to revolutionary songs than romantic and love songs, they would tell him. When I recorded Neway debut album,he became an idol," Ali says. The recognition for Neway came quickly. "Tracks such as Eshete Belahu, Ye Tikimt Abeba brought the recognition that I could hardly imagine," Ali says. In a month's time, the sales reached greater than 100,000 copies, which was a far cry from the Vinyal copies that sold around 3,000 copies.

Neway Debebe, 57, who is currently based in Addis Ababa after years of stay in the US gives his account. He said he was composing lyrics for different singers, exasperated for a while because it took him long to get recording exposure. "I was going around asking music labels, showing mycompositions. Finally Tango was willing to record me, which opened for me the path for recognition" said Neway. "This was a really exciting time in my life, and I am indebted to Tango music shop, its owner Ali Kaifa andstudio engineer Mensur Abdurahaman for inducting me into the world of music records and making my music accessible to the wider public. I havetremendous respect for people like Ali Kaifa who not only loved the music,but put their money where their mouth was," Neway says.

Over the years Ali Kaifa produced a significant body of cassettes, releasing53 records between 1973 and 1977. He helped many of the young artist's transition from amateur performers to best-selling recording artist. He earned a reputation for being honest and generous with musicians when it came to earnings and thus inspired decent loyalty. However, despite his efforts Ali was under no such illusion about the poor and raw quality of theproduction. He said there were no professional or semi-professional studios to record. "We didn't have enough equipment for recording. This was why the quality of the recording was poor," he said.

Ali said that the military government didn't grant them licenses to import better equipment. The government said they had more important priorities when allocating scare foreign exchange. Equally worrying for Aliwas the problem of piracy, which he found was appalling and made the industry precarious. With the opening of newer music shops, he felt, the problem was getting bigger and bigger. Numerous local recording firms started to mushroom in the printing process. As result, large number of cassettes were produced, though most of were not original. "The others shops, when I released a new cassette, they made unauthorized copies ofthe cassettes and sold them in their shops," Very little of the profit endedup in the pockets of the recording artists and record label.

"The level of piracy was such that it forced me out of the recording business for four years. There were a few music recordings who were engaged in uncompetitive and unethical practice of unlawfully reproducingthe records by my label. I decided to play the same card, copying their own production and selling it through my shop. I wanted them to know what it meant to be at the receiving end of such illegal act. Angered by my action, two of the labels approached me through my lawyer. (We had the same lawyer). I had trick up my sleeve and sent my agent to buy my records from one of those shops. He came along with my records illegally copied with their seal upon it. What more evidence could I produce than such this? I told the lawyer that I was willing to pay for their four year's loss if they would pay for my fifteen years'. The lawyer had no more to say,"

Ali's dexterity has extended into the new concept of music and video shopduring the peak time of the military regime. Francis Falceto who was in Addis Ababa during those days and befriended Ali Tango remembers that,“People were queuing every day at his shop, renting videos (mostly films or TV programs from American and English TVs), as they were fed up withthe socialist propaganda on the state-run television and radio,”

Ali is warm in his praise for Francis Falceto, who later reissued some of hisworks and made them available in the international market. He said the French national has done more than most to uncover a seam of excellent music from the country, who have remained wholly obscure in the west.
Ali said they still keep their friendship and communicate frequently. Ali also gives credit to the former Roha Band, a band that he said was his long-time associate, and particularly two of the memebers, Selam Seyoumand Giovanni Rico.
Ali Tango, now 74, leads a quieter life in Seattle, Washington. He has livedthere for the past eight years. His label and music shop, Tango no longer exists. The last cassette he recorded was in 1990, featuring Getachew Gadissisa’s ‘Yifeal buna, yifela sahi’, which was the hit of the year. After Ali’s departure first to Yemen and then the US, his son Adil tried to keep the flame by running the music shop in Atikilt Tera’s area. He managed todo that for about five years, finally giving it up five years ago. Ali is fatherto 13 children biologically, and to hundreds musically. Ali says he is following the recent trends in Ethiopian music and appreciates the fact that a new generation of musicians are introducing newer elements to the melodies of the past, and traditional and modern styles are mixed in an array of regional and ethnic varieties.

Menelik Wossenachew’s Tizita

Monday, October 27th, 2014

Menelik Wossenachew (1940-2008) was one of Ethiopia’s leading musicians, along with Tilahun Gessese, Mahamoud Ahmed, Girma Beyene,and Alemayehu Eshete. He was remembered for his opera like golden voice.

Menelik was born in 1940 in Addis Ababa and grew up in a busy and livelyarea called Tekle Haymanot. He first attended church school and later Alliance Ethio-Francaise. As his love for music got stronger, he dropped out of high school and he was hired at Kedamawi Haile Selassie Theater (today’s Ethiopian National Theater) in 1958. There he got a chance to work with talented musicians like Fikere Maryam Ayele who the young Menelik emulated much. Over the next two years, he performed and recorded with the National Theatre band, making his hits “Almaze Eyasebkush” and “Fikir lemin yeker.” His unrivalled vocal power made himone of the top protagonists of the swinging Addis.

Other than working for the National Theatre, Menelik played in the Ras Band and later established his own band. He wrote his own lyrics like “Ye Harerua wetat” and “Se le Wubetua Sadenk” and “Tizita”, which you couldlisten here.

Arefayné Fantahun Monday, December 19th, 2016

I finally caught Getachew Kassa for an interview. Other than listening to his greatest hits on radio and watching him on television, I was able to see him once or twice in person playing at the Jazzamba Lounge in Piazza few years ago, yet when I tried to contact him for an interview, I found out it was not an easy to thing to do. He was elusive. First he wanted to know which media I worked for; radio, or TV. I explained it was a website.He then asked me to call him after two or three weeks. When I did, he would find an excuse to say No this time around. He would say ‘he has a cold, you know the pollution in Addis?’ Finally, with the help of music producer Amaha Eshete, I was able to interview Getachew.

Despite a wall of formality he builds around himself, there’s a warmth andplayfulness that seeps out of him. He recounted his recollections and stories, with deep, low-pitched voice, and punctuated with infectious laugh.

Getachew, 67, occupies a unique space in the Ethiopian music sphere, his singular voice and stage act straddling generations. Since he started playing one of his hits “Emegnalehu” with a band called Fetan Band – or Speed Band – at the Patrice Lumumba Bar in Wube Berha in the 70’s, Getachew established himself as one of the most accomplished Ethiopian musicians of the period. His career as recording artist includes tunes such as “Addis Ababa”, “Tiz Balegn Gize”, “Yekereme Fikir”, “Bertucan nesh lomi” “Bichayan Tekze” “Agere Tizitash”. The “Tezeta slow & fast” that he created and popularized when he was playing for various groups, the Sehebelles band, the Venus band, and later with the Walias band, was subsequently recorded by Amha Records. Those records were reissued by the French producer Francis Falceto in the Éthiopiques 1 (Golden Years of Modern Music), collections that he put together to recapture the lost musicof pre-Revolutionary Ethiopia. “This Tezeta remains one of the best-sellingrecords ever in Ethiopia, totalling around 5,000 copies, while most hits level-off at 2-3,000 and a few hundred is considered a moderate success. Very people owned record players, but the entire country heard that Tezeta, the first, jangling by an Ethiopia set in motion," Falceto wrote in the cover. The CD reissue brought wider recognition at home and abroad, generating attention and praise even from Bob Dylan who included it in his anthology CD of favorites for Starbucks coffee chain in 2008, in a series called Artist's Choice. In the selections of "music that matters to him" Dylan talked about the song "Tezeta" from the compilation album in the Ethiopiques series. Dylan writes, "When I first heard this record I knew nothing about it. There's this guy named Harold who usually shows up when I play Forth Worth, and he always gives me a bag of CDs. He never writes down what's on them. I had to wait till the next time I was inFort Worth to ask him what this track was. I found out it's an Ethiopian record from this series of records made during that short window of time when popular music was allowed in Ethiopia. But when I heard it I didn't know any of that. I thought it was some kind of Cajun record played backwards. There's something great about hearing music that's so obviously passionate and so obviously good, and not being able to understand the words. I like to imagine this is what my records mightsound like to someone in a country that doesn't speak English."

Getachew says it was a great honour to receive an admiration from this word-class musician. He was not even aware of his inclusion in the CD until a friend told him about it and gave him as present. "This friend of mine Mike Alazar, who used to sing in English at Wabi Shebele hotel one day happened to hear my music while he was at Starbucks. He asked thepersonnel at the chain and came to know that it was compiled with otherEnglish songs. He hurriedly bought it and brought it to me. I treasure it alot" Getachew says.

Born and raised in Addis Ababa's Mercato area from a relatively well-off family, Getachew found his love and dedication for music in his early years. "As early as eight, music was something that just grabbed me. I sang an Italian song called asmarina, asmarina, which was popular then.My parents were separated and I lived with my father. I used to frequentthis café in my neighbourhood called California where I used to listen to records of Little Richards, Elvis Presley, Harry Belafonte, among others. Istarted imitating those singers," he says.

He also started to play drums with a certain Yemen national, Mockbile, who bought a drum and asked him to try it. He played it good. But thoseyears were difficult for him because he never received a blessing on his passion from his father. There were fights at home every single day because of it. "My father even hid the record player that was in our house," he recalls.
The precariousness of Getachew's life made it difficult for him to concentrate in school."I messed up all the time," he said.Eventually, in histeenage years, he run away to Dire Dawa, hoping to get a job doing music. One night he happened to pass by a bar where there was this person playing accordion solo. “There was drum machine on the corner and no one was playing it. I went to him and I proposed playing the drumand he was okay. I became a good drummer there,” Getachew says. “I met this guy, Solomon, who was in the police army, who was playing saxophone. We went to Harar and I joined Segon Orchestra. With the permission of army officials, he bought equipment and we started playing for different occasions. After a year, I came back to Addis because they wanted to put me in the army,”

While in Harar, he took Kassa as his father’s name than the real one Tsegaye, because his father said he did not want him to carry on his name. “At the time I was in love with this girl Assgedetch Kassa, who wasa singer herself. I told her about it and she said why I don’t take her father’s name. I became Getachew Kassa to this day,” he laughs.
In Addis Ababa, Getachew started playing with a band called Fetan Band, at the Patrice Lumumba Bar, which was owned by Woizero Asegedech Alamrew. That was the most important regular gig for him, playing along with Teshome Mitiku, Mekonen Mersha. “Emegnalehu” became very popular and brought him to prominence. “It put me in a whole different place. It was the start of me making a living as a singer.” Tilahun Gessesse used to show up often and do the twist for the music, he says. Getachew was then paid five birr per day. For the following year, he played at Sombrero in Senga Tera, a club where Alemayehu Eshete used to play. He was offered 15 birr by the patron the Seyoum and another of his hits, Sayish Esasalehu was born there. Upon his discharge from the club, he briefly joined Axum Adarash in Gulele as vocalist where he joined Tekle “Huket” Adhnaom, a guitarist from Asmara, Hailu Zihon, who playedbase, former member of the Police Force. Then Abubakar Ashakih, a composer and former singer for the Imperial Music Department, and owner of Venus nightclub beckoned them to play at his club which was first located in Piazza, and later in Ambassador Cinema. The band’s reputation spread rapidly, also getting regular invitation to perform at high school graduation parties. Getachew’s slow and fast Tezeta became more popular here. After six months again another offer from WabishebeleHotel, they became the Wabishebele Band in 1969. It was then that Getachew met Amaha Eshete and the two tunes were recorded in in LP.

As Francis Falceto describes it, ”the double version of Tezeta, thanks to itssuccess and the polemic it fuelled incensed conservatives and pop’s youngguard, stand as symbol of pre-revolutionary Ethiopia- in the light music vein. Getachew Kassa delivers a version totally contrary to tradition, but so well adapted by non-conformist Ethiopian youth in 1972.”

Around that time, Getachew joined the famed Walias ensemble, that eventually landed a residency at the Hilton hotel, performing for tourists, diplomats and middle class locals. After soundtracking Addis Ababa’s nightlife for more than a decade, in 1981 Getachew Kassa and the Walais bandwent to the US, in their first American exposure at a time Ethiopian's military regime was strongly condemning American imperialism. The group's first performance was at Washington DC's famous Warner Theatre.

Getachew decided to stay in Washington DC, where the band had originally landed upon their arrival–and there he remained. His stay in theUnited States, he admits, wasn't a fertile working environment. He said hewas "well received at the start by the Ethiopian community there and quickly making fans across US cities who showered me with gifts".
However, as years went by, he found it difficult to work with the band there, "The trouble with most musicians there is that they don't rehearseenough. Since they are busy with other things, making money, they wantto show up and join me to perform. I myself don't come to the stage without practising my own materials. I make it a point to pay attention to the smallest details. I don't find that with many of them. I couldn't evenfind anybody to play with," he says. All the same, he worked in the Ethiopian restaurants found in different states, including Blue Nile, AddisAbaba restaurant, Dukem, Etete, Queen Sheba. "I used to perform threetimes per week. I liked being on stage. When I put on my hands on the piano, I forgot all other things."

Getachew, who lived in the United States for twenty seven years, is nowback in Ethiopia, trying to rekindle his music career. "I felt a pool from home. Ethiopia is a deep part of my life. The time came that I had to come back," he says. His songs are often about loss, solitude, and for a lot of his life he has been a loner. "I got married once and my marriage did not work out," he says. He has a daughter from this marriage, who iscurrently living in Saudi Arabia that he has not seen or spoken for many years. In many ways he has been consumed by his songs, by touring.
Probably, this drive has been the reason for the break-up of his marriage. After his return to Ethiopia four years ago, he started performing at Jazzamba with a band comprising young musicians, Vibes Band. However,his old demons have not been entirely exorcized. One member of the bandthen described the frustrations of dealing with the singer's mood swings, though he respected his singing so much.

After fire destroyed the Jazzamba club, Getachew shifted playing to Mama's Kitchen, a bar on the shopping mall near Bole airport with Expressband. It worked for a while but these days he is not playing there anymore.

On April 3, 2016 Getachew went to Berlin to perform at concert (his firstin Germany), as part of the "Stay Strong" project, a music project dedicated to the renowned Ethiopian singer and songwriter Alemayehu Eshete & to musicians of his generation.

In a two-week workshop, Getachew's big hits were re-interpreted, arranged in a contemporary manner and recorded in studio quality. Band Manager and Booking Agent at The Stay Strong Orchestra, Clemens Grüntold Ethiopia Observer that they did one recording workshop with Alemyahu Eshete and another with Getachew Kassa and Selam Seyoum Woldemariam. “The recordings, we did, especially with Getachew, are notcomparable with anything he or anybody else ever did with his songs,” hesays. They did eight songs with Getachew.

The project’s trailer, which was described as “a kind of Ethiopian BuenaVista Social Club” could be seen on You Tube. Getachew presented his first performance UFA-Fabrik, factory to wide acclaim.

It was a proof that that his music and energy is as alive as ever and he isa determined as he was in his youthful prime. Getachew is planning to celebrate a 50 year career in music next year. However, he said no plans to retire in the near future, adding instead that he planned to downsize hiscareer, cancelling all club engagements. (Special thanks to John Wilson forsending me Bob Dylan’s notes on Getachew, which i quoted in its entirety in the article.)

Girma Beyene to perform after three decades of absence

Arefayné Fantahun Sunday, July 5th, 2015

After three decades of absence, the popular Ethiopian composer, arranger,vocalist and pianist, Girma Beyene would join the French band Akalé Wubé in a performance in Paris on September 25, 2015. Girma who was active during the golden age of vinyl (1969-1978) only recorded four songs as a vocalist, but arranged more than 60 titles and collaborated to at least 25 other tracks. His four tracks recorded for Amha Records in 1969, Set Alamenem, Enken Yelebesh, Ene Negn Bay Manesh, and Yebequagnal were remastered and released on Ethiopiaques 8: Swingin Addis.
While Girma's vocals remain a trademark of the song, his time in the music industry was short-lived.During the US tour with Walias Band in 1981, he and some members decided to remain there and Girma abandoned music after the death of his wife for whom he penned and composed all of the tracks. Living in Washington DC area for a number ofyears, he dropped out of public life.
Girma, who currently in Addis, is now preparing to play with Akalé Wubé,a Parisian band devoted totally to the grooves of 60s and 70s Ethiopian music. Since their beginnings in 2009, Akalé Wubé have been exploring the musical goldmine of Swingin' Addis, which they discovered through the "Ethiopiques" compilation curated by Buda Music.

QWANQWA

FPE is proud to present its newest artist, QWANQWA, from Addis Ababa,Ethiopia.

QWANQWA in Amharic means «language.» Music has long had the beloved nickname "The Universal Language". It is the world's mother tongue, understood by all, and has the reputation of bridging socio-economic groups and joining the young and old, and the new band, QWANQWA, based in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, is named for this concept.

The music is characterized by tight arrangements, psychedelic sounds, extended experimental moments, and occasional audience sing-a-long sections. It is driving, powerful, and different than anything else comingout of Ethiopia at this current Golden Age of Ethiopian music. The live show ranges from intimate to wild, from whispery conversations to full blown rock show, and it is hard to believe these psychedelic sounds arecoming from traditional harp and violin.

At its core, this band is instrumental, however, the list of guests and collaborations is long, including both beloved and famous singers such as Fikraddis, Habte Michael, Amelmal Abate, as well as Azmari singers Selamnesh Zemene, Ertibu Agengehu, and Etenesh Wassie. Qwanqwa alsohas invited the virtuoso masinqo player Endris Hassen, the father of washint Johannes Aferwork, Dawit Frew (Ethiopia's foremost clarinetist).

Qwanqwa's members' combined experience in experimental musicensembles is part of what contributes to Qwanqwa's unique sound.

- Mesele Asmamaw is Qwanqwa's lead electric krar player. (Krar is a traditional harp, relative to the lyre). Mesele is known as a composer and arranger, active in Ethiopia for over twenty years. He has released many albums of his compositions as well as traveled extensively throughout Europe and Africa performing the traditional music of Ethiopia. Since the mid-2000s, Mesele has been a favorite guest of the extremely influential punk and "The EX", has recorded several albums with the experimental Norwegian drummer Paal Nilssen-Love, and has toured and recorded with his experimental rock group Trio Kazanches. He uses several interesting techniques inQwanqwa, including a wah pedal, a distortion pedal, a coke bottle and a plastic tube!

- Dawit Seyoum, master of the bass krar, plays extensively in traditional groups around Addis, including Ethiocolor and Hager Fikr.He also is a member of the Nile Project, a much-acclaimed Americanbased project which tours internationally with traditional musicians from all Nile countries.

- Elias Wolde Mikael is Qwanqwa's percussionist. He uses the traditional kebero, goat skin drums played with sticks, as well as a variety of other homemade percussion instruments. He can be seen regularly in several groups around Addis Ababa as well as on popular TV music programs in Ethiopia, including Ethiopian Idol andBalageru.

- Kaethe Hostetter, 5-string electric violin, has been playing Ethiopian music for many years now. A founding member of the critically acclaimed Debo Band (signed to Sub Pop), the first Ethiopian band in the US to top many charts including iTunes and CMJ, and who has played many stages from Lincoln Center to Kennedy Center, from Chicago World Music Festival and GlobalFestto Bumbershoot and Bonarroo. She also has had an active performing life in the experimental scene, including tours with FredFrith, Butch Morris and Jim Hobbs.

Product Description

Qwanqwa's unique, experimental, joyously tuneful take on traditional Ethiopian music is irresistible. Volume One is their first album, recorded in2013, and available on a ruby red cassette from FPE. (Volume

Two, recorded in 2014, will be available on CD and LP in late 2014.)

Qwanqwa “takes traditional music and rocks it up a bit” (Byron Coley, TheWire) and “for sure is an incredible experimental traditional Ethiopian rockgroup that deserves to be played in every living room, at every party and on every radio station from Gondar to Santa Cruz.” (Addis Rumble blog). If you’ve heard the golden age of Ethiopian pop as immortalized by the Ethiopiques series some more recent releases on Mississippi records, and wondered why no one was rocking like that in the now – you can stop wondering. They’re doing it. You just didn’t get to hear it yet. Qwanqwa bridges generations and continents, making a huge sound that you can only hear if you’re here, right now.

Groovy and familiar, yet stimulating and heady, the tunes swim through your aural consciousness, providing equal parts enjoyment and confoundment. Qwanqwa vibes with appreciators all types, be it indie blog-followers, jazz enthusiasts, afrobeaters, music theory heads, hippies,or coffee drinkers reading the New York Times.

Inter-generational and inter-continental, Qwanqwa consists of Ethiopian musicians Mesele Asmamaw (electric krar), Dawit Seyoum (electric bass krar), and Samson Sendekou (percussion), and American violinist Kaethe Hostetter (also of Boston-based Ethio-funk band Debo Band), who formedQwanqwa after moving to Addis Ababa in 2012 to fully immerse herself inthe ocean that is Ethiopian music. Volume Two is their second album, recorded at Langano Studios in Addis Ababa in 2014.

The Death Of A Revolutionary

By Arefayné Fantahun first posted on April 22nd, 2014

On June 1977 a young man who represented one possible future for Ethiopia left hisfriend’s house in Asko area and headed to Haya Hulet Mazoria to meet members of his party. His host had an eerie feeling and advised him to take a gun with him.

However, he was not happy about the suggestion. “How can I bring a gun with me when I am going to see comrades?” he asked. Getachew Maru— a former engineering student at the then Haile Selassie University (now Addis Ababa University), — had led the University Students’ Union of Addis Ababa (USUAA) as secretary general in 1971, for a few months. He later formed with like-minded friendsAbyot group which was incorporated into the Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Party (EPRP), the best-supported party among the intelligentsia at the time.

In August 1976, Getachew joined the central committee of the EPRP and served as the editor of Red Star, the internal organ of the party.Only twenty-seven but as a writer, orator, strategist of revolutionary insurrection, he already represented the summit of socialist politics and culture of the time. As the party turned more bureaucratic and authoritarian, Getachew remained loyal to its founding principles, and was gradually ostracized. He unsuccessfully argued that the party should not rule out entirely the Derg's call for a united front and he opposed the policy of assassinating opponents. For that he was seen as disloyal and found himself on thelosing side of a factional struggle for control of the EPRP.

On November 1976 he and Berhanemeskel Reda were expelled from the EPRP central committee. While Berhanemeskel escaped and set up his own force and starting operation in northern Shewa, Getachew was arrested on that unfortunate morning by the people he called 'comrades'. His arrest was possibly as much out of his carelessness for his own safety and naivety to ignore the elaborate plan hatched by the party 'cliques' who have wished him gone. "We have disagreements, without adoubt, but that doesn't mean they are going to hurt me. Why would they want to hurt me, anyway? We are comrades! Comrades who fought side by side for so long," he used to say.But his party had a different plan for him; Getachew was beaten to death with a club, few days later. His assailants put bleach on his face and encased his dismembered body in a sack. The ruling military government, the Derg identified himby his ID card and by thin mustache. Getachew's execution by his own friends, people of his own party remains one of period's open wounds.

More than three decades on, Getachew's lover, who thinks that her life is spared to tell the story of this forgotten hero, has published a book entitled, 'Tower in the sky' which charts the choices Getachew made to move away from his engineering study and toward the Ethiopian revolution where his leadership qualities became apparent. Hiwot Tefera writes glowingly of him and calling for the recognition of his name and heroic act. A beautiful, impetuous young woman, Hiwot was barely twenty when she became intoxicated with the tall revolutionary often dressed in khaki, white rimmed glasses and a black berretta hat and his revolution. In her preface, after quoting Kahlil Gibran who coined "And if our hands should meet in another dream, we shall build another tower in the sky," she has created a rich and intense narrative of their lives and times, which is marked with a terrible tale at a time when 100,000 people were killed in the turmoil unleashed by Mengistu Haile Mariam. She paints fascinating portraits of the great and the good and the noble and the strange, those who were tosacrifice their lives, their freedoms, and their families for equality, freedom, justice and dignity.

The author encapsulates Getachew's earlier life and and how rebellious he had beenin his childhood." He had come from a large family of eight brothers and sisters. He was rebellious when he was in elementary school. One day he ground a pinecone and put it in a house. The house smelled so bad everybody had to leave. His father, a colonel in the army, even contemplated putting him in Tebai Maremia- youth correctional institute," she said.

The book then describes Getachew's transformation. "He completely changed whenhe went to high school. He retreated to his room and buried his head in books. He either read or wrote when at home. When he was in grade eight, he brought home atypewriter and taught himself how to type one day! He may have been unknowingly preparing himself for what was to come."

According to the author, when he graduated from Beedemariam, he was the best student and was the valedictorian of 1966. At the University, he was brilliant and thebest in the department of Mechanical Engineering, where he says his political life began in earnest. He was recognized as "the best teacher of the year" when he wasteaching at Shimles Habte.

Hiwot suggests that throughout his life he has turned to books as a way of acquiringinsights and information from others. He immersed himself in the works of Marxist and socialist thinkers and a spiritual-intellectual search to figure out what he truly believed. "Every book he discussed, every word he uttered, every concept he defined, every sentence he completed had a healing touch. It awakened my brain and soothed my troubled heart," Hiowt said.

The author says she above all salutes him for his courage for speaking out his convictions. "He did not give a blind eye to what he saw around him, like most of us,for the sake of maintaining his position in the party or for fear of being labeled. I admire his untiring effort to right the wrong through dialogue." When revolution was gaining momentum, Getachew left college. In 1973, famine gripped Ethiopia.
Emperor Haile Selassie sat in his palace, increasingly isolated. In September 1974, army tanks surrounded the palace and the emperor was bundled into the back of aVolkswagen Beetle and taken to prison.

These initial moves were popular with many of the country's Marxist intellectuals andyoung people. But disenchantment set in quickly. The military shocked the country byexecuting a group of 59 royals and other leaders of the imperial regime. Paranoia settled over the capital. Members of the Derg assassinated one another in a strugglefor control, and eventually, an obscure army major named Mengistu Haile Mariam emerged. Mengistu secretly ordered Haile Selassie's murder and had him buried in an unmarked grave. The Marxists split: one group (The All Ethiopian Socialite Movement or MEISON) supported Mengistu's methods; the other (EPRP) decided to fight him. Many members of the EPRP had begun to drop out of their jobs to go underground in preparation for the struggle against the Derg.
As the official power of MEISON grew, tensions with the EPRP escalated. In October1976, the EPRP began its own campaign of bombings and assassinations against top MEISON leaders, and the latter retaliated. Mengistu's rise to power within the Derg took place against this backdrop of killing and in April 1977, at a public rally, he smashed glass bottles filled with blood, and vowed to conquer the "enemies of the revolution." All over the city, corpses appeared on the streets, pinned with signs bearing slogans referring to the government's Red Terror campaign. "Ethiopia saw Satan rise up like a bolt of lightning from its belly in the shape of a man named Mengistu. He drew his sword against everybody and anybody committing one of the most heinous crimes in history. He plunged the country into mourning, tears, trepidation and horror," Hiwot recalls.

The massive and indiscriminate detention, slaughter, and assassinations continued, to the point it became hard to tell who was being killed by whom. Getachew's assassination owed more to extreme radicalism and intolerance overriding in his ownparty. His assassination and those of others fueled a growing sense of disillusionment in the hearts of many young Ethiopians. "Getachew's brutal death hadleft an indelible scar in my soul. My being was shaken to its core. It wasn't his death alone that had left me nonplussed, but the very idea that the Party could kill one of itsown. The persecution of Anjas was as distant to me as the stars in the heaven; before Getachew's death, I simply refused to accept it. But Getachew's death broughtit close," Hiwot says.

"What did he die for? For trying to save lives? Is all this in the name of the revolution… in the name of the people? Are we justified to do away with peoples' lives in the name of the revolution? How can we do good if we kill one of our own? We started with a sense of comradeship, love and trust but we are we going? Have we forgotten where we were going? What about our collective leadership?" she asks. Ethiopia's best chance of democracy may have died with him and many others who were condemned by their political views and social background or someone's whim, enmity or attempt at self-preservation through incriminating others.

Who ordered his death?

The question of who killed Getachew has never been satisfactorily answered in Hiwot's book. As we come learn from 'Tower in the Sky,' during the early years of the EPRP, there were often disputes among the party's leadership over its form and strategy. Kiflu Tadesse, Tesfaye Debesay, Zeru Kehesen and some other senior members argued for the need for the party to defend itself from the repression and executions perpetrated on it. Getachew Maru and Berhanemeskel Reda were againstthe launching of urban guerilla warfare. They opposed the urban military activities, embraced by their party on the grounds that "the party was not even equipped to engage in military activities". (The first real victim of EPRP's urban armed struggle was Fikire Merid, a popular law professor at the Addis Ababa University and one of the leading members of the All-Ethiopian Socialist Movement or MEISON. The son ofGeneral Mered Mengesha, a close relative of the emperor, Fikire was for long in exilein France with Haile Fida and Negede Gobeze and he returned to Ethiopia as early as 1973. A prominent member of the Yekatit 66 Political School and the Provisional Office of Mass Organizational Affair's commission, he was shot and killed in his car while waiting to collect his wife from work.)The party made a vitriolic attack on them, calling them "spineless". They considered them individuals who had started the struggle by mistake and who wanted to shun when the going got tough. To this day, the surviving EPRP leaders are trying distort Getachew's and Berhanemeskel's rolesin the revolution, if not excise them from the public record.

Kiflu Tadesse, who was a leading member of the Party until his move to the United States, documented the party's history in two-volume study entitled 'The Generation'.A look at his book, it becomes abundantly clear that, Kiflu has such a palpable bias against Getachew and Berhanemeskel. In fact, he wrote about them as if they were still living political opponents and his personal enemy. He accused them of suggesting striking an alliance with the Derg.

He said they could not provide enough details to warrant a policy change and ther argument could not convince the rest of members, he wrote. The way Kiflu describesGetachew's death is also interesting and revealing. Though he didn't deny the fact that Getachew was indeed held by the EPRP party, Kiflu put the blame on the deceased, saying that 'Getachew Maru who overpowered an EPRP guard and tried to escape imperiled his life." This is a far cry from the version we found in Hiwot's book. Hiwot wrote that she was able to gather from friends that EPRP's squad member Surafel Kaba and his colleagues gave a statement during interrogation that they beat Getachew to death. If that is really what happened, Kiflu's story of Getachew's death did not add up. But who ordered the murder, how far it went up thecommand chain and who was involved in covering still remain to be discovered. It seems that Hiwot has taken care not to overtly put the blame on some parties. But nonetheless the book is a fascinating and well written history of Getachew's incredible life, and the glory, fanaticism and bloodshed of a deadly rivalry and the continuing efforts to bury the revolutionary's ideas and historical personality under a mountain of distortions, slanders, and fabrication.

THE HISTORY OF ETHIO/ISRAEL BILATERAL RELATION
Prime Minister Golda Meir and Emperor Haile Selassie

Sunday, January 15th, 2017 Arefayné Fantahun

Golda Meir (1898–1978) was the fourth Prime Minister of Israel and the first woman to hold the title. An astute and resolute figure, she was known for initiating Israeli involvement in Africa and turning the development of ties with emerging countries into a personal and national mission. Below is an excerpt from her autobiography, My Life, published in1975 in which Meir wrote about her visit to Ethiopia with her daughter Sarah, her fascination for Emperor Haile Selassie since knowing him during his exile years in Jerusalem after the Italian invasion, and how she became disenchanted with him when the Emperor decided to break relations with Israel in 1973, after pressure from Arab countries.

In 1962 Sarah travelled with me to Kenya and to Ethiopia, where I introduced her to Haile Selassie and we visited the large community of Israel working in that country in agriculture, fishing, transportation, helping train the police and the army and teaching at the University of Addis Ababa. Even Ethiopia, with which we had a very special relationship for so many years, broke with us in 1973, but at the time of which I write the ties were still very strong-although never publicized by the Ethiopians and therefore also no by us. For me, Haile Selassie was almost a storybook character, a man from far-off exotic land who dared to stand upin 1936 and call the attention of an indifferent world to the Italian invasionof Ethiopia. He and his family had spent a year in Jerusalem as refugees during the Italian occupation, and I used to see him sometimes-a dark, bearded little man with huge, sad eyes- walking with his empress in the street, while his adored little dogs ran after them. He was not just anotherrefuge from fascism; he is descended from that line of Ethiopian kings who claim that their ancestor was the son of born to King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba and that they are therefore our distant kin. The Lion of Judah has always been the symbol of the Ethiopian monarchy and the links between the Jews and Ethiopia have always been unique. But although Ethiopia is a Christian country, it is part of Africa and, as such, was subjected for years to strong anti-Israel pressure by the Arabs. For a long time, however, Haile Selassie warily trod a tight-rope; many of his dealings with Israel were kept secret, and we sent an ambassador only in 1961. The Sinai Campaign- because opened up the Strait of Tiran- became the start of an even closer relationship, and Israeli ships and planes helped to develop a steady flow of trade between the Ethiopians and ourselves. At the same time, we did a great deal to develop the educational facilities of Ethiopia, and several Israel professors settled in Addis Ababa for a few years. Sarah was too young, I expect, to feel about Haile Selassie as I did. For her he was only the ruler of a fascinating country; for he was always much more. I can't say that we became fast friends, but when I saw him in his own palace and remembered the only exiled figure I used to see in Jerusalem in the 1930s, I felt that the justicehad-for a change- been done, and I was immensely disappointed when even Haile Selassie –for all his own experience with appeasement- did notstand by us. It proved to me once again-though I didn't need very much proof by then-that one can never count on anyone but oneself. (The excerpt was sent to by photojournalist Irene Fertik who is a regular readerof the Ethiopia Observer.)

Haile Selassie I

Christopher Clapham, Professor of Politics and International Relations, andauthor of Haile-Selassie's Government (1969), provides an excellent overview of Ethiopia's last emperor. The article was first published in a catalogue 'Ethiopia and Germany, a longing for Distance" in 2007 and wasadapted for the Ethiopia Observer.

Haile Selassie I (1892-1975), last emperor of Ethiopia, was beyond question the outstanding Ethiopian of the twentieth century. Born on 23 July 1892 at near Harar, son of Ras Mekonnen, governor of Harar and firstcousin of Emperor Menelik II, and his wife Yeshiemebet, he was named Teferi, Haile Selassie being both his baptismal and regal name. He was a descendant, through his father's mother, of Negus Sahle-Selassie of Shewa.

He received a mixture of traditional church education, and tutoring by Catholic Capucin friars, including Andre de Jarosseau and an Ethiopian friar, Abba Samuel. After his father's death in 1906, he was summoned byMenelik to Addis Ababa, where he briefly attended the Menelik's school.
Clearly destined for high office, he was first appointed governor of Darasaprovince in Sidamo in 1908, returning to Addis Ababa following Menilek's illness in 1909. In 1910, at the age of seventeen, he was appointed to hisfather's governorship of Harar. The following year he married Menen, daughter of Jantirar Asfaw of Ambassel in Wello, and grand-daughter of Ras Mikael; they were to have three sons and three daughters.

He remained in Harar, with occasional visits to Addis Ababa, until mid- 1916, when emperor Iyasu reassigned him to Kafa- a move evidently dictated by his own desire to control Harar, a key location for the implantation of his policies. Teferi however remained in Addis Ababa, where his role in the events that led to the deposition of Iyasu on 27 September has never been fully elucidated. This resulted in his elevationto the rank of Ras, and regent and heir to the throne, under Menelik's daughter, the childless empress Zewditu. He was present at the battle of Segele, on 27 October 1916, which confirmed the establishment of thenew government.

As regent, Ras Teferi was nominal head of a government over which, initially at least, he had little control. Teferi's strength lay in his ability to play a waiting game, and to maintain relations with the outside world, notably through the diplomatic missions in Addis Ababa. Gradually, however, he was able to extend his control over the central government, and infiltrate young and relatively educated appointees into key positions,notably those concerned with revenue collection.

Teferi used his diplomatic contacts and skills to secure Ethiopia's admission to the League of Nations in September 1923, a move which- though it ultimately failed to protect Ethiopia against external aggression-secured the country's formal diplomatic equality with other states, and also supplied Teferi with leverage in his attempts to control provincial governors through the suppression of the slavery, which had been a key sticking point in the battle for admission.

Following a visit to Djibouti and Aden in 1922, he embarked in 1924 on atour of Europe, including France, Italy and the United Kingdom, taking with him a large retinue including Ras Hailu and Seyum.

Diplomatically the trip was a failure, since he was unable to persuade thethen colonial powers to allow Ethiopia unrestricted access to the sea through any of their possessions; he was however able to use Ethiopia'smembership of the League to force the retraction of an Anglo- Italian accord that had sought, without reference to Ethiopia, to define their respective spheres of influence in the country. The most important resultof the visit was in bringing himself and his country to the attention of theEuropean press and public, and indeed to that of other Africans and people of African descent. The Rastafarian movement in Jamaica adopted(part of) his name and title at that time.

The death of Fitawrari Habte Giorgis in December 1926 enabled Teferi to take full control of the central government, and over the next few years he asserted his command over the leading provincial governors. In September 1928 he was elevated to the rank of negus. The defeat and death in March 1930 of the last major independent governor, Zewditu's husband Ras Gugsa Wele, was immediately followed by the death of theempress herself. On 3 April 1930, Teferi was elevated to the throne withthe title of Emperor Haile Selassie I.

Accession, War, and Exile

As emperor, Haile Selassie rapidly sought to consolidate his position, bothat home and abroad. He assumed an aloof and consciously imperial style,which, added to his natural dignity, made a lasting impression on all who met him. His coronation, on 2 November 1930, was designed to present the most favorable impression to the distinguished delegations, especiallyfrom the major European powers. The following year, he promulgated Ethiopia's first written constitution, a document that both proclaimed Ethiopia's modernity for external consumption, and unequivocally insistedon the emperor as the sole ultimate source of power domestically, arousing some disquiet from members of noble lineages, who viewed him as no more than the first among equals. Contemporary official printsshowed the emperor's authority as descending directly from God to Haile Selassie, who in turn transmitted it- in the form of constitution- to his people. Though a two-chamber parliament was established, this had no direct elections and no more than titular powers.

The remaining quasi-autonomous provincial governments were rapidly brought under control. Ras Hailu of Gojam was an obvious target, since hevenality made him unpopular in his own domains; he was implicated in a plot to free the imprisoned former Emperor Iyasu in 1932 and sentenced. The wealthy sultanate of Jimma, governed by its native rulers under an agreement with emperor Menelik, was placed under central supervision.

These developments were aided by a program of road constructions, andby the first steps to train a modern army. Particular attention was paid toeducation and revenue generation. Though the tasks to be undertaken were almost insuperable, Haile Selassie successfully projected the impression of Ethiopia's transformation into a modern state.

Internationally, however, the situation grew steadily more threatening, as the fascist government of Italy finalized plans to conquer Ethiopia from its colonies of Eritrea and Somalia. It remains open to question whether moreadept diplomacy on Haile Selassie's part could have induced France and the United Kingdom to provide effective support against Mussolini's ambitions, though it is likely these powers would have sacrificed Ethiopia to their European priorities. Certainly, Haile Selassie greatly overestimated the effectiveness of the League of Nations in preventing aggression, and continued to pursue diplomatic attempts to resolve the crisis. Even though these had little impact on the immediate situation, they were important in establishing Ethiopia's moral position in the eyes of the outside world.

Haile Selassie had little military experience, and after the Italian attack onOctober 2nd, 1935 he left the army under the command of the minster of the war, Ras Mulugeta, moving north to Dese in late November. Only in late March 1936, when the military situation was already disastrous, did he move to Maichew, where for honor's sake and to meet the expectationsof his people, he launched a doom attack. On May 2nd, he left Addis Ababafor Djibouti, where he embarked on a British warship. After a stop in Jerusalem, he travelled to United Kingdom which he left to address the League of Nations in Geneva on June 30th.

The speech to the League, drafted by Lorenzo Tezaz, was the most memorable in that organization's history, and dramatically counterposedthe promise of collective security and the horrors inflicted on Ethiopia.

Delivered with unquenchable dignity, it established Haile Selassie on the world stage on the world stage, and presaged the forthcoming Second World War. For the following four years, however, he lived in exile in the small English city of Bath, remaining in touch as he could with resistance leaders within Ethiopia. Not until only January 1941, however, was he ableto re-enter Ethiopia, at Omedla on the Sudanese frontier with Gojam. On May 5th, 1941, aided by the defeat of the main Italian armies to the north and south, he re-entered Addis Ababa, and resumed his reign.

The Restored Empire

Haile Selassie's first task on returning to Addis Ababa was to regulate his relations with the British government, elements within which sought to treat Ethiopia as an occupied enemy territory, or implicitly as British protectorate. Having already secured a statement by the British government that it would welcome Ethiopia's restoration to independenceunder his leadership, he asserted his position by immediately appointinga number of ministers, even though his actual exercise of power was still subject to irksome constrains.

Haile Selassie had also establish his supremacy over the patriots or arbegnoch, Ethiopian resistance leaders many of whom welcomed his return, while others regarded him as having deserted his country in hourof its need, and returned on the backs of foreign soldiers. A mixture of skilful conciliation, with the imprisonment or even execution of recalcitrants, enabled him to establish control.

Haile Selassie, accustomed since his youth to be lauded as a 'moderniser',came during the 1950's to be regarded as the embodiment of an anachronistic political system, all the more evidently by comparison with the populist and anticolonialist regimes then arising elsewhere in Africa.
The first visible break in the façade of benevolent imperial rule came in December 1960, when small group of plotters led by the commander of the imperial body guard, Mengistu Neway , seized control of the palace, and announced Haile Selassie's deposition and replacement by his eldest son, Crown Prince Asfaw. Though the coup was put down by force, and itsleader killed or executed, the aura of imperial omnipotence was shatteredand for its remaining years the regime was living on borrowed times.

Haile Selassie's significance and legacy will long be debated, and only apreliminary assessment can be attempted here. His public face, honed over many years of deliberate self-control, is less contentious. Immediately on ascending the throne in 1930, he assumed an aloof and dignified style, which maximized his imperial aura; normally dressed in military uniform, he forsook the traditional dress of an Ethiopian nobleman that he had usually worn during the regency, though in later life (especially on diplomatic occasions) he appeared increasing in an ordinarywestern suit. Numerous accounts from foreigners testify to his personal charm. There is no reason to regard his lifetime devotion to the Ethiopian Orthodox Church as anything but sincere.

This public persona masked an acute political mind, which closely conformed to the leadership style advocated in Machiavelli's The Prince. He conceived the art of rule essentially as the manipulation of individual human beings, in which he was extremely adept. He was cautious and secretive, and, even during the regency period, when he was viewed as the leader of the modernizing tendency within the government, as againstmore traditional figures, he rarely took bold initiatives. His style was instead to encourage others to take such initiatives, whereupon he would himself act as an ostensibly neutral arbiter, without evidently taking sides,or assuming direct responsibility. It was an inclusive form of leadership, which encouraged different factions and individuals to work within the imperial system, while at the same time enabling him to remain central tothe process, by playing off one faction against the other. Keeping his options open, he very seldom resorted to brutal measures, even against those who had plotted against him, the leaders of the failed coup d'état ofDecember 1960 providing a rare exception. Disgraced opticians were instead relegated to titular positions, from which they could aspire to return to imperial favour.

Compared with other leading Ethiopians of his generation, he was always acutely aware of the international dimension, and constantly sought diplomatic support to strengthen his position within the domestic political arena. His courting of the allied legations at the time of the 1916 coup d'état against the Iyasu government set a pattern that continued. At the same time, he remained entirely Ethiopian in his own intellectual formation and allegiance. Unlike some Ethiopian intellectuals both early inhis career and later, he never succumbed to the attractions of foreign ideologies; and when, as his regime was collapsing in early 1974, he had the option of seeking an honored and comfortable exile, he refused it. Helived and died an Ethiopian.

As early as the 1920s, he was widely regarded as financially acquisitive, and in the later years of his reign, rumor ascribed to him a vast overseas fortune. There is however nothing to indicate the truth of such assertions.At the time of his wartime exile in 1936-40, he and his entourage lived in extremely strained circumstances, while if he did posses a large fortune atthe end of his life, he certainly took no steps to enjoy it. It is more likely that, in keeping with his highly personal sense of power, he simply failed to distinguish between his personal wealth and that of the state.
Surprisingly, perhaps, and contrary to the dynastic clauses of the 1931 and 1955 constitutions, he never took any active steps to establish a dynasty. Though his two older sons held titular provincial governorships, the Crown Prince in Welo and Prince Mekonen in Harar, neither they nor any other of his descendants were given the opportunity to acquire the practical experience of government on which his own career had been founded. Instead, they were reduced to the role of idle appendages of thecourt.

Haile Selassie's broader historical role was that of a state- builder, adapting the legacies of his predecessors Tewodros, Yohannes, and Menelik to the circumstances of the central fifty years of the twentieth century. He readily appreciated and adopted those modern technologies, including aircraft, improved communications, taxation systems, and the bureaucracy, that could be used to strengthen imperial rule; but he had no evident conception of modern state, as an organization that rested not just on hierarchical structures of rule, but on ideas and institutions that could link the population to the means by which they were governed. 'Nation-building,' insofar as it was pursued at all, took the form only of the extension of political and social forms characteristics of the central highlands, such as Christianity and the Amharic language, to other parts of the country.

The Italian war apart, Ethiopia was far more peacefully governed during his reign than either before or afterwards; and though this was at one level the result of benefiting from the pause between the endings of resistance to central government led by regional lords, and the rise of resistance derived from popular regional and ethnic nationalisms, it also reflected Haile Selassie's own lack of vindictiveness and skilful management of dissent. At the same time, he was quite unable to appreciate or adapt to the demands for popular engagement in political life, which in his own time were most evident in Eritrea and which subsequently spread to other parts of the country. Nor could he recognizeideologically based demands for social change, most powerfully expressedin the slogan 'land to the tiller', that led to his own overthrow by a Marxistmilitary regime. Many of the subsequent problems of Ethiopia were inherent in the state that he has done so much to form.

NEW BOOKS

A Book on Emperor Haile Selassie published in English

Arefayné Fantahun (Friday, September 4th, 2015)

Lij Asfa-Wossen Asserate's long-awaited book on Emperor Haile Selassie isto be published in English this November, publishers have said. The book, which won wide acclaim with its German edition, will be entitled King of Kings: Triumph and Tragedy of Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia. The author, who was in Addis Ababa on December 2014 to present the German version of the book promised that the book would be available in English shortly. The translation is due to be released by Haus Publishing and distributed in the U.S. by the prestigious University of Chicago Press.

Lij Asfa-Wossen, who is a member of the Ethiopian imperial family, said he used his own personal experiences and research in family and public archives to pen this book. The publishers said the book was "a colorful andeven-handed portrait of the emperor and his tumultuous reign ".

"Haile Selassie I, the last emperor of Ethiopia, was as brilliant as he wasformidable. A descendant of King Solomon and an early proponent of African unity and independence, Haile Selassie fought with the Allies against the Axis powers during World War II and was a messianic figurefor the Jamaican Rastafarians," the book description reads.

This biography describes the Emperor as a reformer and an autocrat whose personal history—with all of its upheavals, promises, and horrors—reflects in many ways the history of the twentieth century itself, accordingto the publisher's note. "Chosen as Time's "Man of the Year" in 1936 for resisting Mussolini's invasion of Ethiopia, Haile Selassie was celebrated bymany as the anti-colonialist "father of Africa." But the final years of his empire saw turmoil and revolution, and he was ultimately overthrown and assassinated in a communist coup," it reads.

Book Review

Under the Shade of Gaashe; Biographical sketch of H.E. Dr. Girma WoldeGiorgis President of Ethiopia (2001-2013)

By Arefayné Fantahun

Sivakumar K.P. Friday, October 14th, 2016

Here is an account of former Ethiopian president Girma Wolde Giorgis whose longand successful life has been marked by an active engagement in civic venture and government service. Curiously, the book is written by an Indian and it took a foreignerto produce this volume. (Though the author acknowledges the role of Abera Tilahun,founder and president of Micros Business College in Ambo in introducing him to the former president and financing the publishing of the book). The book is written as a series of snapshots. It begins with the author arriving in Ethiopia accompanying his wife who was to take a post at the Ambo University on 2010. Through a series of vignettes illustrating critical moments, the book depicts the life of the man who has been fortunate enough to live through and witness many momentous and significant period of the nation. Ato Girma, who is now in his twilight years of 92, served as president of Ethiopia from 2001-2013, he was member of Chamber of Deputies of theImperial Ethiopian Parliament, director general of the Ethiopian civil aviation authority for five years and known as an advocate for environmental conservation.

Gaashe introduces us to the world in which Girma spent his childhood and youth. It isa fascinating world, full of contradictions and conflicts, humour and humanity. We learn about Girma's parents: father whose first name was Dawii, who later changed itto Wolde Giorgis, when he was governor of Debre Berhan because he felt that "a name in Amhara pattern would be suitable for him to easily mingle with and internalize the life and styles of the Amahra people", (p 32).

The author tells us that Girma was born on 28 December 1924 during the reign of Zewditu. His father was the governor of Gurgahe and later Debre Berhan. Though Girma was a second child, he was his father's favourite son. Thus Wolde Giorgis, who was an expert horse rider, was a role model for his son who aspired to emulatehim and "his exceptional style in handling horses and majestic horse rides." (p. 40).

When Girma enrolled at Teferi Mekonen School, he was to meet another figure who was to significantly influence him in his future life. This was the teacher at Teferi Mekonen, the strict disciplinarian monsieur Costre, father of the well-known Ethiopianathletic coach, Dr. Wolde Meskel Costre.

Girma soon became "an ardent disciple to Masseur Costre who would carry youngminds to worlds of diverse knowledge" and instilled in the minds of his pupils "the belief that the world is open for anyone who wants to develop." (p. 41). It was fromhim that Girma learned to study and to behave himself while he was about it.

The books tells us of another influence on the young Grima who was none other thanthe famous Ethiopian patriot, Shewareged Gedle, who was an aunt of his mother. "Shewareged was a young beautiful lady with a brave heart. She fought fiercely against the Italian forces. She led the native force in Addis Alem and contributed considerably in ousting the foreign invaders. She stayed in Addis Alemuntil the town was bombed by the Italians."

During breaks, we are told, Shewareged used to visit Girma's home. Shewarged's visits were a matter of elation for the little boy. "Major reason for this was she will beusually coming with packets of caramels."

The proximity of Girma's school to the site of the then airport at Jan Meda was toleave an indelible imprint on the mind of the little Girma. As the author tells us, "Girma would spend long time, keenly watching the flights taking off and landing." (p. 41), an early harbinger of his later life as an airman.

However, the Italian invasion disrupted his schooling and was taken by his fatherfrom the bustling capital to a tranquil village in sodo, where airplane gazing was replaced by cattle herding. Girma's father took part the war at Mecho against thefascist and had an untimely death at the age of 48, when Grima was 12 years old.

As the invasion was over, a fateful incident happened which was to bring young Grima back to the capital, when Ethiopian soldiers camping near Bantu are were celebrating the victory, with merry making and celebratory shooting, a stray bullet hit the 15-year-old boy's left leg and he was taken to a military hospital at Tulu Bolo. Thebook charts the choices Girma made to move away from there toward the Addis Ababa city, the capital which kindled his dream of flying.

In Addis Ababa, he met Seifu Mutama who provided him with shelter. Eager to earnhis keep, Girma was soon employed as an assistant to Mario Duraski, an Italian whoran a business of paving floors with linoleum. The young man's diligence was noted by his employer giving him enough money with which he bought a bicycle.

Girma then joined the army with the British military mission for Ethiopia and became a sergeant at an age of twenty enrolling at Holeta Military School for a period of eight months, involving rigorous military training. When a Swedish colonel, Capt Magnusonvisited Ethiopia in connection with tasks with air force, he requested emergency communication assistance, he was directed to Girma and the captain impressed.

Impressed by Girma's fluency in English, the Swedish captain suggested that he join the air force. Thus was paved the way for transforming his dream of flying into reality.Becoming one of the 18 cadets at the Debre Zeit Air force, Girma became an airman.

It was at this time that Girma met his marriage partner, Salem Paulos, daughter of anEthiopian consular in Jerusalem, Paulos Menamenos. However, trying to knot was not a simple affair. Airforce personnel were not allowed to enter into marriage and Girma had to appeal none other than the Emperor for the law to be bent for him.
Though Girma did not get imperial blessing for his marriage, he remains "immenselyindebted to the Emperor who though hadn't given a final approval, behaved kindly." (p. 73).

As he breached the rule of the air force, Girma could not continue working there andhe had to find another job. It was at this occasion that his fluency in English came in handy. He was employed as translator for the British council in Asmara. Yet he has still to face severe punishment in the form of court martial for being illegally wedded and for desertion of duty. It was only the mercy of the Emperor that allowed him to return back to his job. Eventually, he was promoted to head of navigation and civil aviation, a post whereby he was to go overseas for training first in Holland and Canada.

When Taffara Deguefe left the post of Director General of Civil Aviation, Girma tookover and he found himself faced with a case that required a decision of what to do with the airport project to be financed by the World Bank. Impatient with the procrastination of the council of ministers who were foot dragging the project, he decided to go all by himself. He ordered his officers to go to different towns toconduct the field studies seeking possibilities for establishing airports.

"This provoked many conservative superior officers. It was a bullet directly hit at theirhegemony. Their reciprocation to Girma was immediate. At least for that they did notprocrastinate!

The provoked officers reported to the emperor that Girma was working against the government. Naturally Girma was summoned to the palace. Gaashe says: "It was anugly kind of summons. Pressure was mounting around me. There was every chancethat they would put me in jail to vent their displeasure on my action.

Bold hearted, Girma appeared before the Emperor. "Behind the Emperor was agroup of people who were eager to see that I'm duly interrogated, warned of behaving as super officer and punished for a jail term."

Emperor asked: "Are you doing against the government?" "Your Majesty, it's yourorder that I'm implementing"

"My Order?"

"Yes, Your Majesty! It was the credentials signed by you that have been produced before the World Bank. It was your statements that consequently availed our country the loan from the World Bank. So I earnestly believed that being a responsible servant, I'm liable to carry out the work according to the stipulated timeframe, due to imminent spell of rain." Girma's articulation made an impression. The Emperor turned back and asked the men who stood behind: "Are you accusing him for doing his job?"then he looked at

Girma and said "God bless you!" (Page 92-3)

However, Girma who was always looking for new ventures was not content to be bureaucratic functionary and decided to make a foray into the world of politics into parliament. He began to contest from Lideta Kernaio constituency in Addis Ababa and eventually reached the apex of his career by becoming president of the parliament of the four year term of which he completed three years. Girma's description of the then parliament is interesting as well is revealing. "At the time therewas no political parties. Instead, the competitions were between opinion groups. Theimperial government set this up: Emperor at the apex, a Senate and a House of Representative below him. Senate is constituted by those who are nominated by the Emperor. House of Parliament was the place for opinion group members, who reach there after winning elections."

About his tenure as Member of Parliament under the Emperor- the King of Kings, theConquering Lion of Juda, Girma recollected, "Emperor was elected by God. I was in his parliament, as representative elected by the people,"

The book points out some of the progress brought by the parliament in introducinginitiatives like protection of forests and environments, the anti-corruption law, themilitary service law and the controversial sentence against lashing.

While Girma was President the Parliament, he made the country a member of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. In the final years, he was demoted to being a member. Heexplains the reason for the demoting with disarming frankness, "Later my arrogance must have displeased many."

After leaving parliament, Girma returned to his agricultural venture with three like-minded people, cultivating Virginia Tobacco, maize and banana.

With the coming of the Derg, Girma was assigned to Eritrea as deputy Commissionerfor the Peace Making Delegation, which was a fitting task for a man with long attachment with Eritrea. Yet the five member delegations chaired by an Eritrean named Dr. Yakob Eyob, who could not nurture unity among them members, failed toachieve the desired results. Girma was invited by the government for "a meeting as to how the government was to be formed and the constitution could be formed".

He crowned his long time career with becoming the president of Federal DemocraticRepublic of Ethiopia, along with the premier Meles Zenawi whom he describes as "very intelligent, who shifted his personality as gallant warrior to a seasoned statesman quickly. He could do that only because he had a strong desire to establisha democratic Ethiopia."

Girma had no delusion about his role, a non-executive president with largely ceremonial functions. Yet he was the person who convinced the then prime ministerMeles Zewawi to grant mercy for 23 Derg officials who were sentenced to death. "Many doubted Meles would retaliate. But Meles didn't object," Girma was quoted. During those times, Girma continued with crusade for environment campaignfor afforestation and preventing desertification. He formed Lem Ethiopia Environmental Society, which today has chapters along some 400 high schools.

In the course of his work, the author has had many long talks with Girma and accompanied him on a number of official errands. The book is filled with anecdotes about his family (including the story of his daughter Hirut Girma, "a girl of versatile talents" who unfortunately committed suicide at the age of 29) and the men and women who worked for him and helped him shape Ethiopia history for a decade. It'salso a book that tends to be politically partisan for long stretches. Sivakumar is not acritical interviewer and he rarely poses a difficult question to Girma. As the introduction makes abundantly clear, the author is a fan. Yet he succeeds in showingus the thinking of an organization man, a sense of duty sharpened by ambition, arranged by idea and theme, instinct. It is concerned to communicate the experienceof growing up, of expanding horizons, of watching change. It hardly suggests greatness, but this is, after all, a book of reminiscences in pace of a man who saw a lot. Under the Shade of Gaashe is not long at 194 pages, indexes included. The images in Girma's book not only help to illustrate the text, but are also compelling images that speak for themselves, and represent moments in Ethiopian history whichare gone.

Book claims Derg regime's security chief was a CIA spy

Arefayné Fantahun Friday, October 16th, 2015

A new book about the Soviet-backed provisional military council (Derg) period writtenby one of its principal actors published by Los Angeles-based Tsehay Publishers aims to strengthen claims the then intelligence chief collaborated with the CIA and rebel forces during the communist period as a spy.

The book, "The Revolution and My Reminiscences," by former deputy to President Lt.Col. Mengistu

Hailemariam, Colonel Fisseha Desta, claims that Col. Tesfaye Wolde Sellasie, who was Minister of Public and National Security for 12 years not only was pro-America, which has been widely believed, but he played a double role working forCIA, Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) and the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF).

Tesfaye, who was rumoured to be possible replacement for Mengistu, was also accused of playing such double role in the coup attempt on May 1989 against Mengistu Haile Mariam. Tesfaye initially posed as a conspirator but remained loyal toMengistu, using the information he gathered to foil the coup.

Fisseha's book shed light on some of the most important political figures in the Derg,the regime notorious for the torture and death of thousands of Ethiopians.

Fisseha mentions that Tesfaye Woldeselassie tried to discredit him in the eyes of thehead of state pointing to his Tigrayan origin, which most likely explains the grudge hebore him.

Fisseha seems to imply that Tesfaye was somehow involved in the murder of the writer Baalu Girma. While they were both in prison after the fall of the Derg, he askedhim about the circumstances of Baalu's death. Fisseha tells us that Tesfaye's response was "within a few months of the publication of the book, the EPLF radio started using the book as propaganda instrument. Political officers, intelligence operatives complained against the top leaders."

It is long believed that journalist and novelist Baalu was arrested and killed on theorders of military authorities. One commentator said in his quest to exonerate himself, Fisseha is quite prepared to include Tesfaye and others in his list of the guilty, the instalment in a lingering feud between two men who were loyal to Mengistu.

Tesfaye Woldeslessie was an official who was portrayed in Baalu Girma's novel "Oromai" by a character named Colonel Betru Tessema, a book which cost the writerhis life. Oromai was published in 1983 in Addis Ababa by Kuraz Publishers. After 500copies were sold in 24 hours, it was taken out of the bookstores and suspended fromcirculation, according to an official of the period. "Baalu was immediately removed from his post with a letter that disgraced him. Mengistu refused to give him permission to be employed anywhere else," Dawit Wolde-Giorgis, who himself was a key player in the Rehabilitation and Rescue Commission until he disassociated himself from the regime, wrtoe in his book "Red Tears: War, Famine and Revolution in Ethiopia."

Baalu's novel castigated the Mengistu government as corrupt, greedy, and rapacious and Colonel Tesfaye is portrayed as someone who reviled the greedy and power- hungry officials who were to amass wealth for themselves and to satisfy their politicalambitions.

Literary critic Tadesse Adera wrote that "Baalu Girma's fall is a grimly intriguing matter, for he was not only a writer but also a political appointee of the same government that rejected him. Not long before he was removed from his post, he wasthe chief of propaganda the Red Star Campaign in Eritrea. Moreover, one of his books, Ye Kei Kokeb Tiri (The Call of the Red Star), is a partisan novel which seems to condone Mengistu's venomous attack on the youth of Ethiopia during the infamous"Red Terror". So Baalu's Oromai was, in the government's view, an act of treason. It led to the end of his career and his life." On August 2005, Tesfaye Woldeselassie along with ex-police chief Legesse Belayneh had been sentenced to death after an 11-year trial. They, among others, were accused of playing prominent roles in setting up torture camps during the "Red Terror." Neither of the two men sentenced to death had been executed as the Ethiopian government withdrew their death sentences andother 23 senior officials. Tesfaye died in prison days after the pardon.

Fisseha Desta, member of the politburo of the worker's party, is one of the few members of the Derg who come from the Tigrean nobility. In 1978, he was designated deputy secretary of the Derg and in 1979 he became a member of the Executive Committee of the newly formed COPWE, and head of the Administrativeand Justice Department. He was appointed deputy senior minister without portfolioand deputy chairman of the Council of Ministers in 1980. Until he was pensioned in1990 he Vice-President of the country and ex-Assistant secretary of the Dergue.

Fisseha was one of the 100 Derg members tried in 1995 after the fall of the Derg, accused of the murder of Emperor Haile Selassie, and of the second Patriarch of theEthiopian Orthodox Church Abune Theofilos, and 59 members of the imperial court, nearly 2,000 members of rival revolutionary groups, and charged with crimes againsthumanity and genocide, aggravated homicide, abuse of power, and unlawful detention. He was condemned and served twenty years terms.

University of Toronto begins teaching ancient Ethiopic language,Ethiopic Ge'ez

By MEGAN DOLSKI, The Star January 19, 2017

The course in Ge'ez, which could be a first step to launching a larger Ethiopian Studies program, was helped made possible by a donation of $50,000 each from a prof, the school and the Weeknd.

A language that hasn’t been spoken for more than 1,000 years is being taught this semester at the University of Toronto, a step perhaps towardsdecoding rarely understood excerpts of history.

The ancient Ethiopic language of Ge’ez is written in a script that’s read leftto right and has 26 letters. Letters have variations for the vowels that go with them, meaning students have to learn 26 characters in sevendifferent ways.

The goal of the class, which meets twice a week, is to get students ontheir way to reading.

Milen Melles, a history major who said her parents immigrated to Canadafrom Eritrea — which became independent from Ethiopia in the early 1990s after three decades of war — is taking the class as an opportunityto connect with her roots. She one day hopes to study texts from the region at a graduate level.

“This is a huge step for western academia to be exploring African languages, ancient languages, because they usually only study Swahili,”Melles said, noting that African studies often get lumped together at universities, differently than other regions where specific areas or countries are studied independently of one another.

“They treat Africa like a monolith, if they were to have an Ethiopic studiesprogram that would clearly change that whole model of the way that theylook at Africa,” said Melles, noting that the Ge'ez language pre-dates Ethiopia as it exists today.

U of T’s Scarborough library is working on digitizing tens of thousands ofpages of historical manuscripts written in Ge’ez that hardly anyone can understand.

The class’s professor, Robert Holmstedt specializes in Semitic languages and is one of only a handful of people teaching Ge’ez at a university levelin North America.

Holmstedt said Ge’ez hasn’t been spoken since about the year 1000, andis the ancestor of the modern languages of Amharic, Tigrinya and Tigre (similar to the relationship Latin has with the romance languages). Also similar to Latin, Ge’ez lived on through the church as literary language after people stopped speaking it. Holmstedt said outside of a church- context, very few people learn it anymore.

Professor Holmstedt said his class will be working towards reading biblical texts in Ge'ez first. He said that while it disappeared as a spoken languageabout a thousand years ago, Ge'ez remained in use by the church after that.

Here's an example of John 1:1, written in English and then written andread out loud in Ge'ez.

In its first semester, five undergraduates and five graduate students areenrolled in Holmstedt's class, with a handful more auditing. He said his students are taking the class for many different reasons, for some it's achance to connect with their heritage while for others it's an effort to unlock ancient bits of history.

Funding for the class started with a $50,000 donation from U of T historyprofessor Michael Gervers, who worked on digitizing manuscripts for the university from the Gunda Gunde monastery in Ethiopia.

Gerver's donation was later matched by Scarborough's Abel Tesfaye(better known as Grammy award-winner, the Weeknd) and by the university.

His donation was made as part of the Bikila Awards organization's efforts to fundraise for the course. The organization said the Weeknd, whose parents moved from Ethiopia, "immediately" answered its call for support.The artist later tweeted that he was proud to help and share Ethiopia's "brilliant and ancient history."

Gervers, who is auditing the class, said the graduate students in Holmstedt's class will be working with the Ge'ez manuscripts that U of Thas for their term papers. He said the university has more than 200 manuscripts that contain roughly 35,000 pages of Ge'ez writing.

U of T is now trying to figure out its next move towards its goal of eventually offering a larger Ethiopian studies program. "I think it's in theair to consider a course on literature," Gervers said.

Suzanne Akbari, director of U of T's centre for medieval studies, said oneof the university's specialties is manuscript studies, so the Ge'ez class fitsnicely within one of the school's areas of expertise.

Akbari said that while studying the ancient past can sometimes seem likea distant undertaking, doing so can still be relevant today.

"On the one hand it's a little corner of the medieval past, but it's also areally vital corner if we are thinking about our history in terms of how people are connected," she said.

Akbari said Ethiopia is especially interesting when studied as a crossroadswhere cultures, religions, trade and languages met.
She said an Ethiopian studies program will be important in shaping the way students at U of T view Africa from a historical standpoint. She said that too often, African Studies is considered an isolated subject, and she thinks it's important to study the region as it is connects with Europe andthe Middle East, and the rest of the world.
Clarification – January 16, 2017: This article was edited from a previousversion to make clear that Milen Melles referred to the program as 'Ethiopic Studies.'

ETHIO POLITICS
Is TPLF prison empire in Ethiopia silently approach towards half acentury !..???

By TEMESGEN TESFAYE MENGESHA.X From NORWAY 27/12/2016

Since TPLF fights for 17 years as a guerrilla fighter against the military junta Derg Mingistu Hailmariam here are facts about the prison cell and situation are it's major characteristics features of the group. Tigray peopleliberation front from the grass roots history they have got a famous prisoncell which is highly secret full know as BADO SHIDESTE (06) which is usedto arrest those who are against them and prisoners who are sundered, wounded or hijacked by TPLF. It is used to torture, harsh keeping of prisoners like starvation and denial of medical assistance in addition if it isnecessary extra killings individual and mass according to AREGAWI BEREHE and Gebermedhin Araya former and founder of TPLF documents about story the massacre time Hinfishfish (internal shock), Thadesso (Salvation), Halwlew and other campaign are witnessed for the tragedy nobody knows still now the number is expected to be thousands or millions During 17 years of fight against the Derg regime how much people are arrested and lost their lives it needs a grave evidence and let alone this for research and discovery in human tragedy. Let's try to see the quarter decade (25) years of TPLF's prison empire in Ethiopia. Ethiopia has the second highest number of prisoners in Africa, 93, 044 running after south Africa has which has a total of 165, 398 inmates in April 2014, according to the international center for prison studies (ICPS). As some organizations and CPJ reports prison in Ethiopia is on it's highly increasingpoint from 2000 were prison population 55, 209 until 2014 prison population number 104, 467 according to ICPR data.

In 2015 and 2016 it is believed to be increasing sharply. More than 600 people have been killed in unrest since last year, rights groups say , triggered initially by anger over a development scheme for the capital, Addis Abeba .The crack down on the media comes amid mass arrests following large protests that led the government to declare a state of emergency on October 9, security forces have detained more than 11, 000 people since the state of emergency was declared, Tadessa Hordofa , of Ethiopian governments state of emergency inquiry Board, said in a televised statement on November 12, 2016.According to the internal sources from activists and human rights groups more than 24, 000 people's are under arrest since after the state of emergency declaration and still mass arrest is going on in different solitary confinement of the country .where prison places are in several parts of the country.

As of 2015, Ethiopia's prison system consists of six federal prisons, 120 regional prisons, and many unofficial detention centers are used. Since the unrest begins Addis Abeba, Bahir Dar, Oromia region, North-westernand southern regions, Ambo, Dembi Dolo and Nekemt. Due to a major problem causes are:

-hundreds of killings and thousands of arrests by federal and commandforce soldiers.

-human rights abuses (detention of opposition, demonstrates) In Oromiaregion.

-Official status dispute over Welkaiet belongs to the Gonderian.

-unfair distribution of wealth.

-Political marginalization in Oromia, Amhara, Gambela and Konso.

-Land seizures by the Ethiopian government.

It's of grave concern that there are now over Ethiopians prison populationcontinues to raise , ,despite the fact that imprisonment is a highly expensive option for the Ethiopian Government , as well as being in appropriate and ineffective for the majority of prisoners who are from thetwo majority and marginalized ethnic groups Oromo and Amhara which accounts for more than 60 % of the population, also from the minority Gambella, Konso and others, the highest number of prisoners among supporters, journalists, political party leaders, blogger, members the civilsociety protest and demonstrate against the TPLF regime during the one year arrest are on its beyond the highest level.

If Ethiopians are under the TPLF mafia thugs brutality, supported and financed by western hypocrites and educationists for 25 years and then ?Harassing , arresting and killing impunity with or without their Kangaroo Courts review is common in the past .not a single official or security officer is prosecuted with 25 years of corruption , bad governance or crimes. Ethiopian civilians ranged from torture, murder, ethnic cleansing to genocide and mass arrest in different parts of the country solitary confinement can not be a guaranty to stay in power more than 25 years.

The constitution and laws are always punishing everybody else, except thecorrupt TPLF criminal gangs, so what the ordinary Ethiopian to loose? It is the same for Ethiopians under tyranny as usual, but for the brutal TPLF government with its financiers, a legitimate cover to quash any critic, commit more mass murder , tortures and imprisonments Ethiopian dictatorial TPLF regime arresting peoples massively throughout the year from 2000 and until now it costs very expensive to mobilize the military toattack and arrest those who are activists or civilians who are protesting against the regime specially the past one year the government spent a huge amount of money to recover from this strong protest and demonstration one can imagine still the loss of financial cost to perform this but one of the poorest country on the planet can't cover all this cost itis real there are hidden financial suppliers behind for the cruel governmentof Ethiopia it is believed to be the USA, UK and the western just to prefer only national interest knowingly done no responsibility, humanity , moral values and shame , Ignoring Ethiopia's political issue even by internationalmedias.

Ignoring fact full documents and human rights abusive data's like HRW, AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL, USA state department annual reported humanrights advocacy organizations. They don't give a legal right for these international organization, they don't respect their report, they don't give them power for these organizations. This will not prevent a long last peaceful security in Ethiopia where more than 85 ethnic groups and language with multi cultural and the worst poor country and people the final outcome will be a collateral damage and destruction for the country and for EPRDF.

Finally if there is a willingness, time is not yet late. Measures like free all political prisoners, free media, free press, freedom of expression, the respect for constitutional right, respect for the rule of law and multi partysystem or a true reform can restore and make a stable Ethiopia where asif continuous mass arrest in the concentration camps the story becomes true and dangerous! Ethiopia cuts diplomatic ties with South Sudan: Radio

By Radio Tamazuj January 24, 2017

A diplomatic row has broken out between South Sudan and neighboring Ethiopia following rumors on social media that President Salva Kiir accepted to allow Ethiopian rebels to open their office in the capital Juba.

"Rumours have been circulating on social media that when President Kiir visited Egypt, he discussed important issues with the Egyptian officials sothat Ethiopian rebels can open an office in Juba, "a senior government official who preferred anonymity told Radio Tamazuj Monday.

“The rumours circulated that the President has accepted to allow the Ethiopian rebels to open their office in Juba and Egypt will support the Ethiopian rebels with guns, because Egypt is having differences with Ethiopia over the issue of Renaissance Dam, so this is what happened onsocial media,” he added.

The official accused the SPLM-IO faction allied to former First Vice President Riek Machar of circulating the rumour in neighbouring Ethiopia.
”The rebels now took advantage of that, and this information has alreadyreached the government of Ethiopia,” he said.

He pointed out that the government of Ethiopia has decided to cut diplomatic ties with the government of South Sudan and expel South Sudan’s Ambassador to Addis Ababa. “Even if there are differences between us, Ethiopia cannot expel our ambassador, because the ambassador is the ambassador of South Sudan to Ethiopia and at the same time he is representing us in the African Union. So, Ethiopia cannot expel our ambassador,” he said. According to the official, South Sudan government will issue a statement to deny the rumour.

The Ethiopian Coffee Ceremony In America

BY NAOMI TOMKY January 24, 2017

Participating in an Ethiopian coffee ceremony is like standing in the front row of a live concert—but the band is the beverage itself. The nearly two-hour event draws your full attention, encompasses all your senses, and shuts out the outside world for the duration. It’s the coffee tradition of a place whose history with the drink goes back at least five times as long asit does in the US.

Ages before Starbucks was a household name, before coffee replaced tea as the drink of choice in America, Ethiopia brewed a culture of ritual around the roasting, steeping, and drinking of coffee. Kaldi, the young goat herder who, legend holds, discovered coffee after watching his goatsfrolic energetically following a snack on the fruit of a coffee shrub, is depicted on the country’s one Birr note (worth about a nickel). It is a partof the history, the culture, the economy, and, with its ceremony, the dailylife of Ethiopia. With a barista in a uniform of flowing white cotton and thescents of frankincense and myrrh mingling with that of freshly roasted coffee, the multi-hour ritual might seem like a special occasion to an outsider. But in coffee’s native home, it’s simply the everyday manner of drinking it.

“The way we roast the beans, grind them in front of you,” explains restaurateur Tensay Assress of Little Ethiopia in Los Angeles, “this is theway to really try coffee the way it’s supposed to taste, the original bean,no machines involved. If someone is a coffee lover, this is the way to goabout it.”

Ethiopian immigrants and their descendants in the United States have long kept up the tradition in their own homes, but many Ethiopian cafesand restaurants are pushing to introduce the tradition to new audiences.“It is our culture,” explains Assress, “in each household, every day. And we want to share that, the tradition and the culture.”

The first half hour of an Ethiopian coffee ceremony is an exercise in patience. Someone, usually a woman, washes and roasts the beans. They jingle in the pan, crackling as they take on color, the smell wafting upwardwith wisps of smoke, joining the nearby incense in perfuming the air. The barista, as it were, focuses on roasting the beans to medium, just enough to let the bright flavor, perhaps of blueberry, jump out from the cup. But not yet. First, the anticipation. Popcorn, dry-roasted barley, peanuts, or sunflower seeds make the rounds. Settle in, the snacks suggest—you’re not going anywhere for a while.

The ceremony takes about two hours from start to finish, beginning with the roasting in a flat pan over coals. Or, in the case of Martha Ayele, at her restaurant, named 'Jebena' for the clay pot in which coffee is brewed, over a small gas stove. She uses a long, hooked tool to push the beans around in the pan, patiently waiting for the right sounds, smells, and appearance to indicate it’s time to remove them from the heat. Ayele doesthe ceremony at least once a day here, when business is slow. She sits down with her mother, who still scolds her if she tries to rush the roasting,asking “where do you want to go?” and they talk about “the past, the present, and the future.”

Much of the ceremony—for all its heavenly scented incense, flowing cloths, and clay pots—is all about just that: talking about your day, hearing the latest gossip, catching up with friends. At the end of the roasting process, Ayele adds a little bit of cardamom and clove. The ceremony, she says, “is about sharing our love, our lives.” The scent ofhot coffee and spices joins the aroma of frankincense and myrrh, blossoming as the beans are ground, traditionally by mortar and pestle,before the hefty pile of coffee is dumped in the Jebena.

Solomon Dubie learned to roast coffee at the age of eight. For Ethiopians,in America or at home, roasting green beans, grinding them by hand, andbrewing them in the jebena is part of the everyday routine. It takes morethan half an hour from the start of the ceremony to the first cup. “It’s all about the socializing,” he says. “Your saddest moments and your happiestmoments, with your loved ones, with friends and strangers. Coffee is thatice-breaker. It’s the social norm. It’s every day.”

The grind on the beans can’t be too fine: the grounds go directly into thejebena, with cold water to brew. Tall, dark, skinny, the jebena bears a dancer’s elegance, drawn in part from its simplicity: there’s no straining process, other than the pot’s shape. The big bottom lets the grounds settle in and the thin spout keeps them from sludging forth.

A tray of cups sits in front of the barista on a low stool known as a rekbot,and that same thin spout pours from high above into the many cups below. Smooth and arcing, the coffee streams down like a caffeinated fountain. It is the first of three brew cycles, from which two cups per person are traditionally poured. It is the strongest of the three, called abol, and for that, Dubie named his Seattle coffee shop Cafe Avole.

Eventually, Dubie would like to roast beans at Avole, which also serves espresso and drip coffee, Ethiopian food, and American-style sandwiches. For now, he offers jebena on the menu. For $8, anyone can order the traditional Ethiopian brew—no ceremony, just an easy way to order coffeefor a long conversation or perhaps for a group. If you finish the jebena, hewill refill it with water, much as in the ceremony itself, where that second brewing is called tona. It’s slightly weaker, the same grounds swimming innew water.

The third and final brew, baraka, is the weakest of the brews, still the same grounds refreshed with more water. Sam Saverance, co-owner of New York's Bunna Cafe, which offers weekly ceremonies and runs the website www.whatisthecoffeeceremony.com, emphasizes that the ritual isn't actually that much about coffee anyway. "It's the ambiance, it's a constant thing you experience," he says. "It becomes less about drinkingcoffee and more about becoming immersed in a sensory experience."

The art of brewing and drinking coffee is all about finding the way to drinkthat fits your taste and style preference. With the fast-paced culture of theUS, it's unlikely we'll see a renaissance of the Ethiopian ceremony—peoplesetting aside two hours a day for socializing over coffee—and Dubie, Saverance, and Ayele all recognize that. But each has found a special wayto bring Ethiopian-style coffee to the American way of life.

Ayele offers coffee to any diners in her restaurant while she conducts theceremony, served in the same small ceramic cups used in the ceremony (free of charge—she'll also conduct a full ceremony for guests by reservation for a fee). "I love customers, I love talking to people," she says. It is that creation of community, that socialization, that has saved both her life and her livelihood—a customer who was a lawyer saved therestaurant when it was sued by a former investor, and another helped Ayele navigate the complex world of American healthcare as she got treatment for a medical crisis. With the ceremony, she says, she shares her love, "with family, friends, and customers."

For Saverance, the ceremony is less about drinking coffee and more aboutbecoming immersed in the sensory experience. Some people come just forthe weekly ceremony, but most tack it onto the end of a meal. "It's a snapshot of the culture in general," he says of why it's important to him tooffer the ceremony. "Coffee has a very personal characteristic in Ethiopianculture—it's the ambiance of the surroundings, the smell, it's a constant thing you experience. There's more of a personal relationship to the bean." By opening the restaurant's ceremonies to the public, he hopes to share Ethiopian coffee culture with more people·

Dubie takes it a step further, pragmatically extracting the coffee (and brewing method) from the ceremony: “You’ve got pour-over, you’ve got French press, you’ve got espresso, why shouldn’t you be able to go into acoffee shop and order a jebena?”

You can’t grab a jebena to-go at Avole, he points out (“If my mom says we’re going to have some coffee, it’s two hours. It’s not quick, it’s not a five-minute conversation, ever”), so serving coffee like this forces peopleto change how they drink it. “No worries, stress-free, relaxed. I want to bring that patient type of coffee into the shop,” he says, telling of a teacher who brings her students in to talk over a jebena, and of people driving in from the suburbs to relax over a pot.

Brewing coffee in a jebena is one of the oldest methods of making coffee, and participating in an Ethiopian coffee ceremony is one of the most generous, ritualistic ways to drink it. Bunna in Brooklyn, Little Ethiopia in Los Angeles, and Jebena and Avole in Seattle are each within a stone’s throw of some of America’s most cutting-edge, modern coffee shops, as are similar places in other cities with significant Ethiopian populations, such as Washington D.C. and Toronto. But in the shadows of the newest, hottest cafes, there’s a small group of Ethiopian restaurants and cafes who have figured out how to share their deep-rooted traditions in coffee. All they ask from the customers is to slow down a little and enjoy the ride.

QWANQWA FPE is proud to present its newest artist, QWANQWA,from Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

QWANQWA in Amharic means language. Music has long had the belovednickname “The Universal Language”. It is the world’s mother tongue, understood by all, and has the reputation of bridging socio-economic groups and joining the young and old, and the new band, QWANQWA, based in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, is named for this concept.

The music is characterized by tight arrangements, psychedelic sounds,extended experimental moments, and occasional audience sing-a-long sections. It is driving, powerful, and different than anything else comingout of Ethiopia at this current Golden Age of Ethiopian music. The live show ranges from intimate to wild, from whispery conversations to full blown rock show, and it is hard to believe these psychedelic sounds arecoming from traditional harp and violin.

At its core, this band is instrumental, however, the list of guests and collaborations is long, including both beloved and famous singers such as Fikraddis, Habte Michael, Amelmal Abate, as well as Azmari singers Selamnesh Zemene, Ertibu Agengehu, and Etenesh Wassie. Qwanqwa alsohas invited the virtuoso masinqo player Endris Hassen, the father of washint Johannes Aferwork, Dawit Frew (Ethiopia’s foremost clarinetist).

Mesele Asmamaw; is Qwanqwa’s lead electric krar player. (Krar is a traditional harp, relative to the lyre). Mesele is known as a composer andarranger, active in Ethiopia for over twenty years. He has released many albums of his compositions as well as traveled extensively throughout Europe and Africa performing the traditional music of Ethiopia. Since the mid-2000s, Mesele has been a favorite guest of the extremely influential punk and “The EX”, has recorded several albums with the experimental Norwegian drummer Paal Nilssen-Love, and has toured and recorded withhis experimental rock group Trio Kazanches. He uses several interesting techniques in Qwanqwa, including a wah pedal, a distortion pedal, a cokebottle and a plastic tube!

Dawit Seyoum;is master of the bass krar, plays extensively in traditional groups around Addis, including Ethiocolor and Hager Fikr. He also is a member of the Nile Project, a much-acclaimed American based project which tours internationally with traditional musicians from all Nilecountries.

Elias Wolde Mikael; is Qwanqwa's percussionist. He uses the traditionalkebero, goat skin drums played with sticks, as well as a variety of other homemade percussion instruments. He can be seen regularly in several groups around Addis Ababa as well as on popular TV music programs in Ethiopia, including Ethiopian Idol and Balageru.

Kaethe Hostetter; 5-string electric violin, has been playing Ethiopian music for many years now. A founding member of the critically acclaimed Debo Band (signed to Sub Pop), the first Ethiopian band in the US to top many charts including iTunes and CMJ, and who has played many stages from Lincoln Center to Kennedy Center, from Chicago World Music Festivaland GlobalFest to Bumbershoot and Bonarroo. She also has had an active performing life in the experimental scene, including tours with Fred Frith,Butch Morris and Jim Hobbs.

Product Description
Qwanqwa's unique, experimental, joyously tuneful take on traditional Ethiopian music is irresistible. Volume One is their first album, recorded in2013, and available on a ruby red cassette from FPE. (Volume Two, recorded in 2014, will be available on CD and LP in late 2014.)

Qwanqwa "takes traditional music and rocks it up a bit" (Byron Coley, TheWire) and "for sure is an incredible experimental traditional Ethiopian rockgroup that deserves to be played in every living room, at every party and on every radio station from Gondar to Santa Cruz." (Addis Rumble blog). If you've heard the golden age of Ethiopian pop as immortalized by the Ethiopiques series some more recent releases on Mississippi records, and wondered why no one was rocking like that in the now – you can stop wondering. They're doing it. You just didn't get to hear it yet. Qwanqwa bridges generations and continents, making a huge sound that you can only hear if you're here, right now.

Groovy and familiar, yet stimulating and heady, the tunes swim through your aural consciousness, providing equal parts enjoyment and confoundment. Qwanqwa vibes with appreciators all types, be it indie blog-followers, jazz enthusiasts, afrobeaters, music theory heads, hippies,or coffee drinkers reading the New York Times.

Inter-generational and inter-continental, Qwanqwa consists of Ethiopian musicians Mesele Asmamaw (electric krar), Dawit Seyoum (electric bass krar), and Samson Sendekou (percussion), and American violinist Kaethe Hostetter (also of Boston-based Ethio-funk band Debo Band), who formedQwanqwa after moving to Addis Ababa in 2012 to fully immerse herself inthe ocean that is Ethiopian music. Volume Two is their second album, recorded at Langano Studios in Addis Ababa in 2014.

South Sudan ambassador dismisses rift with Ethiopia

By Associated Press January 25, 2017

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia – South Sudan's ambassador to Ethiopia is dismissing reports that relations are strained between the two countriesafter President Salva Kiir visited Egypt and met with President Abdel-Fattah el-Sissi in Cairo earlier this month.

South Sudan's Ambassador to Ethiopia and the African Union, James PitiaMorgan, made the remarks after some Ethiopian and South Sudanese media outlets reported that South Sudan and Egypt signed what they called a "dirty deal" to arm Ethiopian opposition groups based in South Sudan who aim to sabotage the big dam that Ethiopia is building on theNile River.

Egypt has long felt that the massive dam Ethiopia is currently building willdecrease its share of Nile waters, despite Ethiopia's assurances that it won't. This raised tensions between the two countries and the Ethiopian Prime Minister recently charged that "some elements within the Egyptian government" are supporting the unrest in his country. Despite the tensions between Ethiopia and Egypt, South Sudan wants to have good relations with both, said Morgan.

Tewolde Mulugeta, spokesman for the Ethiopian Ministry of Foreign Affairs, agreed with the ambassador's remarks saying that South Sudan and Ethiopia enjoy good relations. Ethiopia currently hosts close to 300,000 South Sudanese refugees, most of whom fled after conflict brokeout in the world's newest nation in December 2013, according to U.N estimates.

Ethiopia : Former Derg officials held discussion with HailemariamDesalegne

Borkena, Ethiopian News February 5, 2017

Toronto- Former Derg government senior officials, who were imprisoned for over two decades and released recently, held discussion with prime minister Hailemariam Desalegne this past week, reported Wazema radio.

Focus of the discussion was on “sew le sew”, not to be confused with a German non-governmental organization operating in Ethiopia, association’s application for a piece of land in the capital for purpose of constructing a building to help members of the association, the report added. The association is chaired by Fikreselassie Wogderes, prime minister under military Derg government of colonel Mengistu Hailemariamand former member of Ethiopian Air Force.

However, Wazema says prime minister Hailemariam Desalagne discussed other issues of national importance with the former officials but he is said to have advised them not to release contents of the discussion for media consumption and said that he will make it public on his own when the timecomes for it.

Wazema hinted that the former officials, with invitation from prime minister Hailemariam Desalenge, offered advise on current situation of thecountry and on the way forward. Colonel Fesseha Desta, published autobigraphy entitled “Abyotuna Tiztaye” – could translate to my memory of the revolution, is said to have commended the government in terms of infrastructure development but advised the government to work on national unity.
No other current government official was in attendance during the discussion between Prime minister Hailemariam Desalegne and formerDerg officials, according to Wazema.

However, from the report, it is former Derg officials who lodged a request to meet with the current prime minster regarding their application for a plot of land in Addis Ababa for their “sew le sew” association. The prime minister responded positively within a short period of time and met with them. Fikreselassie Wogderes is, Wazema report added, said to be surprised with the positive response and well mannered reception from the prime minister’s office. Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegne pledgedto work on the matter in coordination with mayor of Addis Ababa City, Driba Kuma.

Prominent social media activist elected opposition leader inEthiopia

Hated as 'mercenary' by the people, the ruling party is waiting to strike itsrival dead

By Ethiomedia February 6, 2017

MEKELLE, Ethiopia - Abraha Desta, a prominent social media activist known for his powerful commentaries against the ruling party in Ethiopia,has been elected chairman of Arena, an opposition party based in this capital of Tigrai region.

TPLF, the dominant party in the ruling coalition EPRDF, which sees Arenaas its nemesis, is also based here in Mekelle.

Abraha was released in July last year from two years in prison, along three other prominent opposition leaders, Habtamu Ayalew and Daniel Shibeshi (UDJ/Andenet) and Yeshiwas Assefa of Semayawi Party. They were all accused of terrorism for allegedly having links with the outlawedArbegnoch Ginbot 7 (G7) rebel group.

They were all acquitted, though Abraha served one year and four monthsmore for 'contempt of court.'

Unlike other former political prisoners who postpone their return to active politcs (and no one blames them given the torture and suffering their boreas inmates), Abraha walked out of prison and right away dived into the sea of opposition politics - making it look like the two-year suffering in prison had little or no effect on him.

ARENA VS TPLF

Arena and TPLF are poles apart in their political programs. For instance take the never-ending issue of the Port of Assab. Arena, which is affiliatedto the larger Ethiopian opposition coalition Medrek, considers Assab as a legitimate part of Ethiopian sovereignty while TPLF is an unwavering defender of the port as a sovereign Eritrean territory. This issue alone exposes TPLF leaders as mercenaries who have masked themselves as "Woyane" (Tigrai) for their own hidden agenda.

Since its creation in 1975, it is possible to say TPLF has been the de facto ruler of the people of Tigrai. Headed by profoundly anti-Ethiopian mercenary elements like the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi and SebhatNega, TPLF was what was the Khmer Rouge of Cambodia - a mass murderer.

TPLF's numero uno mission was to secure the independence of Eritrea from what it called 'colonialist Ethiopia'. TPLF leaders made sure Tigrians were cut to size as 'foot soldiers.' Those who questioned the anti-Ethiopiamotive of TPLF leaders were wiped out of existence. Those Tigrians who witnessed the pogrom - like Seyoum Mesfin, Abay Tsehaye, Seeye Abraha, etc became more Catholic than the pope.

From bad to worse, TPLF made the toxic 'ethnic federalism' the govering policy of the country with the deliberate goal of disintegrating Ethiopia likethe former Soviet Union and Yugoslavia in the event that TPLF is evicted out of power.

Under ultra Eritrean nationalist mercenary leaders like Meles Zenawi, Berhane Gebrekristos, Tewodros

Hagos, etc, Ethiopia was doomed as thelargest landlocked country in the world.

In short, the impoverished people of Tigrai sees TPLF with fear butcontempt as a mercenary group.

If justice is to reign for a single day, and the people of Tigrai are given thechance to freely choose between TPLF and Arena in that one blessed day, there is no doubt Arena would win with a knockout. The fight will be between an indigenous Ethiopian Arena and a mercenary TPLF.

(Note: Some hateful opposition elements say there is no difference between TPLF and the people of Tigrai. Such individuals are not only wrong but also promote the goals of TPLF, and that is to get the people ofTigrai ostracized and hated by the Ethiopian people. In a recent public forum in Tigrai, many individuals vowed that their suffering is too much that they don't need to burn cars or vandalize buildings but devour TPLF officials).
Finally, one may ask one key question: If TPLF is as demonic as this reporter tried to portray, why did it allow Arena to hold congress and electnew leadership?

Well, TPLF has the policy of saying, "give the opposition a time to give birth to a new set of leaders. When the opposition party tries to get on itsfeet, then chop off its legs."

TPLF now knows ARENA has young leaders. When such leaders grow up and begin to win the hearts and minds of the people, then TPLF begins themass murder - its staple diet. Will the Ethiopian Arena mobilize Tigrai and destroy the mercenary TPLF? Time will tell - (Abraha Belai, Editor of Ethiomedia)

Egypt Accused of ‘Dirty Deal’ to Sabotage an Ethiopian Dam ProjectJanuary 6, 2017

This morning’s key headlines from GenerationalDynamics.com

- Egypt’s air force accused of bombing rebel targets inSouth Sudan
- Egypt accused of ‘dirty deal’ to sabotage an Ethiopian damproject

Egypt’s air force accused of bombing rebel targets in South SudanAnti-government rebels in South Sudan are accusing Egypt of conducting bombing raids on rebel targets. A statement publishedby the rebels accuses South Sudan’s president Salva Kiir of risking a regional war.
South Sudan is the world’s youngest nation, having gained independence from Sudan in 2011. The region’s last generationalcrisis war was an ethnic war mainly between two tribes, the Nuerand the Dinka.

That war climaxed with the “Bor Massacre,” whichbegan on November 15, 1991, killing tens of thousands of peopleand displacing hundreds of thousands of people over a three month period.
A new conflict began on December 15, 2013, led by the presidentSalva Kiir, of the Dinka tribe, fighting against forces led by vice president Riek Machar, of the Nuer tribe. Kiir and Machar signed apeace agreement in August 2015, but that did little good.
South Sudan is in a generational Awakening era, and this renewed war between the Dinkas and the Nuer would have fizzledout, except that both sides have been importing weapons, often using funds meant to fight poverty. The situation in South Sudan is similar to the war in Syria, which would have fizzled out long ago if it weren’t for massive military aid from Russia, Hezbollah and Iran.
The rebels are accusing Egypt of replicating the situation in Sudanby playing the part that Russia is playing in Syria, and bombing rebel targets on behalf of the government.
Egyptian foreign ministry spokesman Ahmed Abu Zeid denied thealleged air strikes, saying: “Egypt does not interfere in the internal affairs of other countries.” Reuters and South Sudan News Agency

Egypt accused of ‘dirty deal’ to sabotage an Ethiopian damproject
The statement by anti-government rebels accusing Egypt of bombing rebel targets in South Sudan says that Egypt and South Sudan are in a “dirty deal” between Egypt’s president Abdel Fattah al-Sisi and South Sudan’s president Salva Kiir, and that the deal involves involving weaponssales and sabotage of an Ethiopian dam project:

There is a dirty deal going between Kiir and El-Sisi. The issue of Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam is one of the main deals being finalized in Cairo. Our intelligence sources in Kampala and Juba confirmed that Egyptwants South Sudan and Uganda to be her regional allies so that she can advance its covert sabotage campaign against the Ethiopian Dam. The man [Kiir] is a double agent; he will cause many problems for the entire East Africa region.

The statement refers to a Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) project that Ethiopia has been trying to get built for years. Ethiopians seeas is a great national project and a means of overcoming poverty.

There is considerable opposition to the dam project in Egypt because it would affect the flow of water along the Nile river. Egypt depends on the Nile river to supply most of Egypt’s drinking war, to irrigate the Nile Delta,and to generate half of the country’s electricity through the operation of Egypt’s Aswan High Dam.
Egypt’s long-time dictator Hosni Mubarak was able to block developmentof the Ethiopian dam, but after the “Arab Awakening” in 2011, and the coup that overthrew him, Ethiopia began building the dam. It’s expectedto be completed in July. Egypt and Ethiopia have signed an agreement saying that Ethiopia guarantees that Egypt’s water supply will not be affected, but that hasn’t fully reassured many Egyptians.

The South Sudan rebel statement, if true, would indicate that Egypt’s al-Sisi and South Sudan’s Kiir covertly sabotaging the dam in a “dirty deal”that will keep Kiir in power. Egypt Independent and Al-Ahram
(Cairo) and Sudan Tribune

Trump presidency heralds new era of closer ties with Egypt

Fb Social media platform

(Reuters February 10, 2017) Friendly phone calls, an invite to the White House, a focus on Islamic militancy and what Donald Trump called "chemistry" have set the tone for a new era of warmer U.S.-Egyptian tiesthat could herald more military and political support for Cairo.

The mutual admiration dates back to a U.N. meeting in September, whenthen-presidential candidate Trump found common ground with President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi's hard line on extremism. Trump described the ex- general, who rights groups criticize as authoritarian and repressive, as a "fantastic guy". Sisi, the first foreign leader to congratulate Trump on his election victory,returned the favor last month after the newly inaugurated president barred citizens of seven Muslim-majority countries from entering the United States.

Egypt, not on the list, refrained from speaking out against the ban on behalf of Muslim countries that often look to it for leadership. That silencespoke volumes about the changing tone of its relationship with the UnitedStates.

For Trump, Sisi appeals as an uncompromising leader who came to powerby overthrowing the Muslim Brotherhood and is fighting Islamic State in northern Sinai and on his border with Libya.

For Sisi, Trump appeals as a U.S. leader who unlike Barack Obama is notinterested in berating an old ally on human rights. "The rhetoric alone ofthis Trump administration is much more forward leaning in its support towards Sisi than Obama," said one U.S. official, who declined to be named. "I expect it to be a much closer relationship."
Egypt is one of Washington's closest Middle East allies, and U.S. militaryaid has long cemented its historic 1979 peace deal with Israel. Home to the Suez Canal, one of the world's busiest waterways, the stability of theArab world's most populous state is a U.S. priority, but the strategic relationship hit a low under Obama who briefly froze aid after Sisi overthrew an elected president.
In contrast, weeks into Trump's presidency, the White House has alreadydiscussed declaring the Brotherhood a terrorist group - sure to be welcomed by Sisi, who was condemned by Obama for his crackdown on Egypt's oldest Islamist group.

Egyptian and U.S. officials say the Trump administration will likely seek tolift or ease conditions imposed under Obama on the payment of $1.3 billion in U.S. military aid a year.

Officials and analysts do not expect a major jump in the size of U.S. military aid overnight, but describe a relationship that is more aligned andmutually supportive. "During the Obama's administration there were difficulties," said an Egyptian government official, who declined to be named.

"When the administrations have common goals it makes cooperationeasier. The military is the backbone of the relationship. We have a common enemy, which is terrorism."

Obama froze aid for nearly two years after Sisi overthrew President Mohamed Mursi, an elected Brotherhood official, in mid-2013 after massprotests.

Though Sisi went on to win an election and the aid was restored in March2015, new rules were introduced to ensure it was used for counter- terrorism and border security and Sinai.

Congress also made aid dependent on the U.S. Secretary of Statecertifying that Egypt was moving to govern democratically.

That experience has left a bitter taste among some in Egypt's military whosaw their overthrow of the Brotherhood as part of the broader war on terrorism. "What interests Egypt now is economic and military aid and thisis what Egypt will try to benefit from in light of the closeness between Sisiand Trump," an Egyptian intelligence official said. "In return, America is seeking to benefit from Egypt as an ally in the Middle East and the fight against terrorism."

The Egyptian government official said the overall size of the aid package had barely changed in decades, but it would weigh any request for increases carefully. What Egypt gets depends partly on Congress, where some oppose loosening restrictions due to concerns over Sisi's crackdownon dissent.

"(The administration) could ask Congress to no longer impose conditions on the funds and they could request increases in certain types of assistance," said Tim Rieser, a foreign policy aid to Senator Patrick Leahy,the Democratic vice chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

"But President Trump's positive statements offer President Sisi a kind ofaffirmation and encouragement to continue what he is doing, which in some ways is worth more than dollars."

NEW ERA

Egypt has witnessed years of upheaval since the 2011 uprising helped toend Hosni Mubarak's 30-year rule, a change ultimately supported by theObama administration.

When the ensuing elections saw Islamists win parliament and presidency,Obama engaged them in an effort to encourage democratization in the aftermath of the Arab Spring uprisings.

But Egypt banned the Muslim Brotherhood as a terrorist organization shortly after Sisi seized power. His security forces killed hundreds of Mursisupporters and thousands of activists have been jailed, prompting criticism from the United States and the aid suspension. By contrast,Trump has backed Egypt's approach.

"The (Trump) administration has signaled repeatedly that it sees the Muslim Brotherhood as virtually indistinguishable from groups like al Qaeda or even Islamic State," said Eric Trager, a fellow at The WashingtonInstitute for Near East Policy. "This is something Cairo is very excited about and Arab partners favor as well."

On the street, Trump's victory was met with delight by Sisi supporters, who saw in Hillary Clinton an extension of Obama. The early invitation tothe White House is seen by Egyptian officials as a sign they will again beheard.

But while Egyptian officials like Trump's more aggressive approach to Islamic State they say they have yet to see detailed policies. "The warmthof the rhetoric is definitely something that's different, that makes the Egyptians feel very comfortable," said H.A. Hellyer senior non-resident fellow at the Atlantic Council in Washington. "But nobody likes an unpredictable, erratic, variable in the mix and Trump is a very erratic variable." Ethiopia: Peaceful protests turning into fully-fledged armeduprising

ESAT News (February 17, 2017)

The peaceful protests that began in November 2015 have now changedinto “fully-fledged armed uprising in Ethiopia,” says the head of a UK charity that works on social change and human rights.

“Angered and exasperated by the government’s intransigence and duplicity, small guerrilla groups made up of local armed people have formed in Amhara and elsewhere, and are conducting hit and run attacks on security forces,” writes Graham Peebles, director of the Create Trust, inan article published in Dissent Voice, a radical newsletter that focuses on the struggle for peace and social justice.

“What began as a regional protest movement in November 2015, is in danger of becoming a fully-fledged armed uprising in Ethiopia,” he beginsin hi article titled “Ethiopia: Peaceful Protest to Armed Uprising.” Peebles quoting media and other sources including ESAT documents the armed attacks against the regime by armed groups in various parts of thecountry and warns “this unprecedented uprising may be held at bay for a time, restrained by force and unjust legislation, but people rightly sense this is the moment for change; they will no longer cower and be silencedfor too much has been sacrificed by too many."

He further writes that there is no independent media in the country and the few available outside the country, including ESAT, have been declaredterrorists by the regime.

"There is no independent media – it is all state owned or controlled, as isaccess to the Internet; journalists who express any criticism of the rulingregime are routinely arrested, and the only truly autonomous media group, ESAT is now classed as a terrorist organization."

Peebles writes extensively on Ethiopia and injustices across the globe. Hisrecent video documentary titled "Ogaden: Ethiopia's hidden shame," exposed the atrocities committed by the regime in the Ogaden region, particularly the sexual assault and abuse against women in ogaden committed by forces of the brutal regime.

Richard Pankhurst dies, Ethiopia mourns

By Reuters February 17, 2017

Richard Pankhurst, the son of the British women's rights campaignerSylvia Pankhurst who became one of the world's leading experts on Ethiopian history and culture, has died aged 89.

He first came into contact with Ethiopia through his mother, a 'suffragette'who also campaigned against the invasion of the Horn of Africa nation by Benito Mussolini's fascist Italian troops in 1935.

He moved to Addis Ababa with her after World War Two and started teaching at Addis Ababa University, going on to write more than 20 booksand thousands of articles.
He also inherited an activist streak from his mother and his grandmother,Emmeline Pankhurst, founder of the suffragette movement, which helpedsecure the right for British women to vote.
Richard campaigned with his wife Rita for the return of piles of plundertaken from Ethiopia by invading British troops in 1868, and of a giant obelisk taken from the ancient city of Axum by Mussolini's forces. Bothwere there in Axum to watch as Italy returned the obelisk in 2005.
The British Embassy said Pankhurst had died on Thursday, Ethiopia's Foreign Ministry called him a "doyen of historians and scholarsof Ethiopia".

"Pankhurst was one of Ethiopia's greatest friends during his long and productive life, and his scholarship and understanding for Ethiopia will besorely missed," it said in a statement.

Author and photographer Maaza Mengiste told BBC Africa: "I've discovered things about my country, just sometimes stumbling upon something that he's written ... a whole other window opens for me on howI understand my own history."

One Ethiopian, Wondwosen Gelan, tweeted simply: "He was our historyarchive. We miss him so much."

HISTORICIZE

Turkey restoring tomb of Ethiopian King Najashi, who sheltered the First Muslim emigrants, the journey is known as the first hijra.

DAILY SABAH AFRICA February 22, 2017

The Turkish Cooperation and Coordination Agency (TIKA) is finishing up arestoration project on the tomb of King Najashi, the former leader of modern day Ethiopia's Kingdom of Aksum.

TIKA coordinator in Ethiopia's capital Addis Ababa, Fazıl Akın Erdoğan, toldreporters that the restoration project on a mosque and tomb located 800 kilometers from the capital would wrap up this year.

In addition to the restorations, Erdoğan explained that additional buildingswere being constructed in the area, "We made a full-fledged food court toserve the needs of the guests and visitors. Besides the kitchen, we built amulti-purpose hall that can fit 500 people," he said.

The restoration team also met the water needs of the tomb area bybuilding 160 ton water depots in two different places.

Noting that the project had been ongoing for three years, Erdoğan saidthat Ottoman architectural examples were evident in the marble, door,and window details of the mosque and tomb.

Erdoğan emphasized that Turkey had made various negotiations with Ethiopia's Religious Services Consultancy and that they would like KingNajashi's tomb to be added to the route of pilgrimage and umrah organizations in Turkey. If this happens, he said, the tomb would be a huge contribution to the tourism industry in Ethiopia.

Imam Mohammad Ibrahim of the Najashi Mosque explained that, beforethe renovation works, the mosque was not in a good condition, but thateverything had changed with the restoration effort.

The imam also stated that he always prayed for Turkey and Turkish people saying, "Turkey is not only helping us, it is helping all Muslims."

Getachew Berhe, an Ethiopian engineer who has worked on the project and speaks Turkish fluently, explained that after studying civil engineeringin Turkey, he returned to his country and began working on the restoration efforts.

Bearing in mind that the project is very significant for both Muslims andEthiopians, Berhe said, "I am very pleased to have contributed to this work."

King Najashi, also known as Armah, was the ruler of the Kingdom of Aksum from 614-631. The Empire was a trading nation situated in modern-day Eritrea and Ethopia, existing from approximately 100-940 AD.

King Najashi gave shelter to early Muslims from Mecca who were seekingrefuge from Quraysh persecution by traveling to Aksum, which was at time a Christian Kingdom. In Islamic history, the journey is known as thefirst hijra.

THE BATTLE OF ADWA: Menelik II & The Annihilated Italian Forces

In March, 1896, Ethiopian forces under the leadership of Emperor MenelikII surprised the world by defeating an Italian Army sent to conquer the Empire. In the following article Raymond Jonas, the Giovanni and Amne Costigan Professor of History at the University of Washington, explores that victory at Adwa. His article is drawn from his recent book, The Battleof Adwa: African Victory in the Age of Empire.

The battle of Adwa of 1 March 1896 was a stunning victory for Ethiopia but a rout and a disaster for Italy. Adwa – the story of Africans seeing to their own freedom – played out against a background of almost unrelenting European expansion into Africa. The success of Ethiopia's forces assured that Ethiopia would be the only African country successfullyto resist European colonization before 1914. It also resonated powerfully in post-Emancipation America where hierarchies of race and ethnicity wereonly beginning a process of challenge and renegotiation.

Italian interest in East Africa dates from 1869, when the opening of the Suez Canal transformed the commercial and strategic significance of the Red Sea coast. An official Italian presence didn't begin until they established themselves at the Red Sea port of Massawa in 1885, after which the Italians began to move up into what are now the Eritrean highlands. Ethiopian commanders sought to halt the Italian advance, with some notable successes, but the Italians artfully played on rivalries amongEthiopian leaders. By 1890, the Italians had secured control over a significant territory west and south of Massawa; they announced the creation of the colony of Eritrea, with a capital at Asmara.

The Italians continued to push westward, into the Sudan, and southward,toward the northern Ethiopian province of Tigray. In late 1894 Ras Mangasha, the ruler of Tigray, used the pretext of war against the Dervishes to mobilize forces to resist Italian incursions. In a series of victories in early 1895, the Italians defeated Mangasha's forces. They pursued Mangasha deep into northern Ethiopia, establishing fortified positions in Tigray and Agamay provinces - vastly expanding the territoryunder Italian control.

The population of Tigray and Agamay appeared, for a time, to accept Italian rule. Back in Rome, the Italian commander Oreste Baratieri wasfeted as an Italian hero.

In September of 1895, Menelik, king of Ethiopia, called the population of Ethiopia to arms. He began to lead a massive force of some 100,000 mennorthward toward the Italian-occupied territories. Through late 1895 and into the early months of 1896, Menelik led a brilliant campaign that forcedthe overextended Italians to fight on his terms. By threatening to outflankthe Italian forces and threaten Eritrea, Menelik maneuvered the Italians into a position that left their supply lines exposed, vulnerable to a population that was now turning against the occupiers.

General Baratieri was reluctant to attack Menelik's army in the open field.Recognizing that he had been outmaneuvered, he believed that tactical retreat was his best option. Some of Baratieri's officers argued forcefully against retreat, citing spy reports to the effect that Menelik's forces were demoralized and depleted. Baratieri agreed to a plan that called for his army of some 15,000 to advance under cover of night and occupy forwardpositions, a move that would have forced Menelik to lose face if he declined to attack Italian forces holding strong defensive positions.

The advance took place at night on the 29th of February. By dawn, the Italians were to have been securely established in the Ethiopian passes, inviting attack. Instead, one Italian brigade overshot its rendezvous pointand virtually marched into the Ethiopian camp. A second Italian brigade sent to cover the retreat of the first got caught up in a separate engagement. Menelik's forces were able to defeat these brigades and themain Italian force in three separate combats. By the afternoon of 1 March1896, Italian forces were in a desperate, panicked retreat back toward Eritrea.

Victory at Adwa sealed the unification of Ethiopia. Europeans and European-Americans interpreted the story of Adwa in different ways. Forsome, it was an opportunity to discredit Italy militarily. For others, it wasimportant to advance the view that the Ethiopians were not black, thus explaining away the significance of white and European defeat.

Ethiopian victory assured Ethiopia's status as a beacon throughout theAfrican Diaspora.

Battle of Adwa: The Nationalist Army uses Envelopment, FrontalAttack to Annihilate Italian Forces

February 27, 2017 by Fetsum Berhane

On 1 March 1896, in the vicinity of the Ethiopian town of Adwa, a localarmy led by Emperor Emmeye Menelik, also known as Menelik II, cut acolonialist Italian army to pieces.

Historians consider the Battle of Adwa, culmination point of the Italo- Ethiopian War (1895-1896), to be one of the most important events in theworld. In fact, it was the first victory of an African nation against a European counterpart since Hannibal's successful battles against Rome during the Second Punic War 2,200 years ago. In the introduction to their book The Battle of Adwa, Reflections on Ethiopia's History against European Colonialism, editors Paulos Milkias and Getachew Metaferia wrote, "Adwa holds a significant place in Africa's history … it challenges the demeaning Western conception of African cultures; it demonstrates that being targeted for colonization is not a prelude to fatality and that colonialism can be defeated…"

Beyond those historical, sociological, and geostrategic considerations lies adeep tactical lesson. Conducting a spoiling attack, the Tigrayan army made successful use of two forms of maneuver – envelopment and frontalattack — to annihilate an Italian brigade led by MG Matteo Albertone.

A look into the genesis of the Italo- Ethiopian War allows the assertion that the roots of the Battle of Adwa lie, at least, down to the triangular relations between Emperor Yohannes IV of Ethiopia, who was politically based in Tigray; King Menelik II of Showa, who was known for being ambitious and ingenious; and the Italian government, which wanted to colonize Ethiopia. During the second half of the 19th century, the Horn ofAfrica experienced a period of turmoil punctuated by significant events including internal and external battles, alliances and betrayals, friendshiptreaties and commerce treaties.

Before and during this period, European nations like Germany, France,Great Britain, and newcomer Italy were eagerly willing to carve their empires throughout the African continent. This feverish imperialist obstinacy also known as the "Scramble for Africa" reached its climax at the Berlin Conference (1884-1885). It was obvious that the Horn of Africaand the adjacent Suez Canal — opened in 1869 — constituted a great strategic interest, and it logically triggered the European imperialist nations' desires. Guided only by the principle of divide et impera (divide and conquer), they established contacts and relationships with many localchiefs and kings through a multitude of treaties. The main consequences of these Machiavellian politics, chiefly based on the provision of armamentto their local — temporary or long-term — allies were the modernized weapons proliferation and the constant destabilization of the Ethiopian empire.

One of the major treaties that set the guns fi ring of the Italo-Ethiopian War was the Treaty of Wuchale (or "Uccialli" as the Italians spelled it); itsprimary goal was to secure Italian possessions in eastern Africa (Erytrea).Concluded on 2 May 1889 by the intermediary of Count Pietro Antonielli, in his dual role of official envoy of the Italian government and close friendof Emperor Menelik II, the "Italy-Ethiopia Treaty of Friendship and Commerce of Wuchale" had been established in a dual language — Amharic and Italian — version. Owing to the light linguistic discrepancy induced by or due to simple diplomatic chicaneries, this agreement failed to be read "like a typical non-capitulationist international document willingly entered into by two sovereign polities mutually seeking to normalize and enhance positive relations for present and future generations and regimes," according to Ayele Negussay's chapter "Adwa 1896: Who Was Civilized and Who Was Savage" that appeared in The Battle of Adwa.

The main dispute rose over the interpretation of one of the treaty's articles, which stated that the Ethiopian king would involve the Italian government in matters dealing with other powers or governments. As the months went by, the Italians read the article as Ethiopia being their "protectorate" and notifi ed the other European powers. Menelik II refusedpoint blank to admit to any kind of subjugation. He argued that his agreement to use the Italian government as a middleman was supposed to be if he so desired and not that he would be obligated to do so. This contradiction was the proximate cause of the Italo-Ethiopian War. During 1895 and 1896, the conflict moved from skirmishes to bloody battles (Amba Alagie, Mekelle), interspersed by many attempts to settle the dispute, and finally reached its culmination point at the Battle of Adwa.

On 29 February 1896, after failing to lure the Ethiopian forces to attack his entrenched positions around Mount Enticho in Tigray (the Ethiopians' most probable course of action), LTG Oreste Baratieri gave orders to his 20,000 Italian and native troops to conduct what was supposed to be a surprise attack on the Ethiopian troops massed in the vicinity of Adwa. Forthis mission, Baratieri's troops were arrayed in four brigades, each commanded by an Italian army general. With a fighting power of 17,700 effective fighters, the Italians had 14,519 rifl es, 56 artillery guns, and nocavalry, according to George Fitz-Hardinge Berkeley in his book The Campaign of Adowa and the Rise of Menelik. In the center of their disposition was MG Guiseppe Arimondi occupying Mount Belah; and at hisrear, at Rehbi-Ariani, was the reserve brigade, commanded by MG Guiseppe Ellena. MG Vittorio Dabormida, with his brigade, was occupyingthe spur of Mount Belah at the right of the mount itself. MG Matteo Albertone had to move and occupy the left flank of the Italian front by arraying his brigade on the mountains of Kidane Meret.

This last brigade,equipped with three and a half batteries of mountain artillery (14 guns), was made of four native battalions plus the irregulars of Okule-Kusai andGheralta, for a total of 4,092 soldiers, wrote Berkeley.
In an impressive display of national unity, a 100,000-strong army composed of contingents from almost every region and ethnic group of the Ethiopian empire was eagerly awaiting the Italians. Faced with the Italian plan, the Ethiopian imperial army had a coherent organization — notwithstanding the sarcastic opinion of British historian Berkeley who described it as a "feudal army, with hardly an attempt at modern organization … the arms in the hands of the Ethiopians were modern, but the organization was, in many respects, very similar to that of the Englishat the Battle of Agincourt …"

In their defensive positions, "the Ethiopian formation near Adwa resembled a cross to enable it to respond in the same manner no matter from which side the enemy's attack came," according to Milkias in his chapter, "The Battle of Adwa: The Historic Victory of Ethiopia over European Colonialism." The fighters, arrayed in a defensive position, wereequipped with 40 cannons, 70,000 rifl es (ranging from Remingtons to Martini-Henrys, Fusil Gras, Berdans, Mausers, Lebels, and Vetterlis), as well as spears and swords. Emperor Emmeye Menelik and his 35,000- strong imperial bodyguard and Empress Taytu with her 5,000 combatantswere encamped at the monastery of Fremona in the center of the imperialarmy disposition. The Ethiopian main body was arrayed from the south ofthe Sheloda Massive (also known as Mount Selado) to the Mariam Massive.

When combined, the Tigrayan army numbered around 15,000 fighters, ledby the charismatic and great nationalist Ras Alula. This is the enemy Albertone's brigade was recklessly and blindly moving up to in his attemptto reach his assigned position, according to Berkeley.

By dawn on 1 March, at the end of the three columns' approach toward the Ethiopian defensive positions, the Negus Negasti army conducted a spoiling attack which caught the Italians off guard. The Tigrayan army engaged the forward element of Albertone's brigade from the heights of Mariam Massive at 6 a.m. In Reaction to this contact, the Italians' artilleryfi red on the Ethiopian formations, which were massed within the cannons' range. This caused many casualties. The Ethiopian troops scattered and attacked in smaller formations. Using their traditional half-moon formation, Ras Alula's and Ras Mengesha's infantries pressed the leadingItalian forces while the two wings, supported by Ras Mikael's Wallo cavalry, achieved an envelopment of the opponents. The first battalion ofAlbertone's brigade was quickly surrounded and destroyed. Some Ethiopians, led by Dejazmach Balcha Abba Nefso, the hero of Adwa, deployed their quick firing guns on the lower side of Mount Abba Gerima,setting an effective support by fi re. This allowed Ras Alula and Ras Mengesha's Tigrayan fighters to finish crushing the remainder of Albertone's brigade by swift movements associated with a deluge of riflesfi ring, spears hurling, swords swirling, and hand-to- hand combat. They captured 14 artillery guns and destroyed the three other battalions. The annihilation of Albertone's brigade was complete.

In an attempt to assist his endangered left wing, Baratieri ordered his right wing to move up and link up with Albertone. After maneuvering for hours and despite one of Arimondi's battalions offering him an effective support by fi re, Dabormida was unable to meet his commander's expectations due to the mass of Ethiopian forces isolating Albertone's brigade. As soon as the Italian's right flank was destroyed, the Ethiopian troops oriented their efforts toward the main body. They then decisively engaged Arimondi's brigade and successfully seized objectives in the rear of Ellena's reserve brigade. In fact, the Ethiopian army's intent was to sealoff the whole Italian army and prevent it from withdrawing to Enticho, Adigrat, and Akele Guzay. One by one, all of the Italian brigades were destroyed; Dabormida's brigade was the last to face the "furia ethiopiana." Around 6 p.m., only the remnants of the four Italian brigadessucceeded in withdrawing from the battlefield in a manner far from being orderly. Just before the Ethiopian forces declared victory, Baratieri fled thebattlefield. The commander of the Italian army was later brought to trial by the Italian government "… for having abandoned his command from 12:30 p.m. on 1 March until 9 a.m. on 3 March (i.e. during the retreat) and having thus omitted to give orders, or take measures, such as the circumstances required," according to Berkeley.

There are many historical accounts of the battle's toll. According to two ofthe most reliable, around 6,500 Italians soldiers were killed or wounded and 2,500 taken prisoner for the first, and 7,560 were killed or wounded and 1,865 taken prisoner for the second. Meanwhile, the Ethiopians suffered almost 7,000 killed and 10,000 wounded. As a result of this bloody battle, Italy recognized the independence of Ethiopia and revised her East Africa extension plans.

A close look at the role played by the Tigrayan component of the Ethiopianarmy gives a clear insight to how the Ethiopians used the two forms of maneuver — envelopment and frontal attack — to destroy Albertone's brigade. As a reminder, the Ethiopian offensive was, overall, a typical spoiling attack. According to the FM 3-0, Operations, offensive operationsare conducted to defeat and destroy enemy forces and seize terrain. Theycan be launched from defensive positions. There are four types of offensive operations: movement to contact, attack, pursuit, and exploitation. An attack — hasty or deliberate — can have a special purpose; the six doctrinal special purpose attacks are: ambush, spoiling attack, counterattack, raid, feint, and demonstration. FM 1-02, Operational Terms and Graphics, defines "spoiling attack" as "a tactical maneuver employed to seriously impair a hostile attack while the enemy is in the process of forming or assembling for an attack." This clearly validates the spoiling nature of the attack launched by the Ethiopian armyon a poorly deployed enemy in the early hours of 1 March 1896, with the Tigrayan army being the first to engage the Italians.

Many accounts established the decided doctrinal inclination of the Ethiopian imperial army towards a specific form of pincer movement; theycalled it afena and achieved it from a half-moon formation during their offensive operations. According to Milkias, "When they encounter a battalion or large body of an invading Army, they employed afena, the poor man's blitzkrieg. In afena, the Ethiopian fighters surrounded the enemy and advanced towards the center, using whatever cover was available for them. Encirclement was conducted with Fitawrari's troops dividing into two and making a detour around the flanks of the invaders.
The army would then go to direct attack from every side …"

There are five doctrinal forms of maneuver: turning movement, penetration, infiltration, envelopment and frontal attack. Only the two latter apply to this case study. The term "envelopment" is defined as "a form of maneuver in which an attacking force seeks to avoid the principal enemy defenses by seizing objectives to the enemy rear to destroy the enemy in its current positions. At the tactical level, envelopments focus onseizing terrain, destroying specific enemy forces, and interdicting enemy withdrawal routes" (FM 1-02). By using afena, the Tigrayan Army and the supportive Ethiopian forces succeeded in destroying each and every battalion of Albertone's brigade. The lateral movement of Ras Alula's and Ras Mengesha's fighters associated with a withdrawal denial establishes a strong and obvious link between the Ethiopian afena and a classic and doctrinal envelopment. The slight discrepancy is that the afena commanded to use a divertive force in the central portion of the half- moon formation instead of "avoiding the principal enemy defenses."

This diversion was critical to allowing the lateral elements, mainly the cavalry, to slide, encircle the enemy, and crush his flanks; and in fact, thisassociated maneuver, in light of modern war theory, is a frontal attack. Asstated in the FM 3-90, Tactics, "a frontal attack is a form of maneuver in which an attacking force seeks to destroy a weaker enemy force or fi x a larger enemy force in place over a broad front." Given the ratio of forces — more than 15,000 Ethiopians versus 4,092 Italians — the Tigrayan army used its overwhelming combat power to strike directly his weaker enemy in his positions, prior to the envelopment achievement. All in all, the Ethiopian's form of maneuver called afena, a variant of pincer movement, was effective and decisive in the overwhelming and glorious victory achieved by Emperor Menelik II and his Ethiopian troops at the Battle of Adwa. By applying this subtle combination of two forms of maneuver — envelopment and frontal attack — the Tigrayan army led by Ras Alula annihilated Albertone's brigade and called for further destructionof the Italian army. This resounding success propelled the Ethiopian empire into the league of independent nations and later served as a compass for many ant colonialists and pan-Africanists in the quest of theiridentity.

Capital Flows Contributor: Ethiopia's Cruel Con Game

OPINION/ Foreign Affairs by David SteinmanMar 3, 2017 @ 11:39 AM

In what could be an important test of the Trump Administration’s attitudetoward foreign aid, the new United Nations Secretary-General, António Guterres, and UN aid chief Stephen O'Brien have called on the international community to give the Ethiopian government another $948 million to assist a reported 5.6 million people facing starvation.

Speaking in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, during the recent 28th Summit of the African Union, Guterres described Ethiopia as a “pillar of stability” in the tumultuous Horn of Africa, praised its government for aneffective response to last year's climate change-induced drought that leftnearly 20 million people needing food assistance, and asked the world toshow “total solidarity” with the regime.

Ethiopia is aflame with rebellions against its unpopular dictatorship, whichtried to cover up the extent of last year’s famine. But even if the secretarygeneral’s encouraging narrative were true, it still begs the question: Why, despite ever-increasing amounts of foreign support, can’t this nation of 100 million clever, enterprising people feed itself? Other resource-poor countries facing difficult environmental challenges manage to do so.

Two numbers tell the story in a nutshell:

1. The amount of American financial aid received by Ethiopia’sgovernment since it took power: $30 billion.
2. The amount stolen by Ethiopia’s leaders since it took power: $30 billion.

Mr. Steinman advises foreign democracy movements. He authored thenovel “Money, Blood and Conscience” about Ethiopia’s secret genocide.

Ethiopia commemorates defeat of Italian forces at 1896 'Battle ofAdwa' By AfricaNews March 3, 2017

Ethiopians witnessed a colourful event to mark the country's victory against Italian forces in a battle that was fought over 120 years ago.

The 'Battle of Adwa' was fought on March 1, 1896, near the northern townof Adwa. The Ethiopian forces prevailed over the Italians in a victory that President Mulatu Teshome says taught the country lessons of cooperation and mutual respect.

''Our ancestors have made huge sacrifices to safeguard the sovereignty ofthe country and pass it on to existing generations,'' the President is quoted to have said during an event in the capital, Addis Ababa.

The battle according to him was a victory for all black people. He taskedyoung Ethiopians to involve themselves in the development of the country.

"It is my strong conviction that a generation that remembers the historyof its forefathers can also make its own history. In order to pass this history on to the next generation we have to build a war museum and a pan African University.

"Although a foundation stone for this project has already been laid, it has never materialized due to various reasons. Now, the Ministry of Tourism is taking on full responsibility and is establishing a secretariat office so that this can be realized soon and make Adwa a tourist destination," he added.

The event saw marches by members of the Ethiopian security forces anddisplays by veteran soldiers who showed up with weapons and displayedartistry. They were all draped in the colours of the country.

Also present at the event was the Deputy Prime Minister, Demeke Mekonnen and the Mayor of the Addis Ababa, Diriba Kuma. A ceremonialevent launch was held by President and Speaker of the legislature aimedat raising funds for the completion of the Great Ethiopia Rennaissance Dam (GERD) project.

About the Battle of Adwa
Thousands gathered in the country’s Northern town to mark 121 yearssince repelling the Italians.

In the age of relentless European expansion into Africa, Ethiopia, led byEmperor Menelik II, defeated one of Europe’s major powers.

Italy had taken control of the impoverished territories of Eritrea and Somaliland and wanted to further advance its imperial ambitions by takingover adjoining Ethiopia.

Adwa is a market town and separate district in northern Ethiopia specifically in the Tigray region. It is best known as the community closestto the decisive Battle of Adwa fought in 1896 with Italian troops.

Empress Taytu Betul (c.1851-1918) & The Battle of Adwa

The Bad Cop Empress of EthiopiaIf you know anything about Africa's interactions with Europeans in the 1800s, you know that things didn't go great for the Africans. Time and time again, a European "ally" nation would just happen to witness some malady befall one of their new Africanbuddies. As a good neighbor, the Europeans would then prescribe their traditional folk remedy: military invasion. And so, time and time again, African armies would go up against European ones and lose.

But not in Ethiopia.

When its "ally" Italy began invading, Ethiopia defeated them in battle, andin so doing, made Italy collectively lose its mind. And this crushing victory? Due in large part to the foresight, skepticism, and unrelenting sass of one of the toughest women in Ethiopian history: Empress Taytu Betul.

Here Comes the Sun

From the get-go, Taytu (Amharic for "sun") was an odd choice for empress. As one of the Oromo people — a historically-downtrodden ethnicgroup in Ethiopia1 — Taytu was subjected to female genital mutilation before she was even three months old. This left her unable to bear children2, one of the main expectations of any female royal. Moreover, before marrying emperor Menilek II3, she'd had four husbands4 and was over thirty years old (an eternity in Ethiopian marital terms).

But they were a good match. Not only did her lineage give his reign legitimacy (she was linked to the Solomonic dynasties5, a fact that overrode any concerns over her Oromo heritage), but she made him a more serious ruler by curtailing his womanizing ways6. A popular song ofthe time played off Taytu's name and that of Menilek's hated mistress, saying "the sun [Taytu] has dissipated the fog [the mistress]." With Taytu's help, Menilek gradually united the warring factions of Ethiopia under one banner.

The two settled into a well-polished good cop/bad cop routine. Menilek II would regularly straggle and avoid taking unpopular stances by saying "Ishi, nega," (yes, tomorrow), while Taytu would decisively say "Imbi" (absolutely not). She became a savvy adviser to his every political move,interrupting negotiations "often in a decisive and resolutely hostile way." She was one of the first to realize Italy's intentions to make Ethiopia its thrall7, and bluntly called Italy out on it: “You want other countries to see Ethiopia as your protege, but that will never be.”

By the time Italian-Ethiopian relations broke down in 1891, Italian diplomats came to describe Menilek as “weak, uncertain, and in the handsof his wife.” Which is to say, good hands.

“Victory is ours!”

After multiple attempts to sue for peace, Menilek and Taytu settled in to repel Italy’s immiment invasion. Taytu joined her husband on the front lines, traveling around with a personal force of 5,000 soldiers who, underher taskmaster guidance, “kept perfect order.” Witnessing the professionalism of her troops, a European observer wrote that Taytu “is agreat lady, who perhaps in another milieu would have been a Christina ofSweden or a Catherine the Great.”

(White person code for “if she wasn’t black.”)

Taytu’s shining moment in the war came with the 1896 Siege of Mek’ele.Here, the Italians were holed up in a fortress, where they easily repelledEthiopian assaults. Taytu took 900 of her men aside and instructed themto cut off the fort’s water supply8. They did so, and after 10 days of increasingly horrific suffering, the Italians surrendered.

A month later, the war ended with the Battle of Adwa, where Italy suffered a humiliating defeat at the hands of a united Ethopia. In multiple(likely exaggerated) histories of the battle, Taytu strode into the fighting herself. After seeing her soldiers beginning to lose heart, she dismounted,removed her veil, and yelled, “Courage! Victory is ours! Strike!” Some tellings even have the middle-aged woman armed to the teeth and plunging headlong into the fray. Which provided much fodder for earlier drafts of the above illustration.

After the Italian defeat, the European nations, shocked at the Ethiopian victory, began negotiating in good faith — often with Taytu herself. The Italians, when negotiating for the release of their prisoners of war, specifically asked to speak to Taytu9. The Italian accounts of the time showed a country as divided as the United States after the Vietnam War, with some clamoring for revenge and others questioning why they’d even gone there in the first place. The Italian press took very polar stances on Taytu herself. While some compared her to Zenobia, Cleopatra, and Joan of Arc, others spun up hoary tales of how she bathed in blood10, gossipedabout her earlier marriages and purported side lovers, and began calling her a modern-day Jezebel.

To be fair, she was a divisive figure even among her people. On the one hand, she was capable of great mercy and societal progress: she personally cooked for prisoners and starving countrymen, inaugurated theEthiopian Red Cross, founded the new capitol of Addis Ababa, and workedto kickstart many national industries, including wine production, candle- making, and more. In the words of one observer, she "applied herself notonly to feminine works, but like quicksilver attended to perplexing business usually done by men, and succeeded at it."

On the other hand, she could be a brutal politician and ruler. She filled thegovernment with nepotistic political appointments in order to solidify her political base, especially as Menilek's health declined. She was linked to a staggering number of poisonings11, she persecuted those who spread foreign religions, and she was rude to the point of xenophobic with European envoys – although, given Ethiopia's history with Italy, that last point is a bit more understandable.
Also, in the accounts of many Europeans, she grew fat. Not that it hadanything to do with anything — but they felt the need to mention it. Atlength. Repeatedly.
When Menilek's health took a plunge, Taytu became de facto ruler for a couple years12 — and it took the a massive conspiracy on the parts of much of the Ethiopian elite to oust her from power. When Menilek finallydied, Taytu stepped down and lived a fairly quiet life until her death.

Her reputation lived on long past her death – both in Ethiopia, where shebecame a national heroine, and in Italy, where she was, for a time at least, the linguistic gold standard for a lofty woman. The once-popular phrase "Chi si crede di essere, la regina Taitù?" translates to "Who does she think she is? Empress Taytu?"

Ethiopians engage in the exportation of Injera

Dibie Ike Michael with ReutersMarch 3, 2017

When the Tessema family started their business making injera – a staplein Ethiopia, their target market was residents who lived near the factory,but 15 years later the bakery has a growing market of clients abroad.
Mama fresh specializes in packaging various Ethiopian dishes, including chicken sauce and spices, but the Injera remains one of its fastest movingproducts. Injera is a fermented spongy bread made from teff, a cereal that looks like wheat and has a sour taste. It is baked on a clay plate and is largely consumed in Ethiopia and Eritrea. So at the beginning, it was 95percent for diaspora. Nowadays we are reaching 20 percent for the international market and 80 percent for the diaspora.

Teff is even being referred to as a ‘superfood’ for its nutritional values andis in high demand in health-food shops and stores in the west. The founder and general manager at Mama Fresh, Hailu Tessema, said from 2014 until now they have been looking for the international business.

“So at the beginning, it was 95 percent for diaspora. Nowadays we are reaching 20 percent for the international market and 80 percent for thediaspora,” he said.

Injera has a rich, cultural heritage and is often served with vegetables ormeat dishes topped with goat cheese. The bakery supplies major hotel chains in the country, including the Hinton and Sheraton hotels.

“I think the fact that injera is becoming a global food is a good thing. Thereason is, for one it promotes the country positively and secondly, small-scale farmers are going to benefit a lot in terms of employment,” Addis resident, Man Fikreselam Kassahun said.
Mama Fresh produces 6,000 injera pieces per day for export to various countries including the United States, Sweden and Norway. The company employs about 100 workers at its factory to meet demand for its products.About 2,000 pieces of injera are also sold locally every day.

Last year, the shop made about 1.5 million U.S. dollars in profits, this yearthey are looking to increase that to 2 million dollars. “We are working manually, so when we can get automatic machine we shall make 20 to 30,000 Injera. But our problem is to mechanize it, modern system of baking injera. We need the machine for the future to increase its capacity,the machine is important for us,” said Tessema.

In 2015 the company was recognized by the government as the country’sleading micro and small enterprise exporter.

The Turkish Gulen schools in Ethiopia sold – (but why?)

March 5, 2017

The Turkish government has been actively cracking down on African schools run by the controversial Islamic preacher Fethullah Gulen. Now,Gulen schools in Ethiopia have changed hands. Due to pressure from Ankara?

Everything is the same on the Nejashi Ethio-Turkish International Schools'website. The top of the page reads: "Registration Starts for 2016-17 Academic Year." Photos feature children playing basketball in front of a school building, and high-end technology in the classroom is emphasized. But the most important news about the school is missing: According to media reports, all six Nejashi schools in Ethiopia have been sold. The newsagency AP quoted school administrator Cecil Aydin as saying the decision had been made "for economic reasons."

Some 2,000 students attend the six educational institutions, which offercomplete K-12 schooling. Yearly tuition is more than $2,500 per student(2,353 euros). Most parents in Ethiopia cannot afford the cost, but the country's elite like to send their children there.

Schools said to belong to Fethullah Gulen's Hizmet Movement can be found in more than 160 countries around the world. But the Turkish government is no longer a fan. Ankara now claims that the Islamic preacher was behind last July's failed coup attempt against President Recep Tayyip Erdogan. Turkey accuses Gulen of using the schools as aninstrument to attract new supporters. The Gulen Movement denies the accusations.

Turkish influence in Ethiopia

Last year, Turkey's ambassador to Nigeria insisted that the country closeall 17 of its Gulen schools. President Erdogan is said to have expressed criticism of the schools while in Africa, traveling in Tanzania, Mozambiqueand Madagascar. He also discussed the schools when he met with Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn.

"I told him that he should show us a new path to keeping the schoolsopen if there was something wrong with them," Desalegn told AP.

It has yet to be confirmed that pressure from Turkey led to the sale of theschools. But the fact remains that Turkey wields great influence in Ethiopia. The country has seen double-digit economic growth over the lastseveral years and "that has led to a lot of Turkish investment," says Ludger Schadomsky, head of Deutsche Welle's Amharic Services.

According to the Turkish Foreign Ministry, some 150 Turkish companies,employing 30,000 people, are active in Ethiopia. The Ministry's website claims that Turkey has invested more than $2.5 billion dollars in the country on the Horn of Africa. That cooperation extends to other sectorsas well: "The countries have also had an agreement on military cooperation since 2013," says Schadomsky.

The schools themselves are said to have been bought by a group of German investors, but that claim has not been substantiated. And there are no further details about the investors. A Deutsche Welle interview request submitted to school administrators went unanswered. The Germanembassy also declined to answer AP questions about the sale of the schools.

Gulen schools in other countries closed as well

Last December the Senegalese government closed all of that country's Gulen schools. A newly founded Turkish foundation is said to have taken over school sponsorship. Angola followed suit in February when the government closed down the Colegio Esperanca Internacional (COESPI) inthe capitol, Luanda. The decision affected some 750 students. Sixty-six people – Turkish employees of the school and their families – were forcedto leave the country.

A decree from President José Eduardo dos Santos stated that it was necessary to close the school in order to "guarantee the safety and welfare of the people." Interior Minister Angelo de Barros Veiga Tavares declined to comment on the exact reason for the closing. He simply saidthat, "the Angolan government's decision was in no way influenced by pressure from other countries," while speaking on state television.

Not everyone in the country sees things that way. "We believe that thereis an obscure agenda that has led the president and his underlings to acquiesce to the caprices of the Turkish president," Angolan legal expert,Domingos Chipilika, told DW's Portuguese department. Nelson Sul contributed to this article.

”An Act of Treason by the TPLF Ethiopians Must Reject”March 9, 2017

Ever since its formation, the Ethiopian Border Affairs Committee (EBAC) has beenin the forefront of exposing the treasonous scheme of the Tigray People’s Liberation Front (TPLF) to cede large tracts of Ethiopian lands to the Sudanese government. We reiterated and alerted the Ethiopian peopleand the international community at large that, if and when implemented, this treacherous and treasonous act is being perpetrated outside public view. It is detrimental to Ethiopia’s territorial integrity, national security, the wellbeing of millions and the peaceful coexistence of the Ethiopian andSudanese people.

EBAC is pleased to note that over more than 11 years of advocacy, the overwhelming majority of the Ethiopian people, civic and opposition parties and prominent personalities, the media and others have provided us unwavering and steady moral, diplomatic and material support. On ourpart, we have been diligent in exposing the secret deal through press releases, the media, symposiums, research and the preparation of position papers that future generations of Ethiopians and succeeding governments could utilize in restoring Ethiopia’s legitimate rights to its lands.

Despite the TPLF’s outright dismissal of its treacherous acts that take place in secret negotiations with the government of the Sudan, we have repeatedly conveyed to the Bashir Government that handing over a “goodchunk of Ethiopia’s fertile farmlands, waters and other natural resources” will undermine peace, stability, and security of the region in the decades to come. We have gone on record that ceding Ethiopian lands is illegitimate, illegal and source of destabilization in the area.

In our official letter to the late Prime Minister of Ethiopia, Meles Zenawi,we informed him that his party or government “has no authority to cede any Ethiopian territorywithout the consent of the people of Ethiopia.” Meles was fully cognizant then and his successors now that the government in power would face unprecedented opposition and public uproar. This is why Meles and now Prime Minister Hailemariam Dessalegnrefuse to discloses the contents of the deal to the people of Ethiopia.

Instead, this treacherous act is carried out with the highest level of secrecy; and purportedly involving the regional government of Tigray andSudanese authorities. Matters of this magnitude require transparency, open discussion, participation by the Ethiopian people and at least a modicum of debate within the rubber stamp Ethiopian Parliament. Today,Ethiopia is characterized by a suffocating political environment of closed political and civic space and the criminalization of press freedom. There isno meaningful opposition. Civil society has been decimated.

In light of this suffocating environment and the current State of Emergency, the TPLF dominated government and media still purport that“Not a single Ethiopian is displaced from his ancestral farmland” and thatno agreement has been reached. This claim suggests to us that the TPLFknows well that it has no authority to redraw Ethiopia’s national boundaries or to cede any Ethiopian territory to the Sudan.

EBAC wishes to underscore once again that any secret agreement with theSudan will neither bind the rest of thecountry nor contribute to stability and peaceful coexistence between the two countries. On the contrary, anysuch agreement and deal will undermine the long-established tradition of peaceful coexistence, mutual benefit and friendly relations between Ethiopia and the Sudan. The Sudanese government ought to understand that the TPLF dominated government is doing the opposite of what is in the long-term interests of the Ethiopian and Sudanese people. The TPLF does this for short term economic and political gains. It has a well- established tradition of abandoning Ethiopia’s access to the sea. It leases millions of hectares of land to foreign investors and selected TPLF supporters while Ethiopians starve etc.

Teshafi Tizaz Aklilu Habtewold would have turned 105 right today.

Arefayné Fantahun

Born in Adda, Shewa in 1912, Aklilu became a prominent statesman for over three decades in Atse Haile Selassie's government, including servingas Prime Minister from 1961-1973.

The youngest son of a humble priest family, Aklilu first studied in the French Le Lycée of Alexandria, then in Paris, Sorbonne and a l'école de science politique. Starting his career as Press Attaché in 1936, he consequently served as Secretary and chargé d'affaires of the Ethiopian Embassy in Paris. During the Italian occupation, he was the Emperor's personal representative to the French capital. On his return from exile in 1941, he was first named Minister at the Ministry of Pen and later Ministerof Foreign Affairs. It was in this capacity that he took the leading role in important negotiations, including one that led Eritrea to be federated withEthiopia in 1952. He also played a major role in the preparation of the Charter of the Organization of African Unity and the establishment of the organisation of on 25 May 1963.

"Aklilu was the product of Western civilization with the French touch. He was married to a French lady and lived like a Frenchman than an Ethiopian," Seyoum Haregot, later to become a minister, wrote of him. "He was suave, debonair, affable, and urbane, and immediately put people at ease. He was a man of extreme patience, who never lost his temper (…) His patience was so extreme that it could make his colleaguesimpatient, but completely disarmed opponents," according Asfa-Wossen Asserate's book King of Kings: The Triumph and Tragedy of Emperor HaileSelassie I of Ethiopia.

This rare photo provided by Aklilu family to Ethiopia Observer shows the late Prime Minister with his wife, Colette and General Abiye Abebe, one hiscloset friends. When Prime Minister Aklilu Habte-Wold sought to resign hispost in 1973, he reportedly suggested to the Emperor that he be replaced by General Abiye. However Abiye consented to becoming Prime Minister only if his nomination, and those of his cabinet, were approved by the Ethiopian parliament, a condition Emperor Haile Selassie found unacceptable. The post was given to Endalkachew Makonnen.

MUSIC LEGENDS

A ton of respect to veteran vocalist Muluken Melese

The recognition is all about what artist Muluken Melese has once meant tothe music industry and a massive contribution he left behind, long before his departure, to what he believed is best for him, So, whenever you leave one's personal decision, privet life and politicalview behind, then you will automatically begin to see one's true color clearly.

Anyhow, without a single doubt whatsoever, Artist Muluken Melese hasplaced a headstone right on the heart of Ethiopian art that will always stand firm through the test of time. And nothing is gonna change that.
In his own word from one of his songs.....
ፍጽም በረሃ ነው ፈሳሽ የሌለበትፍጹም በረሃ ነው ፈሳሽ የሌለበት
ውሃ ውሃ የሚያሰኝ አንቺ የጠፋሽበት!

Very touching. She must be so worthy to cause such risk and to deserve such honor. And I hope you have finally found her. Muluken, however, here in the world of art, you are truly missed by your millions of fans. Andyour spot in history remains intact.

PUBLIC FIGURES
Mesfin Woldemariam: A Tower of Humbleness, Reflection

By Arefayné Fantahun

Addis Fortune columnist Girma Feyissa pays tribute to prominent humanrights activist and geographer Professor Mesfin Woldemariam.

Our lives are intertwined between the past, present and future. The pastis history, but we can take some useful experiences from it to build the present and the future.

That is how life is made sustainable. The present is actually lost in thefuture. This is because what we do now is translated into action for tomorrow.

The past is collected from the heritage of yesteryears; speeches, pictures,actions and thoughts. These collections create what we call knowledge.

The relationships within these branches of knowledge are processed to result in decisions that lead to actions. Some personalities affect these decisions through their legacies. Today, I have chosen to talk about a certain character that I had known for over fifty years, but never talkedto, albeit the ample opportunities I had.

I had planned to write about this character a long time ago. But I had towait until I got the chance to see him in person. But that was not to be.
Hence, I decided to write my memories about him. I have met him onnewspaper and magazine pages. I see him on videos and websites.
I have read most of his books. In fact, one of his publications was a reference to my senior essay when I was doing my postgraduate work atLeeds University, UK, in 1989. I owe him a lot.
He had been my teacher of Ethiopian Geography 101. I have been privileged and am proud to have come from the same school – Teferi Mekonen – as him. I was only a teenager in the elementary section, whilehe was in the fourth form – as Grade 12 was known then.

I never forget the circumstances of the first time I saw him. It was a school day, also known as Parents' Day. The main show was taking placeon the football field.

The laboratory where I was assigned was also where some scientific experiments were being displayed. Late in the afternoon, the headmastercame to the laboratory escorting a young Ethiopian scholar.

I would not be blamed if I could not vividly remember the young man's looks, which I had seen over half a century ago. What attracted my attention most was the respect and hospitality shown by the most reveredheadmaster to the young visitor. I am saying that at the advantage of hindsight.

The next time I saw him was at our office at the Telecommunications Board. He used to come to the GPO every Saturday, perhaps to check hispost box.

But, perhaps, in passing, he used to come to our office to visit his friend, Aemro Araya, who was my immediate boss. Aemro, by the way, had his Bachelor's Degree from Perdue University, one of the top 10 universities in the US, and was known for his role as a counterpart with the engineersof the Japanese company that had installed the ground stations of Satellites A and B at Sululta.

Judging by what they were discussing, I could guess that my boss and thispersonality were schoolmates at the aforementioned Teferi Mekonen School.

Many of my readers may remember that after Prime Minister Aklilu Habtewold resigned from his post, Endalkachew Mekonnen was replaced,even if only for a little while – nicknamed the “Give Me a Break” transitional period – which lasted no more than six months.
That was probably the first time we, Ethiopians, had the honey taste offreedom of writing. Every scholar of a name had a lot to write about freely.

Every topic from the land tenure system to political party formation, fromthe quality of education to the type of economic policy, came up for discussion. Many people may well remember my character illustrating hisplans for a community landholding system.

He had divided the community land tenure system into its parts, includingthe allocation of land for forestry. At this time, the world did not talk muchabout soil preservation or even the problems of the environment.

I remember well a point he raised about leadership at a time when everything had become a mess. He said the revolution is like a train witheveryone on board; the driver should look forward to see where the train is rolling.

An uninformed driver carrying a gun and looking backwards at the passengers could lead the train and passengers either nowhere or off track, he argued. That was probably what took place during the 17 years of revolution.

I have to untie the plot by stating his name, in case there are some readers who have not guessed rightly so far. This courageous personalitywho has travelled throughout every square metre of the country is none other than Mesfin Woldemariam (Prof).

Many of us wonder why the Republic of Somalia fell into a chaotic situation, not long after freedom was attained from the British government and Italy, as it tried to build the greater Somalia. The then Prime Minister Aklilu Habtewold had established a special committee madeup of Germame Neway, Workineh Gabeyehu and Kettema Yifru, among others.

They had visited the Ogaden Region and talked to the elders of the different clans and ethnic groups. But the most reliable source that connected the past and the future was documented by Mesfin in his book“The Brain Child of Africa”.

Mesfin is not timid by nature. He speaks his mind freely. That wasprobably why he has been a very controversial personality.

There are some who accuse him of having double standards. I happen notto subscribe to this school of thought. In fact, with him being a man of at least three generations, it is we who fail to get to grips with his perceptions.
A good example is the value he gives to mediation by elderly people inconflict resolution situations – an approach some may consider to be rather obsolete.

Many of us associate Mesfin with the 1974 famine in the northern part of Ethiopia. But the fact is that he had made the trip at least one year aheadof the film by Jonathan Dimbleby, entitled – " The Hidden Hunger".

Dimbleby may have succeeded in revealing the plight of human beingsdying at a time when the world was dumping a third of its food supply.But the impact of that film went far beyond that.

The scar on the country's image is still fresh in the minds of people, evenif the film had triggered the denials of an ancient monarchy, which Mesfin's book – "Rural Vulnerability to Famine" puts the rational in its right perspectives. I owe the professor a lot in that sense.

Rubbish dump landslide kills at least 46 in Ethiopia

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia: A mountain of trash gave way in a massive garbage dump on the outskirts of Ethiopia's capital, killing at least 50 people and leaving several dozen missing, residents said, as officials vowed to relocate those who called the landfill home. Many victims are thought to have been people who scavenged for a living at Koshe landfillsite
By AFP March 13, 2017

At least 46 people have died and dozens more have been injured in a giant landslide at Ethiopia's largest rubbish dump outside Addis Ababa, a tragedy squatters living there blamed on a biogas plant being built nearby. Dozens of homes of squatters who lived in the Koshe landfill site,on the outskirts of the capital, were flattened when the largest pile of rubbish collapsed on Saturday.

Dagmawit Moges, head of the city communications bureau, said 46 peoplehad died – 32 female and 14 male, including some children. Many of the victims were squatters who scavenged for a living in the 30-hectare (74- acre) dump, she said. Musa Suleiman Abdulah, who lost his wooden shacktopped with plastic sheeting in the disaster, said when it happened, he heard “a big sound”.

“When we came out, something like a tornado is rushing to us,” he said.“We started to collect family members [and escape]. People helped. My child and family left before the destruction happened.” Construction materials, wooden sticks and plastic sheeting could be seen in the wreckage. The Koshe site has for more than 40 years been the main garbage dump for Addis Ababa, a rapidly growing city of about 4 millionpeople.

According to residents, about 50 houses with about seven people living in each of them were built on the rubbish. People had built the houses abouttwo to three years ago, said Berhanu Degefe, a rubbish collector who livesat the dump but whose home was not destroyed.

“Their livelihood depends on the trash. They collect from here and they live here,” Degefe said, referring to the victims and other squatters. “Thispart, all of it went down,” he said, gesturing at a huge chunk of the hill that suddenly slid. “A lot of people died last night.

Ethiopia boasts about its economic progress.
The body count at a garbage dump tells another story

Ethiomedia By Paul Schemm, Washington Post

March 15, 2017Three days of national mourning began Wednesday for thevictims of a catastrophic landslide at the Ethiopian capital’s main garbage dump that left at least 72 bodies buried under a wall of trash and dirt, mostly women and children.

This year has not been kind to Ethiopia, including widespread popular unrest, drought in many parts of the country, a cholera outbreak and stampede at a culture festival. Yet the deaths at the Addis Ababa landfill on Saturday stands out as a sobering counterpoint to the country's boastsof economic progress.

Ethiopia’s government for the last decade has tried to put behind the familiar cliches in Western minds of famine and poverty. The numbers help their case. Ethiopia has one of the best-performing economies in Africa. But 30 percent of Ethiopia's population still lives below the povertyline.

The changes are especially apparent in Addis Ababa, which was once littlemore than an overgrown village with a few government buildings. The cityis now sprouting with glass and metal skyscrapers ringed by affluent new neighborhoods catering to an emerging middle class.

But the landfill tragedy is a reminder that the slums and shantytowns are still there, too. One of them was built amid the artificial mountain of garbage, where people scrap out a living combing through the refuse. LateSaturday, they heard a roaring sound. The garbage mountain suddenly gave way, sweeping away makeshift homes and burying dozens.

The growth of the capital has often outstripped efforts to manage it, creating hazards like the half-century-old landfill of Reppi, also known asKoshe or dirt in Ethiopia's Amharic language.

Located southwest of the city, just a 15 minute drive from the embassy- filled neighborhood of Old Airport that is also home to the city's best international school, this mountain of trash is now surrounded by housingdevelopments.

Here, hundreds of men, women and children known as "scratchers" comb through the daily trash deliveries from the rest of the city, squabbling overthe highly prized refuse from the wealthier neighborhoods that yield the most valuable castoffs or the best food. Overhead birds circle the nearly 90-acre site, waiting for their own turn on this artificial mountain of trash

Even before the latest collapse claimed dozens of lives, injuries and deaths from the settling trash or the bulldozers were common in this area,which is often a first port of arrival for immigrants from the countryside.

There was an attempt recently to close down the Koshe dump. But protesters from the surrounding Oromo region blocked garbage trucksheading for a new site.

In sharply worded statement Monday, Amnesty International held the government responsible for this "totally preventable disaster," saying thatthe government was aware it was at full capacity but used it anyway and allowed people to build their huts on the garbage. "These people, including many women and children, had no option but to live and work insuch a hazardous environment because of the government's failure to protect their right to adequate housing, and decent work."

An estimated 300 people scavenge through the rubbish mountain at any given time and it is feared that the death toll could keep rising. The government has announced the relocation of at least 300 people living on the site as well as compensation for the families. There have been scufflesthough between residents and rescue workers, claiming they are not doingenough. In the days since the landslide, there has been a heavy security presence at the site.
There has been no official reason for what caused the landslide, though the site's overcapacity and the strain of accepting every day more garbagefrom the city's estimated 3.5 million residents could be part of it. Some residents have also claimed that the trash mountain was destabilized by the construction of a huge waste-to-energy plant on the site — an accusation denied by the government but echoed by commentators on state-run radio.

If the $120 million Reppie Waste-to-Energy facility caused the landslide, itwould be a particularly cruel irony. The gleaming facility covered in scaffolding was supposed to be the salvation for the people of the trash.

When the deal was announced in January 2013 with Cambridge Industries, it was seen as a solution for the festering problem of the landfill. The facility would take the 350,000 annual tons of garbage entering the site and turn it into enough electricity to power the homes for30 percent of the city. Blackout are common in Addis Ababa as another symptom of its rapid growth.

The plant was part of the country's $150 billion Climate Resilient Green Economy launched in 2011, with the stated of objective of turning Ethiopiainto a middle-income economy by 2025 while keeping down greenhouse gas emissions. Construction had originally been expected last only 18 months, but the company's website now says the plant won't be operational until later this year. Company representatives were not available for comment.

Death toll doubles to 113 in Ethiopia garbage dump collapse

By Associated Press March 16, 201

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia -- The death toll from a collapse at a landfill outside Ethiopia's capital has risen sharply to 113, an Addis Ababa city official said Wednesday, as the country began three days of mourning forvictims who were mostly women and children.

Dagmawit Moges confirmed the new toll Wednesday evening. Meanwhile,Addis Ababa Mayor Diriba Kuma told state broadcaster EBC the search- and-rescue effort soon would be completed and an investigation into the cause of the accident would begin. Hopes were waning for survivors, though an official with the city's emergency department, Nigatu Mamo, said one person had been pulled out alive on Monday, two days after thedisaster.

Saturday's collapse of a mountain of garbage buried makeshift mud-and-stick homes inside the Koshe landfill on the outskirts of the capital.

Excavators and rescuers have been pulling bodies from the black mud since then. Nigatu said excavators were being redeployed from various construction projects around Addis Ababa to help in the search. "We willcontinue the effort until we are directed to stop it. Our rescuers are working in two shifts, day and night," the emergency official said.

Residents have suggested various reasons for the collapse. Some blamedthe dumping of trash that had resumed at the landfill in recent months after protests at a newer landfill site. Others blamed the construction of anew waste-to-energy plant at Koshe.

Officials said they have already relocated about 300 people from the landfill, where hundreds of waste-pickers salvaged items to make a livingand others found inexpensive housing. The mayor said people whose family members died in the collapse have received money ranging from $430 to $650 each, and that they would be resettled permanently in thecoming years.

The landfill has been a dumping ground for the capital's garbage for morethan 50 years. Smaller collapses have occurred at Koshe -- or "dirty" in the local Amharic language -- in the past two years but only two or three people were killed, residents said. The deadly collapse has been a shock to many in a country that has prided itself on having one of Africa's fastest-growing economies.

The state of emergency ends in May:
Ethiopia Relaxes Emergency Measures that Followed Protests
March 16, 2017

Voice of America – Addis Ababa- Ethiopia's state broadcaster says the government has lifted parts of the state of emergency imposed in Octoberwhile claiming the "restoration of law and order in many parts of the country."

The Ethiopian Broadcasting Corporation on Wednesday cited Defense Minister Siraj Fegessa as saying that arbitrary arrests without court ordersand conducting searches without court papers will stop.

Also being lifted are bans and restrictions imposed on radio, television andtheater. And prohibitions on unauthorized movements around infrastructure facilities and factories from dawn to dusk have been repealed.

Ethiopia's government declared the state of emergency on Oct. 9 in an effort to calm months of deadly protests across the country, especially inthe restive Oromia region. Demonstrators were demanding wider politicalfreedoms.

Discoveries in the Ethiopian Desert:

ORTHODOX RELIGION IN ETHIOPIA: Exploring the Ancient Gospels of Ethiopia

THE MARGINALIA REVIEW OF BOOKS March 17, 2017

It’s not every day that scholars discover new Bible manuscripts from the ancient world. It’s even rarer to discover ones endowed with luxurious painted images. Yet this is precisely what has happened over the past decade thanks to groundbreaking research into three ancient codices fromEthiopia, the earliest surviving copies of the Gospels in Ethiopic.

The manuscripts, which were produced and are still housed at the Monastery of Abba Garima in Ethiopia’s northern highlands, were not completely unknown to experts before, having been published for the first time in the 1960s. But recent work by Judith McKenzie and Francis Watson—published in a spectacular new book—has led to a radical reassessment of their dates and significance. Through radio-carbon testingand fresh analysis of their iconography and texts, we now know that the three Abba Garima Gospels were copied not in the tenth or eleventh centuries, as once thought, but between the fifth and seventh centuries atthe zenith of Ethiopia’s ancient Christian civilization. For anyone interestedin the history of the Bible, late antiquity, or Ethiopia itself, this is very big news.

To put the discovery in perspective, the Abba Garima manuscripts are among the very oldest illustrated Gospels in the world. When it comes tofirmly dated parallels, only the Syriac Rabbula Gospels, produced near Antioch in 586, is earlier. The Abba Garima Gospels are also older than several of the greatest monuments of Western manuscript illumination, including the Codex Amiatinus, the Lindisfarne Gospels, and the Book of Kells, all of which were copied in the British Isles between the eighth andninth centuries. Then, as today, Ethiopia lay far, far away from Syria andIreland. Despite this, the manuscripts show striking similarities to the artof other ancient Christian cultures outside of Africa. Indeed, they are a testament to the deep connections between Ethiopia and the wider late antique world.

To understand the history of the Abba Garima Gospels, we must first appreciate something of the civilization that produced them. In ancient times, long-distance trade was the umbilical cord linking Ethiopia and the outside world. Ethiopian merchants spread their wares far and wide, including incense, ivory, gold, and even live animals such as baboons. Its closest trading partners lay just across the Red Sea in southern Arabia, but Ethiopian traders also reached markets in far-away Egypt, India, and the Mediterranean. So numerous were the Ethiopian merchants of Alexandria, for example, that a fourth-century Roman law barred them from tarrying in the city for more than a year. These commercial contacts encouraged cultural exchange, such that Ethiopia's art, architecture, and literature were constantly shaped by the practices of its distant neighbors.
Christianity first reached the Kingdom of Aksum—the state that ruled Ethiopia during late antiquity—in the fourth century. The advent of the new religion in Aksum is an event shrouded in myth, though it seems thatthe first Christians there were traders, possibly Egyptians from the north. King Ezana of Aksum officially converted by the 350s, though like his Roman counterpart Constantine, the nature of his conversion is heavily contested. For example, Ezana is known to have minted coins with both Christian and pagan symbols in the course of his life. A famous bilingual stele—erected before his conversion—invokes a pagan deity called "Mahrem," a term related to the Quranic epithet for God, al-Rahman, or "the Merciful." Despite these murky origins, what is clear is that by the early sixth century, Christianity had become the leading religion in Aksum,with a sophisticated network of bishops, churches, and monasteries scattered throughout the country.

Another feature of Ethiopia's history in late antiquity was its occasionally aggressive foreign policy. An ally of the Byzantine Empire, ancient Aksum attempted to establish a sphere of influence stretching across East Africa and the Red Sea. Notably, at the start of the sixth century, Aksumite armies invaded and installed a puppet ruler in the Kingdom of Himyar in south Arabia, which had recently undergone its own conversion to Judaismand become an ally of Sasanian Iran. These high-stakes rivalries shaped the world of Muhammad and the first Muslims: indeed, the Islamic tradition holds that the Prophet was born in 570, the "Year of the Elephant," when an Aksumite viceroy famously marched a fleet of war elephants into Mecca with the goal of destroying the Kaaba. In the decades to come, the early Muslims nurtured their own contacts in Ethiopia, notably during the “First Hijra” of 615, when Muhammad dispatched a small group of followers to Aksum to avoid persecution in Mecca. Not surprisingly, scholars note that many words in classical Arabic have connections in Ethiopic, also a Semitic language. Tellingly, one of these is mushaf, the term for codex.

Given this, ancient Ethiopia has emerged as a hot topic of research in recent years. Scholars have come to see Aksum not as an isolated andeccentric culture on the edge of the Christian world, but as a linchpin binding together many far-flung civilizations. In many ways, the Abba Garima Gospels embody this special role: they are a monument to thevitality of local Aksumite culture as well as its openness to outside influences.
The most striking characteristic of the three codices are their brilliant illustrations. These include portraits of the four evangelists, along with oneof the fourth-century bishop and biblical scholar Eusebius (all found in Abba Garima III.) In most portraits, the saints stare at the viewer head- on with arresting intensity. St. Mark, however, is shown in profile, seated in a pose reminiscent of evangelist portraits in Greek, Syriac, and Arabic manuscripts as well as older Roman mosaics. The image of Mark even has connections to ancient Egyptian wall paintings, including the saint’s rigid,hieratic pose and the leopard-skin throne on which he sits. Mark also wears a white scarf known as an omophrion, befitting his status as a bishop and a founder of the Egyptian church. In addition, his V-shaped lectern calls to mind reading stands used in later periods for copies of theQuran and the Arabic Bible.

Aside from the saints’ portraits, another illustration depicts what McKenzieand Watson term the “Renewed Temple.” It is a curious building, with a trapezoidal roof, a course of bricks and columns, and a base with two doors, from which slender white deer poke their heads. In its specifics, theimage is almost without precedent in the arts of late antiquity and the Middle Ages, though as McKenzie notes, it belongs to a wider genre of buildings with pitched roofs, porticoes, and hanging curtains known as “tholoi.” Watson also identifies similarities between this image and descriptions of the Temple in the text of the Bible. Their arguments are convincing, but the closest parallel may be an image not included in McKenzie and Watson’s book at all, namely, the scene of Christ’s Temptation from the Book of Kells, in which Jesus and Satan are depicted on the parapet of the Jerusalem Temple. The building in Kells shares the same distinctive structure as the one in Abba Garima III and is in fact much closer in form and iconography than the tholoi which McKenzie highlights. Eastern influences on the Book of Kells are well known, so it is not out of the question that it and Abba Garima III could share a commonancestor.

In general, the Abba Garima Gospels are relatively poor in what we mightcall traditional Christian iconography. There is not a single image of Jesusanywhere in the three codices. What they lack in explicitly Biblical imagery, however, they more than make up for in other elements, including canon tables, a distinctive feature of ancient Gospel manuscripts. Although completely missing from modern printed Bibles, nodeluxe Gospel from the pre-modern world was complete without them.

Designed by Eusebius of Caesraea—whose portrait graces the pages of Abba Garima III—canon tables responded to a basic problem that instantly strikes anyone who tries to read the Gospels together: despite significant overlaps, the four accounts of Jesus' life convey different, sometimes conflicting, information. In response to this, Eusebius devised a system for cross-referencing parallel passages.. The first canon table, for example, mentions material found in all four Gospels, while subsequent tables mention material shared across three and two Gospels.

The canon tables had obvious practical applications. Over time, however, they acquired a primarily symbolic significance, transforming into icons that visually expressed the idea of harmony among the four stories of Jesus' life. The Abba Garima manuscripts represent the final stage of this transformation from "tools" to "symbols." Indeed, as an orderly system forcross-referencing the text of the New Testament, the tables in the Abba Garima Gospels often do not work. Yet the illuminators still invested greattime and effort in painting page after page of tables, each with elaborate architectural frames recalling those from Pompeii or Baalbek and crowdedwith exotic fauna plucked from the East African landscape. Therefore, although Jesus himself is missing from the Abba Garima Gospels, the Incarnate Word is represented abundantly and implicitly in the tables themselves, symbols of a common revelation recorded by Matthew, Mark,Luke, and John.

One of the biggest problems facing research into the Abba Garima Gospelsis the absence of historical comparanda in the form of contemporary manuscripts, wall paintings, or written sources from Ethiopia itself. Given this, it is unsurprising that earlier scholars sometimes argued that the illuminations may have been produced outside Ethiopia in places like Egypt or the Levant. McKenzie and Watson's book definitively disproves this theory, which implicitly rests on an assumption that Ethiopia – geographically and culturally isolated from the "real" cultural hubs of the late antique world – was incapable of producing something as beautiful as the Abba Garima Gospels without foreign help.

Although the three manuscripts show abundant parallels to the arts of thewider late antique world, they also demonstrate in dazzling fashion the vitality of local culture in Ethiopia itself. In fact, their beauty and sophistication suggest that these were not the first fruits of a tradition about to bloom, but the mature efforts of a tradition that had already been flowering for generations. We owe McKenzie, Watson, and their teama great debt for making these codices accessible to the general public.

Their fine volume will hopefully serve as a stimulus for further research onancient Ethiopia more broadly, a great crossroads of culture whose significance to world history we are only just beginning to appreciate.

On March 1st, 1896 right after the disastrous battle of Abba Garima at Adwa battlefiel, they were made prisoners. On the following day several ofthe Ras' begged the Negus Negest to have them mutilated, but Menelik refused. On March 3rd a great court-martial was held and Mengesha Yohannes, Ras of the Tigray, together with Queen Taitu and the Abuna Chagay, urgently pressed on the Negus that the prisoners as traitors should undergo the penalty of the “urusat” - that is, the removal of the right hand and left foot. The charge of treason could only have applied to those prisoners of Abyssinian origin, but in no way to fully one-half of the prisoners, who were either Arabs of the coast or Somali. These, all of them Mohammedans (Muslims), never had allegiance, either political or religious, to the Abyssinian's, and their only misfortune was the black color of their skin.

Menelik yielded to the pressure, and consented to the “urusat”. The execution took place at once, and not as usual by the hand of the executioner, who has a certain practice, but by that of soldiers. The unfortunate prisoners in the camps of the various Ras, Mengesha, Mekonnen, Alula, Whoalleyay, Bathool Negus and Tekle-Haimanot, were dragged out from the tens and held by soldiers. The “modus operandi” was as follows: A soldier would pull strongly apart the right hand from theforearm in pronation, so as to put the skin and joint on the stretch, whilstanother soldier, with a sweeping cut of the sword on the dorsal aspect of the wrist, divided the skin and tendons; then the first soldier would forcibly flex the hand over the forearm, and a second cut would open the joint; finally, the first soldier would extend the hand over the wrist and a third cut, sweeping from below upwards, caused the hand to drop off. Thesame method was used with the foot.

When this sort of mutilation is adopted for the punishment of theft the sufferer is allowed to plunge the stump in boiling melted butter to stop bleeding, but with these prisoners this was strictly forbidden, and once themutilation was completed they were freed and left to themselves. As a result a great many died shortly after from hemorrhage. Many more crawled to the water of a neighboring torrent, where many of the Mohammedans (Muslims) in despair drowned themselves in a deep water hole. Those amongst them who were able to bandage themselves with portions of their robe (footah) survived. For many days they lived on grass and water and what little food they could beg from the Abyssinian soldiers. Source Article: "A Report on the Mutilated and Evirated of the Battle of Adwa" by Dr.

FOREIGN INFLUENCE IN ETHIOPIA

The Turkish Gulen schools in Ethiopia sold – (but why?)

The Turkish government has been actively cracking down on African schools run by the controversial Islamic preacher Fethullah Gulen. Now, Gulen schools in Ethiopia have changed hands. Due to pressure fromAnkara?

Everything is the same on the Nejashi Ethio-Turkish International Schools'website. The top of the page reads: "Registration Starts for 2016-17 Academic Year." Photos feature children playing basketball in front of a school building, and high-end technology in the classroom is emphasized. But the most important news about the school is missing: According to media reports, all six Nejashi schools in Ethiopia have been sold. The newsagency AP quoted school administrator Cecil Aydin as saying the decision had been made "for economic reasons."

Some 2,000 students attend the six educational institutions, which offercomplete K-12 schooling. Yearly tuition is more than $2,500 per student(2,353 euros). Most parents in Ethiopia cannot afford the cost, but the country's elite like to send their children there.

Schools said to belong to Fethullah Gulen's Hizmet Movement can be found in more than 160 countries around the world. But the Turkish government is no longer a fan. Ankara now claims that the Islamic preacher was behind last July's failed coup attempt against President Recep Tayyip Erdogan. Turkey accuses Gulen of using the schools as aninstrument to attract new supporters. The Gulen Movement denies the accusations.

Turkish influence in Ethiopia

Last year, Turkey's ambassador to Nigeria insisted that the country closeall 17 of its Gulen schools.

President Erdogan is said to have expressed criticism of the schools while in Africa, traveling in Tanzania, Mozambiqueand Madagascar. He also discussed the schools when he met with Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn.

“I told him that he should show us a new path to keeping the schoolsopen if there was something wrong with them,” Desalegn told AP.

It has yet to be confirmed that pressure from Turkey led to the sale of theschools. But the fact remains that Turkey wields great influence in Ethiopia. The country has seen double-digit economic growth over the lastseveral years and “that has led to a lot of Turkish investment,” says Ludger Schadomsky, head of Deutsche Welle’s Amharic Services.

According to the Turkish Foreign Ministry, some 150 Turkish companies,employing 30,000 people, are active in Ethiopia. The Ministry’s website claims that Turkey has invested more than $2.5 billion dollars in the country on the Horn of Africa. That cooperation extends to other sectorsas well: “The countries have also had an agreement on military cooperation since 2013,” says Schadomsky.

The schools themselves are said to have been bought by a group of German investors, but that claim has not been substantiated. And there are no further details about the investors. A Deutsche Welle interview request submitted to school administrators went unanswered. The Germanembassy also declined to answer AP questions about the sale of the schools.

Ethiopia extends state of emergency by four months

By Aljazeera March 31, 2017

The Ethiopian parliament has extended by four months a state of emergency it declared six months ago after almost a year of often violentanti-government demonstrations.

The widely expected extension comes amid reports of continued violenceand anti-government activities in some rural areas. At least 500 people were killed by security forces during the year of protests, according to New York-based Human Rights Watch group - a figure the government later echoed.

"We still have some anti-peace elements that are active and want to capitalise on disputes that arise among regional states in the country," Ethiopia's defence minister, Siraj Fegessa, told MPs when he called on them to approve the extension on Thursday. "In addition, some leaders ofthe violent acts that we witnessed before are still at large and are disseminating wrong information to incite violence."

Opposition parties complain that the emergency powers are being used to clamp down on their members and activities, especially in rural regions farfrom the capital, Addis Ababa. The state of emergency, declared on October 9, was a reaction to protests that were especially persistent in theOromia region. Many members of the Oromo ethnic group say they are marginalised and that they do not have access to political power, something the government denies.

A wave of anger was triggered by a development scheme for Addis Ababa,which would have seen its boundaries extended into Oromia.
Demonstrators saw it as a land grab that would force farmers off their land. The protests soon spread to the Amhara region in the north, where locals argued that decades-old federal boundaries had cut off many ethnicAmharas from the region.

The Oromo and Amhara ethnic groups together make up about 60 percentof Ethiopia's population. The country’s ruling coalition, which has been in power for a quarter of a century, is controlled primarily by the Tigray ethnic group, who make up six percent of the population. Tensions reached an all-time high after a stampede in which at least 52 people were crushed to death fleeing security forces at a protest that grew out ofa religious festival in the town of Bishoftu on October 2nd.

In the following days, rioters torched several mostly foreign-owned factories and other buildings that they claimed were built on seized land.The government, though, blamed rebel groups and foreign-based dissidents for stoking the violence.

The state of emergency initially included curfews, social media blocks, restrictions on opposition party activity and a ban on diplomats traveling more than 40 kilometres outside the capital without approval. Authorities arrested over 11,000 people during its first month. Some provisions of thestate of emergency were relaxed on March 15th, two weeks prior to Thursday’s announced extension. Arrests and searches without court orders were stopped, and restrictions on radio, television and theatre weredropped.
Bole International Airport is Infested by TPLF members!

(April 11, 2017 by Muluken Gebeyew)

One of the “covert” mission of TPLF (Tigray People’s Liberation Front) to its members is to enrich them and benefit from the regime as much as possible at the expense of non-Tigrayan Ethiopians. TPLF in its 26 years ofpower has implemented a direct policy that favours its members.

TPLF believes in the might of economic power along with political, militaryand security power. It has facilitated a structure for its members to loot Ethiopians wealth by every possible means. TPLF considers Ethiopia as annexed land to be looted.

From the time they controlled the central power in 1991 (1983 Ethiopian calendar), TPLF enriched its members and their “Shabia friends” by lootingany properties and finances run by former government or collective organizations. Their “Shabia friends” were the street smarts who trained them the “city” life as they never trusted other Ethiopians. The conflict between Shabia and TPLF in the 90’s had more benefited TPLF as its members were able to loot their friends property and finance as well.

TPLF has believed as party, its members should control or own the upper hand of the Ethiopia economy. On their troubled mind, this would enable them to be self-sustaining if Tigray Republic is formed or be the economicdominant ethnicity in Ethiopia, even when TPLF lose power.

Seventy percent of Ethiopian economy is run by EFFORT (Endowment Fund For Relief of Tigray) which is private company owned by the elites ofTPLF. Every business opportunities and investments in Ethiopia are structured to benefit them or their loyal supporters. Any non-Tigrayan successful business would be liquidated by decree of “tax non payment” and will be transferred to TPLF members. 70 % of the land of Gambella isowned by Tigrean TPLF members. A higher proportion of “Benishangul” region’s land is also owned by Tigreans at the pretext of investment.

Please read “Yemeles Likakit” book written by former state Minster,Ermias Leggese on how they control the Ethiopian economy.

TPLF is like a beggar which doesn’t get satisfied. It bites the hands that fed it. Despite enormous wealth they looted from Ethiopians, TPLF members still continues to steal and streamlined the monopoly procedurethat generations of Tigrayan would benefit from it. The father who has been stealing for last 26 years, arranged for his young son or daughter and families to be in position to steal and influence Ethiopians.

One of the place highly infested by young, old, male or female Tigrayans is Bole International Airport. The Ethiopian airlines and Bole International airport are the cash milk for the regimes members. When you arrive Bole,you would get the mistreatment as you embark from airplane. From ethnic uniformity, language and bad manner, you may wonder either you landed by mistake in “Republic of Tigray”. Actually you landed in Ethiopiancapital, Addis Ababa Bole International Airport. The whole security officers, duty free shops, restaurant owners in the airport are Tigrayans.

You may wonder either Ethiopia is under colony by other black Africans.
The working language among the security people in Bole is Tigrigna whichmajority of the other Ethiopians don't understand. You will be welcomed like prisoner in your own country unless you speak the "Royal language" Tigrigna. The mistreatment you receive for someone who arrives to motherland after long time abroad is so shocking. In their untidy uniform,this Tigrayan security officers are rough, suspicious, rude and attempt to show you the power balance as your leg step in to your motherland. Most of them are ignorant, non civil, speaks poor Amharic or English. If you politely ask them or speak to them mannerly, they consider you as insincere and potential enemy. They would go through your luggage as locust infesting it for any valuable items (not for the state) for their own possession. They even don't know their own rules and regulation. As an Ethiopian, you feel embarrassed by their action. You would be surprised why TPLF top brass didn't assign at least better communicating, polite andcivilised TPLF members in such senstive place even though they don't trust other Ethiopians!
You may notice on your short stay in the airport an ordinary Tigrayan security officer commanding and ordering the well educated and civilisedEthiopian airlines workers who are powerless. You read on their face " I am their slave in my country".
While you are on your line for passport check, if you speak to them abouttheir mistreatment you endure, you would be taken to other room and interrogated thoroughly about your ethnicity, political opinion, why you come to your own country and your luggage will be heavily scrutinized.
They will not leave you until you "beg" them or speak in the languagethey want to hear.
It is so sad that you feel at loss when you land in your motherland. Youfeel stranger in your own country. You realise that Ethiopia is under internal colonization.
TPLF is a minority parasitic regime currently bleeding, wounding, imprisoning, selling, killing and terrorizing Ethiopians for the last 26 years.It is private company which controls Ethiopia under the pretext of politicalparty owned by an elite ultra Tigrayans and pro-Eritrean secession family members. It owns the Ethiopian economy, military, foreign affair, securityand all the important sector of the society.
TPLF shield itself under Tigrayan people as if it's legitimate representative.TPLF doesn't represent the Tigray people which itself comprise 6% of Ethiopian population. The majority Tigrayans in Tigray live under fear anddouble oppression from TPLF. Tigreans have to stand up and denounce TPLF which has been committing all atrocities on other Ethiopians under their name.
Ethiopians need to work together to own your country. TPLF has and will never make you feel your country as your own. The treatment to their fellow Ethiopian who oppose their politics is horrendous as we recently heard the testimony Habatmu Ayalew. They will never reform or change their current practice. TPLF is unEthiopian and an internal colonizer that needs to be eradicated. Only working together and unity is the remedy forsuch ill.

EU official concerned over high number of political prisoners

Addis Ababa April 11, 2017

The European Union expressed its concerns over the large number of persons being detained or prosecuted following the anti-government protest last year which is continuing under the state of emergency. The statement came as the European Union Special Representative for HumanRights, Stavros Lambrinidis, paid a three-day official visit to Ethiopia last week.

The Special Representative noted that the 2015 general elections had resulted in a House of Representatives without any voices of the politicalopposition. Lambrinidis encouraged a genuine and inclusive political process to find a constructive way forward and to ensure greater representation of different political parties and views ahead of the 2018 and 2020 elections, according to an EU press release.

He said the release of opposition leaders and others, and the further easing of restrictions and prompt lifting of the State of Emergency, wouldsend an important signal to that direction.

Egypt to establish military base in Eritrea

By Tesfa-Alem Tekle

April 17, 2017 (ADDIS ABABA)

The Red Sea Afar Democratic Organization (RSADO), an Eritrean opposition group, claimed on Monday that the Red Sea nation had allegedly granted Egypt green light to build a military base within the country's territory.

Officials from opposition group, quoting "reliable" sources in Eritrea,claimed Asmara has allowed Cairo to acquire a military base in Noralocality at the Dahlak Island for an indefinite period of time.

The agreement, RSADO further said, comes in the wake of last week's high-level visit of the Egyptian delegation to Eritrea. An estimated 20,000to 30,000 Egyptian naval forces will be deployed at the planned base, officials from the group hinted.

As it had long been anticipated and if true, Egypt will be Africa's first andthird Arab country to build a military facility in the reclusive East African nation, currently under United Nations sanctions for arming and financingAl-Shabab, a terrorist group allied with al-Qaeda.

According to previous U.N reports, Eritrea has already leased its port townof Assab to Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates (UAE) to establish military bases to ease their coalition battle against Houthi rebels in Yemen. Concerned by Saudi and UAE military presence in Eritrea, Ethiopiawarned the two Arab nations against supporting what it said was “Asmara’s long-standing destabilizing agenda against Ethiopia”.

Recently, Egyptian leaders have reportedly been engaged in diplomatic efforts for regional countries including Somalia, Somaliland and Djibouti togrant them military and commercial base in their selected soil. However, none of Cairo’s efforts were reportedly successful, prompting the opposition group to disclose this matter.

Who is responsible for the garbage dump termed as "Qoshe"?

Excerpted from F. A. Wondmagegn April 17, 2017PART ONE HUMAN RIGHTS

Article 14 Rights to life, the Security of Person and Liberty Every personhas the inviolable and Be inalienable right to life the security of person and liberty.

Article 15 Right to Life Every person has the right to life. No person maybe deprived of his life except as a punishment for a serious criminal offence determined by law.

A huge mountain of garbage “Queshe” a dump site for the past 50 years collapsed in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, the capital of Africa on Saturday March11, killing at least 115 people, with unknowns more still missing. The tragedy isn't the first of its kind, according to a piece on the disaster in the American Geophysical Union's Landslide Blog, http://blogs.agu.org/landslideblog/2017/03/17/koshe-1/ but it is the deadliest such incident in years.

Regardless how and why it happened? The big question to such disaster and many atrocities committed by the government in Ethiopia for the past25 years: who is responsible? How is the golden scriptures of the constitution not implemented? We can ask so many questions, however, the EPRDF government will never admit nor admitted to any wrong doing to any situation any time. When the government of Ethiopia breach the law of the land, where and how can victims seek justice?

After visiting the remaining victims of this garbage disaster, the mayor ofAddis Ababa, Deriba Kuma promised to set up a special committee that will be chaired by him and investigate the cause of the disaster and whichwill recommend appropriate action. Also, the mayor said people whose family members died in the collapse have received money ranging from $430 to $650 each, and that they would be resettled permanently in thecoming years. This is the typical response to any disaster or crimes committed by its irresponsible official from any government official in Ethiopia.

No government official took any responsibility for the disaster thathappened on March 11, 2017.

According to Ethiopian Satellite Television Report on March 30, some of the survivors from this disaster were told to get lost or just go away wherever they want without any compensation, though the government media were reporting that hundreds of millions of birr was donated by many individuals and corporations. Like many African countries, the government of Ethiopia, led by EPRDF, for the past 26 years has written constitution, laws and by laws that the ruling party or class don't intend toabide by. So as a former resident of Addis Ababa, and a citizen of Ethiopia, I ask, "who is responsible for "Qoshe"? Where can we go to seekjustice for the victims?"

Report: 669 killed in Ethiopia violence since August

Government-backed report comes after independent rights groups are denied access to conduct probe into violence.

ADDIS ABABA April 19, 2017:

Almost 700 people have been killed during violence in Ethiopia since August 2016, a government-sponsored commission has said, bringing thetotal death toll since the unrest began in late 2015 to more than 900.

Ethiopia declared six months of emergency rule in October after almost ayear of anti-government violent protests in its Oromia, Amhara and SNNPregions. In March, the measure was extended by four months amid reports of continuing violence in some remote areas.

The Ethiopian Human Rights Commission - mandated by parliament to investigate the violence - presented its long-awaited findings on Tuesday.The commission blamed a lot of the violence on opposition groups, sayingthat security forces in some places had no choice but to respond with lethal force. "The violence happened because the protesters were using guns and so security forces had no other option," Addisu Gebregziabher, the commission's head, told members of parliament.

The report, the second by the commission, said police used "proportionateforce" in most areas during the unrest, but could have provided better security during the rallies. It said that since August the unrest claimed 495 lives - 462 civilians, 33 security personnel - in Oromia; 140 - 110 civilians and 30 security personnel - in Amhara; and 34 in the SSNP regional states.

Last year, the commission's first investigation said that 173 people in Oromia and 95 people in Amhara had been killed between November 2015and August 2016. "The commission here is blaming a lot of the violence on what it describes as the opposition both in Ethiopia and abroad using social media to stoke the unrest," Al Jazeera's Charles Stratford, reportingfrom inside Ethiopia's parliament in the capital, Addis Ababa, said.

"The government has denied access to any independent international rights organisation to come to Ethiopia and conduct its own investigationinto the violence," he added. "It has also made it increasingly difficult forjournalists to speak to witnesses or travel to the most badly-affected areas since the emergency law was passed in October."

Violent protests

The state of emergency, declared on October 9, was a reaction to proteststhat were especially persistent in the Oromia region. Many members of the Oromo ethnic group say they are marginalised and that they do not have access to political power, something the government denies.

A wave of anger was triggered by a development scheme for Addis Ababa,which would have seen its boundaries extended into Oromia.

Demonstrators saw it as a land grab that would force farmers off their land. The protests soon spread to the Amhara region in the north, where locals argued that decades-old federal boundaries had cut off many ethnicAmharas from the region.

The Oromo and Amhara ethnic groups together make up about 60 percentof Ethiopia's population. The country's ruling coalition, which has been in power for a quarter of a century, is controlled primarily by the Tigray ethnic group, who make up six percent of the population. Tensions reached an all-time high after a stampede in early October in which at least 52 people were crushed to death fleeing security forces at a protest that grew out of a religious festival in the town of Bishoftu.

In the following days, rioters torched several mostly foreign-owned factories and other buildings that they claimed were built on seized land.The government, though, blamed rebel groups and foreign-based dissidents for stoking the violence.

The state of emergency initially included curfews, social media blocks, restrictions on opposition party activity and a ban on diplomats traveling more than 40 kilometres outside the capital without approval. Arrests and searches without court orders were stopped, and restrictions on radio, television and theatre weredropped.

The government has repeatedly said that those responsible, including security forces, for the violence must be held accountable. No members of the security services have faced any charges for the killing of theprotesters.

Some Ethiopian politicians argue that Egypt's growing interest to secure military incursion in the Horn of Africa intends to contain Ethiopia's massive hydro-power project, which Cairo fears the multi-billion dollar dam project being built along Nile River would eventually diminish historicwater shares of the North African nation.

Redda Mulgeta, a member of Ethiopia's ruling Peoples Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), says Cairo's motive to have military presencein Eritrea was clear.

"Egyptian leaders' motive to have a military base in the soil of rival Eritreais to sabotage construction of Ethiopia's mega dam project by supporting Eritrea sponsored anti-Ethiopian elements and al-Qaeda allied Somali militant group," Mulgeta told Sudan Tribune.

"Egypt is conspiring with Eritrea to subject Ethiopia engage in proxy war with its enemy Eritrea, local armed opposition groups and further with al-Shabaab", he added.

Meanwhile, despite the various U.N reports, Eritrea has previously dismissed revelations that it has leased lands for foreign countries. Relations between Ethiopia and Eritrea has remained odd after 1998-2000 border war, which killed an estimated over 70,000 people. (ST)

Diplomatic shuttle follows news that Eritrea grants Egypt militarybase

ESAT News (April 19, 2017)

Ethiopia's Foreign Minister is in Cairo following news that arch foe Eritrea has given the nod to Egypt to establish a military base. Details of the talksare scanty but Workeneh Gebeyehu has met his Egyptian counterpart andalso president Abdel Fettah Al Sisi in Cairo.

A high level Egyptian delegation was in Asmara, Eritrea last week amid unconfirmed reports that the east African nation, which is under a UN sanction, has granted Egypt to establish a military base. Egypt will be thethird Arab country in the region to have a military base in Eritrea. Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates have already leased the port city of Assab for military base, according to the U.N.

News of the new developments has led Ethiopian officials to scramble for diplomatic solutions, as any cooperation between Egypt and Eritrea is seen as a threat by the Ethiopian side. Ethiopian officials say the move byEgypt would undermine and sabotage the construction of the mega hydro electric dam along the Nile, which Egypt says would affect its share of thewater, according to reports. Ethiopia has been accusing Eritrea and Egyptof harboring “anti Ethiopian forces,” which the two countries categoricallydeny.

Traders prevented from targeting Ethiopian Donkey Skin --EthiopiaBans Donkey Skin Trade

(20 April 2017 – For Immediate Release)

Traders have been prevented from targeting the world’s largest donkey population thanks to the Ethiopian Government, in a move which will alsosafeguard the livelihoods of millions of Ethiopia’s poorest people who depend on them.

Ethiopia’s 7.4 million donkeys have increasingly been the focus of attention for businessmen eager to fulfil a growing demand for donkey skins, which are used in a traditional Chinese medical and cosmetic remedy called ejiao. The trade, estimated to be 1.8 million skins globally,is placing at risk donkey populations all round the world but with its hugedonkey population, Ethiopia was under particular threat.

The Ethiopian government’s move has been warmly received by The Donkey Sanctuary, which has been campaigning for countries to follow thelead taken by Niger and Burkina Faso to ban the trade and export of donkey skins. Its “Under the Skin” report, launched in January this year, revealed how donkey populations around the world are being decimated by both a legal and illegal trade in donkey skins, with African countries being primary targets. Dozens of reports about cruel and illegal methods of killing donkeys for the trade have been received by The Donkey Sanctuary, revealing that some of the animals have been stolen or poached, poisoned, clubbed to death and even skinned alive.

The Donkey Sanctuary CEO Mike Baker said; “Huge numbers of donkeys could be saved from suffering by this welcome decision. It is good news for the people of Ethiopia too. In Ethiopia there is a saying among farmersthat ‘Without a donkey, you are the donkey’. Without these incredible animals, the load of carrying goods, fuel, water and everything the community needs is shouldered by people, often women and children. TheEthiopian government’s decisive action will prevent suffering of both animals and people. We congratulate them and urge other nations to follow their lead.”

Dr Bojia Endebu, Country Manager of The Donkey Sanctuary’s operationsin Ethiopia welcomed the move; “This news is a big relief to us all.

Donkeys are central to Ethiopia’s agriculture and economy and the decision speaks volumes that the government values donkeys in itssociety; and that they have listened to their people.

“This ban has come about because of public outcry. When the local donkey owning community learned of an abattoir opening in Debre Zeit (Bishoftu) to kill donkeys for their skin, they strongly opposed. When the abattoir tried to reopen in March, they knew they were not being listened to and began to talk – among themselves and to the media saying it is ‘against our culture, against our religion, against our community’. This prompted pressure on the government who listened and acted, closing theabattoir three weeks after it was back up and running. The outcome was praised by media and was a catalyst for the government to ban the trade nationwide.”

Chinese businesses have invested heavily in Ethiopia in anticipation of open access to its huge donkey population, funding the construction of atleast two large abattoirs which were due to process 200 donkeys every day.

One of these, at Debre Zeit (Bishoftu) near Addis Ababa was closed downby the local authorities on Sunday following protest from local communities. The local authority said that the killing of donkeys was against the “norms and culture of the people”. Another donkey abattoir isbeing constructed by Chinese investors in Ethiopia’s Oromia region.

News reports suggest that the biggest Chinese ejiao production company Shandong Dong-e invested 80 million Birr (£2,722,192.60) in the facility and may now take the Ethiopian government to court over their decision. There are estimates of 1.8 million donkey skins being traded globally eachyear, but other estimates suggest demand as being between 4 and 10 million skins annually.

Ethiopia now joins Mali, Senegal, Niger, Burkina Faso, The Gambia andZimbabwe in standing up to the trade. Given they now have the largestpopulation of donkeys in the world, this is a significant step forward forthe welfare of millions of donkeys globally.

Ethiopia enters its seventh month of emergency rule

April 24th 2017 AMBO

THE three-hour bus-ride to Ambo from Addis Ababa, Ethiopia’s capital, offers a glimpse into the country’s future. The road is well paved; irrigation ditches and polytunnels criss-cross commercial farmland; electricity lines leap over forested hills. The signal granting access to mobile internet is clear and constant. As the bus pulls into Ambo, a trading centre in Oromia, the largest and most populous of Ethiopia’s nineethnically based regions, the street is bustling.

But there are signs, too, that not all is well. An army truck rolls down themain road. Federal police surround the entrance to the local university.

Unemployed young men playing snooker in bar point at a building across the road: it used to be a bank, but it was burnt down. Three years ago 17local boys were shot dead by security guards as they protested on the doorstep, the young men say.

Ambo has a reputation for dissent. It was on these streets that protestsagainst authoritarian rule started in 2014 before sweeping across the country. They culminated in the declaration of a six-month state of emergency on October 9th last year.

Students from Ambo University led the charge in opposing a since-shelvedplan to expand the capital city into surrounding farmland. Oromo identity is especially powerful here: locals speak angrily about being pushed aside by ethnic Tigrayans, who they say dominate the government despite making up less than 6% of the population.

The country’s leading opposition politician, Merera Gudina—who was charged with inciting terrorism in February and was scheduled to appear in the dock on April 24th—comes from this area. When the ruling Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) extended the emergency law for another four months (albeit after watering down its most draconian provisions) on March 30th, it was because of places like Ambo. Hundreds of its citizens have been arrested and subjected to months of “re-education” in military camps. Although stability has more orless returned to Ethiopia there are still young men across Oromia and Amhara, the second-largest region, who talk of protesting once more when the state of emergency is eventually lifted.

Not everyone feels this way. There may have been plenty of raised eyebrows when the prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, told Parliament on March 15th that 82% of Ethiopians wanted the state of emergency extended. But few want a return to disorder, and many admit that further emergency rule might not be so bad. Shopkeepers and restaurant owners in particular recall that businesses—as well as schools—were closed for months during the unrest. “Peace and security is more valuable than anything,” says a weary pharmacist.

Yet the challenge of addressing both the frustrations of angry youngstersand the concerns of anxious property owners is one the EPRDF is struggling to solve. Ethiopia’s economy is still growing at a healthy 7% a year, one of the fastest rates in Africa, even though drought has again hitlarge parts of the country. Foreign investment, which the government is promoting energetically, has held up surprisingly well. But with political freedom now a thing of the past, the government's legitimacy rests on it delivering the prosperity it has long promised to all its citizens.

Its response to the crisis has, therefore, been primarily an economic one. Its top priority is to reduce youth unemployment, of at least 30% in urbanareas. It hopes to do so through promoting industrial parks such as the one in the southern town of Awassa, which opened in 2016. It is Africa's largest and is expected to provide 60,000 jobs. But even the largest industrial parks are still a drop in an ocean of unemployment. And since most of the jobs they provide are low-skilled, they will do little to help thehundreds of thousands of university graduates entering the job market each year. "I'm a graduate in accounting but I work as a hotel cashier," laments one exasperated Ambo resident.

Political reform has been much less of a priority. Only one regional president has lost his job, though many ought to shoulder quite a bit of the blame for the unrest because of poor governance. A cabinet reshuffle in November included some high-profile changes: an Oromo controls the foreign ministry for the first time, for instance. But dialogue with opposition parties has made little progress. They must still ask permissionto give a press conference or hold a public meeting. And an expansive anti-terrorism law, which has crimped their activities since 2009, will still be in place even when the last of the emergency provisions are lifted. Thegovernment has long promised to tackle corruption, which is the cause of much unhappiness. But there have been no high level prosecutions since October, even though tens of thousands of low-level officials have been sacked.

Alexis de Tocqueville, a 19th-century French historian, argued that the most dangerous time for a bad government is when it begins to reformitself. The EPRDF is not the ancient regime of pre-revolutionary France.But it has taken de Tocqueville's lesson to heart. It views Ethiopia as a house of cards that might easily topple. So the old model persists: development now, democracy later.

ETHIOPIA IN HISTORY

MISCELLANIOUS HISTORIC FILES OF IMPORTANCE

Historicize, Landmark Events, Diary Refreshes, Way of Life, Current Affairs, Focus News, Trends, Fame, Legends, Generalknowledge et-al… expressed in bilingual ... (English/Ethiopic Ge'ez) terms. Alphabetic Africa version of Ethiopia section focuses on the cultural region consisting of Ethiopia, Eritrea, as well as parts of the Horn of Africa such as Somalia and Djibouti. It additionally covers the relationships of the horn with other regions, including Oriental and Occidental countries. The central thematic areas are history, languages, literatures, ethnology, religion, culture, society and arts. While most of the articles gear towards history, many also cover recent political economical, socio-cultural developments. Biographic entries provide information on personalities whoplayed an important role in the cultural or social life of the people, or who have contributed greatly to the knowledge of the region. Several authors from various countries have merged their efforts to present known and innovative research results over thousands articles; illustrations and mapsoffer additional information. The use is facilitated by cross references as well as comprehensive bibliographic references.

የኢትዮጵያ ፊደልና የኢትዮጵያ ቋንቋዎች፤

መምህራኑ የሚወስዱት አጠገባቸውያገኙትን ፊደል ነው"ባልኩት መሠረት፡ የአማራ መምህራን የግዕዝን ፊደል ወሰዱ።

አንደኛ፡ አጻጻፋችን ከቋንቋውጋር አብሮ ይሄዳል። ቋንቋውሲለወጥ አጻጻፉም (the Spelling)አብሮ ይለወጣል፤ ተለውጦ በጊዜውትክክል የሆነውቃል ይጻፋል። ለምሳሌ፡ ዱሮ "ኸየት"፡ "አንቲ"ነበር የሚባለው። ወደሸዋ ስንመጣ "ኸየት"ተለውጦ "ከየት"ሆኗል፤ "አንቲ"ከሁሉምአገር "አንቺ"ሆኗል። አጻጻፉ አብሮ የማይለወጥ ቢሆን ኖሮ፡ አሁንም የትምቦታ "ኸየት"፡ "አንቲ"እያልን እየጻፍን፡ "ከየት"፡ "አንቺ"እያልን (ያልተጻፈውን)እናነብነበር። ምሳሌውን ከእንግሊዝኛ ባመጣ የበለጠ ይብራራ ይሆናል። ለምሳሌ፡ በእንግሊዝኛ laugh, doubtየሚሉ ቃላት አሉ። ቃላቱ ተለውጠውሳለ፡ አጻጻፉ (the Spelling)ባለመለወጡአሁንም የሚጻፈው laugh, doubtእየተባለ ነው። ቃላቱ ግን ተለውጠው laf, doutሆነ ዋል። የአጻጻፍ ልምዳችን የተማርነውን ሳይሆን የምንሰማውን ነው።

የኢትዮጵያ ፊደል የሌሎች የኢትዮጵያ ቋንቋዎች መጻፊያ እንዲሆን ተሞክሮ ፈተና አልፏል። "ወድቀሃል"አንበለው። "የአማራን ባህል አያሳዩን፡ አታሰሙን"ከሚሉ ሰዎች መካከል፡ "የኢትዮጵያ ፊደል እንኳን ለሌላዎቹ ቋንቋዎች

Traditional Sources

According to traditional sources, paganism as well as Judaism were practiced side by side in Ethiopia before the introduction of Christianity. Both were the result of contact with Middle Eastern countries through commercial channels. It believed that at an early stage of Ethiopian history, the worship of the serpent was widespread and the Ethiopians offered sacrifices to it. This is confirmed to some extent by archaeological evidence found at Axum: on one of the stelae at Axum an engraving of serpent is still visible today. Though the worship of serpent was spread through almost all the countries of Middle East, we have reason to believethat this cult was introduced directly to Ethiopia from Persia. The description in Avesta, the sacred book of Persia, concerning the worship ofserpent, is identical with the tradition found in Ethiopia.

Archaeological Sources

The Sabaean migrants who crossed the Red Sea in the first millennium
B.C and settled in Ethiopia brought with them their own religion. They were polytheists, and worshipped different gods of heaven, the earth andthe sea. Almouqah (Elmouqah), for example, was the principal god of thesouth Arabian pantheon, and was retained as such in Ethiopia. Other Sabaean gods, like Astar (Astarte), corresponding to Aphrodite and Venusof the Greek and Roman world, sin the moon god shams the sun god, were widely worshipped in Ethiopia. Later, with the introduction of Greek culture into Ethiopia, worship of the Greek pantheon became widespread.In the well-known Greek inscription, left at Adulis by an anonymous Ethiopia Emperor, mention is made of Zeus, Poseidon and Aries. On the reverse of the monument appear engravings of another Greek god and demi-god, Hermes and Hercules, Aries was in fact the personal god of theEthiopian Emperors of the pre-Christian era, as shown in the frequent references made to him in epigraphic inscriptions.

After the third century, with the development of more purely Ethiopian civilization, Ethiopic names evolved for the gods then worshipped. This can be observed in the pre-Christian Ge’ez inscriptions of Emperor Ezana,where Ethiopic names replace the Sabaean or Greek names. Mahrem corresponds to Aries, Baher to Poseidon, and seamy to the Sabaean god Almouqah.

Temples, altars and statues were dedicated to gods. In Yeha there is a well-preserved temple dedicated to Almouqah. This temple was created before fifth century; it is rectangular in form with a double wall and singledoor. A similar temple to the same god existed at Hawlti-Melazo, near Axum, but it is now in ruins. A temple dedicated to Aries is found in Axumitself. Altars to the gods were also erected in various places. For example,at Kaskasse about eight kilometers northeast of Matara, there is an altar with a Sabaean dedicatory inscription to god sin, engraved with the symbols of the crescent and disc. There are also many altars bearing dedications in Sabaean to Almouqah. After his victory over the Beja people on the northern frontier of his domain, the Emperor Ezana erectedstatus in gold silver and bronze to the god Aries.

Monotheism

Information about the introduction of Judaism into Ethiopia is found in thekebre Negest, (The Glory of the king). The visit of the Queen of Sheba to King Solomon in Jerusalem is recounted there. On her return to Ethiopia she had born him a son, whom she named Menelik. When Menelik grew up he visited his father in Jerusalem, and came home accompanied by many Israelites, the sons of Levites and bringing with him the Ark of the Covenant, which he had obtained by subterfuge. From then on, Judaism was practiced in Ethiopia. It is side by some authorities that the Falasha tribes of northern Ethiopia, who practice a form of Judaism to this day, aredescendants of the Israelites. The form of Judaism professed in apparentlya development of a pre-Talmudic type of worship.

THE INTRODUCTION OF CHRISTIANITY In Abyssinya

St. Frumentius and the Conversion of Ezana c. 330 A.D

ንጉሥ በሠራዊቱ ታላቅነት አይድንም፤ ጀግናም በኀይሉ ብርታት አያመልጥም። (መዝ.ዳዊት 33፡ 16) (Noking is saved by the size of his army; no warrior escapes by his great strength -Psalms 33:16)

Although Christianity became the official religion of the Aksumite kingdomin the fourth century, the religion had been known in Ethiopia since a much earlier time. In the Acts of the Apostles, VIII: 26-40, we are told of a certain Eunuch, the treasures of Queen Candace of Ethiopia, who went to Jerusalem to worship the God of Israel. There he met Philip the Deaconand was baptized by him. Ethiopian tradition asserts that he returned home and evangelized the people. In his Homily on Pentecost, St. John Chrysostom mentions that the Ethiopians were present in the Holy City onthe day of Pentecost. Later, when the Apostles went out to preach the Gospel, Matthew was allotted the task of carrying the good news to Ethiopia, where he suffered martyrdom. Ethiopian sources, such as the Synaxarium, make no mention of this, however; on the contrary, Ethiopians believe that received Christianity without shedding apostolic blood. Nevertheless, Christianity without certainly known in Ethiopia before the time of Frumentius, being the faith practiced by many of the merchants from the Roman Empire Settled in the Aksumite region. In important cities, such as Axum and Adulis, these Christian merchants hadtheir prayer houses and openly practiced their religion.

The introduction of Christianity as the state religion of Ethiopia came about not as the result of organized evangelical activity from outside the country, but because it was the desire of the king. The story of the conversation of the Axumites has come down to us in the work of the contemporary Church historian, Rufinus (d 410 A.D). Meropius, a philosopher from Tyre, set out to visit India accompanied by two young relatives, Frumentius and Aedesius, Apparently they followed the usual itinerary of the time along the Africa coast of the Red Sea. In the course of their journey they run short of provisions and put in at a port of the African coast. The local inhabitants, however, were hostile to Roman citizens, as they massacred Meropius and all aboard the ship, sparing onlythe two boys, who were taken to the king. They soon gained his interest and won his confidence. The younger, Aedesius, he made his cup-bearer, while the elder, Frumentius, who showed signs of wisdom and maturity, become his treasurer and secretary. The king died early, leaving his wife with an infant son as heir to the throne. Now the dying king had given Frumentius and Aedesius leave to return to their own country if they so wished, but the Queen-Mother who was left as Regent, begged them to remain to help her administer the kingdom until her son should grow up. The young men agreed, and stayed to carry out the task faithfully.

The thought of Frumentius then began to turn towards matters of faith. He sought out Christians among the Roman merchants settled at Axum, and encouraged them to establish meeting-places for prayer, helping thenin every way he could, according them favours and benefits, and gradually spreading the seed of Christianity among the people. The young king himself became a convert. When he was old enough to rule the country alone, Frumentius and Aedesius asked him for permission to leave Axum. Aedesius returned home to Tyre, but Frumentius went to Alexandria and laid the whole affair before the newly-appointed patriarch, Athanasius, begging him to appoint a bishop to minister to the needs of the growing Christian community at Axum. The patriarch summoned a council of priests to consider the matter. It was agreed that Frumentius himself should be consecrated as the first Bishop of Axum. Thus he returned to propagate the faith in the land he knew so well so well. Although Rufinus does not specify the name of the country to which Frumentius went, othersources are more specific in this respect. A letter from the Emperor Constantius, written in 356 A.D to his “precious brothers”, Aezana and Saezana, rulers of Axum, concerns the Bishop Frumentius. Furthermore, the inscriptions and coins of the Emperor Ezana testify to his adoption of Christianity. In his earlier inscriptions he styles himself “Son of unconquered Mahrem”, but in the inscription after his victory over Nubia the employed anew terminology, speaking of “the Lord of heaven and earth”, and describing how he had destroyed the “images in their temples”, thus affirming his dissociation from paganism. A recently discovered Greek inscription belonging to Ezana leaves no doubt on this matter. It begins: “in the faith of God and the power of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost”. Likewise, the coins minted in the early part of Ezana’s reign bear the pagan symbol of the crescent and disc, while thoseminted in the later part of his reign bear the sign of the cross.

The introduction of Christianity as the state religion marked a turning point in Ethiopia history. Christianity does not constitute a purely religiousphenomenon on the country, but plays an integral role in all aspects of national life. The Church is not only a religious institution, but has for many centuries been the repository of the cultural, political and social life of the people. The true feeling of the people who first received Christianityseems to have been expressed in the names they bestowed upon Frumentius, which are Abba Salama. Kassate Berhan, “Father of peace and Revealer of light”. It is interesting to note that Ezana and Saezana appear to have baptized with names also signifying illumination – Abreha (He illuminated) and Atsbeha (He brought the dawn).

In Ethiopia, the diffusion of Christianity did not follow the same pattern as in the Graeco-Roman world, where Christianity was confined to the lower levels of society for three centuries, and utterly rejected by the ruling classes. Only at the beginning of the fourth century did it begin to gain a few converts among members of the imperial family. In Ethiopia the converse was true. Christianity was introduced first in to the royal court, and from there gradually penetrated among the common people. Likewise,in the Roman Empire, the Apostles and later the Church fathers were actively engaged in the evangelization of the people; in Ethiopia, Christianity was voluntarily adopted.
The birth of Ethiopian Church took place at a time when the Arian heresywas at its peak. When Frumentius was consecrated, the Patriarchate of Alexandria, under the leadership of Athanasius, “the Column of Orthodoxy”, was the stronghold of the Nicene faith against Arianism.
Constantius expelled Athanasius, however and installed an Arian, George of Cappadocia, in his place. The first ecumenical Council, where Arius wascondemned as a heretic, took place in 325, Shortly before the establishment of the Ethiopian church, but the decision of the Council wasnevertheless regarded as binding, and Ethiopia stood by Athanasius, and the Nicene Faith. In vain, Constantius, the son of Constantine the Great, tried to bring Ethiopia onto the heresy of Arius. It was for this reason thathe addressed the orthodox group of any support, and ensures international recognition of Arianism. A certain Theophilus, a priest from Socotra, highly respected for his impeccable moral character, was entrusted with this mission to Axum, but he was apparently not even allowed to enter Aksumite territory. His mission failed, and Frumentius remained in Axum, to continue the teaching which he had learnt from Athanasius. The Ethiopian church holds Athanasius in special veneration. He was canonized as a saint, and his work, The Life of Saint Anthony, wastranslated into Ethiopic. One of the fourteen Anaphora’s of the Ethiopian Church is attributed to Athanasius. The 318 Father who participated in theFirst Ecumenical Council are also specially venerated, and another Anaphora of the Liturgy bears their name, as the Anaphora of the Three Hundred Fathers.

THE EXPANSION AND CONSOLIDATION OF CHRISTIANITY

C. 350 TO 650 A.D. Evangelistic Activities

According to the chronological lists of the Ethiopian bishops, Frumentius was succeeded by the Bishop Minas. He was apparently of Egyptian origin.From this time onward began the peculiar Alexandrian jurisdiction over Ethiopian Church, which was to last for sixteen hundred years. Throughoutthis period

Ethiopians were not considered to be eligible for consecration as bishops. Minas left certain literary works concerning his missionary activities but the major contribution in the missionary field was that of thenine Saints. They came to Axum about 480, and well received by the emperor Ella Amida and by the inhabitants of the city. The most outstanding figures among the Nine Saints were Za-Mikael Aregawi, Pantalewon, Afse, and Garima or Isaac (Yeshaq). As their names indicate, they came from different parts of the Eastern Roman Empire, such as Constantinople and Syria. They were all adherents of the same doctrine, however it seems that they left the countries of their origin because of religious differences; they were anti-Chalcedonian, and thus were persecuted by the roman emperor, who was an ardent supporter of the Chalcedonian doctrines. They went first to Egypt, and lived some years at the monastery founded by Pachomius, before proceeding to Ethiopia. In Axum they studied the language and became familiar with the people and customs. After this preparation they set out in different directions to proselytize and to introduce monastic institutions. Only two of them, AbbaLibanos and Abba Pantalewon, remained near Axum itself, the others wentfurther east of the capital and founded hermitages in the old pagan centres. Za-Mikael went to Debra Damo where the worship of the serpent had long flourished. He succeeded in eradicating the cult, and founded a monastery there. Abba Pantalewon transformed a pagan temple into a church. Abba Afse went to Yeha, the renowned Sabaean center, and likewise transformed the famous temple there into a church. The Afse went to Yeha, the renowned Sabaean center, and likewise transformed thefamous temple there into church. The efforts of the Nine Saints to wipe out paganism did not result in their persecution, as had happened in the Roman Empire, since in Axum they had the protection and support of the sovereign.

The Nine Saints also contributed greatly to the development of the Ge’ez liturgy and literature. They introduced terms and vocabulary into Ge’ez, such as Haymanote, Religion, qasis, priest, and ta’ot, idols. But their major contribution was undoubtedly their great work of Biblical translationinto Ge’ez. The work of translation had begun in part during the time of Frumentius, at that time only a few of the basic Books for worship, such as passages of the psalms, had been translated as revealed in contemporary inscriptions. The Nine Saints undertook the massive task oftranslating the whole Bible. Since they were familiar with both Syriac and Greek, they used a Syrio-Greek text for this purpose. Most probably each of the Nine Saints translated one portion of the Bible. This is why the Ethiopic version reveals considerable differences in style from one Book toanother. The Ethiopic version is one of the earliest Bible translations, and as such it is great importance in textual criticism and in establishing the original text.

The Nine Saints also translated a number of basic religious works into Ge’ez. These are of both doctrinal and literary content. Under the title of Qerllos (Cyril) were translated dogmatical treatises and homilies of the Church Fathers, in particular the work known as de Recta Fide by St.Cyril,Patriarch of Alexandria. On this book which was translated from the Greektext, is based the teaching of the Ethiopian Church. Other works translated at this period include The Ascetic Rules of Pachomius, which still today regulate the monastic life of Ethiopia, and the Life of Saint Anthony by St, Athanasius, which is still widely read in Ethiopian Church circles.

Music and Art

The coming of the Nine Saints inaugurated a new era in the liturgical life of the Ethiopian Church and in cultural development in general. Music andart Flourished. To Yared, an Aksumite scholar of the time, is attributed thecreation of Ethiopian church music. He was a disciple of the nine saints, probably of Aregawi, and composed music in three modes, which is still used in the Ethiopian church. The hymnary attributed to him is rich in inspiration and expression: perhaps it is one of the best of its kind in the orient. The influence of the nine saints extended also to art and architecture. The ruins of basilicas found in the ancient cities of Axum, Adulis and Hawlti may show a resemblance to Syriac churches. Of Aregawiat Debra Damo is the oldest existing example of Christian architecture in Ethiopia, and traces of this influence can be seen in it.

HISTORICIZE

Reflections on the History of the Abyssinian Orthodox TewahdoChurch

If is often said that, “If you can’t read the book you want, you gotta writeit,” and writing it is exactly what I did in “Reflections of the History of theAbyssinian Orthodox Tewahdo Church.” It was an intellectual as well as apersonal quest; I had a burning desire to know the story of my past.

Today there are many Abyssinians who are Muslims, Catholics and Protestants, but this is their story too; it is their heritage. It is a shared past that, irrespective of religious affiliations, binds all of us together, and as such it has to be cherished, celebrated and be used for good purposes.And it starts by knowing about it; by reading about it; and by discussing it.

The book tries to understand how Abyssinia (most of Modern-day Eritrea and Ethiopia) was favored by the three Abrahamic religions: Judaism, Christianity and Islam, and how the Orthodox Tewahdo Church has evolved to be the source of glory and quintessential identity of the people and country. The Orthodox Tewahdo Church is the oldest and most venerated institution in Abyssinia where the simple piety of the people hasremained untouched throughout its long history. It is not only a religious institution but a repository of art, music, culture, poetry, and literature which has an immense influence on the very essence of Habesha identity. It is a carrier of high culture (Gebre-Medhin, 1989). To some degree, understanding the Tewahdo Church is similar to understanding the last 17centuries of Abyssinian history and civilization. It is the unveiling of this distinctive conglomerate and its forms and expressions that had long become the store-house of the cultural, political, and social life of the people (Ullendorff, 1973, p. 93); and the unearthing of the Tewahdo fossilwhere Abyssinian history is ensconced. More importantly, it is also the religious story of how the purest prayer of Orthodox Christendom (Hansberry, 1974) had risen from the source of the Nile to the mouth where St. Mark planted his seed. It is the embodiment of the purest seedsof evangelism, the miraculous story of how the baptism of an Ethiopian eunuch on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, had given birth to the baptism of millions of Abyssinians back home.

In Praise of the Book:

Semere Habtemariam's "Reflections on the History of the Abyssinian Orthodox Tewahdo Church" is a welcome contribution to our knowledge and understanding of a crucial institution that has shaped the culture andhelped influence the politics of Ethiopia (and Eritrea).

To those who have heard of, or had the good fortune of having read the writings of Philosopher/Emperor Zera Yacob, and have had a modicum of knowledge of the various religious disputes in Abyssinian history; to thosewho have seen and marveled at the paintings at the Gondar Church of Debrebirhan Selassie; and to those who have had the rare privilege of listening to the sermons of Abune Yohannes at the Axum Tsion Church inthe late 1960s near the end of Emperor Haile Selassie's reign (as this reviewer had)….and to all the devout followers of the Ethiopian and Eritrean Orthodox faith, Semere's book is a boon. It is a welcome companion and an essential guide to understand the significance of what he calls the Abyssinian (i.e., Ethiopian and Eritrean) Orthodox Tewahdo Church—its origin, development, challenging history and its impact on the life of the people and governments of Ethiopia as well as of highland Eritrea. Semere's book, based on an immense research and personal thought, plus a devotion to the faith, may raise some eyebrows but will excite and inform all readers irrespective of their own religious orientation.It is indeed a timely and welcome addition to the scant literature on the subject. I recommend it highly.

የጥንቱ የኢትዮጵያ አፈ ታሪክ “አንድ ሽሕ ዓመት ያህል ከልደተ ክርስቶስ በፊት፣ ባገራችን ሊቃውንትና መምህራን ነበሩበት ...እስከ ዛሬ ድረስም ሊቅ፣ መምህርና ደራሲ አልጠፉበትም”ይላል። ቢሆንም አፈ ታሪኩ ከክርስቶስ ልደት በፊት ከብሉያት በቀር ሌላ ዓይነት መጻሕፍት መኖር አለመኖራቸውን አያመለክትም።

ይህን አፈ ታሪክ የሚነግሩ መጻሕፍት ባገራችን መጻፍ የጀመሩት ከ1300ኛ ውዓመተ ምሕረት ወዲህ ነው። ሽሕ ዓመት ከዚያ በፊት ለሕዝቡ ወንጌል ተሰብኮለት ነበር። በሽሕ ዓመት ውስጥ የመጽሐፍ ቅዱስ አሳብ፣ በአሕዛብነት የነበረበትን ዘመን እንዲጠየፈው፣ የሕዝበ እሥራኤልን መጻሕፍትና አሳብእንዲወድ አድርጎት ስለ ነበረ፣ ጥቂት በጥቂት የገዛ ራሱን ታሪክ እየዘነጋ፣ የእስራኤል ልጅ ነኝ ከማለትና የእስራኤል ሕዝብ የጻፋቸውን መጻሕፍት፣ አያቶቼየጻፏቸውናቸው ከማለት ደርሷል።

እንደዚኸው ሁሉ የኢትዮጵያን ታሪክ በአዲሱ የምርመር አካሔድ የሚከታተል ሰው፣ ታሪኩን በሌላ መንገድ ያስረዳል እንጂ፣ ስለ ንግሥት ሳባና ስለ ሰሎሞን የሚነገረውን መሠረት አያደርግም። ስለዚህም ከልደተ ክርስቶስ በፊት መጻሕፍት በኢትዮጵያ ኑረውእንደሆነ የደረሱበትን ለማወቅ ቸግሮናል እንላለን እንጅ (ሕዝበ እስራኤል በሰሎሞን ዘመን የሙሴን መጻሕፍት መሰብሰብ ገና ሲጀምር) እነዚህ መጻሕፍት ድሮ ባገራችን ነበሩ ለማለት ይቸግረናል።

The Author of Deliverance: Prof. Bereket Habte Selassie,

A Tale of Colliding Passions and the Muse of Forgiveness

Based on extensive research and well-written, "Reflections on the History of the Abyssinian Orthodox Tewahdo Church" represents a significant addition to the existing body of knowledge on the evolution of the Orthodox Tewahdo Church; the basic tenets of its theology, liturgy and rituals; and the preeminent role the Church has played in conserving, defending and developing the multiple facets of Abyssinian literary culturefor nearly seventeen hundred years. In a very real sense, the book connects, in systematic fashion, the dots in the relevant literature to dateand surveys the writings, teachings and practices of the Church as it evolved over the centuries. Branched into the Eritrean and Ethiopian Churches since Eritrea's de facto independence in 1991, the Abyssinian Orthodox Tewahdo Church remains the repository of spiritual guidance and moral compass for tens of millions of adherents in the two countries.

I congratulate Semere Habtemariam for his excellent work and highly commend the book. On top of being a gifted writer, Semere is a committed pro-democracy activist with a demonstrated capacity to reach out and work with the entire spectrum of the various hues and colors of the Eritrean Diaspora political opposition in search of common ground. In an era punctuated by the resurgence and proliferation of sectarian politicsand its destructive consequences, I believe that "Reflections on the History of the Abyssinian Orthodox Tewahdo Church", in highlighting the history of essentially harmonious coexistence between Christianity and Islam in Abyssinia, would contribute to the continuity of religious harmonyin modern-day Eritrea and Ethiopia. Source: A Book by Semere Tesfamicael Habtemariam

Church Organization

After the expansion of Christianity there was at least four dioceses in Ethiopia, each headed by a bishop. The chief of these was obviously the metropolitan of Axum. The second most important diocese was Adulis; it was through this ancient port that Christianity was first introduced to Ethiopian. As we have already mentioned, all the bishops were of Egyptianorigin. They were closely associated both dogmatically and judicially with the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria. The latter sent Egyptian bishops to Ethiopia whenever necessary until the rise of Islam. To perpetuate his Egyptian suzerainty over the Ethiopian church, it became necessary to adduce legal justification. The Egyptians therefore inserted the forty- second Pseudo-Canon of the Council of Nicea, prohibiting the Ethiopians from occupying hierarchical positions. The authenticity of this Article was highly suspect to the Ethiopian clergy, but was nevertheless respected until the thirteenth century, when a new wave of independence arose.
Once again it become necessary for the Egyptians, who did not wish to relinquish their prerogative, to renew the prohibition, and the same Articlewas inserted in the Fetha Negest, the politico- religious code under which the country was governed for more than six hundred years. Thus, an Egyptian bishop always remained at the head of the Ethiopian Church from its foundation up to the second half of the 20th century. This is a unique phenomenon in the history of the Christian Church.

The rise of Islam and its impact on Ethiopia

The period following the rise and the rapid expansion of Islam in the near and the Middle East was a very critical one for the Christian kingdom of Axum. The whole civilization and culture of Axum, as well as its economiclife, was based on its international maritime connections, Ever since the Ptolemeys had taken a scientific and economic interest in the Red Sea area, Axum had become an integral part of the Hellenic world. Axum heldthe same position also during the Roman and Byzantine Empires. It was indeed not a mere coincidence that the Church in Axum was established immediately after the Emperor Constantine made Christianity the state religion of his Byzantine dominions. There seems to be no doubt, now, that there were many individual Ethiopian and foreign Christian's residingin the Aksumite kingdom, even before the formal establishment of the Church there. But the crucial step taken by Ezana to adopt the new religion and to make it a state Church followed upon a similar imperial decision by Constantine. It was also from the Eastern Mediterranean that the first Christian missionaries come to Axum. Abuna Salama and others such as the Nine Saints came from the Byzantine world, and endowed theAksumite Church with its earliest characteristics. These regular contacts continued down to the seventh century, and all-important economic, political, and religious developments in the Byzantine world were also reflected in Axum. With the rapid Muslim conquest, however, these historical channels of communication were almost completely cut off. Onlywith the Alexandrian Church did Christian Ethiopia continue to have precarious contact.

Before the rise of Islam, Axum was an extensive maritime and commercialEmpire. In its heyday, it ruled many districts in the southwestern part of the Arabian Peninsula, across the Red Sea. It controlled the land of the Beja, a people who inhabited northern Eritrea and what northeastern part of the Republic of the Sudan. In the west, the political and military sphereof influence of Axum had already reached the Nile valley by the fourth century A.D. Beyond the River Takazz'e, the district of Semien and probably also the region as far as Lake Tana were within its territorial limits. However, it was in the south, in the predominantly Agew populatedareas of Tigrai, Wa'ag, Lasta, Anogot and Amhara where the heritage of Axum struck its deepest roots. When almost completely excluded from theRed Sea trade, and having lost its maritime international orientation, the kingdom of Axum turned towards this Agew interior, and made it the center of a distinctive Christian culture over the centuries.

The rulers of Axum had acquired strong footholds in these central highlands already before the establishment of the Christian Church in the kingdom. They sent numerous expeditions of war and conquest into theseareas from where they obtained tribute and a continuous supply of ivory, gold, and slaves. The Aksumite governor of the Agew was responsible forthe long-distance caravan route to Sassou-some where near Fazolgi in eastern Sudan –from where Axum obtained much gold. These precious commodities were used for the international trade across the Red Sea inwhich Aksum was most active.

After their conversion to Christianity the kings of Aksum consolidated theirpower by establishing churches and military colonies in these central highlands. There are still today a number of churches many of them dug out of the living rock in Tigrai and Lasta-which are attributed to the early Christian kings of Aksum. These churches and military settlements became centers of still further movements of small family groups from themore crowded parts of northern Ethiopia. In this way, the areas as far south as the region of northern Shoa were gradually affected by these slow population movements. Local traditions indicate that already in the tenth and eleventh centuries a number of small isolated Christian families had been established in the districts of Menz, Merhabite, Muger, and Bulgain northern Shoa. The spear head of Aksumite expansion may have even further south and east. This seems to be suggested by the geographical distribution of some of the Semitic languages of Ethiopia-Amharic, Argobba, Harari, Guragi, and Gafat.

All these regions in which the Aksumite were expanding were originally pagan lands, and the people spoke different Cushitic language. We have no historical data to show how these people lived, and how they were socially and politically organized before the advent of Aksumite rule. Whenthe Aksumite conquered them, however, they imposed upon them their own religion, language, and Political organization. It was this Aksumite impact on the Agew and Sidama interior of the Ethiopian region which resulted in the creation of a number of small, predominantly pagan kingdoms of which we have distant echoes in the traditions of early and late mediaeval Ethiopia. Among these, were the political units of the Athagaw (=Agew) mentioned in the inscriptions the Aksumite kings against whom fought long wars of resistance; the Semenoi (that is, the ancient people of Semien) who also fought against, and were conquered by the Aksumite; the pagan kingdom of Gojjam, (also of Agew extraction),which was only integrated into the Christian Kingdom of Ethiopia in the fourteenth century; and the legendary kingdom of Damot (probably inhabited by Southern Cushitic or Sidama peoples),which was still very strong between the tenth and thirteenth centuries in the whole region south and south-west of Shoa.

The beginnings of the Zagwe' Dynasty

One of these political units, the kingdom of Bugna in Lasta, later emergedin the twelfth century as the most dominant single power in the region, and took control of the inland Empire that was once ruled by Aksum. The new rulers are collectively known as the Zagwe Dynasty in Ethiopian history and the y ruled the world of the Christian kingdom until the last quarter of the thirteenth century. The power of Aksum had declined, and her commercial supremacy in the Red Sea area had been taken first by the Persians and later by the huge Muslim Empire which dominated the whole of the near and Middle East and Northern Africa. The descendants of the ancient rulers of Aksum thus lost their Red Sea ports and much of the semi- desert coastal strip, and they seem to have concentrated their attention on their inland provinces south of Aksum. Even Aksum was apparently abandoned as a political center by the ninth century, and the center of gravity of the Christian kingdom moved to the region of southernTigrai and what is today northern Wollo.

For about three centuries this area remained the center of the kingdom, which revived, once again, with a new identity as a land-locked Christian Empire. It entered a new period of conquest and expansion, and, according to an Arab historian of the tenth century, its political sphere of influence reached the region of Harar and Zeila. The same historian tells us, however, that in the middle of the same century the kingdom had suffered a number of military reverses, and the southern part of its territory was conquered by an apparently pagan queen, the queen of the Banu al-Hamuiyya, who had diplomatic and commercial relations with theMuslim kingdom of Yemen. The new political situation seems to have brought about a period of decline and internal conflict in the Christian kingdom. But the kingdom held on in the northern part of its territories unit the new Zagwe rulers took over in the middle of the twelfth century as we have mentioned earlier.

The term "Zagwe dynasty" means the dynasty of the Agew. As already stated above its rulers came from the district of Bugna, in Lasta. Their homeland was apparently one of the most important strongholds of the Agew people in their centuries-old relations with the Semitized Agew kingdom of Aksum. It was probably here that the armies of ancient Aksumwere confronted with very strong movements of resistance when they were expanding southwards. It was also probably here that the Aksumite governor of the Agew had his headquarters from where he protected the long-distance gold trade of Aksum in the sixth century. All the dialectical groups of the Agew peoples consider this region as the land of their ancestors, and as a point of dispersal in their traditions of population movements. It was therefore not accidental that the Agew dynasty of Christian Ethiopia should emerge from precisely the same area.

The Agew people of Wa'ag and Lasta had already been within the Aksumite kingdom since the early centuries of the Christian era. It has already been said above that many churches in this area are attributed tothe early Christian kings of Aksum. It was also in southern Tigrai and in Angot (northern Wollo), just next door to Wa'ag and Lasta, that the Christian kingdom had its political center for three centuries after the decline and fall of Aksum. The Agew peoples of these areas had thereforebeen profoundly acculturized by the Aksumite kingdom, and they had even adopted Christianity as their religion. The Agew kings of the Zagawedynasty were therefore completely Christian from the start. They had, however, successfully resisted complete assimilation, particularly in a linguistic sense. Thus, although it is certain that they used Ge'ez as the language of their church services; they apparently continued to use theirAgew mother tongue for their daily needs. Signs of this bi-linguality are clearly seen in some of the land charters given by the Zagwe kings in Ge'ez. In the major aspects of their rule, however, the Zagwe kings continued the cultural and political legacy of Aksum.

REVIVAL OF THE CHURCH (1200-1526)

The capital of the Zagwe kings was at Adefa, at the present site of the town of Lalibela. From here they continued the Aksumite imperial traditionof conquest and Christian expansion here at Adefa they received and entertained many delegations from the Patriarchate of Alexandria, and probably also from the Muslim rulers of Egypt. Kings Yimrha and Lalibela, the greatest kings of the Zagwe dynasty, had many such contacts with theeastern Mediterranean region and particularly with Egypt. The traditions about the building of the beautiful churches of Yimrahanne Kristos and theLalibela group of rock-hewn churches are dominated by allusions to such international contacts. The characteristic aspects of the building of these religious monuments are essentially loyal, however, to the best traditions of Aksumite architectural art. Thus, although it can be surmised that the Zagwe kings may have used artisans from the eastern Mediterranean countries, the conception of the building was clearly indigenous and no doubt derived from the Aksumite heritage of the Zagwe dynasty.

Translations of many religious works from Arabic into Ge'ez are also said to date from this period. Despite later traditions to the contrary, therefore,the living achievements of the Zagwe dynasty clearly show that the periodwas one of cultural and literary revival in the Christian kingdom.

The 'Solomonic" Dynasty

This dynasty was overthrown by Yikunno-Amlak, an Amhara warrior of thecentral province of what is now Wollo, which constituted the southern partof the Zagwe kingdom. Besides Yikunno-Amlak's successful revolt against the Zagwe, a number of crucial historical factors brought about this drastic political change in the Christian kingdom.

Ever since the rise of Islam at Mecca, in the 7th century, the Aksumite had been losing their ancient ports and islands to the increasingly, dominant Muslim merchants of the red Sea. From these marker stations on the seaboard, the Muslim merchants operated in the Christian highlands throughout the early mediaeval period. They gradually made a number of local converts to Islam, mainly in the major market villages and along the caravan routes. The right of public worship and free trade ofthese local Muslim converts was strongly championed by Muslim rulers of Egypt who could always put pressure on the Christian Ethiopian kings through the Patriarchate of Alexandria. Until the tenth century it is very clear that these local Muslims were few in number, and their activities in the Ethiopian region were purely commercial in character. After the tenth century, however, their number began to grow and many Muslim settlements were established. These erstwhile commercial Muslim settlements gradually assumed much political significance. This historicaldevelopment was particularly true of the hinterland of the port of Zeila which was becoming the most important commercial outlet for the Ethiopian region. By the twelfth and the thirteenth centuries a number ofsmall Muslim sultanates were established along the trade routes from Zeila to Ethiopian interior. The most important among these were the sultanates of Shoa, Ifat, Dawaro, and Bali. Since all these Muslim states were situated to the south and southwest of the central Ethiopian highlands, the Zagwe kingdom was growing more and more isolated andwas receiving no benefits from the commercial exploitation of the rich regions of southern Ethiopia. The province of Amhara lay between the seat of Zagwe power in Lasta and these rich areas, and, when Yikunno- Amlak raised his banner of revolt in Amhara, the isolation of the Zagwe rulers became complete.

The dynasty founded by Yikunno-Amlak in 1270 is called the “Solomonic” dynasty. This appellation is a result of an historical process that seems to have started in the early mediaeval period. After the decline of Aksum, theChristian kingdom was surrounded by Muslim and pagan neighbors and was isolated from the rest the Christian world except the Alexandrian Church. During all this period the most important religious book in the possession of the Ethiopians was the Holy Bible which they took much inspiration. Taking accounts probably of the similar beleaguered circumstances, the Ethiopians began to identify themselves with Israel, and to deliberately imitate and adopt many of the institutions of the Old Testament. The most important expression of this attitude is the gradual identification of the Ethiopian ruling house with the family of king Solomonof Israel. This tradition is embodied in the Kebre Negest, compiled in the thirteenth century, which tells the Ethiopic version of the legend of the Queen Sheba. The Solomonic tradition was particularly important after Yikunno-Amlak founded his dynasty. All his descendants adopted the name of the “House of Israel”, and no one who did not belong to this house could accede to the throne in the whole of the late mediaeval period. All the male descendants of Yikunno-Amlak, expect the reigning monarch and his miner sons, were kept under heavy guard on the inaccessible mountain top of Gishen. When a king died, it was form amongthe detained princes on Mount Gishen that his successor was chosen. This ingenious device gave a high degree of political stability to the mediaeval Christian kingdom, a stability which was essential in that period of intensive struggle with the numerous Muslim sultanates that had been established in the south and the south-eastern part of the Ethiopian region.

Yikunno-Amlak's grandson, king Amde-Seyon (1314-44), dealt effectivelywith these Muslim king lets in the area. His quarrel with them was not merely religious. He wishes to control their commercial activities by conquering the areas through which the trade routes passed, and break the age-old isolation of his kingdom. In a series of long wars he conqueredIfat, Dawaro, Bali, Hadya, and the pagan regions to the west and southwest of these centers of Muslim trade. From this time on Christian kingdom maintained its dominant position until the sixteenth century.

Just as in the preceding period of the Zagwe dynasty, the major aspects of the social, cultural, and military organization of the mediaeval Christiankingdom were a direct replica of the Aksumite kingdom. The "Solomonic" kings of mediaeval Ethiopia maintained the imperial traditions of ancient Aksum which remained their cultural and religious centre to the end of theperiod. Unlike the kings of Aksum, however, they did not build fixed urbancenters or capital cities. They administered their huge unwieldy Empire from a series of peripatetic royal camps which nevertheless had the same functions as permanent towns or cities. This arrangement increased the mobility of the royal court, and the effectiveness of the Christian army against local revolts. In a vast empire with numerous big rivers, great mountains and spectacular valleys, without roads and bridges, the task ofmaintaining sufficient control over their heterogeneous subjects would have otherwise been impossible for the mediaeval kings of Ethiopia.

The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church (EOTC) Faith and OrderMonasticism and the Expansion of the Church

It was within this historical milieu that the Church was making its impact felt in the Ethiopian interior. It has been mentioned in the second section above that the nine saints had instituted the earliest monasteries in the Aksumite kingdom. It is apparent that, together with monasteries other monastic communities later established in Tigre and Lasta, these ancient monasteries continued to be the cultural continued to provide educationalfacilities for the whole of the Ethiopian Christian leaders in mediaeval Amhara and northern Shoa, it is very clear that any ambitious young manhad to travel all the way to northern Ethiopia to obtain any serious religious and literary training. When they returned to their native districts,some of these men opened small schools where they taught some of the local children how to read and write. But until the middle of the thirteenthcentury, it seems that none of these small local schools in the south attained any particular significance beyond providing very elementary educational service for a handful of local children.

In about 1248, however, a young monk, Iyasus-Mo'a (c.1211-1292) cameto Lake Hayq and opened a small monastic school at the island church of St. Stephen. Iyasus-Mo'a was born in Dahna, a small district of Lasta bordering on the River Takazze. While still a young boy, he abandoned hishome district, traveled to northern Tigre, and joined the famous monastery of Debra Damo. There, he studied for many years under the abbot, Abba Yohanni, who later conferred on him the monastic habits.
Iyasus-Mo'a had been a very serious student, and he had particularlydistinguished himself as an outstanding calligraphist.
He apparently copied many books while at Debra Damo, and he is renowned for having left a large collection of manuscripts when he died atHayq in 1292. The school he opened at Hayq becomes very famous as thefirst center of higher Christian education south of Lasta. Many young menfrom the surrounding Christian communities joined his school. According to the hagiographic tradition about his life, one of his pupil was the founder of the "Solomonic" dynasty, King Yikunno-Amlak (1270-1285), and there are more reliable indications that the island monastery of Lake Hayq continued to be one of the most important cultural centers of the "Solomonic" kings until the advent of Ahmad Gragn in the first half of the sixteenth century.

Many of Iyasus-Mo'a's pupils later acquired considerable fame as monasticleaders of the Ethiopian Church. Abba Hiruta-Amlak is believed to have been the founder of the important island monastery of Daga Estifanos on Lake Tana. Many others are said to have founded similar monastic communities in mediaeval Amhara and central Begemdir. One of the mostoutstanding pupils of Iyasus-Mo'a was Abba Takel-Haymanot of Shoa (d.1313). He apparently joined Iyasua-Mo'a's school as a middle-aged man with many years of clerical service in Shoa behind him. He spent some nine years with Iyasus-Mo'a who gave him his first serious Christianeducation. After having been invested with the monastic habits by Iyasus-Mo'a, Takel-Haymanot decided to visit the ancient monastic centers in northern Ethiopia. He went to Debra-Damo and other places in Tigre where he remained for over ten years. In the meantime, he undertook further religious and monastic training and he apparently gained a much deeper insight into the history and ecclesiastical traditions of Ethiopia. He returned to Hayq with many followers after his long sojourn in Tigre.
Iyasus-Mo'a now advised him to go back to his native district of Shoa andstart a new monastery of Debra Libanos which has become one of the most important religious centers of Christian Ethiopia.

Similar monastic leaders were emerging during the same period in northern Ethiopia, and they established other cultural centres. Abba Ewostatewos (d.1352) deserves particular mention. He was apparently born in Gar'alta, in central Tigre and he studied under his own uncle, AbbaDaniel, who was the abbot of Debra Mariam there. He then left Gar'alta and began teaching in Sara's, in what is today the province of Eritrea. There he was joined by many students who later founded their own monastic centers in the area. Ewostatewos himself was persecuted by his colleagues in the Ethiopian church for insisting on the Biblical custom of the observance of the Sabbath, and he left his country for Egypt, Palestine, Cyprus, and Armenia where he died after fourteen years of self-exile. He was accompanied by some of his pupils on his foreign travels, and some of them managed to return to Ethiopia after his death. Togetherwith their colleagues who had remained in northern Ethiopia, these followers of Ewostatewos effectively organized themselves and they become one of the two monastic houses of the Ethiopian Church. (The other is the House of Takla-Haymanot of Shoa) important cultural and educational centers like Debra Mariam of Qohain, and Dabra Bizan (on theeastern edge of the Hamasen plateau) were later founded by the followers of Abba Ewostatewos. Thus, by the fifteenth century, numerous monastic centers had been established at a number of crucial points from northern Hamasen to Lake Zuway in the south, from the eastern edge of the Ethiopian plateau to beyond Lake Tana in the west. And, just like the ancient center founded by the nine Saints, the new monastic communitiesprovided the only educational facilities available in the Christian highlands.

Development of Christian literature

Each monastic community ran a number of schools depending on its size and its resources. A senior member of the community, specially noted for his learning and for his exemplary character, was given charge of each of these schools. The monasteries of Ethiopia vied among themselves for attracting well-known teachers, and the fame and prestige of a monasterylargely depended on the quality of the teachers it employed. The courses given by each school were of course mainly religious and they depended on the level of the school.

There were mainly four general levels of education in these monastic communities. The first level concentrated on training children how to read.They started with the Ethiopic alphabet, and they were drilled into readinga series of increasingly difficult passages. The question of understanding and comprehension was not important at this stage. It was strictly a "Reading" exercise. After sunset, following the evening prayers and the community dinner time, the children of the "reading School" were taught to memorize and recite a series of increasingly difficult prayers. This "memorization exercise" often went on up to midnight.

The next stage was usually one in which courses in church Music were given at different levels. Since the days of Yared, who is believed to have been divinely inspired to compose the first notes of the distinctively Ethiopian church Music in the Sixty century, a meticulous system of courses was organized in this field. It is apparent that this elaborate program of musical studies was at the height of its development in the fifteenth and the sixteenth centuries. The Dagwa, the collection of hymnstraditionally attributed to Yared , was most probably a cumulative productof many centuries. A major aspect of the Ethiopian Church Music in the ritual dance that always accompanies the liturgical chant. Monneret de Villard, a well-known student of Ethiopian Christian art and the history of the Nile Valley, has suggested that the liturgical dance of the Ethiopians may have originated in ancient Egypt. But in its contemporary manifestations a religious musical performance of the Ethiopian priests is strongly reminiscent of the dancing and the rejoicing of the Levites in front of the Ark of the Covenant (2 Sam. 6:2-5). A casual look at the musical instruments used by the priests clearly shows that the Ethiopianshave also drawn much inspiration from the Old Testament. The whole atmosphere created during a religious service in Ethiopia evokes the old Biblical scene transmitted in the last chapter of the book of psalms: Praisehim with the sound of the Trumpet: praise him with the psaltery and harp.Praise him with the timbrel and Dance: praise him with stringed instruments and organs. Praise him upon the lord cymbals: Praise him upon the high sounding Cymbals.

The third stage of education was usually what can be called the “Poetry School”. It has not been possible to find out the definite origins of this school, nor to ascertain the earliest period of its establishment. But there is no doubt that it had already developed by the fifteenth century, and it constituted one of the advanced level of education in Christian Ethiopia. The most important aim of this school was to increase the level of comprehension of the Church scholar and to make him a master of the Ethiopic Grammar. An essential element of the training here is drilling the student to compose poems of different level. In the evening, the student recited before his master the poems he had composed for the day, and the master commented on the form and the aesthetic qualities of the poems. When the student reached a tolerable degree of excellence the master promoted him to the next level. After all the students had finished reciting their poems, they gathered around the master who composed spontaneously a series of original poems. These were often known for their outstanding qualities in both form and content, qualities which the student vied among themselves to master explained what he meant by the lines of the poem, and this was followed by groups of his students meticulously analyzing with him each of the words of every line to appreciate their grammatical and syntactical place in the poem. This session often went on well beyond midnight every day, and it was the major occasion when the scholars could have the personal guidance of their master. To pass through the eight or nine stages of this “Poetry School” a student often needed more than two years; but if the scholar had the intention of becoming a master himself, he usually spent as manyas ten years visiting as many different masters as possible. The “Poetry School” was one of the most prestigious institutions to have gone through,and its inmates could hope for some of the highest positions in both Church and State.

The next and last stage was the mastery of the interpretations of all the canonical books of the Church. The Ethiopian clergy had developed an elaborate system of analytical studies of each of the books of the Old and New Testaments. The Canons of the Church were also studied in the samemeticulous fashion with a lot of legal hair-splitting. These studied were so detailed that there was sometimes a special master for each of the Books of the Old and New Testaments, as well as for some of the apocryphal works of the Church.

These were the different stages of education in mediaeval Ethiopia. Although the content of the program was strictly religious, there is no doubt that it solved the essential problem of developing the intellectual faculties of the scholar, and it prepared him for specific roles in the mediaeval Ethiopian community. What is more important is that the graduates of the monastic school system were employed not only in the Church but in all various administrative, judicial, and other department ofthe State. Nor was it with the limited prospect of leadership in the Churchthat students went to those schools. Indeed many of the royal princes who later ascended the throne –kings like Dawit (1380 -1412), Zar'a Ya'iqob (1434-68), and Na'od (1494-1508) are known to have attended such schools. Zar'a Ya'iqob and Na'od were particularly noted for their considerable scholarship, and they were the authors of a number of important original compositions in the Ethiopic language. Prolific writers such as King Zar'a Ya'iqob and Abba Giyorgis of Gascha were products of the great monastic schools of the fifteenth century. The literary and artistic achievements of mediaeval Ethiopia were indeed outstanding.
Many translations from Arabic, and numerous original Ge'ez works date from that period. A short visit to the Museum of the Institute of Ethiopia studies at Haile Sellassie I University also gives some idea of the works ofChristian art of those times. The library collections of the numerous islandand mainland monasteries throughout Christian Ethiopia, even today, area living testimony to the splendor of cultural life in mediaeval Ethiopia.

A PERIOD OF CONFLICT (C. 700 – 1200 A.D)
Professor Taddese Tamerat
The rise of Islam and its impact on Ethiopia
The period following the rise and the rapid expansion of Islam in the nearand the Middle East was a very critical one for the Christian kingdom of Axum. The whole civilization and culture of Axum, as well as its economiclife, was based on its international maritime connections, Ever since the Ptolemeys had taken a scientific and economic interest in the Red Sea area, Axum had become an integral part of the Hellenic world. Axum heldthe same position also during the Roman and Byzantine Empires. It was indeed not a mere coincidence that the Church in Axum was established immediately after the Emperor Constantine made Christianity the state religion of his Byzantine dominions. There seems to be no doubt, now, that there were many individual Ethiopian and foreign Christian's residingin the Aksumite kingdom, even before the formal establishment of the Church there. But the crucial step taken by Ezana to adopt the new religion and to make it a state Church followed upon a similar imperial decision by Constantine. It was also from the Eastern Mediterranean that the first Christian missionaries come to Axum. Abuna Salama and others such as the Nine Saints came from the Byzantine world, and endowed the Aksumite Church with its earliest characteristics. These regular contacts continued down to the seventh century, and all-important economic, political, and religious developments in the Byzantine world were also reflected in Axum. With the rapid Muslim conquest, however, these historical channels of communication were almost completely cut off. Onlywith the Alexandrian Church did Christian Ethiopia continue to have precarious contact.

Before the rise of Islam, Axum was an extensive maritime and commercialEmpire. In its heyday, it ruled many districts in the southwestern part of the Arabian Peninsula, across the Red Sea. It controlled the land of the Beja, a people who inhabited northern Eritrea and what northeastern part of the Republic of the Sudan. In the west, the political and military sphereof influence of Axum had already reached the Nile valley by the fourth century A.D. Beyond the River Takazz'e, the district of Semien and probably also the region as far as Lake Tana were within its territorial limits. However, it was in the south, in the predominantly Agew populatedareas of Tigrai, Wa'ag, Lasta, Anogot and Amhara where the heritage of Axum struck its deepest roots. When almost completely excluded from theRed Sea trade, and having lost its maritime international orientation, the kingdom of Axum turned towards this Agew interior, and made it the center of a distinctive Christian culture over the centuries.

The rulers of Axum had acquired strong footholds in these central highlands already before the establishment of the Christian Church in the kingdom. They sent numerous expeditions of war and conquest into theseareas from where they obtained tribute and a continuous supply of ivory, gold, and slaves. The Aksumite governor of the Agew was responsible forthe long-distance caravan route to Sassou-some where near Fazolgi in eastern Sudan –from where Axum obtained much gold. These precious commodities were used for the international trade across the Red Sea in which Aksum was most active.

churches and military colonies in these central highlands. There are still today a number of churches many of them dug out of the living rock in Tigrai and Lasta-which are attributed to the early Christian kings of Aksum. These churches and military settlements became centers of still further movements of small family groups from themore crowded parts of northern Ethiopia. In this way, the areas as far south as the region of northern Shoa were gradually affected by these slow population movements. Local traditions indicate that already in the tenth and eleventh centuries a number of small isolated Christian families had been established in the districts of Menz, Merhabite, Muger, and Bulgain northern Shoa. The spear head of Aksumite expansion may have even further south and east. From these marker stations on the seaboard, the Muslim merchants operated in the Christian highlands throughout the early mediaeval period. They gradually made a number of local converts to Islam, mainly in the major market villages and along the caravan routes. The right of public worship and free trade ofthese local Muslim converts was strongly championed by Muslim rulers of Egypt who could always put pressure on the Christian Ethiopian kings through the Patriarchate of Alexandria. Until the tenth century it is very clear that these local Muslims were few in number, and their activities in the Ethiopian region were purely commercial in character. After the tenth century, however, their number began to grow and many Muslim settlements were established. These erstwhile commercial Muslim settlements gradually assumed much political significance. This historical development was particularly true of the hinterland of the port of Zeila which was becoming the most important commercial outlet for the Ethiopian region. By the twelfth and the thirteenth centuries a number of small Muslim sultanates were established along the trade routes from Zeila to Ethiopian interior. The most important among these were the sultanates of Shoa, Ifat, Dawaro, and Bali. Since all these Muslim states were situated to the south and southwest of the central Ethiopian highlands, the Zagwe kingdom was growing more and more isolated and was receiving no benefits from the commercial exploitation of the rich regions of southern Ethiopia. The province of Amhara lay between the seat of Zagwe power in Lasta and these rich areas, and, when Yikunno- Amlak raised his banner of revolt in Amhara, the isolation of the Zagwe rulers became complete.

The dynasty founded by Yikunno-Amlak in 1270 is called the "Solomonic"dynasty. This appellation is a result of an historical process that seems to have started in the early mediaeval period. After the decline of Aksum, theChristian kingdom was surrounded by Muslim and pagan neighbors and was isolated from the rest the Christian world except the Alexandrian Church. During all this period the most important religious book in the possession of the Ethiopians was the Holy Bible which they took much inspiration. Taking accounts probably of the similar beleaguered circumstances, the Ethiopians began to identify themselves with Israel, and to deliberately imitate and adopt many of the institutions of the Old Testament. The most important expression of this attitude is the gradual identification of the Ethiopian ruling house with the family of king Solomonof Israel. This tradition is embodied in the Kebre Negest, compiled in the thirteenth century, which tells the Ethiopic version of the legend of the Queen Sheba. The Solomonic tradition was particularly important after Yikunno-Amlak founded his dynasty. All his descendants adopted the name of the "House of Israel", and no one who did not belong to this house could accede to the throne in the whole of the late mediaeval period. All the male descendants of Yikunno-Amlak, expect the reigning monarch and his miner sons, were kept under heavy guard on the inaccessible mountain top of Gishen. When a king died, it was form amongthe detained princes on Mount Gishen that his successor was chosen. This ingenious device gave a high degree of political stability to the mediaeval Christian kingdom, a stability which was essential in that period of intensive struggle with the numerous Muslim sultanates that had been established in the south and the south-eastern part of the Ethiopian region.

Yikunno-Amlak's grandson, king Amde-Seyon (1314-44), dealt effectively with these Muslim king lets in the area. His quarrel with them was not merely religious. He wishes to control their commercial activities by conquering the areas through which the trade routes passed, and break the age-old isolation of his kingdom. In a series of long wars he conqueredIfat, Dawaro, Bali, Hadya, and the pagan regions to the west and southwest of these centers of Muslim trade. From this time on Christian kingdom maintained its dominant position until the sixteenth century.

Just as in the preceding period of the Zagwe dynasty, the major aspects of the social, cultural, and military organization of the mediaeval Christiankingdom were a direct replica of the Aksumite kingdom. The "Solomonic" kings of mediaeval Ethiopia maintained the imperial traditions of ancient Aksum which remained their cultural and religious centre to the end of theperiod. Unlike the kings of Aksum, however, they did not build fixed urbancenters or capital cities. They administered their huge unwieldy Empire from a series of peripatetic royal camps which nevertheless had the same functions as permanent towns or cities. This arrangement increased the mobility of the royal court, and the effectiveness of the Christian army against local revolts. In a vast empire with numerous big rivers, great mountains and spectacular valleys, without roads and bridges, the task of maintaining sufficient control over their heterogeneous subjects wouldhave otherwise been impossible for the mediaeval kings of Ethiopia.

Monasticism and the Expansion of the Church

It was within this historical milieu that the Church was making its impact felt in the Ethiopian interior. It has been mentioned in the second section above that the nine saints had instituted the earliest monasteries in the Aksumite kingdom. It is apparent that, together with monasteries other monastic communities later established in Tigre and Lasta, these ancient monasteries continued to be the cultural continued to provide educationalfacilities for the whole of the Ethiopian Christian leaders in mediaeval Amhara and northern Shoa, it is very clear that any ambitious young manhad to travel all the way to northern Ethiopia to obtain any serious religious and literary training. When they returned to their native districts,some of these men opened small schools where they taught some of the local children how to read and write. But until the middle of the thirteenthcentury, it seems that none of these small local schools in the south attained any particular significance beyond providing very elementary educational service for a handful of local children.

In about 1248, however, a young monk, Iyasus-Mo'a (c.1211-1292) cameto Lake Hayq and opened a small monastic school at the island church of St. Stephen. Iyasus-Mo'a was born in Dahna, a small district of Lasta bordering on the River Takazze. While still a young boy, he abandoned hishome district, traveled to northern Tigre, and joined the famous monastery of Debra Damo. There, he studied for many years under the abbot, Abba Yohanni, who later conferred on him the monastic habits.
Iyasus-Mo'a had been a very serious student, and he had particularlydistinguished himself as an outstanding calligraphist.

He apparently copied many books while at Debra Damo, and he is renowned for having left a large collection of manuscripts when he died atHayq in 1292. The school he opened at Hayq becomes very famous as thefirst center of higher Christian education south of Lasta. Many young menfrom the surrounding Christian communities joined his school. According to the hagiographic tradition about his life, one of his pupil was the founder of the “Solomonic” dynasty, King Yikunno-Amlak (1270-1285), and there are more reliable indications that the island monastery of Lake Hayq continued to be one of the most important cultural centers of the “Solomonic” kings until the advent of Ahmad Gragn in the first half of the sixteenth century.

Many of Iyasus-Mo’a’s pupils later acquired considerable fame as monasticleaders of the Ethiopian Church. Abba Hiruta-Amlak is believed to have been the founder of the important island monastery of Daga Estifanos on Lake Tana. Many others are said to have founded similar monastic communities in mediaeval Amhara and central Begemdir. One of the mostoutstanding pupils of Iyasus-Mo’a was Abba Takel-Haymanot of Shoa (d.1313). He apparently joined Iyasua-Mo’a’s school as a middle-aged man with many years of clerical service in Shoa behind him. He spent some nine years with Iyasus-Mo’a who gave him his first serious Christianeducation. After having been invested with the monastic habits by Iyasus-Mo’a, Takel-Haymanot decided to visit the ancient monastic centers in northern Ethiopia. He went to Debra-Damo and other places in Tigre where he remained for over ten years. In the meantime, he undertook further religious and monastic training and he apparently gained a much deeper insight into the history and ecclesiastical traditions of Ethiopia. He returned to Hayq with many followers after his long sojourn in Tigre.
Iyasus-Mo’a now advised him to go back to his native district of Shoa andstart a new monastery of Debra Libanos which has become one of the most important religious centers of Christian Ethiopia.

Similar monastic leaders were emerging during the same period in northern Ethiopia, and they established other cultural centres. Abba Ewostatewos (d.1352) deserves particular mention. He was apparently born in Gar’alta, in central Tigre and he studied under his own uncle, AbbaDaniel, who was the abbot of Debra Mariam there. He then left Gar’alta and began teaching in Sara’s, in what is today the province of Eritrea. There he was joined by many students who later founded their own monastic centers in the area. Ewostatewos himself was persecuted by his colleagues in the Ethiopian church for insisting on the Biblical custom of the observance of the Sabbath, and he left his country for Egypt, Palestine, Cyprus, and Armenia where he died after fourteen years of self-exile. He was accompanied by some of his pupils on his foreign travels, and some of them managed to return to Ethiopia after his death. Togetherwith their colleagues who had remained in northern Ethiopia, these followers of Ewostatewos effectively organized themselves and they become one of the two monastic houses of the Ethiopian Church. (The other is the House of Takla-Haymanot of Shoa) important cultural and educational centers like Debra Mariam of Qohain, and Dabra Bizan (on theeastern edge of the Hamasen plateau) were later founded by the followers of Abba Ewostatewos. Thus, by the fifteenth century, numerous monastic centers had been established at a number of crucial points from northern Hamasen to Lake Zuway in the south, from the eastern edge of the Ethiopian plateau to beyond Lake Tana in the west. And, just like the ancient center founded by the nine Saints, the new monastic communitiesprovided the only educational facilities available in the Christian highlands.

Development of Christian literature

Each monastic community ran a number of schools depending on its size and its resources. A senior member of the community, specially noted for his learning and for his exemplary character, was given charge of each of these schools. The monasteries of Ethiopia vied among themselves for attracting well-known teachers, and the fame and prestige of a monasterylargely depended on the quality of the teachers it employed. The courses given by each school were of course mainly religious and they dependedon the level of the school.

There were mainly four general levels of education in these monastic communities. The first level concentrated on training children how to read.They started with the Ethiopic alphabet, and they were drilled into readinga series of increasingly difficult passages. The question of understanding and comprehension was not important at this stage. It was strictly a “Reading” exercise. After sunset, following the evening prayers and the community dinner time, the children of the “reading School” were taught to memorize and recite a series of increasingly difficult prayers. This “memorization exercise” often went on up to midnight.

The next stage was usually one in which courses in church Music were given at different levels. Since the days of Yared, who is believed to have been divinely inspired to compose the first notes of the distinctively Ethiopian church Music in the Sixty century, a meticulous system of courses was organized in this field. It is apparent that this elaborate program of musical studies was at the height of its development in the fifteenth and the sixteenth centuries. The Dagwa, the collection of hymns traditionally attributed to Yared , was most probably a cumulative productof many centuries. A major aspect of the Ethiopian Church Music in the ritual dance that always accompanies the liturgical chant. Monneret de Villard, a well-known student of Ethiopian Christian art and the history of the Nile Valley, has suggested that the liturgical dance of the Ethiopians may have originated in ancient Egypt. But in its contemporary manifestations a religious musical performance of the Ethiopian priests is strongly reminiscent of the dancing and the rejoicing of the Levites in front of the Ark of the Covenant (2 Sam. 6:2-5). A casual look at the musical instruments used by the priests clearly shows that the Ethiopians have also drawn much inspiration from the Old Testament. The whole atmosphere created during a religious service in Ethiopia evokes the old Biblical scene transmitted in the last chapter of the book of psalms: Praisehim with the sound of the Trumpet: praise him with the psaltery and harp.Praise him with the timbrel and Dance: praise him with stringed instruments and organs. Praise him upon the lord cymbals: Praise him upon the high sounding Cymbals.

The third stage of education was usually what can be called the “Poetry School”. It has not been possible to find out the definite origins of this school, nor to ascertain the earliest period of its establishment. But thereis no doubt that it had already developed by the fifteenth century, and it constituted one of the advanced level of education in Christian Ethiopia. The most important aim of this school was to increase the level of comprehension of the Church scholar and to make him a master of the Ethiopic Grammar. An essential element of the training here is drilling thestudent to compose poems of different level. In the evening, the student recited before his master the poems he had composed for the day, and the master commented on the form and the aesthetic qualities of the poems. When the student reached a tolerable degree of excellence the master promoted him to the next level. After all the students had finished reciting their poems, they gathered around the master who composed spontaneously a series of original poems. These were often known for their outstanding qualities in both form and content, qualities which the student vied among themselves to master explained what he meant by the lines of the poem, and this was followed by groups of his students meticulously analyzing with him each of the words of every line to appreciate their grammatical and syntactical place in the poem. This session often went on well beyond midnight every day, and it was the major occasion when the scholars could have the personal guidance of their master. To pass through the eight or nine stages of this “Poetry School” a student often needed more than two years; but if the scholar had the intention of becoming a master himself, he usually spent as manyas ten years visiting as many different masters as possible. The “Poetry School” was one of the most prestigious institutions to have gone through,and its inmates could hope for some of the highest positions in both Church and State.

The next and last stage was the mastery of the interpretations of all the canonical books of the Church. The Ethiopian clergy had developed an elaborate system of analytical studies of each of the books of the Old and New Testaments. The Canons of the Church were also studied in the samemeticulous fashion with a lot of legal hair-splitting. These studied were so detailed that there was sometimes a special master for each of the Books of the Old and New Testaments, as well as for some of the apocryphal works of the Church.

These were the different stages of education in mediaeval Ethiopia. Although the content of the program was strictly religious, there is no doubt that it solved the essential problem of developing the intellectual faculties of the scholar, and it prepared him for specific roles in the mediaeval Ethiopian community.

What is more important is that the graduates of the monastic school system were employed not only in the Church but in all various administrative, judicial, and other department ofthe State. Nor was it with the limited prospect of leadership in the Churchthat students went to those schools. Indeed many of the royal princes who later ascended the throne –kings like Dawit (1380 -1412), Zar'a Ya'iqob (1434-68), and Na'od (1494-1508) are known to have attended such schools. Zar'a Ya'iqob and Na'od were particularly noted for their considerable scholarship, and they were the authors of a number of important original compositions in the Ethiopic language. Prolific writers such as King Zar'a Ya'iqob and Abba Giyorgis of Gascha were products of the great monastic schools of the fifteenth century. The literary and artistic achievements of mediaeval Ethiopia were indeed outstanding.
Many translations from Arabic, and numerous original Ge'ez works date from that period. A short visit to the Museum of the Institute of Ethiopia studies at Haile Sellassie I University also gives some idea of the works ofChristian art of those times. The library collections of the numerous islandand mainland monasteries throughout Christian Ethiopia, even today, area living testimony to the splendor of cultural life in mediaeval Ethiopia.

PERSECUTION AND RELIGIOUS CONTROVERSIES

Professor Tadesse Tamerat

After the reign of Zar'a Ya'iqob (1434-68) and his immediate successor Ba'ida-Maryam (1468-1478), the Christian kingdom of Ethiopia had a series of miner kings who were too young to take the affairs of state in their own hands. This brought some of the more ambitious royal officials into temporary prominence as guardians of the Crown but these officials had numerous rivals for power, and the whole kingdom entered into a period of political conflicts and civil war which lasted for about fifty years.The end result of this was the gradual weakening of the Christian army and the slackening of the frontier defense system. In the long struggle with the Muslim kingdom of Adal, this brought about a sudden change in the balance of power between the Church and Islam.

The Wars of Ahmad Gragn

With the Ottoman conquest of the whole Near and Middle East, Islam wasgiven a special impetus in the Red Sea area and in the Horn, The Muslim communities of the Ethiopian region began to be more and more aggressive particularly in their relations with the Christian Empire. Many Turkish and Arab mercenaries came over from across the Red Sea, better equipped with the superior arms of the Ottoman Empire. The Muslim invasion of the Ethiopian highlands in the beginning of the sixteenth century was thus a tremendous success. The leader of the Muslim forces during this conflict was Imam Ahmad Ibn Ibrahim or Gragn, as he is known in Ethiopian Chronicles. His Chronicle, entitled Futuh al-Habasha (meaning "The Conquest of the Abyssinians"), relates how the Muslim invasion was particularly aimed at destroying the Church in the Ethiopian highlands. As the center of the mediaeval Christian culture of Ethiopia andas the place where the kings also kept their fabulous treasures, the Church was attacked by the Muslim forces with particular fury. Dazzled bythe riches of the churches and monasteries, the Muslim troops burnt and looted for a period of about fifteen years, and almost completely destroyed the mediaeval heritage of Christian Ethiopia. The following passage is a vivid description of how the island monastery of Hayq was sacked, and it characterizes the attitude of the Muslim army throughout the period of their success between 1531 and 1543:

"They carried off the gold… there were crucifixes of gold in great quantity,books with cases and bindings of gold, and countless idols of gold; each Muslim took 300 ounces; each man had sufficient gold plate to satisfy three men. They also took a vast quantity of cloth and silk… The next morning (the Muslim chief) sent the Imam three rafts loaded with gold, silver and silk; there were only five men on board, two in front and three at the back, the rest of the raft being covered with riches though it could have carried 150 persons. The cargo was unloaded in front of the Imam who marveled at it and forgot the treasure which he had seen before. Therafts returned to the island and were a second time loaded with riches.

They came three times, on each occasion loaded; they then returned to the island and the men went on board to return to the mainland. On the following day Ahmad partitioned the spoil; he gave one part to the Arabsand … one to the troops who had gone on the water; the rest he dividedamong the Muslims".

It was in this way that the material and spiritual heritage of Mediaeval Ethiopia was destroyed during the wars of Ahmad Gragn. Many of the inhabitants in the Muslim-occupied areas were forced to renounce the Church and adopt Islam. Although some chose to die for their faith, the large majority of the Christian peasants acquiesced to at least a nominalacceptance of Islam.

The Dilemma in Ethiopian Relations with Europe

The Ethiopian kingdom was later restored after the death of Ahmad Gragn(1543) and after the defeat of his army by Emperor Galawdewos (1540- 59) who was given effective military assistance by the Portuguese.

Relations with the Portuguese had already started towards the end of the fifteenth century, and reciprocal envoys had been exchanged between Lisbon and the Ethiopian court. The Ethiopians were impressed by reports of the technical advances in Europe and wanted to share in this material civilization. From the earliest stages of their contacts with Europe the Ethiopians expressed their desire to receive European technicians and artisans, and the kings were especially interested in firearms. Already in the fifteenth century some isolated European adventures had reached Ethiopia even before the Portuguese, and they had been employed by the kings as masons, craftsmen, and amateur painters. When official relationswere later initiated with the Portuguese, it was precisely their interest in the material civilization of Europe which preoccupied the minds of the Ethiopians. Emperor Libna-Dingil requested artists, builders, craftsmen, and men who could make guns for him. He also desired to establish a strong military alliance with the Portuguese. But outside these cultural anddiplomatic contacts, a completely different interest preoccupied the Europeans in their self-sufficiency of Ethiopia and the extent of its commitment to the Church of ST. Mark. Thus, almost completely ignorant of the history and the spiritual heritage of the Ethiopian Church, the Portuguese sought to act as the agents of the See of Rome. This caused a lot of unnecessary bloodshed in the first part of the seventeenth century, and led to the expulsion of the Jesuit mission by Emperor Fasiladas in1632.

The Jesuit experience was very bitter for the Ethiopian Church, and it naturally led to the creation of very strong antipathies towards anything European for a long time. During their short sojourn in Ethiopia, the Jesuits had done a great deal of damage and they had seriously disturbedthe spiritual stability of the Ethiopian Church. Thus, immediately after theofficial expulsion of the Jesuit mission, there was a very long period of intensive doctrinal controversies within the Church which lasted for over two centuries. When these controversies are seen in the right historical perspective, it is very clear that they arose from the need to re-examine the doctrinal positions of the Church and to purify the Church from possible external influences still lingering even after the expulsion of the missionaries. The end result of all this was an intensive movement of literary and intellectual revival in the kingdom of Gondar. What is most impressive is that, despite the decline of the monarchy and the disintegration of the State into a number of regional entities during the so-called Era of the Princes, the Ethiopian Church preserved its basic unity. And from the middle of the nineteenth century, when the monarchystarted to revive once again, the Church resumed its historic role as the most important unifying factor in Christian Ethiopia.

THE PERIOD OF REORGANIZATION

Professor Sergew Hable Selassie

Tewodros and his religious policy 1855-1868

After the death of Abuna Qerillos about 1828, Ethiopia remained without abishop until the appointment of Abuna Salama in 1841. The new bishop was a young, energetic man who had attended a Protestant college in Cairo. In Ethiopia, many problems awaited the young prelate, the chief among them being the political instability of the country, widespread doctrinal controversies within the Church and the activities of foreign missionaries. Abuna Salama demonstrated ability as an administrator of Church affairs and considerable political skill during a very trying period, while endeavoring to solve as many of the problems as he could with caution and wisdom.

His arrival in Ethiopia occurred during the period of Ethiopian history known as the Era of the Princes, when strong central government had broken down and the Emperors were puppets in the hands of ambitious nobles vying for power. During this difficult time, when the various provinces of the Empire were ruled by different local lords, the OrthodoxChurch had remained one of the few unifying forces in the country.
Unfortunately the Church herself was divided by a doctrinal controversy over the Nature of Christ, which flourished throughout the Alexandrian teaching on this matter and to persuade Church scholars to accept it and renounce erroneous beliefs. With regard to the problems posed by foreignmissionaries, he assigned to them certain spheres of influences where they could teach but not baptize; he required new converts to be baptizedby Orthodox priests.

Abuna Salama was, of course, unable to restore political unity to Ethiopia;this was the task undertaken by the Emperor Tewodros II. His reign inaugurated a new era in the history of Ethiopia, in both a political and a religious sense. After his coronation by Abuna Salama in 1855, he set outto reunite the divided Kingdom and to restore Ethiopia to her ancient glory. A fundamental aim of his policy was to put an end to religious controversy in the Empire and to consolidate the Orthodox Faith. To this end, in 1855, he imposed the Tewahido doctrine, propagated by Abuna Salama, as the sole doctrine to be allowed in Ethiopia.

At that time there existed three groups of doctrinal affinities which had been inherited form the past. The Tewahido doctrine was and remains theofficial teaching of the Church of Ethiopia. It confesses the unity of two natures, divine and human, in the person of Christ, without confusion andwithout separation: -- hence the name Tewahido which means “unity”.
The second group was called Qebat, signifying “unction”, because it laid stress upon the anointing of Christ and not upon the incarnation of the Son. The third group was known as Tsegga Lej (Son of Grace) and supported the teaching of the “Three Births”: eternal birth of the Son fromthe Father, genetic birth of the Son from the Virgin Mary and birth from the Holy Ghost after the incarnation of Jesus. The Emperor Tewodros forbade the teachings of the Qebat and Tsegga Lej sects and all Christianswere called upon to profess the Tewahido teaching. Any who failed to abide by this decree were severely punished, thus his order was generallyaccepted and theological disputation gradually died out.

At the beginning of his reign, Tewodros showed deep religious faith and strict adherence to Christian moral standards. He and his wife received Holy Communion and in his conduct he became an example to all the Christians in the Empire. Many followed his example and began to lead a good Christian life. In the sphere of missionaries' work, Tewodros stronglysupported the monks who devoted their lives to evangelizing the pagan inhabitants of the country. Many people including numerous Moslems, became voluntary converts to Christianity.

Tewodros maintained a good relation with the Church until he initiated certain innovations in church organization. In order to carry out his far- reaching policies of modernization and reform, Tewodros desperately needed finance. He planned to raise money from the church by restricting the number of clergy allowed to serve in each church to two priests and three deacons. The remaining clergy would have to work and pay taxes like other people and some church lands would be given to ordinary farmers, who would pay taxes on them. This proposal was unacceptable tothe clergy and these and other actions exposed Tewodros to harsh criticism, so much so that the people in general supported the clergy against him. In the latter part of his reign, Tewodros' personality and conduct changed radically; he lost the high moral standards which had characterized the early part of his reign and grew harsh and bitter. Finallyhe became completely alienated from both the clergy and the ordinary people and Abuna Salama himself was imprisoned at Maqdala, where he died in 1867.

The expansion of the church (1872-1913)

In the last years of the 19th century the church of Ethiopia was engaged in consolidation and missionary activities. In the work of consolidation thepolicy applied was the same as in the first part of Tewodros' reign.

Doctrinal differences had once again become a subject of discussion in certain places. Now Emperor Yohannes and king Menelik of Shoa called a council at Boru Meda, in Wollo, in 1878 in which many learned scholars ofthe church participated. By coincidence there was no bishop in Ethiopia atthe time, but this was not considered an impediment to the holding of thecouncil. The Emperor Yohannes had already acquired a letter from the Patriarch of Alexandria in which the official teaching of the church formulated, and this was accepted as binding by the clergy. The Boru Meda council was the last of its kind. No such meeting has been held since. The three Births teaching which held sway in many places was rejected and condemned as a heretical teaching; the followers of this sectwere called upon to embrace the decision of the council.

The council was summoned in order to promote harmony and peace withinthe church itself and thus to facilitate the missionary activities of the church. The attention of the church was concentrated on the Wollo region for historical reasons. The whole of Wollo had been a Christian centre withmany historic churches and monasteries before the sixteenth century. In that century, however, the population was Islamaized by Ahmed Gragn.
Later on, when the Christian religion was restored, the population remained predominantly Moslem. Both the Emperor Yohannes and MenelikII, then the king of Shoa, encouraged the church to carry on missionary work in this region. They themselves took an active role by becoming the godfathers of prominent Moslem rulers of Wollo. The Emperor Yohannes baptized Mohamed Ali of Ras, and king Menelik sponsored Abba Matthew, who later on was called Dejjazmach Hail-Mariam. The conversion of their leaders had far-reaching effects on the population of the region. Many followed the example of their leaders and embraced Christianity. Aleka Akale Wold, a well-known scholar, was selected to assist in the consolidation of the Christian church in Wollo. He founded a centre of learning at Boru Meda itself. Boru Meda Sellassie became renowned a centre of higher church education and students flocked there from all overthe country.

In southern, western and eastern Ethiopia, missionary work was encouraged by Menelik II and many churches were built in different areas,which had become cut off from the Christian heartland of Ethiopia during the period of conflict. The re-integration into the empire of these regions by Menelik revealed the ruins of many churches in addition to numerous ecclesiastical objects, evidence that these regions were once Christian andtherefore Menelik insisted that they should be evangelized. A number of witness have described the joy with which the arrival of fellow-Christians was received by scattered communities which had endeavoured to cling toChristianity, although without priests and without the sacraments, since their separation from the northern provinces.

In order to strengthen the organization of the church and facilitate evangelistic activities, the Emperor Yohannes succeeded in obtaining theappointment of four bishops from Alexandria. This was the first occasionthat more than one bishop had been appointed to the Ethiopian church since the reign of Zar'a Ya'iqob (1434-1468), who had the privilege of acquiring no less than three bishops simultaneously. In 1881, the new bishops arrived in Ethiopia. They were Abuna Petros, the metropolitan, and Abuna Mattewos, Abuna Lukas and Abuna Yohannes. Abuna Petros remained close to the Emperor, while Abuna Mattewos was sent to Menelik II Shoa, Abuna Lukas to Gojjam and Abuna Yohaness to Simen-Begemder, where his career was cut short by his untimely death.

At the down of the 20th century, a new wave of independence arose in theEthiopian church. Ethiopians recognized the futility of the apocryphal canon which prevented them from being prelates in their own country.
Moreover it was strongly felt that reform and modernization of the churchcould not be achieved by a foreign hierarchy out of touch with national lifeand problems. The common consensus was that the church must be freedfrom the hegemony of the Coptic Church. Matters came to a head in 1926with the death of Abuna Mattewos, the last of four Bishops who had been appointed in 1881. The Ethiopian Church approached the Coptic Patriarch with a request that authority should be delegated to the new metropolitan to consecrate bishops. A lengthy exchange of views took place between officials of the Coptic Church and the Ethiopian Government. Finally in 1929, a new Coptic Abuna, Qerillos, was appointed and it was agreed thatfive Ethiopian monks should be consecrated as diocesan bishops. Five distinguished monks of irreproachable moral integrity were selected by a church assembly in Addis Ababa. They were Abraham, Isaac, Michael, Petros and Sawiros, who died shortly after his appointment.

During the period of Italian occupation (1935-1941) the Ethiopian Churchwent through a very difficult period. Italian policy was aimed at undermining the immense influence wielded by the church as a factor of Ethiopian unity. Abuna Petros and Abuna Michael paid with their lives for the steadfast patriotism and devotion to the church. The great monks of Debra Libanos were massacred in 1937 and other ecclesiastics suspectedof sympathy with the national resistance movement were likewise martyred. The fascist government wished to isolate the Ethiopian Church by serving its ties with Alexandria. Abuna Qerillos refused to be party to this and was sent to Rome; he later retired to Cairo in self-imposed exile. Thus the Church of Ethiopia remained without a Metropolitan, adding a canonical crisis to the moral crisis already prevailing in the country. Takingadvantage of this, the fascist regime forced the aged and ailing Bishop Abraham to take the place of Abuna Qerillos and declare the Ethiopian Church independence of Alexandria. The Patriarch of Alexandria then formally excommunicated Bishop Abraham and all who followed him.

Meanwhile the Church in exile was doing marvelous work abroad. The second highest-ranking ecclesiastical dignitary, the Etchege, who was latePatriarch of Ethiopia, Abuna Basilios, had his seat at Jerusalem and from there he dispatched priests to minister to the Christians in exile elsewhereand to convoy to them messages of consolation and hope. With the Emperor, in exile in England, there was a sizable Ethiopian community. Tothem, Abuna Basilios sent five monks with the necessary sacred objects toadminister the Holy Sacraments. He also used to send messages to the patriots of the Ethiopian resistance movement urging them to continue struggle. The qualities of moral authority and integrity evinced by the Etchege during this period helped to create a positive attitude of unity, enthusiasm and purpose among Christians in all walks of life and accelerated the movement towards the independence of the church.

After the liberation of Ethiopia in 1941, Abuna Qerillos returned to Addis Ababa and negotiations were resumed between the Ethiopian Church and the See of St. Mark. The Ethiopians requested the granting of autonomy and the lifting of the ban of excommunication imposed in the time of Bishop Abraham. After very lengthy negotiation, agreement was finally reached in 1948 when the Coptic Synod decreed that the Ethiopian monksmight be appointed as bishops during the lifetime of the Metropolitan Qerillos and, upon his death, an Ethiopian Metropolitan might be consecrated. These concessions were accepted by the Ethiopian clergy as providing a solid basis for autonomy. Five learned monks were chosen by the church assembly to be bishops; among them were the late Patriarch ofEthiopia, Abuna Basilios and the acting Patriarch, the Archbishop of Harar,Abuna Theophilos. Upon the death of Abuna Qerillos in 1951, Abuna Basilios was chosen as metropolitan of Ethiopia by clergy and laity and thus the full autonomy of the Ethiopian Church was established. The movement of the autonomy was fully supported by the Ethiopian government from 1926 onwards and His Imperial Majesty, Haile Selassie I, played an outstanding role in this matter.

Ecumenism

The Ethiopian Church became a founding member of the world council of churches in 1948. In the assembly held in Amsterdam in the same year the Church was represented by Abuna Theophilos, Bishop of Harar and byBlatten-Geta Mersie-Hazen Wolde kirkos. Since then the Ethiopian Churchhas participated in all spheres of activity of the World Council, e.g. in the central committee, the faith and order commission, the All-Africa Conference of Churches and the Youth Movement. A special committee was set up and entrusted with relations between the World Council and the Ethiopian Church. Through this committee, the Church has been granted aid from the World Council of Churches for two important projects. The first of these is the Kunama project which has as its aim theevangelization of the predominantly pagan Kunama people of western Eritrea. The second project is the establishment of a special school at Zuway in Shoa where dedicated young people receives appropriate training to enable them to undertake missionary work in the countryside.The school is already functioning and has attracted many young people with a sound Christian background.

The Ethiopian Church participated as an observer in the Vatican council and was represented at all its sessions. This was the first occasions thatthe Ethiopian Church had opened at least indirect dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church.

The Ethiopian Church was represented in the same manner at the Panorthodox Conference at Rhodes in 1961. A dialogue began between Chalcedonians and Anti- Chalcedonians in 1964 at Aarhus in Denmark andwas continued in 1967 at Bristol in England. Though no immediate concrete results have been forth coming from these meetings, the establishment of personal contact and exchange of views is an important factor which may have far-reaching effects upon relations between the two groups in the future.

Meanwhile the Ethiopian Church remains desirous of preserving and strengthening its relations with the Oriental Churches. When in 1965, theheads of the Oriental Orthodox Churches met together for the first time since the council of Ephesus in 431 A.D, a new era in Church history wasinaugurated. A secretariat of Oriental Orthodox Churches has been established in Addis Ababa.

THE HIERARCHY

By P.K. Matthew

The hierarchy of the Ethiopia Orthodox Church is directly within the livingtradition of the Universal Church. As such it is continuous with the tradition borne witness to in the Scriptures and the hierarchy of the earlyChurch.

Etymologically, the word hierarchy means the rule of priests. It s derivedfrom the Greek HIEREUS (priest) and ARCHE (rule). The term hierarchy never occurs in the New Testament. ARCHE is used in the New Testamentnever in the sense of ecclesiastical authority. Instead, EXOUSIA (power orauthority) is used on a few occasions; such as in relation to the works of Jesus, the Ministry of the Twelve and the Apostolic authority of St. Paul tobuild the Church (Matt. 9:6; 10:1; Luke 9:1; II Cor. 10:8). The character of EXOUSIA in all these is one of DIACONIA (service or ministry). All thosewho hold authority in the Church have it from the Lord, who Himself cameto 'serve'. ARCHE may be understood as EXOUSIA which is essentially DIACONIA. Thus hierarchy may receive its correct meaning when it is qualified by 'ministerial'; and hence, hierarchy is 'priestly ministry'.

The hierarchy of the Ethiopian Church consists of the traditional three orders of episcopate, presbyterate and diaconate. Of these three orders,the episcopate is most central, and it is by the same that hierarchical continuity is preserved in the Church.

Episcopate

The Episcopal continuity is the primary factor in the apostolic succession of the Church. It signifies the call and commission of the Apostles by our Lord, as well as the transmission of the apostolic faith. The Church is a Church of all ages and the apostolic succession is the link that binds themall to our Lord. Since the Church maintains the Apostolic faith and is 'sent'by the Lord to proclaim it (cf. Matt. 28:19-20) the Church itself is Apostolic. The Apostolic ministry of preaching and of administering the sacraments is exercised in the Church. The episcopate is a concrete symbol of the Apostolic succession, and it keeps the Church united on theprinciple of ministerial leadership.

The Ethiopian hierarchy it traced to the Church of Alexandria. St. Frumentius, a Christian from Syria, as the first missionary to Ethiopia andas closely attached to the Aksumite court during the middle if the fourth century, was consecrated by Patriarch Athanasius of Alexandria as the first bishop (ABUNA) of the Ethiopian Church. Thereafter, the hierarchicalhead of this Church was always sent from Egypt until recent times.

In the years following the Muslim invasion and persecution, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, the Ethiopian Church had to pass through a period of crisis which seriously affected the hierarchy. Even before this time, the Jesuits had been working to bring the Ethiopian Church under the jurisdiction of Rome, although with no success. After thses disturbances, the hierarchy was fully restored in 1881, when four Egyptian bishop were sent to Ethiopia; on the death of the last of them, the Church pleaded with the Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria for the consecration of men of Ethiopian nationality as bishops for this Church. Asa result, five Ethiopian bishops were consecrated in 1928. The recognitionof the autonomy of the Church of Ethiopia was marked by the consecration of five other Ethiopian bishops in 1948 (one of whom, the late Abuna Basilios, was made Archbishop in 1951) and was sealed by the installation of Abuna Basilios as the first Patriarch of Ethiopia in 1959 bythe Patriarch of Alexandria.

Today the Ethiopian Church is an autocephalous Church in every respect,and it holds that its doctrine and hierarchy belong to the living tradition which has been transmitted to posterity since Apostolic times.

The Hierarchy and the Laity

The Ethiopian Orthodox Church shares with many other Churches the belief that the Royal Priesthood of Israel and the Aarnoic institutional priesthood have become one in Jesus Christ the Eternal High Priest. The people of the New Covenant constituted in Him possess His Royal Priesthood, and are called after the Old Testament fashion, “an elect race,a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God’s own possession” (I Pet. 2:9). All those who are properly baptized within the Church are members of this priestly community.

After the pattern of Jesus’ baptism and anointing with the Spirit the Church has the washing of regeneration, baptism, and the granting of theSpirit, Chrismation, (cf. Tit. 3:5). Following the ancient custom of the Church, the two are administered together in the Ethiopian Church. As thesealing of the Spirit, Chrismation constitutes the lay ordination into the sacramental and active life of the Church. Thus, every baptized and anointed persons is a member of the Royal Priesthood. The hierarchical orders are special ranks within the Church, the People of God (LAOS TOU THEOU), from which the term laity is derived.

The Apostolic, priestly and ministerial functions of the Royal Priesthood are a means whereby Christ works through His Body in the world. The Church being the Body of Christ acts as one body; and the ministry of theChurch, thus, is a ministry acted as one whole. Yet it is recognized that there is a distinction among the members based on the diversity of ministries and gifts of the Spirit, interdependent and interrelated among themselves. They include prophecy, service, teaching, exhortation, contribution, aid-giving, merciful acts, apostleship, pastoral work, healingand administration (Rom.12: 6-8; Eph. 4:7-14; I Cor.12:27ff). The gifts are given in variety, but by the same Spirit (I Cor.12: 4ff).

Thus, the hierarchy is not regarded as a separate class, but as a constituent part of the People of God. All ministry in the Church is the ministry of Christ to the Church and through the Church to the world. Because of this, the hierarchy does not function separately but in closeunion with the laity in the Church’s teaching, worship and government.The laity are given vital roles to play in the life of the Church in many spheres.

Hierarchy and Sacraments

Within the wider ministry of the whole Church the hierarchy is set apart by further ordination. The sacraments as means of grace are conveyed to thefaithful by the hierarchy’s ministry of grace.
The Ethiopian Church regards Ordination as a sacrament, and insists thatfor the administration of sacraments there must be validly ordained persons. In Ordination the invisible divine grace is transmitted to the ordained with the visible sign of laying on of hands of the bishop.

By Ordination, one is given the divine grace for the fulfillment of a particular function, and thus one is set apart for that particular priestly ministry. It is to be fulfilled in the Church and is meant as a service to the world. At Ordination, special grace is granted to the ordained by the Holy Spirit, which enable him to appropriate individually the grace granted corporately to the community.

At Ordination the members of the hierarchy take a vow that they will holdfast to the faith and tradition of the Church and will teach the same to themembers of the Church.

The single grace of the sacrament of Ordination is distributed among thethree grades of episcopate, presbyterate and diaconate. Although by Ordination the ordained is appointed to carry out concretely a function ofthe Royal Priesthood, it is not simply the apportioning of a place by the Church, but it is a setting apart by Holy Spirit chiefly for the sacramentalministry in the Church and for the wider service with the Church to the world.

The Place of the Hierarchy in the Unity and Order within theChurch

The Ethiopian Church recognizes that the inward essential authority of theChurch is Christ Himself, who exercise it through the Holy Spirit, the Power of God that dwells within the Church. The institutional authority in the hierarchy is believed to express the activity of Christ. As an institutional organ, the hierarchy is responsible for the organized life of the Church.

An organized ecclesiastical life is expected to foster the exercise of all kinds of EPISCOPE (i.e. oversight, supervision or watchful care, such as parents' care for children, teacher's for students, superior's for inferior andthe like), through its hierarchical ministry over the proper functioning of the different Spiritual gifts and services within the Body of Christ. The Ethiopian clergy, through their private conversations, personal contacts and sermons, exhort the people to exercise their Christian duties in the best way possible. After the worship, the priests regularly meet the peoplein the Church premises to instruct them in faith and tradition. They also act to settle domestic disputes among the member of the Church.

The clergy act in obedience to the bishop of the eparchy within which they are given to serve; and the bishop, besides his administrative responsibilities, exercises pastoral supervision over the ministry of the clergy. Thus, the bishop of an eparchy represents the unity within it.

When a bishop exercises his EPISCOPE, he exercises it in the Church andfor the Church. When a priest exercises his ministry in a parish he is helping the bishop under whose supervision he is given charge to see to the order and unity within the local unit of the Church. When a deacon assists the bishop and the priests, he is serving them to carry on 'their tasks', and the congregation is always with them in the unity of the Spiritand service.

Such an organized diocesan life is one unit of the organized life is one unitof the organized life of the whole Church, in which the Patriarch is the center. As a bishop is the symbol of unity in each eparchy, the Patriarch isthe symbol of unity of the whole Church.

Certain Distinguishing Features of the Ethiopian Hierarchy

Being an autocephalous Church, the Ethiopian Church had its constitutionbased on the principle of self-government in which the hierarchy and laityshare and co-operate. It has always been the official Church of Ethiopia, and has been supported and protected by the Emperors of Ethiopia. All important nomination within the Church are subject to the approval of theEmperor, who is acknowledge as the "Defender of Faith."

Even though Ethiopia had no national Patriarch until recent times, there bad always been an ETCHEFE besides the ABUNA to hold the administrative authority of the Church. The power of ordination and pastoral supervision belonged to the ABUNA, while the juridical responsibilities were the rights of the ETCHEGE. The ETCHEGE always wasan Ethiopian, a celebrate monk, nominated by the Emperor in consultationwith the Church. With the emergence of autocephalous status this double office has been vested in the Patriarch.

The three-fold hierarchical structure, namely, episcopate, presbyterateand diaconate, has subdivisions under each of them. Thus episcopate includes Patriarch, Archbishops and Bishops.

The Ethiopian Church has the custom of having numerous priests assistingthe Rector of the local Church. In the cities, the Rector of a parish is madeby appointment. Honorable titles are given to the Rectors of the importantcity Churches. It is of interest to mention a few of them. NEBURA'ED is a title given to the Rectors of Aksum Church and of the Church of St. Mary, Addis Alem in the Shoa Province. NEBURA'ED means 'one upon whom hands are laid', and it refers to an office of authority. The NEBURA'ED of Aksum is also the governor of the Aksum district. LIKE SIRTANT (chief of the authorities) is the title given to the Rector of the Holy Trinity Cathedralin Addis Ababa. There are, besides, other titles such as LIKE LKAWENT

(chief of the learned), MELAKE SELAM (angle of peace), MELAKE GENNET(angle of paradise), MELAKE HAIL (angle of power) and others. As a significant feature in rural areas the accession of the chief-priest to his status is not by appointment. One among the local clergy emerges to thisstatus on the basis of character, ability, virtues and personal qualities.
Next to the Rector of each church is the GEBES, a priest who is thetreasurer, holding authority over the church property.

Besides the priests there is a group of deacons in every church assistingthe presbyters in worship and administration. Each church has its own Archdeacon as leader among the deacons.

The class called DEBTERA is unique feature of the Ethiopian Church. As anorder of singers, it corresponds in some ways to the choirs in other Churches. Although the DEBTERA do not belong to the ordained hierarchy,they are a class by themselves, to be found in every Ethiopian Orthodox Church, closely associated with the priests and deacons in assisting the services of worship. They have their required education and practice in Church music. Their ecclesiastical dance, performed with solemnity and sanctity, makes their role in the Ethiopian Church distinctly unique. With rhythmic movements, steps and musical accompaniment their performance adds to the beauty of the worship and of special festive celebrations.
Until the present day, many of the churches and church institutions haveremained the source of basic elementary education for the Ethiopian population, and the hierarchy plays a key role in it. Until the introductionof modern education, the teaching ministry was the prerogative of the teacher-priests of the Church.
Most of the clergy have their required education in the ecclesiastical language, Ge'ez. A small percentage of them have received modern education. Ge'ez is a rich language with a large mass of theological, historical and biblical literature, with which many doctors of the EthiopianChurch are well acquainted.

WORSHIP IN THE ETHIOPIAN ORTHODX CHURCH

Professor Sergew Hable Sellassie and Belaynesh Mikae

The Church of Ethiopia is one of the few Churches of Christendom where the worship of the primitive church has been preserved. This is largely dueto the geographical position of Ethiopia and to the historical developmentsthat led to her virtual isolation from the rest of the Christian world from the seventh century, as a result of which Ethiopia retained the form of worship she had received in the 4th century. It is of interest to considerthis subject in broad outline.

1. The Place of Worship

The noted church historian Rufimus has provided us with information that confirms the existence of prayer houses in Ethiopia before the introductionof Christianity as the official religion. In the story of St. Frumentius and his brother Aedesius he tells us that “while they lives there and Frumentius held the reins of government in his hands, God stirred up his heart and he began to search out with care those of the Roman merchantswho were Christians and to give them grate influence and to urge them toestablish in various places conventicles to which they might resort for prayer in the Roman manner.”

According to traditional sources, after the official acceptance of Christianity as the state religion, the Emperor Ezana, the first Christian ruler of Ethiopia, built a magnificent church at Aksum. It was supported bythirty-two monolithic columns and had no arches. During the early Christian period old temples of pagan times were transformed into churches. The old Sabaean temple at Yeha was made into a church by Abba Afse, one of the Nine Saints who came to Aksum from the Roman Empire in the 5th century. Recent archaeological excavation of the easterncorner of this building brought to light Christian objects, such as bells and crosses, of grate antiquity. The same can be said of the church of Abba Pantalewon, in a suburb of Aksum. The site was once center of pagan worship; both Sabaean and Greek gods were worshipped there. Abba Pantalewon either transformed the ancient temple into church or else builta church upon the ruins of the temple.

Excavations in the area of the old Aksumite kingdom, at Adulis and Hawlti-Melazo, have brought to light the ruins of basilicas of Syrian type. This may be due to the influence of the Nine Saints, since the majority ofthem are believed to have been of Syrian origin. An existing example of the basilica type of church is found at the ancient monastery of Debra Damo. According to hagiographical sources, the church was built by the Emperor Gebre Maskal, son of Caleb, in the 6th century. During the sameperiod a remarkable church was built at Sana’a by Abreha, the Ethiopian viceroy of Yemen. This church was much admired by Arab writers. It was known as al-qalis, a corruption of Ekklesia. Abreha brought architects bothfrom Aksum and Byzantium and they designed a church that was marvel of architectural skill, combining the basilicas and Byzantine styles.
In the mediaeval period the basilica from was retained, but underwent modification in certain cases. The amazing monolithic churches of Lalibelaare developments of this period. The churches of Medhane Alem (Saviour of the World) and Gennet Mariam (Paradise of Mary) are decorated by external columns of a type completely new in the architectural history of Ethiopia. The interiors have many features in common with the old church of Aksum. The external façade of Bete Emmanuel (Church of Emmanuel) is reminiscent of Aksumite style of alternate recessions and projections. The churches of Lalibela, hewn as they are out of the living rock, may besaid to be among the architectural wonders of the Christian world. The interiors are hollowed out and decoratively and ingeniously carved, with varieties of vaulted roofs and complex arches. Each church is constructedin a different style.

In the late mediaeval period, ecclesiastical architecture underwent a radical change. Churches of octagonal or circular shape were constructed. It seems probable that these forms were increasingly adopted as Ethiopian power moved southwards and the churches acquired the form ofthe round dwellings common in the south. This type of circular or octagonal church is abundant in the southern and western areas where Christianity was introduced later. The basilica from has been retained to alarge extent in northern Ethiopia.

The internal structure of the circular and octagonal churches consists of three concentric rings. The innermost part is the Maqdes or Sanctuary, also know as the Qeddusa Queddusan or Holy of Holies, where the Tabot or Ark rests; only priests and deacons have access to it. The Tabot represents the Ark of the Covenant, believed to have been brought to Ethiopia by Menelik I, the son of King Solomon. It rests upon the Menbir, which may be said to correspond to the alter in other Churches. The sanctity of a church depends upon the presence of the Tabot and without it services cannot be held. The blessing of the Tabot by the Abuna constitutes the consecration of the church. On occasions when the Tabot isremoved from the church and carried in processions as on the Feast of theEpiphany it is covered with a cloth and everyone bows or prostrates himself to it on passing. The second chamber is the Keddist, which is reserved for communicants, who receive the Sacrament, the women segregated from the men. Only those who feel pure, have fasted regularlyand have conducted themselves blamelessly receive Communion. For this reason communicants are usually babes-in-arms, infants and the very old.The third division is the outer ambulatory which is known as the Qene Mahelet (the place of the cantors). The Qene Mahelet is divided into three sections by curtains. The western part is occupied by the Debteras or cantors who sing hymns and praise God to the accompaniment of musical instruments, drums, prayer-sticks an sistra. One part of the ambulatory is reserved for women only and one part for men. There are three doors, to the east, north and south. The latter is used as the only entrance by women. The other two entrances are used exclusively by men; men may also sometimes use the women’s entrance, but women never use the men’s entrance. Those of the congregation who feel particularly unclean ritually stand in the churchyard throughout the service. Often there are asmany people, if not more, in the churchyard as in the church. It should benoted that the church precincts and the surrounding wall are considered sacred, therefore those who remain outside the church during the service are considered to have attended church.

A few modern city churches are built in the traditional Alexandrine cruciform. They contain pews for the congregation. It is customary in suchchurches for men and women to sit on separate sides of the church. The traditional Ethiopian church contains no seats, however. Rush mats may be spread upon the floor and it is customary to remove one's shoes beforeentering the church. As the services are lengthy, prayer-sticks, known as Makomiya, are provided fot the Debteras and for elderly or important members of the congregation to lean upon. However the truly devout mayrefuse to make use of a prayer-stick during the service and a few exceptionally pious people may try to mortify the flesh by standing upon one leg only throughout the service.

The date of Ethiopian Christmas on the Julian calendar would be celebrated on the 7th January, several thousand Christians will celebrate the holiday in the Churches of Lalibela hewn out of solid rock at a time, inthe 12the century, when it seemed all of Christendom might be overrun by the armies of Islam. The fortress of Lalibela, a few hundred miles from the capital Addis Ababa, has 11 monolithic Christian churches carved fromhuge individual rocks in the 12thCentury that are joined together by a labyrinth of buried tunnels and trenches. Some are shaped like crosses; others resemble Greek temples. They are all carved and chiseled from thestone. Nothing has been added, not altars, windows, doorways or chapels,all is carved from the same stone.

King Lalibela in the 12th and early 13th centuries meant for these churchesto be a new wonder of the world, a new Jerusalem, as he called the site after the Jerusalem of the Holy Land was taken by the armies of Islam in 1187. The river that runs nearby he named the River Jordan. The Christmas services begin at midnight on Jan. 7 with a procession to the church of Bet Emmanuel, the largest of the monolithic churches, led by over 100 chanting priests dressed in white robes who begin dancint as thecrowds cheer and clap. The service itself has not changed at all in the 800years it has been celebrated, and worshipers clamor up the sides of the buried rock cutouts to take part in the ceremony.

2. The Times of WorshipChurch Services

One can distinguish two types of church service in the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, indoor and outdoor. The former is conducted in the Holy of Holies by priests and deacons. A minimum of five persons, two priests and three deacons, is required to celebrate Mass. In certain monasteries a minimum of seven persons is still required. The celebrants are required to abstain from food for at least twelve hours in advance. The sacramental bread andwine are prepared by one of the deacons in the compound of the churchyard, in a small building known as the Bethlehem. The times of the services depend upon fasting periods and holy days. During fasting periods the service commences at 1 p.m. In some churches and monasteries it may begin as late as 3 p.m. The normal duration of a service is about two hours, but it may be lengthened or shortened upon occasions. At Easter, Mass is celebrated at 1 a.m. and at Christmas about 4 a.m. is the usual hour. On Sundays the service usually commences at 6 a.m., although it may start earlier and in some monasteries and churches the usual hour is 5 a.m. In some churches in Addis Ababa, the service now beings at 7 a.m. and at 8 a.m. on Saturdays except on Holy Saturdaywhen the service is conducted at midday.

The times of the outdoor services, conducted by priests and Debteras alsovary. On Sundays the service begins at 7 a.m. until replaced by the service in the Holy of Holies. During fasting seasons, the service commences at 6 a.m. and continues until the beginning of Mass at 1 p.m.There is also a short service towards the end of the Mass which consists mainly of the reciting of Qene, or verse which is epic in type.

3. The Types of Worship

a) Liturgy

The Ethiopian Orthodox Church has retained the ancient service of the Early Church and still uses the Mass of the Catechumens. In the Early Church, adults receiving instruction in the Christian Faith would attend theMass until the reading of the Gospel and the sermon. Then the deacon would dismiss the Catechumens and they would leave the church. The mass is still retained in the Ethiopian Church, though there are no longer Catechumens under preparation for baptism.

The real liturgy begins after the point in the service marking the departureof those not yet baptized. The church of Ethiopia has fourteen Anaphoras, a unique phenomenon in any Christian Church. Each is used on special occasions to mark the observance of a particular holy day. Through the Anaphoras differ in length and content, they have common characteristics.They stress the Incarnations, the Last Supper, the Crucifixion and the Resurrection. In principle the Mass is conducted in Ge'ez, the ancient classical and liturgical language of Ethiopia. Today, however, the readings and certain portions of the liturgy are in the vernacular, Amharic. The congregation. Both men and women may join in the singing Choirs of the western type are unknown in the Ethiopian Church.

b) Se'atat, the Horologium

There are two types of Horologium, for day and for night. The Horologiumwas composed by a distinguished 15t Century scholar, Abba Giyorgis of Gascha; during the ensuing century it was gradually enriched by additional hymns and prayers. In big churches it is usual monks. Priests and deacons to conduct the Se'atat in the northern part of the ambulatory, while the Debteras are conducting a different service.

c) Mahelet

Cantillation is an integral part of worship in the church of Ethiopia. Hymnsare sung in different modes and Rhythms. The Deggua or hymnary is attributed to Saint Yared, a scholar who lived in Aksum in the 6th century. During the course of the centuries.Hymns have been added by various composers. The cantors or choristers are the Debteras. On joyful occasions they chant and sing to the accompaniment of musical instruments. Hand-clapping an rhythmical movement of dignified and solemn kind. The rhythmic bet is marked by the movement of the prayer-sticks carried by the Debteras. During periods of mourning the chanting is in a melancholic mode and is not accompanied by hand-clapping or rhythmic movements. During Lent, the use of the drum is forbidden except on Palm Sunday. From the beginning of Lent until Palm Sunday, a special hymn is sung called Tsome Deggua.
Throughout Holy Week, special prayers are said, accompanied by prostration, culminating on Good Friday. During this week extensivereading from the Bible, works of the Church Fathers and Lives of the Saints take place.

No one can distinguish Church fathers like St. Mahletay Yared, and the Ethiopian Orthhodox Church in his singing service to the worshipping. Saint (Mahletai) Yared was born in the city of Axum from his father Abyud(Isaac) and his mother Christina (Tawklia) was a semi-legendary Ethiopianmusician credited with inventing the sacred music tradition of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and Ethiopia's system of musical notation. He is responsible for creating the Zema or the chant tradition of Ethiopia, particularly the chants of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, whichare still performed today. He is regarded as a saint of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church with a feast day of 11 Ginbot (May 19). Reading the Bible in Gee’z and the Yaredian soundings and position how to serv the church are preserved. The Holy St. Yared developed and composed the liturgical music and chants of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, as well as a unique 5 note system and notation system for Ethiopian music.

4. Manner of Prayer

The Fetha Negest, or Law of the Kings, reminds us that prayer is man’s way of communicating with Almighty God. In prayer, man thanks God, praises Him and recognizes His domain, confessing hid sin and seeking onhis part the way of pleasing Him. The following precepts are laid down forone who prays. Firstly, he should stand up, as enjoined on the words of the Lord; “When you rise up for prayer; you shall stand up.” Secondly, heshould gird himself with girdle; as the Lord has said “Let your loins be girt.” Thirdly, he should turn towards the east, for that is the direction from which Christ will appear in His second coming. Fourthly he should make the sign of the cross from the forehead downward and from left to right. Fifthly he should recite the prayer in fear and trembling. Sixthly he should kneel down and prostrate himself, since the gospel tells us that onthe night of his passion, our lord prayed prostrating himself and kneeling.

Prostration plays an important part in worship in the Ethiopian church. Thefaithful are enjoined to begin prayer by prostrating themselves once or thrice and to do the same at the end of prayer. At certain times kneeling or genuflection is substituted for complete prostration, i.e. on Sundays, the days of Pentecost, the feast days of our lord and our lady, and also after receiving the Eucharist. On good Friday, the faithful spend the whole day at church, usually in the courtyard, performing the act of prostration many hundreds of times, to the limits of their physical strength.

5. Times of prayer

The faithful should pray seven times each day. First upon arising from bedin the morning and before beginning work. Secondly at the third hour; thirdly, at the sixth hour; fourthly, at the ninth hour; fifthly, the evening prayer; sixthly, the prayer before sleep and lastly, the midnight prayer.

The morning and evening prayers should be said in church, especially on Saturdays and Sundays. Anyone who omits prayer, unless he is ill, shouldbe cut off from the congregation of the faithful. Anyone who is sick shouldattend church if he possibly can, for he may be healed. The other prayersshould be said at home. When the hour for prayer arrives and one of the faithful finds himself in a place where he cannot pray, he should pray mentally.

6. Fasting

In the Fetha Negest* fasting is defined as follows:

“ Fasting is abstinence from food, and is observed by man at certain timesdetermined by law, to attain forgiveness of sins and much reward, obeying thus the one who fixed the law. Fasting (also) serves to weaken the force of concupiscence so that (the body) may obey the rational soul.”

Fasting is strictly observed by all faithful members of the church. There are approximately 250 fast days in the year, although not all of these arecompulsory for everyone. The average person may fast about 180 days inthe year. There are seven official fasting periods for Ethiopian Christians.

1. All Wednesday and Fridays, except for the 50 days after Easter.
2. The Lenten fast of 55 days.
3. The Nineveh fast of 3 days.
4. The vigils, or gahad of Christmas and epiphany.
5. The fast of the apostles; this varies in length, depending upon the dateof Easter, and maybe a minimum of 14 days and maximum of 44. This fast commemorates St. peter and St. Paul.
6. The fast of the prophets of 43 days.
7. The fast of the assumption, 15 days in august.

Of these fasts, the fast of the apostles and the fast of the prophets are compulsory for clergy only, although they are also observed by many of the faithful. All the other fasts are considered obligatory for all devout Christians, except children under seven. During fasting periods, Christiansabstain from meat and all animal products: meat, milk, butter and eggs. No food or drink is taken before noon, at the earliest: even then only a simple repast should be taken. Pregnant women, the seriously sick and travelers are exempted from fasting. In Holy Week no food is taken before1 p.m. or later. The really devout fast completely from Good Friday till Easter Sunday, while others eat only the evening meal on these days.
The Lenten fast is traditionally broken by a joyful feast that takes placeafter midnight mass, at about 3 a.m., or the first cock- crow or Easter Sunday morn.

7. Holidays or feasts

Nine major and nine minor holy days are observed in the church ofEthiopia. All are connected with events in the life of Christ.

MAJOR HOLY DAYS & MINOR HOLY DAYS

1. The Incarnation 1. Sebkat (first Sunday in advent)
2. The Birth of Christ 2. Berhan (second Sunday in advent)
3. Epiphany 3. Nolawi (third Sunday in advent)
4. Hosanna (palm Sunday) 4. Christmas Eve
5. Crucifixion 5. Gizret (Circumcision)
6. Easter 6. Birth of Simon
7. Debra Tabor (feast of mount tabor, 7. Debra Zeit (Feast of the Mountof Olives) the transfiguration)
8. The Ascension 8. Kana Zegalila (The Miracle of Kana)
9. Pentecost 9. Maskal (The Invention of the True Cross)

Other feast days include one for each of the twelve Apostles. The martyrs,St. George, St. Stephen and St. John the Baptist are also commemorated.Other important holy days are those in commemoration of St. Michael andSt. Mary and of the grate religious reformer, the Emperor Zar'a Ya'iqob.
No less than thirty-three holy days are devoted to St. Mary. An indicationof the special veneration attached to the Blessed Virgin in Ethiopia. A feature of feast days in the Ethiopian Church is that many of them are commemorated monthly and not only annually. As in the rest of the Christian world Sunday is observed as a day of rest. In former times Saturday, the Biblical Sabbath, was also observed. On holy days believersare expected to refrain form heavy labor and manual tasks, such as farming, forging metal and weaving. Various transactions are permitted, however. On these days ot os customary to carry out charitable and philanthropic acts, to visit the sick or those in prison and to arrange reconciliation between those who have quarreled. Sundays and other holydays are also occasions of social events, weddings, dancing and sport.

EOTC Coptic Nativity-Christmas is Celebrated January 7 and iscommonly known as Lidet or Genna

While many scholar debate over the real birthday of Iyesus Christ being between July and September, the Gregorian calendar celebrates Christmas on the 25th of December, while Ethiopia still retains the ancient Julian calendar in which Christmas falls on January 7th (of the Gregorian calendar.) The Julian Calendar has not been altered since Christ has walked the Earth. During Ethiopian Christmas, its typically, a hot summer day and people in towns and villages dress up in their finest to celebrate.

The Ethiopian name given to Christmas is Lidet or Genna which, accordingto elders, comes from the word Gennana, meaning “imminent” to expressthe coming of the Lord and the freeing of mankind from sin. Genna is alsothe name given to a hockey-like ball game. Legend has it that when shepherds heard of the birth of Christ they rejoiced and started playing the game with their sticks. Men and boys in villages now play the traditional Genna game with great enthusiasm in the late afternoon of Christmas day, a spectacle much enjoyed by village communities and the elders who referee the game. "በገና ጨዋታ አይቆጡም ጌታ" Kids holding a curved stickfor playing " Ye-Genna Chewata " , it’s a hockey-like ball game, in groups on late afternoon of Christmas day in Ethiopia

Many people fast (don’t eat anything) on Christmas Eve (January 6th). Atdawn on the morning of Genna, people get dressed in white. Most people wear a traditional garment called a shamma. It’s a thin white cotton pieceof cloth with brightly colored stripes across the ends. Most men prefer theheavier covering called a gabbi. It’s worn like a toga. If you live in a big town or city you might wear ‘western’ clothes. The early Genna mass starts at 4.00am!

Genna festivities begin early in the day, as early as 6:00am when people gather in churches for mass. For the clergy it has begun much earlier, 43 days before, with the fasting period leading up to Genna. This pensive fasting period is required of the clergy and is known as the Fast of the Prophets. The fast of Advent is carried out to cleanse the body and soul inpreparation for the day of the birth of Christ. Everyone stands throughoutthe worship service for up to three hours. The clergy and Debtera (scholars versed in the liturgy and music of the church) lift their voices in hymn and chant just as it has been for over a 1,500 years when Ethiopia accepted Christianity. This ancient rite culminates in the spectacular procession of the Tabot (the Tabot is symbolic of the Ark of the Covenant)and carried on top of a priest's head). The procession makes its way threetimes around the church amidst ululation and chiming church bells, dazzling umbrellas and colorful attire of the clergy and Debteras (especially designated to accompany the Tabot) as well as a throng ofChristians who follow the procession with lighted candles.

The Ethiopian capital city is Addis Ababa. It's a modern city. Most peoplewho live outside big cities live in round house made of mud-plastered walls which have thatched cone-shaped roofs. Sometimes houses in the country are rectangular and made of stone. The design of Ethiopian Church is similar to the houses. In the country, they are often very old and have been carved out of rock. In cities, modern churches are built inthree circles, each within the others.

The choir sings from the outer circle. Everyone who goes to church for theGenna celebrations is given a candle. The people walk around the church three times in a solemn procession, holding the candles. They then go to the second circle to stand during the service. The men and boys are separated from the women and girls. The center circle is the most important and holy place in the church and is where the priest serves the Holy Communion or mass.

It's also a tradition that one of the Wise Men who visited Iyesus came from Ethiopia. After Holy Services, people disperse to their homes to feastand the clergy break their fast. Food and drink are plentiful, with many homes preparing the special meals characteristic of all big festivities highlighted on the Ethiopian calendar. Food served at Christmas includes Doro Wat and Injera, a spicy chicken stew eaten with the sourdough pancake-like bread. Often, tej, a local wine-like drink made from honey, accompanies the feast.

Traditional Christmas foods in Ethiopia include wat which is a thick and spicy stew that contains meat, vegetables and sometimes eggs (soundsyummy!). Wat is eaten on a 'plate of injera' – a flat bread. Pieces of theinjera are used as an edible spoon to scoop up the wat.

Christmas is quietly shared and celebrated in groups of friends and family.Gift giving is a very small part of Christmas festivities in Ethiopia. Only small gifts are exchanged amongst family and friends at home. But one gift most eagerly awaited by all children is a new outfit that they wear with pride on Christmas Day. The festive mood continues until the late hours of the evening. The joy of giving and sharing, extends beyond religious beliefs and spreads the spirit of peace on earth and goodwill to all mankind throughout the world.

Twelve days after Genna, on 19th January, Ethiopians start the three daycelebration of Timkat. It celebrated the baptism of Iyesus. Children walk to church services in a procession. They wear the crowns and robes of thechurch youth groups that they belong to. Adults wear the shamma or gabbi. The priests wear red and white robes and carry embroidered fringed umbrellas.
Musical instruments are played during the Timkat procession. The sistrum is a percussion instrument with tinkling metal disks a bit like a vertical tambourine. A makamiya, a long T-shaped prayer stick is used to keep therhythm and is also used by the priests and a stick to lean on during the long Timkat church service!

Ethiopian men also play a sport called ye-feres gugs (Horse rides game). It's played on horseback and the men throw ceremonial lances and arrowsat each other (sounds rather dangerous!). People don't give and receive present during Genna and Timkat. Sometimes children might be given a small gift of some clothes from their family members. It's more a time forgoing to church, eating lots and playing games!

Orthodox & Coptic Christian Religion
The Twenty-First Day of the Blessed Month of Tubah/Tir - TheDormition of Our Lady, the Virgin Mary, the Theotokos.

On this day, Our Lady, the all pure, Virgin St. Mary, the Mother of God, departed. As she was always praying in the holy sepulchre, the Holy Spiritinformed her that she was about to depart...from this temporal world.
When the time of her departure arrived, the virgins of the Mount of Olivescame to her, with the apostles, who were still alive, and they surrounded her bed. The Lord Jesus Christ, to Whom is the glory, with a host of thousands and thousands of angels came to her and comforted her and told her about the eternal joy that was prepared for her, and she rejoiced.The apostles and the virgins asked her to bless them. She stretched her hand and blessed them all, and she gave up her pure spirit in the hand ofher Son and God, and He took her spirit to the heavenly mansions. The apostles prepared the body in a fitting manner and carried it to Gethsemane.

Some of the Jews blocked their way to prevent them from burying the body. One of the Jews seized the coffin with his hands, which were separated instantly from his body and they remained attached to the coffin. He regretted his evil deed and wept bitterly. Through the supplications of the saintly apostles, his hands were reattached to his body, and he believed in the Lord Christ. When they placed the body inthe tomb, the Lord hid it from them.

St. Thomas the Apostle was not present at the time of St. Mary's departure. He wanted to go to Jerusalem and a cloud carried him there. On his way, he saw the pure body of St. Mary carried by the angels and ascended to heaven with it. One of the angels told him, "Make haste and kiss the pure body of St. Mary," and he did. When St. Thomas arrived where the disciples were, they told him about St. Mary's departure and hesaid to them, "You know how I conducted myself at the resurrection of theLord Christ, and I will not believe unless I see her body." They went with him to the tomb, and uncovered the place of the body but they did not find it, and everyone was perplexed and surprised. St. Thomas told themhow he saw the holy body and the angels that were ascending with it.
They heard the Holy Spirit saying to them, "The Lord did not will to leaveher body on earth." The Lord had promised his pure apostles to let themsee her in the flesh once again. They were waiting for this promise to be fulfilled, until the 16th day of the month of Misra, when the promisewas fulfilled and they saw her.

The years of her life on earth were 60 years. She was 12 years old when she left the temple. She spent 34 years in Joseph's house, until the Ascension of the Lord, and 14 years with St. John the Evangelist, according to the commandment of the Lord which he told her at the cross,"Behold, this is your son," and to St. John, "Behold, this is your mother." Her intercession and blessings be with us. Amen. Coptic/ Ethiopic Synaxurium

LITERATURE & ART

THE ROLE OF THE ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH IN

By Adamu Amare and Belaynesh Mikael

The Ethiopic or Ge’ez Literature

Ethiopia occupies a unique place among African countries south of the Sahara, having evolved her own literary language, Ge’ez, in very earlytimes. A vast body of literary works in Ge’ez grew up from fifth century
A.D onwards. Almost all of these works are religious in content. Religion lies at the very core of Ethiopian civilization and the Ethiopian Church has been not only the storehouse of the national culture, but also it propagator, instrumental in shaping and moulding Ethiopian literature andart. Ethiopian men of letters have, in almost all cases, also been men of the Church and many scholars consider that the most distinctive attainment of Ethiopian culture lies in the vast collection of manuscript, compiled and preserved in the monasteries and churches, which embody the national literary tradition. Their subject matter and their style stronglyimbued with religious concepts.

It is interesting to note that while many of the literary works extant in Ge'ez are based on translations from Greek, Syriac, Coptic and in later times, Arabic originals, in every case the work in question has been not merely translated but, in Professor Ullendorff's phrase, has been "conveyed into the spirit and ambiance of Christian Abyssinia". In other words, these works have been submitted to such a process of adaptationand transformed that instead of being mere copies or hackneyed translations they stand as literary works of art in their own right.

The literary achievements of the Aksumite Period c. 5th- 7thcenturies A.D

The major literary achievement of this period was the translation of the Holy Scriptures into Ge'ez. This grate undertaking was the work of a group of learned Syrian monks known as the Nine Saints who came to Ethiopia in the fifth century to escape the Byzantine persecution of the Monophysites. The translation of the Old Testament was rendered from the Lucianic recension current in Antioch at that time. The Ethiopic Bible contains 81 Books; 46 of these comprise the Old Testament and 35 are found in the New Testament. A number of these Books are apocryphal or deuterocanonical, such as the Ascension of Isaiah, Jubilees, Enoch, the Paralipomena of Baruch. Noah, Ezra, Nehemiah, Maccabces, Moses and Tobit. They are of intrinsic importance to scholars either because no othercomplete version of the text is extant in any language other than Ge'ez orbecause the Ge'ez version is authoritative.

Perhaps the most important of these apocryphal works is the Book of Enoch, which has been preserved in Ge'ez alone. The name Enoch signifies "teaching" or "dedication" and Enoch is one of the grate Biblical characters, the first-born son of Cain. The Book of Enoch was lost for centuries to western scholars who knew it only because it is mentioned in the Epistle of St. Jude, until, in 1773, James Bruce brought three completemanuscripts to Europe. This grate prophetic work mat be summarized in five parts as follows:

1. The laws governing the heavenly bodies.
2. An account in the form of visions of the history of the world until theLast Judgement and the coming of the Messianic Kingdom with its center at the New Jerusalem.
3. The establishment of a temporary kingdom that heralds the approach ofthe Last Judgement.
4. A vision of Enoch and other and his journeys through earth and heaven.
5. This section contains the Similitude's and describes the coming of theMessiah as the judge of all mankind.

Other early Ge'ez works of significance which have been mentioned in a previous chapter include the famous work known as Qerlos, the grate collection of Christological writings which opens with the treatise by St. Cyril, Patriarch of Alexandria, known as Haimanot Rete'et, or De Recta Fide. On this book is based the teaching of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church. Another work translated at this period was the Ascetic Rules of Pachomius, which established the rules governing monastic life in Ethiopia. It is interesting to note that the same period saw the translationof a secular work, the Physiologus, the well-know work of natural history,which was very popular in Europe during the Middle Ages.

The Solomonic Restoration

After the decline of the Aksumite Empire, towards the middle of the eight-century, Ethiopia entered a tenebrous period from which literary documents have not survived (or yet discovered). A grate period of cultural renaissance followed upon the restoration of the Solomonic dynasty about 1270, however, and the fourteenth century was the beginning of what has been termed the "Golden Age" of Ethiopian Literature. Although Ge'ez was no longer a living language it retained its primordial role as an ecclesiastical and literary language, like Latin in the western Church. In addition to works of a theological or dogmatical naturewe find the beginning of the grate series of Royal Chronicles of Ethiopia with the reign of Amda-Seyone (1314-44). The chronicle of Amda-Seyoneis an outstanding work. The vivid and compelling account of Amda- Seyone's struggles against the Moslems was certainly the work of an eye-witness and denotes a new phase of Ge'ez literature. To the same period dates the earliest known Amharic text; a collection of solders songs celebrating the victories of Amda-Seyone. From this time onwards royal chronicles became a regular feature of the Ge'ez literary development in Christian Ethiopia.

This period also saw the composition of the Kebre Negest or Glory of the Kings which is perhaps the most significant work of Ethiopian literature. Itwas composed by the Nebura'ed Yeshaq of Aksum and combines history, allegory and symbolism in its re-creation of the story of the Queen Sheba,King Solomon and their son, Menelik I of Ethiopia. The grate achievementof the author, Yeshaq, lies in the way he has gathered together and syncretized all the myriad strands of this grate cycle of legends and stories which is woven into the very fabric of Ethiopian life.

Other works of this period include the Matshafa Se'atat or Horologium, a very popular work attributed to Abba Giyorgis of Gascha. The Weddase Mariam or Praises of Mary is, as the name implies, a collection of hymns and laudations dedicated to Our Lady and ordered according to the days of the week. It is ascribed to Abba Salawa, who also engaged in a revisionof the text of the Bible.

A new genre of literature which appeared was devoted to the lives of the saints and martyrs. Well-known works of this nature are the Gadle Sama'etat or Acts of the Martyrs and the Gadle Hawaryat, or Acts of the Apostles. But the most important of these is the Senkessar or Synaxariumwhich has been translated by Sir E.A. Wallis Budge under the title The Book of the Saints of the Ethiopian Church. This is a compilation of the lives of the saints arranged in order of their feast-days throughout the year. In general these works are devoted to the struggle and suffering endured by the saints and martyrs in defense of their faith. The torments inflicted upon them are described as well as their patience in affliction, their working of miracles, their martyrdom and, after death, their receiving of the Crown of Glory. Mediaeval Ethiopian literature is particularly rich in hagiographies. The lives of well-known saints, such as Saint Anthony and Saint George enjoyed grate popularity and the lives of such famous Ethiopian Saints as St. Tekla Haimanot and Gabra Manfas Keddus provide important source books for Ethiopian Studies. In may manuscripts the whole volume is occupied with the life of a single saint and the miracles wrought by him both in his lifetime and after his death. Such manuscript often contain beautiful illustrations.

Two important original works appeared in the early fifteenth century. Thefirst of these was the Fekkare Iyasus or the Explication of Jesus, an interesting work, messianic in tone and foretelling the coming of a king called Theodore (Tewodros) who would restore peace to suffering humanity. This prophecy became of considerable importance in Ethiopia until the middle of the nineteenth century when King Theodore II chose this throne name, apparently because of its associations with the prophecy. Another philosophical work was the Mystery of Heaven and Earth, setting forth the eternal struggle between good and evil.

The reign of the Emperor Zar'a Ya'iqob (1434-1468) was notable for the development of grate literary activity. Zar'a Ya'iqob himself was a zealousreformer and wrote several important works, such as the Matshafa Berhan, or Book of Light and the Matshafa Milad or Book of Nativity. The king sought to refute heresies which had taken root and to attack the corruption of religious practices. Other works which have been attributed to him include the hymn collection entitled the Arganona Maryam Dingle or Organ of the Virgin Mary and the Egziabeher nagsa or God has reigned.Numerous edifying homilies were produced during this period, the most famous of these is the collection entitled Retu'a Haimanot (True Orthodoxy) ascribed to St. John Chrysostom.

The beginning of the sixteenth century saw many changes in Ethiopia. TheMoslem invasions caused grate destruction to the nation's Christian heritage. Many churches and monasteries were destroyed together with their collections of manuscripts. However enough survived to preserve national traditions. An interesting literary figure of this period was a certain Embakom (Habakkuk) an Arab converts to Christianity who entered the celebrated monastery of Debra Libanos. He was the author of the Ankasa Amin or Gate of Faith and of a number of translations from Arabic. A series of important literary works was inspired at this period by the need for the Ethiopian Orthodox Church to define her position vis-à-vis the Roman Catholic influence. The best known of these is the Confessio Claudii, or Confessions of the Emperor Claudius (1540-59), a spirited exposition of the Alexandrine Faith. Other works are Sawana Nafs or Refuge of the Soul, Fekkare Malakot, Exposition of the Godhead; and Haymanote Abaw or Faith of the Fathers.

No summary of Ethiopic literature would be complete without mention of the grate work known as the Fetha Negest or Laws of the Kings. The FethaNegest is indeed the repository of Ethiopian ecclesiastical and civil law andas such a literary work of fundamental national importance. Throughout its history, the Fetha Negest has been closely linked with the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, which still observes many of its precepts. The Fetha Negest was always faithfully conserved in the monasteries and important churches.

There it was available for consultation; there also it was studied and taught by leading ecclesiastical scholars. Even in modern times it hasserved as the basis or inspiration of much civil and penal law.

Liturgical Works

The liturgy of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church serves as the central point for the whole service conducted by priests and deacons. It is written in theform of a litany. Portions or passages of prayers, chants and hymns whichare said by priests and deacons differ from those said by the faithful. As the liturgy is sometimes referred to as the “Drama of Salvation”, it is acted out like a drama, telling the life and teachings of Christ, relating thesufferings of the Saints and Martyrs of the Church and using many symbols such as the Cross with its signs, the Censer, the Bell, the Chalice,the Container for the holy water, the washing of hands by the Chief Priest,the bows and the whole elaborate vestment of the priesthood.

In the Ethiopia Orthodox Church, at least two priests and three deaconsare required to celebrate the Holy Eucharist. No Mass can be performedafter taking meals. Hence, the Holy Eucharist always takes place beforeand meal.

According to the teachings and practices of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, the liturgy consists of two main parts, some of which are sungwhile other portions are read aloud by the priests.

The first part of the Mass is known as the Synaxis and includes the reading of the Epistles and Gospel, while the second part is called theAnaphora or Canon. This is the sacramental [art of the Mass which consists of fourteen Anaphoras: of these, the standard one in most common use is the Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles.

This is the sacramental part of the Mass which consists of fourteen Anaphoras: of these, the standard one in most common use is the Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles.

These Anaphoras may by listed as follows:-

1. The Anaphora of Our Lady Mary
2. The Anaphora of the Apostles
3. The Anaphora of Our Lord Jesus Christ
4. The Anaphora of St. John The Evangelist
5. The Anaphora of St. Basil

7. The Anaphora of The Three Hundred and Eight Fathers
8. The Anaphora of St. Gregory the Armenian
9. The Anaphora of St. Epiphanius

10. The Anaphora of St. John Chrysostom
11. The Anaphora of St. Cyril
12. The Anaphora of St. James of Serug
13. The Anaphora of St. Dioscorus
14. The Anaphora of St. Gregory of Alexandria.

The exact origin of most of the Ethiopic Anaphoras has not been discovered. They first appear in Manuscripts of the 15th century, but weredoubtless composed very much earlier. Scholars at one time assumed thatall or most of these Anaphoras were translated of foreign liturgies, but recent studies, such as that of Ernst Hammerschmidt, have demonstrated that many of the Anaphora are genuine creation of Ethiopic literature evincing theological thought and liturgical poetry of a high order.

Painting and Manuscript Art

The hall-mark of sophisticated artistic expression of any country can be tested by its capacity to assimilate many elements from foreign source and indigenous these foreign influences. Ethiopian representational art is no exception to this rule. In fact Ethiopian art has syncretized both Oriental and Byzantine artistic traits. Although architecture and metal work belong to representational art, we are here concerned with painting, which is by far the most representative and ubiquitous branch of EthiopianArt.

With the exception of a few ancient rock carving or drawings which depictboth human and animal scenes, Ethiopian painting is virtually wholly ecclesiastic. It is Christianity, the religion of the state, that has determined the scope and purpose of painting in Ethiopia.

Generally speaking, clarity, vividness and the capacity to convey an ideadominate Ethiopian painting more than the desire to give pleasure.
Ethiopian artists may even go so far as to distort proportion in order to convey an idea vividly. Such paintings are found in the form of icons, asmurals in churches and in manuscripts.

The imaginative church artists have beautified and ornamented these paintings with elaborate color, illumination and elegant design. Priests andmonks insert pictures in their books in order to communicate the messageto the faithful more vividly and colorfully.

In fact Ethiopian artistic accomplishment is considered by many scholars to have reached its apogee in the illuminated manuscripts produced in thegrate monasteries between the fifteenth and eighteenth centuries. The finest manuscripts are written on goatskin, whereas for ordinary purpose sheepskin is used. The text is usually written in a copiously decorated heavy black script with occasional insertions in red. The pages very in size, but may be very large; the text is written in one, two or three columns according to the size of the manuscript. Lavish illustrations abound, sometimes occupying whole pages and sometimes incorporated into the text. The leaves are put together in quires, usually of ten pages. They are then bound between wooden boards often covered with tooled leather and the completed book may be provided with a leather case withstraps that make it convenient for carrying.
Ethiopian paintings are characterized by Biblical themes and figures. Angles, evangelists, saints, martyrs and other biblical personalities are thesubjects of painting in Ethiopia. Of all these biblical personalities the VirginMary occupies a very prominent place in Ethiopian painting. The extreme veneration attributed to St. Mary finds its expression in many ways. for instance, some pictures depict St. Mary as a delicate and modest young girl, while others show her as a strong, mature women and protector of the Ethiopian people.

The paintings and pictures found in various manuscripts and on the walls in churches, afford the viewer a moral lesson and religious instruction. As they communicate their message clearly they are a way of acquainting thefaithful with the teachings of Christ, the history and teachings of the Church, the lives and acts of the Apostles. All this of course is in addition to the purely aesthetic role they fulfill as objects of beauty and decoration.

THE ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH SCHOOLING SYSTEM

By Haile Gebriel Dagne

The educational system in Ethiopia has been profoundly molded by the past. Traditional education derives its distinctive character from the unique Christian heritage of the country. Ethiopia is, after all, the only African country to have preserved Christianity as its religion for over a millennium and a half. Moreover, having its own written language and literature it developed from very early days a tradition of ecclesiastical scholarship. The long monastic tradition dates back to the fifth century and the significant role of monasticism in the diffusion of Christian learning during the mediaeval period has been described in an earlier chapter. In the Christian highlands of Ethiopia, the Church constituted themain guardian of traditional culture and provided the only schools in the land for many centuries. Not only did it preserve its ancient tradition with tenacity and convey it to future generations but it also secured remarkable continuity that has lasted to the present day. For the authorityof tradition in present day Ethiopia remains compelling and forceful.

The church school system has been the instrument that has preserved thetraditional learning of Ethiopia and conveyed it faithfully to succeeding generations. The priests and Church scholars who are the bearers and propagators of traditional learning have themselves been formed in the church school system that we propose to examine in some detail. For, in spite of the inevitable changes taking place in Ethiopia with the steady expansion of modern secular education in the present century, church schools still play an active part in the Ethiopian educational scene.

The church school system, which is one of the oldest in Christendom, originated in the Aksumite Kingdom with the introduction of Christianity about the 4th century. In the course of the centuries the school system has grown and changed in many ways. With the expansion of the Kingdomand Christianity to the south and southwest, churches and monasteries were founded, which became for centuries important centers of learning.

In their present form the church schools evolved during the “golden age” of the Church from the 13th to the 16th centuries when the literature of the Church had reached its peak. After the great wars, particularly after the 17th century, cultural activities declined. From that time to the present the church schools have undergone little change. The schools have in this period confined their educational activities to glorifying the products of past centuries and conveying these to the coming generation.We shall not discuss here the historical development, but rather the educational activities of the schools, as we know them today in the country.

The church school system has the following divisions:

1) Nebab Bet (Reading school)

2) Qedasse Bet (Liturgy school)

3) higher schools, namely

a) Zema Bet (Music school)

b) Quene Bet and (Poetry school)

c) Metsehaf Bet which again have different subdivisions. (Literatureschool)

1) The Nebab Bet

The Nebab Bet, the Reading School or the “House of Reading” is the first stage of the traditional schools, where primary instruction is given. We find the Nebab Bet in practically all churches and monasteries, in a number of villages and in the compounds of well-to-do landlords. It is a one-teacher school, with instruction given by a priest or layman with church education. It is difficult to estimate the number of Nebab Bet in thecountry or to evaluate the school population involved. According to the Church Office there are about 15,000 churches in Ethiopia. If each church has one Nebab Bet, which is probably the case, then there are at least 15,000 one-teacher schools.

Each Nebab Bet may have an average of 20 pupils. We may then be justified, with some reservation, in saying that at present the total Nebabbet enrolment might well be 300,000. This does not include pupils receiving instruction in the village schools and in private compounds.

Normally children start school between the ages of 5 and 7, when they aretraditionally considered ready to learn. Theoretically, both boys and girls and members of all ethnic groups and classes are eligible to enroll in church schools. However, in rural districts, parents generally discouraged the education of girls, since their function is to be housewives, and for thisrole no formal education is felt to be necessary. Non-Christian families arereluctant to send their children to a Nebab bet because it is closely integrated with the church. Therefore, the Nebab bet and the church schools as a whole can not be considered to serve the entire population, but only members of the Orthodox Christian Church.

The prime function of the Nebab bet is to teach children to read religiousbooks, practically all of which are in Geez. Instruction in the Nebab bet consists almost exclusively of reading. Children master the 231 letters of the Geez syllabary, and are drilled in the art of good reading. Traditionallywriting is not taught, since this was not needed in everyday life, unlike reading which is necessary for daily prayers and participating in the church service. In urban centres and roadside towns the Nebab bet has a new function today. The modern schools often accepts more readily in their primary grades those children who can already read and write. This limitation of the enrolment is mainly due to the large number applicants and to an insufficient number of schools, so parents, especially those whodo not need the labour of their children, are obliged to send their childrento the Nebab bet as a first step to enrolment in a modern government school.

The instruction in the Nebab bet is given in three different stages:

a) Fidel (Alphabets) Instruction
b) Drill in the reading of various religious texts
c) Reading of the Psalm of David

a) Fidel Instruction

The first subject of study for the child is the set of Ge'ez letters, known asthe Fidel. In earlier times the letters were written on a roll of parchment, which the pupil carried with him. When he was studying a particular part of the Fidel the student unrolled the parchment and fixed the two-ends ofthe roll on a wooden stick with a piece of cloth or string. Today children use a printed table of letters, which is glued on a single sheet of cardboard. This is available for about ten cents in every market place in the country, so that the traditional parchment is disappearing.

What is the process of learning the letters? The child, who is led by his teacher or a monitor, touches with a straw each letter from left to right ofthe table and names the letter in a loud voice. He repeats this for months.Usually the child learns the whole set of letters in sequence by heart, so that in reality he may not be able to distinguish on letter from the other.

As a next step to help him distinguish individual letters, he is led to pronounce each letter reading from right to left and then from top to bottom. This process is known as Qutir, i.e. "learning by counting each letter". The large number of characters (33 in 7 orders) with the differences and irregularities of the related sets are not easily grasped by the beginner. To help the child distinguish the different characteristics of the alphabet another table has been prepared. On such tables the numberof the letters and the forms in the seven orders remain the same, but the place of the characters is changed or mixed up, so that the child cannot depend only on his memory and the sequence in which he has memorizedthe characters. Today the standardized table “Aa, Bu, Gi, Da “ is much used, however, so that the pupil may learn even this by heart and only comes to distinguish the individual characters well after much practice.

When the pupil knows the letters to some extent, he starts to practicereading a text. Generally, the first epistle of St. John is used for the purpose. The child uses four methods to practice reading this text known as Fidel Hawaria or the first Epistle of St. john, first he pronounces every letter of the word pointing at each letter with a straw (Qutir-method). He repeats this pronunciation exercise on the same text several times. When he is able to distinguish the letters he passes to the next drill known as Ge’ez, i.e. the beginning of reading. Here the student attempts to put the letters together in a chanting form and read them as a word. The same process is repeated for several days or even months. When the teacher feels that his pupil has mastered this stage, he leads him to “Wurdnebab”.Now the child practices read learns to take much care over words that must be read to together, the accents, the pauses and the soft or hard pronunciations of the syllables. This step is important, so the pupil spendsmore time on it. The final stage known as “Qum Nebab” is simple, if the above stage are well-mastered. Here the child practices reading at a very lively pace, but without mistakes. The four steps are repeatedly drilled on the same text, Fidel Hawaria. The exercise of reading can be quite difficultfor the beginner, particularly because the text is in Ge’ez, a language no longer spoken and therefore far from the experience of the child. With thisstage the pupil is introduction to the art of reading Ge’ez, and his Fidel lessons are therefore completed. He can then practice reading different religious texts.

b) Reading lessons from religious books

The number and the kind of books the student has to read at this stage is not standardized. All depends on the availability of books. Traditionally, teachers in different areas select any text for reading. The following texts are known to have been used in different areas: Gabata Hawaria, i.e. selected epistles of St. Paul, St. James, and St. Peter; the Gospels, usuallythe Gospel of St. John is used as a text for exercise; Arganon: praises of St. Tamara Mariam: the miracles and wonder of St. Mary; Paulos: the epistles of St. Paul; Tamara Iyasus: the miracles of Jesus; the Acts of the Apostles, etc. Pupils need not understand the texts of these books, but they have to be able to read them well, since thee are the books read in the church service, where young boys serve as readers, deacons, and later on as priests. The methods of practicing the reading are those described under the Fidel Hawaria, namely, Qutir, Ge’ez, Wurdnebab, and Nebab.

When the pupil is able to read a text, he starts a new lesson known in Amharic as Yemata Timhirt, i.e. an evening lesson, or Yeqal Timhirt, i.e. memorization. Every evening he has to memorize the daily prayers.

In theevening the pupils come to the house of the teacher, which is also at the same time the school itself' All stand around the teacher while the lesson is given. The teacher or an advance student recites to the pupil sentence by sentence or verse-by-verse the standard prayer the child has to memorize. The pupil then repeats the sentence till he knows it well. This exercise is repeated for months or every a couple of years, until the boy knows the main prayers by heart. In some cases the Ethiopic catechetical book, the Aemade Mestir (Columnae Mister), particularly Mistere Sellassie(on the Trinity), is taught in Amharic. All other texts are in Ge'ez. Since the pupils do not understand the texts, the memorization drills are very exacting in energy and time. When the teacher is convinced from his dailyobservations that his pupil had mastered the reading exercises, he lets him start to learn the reading of the Psalms.

C) Reading the Psalms

The pupil now learns to read the psalms, the most important devotional book of Ethiopian Christians. The method he uses is the chanting from andthe Wurdnebab reading process. After repeating the entire book of Psalmsseveral times using Wurdnebab, he continues reading for months, even over a year, using the Qum-Nebab reading method. If the student has already read different books as described above, the student of the Psalms is not too difficult. In some cases students are made to memorize the texts of the Psalms. This is particularly important for those students who plan to continue on the higher learning, since passages from the Psalms are used frequently in the hymns and poems of the church.
Gradually the pupil masters the art of good reading. The teacher normallydoes not set a formal examination to judge the work of the pupil.
However, he follows the progress of his student daily, so no special testsare needed.

When he is convinced that the pupil has reached the level of knowledge traditionally required at this stage of learning, he indicated that the time has come when he may leave the Nebab Bet. This is considered one of themost important events in the life of the pupil. It is also an occasion of joy for the family, and the parents usually organize a feast to mark the event.

A reader of the psalms enjoys certain privileges as one of the elite in his village. He may be called upon to read and write letters. At certain ceremonies he may recite prayers, if no priest is available. The girls from traditional families who have attended the school usually marry before orshortly after they complete the lessons in the House of Reading.

2. Qedasse Bet--- The training of the altar priest

Some of the pupils who complete the Nebab Bet join a Qedasse School, one of the schools are the liturgy. A teacher specialized in Qedasse or theMass is to be found in practically all the main churches. A teacher specialized in this branch of the liturgy teachers the Gebre Diquna and Gebre Qissina, i.e. the functions of deacon and of a priest in the liturgy.

Children of the clergy, who use church lands usually enter such schools in order to become deacon or priests in a church (and thus keep their churchland in the hands of the family). The office of a priest is particularly attractive to tenants or landless peasants, because a priest in his area enjoys privileges, and his office entitles him to possession of the land known as Semon land. The function of an altar priest is limited to carryingout the rituals of the Mass and the Sacraments. For this purpose scanty training suffices. A Qedasse teacher normally teaches only the hymns which a deacon or a priest has to use in the liturgy of the Church. The rest, including the teaching the traditions and service of the Church, is learned through daily experience in the parish itself. Usually a candidate for his training is attached to a priest or monk to whom he gives certain services, accompanying him on visits of families, festivals, and ceremoniesin and outside the parish. Through observation or day-to-day practice andinstruction by his priest-master, the boy learns the Church activities and functions of a deacon and of a priest. The activities of the priest, therefore, are limited to the rituals, which do not usually demand the understanding of the Scriptures. Thus relatively little education is expected from a young man to be ordained an altar priest.

3. The higher schools of the church

We have seen that the Qedasse bet trains mainly the altar priests, who are known as the semonegna (those who serve weekly). These are the only members of the clergy who are allowed to celebrate the mass and administer sacraments. However, before and after the mass there are readings of the scriptures, ritual dance, and long hymns and poems. To beable to carry out this further service one has to attend a higher school of the church, which should be considered an extension of the Nebab and Qedasse Bet.

The leading teachers and scholars of the church, who are known as Debtera, are trained in the higher school. A Debtera is a general term given to all those who have completed one of the higher schools of the church. Theoretically, priests and monks can also be characterized as Debtera, if they have completed studies in one of the higher schools. In practice however, few fall into this category, and these few are not usuallyknown as Debtera. The majority of the Debtera are laymen, and as such they are not allowed to serve in the mass and the administration of sacraments. Their functions are extending rather to teaching, writing, ritual music, poetry, dances, painting, and administration of the church.

A student of the Nebab Bet or Qedasse Bet, who would like to join the higher schools, usually leaves his parents and joins the wandering students who travel from parish to parish and form monastery to monastery. Traditionally a boy can receive only the Nebab Bet instruction while he is at home. The main reason for wandering in search of schools and teachers is that in rural areas any higher education is not possible for a youth who remains with his parents, except in a few cases of Debtera families. The heavy demands of cultivation and cattle tending force the parents to demand the services of their children. Besides this, the student is attracted by the adventurous and romantic life of a begging and wondering student, about whom much is spoken and fabulous stories are told. Wandering students usually come from farming and clerical families –very few are from the higher classes.

With the spread of modern education and a modern school system this institution is declining. Fewer young people are motivated to study in the higher church schools. One of the main reasons for this change is that thegraduates of the church schools have lost their traditional elite status in the social order, which today particularly in the modern sector, is being occupied by those who have a modern western type of education.

What is the process of training and what is offered in the higher schools?The main courses of study are in church music, church poetry, and religious literature, each divided according to content of instruction

In all these schools the students must learn the material by heart. To demonstrate this we should describe the average study day at the Zema Bet. The teacher of Zema sits in the middle of his pupils, who are practicing their daily assignment of the hymns individually or in-groups. Each group sings from a single text, or one of the groups sings and the rest observe him. The more advanced students serve as monitors to instruct the beginners. When one of the students has mastered the hymn,he goes and sings before the teacher. The teacher either approves and gives the student a new assignment or orders further practice on the same text. The lessons advance in this manner day after day until the student finishes the fixed text of the hymn and knows it by heart.

The training challenges the memory of the child rather than leading him tothink. In spite of the monotony of the learning and teaching methods and the exacting length of time, the students show surprisingly high morale.
There are ofcourse reasons for their diligence. The wandering student expects a high position in the church hierarchy. Furthermore, since the instruction is considered sacred, just as prayer is, the student takes his assignment seriously. The resulting high morale in the school community helps the individual student to adapt himself to the hard work. The usuallystrict demands of the teachers are accepted with out hesitation, because the wandering student has come to the school of his own free will and haswillingly submitted himself to the authority of the teacher. If he is not satisfied, he can leave the school and look for another one.

b) Qene Bet

There are Qene forms or models that the student has to master in order to be able to compose the Qene poems which are sung in different sections of the liturgy of the church or used to celebrate church and stateceremonials. About nine models are famous in the Samenna Worq (wax and gold) Qene system. There are also other Qene types which are however not as widespread as the Samenna Worq.

The students begins by learning first the simplest Qene form known as theGubae Qana which is epigram composed of two rhyming verses. He then learns Ze'amlakiye (3 verses), Wazema (5 verses). Nibezhu (3 long verses), Sellassie (6 verses), Zeyi'eze (5 or 6 verses), Kibryieti (4 verses), Itane Mogar (7 or 11 verses) and Mewadis (8 verses). These aremost widespread but there are other forms, e.g. in Gojjam, the Gonji and Washera schools of Qene differ from this.

The student learns Qene with more interest and motivation than the otherdisciplines, such as Zema. There are several reasons for this. The main one is that the student understands the Ge'ez language in the Qene school. The teaching method allows the boy free activities and movementsas illustrated below. In the student an aesthetic interest is developed, or at least awakened. The following illustration may make this clear.

The Qene lessons usually start in the afternoon or in some places early in the evening. The place of instruction is usually a communal hut near the teacher's dwelling known as the Mahber Bet, or simply in the open or under a tree. First there is a prayer to be recited. The teacher may then make some remarks on the students' work for the day. As the main task of the session some Ge'ez verbs are conjugated, and the proper usage of selected verbs and nouns is demonstrated by examples from different Qene verses composed by the teacher and advanced students on the spot.The story or legend of the saint whose feast is to be celebrated on the next day is then narrated; this comprises the theme of the Qene composition by the students, using the vocabulary and grammar already discussed at the session.

During the evening the student endeavours to find the proper music to fit the Qene model he is going to compose; since all Qene has to be sung, hisQene piece must be suited to a corresponding musical form. The next day the student looks for a secluded place and meditates on his composition.
When he has composed his Qene verse after the model assigned to him bythe teacher, he then approaches the teacher, who sits for the most part ofthe day at a place known to all. The teacher is usually engaged in some individual work such as reading, copying a manuscript, or even doing some handwork.

The student recites the product of his intellectual labour. The teacher either accepts the verses or the offers critical comments and sends thestudent back for further meditation, students come at intervals to the teacher to recite in the manner.

In the afternoon the session or Gubae takes place again. The work of theday is first reviewed, in which a lively discussion is usually generated.

This timetable shows that the student does not assimilate his lesson passively it happens in other branches of traditional learning. He has the opportunity to discuss the theme given, which challenges his intellect. He should not, however, contradict or be critical of religious and other accepted values. The student strains his power of expression to construct the Qene verses in a vivid, enigmatic manner or to express his experience in social life in connection with biblical stories, visions, and legendaryevents.

One could say that in the Qene School the content of learning covers practically all aspects of the values of the traditional social system in which the student lives. The Qene School is perhaps the only school wherethe students can received both intellectual and traditional training. It is generally recognized that the most able clergy of the Church are those trained in the Qene School. The main interest and purpose of the school is, however, not to develop poetic and other aesthetic interests in the child or youth, but to enable him to carry out the Church rituals. A graduate of Qene School looks for a position in a Church and serves in thechoir where he composes Qene and sings, or he may take a post as a minor teacher or administrator in the Church. Those who want to study further may join the next school, the Metsehaf Bet. To specialize in Qene so as to be a teacher in a higher school, the student must attend several schools and study more branches of Qene, which means studying and wandering for some years more.

c) Metsehaf Bet

This is the general term for the School of Commentaries composed of fourbranches. The first type is known as Beluy. The 46 Books of the Old Testament are studied and commented upon. The second branch is the Haddis, a specialized school on the commentaries of the 35 Books of the Ethiopian New Testament. The third branch is Liqawent, which presents studies and comments on the various writings of the Church Fathers, e.g.Saint John Chrysostom, Qerlos and others. The canon law (Fetha Negest) as well as the calendar calculation (Bahre Hasab) are also studied here.
The last branch of the Metsehaf Bet is the Menekosat, the School ofCommentaries on monastic literature.

In these specialized branches the students learns the traditions of the Church, theology, Church history and laws, through the interpretation of the various individual writings. The commentaries of these teachings do not proceed under systematic theological or historical categories, but when each sentence or phrase of a text is interpreted, depending on the content, theological, moral and historical questions are raised, discussed, and developed. The student has to learn each sentence of the commentary by heart. The following is a typical example of a Metsehaf Betlesson

Students come to the teacher in a group of three or four, all studying the same text. One of the group reads a sentence or a phrase. The teacher first translates the sentence into Amharic and then comments on it. The students listen attentively and try to remember the comment word for word. When this group leaves the teacher, another group or individual comes to read to the teacher and hears his commentary. After leaving theteacher each group moves apart and tries to comment on the text just as the teacher did, as much as possible word for word. If one misses a word or an idea, another member of the group recalls it and supplements. Aftersome time the group goes again to the teacher and reads the same text and again comments on it. This way the group can compare its progress to know how far it had grasped the interpretation of the previous time.

This memorization of the commentary of the books exacts many years ofexercise and labour, which the adult student is ready to accept. A graduate of the Metsehaf Bet enjoys high prestige as a scholar and can take a high post in the Church hierarchy, such as head of a monastery (Gedam) or a large church (Debre). This hope is perhaps one of the motives that encourages the student to spend more that half of his life at such a school. At this stage memorization is not felt as a burden by the student, because ever since his early days in the Nebab Bet he has developed his powers of memorization.

One important reason memorization is so stressed all through the Church Schools is that writing materials were traditionally not well developed. Thefew handwritten manuscripts on parchments were, and still are, very expensive. Aside from the Authoritarian tradition there is another consideration; the student is not allowed to have a critical opinion about any text to be commented upon, since it is believed that God revealed thecontent to the Fathers through the Holy Sprit. Therefore, these patristic writings are not to be considered critically, but simply learnt by heart. Thehabit of memorization and the uncritical acceptance of the commentary condition the mode of thinking of the student.

In this way the historical interpretations are mixed with legendary tales and special natural events, all considered to be miracles, and even concrete phenomena are given symbolical meanings. The expressions arevividly illustrated with parables, analogies, proverbs, and popular wisdom.Parallels are quoted from the history of the country while interpreting the passages on the Holy Land. Generally, the approach to reality is well mixed with mythical attitudes.

These schools of commentaries are not to be found everywhere, but in large churches, Debre, and in monasteries, Geddam, where extensive libraries and famous teachers are to be found. It may be that church schools as a whole will take on a new impetus and play an important rolein raising the general level of education of the clergy in the future.

The church schools that have been described above provide the continuation of traditional education in Ethiopia. Modern education, of recent origin, is provided mainly in schools operated by the Government. However, in the urban centers and roadside towns the elementary church school, the Nebab Bet is flourishing as an institution to prepare pupils for Government schools, teaching young children literacy in Amharic. This roleis encouraged by the shortage of places in government schools and the consequent preference given to children who can already read and write.Such schools may perhaps play a wider role within the context of the national campaign for literacy and provide more instruction for adults aswell as young pupils.

It should be noted that the Church is fully aware of the necessity to train its own future leaders in such a way that they will fulfill their role in modern society. Modern theological colleges exist which combine traditional studies with the broader curriculum demanded in the twentiethcentury. A number of theological students have also progressed to furtheradvanced studies abroad. In other words, the church is successfully bridging the transition from strictly traditional scholarship to a new, dynamic era where traditional learning and modern education will blend together to ensure the continuity of Ethiopia's Christian heritage in the setting of modern world.

The OOCs Addis Ababa Conference In January 1965INTRODUCTION

The conference of the Heads of oriental Orthodox Churches, which was held in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, during January 1965, is undoubtedly an event of some importance in the history of the church in our times. For the first time in history is brought together in a formal meeting the Heads of five of the historic Churches. Accompanied by a few delegates each, they came together and thereby inaugurated a new era of cooperation andcommunication among their Churches. Although these five Churches have all along recognized one another officially as sister churches holding full Eucharistic fellowship with each other, they have not had a common council or synod after the fifth century. The Addis Ababa Conference has now brought to an end this practical isolation one from another of these Churches and opened up a new age in which they may be expected both to manifest concretely their unity and to play their role together in servingthe Christian cause in the modern world.

The Addis Ababa conference of the Heads of Church lasted only about fifteen days. But it did pave the way for the participating churches leap over more than fifteen centuries of mutual isolation. For it was at Ephesusin 431 A.D that these Churches lasted only about fifteen days. But it did pave the way for the participating churches to leap over more than fifteencenturies of mutual isolation. For it was at Ephesus in 431 A.D that these churches had their last common council. Now after so many long centuries, this conference has offered them the beginning of a new era of cooperation. This should indeed be followed up through coordinated planning and concerted action, so that the churches concerned may be enable to manifest the unity which exists among them and promote thecause of the church in the modern world.

It is with this goal in mind that their Holiness's the patriarchs have, through the conference, adopted the decisions which are published in the present volume. In fact they have sanctioned the appointment of various committees, which in the light of adequate study and comprehensive vision will draw the attention of the Churches to the many tasks which they have to fulfill. Existing as it does in an age of science, the church should be able to combine with its spiritual purity the many insights whichscience offers. From this point of view, the plan of creating a centre for evangelistic studies and an institution for higher theological learning is to be heartily welcomed.

The conference of the Heads of churches which took only a week was preceded by another week of preparatory work by specially delegated theologians. The task of organizing them both needed several months of planning. In fact, the very idea of the conference reached its maturity after several years of contemplation. Behind all this there was his ImperialMajesty Haile Selassie I, Emperor of Ethiopia, who convened the conference, there by giving it a setting similar to that of the Councils of the ancient Church. So it was quite fitting that the conference conferred on the Emperor the little, "Defender of Faith".

This Conference is only a beginning – just a humble one at that – towards leading the Church concerned to realize and fulfill their God-given mission in the world. But we have firm hope in the power of God who will continuethe work thus begun, so that it may bear fruit to his glory. We believe thatour Lord Jesus Christ who sumptuously fed five thousand men with the negligible provision of five loaves and two fishes will lead the churches in this great work.

In this connection, a special word of appreciation is due to the diplomatic missions of the Government of Ethiopia for their commendable service in communicating most promptly all the necessary messages relating to the Conference to the various Churches. While extending to the members of the various committees, the interim Secretary, and his assistants, the sincere appreciation and thanks of the secretariat, of the conference, mayI express my profound joy to see that this document is being published, and that its copies will be placed in the hands of all those who love the church.

A WORD ABOUT THESE CHURCHES

The five churches which took part in the Addis Ababa conference have, each of them, a long history, which in most cases can be traced back to the first century of the Christian era. At the same time, with reference tothe fifth century Christological controversy they remain loyal to the Alexandrine theological tradition as it had been declared orthodox by the council of Ephesus in 431. On this ground they renounce the council of Chalcedon held in 451, which, they maintain, did practically contradict thecouncil of 431.

In consequence of this stand as well as of various other causes these Churches have been made to face disabilities of many kinds. This, to besure, is one of the main reasons why these Churches happened to be isolated both from the rest of Christendom and from one another.
However, in spite of all such disadvantages they have continued to exist inthe world holding to “the faith once delivered to the saints”, and today they include in their total membership over twenty million believers.

All this five Churches are members of the world council of churches. The wind contacts which this offered had led many in these churches to hope and pray for a common council of their own churches to be convened. Theleaders of the world council of churches have also been showing much interest in such a development.

ARRANGEMENTS MADE FOR OOCs CONFERENCE

The Lord of the church answered the prayers and put into the main of His Imperial Majesty Haile Sellassie I, Emperor of Ethiopia, the idea of convening a conference of the Heads of these Churches in his own capital city, as a first step towards bringing the churches into a state of concrete unity and mutual cooperation. A devout member and protector of the Ethiopian orthodox church which is one of the participating churches, the Emperor himself had, ever since has elevation to the imperial throne of Ethiopia, been waiting for a suitable occasion to call together a conferenceof these churches.

At last the time came, and on 18th May 1964 the Emperor sent out invitations to Heads of the Churches, requesting them to take part in a conference which he was planning to convene. On receiving their replies ofacceptance, he entrusted the responsibility of making the necessary preparations with three local committees. These were a program committee under the chairmanship of His Beatitude Abuna Theophilos, Archbishop of Harar and Deputy Patriarch of the Ethiopia Orthodox Church; a Reception Committee led by His Excellency Balambras Mahetheme Sellassie, Minister of public Works of the Ethiopian Government; and a Secretariat with His Excellency Ato Abeba Retta, Minister of public Health of the Ethiopian Government, as Secretary General. These Committees, in cooperation with the staff of the Theological College of the Holy Trinity and persons like the Reverend Father T. Paul Verghese of the World Council of churches, did the work assigned to them during the several months preceding the conference.

In conclusion with the Heads of Churches, the program Committee prepared a tentative list of subjects to be discussed by the conference. Besides, this Committee arranged for the convening of a preparatory consolation by group of two theologians each deputed by every church towork out the “Schema” as a basis of discussion at the subsequent Conference of the Heads of Churches.

PREPARATORY CONSULATATION OF THEOLOGIANS

This was held during January 7-14, 1965 in one of the Committee Rooms of the Africa hall. With solemn prayer and an address of welcome delivered by his Grace Abuna Philipos, Archbishop of Jerusalem, representing the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, the work of the committee oftheologians formally began at 11 a.m. on January 7, 1965. it was attended by delegates of all the five Churches, the Secretary General, andother officers of the Conference. The meeting elected His Grace Abuna Philipos, representing the host Church, to be its permanent chairman, andevery session was presided over by a delegate of each Church who was chosen by a principle of rotation. Each of these sessions began and concluded its work with prayer led by every member of the Committee also by rotation.

Held behind closed doors, this consultation was indeed a great success and an unforgettable experience for those who took part in it. After long discussions carried on in a spirit of frankness and cordiality on the basis ofthe tentative list of subjects which the program Committee had prepared these theologians unanimously recommended the “Schema” for the Conference of the Heads. A summary of the discussion is preserved in theshort notes taken down by two recording secretaries, whose services had been graciously lent by the World Council of churches. Besides, the Committee had its official findings drafted by a body of three persons elected from among its membership. These findings were finally approvedby a committee with necessary modification in order that they may be presented to the conference. The “Schema” thus proposed by the group oftheologians to be submitted for deliberation by the conference consisted of forty paragraphs dealing with the following subjects: - I. The Modern World and our churches; II. Cooperation in Theological Education; III. Cooperation in Evangelism; IV. Our Relation with other churches; V. Instituting Machinery for the Maintenance of permanent Relations: and VI.A Statement on Peace and Justice in the world.

THE CONFERENCE OF THE HEADS OF CHURCHES

The conference had its sessions from January 15-21, 1965. The Heads with delegates other than those who had taken part in the preparatory consultation had arrived by plane on January 14th. They were received at the airport by His Imperial Majesty in person and high-ranking dignitariesof both the church and the state. Besides, there was a very larger gathering of people at the airport to accord a cordial welcome to the holy Fathers on their arrival. They were also given a special reception at the cathedral of the Holy Trinity in accordance with the tradition of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church. The Reception Committee had made all the necessary arrangements for the comfortable stay of these most venerableguests in Addis Ababa.

The Conference was inaugurated at 11a.m. on January 15th in the contextof a short service of prayer. The rotunda of the Africa Hall had been reserved for the delegates and all the seats in the gallery were occupied by invited guests. On rostrum seats were arranged for the Heads of the Churches following the ancient tradition of precedence, and a bible placed on a beautifully decorated table remained at the center of the hall in front of these seats. At this inauguration ceremony the place reserved for the Patriarch of Alexandria remained vacant, as His Holiness Anba Kyrillos pope of Alexandria and Patriarch of the see of St. Mark arrived only two days later. The conference was declared open by Emperor Haile Sellassie Ias the host, who delivered the inaugural address, welcoming the guests and expressing his unbounded joy in the great event signified by the conference. Following him, two of the Heads, namely His Holiness Moran Mar Ignatius Yacub III, Patriarch of Antioch and all the East, and His Holiness Vasken I, Supreme Catholicos and Patriarch of the Armenian Orthodox Church, also spoke thanking the Emperor and wishing the Conference every success.

The inaugural ceremony was followed by the regular sessions of the Conference, two sittings each day, expect on 17th January which was a Sunday. Attended only by the Heads and delegates with the officers of theconference, these sessions were also held behind closed doors. Each session began and concluded its program of work with prayer led by one of the Heads, and in response to a unanimous request of the conference His Excellency Ato Abeba Retta, the Secretary General, assumed the role of the Moderator, and Ato Aberra Jembere served as the General Secretary. During these sessions the recommendations of the committee of theologians were read in the context of a very lively discussion of the issues raised in them. As at the preparatory consultation of theologians, the discussion, and a body of five persons was appointed to draft the findings. These men did the work assigned to them and the statements which necessary alterations, as its decisions.

The conference came to a close on January 21st. At 4 p.m. on that day the concluding session was held in the presence of a large gathering of people. On this occasion also the Emperor delivered an address, followingby speeches by all the Heads of Churches. This closing session most solemnly conferred on His Imperial Majesty Haile Sellassie I the title of “the Defender of Faith”, and placed on record the feeling of sincere gratitude towards all those who worked for the success of the decisions approved by the Conference.

A PROBLEM IN THE ARMENIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH

Although this was a Conference of the Heads of five Churches, the Headsand delegates of the Armenian Orthodox Church expressed their inability to participate in it fully, because of certain internal difficulties of administration which they were facing between the Supreme Catholicos ofEtchmidzin and the Catholicos of the Great House of Cecilia. So at the closed sessions of the Conference the Armenian Orthodox church was represented only by observers, and neither of the Catholicos of the Armenian Orthodox Church signed the decisions at the conclusion of the conference. We are happy to note, however, that His Holiness Khoren I, Catholicos of the Great House of Cecilia, has subsequently signified his willingness to be considered a full participant of the Conference. We hope and pray that the Armenian Orthodox Church will be se guided by the HolySpirit that will join fully with its sister Churches.

A WORD IN CONCLUSION

Following its adjournment, the standing Committee appointed by the Conference had several meetings, in which a number of decisions have been made with a view to follow up the work of the Conference. It shouldalso be noted that in response to the request of the Conference, the Ethiopian Orthodox Church soon set up the interim Secretariat in Addis Ababa with Ato Seifu Metaferia as its Secretary General. In this way the work which the Conference aimed to accomplish is being carried on.

We pray God to shower His unceasing blessings on these churches, and guide them by His Holy Spirit that they may become effective witnesses ofthe redeeming work of Jesus Christ.

INVITATION TO THE EMPEROR AND HIS SPEECHES TO ORIENTALORTHODOX CHURCHES

The English Translation of His Majesty’sOriginal Letter of Invitation Sent to the Heads of the four Oriental Orthodox Churches

18th May, 1964Your Holiness,
We extend loving and friendly greetings in the name of our Lord JesusChrist.

Ever since Our ascension to the throne, by the will of the Almighty God, ofour fathers, it has been our great desire to see representatives of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and her traditional sister Oriental Orthodox Churches gather around one table in our capital city to strengthen their unity in faith and further their good relations as well as to solve their common problems by mutual exchange of ideas.

Because of our expressed desire to see this noble objective achieved,namely, the extension of God's kingdom, we have at last decided to convince such a meeting.
Our great fathers met first at Nicea, then at Constantinople, and finally atEphesus. Notwithstanding the very long period that has elapsed since then, the spirit of unity in faith of these sister Oriental Orthodox Churcheshas been maintained. This fact has encouraged us to convince this meeting. If the representatives of our Churches meet once again, there isno doubt that the common faith will be further strengthened.

Other Churches and Denominations have their own separate meetings todiscuss their common problems and to strengthen their unity. Now morethan ever before, when the Churches are faced with great responsibilitiesand need greater strength, it is quite appropriate that the leaders of our Churches should meet together to discuss common problems and exchanges ideas. Your Holiness is well aware of the great need and usefulness of such a meeting.

It is, therefore, our desire that these ancient sister Churches should meettogether in order to strengthen their unity in faith, to discuss points of common interest, resolve their common problems, and especially to pavethe way for the ultimate reunification of the divided Churches of Christ.

We are happy to arrange such a meeting of the leaders of the sister Oriental Orthodox Churches to be held here in our capital city of AddisAbaba from September 25, 1964 to October5, 1964.

With great personal regards to your Holiness, We extend this invitationhoping that your Holiness will be able to attend and participate in this meeting. We wish Your Holiness all peace from God and good health.
(Signed.) HAILE SELLASSIE I, EMPEROR

INAUGURAL SPEECH OF HIS MAJESTY THE EMPEROR:
TO THE CONFERENCE OF HEADS OF ORIENTAL OOCs Venerable and Holy Fathers,

On this occasion when you, Venerable Heads of the Oriental Orthodox Churches, are assembled together in our capital city, it is appropriate to demonstrate our joy by singing with the psalmist, “Behold, how good andhow pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity”(Ps 133:1).

The Unity of the Church, as your Holinesses well know, is the will of Godand ought to be inspiring example to all men. It should always be a helpand not hindrance to the unity of men of different religions.

As church history testifies, the church fathers from the apostolic period upto the Third council (4th century A.D) did hold councils to formulate the doctrines of the church and to draft rules of Churches administration.

It is with the hope that your meeting will contribute in a significant way tothe unity of the Church, and indirectly to the unity of church, and indirectly to the unity of all men, that we have invited your Holinesses andVenerable Fathers to our capital city.

Today not only the Church, but also the political powers of the world are frequently meeting, leaving their difference aside, to tackle common problems, and find ways and means for the achievement and preservationof world peace. The church should not overlook this great task because she is the source of peace and fraternity.

Our own church is as ancient as our faith, and her history is replete withaccounts of the unswerving faith of our people, the inspiring heroism of our martyrs, the holiness of our saints. The history of our nation has always been closely related to the history of our Church, and the churchhas been both the rallying point and the inspirer of our national unity.
Christianity has flourished in our country, keeping its original features andcharacter through the centuries. As a nation we have a great debt to the Church for our cultural heritage.

Ethiopia has been from ancient times well known for he hospitality and this is not the first time she has welcome holy fathers like yourselves. From the 4th century A.D onward monks and saints have come from Egypt, Syria and other Christian countries to Ethiopia and been received with high honor and great respect. T o mention only a few among those who are canonized in the Ethiopian church, the Nine Saints who came from different countries of Middle East and Abuna Gebre-Menfas-Kidus areexamples. Those holy fathers, preaching and establishing monasteries in various parts of our country, have greatly contributed to Ethiopian Christianity. Therefore, many churches and monasteries are dedicated to them in undying memory of the spiritual services, which they rendered to our country.

In ancient times, when the Faith of the whole Church was one, our country had the closest relations with the Emperors of Christian Byzantium. At the time when several Christian peoples in the North became subservient to non- Christian powers, our country gladly gave asylum to thousands of Christian refugees. It had equally given asylum from religious persecution at an earlier date to the followers of the founder of Islam. Only when our own immediate neighbors ceased to be Christian did our contacts with our fellow-Christians in the North and Eastbecome difficult to maintain.

Ethiopia, an island of Christianity has made her own distinctive contribution to the Christian faith; for, ever since her conversion to Christianity, she has remained faithful, her age-old ties with the apostolic church uninterrupted. For this reason she is universally renowned as the faithful daughter of St. Mark of Alexandria. The opportunity we have todayto discuss our common interests and problems together is the fruit of thatancient unity. To defend the faith and to preserve our ancient ties with your respective countries, our fathers the Emperors of Ethiopia and Ethiopian people have exerted great efforts all through our history. We aregrateful to all of them.

It is therefore with great joy that we welcome your Holinesses to our land and to our Church. Your Holinesses bring with you sacred memories from the ancient past. Your presence here is a pledge and token of the desire ofall Christians to be one.

Ever since we ascended the historic throne of Ethiopia, we have considered it our duty to call a meeting of the churches who belong to thesame fold. We were praying to God for His help in achieving this holy purpose, so that He may grant it to us to see this event. In ancient times the Byzantine emperors used to summon the Councils. Our sincere wish from the very beginning was to see these churches meeting to discuss their common interests and decide on their common problems. This wish is in actual fact fulfilled today, and we are happy to witness it. Therefore, we thank Almighty God, first because he has enabled us properly to fulfillour clear duty and, secondly, because our long cherished desire has now met with fulfillment. Henceforth the matter will demand the spiritual unityand hard work of your Holinesses. For strength can be achieved through unity, and success is the fruit of cooperation. There is no doubt that workdone through a cooperative spirit shell meet with success. Christ affirmed:-

“…..That if two of you agree on earth as touching anything that they shallask, it shall be done for them of my father which is in heaven” (Math.

For centuries past our Orthodox Church have been without contact. Perhaps that which still divides the two groups is a matter of some importance. Perhaps it is not. In any case, we live in a time when even political differences are discussed around the conference table and peaceful and amicable solutions sought by all. The church can afford to dono less.

Our age is characterized by notable advances in the sphere of communications, and is therefore rightly termed and age of unity and of coming together. In this connection we recall the noble efforts of Archbishop Nathan Soderblom of Sweden who took the initiative for the “Universal Christian Conference” which met in Stockholm as long ago as 1925. We have also followed with keen interest the deliberations of the Ecumenical Council held last November in Vatican City under the spiritualleadership of Pope Paul the sixth of Rome.

This Conference may not be able to come to conclusions here and now.Yet it behaves the leaders of the churches to begin to seek ways and means of reconciliation and collaboration.
As noted in your agenda, you are to consider the problem of peace, because the world today is facing a great dilemma: the catastrophically weapons which are the result of human ingenuity menace the word to thepoint of annihilation, and the human race is more than ever in need of theprayers and support of the church. In this face we have another ground for cooperation with all the Churches of the world. As the followers of Christ let us not forget how often our case has suffered through disunity.

We would like to refer in conclusion to the question of social welfare in themodern world. For a country can achieve much more in this field if supported by the Church. The will of God will be realized and humanity can achieve progress in both spiritual and material fields in a healthy society.

We consider it a great blessing to us and to our people that your Holinesses have come to bless our land with your sacred presence. Ourpeople and our Church rejoice to welcome Your Holinesses in our midst.

Holy Fathers, as the spiritual descendants of the Apostles of Christ, youhave an eminent responsibility, which responsibility would include the improvement of the relations of laity with clergy and of church with society.

We hope and trust that God will guide the discussion here according to Hiswill and that His power will assist Your Holinesses in finding common solutions to common problems in the spirit of amity and concord. May Godwho helped the 318 Fathers of the Council of Nicea enlighten and help us all.

A WELLCOME SPEECH DELIVERED BY A REPRESENTATIVE OF THEETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH TO THE PARTICIPATS OF THE PRE- CONFERENCE CONSULTATION

Esteemed Fathers and revered Brothers

We in Ethiopia are indeed delighted that you are with us and that we join with you in service for the next few days. So let me, on behalf of the Ethiopia Orthodox Church, His Imperial Majesty's Government and of my own, take this opportunity to extend to you our warmest and most sincerewelcome to our Church and country. You are responsible leaders and theologians of some of the most ancient and renewed Churches in the world and you have come to Ethiopia as the officially chosen delegates of your own respective communities. So we consider it an honor to welcome you and a great privilege to entertain you.

You have come to Ethiopia to perform a glorious piece of work, and it is quite fitting that it has been so arranged that you will begin it on these days of the Feast of Christmas. Our lord Jesus Christ was born more thannineteen centuries ago in that lowly manger in Bethlehem. He came into the world to bring peace on earth by uniting man with God and man with man. He lived on earth and died on the cross. But He rose again from thedead and is present with us to lead us in the way of peace.

On these blessed days you have come together to work under His leadership and guided by the Holy Spirit to lay the foundation of a renewed spirit to lay the foundation of a renewed spirit of forward movement in our Churches, a movement which should contribute to growth and enable all those who are called by the name Christian to drew closer together and express the fullness of unity, for which our Lord earnestly prayed. We know that this is a very great task, but we hope thatGod will guide you to make a good start towards its fulfillment. The conference of the Heads of our Churches, which is to follow your consultation, will rely on your labors for their decisions. So the success of the Conference will depend upon what you will be doing during these few days. Our earnest support in prayer goes with you, and we believe that God who has brought you here will be with you guiding you in all your thinking and activities.

We trust that you will enjoy your stay with us. Once again let me assure you that you are most welcome in Ethiopia, and that you may count on usthat we will do our best to make you happy and comfortable in every waypossible.

REPLY OF H. MORAN MAR IGNATIUS YACUB III

Your Imperial Majesty, Holy Fathers and Brothers beloved clergy andpeople.

It is with deep sense of gratitude to Almighty God that we stand here on this occasion, and the joy which we feel in the depths of our hearts is beyond words to describe. Your Majesty has offered us a memorable opportunity to meet in your beautiful capital. While listening to the speechof your Majesty, we are reminded of the episode at the Council of Nicea in325, when following the inaugural oration of Emperor Constantine, St.
Eustathius of Antioch delivered an address praising the Emperor. Althoughwe consider ourselves unworthy to take the place of that illustrious soul, as a successor of his on the holy see of the Apostle Peter we deep it our most pleasant privilege to speak these few words following your Majesty. In calling this historic Conference, your Majesty has shown yourself a worthy successor of the faithful Emperors in Christian history who have served the cause of the Church in their respective generations. While thanking your Majesty for convening this Conference, may we express ourmost sincere gratitude to the government and people of Ethiopia as well as to the Ethiopia Orthodox Church.

As the meeting of Heads and leaders of our sister Orthodox Churches of the East, this Conference is a great event for our Churches. Through we have a common heritage of Orthodox faith, our Churches have not had anopportunity of meeting together in this way for many long centuries. But now God has, through his servant Haile Sellassie I, the Lion of Juda and the glorious Emperor of Ethiopia, made it possible for us to come together. In fact, from the time when our humble self was elevated to theholy see of the Apostle peter, we have been praying God to open the wayfor a meeting of our Churches, and when two of our brother Metropolitansvisited Ethiopia soon after our installation, we had sent through them an appeal to your Majesty urging you to convene it. Now your Majesty has, out of your own gracious decision, called this Conference and we of the Syrian Orthodox Church all over the world rejoices in it.

It is fitting on this occasion for me to say that as the ruler of Ethiopia yourMajesty is a person whom we hold in the highest esteem. We remember you always in the celebration of our Liturgy. In so doing, we follow the worthy instruction of our distinguished Fathers like Mar Dionysius Bar Salibi in the twelfth. They have enjoined on us that we should remember the kings of Ethiopia in our Eucharistic Service, as they share the same faith with us. Even our Churches have very close relationship with each other at least from the forth century. So we have record that St.
Frumentius who was the first Archbishop of Ethiopia had come from Tyrewithin the province of our see. Mar Jacob Baradaeus in the sixth centuryvisited Ethiopia, and that about the same time the Nine Saints settled down in this country leaving their home in Syria. We are indeed happy that we are able to visit this great land, its Church and people.

Our Churches have indeed inherited the Orthodox faith from our Fathers. But we have not always manifested its meaning through the redeeming powers of divine love to a world which is hungry for it. That is one reason why our Churches have not been able to make the Gospel of Christ more real to our non-Christian neighbors. Through this conference we shall not only strengthen the bond of unity which exists among us, but shall also seek to reexamine the ways in which our true faith should transform our people. Besides, we shall agree together on practical programs of commonaction to make our Christian witness more effective in the world. With these concerns in mind, we pray that Almighty God may so order our deliberations that our Conference may give a new start to our ancient Churches.

To you Imperial Majesty and to the people of Ethiopia, especially to our brethren in the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, we and our Bishops bring the warmest regards of the Syrian Orthodox Church all over the world. We have with us in this conference our exalted Brother, Mar Baselios Augen I,the Catholicos of the East, leading a delegation of his ancient Church in India. It gives us great joy to see that in spite of his old age our beloved brother has journeyed from far-off India to Ethiopia to take part in this Conference. May we convey to Your Majesty, the church and people of Ethiopia the warmest greetings also of the Syrian Orthodox Church of India.

Today's Ethiopia is Ethiopia of the Holy scriptures,

INTRODUCTION

Of the lands and peoples of the Middle East and NorthEastern Africa mentioned in the Holy Scriptures and in ancient historical documents and on which light has been shed by various archaeological discoveries, Ethiopia and the Ethiopians occupy a leading place. In order to understandthis clearly, one has to look into various sources. Who are the Ethiopians? Where does their geographical location ……? These are some of the questions to be raised. No doubt, the answer to these questions are foundin the texts and interpretations of the Holy Scriptures, in ancient historicaldocuments, and in archaeological findings.

According to anthropological studies, Ethiopians are among the peoples that come under the category of dark skinned. The area they inhabit was also named Ethiopia in relation to the their colour. The cytological root of the word “Ethiopia” came from the Greek language “Aithiops” to mean “people with burnt faces,” The Greek translation of the Old Testament, theSeptuagint translates “cush” by “Ethiopia.” Since then, it has been appliedto the people of this country. According to very early Ethiopian traditions, however, the name Ethiopia was used after one of its ancient Kings, Aithiops I.

The archaeological and historical investigation of the people and its geographical location indicates that this designation was used for the lands lying to the South Egypt and extending up to India. The people whoinhabited this vast region were generally known as Ethiopians. As time wet on, the people of this region came to be known by the different states, with their own cultural affinities and religious variations. As a veryspecific term, the name “Ethiopia” was identified with the region of the source of the Nile and its valley, an identification which has continued to this day with its own historical legacy. Moreover, Ethiopia is noted for its precedence in her state formation in the region and has existed ever since, preserving her freedom, integrity and history. It is a living examplefor the preservation of the evidence found in Holy Scriptures, ancient historical documents and archaeology.

Nevertheless, a new falsification of Scripture has come to the fore, which is quite contrary to the history of the region, its designation and its geographical location as well. This is the publication of a revised Bible by the American Bible Society, the Good News Bible in 1976. The new publication has two amazing mistranslations, which amount to deliberate distortions. The earlier accepted translation of the Hebrew word “Cush” into “Ethiopia” and the “Ethiopians” used in the Greek, Latin and Geez Versions is now deliberately altered and instead “Sudan” and “Sudanese” are used. On the other hand, it left uncharged the word “Cush” in Genesis2:13, “…. And the second river is Gihon; it flows around the country of Cush” and the word Ethiopia in the New Testament (Acts 8:26) is notchanged into Sudan.

It is not clear why the American Bible Society intended to alter the word “Ethiopia” into “Sudan” without valid historical investigation. There is no historical basis for making this change. It is rather misleading, directing people’s attention to a wrong concept, and thus needs to be promptly challenged. The Bible Society of Ethiopia and Holy Synod of the EthiopianOrthodox Tewahido Church strongly protested and denounced this malicious act as it is not grounded on genuine interpretation of the Bible and history. The act also forced them to exchange a couple of letters withthe office of the United Bible Societies in the hope of make them realize their error.

The office of the United Bible Societies recognized the deliberate alterationby the American Bible Society. It noted that the word “Cush” of the Hebrew Version included the areas of today’s Sudan and today’s Ethiopia and as such it was unnecessary to change “Ethiopia” into the “Sudan”. It also gave assurances that further reprints of the Good News Bible would be stopped. However, the newly revised edition of the Good News Bible is in circulation all over the world and in disseminating a wrong impression to millions of people. The various letters exchanged with the office of the United Bible Societies asking them to correct the mistake done, now put inthe achieves, could not be an effective corrective to the initial error. Thus,it becomes, accessory to issue this short message to enable readers gain a correct understanding of the history how Ethiopia came to acquit its name.

Today's Ethiopia is Ethiopia of the past

It is clear that the distribution of people in the world is determined by thegeographical conditions. Even if it could be assumed that peoples of the world had no variation in their nature, their spatial distribution (low land,high land, temperate zone) and the climatic conditions (hot, cold, airy place) their experience could have some effect on their way of living and their colour.

Thus, we see that the designation of places and of people seem to be related. For example the word "Ethiopia" was derived from the colour ofthe people which might have been a result of the impact of the surrounding climatic condition. From this assumption, we believe that itwould be wise to see the designation of "Ethiopia" and "Ethiopians" intothree aspects based on historical facts and Holy Scriptures.

. Tribal Offspring
. Geographical Location
. Foreign Relations. (Ethiopia and the surrounding regions

a) Tribal Offspring :-

The Holy Scriptures assert that the peoples of the world are the descendants of Adam. Even then, the climatic conditions over the past Centuries brought about colour differentiation among peoples.The word "Ethiopians" meant "men with burnt faces" and the name "Ethiopia" was given to this land in relation to the colour of its people. According to Graeco-Roman historians and geographers the etymological root of the world "Ethiopia" is Greek-coined from two words and it was mainly given to this particular area land dark-skinned people. The first mentions of the Ethiopians in ancient Greek literatures was in the epics of Homer, a Greekpoer, who lived ca 500 B.C. Homer mentioned Ethiopia twice in the Nied and once in the Odyssy. In his writing about the Ethiopians and their country, Homer expressed their kindness and indicated that they lived at the end of the inhabited world, and that they were a people whom the gods liked to visit. In his references to the Ethiopians who lived at the endof the inhabited world, Homer indicated that some of the Ethiopians lived near the horizon where the sun sets while some of them lived at the otherend of the horizon where the sun rises.

What did Homer mean by the Ethiopians who lived at the end of the inhabited world? To understand this concept, we need to refer to the writings of other ancient historians and geographers. By the end of the inhabited world, Homer meant the regions to the south of Egypt and extending up to India, a concepts that became much clearly by the days of Herodotus. Herodotus, the well known Greek historian, who lived in theperiod between c. 400 and 300 B.C. traveled throughout the Middle East into Egypt and stayed therefore some years where he was able to learn more about the Ethiopians from various sources. According to the information he got he believed that there were two Ethiopian regions: thefirst of which was the land adjoining Egypt, and the second was the bit farther to the south of Egypt. Since he had written about the Ethiopians, who lived farther to the south, his reference could somehow fit with today's Ethiopia.

He further indicated that the geographical location of Ethiopia is to the south of Egypt along the Red Sea. He related that these people lived longer and were fish eaters. As indicated above, Homer was the first manto use: his designation. Traditionally, however, it was derived from an Ethiopian king Aethiops I, of the second millennium. But, on the other hand, the words "Ethiopia", "Ethiopian" and the "Ethiopians" were used inthe Septuagint in place of the word "Cush" in the Hebrew Bible. The word"Cush" in Hebrew had a three fold meaning. In the first place it was usedas a proper noun, since Cush was one of the sons of Ham (Gen, 10:6).

Then it was used as a tribe, Cush and Cushites, given to the sons of Cush.In this sense it has also been generally applied to the black race as a whole, even though this designation cannot be readily accepted. Thirdly itwas used as a name of a region, from the south of Egypt as far as India, where people of sunburn faces live. Hence, the second and the third meanings of the word Cush well fit to this particular area.

History of Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church (EOTC)'

EOTC is a member Church of The ORIENTAL ORTHODOX comprises of TheChurch of Armenia, The Church of Syria, The Church of India, and The coptic Church of Alexandria (Egypt).

Saint (Mahletai) Yared (25th April 505 AD - 20th May, 571)

Saint (Mahletai) Yared was born in the city of Axum from his father Abyud(Isaac) and his mother Christina (Tawklia) was a semi-legendary Ethiopianmusician credited with inventing the sacred music tradition of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and Ethiopia's system of musical notation. He is responsible for creating the Zema or the chant tradition of Ethiopia, particularly the chants of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, whichare still performed today. He is regarded as a saint of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church with a feast day of 11 Ginbot (May 19). Reading the Bible in Gee'z and the Yaredian soundings and position how to serv the church are preserved. The Holy St. Yared developed and composed the liturgical music and chants of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, as well as a unique 5 note system and notation system for Ethiopian music.

Religious Fastings: Fasting is abstinence from all kind of food for a limitedtime until the fast season is over. This can be performed by abstaining from tilulat and keeping ones body from food and dinking. Fasting is not absenting from tilulat but also from all things harmful to human beings; on the contrary it includes doing all vitreous deeds for others. Fasting is common in any faith but its performing order is seen different. Israelites,for instance, eating tilulat at the night after fasting the whole day time.
Others, the followers of Christianity, after fasting they simply eat and dinkinjera and water like E.O.T.C. but never eat tilulat until the fasting period is over. By saying order of fasting we mean how fasting is performed and to know why do we observe it and to show its performance as per its order. The Ethiopian (Orthodox Tewahedo) church as one among the first churches has this law and order of fasting. As per its law there are seven fasting periods; they are: 1. Lent (the Great fast) 2. The fast of the Apostles 3. The fast of the Assumption (of the Holy Virgin Mary known locally as 'Felseta Mariam') 4. The fast of Prophets (Advent) 5. the fast of Gehad (eve of Epiphany) 6. The fast of Nineveh 7. The fast of Redemption (Wednesdays and Fridays) "May the kings of Sheeba and seba bring gifts" (ps.72:10) - Based on prophesy of King David on psalms 72:9-10, "may the Ethiopians bow down before him, and his enemies lick the dust! May the kings of Tarshish and Isles render him tribute, May the kings of Seba bring gifts! May all kings fall down before him", when Jesus Christ was born in Bethlehem of Judea during the reign of Herod, the wise men from the East came to Jerusalem "and going in to the house they saw the child with Mary his mother, and they fell down and worshiped him. Then opening their treasures, they offered him gifts, gold and frankincense and myrrh (mt. 2:1-11). According to Ethiopian tradition one among the kings that gave tribute to Jesus in Bethlehem is an Ethiopian king Bazen. The Ethiopian Bakos is the first to introduce to the world the formula, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." Unlike Jews and Muslims, whostill are in difficulty to accept Jesus' Son ship of God, he believed Jesus as the Son of God and taught this true faith to his people. Since then the Ethiopian Orthodox Church believes and teaches Jesus' Son ship of God.
Bakos, the first harvest of the Gospel during the apostolic era by embracing Christian faith, is a corner stone for the beliefs and order of worship of the Ethiopian Church. With his pilgrimage, Bakos fulfilled the obligations of Mosic and Gospel rules, and made his name and the nameof his country mentioned in the Bible.

The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church (Amharic: የኢትዮጵያ ኦርቶዶክስ ተዋሕዶ ቤተ ክርስቲያን) Transliterated Amharic: Yäityop'ya ortodoks täwahedo bétäkrestyan) is the predominant Oriental Orthodox Christian church in Ethiopia. The Ethiopian Church was administratively part of the Coptic Orthodox Church until 1959, when it was granted its own Patriarch by Coptic Orthodox Pope of Alexandria and Patriarch of All Africa, Cyril VI. The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, being a non-chalcedonian church, is not in communion with the Ethiopian Catholic Church, a Chalcedonian church. One of the few pre-colonial Christian churches of sub-Saharan Africa, the Ethiopian Church has a membership of between 40 and 45 million, the majority of whom live in Ethiopia, and is thus the largest of all Oriental Orthodox churches. The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church is a founding member of the World Council of Churches.Tewahedo (Ge'ez ተዋሕዶ) is a Ge'ez word meaning "being made one" or "unified". This word refers to the Oriental Orthodox belief in the one singleunified Nature of Christ; i.e., a belief that a complete, natural union of theDivine and Human Natures into One is self-evident in order to accomplish the divine salvation of humankind, as opposed to the "two Natures of Christ" belief (unmixed, but unseparated Divine and Human Natures, called the Hypostatic Union) which is held by the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches.

The Egyptian Coptic Church of Alexandria and the Ethiopian Church reached an agreement on 13 July 1948, that led to autocephaly for the Ethiopian Church. Five bishops were immediately consecrated by the Coptic Pope of Alexandria and Patriarch of All Africa, empowered to elect anew Patriarch for their church, and the successor to Abuna Qerellos IV would have the power to consecrate new bishops. Abuna Basilios, the firstEthiopian archbishop Amharic meaning for "Abune", and later to become the first patriarch of the EOTC to assume the title fully in the presence of His Majesty Emperor of Ethiopia at the St. Trinity Cathedral Church was part of Egypt’s Coptic Orthodox Church, but got its autonomy this time. This promotion was completed when Coptic Orthodox Pope Joseph II consecrated the Ethiopian-born Archbishop, Abuna Basilios on the 14thJanuary 1951.

The formerly "Ichegue" of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church at the time this was the highest rank open to an Ethiopian within the EOTC, for the title of "Abune", or equivalent to "Archbishop", was always a cleric of the coptic- Church. In 1959, Pope Cyril VI of Alexandria crowned Abuna Baslios as thefirst Patriarch of Ethiopia. The Coptic Orthodox Church of Alexandria grants the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church autonomy gradually, andelevated the Archbishop to the Patriarchal dignity and was enthroned him with the title of: Patriarch and Re'ese Liqane Papasat Echegue (Catholicos)of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church. The title of Ichegue (Supreme Abbot) of the See of St. Tekle-Haimanot of Debre-Libanos was subsumed into the Patriarchate. The title of Ichegue was revived and the title of Archbishop of Axum was added to the Patriarchal titles at the latter, as Axum was the seat of Ethiopia's first Bishop, and the thus the oldest see in the church. Patriarch Abune Basilios died in 1971, and was succeeded the same year by Patriarch Abune Tewophilos.

According to the Catholic Encyclopedia article on the Henotikon, around 500 bishops within the Patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch and *Jerusalem*refused to accept the Dyophysitism (two natures) doctrine decreed by the*Council of Chalcedon* in 451, thus separating themselves from the main body of the Christian Church (which would later split in the 11th century, for different reasons, into the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches). The Oriental Orthodox Churches, which today include the Coptic Orthodox Church of Alexandria, the Armenian Apostolic Church, the*Syriac Orthodox Church*, the Malankara Orthodox Church of India, the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, and the Eritrean Orthodox Tewahedo Church, are referred to as "Non-Chalcedonian", and, sometimes by outsiders as "monophysite" (meaning "One Single Nature", in reference to Christ). However, these Churches themselves describe their Christology as miaphysite (meaning for "One United Nature", in reference to Christ; the translation of the word "Tewahedo". Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo ChurchDepartment of Evangelical and Missionary Activities is a principal department literally responsible for religious teachings of the EOTC. EOTC -Scriptural background to the 7(8) years difference in the calendarsaccording to the teachings' Ethiopian calendar (and other Orthodox Churches) differs from that of Europe and the countries that Europeans influenced through colonizationor occupation and so on. The chronology of the Ethiopian church follows the Era of Incarnation that is it dates from our Lord's birth; there is a difference of 7 or 8 years between the western and Ethiopian systems.

Because the Ethiopian church holds that our Lord was born 5500 years after the creation of the world this gives the 7 or 8 years difference between the Gregorian and Ethiopian Chronologies. The church also uses other systems of chronology. There is the Era of the world which dates from 5493 B.C, which also differs from the western chronology by 7 or 8 years. Then there is a system of chronology called "the years of Mercy or Grace," a system which follows the great lunar cycle. The difference lies indetermining the exact date of the birth of Christ.

According to Dionasius, a Roman monk, the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ was 753 years after the foundation of the city of Rome. It is according to his calculation that the world joins the second millennium, in spite of the fact that, researchers many years after him have already discovered he has made a mistake by at least four years. Their argument was based on the Biblical clues given at Mt. 2:1 and Lk.3: 1-3, 22-23. In Mt. 2.1, it wasmentioned that Jesus was born during the time of King Herod. The King died just after the birth of Christ. Meanwhile, it was also recorded that theking died 750 years after the city of Rome was founded. The other Gospeltells us that Jesus was 30 by the time he began his ministry. It was also mentioned that this was the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar.Historians proved that Tiberius came to power 765 years after Rome was founded. Fifteenth of his reign would be in 780, ~ clearly showing a difference of four years from the calculation Dionasius has done.

One would ask, "Why didn't they make these corrections? Why so far? ".
One reason for this could be, that based on this calendar many historical records and other important dates and festivals have already been established. ~ Correction would have meant losing of all these documents and reestablishing the dates, which might have created much conflict. TheEthiopian Christians didn't base themselves on historical facts to decide the date on which Jesus was born. They used ages mentioned in many parts of the Holy Bible. According to their argument, God has nothing todo without reason.
He must have meant something when He makes mention of these ages. Ifone contemplates on this he would draw a remarkable conclusion about this matter. Moreover, the birth of our Lord was foretold. The time was also fixed. Jesus was not born suddenly. When was it? It is really a big question. How did the Magi come to Jerusalem to worship the infant Jesus?
Indeed, they were wise men, and had the prophecy in their tradition thatthe King of the Jews, whose Kingdom will last forever, will be born in theholy land. It is also important to observe that the chief priests of Jerusalem were able to tell where he was born (Mt.2: 1-5).
They knew the date (Dan. 9:24) and place (Mic.5:2).
So we can be sure that there is sufficient information to fix the exact date just by following the stories in the Holy Bible and the prophecies. From theSt. Paul's, "When the time had fully come, God sent His only begotten son, born of a woman..." (Gal. 4:4) it was clearly indicated that there was a time period which human beings were supposed to wait. This was, according to Ethiopians, 5500 years. The same was mentioned in the tale of Abraham.
This was a covenant given to Adam by God. When Adam was banished from Garden of Eden, he sought to get mercy of God. God told Adam thatforgiveness of sin would not be obtained by his effort. He then promised him, "When five and a half days are full, I will be born of your offspring and save you".
Note that one-day is one thousand years with God (2 Pt.3: 8). When thistime (5500 years) had fully come, Jesus was born. Then the Ethiopian started to calculate this time following the pace of Biblical history from Genesis up to the time of Jesus the Christ. The task was not so easy. It requires a good understanding of how the times were mentioned in the Holy Book. It is presented below in a simplified form. The story begins inthe fifth chapter of Genesis: (Gen. 5:3)
Finally, we reached the point. This total sum would establish the 5500(=4990 + 510) years sought.
The time God gave Adam to come to this World. The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church based its calendar on this calculations. Wosibihate Le Amelake Abewene. For further knowledge you may read: "TWFITAWI HASABE ZEMENINA TARIKU', By S.Meseret and 'YEZEMEN AKOTATER', By A.Gebremariam and G.Mehari.

Apart from a five-year occupation by Mussolini’s Italy, it has never beencolonised. It has a unique cultural heritage, being the home of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church – one of the oldest Christian churches in theWorld – and a monarchy of Solomonic Dynasty that ended only in the coup of September, 1974.

ETHIOPIA IN HISTORY:

Queen of Sheeba or Makeda -TheTrue Name of the EthiopianQueen, the Wife of King Solomon Of Judah

In 960 B.C., the nation that is now called Ethiopia, came back upon the center of the stage of history. Ethiopia was then represented by a queen,who in some books is referred to as "Makeda. "She is better known to theworld as the Queen of Sheeba. In his book, "World's Great Men of Color,"
J.A. Rogers, gives this description: "Out of the mists of three thousand years, emerges this beautiful story of a Black Queen, who attracted by thefame of a Judean monarch, made a long journey to see him."

Makeda , according to lore and legend, is the mysterious and majestic Queen of Sheeba, and the beloved of King Solomon of Judah. However, according to the Old Testament , she is portrayed as a chaste and unnamed queen of the land of Sheba heard of the great wisdom of King Solomon of Israel and journeyed there with gifts of spices,gold, precious stones, and beautiful wood and to test him with questions, as recorded in First Kings 10:1-13 (2 Chronicles 9:1–12).

Pre Christian
It is related further that the queen was awed by Solomon's great wisdomand wealth, and pronounced a blessing on Solomon's deity, Solomon reciprocated with gifts and "everything she desired," whereupon the queen returned to her country. Makeda was apparently quite rich, however, as she brought 4.5 tons of gold with her to give to Solomon (1 Kings 10:10) .
There is no hint of love or sexual attraction between Solomon and the Queen of Sheeba. The two are depicted merely as fellow monarchs engaged in the affairs of state. Note that the Songs of Solomon (the shortest book in the Bible with only 117 verses) are amongst the mostbeautiful odes to love between a man and a woman ever written.
Makeda’s name is never mentioned.
Together they had a son, Menelik I, who would become the first Emperor of Ethiopia. Based on a text The Kebra Nagast , a royal chronicle compiledin Abyssinia in the 14th century, this ancestry reestablished the Solomonicline. In 1270, with Emperor Yekuno's declaration to be the lineal descent Menelik, all succeeding Ethiopian rulers confirmed they have full filial and ruling rights by birth to Yekuno Amlak and, by that means, to King Solomon and Queen Makeda.

Piero della Francesco

In many versions of the Old Testament and in subsequent art, Queen Makeda was whitewashed. She was a beautiful powerful black woman whoconverted to Judaism, out of love, and traditional Western culture have never acknoweldged this. It is also believed that one of the ten lost tribes of Israel are the "Falashas", a group of Ethiopian Jews who live today as inBiblical times.

Perfumer Shelley Waddington is the first to name a fragrance after Makeda. This perfume magically evokes the love between King Solomonand Makeda , the fragrance is hand blended as in the days of old; Makeda's heart of Jasmine Sambac, base of Oud,and cedarwood ("The beams of our house are cedar, King James 1.17') clearly evoke the passion, sexuality and royalty of its noble namesake.

King Solomon Meeting the Queen of Sheba It was the trumpets in the background more than anything that convinced me this window depicts the meeting of King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. That's not much togo on, is it? Well, Ethiopian identity, ideology, history, and politics are all deeply connected to the story of King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba....

It seems inconceivable that Emperor Haile Selassie I, an emperor of a Solomonic dynasty claiming legitimacy through descent from King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, would build an immense cathedral and not allude in some way to the seminal event in Ethiopian history. This must be it. The elements are all present: apart from the horns, there's a king (left), a female in an Ethiopian crown and pearls (right), who must bethe Queen of Sheba, and minions displaying the Queen's tribute to King Solomon.

Ethiopia served as a symbol of African independence throughout the colonial period, and was a founder & chartered member of the United Nations and it's also the African base for many international organisations including the newly restructured African Union (AU) the successor of the former Organization of African Unity (OAU).

Orthodox Church is a defining feature of national identity. Ethiopia has suffered periodic droughts and famines that lead to a long civil conflict inthe 20th Century and a border war with Eritrea. In the first part of the 20th Century Ethiopia forged strong links with Britain, whose troops helped evict the Italians in 1941 and put Emperor Haile Selassie back onhis throne. From the 1960s British influence gave way to that of the US, which in turn was supplanted by the Soviet Union.

Prior to Ethiopia's Solomonic Dynasty, Ethiopia had a beautiful queen known as Queen Makida or the Queen of Sheeba. She once went to Israelto visit Jerusalem and met the wise and powerful King Solomon. The queen was greeted with great hospitality in Jerusalem and King Solomon enjoyed her company. The meeting of the Queen and the King eventually resulted in an affectionate relationship and the Queen of Sheba went backto Ethiopia pregnant with Solomon's son. The son was Minilik the first whobecame the first king of Ethiopia as anointed by his father, launching Ethiopia's long line of Solomonic Dynasty. All of Ethiopia's emperors and empresses are descendants of Minilik I – the first-born of King Solomon.

The Solomonic Dynasty was founded in 1268, with Yekuno Amlak becoming the first emperor. The last emperor of Ethiopia's Solomonic Dynasty was Emperor Haile Selassie I who died aqt age of 84 in August 1975.

Prince Alemayehu of Ethiopia, who was the son of Emperor Tewodros, diedat the age of 18 on 14 November 1879 in the city of Leeds in England after being taken hostage by Briton ten years earlier. The prince was taken hostage by Briton after his father committed suicide regarding capture by an invading British army as bringing shame on himself and his country. Prince Alemayehu's body is still kept at the medieval WindsorCastle in the English county of Berkshire.

Emperor Haile Selassie was the first Ethiopian leader to extensively travelabroad. He had private, official and state visits in nearly 167 countries.

Among the countries he visited are: America, Brazil, Australia, Canada, China, Egypt, England, France, Germany, Ghana, Greece, Haiti, Hungary,India, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Japan, Kenya, Liberia, Malawi, Malta, Nigeria, Norway, Russia, Saudi Arabia Senegal, Sweden, Switzerland, Trinidad, the Netherlands, the Vatican and Uganda.

Ge'ez Alphabet & Numerics:

The script of Ethiopia's official working language of Amharic is derived from Ethiopia's ancient language of Gee'z which came to being during the4th century CE.

Ge’ez & the Armenian Alphabet Similarities

ER: (August 23, 2013) - The Geez alphabet is much older than the Armenian alphabet. According to historians, the Armenian alphabet was created around 400AD by an Armenian priest who wanted to create a unique alphabet. He had exposure to various scripts in Jerusalem including the Geez script from priests there and he based it largely on Greek and Ge'ez alphabets. Various scripts have been credited with being the prototype for the Armenian alphabet. Pahlavi was the priestly script inArmenia before the introduction of Christianity, and Syriac, along with Greek, was one of the alphabets of Christian scripture. Armenian shows some similarities to both. However, the general consensus is that Armenian is modeled after the Greek alphabet, supplemented with letters from a different source or sources for Armenian sounds not found in Greek. The evidence for this is the Greek order of the Armenian alphabet;the ow ligature for the vowel /u/, as in Greek; and the shapes of some letters which "seem derived from a variety of cursive Greek." Armenians at that time found Geez is to be easier, powerful and efficient created thier alphabet based on Geez template. It has also been suggested that the Ge'ez script had an influence on certain letters of the alphabet. Ge'ez language, the ancient Ethiopic language, now remains the liturgical language of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church (EOTC). The modernAmharic language, which is the national language of Ethiopia, believed developed out of the ancient Ethiopic language Ge'ez while the Ge’ez alphabet known as Saba Ge’ez is still under use. It was Ethiopia among some countries in the world sheltered Armenians off the Turky’s genocide.

ETHIOPIA IN HISTORY: Ark of The Covenant:

According the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, the original Ark of the Covenant, the object on which the Ten Commandments were inscribed, iskept at the Church of Our Lady Mary of Zion in the northern Ethiopian town of Axum.

An Ethiopian shepherd who lived in the ninth century discovered the coffee plant in the southwestern Ethiopian town of Kaffa. The shepherdwas napping one day while his herd had set out to find grazing to eventually stumble across the coffee plant and its stimulant cherries.

Legend has it that the herd led the shepherd to the spot where they foundthe coffee plant and that he helped himself to the bright red cherries as a matter of curiosity and realized their stimulant nature. The first experiment of coffee was then carried out by boiling the cherries in water and drinking the blend. Most people at that time enjoyed the stimulant nature of the plant on the grounds that it kept them alert and lively, thereby making them able to maintain wakefulness during evening prayers in this deeply religious country. This makes Ethiopia the origin of one of the world's most consumed beverages and the coffee beverage is named after the Ethiopian town of Kefa where the coffee plant was discovered for the first time.

ETHIOPIA IN HISTORY: Lalibela Rock Hewn Churches In Ethiopia One of Ethiopia's most recognized national landmarks is the world-famousrock-hewn ancient church of Bete-Giorgis located in the northern Ethiopian town of Lalibela. While the Church of Bete Geiorgis is very easilyrecognized for its architectural shape resembling the Cross, it actually is one of eleven churches carved out of a single piece of granite below ground level that are connected to each other by a tangled maze of tunnels. Built in the 12th century under King Lalibela, these churches attract pilgrims carved out of a single piece of granite below ground level that are connected to each other by a tangled maze of tunnels. Built in the12th century under King Lalibela, these churches attract pilgrims.
Lalibela, a small city of approximately 15,000 people located in the WolloProvince of the Amhara Region of Northern Ethiopia, is considered one ofthe nation's holiest cities and is the destination for pilgrimages by Ethiopian Orthodox Christians from around the nation. It was envisionedto be a "New Jerusalem" in response to the capture of Jerusalem by the Muslims in 1187.

Originally called Roha, the town took the name of Gebra Maskal Lalibela,the Emperor of Ethiopia from 1185 to 1225 and one of the last rulers of the Zagwe Dynasty. According to local history Lalibela, who had visited Jerusalem before its conquest, vowed after its fall to make Roha his newcapital and to ensure that it would recall the glory of old Jerusalem. He gave biblical names to many of the town's features and encouraged architecture that followed established Christian themes. Lalibela remainedthe capital of Ethiopia for more than a century after the Emperor's death.

Thirteen unusual churches were built in and around Lalibela. Each church sits below ground level and was cut directly into the rocky terrain. These church buildings are architectural marvels. The floors, columns, windows,doors and even roofs were constructed by carving into enormous pieces ofsolid rock. Some of these structures are "pure" monolithic churches, meaning the entire edifice is carved from a single rock with only the floor still connected to the terrain. Four of the twelve rock-cut churches are "pure" monolithic churches, Bete Madhane Alam, Bete Maryam, Bete Amanu'el, and Bete Giyorgis, the most finely built and best preserved of the churches.

Abba Libanos, another full rock-cut church, is unique in that it has walkways surrounding the outside of the building. These walkways connect to the landscape at the top of the structure. Bete Madhane Alam, the largest church, houses the Lalibela Cross. Bete Golgotha, known for the art on its walls, is said to contain the tomb of Emperor Lalibela. Somehistorians theorize that not all of the thirteen buildings were intended to be churches. Bete Gabriel-Rufael was possibly a royal palace and Bete Merkorios may have been a former prison.

Complementing all of these rock-cut churches is an extensive system of drains, defense trenches, and ceremonial passages all cut out of the volcanic rock common to the region. There is scholarly debate regardingwhen and how and why these churches were constructed because of thediffering architectural and engineering styles. This debate is ongoing andcarbon-14 data has been inconclusive. Nonetheless because of its churches, Lalibela is a World Heritage Site and thousands of tourist mix with Christian Pilgrims to visit the town and its churches each year.

ETHIOPIA IN HISTORY: Queen Makeda -The True Name of theEthiopian Queen, the fiancé of King Solomon Of Judah

ETHIOPIA IN HISTORY: Castles of Fasiladas In Gondar, Ethopia Gondar is the former capital of the emperors of Ethiopia and remains a regional center to this day. Around 1635, Emperor Fasiladas (reign 1632- 67) began construction on a castle in the Gondar Valley near the shores ofLake Tana. The fortification was ideally situated along trade routes and had ready access to wood, water and foodstuffs from the agricultural regions along the northern shore of the lake. Because of these factors, Gondar would be able to grow into the first true Imperial Ethiopian capital.This designation was solidified by Fasiladas' successor Yohannes (reign 1667-82) who was crowned and died in the city. Despite a growing political importance, early Gondar was not a particularly beautiful city.

Charles-Jacques Poncet, a French pharmacologist residing in the capital around 1700, was impressed by the majesty of the Imperial court but notby the mud houses that made up the city.

Nevertheless, as the city grew, each successive emperor built new palaces, churches and monuments. Fires, such as the one set in 1732 when forces loyal to Iyasu II (reign 1730-55) defeated a rebel force in the city, provided an excuse for an emperor to build and rebuild. The trade that fueled the growth of the city was conducted in weekly marketsheld south of the castle complex. The growth also had a demographic influence as well. Ecclesiastical suburbs were formed, such as the Muslim Islambet or Islamge; the Jewish community of Falasha Bet that was involved in blacksmithing and pottery making; and Echege Bet and AbunaBet, both centers for the Ethiopian Church.

Whereas Fasiladas, Yohannes and their predecessors had been strong monarchs, the emperors who followed them were increasingly weak and confined to their palaces in Gondar. By the time of the boy-king Iyoas (reign 1755-69), the decline was complete and the future Gondarine monarchs would be dominated by various ras, upper nobility roughly equivalent to British dukes. Gondar itself would frequently become the stage of conflict for the ras attempting to control the current emperor. By1814, the great palaces of Gondar were described by a traveling Englishman as being in decay. What was left of Gondar's glory days was destroyed when Tewodros, a ras who had been declared emperor, sackedthe city in 1864 and again in 1866, and moved his capital to Mekdela.

Gondar today remains one of the major cities of modern Ethiopia with apopulation of roughly 200,000.

Ethiopian prince was kidnapped by Britain – now it must release himMaaza Mengiste (the guardian)

Seven-year-old Prince Alemayehu was captured – along with many national treasures – in 1868. His remains are held in Windsor Castle butpleas for their return have been rebuffed

You see him first as he was soon after his father's death: a seven-year-oldboy staring, stunned, into the camera. He sits on a cloth-covered bench, next to a shield and a strip of animal hide. Around his shoulders, a long shamma drapes and gathers at his folded ankles. You note his bare feet, the way one toe, curled upward and tense, hints at the emotions he is keeping guarded. He wears the silver-baubled necklace that will travel with him from Ethiopia to England, the one also seen in pictures where he is made to sit for Julia Margaret Cameron and other photographers. His mother, if still alive, will soon die unexpectedly, leaving him in the hands of the same British men who came to confront his father. But for now, hehas not lost everything.

In the end, Emperor Tewodros released the prisoners unharmed, then committed suicide rather than surrender. What happened next would be described as a "deluge of fire" and one of the greatest looting orgies everundertaken in the name of the British empire. Alemayehu, by now an orphan, was put on board the Feroze, the same ship as Holmes, who wastaking back to Britain the largest haul of stolen artefacts in Ethiopia's history. The objects went into British museums and libraries. Alemayehu became a ward of Queen Victoria and, despite his continual pleas to be returned to his homeland, he died aged 18 in England. He was buried at Windsor Castle, where he remains. A plaque, “When I was a stranger, yetook me in,” marks his vault.

Today, we can recognise Napier and his forces for the marauders that they were. We can acknowledge the imperialist arrogance that would kidnap a young boy and trumpet the achievement through newspapers and photographs. The generosity of hindsight might even explain why Alemayehu’s pleas to return home were refused. But there is no longer any excuse for that same refusal and arrogance. There is no viable reasonto continue to hold his remains hostage. He has become, like the sacred and valuable objects still in British museums and libraries, a possession.

In 2007, the then Ethiopian president Girma Wolde-Giorgis sent QueenElizabeth a formal request for the return of the prince’s remains.

Alemayehu’s plight has been the subject of radio plays, poems, and books. Scholars and concerned citizens have started campaigns; a young boy wrote a widely publicised letter to Tony Blair. Yet every request to theQueen or Buckingham Palace has been met with silence or refusal.

Alemayehu is still trapped in the land of his kidnappers, a plaque forcingon to the narrative of his life a sentiment that he would not have chosenas his own.

In her diary, Queen Victoria describes Prince Alemayehu as “a pretty, polite, graceful boy … There is nothing whatever of the Negro about him.”

In photographs, Alemayehu is rendered fragile and exotic. Though she acknowledges that “his was no happy life, full of difficulties of every kind”,the queen does not seem to consider that this unhappiness might have broken this young boy, might have sent him spiralling into ugly, impolite anger. What the queen wanted to imagine in Alemayehu, what England still wants to possess, is a foreigner who earns refuge through politeness, quietness and grace.

Alemayehu, like those who are today crossing borders to flee violence andoppression, endured a forced migration. Yet there is nothing graceful about the overloaded boats heading towards Europe. There is nothing polite about those who have rushed fences and tunnels to escape devastation. If there is beauty to be seen, it is in what they refuse to give up: aspirations and dreams, a love willing to risk all for family, the photographs and letters they clutch even when it requires superhuman strength. These people too are portrayed as strangers. But they, lacking inthe refinements that Victoria praised in Alemayehu, are not the kinds of foreigners acceptable to a Europe still looking for comfortable narratives that can be condensed on to plaques and fit into museum displays.

You think of him in what is now the Victoria and Albert Museum, wandering a room where the loot from the expedition is displayed. He pauses at the familiar gold crown. He stares at the necklaces and anklets worn by the women in his household. Over there, the torn fragments of anilluminated Bible.

You see him look longingly at these mementos from home, now imprisoned behind glass. You see him, stoic, as he is guided from one vitrine to the other. You see his steps slow and falter as he approaches a beautiful long dress. You imagine that in that instant he wants to smash his fist through the glass and take back his mother's dress, bury himself inher familiar scent. Instead, he turns to the queen and demands again to be sent home. Maaza Mengiste will be speaking on a panel about migration at the Africa Utopia festival at London's Southbank Centre.

Emperor (Atse) Yohannes IV & The Unity of Ethiopia

Following Emperor Tewodros's death, a struggle for succession took placebetween Tekle Giorgis and his brother-in-law, Dejezmach Kassa of Mirchaof Tigray. In 1872, Dejezmach Kassa of Tigray defeated Tekle Giorgis (1868 -1872) and was crowned under the name Yohannes IV. He established Mekele as his capital when he relocated his power base from Debra Berhane to Mekele in 1881. Yohannes was a committed Christian, nationalist, diplomatic, and a great military leader.

Ethiopia In History:

Prince In-exile Alemayehu Tewodros of Abyssinya'

Prince Alamayehu Tewodros, an Ethiopian prince who was orphaned at theage of seven, when his father Tewodros II died rather than surrender to the British troops that had surrounded his castle in what was then Abyssinia. Alamayou was brought to England by Sir Robert Napier and adopted by the intriguingly named explorer Captain Tristram Speedy.

Alamayou died in England of pleurisy in 1879.

Prince In-Exile Alemayehu Tewodros, often referred to as HIH Prince Alemayehu or Alamayou of Ethiopia (23 April 1861 – 14 November 1879) was the son of Emperor Tewodros II of Ethiopia. Emperor Tewodros II committed suicide after his defeat by the British, led by Sir Robert Napier,at the Battle of Magdala in 1868. Alemayehu's mother was Empress Tiruwork Wube.

The young prince was taken to Britain, under the care of Captain TristramSpeedy. The Empress Tiruwork had intended to travel to Britain with her son following the death of her husband, but died on the way to the coast leaving Alemayehu an orphan. Initially, Empress Tiruwork had resisted Captain Speedy's efforts to be named the child's guardian, and had even asked the commander of the British forces, Lord Napier, to keep Speedy away from her child and herself. After the death of the Empress however,Napier allowed Speedy to assume the role of caretaker. Upon the arrival of the little Prince's party in Alexandria however, Speedy dismissed the entire Ethiopian entourage of the Prince much to their distress and they returned to Ethiopia.

While staying at Speedy's home on the Isle of Wight he was introduced to Queen Victoria at her home at Osborne House. She took a great interest in his life and education. Alamayehu spent some time in India with Speedyand his wife, but the government decided he should be educated in England and he was sent to Cheltenham to be educated under the care of Thomas Jex-Blake, principal of Cheltenham College. He moved to Rugby School with Jex-Blake in 1875, where one of his tutors was Cyril Ransome(the future father of Arthur Ransome). In 1878 he joined the officers' training school at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, but he was not happy there and the following year went to Far Headingley, Leeds, West Yorkshire, to stay with his old tutor Cyril Ransome. Within a week he had contracted pleurisy and died after six weeks of illness, despite the attentions of Dr Clifford Allbutt of Leeds and other respected consultants.

Queen Victoria mentioned the death of the young prince in her diary, saying what a good and kind boy he had been and how sad it was that heshould die so far from his family. She also mentioned how very unhappy the prince had been, and how conscious he was of people staring at him because of his colour.

Queen Victoria arranged for Alamayehu to be buried at Windsor Castle. The funeral took place on 21 November 1879, in the presence of Cyril Ransome, Chancellor of the Exchequer Stafford Northcote, General Napier,and Captain Speedy. A brass plaque in the nave of St George's chapel commemorates him and bears the words "I was a stranger and ye took me in", but Alamayehu's body is buried in a brick vault outside the chapel.

Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia arranged for second plaquecommemorating the Prince to be placed in the chapel as well.

In 2007, the Ethiopian government requested the return of Alemayehu'sremains for reburial in Ethiopia.

In popular culture

The story of Alemayehu's life is told in the radio play I was a stranger, byPeter Spafford, which was broadcast on BBC Radio 4 in May 2004.[4] Therole of Alemayehu was played by Chiwetel Ejiofor.

The story of Alemayehu's life is also told in the book The Prince Who Walked With Lions by Elizabeth Laird (ISBN 978-0230752436) in March2012.

In December 2012 Alemayehu was featured in the BBC Radio 4 programme Great Lives, nominated by poet Lemn Sissay. Elizabeth Lairdwas the invited expert. (Text ends)

HISTORICIZE

The Stolen Ethiopian Prince buried in Windsor'

Posted on December 17, 2012 by Lemn Sissay

His story has been written by the victors of the Battle of Magdala, but is the truth inhumed beneath the battleground? There’s an Ethiopian prince buried in Windsor Castle at St Georges Chapel. He still can’t get home. Hedied in 1879 and is said to be Queen Victoria’s favorite prince. He is HIH Prince Alemayhu of Ethiopia son of King Tewdros II His tragic life is my chosen subject on BBC radio 4’s Great Lives. My quest into his life begins with his death.

As one taken from his family through deception by the British governmentI have an interest in Prince Alemayhu. When I discovered him I can’t admit that I wasn’t excited to find a kindred spirit. Like his my childhood isdocumented by the British government who refused to return me to my Ethiopian mother and hid the letters of her pleading for my return. Not an hundred years earlier government refused to return Prince Alemayhu and, after his death it came to light, they'd hid such letters from him.

The narrative established for me was that my Ethiopian mother and familydidn't want me. Effectively the same narrative was established for the prince. Both were proven to be untrue. I have utilised my life to prove mycase. Prince Alemayhu didn't have that opportunity. To the story. His father The King of Ethiopia committed suicide as the British troops descended upon his castle atop a hill in Magdala. The British army then took his son Prince Aleymahu – he was seven years of age – from Ethiopiato England. What follows is the official british narrative that having lost the battle in which thousands of his countrymen died, and before committing suicide, King Tewdros II made his wish known to the victors that his son should be taken by them to England. To believe this without question is insulting to say the least and willfully naïve at best yet this is what British history documents.

Within living memory of Prince Alemayhu's passing journalist Hannah Poolwas taken from Eritrea on the premise established by nuns that her parents were dead. This was untrue. There are many more African adoptees that are told untruths or convenient half truths about their birthparents which serve to force closed the door of an alternative and altogether more human narrative.

If you wouldn't mind me swerving from the central story I'll try and explain what I mean by "an alternative and more human narrative". Whena mother gives up her child for legitimate adoption one could say it's one of the most selfless and painful acts of humanity for a woman and yet more often than not the birth mother is castigated. Neither Hannah, PrinceAlemayhu or myself were fostered or adopted in such a way still the fact remains.

Returning to the main story the circumstantial evidence of Alemayhu's taking suggests there were more vainglorious reasons rooted in the pomposity of Victorian culture, a pomposity most eloquently documented by Dickens. Though race was not his subject if I recall. Where are the other examples in Ethiopian history of Ethiopian Kings willingly giving theirchildren to the British? There are none to my knowledge.

However there is plenty of evidence of British soldiers raiding and lootingAfrica. Is it more likely Prince Alemayhu was one of the more vulgar exploits and spoils of The Battle of Magdala, to impress Queen victoria, ina primal exaltation of war. The army raided King Tewdros's castle taking gold, historical texts and even the clothing of his wife the Empress who died months later. These garments are displayed today in the British Museum. ETHIOPIA IN HISTORY:

Why Ethiopian historians denied all this?

7 facts you may not know about Yohannes IV.

This list is an extract of a study from the renowned Ethiopian scholar Richard Pankhurst titled "Innovation and Misoneism during the Reign of Emperor Yohannes IV (1872.1889)", you are invited to read the study init's entirety.

1. Urban Development;

Dabra Tabor – The Emperor, on assuming the throne, travelled to DabraTabor,Tewodros's former capital in Bagemder, and established a new palace and other buildings at nearby Samara. He also ordered the construction nearby of the modern-style church of Hiruy Giyorgis, whichwas erected with the help of an Italian craftsman Giacomo Naretti.

Desse – Yohannes had one other notable urban achievement to his credit:the founding of the town of Desse, soon to emerge as the capital of Wallo.The settlement was established in 1882, and commemorated that year's Great Comet.

So why Ethiopia historian hide this fact???

2. Medicine;

Physician – The second field of traditional innovation in which Yohannesplayed a prominent role was medicine. He accepted the presence at hiscourt in 1885.86 of a Greek physician, Dr. Nicholas Parisis, lent by King George I of the Hellenes. Yohannes was thus the first Ethiopian ruler tohave his personal physician.

Vaccination – Parisis was, however, more than a mere court physician. Heintroduced European-style vaccination, based on a serum imported from France, to a moderately wide section of the population. This arrived duringthe great smallpox epidemic in 1886, and resulted in the vaccination of many prominent figures. They included Emperor Yohannes himself, the Abun, or head of the church, King Minilik of Shawa, King Takla Haymanot of Gojjam, and Ras Alula, as well as many generals, officials, soldiers, and numerous children.

Yohannes was so convinced of the superiority of modern vaccination over traditional Ethiopian variation that he issued a decree forbidding his subjects from practicing the latter. The force of this decree is confirmed byHarrison Smith, who declares that the old practice was declared a heinous. offence; and that great efforts were made to replace it by European-style vaccinatOrthotic & Prosthesis – Other medical developments took place in this period throughout much of northern Ethiopia. One of the most remarkable innovations was due to the arrival inAdwa of the aforementioned Hungarian armourer, Andre, who made artificial limbs for thieves and other persons amputated in accordance withthe traditional Ethiopian legal code. He reportedly charged ten Maria Theresa dollars per limb, in addition to being given presents of grain, meat, honey, etc. The French traveler Alex Girard reported that when Yohannes first saw Andre's artificial limbs he "could not believe his eyes".

Clinics – The establishment of clinics in Adwa and Gondar, New medicineswere also imported in the course of trade, or brought in by foreign travelers. This resulted in a significant expansion in the use of mercury sulphate preparations in the treatment of syphilis. This cure was by then replacing the older sarsaparilla treatment, and by the early 1880s was commonly used, Rohlfs says, in much of northern Ethiopia.
Again why Ethiopia historian hide all these fact???

3. Slave Trade;

Yohannes was significantly influenced by the nineteenth century European, and more specifically English, agitation against slavery and theslave trade, and was virtually the first Ethiopian ruler to take an official stand against them. Both institutions were then long established in the country. Hallowed by time, they were accepted, albeit with some qualifications, in the Ethiopia's traditional legal code, the Fitha Nagast, or Law of the Kings. The question of the slavery and the slave trade came tothe fore early in Yohannes reign. The matter was apparently first broughtto the Emperor's attention in 1873 by the British traveller de Cosson, whoshared his countrymen's passionate hatred of slavery. Yohannes, according to the traveler, listened attentively to his interpreter's translation of the arguments against the institution, after which he declared that he had thought gravely over these matters, and that it wastrue that slavery was distasteful to him as a Christian sovereign;though Minilik re started it again on Southern Ethiopia.

4. Opening of diplomatic relations;

Though rulers of Ethiopia had despatched diplomatic-cum-commercial missions to Europe since early medieval times, Yohannes was the first Ethiopian monarch to appoint a permanent representative abroad(formal Embassy). The latter was an Englishman based in London, a certain HenrySeymour King, who was accorded the title of Ethiopian Honorary Consul.

Again why Ethiopian historians hide this ???

5. Repatriation of artifacts & Restitution of the Kibra Nagast – Yohannes was likewise the first Ethiopian monarch to request the repatriation of artifacts looted from the country. He was grieved in particular at the loss of two items seized by the British expedition to Maqdala in 1868. One wasa manuscript of the Kibra Nagast, or Glory of Kings, the marginalia of which contained important data on land holdings in the Aksum area; the other was an icon of the Christ with the Crown of Thorns, which had for centuries been carried by the Ethiopian soldiers on campaign.

Deeply concerned at the loss of these two irreplaceable items he despatched two letters to London: one to Queen Victoria; and the other tothe British Foreign Secretary, Earl Granville. As a result of this intervention the British Government returned the manuscript, which, it transpired, had been acquired by the British Museum (now British Library).(Anbessa!!! but the Axum obelisk was looted by Italia during the reign of Minilik; !!!!!) The volume was subsequently transferred to Emperor Minilk's custody, and is currently in the possession of St. Raguel'schurch in the Markato open market area of Addis Ababa.

6. Introduction of a national flag –

Yohannes meanwhile had the distinction of being the first Ethiopian ruler to introduce a national flag. Two designs were produced, both entirely different from the one later inaugurated by Minilik. The first, according to Winstanley, was a gorgeous production of silk, a tricolour, the coloured divisions running laterally. The highest portion was crimson, the centre white, and the lowest ametyth blue. The whole was surrounded by a rich gold fringe. On the white ground was a gilt and painted representation of the Lion of Judah, with a defiant tail, and a crucifix in his right paw. The second version, described by the French traveler Gabriel Simon, consistedof two bands of red silk followed down by a white band on which was embroidered the Ethiopian lion merchant;being the least bottom green color. The shaft was surmounted by a double cross. who is the real Lion ofJudah?

7. Founding of a church at Jerusalem (Del-Sultan Monasteries)

The one other achievement of Emperor Yohannes deserves mention:

founding of the Church of Dabra Gannat at Jerusalem. This place of worship was initially funded with gold he had captured from the Egyptiansat the battle of Gura in 1876.(Anbessa!!!)

He subsequently made the church many further payments, to a total valueof 328,500 Maria Theresa dollars, of which 141,500 dollars were for construction purposes.

RAS ALULA ENGIDA (Wadi-Eqube)

He is one of the top 20 Generals of all time , his military tactics are still studied in major military colleges...all over the world. Serving under Emperor Yohannes IV, he led so many successfully won battles against foreign invaders. He was the very first African general leading the defeats of the Egyptians in Gundet 1875, Gura 1876, Aylet 1887, Senhit 1880; theMahdists of Sudan in Kufit 1884; the Italians in Sahrati 1887, Dogali 1887, Amba-Alaje 1889, Mekelle 1896 and Adwa 1896. What a great Ethiopian warrior he was! Also let's not forget that he was the governer of mereb melash and midri bahri (current day Eritrea) and founder of Asmara! “ጣልያን ሰሀጢን የሚገዛውእኔ የሮምገሸ ሆኜ ስሄድ ነው፤ ክንዴን አቅምሻቸዋለው ተመልሰው የ ማጡእ ንደሆነ ምእደግ ማቸዋለው'' ራስ አሉላ አባ ነጋ

ETHIOPIA IN HISTORY:

The Imperial Crowns of Emperor Menelik II

Portrait of Menelik II. (source: Wikipedia)

Emperor Menelik II was a “King of Kings” in the literal sense of the word. King Tekle Haimanot of Gojjam had been crowned Nigus of Gojjam by Empero Yohannis, and Menelik had confirmed him. However, Menelik would refuse to create anymore kings in the Empire under him, and the eventually caused his rift with Ras Mengesha Yohannis who expected to becrowned King of Zion. Empress Taitu tried to reason with Mengesha stating that his arranged marriage to her niece Kefey had been intended to cement his relationship as the “son” of the Emperor and Empress, and a family member. She argued that Tigrai had never been ruled by a king, but by a Dejazmatch traditonaly, and that only Shewa and Gojjam had been given this dignity (although Gojjam had only recieved this recently during the previous reign and Shewan royal house had granted the dignityto itself rather than through Imperial sanction initially). She argued that Her uncle Wube and his own father Emperor Yohannis, when they had been rulers of Tigrai had only had the title of Dejazmatch, and that he as a Ras had superseded both of them and elevated the province. Mengesha however was adamant that his father had been “King of Zion” and that in gratitude for his stepping back from his claims on the Imperial throne, theEmperor Menelik owed him the title of King.

Menelik was equally adamant, and so when a petulant Ras Mengesha rebelled yet again, Menelik decided that enough was enough. When Mengesha was persuaded to yet again submit, Menelik refused to be merciful yet again to this man who had never gotten over losing the Imperial throne to him. This time he ordered Ras Mengesha arrested and placed under house arrest in the old Palace at Ankober in Shewa, where he remained for the rest of his life. The province of Tigrai would temporarily be administered by Ras Makonnen. Eventually Tigrai was divided three ways between Dejazmatch Gebre Selassie Baria Gabr, Dejazmatch Abraha Hagos, and a son of Ras Sebhat. Later still, the sons of Ras Araya Selassie Yohannis and Ras Mengesha Yohannis would be granted half of Tigrai each. Ras Mengesha was not the only would be royalvasal that caused Menelik problems. Even before he became Emperor, as the King of Shewa, Menelik had gone about bringing the southern kingdoms and principalities to heel, and re-incorporated them into the Ethiopian Empire. A bloody and difficult war had to be fought in 1894 to bring the Kawa of Wollaita, Tona, to accept Menelik II as his liege lord.

Shaqo Tona would be the last King of Wollaita, his successors were given the title of Dejazmatch, and regarded as nobility in Ethiopia from then on rather than royalty. Another princeling that resisted the Emperor was the Tato of Keffa, Gaki Sherocho. He refused to submit even after his military defeat in 1897. After 5 months as a fugitive, he captured and was broughtin captivity to Addis Ababa, and placed under house arrest in the ImperialPalace. He was allowed his own house on the grounds, and his own staff of servants and slaves came with him, but he was made to always wear long chains to symbolize his status as a prisoner. However, in deference to his royal birth, his chains were made of gold. They would not be removed until Lij Eyasu assumed the throne in 1912. The Oromo monarchies of the south and west fared better however. Kumsa Moreda ofLeqa Nekemt not only submitted, but converted to Christianity and accepted the Orthodox faith. Renamed and titled Dejazmatch Gebregziabiher Moreda, he continued to rule his fief and was allowed to resume every royal dignity he had enjoyed before. Jote Tullu of Leqa Qellam also submitted to Menelik and the Church, and was given the title of Dejazmatch as well. These Wollega Oromo dynasties would shortly become a favored source of wives for the Imperial family and the highest Shewan aristocracy, as they were considered of lofty birth and position.

The young Muslim Sultan of Jimma, Abba Jiffar II, had initially resisted submission in 1884, but he too eventually submitted, convinced by his mother that fighting the powerful Menelik was futile. Menelik was grateful,and decreed that Abba Jiffar II was to remain the fully empowered Sultan of Jimma, and that the only concession that Menelik expected was payment of an annual tribute to the Crown. Abba Jiffar would become a loyal vassal to Menelik, and even went on to fight for him against less co- operative princelings in the south such as the Kawa of Wollaita and the Tato of Keffa. The most difficult to re-incorporate into the Empire was Arsi. Suffa Kusso and Damu Usu, two of Arsi's leaders were persuaded to submit to the then King Menelik of Shewa in 1882 in exchange for autonomy. However they were not able to convince any other Arsi notables, and what resulted was a bloody and difficult war that lasted between 1882 and 1886. Ras Darge and Menelik himself both led campaigns through Arsi to gain the submission of the province, but it was a difficult time, and in fact Menelik barely escaped with his life on one occasion in 1883. Finally, Ras Darge was able to deal a crushing blow to the Arsi rebels at the Battle of Azule in September of 1886. With the Egyptian withdrawal from Harrar in 1885, and the restoration of Emir Abdulahi, Menelik decided it was high time that the City State be re- incorporated into the Empire. The weak forces of the Emir of Harrar met the much better armed and much larger force of the Emperor at Chelenqoon January 6th, 1887, Ethiopian Christmas-eve. After a very brief shootout that lasted a few minutes, the Harraris fled. Following the entry of Menelik into Harrar, and the end of the Emirate of Emir Abdulahi, the Emperor appointed his cousin and confidant Ras Makonnen Wolde Michael (father of Emperor Haile Selassie) as the governor there. Keffa was given to the Emperors cousin, Ras Wolde Giorgis Aboye (son of his aunt Ayahilush). Ras Tessema Nadew, son of his beloved former tutor, was given Illubabur. The eastern end of Wellega (excluding Leqa Nekemt and Leqa Qellam) was granted to Dejazmatch Demiss Nessibu, who had foughtvalliantly at Adowa.
Another favored General of the Adowa campaign, Fitawrari Hapte Giorgis, was given not only Borena in the far south but also Jebat and Mecha in western Shewa. Dejazmatch Balcha Saffo was given Sidamo. Hapte Giorgis was of mixed Gurage and Oromo ancestry, while Balcha was also an Oromo. Both had been captured as boys by Menelik's army's during thecampaigns to re-incorporate the south into the Empire when Menelik was still King of Shewa. However, both had been raised by him, and then elevated to high positions of military and political responsibility. Both would become fiercly loyal to Menelik and his interests even after he had died. Hapte Giorgis would become one of the most powerful people in the Empire and a kingmaker in the government. In 1887 Ras Makonnen, alongwith Dejazmatch Jote and Dejazmatch Gebregziabiher of the Wellegan states led a campaign to subdue the sheikdoms of Asosa (Aqoldi),Khomosha and Bela Shangul which had for some years owed allegience to the Mahadist regime in Khartoum. After some initial fighting, Sheikh Khojale Al Hassan of Assosa submitted, but Sheikh Abdel Rahman Khojale of Bela Shangul fought on fiercely, and was finally defeated at Fadogno in 1897. Sheik Khojale Al Hassan then joined the Imperial forces,and launched an attack on Mohammad Wad Mahmud of Khomosha and defeated him, handing him over to Ras Makonnen. However, Sheik Khojale was soon found to be in secret correspondence with the British who were reestablished in the Sudan, and he was arrested and brought toAddis Ababa along with the two other captive Sheiks. After all three had formally submitted to the Emperor, they were allowed to return to their lands to continue ruling them as before in all respects, except that annual tribute must be sent to the crown. Muhammad Wad Mahmud was granted the title of Fitawrari, and Abdel Rahman Khojale was made a Dejazmatch. Sheik Khojale Al Hassan however insisted on keeping his traditional title of Sheik and accepted no other title. Ethiopia was begining to assume herpresent borders.

It needed an exceptionally strong man to weld the heterogeneous & disloyal elements of the country into a harmonious one. Menelik has accomplished this almost by a superhuman activity. Menelik is extraordinarily well acquinted with what is going on in the world, not only from the political point of viewbut also from a scientific point of view too. Menelik's manners are pleasantand dignified; he is courteous & kindly, & at the same time simple in manner." The Mysterious Origin of the tri-colors flag of Ethiopia

The book Ethiopian National Flag attempts to document the origin of the Ethiopian National Banner from all angles. The author, Asfaw Tefera, in 1999, has surgically examined the folklore, legends and documented accounts of the Ethiopian Flag or Sendek Alama. He was able to discover that at various times the Ethiopian flag was either blue or contained two white stripes and many more variations of the Green Yellow and Red. Theinterpretations of the flags are also discussed. Unfortunately, there is a tendency to discount the Ethiopian legend as he attempts to discover the origins of the Ethiopian National Flag. is by strongly relying on documents.Basically there is an attempt to describe the legend as nothing more than myth since Ethiopians are well known to rely on legends than on documentations.

In this section, we shall attempt to reveal the mysterious origin and interpretation of the Ethiopian flag which has been passed down as folk lore through oral history. The Ethiopians call their flag Sendek Alama, which literally means "Sceptre Motto " or "Sceptre Symbol" or "National Flag". The Ethiopians also use the bastardized name Bandira (Italian=Bandiera), unaware that it is of Italian derivative for banner or flag. We believe that the Ethiopian flag of Green Yellow and Red is the oldest flag in the world and are presenting the wonderful and majestic story here.The earliest flag used by humankind is probably the colors of the rainbow (Keste Damena or Bow of the Cloud), basically the Green Yellow and Red. Two nations that have kept these cultures are Ethiopia and Bolivia. Today Bolivian Indians still use the colors to celebrate some oftheir festivals but in Ethiopia it is still the emblem of the country.
Throughout the year, it is seen in the rains of the monsoon seasons or inone of the many waterfalls (Fwafwate) during the dry season, as a reminder that God made to man never to destroy the earth with water.
The right photo above show the rainbow after a shower in Yayi, Ethiopia.The left photo is the perpetual rainbow at the Blue Nile falls (Tis Isat or Smoke of Fire). The flag has an ancient roots and therefore has many interpretations. The flag colors signifies such doctrines as Faith Hope andCharity, Father Son and Holy Spirit and Wealth Blood and Fertile Land.

Ethiopians however believe it was given to them by God and its sanctity isbeheld. (Photo from Pankhurst, Ethiopia).

The image of the flag with the Lion of Judah (Moa Anbessa) is from a flag used in the Jubilee Palace and depicts the official and correct Lion of Judahsymbol. Certain individuals use the British or Persian lion but the Lion of Ethiopia is unique and as depicted on the currency of the country. Touristsand pseudo-scholars sometimes provide wrong information that are pickedup by the lay person just because it was written by a European. One such example is Herbert Vivian, a British traveler who was in Ethiopia in 1900 and who describes the flag of Ethiopia in his book Abyssinia as White Red White horizontal strips when he first saw it near Somadu and Gildessa close to Harar.

Lij Tafari Makonnen (Amharic ልጅ ተፈሪ መኮንን ; lij teferī mekōnnin)

He was well known at age of 3 as a child. He becomes more known as LijTaffari Makonnen later until he becomes Dejazmach Taffari at fourteen years of age. Lij meaning for "child", and...serves to indicate that a youthis of noble blood. His was given a name, Taffari, meaning "one who’s respected or feared". Like most Ethiopians, his personal name Tafari is followed by that of his father Makonnen and rarely that of his grandfather Woldemikael Gudissa. His infant baptism name Haile Selassie was given tohim at his coronation day in November, 1930 and adopted again as part ofhis regnal name.

Ethiopian Legends: Regional King Haile Melekot of Shewa.

Father of Emperor Menelik II. He was the son of King Sahle Selassie of Shewa by his legal wife Bezabish Woldé. Haile Melekot fathered Menelikby Woizero Ijigayehu, who was serving in the household of King Sahle Selassie's mother Zenebework. Some accounts maintain that Ijigayehu was a lady sent from the Imperial court in Gondar to teach the young women of the Shewan royal family about etiquette and customs of the Solomonic Imperial court. The baby was baptized as Sahle Mariam and King Sahle Selassie himself named him Menelik and made Haile Melekotenter into a union with Ijigayehu which didn't last long in any case.

Nigus Haile Melekot was a renowned warrior, and many thought he had the ability to someday take the Imperial throne itself. However it was Tewodros II whose fate it was to take the Imperial throne and forcibly re- incorporate Shewa under direct rule of the Emperor. As Tewodros II sweptinto Shewa with his vast army, Haile Melekot's mother Bezabish, and grandmother Zenebework raced ahead to submit to the Emperor betrayingtheir son and king. The two queens immediately began to plague Tewodros with competing demands over lands, rights and Royal income.

In the mean time, King Haile Melekot, already gravely ill, died of his sickness before getting a chance to rally his troops and face the Emperor in battle. When Tewodros II marched into Ankober and was told that the king had died of illness, he refused to believe it and had Haile Melekot's grave opened to look at his recently buried body. When he say the dead king, Tewodros is said to have wept for him, saying it was a tragedy that a great warrior like Haile Melekot of Shewa should die this way without having a chance to defend his throne. Having conquered Shewa, the Emperor had captured Haile Melekot's young son Menelik and half brotherDarge and the King's stunningly beautiful widow Tideneqialish.

Tewodros had recently lost his adored first wife Empress Tewabech Ali, so his eyes fell on the beautiful Shewan Queen. He told her she must accompany him back to Gondar. Tideneqialesh modestly agreed to go withthe Emperor, but asked him to grant her one favor. She said she had never visited St. Mary of Zion in Axum and would Janhoy grant her permission to go there first. Her wish was grated and Tewodros allowed her to go to Axum on the condition that she then proceed to Gondar.
Tideneqialish went to Axum, prayed to the Virgin Mary for her protection,then promptly escaped fleeing for Massawa where she boarded a boat forPalestine. Tideneqialish widow of Haile Melekot of Shewa arrived in Jerusalem and entered the Ethiopian monastery there ending her days asa simple nun. When Tewodros II heard about this he said a poem addressed to the dead King about his female family members "Haile Melekot indet ainet sew neberu? Ye meest menagn, Ye inat shumet lemagn!" (Haile Melekot what kind of person were you? With a wife whoenters a nunnery and a mother who demands honors!) in those days it would have been expected that Zenebework and Bezabish would enter aconvent and the widow Tideneqialesh would demand a share of her husband's property, but in this case Tewodros was amused that the reverse had occurred

Ethiopian Legends: GEBRE HIWOT BAYKEDAGN

"Gebre-Hiwot was born in 1886 in a town of northern Ethiopia, Adwa. In atrip to the port of Massawa, Gebre-Hiwot and his friends got permission from a captain of a German ship to visit the ship. On departure, Gebre- Hiwot stowed away (this may not be deliberate, Alemayehu Geda, 2004). On arrival, the captain entrusted the young boy to a rich Austrian family, who adopted him. This fortune opened to him the opportunity to study theGerman language and to go to school. His expos...ure to Western education was thorough, and he pursued medical studies at Berlin University. He returned to his country and became private secretary and interpreter to the Emperor Menelik, the very one who defeated the Italian colonial army in 1896 at the battle of Adwa. Later on, while the late emperor Haile Selassie was still the successor to the throne, he fulfilled important administrative functions. He served as inspector of the important Addis- Ababa-Djibouti railway until his premature death in 1919. Baykedagn published two majors works in Amharic, the Ethiopian national language: Mengistna ye Hizb Astadadar, published in 1924 after his death and translated in to English in 1995 as “State and Economy of Early 20th Century Ethiopia” and in 1912 Atse Menilik ina Ethiopia, which was translated in to French in 1993 as UEmpereur Menelik et VEthiopie.

Gebre-Hiwot is one among pioneer development economists of early 20thcentury in Ethiopia. Thanks to my undergraduate lecturer (for the course History of Economic thought) Mr. Sisay Regassa, among knowledgeable professors ever taught, makes me read Gebre-Hiwot’s book “State and Economy of early 20th century in Ethiopia while I was doing my under grad. degree @ Addis Ababa University. I was astonished on his way of writing and his philosophy concerned with the role of education (human capital) in development, the internal restraint for development, the tradelink with Europe and its aftermath on backward countries development ingeneral and Ethiopia's development in particular, and creative way of adopting the European replica of economic development in general, and that of Japan in particular to the Ethiopian realism." - Prof. Bahru Zewde

Ethiopian Legends:

Negus(King) Mikael Of Wollo & the Northern Ethiopia

Mikael of Wollo (1850 – 8 September 1918), born Mohammed Ali, was an army commander Regional King and a member of the nobility of the Ethiopian Empire. He was the father of the "uncrowned" Emperor Iyasu V.Lij Eyasu proclaimed that his father would now become King of Zion. Hisinitial designation was "King of Zion" which would have given him hegemony over Tigray, Wollo, Lasta, Wag and even Beghemidir, in effect the entire north. Emperor Yohannes IV was the last person to use the title of King Zion in conjunction with that of Emperor. As a result Yohannes IV'sheirs expressed deep displeasure and so Negus Mikael was crowned King of Wollo but was still given explicit hegemony over the entire north including Tigray. So you could go either way with whether the title "king of Wollo and Tigray" is correct. This was one of Lij Iyasu's acts that angered much of the northern nobility.

This title gave Ras (now king) Michael hegemony over all northern Ethiopia, not just Wollo, but Tigrai and Gondar as well. The northern nobility were furiou...s that they were now being presided over by a former muslim whom they had formerly out ranked. In particular, the Tigrean princes were enraged as the title "King of Zion" had last been used by Emperor Yohannis IV, and they believed their family had been robbed of it's inheritance. Shewans and southerners were not pleased withthis sign of the ascendency of the Wollo relatives of the heir. In particular,the much overlooked Ras Wolde Giorgis, cousin of Empror Menelik II was resentful that he, a senior prince and member of the Imperial House was relegated to the mere title of Ras while Michael was made King of the north. The prominent Tigrean noble, Dejazmatch Gebre Silassie Baria Gabr, who had played a key role in removing Empress Taitu from state authority, rebelled against the declaration of Michael as king of Zion, hoping the heirs of Emperor Yohannis would join him in the rebellion.

However, Seyoum Mengesha, grandson of Emperor Yohannis, and son ofRas Mengesha decided it would be prudent to obey the powers that be, and he joined King Michael against Gebre Silassie.

Michael was crowned King of Zion on May 31st, 1914 at Desse, and rewarded Seyoum Mengesha with the title of Ras. In deference to the sensitivities of the heirs of Emperor Yohannis, Michael stopped using the title "King of Zion" almost immediately and began to use "King of Wollo".Mikael of Wollo, as he was now known, eventually would marry Shoaregga Menelik, Menelik's natural daughter, becoming the third of his four wives. Mikael founded Dessie, the first town in Wollo and its new capital. Ras Mikael would become a deeply devout Orthodox Christian, anda dedicated builder of churches.In 1896, during the First Italo-Ethiopian War, Mikael fought for Menelik and led the feared Oromo cavalry against the invading Italians at the Battle of Adowa. An Italian brigade began a fighting retreat towards the main Italian positions. However, the brigade inadvertently marched into a narrow valley where Mikael's cavalry slaughtered them while shouting "Reap! Reap!" (Ebalgume! Ebalgume!).

The remains of the brigade's commander were never found.

As the Emperor Menelik II had no acknowledged sons who lived to adulthood, the question as to who his heir would be was always open during much of his reign. He was said to personally favor his cousin Ras Makonnen, son of his paternal aunt, Woizero Tenagnework Sahle Selassie.
Ras Makonnen had been a loyal and faithful subject, who had acted as thede-facto minister of foreign affairs for many years. He had represented the Emperor at the coronation of King Edward VII in London, and had traveled extensively in Europe, including Italy where he had tried to negotiate a solution to the crises over the Treaty of Wuchale, which later resulted in the Battle of Adowa. He had also served at Adowa as a commander, shared most of the Emperor’s progressive views, and was quite well respected and liked in court circles. His untimely death in March1906 however, left the succession up for grabs as the Emperor aged and became increasingly frail. Other candidates for the throne included Dejazmatch Taye Gulilat, direct descendant of Menelik’s paternal uncle, Merid Azmatch Haile Michael Sahle Selassie. Another was Ras Wolde Giorgis Aboye, the son of Woizero Ayahilush Sahile Selassie, another aunt of the Emperor. Nevertheless, Lij Eyasu Michael was always a favorite candidate for the position of heir apparent as Menelik’s only grandson. Lij Eyasu was educated at the Imperial Palace in Addis Ababa, and also at theold Shewan capital, Ankober. He also traveled often to his father in Desse.He was taught at the modern Menelik II school with other young noblemen later on. From an early age, he was made aware of his proximity to the throne of Solomon. His step-grandmother, Empress Taituseems to have had reservations about his position from the beginning.
Even as a young boy, and increasingly as he grew older, the prince showed little regard for her, and the childless Empress did not relish the thought of being at his mercy one day. The roots of this may have been inthe deep seated rivalry between the Mammadoch clan of his father, and the Empress’s Werresheik clan of Yejju, both of whom claimed precedencein Wollo. Although relations between Ras Michael and Empress Taitu were always civil, her brother Ras Welle Bitul was an avowed enemy of Michael,and the two Rases often exasperated the Emperor with their constant feuding. Empress Taitu, in addition to her Yejju lineage, was also of Simien blood, and had Imperial ancestry in the Gondar line. As a thorough northerner, she was resented by the Shewan aristocrats as ambitious for her own family and their pretensions. Indeed, Taitu had managed to marry all her relatives into the major aristocratic houses of Shewa, Tigrai, and Gojjam. It was whispered, that the Empress would prefer Menelik's daughter Zewditu ascend the throne as Empress. As Zewditu was married to Taitu's nephew, Gugsa Welle, son of the aforementioned Ras Welle Bitulwho was also of Imperial blood, it was said that she hoped that the couple would rule Ethiopia together, and return the capital to Gondar. Thus her Yejju-Gondar relatives would have unfettered influence at the expense of the Shewan aristocracy which surrounded Menelik and the non-Yejju Wollonobles whose hopes were pinned to Eyasu. As it was, the Tigreans and themost of the Wollo shared the concerns of the Shewans as far as the ambitions of the Empress, and there was little likelihood of her being able to carry out this plan. In October 1909, it was decided that Lij Eyasu should be betrothed to marry Romanework Mengesha, daughter of Ras Mengesha Yohannis, and granddaughter of Emperor Yohannis IV. She wasalso the daughter of Woizero Kefey Welle, and thus great-neice of Empress Taitu. It was a brilliant political match on several levels. This marriage was the second attempt at a union between the Houses of Tigraiand Shewa (the first being the marriage between Ras Araya Selassie Yohannis and Princess Zewditu which ended with the death of the Ras),and it had the added element of involving an alliance between Empress Taitu's family and that of Ras Michael. It was clearly a product of the Empress' policy of political marriage, and served her interests nicely. As the couple were still very young, the nuptials were not consummated, pending their coming of age. Possibly, no one wanted to repeat the tragedy of Zenebework Michael.

Iyasu V (Ge'ez ኢያሱ ፭ኛ) (4 Feb 1895-25 Nov 1935)

He was designated but uncrowned emperor of Ethiopia (1913–16) Iyasu's grandfather Emperor Menelik II chosen him as heir to the throne. But due to his lack of diplomatic skill, leadership qualities, rude, whimsical, dismissive, often belittling manner towards the ministers & aristocratic body at the time, on September 27, 1916 while at the city of Harrar, he was deposed by the Council of elders led by Shewan nobilities under Fitawrari Habta Giorgis Dinagde in favor of his aunt. Zauditu Menelik whos succeeded later by HRH Ras Taffari Makonnen.

This title gave Ras (now king) Michael hegemony over all northern Ethiopia, not just Wollo, but Tigrai and Gondar as well. The northern nobility were furio...us that they were now being presided over by a former muslim whom they had formerly out ranked. In particular, the Tigrean princes were enraged as the title "King of Zion" had last been used by Emperor Yohannis IV, and they believed their family had been robbed of it's inheritance. Shewans and southerners were not pleased withthis sign of the ascendency of the Wollo relatives of the heir. In particular,the much overlooked Ras Wolde Giorgis, cousin of Empror Menelik II was resentful that he, a senior prince and member of the Imperial House was relegated to the mere title of Ras while Michael was made King of the north. The prominent Tigrean noble, Dejazmatch Gebre Silassie Baria Gabr, who had played a key role in removing Empress Taitu from state authority, rebelled against the declaration of Michael as king of Zion, hoping the heirs of Emperor Yohannis would join him in the rebellion.

However, Seyoum Mengesha, grandson of Emperor Yohannis, and son of Ras Mengesha decided it would be prudent to obey the powers that be, and he joined King Michael against Gebre Silassie.Michael was crowned King of Zion on May 31st, 1914 at Desse, and rewarded Seyoum Mengesha with the title of Ras. In deference to the sensitivities of the heirs of Emperor Yohannes, Michael stopped using the title "King of Zion"almost immediately and began to use "King of Wollo".Mikael of Wollo, as he was now known, eventually would marry Shoaregga Menelik, Menelik'snatural daughter, becoming the third of his four wives. Mikael founded Dessie, the first town in Wollo and its new capital. Ras Mikael would become a deeply devout Orthodox Christian, and a dedicated builder of churches.In 1896, during the First Italo-Ethiopian War, Mikael fought for Menelik and led the feared Oromo cavalry against the invading Italians atthe Battle of Adowa. An Italian brigade began a fighting retreat towards the main Italian positions. However, the brigade inadvertently marched into a narrow valley where Mikael's cavalry slaughtered them while shouting "Reap! Reap!" (Ebalgume! Ebalgume!). The remains of the brigade's commander were never found.

THE AMHARAS IN ETHIOPIA: Amharas owe Abyssinia, notAmharaland

The Abyssinians, rulers of the country, call themselves "Amhara" in contrast to the inhabitants of Tigre. Through all extent of journey to the west, not come across any areas that they had completely settled, but, onthe other hand, in those most recently conquered, all the rulers and troops are Abyssinian. As said above, being a mixture of all the peoples who gradually occupied the country, they are not of one uniform type.

The shape of the skull, the shade of the skin, the height, the features of the face are all diverse. Side by side with a clearly Semitic type, you see the regular facial features of the ancient Egyptians and a turned-up nose.But, in spite of this apparent diversity, the national character is very determined and homogeneous, with small deviations that could lead to two types -- Gojjam and Shoan.71

It is hard to imagine so many contrasts united in one person, as are united in the Abyssinian character. Their character is like the nature around them -- where precipices, cliffs, mountains and plains alternate among one another, and cold is mixed with tropical heat. If I allow myselfa rather free comparison, this is how I would characterize the Abyssinian.He is talented and receptive, like a Frenchman. With his practicality, with the way he deals with those he has conquered and his governmental abilities, he is like an Englishman. His pride is like that of a Spaniard. By his love for his faith, his mildness of character and tolerance, he is like a Russian. By his commercial abilities, he is like a Jew. But in addition to allthese characteristics, he is very brave, cunning, andsuspicious.

At the present time, Abyssinia -- with its ancient culture, Christianity, andhistorically shaped governmental order -- appears like an island among other peoples who are almost in a childlike condition. Abyssinians have professed the Christian faith since 343 A.D., and before then, from the time of Solomon, they professed the Jewish faith, which even today is reflected in their ceremonies.72 To this day they separate animals into pure and impure; they give great significance to the ability to butcher cattle; and they circumcise their children. There are many other similarities, but I will tell of them in greater detail later.

The Abyssinian Language, later to be known as "Amharic"

Their language is of Semitic origin and of Hamitic root, since their ecclesiastical and literary language, Geez, derives from the Hamitic. The Geez language was brought to Ethiopia at the time of the Semitic migration. The Semites, becoming the ruling nation, made Geez their language. Mixing with Ethiopian tribes, Cushites who lived on the Ethiopian plateaux, they modified theirlanguage, adopting much from thesurrounding tribes. Since thedistribution of Semites was not uniform, withmore to the north than to the south, to the north the language retained agreater purity, and at the present time we see in Abyssinia three dialects:Geez, ancient Hamitic, is the ecclesiastical and literary language; the Tigrean dialect which differs little from Geez; and the Amharic language, which has many Geez roots, but which has a grammar and pronunciation which is completely different from Geez. The Amharic language is very sonorous. In it there are not of the characteristic guttural "ha-ga" soundsof Semitic languages, including Geez and Tigrean. Conjugation and declination are also completely different between these two languages.

The alphabet of both consists of 202 letters. Each syllable is represented by a different letter. The written form of the letters is similar to ancient Chaldean. They write from left to right. (It is significant to note that the alleasternpeople write from right to left.) Regarding the pronunciation of several consonants there are several complications. Forinstance, there arethree different ways to pronounce the letters"h" and "t"; there is a difference between "ts" and "t-s"; andthere are two ways to pronounce the letter "s." All books are printed in the Geez language, and only in recent times have several appeared in Abyssinian: Feta Negest and TarikaNegest.

The first of these is a modified Code of Justinian; and the second is the history of the reigns of kings. The people have preserved some legends relating sometimes to former kings, but mostly to saints. Of the kings, Atye Zar Yakob (1434-1468) still lives in the memory of the people. He ruled all of present-dayEthiopia, including Kaffa and Mocha. I was unable to find any epics. There are some stories and proverbs.73 There are veryfew songs about the country, almost none, because their singers prefer to touch upon lively interests of the day with their songs or to sing unceremoniously about the person who invited them, in hope of getting a good tip. If the tip isn't good enough, thepraise slowly turns to insulting abuse. Songs with indecentcontents are also very wide-spread. In Abyssinia there are two kinds of itinerant singers: azmari and lalibala, which arealways at odds with one another. The azmari sing, accompanying themselves on a single-stringed instrument like a violin, which is called a masanko.74 The lalibala sing heroic couplets with great enthusiasm, and with them there is a chorus of boys or girls who sing the refrain. These singers represent a completely different class of people, andare not subject to the general laws of the land. No one has the right to bother them, under threat of severe punishment, and the singers can ridicule and blame whomever they please, even the emperor himself to hisface.

They all are afraid of this mockery and generously reward singers, using them also as a way to increase their popularity. Azmari sing with great affectation, somewhat nasally, and during the song and roll over with theirwhole body in time to the music. For the most part, what they sing is improvised. Some of their tunes are very nice. Lalibala do not sing, but rather yell or growl some kind of heroic recitative; then the chorus sings some monotonous tune.

The Abyssinian Family Life

The family life of the Abyssinian is very simple and almost the same in all classes. Houses in Shoa are wooden; those in the north are stone. Their structure is very simple. They drive sticks or stakes that are two and a half to three arshins long [70 to 84 inches] into the ground around a circlewith a radius that is also three arshins [84 inches]. In the middle is a large post which serves as the base for the roof. The roof and the walls consist of the same kind of stakes and are connected together with ropes or pieces of bast. The house is not divided by partitions, but from one of the sides they make a back shed for horses or sheep. In the middle of thehouse is the hearth, on which they cook food in clay pots. By one of the walls is the alga -- a bed, consisting of a wooden frame on supports and abelt binding. All the rest of the space is covered with large clay pots.
There are no kitchen-gardens. Large houses of leaders are built by the same system and attain 16 arshins [12 yards] in diameter. Sometimes they build them without a central post. Around the circumference, they stick large slivers of wood or stakes five arshins [4 yards] high, and in themiddle around the circumference of a little circle drawn inside are several large posts. On these posts is placed a circle of flexible bamboo poles, tiedtogether with ropes, and on this circle is held the whole roof, which consists also of flexible thin spokes or slivers, joined together above in a conic shape and fastened to a whole series of intermediate horizontal circles made of bent bamboo. The wrap these circles with multi-colored skins, and obtain a very beautiful appearance.

The Abyssinian Traditional Clothings

The clothing of the Abyssinians consists of white trousers. The well-to-do have white thin cotton shirts. The highest personages wear silk ones. The waist is wrapped in a long wide piece of cotton material, over which they wear a bandoleer, if they have one, and a saber. On the shoulders they throw a shamma, a large square piece of white cotton material made locally. It is worn like a Roman toga, and there are many nuances in the way it is worn. At home, where each Abyssinian considers himself as an independent lord with full rights, like the emperor in the empire, the Abyssinian dons the shamma throwing the ends behind both shoulders and wrapping it around his whole body. The extreme expression of pride isa sitting or quietly moving Abyssinian, wrapped up to his nose in a shamma, looking with disdain on all that surrounds him. In the presence of or in the home of a higher person, no one other than this person can wear his shamma in this way. Others wear theirs in two ways. Half the shamma is wrapped around the waist, forming a kind of skirt; and the other, free half is picturesquely thrown over the shoulders. This is how all wear it when they speak with the negus. for instance, or a slave before hismaster. In addition, during a conversation the rule is observed that the younger when speaking to the elder, covers his mouth with the free end ofthe shamma. Furthermore, a courtier, when leaving the emperor or his leader, covers both of his shoulders with the free half of theshamma. Also,in law court, the plaintiff and the defendant wrap half the shamma aroundthe waist and, hold the other hand in their hands. They like to cover their head with white muslin.

This is in imitation of Menelik. Previously each brave man who had killed an elephant, lion or man braided his hair in plaits. Menelik always wears aheadband. In recent times, felt hats with wide brims have come into use. They usually don't wear footwear and only when going to hot places do they wear something resembling sandals. The highest persons put on overthe shamma what they call a kabba. This is a satin cloak with a hood, bordered with fringe. For covering from rain and cold, they have something like our felt cloak. This consists of thick felt, butsewn so that it doesn't come undone. The hood is on the back ofit. The clothing of the women differs from that of the men in that, instead of trousers and a thin shirt, they wear a long, thick shirt that extends to the heels. The wealthy have themembroidered with silk. Around their waist they wrap the same kind of sash as the men, and on top they throw a shamma, and some a cloak.

Abyssinian Staple Food

The usual food of the Abyssinian consists of injera (a kind of pancake bread, which is round, about 3/4 arshin [21 inches] in diameter), which they eat dipped in sauce made of pea meal with pepper. The wealthy add to that butter and meat. Their national and favorite dish, which they succeed in eating quite rarely is brindo, raw fresh-killed meat. A huge filletor thigh is held by a servant over a basket around which those who are eating sit. Each chooses a piece for himself and cuts it out. They can eat an enormous quantity of raw meat, but all Abyssinians without exception have the inevitable consequence of that -- tapeworm. Therefore, it is the established practice among them to eat once every two months the cooked berries of the kusso tree to expel the parasitic worms. They very strictly observe fasts. On Wednesdays and Fridays they do not eat until noon; and during fasts, even fish is forbidden.

The Abyssinian Way of Life and Etiquette

In his own home the Abyssinian is the complete master and zealously protects his right of the inviolability of his dwelling, like an Englishman. Inthe home of each wealthy Abyssinian the same strict etiquette is observedas at the court of the emperor, although, of course, to a lesser degree.
There is a whole series of various domestic posts. For instance, theagafari, is the one who admits those who wish to see his master.
There are agafari of the husband, the wife, who manage large receptions.They are usually very important and full of their own dignity. They alwayshave in their hand a thin stick or little whip. The azzaj manages the houseand all the property. There are chiefs of the various departments of the household economy. The kitchen chiefs are the cookers of honey, the injera-byet, wot-byet, and tej-byet. The chief of the stables is the balderas. The asalyfi is the one who cuts the food in pieces and serves thefood and drink. The elfin ashkers are the servants of the bedroom. They are usually notably good-looking youths with gentle, graceful movements,with refined Abyssinian manners, always remarkably draped in their shammas.

The day of an Abyssinian noble usually begins and ends very early. He gets up at sunrise and with his secretary -- tsafi -- and get down to work.The secretary reads to him the correspondence that has been received and answers to these letters are composed. Having finished that the noblegoes to the courtroom to dispense justice. All available soldiers and chiefshave already assembled in the yard to accompany him. He sits on a richlyattired mule. Over him they unfurl a parasol, and the huge procession moves to the courtroom. At eleven o'clock on ordinary days and at two to three o'clock on fast days they have dinner. The wife is not at this meal.
She sits in the elfin -- the bedroom. Nobles dine with their closest leaders.After the dinner of the master, the servants who are in attendance on himeat what remains, and if the master wants to especially distinguish one ofthem, he gives him his partly eaten piece of meat or partially drunk decanter of mead. After dinner, mead -- tej -- and beer -- tella76 -- is brought in decanters. And conversation begins, the thread of which is always maintained by the master. In this regard they have striking talent,and the popularity of a leader to a large extent depends on his skill in conducting conversation.

At every minute people come to disturb the master about this or that matter. Only in the evening do all the retainers go away, business ends and he can spend a few hours with his family. At about seven o'clock he has supper with his wife, and at about nine o'clock he has already gone tobed.

The Abyssinian Family

Families, as we know them, do not exist among the Abyssinians. Therefore, mutual love among members of a family, with very rare exceptions, does not exist. The absence of family is due to the position of women in Abyssinia and the instability of marriage.

With very few exceptions, all marriages are civil. As a result, it is sufficientif the groom and bride in the presence of two witnesses -- kuas -- declare in the name of the negus that the marriage is made, and then the witnesses look after the property brought by the wife and also are responsible for the obligations which the groom takes on himself in relationship to the family of the bride. From the moment of swearing by the name of the negus, the marriage is completed, but to divorce is just as easy as to marry. In front of two witnesses, the husband sets the wife free, and then if the divorce was not a consequence of discovering unfaithfulness of the wife, than in going she has the right to half of all theproperty which they then divide. Only after many years of peaceful life together do the husband andwife decide to have a church wedding, whichis inviolable.

Priests are all married in church weddings. Because divorce is so easy andfamilies change so frequently, one mother might have children from several fathers; and the position of the children is extremely uncertain.
For instance,having divorced the first husband, the mother takes an infantwith her and leaves another with the husband. Then she marries a secondtime, also has children from the second husband and a second time divorces, and this time leaves all the children both from the first and fromthe second marriage with the second husband. I saw little love of parents for their children. Above all, brothers and sisters are friendly to one another. At a strikingly early age children cease being children. They are very serious, rarely play pranks and you can entrust them with important things to do, which they will take care of and not make a mess of it. Theirindependent life begins very early.

The Abyssinian woman is terribly coquettish and beautiful; but for the most part, she is short, poorly built and rarely has many children. Having few children must be due to the very early marriages. I knew a case where a girl seven years old was given in marriage. They marry quite frequently at nine years old,regardless of the fact that they are physically completely developed. The position of women is very free in the lower class and completely closed in the higher class. Eunuchs watch over them.They cannot go anywhere without a huge escort. In other words, on thoserare occasions she is accompanied by her whole staff of chamber maids and eunuchs, and they sit her on the mule and take her off the mule, closely screening her by shammas from the view of strangers. In the higher class, almost all women are literate and even well-read. Very often,important correspondence is carried on between husband and wife. Since relations between the sexes are very easy, there are almost no instances of love affairs and jealousy. Catching the wife in infidelity at the scene of the crime, the husband has the right, with impunity, to kill both of them, and usually does so. But until such time as the infidelity has not been clearly discovered, the husband does not express either jealousy or suspicion. The closed conditions of women of the upper class are stipulated by etiquette.

The birth of a child is not a prominent, happy event in the family. For the Abyssinian woman a child is almost always a burden. At birth, a male childis circumcised on the seventh day and christened on the twentieth. A female child is circumcised on the fourteenth and christened on the fortieth. At the christening, the child is given the name of some saint. They never call themselves just by this name but always with prefixes, forinstance Wolda Mikael -- "birth of Michael," Gebra Maryam -- "slave of Mary," Haile Iesus -- "strength of Jesus." For the most part they do not call themselves by the name given at christening but with a nickname.
There are some very original nicknames, for instance, Setayukh -- "Howmuch I see" or Enatenakh -- "You are to mother," Sefraishu -- "Find theplace", and for women, for instance, Terunesh -- "You a clean person," Worknesh -- "You are gold," Deseta -- "Happiness."

Death among them is a very sorrowful event, mourned by all the relativesand acquaintances. And on this occasion there appears a contradiction of their character. Indifferent in his family feelings, the Abyssinian comes from afar to mourn at the grave of a relative. The Abyssinian dies quietly, in spite of the fact that during a grave illness for several days before death, in his house a mass of people crowds together, before time, to mournhim. (By the way, this happened to me when I was seriously illin December of 1896, and my servants believed that my end wascoming.) When it is apparent that death is unavoidable, the person who is sick takes kusso (a purgative) to drive out parasitic worms before death. (It is considered indecent to die with these in one's stomach). Then he takes confession and is given communion. They wash the corpse, roll it up in linen and, with loud weeping, carry it to the church where, after mass, they bury it with the head to the east. They have mourners, but they do not collect the tears in a vessel. Relatives wear mourning clothes, consisting of dirty, torn and old clothing. For several days the closest relatives do not leave the house, and during this time everyone who knewthe deceased pays his relatives a visit of sympathy; and, over a small bottle of tej (mead), they weep together with them. In such cases the effusiveness of the Abyssinian character is expressed. Whether he rejoicesor grieves, he tries as much as possible to express this and let it be known. Their mimicry and manner of conducting themselves always corresponds remarkably to the occasion. For instance, mourning the deathof someone who is a completely stranger, the Abyssinian seems at this time to be completely crushed by grief, and finally having convinced himself of this, he weeps almost sincerely.

The property of the deceased is divided among the children and among them they do not have the right of inheritance by the eldest. Always theland, and very often all the property of the deceased is inherited by whoever of the children was closest to him.

The Abyssinian Division into Classes

Some writers compare present-day Abyssinia with Europe in feudal times and identify its system with the feudal system. But is this really so? The first condition of a feudal system is the division into classes and hereditaryownership and class advantages, which Abyssinia does not have. In Abyssinia there is an aristocracy of position -- people who at the present moment are in power. There are merchants, priests, monks, soldiers,artisans, and peasants. But all of these are differences in positions oroccupations, and not separate closed classes.

In Abyssinia there is no hereditary nobility, and it would even be unthinkable given the country's family structure. There are some familieswhich lead their kin from afar. There are some who consider themselves descendants of kings and at this time are in the lowest position. In the Abyssinian language, there isn't even a word to express "nobility." Sometimes in an argument they say, that "I am bale abat," which means "one who has a father."

But this is not to determine his noble parentage, but rather in contrast to someone whose father was a slave or who himself was a slave. The concept of hereditary nobility is incompatible with the practical mind of the Abyssinian. They admire wealth, position, and personal servants, as long as these elements of strength are evident. But if they should go away
-- if the wealthy man is impoverished, if the leader had his territory takenaway from him, if someone who was powerful at court falls into disgrace, or if children of a powerful and great man do not represent anything remarkable by their wealth or position -- then these people become equalwith all others and the lowest soldier will talk down to them ["tutoyer" in French]. But nevertheless, when distinguishing among gentlemen, they always give preference to individuals whose fathers were in the same position.

Selection for the highest government posts is based on the principle of personal merit. And in addition to that, in order to be recognized as emperor, besides the actual power, one must have the ability to show that one is descended from Solomon.

Rases and dajazmatches are very often relations by marriage or by bloodwith the reigning emperor and his wife. The emperor and empress try to tie them closer to the throne by having them marry their relatives. But some of them came from the very lowest positions. Thus we see that nobility as a class does not exist, but there is a class of those in high positions; or you could call it a service aristocracy, the membership of which is half by chance.

The concept of "mesalliance" does not exist in the upper class. They selecttheir wife by desire, and sometimes from among the servants. Children ofthe upper class usually start out at a young age at the court of the emperor or of one of his principal leaders. There they carry out the responsibilities of a houseservant and receive the highest Abyssinian education: they learn to play the lyre (bagana),77 to play chess, reading, writing, theology and military exercises. Becoming personally known by the emperor or another individual at whose court they serve, and finally, winning the favor and confidence of him, they obtain some appointment.
But at court are found not only the children of those in the highest posts, but also many who are there by chance. Posts are neither for life nor progressive. Each person who holds a post considers himself the the directservant of the person who gave him that assignment. The only similarity between present-day Abyssinia and Europe in feudal times is the apparently considerable independence of those who govern the territories,but was we will see later, this autonomy is veryrelative and the proprietorship is not hereditary.

The life of the upper class is very simple and uniform. In this regard it differs from the life of others. This crowded court and etiquette representsin miniature the court of the emperor. Their manner of conducting themselves with subordinates is notable for remarkable restraint and dignity. In general, the upper serving class have great qualities. They are very devoted to the leaders who assigned them to their job and zealously guard the interests of their patrons.

The Abyssinian clergy consists of "white" -- priests and deacons, "black"and debtera -- scribes, who are secular individuals who live in churches.The similarity to feudal times lies in the existence of ecclesiastical lands,very large and independent properties controlled by them. Each church has its land, half worked by peasants. Each monastery also has lands, and, in addition, their bishops and ychygye (the leader of the monastic order of Saint Abun Tekla Haymanot) own extensive lands.
Each man who feels the vocation can go into the clerical ranks. But only those who have been prepared for it and who marry in a church ceremonyare consecrated as priests. All deacons are children. Those who have prepared themselves for the clerical calling, but have not been consecrated as priests, not feeling this vocation, continue to live in churches and are called debtera -- scholars or scribes. They have great influence on the affairs of the church. In each church, the leader of all the clergy who live there (the clergy of a parish can reach as highas 300 men in a single church and never is less than 25) and of the church lands is appointed from among the debtera. The clergy -- especially the debtera and itinerant monks -- have great influence on the people. Each person of the upper class has a confessor, who plays a large role in his family life. Inthe Abyssinian clergy, many characteristics of Judaism have been preserved. Debtera, for example, take the place of the former scribes and Levites. They sing during the church service, devote themselves to theology and copying holy books. The Abyssinians have preserved some ceremonies borrowed from the Jews. They read the Psalms of David more often than the Gospels. But, in spite of all that, Abyssinians, and especially their clergy, are ardent and sincere believers, and among their monks there are many ascetic heroes. (For more details on that see the chapter "Church and Faith.")

Military service is the favorite profession of Abyssinians, but having the full freedom of a person in the limits of the responsibilities he has taken on for himself, each enters into service by his own desire and choice. Thearmy is very well paidand in peace time does not entail any work.

Merchants constitute a somewhat separate class and are subordinate to nagada-rases ("chief of traders" -- of which there are three). Some townsare populated exclusively by merchants and regardless of the fact that they are located among other estates, they are governed separately fromthe others. The merchants are distinguished by great resourcefulness andcommercial abilities, which they inherit, in all probability, from their Semite ancestors. They usually buy goods from Galla merchants and takethem to the sea. Some even take them to Aden.

Membership in the merchant class is as random as is membership in the other classes, and is not based either on heredity or on other positions. Those who work the land (peasantry as a class does not exist) become such by their own desire. There are two kinds of them: those who owe a rent to whoever has title to their land, whether this is the emperor or someone else, and those who in some provinces possess their won land. Abyssinian farms have less of a many-field system than Galla ones. Theydo not grow roots, as the Galla do. But they work the land well enough using the same tools as the Galla. The livestock among them is the sameas among the Gallas: bulls, cows, sheep, goats, horses, mules, donkeys, and in the north there is a special breed of rams with very long wool. Theartisans -- for the most part descendants of the Felasha -- are concentrated at the courts of rulers. Weavers and smiths often live separately. Among the artisans are smiths, joiners, tanners, saddle makers, weavers, goldsmiths, and gunsmiths.

The Abyssinian Slavery System

Continuous wars which yield many prisoners, and the necessity for a largenumber of workers to support the way of life of the upper class gave rise to slavery. But this slavery is only similar in name to what we are accustomed to understanding by this term. By a law issued by the Emperor Menelik, slavery has been abolished in the country; and at risk ofhaving one's hands cut off, it is forbidden to sell or buy slaves. Nevertheless, those who were captured earlier, and recently captured Gallas and Negroes stay at the homes of their masters and continue to work for them, receiving food and clothing in return. This is a very indefinite condition, which could not be called either slavery or freedom.

For instance, a runaway when captured is returned to his former master and is punished for escaping, but the children of slaves are not slaves, andwillingly, faithfully, by force of habit stay at home and serve their masters.To buy or sell slaves is forbidden, but you can give them. Today you can also say with certainly that that the last remnants of slavery will soon be abolished and Abyssinians will change to paid labor since the waythey conduct wars has already begun to change its character, turning from the former raids to conquest of new lands and annexation of them. Since all the conquered inhabitants are attached to the land, war will not yield slaves. But the slavery there is today is a very mild of it. They treat theirslaves very well, do not force them in their work and consider them as members of the family.

The Abyssinian Distribution of Property

The distribution of property in the country, despite the existence of a largenumber of beggars, is rather even. Few are those who stand out conspicuously above the general level. The right to own land only exists ina few provinces, namely Tigre and Shoa and others at a distance from theimperial power. All land belongs to the emperor. The distribution of land incentral Abyssinia took place historically. Part is owned directly by the emperor, part is granted to the church, part is given to the proprietorship of private individuals half and half or by other arrangements, and part is distributed to military leaders in the form of pay. Galla lands together withtheir population belong to the emperor by right of conquest. All Galla are considered obliged to pay rent, and at the present time the same process is beginning which took place in Russia at the time of Boris Godunov -- the process of turning people into serfs. Considering himself free, a Galla who is dissatisfie with the governor of the territory or with the burden of taxes abandons his home and goes to another Galla, who willingly acceptshim. This phenomenon serves, in the first place, as a curb against too greedy administrators, but then, on the other hand, it gives rise to a largenumber of complaints against neighbors -- a constant correspondence with demands for returning those who have left,which, of course, rarely succeed. In former times, the majority of Galla fled to the autonomous Galla lands -- Leka, Wollaga and Jimma. But now the emperor has forbidden the rulers of these lands from accepting new immigrants. This should be the first step toward finally turning the whole Galla population into serfs.

The export and import trade of Abyssinia is in the hands of Abyssinians and a few Europeans: French, Armenians, and Greeks. For the most part,imports consist of guns (through Jibuti), cheap paper linen from India, glass vessels (small decanters), silk and velvet cloth, and small items.

Exports consist of coffee, ivory, gold, musk, and skins. Both imports and exports are directed to four points -- Massawa, Jibuti, Zeila, and Berber. Massawa has now, with the shift of the political center of Abyssinia to the south, lost its former significance. Jibuti is gaining more and more importance as the sole point for import of guns, but the main part of the native trade goes by way ofZeila to Aden. Berbera serves as the port for Somali lands and the southern regions of Jimma and Kaffa. Merchants selltheir wears at marketplaces which are found at each little populated point.Exchange is conducted in money. The monetary unit is the Maria Theresa taler and pieces of salt (amulye) which are six vershoks [nine inches] long, and one vershok [one and three-quarters inches] thick. They give seven pieces of salt for one taler. Now the emperor is trying popularize coins of his own mint of various values, but up until now he has beenunsuccessful.78

The Abyssinian Traditional Games (Feres Gugs) & Folk Dances

It is said that how they pass their free time and games indicate the character of a people. In this regard, the Abyssinians have a wide range ofgames according to the time of the year and their appropriateness for big holidays. The Abyssinian sometimes does not play an unseasonable game,even though all the circumstances favor it.

In the month of September on the holidays of Maskal, Holy Cross Day, everyone who owns a horse plays guks. They prepare horses for this big game, and on the day of the holiday they all go out on the plain. This game is an imitation of actual individual cavalry combat. Dividing themselves in two groups, several dare-devils engage in battle. They fly atfull career at someone on the opposite team and, not having galloped a hundred steps, sharply turn and gallop away. Those who are summoned and others with them pursue those who summoned them and throw at them a javelin without a point, which the others parry with their shield, and some who are dextrous parry with a javelin. Once started the battle becomes general: clouds of flying javelins, sometimes the dry sound of one striking a shield and a mass of riders racing forward and backward at full career. Among the horses, servants of the gentlemen dart in and out and bring them javelins. It is rare that such a game takes place without unfortunate accidents, sometimes ending in death, since besides the forceof falling of the javelin, even without a point, is so great that it pierces theshield. And I know of an incident when one Abyssinian broke his arm because a javelin pierce through his shield. (By the way, the Gallas, having adopted this game from the Abyssinians, are enthusiastic about it even more than the Abyssinians are.)

In November begin the games that lead up to the great games of guna onChristmas. The people call the holiday of Christmas also guna. The reasonfor this, I believe, is the same as that amongus in Russia, where a holidayof a pagan cult is timed to take place with a Christian one. For example, kolyada, Shrovetide, is the celebration of John the Baptist. The game of guna consists of two teams, armed with wide sticks that are an arshin (28inches) in length, try to drive a small piece of wood to the enemy's side. All, old and young, play at Christmas this game that, like guks, rarely cantake place without unfortunate accidents.

From the beginning of Lent begins the time for the playing of was -- a ballmade of rags. One person, sitting on the shoulders of another, throws in aheap the playing balls. Whoever gets the ball sits on the shoulders of the one who threw it, and the game goes on forever. At Easter again they play guks and the so-called giji. A thin pole is set us and they throw javelins at it from 50 paces. When someone hits the target three times, allthe others lie on the ground and the winner goes past them.

In August after the rains, they play jiraf -- long whip. All, having armed themselves with a long strap, are divided into two teams and try to drive one another away. In the end, the weaker team runs away. This also doesn't happen without mutilation. These games have great educational significance. The whole nation takes great interest in them and these games demand from the player great endurance, dexterity, and quicknessof understanding and accustom them to danger.

Their household games are senterei (chess) and gebeta, a kind of backgammon. The chess moves are the same as the way we play the game, but the circumstances are different. For example, the game is not considered lost if the king is taken. Gebeta is similar to backgammon, but dice are not thrown. Rather the game is based on calculation, so it requires very quick wits. On a board or simply on the ground, there are 12or 18 little holes.

At the beginning of the game half the holes belong to one player and half to the other. In each little hole there are three pebbles. Shifting these pebbles in accord with known rules, they win over from their opponent hisholes and pebbles. The person whose last pebble arrives at a hole where there are three pebbles takes possession of that hole.

THE SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT

The empire of the now-reigning Menelik II, king of kings of Ethiopia, consists of the following domains. Listing them from north to south, theyare:
Ras Mengesha Yohannes -- Tigre. Ras Mengesha is a natural son of Emperor Yohannes IV. Yohannes' legitimate son and heir to the throne was Ras Area, who married the daughter of Menelik -- Woyzaro Shoareg. Ras Area died. The boundaries of Tigre once extended to the shores of thesea; but first Turks and Egyptians and, especially in recent times, Italians drove back the Abyssinians to the other side of the Mareb River. Althoughthe Italians were defeated in the last war, in the peace treaty it is assumed that the boundaries stay at Belesa-to-Mareb.79
Ras Wali -- the mountain province to the south of Tigre: Lasta Samyen,Eju. He is a brother of the Empress Taitu and son of the Tigrean Ras Wolda Giyorgis.
The dynasty of the Wagshums -- the provinces of Wag and Derru. Thereare two brothers: Wagshum Wangul and Wagshum Kabeda. They are a strong Jewish type, but in all probability theirancestors were Felasha kings, since the mountains of Samena and Wag are populated by them. (Felasha are Abyssinian Jews).
Ras Mikael -- Wollo. Ras Mikael, baptized by the Emperor Yohannes, is aGalla,formerly king of Wollo. Negus Tekla Haymanot is king of Gojjam, Damot, Amhara, Gindeberat, Jimma, Lima, Guder and Horro.

Negus Tekla Haymanot, formerly Ras Adal, is the son of Ras Gosho. He was crowned negus by Atye Yohannes in1881 for the conquest of Kaffa.

Ras Mengesha Bituaded80 -- Gondar and Begamedyr. The title bituaded means "favorite." It is usually given to one of the rases who is closest to the reigning emperor. He is entrusted with the government of the provinces of Gondar and Begamedyr. The city of Gondar was formerly theofficial capital of Abyssinia. (Today, besides Ras Mengesha Bituaded thereis a Bituaded Atnafi, an old man, ruler of a small area, and a favorite of the negus.)

Azzajs -- those who rule lands of Emperor Menelik, are generals of hisown army. They rule parts of the kingdom of Shoa, of the hereditary domain of Emperor Menelik. Shoa consists of the provinces of Tegulet,Ifat, Menjar, Bulga and Ankober.

Ras Makonnen -- Harar, Chercher, Itu, Erer, Ogaden. Ras Makonnen is anephew of the emperor on his mother's side.

Dajazmatch Wolda Gabriel -- Bali and part of Arussi.

Ras Dargi -- Arussi, the homeland of the Galla people. Ras Dargi is the son of Atye Sahle Selassie, the grandfather of Menelik. Besides this recently conquered province, he also rules a small region near Gondar. Heis very dear to the emperor and has great influence.

Dajazmatch Balachio -- Sidamo. Formerly Lyj, Balachio is a son of Dajazmatch Beshakha. Balachio was in Petersburg with the embassy ofDamto. This year on the occasion of the death of his father, killed at Adowa, the emperor gave him the government of his father's former lands. The other half of Sidamo is ruled by Dajazmatch Mul Saged.

Fitaurari Abto Giyorgis -- Gurage and Sodo. Dajazmatch Haile Maryam -- Chobo, Bocho and Tikur. Dajazmatch Haile Maryam is a nephew of the emperor, the oldest brotherof Ras Makonnen.

Dajazmatch Ubye -- Mecha, Ejir-Salafu, and Nonno. Ubye is married toWoyzaro Zawditu, the second daughter of Emperor Menelik.

Dajazmatch Demissew -- Gera, Guma, Gomo, Buna, Leka and Wollaga. Heis the son of Afa-negus Nasibu, the chief judge. He has the main supervision of the autonomous Galla provinces of Leka, under DajazmatchGebra Egziabeer and Wollaga, under Dajazmatch Joti.

Likamakos Abata -- Chalea, Tibye, Wobo, and Sibu. Likamakos is a courtrank equivalent to Adjutant General.
Dajazmatch Tesemma -- Ilu-Babur, Buna, Burye, Alye, and all thesouthwestern areas of Abyssinia.

Tessema, the son of Dajazmatch Nadou, is married to the god-daughter ofEmpress Taitu, the daughter of the Galla king of Guma.

Ras Wolda Giyorgis -- Botor-Limu, Kulo, Kosho, Konta-Shiro. He also hasmain supervision over the kingdom of Jimma of Aba-Jefar. (Negus Aba- Jefar is a Mohammedan.)

The recently conquered province of Walamo is directly under the command of Menelik. These days, Abdurakhman, the king of Beni-Shangulhas submitted to the Emperor.

All these domains are not hereditary, but rather are bestowed by the Emperor (with the exception of the domains of Negus Tekla Haymanot, Tigre, the kingdom of Jimma, Leka, and Wollaga). The size of each domaindepends purely on personal factors -- on the relationship of the Emperor to the proprietor and on his personal merit, and consists of one or several provinces. The connection between these provinces is not permanent and can always be broken either by one of them being taken away or by the addition of a new area. All these "polymarchs," as these rulers of regions can be called, are completely independent in internal affairs, justice, the distribution of lands and jobs. But in all else they are absolutely under the command of the Emperor. They recognize his power and pay him tribute in the form of taxes or presents.

In general, Ethiopia represents a single state, divided for government among the main military leaders, under the absolute imperial power of theking of kings, all the strength of whom rests in the army and in the love ofthe people. A necessary condition to becoming Emperor is belonging to the house of Solomon and Menelik I. (The exception to this was the dynasty of Zagye and the Emperors Tewodros and Yohannes.)

From this we see that the Ethiopian Empire is a purely military state. It became this historically, having earlier experienced many other phases. Itis not within the limits of my work to describe the history of Ethiopia, but Iconsider it necessary to indicate some of its prominent moments.

The name "Ethiopia," which the Abyssinians give to their country, is a Greek word and in translation means "black face." Homer called all of Central Africa "Ethiopia," stretching from the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean to the Atlantic. Diodor the Sicilian distinguished three Ethiopias:Western -- the Congo Basin, High -- the present-day highlands of Ethiopia, and Eastern -- which included the lower, east coast of Africa andSouth-Western Arabia.

In the history of Ethiopia, the following moments can be distinguished:

1. The period which preceded the Queen of Sheba. This period is almost completely unknown with regard to what is now Ethiopia, and apparentlydoesn't have any connection with it.

2. The Queen of Sheba and the Solomonic81 dynasty which followed herwere displaced by King Del Noad of the Zagye dynasty in the year 901
A.D. According to the Abyssinian Tarika Negest, the Queen of Sheba, having heard about the greatness of Solomon, went to him and had byhim a son named Menelik or Ybnakhakim.

There is much disagreement regarding the etymology of this word. Several believe that it derives from the Amharic words men which means"what" and alykh which means "you say." In other words, "what you sayor tell." Others translate Menelik as "second I." But the name Ybnakhakim, which is equivalent to Menelik, comes from the Arabic, and the most probable translation for that is "descended from a wise man." Hakim -- "wise" -- was the Arabic name for Solomon.

The Queen of Sheba, Azyeb or the Southerner, also had many other names: Makeda and Nikola. The Abyssinians affirm that Aksum was her capital, but others say it was Yemen. There is also dissension among scholars on this question. Some, such as, for example, Patriarch Mendesand Bruce,82 accept the legendabout her journey to Solomon and consider her to be actually a queen of Aksum. Others (such as Pined) consider her to be an Arabian queen. Most probably, she ruled both present-day Ethiopia and the Arabian peninsula, at least part of the one and the other, since between Arabia and Ethiopia there was a close connection at that time, based on the continual migration of Semites to Africa.

The legend says further that Menelik, having come of age, was sent toJerusalem. He was supposed to give Solomon gifts from his mother.
Abyssinians have preserved the legend that at the time of his reception for the first time by Solomon, Solomon, wanting to test his son, stood inthe ranks of his retinue, and on the throne placed one of his retainers.
Menelik, although he had never seen his father, having first bowed to theman on the throne, did not give him the gifts, but rather began to searchwith his eyes among the retinue and, having finally seen Solomon, bowedto him. He was very similar to his father and enjoyed great popularity. Asa result of this, it is said that Solomon, having generously given him presents and many Levites, priests and children of many noble families, let him return to his homeland. (Text ends)

TRADITIONAL BEVERAGES:

Ethiopian Honey Wine and The History of This Ancient, Exotic Elixi

All About The honey wine that Ethiopians have made for centuries

How to Make The Organic Tej

1. A Very Brief History of Ethiopia, the Land of Tej

THE ANCIENT CULTURES of the Middle East may have made contact withthe civilizations of what we now call Ethiopia as early as 1,000 years B.C.Legend tells us that Makeda, the queen of the land of Saba (or, as we know it today, Sheba), visited the revered King Solomon on a diplomatic mission, during which, the legend says, they toasted each other with Makeda's tej. She lavished him with gifts, the greatest one eventually being a son, named Menelik, whom she raised in Saba and sent home tomeet his father when he reached manhood.

Then, in 1270 A.D., Yekuno Amlak, a wily monarch of Abyssinia – as the land was alternatively called in earlier times – drew upon the legend of Solomon and Makeda to declare himself to be the direct descendant of Menelik. This established the Solomonic Dynasty of Ethiopian emperors that ruled for 700 years and ended in 1974, with the fall of Emperor HayleSelasse to Communist revolutionaries. The brutal Derg ("Committee") ruled until 1991, when a long-time rebellion finally succeeded, thus creating a nascent democracy in Ethiopia.

We must now take the ancient story of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, devised in the time of Yekuno Amlak (who did exist), with a block of salt (which, incidentally, were called amole in Ethiopia and were used as currency well into the 19th Century). Despite Ethiopian lore disguised as history, there's no proof that the land of Saba was located in the portion of eastern Africa that's now Ethiopia. It may have been in Yemen, across the Red Sea, and the monarch whom the Ethiopians call Makeda was called Bilqis on the Arabian peninsula. There may even have been two Sabas, one on each side of the Red Sea, with neither one dominating the other. Scholars disagree, and the hard archaeological evidence is spotty atbest.

The Bible has very little to say about Ethiopia that offers much help in clarifying its relationship with the ancient world. Two passages in the OldTestament – 1 Kings 10: 1-13, and 2 Chronicles 9:1-12 – tell a story of aQueen of Sheba who visited King Solomon on a diplomatic mission after hearing tales of his greatness. It doesn't say she was from Ethiopia, nor do she and Solomon consummate their summit.

Then, somewhere between 1314 and 1322 A.D. (scholars believe), an anonymous author composed the Kebra Negast ("Glory of Kings"), a book that became the Ethiopian national story. This lengthy saga clearly intendsto turn Yekuno Amlak's newly declared "Solomonic Dynasty" into historical fact: It embellishes the brief biblical story of Solomon and Makeda andcreates the child Menelik.

Yet this story remains the central mythology of the nation and is now recognized as the legend that helped to found and foster a culture and a civilization, which began definitively in the first century A.D. with the Aksumite Empire, in what is now northern Ethiopia and Eritrea, then slowly evolved into modern Ethiopia. For the next two millennia, empires and emperors waxed and waned, until a 19th Century surge of unificationand conquest under the powerful Emperor Menelik II forged the modern nation.

2. By Any Other Name: The Language of Tej

THE HISTORY AND ORIGIN of the word "tej" – as with so many words in so many languages – is probably as clear as it will ever get. It's the word,in Amharic, that Ethiopians have long called wine made from honey.
Amharic, a Semitic language, has been the state language of Ethiopia for centuries, although it's not the country's most widely spoken first language. That honor goes to Oromo, a Cushitic language. The Amhara culture dominated the country long ago and imposed its language as official. But several other Ethiopian languages – some Semitic, some not –use the word "tej" or something like it to mean "honey wine," and Amharicitself seems to have borrowed the word from a root word in an Ethiopian Semitic mother tongue. [See the chart with the words for "honey wine" and "honey" in every Ethiopian language.] (Text ends)

LEGEND PEOPLE:
HAKIM (Dr.) WORKINEH ESHETE (1865-1960s?)
Who Is Hakim Workneh Eshete?
THE FIRST WESTERN TRAINED ETHIOPIAN PHYSICIAN/SURGEON
Reminiscenses by Prof Richard Pankhurst:
Historian, author and commentator Professor Richard Pankhurst talks about the renowned intellectual, statesman, diplomat and Ethiopia's firstwestern trained physician, Hakim Workneh Eshete (also known as Dr.
Charles Martin). In an article published in the Capital newspaper, the mostprolific writer on Ethiopian historical matters reviews two recent books that saw the light of the day on the historical figure.

Hakim Workneh, aka Dr Charles Martin, was the first Ethiopian I ever met,and the first Ethiopian doctor to give me medical advice – albeit only onceor twice during my childhood. Hakim Workneh, who was an important figure in Ethiopian history, is the subject of two recent biographies. He came from a prominent Gondar family that, for one reason or another – we do not know precisely why – was attached to Emperor Tewodros's court at Maqdala.

The family was there at the historic moment when Robert Napier's expedition launched its assault on the Emperor's citadel. Workneh, then about three years old, was in the care of his aunt, herself little more thana child, who, on hearing the noise of battle, fled the scene. This was not surprising, as an Ethiopian royal chronicle of this time reports that the commotion was terrible. Workneh meanwhile realizing that he had been abandoned by his guardian, rushed about like a mad thing, looking for anyone he knew – but to no avail.

The British, seeing him in this condition, jumped to the conclusion that hemust be an orphan. This, given the large number of Ethiopians killed in the preceding fighting, was not an unreasonable supposition.Several British officers, feeling a sense of responsibility for the assumed "orphan" − and lacking any way of ascertaining his identity, thought it best to take him back with them to India, from where their expedition had emanated. There, they proposed to give him a Christian education. Though already baptized in Ethiopia, the waif was accordingly re-baptized in India – and was educated at the expense of two British officers, Colonels Chamberlainand Martin. He was accordingly re-named Charles Martin.

In the years that followed, Martin, as we must now call him, received a good education, partly under the auspices of the British-based Church Missionary Society, from which he learnt the "golden rule" to "do as you would be done by". He went to school in India, Burma and Britain. This enabled him to qualify in due course as Ethiopia's first modern-trained physician and surgeon. His story is told in two recent monographs. The first, in Amharic, is thus widely accessible in Ethiopia. It is by Ato Tadele Bitul and is entitled YeAzazh Hakim Warqnah Eshetu YeHiwyot Tarik (Addis Ababa, 2000). The second, by Professor Peter Garretson, entitled AVictorian Gentleman & Ethiopian Nationalist. The Life & Times of Hakim Warqnah, Dr. Charles Martin (James Currey, London, 2012). Professor Garretson had access to Hakim Workneh's diaries and was thereby able toprovide a more in-depth account of this remarkable son of Ethiopia.

On acquiring his medical qualifications Martin, accepted a medical post with the British colonial administration in Burma. This assured him relativeprosperity, but tied him to British employment. He did not however forget his Ethiopian identity – and dreamt of one day visiting his ancient motherland.

The opportunity to do just that seemed to strike in March 1896 when Menelik defeated the Italians at the battle of Adwa, and there appeared a possibility of a European-trained physician being sent out to treat the Ethiopian wounded, who were entirely lacking in modern medical facilities.The young Ethiopian patriot took the leave to which he was entitled, packed his bags, and set forth for Africa, but travelled only as far as the port of Zeila in the then British Somali Protectorate. There, his leave fromthe Burma-based British medical service expired – and he felt obliged to abandon his planned journey to his beloved, but seemingly elusive Motherland. All, however, was not lost, for while in Zeila he met the British Commissioner, John Lane Harrington, who was subsequently appointed the first British envoy to Ethiopia. He told Menelik of his medicalcompatriot in far-off Asia. The Emperor, a great modernizer, was naturallymuch fascinated – and facilitated Martin's eventual home-coming.
All this, dear reader, was a far more complicated story than I present to you here. Suffice it to say that Martin was discovered by his Ethiopian family from whom he learnt that his original name was Workneh. He duly entered Menelik's service – which posed no small problem as employmentin Ethiopia was traditionally rewarded by land grants rather than a monthly wage to which the good young Ethiopian doctor was accustomedto in Burma and India.

Workneh, as we now know him, nonetheless elected to return to Ethiopia,and on retiring from British Colonial Medical Service decided to settle there for good. He gradually emerged as one of the country's great modernizing spirits. Workneh, who subsequently entered the service of Ras Teferi Mekonnen (the future Emperor Haile Selassie), accompanied the latter on his ground-breaking European tour of 1924. A notable advocate of modern education, Workneh was critical of the Egyptian teachers in the old Menelik School, founded by the monarch of that namein 1908, and urged Teferi to establish a more modern Europe-oriented school: the Teferi Mekonnen School at which he served as administrator. He was a keen supporter of English rather than the prevailing French, as Ethiopia's foreign language of instruction.

Workneh was one of the foremost Ethiopian opponents of slavery and theslave trade, and on being appointed governor of Chercher Province, in theeast of the country, did much to bring both these institutions in that region to an end. All in all, he gained a reputation as a progressive administrator.

He is however probably best remembered, as I remember him personally,as perhaps Ethiopia's ablest and most loyal pre-war diplomat – who was appointed as his country's Minister, i.e. Ambassador, to Britain in 1935, now seeming so long ago. As such his views on the evolution of Anglo- Ethiopian relations (reproduced by Garretson) are worthy of attention.

PATRIOTISM: Yekatit 12 Martyrs Square (Sidist Kilo)

Monument stands in tribute to the thousands of innocent martyrs butchered by the Fascist Italian Occupiers on that date in in the Ethiopian Calender year of 1929 (1936 Gregorian Calender). The massacre took place at the order of the Italian Vice-Roy Marshal Grazziani in response to an assasination attempt against him carried out by two pro-Ethiopia Eritreans. The monument is shown here during a religious procession of priests of the Orthodox Church, probably at Timkat (Epiphany). Wreaths were laid here by the Emperor to commemorate the massacre every year.Col. Mengistu Haile Mariam continued this practice during his rule, but for a time after the fall of the Dergue regime, only the Mayor of Addis carried out this practice. Recently, the President of the Federal Republic has takenover this task. The monument is in the form of a white obelisk with black bas reliefs of scenes of the massacre as well as scenes of the Imperial funeral accorded to the remains of the victims in the presence of the Emperor following the liberation around it. A Lion of Judah also decorates the face of the obelisk. Even though the image of the Lion of Judah and the Emperor Haile Selassie were removed from all over the city during the reign of the Dergue, they suprisingly did not touch this monument. The monument stands in the Sidist Kilo square infront of the Yekatit 12 Hospital (formerly Emperor Haile Selassie Hospital and known before that as the Beite Saida Hospital). Also facing the square are the southern gatesof the Guenete Leul Palace, which today is the main campus of the Addis Ababa University (formerly Haile Selassie I University). Another major attraction adjoining the square is the old Imperial Lion Zoo, where many of the old Imperial lions and their decendents live. The Churches of Menbere Leul Kidus Markos (Altar of Princes St. Marks Church) and the Meskia Hazunan Medhane Alem are both nearby, as are the former palaces of the Crown Prince (later the Political Cadre's College during the Dergue Era), the Duke of Harrar (later the Headquarters of the Womens wing of the Workers Party of Ethiopia), and Princess Tenagnework (later the headquarters of the Ethiopian Navy), as well as the American and Greek Embassies.

The Abune Petros Memorial Statue

Just West of Addis Ababa's impressive City Hall, down the hill on the mainroad to the Merkato district is Abune Petros Square with it's imposing statue. Abune Petros, the Ethiopian Orthodox Bishop of Wello who was executed by the Italians at the edge of this very square. Abune Petros wasone of the four first native Ethiopians who were anointed as bishops by the Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria to serve under the Coptic born Archbishop Abune Kerllos of Et...hiopia in 1932. Abune Petros was given the province of Wello as his diocese. In 1936, the Fascist armies of Benito Mussolini occupied much of Ethiopia, and Abune Petros traveled to the northern Shewan district of Menz to join the sons of Ras Kassa, Dejazmatches Wondwossen, Abera and Asfa Wossen Kassa and other resistance leaders to plan an attack on the Italians to drive them out of Addis Ababa. The attack failed in 1937, and the Bishop was captured. Defiantly refusing to submit to Italian rule, he was condemned to death. Shortly before his execution Abune Petros Bishop of Wello, dressed in his clerical robes, held up his hand cross and pronounced his anathema on the people and on the very earth of Ethiopia itself, if they were ever to submit to the invader. He was then shot to death in front of a horrified audience. Emperor Haile Selassie had the statue erected in the memory ofthis great Bishop upon his restoration to the throne. The spot of his execution on the western edge of this sqare is also marked by a memorialslab. Sadly, during the brutal rule of the Dergue regime, the bodies of many victims of the “Red Terror” were displayed in this square.

"The Crest is the Official Coat of Arms and Seal of the Ethiopian Monarchy,and is displayed on this website with the graciouspermission of the Ethiopian Crown Council. The arms display the Throne of Solomon, supported by two angels. The angel to the right of th...e throne bears the Sword of State, and Scales of Justice, symbolizing the role of the Emperoras Supreme Soldier and Supreme Judge. The Angel to the left of the throne bears the Imperial Scepter, symbolizing the sovreignity of the monarch. The Lion of Judah stands before the throne, and the arms are draped under an Imperial Red canopy, surmounted by the Imperial Crown. Below the Lion of Judah appear the words “Moa Anbassa Ze Imnegede Yehuda”, translating to “Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Judah”.Omited from this version of the Crest,is the banner at the base of the arms reading “Ityopia Tabetseh Idewiha Habe Igziabiher”, which is a quote from the Psalms of David in the ancient Ge-ez language of Ethiopia,and translates to “Ethiopia Stretches Her Hands unto God”, which served as the official Motto in the Imperial Era."

Imperial Coat of Arms & Coat of Arms of Ethiopia

The Lion of Judah Monument stands in the square in front of Addis Ababa’s train station. The golden colored statue of the Lion of Judah in it’scomplete glory stands on a black granite pedestal which is decorated with relief portraits of Emperors Menelik II and Haile Selassie I, and Empress Zewditu, as well as Ras Makonnen. It marks the foot of the city's widest and avenue, Churchill Road which has the impressive Addis Ababa City Hall at it's other end. The Lion of Judah statue has a very interesting history. Erected in 1930 just before Emperor Haile Selassie's coronation, itwas looted by the Italian occupiers in 1935 and taken to Rome, where it was erected next to the Vittorio Emanuelle Monument. During the 4th anniversary celebrations of the proclomation of the Itlian Empire, Adolf Hitler chose to visit Rome, and attended the celebratory parades along side the Fascist Dictator Musollini and King Victor Emanuelle III. In the parade were numerous subjects of Italy's African Empire, including a young Eritrean named Zerai Deres. Zerai Deres was marching with other parade members carrying a ceremonial sword with which to salute the King, the Fuhrer, and el Duce, at the grandstand. As the parade marched past the Vittorio Emauelle monument, Zerai looked up and saw to his shock, the golden Lion of Judah, the symbol of the ancient monarchy to which his ancestors had long owed aliegence, erected as war booty in the heart of Rome. It was too much for him to bear, and he promptly drew hissword and with tears of anger running down his face he fell on the first Italian officer he could find. He killed and wounded numerous Italian military officers before he was killed. Zerai Deres is lionized to this day as a brave Ethiopian patriot. The monument remained in Rome for several decades, and was finally returned to Addis Ababa after long negotiations in the 1960's. When it was re-erected in it's square the day it arrived, the Emperor was present in military uniform to salute, and to pay tribute to Zerai Deres. Following the revolution in 1974, the Dergue regime decided to remove the statue once more as it was a monarchist symbol. However,the elderly war veterans association members appealed to the Dergue to consider the memory of Zerai Deres and his sacrifice that was inspired by this very symbol. This act saved the statue and it stood it all it's Imperial glory right through the Dergue era, and continues to stand today.

Imperial Ethiopia & The Lion of Judah

The French inscription on the statue's base reads: "To his majesty theKing Tafari Makonnen/In remembrance of his coronation/The Franco- Ethiopian Railway Company" Tafari Makonnen was the given name of Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie I. He used that name until he was crowned Emperor of Ethiopia on November 2, 1930.

The Franco-Ethiopian Railway Company was the successor to the Ethiopian Imperial Railway Company. The Ethiopian Imperial Railway Company was form...ed in 1894 to build a railroad from Addis Ababa to the Red Sea port of Djibouti in French Somaliland. When the Ethiopian Imperial Railway Company failed in 1906, the rails reached only from Djibouti to Dire Dawa in eastern Ethiopia.

According to Wikipedia: "In 1908, the assets of the [Ethiopian Imperial Railway] company were transferred to a new firm, the Comagnie de Chemin de Fer Franco-Ethiopien de Jibuti à Addis Abeba [The Franco- Ethiopian Railway Company], which received a new concession to finish the line to Addis Ababa. After a year of wrangling with the previous financiers and their governments, construction began anew. By 1915 the line reached Akaki, only 23 kilometers from the capital, and two years later came all the way to Addis Ababa itself." "Lion of Judah" is one of the titles used by the Emperors of Ethiopia. That title harkens back to the Queen of Sheba's visit to King Solomon in biblical times. The Lion of Judah symbolized the person of the emperor. It is also a national symbol of Ethiopia. In the collection of the National Museum, Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

The Lion of Judah

Imperial Ethiopian symbol over the flag of Ethiopia

Ethiopia 's history as recorded and elaborated in a 13th-century treatise, the " Kebre Negest ", asserts descent from a retinue of Israelites who returned with Makeda, the Queen of Sheba from her visit to King Solomon in Jerusalem, by whom she had conceived the Solomonic dynasty'sfounder

Menelik I . As Solomon was of the tribe of Judah, his son Menelik I would continue the line, which according to Ethiopian history was passed directlydown from K...ing to King until Emperor Haile Selassie I (ostensibly the 225th king from King David) was deposed in 1974. Both Christian and Jewish Ethiopian history have it that there were also immigrants of the Tribes of Dan and Judah that accompanied Makeda back from her visit to Solomon; hence the Ge'ez motto Mo`a 'Anbessa Ze'imnegede Yihuda ("The Lion of Judah has conquered"), included among the titles of the Emperor throughout the Solomonic Dynasty. It is unknown whether John of Patmos was directly aware of this hereditary title when he penned it into the text of the prophecy.

The Imperial Standard: The Ethiopian Flag

The Imperial Standard is the Ethiopian Flag (horizontal Green, Yellow, andRed stripes) St. George slaying the Dragon on the front of the flag.
Surrounded with the chain of the Order of Solomon’s seal, and the Lion of Judah on the back. The Ethiopian Star of Solomon (Star of David with a Cross Centered on it) would appear on each corner of the standard, front and back. The Imperial Standard was draped on the coffin of Emperor Haile Selassie, and can be seen in the pictures of... his funeral on the webpages covering this event linked below in the special Funeral section of this page. St. George was one of Ethiopia’s Patron Saints, and was associated particularly with the Imperial Family and with the Imperial military forces as well. The Battle of Adwa in 1896 which resulted in a resounding victory of Ethiopia over the colonial forces of Italy took place on the feast day of St. George, and it is this event that inspired both the construction of Addis Ababa’s St. George Cathedral (Kidus Giorgis) and the placement of this Saint on the Imperial Standard, and on the Standardof the Imperial Army. A very large mosaic of St. George was part of the facade of the Parliament building in Addis Ababa, but it was painted over by the Derg regime following the revolution of 1974, and it remains painted over today.

Emperor Haile Selassie used a three point star with three linked rings as apersonal emblem. The three point star was known as the Trinity Star, andsymbolized the Holy Trinity for whom the Emperor was named (his baptismal and regnal name Haile Selassie means “Power of the Trinity”).

Emperor Amha Selassie I – Emperor-in-Exile Part-3

In December 1960, Emperor Haile Selassie departed for a state visit to Brazil. Soon after his departure, the Officers of the Imperial Guard, led bytheir Commander, Lt. General Mengistu Newaye and his brother Girmamelaunched a coup-d’etat. after seizing key points in the capital, they placedthe leading figures of the nobility and the government under arrest in the Green Salon in the Guenete Leul Palace. Empress Menen, Princess Tenagnework and the Duchess of Harrar along with their children were placed under guard at their respective homes (Empress Menen had for some time been spending much of her time in a one story villa near the Guenete Leul Palace because her illness made negotiating the stairs at thepalace too difficult). Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen was forced to go on the radio and announce that the Imperial Guard had overthrown the Emperor,and that he was assuming the throne. He announced that he would be a constitutional monarch and would “live on a salary“. He announced that this was done to liberate Ethiopians from poverty and backwardness. He also announced that his cousin Ras Imiru was to be Prime Minister, and that Lt. General Mulugueta Bulli would be Chief-of-Staff. Ras Imiru, also acaptive along with the Crown Prince and was aslo forced to aquiece.

General Mulugueta, was not cooperative, and was held prisoner in the Green Salon. The coup leaders had made certain key mistakes. They failedto win over or arrest the commanders of the regular army, and they failedto sieze three key figures. One was Prince Asrate Kassa, the leading concervative nobleman, the other two were Crown Princess Medferiashwork and Prince Sahle Selassie. Crown Princess Medferiashwork, convinced that her husband was being forced to accept the throne, played an important role. She and her children had been left alone in their house, so she contacted the commanders of the Army and had them meet in her house with Prince Asrate Kassa and the other nobles who had eluded capture. This enabled them to coordinate their efforts and resolve to refuse to accept the coup-d’etat. Prince Sahle Selassie was a ham radio hobbyist. He was also left alone in his home, so he was able to send out a message to ham radio opperators that the Imperial Guard in Ethiopia had launched a coup-d'etat against his father.

The ham radio opperators around the world were able to contact the Emperors plane on it's way to Brazil, and he promptly turned back. The final straw was when the Patriarch of the Orthodox Church, Abune Baslios,refused to recognize the new government. Instead he issued an excommunication against those who had defied the monarch anointed by the church, and called on the people not to accept them as their rulers.

This edict was printed up and scattered all over Addis Ababa by Army helicopters. News arrived that the Emperor had landed in Asmara, and that the population there had turned out by the thousands to greet him inan act of loyalty. The army then stormed the Guenete Leul Palace pushingout the Imperial Guards, and freed the Crown Prince and Ras Imiru.

However, the coup leaders had fled, but not before machine-gunning theprisoners in the Green Salon, killing many of the leading figures of the nobility and the government. The Emperor returned and order restored.

Following the 1960 coup attempt, the public began to speculate as to whether the Crown Prince was an active participant in the attempt to overthrow his father. His radio address to the people was explained to have been given under extreme duress. However, it had long been rumored that he was far more liberal in his outlook than his father, and that he favoured reducing the role of the monarchy from the all powerful possition it held, to a symbolic constitutional one. It led many to believe that the Prince may have at the very least sympathised with some of the plotters ideals if not having a direct part in their schemes. It was thought significant that the Prince and Ras Imiru, two men of the dynasty known to have liberal leanings, were removed from the Green Salon and sent upstairs in the Palace before the Guards massacred the imprisoned nobles and officials. In an audience with some peace corp officials that he granted in the mid sixties, Prince Asfaw Wossen stated that he recognized the need for extensive land reform, and immplied that there would be changes in the role of the monarchy in his reign. The Crown Prince remained the legal and hereditary heir to the throne however, and reformers of monarchist sympmathies decided to patiently wait for his turn on the Throne of Solomon. Some more conservative elements however are said to have wondered if there were not a way to bypass the Prince and either enthrone his underage son Prince Zera Yacob, or one of the sons of the Duke of Harrar under a regency. Some are said to have whispered of a regency under the conservative Prince Asrate Kassa, others speculated that this Prince should himself be made Emperor as his blood decent from Solomon was equal to that of the Crown Prince. Others went so far to wish that women had not been removed from the succession by the 1955 constitution which might have allowed the more conservative Princess Tenagnework to succeed her father. They probably weren'taking into account the close personal bond between Princess Tenagnework and her brother the Crown Prince, and her fierce loyalty to him. Many were convinced that the succession of the Crown Prince might cause upheaval between the liberal and conservative interests within the government and across the Empire. This would never be tested. In 1973, Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen suffered a massive stroke which paralized him. He was rushed to Switzerland for treatment, and his wife and children accompanied him. As most people did not belive that the Prince would survive, and as the stability of the country came under increasing assault from student protest and economic stresses caused by the OPEC embargo of 1973, pressures increased on the Emperor Haile Selassie to name an heir from the younger generation. The Emperor resisted. The Crown Prince was still the legal heir, and unless he were to die, the Emperor did not see any need to name another heir. However, the Emperor himself being in his Eighties, the future looked more and more uncertain, and the embattled government of Prime Minister Endalkachew Makonnen continued to urge him to name another heir. The conservatives,encouraged by the posibility of realizing their hopes for an underage Emperor governed by a conservative regency, leant their strong support.

Finally, the Emperor announced that his grandson, Prince Zera Yacob Asfaw Wossen, son of the Crown Prince, would become “Acting Crown Prince”, while his father was in ill health. This was taken to mean that Prince Zera Yacob was now an “Heir Presumptive” pending the death of the “Heir Apparent” Prince Asfaw Wossen, which was expected at any time. Prince Zera Yacob was a student at Oxford at the time, and acceptedthe new title with appropriate dignity. The possition of “Acting Crown Prince” however was unprecidented in the histories of the monarchies of the world, and the Emperor was clearly reluctant to create this title which seemed to anticipate the death of his son. Ironically, the Crown Prince would not only survive, but would outlive almost all of the officials who had been certain that he was at death’s door and also those who perhaps eagerly looked forward to a conservative regency. The entire cabinets of both Prime Minister Endalkatchew Makonnen and Ex-Prime Minister Aklilu Haptewold, the military leaders,the varous governors and officials at various levels, aristocrats of all ranks, and aides of the Emperor himself were placed under arrest one by one, by the new military coordinating commitee. The arrests continued from February 1974 into August in what came to be known among westerners as the “creeping coup”. Noblemen, ministers, officers, judges, digniaries of the Imperial court were rounded up and placed under arrest at the Fourth Army Division headquarters in South Eastern Addis Ababa by the Military Coordinating Committe known as the Dergue. The Dergue had been formed under an Imperial Charter toinvestigate the causes of various military mutinies and insurections that had spread accross the Empire over the previous year. They had extendedtheir mandate to cover the right to investigate government corruption, and used this to sweep up the bulwarks of Ethiopia’s ruling class. On September 11th, 1974, all members of the Imperial Family in Ethiopia were placed under arrest. The next day, September 12th, Emperor Haile Selassie was removed from the Jubilee Pallace and his deposition was announced to the world. The new military government announced that Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen would become “king” rather than Emperor, and that the title Conquering Lion of Judah would become “Conquering Lion of Ethiopia”, and that the cross would be removed from the staff in the Lion symbol. Upon this news, reporters assembled outside the residence in Geneva where the Crown Prince and his family were staying. A spokesman came out to state that the Prince had no comment on developments, and that he had recieved no summons from Addis Ababa.

He also spoke of the concern for the safety of the Emperor and the other members of the Imperial family that was shared by those members of thefamily outside Ethiopia. Two months later, on November 24,1974, Addis Ababa radio announced the execution of 58 former officials of the Imperialgovernment without trial, as well as the execution of the acting Head of State and his followers who had opposed the policies of the military government. The dead included Gen. Aman Michael Andom, the man who had replaced the Emperor as acting head of state, Prince Asrate Kassa, the president of the Crown Council, both the former Prime Ministers AkliluHapte-Wold and Endalkachew Makonnen, the Emperors grandson and sonof Princess Tenagnework, Prince Rear-Admiral Iskinder Desta, the Emperor’s son-in-law and former defence minister, Gen. Abiye Abebe, andmany others. The country and the world reeled in shock. Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen, issued a statement condemning the executions. When the Prince and his family moved to London soon afterwards, they notified the Ethiopian Embassy of their imminent arrival. The charge-d’affairs in London telegramed Addis Ababa and asked for instructions as to how he was to receive Asfaw Wossen, as Crown Prince, or as the officially designated King and Head of State of Ethiopia. The Dergue (after some angry exchange of veiws with monarchist members who did not long survive), ordered him to receive the Prince and his family as he would anyregular Ethiopian. Soon afterwards the military government announced it’scommunist program and anounced the abolishment of the monarchy and all Imperial titles and ranks.

The following year was a horrible one for the Imperial family. The men of the Imperial family inside Ethiopia (basically the sons of the Duke of Harrar) were imprisoned in the celars of the old Imperial (Menelik) Palace.The women were first kept at the home of the Duchess of Harrar, but were then moved to the Akaki Prison. Known as Kerchele or Alem Bekagn (the end of the world), it is one of the worst prisons in Africa. While underarrest here, Princess Ijigayehu, daughter of the Crown Prince by his first marriage and the mother of six, died of illness and medical neglect. Not long afterwards, Princess Tenagnework’s daughter Mary also died. On August 24th,1975,Radio Ethiopia anounced that the “ex-king” Haile Sellassie had died the previous night of an unspecified illness. It was announced that “the ceremony of burial” had already been held. What hadactually happened was that the military council which now ruled the country, known as the Derg, had voted to kill him in secret. The Emperor had been strangled. His body had then been wrapped in a blanket, tied upwith rope and buried in a deep grave, over which the leader of the Derg was to build a latrine that adjoined one of his offices.

Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen lived in quiet exile in London with his wife andchildren. After the death of his daughter, his ex-wife, Princess Wollete Israel had obtained custody of Princess Ijigayehu's children (their father was imprisoned). Princess Wolette Israel, inspite of being the ex-wife of the Crown Prince, and the sister of the leader of a major rebel group (Ras Mengesha Seyoum)was the only princess not placed in Prison. Although the Crown Prince's grandchildren were not imprisoned, they were under considerable risk, and there was constant fear that they would be arrestedor worse. In 1977, together with an American missionary family in Addis Ababa, the Imperial Family was able to engineer the escape from Ethiopia of the 6 children of the late Princess Ijigayehu, the 4 children of the imprissoned Princess Seble Desta, and the daughter of Princess Aida Desta(and daughter of Ras Mengesha). Thus, all the Crown Princes grandchildren, and the grandchildren of his sister Princess Tenagnework (with the exception of the daughter of Prince Rear Admiral Iskinder Desta)were now out of Ethiopia, insuring the continuation of the dynasty.

Princess Tenagnework and her daughters, Princess Sara Duchess of Harrarand her sons remained in prison. Princess Mahisente, widow of Prince Sahle Sellassie, and her son Prince Ermias were out of Ethiopia at the timeof the revolution, and also escaped imprisonment, as had Prince Dawit Makonnen, one of the sons of the Duke and Duchess of Harrar. Princess Sophia Desta's daughter also lived in London, as did Princess Tenangeworks husband Ras Andarkachew. Various other exiles congregated in London also. This was the basic make up of the Imperial family in exile.The Imperial family avoided political involvement for years, and kept a low profile. In 1981, Emperor Haile Sellassie's neice Princess Yeshashework Yilma became the first member of the family released from prison due to ill health and age. She died only a few months later in Ethiopia. Then in 1988, the government released from prison the women of the Imperial family. Released were, Princess Tenagnework Haile Sellassie, her daughters Princesses Aida, Seble, Sophia and Hirut Desta, Princess Sara Gizaw Duchess of Harrar, and Princess Zuriashwork Gebregziabher, widow of Prince Asrate Kassa. The official announcement of their release refered to each of the women as Mrs. rather than Princess.The international press did the same, but refered to Princess Tenagneworkas Princess. A year later, the sons of the Duke and Duchess of Harrar were also released from prison. The entire Imperial family were now out of jail. Eventually they would all leave for Britain, the United States, and Canada.

Over the years, opposition politicians had often urged Prince Asfaw Wossen to take a more active role in the struggle against communism. The Prince and his family however, were afraid that actions they took could jeopordize the lives of their family in prison in Ethiopia, so they refrained from political activity. The Prince also was a firm believer that the monarchy's future role in Ethiopia would have to be above politics, and should act as an impartial reconciler and symbol of unity, rather thanthe repository of power that it had been. So although he was clearly an anti-communist, he did not want to be seen as being partisan to one opposition group over another. Finally though, after years of persuasion, the Prince agreed to act. On April 7th, 1989, Crown Prince Merid AzmatchAsfaw Wossen was proclaimed Emperor Amha Selassie I, Conquering Lionof Judah, King of Kings of Ethiopia in Exile, at his home in London. He called on the people of Ethiopia to rise up and throw out un-Godly communism, and restore the monarchy, but under a constitutional framework. His wife became Empress Medferiashwork, and his son became Crown Prince Zera Yacob. A year later, Emperor Amha Selassie and his family left London and moved to the metropolitan area of Washington D.C. to be with the much larger Ethiopian community there. In May of 1991, the EPRDF reble movement marched into Addis Ababa and deposed the communist government. In response to their call for theformation of political parties, the Emperor authorized the formation of theMoa Anbessa monarchist movement to advocate the setting up of a constitutional monarchy in Ethiopia. He also announced his intention ofreturning home for a visit.

Under the bright lights of Television cameras, in May of 1992, the earthly remains of Emperor Haile Selassie I were disinterred from the place that President Mengistu Haile Mariam had ordered them buried. Mengistu had ordered the Emperor to be buried upright, had a very thick concrete and rock slab lain over the spot, and built a latrine over the secret grave. On the same day, the 60 martyrs of November 23,1974 were also disintered from their mass grave on the grounds of the Akaki prison. The Emperor's remains were escorted to the church of St. Mary Ba'eta, the Masoleum of Emperor Menelik II and Empress Zewditu, by weeping relatives and palaceservants. Emperor Haile Selassie's remains were placed temporarily in themausoleum, untill the Imperial family could organize a fitting funeral, and bury him at Holy Trinity Cathedral next to his wife Empress Menen as he had wanted. However, the Imperial family and the Transitional government clashed over several issues. First, the government refused the Imperial families request for a state funeral, insisting that the family arrange a private funeral, no matter how large or elaborate. They also refused to guarantee security for the various foreign dignitaries that mightattend, including foreign royalty. The Imperial family decided to leave the remains where they were, in a holy place of great honor, the masoleum church of St. Mary Ba'eta, until such time as it became possible to give the late Emperor a funeral befitting his possition and place in history. Due to this, Emperor Amha Selassie did not return to Ethiopia, but his daughter Princess Sehin represented him at the funeral of the 60 martyrs at Holy Trintiy Cathedral on July 11, 1992. The Emperor's health suffered over time, yet he continued to voice his opinion and offer advice on certain national issues from his home in exile. He strenuously denounced the referendum on Eritrean independence, and spoke out against any move to seperate Eritreans from their motherland Ethiopia. He also protested the arrest of members of oppossiton parties in Ethiopia. He was an avid promoter of democratic change in Ethiopia, a supporter of the ruleof law, and advocated the restoration of a constitutional monarchy in his country. Emperor Amha Selassie, in an effort to better organize the monarchist movement, decided to restore the Imperial Crown Council which had been abolished by the Dergue regime, and whose members hadall been exectued or gone into exile. He also had tentative plans to restorethe Haile Selassie I foundation established by his father. (Text ends)

BIBLE: Onesimus Nesib (Hikma)

He who translated the scriptures to Oromiffa

He translated the scriptures to Oromo, publishing the first Oromo hymnbook in 1887, the New Testament in 1893, and the whole Bible in1899.

Was born around 1856 near Hurumu in today's Illu Abbaboora. His originalname was Hika, an Oromo name meaning "translator." His father died when he was four years old. Raiding tribesmen stole Hika from his motherand sold him as a slave, giving him a new name, Nesib.

Nesib was again stolen again from his owners and so...ld four times beforeWerner Munzinger (1832-1875), the vice-consul of the French Consulate, liberated him at Massawa on the Red Sea coast, where missionaries from the Swedish Evangelical Mission (SEM) had a boys' school headed by Rev. Bengt Peter Lundahl (1840-1885). Here, Nesib was given to Mr. W. Ahlborg (SEM) as a servant in October 1870 and become one of the students of that school. Mr. P. E. Lager (SEM) became his first teacher butLundahl took over in December of the same year. A bright student, Nesib was soon converted and, when he was about sixteen, he was baptized on Easter Sunday (March 31, 1872), taking the Christian name Onesimus.

Dejazmatch Gebre Selassie Baria-Gabr of TigreA Prominent Tigrean Nobleman

Taitu’s conduct continued to irritate the Shewan nobility and angered the paternal relatives of the Heir to the Throne. When Ras Tessema and Fitawrari Hapte Giorgis urged the Empress to halt appointing only her relatives to office and causing alarm to the foreign diplomats in February of 1910, she angrily called Ras Tessema an imbecile and Fitawrari Hapte Giorgis an invalid. This was the last straw. The two men summoned several other notables to Hapte Giorgis’home and resolved to remove the Empress from state authority. The group included Dejazmatch Gebre Sellassie Baria-Gabr, ruler of Adowa and prominent Tigrean noble man, Dejazmatch Lul Seged (later Ras), Dejazmatch Demissew Nessibu, Dejazmatch Wesene Tirfe and Dejazmach Merid Hapte Mariam. The foriegn missions, particularly the French, British and Italian missions wereactive in encouraging this group against the Empress, as she was regarded as being anti-foriegner. Many secret communications took place encouraging the nobles to act. After ascertaining the support of the Army,these prominent nobles notified the Archbishop Abune Mattiwos of their intentions (the Archbishop was a long time foe of the Empress)and had sworn to him that they would not shed any blood. The Archbishop asked to go to the Empress to speak to her first and try to convince her to step aside peacefully and calmly. Taitu’s informants however beat him to the chase. When he arrived at the Palace, the women of the Imperial household staff came running out and threw stones at the cleric, calling him a dog and a son of foreigners, telling him to go back to Egypt. The Empress sent out word that she didn't have time to see him. Archbishop angrily returned to his residence and sent the Empress a terse letter in which he stated that if she did not recieve him she would be turned over to soldiers. Taitu reluctantly agreed to recieve him, and after some tense discussion, agreed to recieve the conspirators in audience. The nobles arrived dressed in court dress, and made the proper bows to the Empress.Dejazmatch Gebre Selassie then stepped forward and politely asked Her Imperial Majesty to confine herself to the caring of the sovereign, her husband, and halt her involvement in the daily affairs of government which were the rightfull duties of the Regent of the Empire, Ras Tessema Nadew, in the name of the Heir, Lij Eyasu Michael. Although the Dejazmatch and the others had been meticulous in their etiquette, the Empress could not contain her rage. She berated Dejazmatch Gebre Selassie as a coarse and disgusting person, unrefined, and a mere shepherd. In a dig at her own Semien origins (Semien being known for it'ssheep), the Dejazmatch elegantly replied "If not for Emperor Menelik, we might all be shepherds, but thanks to him we are all now shepherds of men." Exasperated, she then turned on Ras Tessema demanding to know what action she had ever taken without consulting him as regent, and asking him if it was not he who constantly involved her in state matters because of his insistance that she was far more experienced in these matters. His answer was considerably more feeble than the Dejazmatch's quick witty reply. He mumbled something about her constant interference in government, and appointment of her relatives to all offices. Ras Mengesha Atikem of Agew Midir, a man who had recently been recently agrieved by the Empress and was probably there to complain about being dispossesed of his province by her, and happened to be present at the scene. Although deeply agreived at the Empress, the Ras was never the less offended at this affront to the wife of his master, and he and Dejazmatch Nessibu came to fisticuffs. The two were bodily seperated andwere calmed down by the Archbishop. The Empress then sat on her throneand haughtily looked away from the assembled nobles and in a sign of displeasure, refused to talk with them further. She had a spokesman read a statement from her that asked for permission to leave the capital and take the Emperor to Gondar, or if they insisted he remain in Shewa, eitherto the monastery of Debre Libanos, or her personal fief of Bulga. She would care for him there with her servants and go into seclusion as she was clearly not wanted in the capital. The nobles were startled. They had not expected such a reaction and were not pleased with the prospect of the public seeing them as ingrates who would drive the stricken Emperor and his wife from their home. They pleaded with her not to leave, and to remain in the city and care for the Emperor in the Palace where he and she rightly belonged as the reigning monarchs of the Empire. Her spokesman replied that Her Majesty would think about it. In the context ofthe significant political defeat she had just suffered, it was a small victory,but she must have savored it. She would ofcourse agree to stay. The woman who had ruled Ethiopia along with her husband, and probably the most powerful Empress-consort of Ethiopia ever, was thus deposed. The foriegn missions congradulated the nobles privately for the way they had carried out Taitu's deposing. Ras Tessema was now the de facto as well asthe de jure ruler of Ethiopia, and all business would now be conducted in the name of the Heir to the Throne, Lij Eyasu, rather than in the name of Menelik, King of Kings. Empress Taitu retreated to the Imperial chambers and continued to nurse her stricken husband with the help of her step- daughter Zewditu and a host of servants. All officials were discouraged by the government from meeting the Empress for any reason. Even social visitors were discouraged. The staff was decreased little by little over time. Increasingly her only outside contacts were the doctors that treated Menelik. She herself became quite ill during 1912, and Menelik's cousin, Tsehaiwork Darge (daughter of Ras Darge) came from her fief in Sellale tonurse both the Emperor and Empress much to the grief of the palace staffwhich feared and disliked this particular Princess with a vengence. Cut off from the world, Taitu's staff was continually being reduced, untill the pointthat she only had a few women helping her and Zewditu. She would complain in writing to the Regent "Why am I being deprived of male servants? Am I to be forbidden from hearing male voices?" The Empress and the others who nursed the Emperor depended on male attendants to lift him and bathe him. It was becoming very difficult to care for him. On certain occasions she was asked to present the Emperor for inspection by the nobles to ascertain his continued incapacity to rule. The Regent and the cabinet of ministers, and all the highest nobles would file into the Imperial bedchamber and approach the bed where the King of Kings lay completely unresponsive and shrunken away to a faint image of his once robust self. The nobles would weep and sob openly for their stricken master, and Taitu, seated in a chair nearby would only look on in silence at the men she believed had betrayed her. She would slowly thus sink intoisolation.

Emperor Amha Selassie I – King-in-Exile of Ethiopia

Over the years, opposition politicians had often urged Prince Asfaw Wossen to take a more active role in the struggle against communism. The Prince and his family however, were afraid that actions they took could jeopordize the lives of their family in prison in Ethiopia, so they refrained from political activity. The Prince also was a firm believer that the monarchy's future role in Ethiopia would have to be above politics, and should act as an impartial reconciler and symbol of unity, rather thanthe repository of power that it had been. So although he was clearly an anti-communist, he did not want to be seen as being partisan to one opposition group over another. Finally though, after years of persuasion, the Prince agreed to act.

On April 7th, 1989, Crown Prince Merid Azmatch Asfaw Wossen was proclaimed Emperor Amha Selassie I, Conquering Lion of Judah, King of Kings of Ethiopia in Exile, at his home in London. He called on the people of Ethiopia to rise up and throw out un-Godly communism, and restore themonarchy, but under a constitutional framework. His wife became Empress Medferiashwork, and his son became Crown Prince Zera Yacob. Ayear later, Emperor Amha Selassie and his family left London and moved to the metropolitan area of Washington D.C. to be with the much larger Ethiopian community there. In May of 1991, the EPRDF reble movement marched into Addis Ababa and deposed the communist government. In response to their call for the formation of political parties, the Emperor authorized the formation of the Moa Anbessa monarchist movement to advocate the setting up of a constitutional monarchy in Ethiopia. He also announced his intention of returning home for a visit.

Under the bright lights of Television cameras, in May of 1992, the earthly remains of Emperor Haile Selassie I were disinterred from the place that President Mengistu Haile Mariam had ordered them buried. Mengistu had ordered the Emperor to be buried upright, had a very thick concrete and rock slab lain over the spot, and built a latrine over the secret grave. On the same day, the 60 martyrs of November 23,1974 were also disintered from their mass grave on the grounds of the Akaki prison. The Emperor's remains were escorted to the church of St. Mary Ba'eta, the Masoleum of Emperor Menelik II and Empress Zewditu, by weeping relatives and palaceservants. Emperor Haile Selassie's remains were placed temporarily in themausoleum, untill the Imperial family could organize a fitting funeral, and bury him at Holy Trinity Cathedral next to his wife Empress Menen as he had wanted.

However, the Imperial family and the Transitional government clashed over several issues. First, the government refused the Imperial families request for a state funeral, insisting that the family arrange a private funeral, no matter how large or elaborate. They also refused to guaranteesecurity for the various foreign dignitaries that might attend, including foreign royalty. The Imperial family decided to leave the remains where they were, in a holy place of great honor, the masoleum church of St.
Mary Ba'eta, until such time as it became possible to give the late Emperor a funeral befitting his possition and place in history. Due to this,Emperor Amha Selassie did not return to Ethiopia, but his daughter Princess Sehin represented him at the funeral of the 60 martyrs at Holy Trintiy Cathedral on July 11, 1992.

The Emperor's health suffered over time, yet he continued to voice his opinion and offer advice on certain national issues from his home in exile. He strenuously denounced the referendum on Eritrean independence, andspoke out against any move to seperate Eritreans from their motherland Ethiopia. He also protested the arrest of members of oppossiton parties inEthiopia. He was an avid promoter of democratic change in Ethiopia, a supporter of the rule of law, and advocated the restoration of a constitutional monarchy in his country. Emperor Amha Selassie, in an effort to better organize the monarchist movement, decided to restore theImperial Crown Council which had been abolished by the Dergue regime, and whose members had all been exectued or gone into exile. He also hadtentative plans to restore the Haile Selassie I foundation established by his father. (Text ends)

Ex-Imperial Ethiopia honorifics, traditional and court titles (DIARIES - Wemezekir) Until the end of the Ethiopian monarchy in September 1974, there were two categories of nobility in Ethiopia, the 'Mesafint' and the 'Mekuwanint'. The Mesafint or princes, hereditary nobles, formed the upper echelon of the ruling class. The Mekwanint werethe appointed nobles, often of humble birth, who formed the bulk of the nobility. Until the 20th century, the most powerful people at court were generally Mekwanint appointed by the monarch, while regionally, the Mesafint enjoyed greater influence and power. Now the above titles and all other are under negligence by successive overnments.

Here below list of traditional positions and awards of which only granted by the royal crowncouncil in previous years to the nobility ladies and gentlemen among the society by former Imperial regime. Nowadays Afterthe fall of the conservative regime, these traditional position-awards, andnamings were being neglected by successor regimes. Here are some of previous traditional position awards wordings.

Imperial Ethiopia - Royal Males Honorifics - Aristocratic & Court Titles’

Nəgusä nägäst "King of kings" "Emperor of Ethiopia"

ንጉስ ነገስት -የአንድ ሉአላዊ ሃገር የበላይ ገዥ/መሪ/

Although several kings of Aksum used this style, until the restoration of the Solomonic dynasty under Yekuno Amlak, rulers of Ethiopia generally used the style of Negus, although "King of Kings" was used as far back as Ezana. The full title of the Emperor of Ethiopia included the terms Atse (Emperor), Neguse Negest (King of kings), and Seyoume Igziabeher (Electof God). The title of Moa Anbessa Ze Imnegede Yehuda (Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Judah) always preceded the titles of the Emperor. It was not a personal title, but rather referred to the title of Christ, and placed the office of the Christ ahead of the Emperor's name in an act of Imperial submission. Until Yohannes IV the Emperor was also Neguse Tsion (King of Zion). The Emperor was entitled to the dignities of Girmawi (His/Your Imperial Majesty), and Janhoy (Sire), Atse (Emperor when referred to in the third person) and in his own household and family as Getochu (our Master in the plural).

Negus (ንጉስ) meaning for "king" (ንጉስ -የአንድ ክፍል ሀገር ገዥ)

This word was often used as part of the title to denote any important official. The title of Negus was awarded at the discretion of the Emperor tothe Rases who ruled important provinces. The rulers of Gondar Shoa, Gojjam, Wollo have all held the title of Negus at some point. The title of Negus of Tsion (Zion), usually held by the Emperor, gave hegemony over much of the north of the Empire and was seated at Axum. The title was last used by Emperor Yohannes IV. It was awarded to Negus Mikael fatherof Eyassu V but changed to Negus of Wollo in consideration of the feelingsof many princes in northern Ethiopia, then after his son Lij Eyassu's deposition the title went to Tafari Makonnen, who later became Emperor Haile Selassie I. He would be the last person to bear the title of Negus.

Imperial Aristocratic and Court Titles በነገስታት ዘመን ከ1632 እስከ 1769 የነበረውየስልጣን አይነት እና ትርጉም

Abetohun (አቤቶሁን) or Abeto (አቤቶ) -- Prince. Title reserved for males of Imperial ancestry in the male line. Title fell into disuse by the late 19thcentury.

Abeto-hoy Lij Iyasu attempted to revive the title and this form is still usedby the current Iyasuist claimants.

Ras (ራስ "head") -- One of the powerful non-imperial (ራስ -የአንድ ሃገር ከንጉስ በታችሆኖ የሚገዛ የጦር ሃይል የበላይ አዛዥ ቢትወደድ ባለ ሙሉ ስልጣን) ; Harold G. Marcus equates this to a Duke. The combined title of "Leul Ras" was given to the heads of the cadet branches of the Imperial dynasty, such as the Princes of Gojjam, Tigrai and Selale.

Bitwaded (ቢትወደድ, meaning for "the beloved") -- An office thought to havebeen created by Zara-Yakob who appointed two of these, one of the Left and one of the Right. These were later merged into one office, which became the supreme grade of Ras, "Ras Betwadad".

Lij -- (ልጅ) literally meaning for "younger" -Title given from birth to sons ofmembers of thenobility (mesafint) Lij also meaning for "child", and...serves to indicate that a youth is of noble blood. Haile Selassie was given a name, Taffari Makonnen, the latter emperor Haile Selassie was given the title of “Lij” meaning “the one who’s respected or feared".

Dejazmatch ("Commander or General of the Gate") ደጅ-አዝማች -የአንድ ክፍለ ሃገር ከራስ በታች የጦር መሪ ሆኖ ትዛዝ ሰጪ a military title meaning commander of the central body of a traditional Ethiopian armed force composed of a vanguard, main body, left and right wings and a rear body. Marcus equates this to a count. The heirs of the "Leul Rases" were titled Leul Dejazmach to elevate them above the non-Imperial blood Dejazmaches.

Fitawrari (ፊትአውራሪ) Commander of the Vanguard meaning chief of staff), amilitary title meaning commander of the vanguard of a traditional Ethiopian armed force. Marcus equates this to a baron.

Azmatch (Commander of the Rearguard) a military title meaning commander of the rearguard of a traditional Ethiopian armed force. Thiswas usually a trustworthy counselor and the leader's chief minister.

Bale-Amba-Ras (Commander of an Amba or fortress) ባላምባራስ -ከግራ አዝማች በታች ሆኖ ሠራዊት ይዞ የ ሚዘ ምት ,head of an Amba, these could also be commandersof the guards, artillery or cavalry of a traditional Ethiopian armed force, basically a man entrusted with important commands. Head of an Amba (village).

Royal Females Honorifics

Nigiste Negest- "Empress Regnant" (in her own right) Literally "Queen of Kings". Empress Zewditu (reigned 1917–1930) was the only woman to becrowned in Ethiopia in her own right since ancient times. Rather than takethe title of Itege which was reserved for Empress-Consorts, Zewditu was given the feminized version of Niguse Negest to indicate that she reigned in her own right. She was accorded the dignity of Girmawit (Imperial Majesty) and the title of Siyimte Igziabiher (feminzed "Elect of God"). She was commonly referred to as Nigist (Queen). The 1955 revised constitution excluded women from the succession to the throne so this title was effectively abolished.

Itegue – (እቴጌ) Equivalent to "Empress Consort" were generally crowned asconsorts by the Emperor at the Imperial Palace (የአንድሀገር ገዥሀጋዊ ሚስ ት/ንግስ ት/). However, Empress Taitu Bitul consort of Menelik II, became the first Itege to be crowned by the Emperor at church rather than at the Palace. Her coronation took place on the second day of the Emperor's coronation holiday. Empress Menen Asfaw became the first Itege to be crowned by the archbishop on the same day and during the same ceremony as her husband, Emperor Haile selassie. The Itegue was entitledto the dignity of Girmawit (Her/YourImperial Majesty).

Leul Reserved at birth for daughters of the monarch, and granddaughtersin the male line. Prince is a title born by sons and daughters of the Royalfamily, and by the higher nobility who already have the title of "Ras", hence "Leul Ras".

ልዑል -በቤተ -መንግስ ት ለወንድ ንጉሳዊ ቤተሰብ የ ሚሰ ጥ የ ክብር ስ ም

Leult (feminine) -- Princess. Reserved at birth for daughters of themonarch, ልዕ ል ት -በ ቤ ተ መ ን ግ ስ ት ለ ሴ ት ን ጉ ሳ ዊ ቤ ተ ሰ ብ የ ሚ ሰ ጥ የ ክ ብ ር ስ ም - and granddaughters in themale line. Usually bestowed on the wives of "Leul Rases" as well as the monarch's granddaughters in the female line upon their marriages. The notable exception to the rule was "Leult" Yeshasheworq Yilma Emperor Haile Selassie's niece by his elder brother, who received the title with the dignity of "Highness" from Empress Zawditu upon the princesses marriageto 'Leul Ras' Gugsa Araya Selassie in 1918, and then again from her uncleupon his coronation in 1930 with the enhanced dignity of "Imperial Highness".

Note again: Higher ranks from the title of Ras through Balambaras were also bestowed upon members of the Mekwanint. A Ras who was a member of the Mesafint (such as Ras Mengesha Yohannes son of EmperorYohannes IV would usually be given precedence over a Ras who was a member of the Mekwanint, (such as Ras Alula Engida who was of humble birth) even though their ranks were equal. There were also however parallel rules of precedence based on seniority based on age, on offices held, and on when they each obtained their titles, which made the rules for precedence fairly complicated.

Nebura-Ed ("one put in office through the laying of hands") -- civil governor of Axum. Also called "Liqat Axum". Because of the historical andsymbolic importance of this city, the rules of precedence promulgated in 1689 ranked the Nebura ed ahead of all of the provincial governors.

Indeed, when the title was granted with Ras Warq (the right to wear a coronet), it was higher than even the title of Ras. Although a civil title granted by the Emperor, it was usually bestowed on a clergyman due to Axum's status as the holiest site of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church within the country. Note: The Nebre Id of Axum was both the clerical and seculargovernor of the town and Monasteries of Axum including the great ...

Cathedrals of St. Mary of Zion. The rank of Nebre Id was granted only to the heads of the churches in Axum and Addis Alem, with the Axum NebreId being the senior ranking one. When the rank of Nebre Id was granted with the dignity of "Ras Worq" (the right to wear a coronet), it outranked the title of Ras. Although Nebre Id's could be reasigned to other offices, the title stayed with them for life. Nebre Id Ermias Guebre Selassie remains an active clergyman in the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Bete Kresteyen, abbreviated as EOTC and is considered one of it's leading intellectuals. He served several terms in the Imperial parliament, and wasimprisoned by the succesive Duerg regime for seven years. (Text ends)

FAITH: The Abyssinian Baptist Church In New York,Founded In 1808

Abyssinian Baptist church, currently located in Harlem, New York, wasfounded in 1808 when a group of black parishioners left First Baptist Church of New York due to the imposition of racially-segregated seating. Reverend Thomas Paul, an African American minister from Boston, Massachusetts, assisted the group consisting of African Americansand Ethiopian immigrants in establishing a church. The group named the new church Abyssinian after Abyssinia, the ancient name of Ethiopia.

Abyssinian Baptist Church became the first African American Baptist church in the state of New York; the Reverend John VanVessler served asthe congregation's first pastor. The church—with its already dynamic, politically astute pastoral leadership—became a stalwart pillar in the NewYork black community. Increasing membership forced the church to relocate several times until 1923 when their present day Neo-Gothic architectural edifice was built at 132 W. 138th Street in Harlem between Adam Clayton Powell and Malcolm X Boulevards. The church, constructedof limestone, features European-imported stained glass windows and an Italian marble pulpit.

Abyssinian Baptist experienced rapid growth with its gospel of social justice and its mission of community empowerment. Over the course ofits 206-year history, Abyssinian prospered under the leadership of its 20pastors. Notable pastors include Reverends William Spellman (1856- 1885); Adam Clayton Powell, Sr. (1908-1936); Adam Clayton Powell, Jr.(1937-1971); and Dr. Calvin O. Butts, III (1989-). During Rev.
Spellman's tenure, church membership increased to 1,600; under the leadership of Rev. Powell, Sr., Abyssinian promoted religious and socialoutreach within the surrounding community.

Following the retirement of Rev. Powell, Sr., his son Rev. Adam Clayton Powell, Jr. assumed leadership of the church and their community serviceactivities in Harlem. During Rev. Powell, Jr.'s years as pastor, church membership burgeoned to nearly 14,000. The church continued to provide for the needy during the Great Depression era and extended its religious and social programs to include international outreach.

Reverend Adam Clayton Powell, Jr. brought national celebrity to Abyssinian after his election to Congress (1944-1970) where he was the first to represent Harlem, the 22nd District of New York. Rev. Powell, Jr. continued his duties as pastor while serving as an outspoken proponent oflaws promoting equal rights during his 14-year tenure in Congress. UnderPowell, Abyssinian also organized/ participated in civil rights activism to highlight discrimination in jobs and housing. In 1965 Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. was the invited guest speaker for Abyssinian's 157th church anniversary.

Currently, Reverend Dr. Calvin O. Butts, III is the pastor of the church. Like his predecessors, Rev. Butts, III continues to promote Abyssinian's dedication to religious, educational, and community development. In 1989 the church established the Abyssinian Development Corporation (ADC), a nonprofit community property development venture designed to stimulate economic development and provide affordable housing in Harlem.

Abyssinian founded and operates the Thurgood Marshall Academy for Learning and Social Change (1993) and the Thurgood Marshall Academy Lower School (2004). In 2007 Rev. Butts led a church delegation to AddisAbaba, Ethiopia, capitol of ancient Abyssinia, to honor the memory of the church's founders. In 2009 the church established The Abyssinian (Aby) fund to partner with Ethiopian coffee growers in reducing poverty within Ethiopian farming communities.

In 1993 Abyssinian Baptist Church was designated as an official city landmark by the New York City Landmark Preservation Commission. Today the church continues to draw community residents and inquisitivetourists. LEGENDARY

Who Was Blatten Geta (Gentleman) Lorenzo Taezaz

He born in 1900 at Akele Guzay sub-region of the present Eritrea, then daughter colony of Italia In 1924, while on vacation in Aden, he met HRHRas Teferi Mekonnen, who was there on an official visit, and who encouraged him to go to Ethiopia. A year later, Lorenzo Taezaz went to Addis Ababa. Subsequently, Ras Teferi Mekonnen arranged for his education, and along with other Ethiopians, he sent him to France on a government scholarship. Lorenzo spent the n...ext eight years at the University of Montpelier where he completed his studies in Law and Philosophy. Apart from his native Tigrigna, he already spoke Amharic, Arabic and Italian, but Montpelier also provided him with an opportunity tomaster French and English.

He would go on to become an important diplomatic official for Ethiopia inthe next decades. He served as Emperor Haile Selassie's diplomatic representative during the Emperor's exile in Great Britain following the Second Italo-Ethiopian War, being the permanent delegate from Ethiopiato the League of Nations (LoN). After the restoration of the Imperial government, Lorenzo Taezaz serves in various positions as Minister of Foreign Affairs, Minister of Posts and Telegraph, and served inthe Imperial Ethiopian Senate as well.

The Guenete Leul Palace: renamed Ras Makonnen Hall of the AddisAbaba University (AAU).
The palace compound was originally known as Ras Makonnen Guibi, and was the city home of Ras Makonnen Wolde Mikael Gudisa. Upon the Ras's death it was inherited by his son Dejazatch Taffari Makonnen who later became the king of Ethiopia. The latter Emperor has built two palaces on the same property, the smaller Amsale Guenet (also known as Duke Bet and now the University Faculty of Law Building), and the larger Guene...teLeul Palace which gave its name to the entire complex.

The Amsale Guenet was initially built to host royal counterparts. The Italian Duke of Abruzzi was the first to stay there. Later, when the Guenete Leul was completed its first occupants were the visiting Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Sweden. The Emperor and his entire royal family moved into the Guenete Leul and it was the primary residence of the emperor for most of his reign. Unlike the Imperial (Menelik) Palace and Jubilee Palace, which were also properties of the royal family, the Guenete Leul Palace complex was the Emperor's own personally inheritedproperty.

During the Italian occupation of 1935 to 41 the Guenete Leul was used forofficial functions by the second Viceroy Marshal Rodolfo Graziani, and as the official residence of his successor Prince Amedeo Duke of De Aosta thethird Viceroy (the first Viceroy Marshal Pietro Badoglio was based out of the present Italian Embassy during his briefly term).

In December 1960 the Imperial bodyguards under Brigadier General Mengistu Neway and his younger brother Girmame Neway unsuccessfuly launched a coup to overthrow the Emperor while he was on a visit to 6heSouth America country of Brazil and detained some of the imperial government figures in the Green Saloon of the Guenete Leul palace. As the coup failed, Brigadier General Mengistu Neway and his younger brother machine gunned the held hostages in the Green Saloon by killingnearly 13 of the country's leading figures. As a result of the Green Saloonmassacre, the Emperor finally decided to move out and his official residence became the newer Jubilee Palace (today known as the National Palace). He donated the entire Guenete Leul Palace complex to the formerHaile Selassie I University (HSIU) which today commonly Known as the Addis Ababa University (AAU) to serve as its main campus premises.

Ethiopian Legends:

Who was Belay Zeleke of Bichena

Upon the Emperor Haile Selassie's victorious return to Ethiopia in May 1941, Belay Zeleke was put in charge of a small region in Gojam where hehad assumed a higher rank to be able to play a much bigger role in reconstructing and administering the region. He declined the position in protest and started living life as an outlaw. Soon he was caught and sent to jail accused of being a threat to the monarchy. Some members of the nobility who protested the actions taken on the patriot... and Ras Hailu of Gojam who was a well known nemesis of the emperor helped Belay Zeleketo escape during which time a police officer was killed. He was apprehended later and was executed by hanging with his brother Ejigu and 17 others who were his followers on January 12, 1945. Ras Hailu and the other nobles who helped Belay were immediately put on house arrest and their wealth confiscated by the government. His execution was bitterly received by many Ethiopians. In his honor Gojam road was namedafter him. Most Ethiopians admire him as a king.

ETHIOPIA'S CUISINE IN THE WORLD PRESS

How Old Is Ethiopian Cuisine and the unique way of eating it?

In the 19th Century, Americans often used the word "Ethiopian" to refer toAfricans and African-Americans, a habit that persisted into the early 20th Century. A Leavenworth, Kan., newspaper wrote in 1878 that "the Ethiopians used butter as food, although they are now said to use it for plastering their hair." And in 1914, a Chicago newspaper said that "even the ancient Ethiopians used butter as food." These items probably refer to Africans in general because foreigners tended to call the country Abyssinia in those times, even though the country never called itself that. And how odd that butter seemed to be such a popular topic for newspaper stories.

In 1903, some newspapers around the country published a patronizing story about eating customs in other countries, informing readers that "in Abyssinia, if you wish to be polite, you must smack your lips while you eat." Not very helpful, but historically interesting, I suppose. Those squibsdon't tell us much about Ethiopian cuisine. Fortunately, there are plenty more that do.

OUR REAL STORY BEGINS on April 25, 1868, when the readers of the Deseret News in Salt Lake

City, Utah, got a lesson in history, warfare, andEthiopian food. The newspaper published a vivid account of the British army's advance on the embattled Emperor Tewodros II, (known in Englishas Theodore), who had taken some British citizens hostage after being snubbed by Queen Victoria. His ego brought the ire of England down uponhim and ended with his suicide.
The newspaper story, based on an interview with British Gen. Robert Napier and his host (and collaborator), an Ethiopian prince named Kassai,eventually gets around to mealtime. The scene takes place in Kassai's tent, and I'll include, in brackets, the words for the items that the author merely describes:

Girls bearing large baskets of Abyssinian bread [injera] and curry [wot] came in and placed them on the ground in front of the visitors, who were requested to eat. The bread was brown, formed in flat circular cakes abouta foot in diameter, and had a slightly sour taste. Very little suffices to satisfy curiosity, although here it was permitted that each guest should help himself. In general, in Abyssinia, the servant who brings in the loavesand curry rolls some of the later in a piece of the former, and after kneading it into a ball, thrusts it into the mouth of each diner [gursha].
After enough had been eaten, other girls entered bearing huge bullock horns [wancha] filled with tedj [t'ej], a drink made from fermented honey.This tedj, or hydromel, was poured into Florence flasks [berele], and was given to each. It was expected that the recipient should bow towards the prince, and then empty his flask. No sooner, however, was the vessel emptied than it was seized by a watchful servant and again replenished.
Each had to drink several flasks of the liquor, which tasted not unlikesmall beer, but rather sour. After a while, when the flasks had been emptied, musicians were introduced.

Although the writer didn't name some of the elements of the meal, he gotthe details just right. Many other similar accounts would follow in newspapers across the country before, a century later, Americans had a chance to taste this "bread" and "curry" for themselves.

A few years earlier, Australian readers of the Sydney Morning Herald might have come across an Oct. 3, 1863, story about the enset plant – sometimes called the false banana – and its importance in Ethiopia where,"when cooked, it is the best of all vegetables, tasting like wheat bread, not perfectly baked. Like a turnip well boiled, if eaten with milk or butter, it is the best of all food, wholesome, nourishing and easily digested." This account comes from a passage in the five-volume 1770s account of the Scottish explorer James Bruce's trip to Ethiopia.

As Tewodros' life approached its end, the Halifax Morning Chronicle reported in August 1868, "he rarely partook of more than one meal a day,which consisted of su jera [injera], the pancake loaves made of the small seed of tefi [teff], and red pepper during fast days; of wot, a kind of currymade of fish, fowl or mutton, on ordinary days." The story also says he took to drinking heavily.

The Melbourne newspaper The Age had a long piece in 1868 about the British advance in Ethiopia, saying only this about food: "The troops…partook of plenteous if somewhat course hospitalities, consisting of curry, and sour bread, and acrid beer." Sounds like a typical (andunappreciated) meal of wot, injera and t'alla.
A correspondent for the New York Herald filed a story from Ethiopia in 1868 during the reign of Tewodros that many other newspapers also published. He talked mostly about the nation's quarrel with England, but he also presented Ethiopia as a land of enormous potential – if only it could develop its resources. "Vegetation never falls asleep in this happy climate," the writer says. "The natives sow barley in the beginning of May.In September, they sow wheat and teff, and if they have water, they repeat barley or tares in January."

The important detail here is the mention of teff, a grain virtually unknown to the world in the 19th Century but essential to Ethiopians for making injera. The Morning Chronicle of Halifax, Nova Scotia, published this articleand the next year ran a story called "An Abyssinian Feast" that was copious with detail about Ethiopian food.

Readers learned about t'ej, "a hard but stimulating liquor made by fermentation out of honey," and about "a strong though sour beer [t'alla] which they made from the dagousha [millet] grain." "Almost every event of life affords an excuse for excessive eating and drinking," the story goeson. "The materials of a grand banquet are simple: a good supply of cakesmade of teff wheat or dagousha meal, an abundance of raw meat, and after the eating is over, t'ej ad libitum." The story then describes the "death struggle" of the cattle as it's slaughtered for a feast, followed by the ritual (called qurt) of taking a long strip of raw meat and using a knifeto cut yourself chunks to swallow, unless "attentive servants cram [you] with large morsels as fast as, or faster than, [you] can swallow them."

"One who seems to have made himself at home in Abyssinia says that theraw beef is far tenderer than the most tender joint that has been hung a week in England," the story reports, "and certainly neither the rawness nor the quality taken seems to do much harm, unless the former be responsible for the prevalence of tapeworm." No doubt it is: Just imagine what readers in 1869 would have thought of this exotic spectacle.

AFTER THE SUICIDE OF TEWODROS and the war with the British, Yohannes IV became emperor of Ethiopia, serving until his death in 1889.But in 1878, he crowned Menelik, his future successor, king of the Ethiopian region of Shewa, thus ending a potentially destructive power struggle between the two for the Ethiopian throne.
To mark the occasion, Menelik threw himself a party, and the Montreal Daily Witness – which wrongly reported that Yohannes had resigned as emperor in favor of Menelik – provided details. The feast began with "twojars of a dreadful drinkable called t'ej, 50 loaves of bread, an antelope's horn filled with mingled salt and red pepper, and a live cow, which the escort at once slaughtered, piling up the meat before the visitors. The king's cook and taster followed with four dishes of curry." It was, in short,a typical imperial Ethiopian dinner.

The newspaper didn't seem to like t'ej, nor did The Boston Post in a disapproving 1898 story about Ethiopian customs. "Honey is a great product of this country," the story says. "Out of it is brewed an intoxicating drink called t'ej, in which women – as well as men – indulge to excess." The piece offered no more insight into Ethiopian food. The Deseret newspaper published another story in 1896 that added a detail toour impression of an Ethiopian meal: "The Abyssinians make a great dealof noise when they eat, and the bigger bite a man can take and the morenoise he makes chewing it, the more polite the man is thought to be."

The Evening Journal of Lewiston, Maine, published a story on Dec. 4, 1900, about an unnamed London correspondent's journey with Ras Makonnen and his army of 15,000 men marching east from Harar. The piece says nothing about food, except for this: "Mixed up in the crowd, too, were the Ras's t'ej brewers, a well-nourished party of women with large gombos of t'ej slung on their backs in long pieces of bright red cloth.As they struggled along in the midday sun, their burdens were unmistakably fermenting."

It's highly unlikely that a turn-of-the-century American reader would haveknown that t'ej was honey wine, or that a gombo is a large earthenware jar. In fact, the article feels excerpted from a long piece, meant only to give readers a feel for the adventure. Scribner's magazine published a very accurate and informative story in 1902 that describes Christmas dinner with the legendary Emperor Menelik II. The story begins with Menelik on his throne, "a large pile of flat bread" (injera) on a table to his right, and on his left, "tables set with massive silver knives and forks." The meal, says the unnamed writer, had many courses, some that Menelikate, and some that he didn't.

For the main course, an attendant held up "a great piece of raw beef, killed that morning, from which the guests cut strips with a sharp knife, and, placing each one in the mouth, cut off the remainder. Each person had a decanter of honey beer by his side.” After the guests dined, the soldiers waiting outside entered the room and took their meal in the sameway, except that they drank their “honey beer” from horn cups. They eachalso got “a small glass of arrack” before leaving.

This way of eating raw meat is called qurt, and by honey beer, I assumethe writer means t’ej, the Ethiopian honey wine. Best of all, he mentions*areqe* (or araki), which he calls arrack: It’s an Ethiopian grain alcohol, much like ouzo, impossible even now to get in the U.S. But there it was,more than a century ago, in an American magazine.

The emperor had been no less generous – and perhaps even more so – atChristmas on Sunday, Jan. 7, 1900, according to a holiday squib that appeared in the Meridian, Conn., Morning Record in December 1926. The meal was lavish and delectable: milk and rice soup, kabobs of lamb and potatoes, brown rolls, flat bread, honey beer, French claret, areqe, champagne, 12-year-old t'ej – and fried brains. The emperor also fed his 30,000 soldiers in two detachments. And then there was the weekly gebr (feast), according to a 1911 newspaper story, thrown by the new Ethiopian leaders for the people: Menelik, although still alive, had suffereda stroke in 1909, and a regency took over the government.

The menu, the story says, "is sprung as a surprise on the Caucasian whohas expected either the food of the primitive man or the concoctions of aFrench chef. There are six courses, but they do not vary much, the chiefingredient of all being the flesh of fowls. The white men use knives and forks, the Abyssinians are fed by slaves."

We soon get a closer look at the food, which isn't all fowl: Eight slaves work hard serving the diners "with great lumps of raw meat, with which they eat the leaves of a native vegetable, the anghera. They eat enormous quantities of both, drinking honey-water, the national beverage,out of gigantic horns." The t'ej, of course, is more than water, and of all the ways I've heard injera described, no one has ever called it a "native vegetable."

Readers of the Morning Herald in Sydney, Australia, got a quick nibble ofEthiopian food in a 1906 story about Arthur J. Hayes' book The Source ofthe Blue Nile. Hayes wrote about the culinary use of pepper, reporting that "this condiment is cooked with or added to every dish, and the natives, even the children, eat it in quantities which scorch the most hardened European gullet."

When John Quincy Wood returned home to Maine in 1914, after two yearsas consul general in Ethiopia, he talked to the Lewiston Evening Journal about his experiences. He recalled a banquet in honor of Iyasu, the late Emperor Menelik II's 18-year-old grandson, who was his designated heir but who never took the throne.

"The banquet consisted of plenty of t'ej, the native liquor, bread made from barley, and a piece of raw meat," he told the newspaper. "The love of the Abyssinian for raw meat is one of the interesting characteristics, and it is not strange that the most common ailment among these people is the tapeworm. In fact, they seem to entertain the idea that no man hasattained full and complete manhood until he has grown at least one."

Wood later talks more about t'ej, "the alcoholic beverage which is best known in Abyssinia. It is made of honey and water with some sort of leaf to bring about fermentation. At first it is a pleasant tasting beverage, butone tires of it. Another liquor that is common is made of barley."

His barley liquor is probably areqe, and the leaf is gesho, used to fermentand flavor t'ej. Careful newspaper readers in (of all places) Wyoming learned a little about t'ej in 1926 from an item called "Home Brew of Abyssinnia" published in The Sundance Times.

"A great quantity of beeswax is exported from Ethiopia, but the honey from which the wax is obtained is entirely consumed at home," the story says. "They make a drink of it called t'ej. The honey is squeezed from thecomb and allowed to ferment in goatskin containers. It is a home brew, but it has all the necessary 'kick.'"

An odd piece of writing from The American Weekly appeared in U.S. newspaper in 1926, and the Milwaukee Sentinel headlined it: "In the Nightmare Land of Abyssinia." The author, Rev. G.L. Morrill, a Minneapolispastor and "well-known world traveler," painted Ethiopia a land of "flies, fleas, vermin and smells beyond description," where "honesty is unknown,everyone believes in witchcraft, and nobody takes a bath."

It's no surprise, then, when he describes how his Ethiopian guide has a meal of "raw, bloody meat called brindo. My friend tore off pieces with hisfingers and devoured them with great gusto. The people look with contempt on people who cook meat. Next I cauterized my throat with a dish most diabolically dashed with pepper."

And yet, as a guest of a "millionaire war lord," the reverend seemedperfectly happy with his treatment: "His slaves served us t'ej and champagne, and he gave me a lion skin cape, shield and spear as souvenirs. I do not think I shall ever object to the Abyssinian law ofdetaining guests."

Readers of the Stanstead Journal in Rock Island, Quebec, witnessed quitea spectacle in a Feb. 11, 1926, story with the headline "Get Along WithoutFork in Abyssinia." At a banquet, "raw meat formed the menu," and as some foreign visitors sat on the ground, two servants entered bearing a sheep suspended from a long pole. The visiting men pulled out their knives and pulled off strips of flesh until they were satisfied. Little more than a skeleton remained when they had finished. The bone is held in the hand and with the knife a small piece of meat is loosened by a cut from the base of the chunk. The piece is not entirely severed, but remains attached at the tip. The loose end is then grasped by the teeth and the other end freed with a second upward cut. To an observer it appears that the diners are in constant and imminent danger of severing the ends of their noses.

A 1927 Associated Press story doesn't tell us much about what Ethiopiansate, but it does reveal that a meal with royalty in Ethiopia included dinnerand a movie. Ralph J. Totten, an American consul general in Africa at the time, enjoyed three meals at the emperor's palace in Ethiopia with Tafari Makonnen, who then held the title of ras – a regional governor, or "princeregent," as the story says – and would later become Emperor Haile Selassie.

The only food mentioned is fruit, but "each time, his fruit was served on a solid silver plate, inlaid with American gold and silver coins, so arranged that both sides of the pieces might be seen." The plate was part of a set of25, each one with coins from a dinner guest's homeland. After dinner, using "an excellent projector and an operator to run it," Tafari showed films of Emperor Menelik, some scenes of his own recent European tour, and "a number of topical films and reels of important events."

BEGINNING IN THE 1930S, newspapers across the country began to publish more frequent stories written by correspondents for The Associated Press and other wire services, all of which certainly gave Americans their first taste of Ethiopian food. Haile Selassie became emperor in November 1930, an event that occasioned international coverage. And in 1935, when Italy invaded Ethiopia, the world's fascination with the country exploded – along with an indignation thatstopped short of sending troops to help the Ethiopians.

At the emperor's 1930 coronation, The Associated Press report began withthe meal: "Thousands of dusky-faced Abyssinians, returning to their homes in the African brush, boasted of feasting on raw meat with their emperor, Ras Tafari, newly crowned as Emperor Haile Selassie I, Lord King of Kings of Ethiopia."

In a large banquet pavilion, the guests – some of whom had traveled for days to be there – "ate chunk after chunk of dripping red meat. Unlimitedquantities of native wine were furnished as an indispensable part of the festival." This must surely have been t'ej. Feeding all of those people tooktime, and as the revelers grew impatient, "they attempted to storm the portals, and tribal policemen beat them back, lashing them unmercifully with whips. But in the end food was brought and no one went hungry."

To Americans, this must have sounded like a cacophony. And it gets evenbetter. "At one end of the huge enclosure, there was an odor of freshly slaughtered animals," the piece goes on, "while elsewhere there was the strong aroma of spices and sauces. The native Ethiopian likes nothing so much as his raw meat. All, however, are afflicted with tapeworms from eating uncooked viands. To best the parasites, they take a bitter herb called dekosia." (Actually, it's called koso.)

And finally: “At dusk, the banqueters, having eaten well but none toowisely, lay along the roadside like helpless derelicts.”

They don’t write ’em like that any more. The Washington, D.C., newspaper the Afro-American also covered the coronation, describing “thegreat banquet of raw meat and wine,” with animals killed “on the spot” and “passed to the 25,000 reveling guests.”

But in a passage that has nothing to do with food, the newspaper, which served the black community, provides a fascinating lesson on history andculture. The reporter, who isn’t named, describes “the surprise of white Americans who had come expecting Emperor Selassie I to be a Jew and his subjects white. Instead, they found the Abyssinians such colored folk as live all over the south.” The reporter proudly witnessed “kinky-haired, thick-lipped Negroes walking proudly through palace and street, their patriotic and warlike spirit an evidence of 15,000 years of independence.”The language may be dated, and that number overstated, but the writer’sjoy at seeing an independent black nation certainly is not.

In March 1930, the Los Angeles Times published a piece written by Violet Cressy Marcks, the “first white woman to cross Ethiopia,” the headline says. The emperor granted her permission, provided her with transport, and fêted her at a dinner party, where “everything mirrored modern civilization. The French cuisine, champagne and wine were as good as anything procurable in Europe, and the dinner table appointments were inexcellent taste.” She failed to mention whether she ate any real Ethiopianfood.

A year later, to mark the anniversary of his coronation, the emperor threwanother “banquet of raw meat” for 10,000 people, and many newspapers covered it, albeit in shorter form. But did the new monarch grow more paternal during his first year in office? A 1931 Associated Press article reports that as the editor of a newspaper he owned in Addis Ababa, he had begun to write “vigorous personal editorials against t’ej, the native home brew, charging that the drink harms his younger subjects.” He said that “drink shops should be forbidden as they are a source of all sins,” patterning themselves on American establishments, and employing “musicand dancing partners to lure young men.”

Haile Selassie’s 16-year-old son, Asfa Wosen, visited London in 1932, anda detailed United Press story revealed his dining habits: “For breakfast, the entire party showed a distinct prejudice for porridge. Usually they hadthree helpings all around and then started on the bacon and eggs, which the prince relished and which he insisted on eating with a spoon. He scorned to use knives or forks.” This makes sense: In Ethiopia, people douse spoons for soupy dishes, but for everything else, it’s nature’s fork.

In 1933, the young emperor attended a state dinner in neighboring BritishSomaliland (now Somalia). It was a Friday – a fasting day for Ethiopian Christians – so the menu had no meat, just “eggs, fish, vegetable curry, asparagus, plum tart and cheese,” The Milwaukee Journal reported.
Unfortunately, fasting means no eggs, cheese, butter or lard, leaving theemperor to dine on only “the lettuce under the eggs, the fish, curry and fruit on the tart.”

But here’s the good part: Ethiopians like their food spicy hot, and when the British hosts heard this, they pointed the Ethiopians to some bottles ofTabasco sauce at the table. One of them tried it and, “raising his eyebrowsto the ceiling in ecstasy,” decided that it was well worth giving up meat forsuch a fiery concoction. His countrymen soon tried it for themselves.

When Haile Selassie’s son-in-law, the Ethiopian ambassador to the U.S., dined with newly inaugurated President Franklin Delano Roosevelt on July2, 1933, the president’s housekeeper/chef, Henrietta Nesbitt – who wouldbecome known to all (and reviled by FDR) for her bland meals – faced a diplomatic crisis: She learned (by looking it up) that Ethiopian Christians “eat no meat, butter, cheese or any product of animal food,” she wrote inher 1948 memoir (later reported in a newspaper story).

So after sussing out this cultural dilemma, she came up with a menu. “I [used] peanut oil, even for the rolls, and olive oil for frying, and a sherbetdessert, which eliminated the use of cow’s milk,” she wrote. “The Abyssinians sat down to melon, clam cocktail, saltines, stuffed olives, ripeolives, prime filet of bluefish, grilled tomatoes, Mexican corn, molded potatoes, cucumber and cress salad, beaten biscuits, pineapple ice, stuffed dates, ripe figs and coffee.”

How it didn’t dawn on her that clams and bluefish are “animal food” is anyone’s guess – and may well explain why FDR hated her cooking (muchto Eleanor’s contrivance and delight). Lucky for her, fish is permissible during fasting periods. A squib in the Glasgow Herald on Aug. 23, 1935, reported on a banquet that the emperor threw for the visiting British cabinet. It began at 11 a.m. and lasted all day, and “in this ancient manner the emperor and his people celebrate the end of their 16-day fast,during which they have eaten only fruit and dried peas, not even bread being allowed to pass their lips.” (Ethiopian religious fasts really aren’t that abstemious.)
Another AP report, set in 1935, begins with a crisp lead that would certainly have provoked the interest of American readers: “Three thousand dusky warriors ate raw meat dipped in red pepper and drankhoney beer in the compound of the imperial palace today as guests of Emperor Haile Selassie on this Ethiopian new year’s day,” wrote H.R. Knickerbocker, a reporter for William Randolph Hearst’s long-gone International News Service.

United Press covered the same event, calling it a “raw meat festival,” or*guebbeur* – the Amharic word for feast (better spelled gebr). “The warriors dashed up to the freshly slaughtered carcasses and with their razor-sharp knives slashed great chunks of beef from the warm flanks,”the story reported. “They cut these chunks into long strips, put the endsin their mouths, and with their knives snipped off edible portions.” This again is the ritual known as qurt.

The Age, an Australian newspaper, added to our impression of how Ethiopians eat, albeit with a bit of skepticism. Describing qurt in a 1935 story, a source told the newspaper: “One slashes as fearlessly as one can,considering that the custom is that the last cut be upward and towards theface.” So far, so good. But then the newspaper adds: “There is a story that [the women’s] maids feed them like babies, mashing their food into apaste and pushing it into their mistresses’ mouths. But it is only a story after all.” It’s also called gursha, and it’s a true story.

A month later, The Associated Press witnessed a similar feast: “Fifty thousand fierce warriors gorged themselves with raw meat before Emperor Haile Selassie today,” the Oct. 28, 1935, story said, “but the littleemperor ate none. Instead, he dallied with a plate of vegetables and sipped a glass of tea to show the fighters that he was with them.” It took 312 cows to feed the army.

Newspapers didn’t print many stories about Ethiopia’s role in bringing the coffee to the world. Here are two squibs: One from 1946 (l), one from 1953. Another informative AP story comes from “Mekelle, Italian OccupiedTerritory,” and must have been written shortly after the Oct. 3, 1935, Italian invasion of Ethiopia, which led to a five-year occupation of the country. Makale (or Mekele) is in a northern Ethiopian region called Tigray, where Tigrinya is the dominant language. The Italians invaded from Eritrea, Ethiopia’s northern neighbor, which had been an Italian colony for decades by the 1930s.

The article taught Americans about many aspects of daily life in Ethiopia,including the way Ethiopians eat, cooking on ovens of hard-packed mud covered by a hood of thorn bushes.

“The Ethiopians eat well, but hot,” the writer says. “The food served to uswas good – if you had a tongue of asbestos. Otherwise, it was so highly spiced that each mouthful must be accompanied by a drink of water.”
Hard to say if the food was “hot” by the standards of today’s more experienced foodies, or whether the meals we get in America today havetamped things down considerably (probably a little of both).
Visiting a home in the community where he’d landed, the reporter dined on a chicken dish that he called zigniy, the Tigrinya word for the Amharic wot (a spicy stew). Their hostess, “a grinning, good-natured woman whodid her best to make herself understood in the one language she knew, said that she had put in only a few peppers. But she had evidently put in10 times too many. Each mouthful made us gasp.”

The writer then goes on to describe the breads of Ethiopia, which he seemed to enjoy much more. He tried bakuta, made of flour and water, then baked on an open fire; gera, “a slab an inch thick and two feet in diameter and usually ornamented with designs”; and taff, a thin rubberykind of bread that flops and flaps like a thirsty dog’s tongue.”

Of course, what he calls taff is the bread we know as injera. It’s made of the grain called teff, so he must have misunderstood what his hostess toldhim when he asked the name of the bread. Gera sounds suspiciously like an ambasha, a big round festive leavened bread, although it could also bea short form of mugera, a bread more common in Ethiopia’s southern Oromo cultures. As for bakuta, that one has me stumped, but from his description, it sounds like a basic leavened Ethiopian dabo (bread).

Finally, he got around to beverages: “The drink is either tez, which is thestrong potion – not so strong at that – made of honey and water fermented, or suwa, a kind of beer made with dark grain.” This tez is our t’ej, although it’s odd that he uses the Amharic word and not mes, the Tigrinya word. Yet he does say suwa, the Tigrinya word for homemade Ethiopian beer, which is t’alla in Amharic.

This article ran in newspapers as far east as South Carolina, which today has only two Ethiopian restaurants, and as far west as Wyoming, which still has none. No doubt even more newspapers published the wire servicestory as a worried world watched Italy’s invasion of the never-colonized historic nation.

An AP squib a few days before Christmas in 1935 reported that to celebrate St. Michael’s Day, “Ethiopians are going on a diet of cereals andwater for a week.” These cereals were probably different types of porridge, like genfo or chiko. The abuna – that is, the bishop of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church – declared: “Let no animal be slaughtered, nomeat eaten, no t’alla [beer] or aromatic alcohol be drunk.” The order, theAP noted, also “solves the problem of providing meat for the soldiers.”

The fiery berbere of Ethiopian food did more than just nourish. In 1936, aUPI story reported that Ethiopians could carry 100 pounds of goods for 20miles, all because “we eat much pepper and that makes us gobuz (muscular),” an Ethiopian man told a reporter. “If you would eat red pepper every day, you would become gobuz, too.” To which the reporter adds: “But most foreigners, after a taste of the red pepper, prefer to remain puny.”

At the time of the Italian invasion, many Ethiopian women volunteered tofight. The men didn't permit them in battle, so the women made food forthe soldiers. (See photo below.)

"Willing hands turned to the task of baking millet bread, or enjera, and spicy raw meat for the fierce warriors at the front," the Associated Press reported on Nov. 2, 1935. "Native housetops over Addis Ababa were plastered with huge pieces of the bread, looking for all the world like giantpancakes. When the sun had dried them, they were ground into meal which can be preserved for many months, furnishing 'iron rations' for the army in compact form."

A Sept. 23, 1935, story written by Dr. John Melly, a British medical workerin the country, reports that "a handful of grain will feed a man for several days, and for a more substantial meal he can kill the game with which the country abounds and eat it as he likes it – raw!" The Cambridge graduate benevolently commends these fighters, calling them "the most surprisinglyintelligent and resourceful of all the black races."

And what of t'ej, the 2,000-year-old Ethiopian honey wine? Some of thesestories from the 1930s took note, but in 1932, in a piece from the city of Dire Dawa, the Associated Press focused on Ethiopian potent potables. "Tasting more like sauterne or hard cider, t'ej has the potency of Kentuckymoonshine. Americans who have tasted t'ej say it is a little like liquid dynamite." The story also mentions t'alla, a homemade beer that is "muchstronger and more acrid than American beer."

The reporter drank t'ej from a ram's horn, and he notes that "no native would think of offering his guest a drink of t'ej without taking the first siphimself. This is to prove to his visitor that the wine is not poisoned!" At the emperor's palace, they dispense t'ej from "enormous containers withtaps, the vessels resembling American lemonade coolers."

The Ottawa Citizen sent a reporter to Ethiopia in 1935, and just seven days after the Italian invasion, he filed a detailed (if quirky) report on thelife of a typical Ethiopian family, including some rarely reported details.
"The only reason they don't keep the pig in the parlor," Robinson MacLean's story begins, "is that they don't have the pig or the parlor." Thefamily he visited lived in a tukul – a thatched hut – which explains the lackof a parlor. But MacLean never does tell us that Ethiopian Christians and Moslems don't eat pork. Soon we see the wife of the family – the couple is Tafara and Birrkay – "mashing red peppers with a big stone mortar," obviously making berbere(unnamed in the story). She throws the peppers "into the wot or stew that's bubbling in the dist, which is an earthenware pot the size of a big wash basin and is propped up on three rocks over a little pile of smokeyeucalyptus splinters in the back room."

At dinner, "Birrkay hands [Tafara] a gemasha or half-circle of the flabby gray injera or bread she baked over the splinters that morning. Then she lifts the stew off the stove, and the grownups gather round, dunking their supper with Birrkay eating hers out of the chilfa or ladle." Soon, the adultsdrink coffee out of "handleless china cups" (sini, again unnamed). The children get no coffee.

On Christmas Eve in 1945, readers of the El Paso Evening Post heard some exotic tales from a local woman who traveled around Ethiopia, where she ate "habash a wat, a dish of rice, chicken, eggs and chili sauce,and a liquor made from honey and called t'ej." That oddly named dish sounds like doro wot.

Ottawans learned more about Ethiopia in 1951 when Frank Patton, a local man, gave a talk about his two years there working as an educator. "Sinceraw meat is eaten on feast days, almost everyone has a pet tapeworm," he said. "Each month they take a day off to deal with this tapeworm and brew a kind of tea out of leaves for a cure." Some people, though, use a riskier method: They drink gasoline that they "beg from filling stations."

The next year, the Evening Journal of Lewiston, Maine, published a four- paragraph Associated Press story about Ethiopians who drink gasoline to rid themselves of tapeworms. The Health Ministry advised against it – "gasoline is poison and inflammable and should never be drunk in place ofmedicine" – and recommended "a substitute made from berries for gasoline addicts."

The Milwaukee Sentinel published a big spread on Feb. 2, 1936, that reproduced (in black and white) a colorful multi-panel painting on tannedanimal skin that depicts the legendary meeting of King Solomon and Queen Makeda – or the Queen of Sheba as we know her.
The land of Sheba (or Saba), the myth says, was ancient Ethiopia, and this meeting, which took place about 1000 B.C., forms the cornerstone ofEthiopian lore. From the conjugation of the two monarchs came the childMenelik, whose gene pool began the Solomonic Dynasty of emperors thatended in 1974 with the death of Haile Selassie.
The newspaper's elaborate tale recounts the history of Solomon and Makeda and describes some of the images in the painting. One panel, the story says, shows Solomon "holding a meeting of his cabinet at a banquet,and they have an abundance to eat and drink." In fact, two panels show the meal (see images below), and several more of the earlier panels showpeople with t'ej, which Makeda gave to Solomon as a gift.

But archaeologists now seem certain that the land of Sheba was on the Arabian peninsula in Yemen, and they can't trace t'ej back any further than about 2,000 years to the ancient Aksumite Empire, which really wasthe proto-Ethiopia. So the images and the story are simply lore – the Ethiopian version of George Washington's moment of truthiness when heconfessed to cutting down the apple tree.

(An 1891 article in the Evening News of San Jose., Calif., mentions "the world-renowned spices which the Queen Balkis, of Abyssinia, flung at thefeet of King Solomon." This "Balkis" should be Bilkis, the Arabic name forQueen Makeda.)

And here's a curious true story: Mrs. Della Hanson of Hutchinson, Minn., was a missionary in Ethiopia when the Italians invaded, but she didn't leave the country. The emperor returned in 1941, and three years later, aUPI story says, "the gray-haired, middle-aged" lady soon became the emperor's housekeeper, introducing him to "yank cooking" – and he likedit.

Among his favorites: strawberry tarts and lemon pie. She also introduced him to planked steaks, apple pie, cold cuts, angel food cake, and even a little ice cream. Mrs. Hanson supervised the palace's five cooks, "introducing them to such strange dishes as potato salad." The emperor must have liked her work, for 10 years later, the August 1954 issue of Good Housekeeping magazine featured her with a story. She returned to America in 1955 and settled down with her husband, Herbert, to co-author*For God and Emperor*, a book about their lives in Ethiopia.

Newspaper readers got a sip of t'ej in a 1955 news wire story about the way diplomats in Washington, D.C., tend to over-imbibe. "The eye- opening mixture offered at the Ethiopian embassy topped everything," theglorified gossip columnists wrote. "A sweet-tasting brew known as 'mead' is made of honey, barley and Ethiopian hops. It's one of the most powerfuldrinks in the world and dates back to biblical times. After a few gulps, several of the guests weren't quite sure what century they were in."

The writers' naïveté almost makes it sound like "mead" existed nowhereelse in the world, and they never use the name t'ej. Perhaps they were teetotalers (and therefore bad journalists). The party also featured mulmul, described as "spicy minced meat rolled in a thin bread." In fact,mulmul is a type of Ethiopian bread, so the writers may have misunderstood what their source told them (or else they'd enjoyed too much t'ej after all).

A few months later, the same pair of columnists wrote a little moreaccurately about the cuisine.
“Hint to housewives,” they said, ever so colloquially, “the fad in capitalfood these days seems to be spicy dishes, and the hotter the better.
Madame Yilma Deressa, wife of the Ethiopian ambassador, will testify to this. Other day she whipped a huge batch of special curry sauce to go withlamb and chicken for an embassy party celebrating Emperor Haile Selassie’s coronation 25 years ago.”

She worried that it might be too hot, but “every last morsel was scooped up before the reception was half over.” A U.S. diplomat’s wife even askedher hostess, “But couldn’t it have been a wee bit hotter?”

The hostess also had “cases” of t’ej, which she thought would be enough for her guests. But “the heavy drinkers went through the supply as fast asthe gourmands leveled the buffet table. Then there was nothing to do but ask for Scotch.”

Even the humorist Art Buchwald took an interest in Ethiopian food, although not a serious one. In a 1957 piece ribbing the English and the French about their eating habits – the former take their sweets before the cheese, and the latter take theirs after – a haughty Frenchman wonders how the Ethiopians do it. So Buchwald sojourns to the Ethiopian embassyin Paris for a chat with a faux attaché.

The gentleman, polite to a fault, says he prefers cheese before sweets, and while he has never dined with the ambassador, “I can say there are some people in the embassy who eat the meat course after the dessert.”

We know this is a joke because, of course, there is no dessert in Ethiopiancuisine.

Just don’t tell that to Erwin Faller, an American who served the emperorfor three years and worked in the royal kitchen as a pastry chef at the 1930 coronation. The emperor, it seems, had a sweet tooth, and Faller had the job of satisfying it.

In 1965, when he was a chef at the Virginia Museum of Fine Arts, Faller talked to The Associated Press about his time in Ethiopia. For regular banquets, he served “hors d’oeuvres, soup, fish, three meat courses with a different vegetable for each course, dessert, coffee and liqueurs,” with adifferent wine for each course as well. He doesn’t say anything about Ethiopian cuisine, but those meat dishes with vegetables could have been*wots* of some sort.

Faller also created special imperial desserts for the leader of a country who's cuisine has no tradition of eating sweets. His most elaborate confection: one pound of creamery butter, one pound of confectioners sugar, eight eggs, vanilla, and a quarter pound of hard dark chocolate, all whipped together in a mixer on high speed. When it's blended, it goes into pastry shells and later gets topped with a whipped cream rosette, amaraschino cherry and a mint leaf.

He served this rich treat at the emperor's coronary – that is, the coronation – and he called it a Swiss chocolate tart. I can't imagine whatyou'd call it in Amharic.

WHAT IMPRESSION DID READERS in St. Petersburg, Fla., get in 1961 when the local Times published a story about two residents who did eight years of missionary work in an Anuak village in western Ethiopia? The Anuaks are a cultural group whose lives differ greatly from much of the rest of the country. "Tribesmen suffer from malnutrition and eat cold corn meal mush 365 days a year," the story says, without naming the food. It'scalled kwon in the Anuak language, and it is indeed the culture's staple meal. Anuaks hunt wild game – antelope, water buffalo, gazelle – and especially enjoy young giraffe meat if they can get it, the story says. The Anuaks also live by rivers and catch fish, but the story doesn't mention that. So it's accurate, but it hardly describes typical Ethiopian cuisine.

ETHIOPIA DORO WOT: is made up of 4 sliced onions with bit of water in apan. Add 2 teaspoon Berbere (ground red pepper), 1 teaspoon tomato paste, 1/2 black pepper. Cook 15 minutes over low heat. Add butter, stir 10 minutes. Add cut-up roasting chicken, Cook for 20 minutes. Add 1 teaspoon salt, 2 c. hot water, simmer for 15 minutes. Serve with hard boiled eggs.

The next year, though, the St. Petersburg daily published another article from Ethiopia, only this time, it described the national cuisine. Written by Ben F. Carruthers, the lengthy "Ethiopia, Imperial Kaleidoscope" describedmany aspects of Ethiopian life, including its traditional food. He dines in a very contempopary-sounding tukul, a traditional thatch-roof hut. But this one, still conical in shape, "had an interior fitted out like a huge parlor with colorful matted rugs and highly polished floors."

The meal began with a hand-washing ceremony, and then the food arrivedin covered mesobs, the large colorful baskets used as tables. The server removed the covers "to reveal several layers of huge, gray, spongy pancakes covering the top of the table. This is injera, on which she pours several varieties of wot, a spicy stew made of beef with vegetables and peppers (mildest), chicken instead of beef (spicier) and lamb (spiciest). Toeat, one tears off a chunk of injera and dips it in the wot of his preference.Very filling and a pleasant adventure."

He had a more Western meal at the San Giorgio restaurant in Asmara, Eritrea, which was then a part of Ethiopia. The entree was a chicken roasted inside a clay pot, with spicy gravy made from the giblets, and allof it served over rice or millet. The meal came to the table in the pot, "piping hot from the oven. The diner breaks the clay with a mallet and outcomes one of the finest roast chickens he has ever tasted!"

The Steinbach, Manitoba, cultural event of the season for 1961 must havebeen the dinner party thrown by Mr. and Mrs. Allan Kliewer. Rather than serving Canadian roast beef or chicken, they prepared an Ethiopian meal like the kind they had as missionaries in Africa. They called the dish injerana cutlets, made up of "three Ethiopian spices" (which the Kliewers brought with them from Ethiopia), pea flour, onions, garlic salt, "rancid butter" and red pepper. "The stew, served with a cooked egg, was eaten not with a fork or spoon but with a pancake rolled up and dipped into the stew," the Carillon reported. The presence of the egg tells us it's doro wot,and the pea powder must have been shiro. Mr. Kliewer also said the blessing in "the Ethiopian language."

That same year, the Globe-Gazette of Mason, Iowa, had a piece by Mr. and Mrs. T.G. Burns, local residents visiting the "dark continent" and sending home dispatches. They had attended the dedication of a modern marketplace in Addis Ababa. "Wot, the Ethiopian national food of chicken and pepper sauce," they wrote, "is dipped up with a circular cake of breadcalled injera, all this to the accompaniment of much shouting and bargaining."

In another Associated Press article from Ethiopia in 1962, the table turnedjust a bit: "Cabinet ministers in Ethiopia," the story begins, "are awakening to the sudden realization that their wives can cook."

This piece goes on to tell the story of Pearl Campbell, a librarian for the United States Information Service in Addis Ababa, and her efforts to organize American-style women's clubs for middle-class wives who, in Ethiopia, came from comfortable families that could afford to have a cookin their homes, so the women never learned to cook for themselves.

At weekly meetings hosted by Campbell, the women took surreptitious cooking lessons, unsure of whether their husbands would approve. "The maids just about had a fit," the story says. "It wasn't proper for women ofsuch distinction to do menial work."

After several weeks of lessons, the Etham (Ethiopian-American) Women'sClub prepared a banquet for their husbands, sending them invitations andsettling on a color scheme of silver and purple, something like what “Mrs.Kennedy had at the White House,” Campbell said. The women made “a traditional Ethiopian dish” – Campbell doesn’t name it, but you can bet it was doro wot – “and supplemented it with American roast beef, mixed salad, hot rolls and ice cream.”

An intriguing articled appeared in American newspapers in 1962 under theheadline: “Statement That Ethiopian Women Lack Culinary Talents Riles Housewives.” It seems that Alexander Bodi, publisher of the Palo Alto Daily Times, visited Ethiopia and came to the conclusion that upper-classwomen couldn’t cook because they had too many servants (as if wealthywomen in America don’t). He also mentioned Pearl Campbell’s club that taught privileged Ethiopian women how to cook.

So on the front page of the English-language Sunday Ethiopian Herald, published in Addis Ababa, Alefelege Selam wrote a piece defending his countrywomen and calling Bodi’s statements “misleading and inimical to relations between Ethiopian and U.S. women.” The sole copy of the wire service article I could find is short and doesn’t talk specifically about food.

But Michael F. Silberstein does in “Safari into Understanding,” a column that appeared in The Times of San Mateo, Calif., in 1962. He writes abouthis visit to Ethiopia and reflects on Emperor Haile Selassie, whom he wrongly says attained power in a coup d’etat in 1931 (it was 1930, and heascended to the throne).

On a trip to Jimma with his Crossroads group, Silberstein dined at the home of a grandson of the region’s former king. The meal included “false banana bread, stuffed potatoes, raw sweet potatoes and roasted corn,” allof which he refers to as “common Ethiopian dishes” – which they are not, except perhaps for the “false banana,” by which I assume means qocho made from enset, which is more common in southern regions of the country.

He does go on to describe wot, “a stew-like dish, usually made with meator vegetables, highly spiced and of thin consistency,” and injera, “made from fermented grain, a large pancake about two and a half feet in diameter with somewhat the consistency of sponge rubber. Rather sour intaste, it served as napkin, bread, fork and spoon.” He also enjoyed “someof the best t’ej I had ever tasted,” and he calls these three items the “staples of the Ethiopian diet, comprising at least one meal a day for every Ethiopinan.”

A tiny squib in a 1963 edition of the News-Sentinel in Lodi, Calif., declaresin its headline: “Chicken Is Staple Food In Ancient Ethiopia.” What soundslike the story of 2,000-year-old Ethiopian cuisine simply says that Ethiopians eat chicken, and then it offers an Americanized recipe for doro wot (without naming it).

The Los Angeles Times published a story in October 1964 about a charityrun by an Ethiopian princess in Addis Ababa, and it ends with this teaser:"In addition, the [organization] runs a restaurant not only as a money- making venture but to afford tourists an opportunity to enjoy injera and wot, the authentic Ethiopian food."
Nine months later, in July 1965, the LA Times interviewed Bereket Hapte-Selassie, an Ethiopian cabinet officer who had just completed a year in residence at UCLA. He doesn't discuss cuisine, but he does talk about America's preoccupation with materialism, something he even noted at the evening meal.

"When I try to turn the conversation to issues that are universal and vital,they always change the subject to something trivial," he observed of his American friends. "The conversation at the table frequently has to do withfood. This is another indication to me of the preoccupation with material well being. At home in Ethiopia, or in Europe, the dinner table is the center of intellectual activity. Here, food seems to be important."

When Mrs. Jack Farrar of Quanah, Texas, traveled around the world in 1963, she sent home dispatches in the form of letters, which the Quanah Tribune-Chief published in a series of articles. In Ethiopia, she ate "a platefull of injera topped with wot, meat (we had chicken) in a very very hot red pepper sauce – hotter than the hottest Mexican food and very strong with spices," she told the newspaper.

That same year, John McCormally of the Salina Journal in Kansas took part in a State Department program to help newspapers in other countries. He went to Addis Ababa, where he wrote a series of columns, and one piece revolved around his stay at the elegant Ras Hotel, formerlyan imperial palace.

"I've tried the wot and injera," he wrote, "the Ethiopian meal of thin, gray,rubbery strips of pastry, spread with portions of lamb, beef and pork, highly seasoned enough to shock a Mexican, and which can be survived only if quickly washed down with t'ej, the deceptively smooth wine made of honey." It's unlikely that he ate pork wot: I'd guess it was just well- disguised (to Western eyes) chicken.

"But such risks aren't necessary," he went on. "There are bacon and eggs for breakfast, if you want them, and corn flakes with bananas; thin but well-treated steaks; and I even had Irish stew for lunch." Ethiopia becamea common destination for Peace Corps volunteers in the 1960s, and everytown that saw one of its citizens travel to the country got a lesson in its culture and cuisine.

The Bakersfield Californian published a lengthy article in 1963 that described a banquet for 1,500 guests of an African summit that began with a fireworks display. Then came the food: caviar, courses of Ethiopianand European food, French wine and t'ej served in crystal goblets. The entertainment for the night was the popular South African singer, Miriam Makeba, whom the emperor had flown in for the gathering.

The home brew "tej" of Abyssinia

A great quantity of beeswax is exported from Abyssinia, but the hony fromwhich the Wax is obtained is entirely consumed at home. They make a drink of it called "Tej". The Abyssinian beehive is a long cylinderical basketwhich is surpended from the trees. A little honey is placed in it in the first Place and soon the bees take possession of it and proceed to fill the basket. The honey is squeezed from the comb and allowed to ferment in goat skin (locally known as Silicha) containers. It is a home-brew, but it has all the necessary "kick".

"The legend Queen Sheeba, Makeda in her other name presents king Solomon With some home brewed "tej", and so he thanks her by throwinga banquet in her honor." Benton Harbor, Mich., got its Peace Corps reportin 1965 from a woman who ate injera and wot, "a hot spicy stew with a flat spongy bread that you dip into the stew. It is good but really HOT!

You eat this without silverware. We drank coffee, which is made on a small charcoal stove inside the house. It is made by crushing the coffeebeans and roasting them on an open fire."

A few months before the country got its first Ethiopian restaurant, reader of the Daily Journal in Ukiah, Calif., got a nice account of a meal from Kate Dietterle, a local resident living in Ethiopia with her husband, who had joined the Peace Corps. She described eating injera with wot, "highly spiced, and a gastronomic holocaust." Their chef, who used to cook for theItalians, "made ours ferenj style, easy on the red peppers. Actually, it wasdelicious, but not so good for my tummy." It's not clear whether she knew ferenj meant "foreigner," or if she thought it was an Ethiopian cooking technique.

And in the well-educated Bennington, Vt., the city's Peace Corps volunteerbrought home spicy mealtime tales, "since peppers are one of the main crops," the Bennington Banner wrote. "The first year we made regular trips to Addis Ababa, where we could buy American food," John Schafer, aYale graduate, told the newspaper in 1966. "We felt we had to have our peanut butter and corn flakes, but we got to eating Ethiopian food more and more. I could never face wot for breakfast, however." He then described "a large round unleavened bread" – without naming it (althoughhe does say it's made of teff). "It looked like a napkin," he said, "and since they folded it up and laid it beside the plate, we used to laugh abouteating the paper napkin. But it was good."

Then there's the story of Richard Lipez, a 24-year-old Peace Corps volunteer in Ethiopia from Pennsylvania who told his tale to The Associated Press in 1963. He had never been farther east than Rhode Island before his trip, but in Ethiopia, "Richard now eats a native dish thatfeatures fat pussy cats as its main ingredient – and loves every minute ofhis new life."
I must say that's a new one. Of course, Lipez did grow up to publish mystery novels under the name Richard Stevenson. So it could be one ofhis early tales (or tails). The story, based on his letters home, tells us more about Lipez's culinary adventures in Ethiopia.

"New variations on the daily staple – injera and wot – are introduced," he write. "This age-old dish is a terrifying assault on one's innards by tomatoes, peppers, eggs, chickens, sheep's intestines, a murky sponge- like bread and a few fat pussy cats. There are no eating utensils. You simply tear off a piece of the bread – injera – and slop it around in a bit ofthe common wot bowl. I have gotten to the point where I can eat the stuffand manage a feeble grin. The wot is so hot that you are obliged to wash every bite down with a swig of t'ej – a honey wine – which makes one's ears drop off."

He offers no more detail on his odd feline cuisine.
Milwaukee got an early taste of Ethiopian food in 1958 in a story about anItalian woman from the Eritrean city of Massawa who married a local man and moved to America. She talks a little about Ethiopian food – Eritrea was part of Ethiopia at the time – describing "zighini, a kind of stew cooked with beef, chicken or fish and potatoes with the tongue-searing berbere or red pepper. This is complemented with a gray bread about the color and consistency of sponge rubber, and pock marked, made with sourmilk. About a foot and a half in diameter, it's baked in fragrant eucalyptusleaves."(Five years earlier, an Ethiopian official – well-versed in international cuisine, and studying municipal government in Milwaukee – told a newspaper that he's never seen his native cuisine being prepared: "The servant do the cooking, but our food is very good. It is mainly lamb, beef, chicken and fruits.")

In 1965, a group of church women in Milwaukee decided to have an African-themed festival that featured some iffy Ethiopian elements. They did some research and found that "a spicy sauce containing beef cubes and served on noodles was the Ethiopian main dish, meat wot. This was accompanied by a tossed salad of cabbage, celery and canned pineapple moistened with seasoned salad dressing," an article in the Milwaukee Journal explained. One hostess concluded that "cabbage, spinach and kalewere likely candidates for a salad in Africa, but no lettuce." The newspaperthen printed the complete "formula" for the beef dish (above left).

Things got a little clearer for Milwaukee in 1970 when a writer for the Sentinel talked with Monica

Bayley, a former resident of the city and author of a book on African cooking that she researched in Africa. She describes injera and the manner of eating, but she also says Ethiopians eat a lot of yams. This is true among some Ethiopian cultures, but yams aren't a part of the national cuisine. The story says that "Africans cook with barbery, a red hot pepper that is difficult to get here." I would guessthat the reporter wrote "Africans" when she should have written "Ethiopians," and of course, that's not how we spell the spice today. To recreate berbere in America, Bayley spent a year experimenting with spiceblends and came up with a mix of chili powder, cayenne, and curry to produce "much the same taste."

In the 21st Century, the Ethiopian-born, Swedish-raised, now-American celebrity chef Marcus Samuelsson has returned to his roots and begun to write about Ethiopian cuisine (born Kassahun Tsegie, he was adopted as achild by a Swedish family). But in 1963, the Swedish born-and-raised KurtLinsi left his decade-long job as personal chef to Emperor Haile Selassie tobecome the head chef for Ethiopian Airlines.

A UPI story that year talked with him about the challenges of his many years serving the emperor and countless foreign dignitaries. At one meal, he made Red Sea perch for the emperor look like a meat dish "to put guests at ease when they ate meat while their host ate fish during a fasting period." (Perhaps he should simply have made it a teaching moment and explained.) Foreign guests always asked the emperor to make no exceptions to the palace cuisine for them, except for Yugoslavia'sMarshal Tito, who was on a low-fat diet.

Linsi said he always included some Ethiopian dishes alongside his international haute cuisine – for example, the oat porridge dish ginjte, thestory says. (He probably means qinche.) He also said foreign guests seemed to enjoy t'ej.

Emperor Haile Selassie tours an Ethiopian glass factory in 1949 to see fabricate the many nacked flasks (bereles) used for drinking t'ej. For the airline, the chef said, he tones down the spices on Ethiopian dishes, whichhe mixes in with his largely French cuisine. And he fuses the two with his Queen of Sheba salad: a mixture of chopped tomatoes and onions, sliced meat or fish, and finely sliced hot green pimiento, dressed with red hot pepper paste (sounds like awaze), vinegar, olive oil, t'ej, salt, pepper, ketchup and Worcestershire sauce. That's certainly a salad fit for a king ofkings.

When Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Williams once again left their native Spokane, Wash., to return to Ethiopia in 1965, they talked to the Spokesman-Review about life in their adopted home. "Injera, a spongy gray substance made from grain," the article says, "is used to pick up the*wot*, a spicy ingredient made with cooked or uncooked chicken, beef or lamb for variety. T'ej, the national drink, has either honey or coffee as a base and is slightly alcoholic." That's about two-thirds true, if not exactly clear.

The Williamses also revealed that "educated Ethiopians like American foods, particularly party foods such as deviled eggs, chips and dips." If Ihad to eat "a spongy gray substance made from grain," I'd prefer American munchies, too. Finally, from June through October of 1966, aninteresting article made its way around the country, popping up in newspapers from New York to California and Illinois to Texas. The samephotograph appears with it everywhere, and all versions are word-for- word identical, suggesting it was a wire service story.

But the piece cites no author, except for the version that appears in theAug. 3 issue of the Wellsville, N.Y., Daily Reporter. The newspaper attributes it to "Mary Lou Luckey, county extension cooperative agent, home economic division." We'll never know whether earlier versions in other papers removed her name, or if Luckey merely took credit for thepiece when it appeared in her hometown paper – two months after it appeared in other newspapers around the country.

"Our African neighbors have inspired many innovations in art, music andfashion," the story says, "but it is only recently that Americans have begun to explore the riches of their unique cuisine. For an unforgettableintroduction to African cookery, have an informal buffet supper featuringEthiopian chicken with hot sauce, accompanied by rich, fragrant coffee."

What follows is a recipe for doro wot (or doro weutt as the story calls it)smothered in kulet, a thick onion sauce, which goes unnamed.

"The secret of this tasty chicken stew is in the sauce," the writer explains,"a savory blend of onions, wine, tomato paste and exciting seasonings likeginger and chili. If you want to be very Ethiopian, cook the chicken whole,but then remember to cut the other ingredients in half as noted in the recipe. The spicy sauce must be poured liberally over the chicken when it is served, but fill a little bowl for additional dippings." (Text ends)

TRADITIONAL ALCOHOLIC BEVEREGES:

https://www.facebook.com/photo.php?fbid=429433110583251&set=a.145895902270308.1073741840.100005496973678&type=3 - _blank

Nobody can document for certain when Ethiopians, Aksumites or pre- Aksumites began to make t'ej. We know that gesho, the species of buckthorn that provokes the fermentation process, is native to Ethiopia, and that excavations at Aksum have found remnants of gesho and writingthat mentions honey wine in the third millennium A.D. This confirms that t'ej is at least nearly 2,000 years old.

Accounts from as early as the 16th Century, when European exploration ofEthiopia began in earnest, copiously document the presence of this specialhoney wine. These historic chronicles offer many sweet tidbits about t'ej: its production and consumption, and its place in Ethiopian society. Once a drink of emperors and kings, it's now enjoyed by anyone who can afford the honey and gesho to make it. Some cultures in Ethiopia even use t'ej as a sort of sacramental wine in their religious practices, with thetask of making it falling on a young man in the community.

Eva Crane, in her 1999 book The World History of Beekeeping and Honey Hunting, tells us that the Greek historian Strabo (63 B.C. . 24 A.D.) wrote about Troglodytes living in ancient Ethiopia. "Most of the people drink a brew of buckthorn," he reported, "but the tyrants drink a mixture of honeyand water, the honey being pressed out of some kind of flower."

Strabo doesn't specifically say that these Ethiopians fermented this drink.But he mentions buckthorn, and that's gesho, so fermentation may have taken place. This appears to be the earliest reference to Ethiopians fermenting honey and water with gesho. To a Greek of Strabo's time, "Ethiopian" could have meant any of the black-skinned cultures of Africa.But remember: Only the real Ethiopians cultivated gesho.

Yeah, some good ol’ Kassa Tesema’s ‘Ambasel’ (የ ካ ሳ ተ ሰ ማ - አ ምባ ሰ ል) or Mary Armede’s ‘Che below’ (የ ሜ ሪ አ ር ምዴ - ቼ ’ በ ለ ው) and a glass of tej - ጠ ጅ (Ethiopian honey mead) (somecall it Ethiopian wine) might save the day. Just a glass, we ant’ talking about getting too happy here. "Moderate drinking," as defined by the U.S. Department of agriculture is no more than one drink... per day for womenand no more than two drinks per day for men. Heh, you think woman’s discrimination is a thing of the past.

I dabbled in home-made tej - ጠ ጅ (Ethiopian honey mead) brewing adding to my repertoire of kitchen adventures and my first tej tasting, I said to myself, “Goodness gracious! What do you know? Indeed, our Ethiopian ancestors were genius.” If it counts, my anecdotal finding shows that just a glass of tej ጠ ጅ, which is divine on your palate not only keep the blues atbay, but help digestion, when paired with those rich spicy Ethiopian foods.What’s more, unlike tella ጠ ላ (Ethiopian black beer), it’s really easy to brewtej ጠ ጅ at home. All you need is some stems of gesho (a species of buck thorn, the botanic name for rhamnus prinoide), water and honey and Voila!

Just by applying some techniques, you can naturally ferment your home made tej to your desired alcohol content ranging from 2% up to 15% alc./vol. You can also be creative and upgrade your tej (honey mead) to arange of exotic flavored mead for sophisticated palates by just adding some ingredients like coffee and also spices and herbs like ginger, cinnamon etc. You can also add edible flowers like dandelion or fruits like banana, citrus fruits and dried fruits. There I said it, knowing this would probably going to get me flamed in some church circles. After all we’re alladults and we’re supposed to drink responsibly, right?

SOLOMONIC DYNASTY: Emperor Haile Selassie I of Ethiopia(July 23, 1892 - August 27, 1975)
Emperor Haile Selassie was born on July 23, 1892 as Tafari Makonnen justoutside the city of Harrar in Ejersa Goro sub-district in Harrarghe, in eastern Ethiopia. His mother was Yeshimbet Ali Abajiffar and his father was Ras (Duke) Makonnen Wolde Michael, Governor of Harrar, relative of Emperor Menelik II (1889-1913), and a former general who had played a key role in the 1896 Battle of Adowa where Ethiopia defeated an invading Italian Army to become the only African state to retain its independence by military action.

Appointed governor of Harrar Province, Tafari Makonnen, despite his descent from previous Emperors, would likely have remained an unimportant political figure had he not married his second wife, Menen Asfaw, niece to the heir of the Ethiopian throne, Lij Iyasu. When rumorsspread that Iyasu was flirting with Islam, Ethiopian nobles made Tafari regent in 1916. Elevated to the rank of Ras, Tafari began to rule in fact while Empress Zewditu, the daughter of Emperor Menelik II, was official head of state.

As regent Ras Tafari Makonnen began the transformation of Ethiopia. He ended slavery in 1923 and established a school for newly freed slaves in the capital, Addis Ababa. By ending slavery Selassie secured Ethiopia's admission to The League of Nations. Selassie also began touring Europe both to acquire knowledge and assistance in his modernization efforts andto raise the profile of the only independent monarchy on the African continent.

Ras Tafari Makonnen became Emperor outright in 1930 upon the death of Empress Zewditu. Upon assuming the throne, he took the name Haile Selassie meaning "Might of the Trinity." Continuing his modernization of the state, Selassie in 1931 established the first Ethiopian constitution which centralized governmental power under his leadership. Selassie believed that a more powerful central government was necessary to carryout his modernization ideas for the nation's bureaucracy, military, and economy. Selassie also focused his attention on increasing public health services, providing electricity, and creating a modern telephone network. In 1931 he founded the Bank of Ethiopia which introducedEthiopian currency.

Selassie's ambitious programs were threatened by the imperial designs ofItalian leader Benito Mussolini. Italy had already held Eritrea just north ofEthiopia and was looking to avenge its defeat at the Battle of Adowa in 1896.

Without warning Italy invaded Ethiopia on October 3, 1935 and fought for seven months. Although the League of Nations named Italy the aggressor in the conflict, no further actions were taken. Italian forces easily defeated the Ethiopian Army forcing Halie Selassie and his family into exile in Great Britain on May 2, 1936. Soon afterwards, on June 30, 1936,he gave his most famous speech before the League of Nations, where he protested the use of chemical weapons against his people and decried the advent of the technological "refinement of barbarism." Despite widespread praise of his speech and sympathy for the Ethiopian people, Western powers did not come to his assistance in the campaign against the Italians.

Although the League failed to act, by 1939, Great Britain and France, now at war with Germany and Italy, came to Ethiopia's aid. On May 5, 1941 Selassie re-entered Ethiopia with the assistance of South African, British, and Ethiopian soldiers. By January 1942 all Italian troops had been drivenfrom the country.

Haile Selassie accepted British military assistance. He did not, however, accept their political help in rebuilding Ethiopia, believing they intended toundermine his authority. Selassie become increasingly concerned about outside influences in his nation and slowed the modernization process he had initiated upon becoming Emperor. Ethiopia increasingly became an autocratic state isolated from much of the rest of the world community.

Selassie devoted resources to controlling Eritrea which came under Ethiopian rule after World War II. His military rule of that region led to anindependence campaign that triumphed finally on May 24, 1993. Despite his country's poverty and political stagnation, Selassie viewed himself as a world leader. Ethiopia became a charter member of the United Nations in 1945. In 1950 he sent Ethiopian troops to fight under Allied command in Korea. Throughout the rest of the decade he traveled widely. In 1954, for example, he became the first head of state to visit newly independent West Germany. Nine years later, in 1963, he helped found the Organization of Africa Unity and built its headquarters in Addis Ababa. After visiting Jamaica in 1960, the Rastafarians, with thousands ofsupporters world wide, proclaimed him a living God.

Selassie, however, seemed unable to control the growing political dissatisfaction over his reign which became even more pronounced by aseries of crop failures and famines between 1972 and 1974 which killed80,000 people and brought millions of Ethiopians to the brink of starvation. Two years later in 1974, after riots and hyperinflation paralyzed his government, the Derg, a committee of Army officers, deposed the Emperor and announced the end of the empire. Former Emperor Haile Selassie died in Addis Ababa on August 27, 1975.

SOLOMONIC DYNASTY: Emperor Haile Selassie I of Ethiopia(November, 1930 to September, 1974)

Ras Tefari, the son of Ras Mekonnen (Governor of Harar), was crowned under the name Emperor Haile Selassie in November 1930. He drafted a new constitution for the country and the first parliament was assembled inNovember 1931, which was designed to give control of the country to the nobility based on hereditary rather than on democracy. The constitution also limited the powers of the regional Princes. This new constitution was only challenged by Ras Hailu of Gojjam. Ras Hailu of Gojjam was jailed forlife in 1932, not only for his challenge to the constitution but also for attemptting to assist Iyasu esacpe from prison in Fiche, North Shewa.

Haile Selassie modernisation of the whole country was based on a divide and rule policy. He worked against Tigray in many ways. He continued to isolate Tigray and it became one of the poorest and most underdevelopedregions in Ethiopia.

In October 1935, The Italian army, with order from Mussolini, invaded northern part of Ethiopia i.e. Adigrat, Adwa and Mekele. Haile Selassie appealed to the League of Nations of which Ethiopia is a member state, but his appeal was completely ignored. The League of Nations, especiallyBritain and France, turned a blind eye to what was happening in Ethiopia,effectively giving Italy a green light to occupy Ethiopia.

Many Tigrayans fought against Italian invasion and few Tigrayan feudallords sided with the Italians against Haile Selassie. Haile Selassie sent troops to Tigray in January 1936. The Ethiopian army initially claimed a victory at the Battle of Tembien, however this victory was not sustained and the Italian army overcame them. The Italian army used mustard gas after the battle of Tembien to curb the Ethiopian advances and the Ethiopian army retreated to Maychew. The Battle of Maychew was the finalresistance to the Italian occupation. Haile Selassie sent reinforcements and the Italians defeated the Ethiopian resistance at Maychew on March 31, 1936. When Haile Selassie received the bad news of the Italian victoryat Maychew; he abandoned his people and country, and went into exile in Britain.

Nonetheless, the Ethiopians continued to resist the Italians and waged a guerrilla war on them to undermine and destabilise their hope of colonisation. The Italians responded with brutality and ruthlessness. As a leader, he could have led the country and people against the Italian occupation. Instead he went into exile in order to save his own life and hisfamily. Even though Haile Selassie deserted his country and people, manyEthiopians courageously exiled themselves into the mountains and forestsof the country and fought the Italian army. Haile Selassie did not live up to the reputations of Emperor Tewodros II, Emperor Yohannes IV and Menelik II who gave their life and died for their county in battle (except Menelik) against foreign invaders.

In May 1936, Italy occupied the whole country and incorporated it with Eritrea and Somalia into one territory. Under the order of Mussolini, theItalian army looted the tallest Stelae (obelisk) from Aksum in 1937 and stood in Rome for 68 years. The Ethiopians and friends of Ethiopia had been campaigning vigorously for its return to Aksum, Ethiopia. Italy hadfinally agreed to return the 24-metre granite obelisk to Aksum in April 2005 and was reassembled in 2008 on its original place.

However, the Second World War broke out in Europe in 1939. On June 10,1940, Italy declared war on Britain and France. The British army advancedinto the Italian occupied countries in East Africa (i.e. Ethiopia and Somalia). In January 1941, the British army and the Ethiopian warriors defeated the Italian army. During the occupation, which lasted 5 years, the Italians humiliated and killed many innocent civilians.

After the British army and the Ethiopian warriors drove the Italians out ofEthiopia, Haile Selassie returned from his exile to reclaim his throne with the help of the British. In 1943, when the Tigrayans heard about the return of Haile Selassie they rebelled against him forming a resistance group under the name "Weyane" (popular uprising). The Tigrayans were determined to unseat Haile Selassie as they held the view that he did notdeserve to reclaim the throne for his desertion of his country and people while Ethiopia faced unforeseen occupation, killing and humiliation of its people by the Italian army.
Haile Selassie requested help from Britain to help to put down the Tigrayan rebellion. The British Royal Air Force flew from Yemen and bombed the "Weyane" while they were meeting in Mekele, Capital City of Tigray. The British appeared to have forgotten that the Tigrayans were their allies against Tewodros in 1869 and the Mahdist of Sudan in 1889. The market in Mekele is now remembered as grave of the "First Weyane".In order to diffuse the mistrust and rebellion by the Tigrayans, Haile Selassie arranged for his granddaughter to marry Ras Mengesha Seyoum of Tigray and then made him Prince of Tigray. It was a good move politically. Soon after Haile Selassie went to Aksum to be officially consecrated as Emperor of Ethiopia. Traditionally, when leaders are crowned they must be consecrated in the Church of Saint Mary of Zion, Aksum, in order to claim their direct descendant from the King Solomon and Queen of Sheba otherwise their throne becomes invalid.

The great achievement of Haile Selassie was that he lobbied the US and Europeans for the reunification of Eritrea with Ethiopia, which had remained under the British rule after the Italian defeat in 1941. With the blessing of the United Nations Eritrea was re-united with Ethiopia in 1952.Undoubtedly, Emperor Haile Selassie was skilled in diplomacy and was know for his restless efforts of campaigns against colonisation in Africa.

He became a voice for the whole African countries independence, but hedid little to develop his country's infrastructure and improve the life of ordinary Ethiopians.

The lack of infrastructure, the increase of poverty in the country, the lack of democracy, the famine in Wollo and Tigray regions in 1973, the Eritreans demand for independence, the cries for land reform by peasantsand the fuel crisis led to unrest in the country. Teachers, students, peasants and workers went on strikes and held demonstrations. After seven months of unrest, Haile Selassie was overthrown and imprisoned bythe military on September 12, 1974 and later executed by the Derg (Military Committee) including his cabinet members, monarchist, and the Patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church.

Ethiopian Legends:

Bilal Ibn Rabah: The Abyssinian Iconic figure in Islam

Bilal ibn Rabah also known as Bilal al-Habashi, Bilal ibn Riyah, and ibn Rabah), was one of the most trusted and loyal Sahabah (companions) of the Islamic prophet Muhammad. He was known for his beautiful voice withwhich he called people to their prayers. Bilal ibn Rabah rose to a position of prominence in Islam; but after Muhammad died in 632 AD, Bilal adopted an isolationist and monastic lifestyle. His respected stature duringthe birth of Islam is often cited by Muslims as evidence of the importance of pluralism and racial equality in the foundations of the religion. He died sometime between 638 to 642, when he was just over sixty years old.

HISTORY: The Afro-American Vs Ethiopian Relations

Tadias Magazine by Tseday Alehegn New York August 11, 2008 Ethiopia, also called Yaltopya, Cush, and Abyssinia, stands as the oldest, continuous, black civilization on earth, and the second oldest civilization inhistory after China. This home of mine has been immortalized in fables, legends, and epics. Homer’s Illiad, Aristotle’s A Treatise on Government, Miguel Cervante’s Don Quixote, the Bible, the Koran, and the Torah are but a few potent examples of Ethiopia’s popularity in literature. But it is instudying the historical relations between African Americans and Ethiopiansthat I came to understand ‘ Ethiopia’ as a ray of light. Like the sun, Ethiopia has spread its beams on black nations across the globe. Her history is carefully preserved in dust-ridden books, in library corners and research centers. Her beauty is caught by a photographer’s discerning eye, her spirituality revived by priests and preachers.

Ultimately, however, it is the oral journals of our elders that helped me capture glitters of wisdom that would palliate my thirst for a panoptic and definitive knowledge. The term ‘Ethiopian’ has been used in a myriad of ways; it is attributed to the indigenous inhabitants of the land located in the Eastern Horn of Africa, as well as more generally denotive of individuals of African descent. Indeed, at one time, the body of water nowknown as the Atlantic Ocean was known as the Ethiopian Ocean. And it was across this very ocean that the ancestors of African Americans were brought to America and the ‘ New World.’ Early African American Writers Although physically separated from their ancestral homeland and amidst the opprobrious shackles of slavery, African American poets, writers, abolitionists, and politicians persisted in forging a collective identity, seeking to link themselves figuratively if not literally to the African continent. One of the first published African American writers, Phillis Wheatly, sought refuge in referring to herself as an “Ethiop”. Wheatley, anoutspoken poet, was also one of the earliest voices of the anti-slavery movement, and often wrote to newspapers of her passion for freedom.
She eloquently asserted, “In every human breast God has implanted aprinciple, it is impatient of oppression.” I n 1834 another anti-slavery poet, William Stanley Roscoe, published his poem “The Ethiop” recounting the tale of an African fighter ending the reign of slavery in the Caribbean. Paul Dunbar’s notable “Ode to Ethiopia,”published in 1896, was eventually put to music by William Grant Still and performed in 1930 by the Afro-American Symphony. In his fiery anti- slavery speech entitled “What to the Slave is the Fourth of July?” prominent black leader Frederick Douglas blazed at his opponents, “Africamust rise and put on her yet unwoven garment. Ethiopia shall stretch out her hand unto God.” First Ethiopians Travel to America As African Americans fixed their gaze on Ethiopia, Ethiopians also traveled to the ‘New World’ and learned of the African presence in the Americas. In 1808 merchants from Ethiopia arrived at New York’s famous Wall Street. While attempting to attend church services at the First Baptist Church of New York, the Ethiopian merchants, along with their African American colleagues, experienced the ongoing routine of racial discrimination. As anact of defiance against segregation in a house of worship, African Americans and Ethiopians organized their own church on Worth Street in Lower Manhattan and named it Abyssinia Baptist Church.

Adam Clayton Powell, Sr. served as the first preacher, and new building was later purchased on Waverly Place in the West Village before the church was moved to its current location in Harlem. Scholar Fikru NegashGebrekidan likewise notes that, along with such literal acts of rebellion, anti slavery leaders Robert Alexander Young and David Walker published pamphlets entitled Ethiopian Manifesto and Appeal in 1829 in an effort to galvanize blacks to rise against their slave masters. (Tadias) Adwa Victory &'Back to Africa' Movement When Italian colonialists encroached on Ethiopian territory and were soundly defeated in the Battle of Adwa on March 1,1896, it became the first African victory over a European colonial power, and the victory resounded loud and clearamong compatriots of the black diaspora. "For the oppressed masses Adwa…would become a cause célèbre," writes Gebrekidan, "a metaphor for racial pride and anti-colonial defiance, living proof that skin color or hair texture bore no significance on intellect and character." Soon, AfricanAmericans and blacks from the Caribbean Islands began to make their way to Abyssinia. In 1903, accompanied by Haitian poet and traveler Benito Sylvain, an affluent African American business magnate by the name of William Henry Ellis arrived in Ethiopia to greet and make acquaintances with Emperor Menelik.

A prominent physician from the West Indies, Dr. Joseph Vitalien, also journeyed to Ethiopia and eventually became the Emperor' trusted personal physician. For black America, the early 1900s was a time consumed with the notion of "returning to Africa," to the source. With physical proof of the beginnings of colonial demise, a charismatic and savvy Jamaican immigrant and businessman named Marcus Garvey established his grassroots organization in 1917 under the title United Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) with branches in various states. Using the success of Ethiopia's independence as a beacon of freedom for blacks residing in the Americas, Garvey envisioned a shipping business that would raise enough money and register members to volunteer to be repatriated to Africa. In a few years time, Garvey's UNIA raised approximately ten million dollars and boasted an impressive membership of half a million individuals. Notable civil rights leader Malcolm X began hisautobiography by mentioning his father, Reverend Earl Little, as a staunchsupporter of the UNIA. "It was only me that he sometimes took with him to the Garvey U.N.I.A. meetings which he held quietly in different people's homes," says Malcolm. "I can remember hearing of ' Africa for the Africans,' 'Ethiopians, Awake!'" Malcolm's early association with Garvey's pan-African message resonated with him as he schooled himself in reading, writing, and history. "I can remember accurately the very first setof books that really impressed me," Malcolm professes, "J.A. Rogers' three volumes told about Aesop being a black man who told fables; about the great Coptic Christian Empires; about Ethiopia, the earth's oldest continuous black civilization." By the time the Ethiopian government had decided to send its first official diplomatic mission to the United States, Marcus Garvey had already emblazoned an image of Ethiopia into the minds and hearts of his African American supporters. "I see a great ray of light and the bursting of a mighty political cloud which will bring you complete freedom," he promised them, and they in turn eagerly propagated his message. announcing the arrival of the first Abyssinian diplomaticdelegation to the United States on July 11, 1919. In 1919 an official Ethiopian goodwill mission was sent to the United States, the first African delegation of diplomats, in hopes of creating amicable ties with the American people and government. The four-person delegation included Dadjazmatch Nadou, Ato Belanghetta Herouy Wolde Selassie, Kantiba Gabrou, and Ato Sinkas. Having been acquainted with African Americans such as businessman William Ellis, Kantiba Gabrou, the mayor of Gondar,made a formal appeal during his trip for African Americans to emigrate toEthiopia.

Arnold Josiah Ford, a Harlem resident from Barbados, had an opportunityto meet the 1919 Ethiopian delegation. Having already heard of the existence of black Jews in Ethiopia, Ford established his own synagogue for the black community soon after meeting the Ethiopian delegation.
Along with a Nigerian-born bishop named Arthur Wentworth Matthews, Ford created the Commandment Keepers Church on 123rd Street in Harlem and taught the congregation about the existence of black Jews in Ethiopia. Meanwhile, in the international spotlight, 1919 was the year theLeague of Nations was created, of which Ethiopia became the first member from the African continent. The mid 1900s gave birth to the Harlem Renaissance. With many African Americans migrating to the northin search of a segregation-free life, and a large contention of black writers, actors, artists and singers gathering in places like Harlem, a new culture of black artistic expression thrived.

Even so, the Harlem Renaissance was more than just a time of literarydiscussions and hot jazz; it represented a confluence of creativity summoning forth the humanity and pride of blacks in America – a counterculture subverting the grain of thought ‘separate and unequal.’Above: Commandment Keepers Synagogue.. Photography by Chester Higgins. ©chesterhiggins.com As in earlier times, the terms ‘Ethiopian’ and ‘Ethiop’ continued to be utilized by Harlem writers and poets to instill black pride. In other U.S. cities like Chicago, actors calling themselves the ‘National Ethiopian Art Players’ performed The Chip Woman’s Fortune by Willis Richardson, the first serious play by a black writer to hit Broadway. In 1927, Ethiopia’s Ambassador to London, Azaj Workneh Martin, arrived in New York and appealed once again for African American professionals toemigrate and work in Ethiopia. In return they were promised free land andhigh wages. In 1931 the Emperor granted eight hundred acres for settlement by African Americans, and Arnold Josiah Ford, bishop of the Commandment Keepers Church, became one of the first to accept the invitation. Along with sixty-six other individuals, Ford emigrated and started life anew in Ethiopia. Ethiopian Students in America: Mobilizing Support In November 1930, Taffari Makonnen was coronated as Emperor of Ethiopia. The event blared on radios, and Harlemites heard and marveled at the ceremonies of a black king. The emperor’s face glossed the cover of Time Magazine, which remarked on “negro newsorgans” in America hailing the king “as their own.” African American pilot Hubert Julian, dubbed

“The Black Eagle of Harlem,” had visited Ethiopia and attended the coronation. Describing the momentous occasion to Time Magazine, Hubertrhapsodized: “When I arrived in Ethiopia the King was glad to see me… I took off with a French pilot… We climbed to 5,000 ft. as 50,000 people cheered, and then I jumped out and tugged open my parachute… I floateddown to within 40 ft. of the King, who incidentally is the greatest of all modern rulers… He rushed up and pinned the highest medal given in that country on my breast, made me a colonel and the leader of his air force —and here I am!” Joel Augustus Rogers, famed author and correspondent for New York’s black newspaper Amsterdam News, also covered the Coronation of Haile Selassie and was likewise presented with a coronation medal. After his official coronation, Emperor Haile Selassie sent forth the first wave of Ethiopian students to continue their education abroad.
Melaku Beyan was a member of the primary batch of students sent to America in the 1930s. He attended Ohio State University and later received his medical degree at Howard Medical School in Washington, D.C.During his schooling years at Howard, he forged lasting friendships with members of the black community and, at Emperor Haile Selassie’s request, he endeavored to enlist African American professionals to work inEthiopia. Beyan was successful in recruiting several individuals, including teachers Joseph Hall and William Jackson, as well as physicians Dr. John West and Dr. Reuben S. Young, the latter of whom began a private practice in Ethiopia’s capital, Addis Ababa, prior to his official assignment as a municipal health officer in Dire Dawa, Harar. Draper (Ethiopiancrown.org) Italo-Ethiopian War 1935-1941 Melaku Beyan By the mid 1930s the Emperor had sent a second diplomatic mission to the U.S. Vexed at Italy’s consistently aggressive behavior towards his nation, HaileSelassie attempted to forge stronger ties with America.

Despite being a member of the League of Nations, Italy disregarded international law and invaded Ethiopia in 1935. The Ethiopian governmentappealed for support at the League of Nations and elsewhere, through representatives such as the young, charismatic speaker Melaku Beyan in the United States. Beyan had married an African American activist, Dorothy Hadley, and together they created a newspaper called Voice of Ethiopia to simultaneously denounce Jim Crow in America and fascist invasion in Ethiopia. Joel Rogers, the correspondent who had previously attended the Emperor’s coronation, returned to Ethiopia as a war correspondent for The Pittsburgh Courier, then America’s most widely- circulated black newspaper.

Upon returning to the United States a year later, he published a pamphlet entitled The Real Facts About Ethiopia, a scathing and uncompromising report on the destruction caused by Italian troops in Ethiopia. Melaku Beyan used the pamphlet in his speaking tours,while his wife Dorothy designed and passed out pins that read “Save Ethiopia.”

In Harlem, Chicago, and various other cities African American churches urged their members to speak out against the invasion. Beyan establishedat least 28 branches of the newly-formed Ethiopian World Federation, an organ of resistance calling on Ethiopians and friends of Ethiopia throughout the United States, Europe, and the Caribbean. News of Ethiopia’s plight fueled indignation and furious debates among African Americans. Touched by the Emperor’s speech at the League of Nations, Roger’s accounts, and Melaku’s impassioned message, blacks vowed to support Ethiopia. Still others wrote letters to Haile Selassie, some giving advice, others support and commentary. “I pray that you will deliver yourself from crucifixion,” wrote one black woman from Los Angeles, “andshow the whites that they are not as civilized as they loudly assert themselves to be.” Although the United States was not officially in support of Ethiopia, scores of African Americans attempted to enlist to fight in Ethiopia. Unable to legally succeed on this front, several individuals traveled to Ethiopia on ‘humanitarian’ grounds. Author Gail Lumet Buckleycites two African American pilots, John Robinson and the ‘Black Eagle of Harlem’ Hubert Julian, who joined the Ethiopian Air Corps, then made up of only three non-combat planes.

John Robinson, a member of the first group of black students that enteredCurtis Wright Flight School, flew his plane delivering medical supplies to different towns across the country. Blacks in America continued to stand behind the Emperor and organized medical supply drives from New York’sHarlem Hospital. Melaku Beyan and his African American counterparts remained undeterred for the remainder of Ethiopia’s struggle against colonization. In 1940, a year before Ethiopia’s victory against Italy, Melaku Beyan succumbed to pneumonia, which he had caught while walking door-to-door in the peak of winter, speaking boldly about the warfor freedom in Ethiopia. Above: Colonel John C. Robinson arrives in Chicago after heroically leading the Ethiopian Air Force against the invading Mussolini’s Italian forces. (Ethiopiancrown.org) Lasting Legacies:Ties That Bind Traveling through Harlem in my mind’s eye, I see the mighty organs of resistance that played such a pivotal role in “keeping aloft” the banner of Ethiopia and fostering deep friendships among blacksin Africa and America.

I envision the doors Melaku Beyan knocked on as he passed out pamphlets; the pulpits on street corners where Malcolm X stood preachingabout the strength and beauty of black people, fired up by the history he read. The Abyssinia Baptist Church stands today bigger and bolder, and inside you find the most exquisite Ethiopian cross, a gift from the late Emperor to the people of Harlem and a symbol of love and gratitude for their support and friendship. Above: Emperor Haile Selassie presenting the cross to Reverened Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., on May 27, 1954.

Photography by Marvin Smith. Several Coptic churches line the streets of Harlem, and the ancient synagogue of the Commandment Keepers established by Arnold Ford continues to have Sabbath services. The officesof the Amsterdam News are still as busy as ever, recording and recountingthe past and present state of black struggles. Over the years, the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture has carefully preserved the photographic proofs of the ties that bind African Americans and Ethiopians, just in case the stories told are too magical to grasp.The name‘Ethiopia’ conjures a kaleidoscope of images and verbs. In researching thehistorical relations between African Americans and Ethiopians, I learned that Ethiopia is synonymous with ‘freedom,’ ‘black dignity’ and ‘self- worth.’

In the process, I looked to my elders and heeded the wisdom they have toshare. In his message to the grassroots of Detroit, Michigan, Malcolm X once asserted, “Of all our studies, history is best qualified to reward our research.” It is this kernel of truth that propelled me to share this rich history in celebration of Black History Month and the victory of Adwa. In attempting to understand what Ethiopia really means, I turn to Ethiopia’s Poet Laureate Tsegaye Gabre-Medhin. “The Ethiopia of rich history is the heart of Africa’s civilization,” he said. “She is the greatest example of Africa’s pride. Ethiopia means peace. The word ‘ Ethiopia’ emanates from a connection of three old black Egyptian words, Et, Op and Bia, meaning truth and peace, up and upper, country and land. Et-Op-Bia is land of upper truth or land of higher peace.” This is my all-time, favorite definitionof Ethiopia, because it brings us back to our indigenous African roots: The same roots that African Americans and black people in the diaspora have searched for; the same roots from which we have sprung and grown into individuals rich in confidence. Welcome to blackness. Welcome to Ethiopia!About the Author: Tseday Alehegn is the Editor-in-Chief of Tadias Magazine. 12:02 am This is an amazing history that has never been told. I live in a predominately African American city but some do not even know where Ethiopia is located. I love the fact that we have a rich history with African Americans. I hear how Ethiopians have a negative view of African Americans. However, it is a historical fact that there was a strong connection between Ethiopians and African Americans. I'am above and beyond proud of my country,and history like this one here makes fulfills me with soo much pride. I grew up in the U.S so many of this facts are Unknown to me but evryday I learn soo many good thing about the history of my mother land and I am very proud to be an ETHIOPIAN.

SOLOMONIC DYNASTY: The King’s Palace On Wheels

The Second Italo–Ethiopian War & The history of May 9, 1936

It has to be recalled that Italy formally annexes Ethiopia after taking the capital Addis Ababa on May 5. Also referred to as the Second Italo– Abyssinian War , was a colonial war that started in October 1935 and ended in May 1936. The war was fought between the armed forces of theKingdom of Italy (Regno d'Italia) and the armed forces of the Ethiopian Empire (also known as Abyssinia). The war resulted in the military occupation of Ethiopia and its annexation into the newly created colony ofItalian East Africa (Africa Orientale Italiana , or AOI).During this campaign the Italians placed considerable reliance on their Royal Corps ofColonial Troops (Regio Corpo Truppe Coloniali , or RCTC) – indigenous regiments recruited from the Italian colonial possessions of Eritrea, Somalia, and Libya. The most effective of these Italian officered units were the Eritrean native infantry (askaris) who were often used as advance troops. As advance troops, the Eritreans often suffered heavy casualties accordingly. The Eritreans also provided cavalry and artillery units. The "Falcon Feathers" (Penne di Falco) was one prestigious and colorful Eritrean cavalry unit. Other RCTC units employed in the invasion of Ethiopia included irregular Somali frontier troops (dubats), regular Arab-Somali infantry and artillery, and Libyan infantry. Italy was able to launch its invasion without interference primarily due to the United Kingdom and France placing a high priority on retaining Italy as an ally in case hostilities broke out with Germany. To this end, on 7 January 1935, France signed an agreement with Italy giving them essentially a free handin Africa to secure Italian co-operation. Next, in April, Italy was further emboldened by being a member of the Stresa Front, an agreement to curbfurther German v...iolations of the Treaty of Versailles.

In June, non-interference was further assured by a political rift that had developed between the United Kingdom and France following the Anglo- German Naval Agreement . A last possible foreign ally of Ethiopia to fall away was Japan , which had served as a model to some Ethiopian intellectuals; the Japanese ambassador to Italy, Dr. Sugimura Yotaro, on16 July assured Mussolini that his country held no political interests in Ethiopia and would keep neutral in Italy's coming war. His comments stirred up a furor inside Japan, where there had been popular affinity forthe African Empire. Despite popular opinion, when the Ethiopians approached Japan for help on 2 August they were refused completely: even a modest request for the Japanese government to officially state itssupport for Ethiopia in the coming conflict was denied. With an attack appearing inevitable, Emperor Haile Selassie ordered a general mobilization of the Army of the Ethiopian Empire . His new recruits consisted of around 500,000 men, many of whom were armed with nothing more than spears and bows. Other soldiers carried more modernweapons, including rifles, but many of these were from before 1900 and were badly outdated.

Indeed on 20 January, the Italians resumed their northern offensive at theFirst Battle of Tembien in the broken terrain between the Warieu Pass andMakale. The fighting proved inconclusive and, on 24 January, the battle ended in a draw, with the Italians having suffered 10 casualties and the Ethiopians 8,000 casualties. But, for all intents and purposes, the threat posed by the Christmas Offensive was over. The Ethiopians were never to split the Italian army and they... were never to invade Eritrea. While Graziani had already done so during the Battle of Genale Doria on the southern front, it was during the First Battle of Tembien that Badoglio unleashed on the northern front the use of phosgene as a weapon. The supposed Ethiopian "threat" to Italian-held Makale and the resultant use of poison gas, Haile Selassie said:

It was at the time when the operations for the encircling of Makale weretaking place that the Italian command, fearing a rout, followed the procedure which it is now my duty to denounce to the world. Special sprayers were installed on board aircraft so that they could vaporize, overvast areas of territory, a fine, death-dealing rain. Groups of nine, fifteen, eighteen aircraft followed one another so that the fog issuing from them formed a continuous sheet. It was thus that, as from the end of January 1936, soldiers, women, children, cattle, rivers, lakes, and pastures were drenched continually with this deadly rain. To systematically kill all living creatures, to more surely poison waters and pastures, the Italian command made its aircraft pass over and over again. That was its chief method of warfare.

In early February, the Italians captured Amba Aradam and destroyed RasMulugeta's army in the Battle of Enderta. The battle on the ground was lopsided in the Italians' favor, the Ethiopians suffered massive losses. Theuse of poison gas destroyed a small part of Ras Mulugeta's army, according to the Ethiopians. During the slaughter following the attemptedwithdrawal of his army, both Ras Mulugeta and his son were killed. The Italians lost 800 killed and wounded while the Ethiopians lost 6,000 killedand 12,000 wounded.

In late February, the Italians destroyed the armies of Ras Kassa and Ras Seyoum at the Second Battle of Tembien . Ethiopians again argued that poison gas played a role in the destruction of the withdrawing armies. In early March, the army of Ras Imru was attacked, bombed, and defeated inwhat was known as the Battle of Shire. Despite resistance, the Italians successfully crushed his army. The Italians had suffered 10 casualties andthe Ethiopians 10,000 casualties.

The last minute (የ መጨረሻዋ ሰዓት) of Martyr Abune Petros

Abune Petros (1892 – 1936) - Though tall, slim and markedly handsome, the Abun dominated the trial with the overpowering— and reassuring— calmness of his bearing. Nothing disturbed his peace. He responded in thedeliberately restrained tone of a Church elder:

“As a Church leader, I have responsibilities. I owe an allegiance to my Church and country. This is all I have to say to this court. I will tell therest to my creator. Do as you please.”

Speechless, the judges froze in their seats. A higher authority was affirmed with such confidence, their skepticism was momentarily shaken.So pervasive was the silence that the drop of a pin would have been heard.

But few moments later, a death sentence, to be carried out that very same day, was briskly read out by the Colonel; who was suddenly noticeably dispirited. The other two judges could not even bear to look up.But as soon as the Colonel finished, Abune Petros compassionately held his cross high, blessed the judges, and proceeded to pray for them in Geez; once Ethiopia’s dominant language, now spoken by no community, but dutifully conserved from extinction by the Church. They did not dare stop him.

Italians to sentence him to death on July 29, 1936. At that point, he was asked to say his last words. This was not an act of kindness, but the Fascists expected to hear him change his mind. Instead, Abune Petros defiantly urged Ethiopian patriots to intensify the war of resistance againstthe Fascists. He said:

“My countrymen do not believe the Fascists if they tell you that the patriots are bandits, the patriots are people who yearn for freedom from terrors of Fascism. Bandits are the soldiers who standing in front of me and you, who come from far away and violently occupy a weak and peaceful country: our Ethiopia. May God give the people of Ethiopia the strength to resist and never bow down to the Fascist army and its violence. May the Ethiopian earth never accept the invading army’s rule.”

Eight Italian army privates awaited him to pull the trigger simultaneously.He stood facing a wall, to be struck by a hail of bullets from the rear. As iscustomary, an Italian Officer approached him to read the death sentence (absurdly, in Italian) one last time. His legs and hands trembled as he didso. When he finished, the Abun, calm as ever, kissed the Bible he was carrying; blessed the crowd that had assembled to witness the execution;and then, with an expression serene more than ever, took out a watch from his pocket, noted the time, and placed it back in his pocket. He was ready to meet his creator.

The soldiers stood twenty feet behind him, and were kneeling when the order to fire came. Not a single bullet missed him. No one doubted that his end had come to pass. But the medical doctor who had to ascertain death looked up with stunned expression. Eight bullets had not killed theAbun. He was still alive. The crowd stirred. A solider stepped in hastily, and fired three more bullets. Each one struck the skull.
Rest in Eternal peace !

ARCHIEVE: The Lion of Judah: Ex-Emperor still debated 40 yearsafter his mysterious death'

By Michel Arseneault

On 27 August 1975 a French reporter phoned the Ethiopian imperial palace which had been overrun by Marxist army officers the previous year.Haile Selassie I came to the phone. On a poor line, speaking good French, the "king of kings" sounded calm and composed, not suspecting he had only a few more hours to live. "I am well as before," said the 83-year-old man some revered as a god. "The soldiers are gone. I am well and so are my people." Forty years later, his death remains shrouded in mystery - and the subject of debate. Official sources spoke the following day of his "respiratory failure" but many believe the "lion of the tribe of Judah" was assassinated by revolutionaries determined to overthrow a centuries-old monarchy.

His imperial majesty, emperor of Ethiopia from 1930 to 1974, was a leading figure in both African and world history in the 20th century. Under his stewardship Ethiopia remained an independent country, the onlyone in Africa to never have been colonised even though it was occupied byfascist Italy – an invasion he condemned before the League of Nations in an historic speech in 1936.

Convinced that countries must cooperate to solve international problems,the emperor championed the cause of multilateralism. Ethiopia was a founding member of both the United Nations and the Organisation of African Unity (now the African Union), whose headquarters were established in Addis when it was created in 1963. "Multilateralism was really part-and-parcel of his practice of power," said Eloi Ficquet, an

Addis-based historical anthropologist, in a phone interview. "His vision of aunited and independent Africa with a strong role to play in international affairs was really part of his vision of power." Some observers question hismotives for raising the banner of African unity during the Cold War era.

Steeped in Abyssinian culture, the illiberal emperor was "rather racist", according to Gérard Prunier, a French author and analyst who first travelled to Ethiopia in the 1970s, when Haile Selassie was still in power. The emperor spoke for the politically emerging African continent at a timewhen the US and the Soviet Union, both distrustful of European colonial powers in Africa, were keen to find well-respected interlocutors on the continent.

"Foreign powers were well aware of the reactionary, unbearable and oppressive nature of the Ethiopian Solomonic dynasty but they all had favourite dictators - and the emperor was a magnificent one," Prunier remarked. Although he has turned into a figure of legend – millions of Rastafarians the world over believe he was a messiah - Haile Selassie didface opposition at home. His own royal guard tried to oust him when he was on a visit to Brazil in 1960. Plotters were swiftly executed. The emperor also faced several rebellions, most famously in Eritrea but also among ethnic Oromos and Somalis in the Ogaden region who believe theywere discriminated against under this Orthodox Christian's rule. The rulingEthiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front, whose roots are in a Marxist liberation front, views his enduring popularity with a baleful eye.

His legacy, like his memory, is contrasted and ambiguous in modern-dayEthiopia, according to anthropologist Ficquet.

“The Ethiopian nation is made up of more than 90 million,” he explained. “Not everyone agrees on the emperor but he is still well-respected, even cherished, by some Ethiopians who remember the imperial era as quite prosperous.” When it turned 70 last week, the United Nations held a special event to pay homage to Ethiopia’s role as a founding member – and to Haile Selassie’s role. It was a reminder that the emperor had beenin the spotlight on the world stage, attending the state funerals of US President John F Kennedy and French President Charles de Gaulle, but that his regime still had its dark side. In Prunier’s words: “The emperor smiled in a bid to seduce the international community while crushing his rebellious subjects.” Follow Michel Arseneault on Twitter @miko75011

Ethiopians Discovered the Science of Stars

A book on astrology attributed to Lucian declares that: “The Ethiopians were the first who invented the science of stars, and gave names to the planets, not at random and without meaning, but descriptive of the qualities which they conceived them to possess; and it was from them that this art passed, still in an imperfect state, to the Egyptians.” The Ethiopian origin of astronomy is beautifully explained by Count ...Volney ina passage in his Ruins of Empires, which is one of the glories of modern literature, and his argument is not based on guesses. He invokes the authority of Charles F. Dupuis, whose three monumental works, The Origin of Constellations, The Origin of Worship and The Chronological Zodiac, are marvels of meticulous research.

Ras Kassa Haile Dargie:

One of the most influential leaders of modern Ethiopia.

Although he had by birth a better claim to the throne than his younger cousin Ras Tafari Makonnen (the later Emperor Haile Selassie I), Kassa valued loyalty over ambition, and was content with his fief of Selale sub-region near the monastery of Debre Libanos. During the rise of EmperorHaile Selassie I, Ras Kassa was loyal to Haile Selassie during numerous challenges to his rule, standing by his side during more than one uprising ...His most notable act supporting Haile Selassie was his role in neutralizing the threat of Dajazmach Balcha Safo in 1928.

Ras Kassa served as Qegnazmach ("Commander of the Army of the Right") during the Second Italo-Abyssinian War. His forces fought in the First Battle of Tembien and the Second Battle of Tembien. Following the Ethiopian defeat he went into exile with his Emperor, spending most of histime in Jerusalem. The sons of Ras Kassa stayed in Ethiopia and were partof the resistance to the Italian occupation. In late 1936, three of his four sons were captured and executed: Wondosson Kassa, Aberra Kassa, and Asfawossen Kassa. In early 1941, during the East African Campaign of World War II, Ras Kassa returned to Ethiopia with the Emperor and the Gideon Force. After the war, he became a counsellor.in the Imperial Crown Council.

Tall and Heavy-built Freedom Fighter

The young Abdissa Agga was one of the patriots fighting with valor in the guerilla warfare unleashed on the occupying fascist forces. Unfortunately,Abdissa Agga was caught and briefly jailed in Addis Ababa by the brutal Fascist authorities. He was whisked to Italy via Eritrea and incarcerated ina high-security prison there.

The invincible hero broke out from jail and walked miles in unknown terrain to join Yugoslavian guerrilla fighters in their fortified mountain hideout. He was well received and respected for his fighting ability and was recognized as number two man of the resistance. The guerillas would descend from their hideouts in the mountain to the ground below and inflict damage to the fascist military targets. They blew up bridges, burntammunition depots and gathered military intelligence and transmitted tothe Allied Forces with which they had established contact and earned recognition.

This tall and heavy-built freedom fighter held the Ethiopian Green, Yellow,and Red Flag neatly folded and held in his arm as he was talking to his audience. He told his admiring audience it was this same cherished flag that was hoisted on the pole in his guerilla camp fluttering in the wind blowing over the mountain hideout. He was given a standing ovation.

The II World War ended in victory for the Allies. The guerillas went down to a city below to celebrate the victory. Unfortunately a scuffle arose in the bar and racist remarks were thrown at Abdissa Agga. The scuffle wentinto a full fight and the guerillas beat the hell out of their belligerents.
Abdissa could not be missed for his color and tall and well-built bodily structure. He was identified, jailed and court-marshaled by the authoritiesof the Alliance. He was sentenced to prison and to pay a heavy fine. Ethiopians contributed and paid the ransom money and Abdissa came to his motherland at last. He was among others instructed by the then Ministry of War to take training at Holeta Military Training Centre before assignment. Abdissa was defiant and fell out of favor with the ruling class.He disappeared in the ranks of ordinary masses until fortune knocked at his door years later at the time of the official state visit of Marshal Tito in the first half of the 1950s.
One of the members of Tito’s entourage was a high ranking general and former guerrilla leader and comrade of Abdissa Agga in their mountain hideout in Italy. He asked for the whereabouts of Abdissa apparently noting his absence from the ranks of Ethiopian dignitaries who welcomedthe visitor. Ethiopian officials must have been embarrassed. Abdissa wassought, found and appeared in military uniform with the rank of a lieutenant. To make a long story short, Abdissa since rose to the rank of Colonel and Commander of the Emperor’s Personal Guard Unit.
In sharp contrast, some nobilities and dignitaries carried gifts to Rome as a tribute to Mussolini and procrastinated before the dictator to demonstrate their loyalty. These same people held their status and positions of power upon the return of the Emperor from exile at the end ofWorld War II. So, Ethiopian history is a long saga of highly-placed renegades betraying the national interests of Ethiopia in opportunistic greedy pursuit of their own. One should therefore not be surprised that renegades play destructive role in the present political upheaval in motherEthiopia.

ROYAL MARRIAGE - Japan – Ethiopia:

A ‘Royal Marriage’, Syndication Of The ‘Colored Race’ and towards a NewDevelopment Partnership (Published by Fortune Addis)-

The visit by PM Junichiro Koizumi to Ethiopia is an opportunity to adulate our era’s most successful economies and the Japan-Ethiopia relations in historical and developmental partnership terms. Notwithstanding its triplemenace of debt, deflation and political deadlock, Japan is still the richest,most technologically advanced and culturally integrated nation in the world.

The Japan Miracle:

A much-adorned example of rapid development under intensive human capital development is what best describes Japan in the minds of those who jealously guard Japan’s position as one of world’s rich and industrialized nation. A superlative assertion of Japan of what it has achieved in the 1980s is its emergence as a country with much strength, especially a high average level of education, formidable technology, and great social coordination; experiencing one of the biggest asset booms inworld history. Glowing with triumph and with ostensibly cost less wealth, the nation’s economic powerhouses diverged uncontrollably – spelling thedisintegration of the economic boom and ensuing recession after 1990.

Not unexpectedly, The Economist asserts that: “no nation in modern history has moved so swiftly from worldwide adulation to dismissal or even contempt as did Japan, as the temple bells were tolling in the new year of 1990. These were met with flaccid responses. One, neither bureaucrats nor companies chose to admit what was really happening andtwo; massive public-works spending and an expansionary monetary policywere launched (anesthetizing the price mechanism that ought to have obligated fiscal discipline).

"One hyperventilated account argued that, plans have been made for effecting mixed marriages between the eligible 2000 Japanese settlers andAbyssinian women. This declared policy which is intended to produce a new race of leaders in the united revolt of the coloured peoples against the white races, was to have been inaugurated by the marriage of Princess Masako, a daughter of the Japanese prince Kurado [Kuroda], to the Ethiopian prince Lij Ayalé [Araya]. Europeans saw this as lying in Ethiopia’s wish to model its modernisation after Japan and in Japan’s romantic vision of Ethiopia". (J.Calvitt Clarke III) As a result, Japan mutated from being the genesis of Total Quality Management to a recipient of economic lectures from Western pundits; with offers of recipesfor its reform and revival. Nonetheless, the time for homily is over. Japan is springing back leading the elite nations’ pack under the able leadership of PM Koizumi. The resilience of Japan started with the emergence of a single imperial line in Japan probably dates from the 6th Century AD, if notearlier.

In 1192, Minamoto Yoritomo became shogun, and the shoguns were in effect Japan's rulers until 1867. As Europe began to seek colonies in Asia,the Tokugawa shoguns (1603-1867) tried to preserve Japan's culture by banning missionaries, expelling foreigners, ending almost all trade and even forbidding Japanese to leave the islands. The Meiji dynasty founded in 1868 transformed Japan by abolishing feudalism and overseeing the creation of a modern economy, defense, a meritorious civil service and an elected parliament -- reaping forte at home and astounding Europe and the US by conquering China (1894-95), Russia (1904-05); besides Taiwanand Korea.

Japan and Ethiopia:

J. Calvitt Clarke III in a paper entitled Ethiopia's Non-Western Model For Westernisation: a paper presented to ISA South asserts that "Foreign Minister Heruy Welde Sellasse's (an accomplished writer and progressive thinker and one of Ethiopia's most influential 'Japanisers') led a Mission ToJapan in 1931. To the "exaggerated horror of many western powers, during the 1920s, a series of Japanese merchants came to Ethiopia with aview to expand trade between the two nations and later on, Japanese representatives attended Emperor's Coronation in 1930. A Treaty of Friendship and Commerce was soon after signed and sealed. A year after this, Ethiopia promulgated a constitution modeled on Japan's Meiji Constitution of 1889.

Capping this rapprochement, Foreign Minister Heruy, visited Japan, widelyfêted. Heruy and his party examined many of Japan's most important industrial and military facilities. Many of Japan's most influential nationalist leaders eagerly greeted him hoping to find in Ethiopia an important ally in the struggle of "coloured peoples" against white colonialism and imperialism. Heruy's visit, however, signalled the high watermark of cooperation. Speaking with the French chargé d'affaires in Ethiopia at the time, Heruy praised Japan's transformation and asserted, 'you will see even more extraordinary things here than in Japan'."

J. Calvitt Clarke III submits that Araya, a member of the Imperial Court, played an important part in Ethiopia's relations with Japan and soon to propose marriage to a Japanese Princesses, admired Japanese courtesy,development, and modernisation; while to colonial power Europe, the threat of Japanese political, commercial, and military intrusions into Ethiopia seemed sufficient to justify Italy's military preparations againstEthiopia. In 1933 and 1934, Araya's proposed marriage vexingly personified these intrusions.

How can Japan help Ethiopia project itself into the 21st Century? Matrimony and the hegemony of the coloured race aside, firstly, Japan canexpedite in the reform and development democratic rules and institutions in Ethiopia that have been launched in the recent past. Much of the discussion in political good governance has important economic dimensions as improvements in governance and an increased capacity todeliver these reforms leads to increased investment. Because investors respond to good governance, Japan can catalyze capacity for a virtuous cycle to that end. This augurs on the dialogue on governability and founding an 'intelligent state' –

(1) security agenda to place political governance and participatory politicsat the forefront of international diplomacy;
(2) Developed economic agenda, rehabilitating and right-sizing the Statein its core regulatory functions within the remit of globalization;
(3) Development agenda linking sustainable human development, humansecurity and participatory democracy;
(4) Leadership agenda – to shape dialogue and morality; The convergenceof agenda reflects an emerging consensus on the mutually reinforcing role of governance and development, re-emphasising t he political context of development. Secondly, Ethiopia needs to have a solid Private Sector Development (PSD) agenda. Japan can assist Ethiopia infacilitating implementation of

(1) A PSD social governance agenda: to achieve the MDGs, democraticcitizenships, cultural democracy and the rise of the Arts, ethnic divergence and détente, graft and grand corruption;
(2) Economic governance agenda: to develop state strategic and businessplans for the 21st Century, establish capacity for policy and strategic harmonisation, establish sound knowledge management systems, privatising and commercialising state activities, establishing credit and capital markets and
(3) A leadership agenda: governance that promote business developmentthrough the founding of independent private sector think tanks whoseagenda is to develop businesses concept of futuristic thinking, human security in a society in transformation, Communities of Practice and integration and mainstreaming.

These two trajectories of support to Ethiopia will invariably result in thecreation of private sector and social institutions that can

(1) Independently (both human and material terms) set and pursue owngoals and objectives;
(2) Effectively develop the organisation's capacity at achieving its statedobjectives;
(3) Develop Complexity: the health corporate bureaucratisation of an organisation's internal structure and Cohesion: the sharing of commonvalues, goals and organisational culture among an organisation

THE HISTORY OF SUGAR & SWEETNER IN ETHIOPIA:

Establishment of Wonji, Wonji-Shoa, and Metehara Sugar Estateset-al

In February 21, 1955: Wonji Sugar factory established soon to be followedby the Shoa Sugar factory in nearby Wonji-Shoa, Adama Boset sub- district of former Shoa province which was then managed by the Dutch Company of “Dutch Handels Vereeningung Amsterdam” as leading investment (about 32 mln Eth. Dollar by the time) in the country, is shortly known as HVA-ETHIOPIA officially inaugurated by the Emperor, and launched it’s Sugar production.

Side note: The HVA workers residential houses, Community school, Poly Clinic (later upgraded to hospital level), and other facilities were properly allocated in Wonji Sugar factory area with Shibo ghibi (barbed fence residential houses) were built only for Dutch chiefs of different departments in the estate. Since they were Europeans, the houses were euro standards of that time. Every house had living room, gust room,bed rooms, shower, kitchen, store, and a garage. Concerning Waste disposal, dry waste was collected by workers assigned for it and liquid waste was discharged into drainages which was designed for such purpose, then to the "arjin" and final destination would be sugar... cane plantation. There were public swimming pool,ground tennis field ,elementary school, loungemovie hall and guest houses for staff and community uses.

In Ethiopia such kind of houses were found (except shoa and metehara) only in Addis Ababa around bole international air port. It was said to be "bole homes community".The houses were 230 in number and the then king wanted to facilitate for certain people who had financial ability to paymortgage bank debts. And the houses were built by an American construction company with 28,000 Ethiopian dollar each(bear in mind that one Ethiopian dollar is equal to one Us dollar at that time) around 1961 Ethiopian calendar. These houses were also euro standards. Waste management was same as wonji and it had its own community school andalso separated from other residents of the area with barbed wire fences.
So that in Ethiopia wonji was the first place to have euro standard houses.

How many of us know sugar production need lime and sulfur (Nora and digni) as an input? Lime was produced in Shoa Alem tena. The raw material was imported from out of Wonji ,most of the time from around Metehara (Merti) area. Then the lime mill planted withn Shoa Sugar factory, on the place where near to Shoa Shibo Ghibi (the wired fence) changed it into lime. The mill was located east of the Shibo Gibi on top of the hill. It had got power from fire wood which was brought there in metercube(Meter kube). The mill did grind the limestone and burnt with fire to yield lime. Therefore we can say that the estate was self sufficient in caseof lime. I think we did paint our wall with the oxidized lime we brought from the factory. That oxidized lime was by product in the sugar production process. So that Wonji provided us the knowledge that from what lime is obtained and how.

Most of wonjians as a child, young and elder know "birze" made of sugar better than those who knows birze made of local honey. Any body who had a chance entering in to the sugar factory might be invited sugar madebirze by any worker who knows him/her. Because not only your parents were your family in old times. They had lemon in their pocket or their bag.Sugar was plenty there. Cold water was fetched from public drink water machine installed for the workers. They poured enough sugar in the half bottled water and add lemon in it. Then they did shake the bottle well andgave you to drink. You had to finish your dose. If you could come daily
,they did it warmly. That was how we experienced birze in wonji. It wasour life too.

Wonjians know how Desta candy is made up. Because "Wonji keremela fabrika", where mostly employed by the wives of the Sugar factory workers is found right in wonji. If we had a chance to enter in to the factory, you know,you could eat whether candy or a kind of gum like verysweet thing called “Molasus” you might chew as chocolates. It is a jelly like thing which become candy at the end of the process. So that we are not new for candy. We know also what ingredients it has. First there is glucose jelly imported from abroad in a barrel. Then we need sugar to be mixed with the glucose, flavours and colouring pigment also added. Then it goes through different steps and become candy. By the way the oder ofthe candy invite you to enter even without permission. Some times it is hard to watch a game in wonji stadium due to its pleasant oder. That wasalso our life.

Have you had a chance to visit the Wonji-Shoa Sugar Estate hospital? If you had you noticed how the Kitchener prepare meal for those who were admitted patients. There are modern stoves and huge casseroles.
You couldn't dare to near these huge casseroles while they were boiling. The Kitchener had power to move these things up and down. All daily menus were ready at the meal time. Another thing which I never forget isits refrigerator. It is a room. Very huge. Every thing to be preserved muststore in the refrigerator. I didn't believe when I step inside for the first time. It was cool. I walked in side to see what was there. Different food items including "kitfo", strawberry and so on were on it. So that when I saw such kind of refrigerator else where it never became surprise to me. Iknow I obtained most knowledge not from other places. It is from wonji.
Do you know "Kaldayo" of the Wonji Sugar factory?, Not the Wonji hospital one. It was the heat power house of the factory. Sugar was boiledwith this heat in the process. In this furnace the fuel was the sugar byproduct "ye-ageda geleba". You couldn't stay long in this area if you notworked there for long time. It was hard even for those who have worked there. The soot was transported to its dumping site with carriages that being pushed on rail. Dumping area was an open area adjacent to wonji candy factory and in front of qorqoro sefer. I wonder why the Netherlandsopted to dump the soot at such place. It was also behind their Shibo gibi. Why ? Wasn't there any means to dump it on a far place?

The Implication of Fluoride in the daily life of Wonjians Wonji, Wonji/Shoa and Metehara HVA's fluoride poisoning?Report by The Ovi Team 2009-06-05 09

In December 2007 I went to Ethiopia to attend the wheelchairs distribution event for fluoride victims who are bed-ridden for over 35 years in Wonji/Ethiopia. When I met those victims there was a flow of tears from victims and their family and fighting back my tears was impossible. Through no fault of their own, these innocent victims were bed-ridden prisoners in their own home but now with the help of the Free wheelchair Mission donation- they can move around and after many yearsthey saw and felt the fresh air and the sun light. Their family members were like sitting behind the bars taking care of the sick; they were also prisoners in an emotional prison due to a situation beyond their control.
HVA International NV is responsible for all the damages on these poorvictims by knowingly providing them excess fluoride drinking water.
Despite all the evidences, the Human Rights Corporate violators like HVAInternational NV profits and trade take precedence over public health concerns.

Fluoride targets a part of the brain that makes people less inclined to stand up to authority, which is used as rat poison and cockroach bait. Hitler was using fluoride in the Nazi Concentration camps to keep the Jewsand Jehovah's Witnesses calm, stupid and weak - fluoride is a key dumping down ingredient of Prozac and Sarin nerve gas. These were the reason (in addition to profit) why HVA INTERNATIONAL NV was interestedto continue the consumption of fluoride to Wonji, Wonji/Shoa and Metehara residents for over 17 years without their knowledge. But HVA INTERNATIONAL was very cautious, caring for its Dutch citizens who werein Wonji, Wonji/Shoa and Metehara by providing them fluoride-free drinking water. The dangerous of fluoride was told to Wonji/ Wonji/Shoa and Metehara residents when HVA International was nationalized and was kicked out of the country.
It's not secret that donor countries tend to emphasize their narrow concepts of human rights as a prerequisite to sanction development assistance or financial aid so poor countries' governments are pressured to suck up any human right violation by the corporate. Why, oh- why Wonji residents were not told 17 years before that the water they were drinking is poisonous? To make things worse the roofs of the houses built for them by HVA international NV were made from asbestos!!

Being poor or in a vulnerable situation means being exposed to a variety of human rights violations. The issue is who's rights value most – the rightof the poor to water or the right of a corporation like HVA International NVto maximize its return on investment – human rights or investor rights?
The answer to that question lays on morally conscious corporate who are willing to fulfil their obligations to promote, protect and fulfil human rightsand advocate that human rights come first which is apparently contrary toHVA International NV. Probably Wonji victims' lives didn't matter becausethey were underdogs and less than human and undeserving of respect and dignity. To this day HVA International continues to be reluctant to ratify violating the human rights of those poor voiceless Wonji/ Wonji/Shoa and Metehara residents. May love and compassion prevail!

Note from the OVI Editors: While researching this e-mail we discovered that New Internationalist another online magazine, had received a similarcontact email from Almaz Mequanint a few years ago. The magazine forwarded her email to the Dutch company HVA, which built and ran the places she describes. Clemens JM Rolink, the current General Manager ofHVA International NV, replied. This is a shortened version of what they had to say. They paint two quite different pictures – we leave readers to judge which is the more convincing:

The sugar estates formerly owned by HVA were nationalized by the Ethiopian Government in 1976... HVA International NV has no juridical linkwhatsoever with the former HVA and its interests in Ethiopia. As we probably are the only party that might give some answers to questions, we may have a moral obligation. On the other hand, there is not a single person active in our company that is knowledgeable on details of the sugar estates in Ethiopia. During the time of nationalization... the Ethiopian Government claimed a large amount as compensation for the fluoride problem and at the same time accepted responsibility for all future claims. Drinking water was not available in that area in the 1960s, for which reason HVA bored water wells. After some years it became apparent that these wells contained a high fluoride percentage. The effects of fluoride were not known at that time. Even before the 1970s HVA ordered an official study, from which it became clear that drinking from the wells over a long period could have a negative impact on teeth and bones, especially those of children.

HVA instantly took measures by creating separate water distribution points where special bone-filters were used to produce low-fluoride water,or so-called “children’s water”. Everybody without exception could collect water, and information was widely spread around the estate. The whole fluoride matter was taken extremely seriously... Except for the consequences of fluoride, no other illnesses of a serious nature are known... White and black people were not segregated. On the contrary.

There were two areas, one for labourers (all black) and one for staff, where white and black lived together and shared the same facilities...

The air pollution from sugar factories is very limited if compared to other industries like steel, chemicals, etc. Anti-pollution measures were taken aswas common practice and valid for West-European plants in those days... To our knowledge no asbestos was used for houses. However, asbestos was applied for heat insulation in the factory. This has never created problems due to the fact that the asbestos, after being installed, stayed inplace and could not spread dust particles. All in all, the living conditions within the factory premises were undoubtedly much better than outside inthe villages... For sure, industrialization also has its other side, just as in Western Europe. However, in our opinion, it is on a comparable scale in Ethiopia – not much worse and not much better.

Legendary People: Who was He?

Colonel Orde Wingate of The East African King's Rifles who entersAddis Ababa on a horseback.

At the outbreak of World War II, Wingate was the commander of an anti-aircraft unit in Britain. He repeatedly made proposals to the army and government for the creation of a Jewish army in Palestine which would rule over the area and its Arab population in the name of the British.
Eventually his friend Wavell, by this time c...ommander-in-chief of MiddleEast Command which was based in Cairo, invited him to Sudan to begin operations against Italian occupation forces in Ethiopia. Under William Platt, the British commander in Sudan, he created the Gideon Force, a guerrilla force composed of British, Sudanese and Ethiopian soldiers. Theforce was named after the biblical judge Gideon, who defeated a large force with a tiny band.
Wingate invited a number of veterans of the Haganah SNS to join him. With the blessing of the Emperor of Ethiopia, Haile Selassie, the group began to operate in February 1941. Wingate was temporarily promoted tolieutenant colonel and put in command. He again insisted on leading from the front and accompanied his troops. The Gideon Force, with the aid of local resistance fighters, harassed Italian forts and their supply lines whilethe regular army took on the main forces of the Italian army. The small Gideon Force of no more than 1,700 men took the surrender of about 20,000 Italians toward the end of the campaign. At the end of the fighting, Wingate and the men of the Gideon Force linked with the force ofLt. Gen. Alan Cunningham which had advanced from Kenya to the south and accompanied the emperor in his triumphant return to Addis Ababa in May. Wingate was mentioned in dispatches in April 1941 and was awardeda second DSO in December.
With the end of the East African Campaign on 4 June 1941, Wingate was removed from command of the now-dismantled Gideon Force and his rankwas reduced to that of major. During the campaign he was irritated that British authorities ignored his request for decorations for his men and obstructed his efforts to obtain back pay and other compensation for them. He left for Cairo and wrote an official report which was extremely critical of his commanders, fellow officers, government officials and many others. Wingate was also angry that his efforts had not been praised by authorities, and that he had been forced to leave Abyssinia without havingsaid farewell to Emperor Selassie. Wingate was most concerned about British attempts to stifle Ethiopian freedom, writing that attempts to raise future rebellions amongst populations must be honest ones and should appeal to justice.

Soon after, he contracted malaria. He sought treatment from a local doctor instead of army medical staff because he was afraid that the illnesswould give his detractors another further excuse to undermine him. This doctor gave him a large supply of the drug Atabrine, which can produce asa side-effect depression if taken in high dosages. Already depressed over the official response to his Abyssinian command, and sick with malaria, Wingate attempted suicide by stabbing himself in the neck.
It was only prompt action by another officer that saved him. Wingate wassent to Britain to recuperate. A highly edited version of his report was passed through Wingate's political supporters in London to Winston Churchill. Consequent to this, Leo Amery, the Secretary of State for Indiacontacted Wavell, now Commander-in-Chief in India commanding the South-East Asian Theatre to enquire if there were any chance of employing Wingate in the Far East. On 27 February 1942, Wingate, far from pleased with his posting as a "supernumary major without staff grading", left Britain for Rangoon. (Text ends)

Legendary People: Who Were They?

The patriot brothers Abebe Damtew and Desta Damtew

The two Patriot brothers Abebe Damtew in the title of Dejazmach & Desta Damtew (posthumously Ras) came to the court of Menelik II as young boys to serve as pages (attendants) to the Emperor and to be trained andeducated in the ways of the palace and governance as was traditional in those times. As pages in the royal household, they were favored by Empress Taitu. At the same time as members of the Addisge clan, they were related to Ras Tessema Nadew who became regent when Menelik fellill and Taitu was restricted from government affairs. During the fascist invasion, Dejazmatch Abebe Damtew commanded the forces of Goffa and Bako, while his brother Ras Desta led the forces of Sidamo and had general command over all forces in the south of the country. Dejazmatch Abebe Damtew, when defeat was certain went into exile and settled in Jerusalem during the occupation with his family. He returned and took part in the liberation war. Ras Desta Damtew was captured by fascist forces and executed.
Ras Desta Damtew was married to Princess Tenagnework Haile Selassie.They were the parents of two sons, Princes Amha and Iskinder Desta (later Rear Admiral) and four daughters, Princesses Aida, Seble, Sophiaand Hirut Desta.

Dejazmatch Abebe was married to Woizero Wosenyelesh Mengesha, daughter of Ras Mengesha Atikem of Damot and Agew Midir and Enderassie of former Gojjam province. They were the parents of Woizero Mulumebet Abebe (wife of Lij Araya Abebe), Princess Medferiashwork Abebe (wife of Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen) and Woizero Akleweg Abebe.

Ethiopia In History:

Why did the Emperor left the country into exile?

Proof Haile Selassie did not flee Ethiopia in 1936 but was advised by thewarriors Exhausted and overwhelmed, having severe lack of sleep and food, H.I.M. Emperor Haile Selassie I packed his bags on May 5, 1936, and manuevered to get away from the advancing Italian forces. With one armyof the invaders of the threshold of Addis Ababa and another rapidly closingin from the south, the mild mannered Emperor could hardly be expected to wait for the usurpers to overtake him and his family.

Accordingly he hustled his wife Empress Menen and children into their automobile, taking as much gold bullion as they could carry, and boarded the only railroad train in the country. Arriving at Djibouti the royal party was met by pitying throngs of loyal followers. At the port an Italian newspaper reporter, who tried to get his picture, was mobbed by the natives. Received by the French Governor in the Governor's Palace, the brave and noble ruler was fed and put to bed. Many mocked H.I.M. asan Emperor without an Empire.

We know otherwise

Once a King has faithful subjects, He is still Earth's Rightful Ruler. The Emperor, some people think he run away to save himself and consideredhim as a traitor. WRONG. Why did the Emperor left the country? This is really a question every one has to understand. In My Opinion

1. The Italians were beyond the capa...city of our army and the patriots. They were well equipped and armed than the time of Adowa. I read in some articles the first Aerial bombardment started in Ethiopia, that makesus the first country in the world to be aerially raided and bombarded, bothby bombs and gas.So The King of Kings left to get the support of Friends from Abroad and to fight the Italians in the International stages like 'The League of Nations'. He made history by doing so, and he was even considered as a prophet by forecasting the starting of WWII.
2. If the Italians caught the King in the country, the war would have beenover. The capture or killing of the King would have broken the moral and energy of the Patriots as well as making them completely disorganized,Italy would have easily controlled the country. In these cases the King made the smartest choice in our History and succeed by giving us backour freedom.

(ሻምበል አብዲሳ አጋ -ወደር የሌለው ጀግና)

The Legacy of Lt. Colonel Abdissa Aga.

Lt. Colonel Abdissa Aga was born in Welega. His father lost his temper andkilled his own brother when Abdissa was about 12 years old. Though he went as far as Addis Ababa to appeal for the release of his father, he was executed. Sad and embittered, he joined the Ethiopian Army around the age of 14 and fought against Fascist Italy in 1936 in Ethiopia. He was captured and imprisoned in a concentration camp in the island of Sicily in Italy. There he met Captain Julio, a Yugoslav hero and others.

BLACK HISTORY: The Pan-African Congresses, 1900 to 1945

In the nearly half century between 1900 and 1945 various political leadersand intellectuals from Europe, North America, and Africa met six times to discuss colonial control of Africa and develop strategies for eventual African political liberation. In the article that follows, historian Saheed Adejumobi describes the goals and objectives of these six Pan African Congresses and assesses their impact on Africa.

Pan-Africanist ideals emerged in the late nineteenth century in response to European colonization and exploitation of the African continent. Pan- Africanist philosophy held that slavery and colonialism depended on and encouraged negative, unfounded categorizations of the race, culture, andvalues of African people. These destructive beliefs in turn gave birth to intensified forms of racism, the likes of which Pan-Africanism sought to eliminate.

As a broader political concept, Pan-Africanism's roots lie in the collective experiences of African descendants in the New World. Africa assumed greater significance for some blacks in the New World for two primary reasons. First, the increasing futility of their campaign for racial equality inthe United States led some African Americans to demand voluntary repatriation to Africa. Next, for the first time the term Africans, which had often been used by racists as a derogatory description, became a source of pride for early black nationalists. Hence, through the conscious elevation of their African identity black activists in America and the rest ofthe world began to reclaim the rights previously denied them by Western societies.

In 1897, Henry Sylvester-Williams, a West Indian Barrister, formed the African Association in London, England to encourage Pan-African unity; especially throughout the British colonies. Sylvester-Williams, who had links with West African dignitaries, believed that Africans and those of African descent living in the Diaspora needed a forum to address their common problems. In 1900, Sylvester- Williams organized the first Pan-African meeting in collaboration with several black leaders representing various countries of the African Diaspora. For the first time, opponents ofcolonialism and racism gathered for an international meeting. The conference, held in London, attracted global attention, placing the word "Pan-African" in the lexicon of international affairs and making it part of the standard vocabulary of black intellectuals.

The initial meeting featured thirty delegates, mainly from England and theWest Indies, but attracted only a few Africans and African Americans.
Among them was black America's leading intellectual, W.E.B. DuBois, whowas to become the torchbearer of subsequent Pan-African conferences, orcongresses as they later came to be called. Conference participants read papers on a variety of topics, including the social, political, and economic conditions of blacks in the Diaspora; the importance of independent nations governed by people of African descent, such as Ethiopia, Haiti, and Liberia; the legacy of slavery and European imperialism; the role of Africa in world history; and the impact of Christianity on the African continent. Perhaps of even greater significance was the formation of two committees. One group, chaired by DuBois, drafted an address "To the Nations of the World," demanding moderate reforms for colonial Africa.

The address implored the United States and the imperial European nationsto "acknowledge and protect the rights of people of African descent" and to respect the integrity and independence of "the free Negro States of Abyssinia, Liberia, Haiti, etc." The address, signed by committee chairmanDuBois as well as its president Bishop Alexander Walters, its vice president Henry B. Brown, and its general secretary Sylvester-Williams, was published and sent to Queen Victoria of England. The second committee planned for the formation of a permanent Pan-African association in London with branches overseas. Despite these ambitious plans, the appeals of conference participants made little or no impression on the European imperial powers who controlled the political and economic destiny of Africa.

It was not until after World War I that DuBois revived the Pan-African congresses. Following the war, European and American politicians gathered for a peace conference in Versailles, France. DuBois, who attended the conference as a special representative of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), appealed toPresident Woodrow Wilson. In a letter to Wilson, he urged the American government to initiate a comprehensive study of the treatment of black soldiers. Moreover, DuBois expressed hope that the peace treaty would address "the future of Africa" and grant self-determination to the colonized peoples. President Wilson subsequently released a Fourteen Point memorandum, which suggested the formation a League of Nations and called for "an absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based on the principle that the interests of the population must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the government." Although historians have questioned the impact DuBois's request had on Wilson's Fourteen Point memorandum, it was apparent that the loudest voice on behalf of oppressed blacks in the New World and colonized Africa belongedto the participants of the Pan-African Congress.

Galvanized by the gathering of world leaders and the discussion of colonialAfrica's future, DuBois proposed the formation of a Pan-African Congress. In 1919, as the Versailles Peace treaty deliberations ran their course, DuBois, with the support of Blaise Diagne, a member of the French Parliament from the West African colony of Senegal, and funding from African American civil rights and fraternal organizations such as the NAACP, the Elks, and the Masons, convened a Pan-African Congress in Paris. The Congress, attended by approximately sixty representatives from sixteen nations, protectorates, and colonies, however, was more "pan" than African since most of the delegates had little, if any, first-hand knowledge of the African continent. Prominent American attendees included black members of the NAACP such as John Hope, president of Morehouse College, and Addie W. Hunton, who had served with black troops in France under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), as well as white NAACP members, such as the Columbia University professor Joel Spingarn, the socialist William English Walling, and the socialist muckraking author Charles Edward Russell.
Among the other delegates from the United States were Roscoe Conklin Simmons, a well-known black orator; Rayford W. Logan, who had served with the U.S. Army in France; black women's rights activist Ida Gibbs Hunt; and Dr. George Jackson, a black American missionary in the Congo.

Conference participants adopted a resolution calling for the drafting of a code of law "for the international protection of the natives of Africa." Otherdemands called for direct supervision of colonies by the League of Nations to prevent economic exploitation by foreign nations; to abolish slavery and capital punishment of colonial subjects who worked on the plantationsof European colonial powers in Africa, especially in the Belgian Congo; andto insist on colonial peoples' right to education. Moreover, the gathering stressed the need for further congress meetings and suggested the creation of an international quarterly, the Black Review, which was to be published in several languages. 'While congress attendees insisted that African natives should be allowed eventually to participate in their own government, they did not demand African self-determination. Despite the moderate nature of the demands, the European and American powers represented at the Versailles Peace Conference remained noncommittal.

The Pan-African Congress reconvened in London in August 1921 and a month later in Brussels, Belgium. Both meetings featured representativesfrom the Americas, the Caribbean, Europe, and Africa who echoed earlier Pan-Africanist reformist ideas, denouncing imperialism in Africa and racism in the United States. Moreover, the delegates demanded local self-government for colonial subjects and DuBois stressed the need for increased interracial contacts between members of the black intelligentsia and those concerned about the political and economic status of colonialpeoples.

In 1923, the Pan-African Congress met in two separate sessions in Londonand in Lisbon, Portugal. Noted European intellectuals such as H.G. Wells and Harold Laski attended the London session. Several members of previous meetings participated in the deliberations that addressed the conditions of the African Diaspora as well as the global exploitation of black workers. While some scholars argue that the 1921 and 1923 congresses were effective only in keeping alive the idea of an oppressed people trying to abolish the yoke of discrimination, others claim that the international gatherings laid the foundation for the struggle that ultimatelyled to the political emancipation of the African continent.

Delegates reconvened for a fifth Pan-African Congress in New York in 1927. The congress featured 208 delegates from twenty-two American states and ten foreign countries. Africa, however, was represented only sparsely by delegates from the Gold Coast, Sierra Leone, Liberia, and Nigeria. The small number of African delegates was due in part to travel restrictions that the British and French colonial powers imposed on those interested in attending the congress, in an effort to inhibit further Pan- African gatherings. Most of the delegates were black Americans and manyof them were women. The congress was primarily financed by Addie W. Hunton and the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, aninterracial organization that had been founded in 1919 by opponents of World War I. Similar to previous Pan-African congresses, participants discussed the status and conditions of black people throughout the world.

The financial crisis induced by the Great Depression and the military exigency generated by World War II necessitated the suspension of the Pan-African Congress for a period of eighteen years. In 1945, the organized movement was revived in Manchester, England. It is unclear whether DuBois or George Padmore, a West Indian Marxist, provided the initiative for this meeting. Recognizing DuBois's historic contribution to thePan-African movement, delegates named him president of the 1945 congress. The Manchester meeting marked a turning point in the history of the gatherings. For the first time representatives of political parties from Africa and the West Indies attended the meetings. Moreover, the conservative credo of the forum gave way to radical social, political, and economic demands. Congress participants unequivocally demanded an end to colonialism in Africa and urged colonial subjects to use strikes and boycotts to end the continent's social, economic, and political exploitation by colonial powers.

While previous Pan-African congresses had been controlled largely by black middle-class British and American intellectuals who had emphasizedthe amelioration of colonial conditions, the Manchester meeting was dominated by delegates from Africa and Africans working or studying in Britain. The new leadership attracted the support of workers, trade unionists, and a growing radical sector of the African student population. With fewer African American participants, delegates consisted mainly of anemerging crop of African intellectual and political leaders, who soon won fame, notoriety, and power in their various colonized countries.

The final declaration of the 1945 congress urged colonial and subject peoples of the world to unite and assert their rights to reject those seeking to control their destinies. Congress participants encouraged colonized Africans to elect their own governments, arguing that the gainof political power for colonial and subject peoples was a necessary prerequisite for complete social, economic, and political emancipation. This politically assertive stance was supported by a new generation of African American activists such as the actor and singer Paul Robeson, theminister and politician Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., and the educator and political activist William A. Hunton Jr. who took an increasing interest in Africa.

While the Pan-African congresses lacked financial and political power, theyhelped to increase international awareness of racism and colonialism and laid the foundation for the political independence of African nations.
African leaders such as Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, Nnamdi Azikiwe of Nigeria, and Jomo Kenyatta of Kenya were among several attendees of congresses who subsequently led their countries to political independence.In May 1963, the influence of these men helped galvanize the formation ofthe Organization of African Unity (OAU), an association of independent African states and nationalist groups.

The Gondar College of Medical Sciences (founded 1954)

The Gondar College of Medical Sciences is located in Gondar in the northwestern part of Ethiopia. The college, founded in 1954, is the oldesthealth professional training institute in Ethiopia.

The medical college was located in Gondar in 1954 in part because of themalaria epidemic that devastated the region during 1952 and 1953. Thecollege was designed to educate various health care workers in a mannerthat would allow them to address the particular health needs of rural Ethiopia. While most professional training institutions focus on preparing graduates to understand the disease processes as they affect individuals and especially on diagnosis and management, Gondar College has emphasized preventative medicine and focused on public health (community health) in its training, service, and research activities.

In 1961 the college was placed under the direction of the Haile Selassie I University, now known as Addis Ababa University. The college also offeredfor the first time a bachelor of science degree in Public Health. Over the next 20 years, the college played a prominent role in preparing over 1,100professionals. In 1978 the institution was authorized to establish a medical school to train doctors, health officers, community nurses, and other health professionals. Since 1979 when the first class enrolled in the school's medical program, the program has grown both in size and function. In 1994, the college was renamed the Gondar College of Medical Sciences (GCMS), and its mission was redefined to include the basic research in health sciences and to serve as a referral health center for the region.

The college is at present undertaking various projects for expansion of itsactivities including construction of a new library, a student dormitory, classrooms, and science laboratories. It increased its student enrollment by 30% with the 2009 school year. Today GCMS has over 2,000 studentsenrolled in medical and health science fields ranging from nursing and public health to internal medicine, surgery, pediatrics, obstetrics/ gynecology, radiology, dentistry, and orthopedics. The students are recruited from all regions of Ethiopia. In 2004 GCMS became part of the University of Gondar. The entire university has 11,000 regular students and 6,000 extension students in 35 undergraduate programs and 8 graduate programs.

Ethiopia At The Olympic Arena:

Unforgettable Marathon Legends

Ethiopia started competing in the Olympics at the 1956 Melbourne Olympics in Australia and the only sport the Ethiopian contingent participated in was cycling. The team returned to Ethiopia ranking ninth in the world.

The Marathon Legend Abebe Bikila on His Birthday:

(August 7, 2015 News, Sport, Stories) Abebe Bikila the Legend It is athriller rare in modern Olympics. With amazing grace he changed theOlympic Marathon leaving colorful footsteps forever. First he ran barefooted then in shoes

Early Life

Abebe Bikila was born in 1932 in the North Showa region of Ethiopia, in avillage called Jato. He grew up in a typical village setting. He received some church education. In his youth, he was noted as a good swimmer, Guna player, a type of hockey played during Christmas, and a skillful horse rider. At the age of 17 he moved to the capital city, Addis Ababa, where he began a military carrier in the imperial bodyguard regiment.

Athletic Career

To keep the troops physically fit, the army unit had regular sport activities. This program gave him a chance to develop his natural talent for sport. Later on as a symbol of unity the armed forces established a yearly sport competition event, which was designed to reunite the three forces, The Army, The Air Force and The Navy in shared activities. In his first Annual National Army Athletic competition, he finished the race in 2 hours 39 minutes and 50 seconds. That opened a new chapter in his life. He was noted by the Swedish coach Onni Niskanen who was then a director of athletics under the ministry of education and later an official ofthe Red Cross.

With the assistance of Niskanen, Abebe made an intensive preparation forthe 1960 Rome Olympics. Abebe Wakijera was the only other athlete whoqualified to go to Rome besides Abebe Bikila. Just days before the competition, Abebe had a blister in his foot due to running with a new shoe. Some had claimed that he used to train on barefoot. However, it was absolutely not true. He decided to run barefoot only as a result of inconvenience. Sergey Popov of Russia, who was the world record holder,Abdesselem Rhadi of Morocco, who won the international race that same year and another notable, Barry Maggee, of New Zealand were among theparticipants and the favorites to win the race. The race began at Campidoglio Square. Abebe kept running close but wasnot in the leaders pack until they approached the 10 kilometer mark. By the 15 kilometers, he gained momentum and joined the leaders group. Bythen the competition came down to four people which included Rhadi and Arthur Kelly of Britain followed by the Belgian Van den Dreissche and Abebe Bikila. At the 20th kilometer mark Abebe and Rahdi were running side by side leaving everybody behind them. They passed the 35th kilometer mark running neck to neck. With 1 kilometer left, Abebe Bikila drew away. The distance between the two front runners gradually grew. Running strongly Abebe Bikila finished the race with a new record time of2 hours 15 minutes and 16.25 second improving the previous record thatwas set at Helsinki in 1952 by about 8 minutes.

When Niskanen was later asked by a reporter if he was surprised by Abebe’s victory, he replied that he was not and he added that “others do not know Abebe as I do. He has no fear for his rivals. He has strong willpower and dedication. There is none like Abebe I had ever seen. Abebewas made by Abebe, not by me or anyone.”

In the following years he participated in several international competitions. However, the competition that gained him more fame in thehistory of the Olympics came four years later at the Tokyo Olympics. The 18th Olympic Game, the first in Asia was spectacularly organized. The marathon was highly regarded by the Japanese as a real test of human endurance compare to a life-long journey.

The race started with sixty-eight world class athletes. Immediately Ron Clark of Australia and the Irishman Jim Hogan took the lead pack. This time running with shoes, Abebe stayed close in the front lead. Gradually he advanced and at the 20th kilometer mark he became first opening gapbetween himself and the other two front runners.

Running with soft strides; Abebe became the lone runner leaving everyonebehind. He was already a favorite of the Japanese. He won the Mainichi marathon held in Osaka in June of 1961. Estimated by the police over a million spectators lined up in the streets cheered him at every step of the way. He won the race with a record time of 2 hours 12 minutes 11.2 second improving his own record time in Rome. Once again, he crossed the track into the field and preformed his stretching exercise. He dazzled and astounded the 80,000 spectators. Basil Heatley came second followedby Kokichi Tsuburaya of Japan in the stadium. Abebe had undergone an appendectomy 36 days before the Olympic. At the finish, he had showed no expression of fatigue nor convulsion or enthusiasm.

In a news conference after the event Abebe predicted that he would win inthe 1968 Olympic in Mexico City. Mexico City situated at a similar altitude to Addis Ababa. While training before the 1967 Zarauz competition Abebe hurt his leg. He competed in the race but failed to finish the course. He was sent to Germany for the necessary treatment by the Emperor; however the discomfort to his leg was recurring during training.

Very much confident, he arrived in Mexico City with the intention of winning and defending his Olympic title for the third time. He started in the leading pack running ahead most of the way. Many were certain that Abebe would win a gold medal. Nevertheless, his injury to his leg could not take the pain any more. As the pain became unbearable, he decided to leave the competition. It was reported that he encouraged Mamo Woldewho was in the race, “I cannot continue running because I am seriously ill.The responsibility of winning a gold medal for Ethiopia is in your shoulder.”At the 15 kilometer mark Abebe dropped out of the race. Mamo Wolde took the lead running alone with a little competition from the rest of the athletes and finished the race in the first place in 2 hours 20 minutes and 26.4 seconds.

Accident and Post-accident Life

Bikila was driving his Volkswagen Beetle back from his home town. Abebehad a tragic car accident. in Addis Ababa when he had to swerve to avoida group of protesting students. He lost control of the car and it collided ina ditch, trapping him. He was freed eventually but the accident left him quadriplegic. Realized by the Emperor that he could not successfully be treated at the local medical facility, he was sent to the Stoke Mandeville hospital in England.

He was operated on at the Stoke Mandeville hospital in England and his condition improved to paraplegic. After eight months of treatment he returned to Ethiopia in a wheelchair. Upon his return he was welcomed bya cheering crowd. His physical limit never made him give up his love for sport. His competitive sprits never diminished.

Niskanen convinced him to take up archery and Bikila entered competitions for athletes in wheelchairs, including the International Paraplegic Games, for which he was practicing in this picture, at the Stoke Mandeville stadium.

It was at the hospital in Stoke Mandeville that he strengthened his handsand made them skilled. Two years later, 1971, he entered in a paraplegicsport competition in England competed in Archery among hundred competitors he finished seventh. In that same year he participated in theInternational Paraplegic Games in Norway. He competed in dog sled raceand finished first. As a result of his achievements as an outstanding marathoner and paraplegic sport person, he was respected and received with warm welcome by fans, officials and Presidents alike around the world.

In 1972, he was invited to the Munich Olympic Games as a special guest. He was received by standing ovation as he entered the stadium in a wheelchair. In remembrance of his fortieth birthday a gala celebration washeld at the Olympic village in the presence of athletes and officials of the organization.

The Death of a Hero

Abebe Bikila died In 1973 October 20 at the age of 41. He was buried atthe St. Joseph cemetery. An estimated of 75,000 mourners, His majesty,members of the royal families, ambassadors as well as local and international reporters attended the state funeral. Source: Abebe Bikila

Legend People: Who Is Estelle Sylvia Pankhurst?

Born: May 5, 1882, Manchester, United Kingdom...Died: September 27, 1960, Addis Ababa, Ethiopia

She's the mother of the renowned historian Richard Pankhurst.

Sylvia Pankhurst (1882-1960) a socialist feminist, with her son the historian Richard Pankhurst. Sylvia’s relentless campaign for the restoration of Ethiopian independence, first against the Italians and thenagainst the British, was warmly appreciated.

When in 1960, aged 74, she accepted an invitation issued by the Ethiopiangovernment, to live there. She was an honoured guest. When she died in Ethiopia in 1960 at the age of 78, she was given a state funeral. The last resting place of Sylvia Pankhurst: Estelle Sylvia Pankhurst was anEnglish campaigner for the suffragette movement in the United Kingdom. She was for a time a prominent left communist who then devoted herself to the cause of anti-fascism.

Great Rift Valley In East Africa: Site of the oldest hominid fossils The Great Rift Valley in East Africa refers to a massive land depression, formed approximately twenty million years ago when two parallel fault lines pulled apart. The rift stretches along East Africa from the Jordan River Valley to Central Mozambique, and is of such scale that Rift Valley isclearly visible in photographs of earth taken from space.

At a total length of roughly 3,000 miles, the massive depression varies between 25 and 37 miles wide and plummets from 10 feet to an extraordinary 6,000 feet in depth. Along either side of the Rift Valley reside volcanoes both active and dormant. Some of the most impressive peaks include Mount Kenya, and Kilimanjaro, the highest mountain in Africa. Together with the many steam vents and boiling springs in the RiftValley, these volcanoes help contribute to an area rich in ash and sodiumcarbonate, turning many of the lakes in the area heavily alkaline. Despitethis alkalinity, these lakes are home to a majority of the world's flamingos, which have developed the ability to eat algae off the lake without consuming the corrosive liquid.

The Rift Valley is home to the deepest lakes in East Africa, including Lake Turkana in Kenya. The rapidly eroding highlands have filled the valley withsediments which create a favorable environment for fossil preservation.

Consequently the Rift Valley was the locale where some of the earliest human ancestor remains, tools, and weapons have been uncovered. Mary Leakey's 1959 discovery of the 1.75 million year old Zinjanthropus cranium at Tanzania's Olduvai Gorge, a section of the Rift Valley, drew worldwide attention to the area as a region of discovery in paleoanthropology. The 1974 discovery of 3.2 million year old "Lucy," a 40% complete Australopithecus skeleton by paleoanthropologist Donald C.Johanson near Hadar, Ethiopia, as well as other subsequent discoveries inKenya and Tanzania including a 4.4 million year old female named Ardi in the Afar Depression in Ethiopia in 1994, indicate that the Rift Valley is humankind's ancestral homeland.

LEGEND PEOPLE:

Ex-Royal Princess Tenagnwork Haile Selassie of Ethiopia

Born in 1912 in the city of Harrar, she was the eldest child of the marriageof the then Dejazmatch Tafari Makonnen and his wife Woizero Menen Asfaw (the future Emperor Haile Selassie and Empress Menen of Ethiopia).Princess Tenagnework Haile Selassie was married at a young age to Dejazmach Desta Damtew (posthumously Ras), a member of the aristocratic Adisge clan. Her husband was at various times appointed as Governor-General of Keffa and Limu, and then Sidamo provinces. PrincessTenagnework and Ras Desta had six children, Princesses Aida, Seble, Sophia and Hirut, as well as Princes Amha and Iskinder Desta Upon the occupation of Ethiopia by fascist Italy in 1936, Princess Tenagnework and her children went into exile with the rest of the Imperial family while her husband remained behind to command the Imperial Ethiopian forces in southern Ethiopia. Ras Desta was captured and summarily executed by the Italians. The widowed princess lived in Bath, England with her parents,and acted as hostess for her father most of the time as the Empress spentmuch of her exile in Jerusalem due to the harsh climate of Britain. While in exile the Princess during a brief union with Ato Abebe Retta, gave birth to a daughter Tsige Mariam Abebe. Shortly before the restoration in 1941 Princess Tenagnework's eldest son, Amha Desta died. The Princess returned to Ethiopia in 1941 following the restoration and would marry Betwoded (later Ras) Andargatchew Messai. Bitwoded Andargatchew would serve as Governor-General of Beghemidir and Simien province.

Later, following the federation of Eritrea to the Ethiopian Empire, BitwodedAndargatchew and Princess Tenagnework would serve as the first Vice-royand Vice-reine of Eritrea, representing the Ethiopian crown. Eventually thecouple would return to Addis Ababa from Asmara where the Bitwoded waselevated to the title of Ras and served as Minister of the Interior, and thenmade a Senator and a Crown Councilor. Princess Tenagnework would havea daughter by Ras Andargatchew, Mentewab Andargatchew, who died in infancy. Ras Andargatchew had three daughters previous to his marriage to the Princess and were raised by her. Princess Tenagnework was active in charitable works and participated in organizations that dealt with women's issues. She was the founder of the Sebeta School and Center for the Blind. She also from her private funds helped construct several public schools including those at Asebot, Wondo Guenet, Kuyera, Gefersa, and many other localities. She also funded training centers for the physically handicaped at Magdalla in Wollo, and Kuyera in Arsi. The Princess donatedher large estate at Ginde Beret to be used as a center for the treatment ofthose affected by Leporsy, and donatedanother large vegitable and dairy farm and tree nursery at Gefersa to the Cheshire Home Charitable Organization. Princess Tenagnework also donated the land on which the now famous Fistula Hospial established by Dr. Hamlin was built. She also founded Ethiopia's first old age home for impoverished elderly people without anyone to care for them. Following the death of her younger sisterPrincess Tsehai in 1941, Princess Tenagnework took over the presidency of the Ethiopian Women's Charitable Works Association and headed this organization until it was disolved by the Derg in 1974. After the death of Empress Menen in 1961, Princess Tenagnework became the most visible and foremost woman at the Imperial court. During the lead up to the revolution, the Princess became victim to a smear campaign not only by leftist radicals who spearheaded the revolution, but also by officials that identified with the technocrats against the conservative nobility. Increasingly blamed for much of the lack of reform, the Princess found herself increasingly used as a scapegoat for the lack of change perhaps farbeyond her actual level of influence. Princess Tenagnework and the rest ofthe Imperial family were placed in detention on September 11, 1974. The next day, Emperor Haile Selassie was deposed and also placed under arrest. The Princess together with other women of the Imperial family washeld in the notorious Akaki prison, known as "Alem Bekagn" (I've had enough of this world) for the next 15 years. While imprisoned, Princess Tenagnework's remaining son, Rear Admiral Iskinder Desta, was executed by firing squad without trial in November 1974, her father Emperor Haile Selassie I was murdered, her daughter Emebet Tsige Mariam died in Ethiopia, and her husband Ras Andargatchew died in exile in London. In September of 1989, Princess Tenagnework and the women of the Imperialfamily were all freed from prison. A year later, the male members of the family were also freed. Soon after, the Princess and some of the other members of the family were permitted to leave Ethiopia and joined the rest of the Imperial family in exile. Princess Tenagnework settled in the Virginia suburbs of Washington DC to be near her surviving sibling, CrownPrince Asfaw Wossen (Emperor-in-Exile Amha Selassie). Deeply affected by her brother's death in 1997, her health began to decline. She returned to Ethiopia permanently in 1999 and took part in the re-burial of Emperor Haile Selassie's remains in November 2000. She continued to receive emense respect and deference in post-monarchial Ethiopia after she was released from prison as the matriarch of the Imperial house. Princess Tenagnework died on April 6, 2003 at her home in Addis Ababa and was buried at Holy Trinity Cathedral on April 12.

Legend People

Bekele Mola This Ethiopian entrepreneur (1913 - 2000) is arguably the single most important personality to have left a long lasting positive effecton the tourist industry of southern Ethiopia from Mojo to Moyalle. He had started his business at the age of 12 just with less than 16 Maria Theresa dollars selling eggs and chicken in Harar. At the end of his long and fruitfullife, his business empire was responsible for employing more than 500 people.

Ethiopian Legendary People

Emperor Menelik II (1844-1913), one of the most documented and beloved figures in Ethiopian history, made an impressive attempt to change Ethiopia and its feudal system for ever. From his capital of Addis Ababa, founded only a few short years before he became emperor, Menelik directed the process of changing Ethiopia from a traditional to modern polity. His period of rule saw the introduction of el...ectricity, telephone, telegraph, cinema, public schools, printing press, and hospitals. The Emperor employed European advisors to modernize his army, to introduce modern communications and transportation. He was savvy enough to embrace the new technology of his time—photography—as he was well aware that a picture with the insignia of his office could only enhance power. The emperor was introduced to the new technology by his Swiss councilor, Bitwadad Alfred Ilg. (Text ends)

Legend People:

Lij Eyasu and his father, King Michael of Wollo.

As the Emperor Menelik II had no acknowledged sons who lived to adulthood, the question as to who his heir would be was always open during much of his reign. He was said to personally favor his cousin Ras Makonnen, son of his paternal aunt, Woizero Tenagnework Sahle Selassie.

Ras Makonnen h...ad been a loyal and faithful subject, who had acted as the de-facto minister of foreign affairs for many years. He had represented the Emperor at the coronation of King Edward VII in London, and had traveled extensively in Europe, including Italy where he had triedto negotiate a solution to the crises over the Treaty of Wuchale, which later resulted in the Battle of Adowa. He had also served at Adowa as a commander, shared most of the Emperor's progressive views, and was quite well respected and liked in court circles. His untimely death in March1906 however, left the succession up for grabs as the Emperor aged and became increasingly frail. Other candidates for the throne included Dejazmatch Taye Gulilat, direct descendant of Menelik's paternal uncle, Merid Azmatch Haile Michael Sahle Selassie. Another was Ras Wolde Giorgis Aboye, the son of Woizero Ayahilush Sahile Selassie, another aunt of the Emperor. Nevertheless, Lij Eyasu Michael was always a favorite candidate for the position of heir apparent as Menelik's only grandson. Lij Eyasu was educated at the Imperial Palace in Addis Ababa, and also at theold Shewan capital, Ankober. He also traveled often to his father in Desse.He was taught at the modern Menelik II school with other young noblemen later on. From an early age, he was made aware of his proximity to the throne of Solomon. His step-grandmother, Empress Taituseems to have had reservations about his position from the beginning.

Even as a young boy, and increasingly as he grew older, the prince showed little regard for her, and the childless Empress did not relish the thought of being at his mercy one day. The roots of this may have been inthe deep seated rivalry between the Mammadoch clan of his father, and the Empress's Werresheik clan of Yejju, both of whom claimed precedencein Wollo. Although relations between Ras Michael and Empress Taitu were always civil, her brother Ras Welle Bitul was an avowed enemy of Michael,and the two Rases often exasperated the Emperor with their constant feuding. Empress Taitu, in addition to her Yejju lineage, was also of Simien blood, and had Imperial ancestry in the Gondar line. As a thorough northerner, she was resented by the Shewan aristocrats as ambitious for her own family and their pretensions. Indeed, Taitu had managed to marry all her relatives into the major aristocratic houses of Shewa, Tigrai, and Gojjam. It was whispered, that the Empress would prefer Menelik's daughter Zewditu ascend the throne as Empress. As Zewditu was married to Taitu's nephew, Gugsa Welle, son of the aforementioned Ras Welle Bitulwho was also of Imperial blood, it was said that she hoped that the couple would rule Ethiopia together, and return the capital to Gondar. Thus her Yejju-Gondar relatives would have unfettered influence at the expense of the Shewan aristocracy which surrounded Menelik and the non-Yejju Wollonobles whose hopes were pinned to Eyasu. As it was, the Tigreans and themost of the Wollo shared the concerns of the Shewans as far as the ambitions of the Empress, and there was little likelihood of her being able to carry out this plan. In October 1909, it was decided that Lij Eyasu should be betrothed to marry Romanework Mengesha, daughter of Ras Mengesha Yohannis, and granddaughter of Emperor Yohannis IV. She wasalso the daughter of Woizero Kefey Welle, and thus great-neice of Empress Taitu. It was a brilliant political match on several levels. This marriage was the second attempt at a union between the Houses of Tigraiand Shewa (the first being the marriage between Ras Araya Selassie Yohannis and Princess Zewditu which ended with the death of the Ras),and it had the added element of involving an alliance between Empress Taitu's family and that of Ras Michael. It was clearly a product of the Empress' policy of political marriage, and served her interests nicely. As the couple were still very young, the nuptials were not consummated, pending their coming of age. Possibly, no one wanted to repeat the tragedy of Zenebework Michael. (Text ends)

Lij Melaku Beyan & The Ethio Italian War of 1935 to 1941

By the mid 1930s the Emperor had sent a second diplomatic mission tothe U.S. Vexed at Italy's consistently aggressive behavior towards his nation, Haile Selassie attempted to forge stronger ties with America.

Despite being a member of the League of Nations, Italy disregarded international law and invaded Ethiopia in 1935. The Ethiopian governmentappeale...d for support at the League of Nations and elsewhere, through representatives such as the young, charismatic speaker Melaku Beyan in the United States. Beyan had married an African American activist, Dorothy Hadley, and together they created a newspaper called Voice of Ethiopia to simultaneously denounce Jim Crow in America and fascist invasion in Ethiopia. Joel Rogers, the correspondent who had previously attended the Emperor's coronation, returned to Ethiopia as a war correspondent for The Pittsburgh Courier, then America's most widely- circulated black newspaper. Upon returning to the United States a year later, he published a pamphlet entitled The Real Facts About Ethiopia, a scathing and uncompromising report on the destruction caused by Italian troops in Ethiopia. Melaku Beyan used the pamphlet in his speaking tours, while his wife Dorothy designed and passed out pins that read "Save Ethiopia."

In Harlem, Chicago, and various other cities African American churches urged their members to speak out against the invasion. Beyan establishedat least 28 branches of the newly-formed Ethiopian World Federation, an organ of resistance calling on Ethiopians and friends of Ethiopia throughout the United States, Europe, and the Caribbean. News of Ethiopia's plight fueled indignation and furious debates among African Americans. Touched by the Emperor's speech at the League of Nations, Roger's accounts, and Melaku's impassioned message, blacks vowed to support Ethiopia. Still others wrote letters to Haile Selassie, some giving advice, others support and commentary. "I pray that you will deliver yourself from crucifixion," wrote one black woman from Los Angeles, "andshow the whites that they are not as civilized as they loudly assert themselves to be."

Although the United States was not officially in support of Ethiopia, scoresof African Americans attempted to enlist to fight in Ethiopia. Unable to legally succeed on this front, several individuals traveled to Ethiopia on 'humanitarian' grounds. Author Gail Lumet Buckley cites two African American pilots, John Robinson and the 'Black Eagle of Harlem' Hubert Julian, who joined the Ethiopian Air Corps, then made up of only three non-combat planes. John Robinson, a member of the first group of black students that entered Curtis Wright Flight School, flew his plane deliveringmedical supplies to different towns across the country. Blacks in America continued to stand behind the Emperor and organized medical supply drives from New York's Harlem Hospital. Melaku Beyan and his African American counterparts remained undeterred for the remainder of Ethiopia's struggle against colonization. In 1940, a year before Ethiopia's victory against Italy, Melaku Beyan succumbed to pneumonia, which he had caught while walking door-to-door in the peak of winter, speaking boldly about the war for freedom in Ethiopia.

LEGEND PEOPLE:

Who's Colonel Orde Wingate who enters Addis Ababa onhorseback?

At the outbreak of World War II, Wingate was the commander of an anti-aircraft unit in Britain. He repeatedly made proposals to the army and government for the creation of a Jewish army in Palestine which would rule over the area and its Arab population in the name of the British.

Eventually his friend Wavell, by this time c...ommander-in-chief of MiddleEast Command which was based in Cairo, invited him to Sudan to begin operations against Italian occupation forces in Ethiopia. Under William Platt, the British commander in Sudan, he created the Gideon Force, a guerrilla force composed of British, Sudanese and Ethiopian soldiers. Theforce was named after the biblical judge Gideon, who defeated a large force with a tiny band.

Wingate invited a number of veterans of the Haganah SNS to join him. With the blessing of the Emperor of Ethiopia, Haile Selassie, the group began to operate in February 1941. Wingate was temporarily promoted to lieutenant colonel and put in command. He again insisted on leading from the front and accompanied his troops. The Gideon Force, with the aid of local resistance fighters, harassed Italian forts and their supply lines whilethe regular army took on the main forces of the Italian army. The small Gideon Force of no more than 1,700 men took the surrender of about 20,000 Italians toward the end of the campaign. At the end of the fighting, Wingate and the men of the Gideon Force linked with the force ofLt. Gen. Alan Cunningham which had advanced from Kenya to the south and accompanied the emperor in his triumphant return to Addis Ababa in May. Wingate was mentioned in dispatches in April 1941 and was awardeda second DSO in December.

With the end of the East African Campaign on 4 June 1941, Wingate was removed from command of the now-dismantled Gideon Force and his rankwas reduced to that of major. During the campaign he was irritated that British authorities ignored his request for decorations for his men and obstructed his efforts to obtain back pay and other compensation for them. He left for Cairo and wrote an official report which was extremely critical of his commanders, fellow officers, government officials and many others. Wingate was also angry that his efforts had not been praised by authorities, and that he had been forced to leave Abyssinia without havingsaid farewell to Emperor Selassie. Wingate was most concerned about British attempts to stifle Ethiopian freedom, writing that attempts to raise future rebellions amongst populations must be honest ones and should appeal to justice.

Soon after, he contracted malaria. He sought treatment from a local doctor instead of army medical staff because he was afraid that the illnesswould give his detractors another further excuse to undermine him. This doctor gave him a large supply of the drug Atabrine, which can produce asa side-effect depression if taken in high dosages. Already depressed over the official response to his Abyssinian command, and sick with malaria, Wingate attempted suicide by stabbing himself in the neck.
It was only prompt action by another officer that saved him. Wingate wassent to Britain to recuperate. A highly edited version of his report was passed through Wingate's political supporters in London to Winston Churchill. Consequent to this, Leo Amery, the Secretary of State for Indiacontacted Wavell, now Commander-in-Chief in India commanding the South-East Asian Theatre to enquire if there were any chance of employing Wingate in the Far East. On 27 February 1942, Wingate, far from pleased with his posting as a "supernumary major without staff grading", left Britain for Rangoon.
ARCHIEVE: Patriot brothers Abebe Damtew and Desta Damtew The two Patriot brothers Abebe Damtew in the title of Dejazmach & DestaDamtew (posthumously Ras) came to the court of Menelik II as young boys to serve as pages (attendants) to the Emperor and to be trained andeducated in the ways of the palace and governance as was traditional in those times. As pages in the royal household, they were favored by Empress Taitu. At the same time as members of the Addisge clan, they were related to Ras Tessema Nadew who became regent when Menelik fellill and Taitu was restricted from government affairs.
During the fascist invasion, Dejazmatch Abebe Damtew commanded theforces of Goffa and Bako, while his brother Ras Desta led the forces of Sidamo and had general command over all forces in the south of the country. Dejazmatch Abebe Damtew, when defeat was certain went intoexile and settled in Jerusalem during the occupation with his family. He returned and took part in the liberation war. Ras Desta Damtew was captured by fascist forces and executed.

Ras Desta Damtew was married to Princess Tenagnework Haile Selassie.They were the parents of two sons, Princes Amha and Iskinder Desta (later Rear Admiral) and four daughters, Princesses Aida, Seble, Sophia and Hirut Desta.

Dejazmatch Abebe was married to Woizero Wosenyelesh Mengesha, daughter of Ras Mengesha Atikem of Damot and Agew Midir and Enderassie of former Gojjam province. They were the parents of Woizero Mulumebet Abebe (wife of Lij Araya Abebe), Princess Medferiashwork Abebe (wife of Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen) and Woizero Akleweg Abebe.(Text ends)

A second chance to Mrs. Colleta Habte Wold? We all know that the long and the most impressively lived life of the honorable ፀሐፌ ትዕዛዝ Aklilu HabteWold brutally ended by the hands of the Marxist junta in November,1974 . We all know that he was happily married to a beautiful French ladynamed Mrs Colleta until the day he was gunned down along with 60 imperial ministers.

However what it is not known is, the where about of her since then? As weoften said that “No one deserves to be forgotten” so please help shine anylight on her lost and forgotten story. Let us recall Mrs Colleta and write her down on the page of Ethiopian history. What really happened to her?
Where was she by the time of her husband's bloody execution?
Who could have thought that a love that began in Paris while his Honorable Aklilu was over there for further study so long ago, will finallycome to an end in Addis Abeba? Please tell about it and let us recall Colleta and Aklilu to give them a second chance to meet at least in history.

Ethiopia had had great personality and highly educated, very respective authorized leaders but now we mare under highly repressive, non educated, and fascistic ones, really our fate and the situation of Ethiopia isquite a calamity one. The almighty God please rest the soul of great personality like Aklilu Habte Wold and other 60 ex-imperial ministers whose gunned down along with him.

Respect for Self-Heroes: Ex-Royal Ras Asrate Medhin Kassa Governor General of Eritrea province under Ethiopia, and the latterpresident of the Imperial Crowncouncil

Leul Ras Asrate Kassa was a senior Prince of the Blood, and the head of the cadet Selale Branch of the Imperial Dynasty of Ethiopia after the death of his father, Leul Ras Kassa Hailu. He was the son of Leul Ras Kassa Hailu and Princess Tsige Mariam Beshah of Merhabete. The Prince was the youngest son of his parents, and accompanied them into exile during the occupation of Ethiopia by fascist Italy. As a result he survived his elder brothers, Dejazmatches, Wondwossen, Asfaw Wossen, and AberaKassa, who were all executed by the Italians for resisting the occupation. He returned to Ethiopia with his father and the Emperor and participated in the war of liberation in 1941. he attended Sandhurst in the United Kingdom and would serve as a high ranking officer in the post-liberation era in Ethiopia. The then Leul Dejazmatch Asrate Kassa was a key figure in the failure of the 1960 Imperial Coup d'etat against the Emperor. Having eluded capture by the plotters, he helped co-ordinate the civilian and military opposition to the coup. He succeeded his father as head of the Selale branch of the Imperial family, and served in a number of seniorgovernment possitions, among which were Vice Roy in Eritrea and President of the Crown Council in succession to his father. He was regarded as the head of the conservative faction at the Imperial court, which tried to resist the more modernist trends of the government of Prime Minister Aklilu Haptewold, whose non-aristocratic roots were regarded as insufficiently monarchist by the conservative elements atcourt. When military and student unrest brought down the Prime Minister in 1973, the Prince was among the leading voices who called for the elevation of a member to the nobility to the Prime Ministership. Due to hisImperial blod which was as royal as that of the Emperor's children, the Ras was often mentioned as a possible future monarch if the Emperor's line was unable to hold the throne. Prince Asrate Kassa was among the most senior figures arrested by the Derg in what was known as thier "creeping coup" where officials were slowly and gradually eliminated by being placed under arrest over a period of months. He was married to Princess Zuriashwork Gebre Igziabher, daughter of Jantirar Gebre Igziabher and maternally a granddaughter of Ras Mulugeta, the long timeMinister of War during the reigns of Empress Zewditu and Emperor Haile Selassie. He was executed by the Derg on November 23rd, 1974 with 61 other ex-officials of the Imperial government, and was the most senior member of the Imperial Dynasty executed that day. He is shown on the day he was elevated to the title of Leul Ras (Prince Duke) from the title ofLeul Dejazmatch (Prince Earl) by Emperor Haile Selassie.

Pan-AFRICAN ORGAN: Organization of African Unity (OAU)(Establishe May 1963 – Defuncted July 2002)

The Organization of African Unity (OAU, 1963-2002) was an alliance of independent African nations working to enhance cooperation between thenewly decolonized African governments. The alliance had its basis in the Pan-Africanist philosophy encouraging the unity of all peoples of African ancestry, but it also was inspired by ongoing independence struggles as various African nations freed themselves from European colonial rule in the early 1960s.

On May 25, 1963, Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie invited the heads of the 32 independent African nations at the time to convene at his country'scapital, Addis Ababa. The result of this conference was the formation of the OAU, which would grow in membership to include 54 of the 55 Africanstates as members. Morocco was the only state to decline membership.

The OAU's basic principles included promotion of solidarity among Africanstates, improved quality of life for Africans, a promise to defend the sovereignty of African states, and eradication of colonialism in all its forms. The OAU hoped to achieve these goals through cooperation and peaceful negotiation between its members.

The OAU established various working groups, including the Commission ofMediation, Conciliation and Arbitration, which was designed to aid with thepeaceful settlement of disputes between members. The OAU also helped to finance independence movements in those nations still under Europeanrule, thus playing an instrumental role in independence for such states as Zimbabwe in 1980. The OAU further was committed to battling apartheid and white minority rule in states such as South Africa, which joined the organization in 1994.

Ideological differences between the member states often made agreementon a single course of action difficult. The absence of an armed force similar to the United Nations' peacekeeping contingents left the organization with no means to enforce its edicts. And its unwillingness to intervene in the internal affairs of member nations often meant it would not confront brutal dictatorships such as Idi Amin's regime in Uganda or domestic crises such as the Rwandan Genocide, prompting some observers to criticize the OAU as a forum for rhetoric rather than action.

Recognizing many of these shortcomings, the OAU in September 1999 issued the Sirte Declaration, calling for a new body to take its place. OnJuly 9, 2002, this proposal was fulfilled with the creation of the African Union (2002-) which continues to this day to uphold many of the founding principles of the OAU.

REGIONAL DIPLOMACY

The Somali expantionist policies & The Greater Somalia ConceptThe Greater Somalia Concept, The Somali Supreme Military Revolutionary Council and it's chairman Jalee Mohammed Siyad Barre, The Greatest Leader of all time in the horn of Africa!

President Mohammed Siyad Barre advocated the concept of the Greater Somalia (Soomaaliweyn in Af-Somali term), which refers to those regionsin the Horn of Africa in which ethnic Somalis reside and have historically represented the predominant population. Greater Somalia thus encompasses Somalia, the republic of Djibouti, the Ogaden (in modern day Ethiopia) and the North Eastern Province (in Kenya) i.e. the almost exclusively Somali-inhabited regions of the Horn of Africa. In 1977, the Oga...den War broke out after the government sought to incorporate the various Somali-inhabited territories of the region into a Greater Somalia. The Somali national army invaded the Ogaden and was successful at first,capturing most of the territory, reaching near to Addis-ababa the capital of Ethiopia.

The invasion reached an abrupt end with the Soviet Union's shift of support to Ethiopia, followed by almost the entire communist world siding with the latter. The Soviets halted their previous supplies to Barre's regime and increased the distribution of aid, weapons, and training to the Ethiopian government, and also brought in around 15,000 Cuban troops toassist the Ethiopian regime. In 1978,Siyadd Barre withdrew his Somali troops from Ethiopia. Siyadd Barre gave a brotherhood for DJjibouti and helped them to retain their struggle of getting independence until 1977..

REGIONAL DIPLOMACY:

EMPEROR HAILE SELASSIE I MET PRESIDENT MOHAMMED SIYADBARE OF SOMALIA DURING THE APRIL 1974 OAU SUMMIT IN MOGADISHU:

"President Mohammed Siad Barre was hosting the African unity... summitat Mogadishu in April 1974. Almost all African head of states were there and the OAU Secretary General was to be elected, contested by the Somali foreign minister H.E Omar Arteh Ghalib and the Zambian foreign minister Eiah Mudenda. The Somali agendas priority was as far as the Ethiopian emperor was attending the summit was to lobby within the African Head of States to support Somalia’s claim of the Ethiopian Ogadenterritories. The election of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) secretary General turned out to have no winner because there were not enough votes for either candidate to secure the position.

Many English-speaking countries were supporting Zambia, while the French and Arabic speaking countries were supporting Somalia. PresidentMohammed Siad Barre asked his foreign minister to decline and the Zambian foreign minister to become OAU Secretary General.

Senegal President Leopold Senghor, Empreror Haile Selassie and PresidentSiyad Bare as conferred, the Senegalese President Léopold Sedar Senghortried to mediate the Ethiopian Emperor and the President of Somalia Mohammed Siad Barre. The emperor was feeling tired and frail because ofthe uprising going on back in his country due to famine and lawlessness.
There were student demonstrations in the streets of Addis Ababa with communist ideologies. There was also a military mutiny and also disguisingly showing allegiance to the emperor. Siad Barre was in his peak time with Soviet military arsenal.

Siad Barre is showing that he is not happy with what Leopold Senghor wassaying, thinking that he is sympathizing the Emperor’s argument. On terms of Léopold Senghor is seen to be explaining to both parties about the OAU charter defining that colonial borders should remain, as it was whenever an African country was declared as independent state. PresidentSedar Senghor has had expressed with his hands drawing about borders. Ithink Siad Barre was thinking of what next words he was going to say"

SOLOMONIC DYNASTY:

Amha Selassie I, Emperor In-exile of Ethiopia (1916-1997)

Amha Selassie, the last emperor of Ethiopia, was proclaimed ruler of the state three times, first in 1960 then in 1975 and finally while in exile in 1989. Selassie was born Asfaw Wossen Tafari in the walled city of Harrarin August 1916 to Dejazmach Tafari Makonnen, then the governor of Harrar and future emperor of Ethiopia, and his wife Menen Asfaw. Amha Selassie became Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen of Ethiopia when his father was crowned emperor on November 2, 1930.

In December 1960, the Imperial Guard launched a coup and seized powerin Ethiopia while the emperor was on a visit to Brazil. The coup leaders compelled the 44 year old crown prince to read a radio statement in whichhe accepted the crown in his father's place and announced a government of reform. However, the regular army and the Ethiopian Orthodox Church refused to accept the new government, and the leader of the church, Patriarch Abune Baslios, issued an anathema against all those who cooperated with the coup leaders. Emperor Haile Selassie returned to Ethiopia and the army stormed the palace, where members of the government were being held prisoner by the Imperial Guards. In 1973, Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen suffered a massive stroke and was evacuated to Switzerland for medical treatment. He was accompanied by his wife and daughters and was living abroad when the Derg, a committeeof Ethiopian Army officers, deposed Emperor Haile Selassie on September12, 1974. The crown prince returned to Addis Ababa, the capital, to lead the new government. His brief reign ended seven months later when he was deposed and exiled by the Derg after they abolished the Ethiopian monarchy in March 1975. He and his family fled the country and settled in London, UK.

In April 1989, Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen was again proclaimed "Emperorof Ethiopia" at his home in London by members of the exiled Ethiopian community. He took the throne name of Amha Selassie I. Amha Selassie died of longtime ailments in Virginia, in the United States, at age 80 on February 17, 1997. He had never completely recovered from the massive stroke he experienced in 1973. His body was flown back to Ethiopia and buried in the imperial family vaults. Sources: Saheed A. Adejumobi, The History of Ethiopia (Westport: Greenwood Press, 2007).

The young Ethiopian doctor, Aklilu Lemma, discovered that suds from thefruit of a common African plant, the endod or soapberry, which African women have used as soap for centuries, act as a potent molluscicide. To follow up this discovery, Aklilu Lemma in 1966 established the Institute ofPathobiology in Addis Ababa University, and for the next 10 years he directed a team to carry out systematic research on endod. He was joinedin this work in 1974 by Legesse Wolde-Yohannes

Ethiopian Legends:

Lt. Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam Wolde (ca1937-)

Mengistu Haile Mariam, a former Lieutenant Colonel in the Ethiopian Army, led a coup which ousted Emperor Haile Selassie from power in 1974. Mengistu took control of the government and served as its Communist head of state in Ethiopia from 1977 to 1991. He formally assumed power as chair of the Worker's Party, head of state and Derg (military junta) chairman in 1977. In fact Mengistu had wielded behind-the-scenes power since the coup of 1974. Under Mengistu, Ethiopia received aid from the Soviet Union, other members of the Warsaw Pact,and Cuba.

Opposition against Mengistu's regime emerged with a rebellion against thenew government between 1977 and 1978. The government suppressed the rebellion and in the process generated thousands of casualties, estimated at 100,000 killed or disappeared. In response the anti-MengistuEthiopian People's Revolutionary Party (EPRP) launched a guerilla strugglethat would last until the overthrow of Mengistu's regime in 1991.

On September 10, 1987, Mengistu turned a civilian president under a newconstitution, and the country was renamed the People's Democratic Republic of Ethiopia. Mengistu's government was faced with enormous difficulties throughout the 1980s in the form of droughts, widespread famine (notably the Ethiopian famine of 1984-1985), and insurrections, particularly in the northern regions of Tigre and Eritrea. In 1989, the Tigrean People's Liberation Front merged with other ethnically based opposition movements to form the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). In May 1991, EPRDF forces advanced on AddisAbaba. The EPRDF forces successful toppling of the Mengistu government coincided with the fall of Communism in the Soviet Union. The new Russian government ended aid to Ethiopia.

Mariam Mengistu fled the country with 50 family and Derg members and was soon granted asylum in Zimbabwe as an official "guest" of Robert Mugabe, the president of that country. Mengistu left behind almost the entire membership of the original Derg and the Workers Party of Ethiopia(WPE) leadership, which was promptly arrested and put on trial upon theassumption of power by the EPRDF. Mengistu still resides in Zimbabwe, despite attempts by Ethiopia to extradite him to face trial. Several formermembers of the Derg have been sentenced to death in absentia by the new regime. The trial against Mariam Mengistu started in 1994, and in January 2007 he was sentenced to life imprisonment for genocide. He remains in exile in Zimbabwe. Source: Saheed A. Adejumobi, The Historyof Ethiopia (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 2007).

ETHIOPIA/ERITREA

Eritrea from annexation to independence

Martin Plaut December 14, 2012

Over the years I have collected a series of photographs, illustrating Eritrean history. They are not comprehensive since they depended on what I could find. Here are a selection that illustrate Eritrea’s extraordinary fight for independence from Ethiopia that lasted 30 years.

The British dilemma

At the end of the Second World War Britain was faced with the question ofwhat to do with Eritrea, which it had captured from Italy in 1941.

London turned to the United Nations, which established a Commission todecide the issue.

The Commission went to Eritrea in February in 1950 and canvassedopinion.

On October 7th 1951 Dr. Eduardo Anze Matienzo of Bolivia, UN commissioner for Eritrea, announced that Eritreans had accepted a UN plan for federation with Ethiopia, despite many calling for independence.

He is shown here in December 1951, talking to people in Asmara.

The US Ambassador to the UN, John Foster Dulles, famously declared:"From the point of view of justice, the opinions of the Eritrean people must receive consideration.

Nevertheless the strategic interest of the United States in the Red Seabasin and the considerations of security and world peace make it necessary that the country has to be linked with our ally Ethiopia."

ETHIO/ERITREA: Federation to annexation elections in Eritrea on March 16, 1952, for a representative Assembly of68 members, evenly divided between Christians and Muslims.

This body in turn accepted the draft constitution put forward by the UNcommissioner.

On 11 September 1952 the constitution was ratified by Emperor HaileSelassie.

He is seen on the left cutting the tape on the boundary between Eritrea and Ethiopia on 3rd October 1952, to establish the federation, but it wasnot to last.

The Emperor was determined that Eritrea would be fully incorporated intoEthiopia.

He made Amharic the official language in place of Arabic and Tigrinya,ended the use of the Eritrean flag, imposed censorship, and moved businesses out of Eritrea.

Finally, in 1962 Haile Selassie put enough pressure on the EritreanAssembly for them to vote for an end of the federation.

Resistance grows

In 1957 students demonstrated against the incorporation of Eritrea intoEthiopia.

This was followed in 1958 by trade union demonstrations. A four day strike was repressed with troops firing on the crowd, killing some andinjuring hundreds.

An underground group, the Eritrea Liberation Movement was formed and,in July 1960, the Eritrean Liberation Front was founded in Cairo, led by Mohammed Aden.

The first shots of the liberation struggle were fired by Hamid Idris Awatewhen he attacked a police unit on Mount Adal on 1st September 1961.

This photograph, taken in December 1970, shows ELF guerrillas attackingthe railway near Asciadira, by tearing up the line.

The rebellion continued, but unity did not. In 1968-9 the ELF fracturedand the Eritrean People's Liberation Front was founded in September 1973, led by Isaias Afeworki.

ELF and EPLF fighters managed to penetrate Asmara in early 1975,leading to heavy fighting in the city.

On 13 September 1975 ELF fighters raided the American listening stationat Kagnew, seizing Thomas Bowidowicz, from New Jersey and David Strickland, from Florida.

A $5 million ransom was asked for and, after negotiations, both men werefreed in January 1976.
Clashes between the rival Eritrean movements led to bitter civil war andthe ELF are finally forced out of Eritrea, to seek refuge in Sudan.

Victory and independence

The Eritrean liberation struggle was to suffer many setbacks and itsfighters and civilians to experience terrible suffering.

On several occasions defeat seemed almost inevitable, but finally, by thelate 1980's, the tide turned.

In March 1988 the EPLF destroyed the Ethiopian northern army at thebattle of Afabet. Addis Ababa lost control of large portions of Eritrea.

By 1990 EPLF forces had driven the Ethiopians out of the coastal plan andMassawa.

In February Eritrean forces, using fast speedboats, surprised the Ethiopianforces in the port of Massawa, and the city was captured. The photograph above is captioned: "A EPLF rebel stands in front of a captured Soviet- made cannon used in the taking of the port of Massawa.

The Ethiopians retaliated by bombing the port. Civilians in Massawa cowering beneath a culvert to escape the bombs. The fate of Ethiopianforces was sealed. Eritrean crack units helped Ethiopian rebels of the Tigray People's Liberation Front in their drive for Addis Ababa.
In May 1991 the Ethiopian dictator, Mengistu Haile Mariam fled toZimbabwe and both Eritrea and Ethiopia were free. (Text ends)

Speaking self-mind: Majour Dawit Wolde Giorgis

What surprised me about Sudanese politics -Dawit Wolde GiorgisHe was a military turned civilian general party secretary in the former Eritrea administrative region under Ethiopia.

Sudan is a neighboring country, which has defined our history in many ways. Historically it has been the staging ground of many invasions, whichhas challenged the survival of Ethiopia. In our more recent history it has harbored many kinds of secessionist movements and dissidents. Sudan in its own interest and as a proxy for Egypt and the Ottoman Empire has posed great challenge. During the times I was in the foreign office, and later as a governor of Eritrea I have been sent to Sudan several times to discuss issues of mutual interest.

During one of those visits I have addressed the Sudanese congress reading the message of the Ethiopian people to the people of SudanYou see me here with President Gaafar Nimeiry with his vice president and chief of Security Major Gen. Omar Muhammad al-Tayib. The other you seeher is in Fort Benning Georgia, USA, as a lieutenant attending the advanced infantry school with my course mates from Ethiopia and other countries. Major Mulatu, later major general died last year, Captain Seifu airborne hero killed at Karora, Captain Cheru another airborne hero who has also passed away, and my dear friend Lt. Ghiday standing next to mekilled in the Ogaden. In the front throw left side is Colonel. Abdel RahmanSwar al-Dahab of Sudan.

Now take note of the following interesting story: in April 1985, while President Nimeiry was on an official visit to the United States of America Gen. Abdel Rahman Swar al-Dahab (my coleague you see in the picture who was my course mate in the military training) ousted Nimeiry from power. At the subsequent elections the pro-Islamist leader, Sadiq al-Mahdi(who had attempted a coup against Nimeiry in 1976) became Prime Minister. General Swar al-Dahab became Chairman of the Islamic Call Organization. As of September 2010, he still holds that post. In one of myvisits to Sudan I did invite him to Ethiopia on behalf of our head of state and he did come.

On June 30, 1989, the government of Sadiq al-Mahdi was overthrown in acoup led by Colonel Omar al-Bashir. The current leader. The man behind the coup was DR Hassan 'Abd Allah al-Turabi a religious and Islamist political leader who then headed the National Islamic Front. in Sudan. He has been called "one of the most influential figures in modern Sudanese politics"]and a "longtime hard-liner ideological leader. He became the speaker of the parliament but he was ousted and put in house arrest or prison many times by Bashir.

In 2004 to 2007, after I left my country and became a refugee, I was assigned by the UN as a consultant in Sudan working with the government. There were many familiar faces from earlier years. I met Swar al-Dahab a few times at his place. I felt very much at home with somany officials I know. We have so much in common culturally.

At one time I was invited to a wedding of the daughter of a high profile individual and I was shocked to see all the above people (Nimeiry, Tsadikal Mahdi, Swar al-Dahab, Turabi and current leader Bashir) seated aroundone table joking and laughing. Though I have heard that this was not so strange for the Sudanese I was surprised and of course very much pleased to see such a culture rare in Africa.

At another time I was invited at the 60th anniversary of the founding of the military academy of Sudan. I was the only foreigner invited. There, infront were the three generals Bashir, Nimeri and Swar al-Dahab (officers who have overthrown each other but who were the products of the same military academy,) having fun discussing good old days. I hade an opportunity to talk to them briefly. I expressed how delighted I am to seethem all together and how refreshing it is to people like me who have seen the worst in leaders who don't have such a wisdom and who don't realise greatness in magnanimity.

Remembering The Eminent Surgeon

By Brian Barder

Asrat Woldeyes is a man who fought for the unity of Ethiopia as politicalprisoner, party leader and eminent surgeon, he fought for the unity of Ethiopia

Professor Asrat Woldeyes, who has died aged 70, was successively Ethiopia's most distinguished surgeon, physician and university dean, most controversial political party leader and best known political prisoner.He was also Haile Selassie's personal physician until his mysterious deathin August 1975 (in 1996 he was brought from prison to testify that the emperor had not died of natural causes).

Professor Asrat, who was the first Ethiopian to qualify as a surgeon in the west, after medical studies at Edinburgh University, devoted most of his working life to surgery at the two main hospitals in Addis Adaba, and to the deanship of medicine at the university. He could have practiced in incomparably better conditions in the west – and for greater rewards – buthe preferred to serve his people.

During the dark years of the military communist regime of President Mengistu Haile-Mariam (1974-1991), Asrat continued his medical and university practices. During the 1984-86 famine, his surgical skill savedthe life of the Guardian correspondent, Jonathan Steele, who describedthe event in an eloquent article in the Guardian Weekend magazine lastNovember.

Following the Eritrean-Tigrayan overthrow of Mengistu in May 1991 and the independence of Eritrea, the Tigrayan-dominated government increasingly purged members of the Amhara ascendancy, which had dominated the Haile Selassie and Mengistu regimes. Asrat was among 21 Amhara professors dismissed from the university in 1993. In that year he became founder-chairman of the All Amhara People's Organization (AAPO), dedicated to bringing back the unity of Ethiopia prior to Eritrean independence and the protection of Amhara interests under the ethnically-based constitution of president (now prime minister) Meles Zenawi.

Although AAPO remained nominally legal, its relations with the Meles government deteriorated and in June 1994 Asrat was arrested. He was imprisoned for two years on charges of planning violence against the state, although Amnesty International and other independent observers pronounced the evidence against him dubious and unsafe, and Asrat was on record as condemning violence for political ends. Further convictions followed, each on similarly unsatisfactory evidence, extending his sentence to five years. In 1996 he faced a new trial, repeatedly adjournedand never completed, clearly signalling the government's intention to keephim in prison beyond the expiry of his existing sentences.

By now in his late 90s, and with a heart by-pass, Asrat was incarcerated in a communal cell but forbidden to communicate with his fellow prisoners

− a refined form of solitary confinement. His health deteriorated and in January 1998 he was transferred, under armed guard, to his old hospital,Tikur Anbessa (Black Lion). By November he was in intensive care. Medical details were kept secret, but news of his heart condition, the onset of diabetes, high blood pressure, deteriorating eyesight and a suspected blood clot on the brain caused growing anxiety. His government-appointed doctors reportedly said that to survive, Asrat needed treatment not available in Ethiopia.

On (western) Christmas Day, 1998, the government finally yielded to international appeals for him to be allowed to go abroad for treatment. Asrat was flown to London and then to Houston, Texas. He appeared to recover, but suffered relapses and died at the hospital of the University ofPennsylvania after less than five months of freedom.

Asrat was a man of great dignity and courtesy, stubborn to the point ofcussedness, arguably politically naive. Throughout his five years' harshimprisonment, Amnesty International, with other humanitarian organizations and numerous individuals, including now elderly Scottishdoctors, campaigned for his release. Until very late, however, western governments, whose intervention might have carried weight with the Meles government, refused to go beyond occasional expressions of concern, apparently fearing to irritate a regime which, despite obvious shortcomings, was pro-western and a vast improvement on its predecessor.

It is hard to avoid the conclusion, though, that if those governments had worked harder and earlier, they might have averted the premature deathof the most distinguished, and one of the most courageous, Ethiopians ofour time. Asrat Woldeyes, doctor and politician, born June 12, 1928; diedMay 14, 1999 .

On this day, August 17, it is good to remember Tsegaye Gabre-Medhin, Ethiopia’s greatest playwright, and acclaimed Poet Laureate, as the day ishis birthday. Born in the highland village of Boda, near Ambo, west of theEthiopian capital, Addis Ababa, Tsegaye began his education in the heady days in the immediate aftermath of the Italian Fascist occupation, which had ended in 1941. While still at elementary school he wrote a play called“King Dionysus and the Two Brothers” and saw it staged in the presence, among others, of Emperor Haile Selassie.

Tsegaye later attended the prestigious British Council-supported GeneralWingate school – named after British officer Orde Wingate, who had assisted Ethiopia’s liberation in 1941. The budding playwright subsequently joined Addis Ababa’s innovative Commercial school, wherehe won a scholarship to law school in Chicago.

His interests, however soon took him away from both commerce and law, which he considered as necessary, but soul-destroying pursuits. He turnedinstead to his true loves: poetry and the theatre. In 1960 he travelled to Europe to study experimental drama at the Royal Court Theatre in Londonand the Comédie Française in Paris. On returning to Ethiopia, he devoted himself unreservedly to the development of the country’s National Theatre − which institution last week staged an impressive memorial for its formerdirector.

Besides compositions of his own Tsegaye translated Shakespeare (Hamletand Othello being the most popular of these works), as well as Moliere’s Tartouffe and Doctor Despite Himself, and Bertolt Brecht’s Mother Courage.

Tsegaye, in all things a patriot, was proud of Ethiopia’s long history of independence, and of her unique cultural heritage. He insisted emphatically that his country needed heroes, and used the theatre deliberately to teach his compatriots to respect the Ethiopian heroes of their past. One of the most widely acclaimed of his plays, Tewodros, commemorates the life of the charismatic Ethiopian emperor of that name. A pioneer reformer and moderniser, he committed suicide in 1868rather than fall into the hands of a British expeditionary force which had been dispatched against him.

Another of Tsegaye’s plays, Petros at the Hour, tells the story of Abuna Petros, an Ethiopian bishop, who accompanied Ethiopia's freedom-fightersin their struggle to resist the Italian fascist occupation. Captured by the enemy on the outskirts of Addis Ababa he was subjected to a trumped-upshow trial, which reduces the audience to tears.

Yet another play, the Oda Oak Oracle, a comedy about Ethiopian countrylife, also enjoyed great popularity, both in Ethiopia and abroad, and was staged in no less than eight countries: Britain, Denmark, Italy, Kenya, Nigeria, Romania, Tanzania, and the United States.

His poems, both in Amharic and English, were also widely read. A score ofthem, including Prologue to African Conscience and Black Antigone, were published in the Ethiopia Observer in 1965. Another poem, in Amharic,castigated the European nomenclature for the waterfalls of Sudan and Egypt – which totally ignored those of Ethiopia, and caused Tsegaye proudly to refer to the Ethiopian Tissestat, or Blue Nile Falls as the "ZeroCataract".

During this time Tsegaye travelled widely; he attended the UNESCO- organised First World Black Festival in Dakar, Senegal, and the Pan- African Cultural Festival in Algiers. In 1966, at the age of only 29, he wasawarded his country's highest literary honour: the Haile Selassie I Prize for Amharic Literature – which earned him the title of Laureate, by whichhe has ever since been known.

Ardent patriot that he was, Tsegaye was insistent that his beloved Ethiopia should be seen in wider, Africanist terms. Befriended by PresidentLéopold Sédar Senghor of Senegal, he took a keen interest in the Négritude movement, and in the Paris-based journal Présence Africaine.

He frequently emphasized the African roots of the theatre; and devotedmuch time to studying ancient Egyptian history – to gain a better knowledge of the overall culture of the Nile Valley. This led him to makean extensive study of linguistic history of the region, with special emphasis on the relationship between his country's Cushitic and Semiticlanguages. He was at around this time appointed a Commander of the National Order of Senegal.

Later, after the Ethiopian revolution of 1974 and the fall of Haile Selassie,Tsegaye was appointed for a short time as vice-minister of Culture and Sports, and was active in setting up Addis Ababa University's departmentof Theatre Arts. In 1984 he wrote an extended, and very poetical, essay "Footprints in Time", which appeared with beautiful photographs by the Italian photographer Alberto Tessore, as a "coffee table" book. It traced Ethiopian history from the prehistoric time of Lucy, the first-known hominid, who had then recently been found in the afar area of eastern Ethiopia.

One of Tsegaye's passionate interests throughout this time was in the struggle to regain Ethiopia's looted treasures. A close friend of Chief Segun Olusola, the Nigerian Ambassador in Addis Ababa, who was a fellowpoet, Tsegaye was present when the ambassador agreed to throw his diplomatic pressure behind the popular Ethiopian demand for the return ofthe Aksum obelisk looted by Fascist Italy on Mussolini's personal orders in1937. The chief's support marked a turning point in the Aksum Obelisk Return movement.

Tsegaye was no less insistent that Britain should return the manuscripts, crosses, tents and other loot taken – unjustly, as he saw it, from EmperorTewodros's mountain citadel of Magdala in 1868. Much of this loot is currently in the British Museum and British Library, as well as in Britain's Royal Library in Windsor Castle, which currently holds six remarkably finely illustrated Ethiopian manuscripts. Tsegaye always believed in the unity of the Ethiopian people and felt that this by far transcended purely political matters of the day. In later years he concerned himself increasingly with questions of peace, human rights and the dignity of humanity. He was elected to the United Poets Laureate International, andreceived many international awards – the most recent of them from Norway.

Despite his health problems Tsegaye was active – and creative – to the last. Ever true to his African aspirations in 2002 he composed a poem on the continent's cultural heritage, which the newly-established African Union adopted as its anthem; it read: "All sons and daughters of Africa, flesh of the son and flesh of he sky, Let us make Africa the tree of life." Unable to return to his native land, which lacked the dialysis facilities on which his life literally depended, Tsegaye remained in close contact with the Ethiopian diaspora by whom he was affectionately referred to as Blattengetta, a title traditionally accorded to the most distinguished of Ethiopian scholars. Tsegaye died in Manhattan on 25 February. He was 69, and had for several years been prevented from returning to his native land by his need to undergo dialysis treatment in the US. HISTORY: This Ethiopian Prince Was Kidnapped By Britain – NowIt Refuses To Release Him

By Editorial_Staff - September 7, 2015

AFRICANGLOBE – You see him first as he was soon after his father's death: a seven-year-old boy staring, stunned, into the camera. He sits ona cloth-covered bench, next to a shield and a strip of animal hide. Aroundhis shoulders, a long shamma drapes and gathers at his folded ankles.

You note his bare feet, the way one toe, curled upward and tense, hints atthe emotions he is keeping guarded. He wears the silver-baubled necklacethat will travel with him from Ethiopia to England, the one also seen in pictures where he is made to sit for Julia Margaret Cameron and other photographers. His mother, was raped and murdered, leaving him in the hands of the same British men who came to confront his father. But for now, he has not lost everything.

This photograph of Prince Alemayehu was taken during the 1868 Napier expedition, a British military incursion into Maqdala, Ethiopia, allegedly torescue three dozen European prisoners. His father, Emperor Tewodros, took captives when his letters to Queen Victoria were ignored. Led by Sir Robert Napier, the mission was extravagant: 13,000 soldiers, 8,000 auxiliary workers, and thousands of followers in search of adventure or a story. Several, like Richard Holmes of the British Museum, also came in search of loot.

In the end, Emperor Tewodros released the prisoners unharmed, then committed suicide rather than surrender. What happened next would be described as a “deluge of fire” and one of the greatest looting orgies everundertaken in the name of the British empire. Alemayehu, by now an orphan, was put on board the Feroze, the same ship as Holmes, who wastaking back to Britain the largest haul of stolen artefacts in Ethiopia’s history. The objects went into British museums and libraries. Alemayehu became a ward of Queen Victoria and, despite his continual pleas to be returned to his homeland, he died aged 18 in England. He was buried at Windsor Castle, where he remains. A plaque, “When I was a stranger, yetook me in,” marks his vault.

Today, we can recognise Napier and his forces for the marauders that they were. We can acknowledge the imperialist arrogance that would kidnap a young boy and trumpet the achievement through newspapers and photographs. The generosity of hindsight might even explain why Alemayehu’s pleas to return home were refused. But there is no longer any excuse for that same refusal and arrogance. There is no viable reasonto continue to hold his remains hostage. He has become, like the sacred and valuable objects still in British museums and libraries, a possession.

In 2007, the then Ethiopian president Girma Wolde-Giorgis sent QueenElizabeth a formal request for the return of the prince’s remains.
Alemayehu’s plight has been the subject of radio plays, poems, and books. Scholars and concerned citizens have started campaigns; a young boy wrote a widely publicised letter to Tony Blair. Yet every request to theQueen or Buckingham Palace has been met with silence or refusal.
Alemayehu is still trapped in the land of his kidnappers, a plaque forcingon to the narrative of his life a sentiment that he would not have chosenas his own.

In her diary, Queen Victoria describes Prince Alemayehu as “a pretty, polite, graceful boy … There is nothing whatever of the Negro about him.”In photographs, Alemayehu is rendered fragile and exotic. Though she acknowledges that “his was no happy life, full of difficulties of every kind”,the queen does not seem to consider that this unhappiness might have broken this young boy, might have sent him spiralling into ugly, impolite anger. What the queen wanted to imagine in Alemayehu, what England still wants to possess, is a foreigner who earns refuge through politeness, quietness and grace.
Alemayehu, like those who are today crossing borders to flee violence andoppression, endured a forced migration. Yet there is nothing graceful about the overloaded boats heading towards Europe. There is nothing polite about those who have rushed fences and tunnels to escape devastation. If there is beauty to be seen, it is in what they refuse to giveup: aspirations and dreams, a love willing to risk all for family, the photographs and letters they clutch even when it requires superhuman strength. These people too are portrayed as strangers. But they, lacking inthe refinements that Victoria praised in Alemayehu, are not the kinds of foreigners acceptable to a Europe still looking for comfortable narratives that can be condensed on to plaques and fit into museum displays.

You think of him in what is now the Victoria and Albert Museum, wandering a room where the loot from the expedition is displayed. He pauses at the familiar gold crown. He stares at the necklaces and anklets worn by the women in his household. Over there, the torn fragments of anilluminated Bible.

You see him look longingly at these mementos from home, now imprisoned behind glass. You see him, stoic, as he is guided from one vitrine to the other. You see his steps slow and falter as he approaches a beautiful long dress. You imagine that in that instant he wants to smash his fist through the glass and take back his mother's dress, bury himself inher familiar scent. Instead, he turns to the queen and demands again to be sent home. (Text ends)

BOOK REVIEW: Ethiopian Reminiscences: Early Days
By Richard and Rita Pankhurst, (2013)293pp, Tsehai Publhsers,
A Review by Arefayné Fantahun

Sylvia, Richard and Rita Pankhurst have long been renowned figures in Ethiopia "for their loyal championing of Ethiopia's nationhood, their creative institution building, and their personal generosity", as Donald Levine has stated in the blurb. Part memoir, part history, the book entitled"Ethiopian Reminiscences'', provides a gripping insiders' view of the majorpublic events of the 50s, 60s and 70s.The joint autobiography, which is the first part of the projected two-volume memoir, is filled with colourful anecdotes about their family, friends, and the men and women who played important roles in shaping the formative period of Ethiopian history. The story is illustrated with numerous photographs.

The book has ten chapters. The first three chapters provide a useful background while the remaining chapters are devoted to reminiscences ofthe country the authors have adopted. The authors mainly follow a straightforward narrative approach with the last chapter placing the events of the period in their longer historical context.
Richard, who went to the London School of Economics in the 1940s and wrote a critique of colonialism in his student days, counted among his acquaintances no less than the Emperor and many other eminent Ethiopian scholars, writers and educators. He provides numerous eyewitness accounts of notable people and events, including the politicalupheaval in Ethiopia that brought about the fall of Haile Selassie. Rita, who had studied French and Russian at Oxford, was later to join the National Library of Ethiopia. With Richard's support, she organized a seriesof public lectures which contributed to the growth of Ethiopian consciousness of Africa. She became Librarian of the Haile Selassie I University, a post she held for a decade.

The authors tell us, with warmth and pride, the circumstances of their arrival in Ethiopia in 1956. Richard, with his mother Sylvia Pankhurst, arrived in July and Rita in November. Sylvia was their original link with Ethiopia and it was because of her that Rita and Richard originally came tothe country. It was largely her Ethiopian friends, and their children, who became their first Ethiopian friends.

The book portrays and pays tribute to the courage, dignity and endurancewith which Sylvia devoted the last forty years of her life. After Mussolini invaded Ethiopia in 1935 and Emperor Haile Selassie was forced to seek refuge in Britain, Sylvia wrote in support of Ethiopia to the British and international press. In 1936 she founded a weekly newspaper, the New Times and Ethiopia News, which she was to edit for 20 years. She becameEmperor Haile Selassie's closest and most effective ally in promoting the Ethiopia's cause, writing more of the text, articles and editorials than any other single individual in her role as being the spokesman of the emperor.

At the age of 74, she accepted an invitation from the emperor to come, with her son, and make her home in Addis Ababa. She decided to edit her publication from Addis Ababa, replacing her politically oriented newspaper,"New Times and Ethiopia News", with a more substantial culture and development monthly magazine, the Ethiopia Observer. "The following days, I observed for the first time the family routine, which was governed by the production of the monthly Ethiopia Observer. It did not vary from year to year until Sylvia's death four years later. Sundays were no different from weekdays," Rita wrote.

The part of Sylvia's story which is sure to strike the reader is the way her passing affected her many admirers, Ethiopians and foreigners alike, and the tributes that poured in. She was buried in a formal orthodox ceremonyin Addis Ababa, at the Selassie Cathedral, which is reserved for Ethiopianswho have given the country in distinguished services. She was given a name, Welete-Kristos, or Daughter of Christ, as the token of the honour bestowed on her by the church. Interestingly, the British Embassy's Chancery in Addis Ababa, who could not be expected to take kindly to her criticism of their government policy over Eritrea and Somaliland, had to admit that "as far as we know, no other foreigner had been similarly honoured."
Richard and Rita stayed on in Ethiopia after Sylvia's death. Upon her death, Richard took over the editorship of "Ethiopia Observer", and in 1963 became a co-editor of the Journal of Ethiopian Studies. He beganteaching at Haile Selassie I University and founded its Institute of Ethiopian Studies (IES) in 1962.

He became its first director, a position heheld until 1972. Rita had a serious role to perform and did it brilliantly.
After working as a librarian in the National Library of Ethiopia from 1956to 1962 she was appointed director of the University Library of the thenHaile Selassie I University, serving from 1964 to 1975. Fascinated by Ethiopian life and culture, Rita has written several articles on Ethiopian women in history. She has been active in the civic life of Addis Ababa, serving on the boards of several institutions.

The Pankhursts lived in Ethiopia in the most significant years of the Haile Selassie era. They saw first-hand how the Emperor operated, how he spoke, and how he ran the country. They share their many memories of Haile Selassie from their early days, when the Emperor would drive or walk around the city every evening, inspecting things and greeting people.It was on one night that Richard's office door opened while he happened to be making notes on the history of Harar. "After greeting me he asked, in French, what I was doing. I told him that I was studying the five great gates of Harar, and was trying to ascertain what they were called at various historical periods by the local people i.e. during the Egyptian occupation, in the late nineteenth century, and during the time when his father, Ras Mekonnin, was Governor, etc. He smiled and asked "What are they called in my time?" he recalled.

The Pankhursts were able to join a small handful of distinguished scholars who significantly contributed to our understanding of Ethiopian history andculture. Among the others are, most notably, Harold Marcus, Wolf Lesalu and Donald Levine. Harold Marcus, who shared an office with Richard, wasdescribed as "a young American historian" who "contributed to a livelier intellectual atmosphere in the College". Richard wrote "Knowing that he took an inordinate interest in my visitors, particularly at a time of political tension, I once put a note on my desk stating "the General will come at 7 p.m." That evening I had occasion to stay late and was amused to see Harold, who usually left early, remain in our office well past 7pm".
One story they shared is about Donald Levine, the young American socialanthropologist. He was driving in the town on the first morning of the abortive Coup of the 1960, when he chanced to see a fellow graduate of Chicago University and Ethiopian friend, Lemma Fre-Hiywet, whose cousins, the brothers Mengestu and Girmame Niway, had organized the coup. Lemma allegedly asked Donald what had happened to which Levinereplied, "Your cousin has just seized power."
The book narrates many tales of their friendships with Ethiopians and expats alike. Indeed, it is dedicated to the memory of Mengistu Lemma and Afewerk Tekle, best men at their wedding, with whom they maintained life-long friendships. Of Afewerk Tekle, the famous Ethiopian artist and Richard's friend from student days, Rita writes, "A charming, helpful and generous guest", their first house guest at a time when he was building his Gondar-style house. He took up residence with them, with hismaid, which made Rita think of “the old days in Europe when gentlemen travelled with their valet.”

Mengistu, Richard’s closest friend, whom he had known since they were students in England was naturally the person who he thought to choose asbest man, but an interesting thing happened. “First of all Mengistu had nottaken seriously our request that he be one of our witnesses and was nowhere to be seen on the day. Fortunately his house was on the way to the Embassy, so that Afewerk, impeccably turned out in national dress, helped to get Mengistu hastily dressed, he, too in traditional white Ethiopian clothes.”

Another Ethiopian personality who is excellently characterized and for whom Richard manifestly carries great admiration is Abebe Retta, a pre- World War II student in Scotland, who later joined the Ethiopian government service and was appointed Ambassador to the UK. “A conformed patriot he wrote anonymously in ‘New Times and Ethiopia News’, as an “Ethiopian correspondent” immediately after the country’s liberation, to denounce proposals to curtail Ethiopia’s independence. A scholar no less than a Minster and diplomat he roamed the London bookshops in quest of second-hand books about his country, and built upan important personal library”.

Rita is unstinting in her praise of, and admiration for, Princess Hirut Desta,who was one of the volunteers at the Library. Rita found her “obliging, unassuming and helpful”, while Richard remarks upon Zewde Gebre Selassie’s “warmth, and progressive views,” his inspirational self- confidence and his grasp of the larger picture. Rita’s portrait of Kebede Mikael, who was responsible for the Library, reaffirms many people’s depiction of him, as being more interested in his creative writing than in all the other responsibilities he assumed. “His visits were therefore infrequent. He seldom answered letters and often forgot appointments.”

The Eritrean, Bereket-ab Habte Silasse, who was most active in the Ethiopian student movement, was subsequently involved in drafting theconstitution of independent Eritrea. Richard writes that “much later he confessed, in a mood of nostalgia, that he had succeeded in becoming persona non grata in both Eritrea and Ethiopia”.

They have kind thoughts for Lij Mikael Imru, who had read Politics, Philosophy and Economics at Oxford and who they describe as look like adon, with a thin, long neck and a mass of burly hair. There is an interesting anecdote about Siniddu Gebru, the Ethiopian woman parliamentarian, who gave a good slap in the face to a male chauvinist, after he referred to her in the Chamber as Ato Siniddu, i.e “Mister Siniddu”.

Engagingly written from a personal perspective, this book will be of value to historians and scholars, and to others interested in the country's past. It offers a credible account of the intimacy the Pankhurst family developedwith Ethiopia. It is richly supplemented with accounts of personal relationships with ordinary and prominent Ethiopians, accompanied by some historic photographs. One wishes that the book were translated intoAmharic and widely disseminate to the wider public.

Royal Diarist Mammo Haile:

Who had worked as Emperor Haile Selassie's valet for 30 years Mammo Haile still works at the Institute of Ethiopian Studies, where hetakes care of his former master's private quarters in the museum.

Philip Marsden, an English travel writer, who authored the book, 'The Chains of Heaven, An Ethiopian Romance' (HarperCollins publishers, 2005)met him there. Marsden described Mammo as a person who had 'chaotic teeth, a hangdog expression, and an undimmed devotion to his mast...er.'Mammo told the writer his stories, including about His Majesty's favourite dog, Lulu. Marsden said he had seen a picture of Lulu sitting in the emperor's lap while he stroked her with his small, feminine hands .He saidshe is a tiny, frog-eyed Chihuahua.

Here goes Mammo account. 'If there was a reception Lulu would go around among the legs of the officials. If one one of them was holding a bad feeling about His Majesty, Lulu would touch the man's foot and that was how His Majesty knew. One minister was very popular but Lulu touched his foot and after that no one trusted that man again. Lulu was avery brilliant dog. 'What happened to her?' 'Paul killed her.' 'Who's Paul?''Paul was a big palace dog. Like a big fighter, like a wrestling man. He took Lulu by the neck and shook her and shook her. She was only a tiny dog-and finito! Lulu finito.Such a tiny little dog.' He looked down, toeing the ground with his shoes. I thought he would cry. 'It was only after a year or two after that when they took His Majesty away.'

EX-ROYAL FAMILY: Princess of Ethiopia Hirut Desta Damtew: alsoknown as "Ruth"

Ruth was the granddaughter of Emperor Haile Selassie, the Emperor of Ethiopia for half a century, died in London aged 84. The cause of death wasn't given, but Hirut had been in poor health for several years. Her funeral services was held on July 4 at the Holy Trinity Cathedral in Addis Ababa, next to her grandfather and other members of her family. The ceremony was attended by members of the royal family, religious leaders,including priests of the Lalibela churches and government officials. The Princess was well educated and knowledgeable in a range of areas. She was described as being down to earth, enthusiastic, hardworking and respectful of traditions. While her role in the formation of the Committee for the restoration of the churches of Lalibela was her greatest legacy, she was involved in other successful ventures in culture, library and education,fields she enjoyed herself.

Born in the town of Jimma, south-west Ethiopia in 1930 to Princess Tenagnework Haile Selassie by Ras Desta Damtew, Hirut spent much of her early life on the move. Her father was a hero of Ethiopia's resistance movement which fought Italian occupation. He was captured and executedby fascists in 1937. After his death, Princess Hirut and her siblings accompanied their mother into exile and lived with Emperor Haile Selassiein Bath. She was educated at the School of St Clare in Penzance, Cornwall. Kathleen M Seed who a boarder to Clarendon recalls her when she attended school in Penzance during the 1930s. "We were told that twograndchildren of a very important person were to arrive at the school that summer and be housed away from the main building. The two girls were Ruth (Hirut) and Seble Desta. Aida, their older sister, had gone to Newnham College, Cambridge. I happened to be one in a dormitory in thishouse and we were allowed to meet them. They did lessons with us and led a normal school life. We had a junior percussion band at the time with one or two musical instruments thrown in. In 1938, the annual prize giving was held in the Winter Gardens at Great Malvern and we were honoured to have the Emperor present the prizes," she wrote.

Hirut, the beautiful and talented princess, later enrolled at Sorbonne University in France and Colombia University in the United States, taking courses in history and management. Upon her return to Ethiopia, she became a teacher at the Empress Menen School, the all-girls school established by her grandmother, and went on to eventually become its director, working there for many years. She left a legacy as a visionary pioneer in education and she was an instrumental figure to the success ofthe school, becoming champion of the down-trodden.

In the 1960's when Rita Pankhurst was trying to organize the National Library of Ethiopia, she was faced with shortage of professional staff. Ritalater recalled that she relied a great deal on the help of volunteers and one of her most productive volunteers was Princess Ruth. Rita described the Princess Ruth as being a modest and deeply religious woman – and a highly responsible library volunteer, who showed up when she said she would and was a superb example for other volunteers as well as to librarystaff.

Princes Hirut had a special interest for Lalibela's rock-hewn churches and her motivation for becoming involved in preservation started when she was in the United States for her study. One day, her professor would showher a fabulous photo of rock-hewn churches and asked her if she knew where it was found. And she replied that may be in Rome or Greek. The teacher chastised her for her ignorance of her own country's patrimony.

Remorseful, she called her grandfather, Emperor Haile Selassie and toldhim about it. And he promised to show it to her when she came back. Visit, she did. She also decided to create the Committee for the Restoration of the Churches of Lalibela, and spent five years in the town working towards the preservation of the rock hewn churches there, and towards improving the lives of the town's people there.

She is credited with having the town made more accessible by having a modern road connect to it, and is credited with introducing electricity and potable to thetown. In 1967, she also commissioned the Seven Olives Hotel which was the first tourist hotel in the town, acting herself as hostess in the traditional manner, which helped make Lalibela a tourist attraction. After having finished the work of the hotel construction, she granted the hotel to the Saint Lalibela Monastery Diocese Office. The National Geographic reporter, Nathaniel T. Kenney who visited Lalibela at the time described her as a “trim, most democratic of princesses,” who “was not above grabbing a tool from a workman, I suspect, and showing him how to use it.”

Hirut accompanied her father to the United States on “state visits” duringwhich the royal family she was hosted by President and Mrs. Kennedy. In1968, Hirut was married to Lieutenant General Nega Tegegne, and upon her marriage was elevated by her grandfather to the title of Princess withthe dignity of Her Highness. At the start of the Marxist Revolution, she moved to Gondar with her husband, who was nominated as a governor ofthe region. Barbara W. Olson in her Gondar, Ethiopia: 1971-1975 Guests in the Ethiopian Highlands and Children of Zemecha, she wrote about thenew princess in Gondar. “Every day during the rains, Princesses Ruth has been seen driving to the track that leads the small, circular Debre Tsehai Church next to the ruins of the castle of Kusquam. People say she goes there, in this time of revolution and chaos, for solitude and prayer, to cry and to pray for family and friends who are threatened by revolutionary forces, hunted and imprisoned throughout theAmahra highlands,” she wrote. When Haile Selassie was deposed in September 1974, everything started to crumble for the royal family.

Hirut’s brother, Eskinder, commander of the Imperial Ethiopian Navy, wasshot by the revolutionaries in November 1974, together with 60 other notables. Her mother and her three sisters, Aida, Seble and Sofya, were sent without trial to Prison; their male cousins were put in the high- security wing, known by its Amharic name of Alem Bekagne – “I have hadenough of the world”.

For 14 years until their release in 1988, Princess Hirut, her mother and her sisters lived in cramped, fetid cells, which they shared with rats andlice. They were not allowed visitors, and were without lavatories, warm clothes and shoes. The Princess never had any children.

ARCHAEOLOGY – Re: Ruins of the temple at Yeha

Excerpted from Wikipedia

The oldest standing structure in Ethiopia is located in Yeha: the temple of Yeha. This is a tower built in the Sabaean style, and dated through comparison with ancient structures in South Arabia to around 700 BC. Although no radiocarbon dating testing has been performed on samples from site, this date for the Great Tower is supported by local inscriptions.[2] David Phillipson attributes its "excellent preservation" to two factors, "the care with which its original builders ensured a level foundation, firmly placed on the uneven bedrock; and to its rededication -

- perhaps as early as the sixth century AD -- for use as a Christian church."[2] Two other archaeological sites at Yeha include Grat Beal Gebri,a ruined complex distinguished by a portico 10 meters wide and two sets of square pillars, and a graveyard containing several rock-hewn shaft tombs first investigated in the early 1960s. One authority has speculated that one of these tombs contained a royal burial, while another believes the ancient residential area was likely one kilometer to the east of the modern village.[3]

Additionally, Yeha is the location of an Ethiopian Orthodox monastery. Theedifice was founded according to tradition by Abba Aftse, one of the Nine Saints. In his account of Ethiopia, Francisco Álvares mentions visiting this town in 1520 (which he called "Abbafaçem"), and provides a description ofthe ancient tower, the monastery, and the local church.[4] This church waseither the rededicated Great Temple, or a now destroyed building which the Deutsche Aksum-Expedition described in the early 20th century. (The current structure, which exhibits Aksumite architectural features, was builtbetween 1948 and 1949.)[5]

Yeha has also been the site of a number of archaeological excavations, beginning in 1952 by the Ethiopian Institute of Archeology. Although interrupted during the Derg regime, excavations were resumed in 1993 bya French archaeological team

Respect Self-Legends:

Remembering The honored: Maitre Artiste World Laureate' Afewerk Tekle was born on October 22, 1932 in the historic city of Ankober in Shoa Province, Ethiopia, according to the artist's official web portal. Sent to England in 1947 to become a mining engineer, Afewerk's artistic talent was soon perceived. He was accepted at the Central Schoolof Arts and Crafts in London and later went to the Faculty of Fine Arts of the University of London, the famous "Slade". While studying in England he made several ...artistic pilgrimages to Europe.

On the completion of his studies he returned to Addis Ababa where he held a one-man exhibition at the Municipality Hall in 1954. It was the firstsignificant art exhibition of post-war Ethiopia. Soon after his exhibition heleft Ethiopia for a study tour in Italy, France, Spain, Portugal and Greece.In addition to these countries, he carried out various studies in England. He also made a special study of the Ethiopian illustrated manuscripts in the British Library, the Bibliothėque Nationale in Paris and the Vatican Library, thereby gaining a deeper knowledge of his own artistic heritage.

After two years of this extensive study, Afewerk, by now a well–equipped artist, returned with full confidence to his native land, to tackle the task ahead. On his arrival in Ethiopia, Afewerk opened his studio in the National Library of Ethiopia. Soon afterwards he was given his first challenging commission by the Ethiopian Government: The decoration of St. George's Cathedral, one of the capital's two most important religious edifices, where he worked on murals and mosaics for three and a half years. Afewerk also designed his own house, studio and gallery, known asVilla "Alpha". He was architecturally inspired by his own cultural heritage,especially by ancient Aksum, the mediaeval castles of Gondar and the old walled city of Harrar.

His paintings included titles such as "Backbones of African Civilization", "African Movement", "African Atmosphere" and "African Unity", and for Expo 67 in Montreal, Canada, "Africa's Heritage" which are now in the permanent collection of the National Museum of Ethiopia. After many studies he produced over ten designs for an African Unity emblem and flag. Afewerk's internationally famous stained-glass windows confrontingthe visitor in the entrance of Africa Hall, the headquarters of the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa, is one of his greatest achievements.

In 1964 he became the first winner of the Haile Sellassie I Prize for Fine Arts. The citation described him as a "versatile and disciplined artist". Andthe prize was awarded "for his outstanding drawings, paintings, landscapes, and portraits which eloquently express his particular world environment, and for his contribution in being among the first to introducecontemporary techniques to Ethiopian subject matter and content." He recently participated in an exhibition held at the Sheraton Addis with otherrenowned artists.

What did the Italians ever do for Ethiopia/Eritrea?

Martin Plaut / September 11, 2014

The invasion of Ethiopia in October 1935 broke the power of the Ethiopianimperial forces under the Emperor Haile Selassie. Although some resistance continued with guerrilla forces attacking the Italians when theycould, most of the country was under Italian control by May 1936. Benito Mussolini, the Fascist leader, then set about creating a permanent Empire in the Horn of Africa. Central to this ambition was the building of roads, sothat links between Addis Ababa and the coast could be maintained and costs reduced. This photograph, dated August 1938, shows this process.

The original caption is below.

"Addis Ababa, Africa:

A total of 2023 miles of pivotal highways in Ethiopia constructed under appalling difficulties in thirteen months actual working time by 60,000 Italians and 60,000 natives have just been completed according to official construction reports as of July 30 detailing work on each of six major roadbuilding projects. Of this 1180 miles have been finished in every detail including asphalt surfacing. Freight rates have dropped from $350 a ton (Asmara to Addis Ababa 688 miles) to $30 a ton. A total of 4,448 small bridges, 128 large bridges, 501 construction camps, and 1700 building have been constructed in this gargantuan undertaking.

The biggest single job is the Addis Ababa – Asmara road, 688 miles long known as Route 2 between the old capital of Eritrea and Ethiopia, both now designated as Italian East Africa. So great were construction difficulties that men had to be let down constantly by ropes to carve a road on the side of mountains 3200 metres above sea level. A total of 1864 bridges, virtually one every three miles had to be guilt on this 688 mile road which cost 826,000,000 lire or about $41,300,000. The rebuilding of completely new cities is planned at Addis Ababa, Dessye, Harar, Jimma, Gondar and Assab, work what has hitherto been impossiblebecause of high freight rates.

Ethiopia's fallen aristocrats'

The radicals are pressing for a French Revolution-style solution - a massexecution of the aristocracy (Addis Ababa, August 23) They are crowded into three long army barracks, sleeping on simple army cots, their heads shaven as if they arecondemned men, their food brought to them three times daily by wives already dressed in black for mourning. These were once the high and mighty of Ethiopia - princes, imperial courtiers, provincial nobility, aristocratic landlords, blue-blooded ministers, and much decorated generals. They ruled entire provinces, owned enormous estates, and commanded private armies and could boast of belonging to royal familiestracing their ancestry 2,000 years to the founding of the Ethiopian monarchy.

Today they are the humbled captives of young and unknown military officers, members of a mysterious Armed Forces Committee that has set out to bring revolution to this ancient mountain kingdom of feudal lords and a once all-powerful Emperor. Officially these prisoners of the revolution number only around 150, but it is said the total number of those arrested is about 350. The fallen aristocrats are being kept in rundown buildings near the city centre that serve as the Fourth Army Division's headquarters. Three times a day the road outside the compoundis the scene of traffic jams as families come with food and messages (the army will not feed the prisoners). Their crimes, according to the military, include corruption, abuse of power, maladministration and misappropriation of State funds and lands, a cover-up of the disastrous drought afflicting the country, and, above all, obstruction of badly-neededreforms.

Their fate is uncertain. Theoretically, the prisoners are awaiting the outcome of an investigation by a 15-man committee of inquiry into the alleged misdeeds of the old regime, a process expected to take two years.But relatives of the prisoners feel they have become hostages of the military committee and that they will be the first to die if any attempt is made by Emperor Haile Selassie to overthrow the reform movement. It is rumoured that the radicals among the reformers, still in a minority, are pressing for a French Revolution-style solution - a mass execution of the aristocracy. The military committee, however, is dominated for the moment by relatively moderate men who have committed themselves to arevolution "without any bloodshed."

To Ethiopians all too aware of the violence and civil wars that have periodically marked the history of the kingdom, it is a miracle that the ruling aristocracy has fallen without putting up a fight and practically without a gun having been fired. Some of the most powerful aristocratslike Ras (prince) Asrate Kassa and Ras Mesfin Sileshi were said to haveprivate armies numbering thousands ready to die for them but these reports have turned out to be part of Western and even Ethiopian mythology about Ethiopia.

Asrate was arrested at his home on a hillside overlooking Addis Ababa without putting up a fight, and Mesfin gave himself up when the military threatened to expropriate all his lands and personal property.

Students protest in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, September 17, 1974, against the militarycommittee that seized political power last week. Photograph: AP "These people were absentee landlords and rulers out of touch with their own people," one Western diplomat said. "Nobody was ready to fight for them."

Indeed, few tears are being shed for Ethiopia's fallen aristocrats and thereis a widespread feeling among Ethiopians that justice has at long last prevailed. This feeling is being strengthened by the horrifying testimony ofthe old regime's political prisoners who are now being freed, some of themafter nearly 25 years in gaol. One journalist, Negede Gebrab, who had been in prison 17 years for advocating a Socialist people's republic, said he had spent 36 months in solitary confinement living on dried peas and 50 grams of water a day. He said he was repeatedly whipped, bound up much of the time in 30lb of chains, and periodically dragged naked across the rough gravel of the prison compound.

Another prisoner, a farmer named Bariso Odda, said an army general hadtaken his 48-acre farm, raped his wife, and thrown him into prison for being involved in an uprising against local landlords last spring. In prison,Bariso said, he was hanged upside down, had a red hot sickle shoved intohis mouth, and was further tortured when he could not answer questions put to him by the police because he was so badly burned. If the aristocracy is doomed as a ruling class in Ethiopia, many individual members of noble families are none the less still faring well under the newregime. The most striking example is the Prime Minister, Michael Imru, who is the son of a ras, although one famous for his radical views and acts(Prince Imru gave away all his land years ago). (Text ends)

New Book Looks at Triumph & Tragedy of Ethiopia's Last Emperor HaileSelassie I (TADIAS) Monday, August 31st, 2015 New York

The world does not seem to want to forget Haile Selassie, Ethiopia's last Emperor who has been gone for more than forty years, continuing the debate regarding his complicated legacy as both a reformer and an autocrat. And in November 2015 a new book from Haile Selassie's grandnephew, Asfa-Wossen Asrate Kassa, is slated to be released by HausPublishing and distributed in the U.S. by the University of Chicago Press.

Asrate's book entitled King of Kings: Triumph and Tragedy of Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia provides an authoritative, insider's perspectiveand a refreshingly balanced look at this fascinating international figure who was the global face of Ethiopia for most of the 20th century.

To be sure Haile Selassie governed a much different Ethiopia than today with a population three times less and a country dominated by a handful of politically connected feudal landlords that were either related to or favored by the royal palace. From his vantage point as a close family member the author — who is the grandson of Ras Kassa Haile Darge and the son of Ras Asrate Kassa– shares his personal memories of the Emperor as well as a rarely told and candid behind-the-scenes account of palace politics, family feuds and coup d'etats that eventually led to the coronation of Haile Selassie in November 1930, and forty four years later,his swift downfall and unceremonious removal from power. No challengingevent in Ethiopian history, however, could better encapsulate the triumphand tragedy of Emperor Haile Selassie than his historic appearance beforethe General Assembly of the League of Nations in 1936 — only six years after he took power.

Asfaw Wossen Asrate Kassa, who currently lives in Frankfurt, Germany, notes: "The forces of Mussolini's Fascist Italy had invaded Ethiopia and theexiled monarch made a moving appeal to the world's conscience. The words he spoke that day have gone down in history: 'Catastrophe is inevitable if the great states stand by and watch the rape of a small country.'" Five years later in 1941, after Mussolini's Blackshirts were driven out of Ethiopia by British and Ethiopian forces "he returned in triumph to reclaim the Ethiopian throne." Asrate's book is also timely not only because there is a renewed interest in Haile Selassie by a new generation of artists, researchers and historians, but also because this year marks the 70th anniversary of the United Nations, which was createdin 1945 with the active participation from the Ethiopian monarchial leader.Asserate's description of the Emperor's attempt at modernization, especially the fast-paced changes that were taking place in the capital Addis Ababa in the 1950′s, reminds one of today’s much publicized development projects in the city than activities taking place six decades ago: “Gradually, an urban infrastructure arose –with metalled roads, wideboulevards, shops, factories and warehouses, hotels and guest houses, restaurants, bars and nightclubs, plus a handful of cinemas.

In addition, this period saw construction of new administrative blocks, schools and hospitals, as well as embassy buildings. The city’s growth attracted entrepreneurs and businessmen, advisors, educators and adventurers from all four corners of the world.” Asrate adds: “And yet in many respects the center of Addis Ababa continued to resemble the residential seat of some 19th-centurey German provincial ruler rather than an international capital in the mid-20th century. The heart of the citywas occupied by the imperial palaces: the Genete -Leul Palace, the emperor’s own residence at the time, and the Menelik Palace complex, also known as “the big Gebbi‘, with its numerous buildings, including the palace ministry. This was also the site of the Adarash, the cavernous hall that hosted regular state banquets, and which could accommodate up to three thousand people.” King of Kings: Triumph and Tragedy of Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia is full of captivating details that only an insider could share; it is written with great poise and warmth for the enigmatic leader while at the same time cognizant of the swelling unhappiness and criticism the Emperor faced from his own people impatient with the pace of change. PEOPLE: Lij Mikael Imru Haile Selassie (10 November 1929 – 26 October 2008)

Lij Mikael Imru was Prime Minister of Ethiopia from 3 August to 12 September 1974. Born in Addis Ababa, Mikael Imru was the only son of Leul Ras Imru Haile Selassie and Woizero Tsige Mariam; he had seven sisters. His father, Leul Ras Imru Haile Selassie was among the more senior princes of the Imperial Dynasty of Ethiopia, and a close confidante of emperor Haile Selassie, a close relative with whom he had grown up. (Lij Mikael's paternal ...grandmother was the Emperor's first cousin.) Lij Mikael Imru was thus born into the highest levels of Ethiopian society, andwas a member of the extended Imperial Dynasty. Both Lij Mikael and his father were known to have very strong socialist leanings, particularly in regard to land tenure and wealth distribution issues.

Lij Mikael studied at Oxford University and subsequently returned to Ethiopia. Lij Mikael served as deputy Secretary of Agriculture between 1958 and 1959. Subsequently, he became a diplomat and was first postedto Washington, D.C. (1959–1961), then to Moscow (1961–1965). For a few months between these diplomatic posts Mikael served as Foreign Minister. From 1965 to 1968 he worked in Geneva for the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD). After first becoming in 1974 Minister of Trade and Industry, Mikael Imru was appointed PrimeMinister by the Emperor, succeeding Endelkachew Makonnen .

Upon the deposition of Emperor Haile Selassie, Mikael Imru resigned from the office of Prime Minister on 12 September. Nevertheless, he served intothe following year as Minister of Information. Although he was of royal blood, his long standing leftist sympathies led the Derg administration to spare him the fate of the rest of the Imperial dynasty, and he was never imprisoned as most of his relatives and former colleagues were.
Lij Mikael became a specialist for rural development and worked at theWorld Bank .

He also actively lobbied the Italian government for the return of art objects looted from Ethiopia during their occupation of that country , [3] and became increasingly active in the areas of human rights in the post- Derg era. Lij Mikael Imru died after a long illness in Addis Ababa, and wasburied at Holy Trinity Cathedral .

PROFILE: Meeting Fekrou Kidane in ParisBy Arefayne Fantahun March 24, 2014

During a seven-day trip to Paris, I came across someone I could recognizewhile dinning at an Ethiopian restaurant one night. Shyly, I asked him if he was Fekrou Kidane. He admitted that he was. When I asked him whether he would give me an interview for this article, he graciously invited me to his apartment on the following day.

The 78-year-old Ethiopian who had a distinguished career in the local sport and Olympic world has been living in Paris since 1976, although frequently travelling to other parts of the world. He lived in Lausanne Switzerland for 12 years where he was serving as a senior official of the International Olympic Committee (IOC). He is now advising the presidentof the Confederation of African Football (CAF), working from home doing email and Skype video conference. Since quitting IOC ten years ago, Fekrou has written Ye Piassa Ledge, a memoir about childhood and adolescence in Addis Ababa.

The bespectacled Fekrou lives alone in his Parisian apartment crammed with books, magazines and newspapers. During my brief hours with him, Isaw a ton of notes, drafts, pages of ideas, photos, old newspapers, press passes for the L'Equipe, Deutsche welle, and Football France in his shelves, the media that he worked for at some point in his life, hundreds of classical jazz CDs and a collection of the songs the 1950s and the 1960s and also Ethiopian folkloric songs. I also saw biographies of NelsonMandela, and Ethiopian related books, – from John H. Spencer's Ethiopia At Bay to Dinaw Mengestu novel "The Beautiful Things That Heaven Bears". On his tables were Le Canard enchaîné, a satirical French newspaper. Fekrou's affinity with the world of sport was born at a time when his father, a member of Saint George club used to transport designated players from school to the playing field. That gave him familiarity to the then nascent local football game and the players who were reputed for playing hard. He over the years developed a deep knowledge of the sport and excellent contacts, all of which he brought when he started covering sports events for the local newspapers and Voice of Ethiopia as the first Ethiopian sport journalist in the early 1950s.

On 1957, listeners of Ethiopian radio service witnessed the unique experience of hearing football commentary from the comfort of their own homes and the honor of being the first commentator of a game fell to Fekrou. It was a match held at Addis Ababa stadium between Ethiopia andSudan. Employed by the Ministry of Information, Fekrou also wrote articles for the various outlets of the ministry. This became his niche and he did a lot of freelancing. He covered general sport for international media like BBC, Voice of America, Voice of Germany, Radio France International, France Football Weekly, amongst others. Later, the opportunity presented itself to become the first secretary general of the Ethiopian Cycling Federation, Tennis Federation, National Olympic Committee, and public relations officer of the football federation. Fekrou represented someone with a long history of an independent journalist prior to becoming part of sport federations. He went on to establish the Ethiopian Sports Journalists Association in 1968 in international level and became his first president. He also served as Secretary General of the African Sports Journalists Union (1970-1974), member of FIFA Press Committee, director of the executive office of the president of The International Olympic Committee (IOC) and the Department of International Cooperation.

He subsequently developed and established a monthly African sports magazine "Jeux d'Afrique" a publication dedicated to African sport for which he served as editor-in-chief from 1977-1982. The idea for the magazine came as Fekrou saw a need to put African sports on the map with this publication because he noticed that there was a visible lack of acomprehensive sports publication in the African media landscape.

Partnering with the Senegalese national, the magazine saw the light of theday with the assistance of L'Equipe, the famous daily sport French newspaper with highest circulation in France. Unfortunately, the magazinewas interrupted due to disagreement with the partner. Fikrou again established and directed another magazine called Continental Sports magazine and digest newsletter in French and English for worldwide circulation, which lasted from 1982-1989. Fekrou also served as a UnitedNations staff member in the 1960's.

Fekrou traveled incessantly, visiting around 189 countries. His schedule, like those of many I.O.C. members, was filled with ceremonies, dinners and traversing the globe. The experience gave him a wider perspective and outlook in life. Among world leaders that he mingled with, Mandela stood out most. Fekrou came to know and befriended the human rights icon. "After Mandela left prison, it was reported that Mandela was tired and he needed a vacation. I was then working for IOC. Juan Antonio Samaranch, president of the IOL, proposed inviting him to Swiss. Mandelaaccepted the invitation and I happened to be his host. I've had the occasion to chat with him many hours for five days at his hotel. Mandela has a habit of taking a morning stroll every day. He would get up early in the morning and would walk for two hours. The first day I waited for him wearing a neck tie. I walked along with him for two hours, "he recalled.

Talking about his Parisian life, Fekrou says that it could get lonely for him there and he feels he is a little disconnected from his roots. "The thing is the Ethiopian immigrants in Paris are not numerous. I have only two closefriends that I see often. In America it could have been different. In cities like DC, you would have many compatriots that you would share meals with, swap jokes. It would be easy to immerse yourself in the ways of theold country there."

Yet he loves Paris. "Paris is a wonderful place to live and work. I don't know any other city that is so appealing. Every time I go to other places, and come back, I feel that I've come to new a city. They've got the finest museums and it would take you like two months to visit them all. Plenty ofthings to see and there are many ordinary buildings which are beautiful pieces of architecture. Being able to walk into a church or chateau that is over 500 or 1000 years old is amazing. Paris has lots of parks, public spaces," he says. "They have an amazing public transport system. The metro, trains and the buses are great. You can take a metro anywhere in the city effortlessly," Fekrou says.
What is his experience for an Ethiopian living in Paris? "There are the ups and the downs when you are living as an immigrant anywhere. When I was in Ethiopia, I studied at the French school. The French language and culture was no stranger to me," he says. "People in general are friendly. I have developed relationships with people around me. I have my favorite baker, butcher, grocer, market and restaurants. Of course, it was much easier decades ago when France hasn't had many immigrants. Now thingsare getting difficult as the country has welcomed so many immigrants from Africa, Asia. This has spoiled the locals,"he says. "I understand why. There are many crimes and theft associated with the arrivals of the new community. I think much of the bitterness is associated with that. " "Whenchoosing places either for food market, I go to places where people aren't mean to me. Some of them know you and respect you. If the reception ischilly, you go to other places," he says.

What is his typical day like? "I get up at 5 a.m early in the morning. I listen to the first bulletin of African news on Radio France international at 5.30. At around 6.00 I sit at my computer and read Ethiopian related news. At 9, 00, I go out for a coffee and look at the French papers. I return home and work. I might also cook lunch. If I have dinner invitation,I will have light dinner. Usually I buy food from Ethiopian restaurant.

Fekrou recalled his early refugee days in Paris where he was struggling tomeet financial obligations to his son. "When I made it to Paris from Washington D.C in 1970's, I had my twelve year-old-son and 200 dollars.Staying at hotel I looked for employment and boarding school for my child," he recalls.

Today his son Stephen (or Didi after the famous Brazilian footballer) is doing good and lives with his wife and two children in Belgium. Stephen'sson Gil is presently at Liege University. Stephan comes every month to visit his father. I met him on his last trip and shared sandwiches with hisfather and son. None of the difficulties in his life prevented Fekrou from radiating intense satisfaction at jobs. Keeping them in tune will be a challenge he has been preparing for most of his life.

Respect for Self-Heroes:

Asnaketch Worku - The First Lady of Ethiopian MusicBy Arefayne Fantahun April 21, 2014
She had a combination of emotional depth and versatility. With a voice capable of evoking the joys and pains of life, she carved a niche as a vocalist, Kirar player, theatre actress, and storyteller for over 50 years.Asnaketch Worku, who died on September, 2011, remained a music legend, undoubtedly one of the most important singers in the history ofEthiopian music.

Asnaketch's deep, rich voice, with her own Kirar (6 stringed bowed plucked lyre) accompaniment, had thrilled audiences for decades. Her tersely poetic, mournful songs and easily remembered melodies touched people's emotions. Her appearance was striking as well. She usually woreelegantly that matched with her great beauty.

Asnaketch had a brilliant career as a dancer and she became the first Ethiopian female actress. After her first acting role in 1952's "Ye Fikir Chora" (Rays of Love), she came to play over the years various roles froman angel in an Easter play to her portrayal of Desdemona in "Othello". In her acting careers, she was noted for her willingness to play unsympathetic characters. In many of her roles, she has had angry audiences who came to throw insults, pen, and shoes in her face, even in one case a Coca-cola bottle.

Veteran playwright and stage actor Tesfaye Gessesse described her as "pearl of the stage'. "When she steps in to the stage, the whole scene transforms, it glows. It brightens with her dazzling visage. She could seizethe nerves of her audience, rendering the public and her fellow actors speechless," he wrote.

Yet it is for her music that Asnaketch was best remembered, for many of her tunes that became standards over the years. Her singing style was unique, a combined result of bold projection and expressive restraint and her lyrics conveying choice timeless text subjects. Because of her ability toinhabit the emotional dimensions of a song, she was often likened to MaryArmedie, her chief influence. But Asnaketch had a deeper register and honesty and sincerity in dealing with human frailty and vulnerability.

Born in 1933 in the capital's Sidist Kilo area, Asnaketch's earliest childhood was filled with hardships and difficulty. Her parents separated shortly after her birth and she never saw her father. By the time she was three, her mother died. Thus, she was left with relatives. For a while, Asnaketch lived with her godmother whom she remembered as a "not agreeable woman" who ruled her family with an iron hand. Her godmotherhad neither the means nor the will to send her to school. Expenses for books and clothes would be more than she could handle. Later, she was moved to her sister, Elfinesh Marefia who for some time has been acting as her surrogate mother. Their house was in a mixed neighborhood, where Asnaketch made friends easily. She enjoyed dancing and singing with her friends, and some evenings they would go to Hager Fikir theatre to watch plays and music concerts. Later fascinated by the instrument she purchased a krar for twenty five cents and taught herself to play by observing and listening to others. She memorized all the church songs in the Amharic languages. By the time she was nine or ten, she was singing at family events and neighbourhood parties, and then people started asking her to perform at weddings.

Asnaketch spent her first several years moving from one relative to another looking for better haven. She later tried to get hired as singer ordancer in the local night spots in Addis. At first, she had no luck. Finally, the owner of bar in Churchill Road agreed to give her a try. Although Asnaketch had no training as singer, the customers liked her and she washired on the spot. However, disgusted by the low pay, and verbal harassment, she quits her job at the bar. Never one to complain, Asnaketch later reflected on her most difficult years with an appreciation for how they helped her to mature. She used the memories from these times to help gather emotions for performances, and felt she was more grateful for her success because she knew what it was like to struggle in life.

A major factor in her personal life provided the catalyst catapulting her into a successful artist and that was unrequited love. According to the American music researcher Cynthia Tse Kimberlin (Citing Lishan Tefera's BA thesis), the story goes, Asnaketch liked to sing about love by recallingher sweetheart whom she married but divorced and later regretted.
Because she found she could not stand to be away from him even for onenight, she sent mediators to locate him. He sent her a message saying hewould come the next day but changed his mind and sent an emissary informing her he would never return and advised her not to wait for him. She cried and filled with loneliness.

Since she wanted to run away, her family kept her at home in restraints by tying her to her bed so they could watch her. She stopped eating for three days. Later, she surprised everyone by falling in love again with someone else but their relationship was tempestuous, imbued with jealousy, and ending in tragedy with physical beatings and destruction of property. The man was eventually hanged for killing someone. She did notcry but channelled her emotions in to music to help ease the pain of suffering, sorrow and lost. These emotions enabled her to project how shereally felt into a unique style a vocalist and Krar player.

In 1952 the Municipality of Addis Ababa launched the first department of music and theatre. Nineteen young men were freshly recruited to form thecore foundation. Help and inspiration in the theatrical and musical field came from dedicated trainers like Yoftawi Neguse, Mekonen Endalkatchew(then Prime Minister), Kevrork Nalbandian and his nephew Nerses Nalbandian.

Soon two talented young men, Tesfaye Tesema and Asfaw Tefera, wrote and produced “Ye Fikir Chora” (Rays of Love), the first proper modern Ethiopian theatre that told a story through dance and music. There was not yet a female actress who could play the female role. The Municipality Theatre by then had a few female vocalists and folk dancers but was missing a proper actress who could play a role in a theatrical production, aforeign innovation. In the few theatre performances that had been staged previously, the women’s roles were played by male actors in female attire.After much consideration, the producer had his mind set on a perky, young 19-year-old Asnaketch, who was considered to be a great beauty. Photographs from the time portrayed her as a voluptuous woman having apale face, dark hair, and a thin nose. She was married to an Italian businessman who declared she would one day be an actress.

After a meeting was arranged for her with the producer, he offered her the part. She refused the role at first but friends persuaded her to reconsider her decision and accept the offer. Showing oneself on stage was extraordinarily daring for the time subjecting one to cruel gossip andcondemnation.

Asnaketch accepted the job and stood up to the test of it. She played the role of young girl secretly meeting her lover in Geferesa forest. She rehearsed for months and she was ready to face the audience. The producers had fliers printed and sent them out to dozens of schools and bureaus. Asnaketch’s family, with many friends, well-wishers and young trendy ladies of Wube Berha came to attend. The hall was packed. Her biographer Getachew Debalke recalls the day, “She dressed in fanciful costumes and sparkling jewels that she bought out of her pocket. She looked Maria Montez (a famous Hollywood actress then). The young actor who played opposite her himself was startled by her elegance when she suddenly appeared on the stage as he had not seen her dressed like that before. The two were supposed to sit on the floor and share their love for each other. However, the young man thought it would be inappropriate forher to sit on the not-clean floor and he took out his coat and laid it on the floor for her to sit down. His fiancé who was in the audience left the hall sobbing.”

Asnaketch has proved herself to be more than a trophy beauty. She knewher lines and she performed her part splendidly. It was a beginning of a lengthy acting career. Through the 1960s she continued to shine as an actress and singer in theatre. Interpreting romantic and character roles, she brought to her characterizations a resonant voice and an expressive face that captivated audiences.

When in 1955 the Ethiopian National theatre was completed for the jubileecelebrations of the coronation of Emperor Haile Selasse, Asnaketch was employed as an actress and singer. Other women actresses and singers such as Telela Kebede, Mulembet Haile Maryam, Askale Amenshewa also joined. Professor Franz Zelwecker, Austrian composer and music director, gave her and the other new artists training, to make them ready for the inauguration. Asnaketch did voice lessons with him. It was then that she became aware of the meaning of professionalism for a public performer.

Until then, Asnaketch had never really thought much about vocal technique. Studying with Zelwecker, she began to understand that thevoice could be controlled and channelled.

Asnaketch played the title role in the musical theatre, “David and Orion,”costumed stunningly, bejewelled. She did her part awesomely well, displaying her singing and dancing talents. Her performances and looks were so sophisticated that many people in the audiences thought that shecame from foreign country. One appearance led to another, and she subsequently began to appear in many of the theatres staged at the National Theatre, including playing the role of Desdemona in Othello in 1963.

It was around this time that Asnaketch started to sing and play Krar beside her work as an actress. Her musical career slowly began to grow and her fan base began to grow. She used to own a cabaret in Wube Bereha and her devoted grassroots fan base grew into bar-filling crowds ofregulars. Asnaku’s distinct voice and look mesmerized her audience.
Asnaketch used to say “I am not a singer, but “angoraguari” a mutterer”.She was so revered because she sang many of her songs and accompanied herself on the krar. Once Asnaketch had a band accompanyher because it was a popular thing to do at the time. The audience reaction was unanimous in insisting she continue to accompany herself onthe Krar, and not with a band.

Asnaketch was at the peak of her career in the 1970’s.On April 1974, she made her first recording. “Krar songs by Asnaketch Worku” was released under the Philips-Ethiopia label, with a moderate success. It included ‘Ende Eyerusalem”, which remains one of Asnaketch’s most moving songs.Her recording career was launched. Unfortunately, the record was soon taken of the market, as it was the beginning of the revolutionary mayhem.French music producer Francis Falceto wrote that aside from the seriousness of the political situation at the time, Ethiopian’s propensity fordouble-meanings quickly gave rise to paranoia. “A danger to everyone- to the artist, the record label, the distributors as well as the listeners.”
In 1976 her songs were recorded in a cassette, when lovelorn andcompromising melodies start to spread with the fledgling cassetteindustry.

The songs were often played on radio and became immensely popular. Butmany felt that her live performances were much better than her recordings. The American musicologist Cynthia Tse Kimberlin wrote that, “In general, her studio recordings are more silted, self-conscious and formal where her singing shows less emotion and variation and the text is more refined. Her live performances for indigenous audiences display more emotion because she is more comfortable with her surroundings andhas the opportunity to play a familiar audience. These performances are more spontaneous and improvised where the text more risqué without theusual restraint needed for commercial recordings sold abroad."

Asnaketch went on numerous overseas tours. In 1987 the military government sent her and other fifty musicians and performers on 16 weektour of Europe and America to thank the international community for the support they gave at the time of famine. Accompanied by an Ethiopian Television crew that filmed the tour, the group named Hizib Le Hizib (People to People) visited many countries, giving a series of successfulperformance.

In 1996 she was invited her to perform in Germany where her music werealso recorded and released. She received critical acclaim from several German newspapers. Asnaketch retired from the National Theatre in 1989,though her stage and music career did not end. In 1998, for the centennial celebration to mark 100-year-old of Franco-Ethiopian relations, Asnaketch played the part of Melkam Ayyehu in the translation of "Michel Leiris à Gondar" along with the renowned French actor Philippe Demarle, aplay written by Geneviève Rosse, translated in to Amharic by Dr. Berhanu Abebe and directed by Tesfaye Gessese. It was staged in Ethiopia and France.

In 1998 she has received an award for life time achievement from the Ethiopian Fine Arts and Mass Media Prize Trust. Asnaketch's audio music has been accessible though relatively little live footage. The French based label Buda Musique has complied her music into "the Lady with the Krar" in 2004. Coinciding with the release of the CD, her biography by GetachewDebalke was published by the Alliance Ethio-Francaise and Shama Books in an Amharic edition. The 2004 annual Ethiopian Music Festival was dedicated to her.

Despite her difficult life, Asnaketch rose to the top of her profession and made a unique contribution to Ethiopian music and theatre. Today, many people still enjoy listening to her recordings. Hers is untiring and unselfishdevotion to the promotion of arts in this country during an impressive career of five decades.

Asnaketch died on September 2001, four days after the New Year's Day.She was 78. She had been in poor health in recent years, suffering fromrheumatoid arthritis.

Respect for Self-Heroes: Who Is Richard Pankhurst?

RICHARD PANKHURST is the son of the Suffragette leader Sylvia Pankhurst (1882-1960). He is a world-famous scholar of history and a central figure within the Ethiopian academical and cultural life, as well as ahighly esteemed person amongst ordinary citizens of Ethiopia. He has published more than 20 books, mainly concerning Ethiopian history, and innumerable essays, not least published in The Encyclopaedia Aethiopica. As founder of The Institute of Ethiopian Studies (IES), Addis Ababa University, centre for the international studies of the arts of Ethiopian, since 1963 housed in the former villa of Emperor Haille Sellasie, Pankhursthas made and still makes a great scholarly and pragmatic contribution to the history and culture of Ethiopia. His most renowned achievement to theEthiopian people was when he directed the campaign for to repatriate the great stelae of Aksum, a more than 30 meter high monolith from the 4th century, considered as the most precious cultural heritage in the country. In 1937, it was looted by the Italian Fascist regime and moved to Rome. After many years of efforts and negotiations with the Italian government,in 2005 it was returned to Aksum.

Respect for self-Heroes: Richard Pankhurst in his Twilight YearsBy Arefayne Fantahun April 23, 2014

Sitting a little awkwardly on a wooden chair in front of his old home in Addis Ababa's Tor Hayloch area, Professor Richard Pankhurst, 87, greets visitors. The family compound, which his wife of 58 years, describes as 'crumbling' has a large front yard with a big lawn where a tortoise walks around. Time has taken a toll on the renowned historian, teacher, and author on Ethiopian history and culture, who has struggled with Parkinson's disease for a number of years. The man who has probably published more books, articles, and commentary about Ethiopia than any other single individual is now in painful struggle with declining health. He stays home that he shares with Rita who is devoted to him—whom he is equally devoted to her. She has a knack of giving him undivided attentionat a particularly frail time when he is suffering from fading vision and poorhearing. "I have become his secretary and nurse," Rita says.

Pankhurst's mind is still sharp, and his frustration at having to speak slowly – is palpable. He is much focused on where he is now and on making the most of his twilight years with Rita. He is writing a preface fortwo oncoming books with Rita's help. He does so by dictating, the texts, into a record machine, that she would then transcribe onto paper.

Richard has a deeply generous spirit that nourishes all those who came knocking at his door seeking for advice and guidance. "He is very open towhoever had any kind of question to do with Ethiopia. So there's always been a continual flow of people coming to see about all kinds of subjects.He listens patiently and would give some useful answers,' says Rita.

Richard and Rita have lived in Ethiopia for over 50 years, with a ten yearbreak during the Derg. It was Richard's mother, Sylvia Pankhurst, who cemented their fascination with the culture and languages of Ethiopia.

Sylvia was a British artist, suffragette, anti-fascist, and friend of Ethiopia who was engaged in efforts to remove fascist Italian rules from Ethiopia inthe 1930s. She moved to Addis Ababa in 1956, bringing her son, Richard and soon to be daughter-in-law, Rita. Richard had grown to learn about Ethiopia by reading- and later contributing to New Times and Ethiopian News that his mother ran from 1936 to 1956 and later a monthly journal, Ethiopia Observer. He would copy out a chapter from the history of country for each issue, which became the focus of his academic interests for the rest of his life.

Richard and Rita remained in Ethiopia after Sylvia's death. Richard tookover editorship upon her death, and in 1963 became a co-editor of the Journal of Ethiopian Studies. He began teaching at Haile Selassie I University and founded the Institute of Ethiopian Studies (IES) at Haile Selasie I University in 1962, becoming its first director, a position he helduntil 1972.

Following the overthrow of Haile Selassie, the Pankhurst family returned in1976 to Britain, with two of their children, Alula (named after one of Ethiopian patriot, Ras Alula) and Helen 13 and 12, respectively. "We didn'thave to but Richard was afraid IES would close down,' explains Rita.
Richard became a research fellow with the school of Oriental and African Studies and the London School of Economics, before working as a librarianat the Royal Asiatic Society. There he also continued to research about Ethiopian issues.

The Pankhurst returned to Ethiopia in 1986 when Richard resumed research with the IES. Rita started working as librarian of the National Library of Ethiopia. Since then, they spend most of the year in Ethiopia, often working around the clock. Richard's bibliography of works on economic history, politics, language, culture and belief is vast and forbidding. In his numerous writings over the last five decades, Professor Pankhurst authored and co-authored twenty three books on Ethiopia. He has either edited or compiled an additional seventeen. He continues writing many articles, editing several books and collections of essays. And his were not only well received in scholarly circles, but are also widely read and reprinted. He is a contributor to multiple Encyclopedia Aethiopicaentries, including those on foreign travelers to the country. He writes regularly and extensively for weekly papers such as the Capital, Addis Reporter, and the Ethiopian airlines in-flight magazine, Selamta. He is alsoa trusted source for the media and is often consulted by journalists and scholars. Explaining how he was able to produce so much, Rita says, "He has an ability to focus on one problem and its ramifications at a time, you know when he was writing the medical history, his mind was on medicine and how traditional medicine came about and so on. That occupied his mind. Then he would move to another subject. That will be everything happening would relate to that."

Pankhurst led the campaign for the return of the Axum obelisk from Rometo Ethiopia, where it was re-erected in 2008. He has also led the campaignto raise funds for a new library to house material on Ethiopia; it will be named the Richard Pankhurst University Library.

The Pankhurst are working to encase their memoirs in two volumes, they have finished the first one which focuses on the events and the people in their early life, which was recently published by the Los-Angles based Tsehay publisher, under the title 'Ethiopian Reminiscences: Early Days'. The joint autobiography reveal about Richard and Rita's growing up with unusual and intriguing parents, their meeting at age 31, and the ease withwhich they adapted to their new country.
Rita says they are working on the second part of the book, clinging to thehope that time would allow them to bring the project to an end. These reminiscences are a reminder of the value of the work and collaboration that made the couple triumphant and picture of sheer determination, resilience despite severe physical limitations.

PROFILE: A Heroic Story Of Ethnic Ethiopians:
Ras Gobana Daachi: By AFRICANGLOBE Editorial Staff - Apr 12,2015 By Teshome M. Borago
In response to my last article about Consociational democracy, I receivedmany comments and feedback from readers. Some readers supported myproposal to redesign Ethiopia's federal structure to grant regional statehood to all identities in Ethiopia [like one-ethnic nationalists, mixed- ethnic Ethiopians etc..] But to my surprise, most responders emailed me about my statements on multi "ethnic ethiopians" or "mixed Ethiopians." Many people are asking, why don't we talk enough about mixed Ethiopians?

Since 1991, one of TPLF/EPRDF's missions has been to suppress millions of mixed "ethnic Ethiopians" because they do not belong to any of the ethnic identification categories. While searching for the best angle to writeabout these mixed ethnic Ethiopians, i stumbled upon the heroic story of Ras Gobana Dacche. So, What makes the story of Ras Gobana unique?

Historically, it is well-known that Cushitic, Omotic and Semetic speaking people of the Horn of Africa have been mixing and intermarrying for manycenturies as Abyssinian kingdoms expanded southward, and as Oromos migrated north & west; while trade/competition for resources reshaped boundaries. But in recent history, Ras Gobana played the most prominentrole which has a lasting impact on our identity.

Born in May 1821, Ras Gobana Dacche came from a family of warriors. When he was a child, half a century has already passed since the Yejju Oromo dynasty conquered and outmaneuvered its opponents in Gondar. His era was politically fragile and foreign interests on Ethiopian lands werealso ripe. For example, during Gobana's time, the Sudanese Mahdists were planning to annex northwestern Ethiopia and the Ottomans still had their agents lurking in eastern Ethiopia while Europeans were fighting to control the whole region. This was the era and Gobana's powerful family was already involved deep in politics, including in the leadership of the influential Macha & Tulama Oromo clans.

In the eyes of the competing oromo clans, Gobana was the bravest and skilled fighter; feared by other Oromo mootis (kings). His Family from his father's side was also connected to Abba muda, the spiritual and traditional leader of oromo. What everybody today knows about Ras Gobana is that his Shoan Oromo soldiers were allied with Emperor MenelikII; and this alliance defeated other Oromo and non-Oromo regions. But one fabrication that we are repeatedly told in recent years by OLF & TPLFis that Ras Gobana was an Oromo "traitor." So… was Ras Gobana really atraitor?

The answer is simple. Some Oromo politicians today mistakenly think thatRas Gobana was a full Oromo. But several Oral accounts and historical books say that he was half-Oromo and half-Amhara. In his journal, the1800s Russian scholar Alexander Bulatovich described Gobana's mixedethnicity, by clearly stating: "his father was an Oromo, and his mother anAbyssinian."

So, the main problem is that those people who accuse Gobana do not really know him or know how identity influences politics. Despite Gobanabeing the top Ethiopian minister of war, critics falsely believe that he wasonly serving Menelik, without his own personal interests. Many modern politicians do not know how Gobana's mixed ethnic identity shaped his political decisions to strengthen the unity of the Shoan Oromo family andthe Amhara family into one strong country.

Long before he united with Menelik, Gobana and his horsemen were already powerful and very popular in the south. According to firsthand accounts by Alexander, "all the best fighting elements of Shoa thronged under his banners." Gobana was visionary and his Shoan Oromo forces also acted as peacekeepers between Oromo clans who otherwise "slaughtered one another like cattle," according to historian Prof. DonaldLevine.

Other historical achievements that Ras Gobana is credited for include:Destroying the Gojjam Amhara forces that opposed Shoa.
Settling disputes between warring Western Oromo clans. Convincing the King of Jimma to peacefully unite with Shoa. Helping save the Leqa Naqamte (welega) kingdom from Sudaneseinvasion.

These achievements prove that he was one of the visionary founders of acentralized Multi-ethnic Ethiopian state under Shoa rule. During his military leadership, other mixed Oromos were promoted into the highest ranks in the Ethiopian military, including the famous minister Habte Giyorgis Dinagde.

While he was not the first, Gobana's achievements were a major milestone in our transformation into a multi-ethnic Ethiopian society. So from a viewpoint of one-ethnic based politics, YES, Gobana might look likea "traitor" (the same way as the south-born Abraham Lincoln was a "traitor" for the southern Confederate states.) But from the standpoint of the evolution of a supra-ethnic Ethiopian identity, Ras Gobana is a pan- Ethiopian trans national hero.
In Summary, we should not underestimate the impact of ethnic mixture inEthiopian politics. It is a tradition in Ethiopia that most people pick their father's side of ancestry during self-identification. But this bad tradition does not affect their school of thought or political consciousness, which is still defined by their mixed heritage. So I would argue that we improve our old tradition and embrace our mixed identities. Mixed people should be proud of their mixed heritage and avoid picking one-side of their family. They are simply "Ethnic Ethiopians" by birth since they are the byproduct of the Ethiopian nation-state formation.

In the book "Becoming Oromo" authored by Mekuria Bulcha, there is one short story of a man living in Sudan. He is originally from eastern Wallagaand he was approached by Oromo nationalists to recruit him for OLF. TheOLF was apparently desperate and they did not know the man was a mixed Oromo. So an OLF representative eagerly asked him to join their organization. To their surprise, he rejected their offer by saying his ethnicity is "Ethiopian!"

In this important time for our country, it is time that all mixed Ethiopians stop picking only one part of their identity and embrace their whole being.It is time that we embrace our Ethiopian ethnicity by saying "Gosaye Ethiopia!"

Just like Ras Gobana, for millions of mixed Ethiopians, our "Gosa" is Ethiopia. The ethnic Oromo has Oromia region, the ethnic Amhara has Amhara region and the Tigrayans have Tigray; but for us ethnic Ethiopiansboth our identity and our ethnicity is Ethiopia. Thus defending the Ethiopian state is our duty just like Gobana and his grandson Ras Abebe Aregai did. Ras Abebe (son of Gobana's daughter Askale Gobana) was the leader of the "Arbegnoch" in the mid-1930s, which defeated the Italian occupation and who later became the Minister of Defense under Emperor Haile Selassie. Who among the TPLF camp would dare to tell Ras Abebe Aregai choose only one part of his ethnicity?

Economic History of Ethnic Ethiopians:

Mohammed Abdullahi Ogsadey 1920s - 2006:

The King of Export Ethiopian coffee

"A good name is far better than a good deal of money." –M.A.Ogsadey Ogsadey was born to a poor family in Gabiley, Somalia in the mid-1920s. His father Abdillahi Kahin was a poor trader that would die at a very youngage and his mother would come to fill in the gaps of raising four sons and a daughter. Three of his brothers; Ali Abdillahi and Adan Abdillahi, would be greatly involved in the coffee busin...ess and Haji Askar Abdillahi remain in Gabiley, eventually building his own name.

Ogsadey and his two brothers would eventually move to Ethiopia in searchof a job and a better future. Ogsadey had a very humble beginning as a truck driver. Later, they would start the M.A.O. Corporation in 1942, a coffee import and export empire, believed to be one of the largest in EastAfrica, going back almost six decades. Ogsadey dealt with the Coffee, Ali took care of the management of the day-to-day transactions while the youngest Adan handled the transportation of the goods. He was the first Ethiopian to export Ethiopian coffee; it was previosuly controlled by Italian, British and Greek traders.

Ogsadey has 20 children and numerous nieces, nephews, and grandchildren, who are either closely involved in his vast empire or studying abroad. A man who made sure anyone related to him was taken care of and the less fortunate were employed, Ogsadey would often attribute his love of family as the principal reason behind his success.
Nicknamed "Ogsadey" for his hard work which paid off, he eventually stretched his business to three continents. Ogsadey never discussed hiswealth in public. He was the richest person in Ethiopia, a position that would later be occupied by the billionaire Sheikh Mohammed Al-Amoudi.

Ogsadey has given generously for the past 60 years to make a difference in Ethiopia. Building schools, hospitals, and a mosques in every city he has stayed in Province 5. He even sponsored cycle and soccer clubs to compete over-seas for Ethiopia. He has always lived amongst his country men rather than abroad only leaving once a year for check-ups to America. His last charitable work was donating $254,000 USD to Dil ChoraHospital in Dire Dawa over the next coming 5 years. It would open its doors in 2007 by his family in his honor to serve the poor. Ogsadey lived with a pacemaker for 25 years and died on 2006 after a lifetime of work inthe coffee. Rest in Peace ! Credit:-> Encyclopedia & Marias

THE HISTORY OF MEASUREMENT (MIZAN) SERVICE IN ETHIOPIA

We know different types of scales or balances(mizan). Starting "ye suqe mizan" we know that there are "ye wefcho bet mizan" and human mizan. Because we bought goods for our family from suqe when we were kids and we often went with our family to wefcho bet specially when we were childe. Therefore we can say we knew mizan since we were kids.We wonjians know not only these kinds of scales, but also we know truck loadscale.(yeageda mizan). Before the sugar cane has been supplied to the grinding machines of the factory,it has to be weighed. When the truck arrived at mizan bet, it has to step up on this huge scale or mizan. It was necessary because, first to know the productivity of the sugar cane and second to motivate the transporters with additional payment as premium.Therefore we wonjians knew this kind of scale when we were kids. I saw such kind of mizan in awash sebat kilo, mojo,etc. But I knew it before in wonji. That is why I can say wonji was not only our home town. It was also our school of life.September 25, 2015: (PRESS RELEASE): United Movement for the Salvation of Ethiopia Through Democracy (UMSED) - Ethiopians can no longer tolerate an entrenched ethnic minority rule:

Launching an Effective Resistance against Tyranny:
A tyranny which is the Real Driver of Instability and Civil Strife inEthiopia.
Ethiopia is one of the oldest nation-states in the world. Both written and oral history and recent archeological discoveries, despite regional rivalries,suggest the historical continuity of the nation. It was a Monarchy until 1974. From 1974 to 1991 the country was declared to be ‘Peoples Democratic Republic’ by the military junta, Derg, and went through a traumatic experience. The Tigrai People’s Liberation Front (TPLF), a guerrilla force from a minority ethnic group that led the rebellion against the military junta and captured the institutions of the State, has been in power for the past 24 years. The country is ruled as a one-party state under a façade of multi-party system since 1991. Launching an Effective Resistance against TPLF Tyranny – a tyranny which is the Real Driver of Instability and Civil Strife in Ethiopia

The state is characterized by an intensifying political repression, rampant economic corruption, denial of basic human and political rights and repeated sham elections. The top brass of the army and security organs ofthe state, including key diplomatic positions, are effectively mono-ethnic despite the claim of the regime to stand for the equality of all ethnic groups. The people have completely lost confidence in the government after the regime shamelessly declared itself to have won 100% of the parliamentary seats in the 2015 election. Ethiopians, with no other choice available to them for democratic transition, have now risen up in arms.
And this is a credible threat of force to the regime. History has time andagain proven that no government that denies freedom, justice and democracy to its people will not survive their wrath.

Against this background, Ethiopian democratic forces, reflecting the broaddiversity of the Ethiopian society, have recently formed the United Movement for the Salvation of Ethiopia through Democracy (UMSED) as an umbrella organization. UMSED is committed to coordinate the people'sstruggle for effective resistance against TPLF's tyranny and to ensure the transition to true democracy and stable political order in Ethiopia. No one relishes the idea of armed conflict; but, there are times when armed self-defense becomes the only choice to resist the unbearable violence by minority against majorities and to bring about an enduring peace and stability in a society.

EAF used to purchase American aircrafts

Prior to the revolution the Ethiopian Air Force used to purchase Americanaircrafts. The first Northrop F-5 arrive in 1966. Here the entry from Wikipedia:

"Ethiopia received 10 F-5As and two F-5Bs from the U.S. starting in 1966.In addition to these, Ethiopia had a training squadron equipped with at least eight Lockheed T-33 Shooting Stars. In 1970, Iran transferred at least three F-5As and Bs to Ethiopia. In 1975, another agreement was reached with the U.S. to deliver a numb...er of military aircraft, including14 F-5Es and three F-5Fs; later in the same year eight F-5Es were transferred while the others were embargoed and delivered to a USAF aggressor Squadron due to the changed political situation. The U.S. also withdrew its personnel and cut diplomatic relations. Ethiopian officers contracted a number of Israelis to maintain American equipment.

The Ethiopian F-5 fighters saw combat action against Somali forces duringthe Ogaden War (1977–1978). The main Somali fighter aircraft was the MiG-21MF delivered in the 1970s, supported by Mikoyan-Gurevich MiG- 17s delivered in the 1960s by the Soviet Union. Ethiopian F-5E aircraft were used to gain air superiority because they could use the AIM-9B air- to-air missile, while the F-5As were kept for air interdiction and air strike.During this period Ethiopian F-5Es went on training against Ethiopian F- 5As and F-86 Sabres (simulating Somali MiG-21s and MiG-17s).

On 17 July 1977, two F-5s flown by Israeli pilots were on combat air patrol near Harer, when four Somali MiG-21MFs were detected nearby. Inthe engagement, two MiG-21s were shot down while the other two had a midair collision while avoiding an AIM-9B missile. The better-trained F-5 pilots swiftly gained air superiority over the Somali Air Force, shooting down a number of aircraft, while other Somali aircraft were lost to air defense and to incidents. However at least three F-5s were shot down byair defense forces during attacks against supply bases in western Somalia."

AVIATION HISTORY IN ETHIOPIA:

Aeroplane Named after "Tsehay", an Ethiopian Princess

The first Airplane constructed in Ethiopia in 1934 by the German engineerand emperor's pilot Herr Ludwig Weber. It was named after the then daughter of Emperor Haile Selassie I, Princess Tsehay. The 'plane's first flight took place either at the very end of 1935, or at the beginning of 1936, when "Tsehay" was flown by Herr Weber in person. The history of "Tsehay" was, unfortunately, a short one. The 'plane had flown only 30 hours when the advance of the fascist invaders obliged Weber and his staff to leave Ethiopia. They left at the beginning of May 1936, only a fewdays prior to the entry into the city of Pietro Badoglio's fascist army. The 'plane was then appropriated by the invaders, who dispatched it to Italy.

The History of Opposition Politics In Ethiopia

Soon after Emperor Menelik's death, in 1913, Lij Iyasu V (1913 -1916) took the throne. He was the grandson and designated heir of Menelik II. Iyasu then spent much of his time to improve relations with the Muslim population, as several of his wives were Muslims, rather than leading the modernisation of the country. Iyasu's attempts to improve relationships with the Muslim population and his colourful lifestyle dismayed and annoyed the nobility of Shewa and the clergy ...of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church who feared that he might turn Ethiopia to a Muslimstate.

Iyasu ruled for about three years but he was never officially crowned and recognised as emperor so he was known as Lij Iyasu. This was because ofhis endless and special relationship with the Muslims in the east of the country.

In 1916, Iyasu was overthrown and he fled to the Afar region. He spent much of his time in the Afar lowlands, and then in Tigray and parts of Wello who were hostile to the central government and sympathetic to him.The nobility of Shewa and the clergy of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church officially crowned Zewditu, the daughter of Menelik II, as empress of Ethiopia.

After 5 years on the run, Iyasu was captured and imprisoned in Fiche,North Shewa. For details, visit The Plight of Iyasu and Ras Hailu of Gojjam.

Religion - Ethiopian Orthodox Occupation - Military leader, diplomat

Ras Imru Haile Selassie , CBE (Amharic : ዕምሩ ኃይለ ሥላሴ; 23 November 1892 – 15 August 1980) was an Ethiopian noble, soldier, and diplomat. Hewas also the cousin of Emperor Haile Selassie . He was acting Prime Minister for three days in December 1960 during a coup d'état and assassination of the Prime Minister Abebe Aregai.

Born in Shewa Province, Imru was the childhood friend of his first cousin once removed Haile Selassie I (Imru's mother, Mazlekia Ayala Worq, was Haile Selassie's first cousin); both were tutored together under Abba Samuel Wolde Kahin, and were raised by Imru's father Haile Selassie Abayne, whom Harold Marcus describes as the Emperor's "real father", asserting that "Makonnen's son recalled the surrogate with affection, whereas he invariably referred to his father with formality and deference."Both Imru and his father accompanied the future ruler to his first governorship in Sidamo. In 1916/17 Imru, by then a Dejazmach, was appointed Shum (Governor) of Harar province by his cousin. In 1928, Imru was appointed Shum of Wollo province when Gugsa Welle failed to end a smoldering rebellion there.
In 1932, Imru was promoted to Ras and made ruler of Gojjam province. Imru replaced Ras Hailu Tekle Haymanot, who had been convicted of treason for allegedly helping the deposed Lij Iyasu escape, and sentencedto life imprisonment. Upon arriving in Gojjam, Imru was immediately faced with a revolt by Fitawrari Admassu, a natural son of the imprisoned Ras, who on 30 September briefly held Debre Marqos; not long afterwardsAdmassu ended his revolt, sending messengers to the Emperor to ask for pardon. Nevertheless, despite numerous reforms and efforts to modernizethe province, which enriched both the producers and traders, Imru found few friends in Gojjam and "was invariably viewed as an outsider, the emperor's agent, and, unable to rule by consensus, he governed by force."

From October 1935, Imru led his provincial army and commanded the Army of the Left in the Second Italo-Abyssinian War. His early offensive deep into the Italian rear threatened the Italian advance. Ultimately Imruwas stopped and his army was destroyed by the use of poison gas dropped from the air.

In May 1936, Haile Selassie appointed his cousin as Prince Regent in his absence, departing Ethiopia with his family to present the case of Ethiopiato the League of Nations at Geneva. Ras Imru fell back to Gore in southern Ethiopia to reorganize and continue to resist the Italians.
For this to have worked, he needed the revenue of the gold mines of Asosa , but the loyal Sheikh Hojali was driven out in July 1936 by rebellious Welega Oromo , who also made Ras Imru's position in Gore untenable, and he retreated to the southeast. The Italians followed him, and pinned him down on the north bank of the Gojeb River , where he surrendered December 19, 1936. He was flown to Italy and imprisoned onthe Island of Ponza until freed after the formal surrender of Italy in September 1943 .

After the war Ras Imru was appointed a Crown Councilor and served as Ambassador to India , the United States , and the Soviet Union. Always aman of modernist and reformist views, as well as deeply religious Ras Imru increasingly began to lean towards a left of center political stance that would probably have had him classified as a socialist in the western European sense.

Both he and his son Mikael Imru became advocates for land reform , andhe went as far as distributing his own extensive estates to his tenant farmers. Due to these political views, Ras Imru was nicknamed "the Red Ras" by many contemporaries.

Regardless of his leftist sympathies, Ras Imru remained a confidant of theEmperor and a monarchist. However, when the Derg deposed Emperor Haile Selassie in September 1974, they asked Ras Imru to accompany them to the Emperor's palace in order to witness the act. Eyewitness accounts relate that the Ras was visibly distressed as the members of theDerg announced to the Emperor that he was deposed and that they required him to accompany them to his place of detention. The Emperor and Ras Imru had a whispered conversation after which the Emperor agreed to go peacefully.

The Ras then asked to be allowed to accompany the Emperor to wherever the soldiers were taking him, and became distraught when permission wasrefused. The members then assured the Prince that he could come to see the Emperor later in the day. It is believed that the Derg did not want to subject Ras Imru to the insults and humiliation that were directed at the Emperor by Derg sympathisers as he was driven away from the palace.

After his death in August 1980, Ras Imru became the only member of the Imperial dynasty to be given a state funeral by the Derg . Television and radio announcements of his death accorded him his full titles of Royal Ras,and the dignity of "His Royal Highness" even though the Duerg had abolished all Imperial titles in 1974. He was publicly and officially eulogized as a former Prince Regent , a distinguished diplomat, an early progressive, and a leader of the resistance against the Italian occupation. No mention was made of his blood ties to the Imperial family or his lifelong close association with the late Emperor.

ANIMAL PETS: What Do you know about The Abyssinia Cat ?

The Abyssinian is one of the oldest known breeds of cat. They have a similar appearance to ancient Egyptian cats. The first Abyssinian cat wasbrought to England in 1868. In the book Cats, Their Points and Characteristics (published in 1874), author Gordon Stables mentions the following..."Zula, the property of Mrs. Captain Barrett-Lennard. This cat was brought from Abyssinia at the conclusion of the war..."

In the Harpers Weekly supplement dated January, 27, 1872 there is an illustration of several feline exhibits from the London Crystal Palace show,including an Abyssinian cat. In the following write up the journalist writes"The third prize was taken by the Abyssinian cat, She was captured in thelate Abyssinian war, and was mostly remarkable for her woe-begone appearance, seemingly discontented at her sudden elevation into notoriety, and longing for her barbaric freedom in the good old days of King Theodore."

The Abyssinian cat was officially recognized as a distinct breed in 1882. The first standard of points was published in Harrison Weir's book in 1889and the first Abyssinian registered in the National Cat Club Stud book wasin 1896.

Appearance:

The Abyssinian is an elegant, medium sized, muscular but slender bodied cat. It has a short, silky and close lying coat with distinct ticking. A slightlywedge shaped head with almond shaped eyes and large ears. The tail is long and tapering.

Temperament:

Abyssinians are highly intelligent, extroverted and active cats. They they love people and like to be included in everyday family life. Abyssinian catsoften enjoy a game of fetch with their human companions. They are not an overly talkative cat and have a quiet voice. Words often used to describe Abyssinians include loyal, active, intelligent, playful and inquisitive.

Respect for Self-Heroes:

Veteran Journalist Kebede Anisa

Arefayne Fantahun (April 18, 2015)

Kebede Anissa, who is 82, doesn’t look too bad for his age. He sits a little awkwardly in his chair, but he is a lively, playful interviewee. He lives in Kazanchis, in a crowded Total area close to a garage. It is a big house thathe shares with Ayantu Gemechis, his wife, a grand-daughter of Onesimos Nesib, the man who translated the Bible into the Oromo language. The house is filled with magazines, newspapers and books. On the wall there is a photo of Kebede with the former US president Richard Nixon.

The veteran journalist has a lot to say about the newspaper business in Ethiopia. He became a reporter in the 1960s in the Ethiopian Herald, covering various political and social events before going to Israel for a year to study international cooperation. Upon his return, he joined the Voice of Ethiopia, an evening English newspaper, which nurtured his deepinterest in politics and current affairs. The paper was founded in 1955, onthe occasion of silver jubilee anniversary of Emperor Haile Selassie's coronation. It was first issued as twin language weekly in Amharic and English. A few years later, it was elevated to a daily status with separate Amharic and English editions under the editorship of Berhanu Zerihun andYakob Woldemariam. He worked for the paper for three and half years.
Kebede says Yakob was the best editor he has known and he was an influence in his becoming a journalist. "Yakob is an accomplished editor with great news sense. He is my friend and kin. He is a good example tome as journalist," he says.

Kebede's long career included working as sub-editor, as an assistant editor and later editor-in-chief at the sisterly Amharic paper for the Voice of Ethiopia, of Ye Ethiopia Dimts, which was a tabloid both in format and content. Kebede directed the local and regional news coverage and his meticulous proofreading skills won him many admirers. His editorials advocated equal rights for women and men, and, the need to engage in charity works, the proper use of government budget and land reform. The paper's editorial column made Kebede Anisa a nationally recognised namewith many keen followers. He coined the slogan for the paper, "Ethiopia Tikedem" (Ethiopia first) against the corrupted officials who enriched themselves with the money they stole from the people. The slogan was years later exploited by the military junta, the Derg.

Talking about his experiences at the paper, Kebede said there were sometesting times. "I've learned that there are no short cuts. That success requires hard work. It requires understanding your craft better than anyone and working hard to get ahead," he says. He was suspended for aweek from his editing duties for writing editorial critical of the government's budget allocation when he was editor in chief of Ye Ethiopia Dimts. But he said he felt empowered by the trust readers placed in him. "I have always been passionate about our service to the people," said Kebede. "Providing a fair, accurate and reliable source of information is a huge responsibility and to do that five days a week, takesa special level of professionalism. Our goal has been to improve our coverage of economic development, city and legal issues." He said duringthe Emperor's time, the media enjoyed a relative freedom. "We were not supposed to criticise the Emperor and the church but otherwise we had the right say anything we wish", he said.

"I've thoroughly enjoyed the colleagues and challenges I've met in both newsrooms," Kebede said. While working for Ye Ethiopia Dimst, he went to the United States in 1964 to cover the U.S presidential elections between Johnson and Goldwater invited by the state department. He saidthe visit focused on the familiarization with the electoral system in the USand election process and promote better foreign understanding of the nuances of U.S. politics.

Kebede counts himself lucky to have received journalism course throughan American Embassy from Macalester College, St. Paul, Minnesota.
Traveling and living with journalists from other countries was enlighteningand he recalls fondly the deep friendships he developed with some of the journalists.

Kebede later became editor of Ye zaretu Ethiopia weekly, a popular weekly paper which was edited by Ahadu Sabure. Kebede says Ahadu was the first man to establish and edit Ye Zaretu Ethiopia. "He made the paper a forum of intellectual debate. A maverick and a brilliant editor, Ahadu grewhis Amharic Ye Zaretu Ethiopia to great heights and inspired a whole generation of journalists," he recalls. Kebede worked for four and half years, continuing on Ahadu's excellent standard. He remembers being able to recruit many bright young journalists. In 1973 he was appointed as a general manager of development and planning of Wollo province after-in his own words- kissing the feet of the emperor, perhaps the only journalist to be granted that rare privilege.

Born in Nekemt, Wellega in 1933, Kebede attended Haile Selassie I Schooluntil the 8rd grade. As a student he had been contributing poems to AddisZemen. He came to Addis Ababa and attended teacher's training college for three years and he graduated in 1951 with a diploma. Kebede, taught at the elementary school of Nekemt for five years and in Debre Berhan's Teachers' Training school for another five years before beginning his media career. He came to Addis and joined the Ethiopian Herald. He worked for some time and he went to Israel for a year to study international cooperation. He came back to Ethiopia, then transferred to Awasa Demonstration Centre, which was under the Ministry of Social Affairs before returning to newspaper in the capital.

After the dawning of the revolution, he worked as head of publication at National Planning Office and later department head and chief advisor to the press department. After the EPRDF government came to power, in his proudest achievement as a journalist and consultant, Kebede helped the nascent private newspapers such as Minilk, Tomar and Ethiop as an adviser and later editing the short-lived Amharic weekly Fikare. One of themost memorable interviews he did was with the late author Haddis Alemayehu for four hours in his house behind Plaza Hotel. Committed to his country and to the free press advancement, Kebede was also presidentof the Ethiopian Press Association and department head and chief adviser to the press department.

Kebede carries great admiration for journalists such as Tsegaye Tadesse,Mairegu Bezabih, Tesfaye Kabtyemer, and Negash Gebre Mariam, all of them alive. Having retired from Ethiopian government service and Reuters, Tsegaye is enjoying the twilight years of his life. Tesfaye Kabtyimer strike him as "a great man, a great writer" when he was the editor-in-chief of the Ethiopian Herald. "Negash Gebre Mariam is a wonderful person'' he says. ''He is man of sincerity. He used to write in English and Amharic flawlessly".

Kebede is clearly impressed by Gedamu Abraha. Describing him as "a great Ethiopian journalist and intellectual" Kebede adds: "A very intelligent person. He was a very good organizer and a capable writer. Weworked together at the Press Department. He was in charge of the radio and the press department as well." The renowned painter and poet GebreKirstos Desta used to write for his paper, Ye Ethiopia Dimts.

Kebede says in those days there was no journalism school and most of thejournalists had teaching background and they got noticed by the articles they were contributing for the newspapers. Notable journalists such as Asaminew Gebrewold, Berhanu Zerihun, Tsegaye Tadesse, Leulseged kumsa, Yacob Woldemariam were all school teachers before taking up the newspaper trade.

For him, the Ethiopian press then was sophisticated compared to today. The Daily and weekly Amharic and English-language newspapers, EthiopiaDimtse, Addis Zemen, Yezareitu Ethiopia, Sendekalmachin and the Ethiopian Herald were well-written and had quality content. Ethiopia Dimtse, a paper that he used to edit, had reliable and widespread nationalcirculation, with 35,000 copies sales. It was a paper with good journalisticstandards and its editorials criticised certain aspects of the government's work. Both editions of Dimts were published under the sponsorship of the Patriotic Association, which was a nongovernmental organization.

Kebede's wife, Ayantu Gemechis has supported him in his journalism career, he said. And it was she who took the lead in rearing their nine children, and anchored the family. Raised as a Protestant, it wasn't alwayseasy living with the journalist who was smoking packets of cigarettes every day but Kebede says she has always been patient and loving. They knew each other from school days and Kebede was an admirer of her grandfather, Onesimos Nesib, whom he described as “the great Oromo father and Oromo educator”. “I was happy to marry someone related to him,” he says.

Ato Yidnekachew Tessema Eshete (1921-1987)

Not only is Ato Yidnekechew Tessema called the "Father of Modern Sport in Ethiopia" but also the " Father of Sport in Africa ". Ato Yidnekachew is an extraordinary man with extraordinary contribution to the developmentand popularization of sport in Ethiopia and the rest of the African continent.

The son of Negadras Tessema Eshete, a legendary literary figure, Ato Yidnekachew was born in the city of Jimma in Southern Ethiopia on Ethiopia’s ...New Year day - Meskerem 1, 1914 (September 11, 1921). When he was four years old, the family moved back to Addis Ababa whereyoung Yidnekachew attended school at the Teferi Mekonnen school. At school, Yidnekachew excelled in sports, particularly, soccer. Later in 1935,Yidnekachew joined the first Ethiopian soccer team-the St. George club.
He also qualified to play in the national team.

In 1943, Yidnekachew opened the first sport federation with his colleagueAmde Mikael Desalegn. Once the government recognized the importance of support for sport, Yidnekachew served his country and people in thecapacities of secretary of the soccer and sport federation, president of national Olympics committee and commissioner of Sport federation.
Yidnekachew’s contribution to sport to the African continent started with his pioneering efforts and subsequent success in establishing the African Soccer Federation (CAF) in 1964. He served CAF as the deputy president between 1964-1972 and as the President between 1972 and 1987. He wasalso member of the African Sport Congress, International Olympics Committee, FIFA and President of the African Olympics Committee.
Yidnekachew worked and fought hard to make sure that sport brought peace and understanding between people. He was strongly opposed to accepting sport clubs based on race and religion. He was also opposed to commercial advertisements by tobacco and alcohol companies in stadiumsand sport events.
Yidnekachew’s contribution for the anti-Apartheid movement by preventing the then South Africa from participating in African and world sport events is legendary.

In his long career, Yidnekachew was awarded numerous medals andawards by the Ethiopian government and foreign governments.
Yidnekachew died on August 20, 1987 after a long illness. He is survivedby his children and wife.

ETHIOPIA MUSIC: Mahmoud Ahmed Spans His Career on 50thAnniversary Concert

By Arefayne Fantahun June 15, 2015

Ethiopia's famous and revered singer, Mahmoud Ahmed, appears tonightat the Ethiopian National Theatre with Roha Band, starting at 6:30 P.M. Admission is free. Organized by the Alliance Ethio-Française, Mahmoud Ahmed's concert with Roha Band celebrates the artist's 50 years as professional artist. Mahmoud will be accompanied by band members of the Roha Band, Giovanni Rico, Selam Seyoum, Fekade Amdemeskel, andDawit Yifru for the performance. The Roha Band was formed in the early1980's and the band members are reuniting tonight twenty years after their last concert together.

Mahmoud has played with a number of bands such as Wallias and Roha Band in the 1980's and 90's, performing in numerous grand hotels of thecapital, from the Hilton to Ghion.

Ethiopia's most famous living musician and an international star, Mahmoud has been promoting Ethiopian culture at home and in the West for decades. His songs are largely consecrated to love, earning him great fame. He surrounded himself with the best musicians; his recordings weredistributed on cassettes produced by music shops.

Mahmoud's musical interest was sparked when, aged 18, he became a handyman for the Arizona Club. This is where he got a break in the 1960s,stepping in to sing due to a "no show" by the lead singer of the Imperial Body Guard Band. His star ascended and this opportunity led to a long term engagement until today, and his first 45 rpm recording in 1971. Between his record store and constant demand for his performances, he played at the beginning mainly in his home country and in recent years abroad as his fame grew. In 2007, he was awarded the BBC World musicAward.

Boghossian, Alexander Skunder (1937-2003)

Born in Ethiopia in 1937, Alexander Skunder Boghossian first rose to prominence at the age of 17 when he won second prize for his painting atthe Jubilee Anniversary Celebration of Ethiopia’s Emperor Haile Selassie

I. The following year he was awarded a scholarship to study in London, England at St. Martin’s School and the Slade School of Fine Art. He later moved to Paris, France, where he remained for nine years as both studentand teacher at the Academie de la Grande Chaumiere. While in Paris he interacted with African artists and intellectuals who were part of the Negritude movement. He also encountered the work of the French surrealists. Some of the artists who influenced Boghossian include Paul Klee, Roberto Matta, and the Afro-Cuban artist Wilfredo Lam.

Boghossian in 1966 returned to Ethiopia and taught at the School of Fine Arts in Addis Ababa. He moved to the United States in 1970 and two years later was appointed as a faculty member at Howard University in Washington, D.C. His work, described as “a perpetual celebration of the diversity of blackness,” has been on display throughout the world including the Smithsonian Institution’s National Museum of African Art andthe Museum of Modern Art in New York. Boghossian was the first contemporary African artist to have his work purchased by the Museum ofModern Art.

Alexander Skunder Boghossian died in Washington, D.C. on May 6, 2003,within days of the opening of an exhibit of his work titled “Ethiopian Passages: Dialogues in the Diaspora.” Sources: Saheed A. Adejumobi, The History of Ethiopia (Westport: Greenwood Press, 2007)

Despite all the brutalities the Italian fascist regime has committed againstthe Ethiopian people, the Italians are still the most favored ‘faranjis’ (a name especially awarded for trans-Caucacians), and the most familiarisedin Ethiopia. Thanks to the late emperor Haile Selassie, in accordance with the Ethio-Italian bilateral agreement signed in 1947, all Italian citizens have the right to live and work in harmony with other Ethiopian nationals in every corner of the nation. So is the relationship of colonizers and theironce upon subjects in the rest of Africa such as French in west and centralAfrica, Great Britain in southern, and eastern Africa, Portugal in Angola, Mozambique, Guinea Bissau, Capeverdes, Sao Tome & Principe, and the Spanish in few African countries (like in Equito Guinea, and Spanish Sahara) et-al.

In Memory of The Royal Princess Hirut Desta (1930-2014)"A down to the earth" Princess...

The second daughter of Ras Desta Damtew by Princess Tenagnework HaileSelassie she was a third child after Princess Aida and Prince Amha Desta. In May 1936, she accompanied her mother, siblings and grandparents intoexile when Ethiopia was invaded by fascist Italy. During this exile, her father Ras Desta Damtew, who had remained behind in Ethiopia to command the resistance to Italy in the south of the country, was capturedand executed by fascist troops in 1937. Emperor Haile Sel...assie was restored to the throne upon Ethiopia's liberation from occupation in May 1941. The then Emebet (Lady) Hirut attended the Bolitho School of St.

Clair, in

Penzance, Cornwall, and then went on to Clarendon School in Abergale North Wales. She went on to study at the Sorbonne in Paris, and at Columbia University in New York. Upon her return to Ethiopia she became a teacher at the Empress Menen School for Girls founded by her grandmother, and went on to eventually become it's director, working there for many years. She became the Chair woman for the Committee forthe Restoration of the Churches of Lalibela, and spent five years in the town working towards the preservation of the rock hewn churches there, and towards improving the lives of the towns people there. She is creditedwith having the town made more accessible by having a modern road connect to it, and is credited with introducing electricity to the town. She also caused to be built the Seven Olives Hotel which was the first tourist hotel in the town, and which helped make Lalibella a tourist attraction andworld heritage site that it is today. Princess Hirut was known as a very down to earth and practical woman who put on no airs and pitched in whenever there was work to be done.In 1968, Emebet Hirut Desta was married to Major General Nega Tegegne, and upon her marriage was elevated by her grandfather to the title of Princess with the dignity of Her Highness. Princess Hirut Desta accompanied her husband when he became the commander of the Third Army Division from 1971 to 1974, and then to Gondar when he became Governor of Beghemdir and Simien in 1974. Rest in eternal peace!

Respect for self-legends: Ethiopia Music:

Mahmoud Ahmed received honorary degreeBy Arefayne Fantahun June 29, 2015

The Gondar University awarded an honorary degree to Ethiopia's famousand revered singer, Mahmoud Ahmed.

The university, which has awarded honorary degrees to an Ethiopian economist and a former Chief Executive Officer of the Ethiopia CommodityExchange, Dr Eleni Gabre-Madhin, musician Aster Awoke, athlete Meseret Defar and a number of local and international personalities before, presented Mamoud with the title Doctor of Music at a ceremony in GondarUniversity on July 5.

Mamoud, who left school unqualified in his teenager years, made a speechat the ceremony. Ethiopia's most famous living musician and an international star, Mahmoud has been promoting Ethiopian culture at home and in the West for decades. His songs are largely consecrated to love, earning him great fame. With dazzling combinations of unforgettableAmharic lyrics, tone and melody, Mahmoud Ahmed's soulful body of work –ranging from recordings like Almaz (1973); Alemye (1974); Ere MelaMela (1975); Tezeta (1975)– is not only part of his personal legacy butalso part of a wider heritage collection; a valuable part of Ethiopia's musical history and cultural heritage.

Mahmoud began work as a shoe shine boy. A series of jobs followed until he ended up handy-man at the Arizona Club. This is where he got a breakin the 1960s, stepping in to sing due to a "no show" by the lead singer of the Imperial Body Guard Band. His star ascended and this opportunity ledto a long term engagement until today, and his first 45 rpm recording in 1971. Between his record store and constant demand for his performances, he played at the beginning mainly in his home country andin recent years abroad as his fame grew. In 2007, he was awarded the BBC World music Award.

ETHIOPIA MUSIC: Mahmoud Ahmed performs at Black SummerFestival By Arefayne Fantahu July 23, 2015

Ethiopia's famous and revered singer, Mahmoud Ahmed, appears tonightin Paris's Black summer Festival, Cabaret Sauvage, starting at 19:30.
Mahmoud blends traditional Ethiopian Amharic music with sixties and seventies soul, funk, and jazz. Now seventy-four, Mahmoud was born to an impoverished family in Addis Ababa, and as a young boy had to shine shoes on the street to help support his family. He later worked as a handyman at a club that hosted Imperial Bodyguard Band, and, one night in 1962, when the band's singer did not show up, Mohamoud asked to sit in on a few songs; soon afterward, he became one of the group's front men. Following the 1974 revolution, which overthrew Emperor Haile Selassie, the band dissolved, and Ahmed formed his own outfit, called Ibex. The next year, it released a masterpiece, "Ere Mela Mela," which hada unique sound marked by deep, circular grooves and saturated organ lines. At the center of that album is Mohamed's richly textured voice, which, when it reaches for a high note, can trigger spine-tingling ecstasy. He comes to Paris to perform Black Summer Festival concert in Cabaret Sauvage tonight (59 Bd Macdonald, Paris)

Still working at 86:
Yakob Wolde-Mariam inspires colleaguesBy Arefayné Fantahun July 27, 2015

He is one of the Ethiopia's oldest working journalists. He is the editor of the weekly English version of the Ethiopia Reporter. He heads to the Reporter's office every Friday morning to make a final touch at the articlesthat come out on the paper the next day. "I edit everything that is available, whatever is presented until 5 o'clock. Later than that, I come back home. I get tired. Another editor takes over," he says.

Yakob Wolde-Mariam had edited two dailies and three monthlies before finally leaving the Ministry of Information in September 1993 after 34 years of service. He then briefly worked for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs editing the foreign office diplomatic journal. His enthusiasm for the trade still continues freelancing for a private paper. "I'm still a journalist. I still enjoy working although newspapers aren't the fun they used to be. I thinkthe fun has been the best thing and working with some great colleagues,"he says.

His career spans the imperial, Derg and the current regimes and he says the leaders have all contributed their own due share for the advancementof the country. As he puts it, Haile Selassie built on modern foundation a larger land with most of the facilities of modern technological life. "Menghistu Haile Mariam, despite the human carnage associated with hisname-reduced the edifice of feudalism to dust and Meles Zenawi created peace in Ethiopia for the first time in its long history," Yakob wrote in his autobiography. His brief memoir shows he is raconteur with a constant stream of reminiscences, anecdotes and stories.

How does he respond to those who criticise him of working for the ruthlessmilitary regime and writing editorials praising the 'revolutionary leader'? "Ididn't see anything wrong with socialism. I am still a socialist. Not a revolutionary socialism but a democratic socialism. But I have not fundamentally opposed to the system. Communism can't be practically applied in this country. 99 percent of the people are still ignorant. Religionis strong. How can you build communism in this country?" he asks.

Yet Yakob admits that the year 1974 was marking the beginning of the decline and fall of Ethiopian journalism. He explains: " With 'and I quote' and 'emphasis mine', the radio and newspapers were becoming the dumping grounds of trash masquerading as boringly long research papersprepared by the streetwise."

That period was also characterized by intimidation and penalties. He recalls about an incident in which he and other editors such as Baalu Girma were forced to pay from their salary for many months for the government cars they were given as gift by the previous government. Thestory was this. On 23 July 1973, on the occasion of the Emperor's eightieth birthday –and the last he was to celebrate as ruler- three dozen journalists, including most of the editors of the country, were commandedto the palace where the Emperor thanked them for the special coverage of the birthday anniversary. He told them they could keep the governmentcars in their possessions as a reward for the good job they had done.

Yakob kept a Volkswagen which is still stationed in his compound. When the military regime took power, and looked at the matter in a different light and accused the editors for possessing the cars in a shady and corrupt way. They were told to repay the money, at a time when journalists were badly paid for their work. Yakob and his colleagues werenot pleased. But they had no choice.

Many of the people who had worked with Yakob held him with great esteem. One called him 'a true gentleman'. Another 'a great editor'. Thereare others who say he is a brilliant writer but not a good journalist. He lacked simplicity and straightforwardness in his editorials and his newspaper articles. Yakob himself admitted while writing editorial for the Ethiopian Herald, he was using such "obscurant phrases" merely intendedto circumvent censorship. Like the 'Sword of Damocles' hanging over Ethiopia and officials finding themselves in the "arms of Morpheus" in reference to the hidden famine of the 1970's.

Yakob was born in Nakamte, Wollega, on June 19, 1929 to Wolde-MarimShuba Leka and Wolete-Mikael Senebeto Garba, to whom he was secondson. His father comes from a well-known Oromo clan, the Ghida. Yakob was brought to Addis Ababa by his cousin, who was engaged in the burnouse trade. He joined the Haile- Selassie I Secondary School KotobeSchool in 1945, two years after the school was opened.

He was interested in music and he became one of the few students to attend a weekly piano class under a young Armenian lady near the TrinityCathedral. "An Eritrean friend of mine was learning playing violin under the Italian. Both of us had at one time rehearsed for weeks a Mozart duetto be staged for the Emperor at the Grand Palace at prize-giving ceremony," he recalls.

He said that he grew up "with no thought at all" of becoming a journalistbut getting a scholarship to United Kingdom was what did it, he says. In1950 he went to London to study electrical engineering at the Kingston- upon-Thames Technical College, living in the Surbiton neighbourhood of London, a city which, as he recalled, was stunningly beautiful. His own days were filled with studies, visits to bookshops, music and amateur theatre, and evenings spent at pubs enjoying British beer –"which is an excellent sober drink of diverse make" with compatriots debating everything from the future of Ethiopia and reading Omar Khayyam and bringing a Finish girl to his room once or twice a week.

"During my two years stay at Earl Courts, I cultivated a great love for journalism by reading newspapers.

Right from my arrival in London in 1950, I had cultivated a taste for the Observer, the then Manchester guardian," Upon returning home, he joined the Ethiopian Herald as sub-editor in 1959 replacing an African-American journalist who was leaving for home. He succeeded David A.Talbot in 1960 to become editor-in-chieffor a little over one year.

He practised writing in the Herald under his own name, mostly translatingEmperor Haile Selassie's speeches, which would come beautifully hand- written with a 'Lion of Judah' seal at the head of the each page. He had also written several anonymous articles praising the Emperor-or admiringconstitutional monarchy – "to strengthen my precarious position in the Ministry of Information."

However, his editorship of the Ethiopian Herald ended abruptly in 1961 when he was fired suddenly by the officials of the Ministry of Information who were unnerved by his criticism the rumour circulating in the city afterthe 1960 coup d'état on 'lack of information'. He had also praised the Great October Revolution as a significant event in the history of mankind-in a signed article when the editorial was censored.

In 1963 that he joined the Voice of Ethiopia as its editor and later workedfor Menen and Addis Reporter magazines. When those publications were closed, he was transferred to the publications division of the press department. "I was writing satirical articles for the Ethiopian Herald from 1971 to the first two months of 1974 simply because its editor –who had the recently arrived from the US, had begged me to do so to make the Sunday issue more popular because I had always thrived in an atmosphere," he says.

In 1970, Yakob faced a mini revolt as two senior staff, resigned from Addis Reporter, an English-language weekly magazine, that he was editing. Addis Reporter, although not exactly his own baby, was also a very popular weekly until it set out to be a more sober monthly. First launched under the editorship of the renowned journalist and novelist, Baalu Girma, the magazine had professional journalists working on it, including Gedamu Abraha, Solomon Deressa. "Technically and professionally, the magazine was highly competent" Yakob admits. When Baalu was fired and replaced by Yakob, it was not an easy relationship with the two accomplished writers. Yakob wanted the magazine to be more sober and less critical. Arguments between them would end with thetwo walking out of the office. "If I were shirking my own editorial responsibilities I had, of course, nowhere else to go, aside from being thrown into the streets to explore the mortifying experience of beggary," Yakob says.

Yakob is not a great fan of Baalu Girma, whom he said did not strike him as particularly notable editor. Yakob says Baalu was glamourizing prostitution in an article that he used to publish in Menen magazine but acknowledges that the late journalist and author was very good at organizing journalists for the production of newspapers and magazines. He regarded Baalu as a novelist who unfairly satirized his own friends and colleagues, as he did in “The Call of Red Star. Ghedamu Abraha was depicted as mad man and Kebede Anisa and Yakob himself were mocked and ridiculed. “It was pity, however, as I had said at the time, that one has to thrust one’s finger into the fire to learn that it burned-as he did with ‘Oromai’ and perished by ridiculing (Unlike journalists) those in powerwho were taking very seriously,” Yakob wrote.

Yakob praises Ahadou Saboure who he said was the greatest Ethiopian journalist who was wielding the most powerful pen in the country until hewas shoved aside in 1961. “Ahadou made the Amharic version of L’Ethiopie d’Aujourd’hui a forum of intellectual debate by attracting versatile and provocative writers” he says.

Yakob also admired and wrote about the formidable journalist-and later novelist-Berhanu Zerihun who he said was “a man of inexhaustible ideas and energy who was taking journalism very seriously as profession with amission.”

Asked about the current state of the media and young journalists, Yakob says he finds it hard to be appreciative. “It is terrible. I mean they (youngreporters) are not even interested in learning English. You know, you editsomething, you correct certain mistakes. Next week, the week after, theymake the same error. They don’t even read what was written. That is the tragedy in Ethiopia. Yakob has ten children and one of his daughters is working for the Ethiopian Reporter.

Famine in Ethiopia: The act of human or nature?

UN says 4.5 million Ethiopians now facing starvation

Food crisis grips Ethiopia despite claims of strong economic growth –NBCNews

IRIN August 25, 2015: The number of Ethiopians who will need food aid by the end of this year has surged by more than 1.5 million from earlier estimates, according to United Nations agencies. After failed rains, some 4.5m people are now projected to require assistance, the UN Office for theCoordination of Humanitarian Affairs (Ocha) , the World Food Programme and the UN children’s agency, Unicef, said. This is an increase of 55% on initial projections of 2.9 million, and meansdonors must urgently provide an extra $230m to meet these needs.

Gillian Mellsop, UNICEF representative and acting humanitarian coordinator, said donors had been generous but more was needed toprevent unnecessary human suffering. “The situation facing us today marks a significant change in our plans, requiring the scaling up of assistance, now,” she said.

Remembering The First State owned Bank Manager:

Tefera Degefe Demmo (Phd) passed away in the Canadian city of Vancouver, British Columbia in February 28, 2015 at the age of 89.

Dr. Tefera Degefe Demmo was appointed as the first Ethiopian Manager ofthe government owned, State Bank of Ethiopia, which later became Commercial Bank of Ethiopia. At the past when Banks in Ethiopia were managed by Foreigner, Dr. Tefera used to speak publicly that if given the opportunity Ethiopians are capable of managing and running banking operatio...ns. He demonstrated his claim practically when he got the chance to lead the then State Bank of Ethiopia. Dr. Tefera is a prominent figure in our country's banking industry for his contribution through structuring the banking operation of the country. He is particularly remembered for his contribution in attracting the larger public to the banking service and helping them develop faith in the industry.

During his service as a manager to the State Bank of Ethiopia for 14 years, he initiated the launching of the first Bank professionals TrainingInstitute which served as a source of professional bankers to the expanding Bank branches at the time.

Prior to becoming a manager to the state Bank of Ethiopia, Dr. Tefera Degefe was appointed as Manager of the subsidiary of State Bank of Ethiopia in Khartoum. During this time he performed outstandingly in expanding branches and improvising the service to make the Bank strongcompetitor to foreign banks operating in Sudan.

After a regime change in our country in 1974, Dr. Tefera had been appointed as Governor of the National Bank of Ethiopia. He is well remembered for planning, preparing, signing on and distributing thenational currency for use.

Dr. Tefera Degefe is always remembered by the management and employees of the Commercial Bank of Ethiopia as a prominent figure in laying the foundation for the commercial Bank of Ethiopia in particular andthe banking sector in general.

FAITH: Fragments of world's oldest Koran

By FoxNews (September 1, 2015)

British scholars have suggested that fragments of the world's oldestknown Koran, which were discovered last month, may predate the accepted founding date of Islam by the Muslim prophet Muhammad.

The Times of London reported that radiocarbon dating carried out by experts at the University of Oxford says the fragments were produced between the years 568 A.D. and 645 A.D. Muhammad is generally believed to have lived between 570 A.D. and 632 A.D. The man known toMuslims as The Prophet is thought to have founded Islam sometime after610 A.D., with the first Muslim community established at Medina, in present-day Saudi Arabia, in 622 A.D. "This gives more ground to what have been peripheral views of the Koran's genesis, like that Muhammad and his early followers used a text that was already in existence and shaped it to fit their own political and theological agenda, rather than Muhammad receiving a revelation from heaven," Keith Small of Oxford's Bodleian Library told the Times.

The two sheets of Islam's holy book were discovered in a library at the University of Birmingham in England, where they had been mistakenly bound in a Koran dating to the seventh century. They were part of a collection of 3,000 Middle Eastern texts gathered in Iraq in the 1920s. Muslims scholars have disputed the idea that the Birmingham Koran predates Muhammad, with Mustafa Shah of the University of London's School of Oriental and African Studies telling the Times: "If anything, themanuscript has consolidated traditional accounts of the Koran's origins."

The first known formal text of the Koran was not assembled until 653 A.D.on the orders of Uthman, the third caliph, or leader of the Muslim community after Muhammad's death. Before that, however, fragments of the work had circulated through oral tradition, though parts of the work had also been written down on stones, leaves, parchment and bones. The fragments of the Birmingham Koran were written on either sheepskin or goatskin. Small cautioned that the carbon dating was only done on the parchment in the fragments, and not the actual ink, but added "If the dates apply to the parchment and the ink, and the dates across the entirerange apply, then the Koran — or at least portions of it — predates Mohammed, and moves back the years that an Arabic literary culture is inplace well into the 500s."

PMHD's Speech to The UN General Assembly:

On The Threats of Ethnic Politics In Ethiopia'

(PERSPECTIVE) Prime minister Hailemariam Desalegn's Speech to the UNGeneral Assembly on the Threats of Ethnic Politics in Ethiopia Nahom M Freda September 2, 2015

Prime Minster Hailemariam Desalegn's unexpected statements regarding the negative impacts of ethnic politics and religious extremism at a meeting on the 2nd Growth and Transformation Plan was dramatic and earthshattering, for the simple reason that this is the first time ever the EPRDF echelon publicly admitted the dangers of ethnic politics. He also made comments about the dangers of religious extremism. (I will limit my comments to the former in this writing). Add to the PM's earthshattering salvo the conviction with which he made his points and the reciprocal affirmation he received from his bigwig EPRDF comrades (the interspersedapplause was sustained and boisterous), one can't help but wonder if this is a cautious sign of changing times in Ethiopia. If not, the EPRDF is now on record of acknowledging the disastrous impacts of its ethnic politics.

Regardless, I want to give the PM due credit, if not for the substance of his comments, for the conviction and emotion with which he delivered themessage. I am saying this because it is unimaginable he will make such aprofound statement out of his own volition and without the go-ahead fromthe true holders of power in Ethiopia – the TPLF politburo. While his comments might not have gone far enough to the extent of repudiating the cancerous ethnic politics from Ethiopia's body politics, it nonetheless was unmistakable in its clarity – that after almost a quarter of century in power the TPLF is having second thoughts about divisive politics. The question is why now, how serious are they, and what are the next steps?

TPLF's Endless Contradictions

To put this in perspectives, one needs to delve a bit into the history of theTPLF and examine its nature. Since its days in the bush, the TPLF unashamedly defied all historical records, and declared that Ethiopia is only 100-years old and embarked to remake the country in its contorted image by dividing the nation along linguistic kilils (euphemism for ethnic enclaves). A decade or so later, it claimed to have embarked on a renaissance – to restore the country's centuries-old glory. Renaissance bydefinition is the "rebirth" of a nation, the very nation the TPLF capriciouslyreduced to 100-years of history just a few years past. Moreover, from dayone it forged a narrative that didn't differentiate between the good and bad in history and launched a wholesale condemnation and assault on Ethiopian history. It demonized potential allies who stood for equality in unity.

The contempt and hatred the TPLF leaders harbor for the country they inherited blinded them into an irrational rampage and self-flogging that resulted in fostering suspicion and hatred among the many ethnic groupsthat make up the Ethiopian mosaic. By taking such a self-defeating and belligerent stand, the TPLF has not only repulsed potential allies but mostimportantly denied current generation of Ethiopians the opportunity to learn from history and build a better future and country. Rather than cultivating peace and harmony through positive and constructive messages while at the same time launching genuine legislative and programmatic remedies for addressing legitimate grievances, the TPLF erected walls among ethnic groups and infused the country with hate propaganda, widening rifts and severely curtailing cohesion and harmonybetween the various ethnic groups.

It is not an accident that after almost 25 years of hate mongering you nowhave a generation of Ethiopians who are as alien to each other as they areto foreigners. Without a forward looking national forgiveness and reconciliation strategy and a shared history built on interaction and common experience, ethnic groups are wider apart today than before, andas a result, the very fabric of the nation is withering away. You can't cultivate suspicion and hate at the primary and secondary school levels and suddenly expect harmony to swell at the university level. Moreover, you can't aspire to achieve peace, stability, and sustainable economic progress in such a poisonous environment. No amount of "renaissance" or"growth and transformation plan" would get you there. Any progress made in such a divisive environment can only be fleeting. First you need to shrink the yawning and ever-expanding gap among ethnic groups. In fact, if not corrected quickly, the divide and discord will eventually lead to assured conflict and disintegration. Ethiopians need to heed Obama's July 26th message to Kenyans – "that a politics that is solely based on tribe and ethnicity is a politics that's doomed to tear a country apart. It is a failure – a failure of imagination."

The problem is that because of its myopic and jaundiced view of Ethiopianhistory, the TPLF has been unable to construct and launch a fitting and responsive vision to address the myriad challenges of Ethiopia. This lack of vision is reflected in the inherent contradictions the TPLF finds itself time and again in governing the country. For example, it recently declared100 percent election victory. How can you hold an election in a diverse and huge country such as Ethiopia and come out winning 100 percent?

This defies elementary logic, decency, and self-respect. You can't have it both ways. You either declare no elections and rule by fiat or conduct elections and accept the verdict of the people (no contradiction in both instances). Perhaps the best example of the TPLF's inherent contradiction is demonstrated in its 1998-2000 war with Eritrea. In that unfortunate war, the TPLF sacrificed an estimated 70,000 Ethiopians and hundreds of millions of dollars and achieved a decisive victory over its foe, and later onnegotiated a settlement that surrendered Ethiopia's victory to its vanquished enemy. Sadly, no one has been held accountable for this disastrous outcome. One can make a long list of such contradictions in themodus operandi of the TPLF.

Another problem is the TPLF's shortsighted and vengeful nature. For example, it fought tooth and nail to deny the erection of a commemorative statute for Ethiopia's last monarch, Emperor Haile Selassie, along with Kwame Nkrumah's in the premises of the new AU building in Addis Ababa. No doubt the king was a despot, but nonetheless,he was instrumental when it comes to the independence and unity of Africa. This fact cannot be denied. In fact, the emperor did the TPLF and future Ethiopians immense favor by bringing the AU to Addis Ababa and opening the door for membership at the United Nations. Africa wanted to honor this Ethiopian "father" of Africa, but the TPLF would have none ofthat.

What the TPLF is not realizing is that by denying Haile Selassie his rightfulplace at the AU, it is also denying the historic contributions of hundreds ofthousands of Ethiopians of all ethnicities in defending themselves from colonial enslavement and their inspirational role in ushering freedom for millions of Africans the world over. The TPLF's inability to liberate itself from hate and accept history "as is" causes it to muddle in constant and murky contradictions. On one side, it likes to enjoy the benefits and bask in the prestige of leading the country that is host to the AU, and on the other, it is vengeful that this was made possible by the works of elders it doesn't identify with. Here again many more example can be given to demonstrate the TPLF's vengeful nature. Such hatred is what shackles theTPLF to the past and constantly impedes it from playing a positive role in shaping a more tolerant, civilized and prosperous Ethiopia. More importantly, this ailment alienates it from the people and prevents it fromenjoying wider acceptance. Given all this, it is safe to assume that the TPLF recognizes that there is no love lost between them and the people ofEthiopia.

One needs to also remember that the TPLF and its lackeys, after nearly 25years of unaccountable leadership, have amassed considerable wealth andinfluence that they want to protect. But in an environment of ethnic disharmony, ethnic favoritism (discrimination), growing income inequality and poverty, and lack of freedom and liberty, sustaining the status quo is increasingly becoming difficult. Such is the state of the TPLF today that something has to change; otherwise the cancer of ethnic politics could have a Frankenstein ending, consuming its very creator, the TPLF. The dilemma for the TPLF is that how do you accept historical mistakes and reform the system without losing face and tarnishing the images of its grossly aggrandized late "visionary leader," who is remembered as the chief architect of ethnic apartheid in Ethiopia?

Next Steps

Let there be no doubt that ethnic politics is an existential threat to all Ethiopians, including to the TPLF. Addressing the threat is going to be a daunting task that demands genuine courage and commitment and the involvement of all. However, it can't be addressed in isolation and in the current moribund and undemocratic climate. Eliminating the cancer of ethnic politics requires going beyond the symptoms and conducting bold surgical interventions. In the PM's remarks you can sense his agony to come up with plausible explanations for the ethnic discord prevailing in the country. He brazenly blames university teachers for poisoning their students with ethnic hatred. The fact of the matter is that ethnic politics is enshrined in the Ethiopian Constitution and given effect through various policy pronouncements, decisions, and actions, starting from the highest echelons of government. Accepting this fact is the starting point for anygenuine reform, not scapegoating this or that sector of society.

Granted the PM urged dialogue on the symptoms of ethnic politics and theneed to arrive at a consensus among his colleagues. However, this at bestis a halfhearted and deficient response to the humongous problem facing the country. Ethiopia is where it is now after sustained propaganda, misguided decisions and actions made by those in power for nearly the past 25 years. It will take time, effort and resources to reverse the damage already inflicted. Let there be no doubt however that it can be accomplished. But we have to be cognizant that addressing the threat takes nothing short of a structural reform. There are proven reconciliationmodels from South Africa to Ireland that can be adopted to fit the Ethiopian situation. Whatever model you choose (or make your own), at minimum there are three crucial steps you have to take for genuine reconciliation to take place: taking stock of the harm to human life, property, and national interest that took place as a direct result of the government's ethnic policyto date; identifying the perpetrators and the victims of the policies; and facilitating dialogue and eventual acceptance and forgiveness between theoffenders and the aggrieved. Crucial to this undertaking is an independentand impartial judiciary and law enforcement and a vibrant free press and civil society to carefully usher the country through the painful but necessary cathartic process.

Is the TPLF prepared to allow this to happen and be part of the process? Can we be optimistic and say that PM Hailemariam has taken the first boldstep in hinting the need for a solution? Time will tell, but Ethiopians, particularly the youth need to sustain the pressure on the government for genuine reform. There is no question that mitigating and eventually eliminating the insidious threat of ethnic politics is this generation's ultimate calling in our country's centuries-old quest to form a fair and equitable system. It is this generation's historic calling to devise a more promising and brighter future based on love and respect for each other and individual freedom and liberty for all. They should break artificial barriers hoisted by visionless agents of hate and reach out to each other, as their future is inextricably intertwined by blood, destiny and centuries of history, good and bad. The Future is indeed in our collective hands!GodBless Ethiopia and Ethiopians!

Investing In People – U.S.-Ethiopia People to People Relations' Celebrating 75 Years of US-Ethiopia Educational & Cultural Exchanges

People to people connections and the cultural and educational exchanges that facilitate them are incredibly important and are a foundation for U.S.-Ethiopian relations and United States foreign policy generally. This year the United States is celebrating 75 years of U.S. State Department exchanges, and the U.S. Embassy is hosting events throughout September to highlight the role of exchanges in U.S. Ethiopia relations. Secretary of State John Kerry highlighted the importance of exchanges to U.S. foreign policy earlier this year when spoke about his own personal experience as an exchange student in Europe that, as he said, left him "with the conviction that every time a student touches down in America,or a scholar crosses an ocean to study, the world grows a little bit closerand we understand each other more."

The U.S. Embassy is proud to open our month of programs with a photo exhibit at the National Museum on the history of U.S.-Ethiopia people-to people relations that is open to the public from September 4 – 13. The exhibition covers a period of almost a hundred years, starting with MelakuBayen, the first U.S trained physician who was in the U.S. in the 1920s. Itwas Bayen who recruited American aviator Colonel John Robinson in Ethiopia's hour of need in the 1930s. Colonel Robinson went on to becomethe head of the Ethiopian Imperial Ethiopian Air Force during the Ethio- Italian war and returned afterwards to help train pilots for the Ethiopian Air Force. Photos of both men are fittingly prominent in this exhibition. These two-way exchanges reinforce the bridges of friendship between ourtwo nations, many of which were sponsored through formal governmentalchannels, such as the official exchanges which brought Oklahoma State University to Ethiopia to help establish Haromaya University, while otherswere more personal and informal. At the exhibit you will see wonderful images, including from the visit of Duke Ellington, one of America's great jazz musicians, who came to Addis in the 1970s as part of the U.S. government-sponsored Jazz Ambassadors program which paired him withEthiopian jazz great Mulatu Astake, another exchange alumnus in his ownright.

There are also photos of sports exchanges, including U.S. Olympian Jack Davis, a silver medalist from the 1950s, Bill Russell, a National Basketball Association (NBA) great, and a recent photo of Luol Deng, a current NBA all-star, who conducted a clinic this summer for young people right here inAddis. These are all great examples of the power of people to people connections and exchanges.

There have also been thousands of individual participants, some of whom are now prominent leaders in their own right, in the formal U.S. government exchange programs, such as the International Visitors Leadership Program, the Fulbright and Hubert H. Humphrey Programs, thePeace Corps, the Cultural Envoy program, and the students sponsored by the United States government to study at high schools and universities in the United States. We hope you will have a chance to enjoy the exhibit and see evidence of the historic ties that bind our two nations through education, cultural, aviation, science and sports exchanges. (Text ends)

DISCOVERY: Meet the man who built his own plane from scratch,using second-hand parts and YouTube tutorial.

The Telegraph (September 9, 2015)

When he was a child in Ethiopia, Asmelash Zerefu dreamt he would one day fly a plane. Jonathan Wells talks to the prospective pilot about the struggle to get his plans off the ground His social media pages are plastered with praise for the Wright Brothers, and inspirational quotes such as Mandela's "Everything seems impossible until it is done" and Thomas Edison's “I have not failed. I have just found 10,000 ways that won’t work” punctuate pictures of his own attempts at aviation. Suffice tosay, Asmelash Zerefu is a man with great belief. The 35-year old Ethiopianhas suffered countless setbacks in his mission to become a pilot, and despite still never having even set foot on a plane - let alone fly one - the amateur aircraft builder refuses to give up on his dream.

Why do we still accept such awful food on aeroplanes?

Fifteen years ago, Zerefu decided to leave the world of academia behind inorder to pursue his passion of flight - despite scoring a GPA (grade point average) of 3.8 out of 4.0 at high school, and being accepted onto university courses for both Public Health and Civil Engineering. The prospective pilot planned to leave the Alemaya University campus to join the Ethiopian Airlines Aviation Academy, but encountered his first major setback when the Dire Dawa branch of the aviation school refused to let him enrol. "I was turned down," Zerefu tells me. "I did not meet the height requirement. I was just one centimetre short." A heavy blow to Zerefu's dreams of flying, many men would have been deterred for good after such a rejection. But not Asmelash.

The secrets of an air steward

"That was the turning point. That was when I decided to build my own airplane in order to fulfil my lifelong dream of flight. This was in 2001." And, since his rejection from the Ethiopian Airlines Aviation Academy, Zerefu has dedicated his whole life to the realisation of his aerial ambitions. Too short to become a commercial pilot, the Public Health Officer set about building his own aircraft; from scratch, in the ninth poorest country in the world. Zerefu has applied his considerable intellectto the meticulous development of his plane. He spent more than a decadeporing over FAA (Federal Aviation Administration) maintenance books, trawling the internet for existing aircraft blueprints and learning the craft of plane building from that font of all knowledge: YouTube. And then, following ten years of planning, the day arrived that Zerefu had to begin construction on Ethiopia’s first ever home-built aircraft. After incorporatingthe design of the Clark-Y Airfoil Wing into his own unique plans, and tailoring other existing plane parts, Zerefu began the long and arduous task of sourcing the components and materials he would need to constructhis very own magnificent flying machine. "I collected from garages and workshops, and Merkato - which is Africa's largest market - in Addis Ababa. I used first and second-hand materials to build my aircraft.”

Wingman: a dating app for air travellers

After first constructing the fuselage of his aircraft from wood, Zerefu mounted his plane on the modified wheelbase of an old Suzuki motorcycle

− his own take on the all-important landing gear. The intricate internal latticework of the wings took many months to create but, once complete, Zerefu attached these too onto his creation. It was then that he turned hisattention to the engine.

“My aircraft is powered by a second-hand Volkswagen Beetle engine,” beams Zerefu. “It is a horizontally-opposed 40 horsepower engine; 4 stroke, 4 cylinders and it can run at up to 3000rpm.” A handmade and conditioned laminated wooden propeller was the last technically integral component to be added, that, at 15 pounds, was built to withstand the power of the 1,285cc engine. Sealing the aircraft, and giving it a final coatof white paint, Zerefu was left only to name it.

"I call it the K-570A. K representing my mother's initial of her name, Kiros, and 570 signifying the number of days it took me to complete myaircraft. The A is for Aircraft."

The completed K-570A is a two-seat, open-tandem parasol light aircraft. Designed by Zerefu to fly "slow and low", it cost 160,000 Ethiopian Birr (£4,900) to build and is the product of nearly half of the Ethiopian's entirelife. "I came across many, many challenges to build my aircraft," he says."People surrounding me considered me mad, and it took many trials and errors to build it. Financial problems were another limitation in making myAfrican aviation innovation possible. But despite those difficulties and obstacles I am close to fulfilling my dream."

Zeferu's largest disappointment occured on 15 June this year after he put on his motorcycle helmet (safety first) and teed up the K-570A on his localairfield (an actual field) for her maiden flight. After producing unexpected friction, the propeller shattered, damaged the plane's smoke exit structure, and sent the engineer quite literally back to the drawing board.

Is this the plane of the future?

But it is this perseverance that characterises Zerefu. For a man who has been doubted and stymied by his peers, his government and even his national airline, he retains an extraordinary amount of optimism, and continues to progress in his endeavour to one day reach the sky. He has recently been in contact with René Bubberman, an aviation expert of the NVAV (Dutch Experimental Aircraft Association) - and the lead guitar player of an Austrian disco band. Bubberman suggested Zerefu shed someof the K-570A's extra weight and, thanks to this advice, the aircraft is fairing better than ever. Zerefu frequently takes his newly improved invention taxiing to test its power. "The performance keeps getting better and better," the prospective pilot reveals.

Zerefu's tenacity and bulletproof resolve is that of a true visionary. Before the year is out, he plans to don his helmet once more and, this time, take the K-570A to the skies. "I want to fly 10 metres above the ground. By doing so, I will the first person in African aviation history who has built an aircraft able to fly high up in the sky. I would like to appear in international media, and promote Africa in terms of science and technology." And though the amateur aircraft engineer cites the opportunity to challenge people's perception of Ethiopia as the foremost reason he chose to build the K-570A, his boyish excitement betrays him. Asmelash Zerefu - a man who spent his childhood living in a ravaged region of constant conflict between military regiments and liberation fronts
- just wants to realise a lifelong dream.

A dream that took one step closer to becoming reality yesterday when Zerefu was offered a fuly paid scholarship to the Inholland University of Applied Sciences in the Netherlands to study Aeronautical Engineering. Hand-drawn pictures uploaded to Zerefu's social media pages encapsulatethe youthful sense of adventure he has somehow managed to retain and, with a Dutch degree and a bit of luck, hopefully these pencilled pipe dreams will very soon become reality.

The Oromo language in Ethiopia is part of an Afroasiatic language. It is the most widely spoken tongue in the family's Cushitic branch. This language is spoken as a first language by more than 30 million Oromos and neighboring peoples in Ethiopia and parts of northern Kenya. About95 percent of Oromo speakers live in Ethiopia, mainly in Oromia Region.
In Somalia, there are also some significant number of speakers of the language. In Kenya, the Ethnologue lists 322,000 speakers of Oromo- primarily Borana and Orma, two dialects of the Oromo language spoken by Ethiopian Oromos. Within Ethiopia, Oromo is the language with the largest number of native speakers. Within Africa, Oromo is the languagewith the fourth most speakers, after Arabic, Swahili, and Hausa.

However, if language preference and priority setting becomes an issue, wehereby request the BBC that it considers Afan Oromo. Unfortunately, Afan Oromo do not have a favorable predisposition and institutional support in Ethiopia or elsewhere. Although, numerically speaking, Afan Oromo speakers are LARGER THAN Tigrigna and Amharic speakers COMBINED; the language remains the most disfavored language since the Oromo people still remain the most disenfranchised and least organized society inEthiopia.

The three main spoken languages (Amharic, Tigrigna and Afan Oromo) aremost likely to be considered by the BBC governing Board and the UK government officials for the new broadcasts to Ethiopia and Eritrea that have recently been announced to begin. It is an ideal and sound decision if the BBC decides to start broadcasting to Ethiopia and Eritrea in all the three languages following the model of the Voice of America (VoA)

The History of Measuring unit (Mizan) in Etiopia

Regardless of various traditional measuring system, we know different types of scales or balances(mizan). Starting shopping measuring system"ye suqe mizan" we know that there are Flour mills measurement locallyknown as "ye wefcho bet mizan" and human mizan (ye sew mizan).

Because we bought goods for our family from suqe when we were kids and we often went with our family to flour mills house, locally known as “wefcho bet” specially when we were children. Therefore we can say we knew measurement (mizan) since we were kids. We wonjians know not only these kinds of measuring scales, but also we know measurement for trailers loaded with sugarcane (ye ageda mizan bet). Before the sugar cane has been supplied for production mills (grinding machines of the factory), it has to be weighed before supplied for the grinding machine in the factory. When the truck arrived at mizan bet, it has to step up on this huge scale or mizan, before directly go to the factory’s grinder machine. Itwas necessary because, first to know the productivity and consumption ofthe sugarcane and second to motivate the transporters with additional payment as premium. Therefore all wonjians live in the sugar estate knew this kind of scale when we were kids. There are such kinds of mizans availed for loaded trucks in Awash sebat kilo, Mojo, and the Assab motorway etc. But someone knew it before your arrival in wonji. That is why someone can say wonji was not only home town, but it’s also schooling life.

The 5 Countries That Produce the Most Coffee In The World

An estimated 3.5 billion cups of coffee are consumed worldwide every day. Climates and growing conditions must be just right to grow the most popular bean in the world. While many of the top coffee-producing nationsare well-known, some may come as a surprise.

The coffee tree is a tropical evergreen shrub and grows between the Tropics of Cancer and Capricorn. Around 70 countries produce coffee, with the overwhelming majority of the supply coming from the developingcountries of Brazil, Vietnam, Colombia, Indonesia and Ethiopia.

- 1. Brazil

The production of coffee has played a pivotal role in the ongoing development of Brazil and continues to be the driving force for the country's economy. The plant was first brought to Brazil in the early 18th century by French settlers. With the rise in popularity of coffee among Europeans, Brazil quickly became the world's largest producer in 1840 andhas been ever since.

In 2014, Brazil produced a dizzying 2.7 million metric tons of coffee, whichwas over 30% of the world's production. Some 300,000 plantations are spread over more than 10,000 square miles of the Brazilian landscape.

- 2. Vietnam

Relatively new to the international coffee trade, Vietnam has quickly become one of the largest producers, second only to Brazil. In the 1980s,the Communist Party bet the future of the nation on coffee, and every year of the 1990s, coffee production increased by 20 to 30%, completelytransforming the nation's economy. In 2014, Vietnam produced 1.65 million metric tons of coffee.

Vietnam found a niche in the international market by focusing primarily onthe less-expensive robusta bean. Robusta beans can have up to twice the caffeine as arabica beans, giving coffee a more bitter taste. If you like to save money on your cup of Joe and are just looking for a caffeine jolt, there is a good chance your coffee is from Vietnam.

- 3. Colombia

A popular advertising campaign by the National Federation of CoffeeGrowers of Colombia featuring a fictional coffee farmer named Juan Valdez helped brand Colombia as one of the most famous coffee-producing nations. Colombia is renowned for its quality coffee and produced 696,000 metric tons in 2014.

Some believe fluctuations in climate have negatively impacted the production of Colombian coffee, as temperatures and precipitation amounts increased from 1980 to 2010. Colombia is still the highest-producing nation of arabica beans, and millions worldwide prefer its mild,well-balanced flavor.

- 4. Indonesia

While not nearly as well-known as other nations for coffee, Indonesia's perfect location and climate have helped it become the second-largest exporter of robusta beans in the world, producing 411,000 metric tons ofcoffee in 2014. The Indonesian coffee industry is comprised of 1.5 millionindependent smallholder farms and few large-scale operations.

Indonesia produces several types of highly sought-after specialty coffees, the most interesting of which is Kopi Luwak. Harvested from the feces of Asian palm civets, the beans have a distinctive and understandably uniqueflavor. The process of collecting and harvesting the beans is rather intensive to say the least, and the result is one of the most expensive coffee beans in the world.

- 5. Ethiopia

Ethiopia's history with coffee goes all the way back to the very beginning,as the very first arabica coffee plant was found there in the ninth century.According to legend, a goat herder took notice of the plant when he realized the energizing effect it had on his herd.

The plant has since played an integral role in the development of the Ethiopian economy. Ethiopia is the largest coffee producer in Africa and produced 390,000 metric tons of coffee in 2014. Ethiopia’s 1.2 million smallholder farmers contribute over 90% of production, and an estimated15 million Ethiopians depend on the coffee industry for their livelihood.

ETHIOPIA MUSIC:Veteran Musician Merawi Sitot celebrates 80th birthdayBy Arefayne Fantahun September 24, 2015

The legendary Ethiopian musician Merawi Sitot celebrated his 80th birthday on September 22. At an event held at Harmony Hotel in Addis Ababa, fans and friends paid tribute to the veteran musician in connection with the birthday. The Jazzamba band members Yared Tefera, Abegaz Kibrework, Girum Mezmur presented a tribute to Merawi with a re-creationof his works. Businessman Abinet Gebre Meskel handed over a 50 thousand birr cheque to the veteran singer to cover his medical expenses.Poet Getnet Enyew recited a poem entitled “Dink” (Wonderful).

Merawi was born in the rural Ethiopian region of Wollo Ambassel 80 yearsago. An orchestra that came to town one day had such a profound impacton him that at age 14 he moved to Addis Ababa to pursue a musical career. Merawi helped set up the Ethiopian National Theatre and managedthe National Theatre's Music Orchestra for 27 years. Through a long and versatile career, he worked across three successive governments as a saxand clarinet player and arranger for more than 43 years, writing and composing music that he toured around the world with fellow musicians including the acclaimed Tilahun Gesesse. Together with other artists of thegolden era of Ethiopian music, they helped raise awareness and opened up enjoyment of African music to a global audience. We salute Merawi Sitot and wish him an amazing birthday.

Ethiopian Orthodox Christians In Celebration Of Demera (Meskelfestival)

APA September 28, 2015 Ethiopia Christians on Sunday celebrated 'Demera', which is a ceremony of the Meskel – finding of the true cross,observed by torching a big bonfire.

Meskel, is the spiritual holiday of Orthodox Christians in Ethiopia and has been celebrated for thousands of years. It has now been designated by UNESCO on the Representative List of the Intangible Cultural Heritages ofHumanity. The feast commemorates the discovery of the true cross upon which Jesus Christ was crucified, by the Empress Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great. The inscription could enhance the visibility of intangible cultural heritage and promote inter-cultural dialogue among themulti-ethnic population of Ethiopia as well as other communities internationally.

According to legend, Helena gave pieces of the cross to all Orthodox churches, including the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahido Church. The Ethiopian Church therefore claims to have its own piece in Gishan Mariam monastery, hidden from the public view, north of the capital, Addis Ababa.Followers of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church observe the Meskel evey year,which last for two days, by building and burning a big bonfire, known as Demera. In the capital Addis Ababa, followers attend Demera, the eve of the main holiday (Meskel) at the city's main square where the large bonfire is torched by the Patriarch. The practice is said to have originated in the fourth century with St. Helena. Following a vision that came to her in a dream, St. Helena created a huge fire, infused with frankincense and let the smoke guide her to remnants of the cross on which Jesus Christ was crucified.

Finding of The True Cross - The Faith on to "Kidus Mesquel" (Holy Cross):Mesquel is celebrated in Ethiopia and Eritrea and marks the finding of theCross of Christ by the Empress Helena, mother of Constantine the Great. Bonfires festooned with yellow Mesqel daisies are lit amid much celebration by clergy and laity of the Orthodox Church and is one of the most spectacular publicly celebrated events in Ethiopia.

The True Cross on the other hand is the name for physical remnants which, in Christianity, are believed to be from the cross upon which Jesus was crucified. According to post-Nicene historians such as Socrates Scholasticus, the Empress Helena, mother of Constantine, the first Christian Emperor of Rome, travelled to the Holy Land in 326-28, foundingchurches and establishing relief agencies for the poor. She discovered the hiding place of three crosses that were believed to be used at the crucifixion of Jesus and of two thieves, St. Dismas and Gestas, executedwith him, and that a miracle revealed which of the three was the True Cross.

PROFILE: Taye Mekuria (Med) 1932 - 2012

By Professor Orvar Johnson

Modern surgery in its original classical form was certainly practiced in Ethiopia from the end of the 19th century mainly by foreigners. The real start of modern surgery took place sometime later in 1964 with the establishment of the medical Faculty and the Department of Surgery at that time, Haile Selassie I University. The first professors of surgery werefrom UK. However from its inception Ethiopia surgeons were attached to the Department of Surgery in Princess Tsehai Memorial Hospital. And it isthere that Prof Taye Mekuria started his career as a surgeon and teacherin surgery.

He was appointed Hon. Associate professor 1964 and became an AssociateProfessor 1968. Looking back in Prof Taye CV we find the following important events of his education and training in medicine and surgery.

Surgical work and teaching should for considerable time take place in St. Paulos Hospital where he later on becomes the chief surgeon and Directorof St. Paulos Hospital. In this time undergraduate program in surgery included relatively small groups of students. Students from that time remember Prof. Taye with gratitude as an inspiring teacher in surgery at bedside and operating theaters as well from the lecture hall. Not few of these students are now senior surgeons and some professors at the department of surgery AAU.

In 1980 postgraduate programme in surgery was launched the staff of thedepartment of surgery during that time includes the head of department and three surgeons and Prof. Taye contribution in a heavy burden of surgical work in wards and theaters in teaching of undergraduate and postgraduate students become decisive for a successful out come.

Prof.Taye was the head of department of surgery AAU from 1986. On theother hand the wars following the revolution demanded the presence of surgeons at the different war fronts. Accordingly, beside his work in department of surgery, Prof. Taye was called on numerous occasions to serve in army. Prof. Taye was in these years vice president of the Ethiopian Red Cross Association whose task become to lessen the suffering of civilians affected by the war.

ETHIOPIN MUSIC:Local musical instruments rhythm quignit:Guest Bloggers Around the World: Music Renaissance in Ethiopia By Afropop Worldwide, May 29, 2014 This is an excerpt from the article on the pop music renaissance in Ethiopia, published on Afropop worldwide. Ethiopia has long been highly regarded for its once-rich and vibrant musicscene. It struggled with the official censorship of the '80s and the sluggishness that plagued it afterwards, but now the contemporary musicscene is finally taking off, fueled by live performances, the impact of FM radios and the Internet, and the return of exiled musicians who are reassuming their role as creators. Many Ethiopians still fondly recall the music that was produced in the '60s and '70s, the classic period called theGolden Age, when major artists such as Mahmoud Ahmed, Tilahun Gessese, Alemayehu Eshete and Bizunesh Bekele experimented with and adapted sounds according to their own creativity.

The Afropop Blog is pleased to unveil a new series of guest posts from bloggers around the world, offering coverage of music scenes by writers who know them best. Our second installment comes to us from ArefaynieFantahun, an expert on the scene in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

Ethiopia has long been highly regarded for its once-rich and vibrant musicscene. It struggled with the official censorship of the '80s and the sluggishness that plagued it afterwards, but now the contemporary musicscene is finally taking off, fueled by live performances, the impact of FM radios and the Internet, and the return of exiled musicians who are reassuming their role as creators.

Many Ethiopians still fondly recall the music that was produced in the '60sand '70s, the classic period called the Golden Age, when major artists such as Mahmoud Ahmed, Tilahun Gessese, Alemayehu Eshete and Bizunesh Bekele experimented with and adapted sounds according to theirown creativity.

Even though some of the musicians that emerged from this era are still active, the 1980s and '90s saw the decline of the whole scene, linked perhaps to the demise of live music and emigration of musicians. The bigbands that provided experimental sparks disappeared and the small groups that emerged did not seem to have the staying power of their predecessors.

In the last two decades, however, a number of factors came together which set the stage for a welcome change. Concerts and live bands have become more prominent. Playing light, melodic songs or energetic rock, soft reggae beat or folklore music, the new stars are making their mark onthe popular music scene, with different grooves, shoulder shaking, ululation and handclapping mixed with the modern style.
Teddy Afro has remained the dominant force in this change, possessing unique performance power. Beginning in 2001, when he became a household name with the album Abugida, his popularity has persisted. Hestrikes a chord with a mass audience because he invokes the nostalgia ofHaile Selassie years and the symbols of the Lion of Judah, aspects of the Ethiopian history which many people feel are ignored by the current regime.

Another positive development is the number of Ethiopians in exile who have returned home. Abegaz Kibrework and Teferi Assefa, who returned from the United States, represent the new generation of musicians leadingthe budding pop scene in Addis. Producer, composer, arranger and teacher, Abegaz is behind the success of many of the musicians in the local scene.

Alongside the development of the new music, there has been a revival ofolder styles and interest in the Ethiopian musicians of the bygone era.
Groups such as Express Band are reworking folk and pop songs from the’50s and ’60s. Formed in 1994 and spearheaded by such icons as saxophonist Feleke Hailu and lead guitarist Kibret Zekios, the Express Band is fast becoming one of Addis’s busiest and most popular Addis Ababa’s status as a center for cutting-edge music has surged in thepast couple of years with the opening of top-tier clubs such as the rejuvenated Belisima Club in the Ghion Hotel, and Jazz Amba in the historic Tailtu Hotel, hosting the Zemen Band, Abysinya Sound and the Express Band, who cater to a variety of audiences. The Selam, Acacia andTizita Music Festivals have also become key annual events of the city. (Texte ends)

Respect for Self-Heroes:

Veteran journalist and author Negash Gebre-Mariam

By Arefayne Fantahun, EthiopiaObserver October 4, 2015

It was a pleasure to talk to the revered journalist and author, Negash Gebre-Mariam. He is an imposing presence and he looks vigorous for a90-year-old man but prostate cancer is weakening him these days, he says. It probably shows in his dark rings under his eyes.

He leads a quiet life in the east of Addis Ababa in a house that he shares with his wife and his two children. A bachelor for many years, Negash didn't marry until he was forty, something he came to regret. "You know, it is better to have kids when you are young and active," he says. Negash,a newspaperman at heart worked at the Ethiopian Herald for a year and edited the Amharic daily Addis Zemen for four years, the paper that had been run by church educated people for the previous 20 years. With his four years journalism training in the United States, Negash had to undertake the task of upgrading the layout, story placement, headlines and introducing the idea and coining the Amharic word for "editorial" consulting a renowned Geez scholar, Leke Seyouman Aklilu. After Addis Zemen, he would leave to serve as assistant manager of the radio and television department and later as general manager of the Ethiopian News Agency.

Negash also tried his hand at playwriting with a drama titled "Yedil Atbiya Arbegnoch", which is based on the theme of the Italian occupation. Yet it was his second play, "Ye Azawintoch Kebeb" (Senior Citizens' Circles) thatbrought him wider recognition and fame. It was also financially rewarding,fetching him 33,000 birr which obviously is considerable compared to the previous one, only 4,000 birr. He also wrote an Amharic novel, entitled Setegna Adari (Prostitute) which was described by the literary critic Thomas L.Kane as "clearly superior to the average Amharic prose story." In this work, Negash focuses on the cause and possible solutions to prostitution in Ethiopia.

Negash grew up in Mechara Jilbo, Harar. He was brought up by his grandfather, hailed from Wolo, who understood the value of education.
Young Negash and all the other children in the family were taught alphabet by priest hired by his grandpa. After reciting alphabet, Negash left with his elder brother who was often on the move because of work. His brother, Assefa Gebre-Mariam who was five years older than him already attended mission school. "He had a strong wish for me to get minimum education too and he sent me to a modern school in Asebe Teferi," Negash recalls. His brother moved to Addis Ababa and Negash followed him. After three years in elementary school in Teferi Mekonen School, he joined Teacher's Training School just opened by the British Council. When he finished there, he headed to Jima to teach at a missionschool, which he did for a year. He came back to Addis and joined KotebeSecondary School to complete his education, which he did only in three years.

The school produced share of distinguished students such as Minase Haile,Girmame Niway. Ten of his classmates were selected to go to England for higher education. But he didn't get the chance. Instead, he joined the former University's College in Arat Kilo, the only college then existing in the country. Negash says he nurtured an ambition from early on to become a writer following in the footsteps of his brother, Assefa Gebremariam who authored one of the noteworthy novels written after the war, Ende wetach Keretch. He was aware that journalism would provean avenue for him to fulfil his lifelong ambition. While working for the US Information Service in Addis Ababa, he was given a chance to go the United States, a chance that he seized upon readily. He proceeded with his journalistic training in earnest at Montana University.

On his return from the US in the early spring of 1957, he started working for the Ethiopian Herald edited by David Talbot. With Ayalew Wolde Ghiorgis, also trained abroad and Yakob Wolde-Mariam, they formed a board of editors, which lasted a year. Yakob was later appointed acting editor of the Herald and Negash would move to Addis Zemen (New Era), apaper founded by the Emperor upon the restoration of independence and edited for many years by Blata Wolde Giorgis Woldeyohnnes for many years. "When I started my career as editor of Addis Zemen in 1961, I wastold by the erstwhile editor that on the front page only the Emperor's pictures and news related to him should appear. This was something that naturally against journalistic principles that I was taught at school.
Instead of declining the offer, I chose to accept hoping that in the processthe challenges and censorship would minimize," he says. "It was often a case of two steps backward, one step forward. The censorship prevented me and my colleagues from utilizing our full potential. For instance, upon the break out of cholera in the neighbouring Somali, I once wrote an editorial urging the government and the public to do the necessary preparations. For this, I was summoned before the Council of Ministers and given a last warning," he says. Once he decided to omit his name from the newspaper because his boss, Shamble Atinafu "didn't seem to like my editorials that I was writing. Since I couldn't tolerate his tampering with my writings, I decided to do so," he said. He said it wasextremely spirit-crushing.

Negash's most memorable moment at the paper was the interview he heldwith Emperor on the occasion of his 80th anniversary of his birthday. "A group of journalists made out request to be granted the permission to ask the Emperor some questions in connection with the birthday. But as required by the palace protocol, minsters had first to see the questions and pass them on to the king for him to see them. Having been granted the permission to conduct the interview, I went along with the team of five journalists to the palace. The Emperor was waiting for us, sitting dignified on his throne. I caught a glimpse of a paper with our questions written on it, on his desk. After my colleagues presented their respective questions each in their in turn, it was now my turn and I mustered the courage to pose my questions: "Western writers who praise your Majesty'sgreatness and far-sightedness often end their volumes with a question; what is to become of the country after the Emperor. Could you comment on this?" Negash recalls. The Emperor skilfully shrugged off the question in his response, indicating that it was all put in the constitution. Negash says there were some who were urging the Emperor to take measure against him but the Emperor reportedly responded it was him who gave him the permission. Negash used to give on-the-job training for the reporters in the evenings. Many of his colleagues bare testimony the on- job training they used to receive from him, was instrumental in helping them improve their skills.

After Addis Zemen, Negash became acting head in the radio and televisiondepartment, working under the head of the department, Niguse Habtewold. Upon the Derg's takeover, the head was arrested and Negash was asked to fill the vacancy. He refused saying that he wasn't interested in administrate position. He instead was made general manager of the Ethiopian News Agency (ENA), while Gedamu Abraha became head of the radio and Samuel Ferenji head of television After the dawn of the revolution, Baalu Girma who had been editor of Addis Zemen, came to ENA to be Negash's deputy. "He used to do some translation and reporting," Negash says. At the time, the then Derg chairman, Mengistu was looking for a ghost writer and one of his confidants, Fisseha Geda wascoming to ENA as emissary. "He would ask all the working journalists to craft a speech for Mengistu. Most of us did but it was Baalu's which was selected. When I asked Baalu about it, he light-heartedly told me he foundeasy to get into his style. "You just have to speak their language." Thereafter Baalu has had a hand in every speech Mengistu has done until the Red Star campaign, Negash says. Baalu was appointed as the head of the Ethiopian News Agency, and Negash was sent to the Ministry of Housing and Urban Development as head of the public relations department and there he worked for about two years.
One of the bitter memories of Negash during those times was the twentysix days that he spent in prison for allegedly hiding weapons. "My experience was harsh. The guards alternated between me, shackling mefor hours," he recalls. During those times, the pressures on journalists have multiplied with "senseless and crude censorship," Negash says.
Some paid with their lives. Negash particularly recalls Worku Tegegn whoused to work as reporter at the Ethiopian News Agency. "He was a fine writer whose skill was known by every colleague of his. When the Derg explained the reason for the execution of the then Derg chairman, Col Atanfu Abate, it was him who wrote the report. But he wrote about the subject in a way that implied the Colonel should not have been executed.This was not something the Derg officials were likely to find endearing.
Anyway, just within two days of the publication of the article, we heard that Worku was killed by the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Party, oneof the competing parties."

In 1977 Negash was asked to retire at the age of 52, after he was accusedof being "a reactionary who couldn't keep pace with the official line." He could draw comfort from the fact that he left the press with his reputation still very much intact. So Negash left government service, and he had no other place to go other than spending his day at certain café located in Meshuwalekia area, not far from where he was living. “Many people used to come to this café, brokers, solders, spies and retired people like me. I became close with some of them and we started discussing about what wecould accomplish as educated persons. Some of them were discouraged but some suggested starting a business or opening café,” he recalls. He was already forming in his mind and his notes the outline for the play- onewith this place as setting which later became “Ye Azanwintoch Kebeb”. (Senior Citizens’ Circles) It was performed at the National Theatre in 1980, produced by Debebe Eshetu. It was a tremendous success and it was later filmed and transmitted on the Ethiopian Television.

Despite all his literary success, his happiest times were on his newspaper job. Explaining his disinclination then to follow the traditional career path of moving to management, he says: “I didn’t have an ambitious bone in my body in terms of being a superior commander.” He served as part timelecturer at the Addis Ababa University for a year and later edited Ayat Real State’s magazine for three years. He is full of admiration for some new recruits to the profession, but shares concerns that the problems of financing aspect of the industry. “The industry is relatively small and investment is more or less non-existent” noted the veteran Negash. “For things to change, we need to set in place highly developed circulation and distribution mechanism.” He described some of the defunct private newspapers as of “of low quality, antagonistic to the establishment and full of political scandals.”

Negash is described as “formidable” by almost everyone who remembershim at the Addis Zemen, but they also talk of his meticulous attention to detail and the way he made fun of himself. Mairegu Bezabih calls him “thefather of modern Ethiopian journalism”. Mairegu said he had always had agreat deal of respect for Negash, describing him as modest and talented. “He never boasted, never tooted his own trumpet,” he said. “As former classmate of mine and as playwright to boot, Negash was extremely capable man. At school he was fond of story-telling and later in life he hadproved himself to be a competent writer of articles and plays,” another veteran journalist Yacob Wolde-Mariam wrote in his memoir.

The History of Drought & Famine In Ethiopia

Drought does not necessarily lead to famine. It's the level of preparednessand response to that drought crises that creates famine. The 1984 to 86 famine crises which resulted in the death of over a million people was caused by the government's failure and not by nature. It's the human reaction to drought that creates catastrophe. If that serious stage is reached, the international community is prepared to help if it's given sufficient lead time. It's the repeated refusal of governments to admit the existence of serious problems (preferring to hide in a false sense of pride and it's own realities) that will eventually lead to the death of millions by starvation. Such was the case in the1984-85 crises.

The Imporatnce of Land Reform

With land reform the peasant was granted an equal status in the society. Land reform altered the psychological framework of the nation by changing the way a peasant thought of himself or herself. It was believed then that a single act would bring in a new era of prosperity for farmers. Ethiopia was unprepared for such extensive restructuring of the economic base. The government was unable to handle the complex problems of thatmust inevitably arise from such a move. Government focused only on the immediate aspect of social justice and long term consideration was absent from it's decision. Thus production stalled then fell as farmers lost heart....

Deforestation:

Desertification is moving at a terrifying speed in Ethiopia. In the highlandspopulation density, twenty years ago, it was 92 persons per-square meter.It's usually the highlands that are affected by famine. Over 1.6 billion ton of topsoil is lost every year as a result of wind and water erosion FAO studies indicated that 50 ton of topsoil per-hectare per year lost. As example, one hundred years ago, 40% of Ethiopia was covered by forest: today it's less than 4%. Ethiopian forests have been destroyed to get wood for fuel and construction. In the 1980s out of the total wood consumption 93.4% was for fuel, 2.4% was for transport, 1.4% for industry. It must be a lot worth now. Wood is usually converted into charcoal, and to produce one quintal of charcoal, six quintals of wood are needed. A person with an average income in Addis uses 20 to 25% of their income for fuel. A survey in 1980 indicated that for every town of 10,000 families nearly 3.1 million cubic meter fuel are required annually... alternative sources of energy have not come into use primarily because,people can not afford etc... Many farmers use animal dung, which contributes more to the degradation of the soil. The dung, which once fertilized land with nitrogen phosphorous and other nutrients, is now burned. (Text ends)

Respect for Self-Heroes: Veteran Journalist Mulugeta Lule dies atage 75 Ethiomedia October 5, 2015

WASHINGTON, DC - Mulugeta Lule, a political analyst and veteranjournalist, died here on Sunday October 4, 2015. He was 75.

Mulugeta Lule was a contemporary of the great novelists of the '70s, standing tall among the iconic figures of the time: Ba'alu Girma, SebhatGebregzabher, Berhanu Zerihun, among others. Unlike his colleagues, Mulugeta spent much of his time in Ethiopia as a government official.

Before the change of regime in 1991, Mulugeta was general manager of the influential Ethiopian Press Department, the office which published theleading newspapers of the country such as 'The Ethiopian Herald', 'Addis Zemen' and 'Yezareitu Ethiopia.'

Mulugeta, who was a close friend of Derg's politburo big men Shimelis Mazengia and Endale Tessema, was also implicated in the disappearance of Ba'alu Girma, then information minister [early to mid '80s] who wrote 'Oromai,' a book that cost his life because it foretold how the war effort innorthern Ethiopia was doomed to fail and Eritrea's independence was a fait accompli.
Mulugeta has never addressed the accusation that he and confidantes like Asfaw Damte had a hand in the death of Ba'alu, arguably the best novelistof his generation. Even though he had stayed close to the Derg men, Mulugeta had also tried to roll out a red carpet for EPRDF in the form of writing a book, Atfto Metfat. The book discredits the Mengistu regime frombeginning to end, but EPRDF rewarded Mulugeta by tossing his book into the trash can and himself into the mass of the unemployed.

Yet after his departure from the Information Ministry, Mulugeta and friends launched Tobia, an Amharic magazine that would be the darling ofthe public readership but a bone in the throat of the ruling party. Despite EPRDF's 'press freedom' rhetoric, Tobia staffers suffered numerous setbacks in the hands of the EPRDF regime. Editors and reporters were spending much of their time in courts, defending theircases that either landed them in jail or exacted heavy fines.
After an uphill battle, Mulugeta realized that he had no chance of escapingarrest, and went into exile in the United States. Despite the hurdles of lifefor an immigrant, Mulugeta had the time to write engaging articles under the pen names of Tsegaye Gebremedhin Araya and Seneshaw Tegegn.Almost all commentaries were shots fired at the TPLF/EPRDF regime.

As a fellow family man, friends remember Mulugeta as reserved and yetforthcoming, aloof and yet engaging, withdrawn and yet joke-cracking person of his time.

DROUGHT ALARMED: 7.5m going hungry as Ethiopia crisisworsens
AFP October 4, 2015
The number of hungry Ethiopians needing food aid has risen sharply due to poor rains and the El Nino weather phenomenon with around 7.5 millionpeople now in need, aid officials said today. That number has nearly doubled since August, when the United Nations said 4.5 million were in need -- with the United Nations now warning that without action some "15million people will require food assistance" next year, more than inside war-torn Syria. "Without a robust response supported by the international community, there is a high probability of a significant food insecurity and nutrition disaster," the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, OCHA, said in a report.
The United Nations children's agency, Unicef, warns over 300,000 childrenare severely malnourished.
The Famine Early Warning Systems Network (FEWS NET), which makes detailed technical assessments of hunger, predicted a harvest "well below average" in its latest report. "Unusual livestock deaths continue to be reported," FEWS NET said. "With smaller herds, few sellable livestock, and almost no income other than charcoal and firewood sales, households are unable to afford adequate quantities offood."

Ethiopia, Africa's second most populous nation, borders the Horn of Africa nation of Somalia, where some 855,000 people face need "life-saving assistance", according to the United Nations, warning that 2.3 million more people there are "highly vulnerable". El Nino comes with a warming in sea surface temperatures in the equatorial Pacific, and can cause unusually heavy rains in some parts of the world and drought elsewhere. Hardest-hit areas are Ethiopia's eastern Afar and southern Somali regions,while water supplies are also unusually low in central and eastern Oromo region.

Food insecurity is a sensitive issue in Ethiopia, hit by famine in 1984-85after extreme drought. Today, Ethiopia's government would rather its reputation was its near-double-digit economic growth and huge infrastructure investment -- making the country one of Africa's top- performing economies and a magnet for foreign investment. Still, nearly20 million Ethiopians live below the $1.25 poverty line set by the World Bank, with the poorest some of the most vulnerable to weather challenges.
Ethiopia's government has mobilised $33 million (30 million euros) in emergency aid, but the United Nations says it needs $237 million. Minsterfor Information Redwan Hussein told reporters at a recent press conference that Ethiopia is doing what it can.

"The support from donor agencies has not yet arrived in time to let uscope with the increasing number of the needy population," he said.

Respect for Self-Heroes:Tributes for veteran journalist Mulugeta Lule Veteran journalist Mulugeta Lule died at the weekend at the age of 75. Mulugeta Lule was a contributor for the Ethiopian Herlad, an editor of Yezaretu Ethiopia and Serto Ader newspapers, acting editor of Menen magazine and columnist for the Yekatit magazine, and was considered oneof the country’s top political writers.Finishing high school at Haile Mariam Mamo in Debre Berhan, Mulugeta joined the press in the 1960’s. He quickly charmed his way into literary society, befriending well established writers such as Baalu Girma, Solomon Deressa, Gedamu Abraha, and others. Mulugeta’s review of Baalu’s “Ke Admas Bashager” and Solomon Deressa’s Ledgnet were interesting and there had been some heated reactions to the reviews.

In the 1980s Mulugeta put his writing talents to use as part of the Intergovernmental Consultative Commission established to strengthen relations between Ethiopia, Somalia, Sudan, Kenya and Egypt. The work brought him into contact with Mengestu Hailemariam and lots of hearsaysabout his proximity with the country's strongman.

Before the end of the Derg regime, Mulugeta was head of the Ethiopian Press Department, in charge of the major government newspapers, the Ethiopian Herald, Addis Zemen and Yezaretu Ethiopia. The magazine, Tobia that he established following the mass dismissal of senior journalistsin 1992 from the government media, gained popularity and attracted wider readership. Many of his best essays appeared in this magazine and later in Lisane Hizib, writing under the pseudonym Tsegaye Gebre-Medhinand Sinshaw Tegne. His criticism of the new regime and his association with the former order did not endear him to officials. He was forced to exile in the US where he lived for the past twenty years.

Kebede Anisa, a former colleague and a senior journalist told Ethiopia Observer that his passing is a huge loss to the Ethiopian journalism. "Mulugeta was one of a generation of journalists that has left a huge impact. He didn't even have a college diploma but he was well-read and sophisticated, able to understand the ways of the world with ease. "As a journalist, he wrote exceptionally well, and his great talent was his superbnews judgment. I remember particularly his love of words."
Teferra Shiawl Kidane-Kal, a former journalist and diplomat described Mulugeta as someone who grew up as an avid reader. "Mulugeta could recite word for word the small Concise Oxford Dictionary. He possessed agigantic memory. His writings were also well researched and often full ofwit."

Elias Wondimu of Tsehai Publshers described the late journalist as one of the leading figures of the free press movement in the early 1990's Ethiopia. "For those of us who were starting at the time, he was a towering figure. His courage and mighty pen gave us hope to stand tall and walk on the road paved by him and other seasoned journalists of his generation. His strength and perseverance in a difficult condition, gave usthe will to fight and champion the cause of freedom-of-expression wherever we find ourselves," he wrote.

Jawar Mohammed, executive director at Oromia Media Network, wrote onhis Facebook page that he had an opportunity talk to him in multiple occasion when he lived in DC. "He was an attentive listener and a well versed conversant. My condolence to his family and friends."

Dinberu Melakehiowt, an immigration interpreter based in Silver Spring, Mary Land, said "I have known Mulugeta Lule through his work while he was in Ethiopia and after he came to the U.S. sometime in 1996, I had thepleasure of meeting him in person. Ever since then, we meet in many places where the issue of Ethiopia discussed. Mulugeta was an advocate offreedom of expression and worked very closely with various organizations in bring the issues of journalism in Ethiopia. He advocated for the releasesof all detained journalists in Ethiopia and he was successful in getting nominated some of Ethiopian Journalists for various awards. He worked very closely with Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) and exposed grave situation in Ethiopia. I personally know that he himself escaped from various attempt on his life while he was working as a journalist and editor in Ethiopia. After he came to the U.S. he appeared at various television and radio shows and shared his experiences with members of the Ethiopian community in the diaspora. After launching of Ethiopian Satellite Television, Mr. Mulugeta Lule appeared in many shows and gave his analysis on many national and international issues. In addition, I knowthat he appeared at various immigration court hearings and provided his expert witness testimonies in support of many Ethiopian immigrants,"

Historian, journalist and diplomat Zewede Retta passed awayArafayne Fantahun (October 8, 2015)

Outstanding Ethiopia historian, journalist and diplomat Zewede Retta passed away yesterday in London at the age of 81, Ethiopia Observer haslearnt. Zewde who was considered a great historian of modern Ethiopia, and a political commentator was on vacation in the United Kingdom. He was taken to hospital by ambulance, after he fell down on the street in London. He died at the hospital. Ethiopian Ambassador to Italy and Tunisia, wrote important books on the life and times of Haile Selassie andthe question of Eritrea.

Born in Addis Ababa, Young Zewde went to French Lycée Guebre-Mariam, where he completed his primary and secondary education. According to his biography in Amazon, he began his professional career at the Ministry of Information in 1952 and became the youngest news correspondent for Ethiopian radio as well as press correspondent to the Emperor's palace. "He then spent four years at the school of journalism in Paris where he graduated in 1959. Soon after he became editor in chief for the newspaper The Voice of Ethiopia and for Menen magazine," the bio reads. Throughout the 50's and 60's he held numerous positions including deputyinformation minister, chief director of the Ethiopian news agency and President of the Pan African News Agency. In 1969 he was appointed to the foreign office and assigned as minister counselor to the Ethiopian Embassy in Paris, it was stated.

"His diplomatic ability enabled him first to become deputy foreign ministerand later ambassador of Ethiopia to Italy and Tunisia for the Emperor's government. Overall he had a twenty two years career in the governmentof Emperor Haile Selassie until the military takeover of Ethiopia by Mengistu. The change of government and the uncertainty about Ethiopia’sfuture forced him to stay in exile in Italy where he joined the UN Agency IFAD (International Fund for Agricultural Development), headquartered inRome, where he served as Chief of Protocol and Secretary for Member State,” Amazon posted on its page.

Respect for Self-Heroes: Human rights award for Andargatchew through his daughter Helawit, being held on the death row of herfather in Ethiopia

October 9, 2015 by KOOS COUVÉE

THE daughter of a British man held on death row in Ethiopia has been lauded with a human rights award for a play she wrote with her friends about her father's plight. Helawit Hailemariam, 16, from Clerkenwell, wasawarded the Christine Jackson Young Person Award by the charity Libertyin recognition of her ongoing battle for the release of her father, the Ethiopian-born democracy activist Andargachew Tsege, 60. Liberty honoured a number of activists, young campaigners, artists and lawyers who champion "fundamental freedoms" at its annual Human Rights Awards last month. "We need help for our campaign to get my father back," Helawit, who is studying for her A-levels at City and Islington College in Angel, said. "I really did not expect to to win the award. It definitely helps our campaign, it makes my father's story more real and itvalidates it."

In June, Ask, a new play by Islington Community Theatre starring Helawitand five of her friends marked the anniversary of her father's kidnapping on the command of the Ethiopian government while he was travelling through Yemen last year. He was on his way to Eritrea to attend an opposition conference.

Helawit said she wants to go on tour with the play too, in the hope this will put pressurise on the UK government to press the Ethiopians to release Mr Tsege. "I want the British government to listen and do much more. They haven't done very much at all," she added. Ask will be performed at Hugh Myddelton primary school – which is attended by Helawit's siblings Menabe and Yilak, both 8 – in the near future. Until recently the Ethiopian authorities refused to tell his family where Mr Tsege, 60, was being held. But last month the UK ambassador met him atKaliti jail, a notorious state prison located just south of the capital Addis Abbaba, commonly referred to as a gulag.

The family has not been allowed any contact. There is also no sign Ethiopia is following any kind of legal process. Helawit's mother Yemi, 45, has been campaigning tirelessly for her partner's release. This week she wrote to foreign secretary Phillip Hammond to express her anger after Britain’s most senior Foreign Office official said human rights are no longera “top priority” for the government, adding the Conservatives’ “prosperity agenda” was now “further up the list”. “We are the human face of this policy,” she wrote.

Islington North MP Jeremy Corbyn, who has campaigned for Mr Tsege's release, said he would continue to do so “with the same vigour” now he isLabour leader. “The release of Andy Tsege should be a political priority ashis ongoing safety is a real concern,” he said. “I have been working to secure the release of Mr Tsege for some time and I have given a firm commitment to his family that I will continue to press for his release now that I am leader of the opposition, with the same vigour.
“I am working closely with [human rights charity] Reprieve to this end andit is long overdue that the Prime Minister intervenes to help secure Andy's release as soon as possible". A petition calling on the Prime Minister to intervene with the Ethiopian government and demand the safe return of Mr Tsege has been signed by more than 127,000 people.

HUMAN ANCESTRY: A DNA from a man who lived in Ethiopia about4,500 years ago is prompting scientists to rethink the history of human migration in Africa. (October 9, 2015)
Until now, the conventional wisdom had been that the first groups of modern humans left Africa roughly 70,000 years ago, stopping in the Middle East en route to Europe, Asia and beyond. Then about 3,000 yearsago, a group of farmers from the Middle East and present-day Turkey came back to the Horn of Africa (probably bringing crops like wheat, barley and lentils with them).
Population geneticists pieced this story together by comparing the DNA ofdistinct groups of people alive today. Since humans emerged in Africa, DNA from an ancient Africa could provide a valuable genetic baseline thatwould make it easier for scientists to track genome changes over time.
Unfortunately, such DNA has been hard to come by. DNA isn’t built to lastfor thousands of years. The samples of ancient DNA that have been sequenced to date were extracted from bodies in Europe and Asia that were naturally refrigerated in cooler climates.
That’s what makes the Ethiopian man so special. His body was found face-down in Mota cave, which is situated in the highlands in the southern part of the country. The cool, dry conditions in the cave preserved his DNA, and scientists extracted a sample from the petrous boneat the base of his skull. The resulting sequence is the first nuclear genome from an ancient African, according to a reportpublished

Thursday in the journal Science.

Radiocarbon dating revealed that the bone was 4,500 years old. Thatmeant Mota (as the researchers called him) lived before Eurasians returned to the African continent.

Consistent with that timeline, Mota did not have any of the genetic variants for light-colored eyes or skin that evolved in the populations thatleft Africa. Nor did he have variants that arose in Eurasian farmers that allowed them to digest milk as adults.

Mota did have three variants that are known to help modern-day Ethiopians live in high altitudes. (The present-day town of Mota lies morethan 8,100 feet above sea level.)

When the researchers compared Mota's genome to those of contemporaryhumans, the closest match was with the Ari people of southern Ethiopia

With this information, the research team was able to investigate the mysterious group of Eurasians that came to Africa 3,000 years ago. They created a model that assumed the Ari genome was a mixture of DNA from Mota and an unknown population from west Eurasia. Then they “pluggedin” DNA from several candidate populations to see if they could get a combination that looked like Ari DNA.

Ed’s Note: Ancient Ethiopian genome reveals extensive Eurasian admixture throughout the African continentExtremely interesting! In a word, a 4500 years old male genome from Ethiopia indicates is has a strong Eurasian derivation, that migration that populated Europe got to Africa in a massive migration around 3000 years ago. As the pastoralists that had left Afrcia to populate this planet made a return, which had continued even before. A blow to race rather racist theorists, and dull butever present and noisy racism practitioners in day to day troubled Europe?!!

Abstract: Characterizing genetic diversity in Africa is a crucial step for most analyses reconstructing the evolutionary history of anatomically modern humans. However, historic migrations from Eurasia into Africa have affected many contemporary populations, confounding inferences. Here, we present a 12.5x coverage ancient genome of an Ethiopian male (‘Mota’) who lived approximately 4,500 years ago. We use this genome todemonstrate that the Eurasian backflow into Africa came from a population closely related to Early Neolithic farmers, who had colonized Europe 4,000 years earlier. The extent of this backflow was much greaterthan previously reported, reaching all the way to Central, West and Southern Africa, affecting even populations such as Yoruba and Mbuti, previously thought to be relatively unadmixed, who harbor 6-7% Eurasianancestry.

DIET: A History of Ethiopian Food:

Traditional foods that presented by common Mesob not plate

The ancient people of pre-Aksumite, pre-Christian cultures like Punt and D'MT left no records of what they ate, and what we know of these culturescomes mostly from the writings of the more advanced cultures that encountered them.

In the fourth millennium B.C., agriculture began to emerge in the fertilehighlands of what is now northwestern Ethiopia. It then spread to the lowlands and eventually the plateau. These proto-Ethiopians grew sorghum, and by the end of the millennium, they had begun to herd cattle. By the first or second millennium B.C., they ate sorghum, wheat,barley and possibly teff, along with many other grains, vegetables and pulses (lentils, peas, fava beans, chick peas and more).

But the scholars disagree on when Ethiopians began to cultivate each of these crops and, in some cases, how they got to Ethiopia. Some argue that ancient Ethiopians discovered agriculture on their own; others say they learned it through contact with Egypt and the Arabian peninsula. All we know for sure is that Ethiopians have long cultivated certain things - teff, enset, gesho - that no other culture has cultivated, which strongly points to Ethiopian origins. Whether they did it without help, or learned tofarm from others, may never finally be known. The people of ancient Ethiopia certainly grew things collectively and ate them. The question is what they grew, when they started growing it, and the form in which theyate what they grew. Did these early Ethiopians leave behind any traces oftheir first recipe books?

Where To Eat, What To Eat

Like Chinese restaurants in America, Ethiopian megeb betoch ("food houses") tend to serve a dozen or so dishes whose ingredients are familiarenough. Most restaurants serve milas-senber (beef tongue & hod (stomach), dulet (a stew of spiced beef, liver and tripe), or milasnasember (tripe and tongue), dishes you'll find in Ethiopia, and in the more diverse Ethiopian cookbooks, but only now and then in Ethiopian restaurants. Not so exotic, but still rarely seen, is kategna, toasted piecesof injera coated with berbere (red pepper spice) and kibbee (spiced butter), often offered as an appetizer. Just as rare is bedergan (eggplant)and duba (pumpkin, or sometimes squash). Each usually comes as a wot.These dishes emerged in Ethiopia in the last several hundred years, as more other foreign vegetables found their way into the Ethiopian diet.

The Staple food local Teff-Injera

The world seems to have found teff. Not bad for the smallest food grain onearth - one piece is the size of a grain of sand - and better yet when you consider that its name derives from the Amharic word y t f , which means "lost," because each grain is so easy to lose if you drop it.

Some scholars have even speculated that because teff is so small, Ethiopians cultivated it before other grains: Why would a culture harvestsuch a tiny grain if it had alternatives? Others doubt this, saying that thehardiness and nutritional qualities of teff account for its ancient cultivation.

No longer just the unique grain needed to make Ethiopian injera, it's now used as a gluten-free substitute for wheat, suitable for baking everything from cookies and muffins and cobblers to pancakes and pasta. Once available as a food product only from Ethiopia, entrepreneurs in the UnitedStates, Australia and Canada now grow and sell it, both for its grain and for its grassy stalk, which makes an excellent livestock forage.

About 300 species of teff grow on several continents, but Ethiopia hostsits greatest diversity. Eragrostis tef, the injera species, almost certainly originated there, although scholars can only speculate about how long agothat happened.

And this is one very nutritious grain. A 1997 study by the BiodiversityInstitute of Ethiopia, conducted by Seyfu Ketema, found that white, or magna (pronounced "manya") teff, the kind most popular for making injera, has 56 percent more calcium and 68 percent more ironthan wheat. There are also red, black and mixed-seed varieties.

Teff is higher than wheat in a dozen amino acids, especially the essential lysine, and slightly higher in such nutrients as potassium, zinc and aluminum. It contains 11 percent protein, 80 percent complex carbohydrates, and almost four grams of fiber per ounce. Ethiopian athletes believe that teff makes them stronger in competition, so they'll eat it as injera or as a porridge made from the whole grain. Lost Crops ofAfrica asserts that one large piece of injera a day supplies an Ethiopian with enough amino acids to sustain life without another protein source, and two pieces are "sufficient to ensure good health."

Ethiopia Wild Grain:Ethiopia introduced the world to coffee -Ethiopian Monk Discovered Coffee
Addis Ababa, Ethiopia - An Old legend relates that an Ethiopian monk wholived about 850 AD one day was watching his floak of goats graze at the edge of the forest. He noticed that the goats unusually lively-far more lively, in fact, than their owner. Watching closely, he observed that they were devouring the berries of an evergreen shrub. Hopefully, he tried them, too-with invigorating results. He had discovered coffee.

Ethiopia Wild Grain: Coffee Is Introduced in the US
Coffee from Ethiopia made it's debut recently in Washington DC after a sample was flown there at the instance of Emperor Haile Selassie I. Though, Coffee has been grown in Ethiopia for about 500 years, few Americans have tasted it. The emperor hopes to developCoffee as a majorexport from his small Kingdom, so sent the coffee with the object of building up an American demand. Food editors who sampled the coffee reported that it had a strong, good flavor, similar to Arabian mocha, whichis popular as an after dinner demitasse. (Text ends)

The Genealogy Of Alexander Pushkin
October 10, 2015 Although the vast majority of African Americansare unfamiliar with Pushkin's monumental works, most students of literature are at least aware of his "Blackamoor of Peter the Great", an unfinished romance which relates the biographical dataof the poet's great-grandfather, Abram Petrovich Gannibal his Black great-grandfather.

Some early critics wrongly suspected that Pushkin attempted to aggrandize the African lineage of this black forebear by playing up the family tradition that he was an Ethiopian princeling. However, Pushkin certainly did not need to embellish his ancestor's own personal history. For the accomplishments of Ibrahim Petrovitch Gannibal are proof of whatany man – despite his colour – could rise to, given the opportunity.
Ibrahim was treated as no less than a member of the royal family at courtand, in the biographical notes on him written either by his wife or by someone in her family shortly after his death, the following statement is made:

"….he (Peter) wished to make examples of them and put (Russians) to shame by convincing them that out of every people and even from amongwild men – such as Negores, whom our civilized nations assign exclusivelyto the class of slave, there can be formed men who by dint of application can obtain knowledge and learning and thus become helpful to their monarch." nation of serfs was entirely paternalistic, a child as a personal gift or possession could only be regarded as one of his own kith and kin.

Indeed, at the eight-year old Ibrahim's baptism, the Emperor himself washis godfather, while his godmother was the Queen of Poland.
Although, as we now realize, no Blackamoor at any 18th century Europeancourt was merely decorative, in Ibrahim's case, Peter's expectations for him were as loaded with responsibility as those he would have had for his own son. If he was the Emperor whose patriotic duty it was to drag Russiaspiritually and intellectually out of its Byzantine backwardness and into thefuture of the Enlightenment, then it would literally be Ibrahim's responsibility to care for his adopted country's physical formation and his defence of it. In 1717 the young blackamoor was sent to France for an education in both civil and military engineering. He studied at the Ecole d'Artillerie of La Fere under the brilliant Bernard Forest de Belidor and afterwards, at the Ecole d'Artillerie of Metz, an institution founded by the illustrious Sebastien Le Preste, Marquis de Vauban.

Besides the education which prepared him for his long life of government service, Ibrahim returned from France with something he obviously regarded just as importantly – a name. Like any black kid today reaching back through time to clutch at whatever historical straw of affirmation he can reach for, Ibrahim not only identified as his model but appropriated ashis surname that of the Carthaginian general, Hannibal. Although it could be argued that like Hannibal, he knew that he too would soon enough attain the rank of general, Ibrahim's choice probably betrayed an almost adolescent edge of race conscious defiance considering the threat this Punic potentate had once posed to Rome. Perhaps a better understanding of what Ibrahim intended to imply with his new name can be gathered from what we know today regarding one of the stock theatre characters ofhis time. Sofonbisba, a relative of the historical Hannibal, was easily the most popular of the 18th century heroines. During that period alone morethan forty works, either operas or dramas, were composed with hers as the central story. It would appear that the proud African queen who fought Roman occupation to the point of committing suicide had become the personification of independence for a number of European states that were growing increasingly irritated with Hapsburg hegemony.

Considering that the defining line in a family's history was its patrilineal descent as it was just about anywhere else in the western world, Pushkin'spreoccupation with his African ancestry is all the more telling since Ibrahim Gannibal was his maternal great-grandfather. Furthermore, Nadja, his mother, was through her own mother, a descendant of the same Pushkin forbear from whom her husband Serge descended. This is genetically interesting since it explains why the poet, who is generally but mistakenly accepted as an octoroon, looks perceptibly blacker.

Although most of the above history is related in discussions about Pushkin's African ancestry, no works – at least those translated or writtenin English – have ever commented on the descendent of the great poet. And this, despite the fact that Joel Rogers in "Sex and Race" (a privately-published work which has turned into a cult classic) traced the line of one of Pushkin's daughters into the Mountbatten branch of the British Royalfamily.

(Perhaps the fact that Pushkin's daughter Natalie married a prince was toomuch for either the Bolsheviks or the West's liberal intellectuals who saw in the proletariat sentiments which had on occasion been expressed by thenational poet, a spiritual source of the Revolution. Even if it was a well- known fact that Pushkin sold the serfs he had inherited so that he could afford the pampered wife he wished to wed, standard Soviet doctrine was that he had been the first to dip his pen in red ink.)

Because she herself was not royal, Natalie Pushkin's wedding to Prince Nicholas of Nassau in 1868 was officially designated a morganatic marriage. The term 'morganatic' is a hold-over from a stricter hierarchicaltime. This term of precedence became more familiar as an increasing number of European royalty towards the end of the last century were slowly forced to adjust to the social changes that had begun to affect the rest of the world. The morganatic title created for Natalie was Countess ofMerenberg with the right to bear the title of Count or Countess of Merenberg by her children. A good indication of just how strict the old order had been can be seen from the fact that even though her husband was a prince of the House of Nassau, when it came time for her daughter in turn to wed, her marriage to a member of the Imperial Russian family was also declared a morganatic one. Although the wife of Grand Duke Mikhail, Sophia and the children she bore him were officially known as theCounts and the Countesses de Torby. (No matter how tempting to attribute it as an example of racism in high places, the fact that he was the offspring of a morganatic relationship was probably what prevented Sophia's brother, George, from succeeding his uncle William as Grand Duke of Luxemburg. Faced with a choice between George, Count of Merenberg and the abrogation of the Sallic Law, which excluded females from the succession, the Luxemburg parliament chose the latter allowing Charlotte to claim the throne as Grand Duchess of Luxemburg.)

Interestingly enough, Sophia's daughter, Nadjeda, on the other hand, married someone of exactly her own social standing. George Battenberg was the grandson of Queen Victoria (the name would not be changed to Mountbatten until the outbreak of World War II). However, he too was descended from a royal morganatic line. Battenberg was the principality bestowed on the Countess Julie Hauke and her children after her husband,the Prince of Hesse, had been reconciled with his father for having eloped with her.

On the day of Nadja's wedding in the Chapel Royal at Buckingham Palace the majority of the stories covering the event hysterically pointed to Nadjedja's African ancestry and snidely speculated about the probability ofthis branch of the Royal Family producing black babies. It should be pointed out, however, that the Times maintained both its integrity and its dignity. As was to be expected from a journal of such literary standards,the fact that the bride was a descendant of the great Russianpoet was duely mentioned but what editorializing they did was instead centered on the morganatic backgrounds of both spouses.

With so many published memories and histories of the Mountbattens available today, it is disconcerting to find so few references to Nadja. As the Marchioness of Milford Haven, she was not only Prince Phillip's aunt, she also was actually his stepmother during a period of his adolescence..When his parents, the Prince and the Princess Andrew of Greece, were exiled at the beginning of the war, Prince Phillip was sent to the Mountbattens of Milford Haven since the Marquis was his mother's elder brother. (Incidentally, his mother's title, 'The Princess Andrew of Greece,'is an indication that hers too was a morganatic marriage like the others referred to above.)

Intriguingly, the little published information on Nadjeda available can be found in a biography of Gloria Vanderbilt. Because of the kind of work it is,I cannot help but suspect that the few glimpses we get of Nadjeda are highly coloured. Not only is the reader given a detailed description of the negroid quality of her hair, (a highly implausible observation considering how many generations distant Nadjeda was from her Abysinian ancestor), but, to make for obviously even racier reading, she is portrayed as bisexual. Whether or not, as the author would have us believe, she along with her husband were earlier examples of the racous royals that 'Fergie' and 'Di' became will have to be verified for she also alludes to the extensive and priceless collection of erotica for which the Marquis and Marchioness of Milford Haven were supposedly famous. Until I have a chance to check sources for myself, I might have to accept that this, and not what I would be inclined to think, could be the reason why so little is related about her in the biographical works on Prince Phillip or other members of the Mountbatten clan.

Since both her husband and his brother, Louis, who would in time be made Viceroy of India, were Navy men during the earlier years of their marriage, Nadja and her sister in law grew quite close and in fact made news together when they piloted a two seater De Haviland on a jaunt of Eastern Europe, the Middle East and North Africa. Even though the press does not appear to have commented on the combination at the time, it should be pointed out that Alice represented another racial addition to theMountbatten bloodline since she was the granddaughter of Lord Temple, ascion of the banking house of Ashley which like the Hambros had converted from Judaism in the late l8th century. If there is any truth to the speculation about her relationship with Nehru, then there is a third racial element which, even with an association such as this, expands the ethnic ethos of the Mountbattens into something of almost global proportions.

Taking this particular perspective on his background into consideration, we are provided with at least an inkling of what Prince Phillip's liberalism is perhaps based on. Given both the anti-black and the anti-semetic sentiments so pervasive during his formative years, he could not have been unaware of whatever pain or social embarrassments his family mighthave had to endure because of these two aunts' genealogies. Much has been made of how both the Queen's and his mother's families had to change their names (the House of Hanover to that of Windsor and that of Battenberg to Mountbatten) to cope with the anti-German propaganda of the First World War. But no one has offered any insights as to how the Royal Family might have dealt with two ethnic strains which, if they had not been who they were, would certainly have caused them to be ostracized from those circles that wielded political power.

If we play along with the protocols by which this echelon of society is governed, Prince Phillip's choice of best man at his wedding to the Queen, could be explained by the fact that as head of the house of Mountbatten, David, 3rd Marquis of Milford Haven, was his only option. Since the 2nd Marquis was already deceased, David, according to the rules of this game,had to be recognized head of the entire Mountbatten family, even if his uncle Louis had precedence over him at court due to the powerful position he occupied as Viceroy of India. Phillip's choice, however, was probably based on the simple reason that since he and David were, for at least a part of their adolescent years raised together, David was as much of a brother Phillip ever knew. Nevertheless, because of all the throat clearing the press had done at his aunt and uncle's wedding, and because of the scrutiny the members of his own wedding to the future Queen of England would be subjected to, I cannot help but suspect that Prince Phillip's decision was also a socio-political one. The very idea of the Mountbattens leaving themselves that wide open as targets to whatever racial slurs werepossible during the early fifties, had to have been carefully calculated.

Considering the fact that Pushkin was well aware of the kind of impact his literary success could have on the institution of slavery in the new world, Ithink we can be fairly certain that, for the same racial reasoning, he wouldhave been quite pleased to know that a branch of the British Royal Familywould today be numbered among his descendants. As a 19th century manhe probably regarded any European royal family member as some sort of genetic distillate of political world power that could trace its origins, even in a few rare instances, to the Roman Empire.

Finally, Pushkin would have found it humorously ironic that if only he had stressed his royal Ethiopian ancestry, he might have removed the stigma of 'morganatic' from the marriages of his daughter and his granddaughter.For after all, his great-grandfather was an Ethiopian prince. Furthermore, since the Ethiopian Royal House belonged to the dynasty founded by Menelik, the son of the Old Testament King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, this wedding from a religious perspective could have been seen as a particularly propitious one for it introduced the blood line of the Messiahinto the tightly intermarried royal gene pool of Europe.

He was not the first black noble family of Russia. Because the name itself,“abach” means Abysissinian, the princely house of the Abachidze has long been known to be Ethiopian in origin. With the rise of Paata to political prominence in the early 17th century, they intermarried with andbecame lineal ancestors of the royal houses of Imerithia and Georgia of the Caucuses.

The Arapov also claim that they derived their name from the word, “arap”or arab, the Russian for Negro. Beginning in 1613, they have filled militaryposts as generals and such court positions as a governor and a member ofthe Ministry of Agriculture.

Another family that tradition and legend have traced back to Africa is thatof the Axakov. They apparently came to Moscow in the entourage of Prince Danila Alexandrovitch of Souzdal,1251-1303.

An even earlier black immigrant was Chimon Afrkanovich who arrived in Russia at the beginning of the XI century and entered the service of the Grand Duke Iaroslav Vladimirovich of Kiev. A number of his descendants who carried the name, Isleniev, held high ranking positions in the army.Petr Alexeevitch, for example, was aide de camp to Catherine the Great. (Text ends)

(ANALYSIS ON ETHIOPIAN ECONOMY): Stop blaming one another& collaborate on healing
Excerpted from Aklog Birara (PhD) October 10, 2015

For most Ethiopians, this is not the case. Ethiopia is among five of the poorest countries in Africa: Eritrea, Mali, Sierra Leone and Togo. Contrastthese with five most prosperous nations: Botswana, Ghana, Namibia, Rwanda and South Africa. Why the difference between the two groups?
After all, Ethiopia is the largest recipient of aid in Sub-Saharan Africa and among the top in the world. It has received more than $40 billion in Official Development Assistance (ODA) over the past 24 years. There is noaccurate figure on the amount of humanitarian, defense, security assistance and other non-ODA aid. But it is massive. Nor is there an accurate account of the amount of remittances we, refugees, send to and invest in Ethiopia. So why is Ethiopia not Botswana, Ghana or Mauritius?

Mo Ibrahim gave the answer when he established his foundation to assesshow African societies are administered and economies managed to serve the common good. “Governance is everything. Without governance we have nothing." Somalia has nothing because it has no governance. Syria has nothing because its governance was poor and have failed.

Afghanistan, Iraq, Libya, Yemen, South Sudan etc. are in the same boat.The fact that a government exists does not convey the notion that it serves the common good. This leads me to the latest salient themes arrived at by the Mo Ibrahim Index for Ethiopia.

The Index is grouped into four major governance categories and severalsub-categories under each.

1) Safety and the rule of law

No country develops unless public and individual safety is protected and the rule of law respected. The Index acknowledges that Ethiopia has succeeded in maintaining public and national safety, for example against terrorism. However, its overall ranking of 48 points out of 100 is lower than the African average of 50.1. It scores lowest ingovernment accountability and scores 43.8 percent in the application of the rule of law.It is as if there is no government in the country. It is not only that no official at any level of government is held accountable for misdeeds; but that the administration of the rule of law is crippled. Accountability entails costs and benefits. A balanced score card would show that the costs are high. Ethiopia is among the ten worst offenders in the illicit outflow of funds emanating from price distortions, black market transactions in foreign exchange, bribery and commissions, corruption and manipulation of export and import invoices, etc. A team of experts led by Thabo Mbeki, the former President of South Africa revealed early this year that in 1990-2000 Ethiopia lost $8.3 billion or 3.6 percent of GDP in illicit outflow. In 2000-2009 it lost $11.7 billion. The bleeding hasn't stopped and won't until the system that allows and benefits from it is overhauled.

2) Participation and Human Rights

During his state visit to Ethiopia. President Obama underscored respect forhuman rights and human dignity as a cornerstone of good governance as the basis for sustainable development. There can't be development without freedom; and freedom is meaningless unless human rights are respected by governments. "Africa's progress will depend on upholding the human rights of all people—for if each of us is treated with dignity, each of us must be sure to also extend that same dignity to others." This"Golden rule" applies to each one of us. If we wish to be respected; we must respect others regardless of differences.

The Index shows that Ethiopia "scores one of the ten lowest points in Africa," 45th among all countries with a score of 35.7 percent. "Participation and gender equality deteriorated over the past 4 years." Why is this important? Studies across the globe, the latest in Japan, showthat full participation of women in the economy contributes 15 percent toGDP. The lack of participation among women is not confined to the governing party. It follows a macho model of forced submission. Equally tragic is the fact that opposition groups have failed to encourage and embolden women to participate in the change process. How many men encourage their daughters and or wives to attend meetings or to lead groups? Women are more inclusive and open minded than men.

3) Sustainable Economic Opportunity

Good governance is about undeterred and unencumbered participation by all citizens in the policy, decision making and resources allocation process.Here again Mr. Obama is right in saying this. “I believe Africa’s progress will depend on democracy, because Africans, like people everywhere, deserve the dignity of being in control of their own lives.” He identified universal principles that are standard in democratic and prosperous countries such as Botswana, Ghana, Namibia, and South Africa; and absent or none existent in Ethiopia: “free and fair elections, freedom of speech and press, and freedom of assembly….Africa doesn’t need strongmen, it needs strong institutions.” A regulatory environment that is not based on ethnic affiliation or relations to authorities or loyalty to a party is essential for business to flourish.

The Index states patterns that are policy based and structural in nature. “The falling Sustainable Economic Opportunity score has been driven by adeterioration in the business environment (policy).” There is no transparency; no level playing field; no fair and rule based adjudication ofthe business cycle; no domestic competition; and no independent and impartial institution to restrain party and state excesses. The party and state apply punitive measures against any one or any firm that is out of line. It is not uncommon for a business owner to be forced to pay huge and unbearable taxes. It is common for individuals to pay bribes at everystep of the transaction cycle. “Weakening in sustainable economic opportunity” means that domestic investors have no confidence in the government. They vote against it by taking out their monies or investing monies in ventures with quick rates of return or putting monies under themattress.

The second sub-category of deterioration is the rural sector. “The second largest deterioration in Sustainable Economic Opportunity is in the rural- sector, having dropped by 2.7 points since 2011.” Equally worrisome is the fact that citizens “engagement dropped by 10.4 points.” The government touts its success in transforming the rural sector and uses this argument to receive more aid. However, there isn’t much success to show. More than 7.5 million Ethiopians in the he Afar, Ogaden regions andsome parts of Oromia are suffering from famine. Their survival depends on foreign food aid.

If you look at it differently, the governing party that claims double digit growth over the past decade is unable to meet the food needs of the population. Some Ethiopian cynics say that “the regime does not mind keeping most Ethiopians poor and aid dependent." Poor people are easier to manipulate and govern than the well to do. This may or may not be thecase. However, the fact remains that most Ethiopians are either poor or getting poorer. The Index shows that economic performance of the "rural sector declined by 3.8 points since 2011." Overall, Ethiopia's performancein this critical category declined by 12.3 points. This is the reason why I suggest that Ethiopia is stuck because of disempowering policies and aneconomic and social structure that seems immovable.

4) Human Development

UNDP's, the World Bank's and other human development indicators show a recurring pattern of low performance. This is especially the case in the provision of safe drinking water, modern sanitation, health services, maternal and child care, infant mortality et. Do you know that "only 10 percent of Ethiopians enjoy safe drinking water; and that 49 percent fetch water from rivers, streams and fields traveling long distances? This is medieval and a huge burden on women and girls. Do you know that only 24 percent of the population enjoys modern sanitation facilities? Sixty-fourpercent of the population is deprived of proper sanitation. Do you know that girls' participation in school is among the lowest in Africa? Do you know that Ethiopia's per capita income is one third of the African average?Do you know that the quality of education is among the lowest in the world? Education is the single most important variable in achieving economic and political freedom.

In reviewing the Indices what surprised me most is deterioration in education. The Index says that, "Ethiopia's education results have fallen from an already low base,putting the country as the 6th most deteriorated on the continent in this category." The implication of this deterioration is huge. It makes Ethiopia less competitive. It limits employment and business opportunities for young people. It traps them ina cycle of poverty that in turn forces them to flee, fight or simply diminishtheir potential. It makes them dependent. It forces them to serve the governing party because they do not have other options.

These indicators on the condition of human development in Ethiopia poseenormous risk for the country's future and for the wellbeing of this and coming generations. Risks require some form of mitigation measures.

Sadly, there are no independent institutions or persons to mitigate these and other social and economic risks. The opposition agrees on one thing--

-oppose the current regime-- and not beyond that. We know that Ethiopiais the prototype of a single party state that rules under the pretext of "democracy in name, but not in substance." Because fundamental principles of good governance are diminished or floored, social, economic and environmental risks are widespread. For example, the state and partyled developmental state growth model is heavily skewed in favor of state and party owned enterprises, endowments, loyal individuals and foreign investors. The state and party have been borrowing from the domestic banking sector and raising capital from the public and from abroad.

Ethiopia's public debt ratio is 50 percent of GDP. Who bears the burden?The Ethiopian poor.

Earlier this year the WB expressed concern that high borrowing and highdebt is not sustainable. The IMF confirmed this last week. This deliberate policy squeezes the nascent domestic private sector. This is the reason why Ethiopia scores low in the "business environment category." Remember, however, that there are beneficiaries in this suffocating environment. They defend the system that is unfair because they benefitfrom it. The more money the party and government borrows and pumps into the economy, the more profits for the few. On the social impact side,the more money that is pumped into the economy without correspondingincrease in productivity, the more inflation. The more inflation the more ordinary people suffer. While it is not the same as the Mo Ibrahim assessment, the IMF report indicates that Ethiopians are squeezed in at least two ways. First, Ethiopia's private sector is squeezed and not protected. Second ordinary Ethiopians continue from low wages, a highlydepreciated currency and hyperinflation the IMF estimates at 10 percent and ordinary people and independent analysts estimate to be much higher. In either case, what is important for the opposition to understandand work together is that the economic and social impact is unbearable irrespective of ethnic or religious affiliation. Those with low incomes in urban areas and the poor in rural areas who need to buy consumables-- clothes, shoes etc., are unable to cope with daily life.

Lack of a level playing field
Ethiopians suffer from crony capitalism. The regulatory framework doesnot facilitate or encourage fair entry into business or fair competition.
Business transactions are bureaucratized and costly. Yet the recent government reshuffle shows that there will be more ministers, deputy ministers, permanent secretaries and advisors etc. strengthening the one to five spy network. It is inevitable that the cost of administering Ethiopia will explode. The more bureaucrats the more ordinary Ethiopians have to pay to get anything done. Unless of course you are well connected or loyalto the governing party. Ethiopia's debt has to be paid up by the Ethiopian public. The IMF's role is not to discuss the societal and social impact of debt, hyperinflation etc. but to present the broad monetary and fiscal picture and implications.

Only Ethiopians who care for the welfare of the vast majority who have novoice have an obligation to analyze the numbers and indices and show what they mean for the urban and rural poor, the country's private sector and the country's bulging youth population. It is meaningless to listen to Obama's speech in

Addis Ababa and not follow-up without let up. “When all voices are being heard, when people know they are being included in the political process that makes a country more successful… I believe Ethiopia will not truly unleash the potential of its people if journalists are restricted or legitimate opposition groups can’t participate in the campaignprocess.”

Nepotism, bribery, corruption and illicit outflow

Bribery and corruption is common in many countries. Ethiopia’s is tragic because it is food and development assistance dependent. You can’t grow the economy if you don’t manage public resources to serve the common good. Ethiopian society is bleeding from inept administration, ethnic and religious polarization, favoritism, bribery, corruption and massive illicit outflow of capital, etc. President Obama is right on this. “Nothing will unlock Africa’s potential more than ending the cancer of corruption…here in Africa, corruption drains billions of dollars from economies that can’t afford to lose billions of dollars—that’s money that could be used to createjobs and build hospitals and schools,” feed the hungry, support smallholder farmers so that they can improve their productivity and build factories that could create jobs for hundreds of thousands of youth. Why does the donor community provide aid without holding government officials accountable then? Part of the reason is because the opposition and the rest of us do not speak with one voice. If we do, we will be heard.

A modest amount of theft, bribery, corruption and illicit outflow is inevitable. Ethiopia is one of the ten most corruption ridden countries in Africa. What is stolen and taken out of the economy could have been usedto feed the hungry; build factories; strengthen smallholder farming etc.

This is a systemic problem that requires collaborative action among thosewho want good governance. Just last week, the United Nations reported that 7.5 million Ethiopians in vulnerable and highly sensitive regions require emergency food aid. Take preventable famine as an example.

Famine from occasional droughts is a common occurrence in many countries. The difference resides in how economies are managed and for whose benefit. Democratic countries such as India have overcome the problem by undertaking land reforms and through smallholder farming revolutions. Ghana is boosting productivity by empowering smallholders and youth. This is not the case in development and food aid dependent Ethiopia. The rural poor remain largely poor and in some areas are gettingpoorer. As UNCTAD and the World Bank reported early this year that the Ethiopian government has failed to change the structure of the economy by empowering the society. Land is owned by the state, meaning the ruling party. An estimated 25 to 37 million Ethiopians are either poor or destitute. The current famine compounds the problem. Thousands of young people continue to leave the country in search of job opportunities anywhere in the world. No amount of borrowing or aid would change this. The key is reform.

The Indices show unequivocally that Ethiopia's dictatorship has no ear for human dignity, justice, freedom, participation, engagement, equality, the rule of law and accountability. It has a low regard for the opposition because the opposition is fractured, weak and timid. The regime feels invincible because the rest of us continue to quarrel among one another. Iunderstand indignation within the opposition. But indignation is not a winning strategy.
In summary, economic and social injustice is widespread. It is structural and there is nothing the public or dissenters can do about it if we don't setaside non-strategic differences and collaborate and cooperate now.

President Obama said the right things in Addis Ababa; but he won't give teeth to his words. Donors and others are stunned by human rights abuses, corruption and recurring illicit outflow from one of the poorest andemergency food aid dependent countries in the world. Remember though that the destinations of this outflow are primarily Western banks, Dubai, East Asia and "hidden investments."

Foreign investors do not care if poverty deepens and Ethiopians starve todeath. They make profit and donors serve their own national interests.
They may show a moral obligation and provide food or monies to feed thehungry. Beyond that, they won't pressure the Ethiopian government to democratize.

This leaves those of us who feel strongly that Ethiopia needs good, inclusive, justice and rule of law based governance more than aid or foreign direct investment to rise up. I should like to conclude that the only way out the current quagmire is to stop bickering among ourselves and undermining one another. Each of us need to leave an enduring legacy forthis and succeeding generations by thinking beyond ethnicity and religion,party history or affiliation, age or gender, class or other designation and begin to come together and work cooperatively and collaboratively. If we do this together, we can transition towards a genuine democratic form of government and pave the way for Ethiopia to become one of the most prosperous countries in the world. The alternative is simply unthinkable. (Text ends)

ECONOMY: Where is Ethiopia's so called double digit (11%) growth rate for over a decade? Poverty at home drives thousands of Ethiopian womento flock to Middle Eastern countries to work at domestic workers, where they are treated as slaves. "We are not humans in Lebanon. We are treated like animals or maybe a machine or a robot that they can charge to work," Miryam Kessaya of Ethiopia tells Al Jazeera recently. "I'm not treated as a human. I'm not treated like a woman," said Miryam, who is struggling to form a union of domestic workers along with other activities from India, Philipines etc.

Meantime, Ethiopia is indebted with $57.3 bln US dollar (1.2 trln Eth. Birr) bill, according to Eritrean Press News econmicanalysis of October 12, 2015 referring the IMF lead economists.

Ethiopia is in-debted with $57.3 billion US dollar bill is in the hand of creditors the IMF announced recently. Borrowing and spending it like thereis no tomorrow is irresponsible to say the least. With ever willing sinister creditors, they have found a 'cash cow' in Ethiopia. Learn from Greeks.
A leaked International Monetary Fund (IMF) document warned Ethiopia that its huge uncontrolled borrowing is 'unhealthy' and the expanding ofpublic expenditure as well as the government's tight monetary policy could imbalance its economic by depriving the private sector access to credit and foreign currency, and may need a bailout like Greece.

Multilateral creditors like the IMF, World Bank and the African Development Fund are the main financial lenders to Ethiopia's economy while the increased bilateral creditors like China, India, Kuwait and loans from commercial lenders like the Chinese Exim Bank that demand payablewithin 20 years are the main concern to the IMF.

Ethiopia's 178.6 billion-birr ($9.2 billion) annual budget in which more than 64 percent of the total amount is earmarked for development spending against the advice of the IMF to cut its public spending. The budget also sees a 6.7 percent rise in Defence spending, from 7.5 billionbirr in the previous budget to 8 billion birr. (Text ends)

THE EXAMPLE OF RIGGING ELECTIONS:
IN AFRICA: AFRICAN LEADERS IN SHAM & RIGGED ELECTIONS:
African leader shares his top 10 tips for rigging elections
Martin Plaut
Don't despair. Help is at hand! I just hope you don't mind my remaininganonymous. You know how rumours spread!
Elections don't need to be won. With a little careful preparation they canbe – how shall I put it? – helped along!
The right result can be assured.
Make sure you have your man in place in the Election Commission.After all, they will be running the show, so get your pal on board!
Electoral register: now this is important information. You don't want toshare it with everyone! Keep it safely under wraps until the very last minute – then only give it out in paper form. Can't be searched electronically!

Electoral register: you don't want to keep it up to date! Why? So there are plenty of very old people on it, who can be 'helped' to make their mindup.

Voters registration: now we all are a little, shall we say, less than popular in some areas. So best to make sure in regions or cities where your opponent is king, the registration process goes verrryyyy slowly. If necessary it doesn't happen at all – but that's a bit extreme! Just keep these numbers down!
Tribal elders, community leaders: You have helped them down the years – right? Payback time. They need to suggest that anyone voting foryour pesky rival is just not playing ball. No more credit, fertiliser or seedsfor them! Just put the word around, that should be enough to change minds!

Intellectuals: Now these can be tricky. Tend to vote the wrong way. Sosuggest they might need a little assistance in the voting booths. After all,they might be able to write, but still be illiterate!

Security forces: The boys and girls in blue and khaki. You can almost always rely on them, so make sure they vote early, and then put them incivies and get them to vote again on polling day!

Local media – press and TV: Now I hope you have your own media welland truly under control. Why else own that great radio and TV station? Forthe independents, well, best to have a few traffic accidents in the run-up to the election. They soon get the message!

Foreign media: I used to argue that you don't let them in, but they find ways of creeping about under cover. Best to keep them waiting, then givethem visas at the last minute. Insist they take your helpful media mindersalong with them. They will be so delighted to be on the ground, they will nice and polite – and have no time for those pesky investigations that dig up unhelpful facts!

Election monitors: A piece of cake! African Union monitors only haveone stamp in their luggage – its the one with 'free and fair' on it. Who needs anyone else?

And there you have it.

An election with the right result and all carefully endorsed 'free andfair' by the international community!

No need for all that violence and beating. So last century!

And if all else fails, never forget what my old mentor, Joseph Stalin usedto say: “It’s not the people who vote that count. It’s the people who count the votes.”

Finally, when you win that thundering majority, its always best to offeryour rival a ‘small boy’ job in a unity cabinet. Sort of cherry on the cake. Happy election time!

China in driving seat as Ethiopian capital gets new tramway

(AFP News) September 20, 2015

ADDIS ABABA - Sub-Saharan Africa's first modern tramway opened in the Ethiopian capital on Sunday, marking the completion of a massiveChinese-funded infrastructure project hailed as a major step in the country's economic development.

Even before the ribbon was cut, several hundred residents were queueingfor a ride on the Chinese-driven trams, which have the capacity to carry 60,000 passengers a day across the capital of Africa's second most populous nation.

The two line, 34-kilometre (21 mile) system was built by the China Railway Engineering Corporation (CREC) . The project cost $475 million,85 percent of which has been covered by China's Exim bank.

"I'm very excited and very proud as an Ethiopian. We have been waitingfor this for a long time. It will curb the transportation shortage," said Dereje Daba, who had waited for two hours to become one of the first passengers on the new line.

Currently working in a cafÃ© in the city centre, he said the tram would cut his daily commute from one hour to just 20 minutes. So far only the north-south line is open, with the east-west line due to open next month.

The tramway is designed to relieve the mounting strain on the city's roads, where up to now public transport for the five million and growing population has consisted of aged buses and so-called "blue donkeys" -- anetwork of cramped, polluting minibuses.

"I have had many problems with the blue donkeys, with the long lines andthe fights to get a seat. I hope this will no longer be a problem," said Tigist Dekele, a young woman who lives in the city.

Ticket prices have also been set at the low, accessible rate of no morethan $0.30.

The light rail has been hailed as a milestone in fast-growing but impoverished Ethiopia's development, and part of a cluster of major infrastructure projects -- most of them also Chinese-funded -- that include railway lines, motorways and dams.

The project is also a symbol of China's continued strong economic presence on the commodity-rich African continent. Beijing even built the $200 million African Union headquarters in Addis Ababa in 2012 as a giftexpressing "friendship to the African people."

Ethiopia's transport minister, Workneh Gebeyehu, said the tramway project would also boost Ethiopia's bid to make the city -- already the seatof the African Union -- the undisputed continental hub.
"This is a sign of modernity. This is a very modern train that will serve thecapital city of Africa. We are very proud of that," he said. "The light rail is not for commercial purposes. Tickets are very cheap. It will serve the people with low income."

Authorities have also promised the scheme will not be beset by powercuts, with a separate power grid set up to feed the lines.

MARITIME:Ethiopia to build a new port quay in Sudan
ERITREA PRESS News: October 12, 2015
The government of Sudan has given the land locked Ethiopia a significantpeace of land in Port Sudan city to build a new port to reduce the dependency on Djibouti. Presently, well over 90% of Ethiopia’s imports and exports pass through Djibouti Port, and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) is backing the Ethiopian move to widenits options of ports.

In 1998, Ethiopia stopped using the Red Sea port of Assab in Eritrea where it used to enjoy a free charge for its use. According to IMF, "As stipulated under an inter-governmental transit and port services agreement as well as a customs arrangement, the port of Assab was a free port for Ethiopia, with its own Ethiopian customs branch office, andgoods shipped to or from Ethiopia used to remain exempt from the Eritrean customs duties and related charges."

Since Ethiopia's refusal to use Eritrea's port, it has payed dearly. According to Teferi Asfaw, deputy secretary-general of the Addis Ababa Chambers of Commerce and Sectoral Association, Ethiopia pays Djibouti atotal of US$722.5 million per annum and additional $22.6 million in port tariffs.

Three years ago, President Issaias Affewerki said in an interview, "Eritreais more than willing to offer again the free of charge service of its two ports [Massawa and Assab] if Ethiopia vacates from sovereign Eritrean territories. For Eritrea, good neighborly relations are more important thanfinancial gain.

AVIATION: Is Ethiopian Airlines being insensitive?Ethiomedia (October 12, 2015)

The news that Ethiopian Airlines has hired about 20 Chinese cabin crew members has come as a major shock and surprise for many Ethiopians. The shock is why the Airlines has totally ignored the employment opportunities for Ethiopian nationals who could have done the job had they been given the chance to learn the Chinese language here at home inAddis Ababa, even if sending them to China for the same purpose is costly.

No one is disputing here the need for Chinese speaking cabin crew since, according to Tewolde Gebremariam, Ethiopia makes four flights to mainland China in a single day, and Chinese passengers are known for having difficulty to communicate in English. Given that China is one of thelargest sources of foreign visitors to Ethiopia and other African countries, and the rate is very likely to increase rapidly, it is wise to consider to serve Chineses interests if that company is to generate revenue from the growing market. But it is a matter of commonsense that the same result could have been achieved by Ethiopian nationals who have gone through the Chinese language classes. Otherwise, Ethiopian Airlines is going to hire Arabs (not Arabic-speaking Ethiopians) for its cabine crew because it is flying multiple times to Dubai or Abu Dhabi in a single day?

Many airlines have shown diversity in their cabin crews. They have one or two expat cabin crew on every flight to better serve the interests of passengers who speak only their native language. And Ethiopian Airlines isno exception. And no one would also miss the cut-throat competition among the major airlines. US airlines, for instance, hires an increasing number of Chinese-speaking flight attendants. And they are all US citizens.

In fact, Delta Airlines, the other major US carrier, has gone one step ahead, and created the Language of Destination (LOD) program, which is aimed at increasing the number of flight attendants who speak a foreign language to better serve their customers. But the mind-boggling problem is why the Ethiopian Airlines, a company that used to pride itself that it is run by Ethiopian nationals for the most part, has now taken the route thatis both greedy and insensitive to the interests of young and educated Ethiopians who are being forced to leave the country in search of employment opportunities overseas.

The Airlines is better advised to stop the dangerous trend of bringing in expatriate workforce instead of training ones own nationals. The AirlinesCEO, Tewold Gebremariam, should have learned a lesson from the old Chinese proverb: "Give a man a fish and you feed him for a day; teach aman to fish and you feed him for a lifetime."

DIARIES: Obang Metho of SMNE: Speaking Self-mind:
This morning I had a good meeting with the US government senior officialregarding the stability and security of Ethiopia. The following statement iswhat I ended my remark with: "On behalf of million like-minded Ethiopians, I want to call into question the Obama Administration partnership with one of the most repressive dictators and violators of human rights in Africa.

The “free pass” of ethnic apartheid regime in Ethiopia has enjoyed because of this partnership with th...e US may no longer be justifiable in light of the increasing repression, deteriorating conditions and worseningtensions in Ethiopia and the Horn of Africa.

Looming starvation of 7 Million Ethiopian people, the closure of all politicalspace, the warnings by the Washington DC based International organization of possible ethnic violence, continuing human rights crimes and the increasing radicalization of some in response to these crimes are all warning signs; any one of them a serious risk factor, but together, all the more worrisome.

As many people from the Horn perceive that it is US support that is prolonging the ethnic apartheid regime of the TPLF/EPRDF, I urge you andthose in significant positions of leadership in the Obama Administration to make swift adjustments to failing past policies that favour the dictator andincreasingly alienate the people of the Horn from donor countries like the US. It may be the only way to salvage a deteriorating relationship and to avert the increasing likelihood of large-scale consequences.

It is also highly imperative that the US policy makers seek consultation and assistance from those Ethiopians and others from the Horn who are most invested in peace, stability and prosperity in the Horn—not government promulgators of propaganda. In light of this, I am formally requesting the Obama Administration to focused on seeking mangainful solutions that puts the interests of the Ethiopian people first not dictator.

No longer can we simply excuse our position by blaming Ethiopians for nothaving “a viable alternative” when the ethnic apartheid regime of TPLF/EPRDF makes sure there is none or contrives look-alike ones to its favour, which is not a problem if all others are able to openly compete for offices.

In summary, I am hoping the Obama Administration will take leadership to re-configure the US policy towards Ethiopia now that the true nature ofthis ethnic apartheid regime has been revealed and stop supporting it". (Text ends)

SOLOMONIC DYNASTY: The Last Emperor - The Fall of EmperorHaile Selassie I

By Jake Silverman October 19, 2015

Few could be more considered more central to the modern history of Africa's longest independent nation, Ethiopia, than Emperor Haile Selassie.Regent from 1916-1930, he became emperor of Ethiopia on November 2, 1930 and ruled for nearly 45 years. More than most other authoritarian rulers, Emperor Selassie embodied one-man rule, ultimately to the detriment of his own health and the growth of his nation.

In the end, his efforts to modernize the country's education system alsocontributed to his downfall, as foreign-educated students returned to Ethiopia seeking reform. Calls for change by students, the military and other members of the ruling family, combined with the emperor's decreasing mental awareness, led to his abdication in 1974. Haile Selassiecan be considered the world's last emperor who held true political power.

Sheldon Vance served as Deputy Chief of Mission (DCM) in Addis Ababa from 1962-1966. While serving as DCM, he came to know Halie Selassie personally while working with the emperor to transform the nation into a constitutional monarchy. John Buche served as a political officer in the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa from 1963-1966 and describes the feudalsystem of rule under Emperor Selassie. Parker Wyman worked as DCM in Ethiopia during the last few years of Selassie's reign and gives insight intohis final days as Emperor. Richard Jackson became familiar with the workings of the Selassie government while working in the Bureau of Intelligence and Research, Horn of Africa Desk at the State Department from 1968-1970.

"He really was God in the eyes of his people"

Sheldon Vance, Deputy Chief of Mission, Addis Ababa, 1962-1966 VANCE: [Selassie] had decided, after he was returned to his country by the British after the war, that he would have to make strenuous efforts tomodernize his country, and he ruled, among other things, that education for the future would be in English, not in Amharic, so that his educated people could communicate with the rest of the world more easily.

He said also that public education would be modernized. Before the Italianoccupation, education had been entirely in the hands of the Coptic Church,and it was said that there were many Coptic Church teachers who believedstill that the earth was flat and other wonderful bits of intellectualism of that nature.

As I look back on my four years in Ethiopia, that man dragged his countrykicking and screaming out of the cave age. What happened? He regarded the United States as his greatest friend, and we supplied his prime minister with a legal advisor.

We helped them draft a modern constitution which envisaged a Parliamentwith two houses, which would have a general election, have public participation in the elections. The emperor would appoint a prime minister, there would be a Cabinet, and it all looked like Thomas Jeffersonhad been at work.

However, looking back on it, the emperor, I should add (although very friendly to me personally and to close foreign friends, people he regardedas close friends) he really was God in the eyes of his people. I've been standing with him and have seen reasonably senior Ethiopians come up and prostrate themselves flat on the floor in front of him.
We did not realize how really, totally, a thousand percent feudal the old man was. He simply was not about to delegate anything to anybody. We used to joke that he decided whether to put a 25-cent stamp on any letterthat left the government, or a 50-cent stamp.

What happened was, he lived too long. If he had tried to use the educated, trained youth and the structure in the government [things would have been alright.] We talked him into land control and land reform, brought in airplanes to map the country so that people would know who owned what, rather than just the dukes and their equivalentsowning everything in sight from the mountaintop. It all fell apart.

"He was the only person who had the full view"

BUCHE: Without sounding too naive or too prone to oversimplify, the Emperor was the source of almost all power. His ability to move ministersand governors around, which he did periodically so that they could not build up a power base or could not get any expertise, was one way he exercised power. He moved governors and judges around, moved generals out to be governors, governors in to be ministers, shuffled the military and police constantly.

He had three or four intelligence systems running concurrently, spying oneach other and spying on everyone else. In his prime he was able to keepthe many balls in the air. He was pretty busy keeping things in motion, but that was a source of power.

There was an inherent instability to the system, since he was the only person who had the full view. While he would occasionally tolerate andeven praise independent initiatives by subordinates, such actions were usually viewed negatively and punished in some way.

Officials in Addis Ababa or in the provinces learned that it was safer to consult with the Emperor before undertaking an action that was not routine. We heard of many sudden assignments to the provinces or fromone province to another, where the rumors had it that the cause was displeasure on the part of the Emperor at an action by the official.

The Emperor grabbed power as a young man and held on against many rival contenders for decades. He was shrewd, cunning, farsighted, and decisive in his prime. In 1963 when I arrived in Ethiopia, I believe the Emperor was about at the zenith of his mental abilities. What he accomplished on the international scene over the next several years wasmost impressive. The fact that he held the country together in the 1960sas well as he did, given the many internal and external challenges, demonstrates his extraordinary talents.

"Haile Selassie made a strategic miscalculation"
BUCHE: The Emperor had survived the 1960 coup, and there was a slightly faster pace of reform. The coup was still on peoples' minds, although it took place in December 1960, and the last executions were completed by mid-1961. It was a bloody coup, and there were deaths onboth sides, not only from the fighting, but also the killing of hostages by the Revolutionaries and then the executions by the Government.

The coup punctured the mystique surrounding the Emperor, damaged therelations between Haile Selassie and his son, the Crown Prince, revealed the bitter rivalries in the military and security forces, demonstrated the extent of hatred toward the reactionary nobles around the Emperor, and inspired other opponents of the regime to continue their fight.

A pesky insurgency was festering in Eritrea. The rebellion did not have tohappen. Haile Selassie made a strategic miscalculation.

Haile Selassie wanted complete amalgamation, but he saw that proposal was not going to fly. He was absolutely opposed to independence, so he accepted federation. By 1961, Haile Selassie had the Eritrean Parliament under his control. He gave the signal and the Eritrean Parliament voted toabolish the Federation and join "Motherland Ethiopia". The rebellion begana few months later.

"The forces he unleashed were ones ultimately...he couldn't control"

BUCHE: Both his physical and mental powers began to weaken and the system became unglued. You could see in the late '60s, early '70s, that things were coming undone. He could no longer juggle hundreds of important issues, keep up a heavy schedule of foreign and domestic travel, decide on the numerous personnel appointments, and continue todispense instructions, rewards, and punishments through face-to-face meetings with his officials.

The embassy tried hard, frankly, to get Haile Selassie to abdicate, to step down in favor of his son, the crown prince, who had been educated in England, who was a centrist moderate, let's say, who admired the British monarchy, who took as his model the British monarchy, so that he would have been not exactly a figurehead, but he would have been a constitutional monarch, with a prime minister and elections, real elections,to choose a government under his general suzerainty.

"We began to see the collapse of the entire previously-existing power structure" (Parker Wyman, Deputy Chief of Mission, Addis Ababa, 1972-1974)

WYMAN: All military units sent representatives to Addis to present theircombined grievances to the central government. The ones sent were either junior officers or non-commissioned officers, and tended to be themost radical and vociferous in their units.

Those representatives then formed a committee in Addis which was calledthe "Derg," a word which simply means "committee." One of those men was Major Mengistu, who would gradually come to dominate the entire group by methods which included murdering his rivals.

Meanwhile the incidents, strikes, and mutinies continued to grow in scope.The Prime Minister was replaced, the government's authority looked increasingly weak.

Gradually we began to see the collapse of the entire previously-existing power structure. It became obvious that the new civilian government wasbeing manipulated by the Derg, and we heard more and more of Mengistu's influence in the Derg. Its members had gone way beyond the role of presenting grievances and were calling the shots themselves eventhough Haile Selassie was still emperor and there was still a civilian government. By this time many of the most influential people in the country had been arrested and thrown into the same prison in Addis.

Their influence was growing and expanding into this power vacuum, wherenobody else was really able to control matters. That situation went on, basically-I don't think there's too much point in going into the details-wenton, basically, until the Emperor was-in August of that year, roughly six months after the revolution started-was really thrown out of his palace and taken off to house arrest.

I have always remembered the last meeting I had with the emperor, not long before he was arrested. I remember him shaking his head and sayingsadly, just before I left, "Times are changing very rapidly these days." Ostensibly, he said this in relation to Kagnew base, but I felt sure from thetone of his voice and the look on his face that he was also thinking of the traditional Ethiopian political and economic structure which was collapsing around him. October 23, 2015: ESAT News Report on future Ethio-Eritrea Relations Speakers invited at this conference address issues related to Ethiopia- Eritrea relations. It's good when two neighbors that are technically at warabandon the rhetorics of war and forge amicable relations. But the development shouldn't be at the expense of one over the other. Viewers are advised to carefully observe the remarks of the speakers, and send intheir comments to editor@ethiomedia.com.

ANTIQUITY: A Watch Made for an Emperor: A one of a kind PatekPhilippe

Why collectors are so excited about the Emperor 2497, a unique and previously unknown wristwatch presented to Emperor Haile Selassie in 1954. For collectors and scholars of vintage timepieces, nothing is more exciting than when a watch with traits previously unseen comes to light. When the watch is a reference already regarded as one of the most sought-after wristwatch models ever made by any manufacturer — and furthermore boasts an Imperial provenance — excitement tends to turn into something else altogether. This 18k gold perpetual calendar Patek Philippe 2497 is one such watch. Offered in the Important Watches auction on 9 November at Christie's Geneva, it is the one and only knownexample of this reference bearing a previously never before seen military-style black dial with luminous Arabic numerals and luminous Alpha hands

— all these features being unrestored and in original condition. What’s more, this timepiece features one of the most distinguished provenancesever seen in an auction room. According to our research, it was commissioned in 1954 as a gift for Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie, andpresented during his official visit to Switzerland in November that year.

BOOK REVIEW:Former PDRE VP Fisshea Desta Released his bookmemoir. Reminiscence of the Ethiopian Revolution: A Critical Review

By Professor Asayehegn Desta October 19, 2015

Considering Meison's visionary ideologue, EPRP's firm convictions,and the Derg's commitment to unity and sovereignty, if these wereto operate in a conducive socio-political and economic environment, they would have ushered in Ethiopia's successful development! (Fisshea Desta, as paraphrased by Professor Desta)

Last year, while we were reviewing Kahsay Abraha Bisrat's' book, entitled"Special Love for Assimba" at the National Archives and Library in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, one of the reviewers, Professor Gebru Tareke, brought tothe attention of the audience that in addition to the books written by former President Mengistu Haile Mariam (hereafter Mengistu) and former Prime Minister Fikre Selassie Wegderes (hereafter Fikre Selassie), the former Vice President, Fisshea Desta (hereafter Fisshea, or the author) has written an account of his memories of the Ethiopian Revolution duringthe Derg's (an Amharic word for committee) era. During a private conversation, Professor Gebru Tareke told me that Fisshea's book would be favorably received by the public and probably would be marketed heavily when compared with the fictitious account of the Derg's era written by Mengistu and Fikre Selassie. In addition, as Professor Gebru told me, which is now acknowledged by the author on page 4, Professor Gebru had advised the author to be truthful and profoundly search his memory to reconstruct the so-called "bloodless revolution" that was usurped or snatched by the Derg from the genuine Ethiopian revolutionaries.

Similarly, when there was an informal talk about the possibility of the author writing a book, one of the distinguished advisors of the Derg, without hesitation, reflected loudly and clearly that if an authentic, and true account of the Derg's administrative style and military history were tobe written, the distinguished advisor of the Derg argued that this should be Fisshea's book.

In short, the prominent but anonymous member of the Derg asserted thatFisshea's account is likely to be more reliable than what was recorded by Mengistu and Fikre Selassie because Fisshea was not only a prolific writer but also Fisshea was in charge of the Derg's administrative apparatus andFissshea had unstrained access to all the documents that pertained to theDerg's era.

After many months of delay, now Fisshea's (hereafter the author's) bookhas been released and is in the open market for the general public.
Though it might sound like a marketing gimmick, the publisher claims thatthe author's book is more original and stands out as more authentic than those previously published by contemporaries of the author. Though manyprospective readers have received the author's book with some skepticism, the publisher wholeheartedly endorses the author's book as truthful because the author genuinely extends a deep and heartfelt apology to 1) the parents who not only lost their children but were also forced to pay for the bullets used to kill their innocent sons and daughters,and 2) other Ethiopians who were humiliated, offended, victimized, terrorized, assaulted, and injured for their ideological differences during the Derg's military rule in Ethiopia. Also, the author's book is regarded by the publisher as unique because it reveals for the first time, the hideous death of the well-known Ethiopian creative writer, Ba'lu Girma, about whom a large number of Ethiopians were left clueless concerning his disappearance.

Contrary to the command and control policy that prevailed during the communist period of the Derg's era, in which the author served as a faithful and very important functionary, the author claims that he had a special love for his country. It is exciting to read the author's book because the author feels that he can't undo the numerous inhuman atrocities committed by the Derg but can apologize for them. As a reborn advocate of democracy and the rule of law, the author openly advocates for human rights and citizen participation, sovereignty, control of the abuse of power, and political tolerance. He is very much interested to getconstructive feedback from the readers of his book.

Despite having lost a number of my friends and family members, includingmy younger brother, and that I was pulled from my job at the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in Paris, by the Derg, the advice of the Nobel Laureate, Desmond Tutu, that there can be "No Future Without Forgiveness," I forgive the author and congratulate him for having the stamina and the courage to reveal to the public part of the story that occurred during the Derg's era. I am also surethat the author's motives to write the book didn't emerge for further aggrandizement or to rekindle his personal ambitions, but it is my belief that the book is based on a sincere desire to bring closure to his personal role during the military regime that extended from February, 1974 to April, 1991.

Keeping the above statements in mind, I had no trouble constructivelyreviewing Fisshea's book considering the questions given below:

1) Does the book have a clear purpose?
2) Is the book rigorous and objective?
3) Is the book parsimonious and glaring enough to explain the pros andcons of the Derg's period?
5) What lessons can we learn from the author's book?

To answer the above questions as objectively as possible, within the fifteen chapters of the book five major sections of the book are brieflyexplored.

In Section One of the book, the author documents historically in 3 chapters the pre-1974 upheavals that occurred in Ethiopia and outlines the emergence of the Derg to power. At the outset, the author humbly states that he has a very limited background for carrying out historical analysis. With this modest beginning, in Chapter 1 the author uses primary and secondary sources of information to document the history of Ethiopia starting from the era of Emperor Tewdros, Yohannes IV, and Menelik II. Furthermore, the author illustrates some of the conspicuous pre-1974 political upheavals that were supported by the Wayne group, theOromo group, the Eritrean Liberation Movements, and the uprising that occurred in Gojjam and Balie.

Despite the attempt of Emperor Haile Selassie to partially modernize, andinstitutionalize his semi-feudal authoritarian regime, the author argues that the socialist-oriented Ethiopian university and high school students were not prepared to accept the autocratic nature of Haile Selassie's government. More particularly, the university students didn't accept sittingquietly when a large part of the rural land was owned and controlled by absentee landlords. In 1965, for example, university students demanded land reform and spread their passionate slogan "land to the tiller" to capture the hearts of the Ethiopian masses. More seriously, the author states that as students became more radicalized, vocal students like Waleligne Makonen, demanded that as Ethiopia was a mosaic of nationalities, national groups should be allowed to entertain their rights toself- determination up to and including secession.

As Ethiopia's economic condition deteriorated, the author argues that the militant university and high school student demonstrations were accompanied by a mass movement that embraced the peasantry, urban proletariat, and the rank and file of the army. As a result, the country wassent into turmoil.

In Chapter 2, the author documents how the uprising that was started by the armed forces of Nageli in February 1974 for financial gain culminated with the emergence of the 109 Derg members who maintained their center of operations at the Army Headquarters at Mashiloka, Addis Ababa.Later, the disgruntled group composed of the Armed Forces, the Police, AirForce, Navy, Imperial Body Guard, and the Territorial Army formed the Provincial Military Administration Council (PMAC).

Using "Ethiopia First" as a slogan and emphasizing the various forms injustice, corrupt behavior, and the divide and rule policy that characterized the HaileSelassie regime, the Derg started arousing the country against the Haile Selassie regime. Eventually, the PMAC embarkedon structurally dismantling the existing institutions and finally overthrew the decaying system of Haile Selassie's regime in August, 1974. As the PMAC was in power, with little knowledge of socialism, the Derg not only acquired great political clout but also borrowed from socialist states like the Soviet Union, China, and Tanzania to embark on the nationalization ofthe commanding heights of the Ethiopian economy.

In Chapter 3, the author brings to the attention of his readers that as theDerg gradually rose to power, serious types of irreconcilable differences developed between the then Chairman General Aman Andom (hereafter Aman) and Vice Chairman, Mengistu. As stated by the author, Chairman Aman made it crystal clear to Mengistu that instead of working with 109 mumbo-jumbo types of Derg members, he would like to manage the country with about 14 highly trained and manageable committee members. Also, Chairman Aman emphasized his strong belief that the Eritrean issue could be peacefully resolved through an open dialogue withthe Eritrean fighters. Following his convictions, Chairman Aman started giving clear instructions to the 2nd Division of the Ethiopian Army Unit headquartered in Asmara to refrain from using unnecessary force againstthe Eritrean guerrilla fighters.

As stated by the author, Vice Chairman Mengistu had a hidden agenda tobe the head of state. Therefore, not only did Mengistu start defaming themost respected Chairman as an Eritrean but also rallied against his strategies. Mengistu chose to operate in the interest of national security and sovereignty and he decided to wipeout completely the Eritrean guerrilla fighters by military force.

The rivalry between Aman and Mengistu was prolonged because they could not come to terms on how the imprisoned former Haile Selassie officials would be treated. Aman's position was that the imprisoned HaileSelassie officials be treated with the due process of law. Realizing that Chairman Aman was moving in a different direction, and in collaborationwith his cliques, Mengistu started intercepting the various appeals and discussions that Chairman Aman had with his friends and supporters on issues related to the re-structuring of Ethiopia's political scene to put anend to leading the country by semi-literate and irresponsible military gangs. Ignoring the due process of law and following the advice of Dr. Berket Habte Selassie (by the way, Professor Berket never anticipated that Mengistu would ever attempt to kill General Aman) and also as is widely known throughout Ethiopia, that Mengistu was getting indirect signals from Professor MesfinWolde Mariam, for example, "It is not us butyou who have the weapons," the brutal, blood thirsty, power monger, Mengistu and his cliques, without consulting the other Derg members, summarily executed Chairman Aman and 60 former senior dignitaries of the Haile Selassie regime in November 23, 1974. As a result, the radical action by Mengistu and his cliques not only ended the so called "bloodlessRevolution in Ethiopia" but also ended the peaceful way of solving the Eritrean problem as outlined by General Aman, the most charismatic visionary, and strategic leader that the Derg had ever seen.

In chapter 3, the author documents the underlying reasons the Derg and its cliques designed the "Development through Cooperation (Zemecha) Campaign," a program that dispatched about 60,000 university and juniorand senior high school students and their teachers to the countryside. In short, the author claims that the program participants were sent to the rural part of Ethiopia in order to mobilize rural masses, explain how the land reform program could be implemented, to spread literacy to the rural masses, and to raise the political consciousness of the rural mass (p.136).

On the other hand, to calm the mass upheaval of the militant groups, theauthor mentions that the Derg established an Advisory Board. Being partof the drafting Advisory Board, the author tells his readers that a document was drafted as a directive for the PMAC to establish a democratic civilian government that called for the establishment of unity to bring about equity among the various multi-cultural and religiousgroups in Ethiopia.

In Chapter 4, as an introduction to the land reform policy initiated by the Derg, the author discusses briefly the landholding system during feudal times and goes on to describe how remnants of the former landowners attempted to destabilize the system after they evacuated and started settling in various urban areas and the capital city of Ethiopia, Addis Ababa. Though it is subject to further investigation and without giving credible evidence to support his claim, the author states that the most well-known militants during the Ethiopian Student Movement, Meles Tekle,senior, Giday Gebrewhed, and Rezan Kidan, collaborated with the EritreanLiberation Fighters and attempted bombing and burning the Wabi Sheble Hotel, the Addis Ababa Municipality Office, and the Bole Shell Oil Distribution Center.

The author indicates that the land reform policy, Women's Organization, Debating Societies, Ethiopian Labor movement, and Teacher's Union, initiated by the PMAC, were supported by the All-Ethiopia Socialist Movement (MEISON). But, as the author stated it, the Ethiopian People'sRevolutionary Party (EPRP) which was founded in 1972 in West Berlin, Germany, only supported the land reform policy. The EPRP stood againstthe vague patriotic slogan of "Ethiopia First" designed by the military andshowed its irreconcilable ideological conflicts with MEIOSON. Claiming itself to be a vanguard party, the EPRP used various types of clashes andconflicts in Addis Ababa and finally, called loudly for the abolishment of the Derg and its program for the establishing of a "Democratic Government in Ethiopia".

In Chapter 5 of Section 2, the author narrates the establishment of the National Democratic Revolutionary Program. To calm the controversies that erupted within the PMAC, a few of the Derg members were sent for ten months to the Soviet Union to study and observe in practice the application of scientific socialism (Marxism). Though they were not meantto last long, about five in-formal political parties (MEIOSON, EPRP, SADED(Revolutionary Flame), Waz League (Labor), and the Ethiopian Marxist- Leninist Communist Party were formed.

In Chapter 6, the author eloquently narrates the skirmishes and intriguesthat occurred within Menelik's Royal Palace against Vice Chairman Mengistu for allegations that Mengistu was being too despotic, had betrayed the Revolution and also for consolidating his power against the formation of the People's Democracy in Ethiopia.

In the first part of Chapter 7, the author narrates vividly the nine assassination attempts against Vice Chairman Mengistu. The organizers ofthe plots against Mengistu were fully convinced that Mengistu in collaboration with Meison (p.214) had become the authority figure and themajor originator of the Derg's so called decisions.

The second part of chapter 7 gives a narrative of the atrocities committedby the EPRP. It also blames the radical cliques of the EPRP for throwing itsvigorous and staunch supporters into the jaws of the Red Terror of the PMAC machinery. However, it needs to be made crystal clear that, since Colonel Tesfaye Wolde Selassie, then head of National Security, was known for giving conflicting reports to his authorities, the authenticity of the blame that the author attributes to the EPRP is based on a 95-page report given by Berhane Meskel's Reda, the former chairman of the EPRP.It needs to be seriously questioned.

The third part of the chapter vividly enumerates how two of the Derg's officers (Captain Moges and Capain Alemayohu) played major roles in therestructuring of the Derg's organization, and also in restricting Mengistu from making decisions by himself, without consulting the Derg.

To the surprise of Mengistu, Meison, Waz League, etc, the then Chairman,General Teferi Benti, openly invited the politically alienated EPRP membersto participate with the other groups in substantive political dialogues.
Conspiring with other security officers (such as Colonel Daniel Asfaw, thenHead of theNational Security and others), Mengistu and his cliques designed an effective strategy to wipeout GeneralTeferi Benti and his associates (such as Capitain Moges, Capitain Alemayhou etc).

Mengistu achieved his goal, he was unanimously elected to be the Chairman of the PMAC. Eventually, the Ethiopian Marxist-Leninist Revolutionary Organization was established through the merger of Meison,Seded, Echaat (the Ethiopian Oppressed Mass Unity Struggle), Mal Red or Emalerred (Ethiopian Marxist Leninist Revolutionary Organization) and theWaz League (p.234). In retrospect, taking a neutral stand, the author reflects that had it not been for the mal- political climate that prevailed over the Derg era; the unnecessary atrocities that were committed on each other during the Red and White Terror period; then collectively pursuing the visionary stance of Meison combined with the firm convections of the EPRP and the nationalistic stance of the Derg would have ushered to maximize Ethiopia's development.

In Chapter 8 of Section 3, the author addresses the Somali annexation ofEthiopia and the reasons the United States betrayed its longtime ally, Ethiopia, and instead started supporting the Republic of Somalia. In addition, the author narrates some of the most important factors that gave birth to the formation of the Ethiopian Workers Party (EWP).

Concerning the Ethio-Somali war, the author states that Somalia annexedOgaden, the Somali inhabited region of Ethiopia, in order to realize its dream of forming a unified “Greater Somalia.” (Somalia had a dream of incorporating the Somali inhabitants in the Horn of Africa, i.e., Northern Kenya, Djibouti, Ogaden, North and South Somaliland.) During the war that lasted from July, 1977 to May, 1978, the United States supported Somalia and withdrew assistance to Ethiopia when the Derg declared itselfto be Socialist. In addition, the United States felt that in Ethiopia there was a flagrant violation of human rights because the Chairman of the PMCA was assassinated by Mengistu and his cliques in January, 1977 (p.272). Nonetheless, because it was the Cold War Period and Ethiopia was regarded a genuine Marxist-Leninist nation, it was able to get supportfrom the Soviet Union. Using his good office, the author tells his readers that he was able to solicit and get assistance from other socialist countriessuch as, East Germany, Poland, Cuba, Hungary, North Korea, etc.

As the Derg was strategizing how to defend Somalia's aggression, the author reveals that to the surprise of many of the Derg members, ColonelAtnafu Abate, the Vice Chairman of the PMAC, raised his hand and openlytold the PAMC that instead of pursuing a command type of economy, it would be better for Ethiopia to pursue a mixed type of economy. After enduring a long diatribe by the cliques of Mengistu, Colonel Abate was handcuffed and dragged aside by Mengistu's, henchman, Major GetachewShebashi. Not surprisingly, later it was announced to the Ethiopian publicthat Colonel Abate was executed because of his anti-revolutionary stand.

While this was fermenting, Somalia had no choice but to break its diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union and instead depended on UnitedStates' assistance in exchange for the use of Somali bases. In addition, the author asserts that the huge turmoil in Eritrea and other parts of Ethiopia and the allegation that the EPRP sabotaged Ethiopia's effort to crush the Somali incursion, gave a major advantage to Somalia. Also, since Somalia was a member of the Arab League, Somalia was able to getassistance from a number of Arab states. However, it was indicated by theauthor that after almost a year of heavy fighting the Ethio-Cuba army wasable to drive the Somali National Army off Ethiopia's soil in March, 1978.

Chapter 9, titled "Our win in the East will continue in the North," concernsthe win that Ethiopia scored against the Somali incursion that was believed would continue with a win in Northern Ethiopia (in Eritrea). The chapter also talks about the Celebration of Ethiopia's 4th Revolution that was attended by the president of Cuba, Fidel Castro.

Gaining partial relief from internal upheavals and external aggression, the Derg finally was able to begin designing plans for development. In October1978, the Derg, on paper, announced the formation of the National Revolutionary Development Campaign to mobilize and harness the country's national resources and transform Ethiopia's economy. To construct the necessary base, the Derg initiated a mass literacy campaign in five languages: Amharic, Oromo, Tigrinya, Wolayta, and Somali and later the number of instructional languages were to be expanded to fifteenlanguages. With the nationalization of the Ethiopian Airlines, the continuous forms of strife that prevailed in the country, and the fact that that the Soviet Union was interested in supplying airplanes and indirectly running the Ethiopian Airlines, the Ethiopian airlines faced financial ruin due to poor administration. However, based on the ingenuity of the authorand the advice of the formers managers of the Ethiopian Airline, the administrative structure of the Ethiopian Airlines was reorganized and the Ethiopian government extended financial capital to lift it out of crisis.

Eventually the Ethiopian Airlines regained its status as an aviation power.

In Section 4, the author states that starting in 1976, the Derg embarked aProgram for the National Democratic Revolution (PNDR). The primary objective of the PNDR was to become socialist under the leadership of workers, peasants, and other anti-feudal forces. In order to form a civilianvanguard party, in 1979, with the dismemberment of the Derg, and electing Mengistu as its chairman, the Derg formed the Commission to Organize the Party of the Workers of Ethiopia (COPWE). In September, 1984, the Worker's Party of Ethiopia was proclaimed. With little or no understanding of Ethiopia's culture or how to align it with the Soviet Union's modus operandi, in 1987, Ethiopia drafted a new constitution in line with the Soviet constitution of 1977.

As discussed in Chapter 10, the Derg established the People's Democratic Republic Ethiopia (PDRE) with little attention to the consequent economic collapse, drought, famine, and military setbacks in the Northern part of Ethiopia. Also, the Derg focused on establishing the Institute for the Studyof Nationalization (ISN) in 1983, and forced settlement or villagization schemes without providing adequate services to implement it.

In Chapter 11, subject to discourse, the author claims that it was the Tigrai Liberation Front (TLF), and not the Tigrai's People Liberation Front that originated the Tigrai movement. However, what is certain about the author's illustration is that he gives a firsthand narration of the various forms of injustice that the people of Tigrai faced while they were under the Haile Selassie regime. In addition, though the author, being in power during the Derg's era had undeniable allegiance to the Derg and his country, he narrates the various forms of harassment and mistrust that hefaced for being suspected as a "double dealer Tigraian" and informant for the TPLF because he was raised and grew up in Tigrai.

Concerning the "Eritrean Dilemma" (Chapter 12), the author outlines three different perspectives. The first perspective argues that Eritrea needed the federal status that it had (the United Nations General Assembly federated Eritrea with Ethiopia) before it was forcefully dissolvedby Ethiopia in 1962. Others claim that like other nationalities in Ethiopia, the Eritrean issue could have been peacefully solved if the Eritrean people were accorded the right to exercise self-determination up to and including secession.

Others groups such as the Tigraian People’s Liberation Front, assert that as a former colony of Italy, Eritrea needed to be bestowed nothing but its full independence because it faced indirect colonializationby the Ethiopian empire.

As stated by the author, after the Derg came to power, with the assistance of East Germany and the Soviet Union, it attempted to resolve the Ethio-Eritrean war. But overtime, the Eritrean armed struggle was carefully led by the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) and the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF). Actually, during the Ethio-Somali War theEritrean forces almost drove away the Ethiopian Forces from Eritrea. But, after the Ethiopian and Cuban forces repulsed the Somali incursion, the Ethiopian army swiftly handled the Eritrean guerrilla forces causing them retreat to their enclaves. Afterwards, the Ethiopian army launched a number offensives including the famous "the Red Star Offense in 1982"to dismantle the Eritrean guerrilla fighters, but the Derg forces could not crush the Eritrean forces because the Eritreans fighters were supported bythe Tigrean People's Liberation fighters (TPLF). As a footnote, the author reveals to his readers that since the Ethiopian forces fighting in Eritrea were disorganized, the famous journalist Ba'lu Girma, based on his firsthand observation, gave a clear prediction to the Ethiopian forces that the future of overtaking Eritrea was ended (or Ormaye in Italian). This message was too bitter a medicine for Mengistu to swallow, he most probably instructed the National Security Force to get rid of Ba'lu.

With the dismantling of the Soviet Union into numerous republics in 1985,socialist Ethiopia could not get war materials and supplies. In line with Ba'lu's projection, the Ethiopian Army was completely wiped off of Eritrea soil. And with the complete defeat of the Ethiopian army by the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Front (EPRDF) in 1991, Mengistu, on the month hewas born, made a plan to flee to Kenya. Subsequently, he ended up as a refugee in Zimbabwe.

Section 5, includes Chapters 14 and 15. What makes Chapter 14 excitingis that in the introductory part, the author chronicles some of the most conspicuous events that happened in Ethiopian history all in the month of May to entice his readers. For example, the author mentions the WeicahleAgreement that was concluded between Menelik II and Italy; the attempted coup against the tyrannical and dictatorial regime of Mengistu; the fleeing of Mengistu from Ethiopia to Kenya and Zimbabwe; the overthrow of the Derg's regime by the EPRDF, etc. In addition, the author,without hesitation, asserts that the coup that was attempted by senior Military officers against Mengistu's regime in May 1989, was indirectly designed by Mikhail Gorbachev. While the General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, Gorbachev was in the process of reforming (perestroika) the Soviet Union to be more transparent (glasnost), and destabilizing other socialist countries. He found Mengistu to be more socialist than Gorbachev himself, thus, Gorbachev had no choice but to deny Mengistu the financial aid and material supplies that heasked for.

The author also discusses the pivotal role that he played in sabotaging thecoup that was attempted against the Mengistu regime by senior military officers (May,1989) mainly from Addis Ababa and Asmara. As stated by the author, the coup d'etat was mainly planned not only to oust Mengistu from power while he was on state visit to East Germany but also to negotiate a peaceful settlement with the Eritrean Liberation fighters. In addition, the author claims that while being behind the scenes, he was able to save a number of Tigreans from being slaughtered by the brutalityof Mengistu's cliques because irrespective of their political opinions, all Tigreans were suspected to be supporters of the Tigrian People's Liberation Force.

Chapter 15, discusses token peace negotiations that Mengistu attemptedto resolve some nagging issues in Ethiopia, and indicates how in the finalhours Mengistu repented and embarked on a plan for Ethiopia to have a mixed instead of a socialist or command economy that precipitated a complete disaster for the Ethiopian economy as a whole.

After indicating that a number of socialist countries such as Russia and China, Tanzania, etc. were abandoning the socialist system, it is interesting that the author still advocates that there was nothing wrongthe socialist philosophy as mode of production and fair distribution provided Ethiopia had pursued it rationally by maintaining stability and restraining Mengistu's arrogance and obstructionism.

In conclusion, the author was honest enough to argue that the revolution that emancipated Ethiopia in 1974 was not initiated by the Derg but was given to the Derg to administer. However, as said by the author, the Ethiopian People's Party (EPRP) engineered the "White Terror" to force the Derg, without the military administrating it, to establish the Ethiopian People's Democracy. The Meison group on the other hand, with critical cooperationwith the Derg, preferred to reform the existing bureaucracy and to expandpublic education to raise the political consciousness of the Ethiopian masses. Given this scenario, the author argues that the Derg had no otherchoice but to stay in power to maintain Ethiopia's unity and sovereignty through its Ethiopian Socialism agenda.

Some skepticsview that the author's apology for the atrocities committedduring the Derg era is a distorted plea to the country. However, having thoroughly read his book, I can testify that the author is sincere and truthful. Since the author loved his country, he had to survive in a constrained political space by entertaining and flattering the then Chairman Mengistu. In retrospect, however, the author openly says that Chairman Mengistu was too arrogant and repulsing to accept genuine advice from fellow Ethiopians or foreign advisors. For example, on the Eritrean issue, the author from firsthand experience tells the reader that

Mengistu would never bend from his conviction that ‘it is a mistake tonegotiate with the Eritrean separatist fighters.’

Though candidly put, the author blames the United States for abandoningits former ally, Ethiopia. He argues that the United States began assistingSomalia during the Somali incursion of Ethiopia in order to access Somaliabases in the Red Sea. Finally, negating his previous communistic view, now the author whole heartedly stands for democracy and is an advocate for the rules of law.

Review:

The author, Colonel Fisshea Desta has written a superb book that is well- documented with detailed references. The book moves its readers along easily from one chapter to the next. In order to entice his readers, the author begins each chapter of the book with highly relevant quotations and poems, by well-known writers. Given the author’s sense of humor, hetries to energize and remind his readers of nostalgic memories by quotingfamiliar songs, sung by Ethiopian celebrities. The book is very readable and accessible to the non-specialist because it uses simple words rather than the heavily loaded political slogans that were common during the Derg’s period.

More specifically, the author has made the purpose of his book clear andconvincing by entitling it, “Fisshea’s Reminiscences of the Ethiopian Revolution.” Using primary and secondary sources of information, the contents of the book illuminate Fisshea’s memory of the Ethiopian Revolution from the start until he was finally removed from the Derg because he was either “sick” or had to be reshuffled for retirement because his cajoling of Mengistu was not needed anymore.

Most importantly, unlike the writings of other prominent people of theDerg’s era, the author clearly elucidates not only the most important contributions of the Derg but also apologizes honestly for the blundersthat were committed during the Derg period which was like hell.
Furthermore, the author paints a vivid picture of heretofore unknown,inhuman atrocities committed during the Derg’s era.

Regarding rigor which connotes carefulness and the degree of exactitude in writing a book, the author as a participant/observer demonstrates that he was a good record keeper. All sources of information, except with minor typographic errors with the footnoting (please refer to footnote, 17-19 on page 42-48), the content of the book was systematically documented. The author has consulted the writings of famous historians and political scientists. At times, the writing style of the author seems to indicate that rather than being an active participant, he gives the impression that he was an aloof or third party observer. By and large, thewriting style of the author demonstrates that the author was an excellent observer. The author’s level of participation in a number of political activities within the Dreg, entangled with inefficient bureaucracy is clearlydemonstrated and presents new information and evidence. Being the primary source of information, the author has enabled his readers to get new insights into the Derg's hidden activities. By and large, the conclusionhe reached at the end of the book is in line with his purpose for writing the book. As a result, the author's level of analysis is outstanding.

As the title indicates, the content of book is supposed to be a full documentation of the writer's experience. At times the author documentsother writers' opinions rather than describing vividly his own. The book issupposed to be an illustration of his inner impression from the Derg's camp rather than giving us the opinion of others though they might have been well documented. For example, the "Berhane Meskel Redda's interrogative reports" which the author claims to have gotten from the documents stored in the archive of the Derg's National Security Office arelikely to be unreliable and fictitious since most of the documents collectedby the then Head of the Derg's National Security Office were not true but were mainly written to make Mengistu happy and the note takers could stay alive and in power. Thus, it is likely to say that some serious errors might have been committed, because the author, without cross checking with other documents or interviewing other reliable sources, solely depended on the documents submitted to him by the then National Security office to include in his memoir.

I am sure the author's organizational commitment or his consciously or unconsciously forgetting unwanted memories might have influenced his writing style. For example, given the oppressive nature of the Derg's system and his life in prison for 20 years, four months and six days (p.576) during the currently in power, the Ethiopia People's RevolutionaryDemocratic Front (PRDF), might have restrained him from fully verbalizingsome of the hideous atrocities committed during the Derg's era.
Nonetheless, I am glad to see that the content of the book and the conclusions drawn are derived from actual data and not from the author'ssubjective or emotional values. In addition, the book is parsimonious or simple enough because the author tries to explain every phenomenon in avery easy way to understand.

In the final analysis, it would be fair and exact to suggest to the author that the book could have been more robust if some of the chapters wereeither shortened or further edited to keep the book more concise and to the point. Otherwise, when compared with other books that have been written by Derg members that I have read, I fully assert that Fisshea's book is different from the general understanding that we had about the Derg's period and has made a vital contribution to the study of Ethiopianhistory, public administration and politics. Therefore, the book should beof value to policy makers, students, and scholars. Given this, I hope the readers of Fisshea's book will find it to be inspirational, motivational, andwill help us envision for the future a better democratic Ethiopia.

Entertainment News: Lions guard abducted Ethiopian girl from evil men until rescuers arrive. Sadly, many girls must face this terrible fate, as over70% of girls are forced into marriage in Ethiopia. Luckily, she had some unlikely guardian angels looking over her. Sgt. Wondimu Wedajo was at the scene of her rescue. “They stood guard until we found her and then they just left her like a gift and went back into the forest,” Wondimu said. “If the lions had not come to her rescue, then it could have been much worse. Often these young girls are raped and severely beaten to force them to accept the marriage,” he said. The abductors really didn’t have a choice when they saw a bunch of lions surrounding her and ran for the hills. But the lions comforted her until help came.” Wildlife experts believeshe may have been protected due to the sound of her cries. The whimpering of a young girl may have resembled the sound of a young cub. As of the last report, four of the seven men involved in this heinous crime have been arrested. The lions came to her rescue, and we’re reminded that not only humans can show compassion for others. Source:- iizcat.com

ETHIOPIA: Can the government stop famine this time?

Farmers in North Wollo, the most drought-sensitive area of the country, say their crops have failed. Arron Reza Merat/GlobalPost Government officials say this year the drought is just as bad as those infamous eventsthat sparked famines in 1965/66, 1972/73 and 1984/85. It’s harvesting time in North Wollo, the most drought-sensitive area of the country, and farmers here say their crops have failed. The annual meher rains fell onlyfor three days. Hunger and malnutrition has risen sharply, affecting millions.

But Ethiopians are considerably more resilient to drought than in the past.They now live in the world’s fastest-growing economy, overseen by a government that has halved the poverty rate in 20 years by running Africa’s largest social protection program; allotting 70 percent of public capital to pro-poor sectors, principally agriculture; and doubling the size ofthe road network to connect farmers to markets and emergency responders to remote villages. Ethiopia’s food security system knits together agricultural training, emergency relief and early warning systemsfor crop failure and mother and child malnutrition, making the country far more resistant to drought shocks.But this drought is now severely testing these systems.Mohammed Yasin wears the plaintive expression of a man who is tasked with ensuring 1.6 million inhabitants living in the most drought-prone corner of Ethiopia’s north east get enough food to eat.

“The harvest has been a total loss,” says Yasin, head of disaster prevention and food security for North Wollo, looking out of his window atthe sunny street from the gloom of his dark office In Weldiya, the provincial capital. “Many, many people died in the past. But we now haveearly warning systems and programs to mobilize grain from areas of surplus to areas of scarcity. We will avoid this problem without evacuatingareas.”Yasin says more than half of North Wollo’s inhabitants have been identified for the targeting of food aid. Nationally, the United Nations says 7.5 million, out of a population of 94 million, are now going hungry and need food aid.Eight percent of a nation’s population requiring such assistance is a sobering thought, but there is good reason to believe the situation could be considerably worse. In the 2010/11 drought that struckthe entire horn of Africa, Ethiopians fared better than Kenyans — even more so than Somalis. Advertisement One international donor official in the capital Addis Ababa says that in 2011 “a mass fatality famine, which these weather conditions have caused in the past, was headed off by having structures such as the PSNP [the Productive Safety Net Programme] in place and a broadly effective response from government and donors.”The PSNP, Africa’s largest social protection program, has been a key driver of Ethiopia’s anti-poverty campaign, along with a massive state investment in the agricultural sector and the near universalization of primary school education, according to UK think tank, the Overseas Development Institute.

Established in 2005, the PSNP welfare-for-work program now mobilizes around 6 million able-bodied men and women to work for five days a month on public infrastructure programs such as digging irrigation canalsor building terraces for crops. In exchange, their households — and thoseof over a million less-able citizens — are provided with food or cash amounting to nearly 29 pounds of grain and almost 9 pounds of legumes for the leanest half of the year.

In the far northeastern corner of Wollo is Guba Lafto, a district comprisingtwo valleys with eroded soils and erratic rainfall. The lowlands of the deepand vast valley have received only three days of rainfall this season.
Despite the drought, the crops have grown tall and green, belying theirfruitlessness.

“The rains didn’t come this year. The land will go yellow very soon … Thecrops have not produced grain. They are useless even for the animals,” says Gumat Hussain, a Guba Lafto local chief flanked by two guards sat with AK47s across their knees.

He points to his field of retarded sorghum crops. “It is very severe here. People here are forced to sell their property — their goats and oxen. They don’t have any other options. They travel further with their animals to findthem water but their animals are dying.

”Down the road PSNP workers are digging a water storage pond to help keep the animals alive. Mahmood Mohammed, who is responsible for managing some 400,000 people on the PSNP program in Guba Lafto andtwo surrounding districts, greets the laborers with the air of a teacher greeting his children.“Actually, it’s 392,017,” says Mohammed, taking a pen from his breast pocket and circling the figure on his clipboard. “Andwe have 180,249 graduates.

”“Graduates” is the term the government applies to people who have weaned themselves off the PSNP and have, by Mohammed’s assessment,become resilient to “moderate shock.” They have largely moved on from subsistence farming, “graduating” on to more entrepreneurial activities that diversify their income into higher-value lines of work.

One such farmer, Mulubrhan, lives in the highland village of Hanging Mule,named after an errant beast who hanged itself on its own bridle after falling from a narrow path. He shows off his eucalyptus farm; his dormitory, which he rents out to students for under $4 a month; and a mud-hut that operates as a granary (he owns it with a partner).

In 1985 during the famine, the communist Derg military government shelled his house, leaving him destitute. He said that after years of poverty, making ends meet by small trading, the social safety net gave him a foundation on which to build.

“Before my focus was only on feeding my six children,” he said. “The PSNPhelped me to focus on making money.

”Some 25 miles south of Hanging Mule is the village of Hen Tax, named after a levy the Italians placed upon its residents during Mussolini’s tentative foothold in Ethiopia in the 1930s and 1940s. On the hills between the village and a small stream lives Tsehaynesh, a single-motherof two and recipient of the PSNP, who owns 70 coffee trees that grow in moist soil and a single fat cow. Her income from the coffee and milk is topped up with PSNP funds, which she earns by working fidve days a month building terraces in which teff crops, used to make Ethiopia’s staplespongy flat-bread injera, are grown.

“It’s not very hard work,” she says, laughing at her own understatement.“I am a strong woman.

”On the surface, North Wollo appears fine but the failed harvest portendshardship ahead. The annual PSNP contingency budget has been releasedearly to help those in need now and the government has allocated of $33m dollars for emergency relief.

The PSNP is helping to buffer poor Ethiopians against crop failure for now,but government officials say that state coffers alone will not be enough tofully protect citizens against the drought.

The first veritable step Ethiopia took on food security was in 1973, when itborrowed from emergency response systems from India and Botswana to form its Relief and Rehabilitation Commission.

The population was 31 million. Since then the country has achieved incredible feats, such as halving its poverty rate and developing a sophisticated and responsive food security system. But since 1973 the population has tripled, now hovering under 100 million and climate changehas begun to bite, particularly in the north and east. The system is running to a standstill.

Ethiopia needs financing from international donors, which as of yet has not been forthcoming. Despite recent growth and gains, Ethiopia is still anextremely poor country and it will take time to escape poverty and the need for external assistance.

The country's disgruntled agriculture minister suggested last month that the refugee crisis may have averted the world's eyes from the impendingcrisis in Ethiopia. Perhaps he is right.This article originally appeared on GlobalPost. http://www.zehabesha.com/ethiopia-is-facing-its-worst- drought-in-30-years-can-the-government-stop-famine-this- time/#sthash.8p77TgdP.dpuf (Text ends)

Oromo, Ogaden, Gambella, Sidama & Benishangul Opposition Groups United. October 26, 2015

(AP) by Rodney Muhumuza, Associated Press —Five Ethiopian dissident groups in exile said they have formed an alliance to bring a change of government back home, describing Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn's government as oppressive.... The new group is called the People's Alliance for Freedom and Democracy, according to a joint statement issued Friday in Oslo, Norway, where the groups met recently.

The alliance was formed by the #Benishangul People's LiberationMovement, the #Gambella People's Liberation Movement, the #Ogaden National Liberation Front, the #Oromo Liberation Front and the #Sidama National Liberation Front, the statement said.

"The (alliance) will create an opportunity for all peoples in Ethiopia to co- create a transitional political order that is based on the consent of all peoples, where the outmoded hegemonic culture of a single group dominating the rest is dismantled and a new just political order is established, where the respect of the right to self-determination is genuinely granted to all," the statement said. The group said it "will conduct diplomatic, advocacy, information and other campaigns to changethe current undemocratic political culture and oppressive system in Ethiopia."

Ethiopia's ruling party won every seat in parliament in May elections, raising questions about the credibility and fairness of the polls in a countrywhose government is accused by human rights organizations of harassing and jailing its opponents. Human rights groups criticized U.S. President Barack Obama for visiting Ethiopia in July, saying his trip lent legitimacy to an oppressive government.

At the time, Prime Minister Desalegn defended Ethiopia's commitment todemocracy and said the country needs "ethical journalism," not reportersthat work with "terrorist groups." Ethiopia is the world's second-worst jailer of journalists in Africa, after Eritrea, according to the Committee toProtect Journalists. (Text ends)

Ending Ethiopia's food aid dependency

By Daniel Teferra(PhD) November 4, 2015

Ethiopia has been hailed by the international organizations as the fastestgrowing economy. The Western media is now telling the world that Ethiopia needs food aid because of a widespread drought.

Economic growth is a change in total output between two consecutive years expressed as a percentage. Economic growth, however, does not tell us the components of growth. In the last ten years, Ethiopia’s growth has been in housing and infrastructure; not in food. Thus, the governmentin Ethiopia has recently appealed to its international partners for food aid to feed 8.2 million people. According to U. N. reports, the number of people needing help may reach 15 million by 2016. The regime in Ethiopiaalways appeals for food aid whenever the country is affected by a drought. Then its international aid partners will deliver the food. This has become routine.

Since the early 1970s, Ethiopia has been affected by a drought frequently.As a result, the country has become dependent on food aid despite its richpotential. The regime’s food aid partners are Western governments, international organizations, including the United Nations and its specialized agencies, as well as NGOs. Presently, they are all working hardto avert another famine in Ethiopia. A number of initiatives have been announced in the past by the United States and its Western allies in response to a global food problem. For instance, in 2009, at the G8 Meeting in L’Aquila, Italy, more than $22 billion was pledged for a global food security campaign.

In 2012, a symposium on global agriculture and food security was held inWashington, D.C. At that symposium, the President of the United States launched his New Alliance for Food Security and Nutrition. The President stated in his remarks that the new initiative would be a better alternativethan simply handing out food. Thus, according to the President's New Alliance, G8 nations will honor the commitment, they made in L'Aquila.

Second, African governments, "committed to agricultural development willbuild on their own plans making tough reforms and attracting investment."

Third, donor countries will “closely align their assistance with these country-plans.” Fourth, the private sector, that is, the World Bank, international development agencies, multinational corporations, NGOs andcivil societies will coordinate their involvements with the other partners.
The President in his remarks rightly said, “The whole purpose of development is to create the conditions where assistance is no longerneeded, where people have the dignity and the pride of being self-sufficient.” The President’s New Alliance, however, leaves a lot to be desired.

First, it is not based on the successful experience of America’s agriculturaldevelopment. America has a lot to offer to help Africa modernize its agriculture. The United States of America is a world leader in agriculturalproductivity thanks to the Homestead Act of 1862. The Homestead Act created numerous privately owned family farms. The government made credit sources available to make the purchase of land and farm machineryby the people feasible. The Homestead Act was a strong democratizing measure because it gave Americans private property, which is the foundation for individual rights.

Second, The New Alliance does not incentivize African countries so that they should modernize their agriculture. On the other hand, the U. S. applied incentives to influence Southeast Asian countries to develop their agriculture. For instance, Japan would not have abolished landlordism andestablished owner farmers without American involvement. The American Occupation in 1946 used its power to enforce a land reform law, which was against the interest of wealthy and powerful landlords.

The United States pushed for similar land reform laws in South Korea and Taiwan. Thanks to American involvement, South Korea and Taiwan today are among the prosperous nations in the world (see Table below). For example, in 1961, Ethiopia, South Korea and Taiwan all had per capita incomes less than $120. By 2014, South Korea’s per capita income was 60times larger than Ethiopia’s and Taiwan’s per capita income was almost 100 times bigger.

During 1961-2014, Ethiopia got poorer while South Korea and Taiwan gotricher. Furthermore, the income gap between South Korea and the UnitedStates decreased by almost 50%. And the income gap between Taiwan and the United States shrank by 80%. On the other hand, Ethiopia’s per capita income as a percentage of America’s per capita income declined from 2.3% to 0.8%.

From 1951 through September 30, 2013, the United States provided loans, grants/food aid to Ethiopia amounting to $11.7 billion in constantdollar. Ethiopia received most of the aid between 1991 and 2013 under the present government (see USAID chart below). However, the currentregime is not committed to agricultural development.

ROOTS: African Immigrants In The U.S.

Nigeria, Ethiopia, Egypt are the top birthplaces for African Immigrants in U.S By Monica Anderson, Pew Research InstituteNovember 4, 2015

African immigrants make up a small share of the U.S. immigrant population, but their numbers are growing – roughly doubling every decade since 1970, according to a new Pew Research Center analysis of U.S. Census data. There were 1.8 million African immigrants living in the U.S. in 2013, up from 881,000 in 2000 and a substantial increase from 1970, when the U.S. was home to only 80,000 foreign-born Africans. Theyaccounted for 4.4% of the immigrant population in 2013, up from 0.8% in1970. The growth is evident among recently arrived immigrants. When compared with other major groups who arrived in the U.S. in the past fiveyears, Africans had the fastest growth rate from 2000 to 2013, increasing by 41% during that period. (Africans are also a rapidly growing segment of the black immigrant population in the U.S., increasing by 137% from 2000 to 2013.)

The transatlantic slave trade beginning in the 16th century brought hundreds of thousands of enslaved Africans to the U. S., but significant voluntary migration from Africa is a relatively new trend. One factor behind this recent wave can be traced to the Refugee Act of 1980, which made it easier for those fleeing conflict-ridden areas, such as Somalia andEthiopia, to resettle in the U.S. Back then, less than 1% of all refugee arrivals were from Africa, compared with 32% today, according to figuresfrom the U.S. State Department's Refugee Processing Center. Statistics from the Yearbook of Immigration Statistics confirm this point. Among refugee arrivals in 2013, five of the top 10 countries of nationality were inAfrica: Somalia, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Sudan, Eritrea and Ethiopia.

African immigrants from the sub-Saharan region are also more likely than immigrants overall to enter the U.S. through the diversity visa program – an act passed in 1990 to encourage immigration from underrepresented nations. This legislation was initially intended to boost the number of Europeans migrating to the U.S., but many Africans have also benefited from the initiative. Foreign-born Africans come from all over the continent,but the most common countries of origin for African immigrants are Nigeria, Ethiopia, Egypt, Ghana and Kenya. These five countries accountedfor nearly half of the foreign-born African population in the U.S in 2o13.

African immigrants are more likely to settle in the South (38%) or the Northeast (27%) than in the West (18%) or Midwest (17%), while the largest numbers of African immigrants are found in New York, California, Texas, Maryland and New Jersey. Each of these states is home to at least 100,000 foreign-born Africans. In other states, Africans represent a higherpercentage of the foreign-born population than the national average.

Many African refugees from Sudan, Somalia and Ethiopia have settled in South Dakota (Ethiopians are the largest immigrant group overall there). Africans make up 28% of South Dakota's foreign-born population. Fueled by Minnesota's sizable Somali-born community, 21% of the foreign-born population in that state is African. Africans account for a sizable portion ofthe overall immigrant population in several other areas, including Washington, D.C., Maryland and Maine. (Text ends)

PUBLIC TRANSPORT: TRAMWAY IN THE ETHIOPIAN CAPITAL

China in driving seat as Ethiopian capital gets New tramway

Even before the ribbon was cut, several hundred residents were queueing for a ride on the Chinese-driven trams, which have the capacity to carry 60,000 passengers a day across the capital of Africa's second most populous nation. The two line, 34-kilometre (21 mile) system was built bythe China Railway Engineering Corporation (CREC) . The project cost $475million, 85 percent of which has been covered by China's Exim bank.

"I'm very excited and very proud as an Ethiopian. We have been waitingfor this for a long time. It will curb the transportation shortage," said Dereje Daba, who had waited for two hours to become one of the first passengers on the new line. Currently working in a cafÃ© in the city centre, he said the tram would cut his daily commute from one hour to just 20 minutes. So far only the north-south line is open, with the east- west line due to open next month.

The tramway is designed to relieve the mounting strain on the city's roads, where up to now public transport for the five million and growing population has consisted of aged buses and so-called "blue donkeys" — a network of cramped, polluting minibuses. "I have had many problems withthe blue donkeys, with the long lines and the fights to get a seat. I hope this will no longer be a problem," said Tigist Dekele, a young woman who lives in the city. Ticket prices have also been set at the low, accessible rate of no more than $0.30.

The light rail has been hailed as a milestone in fast-growing but impoverished Ethiopia's development, and part of a cluster of major infrastructure projects — most of them also Chinese-funded — that include railway lines, motorways and dams. The project is also a symbolof China's continued strong economic presence on the commodity-rich African continent. Beijing even built the $200 million African Union headquarters in Addis Ababa in 2012 as a gift expressing “friendship to the African people.”

Ethiopia’s transport minister, Workneh Gebeyehu, said the tramway project would also boost Ethiopia’s bid to make the city — already the seatof the African Union — the undisputed continental hub. “This is a sign of modernity. This is a very modern train that will serve the capital city of Africa. We are very proud of that,” he said. “The light rail is not for commercial purposes. Tickets are very cheap. It will serve the people withlow income.” Authorities have also promised the scheme will not be beset by power cuts, with a separate power grid set up to feed the lines.

MASSMEDIA: VoA and the unanswered questions

PERSPECTIVE: By Abebe Gellaw November 2, 2015

It turns out that after attending the UN General Assembly, Tedros Adhanom and Girma Birru rushed all the way from New York to Washington D.C. to stage their scandalous VOA "nightline show" on Saturday, September 26. It was a well-planned and coordinated mission which was made possible through the efforts of their expanding network,contacts and agents at VOA and beyond.

Backdoor diplomacy

Despite the outrageous nature of the backdoor scheme, which afforded a chance to the messengers of tyranny to dictate their whims and wishes of distorting the Voice of America, some people at the scandal-ridden section appear to be confused about their roles, rights and duties. A few think that it is okay to use their VOA position to serve tyranny in overtand covert operations. But it is a very risky misadventure in this age and time where the evidence maybe just a few clicks away.

There are also a couple of others that think that pushing any serious questions under the carpet and engaging in empty threats and abusive speeches, instead of addressing the real issues and questions at hand, is the hallmark of their professionalism and greatness. It appears that their confusion is going from bad to worse with each passing day. Thinking that no one can raise questions to them and report on matters of public concern reveals a regressive tendency akin to dictatorship.

That extraordinary meeting called at night to discuss the editorial quality and content of VOA broadcasts with representatives of a criminal regime was not a standard practice, as some try to pretend. It may be easy to dismiss serious issues being raised at coffee gatherings. But it appearsthat it is not as easy as the office bravado to do it properly. In any case,as far as the scandal is concerned, no one has come forward so far to explain the inexplicable backdoor diplomacy of Tedros Adhandom and Girma Birru at VOA.

VOA claims to be a beacon of hope, truth and freedom to oppressed people around the world. Contrary to that, the top diplomats of the TPLF- led tyranny openly represent oppression and injustice of an evil regime ruthlessly torturing, jailing, killing, kidnapping, displacing and robbinginnocent civilians. This is not bias, but a reality that VOA itself helped to document well, at least in the past.

Unanswered questions

Whatever was the nature and intent of the talks, the guidance and edicts issued from the tyrannical side, there are seriously lingering questionsthat still need to be answered. When I received credible information from reliable sources on the bizarre meeting, I did my level best to get to the bottom of the issue and verify the information I received well before I published the story.

On Wednesday, October 21, 2015, at exactly 8:30 AM PST (11:30 AM EST), I called VOA Public Relations and talked to a PR officer named George Mackenzie. I explained what I needed and the kinds of questions I wanted to raise. He asked me to send my questions in writing so that he could route them to whoever would be the appropriate person to answer or give me an interview.

Within half an hour, I drafted my questions and emailed them at 9:03 AM.For the record, without fear or favor, the main questions were the following

Dear VoA PR,
Further to my phone call this morning, I would like to submit the followingquestions regarding the visit of Ethiopia's Foreign Minister Tedros Adhanom and Ambassador Girma Birru.

I have received credible information regarding an unusual meeting theminister and the ambassador held at VOA headquarters, on Saturday.September 26th, 2015, from 7 PM to 9 AM, with journalists of VOA working at the Horn of Africa Section.

1. What was the nature of the meeting?

2. Who authorized the meeting, especially on a Saturday night?

3. Were VOA management invited to attend the meeting? If so, how didthey handle the invitation?

4. Was the State Department or any other federal government agenciesinformed about the questionable meeting?

5. The top Ethiopian officials have reportedly demanded VOA journalists tofocus on progress and development instead of sensitive issues like humanrights. They have also allegedly said that giving airtime to dissidents was wrong. How does VOA approach the issue?

6. There is a feeling that the Ethiopian government should not have beenallowed to compromise VOA's independence and put undue influence or pressure on broadcasters. What is VOA's position on this?

7. The Ethiopian government is known to be an enemy of press freedom. Why did VOA allow the officials to try to give instructions and guidelines tothe journalists in the name of building trust?

8. Why do VOA journalists need to build trust and soften critical coverageabout the repressive regime?

9. The officials have reportedly hinted that they are constantly informedabout who does what at the VOA Horn of Africa section. Does VOA haveany channels to inform them about who does what at the section?

10. What is the overall assessment of VOA on the outcome of the meetingand promises of "working together" for mutual benefit?

I thank you for your cooperation in anticipation. My deadline is tomorrow.Please get back to me as soon as possible.

After a few hours, I called to enquire when I can get the answers. Mr. Mackenzie told me that the questions were forwarded to the concerned authority. Apparently, the VOA boss who was supposed to give the answers happened to be an Ethiopian. But the boss failed to answer anyof the questions despite my repeated phone calls and follow-up emails. Instead of answering the simple questions, they have resorted to inappropriate posturing and badmouthing. Needless to go into details atthis stage, it is better to ignore the side show and focus on the pressingissues at hand. (Text ends)

Fairness and balance

I am curiously waiting that any of the questions will be answered satisfactorily. If the concerned VOA managers are serious about challenging the reports, it is better to do it openly and make themselves available for an interview. They can also open the airwaves for an honest discussion with the public and tell us what happened. Instead of reporting on every tiny matter that nobody cares about, what was being discussed on a Saturday night with the top guns of tyranny is newsworthy. There may also be audio recordings that can reveal the raw deal. Nothing is impossible!

On many occasions, I have written and reported on the messes and problems within VOA Horn of Africa section, especially VOA Amharic. WhileVOA's senior executives have tried their level best to answer questionsand investigate wrongdoings, including admitting that Henok Semaegzer's amateurish distortions were below VOA's standard, the concerned African division and service heads never answered any questions and have in fact exhibited dictatorial tendencies repeatedly. The same people cry foul after stories are published without still answering any questions or demanding corrections, if at all there are inaccuracies that can be challenged with factual evidence.

In the spirit of fairness and balance, the bosses should also convene another Saturday or Sunday night meeting behind the scene with opposition party leaders and the countless victims of TPLF's tyranny to review the editorial quality of VOA and give their own guidelines and orders. That is the easy way to open a can of worms.

It is ironic to note that some VOA bosses used to claim to have an issue with government officials for failing or refusing to answer any serious questions raised by VOA Amharic service. Unless they are talking about a different standard, the same must apply to themselves. If getting answersto their questions is so important that they had to go out of their ways to welcome the tyrants in the middle of the night, why is it that answering a few serious questions once in a blue moon has become so hard for them?

It is evident that the tentacles of the TPLF regime, fearful of its fate and demise, is expanding inside and outside of the country. That is why it has an agenda of muzzling and suppressing every little voice. VOA has not been immune from the attacks over the years. When the failed jammers get a chance to jam from inside using their connections, it raises serious concerns that cannot be easily dismissed or pushed under the carpet now or in the future.

It is a well-known fact that VOA Amharic service is particularly a target of TPLF tyrants, who have also made serious efforts not only to jam it but also infiltrate the core team. The effort has made a difference to some extent. Sooner or later, VOA could be another TPLF propaganda outlet if the current rush to the bottom continues unchecked. Does Ethiopia need VOA to do such a hack job like Fana and Walta? The answer is obvious.

After living in the U.S. for decades, there are still a few people that do notseem to understand that VOA does not enjoy any special privileges that make it immune from public scrutiny at various levels. When questionsare raised on its activities, it is expected to give proper answers. Behavinglike African dictators whenever issues are raised, opinions and reports are published contradicts not only the very missions of VOA, but also infringesthe tenets of U.S. constitution.

Here in the United States, we, the people, who exercise our rights to the full, are not powerless or voiceless. We have constitutionally guaranteed rights to voice our concerns and demand answers to our legitimate questions. We can speak out, write, complaint, petition or even legally challenge wrongdoings without fear of persecution. We can hold public institutions and officials accountable. No amount of dictatorial insult or threat helps to change this reality.

The huffing and puffing or resorting to cheap shots behind closed doors is only a sign of weakness, not a position of strength. In reality, such an approach mostly backfires as it only raises more questions and scrutinies.

Just to state the obvious, the standards expected of VOA services are much higher than propaganda outlets run by tin-pot African dictators. If this is not too obvious to miss, what else can be? Whatever one may say,it is not easy to intimidate and silence those who exercise their rights andrespect their duties. I, for one, is not ready to be silenced with empty threats or cheap insults. I do hope that my position is at least clear enough. (Text ends)

REGIONAL DIPLOMACY:

Ethiopia Warns Saudi Arabia And UAE

AFRICANGLOBE – (November 30, 2015)

Ethiopian Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, has told a local private newspaper that Saudi Arabia and the UAE will bear the consequences of Ethiopia's response if their operation in and around Eritrea's Port of Assabsupports the 'Eritrean regime's destabilization agenda against Ethiopia.' He made the remarks after a recent United Nations monitoring group report indicates that Saudi Arabia and the UAE have leased the Port of Assab for 30 years from the Eritrean government in their coalition to fightthe Houthis in Yemen.

"They have assured us that they would not be engaged in activities that would endanger the peace and security of Ethiopia. They have said this isonly a choice of tactical convenience to their operation in Yemen and that they would evacuate the area as soon as the mission is completed," Hailemariam told The Reporter newspaper. "We have also stressed that they will bear the consequences of our response if their operation in thearea supports the Eritrean regime's destabilization agenda against Ethiopia. Although we understand their objective, we were not consultedbefore the countries reached to this agreement."

The Premier also told reporters of the newspaper during his first interview with a local private media outlet that Ethiopia absolves itself of any responsibility in case of disruptions to their operation in the area due to itsproportionate response to any provocations by the Eritrean regime.

"Although we understand their objective, we were not consulted before the countries reached to this agreement. We have a right to protect the sovereignty of our country. And this might depend on the actions of the Eritrean regime," Hailemariam said. The Prime Minister, however, said that there is no evidence Saudi Arabia and the UAE had leased the Port ofAssab from Eritrea for 30 years.

Experts say the relationship between Eritrea and Ethiopia is arguably themost important and volatile in East Africa. The fall-out between the former brothers-in-arms initiated a two-year-long border war in 1998, which claimed around 100,000 causalities, and cost billions of dollars.
Many say the 'no war, no peace' situation between the two countries continues to serve as the main source of regional instability in the Horn ofAfrica. (Text ends)

ATHLETICS:

The Ethiopian town that's home to the world's greatest runnersSimon Hattenstone Friday 6 April 2012

What do Kenenisa Bekele, Tirunesh Dibaba, Derartu Tulu and Fatuma Roba have in common, apart from being Olympic gold medal-winning runners? They all come from Bekoji in Ethiopia – and they were all trainedby one man Outside the blue hut is a plaque with a beautifully calligraphed set of rulesand regulations – athletes must train hard, respect each other, work as a team and honour their homeland. At the top of the plaque three flags have pride of place: Ethiopia, the local region of Oromia and the Olympics.This is the office of Sentayehu Eshetu, known to everybody as Coach. To be honest, it's more run-down garden shed than office. Inside, it is dark and dusty, but the late afternoon sun lights up a series of photographs of athletes on the wall. All have won at least one gold medal at middle- or long-distance running. Amazingly, six of the champions originate from thistiny town of Bekoji, and have been coached by Coach.

If Sentayehu Eshetu is not the world's greatest coach, he is surely the greatest discoverer of running talent. In London this summer, two of the 54-year-old's most successful former prodigies, Kenenisa Bekele and Tirunesh Dibaba, will defend Olympic golds at 5,000m and 10,000m. Thenthere's his first champion, Derartu Tulu, who won the Olympic 10,000m inBarcelona in 1992 and eight years later in Sydney, and Fatuma Roba, whowon the Olympic marathon in 1996 in Atlanta; and the latest generation of champions – Tirunesh's sister Genzebe, only 21 and already world indoor champion at 1500m, and Kenenisa's younger brother Tariku who won the 3000m gold at the World Indoor Championships.

Coach is a small man with a big smile. He talks quietly and is not one forhyperbole. When I suggest he has a magical touch, he looks alarmed.

"No! No magic," he says intensely. "I don't do any magic. It's the weatherand the fact that everything is helping them." He must have something special? "They listen well and work hard. And eat well. You know barley? They eat barley." He grins and says I should eat more barley.

Bekoji is 170 miles south of the capital, Addis Ababa. There are plenty of donkeys and horses and goats and cows on the road, but few cars. Coachsays around 17,000 people live in the town of Bekoji; there are 25 car owners and he knows all of them. The landscape looks arid but is incredibly fertile. Everything grows here – oil seeds, coffee, tea, spices, sugar cane, cotton, cereals. The centre of Bekoji sits 10,500 feet above sea level and has an average temperature of 66 degrees. Its inhabitants are proud of its climate and special air. On arriving, I find it hard to breathe, but when I do manage to gulp some in, I quickly realise how crisp and pure it is. If you can run here, they say, you can run anywhere.

We head off across the red ochre soil, which blows up yet another mini dust storm, past the corrugated shacks and rubble and randomly parked lorries, and head for Bekoji stadium. It's not as grand as it sounds. Thereis one primitive stand, a grassy bank for people to sit on and a straggly football pitch in the middle. This is where Coach takes his youngsters, between the ages of 12 and 20, through their paces five times a week.

There must be more to your success than feeding the runners barley, I say to Coach. "I give full attention to my team and I'm always on time, and I will do anything it takes to make them a champion. I tell them whatthey should do, and if they follow that, they run very well." Coach never ran himself. His sport was football. He taught PE and played in central defence. These days he hobbles more than runs. He shows me the knackered knee that did for his football ambitions.

Until now, the rest of the world has remained oblivious to Coach's achievements, but for the past four years a documentary film crew has recorded in Bekoji and has produced a lovely film called Town Of Runners.It's no exaggeration – any day at sunrise you will see groups of teenagersor adults running up the hill. Most will be on their way to the two-hour daily training session with Coach. Within an hour the sky goes from red towhite to perfect blue. By 8am, the sun is burning through in the 80s.

Coach is thinking about why so many great runners come from here – determination, physical strength from working the land, huge lungs, role models, perfect body shape. (Many of the most successful distance runners have been small, light and immensely strong, with a superhumancapacity to endure – the biopic of Ethiopia's most famous runner, Haile Gebrselassie, who comes from down the road in Asella, is called Endurance.) Running is a means of escape and transcendence in Ethiopia − Coach's best runners will go to "finishing school" in Addis Ababa and that is just the start of their journey. Every day, Coach says, parents will ask him to train their children. "Kids want to run to make their parents happy, and the parents want them to run so they don't have to work theland. They say, come and take my son or daughter."

It must be heartbreaking telling them that they are not going to make it, Isay. He shakes his head. If they have any natural ability, he insists, you can never write them off. Athletes come through unexpectedly – and fail unexpectedly. He tells me about Zegeue Shifarawu Abebe, the young manwho takes training with him. "He used to train with Kenenisa, and we thought he was the better runner; that he was the one who was going to win Olympic medals." For whatever reason, Zegeue never made it, and now he's out every morning coaching tomorrow's champions.

At the Bekoji stadium, the kids are gathering on the grass banks. It's 7am, but no one's yawning – perhaps its something in the air. Alemi Tsegaye is one of the girls featured in Town Of Runners. She and her friend Hawii Megersa were two of the most promising local athletes when the film-makers started shooting. But they may not be quite good enough.In the early days, Hawii tended to win the races and Alemi would finish runner-up. She said it made her just as happy to finish second to Hawii asif she had won. In the film, we see both girls graduate to "running camp"
− they leave home for a promised land of concentrated training, healthy food, a small wage and school. But it didn't work out that way. The camps, or clubs, were well intentioned but badly run by regional government, and the girls felt neglected; Alemi returned home disappointed and Hawii returned distraught, suffering what appeared to bea breakdown.

Since then, Hawii has gone off to another camp where she is said to behappier, and Alemi is between camps. Today, back at training and now18, she is glad to be with her friends.

Like many Ethiopians, Alemi is reserved. I ask questions through a translator and she stares straight ahead when answering, nodding her head from side to side, avoiding eye contact. "I wanted to go to school, but it is very far from the camp. They keep promising we can go to school,but there's not enough money and it never happens."

There was another problem at camp – the food. All they were fed was injera, the Ethiopian yeast-risen bread that is rich in iron but tends to bloat the stomach. "Injera, injera, injera," she says. "Not enough milk andhoney."

We talk about the freakishly high number of great runners from Bekoji. She mentions the special air, of course, and points to the landscape. "We can run on the flat and in the hills. So we can train for all conditions." Then she points to Coach, looks at me for the first time and smiles. "Good coach." What makes him so special? "He's like a parent. You can ask himanything."

Why does she want to become a champion? "For my country and for my family." It's the answer they all give. "If I can't make a living as a runner, I want to be doctor." Is that realistic? Well, she says, her family farm wheat and maize, and are relatively wealthy for this area, so yes. "It was possible, but I've fallen behind in my learning. Most of the children who goto the running camps fall behind."

Later that day I meet Frehiwot Sisay, a friend of Hawii's who was at campwith her. She tells me how awful it was there. She tells me how awful it was there. "Out of 55 of us, 53 left." Runners leave for a variety of reasons – they are not good enough to make the required times, they areunhappy or homesick. "They fed us for only three days. The other four days we had to provide for ourselves. We had to sleep on the floor. The two girls who were left weren't even good runners. They were in their late20s, too old to go home."

Coach blows his whistle to start training. All 200 run round the 400m track. It's easy – barely a trot. Then Coach whistles and they speed up. Within seconds they are half a track away from me – their strides massive, elegant, easy. One time round the track and my chest tightens,my lungs burn, my head hurts and I feel sick. The special air, no doubt.

Coach takes us through our paces for the next two hours. The emphasis ison stretching and loosening, and he refers to the routines as gymnastics. There are so many different exercises – running on the front of your toes,on the back of your heels, bending low and scattering imaginary crops, skipping with an invisible rope, duck-walking, goose-stepping, horse- cantering. "Up, up, up," Coach says, as the athletes lift their legs ever higher. In the distance cocks crow and dogs howl, but otherwise the silence in the Great Rift Valley is overwhelming. Occasionally it's broken by "Up, up, up up" and the drum of feet beating the soil in perfect time.

It's beautiful here – red soil, blue sky, green savannah, mountains in thedistance and the smell of eucalyptus everywhere. "It's the best," Biruk Fikadu says. Both his parents died in their 30s and he has lived with his grandmother ever since. "It is very beautiful here, but it is also boring. Itis a happy place, but there is no money. You have to go to Addis to makemoney."

Before long the going gets too tough for me and I drop out. I'm not the only one who's exhausted. Coach tells me that after training most of the children fall asleep in the afternoon and miss school. Few runners manageto combine training and education. As a former teacher, Coach has mixedfeelings about this – yes, of course, he'd rather they studied, especially now that all children can go to government-funded local schools, but ifrunning is their passion, it's pointless trying to deny them.

Ephren Dejenne, 17, has been training with Coach for three years. He is running 400m and 800m, and hopes to work his way up to 1500m. He's not yet graduated to club level, but Coach says Ephren is one of his mostpromising runners. He has a tattoo on his upper arm, drawn in pen. "It says 'I am' – it is a statement about me, about believing in myself."

His trainers are falling apart, but he says there is plenty of life left in them. He will sew and resew them, and when the sole goes, he will buy anewer sole and glue it on. Like most of the youngsters here, he will havesaved up for between six months and a year for his pair of secondhand trainers. But these are far from the poorest people in Bekoji. To own anykind of trainers, you are likely to belong to the middle class – owning a few dozen cows or goats. Ephren's father is a chauffeur and his mother has a butter business. Like everybody here today, he says he will succeedand go on to run in the Olympics. "If I win, I will buy a house for my mum."

Some of the locals live in very nice houses – three or four rooms, made ofbricks, lots of land – but many still live in one-room shacks made from mud. Next door to the newish Hotel Wabe where I am staying for £7 a night is a row of run-down shacks. In one, three children live in one dark room with a sleepy cow and a goat. The shacks are government-owned and cost around 12 birr a week to rent – just under 50p. Farther along theroad, a woman is cooking injera on a fire. The only possession the family seems to have is a TV and a huge satellite dish that dominates the backyard.

Back at the hotel, an official from the regional tourist board stops to chat. Sinkeneh Tilahun says he can't stand the way Ethiopia is perceived by therest of the world. "What is Ethiopia labelled?" he demands. "We're labelledfamine country. Greece is a country dependent on aid, but would you call it a dependent country? Yes, we still have drought sometimes, but this is a land of plenty. Now the area is completely developed, and lots of it's been done without aid – like the massive dam on the Nile." He has a point. Over the past three years a road linking Bekoji to Addis has been built by the Chinese. But the fact remains that, for all Ethiopia's wealth, 39% of the population lives below the international poverty line of $1.25 aday, and in 2011 the country ranked 174 of 187 countries in the Human Development Index.

Sinkeneh thinks Ethiopia has produced such great distance runners because kids here always had to run to get to school. "I was lucky I only had to run half an hour a day. Gebrselassie had to run six miles to school.Maybe our runners won't be so good now they don't have to run great distances to school."

After training the next day, we head off in a Land Rover to see Derartu Tulu's house, at the end of a long mud track. Derartu now owns a hotel inAsella and lives in Addis, but she often returns to Bekoji and has providedwell for her family. Her mother, an orthodox Christian (the second religionin Bekoji is Islam), has gone to church to fast for three days. A woman stands outside the gates and says we cannot enter. She has a severe, handsome face and holds herself with immense dignity. It turns out she isTejetu, Derartu's aunt. She soon relents and lets us in. "Derartu used to practise on the field here every day. She used to help her mum and do training every day. She cooked and cleaned. When she was five or six we knew she was unusual." In what way? "She was a very strong, powerful girl."

Tejetu is joined by an older woman who balances herself on a stick and has an expressive singsong voice. Habersha is Derartu's stepmother (herfather's first wife) and helped bring her up. "Her mother was not happy she was running, but she helped her all the same," Habersha says. "She was afraid she might go away and she'd lose her. She didn't want her to leave home."

Did they have any idea she'd become an Olympic champion? "No, we never knew," Habersha says. "The first time she ran a race, she was givena dress for winning and she hid it so her mum wouldn't know. She showedit to me. The second time she ran, she brought home a glass trophy. She showed that to her mum, and her parents allowed her to run after that."

Did they watch her winning her first Olympic gold? "No, we listened on theradio. About 60-70 people came round. We were dancing. Her father was alive at the time. We were all so happy."

After the Olympics, Derartu went on to win a great deal of prize money (in2009, aged 37, she won the New York marathon in her comeback race – aprize of $130,000) and was given land by the Ethiopian government for which she bought more cattle. Tejetu says with 50 cows they were never a poor family, but Derartu's success has made a big difference to their life. "She came back and built this house here. We got a television, and she bought more animals. She supported everyone, giving clothes and money to family and neighbours. Everyone."
Did people treat them differently after Derartu won? "If the neighbours have problems, they ask, and Derartu will help. Even if they don't ask, shecan see and will help. That's how she is."
On the way back, Coach tells me Derartu has always been his favouritechampion. "Everybody loves her. She is sociable." Do the successful runners keep in touch with him when they leave for Addis? "Some do. Some come back and say thank you after they have won the Olympics, some don't. Derartu and Kenenisa and Tirunesh all said thank you, the others didn't." Does it bother him? "No. The reward is seeing them win."

We're on the road to Addis to see Haile Gebrselassie's empire. He's considered by many the greatest ever distance runner, and he's already on the way to becoming Ethiopia's greatest tycoon. He's 38 and it's only four years since he won the Berlin marathon in a world record time of twohours three minutes and 59 seconds. At the time he could command $250,000 appearance money just to run in a city marathon. He runs a number of successful businesses, including, in the centre of Addis, acomplex dedicated to his wife, Alem: here is the Alem gym, car salesroom, cinema complex. In a multistorey, glass-fronted building, heand Alem also run a holiday resort business.

A lift takes us to the top floor, which looks out over all of Addis. Haile is out working, but Alem welcomes me. She tells me how they got together. She had a shop in Addis, on Haile's running route. She didn't know who hewas – just another man who ran past quickly every day. After a year he walked in and asked for her phone number. It took her a while to realise he was asking her out: "He was shy." He thought she was above his station.

Alem is dressed in an elegant trouser suit. She stands on the balcony aswe talk, queen of all she surveys. Is Haile one of the wealthiest men in Ethiopia now? "Yes, he is one of them." She giggles, embarrassed. Doeshe still run? Try stopping him, she says. "He runs everywhere. There is construction work we are doing, and he runs there. Then he runs in the mountains."

They have four children, the oldest 13, the youngest six. Are they runners? She looks shocked. "No! They are students." Would she prefer itif they won Olympic gold or went into business? "For me, I prefer first learning. The same for Haile."
Back in Bekoji, Coach welcomes me to his home. He has saved all his life for this four-room house. It cost the equivalent of £3,000. How could he afford it? He says he can't really, and expects to be paying it off for the rest of his life. He is paid £70 a month before tax by the local government, and struggles to make ends meet. "I have three children, two adopted children and a wife. It is not easy." But he's not complaining. He was born in Harar and grew up in a mud shack – that was real poverty,he says. He talks about all the changes he's seen in his life: he lived for many years under Mengistu Haile Mariam's communist military dictatorship. Although the current government has been condemned for silencing dissenters (in January, Amnesty revealed that at least 107 opposition party members and journalists have been charged under terrorist offences since March 2011), Coach says life today is incomparable.

"Now there are more factories, more schools, more people working. Youjust had to do what the military told you in the dictatorship." He introduces me to his son, Beck, who wants to be a doctor. Does he run? "No." What went wrong? Coach smiles. "Nothing. He's just concentratingon his studies."

Coach talks about his own plans for the future. In five years he hopes to retire. Maybe then he will train a small group of runners privately. He is looking forward to taking it easy, but he worries that he won't know whatto do with his time. I ask if he has received official recognition from the government for his work. "No." He stops, and says that's not quite right. "The local government gave me a gold chain a few years ago."

Has he ever wished he was on a percentage of all the money his champions have earned? "No." He laughs. "What would I do with it?" Surely there's something he's desperate to buy? Actually, there is. "Whenmy marathon runners train, I have no way of seeing how they are doing. What I'd love is a motorbike so I can follow them, but there is no way I could afford one.

OTHER SPECIAL DAYS ~ FESTIVAL

Saints' days and other festivals have not been imposed by any law of God,they were established by the church herself. Some go back to apostolic times and others are later origin. There is a prodigious number of feasts inthe Ethiopian Church.

The principal feasts of the church are 9 feasts of the Lord, 33 feasts of ourLady, the feasts of the Apostles, Sunday, Saturday, the feasts of the Angels, the feasts of the righteous (saints) and the feasts of the martyrs.

EOTC religious Ge'ez monthlies: according to the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church doctrine, among all the thirty days in each month, andthe 5 or 6 days (in leap years), meaning the Pegumen, the thirteenth month at the end of the year would be celebrated by in the name of Saints, Angeles and Archangeles which rested on each day. Here as followed the list of the Angeles and the Archangeles in Ge'ez Alphabet,

The feasts which come during each month are:

Trinity, the 7th of each month;

Michael the Archangel, the 12th of each month; the Covenant of Mercy, the 16th of each month; the Holy Virgin Assumption, the 21st of each month; the Death of Our Lord, the 27th of each month; and the birth of Christ, the 29th of each month. The book Senksar is the calendar which contains a list of saints to be commemorated daily and their brief history.There are many holy martyrs and confessors who are remembered. The angels hold a high place in the church. They protect homes, Churches, palaces and all places of importance. Chiefs among them are St. Michael and St. Gabriel.

Fasting is prayer and abstinence of food to attain forgiveness of sins andreward the soul.

It serves to weaken the force of the body so that the body may obey thesoul. Our Lord Christ has taught us that fasting with prayer has the powerof driving away evil spirits (Matt. 17 :21) During Fasting all animal products is prohibited; meat, egg, butter, milk, and cheese, anything thatcontains these products. (Fetha Nagast). However in true fasting the eye is kept from seeing, the mouth from speaking, and the ear from hearing evil things. Fasting has perpetual relation with religion. The way it is practiced differs from religion to religion, however anyone who has religion practices fasting.

FASTING DAYS

There are 7 official fasting periods ordained in the Fetha Negest.

(1) All Wednesdays and Fridays, except for the fifty days after Easter, andalso if the Feasts of Christmas and Epiphany falls on these days.

(2) Fast of the Prophets (Tsome Neviyat) 25 November to 06 January Thefast preceding Gena, 40 days. It begins with Sibket on 15th Hedar and ends on Christmas eve with the feast of Gena and the 28th of Tahsas.

(3) The Gahad of Epiphany, fast on the eve of Epiphany. Christmas Eve (6Jan.) and (18 Jan.) Epiphany (The Vigils)

(4) The Great Lent Fast of fifty-five days. ~ Moveable (.Fast for Hudadi orAbye Tsome)

(5) Jonah's Fast of three days ~ Ninevah (Nenawe) ~ Moveable dates

~Commemorating the preaching of Jonah. It comes on Monday, Tuesdayand Wednesday of the third week before Lent.

(6) Apostles Fast (Tsome Hawariat) Mon. after Pentecost & ends 12 July

(Martyrdom of St. Peter & St. Paul) 10-40 days, which the Apostles keptafter they had received the Holy Spirit. It begins after Pentecost.

(7) Assumption of the Virgin Mariam (Tsome Filseta) This fast is kept strictly by the church from 7 - 21 August. See "fastings why" below forexplainations

SIBKET (ADVENT)

The aim of the church is to cause her children to reflect. During the year she sets apart two seasons in which she imbues the faithful with a spirit ofpenitential fervor. One of these seasons, which is called Advent, from the Latin word adventus, (arrival), embraces about five Sundays. The Law andpractice of the church is observed strictly, though not so much as in Lent. It is a time for devout and penitential preparation of the soul for the proper and worthy celebration of the great feast of Christmas. In advent (Sibket, in Amharic) a fast is kept, the Christmas fast of 40 days beginning on 15 Hedar and ending on Christmas eve with the Feast of Gena on the 28 of Tahsas -EC (6 January - WC).

GENA (CHRISTMAS)

Year after year the Christmas season brings to the minds of all Christiansthe story of the Child in the manger, the shepherds on the Judean hills, the Celestial songs “Glory to God in the highest”, and the Angel’s message, telling that the Long expected ONE had come. Liddet or Gena isthe Ethiopian name for Christmas which is marked by special ceremonies.The origin is basically the same as is universally accepted. It is celebratedon 7th January (Tahsas 29 E.C) preceded by a fast of 40 days. The difference of date is due to a calendar of discrepancy since the Ethiopian calendar is based on the year of Grace 7 or 8 years after Anno Domini.

The Ethiopian Christmas coincides with the date of this observance in theEastern Orthodox dispensation. Qiddus Bale Wold is another name for Christmas in addition to Liddet or Gena. Gena is also a name for a Christmas game played by boys and grown up men (like hockey).

In addition to these,

There is the fast of repentance which a man keeps after committing sin, itbeing imposed as a penance by the priest for seven days, forty days or one year. There is a fast which a bishop keeps at the time he is consecrated. There is a 40 days fast for all new monks, which begins the day of and continues in seclusion. Monks/Emahoys (nuns) observe additional fast days not required of the laity. There is a fast of desire which a man keeps if he thinks he will increase his value in the sight of God or that he will subdue his body by extra good works. All persons above the age of 13 observe the church fasts. The priest rarely grants dispensations. The man who ignores or neglects any injunction of thechurch is not considered good Christian.

The total number of fasting days amounts to about 250 a year, of which about 180 are obligatory for all, and the rest are only for priests, monks,emahoys and other special groups in the church.

The longest periods of fasting are those of Lent. Advent and Kweskwam (forty days preceding the fast of the flight to Egypt). Fast generally implies one meal a day to be taken either in the evening or after 3 p.m. with total abstention from meat, fats, eggs and diary products. Instead weuse cereals, vegetables and other type of food devoid of fats. Smoking is abreach of the fast. There is no fasting while Christmas, Epiphany, and the feast of feast of fifty days are being kept. From Easter to Pentecosta man may eat and drink what he likes on Wednesday and Friday. There is no fast if the Christmas and Epiphany fall on a Wednesday or Friday. Special prayers are conducted during the fasting seasons. In all the churches we have daily services held from morning to 3:00 p.m. Priests, Monks/Emahoys regularly attend night services and they perform the canon, they remain in the churches praying incessantly, and in sadness ponder and read their Psalter from cock-crow by light of a taper, and throughout the day eat dry grain and drink water

Fasting Why's :FASTING AND ABSTINENCE

Our Church, in her earliest days, recognized the necessity for her childrento “chastise the body and bring it under subjection”, as St. Paul advises. The body is ever striving for mastery over the spirit; besides the externalsources of temptation, “the world”, we have always another source with us which is a part of our nature. This is the reason for mortification.

Self denial is in lawful things enables us to turn with great earnestness tospiritual things. It is on these grounds that the Ethiopian church has strictly adhered to the injunctions of the Didascalia and enjoyed on the faithful the longest and most austere fasts in the world.

Fasting implies abstention from food and drink. Special days are appointedfor fasting. Fasting is not only prayer and abstinence from eating meat and meat products neither is it only to abstain until Noon or 3 PM. When we fast we should also refrain from all wrongdoings, and evil things such as vanity, violence, jealousy, hatred, and all works of Satan. Charity is recommended, alms given to the poor and the needy, and gifts brought tothe church, without these charities fasting could not be complete. It is strictly observed by all baptized members of the church. Some young people today do not take fasting seriously and say it is only for priests andold people, however many others recognize that it is essential spiritually to help them navigate the difficulties of modern life.

(1) Wednesday and Fridays are observed because on Wednesday "the Jews took counsel together to put Christ to death" and on Friday He was crucified for our salvation. Besides that, the apostles found it necessary toobserve fasting for two days in the week for the remission of whatever sins may have been committed during the week. So they decreed that Wednesday and Friday must be observed identically to the Great Lent observance.

(2) The Great Lent (Abye Tsome, sometimes called Hudade / Day of Duty)is the longest fasting period. It begins 8 weeks before Easter. This Lent is observed as a remembrance of the 40 days and nights fasting of our Lord Christ after His baptism. Later the Ethiopian church added 15 more days to it. Therefore the Great Lent consists of 55 days total instead of 40 days.Only 1 meal is allowed after sunset, this is strictly observed by clergy and especially by Monks and Nuns.

~ The first week of the Great Lent is called Tsome Herqal (the Fast ofHeraclius, a Byzantine emperor in the 7th century A.D.)

This was separately observed up to the time of Emperor Zara Yacob (1434-68). Emperor Zara Yacob, who devoted himself to prayer and fasting in the beginning of his reign, combined this with the Great Lent. The one week fast of Heraclius was first observed by the apostles who decreed that more days be added to the Lent of 40 days in exchange for Saturdays and Sundays, for on these days people are allowed to break thefast at 9 AM except for animal products.

~ It was observed by all Christians in the MidEast, Rome, all Christians inAfrica and Nubia and especially those in Jerusalem. During the reign of Heraclius, the Christians of Jerusalem were severely persecuted by Foqa,who was governor of Jerusalem. They wrote asking Heraclius to come to the Holy Land to avenge their persecutor. Heraclius, was willing but expressed fear of the canon law made by the Apostles which states that:"Anyone who commits murder must fast and mourn until the end of his life." The Christians promised him that they would fast on his behalf. So the emperor agreed and destroyed Foqa the prosecutor. They estimated that average age of a person (70 to 80 years), divided the days among themselves and fasted and prayed on his behalf. Many of the churches that once observed this occasion no longer do so. But it is faithfully kept by the Ethiopian Orthodox Church.

~ The church is very devoted to the strict observance of Passion Week,which also caused the Great Lent to be 55 days. The Apostles fasted incommemoration of Christ's Passion. All Christians young and old is required to observe the Fast of our Lord, the Great Lent.

During Passion Week, no one is allowed to eat until sunset or until theevening stars appear. During Holy Week, the sacrament of baptism, ordination, funeral services, and absolution are forbidden. However on Palm Sunday, absolution is done for those who died during Passion Week.

~ Maundy (Holy) Thursday ~ is the day on which our Lord in absolute humility washed His Disciples feet, ate the Last Supper with them and revealed the mystery of the Holy Eucharist. On this day the priest brings water in a basin and saying the prayer of thanksgiving, he washes the feetof the faithful.

~ Holy Friday (Siklet) ~ is in remembrance of Christ's crucifixion an Epitaphion (crucifix) is made and passages from the Holy Scriptures and other religious books are read. The faithful prostrate often sometimes hundreds of times in the day. Therefore Good Friday is sometimes called aday of prostration. Towards the evening (around 4:30 PM) the faithful approaches a priest to be patted with small branches of olive trees, which symbolizes the whipping of our Lord. Then the faithful say "Lord have mercy upon us" 400 times. (Ig-zee-'o tesahalene) and Lord have compassion upon us, O Christ (Ig-zee'o me-ha-rene Kristos)

(3) Fast of the Prophets (Tsome Neviyat) is observed from 25 Novemberto 06 January. It is called the Fast of the Prophets because the prophecyabout the coming of Christ was fulfilled. Sometimes it is called Yelidet Tsome or Christmas Fast because Christ was born at the end of the fast.

(4) Christmas and Epiphany (The Vigils) On Christmas and Epiphany, the Holy Liturgy is celebrated starting at midnight until 3 :00 AM. If Christmasand Epiphany falls on Wednesday and Friday, then Tuesday and Friday willbe fast days.

(5) Ninevah Fast is a 3 day fast, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. It fallsat one time in January and another in February. It commemorates the mission of Jonah and it is a fast of the repentance of the people of Ninevah. They were saved from the wrath of God through prayer and fasting, so the faithful will receive mercy and blessings through this fast.

(6) Fast of the Apostles (Tsome Hawariat) starts the Monday after Pentecost and ends 12 July. July 12 is the Feast of Saint Paul and St. Peter. The reason is because the two apostles were murdered on that day. The length of this observance varies depending upon the date of Easter and may be a minimum of 14 days and a maximum of 40 days. The apostles observed this fast after the manner of Moses and Christ. Moses fasted for 40 days after he received the 10 Commandments, but before hepreached the Law to the people, and Christ fasted for 40 days right after He was baptized and before he preached the Gospel. Following this example the apostles after they received the power of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, observed this fast before commencing to preach the Holy Gospel.

(7) Assumption of the Virgin Mariam (Tsome-Filseta)

This fast is kept strictly by the church from 7 - 21 August.
On January 21 Ethiopian Calendar, 29 January European Calendar, the Virgin Mariam died. The apostles wanted to bury her body in the gardensof Gethsemane, so they carried her body to the garden to bury it.
- When the Jews saw this, they were very angry and said, "The apostles disturbed us before when they said Eyesus Kristos was Risen and now they tell us that Mary is risen and ascended," So the Jews dispersed them and did not allow them to bury the Virgin Mariam, instead the Jews wishedto burn it. A certain Jew named Tawfania ran forward to burn the Virgin and when he grabbed the body, Angels of God struck off his hands he stayed there helpless until he died.
~ At this time the Angels then took the Virgins body to Paradise, accompanied by John the Apostle to burn incense over her body, and layed her under the Tree of Life. When John returned and told this fact to the Apostles, they said to each other "John saw and we did not; let us pray and fast that we may see also."
~ Burial and Resurrection ~ They began fasting from 07 August for 15 days, after which the Angels of God brought the body of the Virgin to theapostles. They buried the Virgin on Sunday. On Tuesday 3 days later, theVirgin Mariam rose from the dead just as her Son Christ had resurrected.
~ Assumption ~ Thomas the apostles was not present to witness the burial because he was converting people to Christianity in other lands.As he was returning he was caught up in a cloud and he met the Virgin Mariam as she was ascending. Thomas became afraid and wished to fall. Then he asked the Virgin, "I did not see the resurrection of your Son; whyam I going to see your resurrection? " The Virgin answered and said " Do not be sorry; the others did not see my resurrection and ascension, but you have. " She gave Thomas a sign by which she was known.
This sign in Amharic is called Seven (not the number), and represents herglory and honor. She told Thomas to tell the other apostles what he had seen just as Christ had instructed Mary Magdalene when He resurrected.
In Ethiopia all Baptized faithful including children above age 7 years old, fast and partake of the Holy Communion for 15 days, except on Saturdaysand Sundays. Many elderly people go for retreat away from their homes and sustain themselves on cereals (a grain) and water, while praying and fasting. Young and old testify of miracles performed during this time Ig- zee-'o tesahalene ("Lord have mercy upon us")
Kidus Meskel: The Finding of the True Cross
According to Ethiopian Orthodoxy, after the ascension of Eyesus Christos,the cross on which he was crucified began performing extraordinary miracles. This raised the ire of the people who crucified Eyesus, who thenordered the cross to be removed and buried in the outskirts of town.
Residents living in the surrounding areas were commanded to dump theirgarbage on the site, and for the next three centuries the area turned intowasteland.
Three hundred years later, in the early fourth century, the Roman Empirewas being ruled by Constantine the Great. His mother, St. Elleni (Helena),concerned about the plight of Christians, beseeched her son to allow the free practice of Christendom in her son’s empire. The Emperor consented,and St. Elleni traveled from Constantinople to Jerusalem to look for the buried Cross. Once in Jerusalem, however, no one could tell her the exactspot where it lay. It is said that she went into seclusion and prayed for God’s guidance. As a result of her prayer, St. Michael the Archangel appeared unto her andgave her certain instructions. She ordered her soldiers and the local residents to gather a pile of firewood. After a prayer, a fire was set ablazethe wood. Clergymen doused incense on the flame and the smoke of the incense rose up towards the sky then arched down to the earth, pointing out the exact spot where the Holy Cross was buried. Following this miraculous sign, digging began and commenced for six months until the True Cross was discovered. This has been the premise of the celebration of “Masqal” in the Ethiopian Orthodox Church. Since then, clergy and parishioners have dressed in traditional, colorful clothing to sing ancient hymns dating back to the sixth century. A bonfire is lit up to memorialize the finding of the True Cross.

TIMKET /EPIPHANY/COMEMORATION of the BAPTISM OF THE SON of GOD
Timket festival or Epiphany in Ethiopia is the ritual of reliving the actualbaptism of Lord Eyesus Christos in the Jordan River. This anniversary isthe most significant one within the Ethiopian Orthodox divinity.
It is celebrated on Terr 10 of Ethiopian Calendar, which falls on Jan 19 or20 (leap Year) in the Gregorian calendar.
It’s a three days long celebration which is held by Christians all over thecountry but differs from one place to another.
Lalibela, Gondar and Addis Ababa being the most prominent cities, the most renowned place to celebrate Timket is a church in Gondar, Once KingFassiledes’s Castle transformed into a church. This sacred place is now themost symbolic of all churches in Ethiopia when it comes to the annual Timket ceremony. This is due to the fact that Gondar it is the only city to hold all the forty four Tabots or arks together at this significant time.
Furthermore the church consists of a pond within its complex, whichserves as a re eminence of the Jordan River.
On the eve of Timket, known as Ketera, priests and deacons wearing colourful robes and crowns participate in the festive processions. The priests pray throughout the long night and Kedase is concluded at around2:00 a.m. People in masses camp out, singing church music, eating and drinking sitting around fires and torches. Christian followers attend an early afternoon mass service.
Followed by the actual Timket day the Tabots are carried by priests over their heads, where the Ceremony begins by the divine worship celebratednear the body of water early in the morning. After which the water is blessed and sprinkled on the followers. Many choose to submerse themselves into the holy water, thus emblematically renewing their baptism. After the baptism the Tabots of each church return to their respective churches. They are taken back to their churches in a vibrant parade. ~ By: Ethiopian Calendar
CHRISTIANITY –KEEPERS OF THE LOST ARK?
Ethiopia shall soon strech out her hands unto GOD." Psalm 68:31 Christians in Ethiopia have long claimed to have the ark of the covenant.

Smithsonian Magazine: (December 2007 issue) investigates: They shall make an ark of acacia wood," God commanded Moses in the Book of Exodus, after delivering the Israelites from slavery in Egypt. And so the Israelites built an ark, or chest, gilding it inside and out. And into this chest Moses placed stone tablets inscribed with the Ten Commandments,as given to him on Mount Sinai.

Thus the ark “was worshipped by the Israelites as the embodiment of GodHimself,” writes Graham Hancock in The Sign and the Seal. "Biblical and other archaic sources speak of the Ark blazing with fire and light...stopping rivers, blasting whole armies." (Steven Spielberg's 1981 film Raiders of the Lost Ark provides a special-effects approximation.)

According to the First Book of Kings, King Solomon built the First Templein Jerusalem to house the ark. It was venerated there during Solomon's reign (c. 970-930 B.C.) and beyond.

Then it vanished. Much of Jewish tradition holds that it disappeared beforeor while the Babylonians sacked the temple in Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

But through the centuries, Ethiopian Christians have claimed that the arkrests in a chapel in the small town of Aksum, in their country's northern highlands. It arrived nearly 3,000 years ago, they say, and has been guarded by a succession of virgin monks who, once anointed, are forbidden to set foot outside the chapel grounds until they die.

One of the first things that caught my eye in Addis Ababa, the country's capital, was an enormous concrete pillar topped by a giant red star—the sort of monument to communism still visible in Pyongyang. The North Koreans built this one as a gift for the Duerg, the Marxist regime that ruled Ethiopia from 1974 to 1991. In a campaign that Duerg officials named the Red Terror, they slaughtered their political enemies—estimatesrange from several thousand to more than a million people. The most prominent of their victims was Emperor Haile Selassie I, whose death, under circumstances that remain contested, was announced in August, 1975.

He was the last emperor of Ethiopia—and, he claimed, the 225th monarch,descended from Menelik I, the ruler believed responsible for Ethiopia's possession of the ark of the covenant in the tenth century B.C.

The story is told in the Kebra-Negast (Glory of the Kings), Ethiopia's chronicle of its royal line: the Queen of Sheba, one of its first rulers, traveled to Jerusalem to partake of King Solomon's wisdom; on her way home, she bore Solomon's son, Menelik. Later Menelik went to visit his father, and on his return journey was accompanied by the firstborn sons of some Israelite nobles—who, unbeknown to Menelik, stole the ark and carried it with them to Ethiopia. When Menelik learned of the theft, he reasoned that since the ark's frightful powers hadn't destroyed his retinue,it must be God's will that it remain with him.

Many historians—including Richard Pankhurst, a British-born scholar who has lived in Ethiopia for almost 50 years—date the Kebra Negast manuscript to the 14th century A.D. It was written, they say, to validate the claim by Menelik's descendants that their right to rule was God-given,based on an unbroken succession from Solomon and the Queen of Sheba.But the Ethiopian faithful say the chronicles were copied from a fourth- century Coptic manuscript that was, in turn, based on a far earlier account. This lineage remained so important to them that it was written into Selassie's two imperial constitutions, in 1931 and 1955.

Before leaving Addis Ababa for Aksum, I went to the offices of His Holiness Abuna Paulos, patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, whichhas some 40 million adherents worldwide, to ask about Ethiopia's claim tohave the ark of the covenant. Paulos holds a PhD in theology from Princeton University, and before he was installed as patriarch, in 1992, hewas a parish priest in Manhattan. Gripping a golden staff, wearing a golden icon depicting the Madonna cradling an infant Jesus, and seated onwhat looked like a golden throne, he oozed power and patronage.

"We've had 1,000 years of Judaism, followed by 2,000 years of Christianity, and that's why our religion is rooted in the Old Testament," he told me. "We follow the same dietary laws as Judaism, as set out in Leviticus," meaning that his followers keep kosher, even though they areChristians. "Parents circumcise their baby boys as a religious duty, we often give Old Testament names to our boys and many villagers in the countryside still hold Saturday sacred as the Sabbath."

Is this tradition linked to the church's claim to hold the ark, which Ethiopians call Tabota Seyen, or the Ark of Zion? "It's no claim, it's the truth," Paulos answered. "Queen Sheba visited King Solomon in Jerusalemthree thousand years ago, and the son she bore him, Menelik, at age 20 visited Jerusalem, from where he brought the ark of the covenant back toAksum. It's been in Ethiopia ever since."

I asked if the ark in Ethiopia resembles the one described in the Bible: almost four feet long, just over two feet high and wide, surmounted bytwo winged cherubs facing each other across its heavy lid, forming the "mercy seat," or footstool for the throne of God. Paulos shrugged. "Canyou believe that even though I'm head of the Ethiopian church, I'm stillforbidden from seeing it?" he said. "The guardian of the ark is the only person on earth who has that peerless honor."

He also mentioned that the ark had not been held continuously at Aksum since Menelik's time, adding that some monks hid it for 400 years to keepit out of invaders' hands. Their monastery still stood, he said, on an islandin Lake Tana. It was about 200 miles northwest, on the way to Aksum.

Ethiopia is landlocked, but Lake Tana is an inland sea: it covers 1,400 square miles and is the source of the Blue Nile, which weaves its muddy way 3,245 miles through Ethiopia, Sudan and Egypt to the Mediterranean.At the outlet where the water begins its journey, fishermen drop lines from primitive papyrus boats like those the Egyptians used in the pharaohs' days. I glimpsed them through an eerie dawn mist as I boardeda powerboat headed for Tana Kirkos, the island of the ark.

Slowly the boatman threaded his way through a maze of tree-covered islands so dense that he began to wonder aloud whether we were lost. When, after two hours, we suddenly confronted a rock wall about 30 yards high and more than 100 yards long, he cried, "Tana Kirkos" with obviousrelief.

A fish eagle circled and squawked as a barefoot monk clad in a patched yellow robe scurried down a pathway cut into the rock and peered into ourboat. "He's making sure there are no women aboard," my translator said.

The monk introduced himself as Abba, or Father, Haile Mikael. "There are125 monks on the island, and many are novices," he said. "Women have been banned for centuries because the sight of them might fire the youngmonks' passions."

Another monk, Abba Gebre Maryam, joined us. He, too, wore a patched yellow robe, plus a white pillbox turban. A rough-hewn wooden cross hungfrom his neck, and he carried a silver staff topped by a cross. In response to my questioning, he elaborated on what Abuna Paulos had told me:

"The ark came here from Aksum for safekeeping from enemies well beforeJesus was born because our people followed the Jewish religion then," he said. "But when King Ezana ruled in Aksum 1,600 years ago, he took the ark back to Aksum." Ezana's kingdom extended across the Red Sea into the Arabian peninsula; he converted to Christianity around A.D. 330 and became hugely influential in spreading the faith.

Then Abba Gebre added: "The baby Jesus and Mary spent ten days hereduring their long exile from Israel." It was after King Herod ordered the death of all boys under the age of 2 in Bethlehem, he said. "Would you like to see the place where they often sat?"

I followed him up a wooded path and onto a ridge where a pair of young monks were standing by a small shrine, their eyes closed in prayer. AbbaGebre pointed to the shrine. "That's where Jesus and Mary sat each day while they were here."

"What proof do you have that they came here?" I asked.

He looked at me with what appeared to be tender sympathy and said: "We don't need proof because it's a fact. The monks here have passed thisdown for centuries."

Later, Andrew Wearring, a religious scholar at the University of Sydney, told me that "the journey by Jesus, Mary and Joseph is mentioned in only a few lines in the Book of Matthew—and he gives scant detail, though he does state they fled into Egypt." Like its former parent institution the Orthodox Coptic Church, the Ethiopian Orthodox faith holds that the familyspent four years in western Egypt, Wearring said, in the Nile Valley and the Nile Delta, before returning home. But western Egypt is over 1,000 miles northwest of Lake Tana. Could Jesus, Mary and Joseph have traveled to Tana Kirkos? There's no way to know.

On the way back to the boat, we passed small log huts with conical thatched roofs—the monks' cells. Abba Gebre entered one and pulled fromthe shadows an ancient bronze tray set on a stand. He said Menelik brought it from Jerusalem to Aksum along with the ark.

"The Jerusalem temple priests used this tray to collect and stir the sacrificial animals' blood," Abba Gebre went on. When I checked later withPankhurst, the historian said the tray, which he had seen on an earlier visit, was probably associated with Judaic rituals in Ethiopia's pre-Christianera. Lake Tana, he said, was a stronghold of Judaism.

Finally, Abba Gebre led me to an old church built from wood and rock in the traditional Ethiopian style, circular with a narrow walkway hugging theouter wall. Inside was the mak'das, or holy of holies—an inner sanctum shielded by brocade curtains and open only to senior priests. "That's where we keep our tabots," he said.

The tabots (pronounced "TA-bots") are replicas of the tablets in the ark, and every church in Ethiopia has a set, kept in its own holy of holies. "It'sthe tabots that consecrate a church, and without them it's as holy as a donkey's stable," Abba Gebre said. Every January 19, on Timkat, or the Feast of the Epiphany, the tabots from churches all over Ethiopia are paraded through the streets.

"The most sacred ceremony occurs at Gonder," he went on, naming a cityin the highlands just north of Lake Tana. "To understand our deep reverence for the ark, you should go there."

Gonder (pop. 160,000) spreads across a series of hills and valleys more than 7,000 feet above sea level. On the advice of a friendly cleric, I sought out Archbishop Andreas, the local leader of the Ethiopian OrthodoxChurch. As Andreas ushered me into a simple room in his office, I saw that he had the spindly frame and sunken cheeks of an ascetic. Despite his high position, he was dressed like a monk, in a worn yellow robe, and he held a simple cross carved from wood.

I asked if he knew of any evidence that the ark had come to Ethiopia withMenelik. "These stories were handed down through the generations by ourchurch leaders, and we believe them to be historical facts," he told me in a whisper. "That's why we keep tabots in every church in Ethiopia."

At noon the next day, Andreas, in a black robe and black turban, emergedfrom a church on a slope above Gonder and into a crowd of several hundred people. A dozen priests, deacons and acolytes—clad in brocade robes in maroon, ivory, gold and blue—joined him to form a protective huddle around a bearded priest wearing a scarlet robe and a golden turban. On his head the priest carried the tabots, wrapped in ebony velvetembroidered in gold. Catching sight of the sacred bundle, hundreds of women in the crowd began ululating—making a singsong wail with theirtongues—as many Ethiopian women do at moments of intense emotion.

As the clerics began to walk down a rocky pathway toward a piazza at thecenter of town (a legacy of Italy's occupation of Ethiopia in the 1930s), they were hemmed in by perhaps 1,000 more chanting and ululating devotees. At the piazza, the procession joined clerics carrying tabots fromseven other churches. Together they set off farther downhill, with the trailing throng swelling into the thousands, with thousands more lining theroad. About five miles later, the priests stopped beside a pool of murky water in a park. All afternoon and through the night, the priests chanted hymns before thetabots, surrounded by worshipers. Then, prompted by glimmers of light sneaking into the morning sky, Archbishop Andreas led the clerics to celebrate the baptism of Jesus by playfully splashing one another with thepool's water.

The Timkat celebrations were to continue for three more days with prayers and masses, after which the tabots would be returned to the churches where they were kept. I was more eager than ever to locate the original ark, so I headed for Aksum, about 200 miles northeast.
Just outside Gonder, my car passed Wolleka village, where a mud-hut synagogue bore a Star of David on the roof—a relic of Jewish life in the region that endured for as long as four millennia, until the 1990s. That was when the last of the Bet Israel Jews (also known as the Falasha, theAmharic word for "stranger") were evacuated to Israel in the face of persecution by the Derg.
The road degenerated into a rutted, rocky pathway that twisted around the hillsides, and our SUV struggled to exceed ten miles per hour. I reached Aksum in darkness and shared the hotel dining room with UnitedNations peacekeepers from Uruguay and Jordan who told me they were monitoring a stretch of the Ethiopia-Eritrea border about an hour's drive away. The latest U.N. bulletin, they said, described the area as "volatile and tense."
The next day was hot and dusty. Except for the occasional camel and itsdriver, Aksum's streets were nearly empty. We weren't far from the Denakil Desert, which extends eastward into Eritrea and Djibouti.
By chance, in the lobby of my hotel I met Alem Abbay, an Aksum native who was on vacation from Frostburg State University in Maryland, where he teaches African history. Abbay took me to a stone tablet about eight feet high and covered in inscriptions in three languages—Greek; Geez, theancient language of Ethiopia; and Sabaean, from across the Red Sea in southern Yemen, the true birthplace, some scholars believe, of the Queen of Sheba.
"King Ezana erected this stone tablet early in the fourth century, while stilla pagan ruler," Abbay told me. His finger traced the strange-looking alphabets carved into the rock 16 centuries ago. "Here, the king praises the god of war after a victory over a rebel people." But sometime in the following decade Ezana was converted to Christianity.
Abbay led me to another stone tablet covered with inscriptions in the same three languages. "By now King Ezana is thanking 'the Lord of Heaven' for success in a military expedition into nearby Sudan," he said. "We know he meant Jesus because archaeological digs have turned up coins during Ezana's reign that feature the Cross of Christ around this time." Before that, they bore the pagan symbols of the sun and moon.
As we walked on, we passed a large reservoir, its surface covered with green scum. "According to tradition, it's Queen Sheba's bath," Abbay said."Some believe there's an ancient curse on its waters."
Ahead was a towering stele, or column, 79 feet high and said to weigh 500 tons. Like other fallen and standing steles nearby, it was carved froma single slab of granite, perhaps as early as the first or second century
A.D. Legend has it that the ark of the covenant's supreme power sliced itout of the rock and set it into place.

On our way to the chapel where the ark is said to be kept, we passed Sheba's bath again and saw about 50 people in white shawls crouched near the water. A boy had drowned there shortly before, and his parents and other relatives were waiting for the body to surface. "They say it willtake one to two days," Abbay said. "They know this because many otherboys have drowned here while swimming. They believe the curse has struck again."

Abbay and I made our way toward the office of the Nebure-ed, Aksum's high priest, who works out of a tin shed at a seminary close by the ark chapel. As the church administrator in Aksum, he would be able to tell usmore about the guardian of the ark.

"We've had the guardian tradition from the beginning," the high priest toldus. "He prays constantly by the ark, day and night, burning incense beforeit and paying tribute to God. Only he can see it; all others are forbidden tolay eyes on it or even go close to it." Over the centuries, a few Western travelers have claimed to have seen it; their descriptions are of tablets like those described in the Book of Exodus. But the Ethiopians say that is inconceivable—the visitors must have been shown fakes.

I asked how the guardian is chosen. "By Aksum's senior priests and the present guardian," he said. I told him I'd heard that in the mid-20th century a chosen guardian had run away, terrified, and had to be hauled back to Aksum. The Neburq-ed smiled, but did not answer. Instead, he pointed to a grassy slope studded with broken stone blocks—the remains of Zion Maryam cathedral, Ethiopia's oldest church, founded in the fourthcentury A.D. "It held the ark, but Arab invaders destroyed it," he said, adding that priests had hidden the ark from the invaders.

Now that I had come this far, I asked if we could meet the guardian of theark. The Neburq-ed said no: "He is usually not accessible to ordinary people, just religious leaders."

The next day I tried again, led by a friendly priest to the gate of the ark chapel, which is about the size of a typical suburban house and surrounded by a high iron fence. "Wait here," he said, and he climbed thesteps leading to the chapel entrance, where he called out softly to the guardian.

A few minutes later he scurried back, smiling. A few feet from where Istood, through the iron bars, a monk who looked to be in his late 50s peered around the chapel wall.

"It's the guardian," the priest whispered.

He wore an olive-colored robe, dark pillbox turban and sandals. He glanced warily at me with deep-set eyes. Through the bars he held out awooden cross painted yellow, touching my forehead with it in a blessing and pausing as I kissed the top and bottom in the traditional way.

I asked his name. "I'm the guardian of the ark," he said, with the priesttranslating. "I have no other name."

I told him I had come from the other side of the world to speak with himabout the ark. "I can't tell you anything about it," he said. "No king or patriarch or bishop or ruler can ever see it, only me. This has been our tradition since Menelik brought the ark here more than 3,000 years ago."

We peered at each other for a few moments. I asked a few more questions, but to each he remained as silent as an apparition. Then hewas gone.

"You're lucky, because he refuses most requests to see him," the priest said. But I felt only a little lucky. There was so much more I wanted to know: Does the ark look the way it is described in the Bible? Has the guardian ever seen a sign of its power? Is he content to devote his life tothe ark, never able to leave the compound?

On my last night in Aksum, I walked down the chapel road, now deserted,and sat for a long time staring at the chapel, which shone like silver in themoonlight.

Was the guardian chanting ancient incantations while bathing the chapelin the sanctifying reek of incense? Was he on his knees before the ark? Was he as alone as I felt? Was the ark really there?

Of course I had no way of answering any of these questions. Had I tried toslip inside in the darkness to sneak a look, I'm sure the guardian would have raised the alarm. And I was also held back by the fear that the ark would harm me if I dared defile it with my presence.

In the final moments of my search, I could not judge whether the ark of the covenant truly rested inside this nondescript chapel. Perhaps Menelik'straveling companions did take it and spirit it home to Ethiopia. Perhaps itsorigins here stem from a tale spun by Aksumite priests in ancient times toawe their congregations and consolidate their authority. But the reality of the ark, like a vision in the moonlight, floated just beyond my grasp, and so the millennia-old mystery remained. As the devotion of the worshipers at Timkat and the monks at Tana Kirkos came back to me in the shimmering light, I decided that simply being in the presence of this eternal mystery was a fitting ending to my quest. HISTORICAL CLAIMS: Is Ethiopia The First Christian Nation?

For centuries, historians have widely accepted the arguement that Armenia was the first Christian nation. This important claim has become asource of national pride for Armenians and has remained virtually undisputed for centuries — until now. Armenians will likely be up at arms when they learn that a new book — “Abyssinian Christianity: The First Christian Nation?” — is challenging their claim, presenting the possibility that Abyssinia (modern-day Ethiopia and Eritrea) was the first Christian nation. To be sure, the book doesn’t conclusively assert that Ethiopia wasthe first nation to adopt Christianity as its state religion. However, it will surely challenge the confidence of modern church historians with groundbreaking evidence.

The Weakness Of Armenia’s Claim: Armenia’s claim on this meaningful title is primarily based upon the celebrated fifth-century work of Agathangelos titled “The History of the Armenians.” In it, he says as an eyewitness that after the Armenian King Trdat III was baptized (c.

301/314 A.D.) by St. Gregory the Illuminator, he decreed Christianity wasthe state religion. The truth is that we have no solid proof to support this account. We are forced to rely solely on the authenticity of Agathangelos and his contemporaries. These historians try to liken the conversion of Trdat III to that of Constantine's, even though the baptism of Constantineis questionable, as was his own personal "conversion." Michael Richard Jackson Bonner, a linguist at Oxford University, contends that Agathangelos had a clear agenda. He "wished to stress the independence and uniqueness of the Armenian church … [and 'The History'] is a tendentious compilation, which has expanded and elaborated earlier traditions … and greatly increased the prestige of the patriarchs of the fifth century." In addition, recent studies date "The History of the Armenians" to c. 450 A.D., making it impossible for Agathangelos to have been an eyewitness. If Armenia's claim is based on nothing more than oralhistory, how can it hold any more credibility than Ethiopia's own Christian legends? As for the spread of Christianity in Armenia, historian Peter Brown argued that "Armenia became a nominally Christian kingdom" afterthe king's baptism. The Armenian people in fact "did not receive Christianity with understanding … and under duress."

Where Ethiopia Differs: The Acts of the Apostles describe the baptism of an Ethiopian eunuch shortly after the death of Christ. Eusebius of Caesaria, the first church historian, in his "Ecclesiastical History," further tells of how the eunuch returned to diffuse the Christian teachings in his native land shortly after the Resurrection and prior to the arrival of the Apostle Matthew. Before the Ethiopian king Ezana (whose kingdom was then called Aksum) embraced Christianity for himself and decreed it for his kingdom (c. 330 A.D.), his nation had already constituted a large number of Christians. During the persecutions of Diocletian (284-305 A.D.), commerce ports like Adulis, along the Red Sea, served as a sanctuary for Christians in exile, and the Christian faith began to grow rapidly in these areas. Pagans still comprised the religious majority at thistime, but, as historian Kevin O'Mahoney argued, the Christian faith first took root in "the upper social classes and gradually spread downwards to become the religion of the people." Such was the religious climate that St.Frumentius faced when his ship was pillaged by the native Ethiopians at the start of the fourth century A.D. The Ethiopian king spared his life, andFrumentius received a place of honor at the royal court. In this position, he nourished the Christian faith by locating Christians and helping them find places of worship. He also educated the king's heir, Ezana, and converted him to Christianity. For this people, Ezana's conversion becamea public conversion for Aksum, and Christianity continued to serve as a point of reference for the nation. Unlike the case of Armenia, we have tangible proof of this conversion: Historians have uncovered a public acknowledgement of the Christian faith from Ezana. Also, coins bearing Ezana's image depict the cross after his conversion. As the authors of "Abyssinian Christianity" conclude, "the promotion of the new faith developed into the single point of personal and public identification and unity for Abyssinians." Christianity became the centralizing force behind the Ethiopian empire, which endured through 1974, despite religious and political threats from all sides. Can a nation only become Christian if thereis an official decree from its sovereign? If that were the case, then the Kingdom of Edessa would be the first Christian city-state (in modern terms) in c. 218. As we see with Abyssinia, and Israel before it, a nation isn't confined to political boundaries. Rather, it is defined by a group of people who share a common heritage. Wemezekir: Islam's Historical Relation with Habeshi (Abyssinya) by Historians & Religious Scholars' A History of Islam in the Abyssinyan empire is as old as the religion itself according to Islamic scholars as the early persecuted Muslims, relatives and followers (Al-Sahaab) of prophet- Mohammed on the first hejira (migration) first fled to the sub-region known as then the "Bilad Al-Habashi" to seek safety and protection from the quraishi at the court of the Axumite emperor in modern time Ethiopia whose some of the Muslims that were granted protection are said to have settled in several parts of countries known as the Horn of Africa today to promote Islam in the region. Prophet Mohammed, according to the many "prophecy speeches of Haddis", then Land of Abyssinya was not considered part of "Dar Al-Harb" and thus was not subject to "Jihad", because according to the Muslim prophecy, the "Arthur-Habashi" meaning the "Land of Abyssinya" had granted asylum to the persecuted followers ofthe prophet. For such a reason, the Islamic-prophet chose an Ethiopian born Bilal Al-Habashi, effectively making him the first Muaa-din of the Islamic faith in Mecca that was in the late 6th century, sometime b/n 578 and 582 AD. And at the latter, Islam introduced at the walled-city of Harrar, a once Islamic centre, and later Muslim stronghold during the middle age then still an important commercial centre in the region. At the time Ethiopia's, Muslims had had the opportunity of promoting Islam with having very positive relationships and lived in harmony with christian families and friends.

Islam is the second most widely practiced religion in Ethiopia after Coptic Ethiopian Christianity, approximately with over thirty million (33.9%) of the total population adhering to Islam. Having arrived in Abyssinya at about 615 AD, the first Muslims in then Abyssinya were immigrants from Mecca, persecuted by the ruling Quraishi tribe. They were received by the ruler of Habashi, whom the Arabic tradition has named "Ashama Ibn- Abjar", and he settled them in Nejash, where it was located at present Tigrai region of Ethiopia. "Nejash" is the Islamic historical site in present Ethiopia and parts of East Africa. The Quraishis have sent emissaries to bring them back to Arabia, but the king of Habashi refused their demands.The prophet Mohammed himself instructed his followers who came to Abyssinya, to respect and protect "Habashi" as well as live in peace and harmony with Abyssinyan Christians. Islam later to widely develop more inthe coastal regions of the eastern and southern horn of Africa, particularly among the pastoral Somali communities which adapted it at first.

Zagwe Dynasty - Exists from AD 900 to AD 1270'

Wemezekir: The Zagwe dynasty was an historical kingdom in present-day Ethiopia. It ruled large parts of the territory from approximately AD 900 toAD 1270. The name of the dynasty is thought to come from the Ge'ez phrase Ze-Agaw, meaning "Dynasty of the Agaw" in reference to the Agawpeople that constituted its ruling class. Zagwe's best-known King was Guebre Mesqel Lalibela, who is credited with having constructed the rock- hewn churches of Lalibela. The direct rule of the Zagwe kings "probably embraced the highlands of present day Eritrea and the whole of Tigray, extending southwards to Waag, Lasta and Damot of Wallo province and thence westwards towards Lake Tana of (Beghemdir)." Unlike the practice of later rulers of Ethiopia, Taddesse Tamrat argues that under the Zagwe dynasty the order of succession was that of brother succeeding brother as king, based on the Agaw laws of inheritance. Around 960, Queen Gudit destroyed the remnants of the Aksumite Empire, causing a shift in its temporal power centre that later regrouped more to the south. For 40 years she ruled over what remained of the kingdom, eventually passing onthe throne to her descendants. According to other Ethiopian traditional accounts, the last of her dynasty was overthrown by Mara Takla Haymanot in 1137. He married a daughter of the last king of Axum, Dil Na'od, putting control of Ethiopia in Agaw hands. Some sources give the names of eleven kings who ruled for 354 years.

Solomonic Dynasty - Exists from BC 950 to September, 1974 GC’

Wemezekir: According to legend, long before this, this was the region where Makeda, "the Queen of Sheeba, reigned. 3,000 years ago, the rulerof Sheeba, which spanned modern-day Ethiopia and Yemen, arrived in Jerusalem with vast quantities of gold to present to King Solomon. King Solomon of Israel, no mean connoisseur of beautiful females, is said to have succumbed too easily to the beautiful Makeda, the fabled "Queen of Sheeba", her enchanting beauty was often the subject of Ethiopian folklore.

"Menellik I" was the son of King Solomon, who's himself son of King Davidof Israel, and the Queen of Sheeba was the first ruler of Ethiopia, and theone to whom the family traced it's ancestry, Menellik I, originally named Ebna-la-Hakim meaning for "son of the wise", was the first Jewish emperor of Ethiopia and ruled around 950 BC. The House of Solomon wasthe former Imperial House of Ethiopia. Its members claim lineal descent from King Solomon of Israel and the Queen of Sheeba, the latter of whomtradition asserts gave birth to Menelik I after her biblically described visit to King Solomon, son of King David in Jerusalem.

Menellik I was head of the dynastic family that led Ethiopia for over 2,900years until the fall of the monarchy in 1974, which resulted by the Ethiopian revolution ended their monarchial rule. These claims of Solomonic descent make the Ethiopian royal house among the two oldest in the world. The Solomonic Dynasty continued to rule Ethiopia with few interruptions until 1974, when the last emperor, Haile Selassie I, was deposed. The royal family is currently non-regnant. Members of the family in Ethiopia at the time of the February (Yekatit) Revolution of 1974, wereimprisoned; some of them were exiled.

“Ark Of The Covenant” which the Holy Bible says holds “God's Ten Commandments” was given to Moses on Mt. Sinai - is said to have been kept at Axum, Ethiopia’ The “Ark of Covenant” is said to have been kept atAxum, in Ethiopia, in the Chapel of the Tablet, adjacent to “St. Mary of Tsion Church” since the 1960s. According to the Old Testament, it was first kept in the Temple of King Solomon in Jerusalem for centuries until a Babylonian invasion in the 6th century BC. Since then it has been the goalof many adventurers and archaeologists to find it. Ethiopia is an ancient country. Christianity is part of Ethiopia’s ancient history. The earliest reference to the introduction of Christianity to Ethiopia is in the New Testament (Acts 8:26:38) when Philip the Evangelist converted an Ethiopian court official in the 1st Century AD. The Axumite Kingdom, the forerunner to modern day Ethiopia accepted Christianity around 328 AD. Eversince then Christianity has played a major role in shaping the culture,tradition and history of Ethiopia. The contribution of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church (EOTC) in history and socio-cultural development in Ethiopia is huge. The church rich in tradition is one of the first churches that embraced monastic life, these monasteries were not only spiritual communities offering prayers but also these monasteries andchurches are the sources of literature, arts, music and culture. The churchis the source of attraction for tourism where many pilgrimage to visit its age less monasteries as well as witness grand celebrations such as Holy Cross (Demera), Epiphany (Timiket) and many more. The alphabet Ethiopia is proud of today, the Julian calendar Ethiopia uses, the music which is unique to the world and all have been contributed by the Orthodox Tewahedo Churches.

A bit on the historic walled city of Harrar

Harrar, a city 300 miles from Addis Ababa that predated the Ethiopian capital by nearly a millennium. Harrar had been a Sufi Muslim center of learning closed to outsiders for hundreds of years before the explorer SirRichard Burton entered the city in 1855. In December of 1880, the mercurial French poet Arthur Rimbaud entered the ancient walled city of Harrar, Ethiopia, a journey that had involved crossing the Gulf of Aden ina wooden dhow and 20 days on horseback through the Somali Desert.

Several years before, the author of the prose poems “A Season in Hell” and “Illuminations” had abruptly renounced poetry and embarked on peregrinations that would take him around Europe, Asia, the Middle East and, finally, Africa. At age 26, Rimbaud accepted “a job consisting in receiving shipments of bales of coffee” with a French trading firm in athriving corner of what was then called Abyssinia.

Then as now, Harrar was a market town threaded with steep cobblestone alleys that wind between high limestone and tuff walls. Today those walls are painted with geometric designs in green, white, pink and blue. As one strolls down the narrow, mazelike streets lined with single-story dwellings,the city, fortified and enigmatic, feels closed off. Donkeys carrying bundlesof firewood wait patiently for their owners near the crenelated entrances of the city’s historic gates. In the densely populated old city, there are over 180 mosques and shrines, some dating to the 10th century.

Occasionally one comes upon open-air markets where spices, stimulantkhat leaves and coffee beans are sold in huge sacks.

Rimbaud arrived in Harrar “sick and completely helpless,” according to hisemployer, Alfred Bardey. He rented a rough, clay-walled house with a thatched reed roof. The man credited by many with reinventing modern European poetry would reside in this pre-industrial Ethiopian city for nearly five years, during three distinct periods between 1880 and 1891, the longest time he ever stayed anywhere as an adult. It was a life he hadvisualized years before he began his travels. (Text ends)

Even the rest of the Oromo themselves looked up on Arsi as especially ferocious, for them to murder at the time of great festivals, is both an honor and a social necessity ,though if an Arusi kills a fellow-tribesman it is believed that he will get leprosy; but inter-tribal murders are allowed without penalty, particularly at the end of each Luba period. Before settingout to commit a “murder for honor” the Arusi drinks large quantities of blood, which produces a condition of frenzy. Since the murder nearly always a cowardly one, they hide and kill unsuspecting wayfarers, emasculating them and taking home the genitals a trophy .On their returnthe murderers enact the scene, with cries of triumph and derisive imitation of the victim’s anguish. Only after such a murder may a man wear a copper ring in his ear. When several men take part in a murder, the honor goes to him who strikes the first blow. Hence there is often much quarreling. A man who sets out before a festival to kill and returns unsuccessful is not only ridiculed, but is branded on the forehead and given a small jar of milk which he has to make into butter as a sign that he is not a man.no man could hold a position in the gadaa-government unless he had killed a man or a large animal http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/File:MedievalEthiopia.png Damot was a medieval kingdom in what is now Ethiopia, and Neighbour to the EthiopianEmpire. Originally located south of the Abay and west of the Muger River,[1] under the pressure of Oromo attacks the rulers were forced to resettle north of the Abay

Presently, the Oromos of Wollo and Arsi in particular are predominately Muslim. Little is known about the details of the history of Shewa until almost 1800; however, Emperor Lebna Dengel and some of his sons used Shewa as their safe haven when threatened by invaders."The province was named after the Wollo Oromo, who settled in this part of Ethiopia in the 17th century. While further research is needed to precisely comprehend their origins, the Oromo are believed to have originally adhered to a pastoralist/nomadic and/or semi-agriculturalist lifestyle. Many historians agree that some Oromo clans (Bale) have lived in the southern tip of present-day Ethiopia for over a millennium. In Northern Ethiopia, for instance, an Agew tradition has it that the Arsi Oromo moved to the locality around thesixteenth century.According to the tradition, some of the Agew speakers near Metekel were Arsi Oromos who moved via Gabra Guracha town in Northern Showa. They named their new locality Jaawwii after an Arsi Oromo clan name. The fact that the locality is still called Jaawwii and a nearby church, Arusi Mikael, attests to the pertinence of the Agew story. The Great Oromo migration was a series of regaining expansions in the 16th and 17th centuries by Oromos from more central areas in Ethiopia tomore northern regions. The migrations had a severe impact on the Solomonic dynasty of Abyssinia, as well as being the death blow to the recently defeated Adal state. Because Oromos did not write their languageduring the migrations, we must creat a book or refer to Solomonic, Portuguese, and Arabic sources for the reasons behind and history of the migrations. Particularly, a 16th century Tigrayan monk named Bahrey is the foremost source on the migrations. His book (written in Ge'ez), the History of the Galla (Ge'ez ዜና ሁ፡ ለጋለ zēnahu legalla; "Galla" being an oldername for "Oromos" that is now pejorative), was written in 1593 and details the expansions from 1522 to his age. In addition to his book, further information can be gleamed from other contemporaries such as from the Ethiopian monk Abba Paulos, Shihab ed-Din's Futuh al-Habasha (Conquest of Abyssinia), João Bermudes, Francisco de Almeida, Jerónimo Lobo, and various royal chronicles (e.g. those of Gelawdewos, Sarsa Dengel, and Susenyos, though that of Sarsa Dengel may have been written by Bahrey). [edit] Early migrationsThe early migrations were characterized by sporadic raids by the Oromo on the frontiers of the Solomonic kingdom. After capturing cattle and other booty, the raiding parties would quickly return back to their homelands. Actual settlement ofnew territories would not begin until the luba (Ge'ez ሉባ lūbā, an "appointed" head of one of the five groups of an Oromo clan) of Meslé. [1] lubas (meaning - p.301) [edit] Mélbah (1522-1530) and Mudena (1530-1538)According to Bahrey, the earliest Oromo migratinos occured under the Oromo luba Melbah, during the time of Emperor Lebna Dengel. He states that they invaded the neighboring Bali in the Southeast just before the invasions of Ahmad ibn Ibrihim al-Ghazi of Adal (also known asAhmed Gragn) in the north. These early incursions (Oromo razzia) were limited, however, as the encroaching groups returned to their homeland near the Shebelle River after each raid. Raids continued under Mudenapast the Wabi Shebelle, but these groups also returned home shortly.

[2] [edit] Kilolé (1538-1546)After the death of Ahmed Gragn, Kilolé resumed his predecessors raids, piercing further into Solomonic territory.Aided by the weakening of both the Solomonic dynasty and Adal, he was able to raid as far as the province of Dewaro, north of Bali. Again, however, after each raid, the parties returned to their villages. Bahrey's dating might, however, be off, however, as Shihab ad-din, who wrote a decade before Ahmed Gragn's death, notes a locality named Werre Qallu,an Oromo name, in the province of Dewaro. Francisco de Almeida, however, agreed with Bahrey's dating, affirming that the Galla first beganmigrating around the time of Ahmed Gragn's invasion (1527).

[3] [edit] Bifolé (1546-1554)During the time of luba Bifolé, the Oromo migration achieved its first major success. While all previous movementshad been minor raids on neighboring provinces, under Bifolé new raids were undertaken that began to weaken Solomonic control. All of Dewarowas pillaged and Fetegar to its north was attacked for the first time.

[4] Furthermore, according to Bahrey, the inhabitants of the pillaged areas were enslaved, becoming gebrs (Ge'ez ገ ብር gabr; Amh. gebr, Tgn. gebri), a term referring more precisely to "tax-paying serfs," similar to theserfs in Ethiopia during feudal times. Emperor Gelawdewos, however, campaigned in the south as a result of thee attacks. According to his chronicle, the Emperor defeated the Oromo incursions and made subject to his rule those he captured, preventing further attacks for some time, with further incursions reduced to skirmishes. The initial attacks were significant, however, on a much larger and more devastating scale to the Solomonic dynasty. Despite his reprisals, Gelawdewos was troubled and was forced to settle refugees in a town of Wej, north of Lake Zway, around 1550-1.

[5] [edit] Settlement[edit] Meslé (1554-1562)Meslé's time represent a fundamental change in the migrations of the Oromo. Not only were newlytaken territories permanently settled by Oromos for the first time, but mules and horses began to be ridden by the first time. The adoption of horseback-riding from the north greatly increased the Oromos fighting power, putting them on par with Solomonic troops, who were largely unequipped with firearms.

[6] In the new phase of migration adopted under Meslé, the Oromos defeated Gelawdewos's troops in Jan Amora, allowing them to pillage a number of towns. Instead of returning to their homelands, however, theystayed in the new territories. Gelawdewos campaigned against the Oromos as a result, defeating them at 'Asa Zeneb (yet unidentified), but he was nevertheless unable to drive them from the frontier provinces andcontinued to build the new town in Wej for new refugees.

[7] Oromo migration was not restricted to Solomonic territories, however,as activites against Adal were also pursued. The forces of Nur ibn Mujahid(r. 1551/2-1567/8), the Amir of Harar, for instance, were soundly defeated by the Oromos. According to Bahrey, there had been "no such slaughter since the Galla first invaded."

[7] [edit] Harmufa (1562-1570) and Robalé (1570-1578)During the luba of Harmufa, the Oromos advanced even deeper into Solomonic territory. With the use of horses, they were able to attack the province Amhara, andeven get as far as Begemdir and Angot. Further advances were made under Robalé, during whose time Shewa was pillaged and Gojjam attacked. For the first time, Oromo advances were devastating core Solomonic provinces, whereas there earlier incursions were simply againstfrontier provinces. Despite the deeper attacks, the core provinces remained under Solomonic control, and Emperor Sarsa Dengel carried out reprisals in return. One such reprisal in 1573 involved the engagement of Oromos near Lake Zway in a frontier province, whom he defeated, and taking their cattle and distributing it among his subjects who are described in his chronicle as "bec[oming] rich" as a result.

[8] [edit] Reprisals under Sarsa DengelForced to fight the Ottomans in thenorth of his Empire, Sarsa Dengel turned to curb the spread of Oromos in the south in the 1570s. The first mention of his actions is in his short Royal chronicle, which states that he fought a force of Borana Oromos at Lake Zway under a luba named Ambissa. Learning that, after the 1572 rains, the Oromos had taken Wej, the Emperor gathered his forces from throughout Ethiopia to form an army at Gind Beret. From there, Sartsa Dengel headed south, where he found that the Oromos had also taken Maya.

[8] Despite the size of his army, he was able to defeat the Oromos in the area, pushing them back to Fetegar, and capture a large number of cattle.Sartsa Dengel again learned in 1574 of Oromo incursions in Shewa, and the pillaging of cattle in lowland Zéma. The Emperor sent Azzaj Halibo with 50 cavalry to the area, who forced the Oromo to flee sent the heads of 80 to the Emperor as trophies. Sarsa Dengel was again forced to head north with his army to confront the Ottoman-backed Bahr negus Yeshaq, but later returned to Wej in 1577-8 to fend off Oromo advances in the area.

[9] As a result of the battle in the Mojjo Valley (just east of modern AddisAbaba) against the Borana Oromo, corpses were strewn all over the surrounding countryside. The Emperor then fended off an attack in Dembiya by the Abati Oromo at a place called Weyne Deg'a and as a result of the battle, according to Bahrey, less than ten Oromo survived.

[10] [edit] Birmajé (1578-1586)Despite Sarsa Dengel's military campaigns, the Oromo migration continued to spread northward during this time. It was under luba Birmajé that the Oromos first began to use body-length ox-hide shields. These shields allowed the Oromos to resistarrows and therefore successfully defeat the Mayas. During this time period, the Oromo often came into conflict with Daharagot, one of SarsaDengel's commanders, who was often successfuly.

Nevertheless, during this time, the Oromo pillaged Ar'ine in Wej, killing Solomonic courtiers in the process. Further advances were made aroundLake Tana, Dembiya, and (old) Damot, which was surrounded and someof whose inhabitants were enslaved.

[10] [edit] Mul'eta (1586-1594)Under luba Mul'eta a large raid (Oromo dulaguto) was made on Gojjam south of Lake Tana. With the Ottoman situation in the north largely under control, Sarsa Dengel again took the initiative against the Oromo in the south, where he forced the Dawé (or Jawé) Oromos in Wej to flight. (287) Bahrey praised Sarsa Dengel's campaign, stating that he "did not act according to the custom of the kings his ancestors, who, when making war were in the habit of sending their troops ahead, remaining themselves in the rear with the pick of theircavalry and infantry, praising those who went forward bravely and punishing those who lagged behind.

"[11] Despite Bahrey's praise, Sarsa Dengel was forced to use coercion to draw troops, decreeing that anyone who failed to heed his call to arms would have his house pillaged and property confiscated.[12]xbxhsdfghsrghgfhgfdshghgdshdhdsdfhgfhsghhttp://en.wik ipedia.org/wiki/User:Yom/Great_Oromo_migration Keprpopogandaw bashager wht were z Facts? History 101: Fiction and Facts on the Oromos of EthiopiaBy Prof. Feqadu Lamessa

However, based on historical textbooks, European authors and scholarly accounts, the “Gallas” later known as the Oromos lived in the country nearMagadoxo according to historians; they are a fierce and cruel people, who make war on their neighbours, and on all, only to destroy and depopulate their countries. In the places they conquer they slay all the men, cut off the privy parts of the boys, kill the old women, and keep the young for their own use and service

Fiction #1: "Between 1868 and 1900, half of all Oromos were killed,around 5 million people"

Fact #1: This is one of the most repeated inaccuracies, usually told bySecessionist Oromos, radical ethno-nationalist politicians outside the country or pro-OLF history revisionist websites like gadaa.com et al. However, the undisputed fact is that even the total Ethiopian population (the sum of dozens of ethnic groups) was much less than 5 million in the late 1800s, let alone one ethnic group being 10 million. So claiming that 5million ethnic Oromos were killed by Emperor Menelik's forces does not add up. The truth is several thousand Oromos were in fact killed during battles of that era. It was not a "genocide" as some politicians claim but itwas a massacre of the ill equipped southern forces defeated by the Shewan military of Emperor Menelik which had more European weapons. Throughout those decades, the truth is more Oromos were killed by otherOromos than by non-Oromos because competing Oromo Clans often traded for weapons to have an upper hand against their local competitors,who were often their fellow Oromo and Sidama neighbors. And it was not the first lop sided victory of that era in Africa because various communities from all corners of Ethiopia had attacked one another duringthe "resource battles" and whichever group had more modern weapons had the upper hand. To summarize, Professor Mengistu Paulos of Jimma University said it best when describing right-wing Oromo liberation philosophy:--

"Most fictional accounts of 'Oromo history' blindly accepted as facts by some misled people are manufactured by former politicians turned Pseudo-historians like OLF writer Asafa Jalata, who is renowned for abuseof paraphrasing, often with out-of-context citations. For example, while quoting the 19th century Russian Alexander Bulatovich (who provided an'educated guess' of annihilation of almost half Ethiopian population by disease, famine and war, including internal conflict between Oromo clans and with Abyssinians), the OLF-writer Asafa Jalata infamously claimed halfOromo population was killed by 'evil' Amharas. This was purposely done by Mr. Jalata to create a foundation for ethnic hatred between Oromos and Amharas. Ironically, even Mr. Bulatovich himself never had the capacity nor the legitimacy to do a reliable census, as he spent just a couple of months walking around Oromia and hunting elephants in 1890s."

Fiction #2: "…. largely Muslim Oromo people"

Fact #2: This is a phrase seen in some media outlets but not most. Oromopeople have never been a predominantly Muslim people. In fact, both Christianity and Islam is not our ancestral religion because we have practiced an indigenous traditional religion for centuries before. Gradually,Islam and Christianity were both adopted (during Oromo migrations) by us and imposed (during conquest of our lands by Abyssinian/Christians & Somalis/Islam) on us thru out history. Even today, both the two major religions have equal representation among Oromos. The latest official 2007 census showed that around 48% of Oromos practice Christianity (Both Orthodox & Protestant) while around 47% of Oromos practice Islam. Yet, word on the ground is that the Islam population might soon surpass Christianity among Oromos in the future because Orthodox Christianity is decreasing inside Oromia.

Fiction #3 "Abyssinians labelled Oromos the derogatory word 'Galla'"

Fact #3: For many decades, this false statement has been used by Oromoseparatists to create emotional resentment among Oromos against Semitic Abyssinians (Amharas, Tigrayans and Gurages). The fact is the derogatory word "Galla" was first used by Arab and muslim Somalis to describe Oromos as "gal" meaning "outsiders" and "Pagans." Muslims usedthis label during Oromo migration because Oromo people had their own religion which the Muslims believed was paganism. Nonetheless, this derogatory word was gradually adopted and used by other Ethiopians.

Fiction #4: "Oromos were colonized by Emperor Menelik"

Fact: #4: Another popular claim made by secessionist Oromo politicians (and usually repeated by foreign journalists) is the fiction that Oromo people (as a whole ethnic group) were colonized by another ethnic group. Usually, the slogan goes "Abyssinians colonized Oromos" etc. This claim ispopular among the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) organization and consequently among some Diaspora Oromo nationalists living in America and Europe. While a different version or a re-arrangement of the wording might still be true…in general, the Oromo nation as a whole was never colonized by another Ethiopian ethnic group. To start with, even a united one Oromo nation did not exist at those times. All non-political historical textbooks show the existence of battles between multi-ethnic BUT monolingual communities for many centuries through out Ethiopia. Even in northern Ethiopia (traditional "Abyssinia") Oromos have migrated and mixed so much with Tigrayans, Amharas, Afars etc for centuries that the "Abyssinia" state itself was never a one-ethnic state. In fact, even around the 1700s, Rayya Oromos and Yejju Wallo Oromos conquered and dominated a portion of Amharas and Tigrayans; and thus made Afan Oromo the official language of Abyssinia for that brief period. Meaning: clans and ethnic groups have mixed up in Ethiopia for over a millennium but the dominant ethnic group always imposed its language since it was convenient. This linguistic domination however was not always as exploitive and as vilified as it is today; because many of the ethnic groupsliving along trade centers and trade routes often spoke the languages of other ethnic groups already, because there was financial or commercial incentive to do so. This is the background of the region. Therefore, when it comes to the Emperor Menelik era, all historians have argued that it is more factual to say a predominantly Amharic language speaking community gradually conquered a predominantly Afan Oromo language speaking community in the 1800s. So this does not mean an Oromo ethnic group was conquered by an Amhara ethnic group. In fact, just like Amharas of the north were divided,Oromos were also divided and in conflict among themselves. The obvious evidence for this comes from the fact that the Amhara Emperor Menelik was imprisoned by other Amhara regional kings when he was younger. And when he was freed, Oromo clans were also in fierce battles amongst each other, so much so that the Tullama Oromo, Limmu and Macha Oromos created an alliance with the Shewan Amharas of Menelik, leading to the infamous battles of 1880s thatled to this said alliance easily crushing the non-allied Oromos in various bloody wars. In short, Oromos as a one whole were never colonized by exclusively non-Oromos. In fact, the original founders of the OLF organization themselves never believed it so they did not emphasize the word "colonization" in the beginning. But in the mid-1970s, OLF leaders needed to mobilize Oromos against Emperor Haile Selassie (who was half Oromo himself) and to justify the call for "Oromia independence" from "colonial Ethiopia." Therefore OLF had to create a bad cop-good cop scenario for their convenience and simplified history for their people to create national resentment. This helped OLF to portray Oromos as suddenly being colonized by this foreign ethnic group (Amhara) that we (Oromos) have never came in contact with before. This is common tacticused by national liberation movements around the world. The truth that most Ethiopians know is that Shewa based Oromos and Amharas (ethnically mixed Ethiopians) were the main creators of modern Ethiopia.In his book "Who are the Shoans," the historian and anthropologist, Dr. Gerry Salole once summarized that: "In terms of descent, the group thatbecame politically dominant in Shewa (and subsequently in Ethiopia) wasa mixture of Amhara and Oromo."

In Conclusion, the above are 4 of the main issues that create confusion forforeign journalists who report on Oromo people and Oromo politics in Ethiopia. While it is vital that al Jazeera and other media outlets cover the current suffering of Oromos and other Ethiopians, it is necessary to report responsibly. Otherwise, creating confusion and resentment between the younger Ethiopian population causes more problems than solutions. In reality, not just Oromos, but all Ethiopians have suffered under several governments and the only way they can achieve freedom and lasting democracy is when united, not when divided by tribes or not when being polarized by historical lies presented as truth. It is important that foreign media outlets make corrections or report accurate information to avoid inflammatory statements that are destructive and counter productive against Oromos and all Ethiopian people' ongoing struggle for democracy, development and justice. -- Feqadu Lamessa is a former Adama Universityprofessor and writer The Battle of Adwa as a “Historic Event”

Ethiopia under Menelik II with his stalwart warriors comprising all the mosaic ethnic groups were vehemently opposed to the dehumanizing policy of Italian colonialists and paid a heavy sacrifice fighting for freedomand dignity and set example to all black African people and in the Diaspora. By Donald N. Levine: (Originally published on March 1, 1996)

There are three reasons why we commonly refer to some happening as a historic event: either it occurs for the first time; it has significant consequences; or it is symbolically important. As a first time event,

Emperor Menelik's cession of the Bogos highlands to Italy in 1889 has been described as historic, as the first time that an Ethiopian ruler ever voluntarily ceded territory to a foreign power. In the same vein, Abebe Bikila's victory in the marathon race in the 1960 Olympics at Rome was historic, as the first time that an Ethiopian won a gold medal. We also designate events as historic when their consequences significantly alter the shape of subsequent history. The conversion of King Ezanas to Christianity in the middle of the fourth century was historic in this sense because it redirected Ethiopia's entire cultural development. Similarly, theprotection given to disciples of the Prophet Mohammed by the Ethiopian king in the seventh century was a historic event. It led Mohammed to advise his followers to spare Ethiopia from the jihad of Islamic expansion that took place soon after. Likewise, the killing of Emperor Yohannes IV bySudanese Mahdists in 1889 was historic because it opened the way to the ascendancy of an emperor from Shoa. Even when events have no significant direct consequences, we tend to call them historic when they symbolize important national or universal human ideals. The suicide of Emperor Tewodros II had little political consequencehis rule was over, whether or not he was captured alive by the Britishbut it came to symbolize a sentiment of preferring death over demeaning captivity. The speech of Emperor Haile Selassie to the League of Nations in 1937 is oftencalled a historic address, even though it did nothing to change the course of history, because it came to symbolize the moral weakness of Western democracies in the face of fascist expansionism and the need for a stronger world organization empowered to provide collective security. TheBattle of Adwa in 1896 qualifies as an historic event in all three senses of the term. As a historic "first," it represented the first time since the beginning of European imperial expansion that a non-white nation had defeated a European power.

The Battle of Adwa in 1896 also had two fateful consequencesthe preservation of Ethiopia's independence from Italian colonization, and the confirmation of Italy's control over the part of the country Italy had named Eritrea in 1890. Both consequences had repercussions throughout the twentieth century. Italy experienced her defeat at Adwa as intensely humiliating, and that humiliation became a national trauma which demagogic leaders strove to avenge. It also played no little part in motivating Italy's revanchist adventure in 1935. On the other hand, Italy'scontinued occupation of Eritrea gave her a convenient springboard from which to launch that invasion. A generation later, tensions stemming from the protracted division of historic Ethiopia into two partsone under European governance, one under the Ethiopian Crownculminated in a longcivil war, and the eventual secession of Eritrea as an independent state in 1993. In addition to these actual historic consequences, the Battle of Adwa was historic because it acquired symbolic significance of many kinds. In some instances this symbolism itself came to exert a certain influence on the course of events.

Adwa's Symbolism in Other Countries: In Europe, the short-term symbolicsignificance of the Ethiopian defeat of Italy in 1896 was that it served to initiate a process of rethinking the Europeans' image of Africa and Africans. During the nineteenth century Africa had come to be viewed in increasingly pejorative terms, as a continent of people so primitive they were fit only for European rule. Ethiopia did not escape such swipes.

British officers called Ethiopia a nation of savages and Italian officials described it as “a nation of primitive tribesmen led by a barbarian.” The British Foreign Office supported the provocative move of ceding Zula to Italy, expecting that Yohannes would protest by attacking them and then easily be punished for imagining that Ethiopians were equal to white men.Kaiser Wilhelm responded to Emperor Menelik’s announcement of his accession to the throne with insulting language. The stunning victory at Adwa required Europeans to take Ethiopia and Africa more seriously. It not only initiated a decade of negotiations with European powers in whichnine border treaties were signed, it made Europeans begin to reconsider their prejudices against Africans. It came to symbolize a rising awarenessamong Europeans of African political resources and yearnings and an increasing recognition of indigenous African cultural accomplishments.

In Japan, Ethiopia became appreciated as the first non-Caucasian power to defeat Europeans, an achievement the Japanese were to duplicate in warfare against Russia in 1904. This appreciation led to a sense of affinitythat bore fruit for decades thereafter. Ethiopian intellectuals looked to Japan as a model for modernizing their ancient monarchy; the Meiji Constitution served as a model for the Ethiopian Constitution of 1931.

When Italy invaded Ethiopia again in the mid-thirties, many Japanese citizens (if not the regime formally) expressed solidarity with Ethiopians, sending shipments of many thousands of swords to help Ethiopians in their plight. In Africa, the Battle of Adwa inspired other kinds of symbolism. For a number of colonized Africans, the Ethiopian victory at Adwa symbolized the possibility of future emancipation. Black South Africans of the Ethiopian Church came to identify with the Christian kingdom in the Horn, a connection that led South African leader James Dwane to write Menelik for help in caring for the Christian communities ofEgypt and Sudan. The victory at Adwa made Ethiopia visible as a beacon of African independence, a position that inspired figures like Nnamdi Azikiwe in Nigeria, Kwame Nkrumah in Ghana, and Jomo Kenyatta in Kenya in the early years of the African independence movement, as well as leaders in the West Indies like George Padmore and Marcus Garvey from Jamaica.

Adwa as a Symbol of Ethiopia’s Tradition of Independence: Within Ethiopiaitself, Adwa symbolized many things, some of which had positive consequences for her development while others did not. Internally, as abroad, it symbolized Ethiopia’s proud commitment to freedom from foreign domination. Of the many emblems of Ethiopia’s historic independence, Adwa is perhaps the most visible and the most dramatic.

The spirit of Ethiopians’ defiant protection of their land from outsiders manifests itself in many forms. There is the apocryphal story of Emperor Tewodros, who is said to have ordered the boots of some visitors washedbefore they embarked on a ship back to Europe, saying: “Far more precious than jewels is a single drop of Ethiopian soil." There was the refrain I used to hear young braves chant at festive times, jabbing dula (stick) up and down as they danced and sang:

"What did the brave Dagnew said?" in local term, "Min alle, Dagnew minalle?

"I will not allow a piece of land to invaders" in local term, "Ageren lesew, ageren lesew, alsetim alle!" Literally meaning "What did Dagnew (Menelik's Nom-deguere or horse name) say? I won't give away my country to foreigners, he said" With respect to Menelik's reputation, it partly overcame the resentments he had stirred up by ceding Bogos to Italy in exchange for help against his competitors in Tigray. As a historic assertion of Ethiopia's independence, Adwa also reverberated with memories of Ethiopia's experience as a long-lived independent polity. Its symbolism thereby encompassed a layer of meaning that alluded to the historic depth of the Ethiopian nation. It revived memories of earlier achievements and yearnings. At the same time, Adwa may have served togive Ethiopians a false sense of confidence about their position in the modern world. In showing themselves and the world that they could defeat a European invader with their own resources, the 1896 campaign may have led them to think that their traditional resources could be adequate in an era in which war would be waged with tanks and airplanes.It gave encouragement to isolationist and conservative strains that were deeply rooted in Ethiopian culture, strengthening the hand of those who would strive to keep Ethiopia from adopting techniques imported from themodern Westresistances with which both Menelik and Ras Teferi/Haile Selassie would have to contend.

Adwa as a Symbol of Multi-ethnic Cooperation: The symbolism of multi- ethnic collaboration evoked by the Battle of Adwa has been less visible than its role in symbolizing Ethiopia's tradition of independence. Yet in some ways the former was the most remarkable and meaningful aspect ofthe entire episode. Although members of different ethnic, religious, and regional groups had been interacting regularly in Ethiopia for more than 2,000 years through trading, intermarriage, common ritual observances, pilgrimages, and political competition from the perspective of Ethiopian history, Adwa offersthe most dramatic instance of multi-ethnic collaboration before the 20th century. This is because it gave expression to a great outpouring of national patriotism, foreshadowing the great patriotic struggles of 1935- 41. Even from the perspective of modern world history, Adwa represented a relatively rare struggle for national independence waged by a coalition of diverse ethnic groups. Twenty-five years earlier, Adwa had been the sceneof a protracted battle between Dejazmatch Kasa, who would become Emperor Yohannes IV, and the reigning emperor, Tekle Giorgis II, formerly Wag Shum Gobeze. What the 1871 Battle of Adwa symbolized was the age-old struggle among different regional and ethnic groups fordominance. Yohannes, like Tewodros II before him, came to the throne determined to reunify the empire, which had been fragmented followingthe invasion of Ahmed Gragn and subsequent divisive developments.

Although Yohannes did not live to see it, the 1896 Battle of Adwa was a tribute to his vision and to the thoughtfulness and determination with which he sought to unify Ethiopia while respecting the local jurisdiction of regional kings and lords so long as they remained faithful to the national crown. Those who would deny Ethiopia's long existence as a multi-ethnic society must be embarrassed by the facts of the Adwa experience. If the empire consisted of nothing but a congeries of separate tribal and regionalgroups, how then account for the courageous collaboration of 100,000 troops from dozens of ethnic groups from all parts of the country? How then explain the spirited national patriotism of such diverse leaders as Ras Alula, Ras Mengesha, and Ras Sibhat of Tigray, Dejazmatch Bahta of Akale Guzae, Wag Shum Guangul of Lasta, Ras Mikael of Wollo, Negus Tekle-Haymanot of Gojjam, Ras Gobena and Dejazmatch Balcha of the Mecha Oromo, Ras Wole of the Yejju Oromo, Fitawrari Tekle of Wollega, Ras Mekonnen of Harer, as well as Ras Gebeyehu (who died fighting at Adwa) and Ras Abate of Shoa? Of course, deeply rooted antagonisms and persistent rivalries among different factions beset Ethiopia throughout the19th century. And yet, as historian Sven Rubenson has written, "at the crucial moment, Menelik commanded the loyalty of every important chief in the country." The Battle of Adwa became and remains the most outstanding symbols of what, a half-century later, a British colonel would describe as the "mysterious magnetism" that holds Ethiopia together.

The Battle of Adwa (Ethiopia) as a "Historic Event"

"Min alle, Dagnew min alle? Ageren lesew, ageren lesew, alsetim alle!"

Literally meaning "What did Dagnew (Aba-Dagnew is King Menelik's horsename) say?

He said, "I won't give away my country to foreign invaders "

Ed's Note: The Victory of Adwa is an important event for all of us and of cource our obligation too to celebrate and remember our heroes. For generations of Africans born after the 1896 battle of Adwa, on the continent and throughout the Diaspora, this battle represents the spiritualvictory of black people over the forces of evil. It gave hope to the generations of those fighting against colonialism and for freedom in Africa,in the Caribbean, and the rest of the Third World. Adwa set the stage for the New Negro, Negritude, Pan Africanism, and Black Power movements.

And in many respects, the spirit of Adwa contributed to the success of theAmerican Civil Rights Movement.

With respect to Menelik's reputation, it partly overcame the resentments he had stirred up by ceding Bogos to Italy in exchange for help against hiscompetitors in Tigray. As a historic assertion of Ethiopia's independence, Adwa also reverberated with memories of Ethiopia's experience as a long-lived independent polity. Reflections on Ethiopia's Historic Victory Against European Colonialism'Edited by Paulos Milkias and Getachew Metaferia
Reviewed in Horn of Africa Journal, Rutgers University
The Battle of Adwa in 1896 is considered one of the most importantevents in modern African history. Its significance has been studied by numerousscholars most often in response to Italy's failed attempt to secure Ethiopia as a protectorate. The Battle of Adwa counters the prevailing interpretation revealing that this limited framework minimizes the true significance of the battle and its role in world history. Editors Paulos Mikias and GetachewMetaferia argue, that a phenomenon such as Adwa is a complex nexus of various historical processes with wide-ranging but as yet not fully exploredmeanings. Their work, featuring an introduction, prologue, and nine solid chapters, dissects Adwa as a social, political, national, religious, and military event broadening its scope to begin a new evaluation of this African victory.
The prologue indicates how this story affects the past, present and future.It places Ethiopia's origins in ancient history and the Bible. The editors linkeach of the historical ancient Ethiopia, including the Axumite Empire of Ezana, theChristian state of Zagwe, and the Solomonian Empire that traces its lineage from King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, to the emerging modern nation. This approach solidifies both context and contacts within world history. By focusing on the vastness of the territory that will become modern Ethiopia, they establish that these were people of different ethnic and religious affiliations that were still in the process of unification at the timeof the victory at Adwa.
Emperors Tewodros II and Yohannes IV are central to the rise of MenelikII who will become the nation's ruler shortly before the war with Italy.
Both Tewodros who ruled from 1855 to 1872, and Yohannes, who ruled from Tewodros' death to 1889 were frequently engaged in military conflicts with regional rivals and European forces. Each died in battles thatwere influenced by European powers. Menelik, Yohannes successor, was abeneficiary of those conflicts. His ambitions to become emperorencouraged him to challenge the authority of both men by withholding allegiances and entertaining overtures from British and Italianenvoys to gain their support. The Italians, who like the British and French, sought a colonial empire in the Horn of Africa approached King Menelik during Yohannes reign. Beforethe emperor's death, Count Pietro Antonelli and Menelik agreed in principle to a document that would become the Treaty of Wuchalé. The document had numerous points, with the most important being the debated section authorizing Italy to be Ethiopia's agent in the European world. Essentially, this made Ethiopia an Italian protectorate. Emperor Menelik signed both an Italian and Amharic version of this treaty in 1889.

Theodore Vestal builds the case for the Battle of Adwa by recalling Italy's involvement in Ethiopia in Chapter One: "Reflections On The Battle Of Adwa And Its Significance For Today." He suggests that the Italians underestimated Ethiopia's rulers and European support for the treaty. In fact, Vestal sees Italy's missteps as the cause for the war. While Italy's colonization of Eritrea was minimally accepted, the expansion of the Italian role within local Ethiopian affairs was not. Military actions "fuelled the anger of the Ethiopian masses and leaders alike, who viewed the invasion as a threat to their nation's sovereignty." (26) The forthcoming war can be seen as the foundation for true nationalism and the advent of the modern Ethiopian state. While the Berlin Conference establishes policies for non-military action between European parties in their quest forcolonial empires, Vestal shows that it did not constitute uniform support for each nation's colonial desires. In 1892, he hints that Britain supported Italy in Ethiopia more to keep France out of the region rather than to support Italian imperialism and national development. Additionally, theflaws in the Treaty of Wuchale' were known before the war and it also raised the concerns of European competitors.
