The Russians, for example, denounced the treaty in 1894, and shortly afterwards Tsar Nicholas sent the Ethiopians rifles and ammunition. Yet the key point in the chapter was, not only did the military victory humiliate the Italians, it countered Italian comments that the Ethiopians were barbarians. Ethiopia went to great lengths to be fair in a difficult situation. Before the war, Menelik repaid the loans provided by the treaty,and afterwards allowed the Italians safe passage out of Ethiopia. Further, Vestal argues that Menelik wanted peace and did not pursue the Italians and allowed them to remain in Eritrea. While installing national pride and unity, Menelik's victory did have a price. His failure to remove the Italians from Eritrea became one of the nation's greatest problems. It set the tonefor the hostile relationships between the two regions which most see as part of Ethiopia. Similar themes are echoed in the next chapter,

Editor's Note: During the second Italo-Ethiopian war Ethiopia was facing an existential threat to maintain its unique status as the only independentnation on the African continent. The Italian Fascist leader Benito Mussolini's primary mission was to avenge the humiliation that Italy suffered as a result of a monumental anti-colonial and anti-imperialist victory of Adowa in in March 1896. The victory of Adowa, led by King Menelik II was a shining victory that injected momentum and provided inspiration to worldwide mobilization of anti-colonial struggle especially inAfrica. Thus, the myth of invincibility of western army and western powerwas shattered.

These two historical events the first aggression of Italy by King Emmanuel's army in 1896 and the second invasion by Fascist forces ofBenito Mussolini in 1936 were watershed moments in Ethiopian historythat tested the resolve, determination and spirit of the country's leadership and people.

It has to be recalled that in 1936 at the eve of World War II Emperor HaileSelassie stood before the 16th General Assembly of the League of Nationsand made his historic appeal "Apart from the kingdom of the Lord there is not on this earth any nation that is superior to any other. Should it happen that a strong government finds it may, with impunity, destroy a weak people the hour strikes for the weak people to appeal to the League of Nations to give its judgement in all freedom. God and history will remember your judgements." The Emperor's passionate appeal for assistance fell on deaf ears and Ethiopia and Ethiopians were left to fend off the horrors of fascism on their own. While Czechoslovakia was sacrificed to appease Adolf Hitler in 1938, the people of Ethiopia were betrayed to appease Benito Mussolini and its fascist regime two years earlier. Despite the abandonment, however, it took four years of spirited nationwide mobilization and resistance by determined patriotic men andwomen of Ethiopia to liberate their country from the forces of fascism.

This indeed, is one of the bedrocks of a proud history of the people ofEthiopia.

"The Battle of Adwa: The Historic Victory of Ethiopia over EuropeanColonialism."

(COMMENTARY) In examining Italy's interests in African colonization, Paulos Milkias notes the similarities in the development of the two countries during the nineteenth century. However, he makes the obviouspoint that Italy used colonization as part of its unification process.

This chapter does an excellent job of analyzing the famed Treaty of Wuchalé and how it led to the Italian-Ethiopian war. Milkias places the conflict within cultural values as well as diplomatic ones. The deception inparagraph XIX of the treaty, which has a different meaning in Italian thanit does in Amharic, illustrates the immorality of the Italians. Not only did Count Antonelli betray Menelik's trust, the entire affair reveals the allegedsuperiority that the Italians believed they had over their African allies.

This racial superiority is compounded as Menelik discovers that many of the European nations, including England and Germany, honored the treatydespite being made aware of its improper wording. Menelik had no choice but to dissolve the treaty in February 1893. In the process he and Empress Taytu forced Count Antonelli to reveal his attempt to deceive the Ethiopian ruler. While the Ethiopians pressed for peace, they also prepared for war. The Italians offered another treaty on January 18, 1896.However, this was a more stringent one with the cession of Tigray and more formal protectorate status. Again, the Ethiopians refused. When the war began, it was solely because the Italians had to save national pride and its place in the European community. Milkias offers pages of details about the battle and the resolve of the Ethiopians to save their homeland.Some 20,000 of the Ethiopian 90,000 troops fought without guns, yet they defeated a superior European army causing a loss of nearly 70% of its troops. Ethiopian women, led by Empress Taytu also played a role in the battle. The women provided water and medical care to the troops, andTaytu led her own forces in the course of the fighting.

In conclusion, Milkias posits that the battle of Adwa is important because it was "a victory for the underdog, a victory for right over wrong." (37) Hewrote: "they decisively defeated an invading European army and forced the architects of the Berlin Conference (who had carved up Africa among themselves, like a birthday cake) to formally acknowledge the sovereigntyand territorial integrity of Ethiopia." (88) Furthermore, it was both the "birth and culmination of the struggle for freedom of the peoples of the Third World…sending out the message for self respecting human beings, itis infinitely better to die on one's feet than to live on one's knees." (88)

Chapter Three, Dejazmach Zewde Gabre-Selassie's "Continuity and Discontinuity in Menelik's Foreign Policy," …[discusses] a new foundation by critically examining Menelik's entanglements with local rulers includingEmperor Yohannes and Europeans, especially the Italians….Menelik emerges skillful and lucky in his endeavors…. Following his coronation, Menelik continues the pattern of secret diplomacy, but does so with both local rulers and European powers. The chapter gives additional credit to Empress Taytu who plays a role in these diplomatic missions. The treaty changes the course of these actions, forcing Menelik to appeal more to Ethiopia's local rulers. Menelik's ultimate victories over the Italians rests on his ability to get these rulers who were interested in gaining their ownpower to turn against foreign interests and stand solely with him. This coalition wins two key victories leading to Adwa.

At Adwa, the victory not only creates the ideology for Ethiopian independence, but for Ethiopian nationalism. The great victory also ignitesthe "scar of Adwa" that will haunt Italy for four decades. Harold Marcus' essay returns to the questions of racial discourse that are an integral part of the volume. It is a short but influential piece….His focus explores a sampling of European writings. The sources indicate differences in religion,skin color, and intelligence. While many found the Ethiopians lacking in cultural values, it is important to note that after the battle, impressions of the Ethiopians had a marked improvement. Yet, Marcus concludes, "…evenin its hour of greatest triumph, Ethiopia was not afforded full equality."

Chapter Four, "Adwa 1896: Who Was Civilized And Who Was Savage?"

Prof. Negussay Ayele continues to explore the concept of European racismfound in the first two chapters. Ayele examines racism used to justify colonization, the war with Ethiopia, and continued European resentment ofAfricans after Adwa. It places Adwa at the end of centuries of European and African struggles as it serves as a turning point in these confrontations. While viewing many of the issues considered in the first two chapters, it adds useful and needed details to enhance the immoralityof the Italians and the Treaty of Wuchalé. Ayele provides the treaty's twenty provisions and carefully scrutinizes the flaws and controversial points in the document. He also covers the magnanimity of Menelik following the war to show that the Ethiopians were the civilized party in this defining chapter of African history. Getachew Metaferia essay comprises chapter five. “Ethiopia: A BulwarkAgainst European Colonialism and its Role in the Pan-African Movement,” placesEthiopia in the center of Pan-Africanism that emerges in the late nineteenth century.He convincingly argues the connections between Ethiopia and numerous political movements in modern history. His work examines the historical images of Ethiopia, the growth of Pan-African movements throughout theDiaspora, Ethiopia’s ties to socio-political and religious movements, and current prospects of Ethiopianism. In many respects, this is the best chapter of the work as it offers rich examples that are hard to refute.

Menelik became a role model for those in the Diaspora. He sparked thefirst legitimate invitation for Disaporans to come back home (to Africa).

This connection enamored blacks to support Ethiopia when Mussolini attacked it during World War II, and led to the enthusiastic support of Haile Selassie during and after the war. Emperor Haile Selassie I, too, invited those in the Diaspora to return to Africa and was a spiritual champion for African independence. Additionally, Haile Selassie Selassieconvened the Pan African conference in 1958 and founded the Organization of African Unity in May 1963. (Text ends)

Menelik and Southern Ethiopia: Colonialization, Reunification, orExpansion?

By Messay Kebede (PhD)

The 119th anniversary of the victory of Adwa has generated among some groups in the Ethiopian diaspora a renewed debate over the meaning of the southern expansion. Spearheaded by Menelik, the Ethiopian state accomplished the momentous achievement of doubling its size by expanding into what is now the southern part of Ethiopia. Basically, three opposing interpretations feed on the debate. Was the march into the southern part of Ethiopia a colonial conquest, an expansion, or a re- appropriation of lost territories? The purpose of this article is to examine the three positions with the view of showing their respective strengths andweaknesses. In many ways, this article is a summary of the first chapter of my book, Survival and Modernization, in which I conduct an exhaustive appraisal of the theorizations of the southern march.

Before critically examining the clash of the theses, it is important that we keep in mind the importance of the issue for today's Ethiopia. Debating about Menelik's southern march is not a simple curiosity about a past event with little relevance to current preoccupations. The issue pervades the present political situation of Ethiopia, just as it was one of the reasonsthat led to the revolution of 1974 and the subsequent overthrow of the imperial regime. The perceived injustice and unequal treatment over landownership, as opposed to the northern gebbar system, epitomized in the slogan "land to the tiller," has been the rallying cause that unified the opposition against the imperial rule. Since then the issue has been exacerbated by the failure to generate a modern and democratic state, which failure prepared the ground for the rise of ethnonationalist forces, notably of the TPLF's policy to create ethnic zones. A process that could have been no less viable than the integration of Texas or California into the US now threatens the very existence of Ethiopia because its leaders were and still are unable to implement the most elementary steps of democratization. Let us begin with the most controversial thesis, namely,the alleged Ethiopian colonization of the southern peoples.

The Colonial Thesis

Mostly defended by ethnonationalist scholars of Eritrean and Oromo origins, the thesis simply maintains that the incorporation of Eritrea and the southern peoples into Ethiopia was no less colonial than the formation of British and French colonial empires. It used the same brutal methods and established a similar type of political, economic, and cultural hegemony for the benefit of one “non-native” ethnic group, namely, the Amhara. So stated, the thesis looks puzzling, to say the least, because of the obvious absence in Ethiopia of the main features defining European colonization. Being still a traditional society, Ethiopia did not have an expanding capitalist system in need of overseas satellite countries. Nor didthe incorporation of Eritrean and southern peoples result in the establishment of a social barrier discriminating natives from “racially superior” expatriates.

These undeniable counter-facts could not but call for a specification intenton maintaining the thesis while adapting it to the Ethiopian context. Thus,because the European definition is not applicable to Amhara, who are neither racially “superior” nor historically and culturally alien to Eritreans,intellectuals of Eritrean origin based their main argument on the fact that an Eritrean autonomous state had existed after the decolonization from Italy. And since the internationally accepted principle is that colonial borders must not be contested, it is colonization to incorporate a country whose recognized status as an independent country results from decolonization.

As to Oromo ethnonationalist intellectuals, they added the specification that Ethiopian colonization was actually a dependent colonization. The lackof a capitalist system and the traditional nature of the Ethiopian society atthe time of the expansion preclude any idea that Ethiopia, by itself, had the power and the economic needs to initiate and succeed the conquest ofsouthern peoples. It had done so thanks to the military and diplomatic aids of Western countries so that it can be emphatically affirmed that Ethiopia colonized the southern peoples on behalf of colonial powers. In other words, Ethiopia was just a junior partner of colonial powers.

Be it noted that the thesis of dependent colonialism, unlike its Eritrean counterpart, maintains that Ethiopia fulfilled the racial criterion of European colonization. Both Amhara and Tigreans claim Semitic origins inaddition to being Christian. They are thus racially and culturally different from the southern peoples, who are Cushitic and were non-Christian. Justlike European colonization, the Amhara have imposed their language andculture; they have also appropriated southern lands and instituted a system different from the northern gabbar system, to wit, the southernsystem of tenancy.

Does the transfiguration of the colonial thesis into dependent colonizationmake it more convincing? It would have been so were not the transfiguration still based on flagrant distortions of facts. To consider Tigreans and Amhara as non-native to the region is, of course, an aberration. No less absurd is the suggestion that Ethiopia colonized southern peoples on behalf of European colonizers when it was itself the target of successive attempts at colonization by European powers.

Whatever is the explanation, Ethiopia has frustrated these attempts, notably through the victory of Adwa that resulted in the international recognition of its state as independent and sovereign. Add to this that the Ethiopian context did not generate anything resembling the colonial distinction between metropolises and satellites. Even if the southern system was different from the northern one, it was not a satellization. On the contrary, in terms of economic advancement, the south benefited more while the north was almost marginalized.

The irony is that the defenders of dependent colonialism constantly underline that Ethiopians were not, in terms of civilization, more advancedthan the Oromo. This is so true that the Oromo expanded at the expense of Ethiopia and even penetrated deep into Amhara and Tigre territories where they even acquired political supremacy, like in Wollo. Historians readily admit that the expansion of Oromo is the reason for the weakeningof the Ethiopian state and the rise of what is known as the Era of the Princes. But then, Oromo and Amhara were contenders for the control of the region. Is not the reality of this contention dismissing the description of the Amara as alien to the region? What is more, how is the admission of rivalry for control compatible with the idea of colonization, that is, with the idea of an overseas conquest? The reality is that both were driven by expansion, the only difference being that, thanks to Menelik, the Amhara prevailed. The expansion and the resulting incorporation was, therefore, inspired and executed by indigenous forces. We have maybe a loser and awinner, but not a colonial subordination. We know that the ultimate targetof the thesis of the colonization of the Oromo and southern peoples is the dismantling of Ethiopia. Presented as a racially and culturally alien rule forthe purpose of political domination and economic exploitation, Ethiopia should not have a fate different from the fate of British or French colonial empires. The only legitimate and feasible solution is decolonization and the acquisition of independence of the southern peoples.

Instead of directly contesting the colonial thesis, the TPLF came up with a convoluted alternative, which, short of independence, consists in recognizing southern peoples as full nations with the right to self-determination. The recognition of this right is accompanied by the offer to remain part of Ethiopia in a decentralized federal system in which the rightof each nation to administer itself is fully recognized. Obviously, the TPLF did not propose this solution out of concern for the good of Ethiopia. It was meant to be a rallying proposal against the Amhara hegemony on theone hand and, on the other, a device to recruit ethnicized elites, the very ones that would develop shared interests with the TPLF. It also allows theimplementation of a divided-and-rule policy that makes sure that these towed elites become unable to act in a concerted way. The upshot of all this is that the TPLF remains the sole arbitrator and decider, especially through the complete control of the repressive and armed forces of the state. In thus fragmenting the Ethiopian society while also claiming to be the sole holder of its unity, the TPLF does no more than play with fire: in baptizing ethnic groups nations, it has planted the seed of civil war and secession in the heart of the system in the vain hope of securing a perennial rule.

The Reunification Thesis

The specter of civil war and dismantlement has understandably re-injectedlife into an old thesis that had fallen into disgrace since the radicalization of Ethiopian educated elites. It is the idea that Menelik's southern expansion was actually a reunification, that is, a recovery of territories that were once part of Ethiopia. Let alone colonization, the thesis does noteven accept the characterization of the process as an expansion.

The thesis thus reverses the accusation: the invader or expansionist is notEthiopia, but the Oromo. In other words, the southern components of Ethiopia, including all the expanses where the Oromo settled, were part ofEthiopia until Ahmed Gragn's invasion of the country. The invasion weakened the Ethiopian state and allowed Oromo and Somali infiltrations and the subsequent conquest of Ethiopian territories. Oromo intellectuals themselves openly admit that their vast territory is the result of conquest,especially of expansion to the detriment of Ethiopia. They are also not timid in their glorification of the effectiveness of the Oromo assimilationistpolicy of local peoples.

The defenders of the thesis of reunification argue that, once the fact of Oromo invasion is admitted, Menelik's southern expansion becomes a legitimate claim of territories belonging to Ethiopia. As a matter of fact, addressing the issue of the recovery of previous tributaries of the Ethiopian state that were cut off as a result of Oromo expansion, Menelik himself wrote the following to European powers: "While tracing today the actual boundaries of my empire, I shall endeavor, if God's gives me the strength, to reestablish the ancient frontiers of Ethiopia up to Khartoum, and as far as Lake Nyamza with all the Gallas and the Arussi country up tothe limits of the Somalis, including the Province of Ogaden."

Many Ethiopian and Western scholars find such claims extravagant. Even if one admits the difficulty of firmly demarcating the exact borders of Ethiopia in the past, which probably used to shrink and expand depending on the vitality of kings, such intermittent allegiances of some southern localities to the Ethiopian state are still not enough to support the claim ofrecovery of lost territories. Moreover, because at one moment in time a territory was part of the empire does not entail that Ethiopia has the legitimate right to annex it. During the course of world history, borders have been drawn and redrawn constantly in all countries. With few exceptions, most countries have accepted their present borders even if they have lost territories that were part of them at one time or another.

For instance, it is close to impossible that Mexico would one day claim Texas or California on the grounds that both states were included in the territory that it controlled in the past. Add to this that the claim seems indifferent to what the people now living in the said lost territories have tosay about the alleged reunification. They alone decide whether or not theywant to be part of Ethiopia. Nations are about people, not just territories.

The Expansion Thesis

The difficulties of the theses of reunification and colonization invite a thirdalternative view that speaks of expansion while decidedly countering the characterization of “colonial.” Developed in my book, the thesis argues that the expansion neither assumed a racist overtone, nor acquired the structural divide of “metropolis-satellite,” so characteristic of colonial empires. Rather, it harbored the goal of nation-building through the formation of multiethnic educated elites and a national culture based on the use of one language, allegiance to the imperial throne, and national symbols derived from history and modern institutions.

The point is to explain why the term expansion is more appropriate than colonization and reunification, not only in terms of historical accuracy, butalso for the future survival of Ethiopia. First of all, contrary to the claims of restorationists, it is undeniable that peoples with different cultural and socioeconomic features from northern Ethiopia inhabited southern Ethiopia. This does not mean that frequent encounters and exchanges between the south and the north did not take place or that some of the southern regions were not at one time or another included in the territories controlled by Ethiopian monarchs. Even so, these historical incidents do not alter the fact that southern peoples have maintained cultures and social systems different from the north. So that, Menelik’s march into the south could not but assume the form of incursion into alienterritories, that is, of expansion of the northern system into a different system.

Another evidence of expansion is that the march brought about wars, which expressed the resistance of many local peoples. I am not familiar with any recorded reports saying that native peoples welcomed with cheers and joy Menelik’ soldiers. Instead, what is recorded is the series ofresistance, it is true of unequal vigor, of local peoples. Moreover, the defeat of local resistances was soon followed by the progressive appropriation of land by Menelik’s war chiefs and the subsequent establishment of tenancy. The normal development should have been the progressive evolution into a gebbar system, which would have changed expansion into full integration. Those who came after Menelik opposed thealteration. We know the dire consequences of their policy, which was inconsistent with the project of nation-building. Unless we deny that the southern march did not cause violent clashes resulting in the defeat of those who resisted, I do not see how we can avoid the term "expansion."

As much as it counters the idea of reunification, the thesis of expansion, let me insist on this point, does not lend itself to a colonial interpretation.Can one conclude from the fact of socio-cultural differences that the expansion was colonial? Obviously not, for the simple reason that the differences were never viewed as a justification for the satellization of thesouth. On the contrary, the expansion quickly moved toward integration and nation-building, however inconsistent the method used may have been, and never showed any tendency to segregate, to establish a color bar separating natives from northerners, as is characteristic of colonial domination.

Let it be added that the expansion was not the exclusive work of the Amhara of Shoa: it included a significant Oromo participation. The objection according to which the Oromo participated as native colonial troops overlooks the fact that they were active initiators and consolidatorsof the expansion, as shown by the eminent role of Ras Gobena, who was more of an ally than a subordinate. Gobena was not only a full member of the Shoan aristocracy, but also led the greater part of the expeditions among Oromo people. The Oromo involvement suggests an internal inspiration aiming at uniting the Oromo under the authority of the Ethiopian state in light of their political fragmentation. Clearly, the Oromo participation both at the level of leadership and soldiery had nothing in common with the participation of Eritrean ascaris in the Italian attempts tocolonize Ethiopia or Indian troops in the formation of the British Empire.

As to the establishment of tenancy, the rush to call it colonial simply forgets that it represents none other than the introduction of capitalism ina traditional society. Owing to the resistance that capitalist incursions encountered in the north, which was wholly attached to the gebbar system, the elementary requirement of capitalism, namely, the dispossession of the means of production, came to Ethiopia via the south. It is unfortunate that the feudal lords proved unable to fully utilize the opportunity to grow themselves into capitalist entrepreneurs. Still, the truth remains that tenancy was not a segregationist system, but the easiest way, compared to the north, to introduce a rudiment of capitalism.

True, Ethiopianization of native peoples took place, but it was inspired bythe goal of wholesale assimilation. Though colonialism too imposed its language and economic interests on native peoples, it was less to assimilate them than to tow them to the needs of the metropolises. Cultural differences can be accommodated through syncretism or mutual tolerance, not so racial barriers. Because they are insurmountable, they freeze a ghettoized social relationship based on the assumed innate inferiority of natives. I do not see how it is possible to identify a process ofintegration, however slow it may have been, with the status of an overseas territory. One can rightly denounce the unequal treatment withinthe same social unit, but one cannot use concepts proper to colonialism todescribe it, obvious as it is that the inequality had little to do with an annexation instituting racial exclusion.

In addition to remaining close to the facts as they have happened, one ofthe merits of the theory is to provide a legitimate justification of the expansion. I am referring to the undeniable fact that the expansion was essentially triggered by the Ethiopian instinct of survival before being nation-building, which instinct is evidenced by the amazing perseverance of the Ethiopian state. Menelik was alarmed by the colonial encirclement of Ethiopia: since the surrounding territories, including Eritrea, were all colonized, they could serve as a launching pad to invade Ethiopia. Hence the precipitation to integrate them before they fall under colonial rules. InMenelik’s words, "if Powers at a distance come forward to partition Africa between them, I do not intend to remain an indifferent spectator."

Integration meant more means both in terms of human and material resources in the defense of Ethiopia. More importantly, it gave greater power to Menelik in his fight to prevail over his rivals in the north and unite the country. At least two conditions had to be met to give northern Ethiopia a chance to counter the Italian invasion: unity and the preventionof complete colonial encirclement within a narrow and closed space. The expansion was, therefore, a legitimate act of self-defense, which is an internationally acknowledged right. I find this defense more admissible both in terms of facts and rightness than the thesis of reunification.

The upside of this survival motive is that Menelik's expansion actually saved southern peoples from colonial conquest and subordination. It isundeniable that their integration into Ethiopia foiled colonial designs.

Notably, without Menelik's conquest, what is now called Oromia would have been divided among Italian, French, and British colonizers, like theSomali and many other African countries. Many Oromo still cannot appreciate what they owe to Menelik: they can hate him but they cannotdeny the fact that he shielded them from colonial domination and dispersion.

Some ethno-nationalists may say that it would have been better for Oromo and other southern peoples to have been colonized by authentic rather than by fake or junior colonizers. I consider this objection to be nothing more than an expression of self-deprecation as well as an inabilityto understand the opportunities offered by history. Indeed, what else is implied in the objection but the view that the southern peoples would have been better off under superior white colonizers as if the present ills and failures of African countries were not caused, directly or indirectly, byWestern colonization? The statement that an alleged black colonizer had done worse is just not in the range of possibility.

More importantly, the objection overlooks that the southern expansion represented a call to overcome our narrow identity and put ourselves at the service of a transcendent cause that we bring to life by our effort andchoice. Nation-building is neither a characteristic of nature nor an invitation to ethnic parochialism, but the forging of a new identity that includes the other. In including the non-ethnic other, we rise to universality, to a non-ethnic citizenship, thereby transforming the naturalbelonging to a group into a moral commitment to a union of our own making. (Text ends)

First Ethiopia's Borena Oromos migration to the U.S.’

Wemezekir: In 1902 Borana Ehiopian Oromos Imigrants from southern Ethiopia arrived in Ellis Island near New York City. The Abyssinian Baptist Church in Nw York City is founded by Abyssinian inspired black Americans and Abyssinian immigrants in the early 19th century. The Borena area actually straddles

Ethiopia, Kenya and Somalia as all tribal Africa in the border areas do. According to historians, 1902 was a time the Borana areaincorporated into Ethiopia. It was also the time Borana land stretch was very vast, including the current southern Somalia. This might include the coast of Indian Ocean, which might have been used as gateway for this migration .

ETHIOPIA - Atse (King) Haile Selassie I - The last King of the SolomonicDynasty'

Who was he? Wemezekir: The fall of Emperor Haile Selassie I and the Solomoic dynasty of the Ethiopian monarchy, which resulted by the Ethiopian Revolution of February (Yekatit), 1974 ended their monarchial rule on September 12, 1974. King Haile Selassie during his reign played an influential role that advocates for the independence and freedom of Africa and Africans on the world stage. He was also the last monarch of Ethiopia who defeated the Italian Fascist Invasion that existed from 1935to 1941. Voted Man of the Year and featured on the front cove in Time Magazine in1930, King Haile Selassie's contributions to African unity, independence, peace and collective security are unmatched by any other African or worldleader. King Haile Selassie played a formative and key, leading role in theestablishment of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in May, 1963, now known as the African Union (AU), through his tireless efforts, full dedication and commitment to the cause of African independence, freedom, peace and unity. Shortly after meeting with Nelson Mandela providing him with military training, an Ethiopian passport and a hand- held gun given him to liberate South Africans from Apartheid rule in 1962,King Haile Selassie convened the first conference comprised of 31 Independent African nation states that led to the establishment of the Organization of African Unity on May 25, 1963 in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

King Haile Selassie also constructed the building that would house the firstmeeting of African leaders at the sole expense of the Ethiopian government. He provided the guidance, oversight, and visionary leadership that led to the ratification of the OAU's Charter in May, 1963 aswell. King Haile Selassie was elected as the first and fifth Chairman to preside over the African nations that comprised the OAU. King Haile Selassie is the only African leader to have served as Chairman of the OAU more than once. As Chairman, King Haile Selassie, successfully mediated along with president Modibo Keita of Mali the 'Bamako Peace Accord', which resolved the border conflict between Morocco and Algeria in 1964.

In 1964, he also initiated the concept of a United States of Africa. He successfully negotiated the Biafran civil war of Nigeria in 1967. In February, 1972, Haile Selassie also resolved then southern Sudan crises under the 'Addis Ababa Peace Agreement' between the central government of Sudan and the Anya-Anya, the southern rebel group, becomes a self-governing region under a unified Sudan.

King Haile Selassie was an outspoken advocate and firm believer in African Independence and Freedom. In an effort to liberate Congo from Belgian rule, King Haile Selassie had sent over 3,000 para-troops, including those from his Imperial Guard, to fight for Congolese independence. On October 6, 1963, King Haile Selassie addressed the General Assembly of the United Nations, awakening the conscious of World Leaders by his riveting speech that called for disarmament and prevention of a nuclear arms race and nuclear war. King Haile Selassie preached the need for collective security and peace on an international level, and declared to World Leaders that Africa's emergence as a free, victorious, and independent continent was inevitable. King Haile Selassie spoke against the backwardness of racial prejudice and the contradictions of World leaders who advocated peace, yet subjugated nations of African peoples. Despite being abandoned by the Leauge of Nations, the precursorto the United Nations, when Ethiopia was invaded by Fascist Italy in 1923,King Haile Selassie sent over 3,000 Ethiopian troops to Korea to fight against Communist rule and expansion. In the Korean war, the Ethiopian forces sent by King Haile Selassie fought in 253 battles with not one Ethiopian taken prisoner of war! The Ethiopian troops heroically fought alongside the US 7th Infantry Division. The US military fighting alongside the Ethiopians observed the valor and dignity with which Ethiopian troops fought, and the honor Ethiopians bestowed upon soldiers who died in battle. The US military later adopted the Ethiopian tradition and practice of sending soldiers who perished on the battlefield, draped in their national flag, back home for a proper burial and memorial service. This tradition, borrowed from the Ethiopians, is still practiced to this day in the United States. King Haile Selassie's decision to send Ethiopian troops and approximately ten percent of his military resources at the time to restore global order under collective security principle is a testament to his strongbelief in and dedication to global security and world peace.

Although King Haile Selassie pledged full support of Ethiopia's participationin UN peace-keeping and collective security operations, King Haile Selassienever feared to stand firm on his own ground and render judgment based on principles of international law, equality, morality and righteousness.

Despite Ethiopia being an ally of the US, King Haile Selassie openly called for the Vietnam war to end on several occasions. He also urged the UnitedStates and the World to rid the ideology of racial supremacy and the practice of racial discrimination. King Haile Selassie also urged the United States to improve race relations and to advance the interest of the AfricanAmerican Civil Rights Movement through more legislative reform efforts during his visits to the US in the 1950s and 1960s. As a means of promoting African Unity and brotherhood, King Haile Selassie provided scholarships to students in various African countries to be educated at Haile Selassie I University, now known as Addis Ababa University. King Haile Selassie also provided land in Ethiopia to accommodate the return ofAfricans in the Diaspora. To this day, Shashemene, Ethiopia remains the spiritual homeland of the children of Africa dispersed in foreign lands.

Many of them, members of the Rastafarian faith, have been living there for generations where they and their progeny have not only spiritually, but, physically reclaimed their African identity. It is because of the aforementioned reasons, King Haile Selassie's unparalleled contributionsto the freedom and independence of Africa, and because of his foresightand visionary leadership in establishing the Organization of African Unitythat we adamantly demand Selassie Stand Up! "Agerina tarik aymotim; yetarikinim kibir yemitebiKew tewlid new!” - King Haile Selassie

ETHIOPIA: How is seen by others? - This is the story of Ethiopians’Wemezekir: This was how Ethiopia used to be called

- Ethiopia - 1400 years ago there were three strong empires, namely the Roman empire, the Persian empire, and the Axumite empire ofEthiopians.

- ‘The land of Abyssinya’
- ‘The land of Great Kings’
- ‘The land of ancient history’
- ‘A christian land of High spirituality where kings walk in this land tomaintain teachings of Jesus peace be upon you!’
- ‘Arbil Habeshi’
- ‘Protecting the early Muslims including Othman the Caliph (R.A)’
- ‘The land of mystery & spirituality’
- ‘Even the first man walked this land’
- ‘The last ark of the covenant lies on this land’
- ‘A Land of Peace’
- ‘The Model of truth, Peace, Freedom called pan-Africanists’
- ‘Was a land where African people were proud’
- ‘Was a land where early civilization developed’
- ‘Most of all Ethiopia was more than just a Land of History’
- ‘A Land of Promise called religious preachers’
- ‘13 months of Sunshine called by tourism promoters’
- ‘Land of Dust, Eucalyptus and Hope’ called by explorers

WEMEZEKIR: በኢትዮጵያ የመጀመሪያው ጋዜጣ "አዕምሮ" የመጀመሪያው እትም የታተመዉ በ 1903 ዓ.ም ነ ው ደግሞ የታተመው በ 1916 ዓ.ም.ነ ው።

The first modern newspaper in an African language’

አእምሮ newspaper was established during Emperor Menelik's reign. The firstever issue was distributed in and around 1889 and was written in the Amharic language. The newspaper was weekly and the first ever issue had24 copies. After Amharic, the second earliest modern style newspaper in an African langauge was in Swahili. The Abyssinia court has long history and was writing its own poems and stories about its victories as back as 15th century. The Amhara emerged as written language during Isaac I reign though other small records exist before him but such records are more Geez than Amharic.

ETHIOPIAN MUSIC: About Ethiopian traditional & nationalistic songsLove songs

Love songs are by far the most popular song types in Ethiopia as they would be anywhere else in the world. But not all love songs have the same impact on the listener and some are definitely better than others. What makes for a great love song is a combination of many factors including lyrics that ring true to people's hearts and descriptions of love situations that they can relate to. One way or another, the songs listed below qualify as among the best Ethiopian love songs and whatever yourlove situation, we trust you enjoy listening to them.

Wedding songs

Whether there is a wedding or not, wedding songs are everyone's favourite. For those who are getting married, wedding songs make the occasion happy, warm and memorable. For those who are already married, these songs bring back memories from their wedding day like nothing else could. And for those who are yet to tie the knot, wedding songs simply make them think about their prospective marriage and theprospect of reaching that special day.

This collection of wedding songs express promises of love, loyalty and friendship in ways that are both traditional and contemporary. They celebrate a milestone and the start of a new chapter in the lives of thosewho choose to tie the knot. Each one of these Ethiopian wedding songs are inspired by different traditional elements and they are uniquelyEthiopian.

Nationalistic & patriotic songs for and about Ethiopia

Ethiopian musicians follow an enduring tradition of singing for and about Ethiopia. Perhaps Ethiopia could be the only country in the world where each year several songs are released wishing the country well, admiring its beauty, praising its achievements and just expressing love for Ethiopia.With millions of Ethiopians now living outside of Ethiopia near and far across the world, there is literally a plethora of songs in which fond memories of the country and nostalgic feelings are expressed. Most songsabout Ethiopia are also about hope - hope for a better future, hope for cultural repatriation and hope for the day that one gets to reunite with thehomeland and family members. These are a selection of old and recent songs carrying all of these Messages.

Songs with special meaning

Ethiopian songs cover a lot of ground – they touch many aspects of life and their lyrics and delivery touch the hearts of many. In this collection, you will find songs about music itself, about the value of life and the daily struggle to make life work, the importance of friendship, the gratitude onemust feel towards one's mother and more. The collection will continue to grow.

Holiday songs

Holidays and festivities like Christmas, New Year and Easter are very important aspects of the Ethiopian culture – and there are songs for each holiday season. Some of the songs in this collection are songs from a longtime ago, but time only adds value to them. The collection also has holiday songs that were released more recently and they are a testamentto the continued trend in singing about holidays as Ethiopians' favourite seasons. (Text ends)

Cermonial songs (National Anthem)
The national Anthem of the Imperial government composed by Kevrok Nalbandian, it was Ethiopia's National Anthem that served until the fall ofthe imperial regime in September 1974. Kervok Nalbandian was uncle forNersis Nalbandian whose also an Ethiopian citizen of Armenian descent.

Nersis Nalbandian is accredited for modernizing the Ethiopian Music sincethe 1940s until the fall of the Imperial regime in September, 1974.
Professor Nersis Nalbandian with Ethiopian Musicians used to conduct theOrchestra of the Imperial guard and choired the imperial anthem.

The Golden years For Ethiopian Music
TRADITIOAL FOLKES MUSIC, MODERN ETHIOPIAN MUSICS, ETHIOPIANMODERN INSTRUMENTALS HITS, DISCOGRAPHIES REISSUED IN CD & VINYL BY AMHA RECODS, KAIFA, PHILIPS ETHIOPIA Et-Al
MULATU ASTATKE: Asiyo Bellema / Nefsh Nesh:Yekermo Saw:MecheDerische
ALEMAYEHU BOROBOR: Tez Alegn Hagere / Yeshebelewa et-al
SEYOUM GEBREYESS: Mech Ene Terf Felghu / Musika Musika:Hametegnaw
/ Yehagere Gegna et-al
GETACHEW KASSA: Zemam Sew Lebene / Altegenagenem:Tezeta (slow) /Tezeta (fast): Gumm Gumm:Bichayene Tekezie / Bey Lesenabetsh:Min Yihon Mistiru / Fikrishin Eshalehu et-al
GEMECHU ETANA: Serbi Tole / Teya Suma Hati:Yakolele / ShemermareTiya et-al
MULUKEN MELESSE: Tizita / Alagegnhwatem:Wotetie Mare / Ete EndeneshGedawo: Yemiaslekes Fikir / Hedech Alu:Tenesh Kelebe Lie / Embwa Bellew:Ishururu Belut / Dingetegna Fikir:Anchin Yagegnulet / Fikrishin Kelkiyiw et-al
ABEBE TESSEMA: Ashasha Beyew / Gebre Guracha Gote et-al
TEBEREH TESFA-HUNEGN (Gual Tesfahunegn): Addei Weladitei / WelladkaHazile:Kuhulaye / Imeneni:Temeharu / Sewit Lemlem :Bedilkani / Hadara Zikehadet et-al
ALEMAYEHU ESHETE & HIRUT BEKELE (Jointly): Temelese /TeyeGidyeleshime

DANIEL YOHANNES: Wud Inate / Yesew LijASSEGEDETCH KASSA: Marewa / Sewye

ZERIHUN BEKELE (ORCHESTRA ETHIOPIA): Lekidame Atbiya /ALEMAYEHU BOREBOR: Tew

Irres

BEKELETCH TSEGAYE & ORCHESTRA ETHIOPIA: Hassabih / Abitchu
YIREFU MANYAZ & TESHOME AYELE (Jointly): Ayal Begonder / GondernaGojam:Yantchin Huneta /
KEBEDE W/MARIAM & YIREFU MANYAZ (ORCHESTRA ETHIOPIA): Weha /
Iddil
BIZUNESH BEKELE: Bayn Yemitay Edel / Tigel New :Atrakegne / Inramed:Aha Gedawo / Kal Kidan:Yemisserek Bihon / Hilm Norual Leka :Ayasayegn Chinkun / Ferenj Ager Sathed:Min Bedelkut Minew /Mehonu Asazenegn et-al
(JOINT) BEZUNESH BEKELE & GEMETCHU ITANA:
Esse Menike / Keloto Yabale Shashi
AYALEW MESFIN: Ketegegne Semi / Melyow Tela Alew: Tezetash Rekik / Harrar Dire-Dawa: Gunfan / Ahun New Tez Yaleno: Rehab / Wegene: Libe Menta Hone / "Endet Liyyeshi" Ambasel / Yikul Ineramed:Tereterkush Betam / Neye Temelesh Belwat:Che Belew / Gubilye :Ghedawou / Yesew Neger:Yewofie Birr Abeba / Indet Nesh Belulign:Sak-Sak-Beyelegni / Ewedish Neber:Good Aderegechegn / Feker Aydelmwey Makurefesh Yeker
/ Ho Bilo Hede:Wubeet / Zebeder:Degmo Layne / Yetembelel- Loga:Teregew Nebere / Konjo Lidge Nat:Hasabe / Hedech Gara Zura et-al
YIREFU MANYAZ & TESHOME AYELE (ORCHESTRA ETHIOPIA): Minjar /
KEBEDE ALI: Ittu Gela / Goradew Na
HIRUT BEKELE: Hedetch Alu / Kalkidan Akbari: Woine Alew Beju / JebaharDar Hareg:Letedar Entar / Antewneh Manalegne:Fekregnoche Feredugne /Atetfa Kefite:Des Yemiasegne / Ewnetegna Feker:Shega Lij / Teferoh Denknow:Almorkerkum Nebere / Esu Naw Meselegne:Yekonjowoch Mender / Man Yawkal Yebetein et-al
TADELE BEKELE: Enafkeshalehu / Anchie KonjoTEFERRI FELEKE: Kelkyiligne / Aynamaye:
BEYENE FIRE: Kab Konki Tsibikti / Sei Esemhal: Kedki Diki / Kemakira IleNeyre:Ketan Meanta / Woizerit Tsige:Ayneye / Meretseki et-al
ALEMAYEHU ESHETE: Tashamanalech / Wube Alem:Hedech Ashkbech / Wededkush Afkerkush:Timarkialesh / Ya Tara:Lib Tatefalech / Honey Baby:Fiker Fiker Naw / Gizew Honeshyna:Mekeyershene Salawke / Heiwote Abatei Naw:Afer Yemegnshale / Chiro Adarie Negne:Bechayane Tegodahu / Teredechewalehu:Nefas Indagyeba / Ayalkem Tedenko: Yewoine Haregitu / Yelebene Bitayiw:Addis Ababa Bete / Alteleyeshignim: Temeheret Bete / Denyew Deneba: Enhoy Nat Yabay Dar / Yesew Bet Yesew Naw:Kochen Messasate / Eruke Yalesew:Eskegizew Berchi / Tedesteshal Woy:Konjit / Tilantina Zarie:Memar Memeramer / Shegitu Marie:Yewebdar / Man Yehon Telek Saw: Ete

hol / Hameta:Nei Nei Woleba
/ Yemaynega Lelit:: Wetader Negn / Min Tichiye Midritu :Inat Yenjera Inat
/ Alem Girma: Tikur Gissila / Kenoru Lebitcha.Tsigeredaye / Yibekanal:Abebaye / Yetintu Fikratchin:Beliye / Temar Lije: Ambassel /Tenageri :Ittu Gela / Mushirit et-al
GETACHEW TESSEMA: Nuro Aybelew / Tilagn Kobelelech
TEKLE TESFAZGHI: "Abadit" / "Ab qètri berhan":"Sèlam témagwèt" /"Tsebuk zegeber tsebuk zeirekeb"
BEZUAYENE ZEGEYE: Shewit Sendai / Deke Adey:Woinai / Netsela Mai Mai
BEYENE HABTE: Embi Ila / Tefkereni Zeneberet:: Aimenekuan / Bi-IwanuAfkire

BAHTA GEBRE HIWOT: Gizie / Tessassategn Eko et-alSAMUEL BELAY: Aynochish Yirefu / Lebene Shiwshiw DAMTEW AYELE: Wofe Yillala /
SAMUEL BELAY: Keresh Endewaza

TEZERA HAILE MICHAEL: Ayitchat Neber / Kewedet Tegegnesh ASSRESS TESSEMA & HIS GROUP: Harestay / Meaza (instrumentals)
TEWOLDE REDDA: Ab Teqai Kerebi / Nehadar Zeietkewhune:Telsemki /Wuba:Hidri / Gamey:Kirar Mistequane et-al

HAILE WORKU: Bematebwa Ledagne / Enies Emamaye / YeborenawGamie / Tsegiereda Abeba:Milenu / Momona

PADDY GWADA:(ASHANTIS) I Wanna Do My Thing / Please Don´tGo:Come On And Do It / Silence

ISSATU TESSEMA (TEAM WORK): Ayamaru Ishetie:Tchimit Min Tegoda / Des Yilal Begizew:Endenesh Bebizu / Ken Ale:Lemlemwa Hagere / Gena Benigigrwa: Fiker Bekumena (jointly with Seifu Yohannes) :Yelijinet Fikir /Yikir Ayinesa et-al
LEMMA GEBRE HIWOT: Kulun Manqualeshi / Hay Loga:Asha Gedawo:Yeweyn Abebaye
Wedding Songs:
ZENEBETCH TESFAYE SELAMAWIT G. SELASSIE:: Indalayish / Ahun
Demeksh Abebaye
ABAYNEH DEJENE: Yeberha Lomie / Balengerie / Ereneiete / Balengerie
TSEHAITU BARAKI (Gual-Barkhi): Hadareye / Megemeria Fikirie: Bazay /Aminie: Lalei Bola / Akeza Koynu et-al
HASSAN ATYA (Ethiopia): Kelim Kelim / Yagemil Yasada:Yamalak Yasada /Nenu Yanenu :Wahed Eyenek / Magafi Anid:Ethiopia / Ansa Yagelbi Alhob

THE ARAYA'S FAMILY: Teweldowal / Balehebet Zuria Abra /Engeda Negne Ene / Nedowen Ensebseb (Extended Play)
FREW HAILU: ALMAZ MENE EDA NAW / IYETEGNU NEKU

MENELIK WOSSENACHEW: Belew Bedubaye / Tezeta:Asha Gedawo /Nefse Eko Nat :Menew Bacher Kere / Eshet Eshet:Mekaberene Liyew
/ Chereka :Fikratchin / Mambo Sambo:Aderetch Arada et-alAMLESET ABAI: Dekise Neire / Sadulaye LP AMLESET ABAI and her Kirar

TELELA KEBEDE: Kelemewa: Lomi tera tera

ABEBE HAILE MICHAEL: Konjitie / Tekelkey Bawaile

GIRMA BEYENE: Set Alamenme / TESFA MARIAM KIDANE: Yetesfa Tezeta

TESHOME METEKU: Gara Ser Now Betesh / Mote Adeladayou:Hasabe / Yezemed Yebada et-al

GIRMA BEYENE: Enken Yelelebish / Ene Negne By Manesh

SEIFU YOHANNES: Mecche Derische / Yekermo Saw:Ebo Lala:MelaMela / Tezeta

ESSATU TESSEMA: Ere Dimamaye / Mushrit / Chibo Aymolan /Abebayenesh et-al

GETATCHEW MEKURIA: Antchi Hoye / Shilela:Aha Gedawo /Gedamay-Gedamay

GETETCHEW MEKURIA (Saxophone)KETEMA MEKONNEN & HIS KIRAR
ORCHESTRA ETHIOPIA: Ethiopian Folkloric Songs

TAMIRAT MOLLA: Ber Ambar Seberelewo / Ene YewodedquatSOLOMON SHIBESHI: Elil Bale Hoy / Lomi Wesheba

GIRMA BEYENE: Yebekagnale / MULATU ASTATKE: Yegele TezetaLEMMA DEMISSEW: Adrashash Tefabedgne / Lezelalem Nuree
TAMRAT FERENJI: Anchin Yagegnulet / Fikrishin Kelkiyiw:TAMRATFERENGI: Ya Jaleleto / Bultiko

Woya:Anchin et-al

ASTER AWEKE: Anteye / Lomiye :Mulu / Etetu Beredegne WUBSHET FISEHA: "Mariyé Marwèlèla" / "Sèw Endayhon Yèllèm"LP KASSA TESSEMA & HIS KIRAR
MISRAK KEBEDE & MESENQO et-al

ABDELLA AHMED: Beredu Jimma / Malo Ya Merole

BEREKET MENGISTAAB: Nibeyney Koyne / Imbaba:Uffey Bireri / Shew Beli:Meley / Imbeytey Weizero:Libey Keygage / Bilen Ayney:Amora Intezikewin / Neinay Indo:Fikirey Tselima / Harri Maetebey:Barih Getsa /Kewilowa Gime:Wessen / Kemey Aloki

AMBAYE HABTE MICHAEL: Gotena Hidmo / Gamey Welelo

TEFERA KASSA: Akale Wubie / Infelig Guadegna:Tilagnko Hedetch / FikirAygebatchew:Lemin Tefashi / Kenu Ken Yitilal et-al

TESHOME DEMESSE: Hode Mela / Adarashu Bete KETEMA ENDECHAW: Chekolata / Bediron Kemesew
ALI MOHAMMED BIRRA: Eshurourou / Hinyadini: Abba Lafa / EsetinSiarga:Awash / Sinhanbisin Werri

MAHMOUD AHMED: Asheweyna / Belomy Benna:Erre Mela - Mechenew /Nafkot Naw Yegodagne / Yasdestal Abbai Mado - Embewa Belew
:Sedegnashe Negne – Sameraye / Endenesh Gedawo:Tezeta / Eho Ho Gedama:Atawurulign Lela/Ebakish Tarekigni:Kulum / Fikir Endegena:Ambasel / Mela Mela: Ney Denun Tesesh / Wogenie:Gubelye /Anchie Enen Wudegigne:Etu Gela / Alemye:
Selam Almazeye / Lomiwen Tekebeletch: Ney Denun Tesesh / Belaya Belaya:Gizie:Ebo Lala / Fikir Bezebezegn / Hulum Begizew New Mella Tistegn / Tizita: Esset Mera Degu:Mar : Yeshiharegitu / Eneman NeberuTeb Yilal Kafesh / Aynoche Terabu Neger / Yieker Memekatish

TSEHAI ENDALE: Tsegurewa Wordo / Anten Neiw

A short history of Aircraft in Ethiopia’
Wemezekir: By Professor Richard Pankhurst

It was on Sunday, 18th August, 1929 that the first aeroplane landed in Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia. Ethiopia is becoming known for its signature airline which just announced its 63rd worldwide destination. Richard Pankhurst writes that even though airplanes took a long time to arrive here a monoplane assembled in the country named Tsehai after Haile Selassie's daughter was one of the first planes assembled in Africa. The aeroplane was slow to make an appearance in Ethiopia, reportedly because Empress Zawditu and the Minister of War, Fitawrari Habte Giyorgis Dinagde,nom de guered as Aba-Mela were both conservatives and opposed to the winged innovation.The Ethiopian Government, reacting to Italian Fascist plans of conquest, decided, however, in 1929 topurchase a limited amount of aircraft. An order for two planes was despatched that year to a German firm, but delivery was delayed, it is said, by the French authorities in Jibuti, so that French aircraft could arrive in Ethiopia first.
The arrival in Addis Ababa of the very first aeroplane, a French twin- engined Potez piloted from Jibuti by the French aviator, André Maillet, wasrecalled many years later by an old Austrian friend, Alfred Abel. In a communication to the Journal of Ethiopian Studies, for July 1972 he wrote: "It was on Sunday, 18 August 1929 that the first aeroplane landedin the capital of Ethiopia... At almost the same time as the French plane was being unloaded [at Jibuti] from the SS Porthos a steamer of the Norddeutscher Lloyd carried into the port a Junckers ordered from Germany... "Naturally each crew was competing for the glory of being thefirst to fly into Ethiopia and tremendous efforts were made on both sides to achieve this. In the end it was the French who won the day. This was not surprising as the Port and other authorities did their utmost to assist their own nationals, and as the Germans alleged – with some truth probably, all sorts of difficulties were put in their way..." And Abel continues: "There was, of course, tremendous excitement in town when the day and approximate hour of arrival [of the aeroplane] became knowna few days before the flight. From early in the morning on that historic Sunday, an endless procession made its way to the improvised air-strip, on foot, horse and mule, and also in cars, although there were very few in circulation in those days. Fortunately the weather was fair and the sky cloudless despite the rainy season – and the pilot must have felt immensely relieved during the last stage of the flight with visibility perfect... "A large tent had been prepared for the Prince Regent [i.e. Negus TaffariMekonnen], the Diplomatic Corps and other distinguished guests. The Prince remained in front of the tent scanning the sky with his binoculars,while making conversation with the French Minister, Monsieur de Reffye,who had appeared with the entire Legation staff and looked very important, though slightly nervous..." "There were a few moments of anxious suspense when a telegraph message was brought to the Regentshortly after 10 o'clock advising that the aeroplane had been obliged to make a forced landing, having run out of petrol. However the engine was rapidly refilled... “It was exactly 35 minutes after 10 o’clock when the plane first became visible against the south-eastern sky linsky-line, looking not much larger than a bird, but increasing in size as it quickly approached the air-strip. “An indescribable enthusiasm seized the crowd when they sighted the plane and realised that it was not just a bird, but the real thing. Amid the jubilant shouting and frantic hand-clapping the Police and Guards were hard pressed to prevent the seething crowd from rushing on to the roped-off area [reserved for the plane]. An enormous flag was waved all the time to show the exact spot to land. ‘The plane came down, landing in perfect style, and taxied towards the tent; the engine stopped, the door was flung open and out jumped the crew (the pilot and his mechanic) looking rather tired, but proud and smiling happily. ‘’Again the guards had great difficulty in clearing the way for them to reach the tent, where they were graciously welcomed by the Prince Regent and congratulated on what in those days was, quite rightly,considered a remarkable performance. Champagne was served... ”Thus ended, most successfully, the first day in the history of flying in Ethiopia.”

Ethiopian aviation in those far off days was at first largely foreign-run. TheAir Force was thus successively commanded by the afore-mentioned André Maillet and his compatriot Paul Corriger, while most of the mechanics and instructors were likewise French. The staff nevertheless also included several Germans, as well as an Armenian and a Romanian.

Training was carried out at Dire Dawa and Jigjiga, as well as in Addis Ababa. Ethiopianization in the years immediately prior to the Fascist invasion nevertheless made good progress. The chief pilot at this time wasMicha Babicheff, who was half-Ethiopian and half-Russian. He was assistedby three Ethiopian pilots: Bahru Kaba, who had studied in France, TesfayeMichael, in Egypt and France, and Asfaw Ali in Dire Dawa. An Addis Ababa airport was duly established on the Addis Ababa – Addis Alem road, a few kilometres from the capital, but was soon moved to a more convenient site at Jan Hoy Meda, an open field just north of the Menilek Palace, or east of the later Palace of Haile Selassie (now Addis Ababa University’s main campus). The Ethiopian Government meanwhile attempted to purchase more planes, with the result that the country by the time of the invasion possessed thirteen aircraft – of which however, only eight were reportedly air-worthy. The result of this shortage of planes was that when it came to fighting the invaders had complete control of the air, which they used for heavy bombing, as well as for the dropping of poison gas.

The most interesting of Ethiopia’s pre-war aircraft was a small 7-.37 metrelong re-designed Junkers monoplane assembled in the country. Called Tsehai after Emperor Haile Selassie’s daughter of that name, as well as “Ethiopia I”, it was one of the first, if not actually the first aeroplane, to beproduced in Africa. It was designed by a German pilot, Herr Ludwig Weber, who supervised its construction and flew it for an estimated thirty hours towards the end of 1935 and the first months of 1936. He left Addis Ababa, however, on 3 May of that year immediately prior to the Italian occupation of the Ethiopian capital. This remarkable plane was specially designed for high altitude flight. It was reportedly able to climb a thousand metres from 2,500 to 3,500 metres above sea level in only seven minutes, and could come to a halt in 100 metres without any use ofbrakes. This flying machine, which came to be known at “the plane of the Negus”, or King, and was reportedly registered in the name of the latter’s family, was taken to Italy as a “Booty of War”. Originally painted in silver-grey it became the property of the Italian Museo dell’Accademia Aeronautica, at Caserta, in southern Italy, where it was for some obscure reason re-painted in red, with vertical stripes in the Ethiopian national colours, green, yellow and red. The plane was then transferred to the main Museo Storico, where Ethiopian visitors were allegedly discouraged from asking questions about their country’s old aeroplane. When Addis Ababa’s new airport was planned the architect proposed that the old “aeroplane of the Negus” should be hung in the main reception hall, to symbolise the country’s age-old desire for modernisation. Though an historic machine which should have been returned - like the Aksum Obelisk – in accordance with Article 37 of the Italian Peace Treaty with theUnited Nations, concluded in 1947, repatriation has thus far been denied. Ethiopia remains deprived of this part of her historic heritage. For the subsequent history of Ethiopian aviation, the successful story of Ethiopian Airlines, readers are referred to the important monograph of Professor Bahru Zewde, Bringing Africa Together, published by Ethiopian Airlines in 1988. (Text ends)

ART & DESIGN - Aleka Gebre Selassie Adil's (1881-1975)Mother Ethiopia Paint of the 1960s:
The painting is in the shape of a pyramid. At the top is the head of a symbolic mother figure. The center of the painting is dominated by a middle-aged woman, sitting resolutely with feet and hands carefully placed. Her smooth oval face, melancholic gaze and tender mouth, make her an ideal mother figure. There is a soft, radiant light framing her head,presenting an almost celestial image. Her coiffure, the necklace with golden cross pendant, and the talisman serve to identify her faith, her tradition, and define her as a uniquely Ethiopian. Her head is not positioned in a way that is usually associated with a maternal display of love for a child, but rather of a proud and euphoric mother. "Mother Ethiopia" is the mother of children who are consciously and willingly conceived. Although the significance of the portrayal of this many childrenis obvious to anyone familiar with the administrative regions of Ethiopia. the painting had a deeper, more profound meaning for the painter. At anemotional level, we perceive our country as the 'Princess of nations' -- blessed with a promising and exciting future. In that regard, it seems thatAleka's artistic representation appeals to the perception we have of our country -- that of a unified totality, and a harmonious blend of ethnicingredients.

25 FACTS ABOUT THE ETHIOPIAN CAPITAL, ADDIS ABABA’

1. The first bank established was the “Bank of Abyssinia” in 1905.

2. Dagmawi Menelik Hospital was in 1909 the first hospital built in AddisAbaba. It was built to accommodate 200 patients.
3. Ethiopian Telecommunications Corporation was established on March 9,1894, it included telegraph and postal services. It is the oldest public telecommunications operator in Africa.

4. The first telegraph line was constructed between Addis Ababa andHarar in 1899.
5. The first law requiring Addis Ababans to pay taxes to the municipalitywas enacted in 1942.
6. In 1902 tap water was first installed in the Palace, it cost 7,000 Eth.birr.
7. TO.MO.CA. Coffee Shop was the first coffee company, it was established in 1953. The name stands for Torrefazzione Moderna Café,which means Modern Coffee Roasting.
8. The first locomotive was brought to Addis Ababa in 1904 and it was used to transport construction material into the city to build houses andother structures.
9. The first public toilets were built in 1975, there were about 30 of it'skind in Addis Ababa.
10. The first Boeing airliner jet landed in the city on December 3, 1962.
11. The first Ethiopian stamps were printed and sold in 1908. They wereprinted in France.
12. In 1905, the first school modeled after western education was openedwith teachers who came from Alexandria, Egypt.
13. Mercato, formerly known as mercato indigino is the largest outdoor market in Africa, it started off as a segregated Ethiopians only marketduring the 5-year Italian occupation, hence the term indigino for indigenous.
14. The National Palace, located near the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa, was built to celebrate Emperor Haileselassie I's silver Jubilee in 1955, hence its former name Jubilee Palace. It wasmodeled after theBuckingham palace in the United Kingdom.
15. The old post office by Piassa used to be the home of Mohammed Ali, avery well known Indian merchant from Gujurat who introduced corrugated iron sheets and abujedid and much more to the city.
16. There's a Karl Marx monument located inside Debab Restaurant acrossthe street from Addis Ababa University main campus. It's a reminisce of the country's communist past.
17. Alembekagn, also known as cerchele, is the first western style prisonbuilt in the city in 1923. It was designed in an octagonal architecture to better monitor prisoners. It was demolished to make way for thenew African Union Headquarters.

18. Driving regulations required that cars drive on the left side of the roaduntil it was changed in 1964 to right handed traffic.
19. Itege (Empress) Taitu proclaimed a law requiring every citizen to sendtheir 7 to 21 year old children to school or get fined 50 birr.

20. May 5th is the day that marked the beginning and the end of the Italian occupation of Ethiopia. On May 5th of 1936 the Italian armymarched into Addis Ababa, and on May 5th 1941 Emperor Haileselassie and his army and allies marched into Addis Ababa ending the 5-year occupation.
21. The present day Piassa used to be a segregated market place reservedfor Italians during the 5-year occupation of Ethiopia.
22. Mexico Square was built to recognize Mexico's support for Ethiopia as it was the only nation in theLeague of Nations to have condemned Italy's occupation. In return, Mexico named a metro station stop afterEthiopia.
23. Addis Ababa University was first founded as the University College ofAddis Ababa in 1950, it was thenrenamed Haileselassie I University in1962, and in 1975 it was renamed Addis Ababa University
24. The first Ethiopian coins with Emperor Menelik II's face and namewere mined in 1897.
25. The first time electric power and lights were introduced in 1923, it wasmainly used in government offices, the Palace and certain houses. (Text ends)

Understanding the Highland Eritrea, commonly known as 'Kebessa' Akele-Guzay: Akele or Dequi-Akele: The province of Akele-Guzay was part of what is known as greater Bur when upper mereb and lower mereb were a united kingdom in the 14th century. Greater Bur included the entire Akele-Guzay in Eritrea and Aagame in Tigray of Ethiopia and thus the two people are very identical sharing similar cultures in warfare, trade and cultural laws. Notables who hailed from Akele-Guzay include Dejazmach Bahta Hagos of Segeneiti a powerful chieftan for sometimes of upper mere who resisted Italian encroachment and died in fighting againstthe Italians. Bahta Hagos was Dejazmach of Akele-Guzay, and retrospectively considered an important leader of Italian resistance. He was born in the mid-19th century in the town of Segeneiti and was killed in a battle against the Italian Colonial Army on December 19, 1894. Note the ruling family of Akele-Guzay are idiginious Akele that means they werehereditary rulers hailing from Akele-Guzay, while that of Aagame, their rulers came from Lasta western part of present Wollo region in Ethiopia, particularly the family of Shum-Aagame Woldu whose son Dejazmach Subagadis Woldu was entitled as 'Shum-Aagame', the hereditary chief of Aagame and a one time overlord of Tigray during the Zemene Mesafint (1818-1831) who succeeded the powerful overlord of Enderta, Ras Bitwadad Wolde Sealssie (1788 to 1816).

Seraye: Serawatay or Dequi-Seraye: The kingdom known as Seraya isone of the provinces that make up Kebessa and it is an oldest province, itis mentioned as one of the 13th Tigrigina speaking kigdoms of northern Ethiopia, including the entire Tigray and the entire Mereb milash. The people of Seraya to the most part are not known to have idiginious hereditary chiefs unlike that of Hamassien and Akele-Guzay, a great number of Tigrians particulary from Adwa and aksum had migrated in thepast including from Amhara provinces thus, it is a kingdom of an influx ofmigrants from many parts of Tigrya, Amhara and Eritrea, the people of Seraya are very much similar to that of Adwa in Tigray and to some extent that of aksum in Tigray in that, they are totally the opposite of Hamasien and Akele-Guzay who mirror Enderta - Tembien and Aagame respectively but Seraya very much is identical with the people of Adwa less known for heroism in warfare and very similar to Adwa in culture, manners and norms.

Hamassien: Hamassenay or Dequi-Hamassien: Historically Hamassien was an autonomous kingdom that traces its roots to the proudancient kingdom of aksum, this part of Kebessa or highlander Eritrea, was also the seat of the powerful governor of highland Kebessa under the title“Baher-Negash” from 13th century to 16th century A.D and the historical seat of the Baher-Negash was located in the Hamassien area of present Debarewa which was later moved into Seraye. Notable two familes alternated to rule the kingdom of Hamassien, namely the clans of Hazegaand the clans of Tsaazega until the late 20th century to whome Dejazmach Hailu of Hazega and Ras Woldemikael of Tsaazega belonged.

The people are in general truth-seeking, honest, straight, fierce and proud just like the people of Enderta and Tembien in Tigray. Just like Enderta and Tembien of Tigray region in Ethiopia, Eritrean Hamassiens dominatedmost of the economic, political and military posts of the 18- to 21th century Eritrea and for this they have successfully made Asmara sometime known as ‘piccolo Roma’ which is part of the greater Hamassien, the center of Eritrea’s power base in terms of economy, military, science, technology and business.

HISTORY: The Ethiopian Administration in Eritrea province under ImperialEthiopia
(Sept. 15, 1962 to Sept. 12, 1974)

HRH Tenagnework Haile Selassie & Ras Andargatchew Messai - Vice Rein& Vice Roy of Eritrea.

Brigadier-General Abiye Abebe - Governor-General - From 14thNovember, 1962 to July, 1964

Leul Ras Asrate-Medhin Kassa - Governor-General- From July, 1964 toDecember, 1970

Lt. General Debebe Haile-Mariam – Military Emergency Governor - FromDecember, 1970 to August, 1974.

The Dyfunct Eritrea Federation with Ethiopia (September, 1962 to May,1991)

When Eritrea entered into a federation with Ethiopia, previously landlocked Ethiopia briefly enjoyed the use of Massawa as the headquarters of the now defunct Ethiopian Navy ultimately, Ethiopia dismantled the federation and forcibly annexed and occupied Eritrea. Thisled to the Eritrean War of Independence (1961–1991). In February 1990,units of the Eritrean People's Liberation Front captured Massawa in a surprise attack from both land and sea. Known as Operation Fenkil, the attack utilized both infiltrated commandos and speed boats. The success of this attack cut the major supply line to the Second Ethiopian Army in Asmara, which then had to be supplied by air. In response, the then leader of Ethiopia Mengistu Haile Mariam ordered Massawa bombed from the air, resulting in considerable damage. As of 2005 the Eritrean government is rebuilding and repairing this damage.

The Federation of Ethiopia And Eritrea OR Eritrea Federation With Ethiopia

It was a federation of the Ethiopian Empire and Eritrea. It was created by the approval of the Federal Act in Ethiopia and the Eritrean Constitution on15 September 1952. Prior to the annexation of Eritrea, the Chief Justice ofEritrea was removed and the official Eritrean languages were eliminated infavor of Ethiopia's national language Amharic. During the Federation, the encroachment of the Ethiopian Crown was felt on the Chief Executive of Eritrea. This was in direct contravention of the UN Resolution 390-A(V) which had established the Federation. The federal structure, or some semblance of it, existed between 15 September 1952 and 15 November 1962. On 15 November 1962, following pressure from Haile Selassie I onthe Eritrean Assembly, the Federation was officially dissolved and Eritreawas annexed by Ethiopia.

The Chief Executive of Eritrea Federation With Ethiopia'

The Chief Executive of Eritrea Federation with Ethiopia was the premier position of the Federation between Eritrea and Ethiopia. It was first held by Tedla Bairu while its last occupant was Abiye Abebe. On 20 May 1960the post was dissolved and replaced by the Governor-General of Eritrea, which was appointed directly by the Emperor of Ethiopia. This in effect dissolved the independent Federal structure and was a prelude to the official, possibly illegal, annexation of Eritrea as a province of Ethiopia on14 November 1962.

List of Chief Executives of Eritrea Federation With Ethiopia (1952–1960)

Tedla Bairu ---------- September 15, 1952 to July 29, 1955 (inde-facto) From 8th August, 1955 to December, 1959 (in de-jure)

Asfaha Wolde Mikael ---------- August 8, 1955 to December 1959 (in de-jure)

Abiye Abebe ---------- December 1959 to May 20, 1960

Abiye Abebe ---------- May 20, 1960 to November 14, 1962Eritrea under Imperial Ethiopian Governorate

November 14, 1962 to 1964 ---------- Abiye Abebe Governor-General

July 1964 to December 1970 ---------- Leul Ras Asrate Medhin KassaGovernor-General

December 1970 to August 1974 -------- Lt. General Debebe Haile Mariam(Emergency Governor)

Ethiopian province of Eritrea: September 1974 to May, 1991;

August 1974 to 29 May 1976 ----------Amanuel Amde Mikael, ChiefAdministrator

Brigadier General Getachew Nadew --- Military Administrator Aug.19,1976 to Aug.19, 1976

Ammanuel Amde-Michael - Chief Administrator --- From August, 1974 to29th May, 1976, and again from May 29, 1976 to 19th August, 1976

Ato Fikrou Wolde-Tinsae - Chief Administrator from August, 1981 to 29thMay, 1983

Majour-General Merid Negussie – Military Commander & Administrator

Majour Dawit Wolde-Giorgis – Chief Administrator/Provincial Party secretary August, 1983 to August, 1987: And again from 19th August,1987 to 18th May, 1989:

Brigadier-General Affeworki Wolde-Mikael (the younger brother of unionistBitwadad Asfaha Wolde Michael) - civilian chief administrator of the region19th Aug.1989 to 28th May, 1991

Lt. General Tesfaye Guebrekidan: Emergency Administrator & MilitaryCommander of the Ground forces in Eritrea.

HISTORICAL GLANCE – The Defunct 'Eritrea Federation with Ethiopia'

As well known Eritrea had been placed under British military administration in January, 1941 after the Italian surrender. In keepingwith the 1950 decision of the UN General Assembly, British military administration ended in September 1952 and was replaced by a new autonomous Eritrean government in federal union with Ethiopia.

Federation with the former Italian colony restored an unhindered maritimefrontier to the country. The new arrangement also enabled the country to gain limited control of a territory that, at least in its inland areas, was more advanced politically and economically. The Four Power Inquiry Commission established by the World War II Allies (Britain, France, the Soviet Union, and the United States) had failed to agree in its September 1948 report on a future course for Eritrea. Several countries had displayedan active interest in the area. In the immediate postwar years, Italy had requested that Eritrea be returned as a colony or as a trusteeship. This bidwas supported initially by the Soviet Union, which anticipated a communist victory at the Italian polls. The Arab states, seeing Eritrea and its large Muslim population as an extension of the Arab world, sought the establishment of an independent state. Some Britons favored a division of the territory, with the Christian areas and the coast from Mitsiwa southward going to Ethiopia and the northwest area going to Sudan. A UNcommission, which arrived in Eritrea in February 1950, eventually approved a plan involving some form of association with Ethiopia. In December the UN General Assembly adopted a resolution affirming the commission's plan, with the provision that Britain, the administering power, should facilitate the UN efforts and depart from the colony no laterthan September 15, 1952. Faced with this constraint, the British administration held elections on March 16, 1952, for a Representative Assembly of sixty-eight members. This body, made up equally of Christians and Muslims, accepted the draft constitution advanced by the UN commissioner on July 10. The constitution was ratified by the emperor on September 11, and the Representative Assembly, by prearrangement, was transformed into the Eritrean Assembly three days before the federation was proclaimed. The UN General Assembly resolution of September 15, 1952, adopted by a vote of forty-seven to ten, provided that Eritrea should be linked to Ethiopia through a loose federal structure under the emperor's sovereignty but with a form and organization of internal self-government. The federal government, which for all intents and purposes was the existing imperial government, was to control foreignaffairs, defense, foreign and interstate commerce, transportation, and finance. Control over domestic affairs (including police, local administration, and taxation to meet its own budget) was to be exercised by an elected Eritrean assembly on the parliamentary model. The state was to have its own administrative and judicial structure and its own flag. Almost from the start of federation, the emperor's representative undercutthe territory's separate status under the federal system. In August 1955, Tedla Bairu, an Eritrean who was the chief executive elected by the assembly, resigned under pressure from the emperor, who replaced Tedla with his own nominee. He made Amharic the official language in place of Arabic and Tigrinya, terminated the use of the Eritrean flag, and moved many businesses out of Eritrea. In addition, the central government proscribed all political parties, imposed censorship, gave the top administrative positions to Amhara, and abandoned the principle of parity between Christian and Muslim officials. In November 1962, the Eritrean Assembly, many of whose members had been accused of accepting bribes,voted unanimously to change Eritrea's status to that of a province of Ethiopia. Following his appointment of the archconservative Ras Asrate Kasa as governor general, the emperor was accused of "refeudalizing" the territory. The extinction of the federation consolidated internal and external opposition to union. Four years earlier, in 1958, a number of Eritrean exiles had founded the Eritrean Liberation Movement (ELM) in Cairo, under Hamid Idris Awate's leadership. This organization, however, soon was neutralized. A new faction, the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF), emerged in 1960. Initially a Muslim movement, the ELF was nationalist rather than Marxist and received Iraqi and Syrian support. As urban Christians joined, the ELF became more radical and anticapitalist.

Beginning in 1961, the ELF turned to armed struggle and by 1966 challenged imperial forces throughout Eritrea. The rapid growth of the ELFalso created internal divisions between urban and rural elements, socialists and nationalists, and Christians and Muslims. Although these divisions did not take any clear form, they were magnified as the ELF extended its operations and won international publicity. In June 1970, Osman Salah Sabbeh, former head of the Muslim League of Eritrea, brokeaway from the ELF and formed the Popular Liberation Forces (PLF), which led directly to the founding of the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF)in early 1972. Both organizations initially attracted a large number of urban, intellectual, and leftist Christian youths and projected a strong socialist and nationalist image. By 1975 the EPLF had more than 10,000 members in the field. However, the growth of the EPLF was also accompanied by an intensification of internecine Eritrean conflict, particularly between 1972 and 1974, when casualties were well over 1,200. In 1976 Osman Salah Sabbeh broke with the EPLF and formed the Eritrean Liberation Front-Popular Liberation Front (ELF-EPLF), a division that reflected differences between combatants in Eritrea and representatives abroad as well as personal rivalries and basic ideological differences, factors important in earlier splits within the Eritrean separatistgroups.

Opposition politics and the challenges of clandestine political opposition inEthiopia’

Ethiopian peoples Revolutionary Party (EPRP) claims it surmounts all andcontinues the noble struggle that many had sacrificed their lives for it.

EPRP has launched a SW radio broadcast to Ethiopia for more than a decade, campaigned in various ways, allied with other political groups, and coalitions to form a united front, believed it has now networks in almost all regions of the country. Efforts have been made to implement democracy and the rule of law in Ethiopia. The EPRP has been forced fromthe outset to struggle as a clandestine party.

Negadras Guebre-Hiwot Baykedagn (1886-1919) Ethiopian doctor, economist, and all around intellectual. Guebre-Hiwot was born in 1886 ina town of northern Ethiopia, Adwa died at the age of 33.
Side note: Negadras literally meaning for "Economist" Guebre-Hiwot Baykedagn published two majors works in Amharic, the Ethiopian nationallanguage: "Mengistna ye Hizb Astadadar", published in 1924 after his death and translated in to English in 1995 as “State and Economy of Early20th Century Ethiopia” and in 1912 "Atse Menilik na Ethiopia", which was translated in to French in 1993 as "UEmpereur Menelik et VEthiope" i.e. "Emperor Menelik and Ethiopia". Aste Menelik and Ethiopia was written with the hopes that Menelik’s successor, Lij Eyasu Mikael would take up his recommendations and proceed to modernize the Ethiopian state.
Guebre-Hiwot went on to exert considerable influence on Ethiopian affairsfor the rest of the century. During the reign of Emperor Haileselassie, he authored his most significant piece “Mengist ena Yezib Astedader” (Government and Public Administration). This volume contained economicthinking and principles that had yet to become major topics of discussion even by pioneering Western economists. His writings expressed deep concern with national institutions, structural economics, income inequalityin development, and trade imbalance between developed and underdeveloped nations. Guebre-Hiwot Baikedagn served as inspector of the important Addis- Ababa-Djibouti railway until his premature death at the age of 33 in 1919.
MEISON was formed as a clandestine organization during the 8th ESUE (Ethiopian Student Union in Europe) congress in August 1968 by some ofthe most senior of the exiled radical Ethiopian students. Prominent founders include: Worku Ferede (elected chairman at meeting), Kebede Mengesha, Negede Gobeze, Andargachew Assegid, Fikre Merid, Hagos Guebreyesus, and Haile Fida (chairman and an Oromo from Wellega.
Other early prominent members included Endrias Eshete, Alem Habtu, andDessalegn Rahmato.
MEISON and the EPRP quickly grew to be the two dominant Marxist parties, and their leadership & members across Europe, North America, and the Middle East quickly returned home to take part in the revolution. Ideological friction between EPRP and MEISON, for years played out in thearena of exile student politics, would never come close to improving at home, with deadly consequences for all. The EPRP opposed the Duerg, claiming it was standing in the way of a genuine "people's democracy" andlater accusing Mengistu Haile Mariam of fascism. MEISON, on the other hand, was willing to allow the Duerg authority in restructuring Ethiopian society along Marxist-Leninist principles, at least for the time being, and favored a more "controlled democracy." Because of this, MEISON won the Duerg's favor, and gained key posts in the new government.
Ideological differences eventually erupted into violent conflict that peakedin 1976, with clashes between EPRP and MEISON supporters and EPRP attacks against public buildings and high-ranking Duerg officials. In response to this instability, Mengistu implemented a program of Red Terror (1977-78), designed to eliminate all EPRP opposition. During the first stages of the Red Terror, MEISON remained closely allied with the Duerg and assisted in combatting suspected EPRP supporters. But later in1977, the Duerg turned on MEISON, fearing its membership was more loyal to the party than it was to the Duerg. In August 1977, most of MEISON's domestic leadership including its chairman Haile Fida, quickly went underground and Haile attempted to flee northwest of Addis Ababa to his home province of Welega, but all were arrested and later executed.All other high-ranking MEISON members were removed from their government posts, and the Duerg soon launched a bloody campaign against rural MEISON supporters.

TRADITION – Take your note on the Abyssiniyan Traditional Horsenames(Nom-de-guerre)'

A "Horsename" equivalent to a "nom-de-guere", is customary for ancient Ethiopian warriors, patriots and heroes to assume the name of their horses. These iconic figures were named after their loyal steed which theyrode in a battle or on other landmark occasions. And most of these namescame with the prefix "Abba" referring to the people who own the animals.Among some of the renowned horses which belonged to kings or war generals of the past are included Emperor Tewodros's Abba-Tatek, Emperor Yohannes IV's (Abba-Bezbiz), Ras Alula Eqube (Abba-Nega), KingSahle-selassie's (Abba Dina), Ras Gobena Dacce (Abba-Tigu), Ras Tessema Nadew (Abba-Quemaw), Ras Mekonnen Wolde Michael Gudissa (Abba-Kagnew), Habte-Giorgis Dinagde (Abba-Mela, Dejazmatch Balcha Safo (Abba-Nefso) Emperor Haileselassie (Abba-Tequil), Fikre-Mariam (Abba-Techan) etc,. According to oral tradition, horsemanship in Ethiopia dates back to ancient times. Some have written about the medieval kings like Zera Yaeqob (1434-1468) being one of the best horsemen of the time. It was believed that when his palace at Debre-Birhan was built, it was structured so that he can ride in and out of the palace easily. EmperorSusenyos was also believed to have four to five thousand cavalrymen.

Horses were not only confined to the royalty; in fact they were very muchpresent in the lives of ordinary people as it was a show of "manhood" andwas a means of transportation at the time. With urbanization those generation of horsemen appear to be getting scarce around cities.

Nowadays urbanites consider horseback riding as something that belongs to the rural areas. With the exception of a few occasions like Epiphany, a religious procession that's to be celebrated at Jan-Meda parade ground theurbanites of Addis and horses seem to prefer to stay alien to one another. Present-day Addis Ababa is filled with cafes and going from one to anotherall day long seems to be the trend. Getting away from the hustle bustle of the city and going to places like Langano, Sodere and to most such resorts is considered to be a luxury. Located a few km away from Addis, the township called Sululta is one place that is relatively gaining prominence as an-out-of-town outing for urbanites of the capital these days. The freshair as one approaches the township is quite relaxing. Especially on weekends, people frequent the place for its special tej and meat. But for someone who cares to take a look around in Sululta, there is another excellent means of entertainment -horseback-riding. On the road to Sululta, after passing a big blue factory named Oromia Steel and Pipe KUSO, there is a sign that says Equus (horse) to the right side of the road. Passing through the gravel road, you will be captivated with a very huge compound, exquisite view of nature, green trees and horses prancing in the field. The beautiful plateau of Sululta and the Entoto forestsurround the compound. The place offers horse treks and rides. Every horse has its own room where the names are displayed on each door, together with their specific behaviors and characters. Looking at the horses, it is tempting to try to ride one of them; but the trainers advise visitors to take caution without discouraging them in the process. One would definitely be compelled to try to ride one of the horses; and once onone of the beautiful horses, the experience is different. The feeling of a powerful horse beneath you and the feeling of supple connection with the animal is incredible. Text ends

FINANCE - On to ‘National Bank of Ethiopia’, abbreviated as NBE’

The central bank of Ethiopia reported loosened it's fiscal, montary andcurrency policies’

In a move economists said is aimed at increasing the amount of cash thatbanks available for lending, and others meaningful relevance to economicpolicymaking and policy implementation in a market friendly environmentare essentials.

ETHIOPIA - Public speculation: On Ethiopia’s granting of Scholarship forneighbouring Eritreans’

Government of Ethiopia accused of granting scholarships for Eritrean origins in sacrifice of natives raised concern among citizens. Aabout 52Degree, 18 Masters, 1 Phd scholarship study programmes have been granted for Eritrean nationals at Mekelle University’

ETHIOPIA - On State & Party corruption and embezzelment’

Observation:: In the western culture leaders usually elected every few years depends on the country’s constitution. However, in the African continent most are usually replaced by force except a very few governments. In the Ethiopian context, the thousand years Solomonic ancestral monarchy was overthrown by the Duerg military junta which was also in turn removed by the Tigrai People Liberation Front (TPLF) led rebel group. The TPLF’s are so different from the previous leaders and taking this country back to the previous century. When Emperor Thewodros II ascended to the throne in 1855, one of his main aims was toend the era of the princes and re-unified the nation as Ethiopia. He was constantly on the mission to the neighbouring provinces to accomplish hisdream. He committed suicide on the fortress of Meqedela on 14th April 1868 but of course he paved the way for reunification. The subsequent leaders let the torch of unity go on and his vision was eventually materialised. This year, it is 144 years since Emperor Tewodros died and unlike his vision and earlier leaders, the ruling party has facilitated the way to disintegrate the country. It is my fervent hope that it won’t happenas this is not the desire of the Ethiopian people. The leadership has been accused of being involved in venal practices. Rampant corruption is in its highest level in the country’s history. Some of the crass remarks made bygovernment officials are disturbing and make you wonder whether these people have the slightest idea about our culture or administration. People accuse the government of riding roughshod over the country's law. Most people complain about courts being corrupted and miscarriages of justice.The definition of power in Ethiopia is an opportunity to embezzle and expropriate public fund; to receive bribes and abuse helpless people whereas in the West is to serve the people. People justify such atrocious behaviour by quoting our adage "sishom yalbela sishar yikochewal" which could be rendered in English as "he/she who did not benefited when promoted, would regret later when he/she demoted." –Editor

ETHIOPIA - Several hundred leading student protesters have been throwninto jail' After a riot broke out at the Adama University, 100 km south of the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, according to newsreports. The Region's riot police rounds up students who are suspected of participating in the riot. It was unable to ascertain the cause of the disturbance yet, but one student anonimously told in Addis Ababa that fighting took place betweenstudents who are supporters of the ruling-party and opponents before police was arrived in the University compound.

ETHIOPIA – Reality & The Matter of Fact'

VIEWS: Every appointed or elected leader must be accountable and should be responsible for her/his wrong doings, according to political thinkers. "If we really are up for positive change and development, formerEPRDF leaders who join the opposition must be held accountable for all what they did before. That EPRDF preferred collective leadership before itsgrand division justifies the move to ask defectors for a public apology. As a matter of fact, every appointed or elected leader must be accountable and responsible for wrong doings. It is illogical and insincere to say that doing so is not among the priority for now. But if defectors want to get embraced well, they must clarify their political history sincerely. It is illogical and insincere to say that doing so is not among the priority for now. But if defectors want to get embraced well, they must clarify their political history sincerely. The opposition camp should not be considered a safe haven for fired, frustrated and retired leaders from EPRDF. They mustlearn from Dr Negasso Gidada, who publicly apologized, if we really are upfor positive change and development, former EPRDF leaders who join the opposition must be held accountable for all what they did before. That EPRDF preferred collective leadership before its grand division justifies themove to ask defectors for a public apology.

Mauritanian authorities have exposed a Mossad network'

Authorities in the west African country of Mauritania exposed a Mossad network involved in the assassination of Hamas official Mahmoud Mabhouhand the outburst on air of the Ethiopian passengers plane in Lebanon where a Hezbollah target was on board. According to Mauritania's Al- Huriyeh (Freedom) newspaper, the Mauritanian authorities have exposed the network in which businessmen and activists from different Arab nationalists work. The sources indicated that members recruited by Mossad, the Israeli espionage network were captured after pursuing them and monitoring their suspicious activities. The espionage network was revealed after the Mauritanian police arrested an agent, who was recruitedby a local tourism agency.

Haile Guebre Selassie is the legend Ethiopian long-distance track and roadrunning Athlete'

Rightly observed that Haile Guebre Selassie the legendary track and road runner during his hey years successfully won 2 Olympic gold medals

over 10, 000 mtrs, 4 world champion titles, 2 Olympic 10, 000 mtrs champion, and the holder of about 27 world records. Ethiopia is a nation with the world's best endurance male & female runners. The success of these Ethiopian athlets caused Ethiopian victory national anthem to be sung and their flag to be raised over the Olympic Stadiums. The Great Ethiopian Run is an annual 10-kilometre road running event, the competition was first envisioned by neighbors of Ethiopian runner Haile Guebre Selassie, Peter Middlebrook and Abi Masefield in late October 2000, following Haile's return from the 2000 Sydney Summer Olympics Games in Australia, which takes place every year in late November in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. The elite race attracts a number of prominent runners. Haile Guebr Selassie won the inaugural men's race and at the second edition many of the countries top long-distance runners competed.

Veteran fighter exposes TPLF's committed crimes'

Ato Guebre-Medhin Araya a former TPLF fighter now resides in SouthernAustralian city of Perth, continues to narrate more harrowing stories of war crimes against humanity by the TPLF leaders he specifically mentioned of Sebhat Nega and Meles Zenawi for Ethiopian Satellite Television (ESAT), says "TPLF is a mercenary controlled group that can not be reformed, it should be dismantled like the ex-South African apartheid system.

Ethiopia ranks the lowest in mobile penetration in Africa in comparison tothe neighboring Kenya'

The neighboring Kenya's mobile penetration reaches 77% of the total population. Kenya's mobile penetration rate grew to 77.2% (from 75% in the previous quarter), the latest numbers released by the CommunicationsCommission of Kenya shows. Kenya's neighbor Ethiopia, on the other hand, continues to rank at the bottom with the worst mobile penetration in Africa, currently standing at about 17%. Ethiopia, with a population close to 90 million, lags far behind in access to information technology because of the policies carried out by its paranoid ethnic apartheid junta that tries keep most of the people in the information dark age. Under the existing law, private ownership of telecom, internet and electronic broadcasting companies in Ethiopia is a crime. The numbers are shocking.According to the ITU, there are only 829,000 fixed telephone lines in Ethiopia for a penetration rate of less than 1 per-cent. Internet penetration is equally low — only 1.1%. "The combined cost of purchasinga computer, initiating an internet connection, and paying usage charges places internet access beyond the reach of most Ethiopians," states a UNHCR report. At present, Ethio-Telecom Mobile services subscriptions reached at it's highest about 10.5 million which is a 93.1 % growth from just six years ago since 2005. It's to be widely recalled a century old Ethio-Telecom fixed lines services were only offered in the country.

Democratic opponents in-exile were huddling together’

Eritrean Democratic opponents in-exile regrouped in what they say is a bid to bring hope and freedom to the Eritrean people. They held their first Congress last month in Hawassa, Ethiopia, and formed a new 127- member coalition called the “National Assembly for Democratic Change” tobe headed by Dr. Yosuf Berhanu, a veteran fighter and a physician.

BUSINESS - ‘Bringing Africa Together’ - Aviation Commercial Slogan’

Ethiopian Airlines, which was established in 1945, serves 62 internationaland 17 domestic destinations. The EAL which prides itself on being “The New Spirit of Africa” serves over 40 destinations in Africa, the largest number of destinations served by a single airline. The Ethiopian will hopefully deploy new jetliners, the Dreamliners.

ETHIOPIA - The concept of Tigrai-Tigrigna (Hagere-Tigrai)

How it all started in northern Ethiopia? In March, 1941, the pro- British Liberal Progressive Party of Eritrea (Tigrai-Tigrign plattform) and the Italians devised a political strategy to defend their interests in the Red Seaand the Horn of Africa as a whole. They called it the “Politics of Tigrigna (Ilpolitico Tigre) and The Politics of Showa (Il politico Shoana)”. (History tellsus that the Tigrean Yohaness IV, not only he conspired against Tewodros with the British but also he cooperated with the British in defeating Tewodros in exchange for arms. By the same token the Shoan Menelik II conspired with the Italians against the Tigrean Yohaness IV in exchange for arms.) The politics of Tigrigna, therefore, was intended to install a pro-Western government in the Horn of Africa with the help of aristocrats in Tigray or some what like a protectorate under UN or British administration. According to the plan, first the government of Shoa must be weakened and then the state of Eritrea shall be divided into two or three sects. To implement this plan, Stephen Longrigg made a deliberate effort to instil Tigrean nationalism inside Eritrea by authoring an article in English language under a pen name "Concerned Eritrean." Woldeab Woldemariam (whose origin is from Tigray), supposedly translated the article into Tigrigna and published it in the newspaper "Haddas Eritrea".

They argued that there were strong ties between segments of the Eritreanpopulation and Tigray. They refer to Tigray as having close ties with the highlands of Eritrea, thus in the 1950s it was called "Tigray-Tigrigna" by the Unionist pro-Ethiopia groups in Eritrea, and later in 1968 it was called "Hilmi Abay Tigray" (A dream for the Greater Tigray Republic) as it is stated on the February, 1976 TPLF manifesto.

ETHIOPIA - Political platform of Tigrai-Tigrigna: Italian term “Politico-Tigrigna”

Tigray-Tigrigna are an ethnic group who live in the southern, central andnorthern parts of Eritrea and the northern highlands of Ethiopia's Tigray province. They also live in Ethiopia's former provinces of Begiemidre (Gondar) and part of Wollo, which are today mostly part of Amhara Region, though a few regions e.g. Wolqayt, Tselemt, Raya, Humera were incorporated instead into modern Tigray Region. Their language is called Tigrigna. Do you ever wonder why so many people perished in Ethiopia and Eritrea? The politics of Tigray-Tigrigna emerged around the early 1940s with the help of Brigadier Stephen Longrigg, who was then a Britishmilitary administrator in Eritrea. His plan was to establish a pro-Western government in the Horn of Africa in collaboration with the Tigrayans in thenorthern part of Ethiopia. For many years, the average citizen of Ethiopia and/or Eritrea was unaware of this hidden political agenda. Unfortunately,in the last 50 years or so, many became victims of a horrific war in the Horn of Africa, including Yemen, Somalia and Djibouti which resulted in family breakdowns, disease, famine, oppression and forceful migration merely because of the Politics of Tigrya-Tigrinya.

ETHIOPIA - Politico Tigray-Tigrigna and the followed elimination of Eritrean Liberation Front (Jabhaa)' Issaias Affeworki, like many of his closeassociates, considers himself as one of the inheritors of the Axumite Kingdom. He is one of the top accomplice in the politics of Tigray-Tigrinya (his origin is from Tigray). In 1969, the CIA had launched its own secret operation known by the code name of "seed planting project" at Kagnew military base in Asmara. At that time the United States had completely lost confidence onto the HaileSelassie government. The project was therefore intended to prepare an alternative means to defend American interests in the Horn of Africa. Tesfamichael Giorgio (an Eritrean assassinated by Issaias in 1992), then a governor of a district in Eritrea, had participated in the negotiations at Kagnew between the CIA and Issaias Affeworki. Issaias's job was to dismantle the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) and then use the EPLF to oust the soon to be communist military government in Ethiopia. "If you satisfy our conditions," said Richard Copeland, a CIA agent based in Eritrea, "and you want independence, in return you shall have your independence." As planned, Issaias and TPLF (Tigray-Tigrigna) collaborated and dismantled ELF by driving it out of Eritrea. Also as planned, the military regime in Addis Ababa collapsed and Eritrea won its independence.
ETHIOPIA - Tigray-Tigrigna platform – an empire of jealousy disguised asa strategic policy' Tigray-Tigrigna state of mind is driven by Jealousy. Justlike in the era of Mengistu Hailmariam's Red Terror regime, citizens of both countries still continued to suffer under the rule of Tigray-Tigrigna. (some say that Tigray-Tigrigna agents have played a big role during the "Red Terror" communist regime). This empire of jealous men is armed with spy agencies, satellites, cash, bullets and other harmful ammunition to terrorize the region. Citizens are continuously harassed, poisoned, tortured and assassinated. It also functions as an organized crime of money laundering and human trafficking. It does not care whether you are an Ethiopian or Eritrean, innocent or guilty, poor or rich, illiterate or scholar, believer or atheist, citizen or immigrant, Christian or Muslim. Understand this, the terror in the Horn of Africa, especially in Ethiopia,Eritrea and Somalia is harbored by the politics of Tigray-Tigrinya.
ETHIOPIA -Tigray-Tigrigna – A Traitor Platform'

Tigray-Tigrigna might very well be a pro-British concept whos agent wasstationed in the Horn of Africa.
(አርነስት ቤቪን የተባለው የሌበር ፓርቲ የውጭጉዳይ ሚኒስትርሶማሊያ ነፃ ስትሆን የኢትዮጵያን ኦጋዴን፣ ሪዘርቭድ ኤርያና –ሐውድ እንዲሁም ጅቡቲንና የኬንያን ሰሜናዊ ምዕራብ ግዛት አጠቃልላ ታላቅዋን ሶማሊያ ስትመሠርት በሌላ በኩል ደግሞ በሰሜን ኢትዮጵያ ከአለውሀ ባሻገር ያለውመሬት በሙሉ ማለትምትግራይና ኤርትራ ተዋህደውትግራይ ትግርኝ የሚባል አገር ለመፍጠር የፓለቲከ እቅድ ይዘውነ በር።) Ninety percent of its high level agents are individuals who had strong links and connections with Tigray, in particular. The rest are volunteers who knew nothing about its true identity or individuals with personal interest. In 1998, a senseless boarder war had erupted between Eritrea and Ethiopia because of a small town named Badme. Tens of thousands of innocent lives had perished needlessly. Many left their families to escape the brutal war. What is shocking however is that the border conflict was carefully orchestrated and instigated by the puppet regimes in Asmara and Addis Abeba. The war was conducted ruthlessly. Itwas a senseless war. For the outsiders, it looked like a border issue.

Unfortunately, the war was invented in order to keep both citizens hostage to an endless state of conflict thus securing Tigray-Tigrigna powerfor an indefinite period of time. During the war, citizens were falsely accused of treason. Some were locked in prison for many years without trial and many were executed. They systematically evicted citizens using threats of violence. Many young women were raped; some committed suicide and others fell into the hands of human traffickers. Thousands of innocent lives have disappeared without a trace and others were killed in poverty. Tigray-Tigrinya erroneous policy made citizens of both countries poor and destitute. Many became homeless and Orphans because of it.

ETHIOPIA Tigray-Tigrigna Platform: Phase II - Divide and Rule: Here wego again’

While Issaias Affeworki and his secret agents from Tigray are vandalizingthe state of Eritrea, Ethiopian information minster Bereket Simon, Abay Woldu (Dara) and Seye Abraha, on their part, are dissecting Ethiopia intomany pieces, a plan that was initiated in the 1940s. Minster Bereket Simon recently made a comment that his government is willing to help anyone who is persecuted in Eritrea because of his/her ethnic or religiousbackground. (Facts: in Eritrea all citizens are persecuted regardless of their ethnic or religious background). Now, his government is arming andorganizing Eritrean opposition groups in Northern part of Ethiopia to oustthe government of Iysayas Afeworki. According to Bereket Simon, groupslike Democratic Movement for the Liberation of the Eritrean Kunama (DMLEK), Afar Revolutionary Democratic Unity Front (ARDUF) and/or RedSea Afar Democratic Organization (RSADO) should have the right to self-determination up to secession, if they wish to do so. What does this mean? Civil war! It is a threat against Eritrea that wars and violence will follow if the now/future Eritrean government fails to recognize oppositiongroup’s demand for self determination.

ETHIOPIA - The concept of Tigray-Tigrigna - The Trap’

Eritrean opposition groups are now armed and trained in Northern part of Ethiopia to fight the regime in Asmara. Similarly, Ethiopian opposition groups are also managed and financed by Iysayas Afeworki to fight the regime in Addis. This is in fact another trap! It is meticulously designed byTigray-Tigrinya leaders to control, monitor and finally sabotage the activities of both opposition groups before they strike. In the last ten years or so opposition group's agenda of freedom and democracy has not moved an inch forward due to the manipulation of Tigray-Tigrinya securityagents. TPDM (DMHIT), whose main task is to protect and serve the empire of Tigray-Tigrinya, is the only group who is making a substantial progress in power and number (TPDM has been training in a secret location in Eritrea for the last 20 years since 1991 and is directly financed by Isayas Afeworki).

ETHIOPIA - PoliticoTigrigna Versus Politico Shoana - Final Thought'

Things will not get better in Ethiopia or Eritrea while Tigray-Tigrigna operation of deception is in power. We have enough evidences to show just how quickly Ethiopia and Eritrea are engulfed by Tigray-Tigrinya made disasters. It created a refugee crisis that has percolated throughout the Sahara desert, Europe and the greater Middle East. Ethiopia and Eritrea under the Tigray-Tigrinya apartheid regime are not the same country you once knew. Both countries are ruled by evil individuals who hate their country, their flag and the people. They claim victory when theysee the suffering they have inflicted upon us, citizens. The grim reality is best understood by analyzing the mentality of Tigray-Tigrynia in power, and you need look no further than the network of hundreds of underground prisons spread across Ethiopia and Eritrea to see how evil and barbaric its leaders are. We must therefore act now. Let us all work together to restore the dignity of our people and country.

ETHIOPIA - "Abay (Greater) Tigrai Manifesto":

A TPLF designed, developed political document in the mid-70s'

TPLF had campaigned for "Greater Tigrai" which it asserted as it's primarymission to secede "Tigrai province" from the wider state of Ethiopia, and to create an indipendent "Tigrai Republic" on the run. In February, 1976 TPLF had published it's strategy document "Greater Tigrai Manifesto" in Sudan. The document clearly defines who a Tigraian is, the land that TPLFconsiders as Tigrai, and the final destination of the TPLF. The Tigrai Peoples's Liberation Front (TPLF) from the begining formed and founded only to liberate the former province of Tigrai until it surprisingly changed itself onto the Ethiopiain Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) as whole Ethiopia remains at it's will at the latter. The foundation day, celebrated every year since 1976 for the past two decades, is actually a regional holiday in Tigray alone. For the TPLF the month of February is officially a month of it's birth day celebrations, that's only to catch the emotions of Ethiopians, especially the people of Tigrai, who lost their keens and loved ones during the struggles against the Duerg regime, playthe big benefactor for removing the military dictatorship and justify it's "entitlement" to stay on power. This recurring celebration, as many are saying, will end up with the end of the regime itself, because there will notbe any legacy left worth remembering in connection with the birthday of the TPLF, this event is neither connected with independence from colonial rule nor has it brought any social justice among the Ethiopians that's to consider simply is a victory of an evil over another evil.

ETHIOPIA - The Greater (Abay) Tigray Manifesto & The Republic of Tigray'

Tigray People Liberation Front, TPLF had published their organization's manifesto in February, 1976, the booklet was printed in Sudan. The TPLFmanifesto, clearly defined who a Tigrayan is, the land that the TP LF considers as Tigray, and the final political destination of the TPLF. Tigrayregion added with parts of Afar and Eritrea for access to the Red sea andfor security measures. The following comprises some important contentsof the manifesto. a) A Tigryan is defined as anybody that speaks the language of Tigrigna including those who live outside Tigray, the Kunamas, the Sahos, the Afar and the Taltal, the Agew, and the Welkait.

b) The geographic boundaries of Tigray extend to the borders of the Sudan including the lands of Humera and Welkait from the region of Begemidir in Ethiopia, the land defined by Alewuha which extends down tothe regions of Wollo and including Alamata, Ashengie, and Kobo, and Eritrean Kunama, the Saho and Afar lands on the southern red sea coast of Dankhalia formerly known as the Assab administrative region. C) The final goal of the TPLF is to secede from Ethiopia as an independent "Republic of Greater Tigray" by liberating the lands and peoples of Tigray. The boundaries of Abay Tigray Republic were defined exactly according to what was registered in TPLF manifesto. A map was shared revealing close to the end plan of Greater Tigray Republic. TPLF have done this by annexing the lands of Welkait Tegede and Humera up to the borders of Sudan from former Begiemidre province and parts of Wollo's Raya including Ashengie Alamata and Kobo. In order to justify the demarcation,TPLF had to give up something in return and the lands closer to the Taltal and Afar regions of Ethiopia in eastern Tigray were temporarily sacrificed until the second stage of he project taken place. This important re- demarcation of Ethiopian internal boundaries resulted in the successful completion of the first stage of forming "Greater (Abay) Tigray" later to beconverged into the "Republic of Tigray" after the second stage is completed. Philosophy of Politics: Aristotle's definitions of six types of governments'

The great Aristotle has given definitions of six types of governments with three good and three bad. As Aristotle quotes it, "when a single person rules, it is a monarchy if the ruler is good and a tyranny if bad. When a small group of elites rules, it is an aristocracy if the rulers are good and anoligarchy if they are bad. If the masses rule, it is a polity if they rule well and a democracy (mob-rule) if they rule badly. The word democracy in Aristotle's time did not mean what it has come to mean today. So, strictly speaking, the democracy of our time is an attempt towards polity." - Extracted from: "Aristotle - Philosophy of Politics".

The hegemony of a minority regime is not sustainable – Herman Cohenformer under secretary of State'

Capital Eritrea News Analysis, by Ammanuel Biedemariam

In his opinion published on local Eritrean journal: Mr. Herman Cohen the former assistant under secretary of State for African affairs under pesidentGeorge William Bush Sr. administration, and the then deputy mediator of Ethiopia's rival political forces at the final days of the Duerg era in London,UK, told ESAT, over several interesting issues including Meles Zenawi's divisive political behaviour expressing his optimism on the future of Ethiopia.

The designed 'Republic of Hagere-Tigray & Preferential treatment to the state of Tigray' What does that mean? It means that it is a matter of time until the minority regime will crumble. The role minority regime can play in Ethiopia is on life support. It is a dead man walking per se; a rejected system that could not be revived no matter what. Ambassador Cohen saidthat Meles failed to realize the vision of his own constitution. Article 39 was meant to provide autonomy to the country's various regions. Instead,Meles "imposed the same type of authoritarian regime that Ethiopians hasalways had." Meles' actions are in contradiction to the constitution and outright disregarding to the rights of the rest of the country. For over 20 years, his reign accorded preferential treatment to the state of Tigray. Theprevailing opinion is predicated upon the argument that the clique's objective is to create an independent state, "Abbay Tigray". But is there evidence to back this up? Over the last 20 years, Tigray has had disparateadvantages over the rest of the country. After the TPLF came to power, they have redrawn the internal Ethiopian map to favor Tigray to the dismay of Ethiopians in various parts of the country. There are many reports that accuse Meles and his clique of taking fertile lands from different parts of Ethiopia and, made them part of Tigrai. Resources are transferred from the Ethiopian heartland to Tigray. This included the banking, major industries, the air force and major portion of the country'sarmaments using the threat of Eritrea as excuse. In Tigray, there exists an international bureau. Evidences of building towards greater Tigray are plenty. Many Ethiopians believe Meles literally gave-away major portions of Ethiopian land to Sudan to appease Sudan and to ensure a friendly andnon-threatening Sudan. There are regular flights between Sudan and Tigray in a daily basis. The transformation of the city of Mekele and overall, the state of Tigray is intense relative to the rest of the country etc…

Key: "The TPLF was at the gates of Addis. We wanted to make sure that the war ended with what we called a soft landing in Addis and there should be no destruction….We didn't say takeover the government. We said take over Addis." This is clear evidence that TPLF and Meles never enjoyed support of the Ethiopian people. The US, in effect, was forced toaccept the inevitable change at a crucial moment in history. According tothe Ambassador, Meles promised change but failed to implement any of the reforms he promised.

Key: the US, according to Ambassador Cohen is, primarily interested on its "Strategic Interests." Human rights and other issues are secondary considerations if at all. The question then becomes, does the minority Meles regime-hegemony serve US national interests? According to Ambassador Cohen, "The hegemonic minority rule of the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) is difficult to sustain as Ethiopians are demanding freedom and democracy." Given the fact that it is clearly understood that the agenda Meles pursues is unsustainable, and also, given the fact that the US's key strategic interest in Ethiopia is a united Ethiopia; Ambassador Cohen's campaign, albeit pushed by a personal motive to sella book, is likely the modus operandi. Hence, it is clear to all, Meles Zenawiand co must go. Meles Zenawi can no longer ensure US strategic interestsfor many reasons. For twenty years, Meles and co shunned goodwill towards any group, individuals, national organizations or nations. Meles played hardball. He used the War on Terror-card against everyone. He used it against Ethiopians, in the Ogaden, Oromo, Somalis and Eritreans. He used every tool at his disposal mercilessly. He imprisoned Ethiopians, Eritreans, Somalis or any Ethnic group that he felt could get on his way. Ifone is to ask, if there exists any group of people that supports the minority regime in the region the answer is an emphatic no. Ask the Ogadeni's the Somalis, the Oromos, Eritreans or any group and one will find no loyalty for this regime. There are many indicators that Meles is on his last legs. For over three years, Meles gambled on associating anything Eritrean with terrorism. Thetrajectory seemed on the up and up when he proclaimed that the noose isnow on Eritrea's neck and bragged of what is to come. He invested a greatdeal of time and resources to accomplish what he could not through military and other subversive tactics. He literally gave-away Ethiopia to China and others just to get Eritrea and failed. Meles tried to buy time by talking sanction and Eritrea. He, in effect, muzzled the voice of the Ethiopian opposition because the focus was the sanction. However, that is all the time he could buy because Ethiopians are back with vengeance ready to devour him. This was highlighted by the recent OLF announcement that clarified a united Ethiopia position. This simple expression of unity jolted the Weyane clique as if hit by tsunami. All one has to do is look at the recent headlines in the mouthpiece website of thegenocidal regime Aigaforum. Their incoherent frantic attacks on any Ethiopian opposition are a reflection of the fragility and susceptibility of this group. And they are right to be concerned because for the first time Ethiopians are beginning to speak with one voice. They are talking a voiceof unity to an organization that could only survive in a splintered environment, an organization that is truly afraid of a united Ethiopia.

When all these groups come together to decide the future of Ethiopia, guess who is going to be on the outside looking in? Meles and his genocidal friends! Meles and co in turn will run for their life if there is a safe haven somewhere. According to Ambassador Herman Cohen, "SaveAddis from destruction" propelled Meles to power.

However, TPLF's main agenda was Tigray not Ethiopia. After 20 years, Meles has put the people of Tigray in a precarious position by placing them in the middle. He cannot out-rightly proclaim independent Tigray while he is ripping the benefits of being a ruler of Ethiopia because his masters will hang him dry. This is reflected by the lack of affection and respect that Meles shows the people of Ethiopia. But how are the people ofTigray faring and, how will they fair in the long term? The reality is no temporary gain is sustainable unless coupled with peace and stability.

Meles Zenawi could not win any peace with any group or nation in the region. He could not unite Ethiopia and certainly, he cannot ensure peace for the people of Tigray. The people of Tigray are surrounded by hostility because the hegemonic agenda Meles pursued in the name of Tigray did not promote friendly ties with anyone. Meles Zenawi is at a downward spiral, scared and is likely to make erotic decisions as he recently did by "retiring" (expelling) many officers abruptly. It is odd to see Meles, while involved in military campaign in Somalia, releasing officers' en mass at same time. The reality is, he is scared and he felt that he is removing threats as he repeatedly does. Meles clearly believes that the support he gets from the West is forever. He also believes that they will stick by him regardless of what he does as long as he can ensure their strategic interests. However, US interests cannot be ensured if officers trained by US are chopped-off their duties abruptly as in this case. When ESAT askedthe Ambassador if Meles was in good terms with him, he replied, Meles got angry after the Ambassador spoke-out in the aftermath of the 2005 election massacre. Meles felt that the Ambassador spoke outside the scope of US Ethiopia strategic relations. In effect, bit the hand that feeds his madness. Think how mad Meles will be after the interview. The Ambassador added fuel to the raging fire that is consuming the regime. Inother words, Cohen is telling Meles his time is up.

Conclusion: Meles Zenawi will go down in history as one of the worst leaders for selling his people, Africa and his soul if he had any. He should face justice for corruption, embezzlement, torture, genocide and all the crimes he committed against the people of the region collectively. Meles used hunger, climate change, war on terror, fear, economy, stability etc…to sell his agenda. All is coming to ahead now. The people of Tigray need peace, stability and prosperity. The region also needs it. However, Meles has proven he cannot provide peace, stability or prosperity. The West already knows Meles cannot ensure a united Ethiopia. These are keyconstituencies Meles has lost. And regardless of what he does, without them he cannot stay in power for long. That is the stage we are in and I do believe Ambassador Cohen's timing is not accidental. The Ambassadoris telling Ethiopians it is time.

WikiLeaks | Top US diplomat: 'Time to stop hating Ethiopia'

HORN AFFAIRS ANALYSIS

Friday, September 9, 2011 by Daniel Berhane

A leaked Cable of US Embassy Addis Ababa discloses a passionate plea ofthe then Acting Ambassador Vicki Huddleston for stronger US – Ethiopia relation.

In the Cable, dated Nov. 11, 2006 and classified as 'Confidential', Amb.Huddleston begins saying:

As I prepare to turn over my responsibilities to my good friend and respected colleague, Ambassador Don Yamamoto, I urge the USG tomaintain and strengthen our partnership with Ethiopia.

Then, she goes on to present a must-read analyses of the Ethiopia and theHorn. Ethiopia is an old empire but a fragile one. Political and religious divisions could potentially tear away parts of Oromiya, Gambella, and the Somali region from the uneasy federation. Even Tigray, where the Abyssinian empire began, is at risk because the jailed CUD leaders want a unitary state that includes Eritrea, and Tigreans and Eritreans alike will resist Amahara domination.

Ethiopia, with its 77 million Christian and Muslims — the second most populus country in Africa — would seem to be the ideal partner. It is the oldest nation and the only one not to have been colonized in sub-SaharanAfrica. It is the only democratic nation that can project power throughoutthe Horn.

If Ethiopia can meet rising expectations by providing opportunity for its people, it can overcome its internal divisons. Our resources will be neededto win that race against time. Nowhere are our dollars better spent than inreforming state institutions from Justice to Security and in educating Ethiopians to fully participate in their future.

The democratic trend is positive. But the partnership will not be strengthened if we bend to demands to pass legislation that puts Ethiopiain the same category as countries on our terrorist list, or make public our private concerns about human rights and governance.

Ethiopia — as I have learned — will not act from weakness or because ofpublic threats or even loss of aid. Yet it will — and has — listened to its friends.

Ethiopia is neither — as its critics like to claim — a Marxist-Leninist dictatorship, nor is it a multi-party democracy that strictly adheres to open market principles. But if hubris demands that partnership be based on our standards, then we will find ourselves helping those whose principal goal is neither democracy nor development, but regime change.

The policy of partnership is succeeding. Meles has listened to our advice not to attack the Islamic Courts Union of Somalia, considered pardons forthe CUD prisoners, and to put in place a democratic process.

As for those detained in connection with last November's[2005] violent unrest…the judicial process has been open to the public, including to US NGO Lawyers Without Borders. The prosecution has recently argued somewhat more persuasively through ongoing witness testimony that some of the defendants called for armed uprising and protest to overthrowthe government……..The principal CUD leaders have allegedly continued toadvocate civil disobedience, and all but three defendants have refused legal counsel.

Untangling this web of fear, ethnic differences and political ambition will take time. It is not a one-sided problem. Some of the CUD detained leaders as well as their vocal, hard-line supporters in the Diaspora are unwilling to engage in the democratic process, whether by joining Parliament or by agreeing to disavow street action.

If we have the courage to strengthen our commitment to Ethiopia, we have much to gain. But if we aggressively and publicly press Meles in order to appease the Diaspora, some members of Congress and some civilsociety groups, we will lose Ethiopia.

Meles will not respond if he is not treated with respect and as a fullpartner.

Meles will always do what he believes to be in the country's nationalinterest rather than accepting our demands.

Today we have a strong relationship with Meles and the inner circle, but itis a wary one. It is not yet a full partnership because Washington remainshesitant over Ethiopia's human rights record, despite significant improvements over last year.

I have met with Meles biweekly on average and I have never had a meeting with him in which I did not raise the issues of governance and human rights. I have met with him numerous times to review strategies for resolution of the Eritrea/Ethiopian border, Somalia and internal governance, and never failed to suggest solutions for the CUD detainees.As a result, I have been able to visit the prisoners three times and am working with concerned Ethiopians and Ethiopian-Americans on a processthat may lead to pardons. The point here is that Meles — and the inner circle — listen to our advice if it is given in private and as a partner.

We can best help Ethiopian democracy if we are a firm and reliable partner. It is time to stop hating Ethiopia — the trend is in the rightdirection and the danger is great. (Text ends)

OLF: In order to accommodate the struggle with a modern strategy’

The Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) at its Plenary National Council meeting held in Minnesota on December 30 to 31 “announced it's historic decision to drop its long-held secessionist agenda and to embrace the unity of Ethiopia under a genuine federal arrangement that must guarantee the rights, equality and liberty of all Ethiopians”. What more can one ask for? The Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) Congress and it's entire leadership is calling for a general meeting such goal is believed to come-up with definitive vision or outline for how wish to achieve the desired political stability for the Oromos as a whole, while also addressing the issues in theHorn of Africa.

An Ethiopian political scientist who resides in the west commented’

Messai Kebede "even if harsh dictators have ruled the nation in the past, but all considered themselves as nationalists. But, in the case of Meles Zenawi, “he is a manipulative and a ruthless tyrant affected by family disgrace tries to behave in such a way as to repair the fault. And what's new with Meles Zenawi is his anti-Ethiopian sentiment and his open contempt for whatever is Ethiopian. Many tolerant Ethiopians have had inmind the history of his family, which is a history marred by collaboration with the Italian occupationist forces, notably, his grandfather DejazmatchAsresu Tessema not only worked for the Italians, but he was also an appointee and an office holder (Shum-Bash) during the Italian administration of 1936 to 41. What this means is that Meles Zenawi the grandson of Dejazmatch Asresu, had to deal very early with this family shame, which according to testimonies brought scorn and psychological isolation onto his family", the exiled intellectual commented.

Tips from recent WikiLeaks revelations’

Recent WikiLeakes revealations show that Ethiopia's Prime Minister MelesZenawi's contempt for the South Sudanese and backstabbing of his northern allies, as political commentators. 1, (S/NF) In a January 30 meeting, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi told Acting US Assistant Secretary Phil Carter and AF/SPG Director Tim Shortley that with the expected ICC indictment of Sudanese President Bashir either 1) someone within Khartoum would take advantage of the move to attempt to removeBashir, or 2) such an attempt will either fail or be aborted. While Meles gave the chances of success for option 1 as nearly zero due to the close knit ties among senior National Congress Party (NCP) officials, he argued that the result would leave the Bashir government a "wounded animal" that is more desperate. Meles argued that to the NCP leadership, their approach is "perfectly rational." He explained that the Government of Sudan (GoS) thought it had moved left bad relations with the U.S. behindwhen they signed the Naivasha Agreements, only to, in their view, have the USG move the goal posts As a result, Meles suggested that the NCP believes that the "U.S. will get them one way or the other" and if they seetheir options as either "to die today or die tomorrow, they will chose to employ delaying mechanisms allowing them to die tomorrow." As such, they have no need to resolve problems with the South because it will bring no benefit to them. Facing such calculus, Meles analyzed the GoS approach as to 1) postpone a vote on the South, 2) buy time in Darfur, and 3) "hope for a miracle in 2011." Meles suggested that if he were the U.S., he would either 1) remove the NCP regime or, if that weren't an option, 2) make clear to the GoS that the U.S. is not out to get it and explicitly lay out what is expected of the GoS on Darfur and the South to avoid continued challenges. DESTABILIZING EFFECTS OF ICC INDICTMENT 2, (C) Prime Minister Meles told Acting Assistant Secretary Carter that the International Criminal Court (ICC) indictment of Sudanese President Bashir could provide a signal to someone in Khartoum to attempt to remove Bashir through a coup. Although noting that he has been hearing many rumors of such desires from within Khartoum, Meles said that he did not give too much credence to most of these, but highlighted the implications that such rumors have for the climate in Khartoum. Still, Meles argued that such an option, if attempted, would likely have a 100 percent chance of failing due to the close connections and mutual support for one another among senior NCP officials which would suppress any coup attempt. If Bashir remains in power, either because no such coup attempt is made or an attempt fails, the indictmentwill leave the Bashir regime a wounded animal that is more desperate than ever. THE PERSPECTIVE FROM KHARTOUM 3, (C) While acknowledging Carter's point that Khartoum's actions seem to undermine their own long-term interests, Meles argued that from their own perspective, the NCP's actions are perfectly rational. While the "Islamic agenda" may have motivated the regime ten years ago, today they are interested only in money and power, Meles posited. While the GoS thought that they had moved away from a climate of bad relations with Washington when they signed the Comprehensive Peace Agreement in Naivasha, they perceive the United States as having shifted the goal postson them since. As a result, Meles argued that the GoS believes that "the U.S. will get them one way or the other," and from that perspective, they are already in a corner. Believing they will lose, they perceive no benefit to them of resolving the problems of South Sudan. Instead, Meles arguedthat the NCP's strategy is to postpone a vote on the South, buy time on Darfur, and "hope for a miracle" in 2011. Seeing the U.S. position leavingthem with the options of either "to die today or die tomorrow, they will chose to employ delaying mechanisms allowing them to die tomorrow." 4.

(C) Meles was explicit that the GoS does not trust the United States, but acknowledged that "to some extent they are ADDIS ABAB 00000259 002 OF 002 immune to" a rational discussion with clear benchmarks that allowthem an out. Still, Meles claimed that the GoS has suggested that if they get a way out, they may take it. While acknowledging that the GoS "may try to string (the U.S.) along," Meles argued that the real issue is whetherthere is a possibility of U.S.-NCP negotiations. If that is an option, Meles advised, it could lead to rational discussions. ETHIOPIA'S ADVICE FOR MOVING FORWARD 5. (S/NF) Meles Zenawi offered that if he were the United States, he would look at two options. First, which he clearly conveyed as the preferred choice, would be to "remove the Al-Bashir regime". Acknowledging that such an option was unlikely, Meles advocated for making a clear representation to the GoS that the United States is not/not "out to get them" and laying out clear benchmarks of actions expected of the GoS on both Darfur and South Sudan that would be necessary to "avoid continued challenges" with the U.S. Meles concluded the discussion by highlighting that "they don't trust the Obama Administration," and "they trust the Obama Administration less than the Bush Administration," and with a clear reference to U.S. Ambassador to the UN Susan Rice and former Senior NSC Director for Africa Gayle Smith "...especially some friends of mine". Donald Yamamoto, the US ambassador to Ethiopia. (Text ends)

Ethiopia's oldest armed rebel group OLF abolished secession'

The Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) known locally as Adda Billisuma Oromoo (ABO) has allegedly announced the abolishment of its long held secession agenda and says it will now fight for unity and freedom. The Ethiopia's Oromo rebel group in a surprise move drops it's secession demand. The Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) released a statement that it has dropped it's secessionist agenda, and opted to work with pro- democracy Ethiopian political forces, which that's very welcomed by largenumber of Ethiopians. Ethiopia's oldest armed rebel group, the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) has announced the end of its long held agenda of secession. The group has said it will now fight for unity and freedom.

Political commentators say this is a remarkable move in the Ethiopian politics. The Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) was established in late 1960 and was recently designated as a terrorist organisation by the Ethiopian government along with the Al-Shabaab and Al-Qaeda. The new OLF political programme will accept new federal arrangement that will work forthe betterment of all of it's citizens, neighbouring countries and international communities," a statement released by the OLF National council reads. The news that the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) has decided to struggle for freedom in consort with all Democratic forces in Ethiopia is considered as christmas present the Ethiopian people gave themselves. The news had excited a segment of Ethiopia's political community, long haunted by the prospect of an independent Oromia stateand those democracy activists who wish to see cooperation among the opposition forces.

PUBLIC TRANSPORT: A SkyBus transporter went off road to a tragic deathof passengers'

A public transport bus owned by the Skybus transporters Plc filled up with42 passengers travels from Addis Ababa to northwestern Ethiopian city ofGondar, went off the cliff to a tragic death of all onboard.
OSLO, NORWAY: New legislation that cuts all social aid for rejected asylum seekers has left refugees starving and freezing on the streets' As five rejected refugees from Ethiopia have had to escape hunger in Norwayby turning to Sweden, the UN's refugee agency and the Norwegian Churchnow protest against the "inhumane legislation" in one of the world's richest countries. Ethiopians constitute a realtively small group of asylum seekers in Norway. Norwegian authorities in general hold that Ethiopians have no good case when seeking asylum on a political basis. Moreover, many of them have lived, worked in Norway for many years and integrated themselves into the Norwegian society, which we mean needs humanitarian consideration. We are also deeply concerned about the lack of proper consideration of the rights and wellbeing of children in the processing and reviewing of asylum applications. The grave human rights violations and ever deteriorating socio-economic condition in Ethiopia is well known to Norway and the rest of the International community.
International Human Rights Organizations such as Amnesty International(AI), Human Rights Watch (HRW) and the United States (US) State Department have documented and reported the widespread and serious human rights abuse the dictatorial regime is committing against citizens.As of late the regime has been escalating its repression and closed the political space even to the legal opposition operating in the country by enacting laws such as its anti-terrorism law to prohibit freedom of expression and penalize dissent.
Ethiopia confirmed that its military forces had driven the Somali al-Shabaab fighters'
Ethiopia confirmed that its military forces had driven the Somali Al- Shabaab fighters from Beledweyne, a trading center near the Somalia- Ethiopia border. Ethiopian forces have taken Beledweyne before. This time, however, Ethiopia has a little diplomatic cover. The Ethiopian forcesare ostensibly fighting with Somali government forces (Somali National Army, under the aegis of the Transitional National Government, or TNG).
However, observers in the area reported that the attack involved over 3,000 Ethiopian troops supported by Ethiopian artillery and a substantial number of Ethiopian armored vehicles. In other words, Ethiopia is providing the Somalia government with the heavy military punch it lacks.
Senior leaders in the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) are considering endingits war with the Ethiopian government' The OLF faction would drop its demands for a separate Oromo state and becomes a political party operating within a federal Ethiopian state. However, Ethiopia would have to guarantee Oromo ethnic rights. In the end of last year (2011) the OLF apparently made a more official overture to the government that it would end its secessionist movement if ethnic Oromos were guaranteed the rights they are promised in the Ethiopian constitution. The OLF has been fighting the government since 1973. Its chief demand was the creation of Oromia, a separate Oromo state. The OLF has had several backers over the years. Eritrea has provided it with money and weapons. A couple of years ago the OLF was making common cause with the Somali Al- Shabaab.

EAL official have bluntly rejected the findings of a Lebanese investigationinto an air crash off Lebanon in January 2010' The Lebanese report blames pilot error for the crash of flight ET409, in which 90 people died. But EAL officials say the plane exploded, which they say points to sabotage, a lightning strike or shooting down. The Addis Ababa-bound Boeing 737-800 passenger plane crashed into the sea off Beirut minutes after take-off from Beirut Rafiqi Al-Hariri Airport in stormy weather on 25th January, 2010, with no survivors. The Lebanese investigation reportwhich was challenged by EAL said, "the crash of an Ethiopian Airlines passengers plane flight No 409 off the cost of Lebanon two years ago which killed all 90 people on board was caused by pilot error".

Governor of Gambella, Ato Omot Obang Olom exposed the PM'

Ato Omot Obang Olom who was the Head of Security during the carnage and a major actor in the genocide, exposed in new public testimony that he and Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi should share the same fate—jail—if he were to be held accountable for providing the list of Anuakto be killed in the brutal massacre of 424 Anuak leaders by Ethiopian Defense Forces and armed militia groups. In a recent hearing that threatened to oust him from his position as Gambella Peoples Unity Democratic Movement (GPUDM) party head and Gambella Regional State President, with the likely consequence of imprisonment, he threatened, "IfI go to jail for giving the list, then Meles will have to go with me because he is the one who gave the order, the soldiers and the guns."

On the EOC national religious feast of "Timkhat"

Timkhat is Amharic meaning for Epiphany (Baptism) which celebrated onthe day of 19th January colourfully throughout the nation every year.

Timkhat, which celebrates the baptism of Jesus Christ in the River Jordanby John the Baptist, is the most important Christian holiday in Ethiopia.

The celebration attracts thousands of foreign tourists to the country annually. The holiday was celebrated with various religious and traditionalassortments in the capital. On the eve of Timkhat evening, Sunday schoolstudents adored in their colorful uniforms arrived at 'Jan-Meda' a parade and the Epiphany site-chanting and singing. They spent the night in procession in front of the 'Tabot's, a symbol of the Ark of Covenant containing the 10 Commandments, placed in specially put up tents. Fridaymorning, the baptismal water at 'Jan-Meda' was blessed by his holiness Abune Paulos, Patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and archbishops, and sprinkled on the faithful gathered there. Speaking on theoccasion, the Patriarch of the EOTC called on the faithful to preserve Epiphany celebrations to the coming generations. Following the celebration, the 'Tabots' were taken back to their respective churches in colourful processions. The ceremony in Addis Ababa attracted a huge number of foreign tourists. Axum civilization is best known for the outsideworld in it's enormous monolithic stelae or standing stones. These marks the tombs of a ruling elite of a remarkable civilization that until around 300 AD held sway over both sides of the Red sea, in both Southern Arabia, across the Horn of Africa and deep into the interior of the continent. Axum was the centre of an African empire that had trade links with India, Arabia, Roman, Egypt and Persia as well as Greek.

Ethiopian Christmas (Ghenna) uses local Ge'ez calendar derived fromancient Coptic calendar'

They have 12 months of 30-days and one month with either 5 or 6 days depending on whether it is a leap year. That's why you might see shirts inroad-side shops in Addis Ababa that say "Welcome to Ethiopia – 13 Months of Sunshine." They're not crazy, they're clever. A Christmas celebration in Ethiopian custom usually consists of a fast on the day before Ganna. It's year- 2004 Ethiopian calendar now and celebrate Ethiopian Christmas (Ghenna) on January 7, 2012. Then on Christmas day, most adorn themselves in white clothes and a sash called a shammaand head to early mass a 3-hour Church service in the Ge'ez language that is endured by a crowd of constantly standing parishioners. It begins at 4 a.m. and in Addis Ababa, the services at St. Georges Cathedral are broadcast over a loudspeaker and you have to be a better sleeper than I am to continue your slumber through the noise from a few blocks down.

Christmas in Ethiopia doesn't feature Black Friday or Cyber Monday or Broke Dude Thursday like it does in America or elsewhere. Children sometimes receive a small treat and a gift of some clothes. But Christmas there is for fasting, mass and a feast afterward. Wealthy people often share a small feast with the less fortunate and then enjoy a large feast forthemselves. Many times the celebration includes a roasted sheep or spicedchicken souse. Often, when residents of Addis Ababa purchase a sheep from a herd in the median of a busy highway, they will use public transportation such as a taxi van or bus to get the animal home where itwill eventually meet its final destination. The idea is a great way to celebrate Christmas as Jesus' birthday.

Ethio-Americans and friends of Ethiopia were protested at the KSA Embassy in Washington DC'

Ethiopians, Ethio-Americans and friends of Ethiopia were protested at the embassy of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia inWashington DC to demand the release of Ethiopians who are unjustly detained y the Saudi Arabia Government. Thirty Five Ethiopians — 6 men and 29 women — remain in jail under inhumane conditions since mid- December, 2011. The protesters condemn the unjust incarceration of these Ethiopian Christians who are arrested for praying in their own homes. Demonstrators called the Government of Saudi Arabia to respect their rights and to release them immediately.

Ethiopian PM orientation to gathered Eritreans in Addis Ababa'

The Ethiopian Prime minister 20 years later told gathered Eritreans residing in Addis Ababa, "Ethiopia had spent billions of dollars on port of Djibouti" PM Meles Zenawi told a gathering of Eritreans in Addis Ababa, "when peace is restored in Eritrea, a huge sum of money would be spent once again on the port of Assab, which is going to be a major income for the would be free Eritrea. Political commentators say "the chain of denying the consequences of the devastating Ethio-Eritrean war has cotinued to this date that Meles Zenawi and his associates still refuse to admit the grieve historic mistake that they have made both in the ways they temporarily concluded the war before cutting the back of their arch- enemy on power in Eritrea and also in losing the international arbitration in the aftermath". The Ethiopian authorities have said recently that, have been followed a policy of detente for decades in their bid to avoid military confrontation with the regime in Asmara. The premier has gone on the record several times that changing the government in Asmara is up to thepeople of Eritrea, and not his country, accusing the Eritrean government of attempts to sabotage the latest African Union summit conference of heads of states and governments held in Addis Ababa.The regime in Ethiopia has changed now it's policy toward Eritrean to "actively advocatethe overthrow of the government in Eritrea", and incase Ethiopia launchesit's assault, he believes it will be swiftly, cost effectively, and with less casualities, but analysts say, it's a desperate attempt by the Ethiopian premier to divert public-attention from domestic crisis whose various opposition voices are demanding an end to his regime.

The Ethio-Saudi investor has rolled out a USD 3 billion investment schemeto be carried out over the next three years in Ethiopia' Sheikh Dr.

Mohammed Hussein Al-Amoudi, an Ethiopian-born Saudi Arabian billionaire, who has already invested US$5 billion in the luxury hotel, Sheraton Addis, said he had an eye on various investment opportunities inthe country. The sheik announced the new investment while inaugurating his big cement factory in Derba, northern Shoa, which cost USD 600 million. Sheik Mohammed Hussein Ali Al-Amoudi with his investment company, MIDROC Ethiopia, is looking to invest in the textile, oil, metal, marble factories and other cement factories, among others. "It is my plan to see the new Ethiopia in the coming three years," said Sheik MohammedHussein. He announced that the investment will create 300,000 jobs and will support the country's Growth and Transformation Plan (GTP), which the government launched last year as part of the country's initiative to become a middle income country by 2020. Forbes Magazine estimates theSheik's wealth to be more than USD 12.3 billion and has investments in Saudi Arabia, Sweden, among others, including various African countries.

A dream of most young Ethiopians is to leave the country for the better toanywhere else'

It has to be well recognized that the Ethiopian generations of the 50s, 60s, and the 70s were discouraging badly being exiled or flee as refuge abroad. At present, several thousands of young women are taking jobs as housemaids in the Gulf Arab states every year where we have heard manycountless heartbreaking stories of physical, psychlogical and sexual abuse or being forced to work sometimes for no payment; as example, like the horror the international community witnessed about a beautiful Ethiopian housemaide Ms. Shewaye Molla who had been deliberately burned by Quadhafi's daughter-in-law in Libya.Even those who are "legal" are often extremely vulnerable to economic exploitation, racial discrimination, and physical and sexual abuse. Abuse and enslavement of migrant and domestic workers from Asia and Africa has become epidemic in the MiddleEast.

A Human Rights Watch (HRW) report denounces forced relocations in remote Gambella region bring hunger, hardship’ The Ethiopian government under its “villagization” program is forcibly relocating approximately 70,000 indigenous people from the western Gambella region to new villages that lack adequate food, farmland, healthcare, and educational facilities, Human Rights Watch said in a report released today.State security forces have repeatedly threatened, assaulted, and arbitrarily arrested villagers who resist the transfers. Forced Displacementand ‘Villagization’ in Ethiopia’s Gambella Region,” examines the first year. HRW report said "Waiting Here for Death": Forced Displacement and ‘Villagization’ in Ethiopia’s Gambella Region,” examines the first year of Gambella’s villagization program. The report details involuntary nature of the transfers, the loss of livelihoods, the deteriorating food situation, and ongoing abuses by the armed forces against the affected people. Many of the areas from which people are being moved are slated for leasing by thegovernment for commercial Agri-developers. The HRW report from HumanRights Watch (HRW) confirms and elaborates on what the Oakland Institute (OI) and its partner organization, Solidarity Movement for a NewEthiopia (SMNE), uncovered in several recent reports on Ethiopia where indigenous people and local communities are being coerced and forcibly moved from their lands to make room for large-scale agricultural plantations. Ethiopia, which is deemed an "important regional security partner" by the US government and one of the largest recipients of US aidis forcibly relocating 70,000 people from Gambella to make land availablefor investment in agriculture. In doing this the regime is also aggravating current hunger while laying the groundwork for future famine in Ethiopia, as people are losing their livelihoods and being moved to areas where they cannot readily feed themselves.

MEP from Mera-Bete introduces controversial law in parliament’

The Proposed Legislation Bill Aimed at "Restoring Respect for Ethiopian Culture". Ato Gola Mebrahtu, angry at what he calls "from Europe and America", is introducing an unusually strict law in the Ethiopian parliamentthat will punish people who "by intention or by accident" try to spoil and change the norms of Ethiopian culture. In a press conference he held nearthe parliament, right before the introduction of the law on the floor of Parliament, Ato Gola specifically referred to "these" that are targeted by the new law. "I am talking about these people that come from America and Europe and walk like gangsters, dress like gangsters, and mumble that jumbo mumbo thing called RAP singing on our beautiful Ethiopian streets and think they are hip. I am mad as hell at them and they should be arrested or fined for trying to, ghetto culture they brought from wherever they were abroad," he angrily said "change our youth with their poisonous ideas", told the gathered press. "They should be arrested for substituting our beautiful Ethiopian culture with something that glorifies violence and disrespect of women," he added. "Either they respect our cultural values in every way, or I would stick them, even if this law is not passed by the Parliament".

Arson forest fires damages jungles in Oromia'

Arson fire devastates forests in various times of February to March of 2012 in Theo, Dagalou Theo, Kakka, Gallana, Koffele, Bekodji and Limmu-Bilbillo locality of Arsi-Bale in Oromia regional state.

Self-exiled Ethiopian editor of the Washington based opposition ERwebsite sentenced in absentia'
Elias Kifle editor of the Washington-based opposition website was handeda life sentence in absentia which followed a 2007 life sentence given to him also in absentia on charges of treason for his coverage of the government's brutal repression of 2005 post-election protests, a Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) research shows. A court in the capital, Addis Ababa, sentenced Reeyot Alemu, a female columnist with the independent weekly "Feteh" , and Wubshet Taye, deputy editor of thedefunct weekly "Awramba Times", to 14 years in prison and 33,000 birr (about US$1,500) fine, newsreports said. "The life sentence for Elias Kifle and the prison sentences for Reeyot Alemu and Wubshet Taye are basedon their writings about political dissent.
A Human Rights Watch (HRW) 105-page report documents'
The report reveals the ways in which the Ethiopian government uses donor-supported resources and aid as a tool to consolidate the power ofthe ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). Ethiopia is one of the world's largest recipients of development aid, more than USD 3 billion in 2008 alone. HRW detailed reports on activities that reinforce production and productivity, specifically soil and water conservation, construction of micro-dams, water catchments, diversion canals, development of irrigation farming and ensuring water supply both for humans and livestocks. The World Bank and donor nations provide direct support to district governments in Ethiopia for basic services such as health, education, agriculture, and water, and support a "food for work"program for some of the country's poorest people. The European Union, the United States, the United Kingdom, and Germany are the largest bilateral donors.
Ethiopia And The Concept of Free Market Economy '
Human beings, for countless centuries, dealt with the problem of survivalby means of either tradition or command. However, the rise of the free market system offered a third and lasting solution to the problem of human survival. For instance, in the industrialized societies, governmentsintervene in the free market to improve market outcomes, such as, combatting monopoly to increase competition, regulating private production and consumption to reduce pollution, or narrowing income gaps through progressive taxation. But governments do not control the economy; people do, making their own economic decisions as consumersand owners of the factors of production in response to market forces.
Adam Smith, the father of economic development, described the free market system best: "Each should do what is in his/her best interest. Thelure of gain, not the pull of tradition or the whip of authority, steered eachperson to his/her work. And yet, although each was free to go wherever his/her acquisitiveness directed him/her, the interplay of one person against another resulted in the necessary tasks of society getting done."
The free market system is a new conception of economic life that developed historically. It is the only system that achieved individual freedom and economic development for the first time in history. The free market helped improve human behavior by replacing destructive warriorculture with safer pursuits of commerce. It produced a large and strong middle class by promoting mixing across wider areas through trade and business deals thereby softened the sharp edges of ethnic conflicts and rivalries. Through a democratic system of government, the free market allowed people to vote and determine public policy. Socialism, on the other hand, developed first intellectually as an alternative theoretical structure to existing systems and later began to beapplied on a wider scale. Socialism was primarily based on state ownership of the means of production and centralized decision making.

Unlike the free market, it did not have embedded in its system the machinery for further growth, upward mobility and participation. Thus, itultimately failed. Regarding equality and democracy under the developmental state, Meles Zenawi has wrote, “One of the defining characteristics of a developmental state is that it must be autonomous from the private sector. It must have the ability and will to reward and punish the private sector depending on whether its activities are developmental or rent seeking. It cannot do so if the private sector is in the coalition.”

African Union Commission (AUC) unveils new HQ’

The African Union (AU) built on a 110,000 sq of land donated by Ethiopiangovernment to the AU, the over 100 meters tall new African Union Conference Center (AUCC) financed by the Chinese government was inaugurated on Saturday January 28, 2012 in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. Witha budget of $200 million dollars, around 350 Chinese and Ethiopian workers started the construction project in June 2009. The AUCC is a standard international conference center and it has 2,500 seat big conference hall, a 650 seats medium conference hall, five press conference rooms, two VIP rooms, water fountains, a garden, theatre, parking area, libraries and medical centers among many other facilities.

Several African leaders and dignitaries attended the inauguration ceremony on the 28th, January, 2012. The building also has a helicopter landing pad so that African leaders can be flown from Bole International Airport directly to the AU building to avoid traffic. The office tower next tothe conference halls will become the new home of about 1,000 African Union staff members. The inauguration ceremony was followed by the laying of the first stone of the AU Memorial for Human Rights and the unveiling of the Kwame Nkrumah Monument, in honor of the first Ghana president. Along with Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie I, President Kwame Nkrumah was one of the founders of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), the predecessor of the AU. Termed “China’s gift to Africa”, the edifice was constructed by the China State Construction Engineering Corporation with over 90% Chinese labor. According to Zeng Huacheng, aspecial councilor to the AU headquarters project from China’s Ministry of Commerce, “The panoramic view of the Conference center is like two hands holding each other, signifying the strenghtening friendship betweenChina and Africa.” It is to the discredit of the African Union and therefore,every individual and country within that regional body that in coming years, a building as symbolic as the African Union Headquarters is designed, built and maintained by a foreign country, it does not matter which country. Ethiopian Prime Minister hailed the new building as "a symbol of the rise of Africa", which he said was modeled on China's state-led economic model. He also took the opportunity to criticize the western economic model of the late 20th century as “medicine that turned out to be worse than the disease. The ancient and modern history of donation ofbuildings and structures from one nation to another is filled with intrigues and subterfuges, conquests, diplomatic schemings, espionage and counterespionage, economic manipulations, political statements and dominations.Meantime, the African Union (AU) opens Chinese-funded HQ in Ethiopia.

The African Union has inaugurated its newly built headquarters in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa. The entire $200m (£127m) project was funded by China as a gift to the AU, as Beijing continues to strengthen its influence in Africa. In front of African leaders a huge golden key was handed over and the 100m high building was officially opened. The tower overlooks a vast conference centre where African heads of state are expected to meet for years to come. Their first AU summit in the building will take place on Sunday. China's most senior political adviser, Jia Qinglin, attended the opening of the new headquarters. "The towering complex speaks volumes about our friendship to the African people, and testifies to our strong resolve to support African development," he said, according to AFP. The AU chairman, Equatorial Guinea's President TeodoroObiang Nguema, said the complex was "a reflection of the new Africa," theagency reports. The new AU building dominates the skyline of Addis Ababaand is the city's tallest building. Most of the materials used were imported from China and even the furnishings were paid for by Beijing, AFP news agency reports. Construction began in January 2009 and involved 1,200 Chinese and Ethiopian workers. The project co-ordinator, Fantalum Michael, says the new building signifies China's growing friendship with Africa. "It's a testimony that this relationship will continue in the future," he told AFP. Trade between China and Africa has increased more than six-fold during the past decade to $120bn (£76bn) in 2011. China is interested in Africa's natural resources and in return is investing huge sums in African infrastructure. Roads are being built by Chinese firms at a staggering rate, says the BBC's Will Ross in Addis Ababa. While other rich nations impose conditions before aid is given, China's relationship with African countries is strictly a business one, he says. Human rights groups have criticised China for undermining efforts by western countries to link aid to improvements in governance. However African leaders have welcomed the Chinese approach and have embraced investment from Beijing. In Ethiopia, many jobs have been created through Chinese-fundedprojects. Chinese cars are being made in Ethiopian factories and China is also building a light railway across Addis Ababa.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY: Dr. Osagiefo Kwame N'krumah, remembered’

The biography of Dr. Kwame N’krumah to have read how he felt when he learnt Mussolini had invaded Ethiopia in the mid 1930s, the only independent state and thereafter how the two leaders, emperor Haile Selassie I, and Kwame N'krumah himself worked on the promotion of pan-African sentiments among Africans in the Diaspora while the Emperor was in exile in the Great Britain. It was at this time that the Emperor took the lead of bringing Africa together taking advantage of Ethiopia's neutrality from the lingua-phone divided Africa. The plaque boosts Pan-African feeling. The Emperor, a true African and world leader in every sense of theword, played a key role in the creation of OAU and its successor, the AU. It is a matter of record that Ethiopia under ex-emperor Haile Selassie played vanguard roles in rendering genuine assistance to liberation movements in almost all black African countries except Liberia, which was independent. Students from liberation groups from Angola, Kenya, Nigeria, Somalia, South Africa, Tanzania, Zimbabwe et al received trainingin Ethiopia. The memorial statue is the least the current African leaders could have added to the facility as a tribute to what the Emperor achievedfor the stature of Africa in the global system. Furthermore, as the first host country and the permanent seat of the organization, Ethiopia should have been recognized by the presence of a statue of her respected leader, Emperor Haile Selassie I, often referred to as "The Spotlight of Africa".

Here Kwame N'krumah poem for Ethiopia; "Ethiopia, Africa's bright gem, Set high among the verdant hills . . Ethiopia the wise Shall rise And remould with us the full figure Of Africa's hopes And destiny". It reminds us Ethiopia's survival posturing as the sole independent African state during the colonial era, enshrining liberty and fostering a significant example of independence and self-rule in Africa. It also keeps deep into my heart the contribution my country made to the liberation of the rest ofAfrican nations, nearly 25 in number at that time. In particular the support to, Somalia and Kenya that were not lucky enough to attend the summit during that time because they were still under colonial rules was significant. Also the contributions my country made to the independence of African nations, now in the summit was also immense among which thehighest regard was to the Libyan independence. "In the May, 1963 assembly under the chairmanship of Emperor Haile Selassie I, 30 African heads of states and governments performed the impossible" run the words in the second paragraph of the plaque. And further in the 7th paragraph the plaque states, "To Ethiopia the nation honored by such a historical gathering, the glory of playing host to many of her illustrious sister African nations remains vivid. Will cherish it forever and will guard itselfishly as a priceless treasure destined to occupy pages in it's national and international annals."

Large number of Ethiopians at dismay'

However, large number of the Ethiopian community, locally and abroad dismayed to learn that the statues of the other founding father particularlythe late Ethiopian Emperor Haile sellasie I, has not been erected. It is a historical fact that Emperor Haile sellaise I, played an important role as Kwame N'krumah of Ghana in the foundation of the Organization of African Unity (OAU). Many were surprised at the particular selection of one founding father and erecting his statue in particular ignoring and belittling the values and contributions of the other significant leader. As we all know, HIM Haile sellasie I, played the most crucial role in the liberation struggle of many African countries, the signing of OAU's charter and Pan-

Africanism winning him the name “African Father”. He has the legal, moral, historical and diplomatic legitimacy to have his statue erected next to Dr. Kwame N'krumah. The late Ethiopian monarch’s supporters have argued that their man, who became internationally famous for his resistance against the Italians under Benito Mussolini, was a longer-standing supporter of African liberation than Ghana’s founding president.“It is Haile Selassie who is described by African leaders as the father of Africa not Nkrumah,” said Yacob Hailemariam, an opposition politician who has spoken out against the choice of the Ghanaian. Others said, "no question he deserves the heart felt thanks of Africans and all Black people. It is a proud moment for all of us. Dr. Kwame N'krumah played a major and pivotal role in advancing the concept of Pan-Afrcanismand cemented the relationship of Africans and the African Diaspora in the West. It was an important linkage in showing the commonality of our struggle for freedom and dignity, but the ex-Emperor Haile selassie has not to be neglected, it's quite shame for the African Union. The campaign has, however, infuriated Ethiopia’s current leader Meles Zenawi who said it was “crass” to question Nkrumah’s choice as an African symbol and has repeatedly denounced Haile Selassie, who died in 1975, as a “feudal dictator”. “It is only Kwame Nkrumah who is remembered whenever we talk about pan-Africanism,” Mr. Meles Zenawi told local media. “It is a shame not to accept his role". The African Union confirmed that it had received a letter signed by prominent Ethiopians, many of them living abroad, but declined to comment. The protest letter says that ex-emperorHaile Selassie who ruled Ethiopia for over 40 years had “the legal, moral, historical and diplomatic legitimacy to have his statue erected next to Kwame N'krumah". The statue of Osagyefo Kwame Nkrumah former President of Ghana was prominently unveiled to commemorate his founding role in the Organisation of African Unity (OAU), the AU’s predecessor during the inauguration of the newly built African Union Headquarter in Addis Ababa recently.

When you drive along any road between Ethiopia, Djibouti and Somalia’

When you drive along any road between Ethiopia, Djibouti and Somalia and you are likely to see pick-up trucks, piled high with bundles of fresh green leaves known as "Khat", hurtling past you at terrific speed, horns blaring, lights flashing. Land at any airport in east African cities like Djibouti, Hargeissa, Berbera, bossaso etc., and you will see planes stuffedwith the same green leaves, being unloaded at a frenzied pace. Whether there is war, drought or famine, the leaves get through. The khat industrybooms throughout the year. In parts of eastern Ethiopia some survive on selling chat, a local stimulant plant that mostly men chew in their sparetime . Though this plant has drugging effects, it is legally recognisedand considered a lesser evil than marijuana. Some one has to wonder where all this khat was coming from. It's from the small town of Awaday, is located in between Ethiopia's most holy Muslim town of Harar and its big eastern city of Dire Dawa. Every scrap of pavement, every building, room and shack was devoted to the sorting, the weighing, the bundling and the selling of khat, a fresh, but a slightly bitter smell of vegetation. There are soft, smooth and silky with glossy discarded leaves. Men, women and children sat on these floors, rapidly chopping stems, picking through the leaves to choose the most succulent and tender. There is something medieval about the process, nothing was mechanized, everything was done by hand. Delicate weighing of the highest quality leaves which fetch tens of dollars a bunch is done with tiny brass weights on metal scales. In each and every room, a man sat with a giant ledger, carefully nothing to down-weights, prices or figures. The global trade in khat is worth hundreds of millions of dollars a year and in one Ethiopian town daily life centres almost entirely based on such a drug.

Public speculation: Debate on to Meles Zenawi's political behaviour'

Meles Zenawi Asresu, a former guerilla in the rebel TPLF, was born in Eritrea and became to Adwa district of Ethiopia as a fourth grade schoolchild, and lived as an student in General Wingate School-campus in Addis Ababa, but after brief hiatus in Eritrea. As a person who was a medical student in the former Haile-Selassie I University (HSIU) acompanied with others soon to join a Marxism study group that eventually became the Tigrai Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF) but was not in the leadership first, as a combatant he fled from Eritrea, but his fight was kept secret by his friends who held power simply because they are amongst the first to start the struggle whom he befriended only with thosewho became members of the CC in the first year and became one of the protagonists who could influence the aims and activities of the Front, in the long run before he was officially being member of the CC, then he got rid of his actual and potential contenders within the CC and the Polit- Bureau, and began a quick political rise within the Front. The absolute of Meles Zenawi in the Polit-Bureau of the TPLF led automatically to his absolute power in the TPLF-EPRDF, in Tigrai and then in the whole Ethiopia. Many commented he turned the retarded TPLF into an Eritrean Trojan-horse after smashing his rival-politicians within the TPLF. Meles Zenawi whose compatriots nicknamed him "Wadi-Alemash", sympathisers and admirers praise him that he is more intelligent and brilliant than an average Ethiopian, saying he is the only African leader who have been invited to every international forum more than anyone in the last 20 years. According to sympatisers, Meles Zenawi is the cleverest and most engaging Prime Minister in Africa – at least when he talks to visiting outsiders. When he speaks to his fellow Ethiopians, he is severe and dogmatic. But he entertains western visitors with humour and irony, deploying a diffident, self-depreciating style which cleverly conceals an absolute determination to control his country and it's destiny, free of outside interference. He is well-informed, highly numerate and focused.

And he delivers. He is the most articulate Ethiopian leader so far with so many languages in his belt. Check out most of his international interviews.Despite all the opposition against him, Meles is calm, collected, extremely intelligent, far smarter than most African leaders including Theodros II, YohannesVI, Menelik II, Hailesisllasie I, and Lt. Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam, did not evolve to Meles' stage. The guy with a medical studies drop-out of his 2nd year Univeristy to spend 17 years as top TPLF cadre and teacher, to emerge as the leader of a country of 90 million populationfor the last twenty years and counting. Of course some were echoeing his Grand dad Basha Asres Tessema was the one who massacred

Ethiopian patriots under the servicie of the occupationist Italians as main collaborator (Banda). But someone has to know Meles Zenawi was not handed power by his father or grandfather. He snatched power by his intellect and brave heart by himself, “get what you want by hook or by crook” that’s what politics does mean. Of course, Meles Zenawi wanted political power, he worked hard for it for over 17 years and got it at last.

Be a brave man like him to take it from his hands. Meles Zenawi was notfighting against or living with angels. He was on life and death struggle, living with devils and he won against them all. Editor Norwegian government and the Ethiopian government entered into an implementation agreement in late January, 2012’ The Minister of International Development Heikki Holmås, who flew to Addis Ababa signedthe new Memorandum of Understanding (MoU II) on the 9th May, 2011 with Ethiopia’s Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs Hailemariam Desalegn of which Norway has taken upon itself to ensure their safety and security through these two instruments (MoU I and MoU II). Meantime, Ethiopians and friends of Ethiopians are very disappointed and worried, especially, asylum seekers with final rejection are in screaming, depression and nightmare situation. Asylum applicants were never interviewed in person, nor their issue examined on an individual basis. The decision for the forced repatriation was made collectively. "Norway is not only a signatory to the Geneva Convention but also home to Nobel Peace Prize," signifying that the country is committed to rewarding those who promote peace in any part of the world, the Open Letter read. "Most of these Ethiopians have played a vital role in exposing the crimes and misdeeds of the current tyrannical regime in Ethiopia; theywill definitely face imprisonment, torture or being killed should they returnto Ethiopia. Therefore, all Ethiopians together re-appeal to the government of Norway to stop deportation and review and correct the unjust and unfair asylum granting policy towards Ethiopians demanding assistance to allow them to have access to a fair asylum process. It has tobe recalled that, for several decades, Norway has been known internationally as one of the pillars of United Nations efforts in ensuring respect for fundamental human rights nationally and internationally. In that respect, its important contributions towards alleviation of the refugeeproblem both through the evolution of the normative processes within the United Nations system, such as the development of international instruments, and its steadfastness in giving protection to asylum seekers within its territory have been widely acknowledged. Nonetheless, since 2009 the Norwegian government’s implementation of the so-called ‘assisted returnees’ program, without adequately ensuring returned refugees would not be exposed to dangers once they are back in their home countries have continued to give rise to serious concerns. For instance, Amnesty International’s complaint in 2010 against Norway, along with four other European countries (Denmark, the Netherlands, Sweden, and the United Kingdom), for forcibly returning Iraqi refugees to “the Iraqi provinces of Ninewa (Mosul), Kirkuk, Diyala, Salah al-Din, Baghdad, and to other particularly dangerous areas such as parts of Al- Anbar province”, before the situation in that country had stabilized, has continued as a practice. Worse is the forced removal of children to different countries. Two Norwegian papers “Arbeidets Rett” and “Møre si Nettutgåve” in their 21 March, 2012 editions reported that as many as 2,434 children born and raised in Norway have been returned to their home countries, once the asylum requests of their parents have been rejected, i.e., without giving due consideration to the plight of the minors.Similar criticisms are being darted in Norway’s direction at this very moment, following the government’s decision in late January, 2011 to deport hundreds of Ethiopian refugees who have lived in that country for several years. Because of such considerations, Norway’s position has beenfound untenable. There is strong claim of tensions between this decision Norway has predicated on its agreement with the Ethiopian government, signed on the 26th of January 2012. The evolving consensus is that it is intotal disregard of its longstanding international obligations, beginning withthe 1951 “Convention on the Status of Refugees” and subsequent international instruments ranging from the protection of individuals from torture to inhuman and other forms of degrading treatments.

Haile Guebre Selassie the emperor of long-distance running enchantedfans of running with his mastery of the art for nearly two decades’

Commentary: Because he is such a rare athlete, because of his infectious joie de vivre and because he is an all-around admirable guy, it's now somewhat stressful to see him age. The wear and tear of a life that started on a poor, Ethiopian farm are making the double Olympic champion and four-time world champion in the 10,000 meters look increasingly mortal. The world records in the marathon, 5,000 and 10,000that once were his belong now to others. With his 39th birthday looming in April, 2012, Gebrselassie will never get them back. His ambition of competing at a fifth Olympic Games, in London this July, appears to be fading. His most recent marathon wasn't close to good enough to warranta place on Ethiopia's Olympic team. Moges Mulugeta

A senior European diplomat says two Swedish journalists jailed in Ethiopiacould be released within few days’ Mr. Louis Michel, member of the European Parliament and former Belgian Foreign Minister told he had productive discussions with PM Meles Zenawi, and that he is optimistic the journalists, Martin Schibbye and Johan Persson, will be freed soon. In December, 2011an Ethiopian court convicted the two Swedes of entering the country illegally and supporting a rebel group the government has classified as a terrorist organization. After their conviction and sentencing,Schibbye and Persson declined to file an appeal, saying they would ask forclemency. During the trial, the pair admitted entering Ethiopia illegally, but denied supporting the rebels.

“Committee to Free Eskinder Nega” called for the Ethiopian government todrop terrorism charges against banned journalist and dissident blogger Eskinder Nega’ PR: Eskinder’s trial begins in Addis Ababa and the charges against him carry a maximum sentence of death. Nega is a prominent Ethiopian journalist arrested on Sept. 14 and detained under the country’sAnti-Terrorism Proclamation of 2009. Just prior to his arrest, Nega had published an online column critical of the use of the terrorism law to silence dissent and calling for the Ethiopian government to respect freedom of expression and end torture in the country's prisons. "Ethiopian courts have a long record of convicting political dissidents on trumped-up charges," said Jason McLure, coordinator of the Committee to Free Eskinder Nega. "Pressing capital charges against a journalist is nothing short of barbaric. Prime Minister Meles Zenawi should order his government's prosecutors to drop Eskinder's case immediately and releasehim from prison."The veteran journalist and blogger has been detained at least seven times by Prime Minister Zenawi's government over the past two decades. He and his wife, journalist and publisher Serkalem Fasil, were jailed from 2005 to 2007 in the aftermath of the country's disputed elections along with dozens of other journalists, rights activists and opposition leaders. Since that time, the couple has been banned from re- opening their newspapers or opening new publications. Ethiopia currently has about seven journalists behind bars, and has forced 79 journalists intoexile over the past decade, more than any country in the world, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ). In December a court in Ethiopia sentenced two Swedish journalists to 11 years in prison after theyentered the country illegally to do a story on the separatists Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF).

Solidarity Movement for New Ethiopia (SMNE), released a statement at the same time with the Anuak Justice Council (AJC)' The SMNE has prepared this petition to beseech the International Criminal Court (ICC) and ICC Prosecutor, Mr. Luis Moreno-Ocampo, to open an active investigation into the genocide of the Anuak people of the Gambella regionin Ethiopia, which began on December 13th, 2003 and continued for over two more years. Genocide Watch, an organization that "exists to predict, prevent, stop, and punish genocide and other forms of mass murder," hasindependently confirmed this genocide along with a litany of other criminalacts, including crimes against humanity, committed by Meles Zenawi's regime. On January 6, 2012, the governor of Gambella, Omot Obang Olom, who was the Head of Security during the carnage and a major actor in the genocide, exposed in new public testimony that he and Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi should share the same fate—jail—if he wereto be held accountable for providing the list of Anuak to be killed in the brutal massacre of 424 Anuak leaders by Ethiopian Defense Forces and armed militia groups. In a recent hearing that threatened to oust him from his position as Gambella Peoples Unity Democratic Movement (GPUDM) party head and Gambella Regional State President, with the likely consequence of imprisonment, he threatened, "If I should be jailedfor giving the list, then Meles would have to be imprisoned with me because he is the one who passed the order, the soldiers and the guns tokill" Editor

World's first illustrated Christian Bible discovered at Ethiopian monastery'

The world's earliest illustrated Christian Bible book has been saved by a British charity which located it at a remote Ethiopian monastery. The incredible Garima Gospels are named after a monk who arrived in the African country in the fifth century and is said to have copied them out in just one day. Beautifully illustrated, the colours are still vivid and thanks to the Ethiopian Heritage Fund have been conserved.

Abba Garima arrivedfrom Constantinople in 494 AD and legend has it that he was able to copythe gospels in a day because God delayed the sun from setting. The incredible relic has been kept ever since in the Garima Monastery near Adwa in the north of the country, which is in the Tigrai region at 7,000 feet. Experts believe it is also the earliest example of book binding still attached to the original pages. The survival of the Gospels is incredible considering the country has been under Muslim invasion, Italian invasion and a fire in the 1930s destroyed the monastery's church. They were written on goat skin in the early Ethiopian language of Ge'ez. There are two volumes which date from the same time, but the second is written in a different hand from the first. Both contain illustrations and the four Gospels. Though the texts had been mentioned by the occasional travellersince the 1950s, it had been thought they dated from the 11th century at the earliest. Carbon dating, however, gives a date between 330 and 650 -which tantalisingly overlaps the date Abba Garima arrived in the country. So the first volume could be in his hand - even if he didn't complete the task in a day as the oral tradition states. The charity Ethiopian Heritage Fund that was set up to help preserve the treasures in the country has made the stunning discovery. It was also allowed incredibly rare access tothe texts so experts could conserve them on site
Meles Zenawi told western diplomats fairly and squarely' –"Democratization is a matter of survival"
"The development of a strong democracy and civil society is the only wayEthiopia can survive and secure peace and unity among ethnically and religiously divided population", for this reason, his Government is commited to democracy, adding that for Ethiopia, "democratization is a matter of survival, where democracy developed and citizens had a stake in it's establishment", but some are doubtfuls about his commitment onto political pluralism and multi-party democracy in Ethiopia. Refering his ownstruggle against the Duerg regime, Meles Zenawi said, he and his TPLF compatriots received no foreign support, but were willing to sacrifice and die for their cause. However his critics say, most of his supporters do not seem to be aware of what that does mean and how they come to that conclusion as such but in how he choose to be heared by millions of Ethiopians, important element of having an human-personality is genuinly quality thinking, but he just make such dirty tricks to fool none but only his likes, is useless to himself and to the Ethiopian people if his electoral thinking is full of manipulation, he manipulates more because he needs recognition, vote, reward and generally public support, gifted in the practice of tactical reasoning, adding that "supporters of Meles Zenawi may admire him for his oratory, unrelenting rejection of his political opponents, they would not, however, seem to realize that if his ethnic- politics were to be defined by a word, it is nothing but denial, controls the military and the intelligence making him the most powerful man in the country. However, still many wondered whether the ruling-party change ofheart was genuine after twenty years as freedom of speech nowadays hasbeen confused severely with "terrorism".
Editor
Regime misuses foreign food aid to punish critics'
According to the US based Human Rights Watch (HRW), the regime uses foreign food aid to punish critics. Ethiopia is one of the world's largest recipients of development aid, receiving about USD 3 billion annually, withthe United States one of its largest donors. This money does save lives.

But it also “underwrites repression in Ethiopia,” in the words of the US based Human Rights Watch (HRW) . Families and entire areas of the country are deliberately starved unless they back the government, humanrights groups have shown. In Ethiopia, the verb “to starve” is transitive.

Anti terrorism laws must not be misused to curb rights in Ethiopia’

A group of independent United Nations human rights experts outspokenlyagainst the ongoing use of anti-terrorism laws to curb freedom of expression in Ethiopia, where several journalists were recently given prison sentences under such legislation. “Journalists play a crucial role inpromoting accountability of public officials by investigating and informingthe public about human rights violations,” said the Special Rapporteur onfreedom of expression. “They should not face criminal proceedings for carrying out their legitimate work, let alone be severely punished.”

Ruling-EPRDF is in it’s allout campaign to dismantle and eliminate anyopposition to it's rule’

Hundreds of Ethiopian journalists and political leaders are forced to eithergo into exile or underground. A culture of treason, serial mass murders, lies, deception, ethnicity, fear, hatred and corruption became an integral part of the system. Currently in Ethiopia it is impossible to operate an independent news journal, hold opposition party meetings, and organize protest demonstrations. The regime's campaign extends beyond Ethiopia’sborders. It is pouring millions of dollars into a campaign to infiltrate and control every Ethiopian institutions in the Diaspora, including places of worship, sports and cultural groups, and the media. As example, recently allocated $2 million to regain control of the Ethiopian Sports Federation in North America (ESFNA) after the board kicked out the regime hoodlums from the executive committee.

Editor

Ethiopia is currently exposed to extreme danger as a result of 20 years ofmisrule – Analysts’

TPLF's ethnic policy in particular is an existential threat to the nation as analysts. However, there is a way to protect and preserve Ethiopia’s freedom and unity. Pan-Ethiopian groups must set up a Transitional National Council in exile that will act as a caretaker government once the tyrant regime overthrown. Government in exile is not a new concept as during the Fascist Italian occupation of Ethiopia, was there a government in exile led by the ex-Emperor Haile-Selassie I. Over the past decade, several Ethiopian scholars, writers, and dissideients have proposed such idea. Recently, Syria’s opposition has set up a transitional council in exile.The Ethiopian National Transition Council that is now proposed by Dr. Fissha Eshetu founder and president of Unity University College, is a workable idea, said Tinsae Ethiopia a diaspora based civic organ, and it would like to be one of the first political parties to fully support it. Calledon all patriotic Ethiopians around the world to rally behind the idea of forming a "transitional national council".

Survival International (SI) has uncovered shocking new evidence of human rights abuses against tribes in Ethiopia's Omo valley’ As government efforts to develop lucrative Sugar cane plantations in the region intensifies, bulldozers are flattening land near UNESCO World Heritage Site, destroying villages and forcing local communities to give uptheir pastoral way of life. Fear is growing as violence becomes commonplace and reports of beatings, rapes and arrests spread among the tribes close to the Omo River. As recently Survival International (SI) received reports of three Bodi men being beaten to death in an Ethiopian jail. The government is also ordering families to sell their livestock. One man told Survival, "My money is my cattle. My bank account is my cattle".Survival International has exclusive photographs of a road Ethiopia's government is building in the area, which cuts straight through tribal land,to improve access to land clearance sites. One Mursi man said,"the government is building Sugar cane plantations on my land. When you see it you will cry - there are no bushes in the Omo valley now". Two UN bodies have already requested the Ethiopian government to provide evidence that tribes are being consulted, and that current developments are not damaging the areas cultural and natural heritage. However, Ethiopia has ignored such calls. Survival International has also received disturbing reports that Ethiopia has begun the process of forcibly resettling tribes in the Omo river valley, in a tactic known as "resettlement". Local communities have been given one year to relocate, in a programme similar to that reported by Human Rights Watch (HRW) inEthiopia's remote western region of Gambella. A Mursi man told Survival International, the government came, took our land and told us it wants tomove all the people in the Omo valley to stay in one place like a camp".

Dr. Fisseha Eshetu self-exiled’

Former Owner & President of “Unity University College” has fled Ethiopia,and joined the struggle to bring about a lasting solution to the political problems shocking the nation.

George Orwell, the political philosopher quoted as saying’

The great George Orwell quoted as saying, "in time of deceit telling the truth is a revolutionary act". To "see what's infront of one's nose needs aconstant struggle, for dictators power is not a means, it's an end; one does not establish a dictatorship in order to safeguard a revolution; one makes the revolution in order to establish the dictatorship".

Preliminary investigations into the jamming of Arabsat satellite transmission shows that it is originating from Ethiopia’ Telecommunications Minister Nicolas Sehnaoui said, calling on Arabsat’s operator to secure new frequencies for its transmission in Lebanon. “Arabsat told us that the source of the jamming is Ethiopia and it handed us a copy of their complaint they have passed to Ethiopian authorities on this matter,” said Sehnaoui. Speaking to reporters during a visit to a local satellite station in Mount Lebanon’s Jouret al-Balout, Sehnaoui said that the political atmosphere in the region is likely to be behind the jamming ofcertain satellite operators. “The political atmosphere in the region could push some countries to take such a step and start jamming on some operators,” Sehnaoui said. Several Lebanese channels and the Qatar- based Al-Jazeera have been jammed in the past year, and the frequenciesof Arabsat and Nilesat network providers have been jammed since the pro-democracy uprisings and ensuing unrest in Libya and Egypt. “There needs to be a permanent solution to this jamming problem,” said Sehnaoui, adding that contacts are ongoing with the administration of Arabsat to assign a new frequency for their transmission in Lebanon. “Lebanon should be a [safe haven] for the re-broadcasting of satellite networks ,” Sehnaoui added. Sehnaoui, who was accompanied by members of the ministry’s Telecoms Regulatory Authority, said the installation of the fiber optics network in Lebanon would greatly improvethe telecoms network in the country. “The installation of the fiber opticsnetwork will end in October, and it will help in the development of this sector,” said Sehnaoui. But he reiterated the need to cooperate with Arabsat and Nilesat in providing new frequencies to re-broadcast theirchannels. “Satellite networks should take the initiative to ensure new frequencies for the Lebanese channels because the jamming might berelated to the political problems the region is going through.”

Why 19th of February marked every year as the birthday of the Tigrai Peoples Liberation front (TPLF)? Many people in Tigrai to think of their loved ones as martyrs as every year, it is a day for remembering the loss of abut 65, 000 young women and men, as well as thousands of civilians killed in the countryside and urban centres by the TPLF and of course the ruling Duerg military regime. No victory of the TPLF over the tyrant Duergwhich ended up in the tyranny, intrigue and treachery of TPLF would be celebrated by Ethiopians in the future. Moges Mulugeta Sebhat Guebre Igziabher a journalist, novelist and essayist known for his eccentric lifestyle and yet adored in literary circles as the 'father of short- story writing' dies in Addis Ababa’ He was 76. Sebhat's golden days were during the emperor's time, when he was a flamboyant handsome journalist whose very popular weekly columns appeared in Menen, a magazine named after the wife of Emperor Haileselassie I. In the late '60sand early '70s, he was being schooled in France, where he said he was widely exposed and influenced by the works of great literary figures such as French writer Émile Zola. His novel in Amharic, Letoom Aynegalign, wastranslated and published in French while he was living in Paris. A native of the historic town of Adwa in northern Ethiopia, Sebhat Gebreegzabher published works includeTekusat, Säbatägnaw Mälak, Egrä Mängäd, Mastawäsha, and Amist-Sidist-Sebat, among others.

February 22nd marked as "Nile Day" in Nile riparian countries’

22nd of February to be celebrated among Nile basin countries. Nile basin countries are consisted of Ethiopia, Sudan, Egypt, Kenya, Tanzania, Rwanda, Burundi, Uganda, the Congo, and the new member South Sudanunder a slogan known as "Water, Energy, Food and Cooperation on the Nile River".

Evident in the findings of the recently issued U.S. State Department’s Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 2011 reveals’ “Membership in the EPRDF [the ruling party] conferred advantages uponits members; the party directly owned many businesses and was broadlyperceived to award jobs and business contracts to loyal supporters. The opposition reported that in many instances local authorities told its members to renounce their party membership and join the EPRDF if theywanted access to subsidized seeds and fertilizer; food relief; civil servicejob assignment, promotion, or retention; student university assignment and postgraduate employment; and other benefits controlled by the government… Some government officials appeared to manipulate the privatization process, and state- and party-owned businesses received preferential access to land leases and credit… “The law requires authoritiesto obtain judicial warrants to search private property; however, in practicepolice often ignored the law… The government reportedly used a widespread system of paid informants to report on the activities of particular individuals… Security forces continued to detain family membersof persons sought for questioning by the government…The national government and regional governments continued to put in place “villagization” plans in the Gambella, Benishangul-Gumuz, and Somali regions… According to the [Human Rights Watch] report, security forces beat (sometimes leading to death), threatened, arrested without charge, and detained persons who were critical of planned villagization of their communities, and this caused persons to fear speaking out against the process… While the constitution and law provide for freedom of speech and press, the government did not respect these rights in practice… The government continued to arrest, harass, and prosecute journalists, publishers, and editors… Students in schools and universities were indoctrinated in the core precepts of the ruling EPDRF party’s concept of ‘revolutionary democracy”.

Ethiopia has signaled it may grant clemency to journalists convicted underthe country’s controversial anti-terrorism law’ Prime Minister Meles Zenawitold a parliamentary session that Ethiopia could pardon politicians and journalists arrested under the 2009 anti-terrorism law, but he dismissed opposition criticism he was using the law to clamp down on dissent”.

Regime critics have criticized him for using terror law from 2009 to persecute political opponents. The regime even claimed the opposition was "dirtying-up the people like themselves", and even opposition parliamentarians are routinely being humiliated and treated like deliquent children in a publicly addressed parliamentary session, they were even mocked by the PM for their pronounciation of English words, according to anaysts. Ato Meles Zenawi said specifically Schibbye and Persson in his speech in Parliament, in response to parliamentary questions. Violated thelaws of Ethiopia. These two journalists violated the laws of Ethiopia. No journalist can escape prosecution if the rules are broken, said the Prime Minister.He also dismissed criticism of the anti-terror laws used to crack down on dissidents.All trials are open, all suspects have been given accessto lawyers and some have even been acquitted when no evidence has been found to justify their guilt. And we are also considering a pardon, if the perpetrators admit their guilt and their mistakes, said Zenawi. The Ethiopian government would use its tough terror laws to crack down against opposition he dismissed categorically: All trials are open, all suspects have been given access to lawyers and some have even been acquitted when no evidence has been found to prove their guilt. And we are also considering a pardon, if the perpetrators admit their guilt and mistakes said Meles

Zenawi.

A British excavation team has struck archaeological sites’ The British excavation team has struck gold with a discovery that may solve the mystery of where the "Queen of Sheeba" of the biblical legendderived her fabeled treasures. It's almost 3, 000 years ago, the ruler ofSheeba, which spanned modern-day Ethiopia and Yemen, arrived in Jerusalem with vast quantities of gold to give to king Solomon of Israel. An archaeologist and former British Museum curator, who headed the excavation team on the high Gharalta plateau in northern Ethiopia said "the fact that we might have the Queen of Sheeeba's mines is extraordinary".

Ethiopia-born Ammanuel, a 10-year-old singing sensation wows anAustralian audience’

with a singing talent rare for that age, Ammanuel from Byron Bay, Australia, is only 10 but this little cute takes on multiple Grammy-award winner Adele's "Rolling in he Deep". Ammanuel wows the Australian audience and judges with a talent rare for his age. Ammanuel said he would like to become a recording artist, save money and try to launch running water and clinics in his native country, Ethiopia. The 10 years old native Ethiopian adopted by Australian parents, has been a point of discussion on the social networks among many Ethiopians following his astonishing stage performance in the Australian Idol. His performance wascertainly breathtaking and well beyond his age. It is rather his emotive and thoughtful words in the interview he gave off the stage. Asked about his future career plans, he heedfully replied: “… I want to be a great singer and with the money I make, I want to help people in my home country Ethiopia… I want to give them clean water and fresh food and things like that to make their life a lot better.” Editor

Bombardier Aerospace has confirmed Ethiopian Airlines to be the customer which placed a firm order for five Q400 NextGen regional airliners’ Two of the five fast-turboprop aircraft will be operated by Ethiopian Airlines and three by its affiliate, ASKY Airlines of Togo. In the meantime, according to Mr. Linden Birns, spokesperson of Airbus in sub- Saharan Africa, at the media briefing executives of Airbus will present the company’s latest Global Market Outlook for the airline industry in Eastern Africa and an update on all of its aircraft programmes, including the A350XWB, which has been ordered by Ethiopian Airlines. Ethiopian Airlineshas placed orders for 12 Airbus A350XWB aircraft. Airbus is pushing Ethiopian Airlines to place orders for it's long-range aircraft A330.

Executives of Airbus have recently proposed to the management of Ethiopian that the Airbus A330 widebody jetliner was an ideal option as the airline is on a speedy growth. The Airbus marketing team led by Mr.Francois Cognard have been repeatedly visiting Addis Ababa and trying hard to convince the management of Ethiopian to buy the A330 aircraft.The Airbus team has presented attractive offers to the management of Ethiopian.

Alastair Endersby describes assassination politics as his own mind’

Assassination can be defined as the targeted killing of an individual for political reasons in peacetime. It can be undertaken by individual citizens,or by the agents of another state, but in either case it takes place withoutany legal process. Assassinating a dictator is often considered in the context of Hitler and Stalin, or of secret CIA action against foreign leaderssuch as Fidel Castro in the Cold War period, after this became public knowledge in the mid-1970s US Presidents have banned the use of assassination by Executive Order. However, this issue regained topicality in the 1990s as leaders such as Saddam Hussein and Slobodan Milosevic pursued bloody careers which threatened international peace. In recent years US airstrikes apparently aimed at killing Muammar Al-Qaddafi of Libya (1986), Osama Bin Laden (1998) and Saddam Hussein (1991 and 2003) have provoked argument – were these assassination attempts or did these leaders have the status of enemy combatants in a time of war? Certainly the UN Charter (Article 24) and various conventions (e.g New York Convention) clearly appear to make assassination in peacetime against international law. The arguments below focus on the issue of assassination of a dictator in peacetime, although many of them would also apply to the specific military targeting of foreign leaders in a time of war. The topic can be debated from the perspective of internal oppositionmovements seeking to rid their country of dictatorship, or from the perspective of the international community. Utilitarian argument: many deaths and much suffering could be prevented if one man is killed. The greater good demands a single evil act is done, especially if it would avertthe immediate and certain danger of much worse evil. Who now wouldn’t wish that Hitler had been killed in 1933? According to philosophers, “obedience to tyrants is obedience to God!” .

Staphylococcal poisoning from drinking non-pasteurized or non- homogenized milk was found to affect over 90% of a tested population in Debre Zeit, Ethiopia’ The cause? “Staphylococcus aureus, a bacterium thatcan cause mastitis (udder infection) in dairy cows” according to collaborative research undertaken by scientists from the International Livestock Research Institute (ILRI) and Addis Ababa University (AAU). Thebacteria can then produce enterotoxins in the milk which, when consumedby a person, cause a real risk of food poisoning. Scientists have been measuring the level of staphylococcal poisoning – also known as food poisoning – found in the fermented milk in Debre Zeit. The research has also shown that traditional milk fermentation can help ensure milk is safe for consumption by reducing “the risk of food poisoning by Staphylococcusaureus by 93.7%.” During milk souring: .. the organic acids produced during fermentation inhibit the growth of spoilage micro-organisms, thereby prolonging the storage life of the milk.” These traditional techniques are especially useful when industrial milk preparation methods are not available. This study is a joint collaboration between scientists from ILRI and Addis Ababa University (AAU).

Ethiopia has finalised the installation of power inter-connection lines toSudan’

As the country builds on its resolve to become a major regional electric power exporter. The Ethiopian Electric and Power Corporation (EEPCo) announced the completion of the interconnecting lines, which cover 296 kilometres and have a 230 Kilovolt capacity, which makes Sudan the second country to benefit from Ethiopia's power exports. Ethiopia began power supply to Djibouti three years ago, earning the country US$1.5 million a month from exports.The corporation it had invested US$41 million in the interconnection lines with funding obtained from the World Bank. Iranian and Bosnian experts were the lead constructors in the project. The transmission lines will run between the Ethiopian towns of Bahir-Dar and Metema and up to the border with Sudan to connect the countries' grids. Sudan is expected to replace its domestic thermal generation with surplus hydropower from Ethiopia, and reduce its greenhouse gas emissions. "This increased access to electricity is part of both countries' poverty reduction strategies and will realise benefits suchas lighting of schools and homes, improved access to social services, andgreater opportunities for business development," World Bank said. "The Project is also being implemented in accordance with World Bank environmental and social standards." The bank said that the project represents an important step in a broader power trade agenda for the region, where interconnections with Djibouti, Kenya, Tanzania, South Sudan, Somalia, and Yemen are being planned.

Ethiopia’s premier is gripped with fear that disgruntled members of hisown party are plotting’

Security: Ethiopia’s premier is gripped with fear that disgruntled membersof his ownparty, the Tigrean People’s Liberation Front (TPLF), are plotting to assassinate him. Mr. Meles Zenawi replaced many of his bodyguards from Tigrai with those from the Adwa Awraja and some Eritreans whom heseems to trust more. At least 5 of the replaced Tigrean bodyguards have been arrested and taken to an unknown location, according to sources.

The local ARENA Tigrai accuses Meles Zenawi a traitor who is pitting the people of Tigrai against other Ethiopian ethnic groups to prolong his rule. As a result of growing hostility from Tigreans and his fear of assassination,Meles Zenawi, who already takes extraordinary measures to protect himself, has doubled his security detail and hired security experts from U.S. and other countries to train them.

Three students have been dismissed off Jimma Unversity’

Three students were given academic dismissal off Jimma University in theregional state of Oromia in Ethiopia while four others were suspended from their studies at the university for two years for demanding for a haltto what was described as politically motivated racial slurs, allegedly perpetuated by students of Tigrean origin, the ethnic group that controls the political power in the current regime in the University campuses. The Oromo students were harassed, jailed and killed for seeking fair treatmentand justice. According to eye witnesses in Jimma (Wetern Oromia), Wubshet Zelalem, Mengistu (Amhara national), Tesfaye Berihanu Bari'e and Moera Lema Debela, both Oromo nationals were dismissed from the University, while Makonnin Dabale Tolla, Nuredin Ahmed Bariso and Takalign Konta Oli, Oromos were temporarily abrogated for two years.

Another student, named Melesse Tilahun who was a Gurage by birth, waspenalized with one-year suspension from the University. With the connection of the incident many other students, among those who opposed the inappropriate punishment imposed by the University administration against their fellow students, were arrested and taken to unknown locations.

-Editor

The regime in Ethiopia as described by Dr. Helen Epstein'

"Cruel Ethiopia" published on The New York Review Books dated April 21, 2010 noted that "there are two Prime Minister Meles Zenawi; One a Clubbable, charming African who gives moving speeches at elite forums about terrorism and poverty, and the other is a dictator whose totalitarianism dates back to the cold war days". "The State Department ofthe USA on its 2010 report also noted "…that the Meles government is engaged in killings, tortures, arbitrary arrest, and restriction of freedom ofmovement, assembly and mistreatment of detainees. The Human Rights Watch (HRW) on its December 17, 2010 issue stated "the government of Ethiopia uses development aid for state repression by way of routinely discriminating against people viewed as political opposition supporters".

The aid your government provides the Meles regime as such being used tosuppress political dissent by conditioning access to essential services on support for the ruling party led Mr. Meles Zenawi.

As Dr. Helen Epstein, "The regime in Addis Ababa survives not by the support of the people but by the multitudes of spies or undercover agentsunder its payroll. The agents may range from the ordinary spy in the street in Addis up to those in the Diaspora. The job of the cyber agents inthe Diaspora is to discredit any article critical of the regime in power.

Their unique feature? They are ordered to respond en masse to create theillusion that the article is indeed opposed by the majority of Ethiopians. If scores have already tried to discredit the report by Dr. Epstein, it is not because they are honest but because they are paid cyber agents whose full-time job is to defend the tyrannical regime in Addis".

The European aircraft manufacturer, Airbus, said that Addis Ababa wouldbe a 'Mega City' in the next twenty years' Mega cities are those that havemore than 10,000 long haul air passengers every day. At a press briefing held at the Sheraton Addis, Airbus head of marketing communications, said currently there are 39 mega cities in the world, adding that this number would increase to 90 in the coming twenty years. He said "Ethiopia would join this group within twenty years. Countries which have mega cities need very large aircraft like Airbus A380. Ethiopia, too, may need A380 in the coming 20 years. However, as Ethiopian airlines is growing fast it needs more new aircraft," According to Airbus, its new product A350XWB is on the right track. The A350, which is currently in themanufacturing line, is expected to roll out of the final assembly line in Toulouse this year and would fly early next year. First deliveries are slatedfor 2014. EAL has placed firm orders for 12 A350-900 aircraft. Airbus will start delivering the first A350s to Ethiopian in 2017.

At least 100,000 people came out to Awalia Mosque'

And the area around it as people to hear the report from the meeting heldbetween reps of the Muslim community and government officials, according to a report. The reps sensing the mood of the people, have told the crowd that government officials are considering their demand and will give the final response on March 5,2012. Many young people, though theywere not satisfied by the response given by the representatives, have promised to patiently wait till March 5th out of respect for their representatives. In the mean time, they have decided to meet every Friday (Jumma prayers) and present their demands.The pro-Government Ethiopian Islamic Council called a meeting to prevent the people from going to Awolia, but its attempt has reported failed. A member of the movement who does not want to be named said: "The council has attempted to defame the movement on local radios. The Muslims have disregarded the threat and nagging of the Council and came out en masseto protest." Various narratives are being presented to explain the growing stand off between Muslim activists and the current Ethiopian regime. The activists accuse the state of discrimination and meddling in the internal activities of their faith by imposing an imported religious doctrine. The state blames the conflicts on 'radicalization' and a covert agitation by foreign-based elements. The regime is also accusing the opposition partiesof exploiting religion for their political gains. The opposition attributes the rising tension to the regime's use of religion as part of its divide and rule tactics. Various narratives are being presented to explain the growing standoff between Muslim activists and the current Ethiopian regime. The activists accuse the state of discrimination and meddling in the internal activities of their faith by imposing an imported religious doctrine. The state blames the conflicts on 'radicalization' and a covert agitation by foreign-based elements. The regime is also accusing the opposition partiesof exploiting religion for their political gains. The opposition attributes the rising tension to the regime's use of religion as part of its divide and rule tactics. In other words, Muslims had minimal participation in the politics ofthe Ethiopian state. Today despite making up half of the country's population, Muslims are acutely underrepresented within the Ethiopian political elite. Just like it did with the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church(EOTC), the Ethiopian regime took control of and used the Islamic institutions for its own political purposes. The consequence is that some religious leaders came to act as state agents and institutions began working as if they were extensions of the state. By so doing, they lost legitimacy and credibility in the eyes of the faithful, allowing for alternative leadership and informal institutions to emerge.

On the nation's marking of 19th February every year'

As to mark "Martyrs' Day" commemorating the massacre of about 30 thousand citizens by fascist Italian invading troops in 19th February, 1937. The Yekatit 12 Square (Sidist Kilo) monument stands in the Sidist Kilo square infront of the Yekatit 12 Hospital (formerly Emperor Haile Selassie Hospital and known before that as the Beite Saida Hospital). It stands in tribute to the thousands of innocent martyrs butchered by the Fascist Italian Occupiers on that date in in the Ethiopian Calender year of 1929 (1936 Gregorian Calender). The massacre took place at the order ofthe Italian Vice-Roy Marshal Rodolfo Grazziani in response to an assasination attempt against him carried out by two pro-Ethiopia Eritreans namely Moges Asgedom and Abraha Deboch. Chairman of the Ethiopian Patriots' Association (EPA) whos sacrificed their lives to safeguard the country's sovereignty, as a role model laid a wreath of flower at the "Yekatit 12 Monument" in honour of the martyrs. A war veterans attendedon the occasion stressed, the present generation of Ethiopia should campaign against poverty and pull the nation out of poverty taking the martyrs foot-steps.

At least 100 people have been confirmed dead and more than that number were wounded in tribal fighting parts in Somali Regional State in Ethiopia - residents said' Residents say 24-hour battle between two clans dwell in side by side at Raas village in western Somalia which is under thecontrol of Ethiopia, claiming the lives of 100 people from both warring sides. Mohamed Mohamud Sheik Sadiq, one of the elders in Raas town told Shabelle Media that the battle is due to long history of war between the two clans fighting in the area. The elders from both tribal militias in the conflict called for immediate ceasefire to save the life of more people to die if the battles keep going in the area. Local residents expressed concern about the tribal combat as the situation of Raas town still remainstense. Both sides are getting reinforcements and some villagers began fleeing from their houses to the rural areas to escape casualties.

The Sudanese regime has intensifies repression'

The Sudanese government under President Hassan Ahmed Al-Bashir intensifies repression against Ethiopian political refugees as it strives toplacate the EPRDF regime and achieve its sectarian political gains.

Sudanese police have raided houses and rounded up Ethiopians in Omdurman and many parts of Khartoum. As recent event, a truck carriedEthiopian refugees to be deported had an accident and 42 Ethiopians and two Sudanese police have been killed. The cry for the UNHCR has been without any response. An independent research reveals five governmentalorgans at very loose of public confidence' An independent research sponsored by the Federal Ethics & Anti-corruption Commission reveals that five Ethiopian government institutions specifically, the Judicial system, the Police, Customes Authority, lower levels of Woreda administrations, and municipal bodies are at a very loose of public confidence. Preliminary polls were taken from institutions and individuals across the nation, according to the Tanzania based Killimanjaro International Corporation Ltd.

Some tips on 'Hot Red Chilli Pepper Powder' known locally as 'Berbere' & Niter kibbeh (roasted spice butter mixing)' In East Africa - especifically Ethiopia, Eritrea, and Somalia - is best known for its unique blend of local chilli powder, "Berbere". "Berbere", like most spice blends, can include a wide variety of ingredients, but it typically contains chili peppers, garlic, ginger, black pepper, fenugreek, allspice, and cloves. Before including it ina recipe, the blend is often mixed with water to make a paste, but it can also be used as a spice rub or seasoning. Basically, Berbere (spice pepper mixing) it can find its way into any dish from seafood and poultry to soup and lentils. Chances are that if you've eaten Eastern African food and, likemany, found it's addictive and satisfying, this little spice blend is responsible. Any of the popular stews called "Wat" most likely contain berbere and Niter kibbeh (spice roasted butter mixing). While isn't any strictly Eritrean or Somali restaurants in the US, do have your fair share ofEthiopian eateries. However, since Ethiopia is landlocked by Eritrea and Somalia, don't expect to find much seafood. However, locals and restaurants in western Europe and the US serve "Asa-Wat" i.e. shredded fish simmered with berbere, garlic, and onion on the weekends. But luckily, East African cuisine is often vegan, which despite some dinners' reservations, is a really good thing. It means that Ethiopian cooks have perfected recipes that are satisfying without meat and animal products, and unlike in the United States, they've been eating that way for centuries. For a great vegetarian/vegan meal, order "Miser-Wat" and "Kik-Alicha" from Ethiopian Famous. The wat, a red lentil stew spiced with berbere paste, packs a bit of heat. Then the "Kik-Alicha", a split pea stew,is milder to cut the heat of the berbere. With a little "Injera" , a spongy flat-bread to soak up the sauce and transport the lentils and split peas to your mouth, it makes for a filling lunch or dinner. Of course, if you're in the mood for meat, you can opt for something heavier like "Yesiga Kay- wat" i.e. "beef cubes" in Berbere sauce, Onion, and Garlic, served with homemade cheese made up of cow milk locally called, "Ayib".

GoE insists country not ready to liberalise key sectors yet'

PM Meles said it will maintain a foothold on some key sectors despite increased calls from neighbouring countries to open them up. Ethiopia's Prime Minister Meles Zenawi contends that his government is aware of thepros and cons of employing protectionist measures but still intends to maintain its monopoly in industries such as telecommunications, power, finance and logistics with the aim of protecting its citizens against exploitation. "This (protection) is not intended to keep away anybody and it is not based on paranoia. It has everything to do with creating a little bitof space for unemployed Ethiopian youth to learn to do business and accumulate a little bit of money," he emphasised. He argued that it was such government control that had enabled Ethiopia to make headways in the energy sector allowing it to generate thousands of megawatts of electricity, making the country a competitive destination for business. Theadoption of this mix of policies has also enabled the government to deliveran efficient railway system and telecommunications sector. No foreign banks operate in Ethiopia while the public banks have not been privatised."That is not going to be the future but we feel that at this phase of our development, we need these inputs," he said in defence of his policies.

Meles Zenawi who was in Kenya this time, however said his country values Foreign Direct Flows as demonstrated by its desire to attract investments in manufacturing, agriculture and tourism sectors where government restrictions are minimal.

TRADITION: When one passes through the Argobari (Erer gate) of Harrarwalled city’

In one of the five gates to the historic city of Harrar, he/she will be greeted by the magnificent aroma of fruits and vegetables widely grown inthe area. A group of Oromo ladies who offer some vendibles to the passerby are visually distinctive in their colourful attires. For centuries, Harrar has been a crossroad of commerce and a meeting point for merchants from Africa, India and the Middle East. Nowadays, the city hopes for a new economic boost: tourism. Its place in UNESCO’s world heritage list is already a good start. Situated on the eastern track of the southern Ethiopian mountain massifs, Harrar easily became the most important trade center in the region. The city played an intermediary role between the two trading companies, the rich highlands of the interior and the ports around the Gulf of Aden in the seventeenth century. But despite its commercial, religious and cultural importance, Harrar remained a closed and mysterious city for centuries; until the early nineteenth century. Following the battle of Chelenqo in 1887 where the Harraris weredefeated by emperor Minilik II, Harrar ceased to be an independent state and was forced to become part of Ethiopia. Harrar then began to disintegrate and it soon lost its status of a trade center by the end of nineteenth century when the railway line between Addis Ababa and Djibouti was built through Dire Dawa. From 1902, Dire Dawa became one of main commercial centers in Ethiopia. However, Harrar remained a spiritual city for the Ethiopian Muslim community, the political capital of Harrarge Province until 1994, and become one of the regional sates since 1995. Today Harrar is still a vibrant city with a lot of commercial activities,but the dwellers say that it can't be compared to its heydays. Situated only two hundred kilometers away from the Somalia border, the old merchant route that passes through Harrar is still alive according to residents. Smugglers carry everything from cell phones to satellite dishes into Ethiopia, unhindered by tax and custom law. Although the road isn't that busy anymore as was fifteen years ago, due to the conflict in Somalia, illegal movement of goods is still there. But, nowadays the people take the bus from Harrar to Hargeissa, the capital of Somaliland, toget a hold of cheap commodities and bring it back to the local market untaxed. Unlike its southern neighbor, Somaliland is relatively peaceful, and open for business. "Smuggling isn't as dangerous as it sounds," explains Lishan Ketema, a local guide. The majority of businessmen are convinced that in order to stay in business in the city, one has to buy supplies from smugglers. They confirm that even owners some of the modern stores in Harrar buy goods that illegally crossed the border because they cost forty percent less than those which paid customs duties. Near the contraband, also called as Asian market, another unique area in Harrar the recycling market is located. At this part of the city, scrap metal objects of all shapes and sizes gets recycled into something useful and enters the markets again. A heap of scrap metals and the loud bangs produced from the men working in the areas is quite a scene for a newcomer. The goods are often transported to Addis Ababa get a shot at asecond life. Like everywhere else in the city, khat is widely available in this market. One sees men chewing the leaf in every corner of the city; even on the streets and cafes men are seen sharing a bunch (khat). Khat arrives together with firewood on the back of donkeys, camels or on the top of taxis and buses from the surrounding countryside. Although the health consequence of this local stimulant is still under discussion, Khat remains to be a big business around Harrar and together with Coffee Ethiopia grosses hefty sum of money in form of foreign exchange earningsfrom this leaf, known as Khat. As gains from trade and commerce are clouded by a lot of uncertainties, a bad harvest for example, people's dailyincome around the area appears to be a bit volatile. Hence, an extra source of income is most welcomed. Fortunately for Harrar, it isn't only a crossroad of trade and commerce, but it is also one of the cultural cities inthe country with huge potential for tourism. The cultural organization of the United Nations (UNESCO) is providing an extra boost to this end. In 2003, Harrar received the City of Peace Prize from UNESCO. Harrar is alsoan ancient center for Islamic teaching where a grand mosque, an Orthodox church, and a Catholic church can still be seen standing close to one another. In the other parts of the world, places like Jerusalem, contested religious sites continue to spark violence. But since it's violent incorporation into the rest of the country more than a century ago, Harrar remained a relatively peaceful city until present. And still today, it remained to be one of the locations that draw in a lot of tourists from abroad. The cultural heritage is visible in the traditional Harrari house, whose architectural form is typical and different from the domestic layout usually seen in Muslim countries. The style is unique in Ethiopia. When Harrari people mention the 'Harrari culture', they actually refer to the beauty of their houses, which they are very proud of, so they don't mind showing it off to foreigners for a little amount of Eth. Birr, of course. A woman who lost her husband a couple of months ago don't mind opening her door for tourists as it is an easy way for her to make some extra cash. The walls of the Nedeba or the living room are covered in colourful plates and baskets. The Harraris love to decorate their rooms with the products of their centuries-old crafts. People sit on a series of platforms, reclining against pillows. The platforms are painted red in memory of those who died at the battle of Challanqo, when the Ethiopian Emperor Menelik II defeated Harrari's Emir Abdullahi and the city lost its independence. As darkness falls over the city the most spectacular and original activity for visitors to performs is feeding the hyenas. The hyena man of Harrar makes a handsome living by feeding wild hyenas for the benefit of touristsand curious locals. This man namely, Mulugeta has taken over the tradition from his father. Mulugeta's family is quite famous and nowadays tourists with flashing cameras pay him 50 Birr per person. Although tourism can mean a boost for Harrar, it is also important that the city retains its commercial character. Like the Khat trade, commerce in particular still employs lot of people from all ethnic and religious groups.

Trade in Harrar still reliant on trust rather than formal contracts, and hence all have a critical interest in peace and stability. As one businessman commented in the Journal of Religion, Conflict and Peace, "Ifthe belly is full there will be peace," while another said, "in trade there is no war."

Ethiopia - Ministry of Foreign Affairs briefing to reporters'

ADDIS ABABA: The outgoing president of Yemen Ali Abdallah Saleh is in the east African country. The spokesman Dina Mufti said that Ali Abdullah Saleh arrived in Ethiopia, and said he "doubts" Mr. Abdullah Saleh will fly on to Yemen. Yemen voted to replace Saleh with VP Abed Rabo Mansour Hadi, who is expected to be sworn-in to office. He takes over after monthsof uncertainty over whether Saleh would step down in the face of popular protests that plunged Yemen into crisis. Before arriving in Ethiopia, Saleh spent more than three weeks in the U.S. for medical treatment from wounds sustained in a June, 2011 assassination attempt. The 69-year-oldAbdullah Saleh, Yemen's ruler for 33 years, has pledged to attend his successor's inauguration. Aides to former President Ali Abdullah Saleh saidthat the ousted Yemeni president plans to go into exile in Ethiopia, as pressures mounted on him to depart the country for fear of sparking new cycles of violence. The news that the longtime Yemeni leader might leave to Ethiopia marks the latest twist in the meandering story of Saleh's fall from grace. As rumors have circulated of Saleh seeking refuge in a myriadof countries including Oman, and the United Arab Emirates where some ofhis family is already setting up residence, the ousted president has lingered on in Yemen, much to the dismay of the man who replaced him, the international officials who facilitated the handover of power, and people on the street who want his head. The aides said that the former president will leave Yemen within two days along with some of his family members where he will reside in a villa in the suburb of Addis Ababa. A diplomat in Sanaa confirmed that arrangements had been made for Saleh's departure for Ethiopia. Aides said that visas have been issued andAbdullah Saleh's belongings already shipped to Ethiopia. All officials spokeon condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. Several Yemen government sources close to former President Ali Abdullah Saleh announced that the fallen autocrat had decided to go into exile in nearby Ethiopia, adding that his personal belongings had already been shipped and a residence bought on the outskirts of the capital, Addis Ababa. The Ethiopian government said that Saleh had neither requested a residency permit nor applied as many suggested for asylum. It conceded that a visahad been issued to Saleh as he was on his way to the United States of America for medical treatment as officials felt they were helping Yemen transition through the final stage of its power-transfer. Officials refused toclarify whether they would consider granting Saleh's asylum if he deposited a demand, only pointing out that since Ethiopia was home to great many Yemenis, the government would have to carefully weigh the potential repercussions of such a "political and controversial" decision.

Meanwhile, the General People's Congress is still calling Saleh's forecasteddeparture from Yemen "ludicrous and science fictional." Amongst other rumors, President Saleh was said to travel to Oman or the United Arab Emirates (UAE) as several members of his family had already bought luxurious residences in preparation for their departure from power.

Israeli Foreign Ministry's appointment of the first Israeli-Ethiopianambassadress'

Ethiopian origin Belaynesh Zevadia's appointment has been heralded as "amessage of fighting discrimination", as the new ambassador to Ethiopia is appropriate and worthy. At 43, she is relatively young to head one of Israel's major embassies in Africa. Her career up to now includes stints asa deputy-consul in Chicago and vice-consul in Houston, but having a native Amharic-speaking ambassador in Addis-Ababa is certainly an advantage. Israel's ambassadors in Washington, London and Moscow are all veteran immigrants who have returned to represent Zion in their countries of birth. 28 years after making aliya from Ethiopia, Belainesh Zevadia will return to her birthplace in the summer of 2012 - this time as Israel's Ambassadress to Ethiopia. The 44 years old would be Israel's first Ethiopian born ambassadress. "It is a great honor to be appointed ambassador, and especially the first ambassador from the Israeli-Ethiopian community", she said. made aliya as a youth and am returning to Ethiopia as an ambassador". Belainesh Zevadia, who joined the ForeignMinistry in 1993 as its first Ethiopian-born diplomat, served previously at the consulates in Houston and Chicago. She grew up in the village of Ambova in the Gondar province, and arrived in Israel at the age of 16 on a Jewish Agency scholarship to study at the Hebrew University. After attending Jerusalem's Ulpan Etzion, Zevadia went to work for the Jewish Agency during Operation Moses, the airlift from November 21, 1984 to January 5, 1985, that brought some 8, 000 Ethiopian Jews to the country.She worked in helping ease initial absorption pains for the immigrants. Belainesh's father was the head kes (religious leader) in Gondar, and died three years after coming to Israel, in 1989. She has a BA in international relations, and an MA in anthropology and African studies, from the HebrewUniversity. Belainesh Zevadia was a role model for the entire Ethiopian community and clearly illustrated the phrase that “black is only a color,” commented MK Danny Danon, head of the Israeli Knesset’s Immigration and Absorption committee.

Ethiopia's most prolific author and veteran journalisthas passed away athis home in Addis’

Ato Mammo Wudneh was 81. A household name who produced 60 books that spanned three governments, Mammo was known largely for his translated works of espionage, specially the feats of the Israeli spying agency, Mossad. Altogether he had translated 13 books from the world ofespionage. The rest were either related to history or fiction. Eli Ben- Hanan's "Our Man in Damascus" from the world of espionage as well as"Alula Aba-Nega" from Ethiopian history were two among his best- selling books that made Mammo Wudineh among the most respected literary figures of the country. But he was also among the foremost Ethiopian journalists in the country. Beginning from the 1950s to the mid-1970's when the Duerg came to power, Mammo had worked in various capacities in agencies such like the United States Information Service (USIS) as documentary film worker, editor in-chief of "Police Ina Ermijaw", a bi-monthly Police crime investigative journal, and later in Asmara, the former province of Eritrea as chief-editor of all publications under the Ministry of Information and National Guidance. Back in Addis ababa, he worked on the then popular "Yekatit monthly Magazine", whosechief-editor was the veteran journalist Maeregu Bezabih. Editor

Located en route to Djibouti’

Djibouti, which is the main foreign trade corridor that ferries 97 percent ofthe total export/import trade of Ethiopia, merchandise shipments from theDjibouti port makes a final stop at Kality before entering the market.

Commotion created by loaded trucks, importers, transit agents and customs’ officers gives a lively vibe to the surrounding. And there is hardlyany day that the racket disappears from the customs compound and its neighborhood. In fact, the check-point occupies a central position in Ethiopia’s foreign trade handling, while being the prime source of government revenue. On the other hand, apart from the charges and fees associated with customs regulations and duties, customs clearance procedure also weighs as a primarily cost component in the overall import/export trade; however, it is not alone. Aggregated under ‘trade cost’, customs procedures, cost of in-land transportation, and other factors between the source and the destination countries constitute a significant part of the final price of outputs. In case of a landlocked nation like Ethiopia, the impact of transportation cost appears to be strong enough to seal the fate of the foreign trade sector. World Bank’s private arm International Finance Corporation (IFC) project keeps track of the extent of trade regulations across borders every year. The outcome of thesurvey publishes a compiled report entitled ‘Doing Business’ since 2002, now covering the extent of trade regulations in some 183 countries in the world. Especially, ‘trade across borders’, one of the sections in the report, deals particularly with the above issue. The procedural requirements and documentation in import/export of a standard container shipment is compared across countries and the 2011 report shows that Ethiopia stands among countries with higher trade cost in the world. In this regard,on average it costs 1,960 dollars to export one standard container in the sub-Saharan region, while the import cost appears to be steeper with an average of 2,502 dollar/container. In both measures the region is the worse from the other regions. Found among the above group, Ethiopia as well does exhibit high cost in imports and exports. As far as the transport authority under the Ministry of Transport (MoT) is concerned, in terms of the cost of in-land transportation as well things look bad for the foreign trade sector. According to the document that the authority circulated among transporters, the cost of transporting commodities to and from theport has risen to a level that is alarming for foreign trade in Ethiopia. Withthe exception of a few commodities like cut-flower and minerals, the bulk of the export/import business in Ethiopia is conducted via the sea. And themain means of inland transportation to get the commodities to the port is by trucks and lorries. The transportation authority's figures put this at almost 96 percent. Hence, truck transportation is the primary concern as one talks about transportation cost in Ethiopia. With an average cost of USD 6cent /km/ ton, the truck transportation in the Ethiopian foreign trade sector is hurting the competitiveness, said the document. As the document goes deeper, however, it tries to identify why the final transportation charge has risen over time. In sum, the high operational cost of the transport operators, excessive vehicle-down time and other factors were identified by the study. The study broadly claims that most ofthe transport operators are not using their vehicles effectively. According to the study, the timetable that most of the operators are working at the moment under-employs the trucks. On average 11.17 day are lost until a vehicle makes around trip from here to Djibouti covering a distance of 925km. Here, a further breakdown of the timetable shows that drivers spend more time on the road – four days – while a total of 4.47 days is spent just to load and unload. But the amount of time spent on customs procedures (including all the check-points along the route), quality and heath inspections were also found to be quite significant – 2.2 days, hence, limiting the monthly rotation to mere three time, and the annual distance covered to 60 thousand km. Though it had some loopholes here and there, the study, all in all, appears to have articulated the problem ingreater detail.

A dissident and leader of the Eritrea-based rebel group known as "Ethiopian People's Patriotic Front (EPPF) lost hope over Eritrea' Like thoseEthiopians who went before him and lost hope over Eritrea, Proffessor Mussie Tegegn is now speaking openly against Eritrean regime. He accuses Asmara of killing and detaining EPPF leaders and deliberately weakening the EPPF over the course of years to the point that he says there are no more EPPF rebels in Eritrea at present.

Ethiopia's premier plans to stay in power beyond 2015 election'

In a secret meeting of TPLF's big wigs, the question of Meles' fate after 2015 was a topic of discussion. The group was divided into two camps- one advocating for Meles to stay in power until 2020 and others were pushing the idea of termlimit and the importance of rotating the office ofthe Prime Minster to other personalities from different ethnic groups.

Meles' group led by Dr. Tewodros Adhanom, Seyoum Mesfin and of course, Azeb Mesfin, the wife of Meles were trying to make the point for their proposal that Meles cannot leave power until the millennium dam is finalized and also bring the Eritrean issue to conclusion. Seyoum Mesfin, now the Ethiopian Ambassador to China who participated via secured video conference also sided with Meles. Seyoum was noted as saying thatMeles' clout in international arena is irreplaceable and all the credit channels will close if Meles stepped down. Seyoum passionately argued that TPLF as a party cannot afford to change the horse in the middle of the stream. Seyoum also spilled the beans saying that the much touted five years goal is not achievable by 2015, the party will need more time ifit is going to see any of these lofty ideas implemented on the ground.
Sebhat Nega a devout TPLFite, proposed that Meles should hand power to another TPLF political elite member; however, no one in the TPLF circle was enthusiastic to take over Meles' office. The reason is obvious, Meles puts himself in such intractable position, and his office is not attractive anymore. All TPLF elites know that the power is sliding from their hand and they want to use Meles' evasive skills to buy time and find an opportune time to flee…the amazing thing is that Meles despite his public pronouncement that he had it enough and he would like to retire by 2015,he told his TPLF circles that he would like to stay in power until 2020 to see the fruition of his hard work….he told them that he is passionate aboutthe "Millennium Dam" and also he would like to bring the Eritrean issue to conclusion while he is in power. Meles also warned his party that- exhibiting any sign fracture within the party would pose dangerous threat to TPLF existence. Meles admitted that the TPLF dominance is unsustainable and he believes that gradual transfer of power would be beneficial to his party and people at the helm. Meles told them that Ethiopia is not immune from the Arab sprng style revolution- if that occurs, TPLF will be thrown in the dust bin of history. So he told them he can successfully lead a gradual transfer of power if he is allowed to stay until 2020. After, lengthy discussions, Meles' group seem to win the argument and Meles gladly agreed to stay in power until 2020. TPLF's spindoctors will be busy to present Meles' "change of mind " in more palatableway to the public and international community including the Americans who were anticipating his departure. -Editor
Ethiopia's longtime friend Senator Donald M. Payne dies at 77'
The New Jersey Representative Donald M. Payne, a former chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus and the first black congressman from NewJersey, died on Tuesday in Livingston, N.J. He was 77. Mr. Payne was a tireless advocate for human rights and democracy in Ethiopia and around the world. While serving as chairman of the Subcommittee on Africa and Global Health on the Committee for Foreign Affairs, he was instrumental insponsoring H.R. 2003: Ethiopia Democracy and Accountability Act of 2007.The bill passed in the House of Representatives but was never voted on in the Senate and it died. The TPLF regime in Ethiopia spent millions of dollars on lobbyists to defeat the bill. The New Jersey district that Mr.

Payne proudly represented for over two decades, was not home to significant number of Ethiopian Americans. But, that did not stop Mr. Payne to champion Ethiopia's causes and represented all of Ethiopian Americans. He was among the very few friends, Ethiopian Americans havein Congress. America has lost a remarkable public servant and Ethiopian- Americans lost a great friend in congress. Rep. Payne's commitment to Africa was legendary. In 2008 he played a central role in the Congressional authorization of up to $48 billion over 5 years to fight HIV/AIDS, a substantial portion of it going to Africa. In 2005, he successfully led the effort to enact the Darfur Genocide Accountability Act aimed at imposing sanctions against perpetrators of crimes against humanity and genocide in Darfur, Sudan. In 2002, he played a key role inthe passage of the Sudan Peace Act, which helped to end the war in Sudan and peacefully transition South Sudan into nationhood. Rep. Paynewas one of champions of the Africa Growth and Opportunities Act (2000) which promotes African economic development and trade with the US. Hehas sponsored or co-sponsored dozens of bills to help African countries get debt relief, increased peacekeeping support, expanded agriculture programs and better access to safe drinking water and educational opportunities for millions of children. Editor
The regime displaced people in large numbers in eastern Ethiopia to makeway for Saudi and Indian investors' The Land deals are often made without consultation with local people. An estimated 150,000 people havebeen relocated from eastern Somali to make way for Saudi and Indian investment projects. The impacts of these ventures, including displacement, food insecurity and water shortages, are rarely considered. Ethiopian dissidents have moved to far-form Libya-style National Transitional Council in an attempt to unseat the long-time premier Meles Zenawi's government by mid-2012' The pro-revolution council, which counts exiled opposition politicians, scholars, activists and traders among its ranks, says it hopes to fill the "leadership vacuum" until a "democratically-elected" administration is installed. The council's presumed leader, Dr Fisseha Eshetu, said the group would look to form a caretaker government after removing the current administration. Dr Fisseha is a well-known businessman who recently fled Ethiopia and was the founder and former owner of the country's first private university. He said the council would consist of representatives of politicians and "like- minded" citizens willing to work towards "democracy and justice" in Ethiopia. "This is not a political party, this is a forum to coordinate and support the struggle carried out by all stakeholders for regime change," hetold this reporter. Dr Fisseha at one time run a short-lived private media outlet. He sold his Unity University in 2008 over what was reported as financial challenges.According to the businessman, who says that "change is imminent in Ethiopia, the council is set for its official launch at the end of this month in the United States.
Ethiopia - Cultural And Traditional Cuisine'
It mostly consists of Injera, a sourdough flat bread, and local bread knownas "Dabo", stews known as "Wat", various grains and spices. At the heart of Ethiopian cooking is the 'Injera', a flat bread made of

teff flour savoured with the Doro-wat, a red chicken stew, or the Sega-wat, a lamb stew. Typically the flat bread is of the texture and consistency of a dosa, only it is at least four times its size, and finer, as it is meant to be shared with the whole family from the same platter. One of the virtues of Ethiopian food is that you can eat it with your five fingers — no utensils provided. Instead, every food is served on Injera, a spongy, slightly sour flat bread, traditionally made from fermented teff, an iron-rich native grain. Injera serves as both platter and utensil. Typically, an Ethiopian meal consists of a combination of Injera with different wats, yet each diverse cultural group has their unique variation. A typical snack would be baked small pieces of bread called Dabo-kollo or made up of local grains called “Kollo”. A ground raw meat dish called "tire siga" or the grinded rawmeat called "kitfo" is eaten. For instance “Kitfo” is considered a national dish which consists of raw meat or rare ground beef marinated in "mitmita", a very spicy chilli powder and "niter kibbe", and "Gored-Gored" very similar to kitfo, but uses cubed, rather than ground, made up of raw beef are used as part of national dish since time immemorial. For the majority of Ethiopians it's a must to have "raw meat" at home for holidays, as people have the habit of eating raw meat. Qurse locally meaning for Breakfast: Fit-fit or fir-fir (Ge'ez: ፍር ፍር firfir; ፍት ፍት fitfit), made from shredded Injera with spices, is a common breakfast dish. Another popular breakfast food is dulet (Ge'ez: ዱለት dūlet), a spicy mixture of tripe,liver, beef, and peppers with injera. The other recommend starting with an appetizer called “Yemisir Sambusa”. It’s a pair of triangle-shaped puff pastries stuffed with a delicious blend of brown lentils, onions, scallions, peppers, subtle spices and herbs. Ethiopian sambusa is very similar to theIndian Samosa, and the Yesiga Sambusa, which features minced beef instead of lentils, is also quite appealing. “Fatira” consists of a large fried pancake made with flour, often with a layer of egg, eaten with honey.

Chechebsa or “Kita-firfir” resembles a pancake covered with “Berbere&Kibbeh”, or spices, and may be eaten with a spoon. The meat portion of our combo plate included Kay-wat, Yesiga-Alicha and Doro-wat. These are small cubes of tender prime beef that are sauteed in Ethiopian clarified butter and served in a tangy sauce (Kay-wat); chicken legs simmered in a spicy sauce similar to Indian curry and served, traditionally,with a hard-boiled egg (Doro-wat); and more beef chunks served in a mildsauce tasting of coriander (Yesiga-Alicha). Tibs: Meat or vegetables are sautéed to make tibs. Tibs is served normal or special, "special tibs" is served on a hot dish with vegetables (salad) mixed in. The mid-18th century European visitor to Ethiopia, describes Tibs as a portion of grilled meat served "to pay a particular compliment or show especial respect to someone." Kitfo: Another distinctive Ethiopian dish is kitfo (frequently spelled kitfo), which consists of raw (or rare) ground beef marinated in mitmita (Ge'ez: ሚጥሚጣ mīṭmīṭā, a very spicy chili powder) and “niter kibbe” (rosted butter). Gored-gored is very similar to kitfo, but uses cubed, rather than ground, beef. However, the rising cost of food still continues to be the major challenge for the majority of the people. Tej: is a potent honey wine, similar to mead, that is frequently served in bars particularly, Tej-bet; ጠጅቤት "tej house"). Katikala and araki are inexpensive local spirits that are very strong. Tella: is a home-brewed local beer served in bars, which are also called "Tella bets". Although a lot of Ethiopian food is infused with curry-style flavors, you may find it to be milder, overall, than Indian versions. Lentils and split peas are cornerstones of Ethiopian cooking, as you'll discover with the vegetable combo plate, which includes Shiro-Tegabino , Yemisir-wat, Ater-Alicha, Gomen and Atkilt-Alicha. Of these, you especially like the pureed split peas with spices, onions and garlic (Shiro-Tagabino); Gomen—which was fresh, crunchy collard greens simmered in a very mild sauce; and especially "Yemisir-wat", which is split lentils simmered in a zippy, curry- style hot sauce. The only item that missed the mark was tepid, limp greenbeans with carrots (Atkilt-alicha). So, most dishes you order at Ethiopian restaurants in or outside of the country will come to be served upon big rounds of "Injera". People make their own "Injera", a framed flat bread made up of Teff plant. Teff is a species of lovegrass mostly native to the northwestern Ethiopian highland areas. It's similar to buckwheat flour, its grains are used to make "Injera", which anchors virtually every Ethiopian meal. Though, you would be free somehow to be served anytime when you appear as guest of Ethiopians everywhere whose are well known for their friendliness, and generousity. Beef Meat (Raw Meat) locally known as 'Tire Siga' – A manly traditionaldish in Ethiopia'

Ethiopia is "a nation who generally live[s] on raw meat, and it cannot be supposed that they have made great advancement in their cuisine," the Briton wrote in "Narrative of a Journey to Shoa," an 1868 account of his Ethiopian odyssey. Nearly a sesqui-century later, it looks like Barker was prescient. Ethiopian restaurants in America often tout their vegan options,and Ethiopians certainly appreciate their culture's vegetarian cuisine. But they relish meat even more, and if it's not a holiday fasting season, duringwhich meat is forbidden, they hungrily embrace beef — sometimes cooked, sometimes not.

The recipe for raw beef hasn't changed much since Barker's visit. And howcould it? Raw is raw, no preparation required. You melt some Ethiopian butter (niter kibe), combine it with freshly ground beef, toss in the requisite spices and voila, it's what's for dinner — a favorite Ethiopian dishcalled kitfo. Unless, of course, you don't fuss with all of that. Just take some bite-sized chunks of raw beef, dip them into the red pepper paste awaze or the even hotter red pepper powder mitmita, and you're feasting on gored gored, most likely the no-frills meal that so repelled Barker. The even simpler tere siga, or "raw meat," requires no preparation at all : Presented with long strips of meat, the gourmand uses a knife to cut off piece after piece. This ritual is called q'wirt, from the Amharic word q'warata, to cut.

Ayele Solomon, a businessman who lives in Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital, prefers to eat the most basic version, tere siga, so he can serve himself. "The cutting is part of the ceremony," says Solomon. And besides, he adds, "you don't want someone else's filthy hands touching it." Solomon, an American citizen, was born in Ethiopia and lived in the Bay Area, where his family still lives, from ages 11 to 22. He remembers eating raw meat for the first time as an older teenager in his family's kitchen, where he "just grabbed a piece and put it into my mouth." In Ethiopia, Solomon says, eating raw meat tends to be a "male thing" that guys might do together. Ethiopian ‘tere sig’ Amharic meaning for ‘beef meat’ typically comes from grass-fed beef, Solomon says, which gives it adifferent flavor and texture. "In America, [the meat is] grain-fed, and it's more watery because they try to fatten the animal. In Ethiopia, the flavorsare concentrated. An extreme example would be like eating a grape versus a raisin." There's plenty of Ethiopian literature going back centuriesto document dishes like tere siga and gored gored. But James McCann, a professor at Boston University and the author of "Stirring the Pot," a book about African cuisine, believes kitfo is a modern variant.

"Expatriate Ethiopians have lots of cultural myths that claim historical background," McCann says, "but they really only date from the Addis Ababa elite or upper-middle-class practice in the mid-20th century. Kitfo is a fairly recent addition to the urban diet. Raw beef cut in chunks or strips has been around for a long time." Kitfo is the most common versionof raw meat served at Ethiopian restaurants in the U.S. It came to the table from the Gurage people, who make up about 2.5% of the populationof Ethiopia, a country with more than 80 indigenous languages.

Angeleno Berhanu Asfaw grew up in the Gurage town of Muher, Ethiopia, and he ate his kitfo raw from about the age of 5 or 6, when children are judge to be safe enough from the effects of parasitical worms and other food-born illnesses that they are first allowed to eat raw meat. At Meskel, an Ethiopian Orthodox Christian holiday, children go from home to home, greeting the elders, and at each stop their hosts have kitfo prepared especially for them. Now Asfaw serves kitfo and gored gored at Messob, the restaurant in Los Angeles' Little Ethiopia on Fairfax Avenue that he co-owns with his brother Getahun. The menu describes the beef as "lean" butdoesn't mention raw, so his servers ask patrons how they want it. Non- Ethiopians usually like it to be cooked just a little, but Asfaw's Ethiopian customers prefer it raw. Most of the city's Ethiopian restaurants offer kitfo, but like Messob, they don't all describe it as raw on their menus. If you want your kitfo slightly cooked — what Americans would call rare — ask for it lebleb. Fully cooked is yebesele. Asfaw recommends lean cuts ofmeat, like top round, for raw beef dishes, and Messob grinds the meat for kitfo fresh, often right when it's ordered. "You can't even grind it and keep it the whole day and serve it in the evening," he says, because it loses its flavor. At Selam Market and Deli on West Pico Boulevard, Samuel Mekonnen sells more meat for kitfo than for any other raw dish, and he grinds it fresh at his market's butcher shop. He too recommends very leancuts like top round, ball tips or even the costlier rib-eye.

"If you try to eat soft meat as raw meat, it doesn't taste as good. It has tobe firm," says Mekonnen, who co-owns the market with his wife, Amsalework Jemberu. Mekonnen says women enjoy raw meat just as much as men do, although they tend to eat it more at family gatherings.

When men gather at a tej bet — that is, a place that serves tej, the Ethiopian honey wine — women don't usually join them. The traditional accompaniment for kitfo is gomen, or collard greens, and it always comeswith a side of ayib, the soft Ethiopian cheese. Of course, you eat it all by hand with injera, the spongy Ethiopian sourdough flatbread that serves asplate and cutlery. Among Gurages in Ethiopia, though, injera is a rare accompaniment. Gurage culture eats raw meat with qocho, a bread-like food made from the bark of the enset plant, a staple among many Ethiopian cultures. Enset is almost impossible to get in the U.S., so you won't find qocho at many restaurants. But it's become very popular back home, and some restaurants in the Washington, D.C., area now import fully prepared qocho to accompany their kitfo. Raw meat dishes are served every where locally and in Ethiopian restaurants in the USA. Asfaw enjoys tere siga in the U.S., but for health reasons he no longer eats it when he visits Ethiopia. He remembers talking to his grandfather back home about his culture's love of raw meat.The reasons, he learned, were both practical and primal. "When they had different wars, a long time ago, it was just easier to kill something and eattere siga," Asfaw recalls his grandfather telling him. "It also makes you more macho, and they like that. You have a lot of things that aren't cooked over there." Kloman is the author of "Mesob Across America: Ethiopian Food in the U.S.A." and writes about the cuisine at ethiopianfood. wordpress. com.

ETHIOPIA - Traditional Folk Music’

The music of Ethiopia is extremely diverse, with each of Ethiopia's ethnic groups being associated with unique sounds. Some forms of traditional music are strongly influenced by folk music from elsewhere in the Horn ofAfrica, especially Somalia. However, Ethiopian religious music also has anancient Christian element, traced to Yared, who lived during the reign of Gabra Masqal. In northeastern Ethiopia, in Wollo, a Muslim musical form called manzuma developed. Sung in Amharic, manzuma has spread to Harar and Jimma, where it is now sung in the Oromo language. In the Ethiopian Highlands, traditional secular music is played by itinerant musicians called azmaris, who are regarded with both suspicion and respect in Ethiopian society. Ethiopian music uses a distinct modal systemthat is pentatonic, with characteristically long intervals between some notes. As with many other aspects of Ethiopian culture and tradition, tastes in music and lyrics are strongly linked with those in neighboring Eritrea, Somalia, Djibouti and Sudan. The music of the highlands uses a fundamental modal system called qenet, of which there are four main modes: tezeta, bati, ambassel, and anchihoy, the later three have originated from Wollo. Three additional modes are variations on the above: tezeta minor, bati major, and bati minor. Some songs take the name of their qenet, such as tizita, a song of reminiscence. When played on traditional instruments, these modes are generally not tempered (thatis, the pitches may deviate slightly from the Western-tempered tuning system), but when played on Western instruments such as pianos and guitars, they are played using the Western-tempered tuning system.

Music in the Ethiopian highlands is generally monophonic or heterophonic.In certain southern areas, some music is polyphonic. Dorze polyphonic singing (edho) may employ up to five parts; Majangir, four parts. Ethiopia - Traditional Folk Music: includes both traditional music and thegenre that evolved from it during the 20th century folk revival. The termoriginated in the 19th century but is often applied to music that is older than that. Certain types of folk music are also called world music.

Traditional folk music has been defined in several ways: as music transmitted by mouth, as music of the lower classes, and as music with unknown composers. It has been contrasted with commercial and classicalstyles. One meaning often given is that of old songs, with no known composers; another is music that has been transmitted and evolved by a process of oral transmission or performed by custom over a long period oftime. Starting in the mid-20th century a new form of popular folk music evolved from traditional folk music. This process and period is called the (second) folk revival and reached a zenith in the 1960s. A long-standing popular musical tradition in Ethiopia was that of brass bands, imported from Jerusalem in the form of forty Armenian orphans (Arba Lijoch) duringthe reign of Haile Selassie. This band, which arrived in Addis Ababa on September 6, 1924, became the first official orchestra of Ethiopia. By the end of World War II, large orchestras accompanied singers; the most prominent orchestras were the Army Band, Police Band, and Imperial Bodyguard Band.

On Ethiopia's Musical Instruments: Cordophones: In the highlands, traditional string instruments include themasenqo (also known as masinko), a one-string bowed lute; the krar (also known as kirar), a six- string lyre; In ancient times the "Krar", a guitar type rectangular lyre or harp — was known as the devil's instrument. It's even mentioned in the Bible and is thought to have originated in the area around the headwatersof the Nile. For Krar Collective, five-stringed rithms locally known as, Ambassel, Anchi-Hoye, Tizita, Bati etc., krar is the key tool in their mission to help audiences party down. You can catch Krar Collective's driving dance grooves when the Ethiopian trio plays. The five or six-stringkrar or harp may look like a relatively simple instrument, it's anything butsimple to play. And the Bgena which intertaines the fasters at "Arba- Tsom" of the Orthodox Church with -- strings and two rithms Medina and Zelesegna at it's rithms. And "the begena", a large ten-string lyre. The begena is an Ethiopian and string instrument that resembles a large lyre. According to Ethiopian tradition, Menelik I brought the instrument to Ethiopia from Israel, where David had used the begena to soothe King Saul's nerves and heal him of insomnia. Its actual origin remains in doubt,though Ethiopian manuscripts depict the instrument at the beginning of the 15th century. Known as the instrument of noblemen, monks and the upper class and performed by both Amhara Tigrai men and women, the begena was used primarily as an accompaniment during meditation and prayer. Though commonly played in the home, it is sometimes played during festive occasions. The dita (a five-string lyre) and musical bows (including an unusual three-string variant) are among the chordophones found in the south.

Aerophones: The washint is a bamboo flute that is common in the highlands. Trumpet-like instruments include the ceremonial malakat usedin some regions, and the animal horn found mainly in the south. Embilta flutes have no finger holes, and produce only two tones, the fundamental and a fourth or fifth interval· These may be metal (generally found in the north) or bamboo (in the south). The Konso and other people in the southplay fanta, or pan flute.

Idiophones: In the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, liturgical music employs the senasel, a sistrum. Additionally, the clergy will use prayer staffs, or maqwamiya, to maintain rhythm. Rural churches historically used a dawal,made from stone slabs or pieces of wood, to call the faithful to prayer. TheBeta-Israel use a small gong called a qachel as liturgical accompaniment, though qachel may also refer to a small bell. The toom, a lamellophone, isused among the Nuer, Anuak, Majangir, Surma, and other Nilotic groups. Metal leg rattles are common throughout the south.

Membranophones: The kebero is a large hand drum used in the OrthodoxChristian liturgy. Smaller kebero drums may be used in secular celebrations. The nagarit, played with a curved stick, is usually found in a secular context such as royal functions or the announcement of proclamations, though it has a liturgical function among the Beta Israel. The Gurage and other southern peoples commonly play the atamo, a small hand drum sometimes made of clay.

Wemezekir: Addis Ababa Urban Planning College, known as Ecole’

Urban Planning College (French: Ecole superieure d'amenagement et d'urbanisme) is a city planning college in Ethiopia. It was founded in 1960s by the bilateral agreement between the French and Ethiopian Government. It was intended to train higher technicians serving Ethiopian cities. In early years of its establishment French was medium of instructions, which later was taught as a credited course. The college was known for its unique multi-disciplined training in architecture, planning and civil engineering. In 1996 it was incorporated within the Ethiopian Civil Service College and renamed as the Urban Planning College. Since then the faculty has organized itself under Ethiopian civil service college tocontinue its central role in the development of Ethiopian urban areas.

Land grab: African leaders themselves are in a land grab in Ethiopia’

Several African leaders have bought lands in Ethiopia to develop agricultural projects or tourism resorts. They are let to bypass a 2007 banon export of cereals, still in place for other investors. It has earlier been known that former Nigerian President Olusegun Obasansjo and current Djiboutian President Ismael Omar Guelleh privately have bought up large properties in Ethiopia. Also the Egyptian Prime Minister managed to buy large agricultural land tracts in Ethiopia on behalf of his government.

However, a US Embassy cable leaked from February,2011, released by Wikileaks, indicates that several of these underreported deals operate inthe grey zone of Ethiopian legislation. Following a food crisis in 2007, Ethiopia "temporarily" banned all exports of cereals. The ban has never been formally lifted. Still, both the Egyptian government project and Djiboutian President Omar Guelleh have been allowed to export cereals cultivated on the lands sold to them by the Ethiopian government. "It appears Saudi, Djiboutian, and now Egyptian investors have somehow bypassed this ban," President Ismael Omar Guelleh recently acquired the right to develop about 2.5 acres of lakeside land in Debrezeit (Bishoftu) to build a hotel. This acquisition added to the 7,400 acres of farmland Mr.

Omar Guelleh leased in 2009 in Bale zone of Oromia region. "According topost's conversations with local agricultural business investors and press reports, this farm has already harvested wheat and other cereals for export to Djibouti," the report said. The Egyptians had followed the same path, according to sources. Egyptian Prime Minister Ahmed Nazif, headed a large top-end delegation, last year announced that the state-owned National Bank of Egypt planned to invest US$ 40 million in the lease of 49,400 acres of land in the Afar region to grow cereals. Also these cereals"would be exported to Egypt," it was noted. Among the most prominent investors in Ethiopian lands was Nigerian ex-President Olusegun Obasanjo, Mr Obasanjo had "recently leased about five acres of land near Debrezeit (Bishoftu), Oromia region (about 50 kilometres east of Addis Ababa) to develop a hotel and tourist destination," the report said. The Egyptian National Bank also was "poised to open an office in Ethiopia" andto offer credits to six Ethiopian banks. But, the domestic banking sector isclosed to foreign banks. "It is unclear how the National Bank of Egypt could offer credit in Ethiopia in evident violation of banking and financial regulations," Other recent major investors in Ethiopian agricultural land had included the South African private equity fund Agri-Vie. The company had acquired 3,000 acres of land and company was last year already in the process of establishing fruit production and processing operations. Thecompany was to target the juice markets in Europe and the Middle East.

What could be more dangerous than the wholesale transfer of the pillars of the economy to foreigners and ethnic allies? Ethiopian authorities havefirmly believed that a commercialisation of the agricultural sector and foreign investment were necessary. It has to be recalled that at an Investment Summit earlier this year, the premier had announced to investors: "Ethiopia has over four million hectares of fertile and unutilised agricultural land that he intends to avail to the private sector. Meles's protectionist rationale continues to prohibit the purchase of land.

Ethiopia - Modern Instrumental Music’

Ethiopia is a musically traditional country. Of course, popular music is played, recorded and listened to, but most musicians also sing traditional songs, and most audiences choose to listen to both popular and traditionalstyles. A long-standing popular musical tradition in Ethiopia was that of brass bands, imported from Jerusalem in the form of forty Armenian orphans (Arba Lijoch) during the reign of Haile Selassie. This band, which arrived in Addis Ababa on September 6, 1924, became the first official orchestra of Ethiopia. By the end of World War II, large orchestras accompanied singers; the most prominent orchestras were the Army Band, Police Band, and Imperial Bodyguard Band. Most of these bands were trained by Europeans or Armenians. From the 1950s to the 1970s, Ethiopian popular musicians included Bizunesh Bekele, Mahmoud Ahmed, Alemayehu Eshete, Hirut Bekele, Ali Birra, Ayalew Mesfin, Kiros Alemayehu, Muluken Melesse and Tilahun Gessesse, while popular folk musicians included Alemu Aga, Kassa Tessema, Ketema Makonnen, Asnaketch Worku, and Mary Armede. Perhaps the most influential musician of the period, however, was Ethio-jazz innovator Mulatu Astatke.Amha Records, Kaifa Records, and Philips-Ethiopia were prominent Ethiopian record labels during this era. Since 1997, Buda Musique's Ethiopiques series has compiled many of these singles and albums on compact disc. During the 1980s, the Duerg controlled Ethiopia, and emigration became almost impossible. Musicians during this period included Ethio Stars, Wallias Band and Roha Band, though the singer Neway Debebe was most popular. He helped to popularize the use of seminna-werq (wax and gold, a poetic form of double entendre) in music (previously only used in qiné, or poetry) that often enabled singers to criticize the government without upsetting the censors.

Ethiopian tops Forbes 2012 Black Billionaires list’

Ethiopian tycoon, Sheikh Mohammed Ali Al-Amoudi, who is worth an estimated USD 12.5 billion, tops the Forbes 2012 Black Billionaires List announced recently. The Ethiopian-born Saudi billionaire ousted Nigerian billionaire Aliko Dangote Nigerian, worth USD 11.2 billion. Dangote, who isranked second, remains Africa's wealthiest individual. Mohammed HusseinAli Al-Amoudi, 67, is the 61st richest person in the world. He is presently involved in various construction projects in Ethiopia, where he has invested more than USD 2 billion. He is preparing to undertake additional USD 3 billion investment in the coming five years in various sectors including agriculture, cement production, steel and transport. Mohammed Al-Amoudi also owns gold mines in the Horn of African country and the very prestigious 5-star Sheraton Hotel, Addis. Born to a Saudi father and an Ethiopian mother, Mohammed Hussein Al Amoudi migrated to Saudi Arabia as a child. He made a fortune handling lucrative construction contracts for the Saudi royal family. He subsequently invested in Sweden,Morocco and Ethiopia. His most prominent assets include oil companies Svenska Petroleum Exploration, which explores crude oil in Africa, and refinery operator Preem. In July, Al-Amoudi's Midroc Gold discovered over33, 000kg of gold deposits after seven years of exploration; this will boostproduction, which has already started at two other mining locations. In September, 2012 he will reopen two newly refurbished Ethiopian resorts -Blue Nile and Lake Tana - as part of his eight hotel empire across North Africa. He plans to add to that next year with the African Union Grand Hotel which is a USD 200 million 6-star hotel, which is currently being built in Addis Ababa next to the African Union headquarters, for the union's 50th anniversary celebration. Mike Adenuga (Nigeria), worth USD

4.3 billion, Patrice Motsepe (South Africa), worth USD 2.7 billion dollars,and Oprah Winfrey (USA), worth USD 2.7 billion, occupy the top five positions in Forbes 2012 Black Billionaires List. All Africa.com

Graft, bribery, mispricing, jaded procurement, embezzlement and illicit outflow of money are possible in the absence of oversight' Independent oversight is virtually impossible when there are no nationally-oriented opposition parties, independent civil society organs, academics and journalists. For this reason, TPLF does anything it wishes and gets away with 'murder." Here is the truth. "In Ethiopia today, it is argued, all civil society organizations, opposition political parties, individuals and groups inprivate enterprise, and other groups are described as rent-seeking, while in contrast, EPDRDF (run by TPLF Inc.), the ruling party, is claimed to be the only one which has developmental credentials." It is up to those—within and outside the country--who love the country and respect the hopes and aspirations of all of the Ethiopian people, to work in unison andleave a legacy of peaceful transformation anchored in Ethiopia and owned by the Ethiopian people that future generations would recite and the worldwould admire. The key is to decide that change will only come if we support the Ethiopian people, civil society organizations, youth, oppositionpolitical parties and others in the country. The anchor is Ethiopia; and the social forces are the Ethiopian people. It is they who should guide our thinking and our actions

President of the SNNPRS, was accused of corruption and embezzlement'

Shiferaw Shigute president of Southern Nations, Nationalities and Peoples (SNNP), was accused of corruption and embezzlement. This is not surprising as such occurrences from urban and rural land sales and leases,permits and trade are routine. What is stunning is what he said. He admitted that he and Azeb Mesfin, Meles Zenawi's spouse and one of the wealthiest persons in Ethiopia nowadays, colluded and stole millions of dollars in illegal trade of coffee, Ethiopia's main export. Mispricing of coffee and illegal trafficking and trade in Coffee and other commodities are among the major sources of illicit outflow. Meles Zenawi was forced toreverse the decision against Shiferaw Shigute as quoted "Family comes first; and not justice or the rule of law". It has to be remembered that theGambellan regional president quoted as saying, "If I go to jail for crimes against humanity, Meles Zenawi should to. It is he who gave me weapons and orders." But Obang Olom did not go to jail and Meles remains in power. The law and constitution are manipulated to serve an unjust and corrupt system. This is how the system works; and how corrupt it is.

Editor

Indigenous people forced from their ancestral homes in the Lower Omovallies'

Amhara speaking residents in the Southern part of the country forced to leave their homes and property and Christian churches razed to the ground, these and more violations are justified by the ruling EPRDF partyin the name of peace, security and the constitution. For almost 21 years,it has gone uncontested in pitying one group against another; in assaulting one group in isolation from the other and so on. The 78,000ethnic-Amharas who were kicked out of southern Ethiopia just becausethey are from the Amhara ethnic group.

A widely rumored death of the President'

Speculation: Federal president Girma Wolde-Giorgis widely rumored as hepassed away on the 13th March 2012 at age of 88 to a massive heart attack. The heavy-set president had been battling acute diabetes and heart troubles for a number of years, according to sources within the government. He has held presidential position since October, 2001 and has been an EPRDF member since then. Throughout his lengthy political career, he was largely known as having no real authority except ceremonial attendance. The Office of the President said the President hadbeen in Saudi Arabia for a weeklong routine medical check up without further details. -Editor

Ethiopian official says unknown gunmen in the country's southwest have killed 19 people in an attack on a public transport bus' The president of Ethiopia's Gambella region said Tuesday that eight people were wounded. Omod Obang Olum said the victims were Ethiopian residents traveling in apublic bus that got ambushed near a town called Bonga by attackers with machine guns. He says Gambella security forces are still chasing down theattackers. He said he had no detailed information about the attackers' objectives. Gambella is a traditionally marginalized area of the country that suffers internal conflicts over resources like water and land. It also is affected by its border with South Sudan, as refugees pour across into Gambella when violence erupts in that newly independent nation.

Ethiopia - Ban on charities from working on human-rights issues'

If they receive more than 10 per-cent of their funds from abroad has had a devastating impact on advocacy groups in the country, Amnesty International said. Organizations closed, shifted focus or scaled down their activities b cause of the 2009 statute, which also forces charities to spendno more than 30 percent of their funds on administration, the London- based organization said. "Since the law came into force, it has had a devastating impact on human-rights organizations in Ethiopia, and therefore also on the promotion and protection of the rights of the Ethiopian people," it said in a report released today. "The impact of the law is that today human-rights organizations barely exist in Ethiopia." Ethiopia's government said in 2009 it introduced the law to regulate the country's more than 3,800 non-governmental organizations. It also said that it was the role of the state, rather than foreign-backed groups, to protect human and democratic rights. Along with Ethiopia's media law andanti-terrorism legislation, the so-called Charities and Societies Proclamation has restricted criticism of a government that is responsible for human-rights violations, Amnesty said. Its impact "has been to entrench still further, and even to institutionalize, the climate of fear pervading the work of human rights defenders in Ethiopia," it said. "A number of human rights defenders fled the country as soon as the law was passed." AI

Thousands of Luo & Nuer tribesmen from South Sudan are seeking refugein western Ethiopia'

Most are women, children and elderly people who fled from Akobo Countyin Jonglei State following clashes there earlier this year. An estimated 15,000 people have entered Ethiopia since mid-February. They cite clashes with rival Murle tribesmen and fear of reprisal attacks as the mainreason for their flight. Many of them say they were displaced for weeks inJonglei before they managed to reach Ethiopia. In Jonglei State Murle andLou Nuer tribespeople have been engaged in deadly attacks and counter- attacks over cattle, grazing land and water points for several years.

Clashes between these two tribes in December and January have affectedsome 120,000 people in the Jonglei region. Fresh fighting between the two tribes was reported last weekend in Akobo, and UNHCR is concerned at the possibility of further forced displacement. In Ethiopia, the new arrivals are settling around the border town of Matar in the Gambella region, some 500 kilometres west of Addis Ababa. Most of them are livingin makeshift huts, according to a team of UNHCR and partner agencies that visited the area twice with the Ethiopian authorities. The local communities in Matar have been sharing their meager resources with the new arrivals, including food and water. The influx has stretched water andsanitation facilities beyond capacity. The World Food Programme is extending food distribution to this area to benefit both communities.

Dozens died in fighting between Al-Shabaab rebels and Ethiopian troops'

Near the central Somali town of Baidoa and another small town, dozens died in fighting between Al-Shabaab rebels and Ethiopian troops residents,regional officials and the Islamist rebels said.There were differing accountsof which side bore the brunt of casualties in the small town of Yurkud early on Saturday, the heaviest clashes involving Ethiopian troops since they returned to Somalia in force last year after withdrawing in early 2009. Ethiopian and Somali government troops then clashed with al Shabaab forces near Baidoa, the former seat of the Somali parliament thatwas wrestled back from rebel control last month for the first time in more than three years. The fighting came the day after the African Union said Ethiopia planned to pull its troops out of Somalia by the end of April with soldiers from Djibouti, Uganda and Burundi taking their positions.

Ethiopia - Magnetic stripes hold clues to Ocean formation'

Several winters ago, a team of geophysicists from Missouri flew to the eastern edge of Africa, strapped on bulky backpacks and began walking. They were looking for a set of huge stripes in the Tendaho Graben, a place within the Afar Depression of Ethiopia, where Africa's continental crust is stretching thin and a new ocean will eventually form. But the stripes theysought — and eventually found — aren't visible to the naked eye. They'remagnetic stripes, similar to the ones lining the ocean floor at mid-ocean ridges. The Afar Depression in Ethiopia is a point where three of Earth's tectonic plates meet and are pulling away from each other, creating enormous stress on the rock, producing cracks, faults and volcanoes. Thepulling apart here will eventually result in the formation of a new ocean basin.

The filmed abuse of an Ethiopian domestic worker in Lebanon has drawn widespread condemnation and thrown light onto a persistent problem of living and working conditions of the estimated 200,000 migrants in the country' The video depicts a woman lying on the ground outside the Ethiopian consulate before a group of men drag her against her will into acar. She is quoted as saying in Amharic "I will not go," GlobalVoices wrote. The man beating the woman, pulling her hair, and shoving her intothe car was identified by the Lebanese Broadcasting Company. The Ethiopian domestic worker whose beating outside her country's consulate was widely publicized on video committed suicide the next morning, Ethiopia's consul general in Lebanon confirmed to The Daily Star. Alem Dechasa, 33, hanged herself using her bed sheets between 5 a.m. and 6 a.m., Ethiopian Consulate-general Asaminew Debelie Bonssa said doctors told him. He spoke to The Daily Star while returning from the hospital Psychiatrique "de la Croix Hospital", known as Deir al-Salib. Police took her to the hospital after the incident. The video released by LBCI in the previous week showed Dechasa moaning as a man, later identified as Ali Mahfouz, beat her and forced her into a car. According to the Consul- general who said Dechassa was in Lebanon illegally, the incident took place two weeks prior to its release. Ali Mahfouz said Dechasa had previously attempted suicide.

Ethiopian Military carried out a cross-border attack'

The Ethiopian military carried out a cross-border attacks against three Afar rebel bases inside Eritrean territory where Addis Ababa alleges its arch-rival trains subversive groups, including separatist group the Afar Revolutionary Democratic Unity Front (ARDUF) who killed five western tourists in an ambush in the Afar region near the Eritrean border. The latest attack, Ethiopia's first official military incursion to Eritrea since theend of the 1998-2000 border, further escalated long-standing tensions and raised fears of a potential return to full-scale war between Ethiopia and its former province, Eritrea. Following The cross-border raids, Ethiopian officials said the attack is only the beginning and vowed to continue until, what they described as, Eritrea's growing activities to destabilize Ethiopia comes to end.

IMF senior official urged the Ethiopian government to boost savings andcurb inflation'

According to the local weekly Capital. "Ethiopia still faces significant challenges in particular containing still-high inflation, raising savings, andmeeting enormous investment needs," said Naoyuki Shinohara, the IMF Deputy Managing Director, in a statement issued after meeting senior officials including the PM. Mr. Naoyuki Shinohara advised the governmentto continue reforms to mobilize resources and savings which he said are needed 'to achieve high investment and sustainable growth in order to reduce poverty'. The country's annual inflation eased in January, 2012 to32 per-cent from 35.9 per-cent in earlier month, according to the CentralStatistical Agency of Ethiopia.

A joint undercover investigation by BBC Newsnight programme and the Bureau of Investigative Journalism has uncovered evidence that the Ethiopian government is using billions of dollars of development aid as a tool for political oppression' There they found villages where whole communities are starving, having allegedly been denied basic food, seed and fertiliser for failing to support Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. The investigation has also gathered evidence of mass detentions, the widespread use of torture and extra-judicial killings by Ethiopian government forces. Yet western donors including Great Britain which is the third largest donor to Ethiopia - stand accused of turning a blind eye by continuing to provide aid money despite being warned about the abuses. The aid in question is long-term development aid, not the emergency aid provided in response to the current drought in Ethiopia andits neighbours in the Horn of Africa.

Israel and Qatar mediate between rivals Eritrea and Ethiopia'

Qatar and Israel have separately been mediating between the two countries for Ethiopia to return the border areas of Badme and for Eritrea to stop supporting the Al-Shabaab militia in Somalia. It has been confirmed by various sources that the Eritrean and Ethiopian governmentsare going to have preliminary consultation meeting, as representatives of both countries arrived in Germany. The mediators shuffled to both Eritrea and Ethiopia a five point peace plan; Qatar will lease the Eritrean port of "Assab" for 20 years and Ethiopia will use the port: Ethiopia will be committed to demarcate the border, restore "Badme" to Eritrea, and withdraw its troops: Both countries work to normalize the social relations between them: Both countries work on normalizing diplomatic and politicalrelations: People affected by the 1998-2000 war to be compensated with the help of donors.

Ethiopian rebel leaders who wrongly believe the Eritrean regime will helpthem in the fight against the regime in Ethiopia perish under various pretexts, while the more prominent ones are subject to house arrests or disappearances’ Flight Colonel Tadesse Muluneh, for instance, was a respected leader of the now-defunct Ethiopian People's Patriotic Front (EPPF) until he was purged by Eritrean security officials. It has been months since he disappeared. Family calls and pleas for his release have been ignored. He was a staunch proponent that all rebel groups should fallunder one umbrella organization and fight against the TPLF led government. "Such conviction may have cost him dearly as it contravenesthe policy of the Eritrean regime," sources say.

Army Colonel Abebe Geressu may have died in Eritrean prison’

The former Ethiopian army Colonel who fled to Eritrea and launched a rebel movement known as "Tinsae Ethiopia", whose literal meaning for "Ethiopian resurrection" may have died in prison for lack of treatment, sources told. Col. Abebe Geresu disappeared about five months earlier after Eritrean security men took him out of Nyala Hotel in Asmara. Col. Abebe Geresu who survives a diabetic on a daily insulin injection may have died in captivity, like scores of other Eritrean political prisoners, including journalists and senior government officials opposed to the government of President Isaias Afewerki, sources said.

Col. Abebe Geresuhas been an advocate of unity and a strong opponent of the politics of secessionism in Ethiopia. Such move may have angered the Eritrean government, which has long been known as the Godfather of all those who seek the disintegration of Ethiopia,

‘War’ can define the current regime in Ethiopia’

Since it came to power it has been at war with its own citizens and neighbours. No region or ethnic group has been spared from this infection.The regime is always at war with opposition politicians, journalists, publishers, intellectuals, and business people to mention a few. The regime has fought in Gambella, Hawassa, Ambo, Arba Minch and other localities against its own people. The Ethiopian Government is at war with our Somali-Ethiopians in the Ethiopian Somaliland usually known as the Ogadien, and has been accused of war crimes.

Ethiopia is facilitating procedures to export over 45,000 housemaids to theKingdom of Saudi Arabia every month’ An informed source at the Ethiopian Embassy in Riad, Saudi Arabia has said. Ethiopian housemaids have been high in demand after the Kingdom stopped recruiting housemaids from four countries, including Kenya, because the Kingdom has been unable to reach a satisfactory agreement with these countries, "Asharq Al-Awsat" reported. Noor Aden Masfa, Vice Consul for Economic Affairs in Jeddah, said his department and committees from the Ethiopian Ministry of Labor met several times to facilitate the travel of housemaids to the Kingdom after they are properly trained in Ethiopia. Ethiopian housemaids are trained well on Saudi customs and traditions, besides the percentage of runaways is low,” he said. Such human mass wholesale of Ethiopian women particularly those from the Oromo, Amhara, and other ethnic groups to gulf Arab states as humanrights groups describe it as "a modern enslavement of the 21st century". According to recent reports, upto 45,000 Ethiopian women are trafficked each month to the kingdom of Saudi Arabia alone. Ethiopia’s ruling elite is only interested in the foreign exchange earnings generated on the backs of these vulnerable teen aged girls. These Ethiopian girls are as young as their thirteen are being trafficked to the Middle East. The situation is so out of control that an otherwise a pro-government journal “The Reporter” has felt compelled to speak up. This is not a small rogue operation. It is human trafficking or a modern enslavement on an industrial scale, with a wink and a nod from the Ethiopian government, according to observers.

Ethiopia - Army attacks Eritrean military post in retaliation for rebelviolence’

Ethiopia's attack on an Eritrean-based rebel camp is the latest sign of deteriorating relations with Eritrea. Ethiopian forcesentered archrival Eritrea and carried out what a government spokesman described as "a successful attack" against military posts. The government spokesman saidEthiopia launched the attack because Eritrea was training "subversive groups" that carried out attacks inside Ethiopia. Eritrea's role in last January of death and abduction of European tourists in Ethiopia's Afar region, and Ethiopia's retaliation represented the first direct military confrontation between Eritrea and Ethiopia since the 1998-2000 border war. Coincidentally, these events came one month before the 10th anniversary of the delimitation decision of the Eritrean Ethiopian BoundaryCommission. The Ethiopia-Eritrea Boundary Commission (EEBC) was the product of the “Algiers Accord”, which formally ended the Eritrean-Ethiopian war by referring the border dispute to arbitration. The EEBC's findings should have been the final chapter in the bloody border row between the two countries, but instead, gave the dispute new momentum.The crux of the problem was that Ethiopia rejected the EEBC's decision when it realized that Badme, the small piece of disputed territory that triggered the border war, and which it had acquired at a high human cost,had been awarded to Eritrea. Ethiopia, later accepted the decision "in principle," but demanded negotiations on the normalization of relations before it would permit the disputed border to be demarcated and return Badme to Eritrea. Eritrea responded by invoking the language of the Algiers Accord, asserting that because EEBC decision was designed to be "final and binding," attempts to link its implementation to the normalization of relations were, ipso-facto, a violation of existing agreements between the two parties. Only after the border was demarcated and Badme returned to Eritrea, could dialogue on normalization can be held. Ethiopia and Eritrea fought a border war from 1998 to 2000. Tensions have reignited between the two in recent months.No details about the military operations or any damage or casualties were immediately released. The "Eritrea government has continued launching attacks at Ethiopia through its proxy groups. The attacks had continued. And the recent attacks against European tourists is one of the reasons for the retaliation," the spokesman said. Militants attacked European tourists from five nations traveling in Ethiopia's arid north. Five tourists were killedand two were kidnapped. The two kidnapped German tourists have since been released. Ethiopia blamed gunmen from Eritrea for the attack. The attacks by Ethiopian forces took place about 10 miles (16 kilometers) inside Eritrea's territory in areas called Gelakalay and Gimbina, the spokesman said The Ethiopian forces have returned safely to Ethiopia, he said. Eritrean Information Minister Ali Abdu said Eritrea is not to blame forwhat he said is Ethiopia's failure to resolve its internal crisis. "By its own admission, it's an aggression against the sovereignty of Eritrean territory,"said Abdu. "The internal crisis in Ethiopia is due to the marginalization andexclusion of minor Ethiopian groups [because] of the regime's narrow and backward policy of divide and rule being conducted by the Ethiopian regime."

The EPRDF led government has targeted an ancient monastery and eighteen other Ethiopian orthodox churches for destruction' The regime has targeted ancient monasteries, because they are situated on fertile land the regime has claimed for a planned government-owned sugar plantation. The Monastery at Waldeba in northwestern Ethiopia is one of Africa's oldest Christian monasteries, founded by Aba (Father) Samuel Ze-Waldeba in the 13th century AD. Over a thousand monks and nuns would be displaced and many Christian believers would find they no longer have a place of worship, the priests and monks in the area told the Voice of America (VOA). The densely wooded forests surrounding the area will alsobe cleared and any of the residents would displaced. It's to be recalled that the regime has allocated several churches including the historic Waldeba monastery in north Gondar of northern Ethiopia for "Wolkayit Sugar dev't project". Large numbers of pan-Ethiopians angrily reacted while the historic Waldeba monastery with its indigenous and centuries oldtrees is facing a land lease permit given by the ruling regime to the Chinese and Indians. National treasure forests in Gambella have been given to Indian investors and are being destroyed to make place for farms. Concerned Ethiopians are organising a protest rally at the Ethiopianembassy in Washington DC to help stop the destruction of the historic churches.

Editor

Ethiopia – Natives well awared of Meles Zenawi that he is trying to createa false image to the outside world' By publicly announcing that the nationhas registered a double digit of GDP growth while actually the current socio-economic situation of Ethiopia is characterized by rampant and unparallelled corruption and embezzlement. Graft, bribery, mispricing, jaded procurement, embezzlement and illicit outflow of money are possible in the absence of oversight. Media professionals labeled it as "boomeranging effect of EPRDF's mere false propaganda". Independent oversight is virtually impossible when there are no nationally-oriented opposition parties, independent civil society organizations, academics and journalists. For this reason, TPLF propaganda does anything it wishes and gets away with “murder.” Here is the truth. “In Ethiopia today, it is argued, all civil society organizations, opposition political parties, individuals and groups in private enterprise, and other groups are described as rent-seeking, while in contrast, EPDRDF (run by TPLF Inc.), the ruling party, is claimed to be the only one which has developmental credentials.” It is up to those—within and outside the country--who love the country and respect the hopes and aspirations of all of the Ethiopian people, to work in unison and leave a legacy of peaceful transformation anchored in Ethiopia and owned by the Ethiopian people that future generations would recite and the world would admire. The key is to decidethat change will only come if we support the Ethiopian people, civil society organizations, youth, opposition political parties and others in the country.The anchor is Ethiopia; and the social forces are the Ethiopian people. It isthey who should guide our thinking and our actions. Calls upon all Ethiopians without distinction especially related to democracy cherishing organizations, establishments, fronts, movements and others to put their differences aside and stand in unisom to struggle for a common cause such as genuine democratic principles, justice, liberty, freedom and equality of opportunity to all Ethiopians particularly the youth along with the general public need to work hand in hand to bring about the long- awaited changes in the country.

Large number of Ethiopians shocked and terribly sad’

Ethiopians shocked and terribly sad to learn that the Ethiopian girl who had been seen on a video over the weekend being attacked and kidnapped by Lebanese men infront of the Ethiopian embassy has committed suicide. She might have been killed to cover up what really hadhappened to her after she was kidnapped. What happened to Alem Dechasa is a crime against all Ethiopian women. The horror and humility she suffered is unacceptable to any decent human being. To express their outrage over the crime committed against Alem and mourn her death, concerned Ethiopians in the Washington DC area will gather in front of theLebanon embassy. Meantime, in protest to such barbaric act, Ato Shimeles Desta, a former royal-photographer has angryly requested the Lebanese embassy in London to take back his honorary prizes awarded bythe late Lebanese president Rashid Karami when the ex-emperor Haile Selassie I had visited Lebanon 46 years ago in 1966. Alem is not just a “domestic worker.” She is an innocent human being and a beautiful Ethiopian woman who didin't deserve to die this way. Ethiopian domestic workers survive as slaves or sub-human beings in the Middle East. when they are abused or killed, they have no government that defends their interest. Alem Dechassa dies after the Ethiopian embassy in Beirut fails to come up to her riscue.

National Mining Corporation (NMC), a closely held company owned by the Ethio-Saudi billionaire Sheikh said it found gold deposits in southern Ethiopia that may produce at least 10 metric tons a year, almost doubling national output' Exploration conducted over 15 years shows the Okote sitein Ethiopia's Oromia region has more than 550 tons of gold, of which 73 tons may be ready for extraction within 24 months, Chief Executive Officerof NMC in an interview on March 12 in Addis Ababa, the capital. The company plans to invest $150 million in the initial phase of production, he said. "This area has huge potential," he said. "The revenue will be about $4 billion in 20 years' time" from the 73 tons and the government willreceive $1 billion from tax and royalty payments over that period.
Ethiopia, the world's third-biggest coffee grower, is diversifying its economy to reduce its reliance on agriculture, which accounts for 43 percent of the gross domestic product, according to African Development Bank data. Gold exports surged 75 percent to 11 tons in the fiscal year through July 7, 2011, generating $485.3 million. Earnings totalled $258.8million in the first half of the current fiscal year from $179.2 million a yearearlier, according to Ministry of Trade (MoT) data. Surveys conducted by South Africa's Venmyn Rand Ltd. have shown deposits of 113 tons of goldin the southern part of Okote, which is about 600 kilometers (373 miles) south of Addis Ababa, The area may contain more than 425 tons, according to sources. Ethiopia's only commercial producer of the precious metal is Midroc Gold, another company owned by Shekh Mohammed Ali
Al-Amoudi that was formed out of NMC to develop the Legedembi deposit.That mine, which is about 100 kilometers north of Okote, produces about 4 tons of gold a year. His Ethiopian investments include cement, hotel, soft drinks and agriculture companies.
Eritrean Information Minister Ali Abdu Ahmed said, "Ethiopia's admission of its military attack in Eritrea is a calculated ploy" Eritrean Information Minister Ali Abdu told Ethiopia's admission of its military attack is to divertthe international community's attention from its continuous 10-year occupation of Eritrean territory.He expressed little surprise that Ethiopia embarked on what he called "a military bellicosity that encroaches on Eritrea's sovereignty."Abdu said Eritrea is not to blame for what he said is Ethiopia's failure to resolve its internal crisis. "By its own admission, it's an aggression against the sovereignty of Eritrean territory," said Abdu. "The internal crisis in Ethiopia is due to the marginalization and exclusion of minor Ethiopian groups [because] of the regime's narrow and backwardpolicy of divide and rule being conducted by the Ethiopian regime." Ethiopia announced its forces attacked a military base inside Eritrea as an act of retaliation after accusing its neighbor of sponsoring groups that have carried out attacks inside Ethiopia. Ethiopian government spokesmanShimeles Kemal said Ethiopian troops moved 16 kilometers into Eritrea early Thursday and launched what he called a "successful attack" against two military posts used by "subversive groups." Ethiopia has often accused Eritrea of backing rebel groups that attack targets in Ethiopia's Afar area. But, Abdu said Ethiopia's accusations that Eritrea supports terrorism are like accusing (inventor) Thomas Edison of supporting darkness. "We have fought terrorism long ago before it became the talk ofthe town for politicians… and who are these terrorist subversive groups?" asked Abdu. "Almost all Ethiopians are fighting against the regime for the obvious reason because the regime is pursuing a narrow, corrupted policy,which services a very small family of the elite." Abdu said Asmara resists being dragged into "this kind of acrimony and provocation." He said the Eritrean government is pondering its next line of action.

Historic Ziquala Monastery near the southern town of Debre Zeit isengulfed with fire'

The nearby ancient Ziquala monastery mysteriously caught fire and burned down, reported from Addis Ababa. Locals report that calls for fire elimiation were ignored. This land was also allegedly marked for development. Century old cemeteries are being desecrated as bulldozers clear the area, also marked for development. These actions strike deeply at the heart of religious practices, at treasured religious artifacts and structures and at valued traditions; all of which further weakens these religious institutions and demeans and demoralizes the people. As the EPRDF asserts their power by destroying these physical structures that support the religious community, they are essentially telling the people "who is in charge" over every aspect of their lives. Ziquala monastery is located 27 km southwest of Debre Zeit. It was founded by Abune Guebre- Menfes Kidus in 1168 E.C on the mountains of Ziquala. In late 1800s, Emperor Menilik II expanded the monastery by building a new church. It had to be recalled that Ziquala Monastery was destroyed, and a church at the foot of the mountain had been looted by Imam Ahmad Gurey (Ahmed-Gragn) in 1531; two churches were later built at the monastery, one dedicated to St. Gebre Menfes-Kidus built by Menelik II in 1880 which designed by the Italian Sebastian Castagna, and the other dedicated to St.Kidane- Mihret built during the reign of Emperor Haile Selassie I. Various other holy sites are found around the mountain, mostly rock formations, while the monastery is the site of a bi-annual festival.

Charities and Societies Proclamation of 2009 restricts human rights work'

The CSO law in Ethiopia is crippling human rights work in the country, forcing organizations to cut programmes, close offices and lay off staff, according to an Amnesty International published report. "Stifling human rights work: the impact of Ethiopia's civil society legislation" describes how the 2009 Charities and Societies Proclamation puts in place restrictions on organizations working on human rights and allows for excessive government interference. The result is that people in the country have less access to independent human rights assistance. "Ratherthan creating an enabling environment for human rights defenders to work in, the government has implemented a law which has crippled human rights work in Ethiopia" said Michelle Kagari, AI's deputy Africa director. "The space to make legitimate criticism is more restricted than ever", she said. Ethiopia's ban on charities from working on human-rightsissues if they receive more than 10 per-cent of their funds from abroad has had a devastating impact on advocacy groups in the country, AI said.Organizations closed, shifted focus or scaled down their activities becauseof the 2009 statute, which also forces charities to spend no more than 30percent of their funds on administration, the London-based organization said. “Since the law came into force, it has had a devastating impact on human-rights organizations in Ethiopia, and therefore also on the promotion and protection of the rights of the Ethiopian people,” it said in it’s released annual report. “The impact of the law is that today human- rights organizations barely exist in Ethiopia.” Ethiopia’s government said in 2009 it introduced the law to regulate the country’s more than 3, 800 non-governmental organizations. It also said that it was the role of the state, rather than foreign-backed groups, to protect human and democratic rights. Along with Ethiopia’s media law and anti-terrorism legislation, the so-called Charities and Societies Proclamation has restricted criticism of a government that is responsible for human-rights violations, the report said. Its impact “has been to entrench still further, and even to institutionalize, the climate of fear pervading the work of human rights defenders in Ethiopia, a number of human rights defenders fled the country as soon as the law was passed” the AI report revealed.

Ethiopia - A noted economist in the west spoken his mind’

Recognizing the existence of large-scale and systemic state capture, thatthis state capture type of corruption is the root of widespread corruption,and that it has undermined the country’s potential transition communismto a market economy is paramount and a step in the right direction. Acknowledging that, in Ethiopia today, that it is the EPRDF’s ethnic partiesand their regional kingmakers who are appropriating state and public assets and who are systematically plundering the country’s resources, who are expanding their political and financial power, influence and abilityto employ their relatives and party cronies at the expense of the country, and who are promoting the personal and corporate interests of the political and economic elites would be a good beginning. Recognizing this fact helps us to be on the same page and allows us to collaborate in designing the methods of fighting the corruption scourge”, said Dr. Said Hassan, a professor of Economics at Murray University.

The famous Ethiopian Airlines still keen to build a Four-Star Hotel onAfrica Avenue in the capital’

The Ethiopian Airlines is seeking international companies to build a four- star hotel in two and half years, on a plot near Bole International Airport, a plan its management has been tinkering with for years now. Estimated to have cost 300 million Br two years ago, the national carrier wants to see a hotel of international standard is built on a 40,000sqm plot it has on a land opposite to the Millennium Hall, on Africa Avenue (Bole Road). Thecompany has invited last week international construction firms to “design and build” on a turn-key contract basis. This was not the first offer Ethiopian has made to let companies bid to build the hotel. It had announced a bid in January 2009 to hire consulting firms to design and supervise the construction of the hotel, where domestic companies such as National Consult Plc, Ultimate Plan Plc, and ETG Designers & Consultants Plc, all in partnership with their international associates, had made their offers. Nonetheless, the management had cancelled this in November 2009, claiming to have an interest in searching for other alternatives. The national carrier wanted to have instead a company that could “design and build”, while along the way it will hire consulting firms to review the design and provide supervision as well as contract administration services, according to an architect who is an insider to theindustry. Ethiopian had entered into a 60 million dollars joint venture arrangement with the China-Africa Development (CAD) Fund and HNA Hotels & Resorts Group (HNA Group), where the parties had signed a tripartite agreement in November 2009, in Egypt. Ethiopian would have a53pc share, while CAD and HNA Group would have 28.2pc and 18.8pc shares, respectively.

The EPRDF led government is said to be engaged in another ethnic cleansing campaign, this time in southern Ethiopia against the Amharas’ The Radio “Voice of Germany (DeutchWelle)” has reported that so far 22,000 Amharas have been evicted from Benji-Maji Zone after their properties and fixed assets which they acquired in hard working at their villages were confiscated by low level (woreda) administration officials, and the number could reach about 78,000. According to observers, “when someone really sees their beautiful children forcibly removed from their homes and the environment they grew up to be forever separated from their best friends, neighbors, teachers, and everything else, reminded of the horror and grief they went through, which has left permanent scars onhearts and minds of these neglected children, whose innocence of childhood has been shattered and whose dreams and lives stolen forever”.

The Ethiopian Ministry of Finance and Economic Development (MoFED) hasbeen undertaking various measures to control inflation across the country,says the Minister’ Ato Sufian Ahmed, while presents the ministry's mid- term performance report to the parliament, said the ministry had been undertaking various activities since July, 2011 taking into consideration the significance of controlling inflation to achieve macro-economic stability. Ato Sufian said accordingly, the direct loan, which was borrowed by the National Bank of Ethiopia (NBE) to the government was stopped bylimiting public expenditure in line with it's income. In addition, foreign currency deposits with the Bank were utilised to import additional goods, he said, adding that edible oils, Wheat, and Sugar were imported and distributed at fair prices to the public with a view to stabilising food prices.Inflation the country was mainly driven by global food prices, Sufian said.

Amongst reports Ethiopia is to get more Norwegian funding’

About 450 children that have been born as well as raised in Norway will have to leave because of government immigration policy;- The latest horror story in the tragic saga of Ethiopian refugees comes from Norway. Recently, the Government of Norway put into place a plan to “involuntarily” (forcibly) deport hundreds of Ethiopian political refugees back to Ethiopia. According to human rights sources, some of these refugees have lived and worked in Norway for over two decades. Most of these refugees were given work permits and allowed to live freely and work in Norway when they first entered. Most learned the language and adopted Norwegian culture. Among the refugees include some 450 children born in Norway and living in “asylum seeker reception centers” for several years. Many of these children attend school and some of them speak only Norwegian. The vast majority of these refugees had fled Zenawi's ruthless dictatorship by the skin of their teeth. Many of them areardent opponents of Zenawi's regime in Norway. As recently as October 2011, many of these refugees flooded the streets of Oslo to protest the arrival of Meles Zenawi for an energy conference. Zenawi's operatives reportedly videotaped the protesters in the streets, according to sources. Many of these refugees have a long history of activism in Ethiopian opposition political organizations in Norway at the leadership and grassroots levels taking advantage of democratic freedoms in Norway. Thebasis for the forcible return of the Ethiopian political refugees is a Memorandum of Understanding (MoU), between the Norwegian Government and the regime of Zenawi, which purports to comply with therequirements of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other treaties concerning repatriation of refugees to their countries of origin.

The objective of the MoU is to facilitate a "dignified process of assisted return". It provides for the "Government of Ethiopia to carry out the necessary measures for the return of Ethiopian nationals from Norway." The Norwegian Government is expected to provide "necessary support" forimplementation and monitoring. Refugees who agree to voluntarily return are promised a set amount of money upon their arrival. Prime Minister Jens Stoltenberg had made the announcement about deportation during his speech at the Labour Party's annual meeting in Oslo. "Our concern is to have a just refugee and asylum policy. This means people who are persecuted shall stay, whilst those who are not shall leave." "Regard for children shall be emphasised, but it is not politicians who are to decide individual cases, it is the UDI (Directorate of Immigration) and the UNE (Immigration Appeals Board). Our task is to make laws and regulations," he told Dagsavisen. Many Labour Party representatives from across the country want to see the rules relaxed for the children's best interests, however. Some 450 children in Norway's asylum seeker reception centres have been living in asylum seeker reception centres for three or more years, a quarter were born there. Some attend school, have Norwegian friends, and speak Norwegian. The government's recent return agreementwith Ethiopia has received broad criticism from tri-partite coalition and opposition Parties. Leading Norwegian writers Ingvar Ambjørnsen and Jostein Gaarder have joined the battle to bring about a political change-of-heart regarding the children. The latest prominent Norwegian author to speak out is Jan Kjerstad. Having heard arguments that deportation is meant as a preventative measure, he says, "It is possible this is the right thing to do seen from a bureaucratic point of view, which takes regulations into account." "Nevertheless, in the big picture, this is an ethical act for which there is only one word: shame." Meanwhile, it has also been revealed that Norway doubled it's aid to Ethiopia a month before the deal was made. Many other paperless Ethiopians are also livingin Norway amongst the population and used to pay taxes to the state untiltheir tax card was taken away. Some had a job until even as recently as the beginning of this month. Authorities have denied that there is a connection between the agreement and increased aid, but Ann-Magrit Austenå from the Norwegian Organisation for Asylum Seekers said to the Aftenposten, "I do not think it is a coincidence that the return agreement with Ethiopia has come into effect at the same time we see an increase in the flow of aid.” Other countries, including Sweden, have recently reducedthe amount of aid given to the country on grounds of human rights violations.

Former TPLF top official who later joined the opposition group and becamefounding member of MEDREK, a coalition party told’ “After the 2005 farce election, the Tigrai People's Liberation Front(TPLF), has been downsized toa single family party, namely that of Meles Zenawi and Azeb Mesfin”, Ato Seeye Abarha senior member of Unity for Democracy and Peace Party saidwhile addressing a public gathering in attendance that “the TPLF is no more exists today in the fashion that we used to know it years ago”. Ato Seeye Abraha Hagos, who is currently studying at Harvard University, said“the present socio-economic situation in Ethiopia is in the same state of expose with the final days of the military government of Colonel Mengistu Haile-mariam, characterized by exorbitant cost of living and deepening public discontent. In a country where inflation is soaring over 30%, corruption has become the order of the day”, Seeye said. Ethiopia now supersedes neighboring country, Kenya which at one time was well knownfor it’s rampant corruption throughout the continent. He also noted that with such slippery economy EPRDF is facing insurmountable economic challenges. EPRDF, after the 2005 election, not only created pseudo political parties but also pseudo propaganda machinery. Referring to 10 million Birr fund allocated to political parties for the forthcoming local election, EPRDF has already fetched the lion's share, that is 9 million Birr and sadly only 3500 Birr goes to Medrek, Seeye remarked. His party is unable to even lease an assembly hall anywhere in Addis Ababa, albeit all fees are paid in full. Cognizant of the fact that EPRDF is unable to cleanse its tarnished records in human rights and undemocratic deeds, is now attempting to legitimize its actions by calling itself "development-oriented government." Government owned mass media are sanctioned to report nothing but economic development, he said. He recalled the ban on Deutsche Welle (DW) Amharic Service (German Radio Amharic service) last year and the warning given to it by EPRDF to focus its report only onthe economic activities the country undertakes.

Corporate Land Grabbing: Ethiopia to accelerate Land commercializationamid opposition’

Ethiopia’s government said it plans to clear land and provide infrastructurefor investors to accelerate a commercial farming drive in the west of the country, amid opposition to the plans that left 19 people dead. More than 100,000 hectares (247,105 acres) of land in the Gambella and Benishangul-Gumuz states on the border with Sudan will be targeted in a process managed by the Agriculture Ministry’s Agricultural Investment Support Directorate, its director, Esayas Kebede, said in an interview on March 21. “The government is taking that responsibility to clear the land and to develop the land and then after to transfer the land with a value addition,” he said in the capital, Addis Ababa. The government will provide infrastructure including irrigation, electricity, telephones and drinking water, he said. Ethiopia, which according to the London-based Overseas Development Institute is one of the world’s top five recipients of food aid, has leased out 400,000 hectares acres of land over the past four years to investors including Saudi Star Agricultural Development Plc to grow crops partly for export. The government may increase a so-called land bank thatsets aside 3.6 million hectares of Ethiopia's total 110.4 million hectares for commercialization, Esayas said. Ethiopia's land-lease program has led to "human rights violations and the forced relocation of over a million Ethiopians," in Gambella and the nation's southern region, the California- based advocacy group, Oakland Institute, said in an e-mailed statement on March 19. The government denies human- rights violations and any connection between investment and a resettlement program that it says isvoluntary. Opponents of the relocations and commercial farming shot dead about 19 students on a bus 20 kilometers (12 miles) from Gambella town. These are main factors according humanrights activists that make life unbearable are everywhere present in the country, pushing people to take risks in leaving the country that often result in dangerous situations. The ruling party elites blamed for being guilty of the crime of ceding Ethiopian lands to the Sudan, Djibouti and dubious investors; guilty of rampant corruption; guilty of tightening the political space thus denying peaceful competition.

Eight concerned Civil Society groups appealed for internationalcommunity'
Human Rights Watch (HRW), Caritas Lebanon Migrant Center, KAFA (enough) Violence & Exploitation, Anti Racism Movement, Amel Association International, Insan,Danish Refugee Council, and Nasawiya hasnow joined Ethiopians who are seeking justice for our beautiful sister Alem Dechasa-Desisa. The eight groups stated that "Lebanese authorities should look into several aspects of Dechasa-Desisa's death – the abuse captured on video, the lack of police investigation into the abuse prior to the video being circulated, and the circumstances of her death while in thecare of a hospital," Houry said. "The government should also adopt a national plan to improve domestic workers' ability to report abuse and train police, immigration officials, and judges on how to better respond to these cases." They went on to say" Lebanese authorities should act quickly to reform restrictive visa regulations and adopt a labour law on domestic work to address high levels of abuse and deaths among migrant domestic workers, a group of eight concerned civil society groups said today. The government should also announce publicly the outcome of the investigation into the recent abuse and subsequent suicide of Alem Dechasa-Desisa, an Ethiopian domestic worker."
The New Tele' (Ethio-Telecom) and the Information Network Security Agency (INSA), a state intelligence network" conjuncted' A secret document revealed that the State security agency known as Ethiopian National Intelligence and Security Service (ENISS) drafted new guideline on how the New Ethio-Telecom and the Information Network Security Agency (INSA) work in conjunction to prevent possible potential terrorism.The regime believes in total control of flowing information, brute force and information control sustains rule.
Ethiopian Heritage Society of North America (EHSNA) said it has beenalarmed by government plans'
In yet another egregious assault on its own Ethiopian citizens, the regime of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi and the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front(TPLF) are preparing to raze about 18 ancient churches, to bulldoze the surrounding forests and pastures, and to force the indigenous people to relocate to sub-standard environs far from their heritage homelands. The regime wants the land to lease to large international corporations from China, Saudi Arabia, and India. EHSNA announced it's deeply concerned about preserving the heritage of the Ethiopian people, the Ethiopian Heritage Society of North American (EHSNA) is especially troubled to discover that the "Waldeba Monastery" in Gondar is among the church- lands chosen for demolition. One of the oldest monastic teaching institutions in Ethiopia, countless religious leaders have been educated within its walls for over 1000 years. Waldba also holds an important archive of scriptures and texts in ancient Ethiopian languages, many of which are very important to the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church andEthiopian religious and cultural history. The Ethiopian Heritage Society of North America (EHSNA), is a civil society organization dedicated to promoting and watch-keeping Ethiopian heritages.

Ethiopia - Ministry of Agriculture (MoA), suspended land allocations for investment purposes to take time for assessment' Ethiopian Ministry ofAgriculture (EMoA) will reassess its internal structures and evaluate the work that is being performed on the land that has already been providedfor investment before it commences its regular services. The Ministry willreview requests on a case by case basis to provide land for big projects said the Director of the Investment Supporting Directorate with the ministry.Since the Investment Supporting Directorate has been established the ministry has allocated a total of 342,099 hectares to localand foreign investment companies. The Directorate took 3.6 million hectares of land in Oromia, Beninshangul Gumuz, Gambela and the Southern Region and has been allocating large land grants between 100,000 - 500,000 hectares of land. It has been reported, however, thatinvestors have not been utilizing land allocated for investment appropriately according to sources. The MoA will need to re-evaluate the current status of land in the possession of investors before allocating further land for investors it was said.

Pan-Ethiopians question how could such small ethnic minority group in thename of TPLF could govern the whole country with brutallity and impunity'Democracy sits firmly upon principles of freedom, justice, social inclusion and participation in civil society. Where these qualities of fairness are absent so too is democracy, for the word is not the thing, to speak of democratic values is easy enough, to dismantle repressive methods and state practices that deny there expression is quite another. The ruling elites have made themselves so rich at our expense and treat citizens likedirt. The Tigrean ruling elites are in power for over two decades now, and it looks as if they will be staying in power for more years to come. How does someone explain their longevity in power? They represent a minorityconstituency of about 7% of the total population in the country. Almost everything is going wrong for most people in that country, except for few people associated with the ruling-party. About 14 million people live on food handouts. Inflation rate is going up everyday making life miserable even for the middle income families. Mothers are feeding their children in shifts. Despite all these negative facts on the ground they ruled the country for over twenty years, and they still expect, and even think entitled to rule the nation for more years to come. One may wonder how the Tigrai Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF), as central comoponent of the ruling-EPRDF stayed so long in power. What has kept them in power, and is still keeping them in power for so long despite all these ills and wrong policies? Political pundits and commentators give two most important reasons for their stay in power, and these include: (1) the opposition is too divided making it easy for them to divide and rule; (2) the West is behind the ruling elites providing them financial, political and moral support for their own national interests. Indeed, the above mentioned reasons are among the factors contributing for the longevity of their rule, but these factors are not the determinant ones. According to ones understanding, the minority ruling elites are in power for so long because of their political capability to maintain power. They have Stanlinist doctrine which that combined of Marxist theoretical model with Machiavellian state crafts and apply it without hesitation. They plan all of their political moves and act very fast and decisively with smart and effective political moves that kept and keeping them in power. This cannotgo on forever. Meles Zenawi would be held accountable for all the crimes that he and his cronies are committing. That day is to come, is not far.

The late US president John Fitzgerald Kennedy (JFK) quoted as saying,"those who make peaceful-Revolution impossible, will make violent- Revolution inevitable".

Despite good harvest, Ethiopian coffee export fell sharply’

Ethiopian coffee exports have continued to fall alarmingly, where shipment of the beans dropped by 38 percent during the first eight months of the current Ethiopian fiscal year, according to the Reporter. The Ethiopia Commodity Exchange (ECX) eliminated the +/- 5 percent coffee price range yesterday, which was set to regulate against price fluctuation.The 5 per-cent range was instituted to protect coffee suppliers and exporters from fierce international coffee price volatility. The CEO of the ECX told that until the international Coffee market stabilizes the range willnot be applicable on the trading floor. Coffee exports during the first eightmonths of the last fiscal year were 122,576 tonnes while the foreign currency earned stood at over USD 447 million. The world coffee price haskept falling unabated from December last year through March, thereby export revenues were declining from Ethiopia’s flagship export item and strategic commodity. Brazil is expected to harvest 54 millions bags of coffee (3.24 million tonnes) this year, which is one of the biggest, and world coffee price is expected to keep stagnated at best, if not fall, according to industry observers and analysts.

“ARENA-Tigrai party", an opposition organization operating in Tigrai regionand grouped within the "Medrek Front" has denounced the repression unleashed by the EPRDF regime against it all over Tigrai’

It is to be noted that two years ago ARENA-Tigrai member and candidate for the election, Ato Aregawi Gebre Yohannes, was murdered in cold blood by the regime’sassassins. According to the report, 13 members of the ARENA-Tigrai leadership including CC member Engineer Abdulwahab Bushera and executive committee member Asgede Gebre-Sellasie have been illegally detained, beaten and harassed by the regime’s police. Others, teachers and journalists, have lost their jobs as the regime uses its all out control of power to and the bureaucracy for punishing ARENA members and sympathizers. ARENA-Tigrai is presided by the former politburo member of the ruling TPLF and now dissident Gebru Asrat. Apparently, the regime wants to stifle the organization and remove any meaningful political presence in Tigrai. "ARENA-Tigrai" is a legally registered party that vows to conduct “peaceful struggle” and the repression against it only goes to highlight the repressive nature and policy of the ruling EPRDF.

Ethiopian National Transitional Council's Steering Committee held a pressconference with foreign based members of the Ethiopian media’ Representatives of the ENTC-ST, Dr Fisseha Eshetu and Ato Masresha Tilahun, introduced the goals and objectives of the group and took questions from the media. In explaining the objectives of ENTC-ST, Dr. Fisseha Eshetu explained that the Transitional Council has not been formed. Rather, we are asking everyone to come together, join hands andform the council. The ENTC Steering Committee also used the press conference to introduce it's new headquarters in Washington DC. Additionally, it is reported that local chapters are in the process of being formed in various cities of the United States i.e. Washington DC, Dallas, Atlanta, Seattle, and other cities.
Diasporan civic group SMNE appeals for world attention on genocide-prone’ Gambella, according to to the Solidarity Movement for New Ethiopia (SMNE) witnessing from Gambella, "couple of weeks after an ambush of a passengers bus 2 to 3, 000 government armed troops have been sent to the area where 19 innocent people—mostly young students returning fromschool—were killed. Despite an absence of evidence, the Annuak rebels in the bush have been blamed and with them, the Annuak in general, especially men and older boys who all “look” suspicious in the eyes of the regime. It has resulted in a spiraling number of incidents of violence and arrests of Annuaks by the military, creating an atmosphere reminiscent of the Annuak massacre of 13 to 15 of December, 2003 and the two or more years of human rights abuses that followed. Eight years after the Annuaksgenocide, Gambella is again in the spotlight. This region has become the epicenter of land grabs on the African continent and with it, human rights violations in response to dissent. However, with the return of regime troops, the numbers and breadth of these incidents have multiplied. From the testimony from people in Gambella, the very heavy presence of troopshas terrorized many, triggering post-traumatic memories of the past genocide. The regime is justifying this clampdown as necessary to protect the region-and the investors-from these “anti-peace” insurgents; however, from our investigations, we in the SMNE have found no evidenceof their involvement and instead, reason to suspect that the tragic murderof these 19 Ethiopians may be another state-conspired false flag operation, where disguised ruling party agents attacked the bus themselves inorder to blame the local people, especially those who are opposed to the land grabs. The federal government has now taken complete control of the Gambella region’s security though the governor, Omot Obang Olom, remains as a figurehead. Why is the TPLF/EPRDF regime panicking so much? Was this ambush part of a plan to protect the investors? After the car was ambushed, the government-controlled news agency ENA put out a press release regarding the bus ambush and the killing of the 19 students. This is quite unusual for ENA to release becausethey usually do not put out a press release. When one puts it all together, we believe it may be all a strategy to protect the regime's allies and their investments in the area as well as their work crews and professional staff who have been feeling fearful with some threatening to leave according torumors from the ground.

Democratizing an empire is a self-deception'

According to Oromo nationalists, democratizing an empire is self- deception. Many Oromo nationalists are, once again, debating on the age-old topic of what fits best for the Oromo people – democratizing the Abyssinian-Ethiopian empire or to free Oromiyaa from this imperial yoke. It was some 134 years ago that Oromiyaa fell under Abyssinian colonization; some Oromo nationalists take as example the 1876 Boru Meda Summit in Wollo – between Atse (King of Kings) Yohannes of Abyssinia (originally, King of Tigray), and King Menelik of Shewa – to be the beginning of the Abyssinian conquest and colonization of Oromiyaa. It was at the 1876 Boru Meda Summit that an agreement was reached, between the two Abyssinian Kings, on how to divide Oromiyaa's northernmost territory of Wallo including Rayaa – now part of Debubawi Zone of Tigray, and also on how to subjugate the people of Wallo to religious and ethnic oppressions. With the fall of Wallo as a backdrop, the rest of Oromiyaa was soon conquered and colonized by Atse Menelik, who,by then, had become the King of Kings of Abyssinia after the death of AtseYohannes. After the conquest, the Gadaa confederates of Oromiyaa were brutally crushed, and the Gadaa system abolished – except in Borana, where the Gadaa system is still alive; Borana lied on a frontier far away from the colonial centers in Nairobi, Finfinne and Khartoum during the Scramble for Africa (including Oromiyaa) – which could have been one of the reasons that the Gadaa system has survived till this day. Since the fallof the entire Oromiyaa, i.e. some 120 years ago, there have been only 6 rulers of the Abyssinian-Ethiopian empire – namely, Atse Menelik (1889- 1913), Lij Iyasu (1913-1916), Empress Zewditu (1916-1930), Atse Haile- Selassie (1930-1974), Colonel Mengistu (1974-1991) and Atse Meles Zenawi (1991-Present) – some consider 1991 the year when the Abyssinian imperial power returned to the "House of Tigrai" after about a 125-years reign under the "House of Shoa".

Over 70 Ethiopian and Eritrean origin physicians who work and reside in the United States held a meeting with the Ethiopian Ambassador in the US' The meeting was at Old Town Alexandria Hilton Hotel near Washington DC over recently. The meeting was organized by pro-regime physician and investor Dr. Mulai Teklu Yohannes and Dr. Tesfaye Demmisie Fanta of the North Carolina. The purpose of the meeting was toraise funds for building a higher referral hospital in Addis Ababa. The Ethiopian Ambassador in the US Ato Girma Birru asked the physicians to contribute $30,000 each for the project. He also asked them to buy bond for the proposed "Nile Dam Project". Many of the physicians who attendedthe Woyanne meeting are residing in the U.S. as political refugees, and yet they attend a fund raising party that is organized by the same regimethey fled from. The physicians also must have failed to understand that the regime has no any intention of building a hospital. The existing hospitals in Ethiopia's capital Addis Ababa, such as Tikur Anbessa, are so dilapidated and neglected that patients go there to die. Addis Ababa's biggest hospitals look like morgues. But the regime has enough money to spend over $100 million for buying armored tanks.The main reason that the 70 doctors who met with Ambassador Girma Birru have sought asylumin the US is because they were unable to live freely and make a living in their own country. So if these physicians are genuine about helping their people back home, they need to speak out against the injustice in their home country. If they are not willing to do that, the least they can do is not give money to the regim, critics said.

African Union Commission (AUC) fails to break leadership deadlock'

Leaders of eight African Union countries failed to break a deadlock over the leadership of the 54-member continental body, highlighting divisions that have repeatedly stymied its decision-making. The talks in the Benin port city of Cotonou were called after neither of the two front-runners forthe AU Commission chairmanship - former South African foreign ministerMrs. Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma and the incumbent Jean Ping of Gabon - managed to secure an outright majority vote during a voting contest in January. "consultations will continue..notably between governments of Gabon and South Africa," said a statement issued after the Cotonou talksby leaders of those two countries plus officials from Chad, Cote D'Ivoire, Algeria, Ethiopia, Benin and Angola. They said a further round of talks would be scheduled to try and break the deadlock before a summit in Malawi around the middle of the year. And Jean Ping's mandate has beenextended until then. The African Union Commission (AUC) is the AU secretariat's top administrative unit and the chairman it's public face.

Two passed EPRDF's innhibiting legislation bills in 2009 revealed some of the worst aspects of the government's decent towards greater repression and political intolerance' The first of these is the Civil Society Organizations (CSO) law which, according to the US based Human Rights Watch (HRW), is one of the most restrictive of its kind and will make mostindependent human rights work impossible. The second is the "Counter- terrorism" law, introduced at the same time, which allows the governmentand security forces to prosecute political protesters and non-violent expressions of dissent as terrorism. The Ethiopian government has used these laws as a pretext for all manner of human rights violations and to justify suppression and control. According to the, Bureau of Investigative Journalism among other travesties of justice, the legislations "permits a clamp down on political dissent, including political demonstrations and public criticisms of government policy. These laws are clearly in violation of the ICCPR and blatantly contravene the much-championed Ethiopian constitution. According to Article 19 of the UNDHR, "Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.”The UDHR is not in a legally binding document but it provides a moral framework for states and offers a clear indication of what we as a world community have agreed to as the basic requirements of correct governance and civilized living. The preamble to the UDHR states that “it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law”. Although the UDHR is not legally binding, its sister document, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), is. Article 19, paragraph 1 of the covenant states:”Everyone shall have the right to hold opinions without interference.” And paragraph 2 says: “Everyone shall have the right to freedom of expression; this right shall include freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media of his choice.”Ethiopia ratified this international treatise on 11 June 1993 and is therefore legally bound by its articles. Not only is the Ethiopian government in violation of international law, but by restricting the freedom of the media and inhibiting any hint of dissent, the regime is alsoin contradiction of its own constitution. Article 29 of the Ethiopian constitution, entitled rather optimistically “Right of Thought, Opinion and Expression”, states: 1, Everyone has the right to hold opinions without interference. 2, Everyone has the right to freedom of expression without any interference. This right shall include freedom to seek, receive and impart information and idea of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any media of hischoice. 3, Freedom of the press and other mass media and freedom of artistic creativity is guaranteed. Freedom of the press shall specifically include the following elements: (a) Prohibition of any form of censorship.

(b) Access to information of public interest. Clear and noble words which, in fact, serve only as a mask of convenience and deceit, allowing the betrayal of the many to continue. HRW gently states that the 1995 constitution incorporates a wide range of human rights standards, and government officials frequently voice the state’s commitment to meeting its human rights obligations. But these steps, while important, have not ensured that Ethiopia’s citizens are able to enjoy their fundamental rights.That is why the UN Jubilee Campaign has called for their repeal. The “Counter-terrorism” law is a pseudonym for a law of repression and control, made and enforced by a paranoid regime that is determined to use all means in its armoury to quash any dissent and maintain a system of disinformation and duplicity. Under this law, media organizations that disagree with the EPRDF party line run the risk of being branded “terrorists”, arrested and imprisoned. All opposing voices to government policy are stifled; journalists are frightened and the facility to expose and criticize the many serious violations of human rights facing the country are denied, all independent voices have been virtually silenced and freedom of speech and opinion are denied.Control flows from fear, the greater the dishonesty, corruption and greed the more extreme the controls become. The UN, in its human rights report, says that the suppression of dissent has become the primary source of concern regarding the future of human rights in Ethiopia. As with all dictatorships,the EPRDF regime seeks to centralize power, deny dissent and freedom ofexpression, and suppress the people by intimidation, violence and fear. Ithas created an atmosphere of apprehension and extinguished all hope of justice, true human development and freedom from tyranny.

Disempowerment is the aim, and the means are well known, crude and unimaginative: keep the people uneducated, deny them access to information, restrict their freedom of association and expression, and keepthem entrapped, according to Graham Peebles Director of the Create TrustUK.

The famous Ethiopian Airlines is now being in a commercial crisis'

As fuel prices globally soars, the Ethiopian Airlines, the country's flag carrier tightens belt. Only a few months since declaring profits and makingacross-the-board salary increases of 20per-cent, Ethiopian Airlines finds itself taking drastic cost cutting measures to save up to one billion Birr, which management hopes will relieve the national carrier from an imminent difficulty in operation, sources disclosed. Such measures includea series of meetings soliciting its 5,635 employees to come to its rescue, relinquishing part of their salaries, providing free services during leisure times and increased efficiency. The drastic cost cutting initiative aims at slashing operating costs short of the costs for fuel and oil, for the latter are beyond the sphere of influence of the company. The management plans to gain close to 303 million Birrr saved from efficiency in maintenance and repair costs. Among the proposed methods of participation in the initiative, which may include security personnel giving up meals, are unpaid leisure time work, increasing the number of customers, avoiding material wastage, servicing foreign planes, negotiating to get reduction of lease of rented aircraft, reducing maintenance costs, and reducing overall operation costs, according to those who participated in the meetings. In separate meetings held over successive days last week, with different categories of employees, the management of Ethiopian Airlines has admitted confronting trying days ahead, due to a sudden surge in the price of fuel globally, according to sources.

The rise in expenditures was attributed by the Airlines to the spiraling global prices of oil, which took up to 39 per-cent (6.7 billion Birr)of its total spending, according to Ethiopian's nine-month report to Parliamentary sub-committee forTransport Affairs on May 9, 2011.

Traditionally, what Ethiopian Airlines spends on buying fuel constitutes half o f its operating expenses, which stood at 15.4 billion Birr during its operations in the year 2009/10, up by 37.3 per-cent from the previous year. Crude oil prices in the international market have gone through a volatile period over the past few weeks, for the first time since 2008, when the price of oil per-barrel shot up to 149 dollars. It went down to 80dollars in 2010, only to pass the 100-dollars threshold in January 2012.

Although subsided marginally late last week, uncertainties over the West’ssanctions on Iran and Syria kept prices as high as 105 dollars per barrel. The expenditure on fuel had risen from last year’s same period by 67per- cent, contributing to the national carrier facing stiff competition from otherairlines, particularly those from the Middle East, according to the report.

A dissident Ethiopian journalist on trial for terrorism’

He has categorically denied the charges and warned the court “history would judge its verdict” A three-judge panel listened as journalist EskinderNega Fenta described himself as a prisoner of conscience and rejected accusations that he had conspired to overthrow the government through violence. Eskinder is one of 24 defendants, including opposition politicians and several exiled journalists, charged with supporting Ginbot-7, a political party the government has labelled a terrorist group. Lawyers say they could face the death penalty if convicted. In a 20-minute presentation, Eskinder challenged the prosecution's case. He admitted writing and speaking about whether an Arab Spring-like movement might take root in Ethiopia, and calling for peaceful protests, but denied advocating violence or unconstitutional change. About 130 journalists and opposition political activists convicted of treason and sentenced to life in prison following the 2005 elections. They were later pardoned. They were re-arrested along with six others last September, soon after the 2009 anti-terrorism law became operational. Another 18 defendants identified as supporters of the Ginbot Seven party were charged in absentia. Most ofthem are political exiles in the United States. Ethiopia also brought terrorism charges against two ONLF members and three other journalists,including Elias Kifle, who runs the Washington-based Ethiopian Review website and Woubshet Taye, the deputy editor of the Addis Ababa-based “Awramba Times”.

It’s well recognized that the Ethio-Saudi Sheikh is behind the shameful planned slave-like exportation – Commentators’ Exportation of over 45,000 Ethiopian women per-month from the Amhara and Oromia regionsof Ethiopia to the kingdom of Saudi Arabia have already started. The women, most of whom are teenage girls, would be working in slave-like conditions, often subjected to beatings and other kinds of abuses. In the wake of the recent suicide of an abused Ethiopian worker, Alem Dechasa Desisa, whose story helped galvanize migrant rights campaigns, the issue has moved into the media spotlight lately: Stories of migrants dying on the job or taking their own lives are not uncommon, underscoring how their lives can be undervalued once they're swept into a "disposable" household workforce. Migrant women in particular struggle often with abusive employers and sexual harassment. Some migrant women are organizing and documenting their struggles in their own voices. One Ethiopian domestic worker-turned-filmmaker, Rahel Zegeye, has created afeature film, Beirut, which narrates the wrenching struggles of migrant women in Lebanon. Rahel Zegeye describes a plight that may sound familiar to domestic workers in the United States: Confirmed reports said Al-Amoudi’s involvement in this massive human trafficking, and also a person have been able to be identified as whom he has put by the Sheikhin charge of the operation. He is an Ethiopian who resides in Addis Ababa,and frequently travels to Saudi Arabia and other Gulf Arab counties as an employee of Sheikh Al-Amoudi. He is also in charge of Al-Amoudi's other company known as “Horizon Plantations Plc”, one of Al-Amoudi’s companies that is engaged in Saudi Star Agricultural Development that are used for growing and exporting cash crops. But Jamal Ahmed who labeled as collaborative in human trafficking responds, “I am an Ethiopianwho used to live in Atlanta, Ga, USA, and moved to my Country 20 years ago. I am a self-styled businessman who is very proud of what I am contributing to my lovely country. It is true that I am a business associateof the Sheikh Mohammed Al-Amoudi, whom I have a very great respect for him. Unlike others and their hate advocates, Sheikh Mohammed has been bringing billions of dollars to Ethiopia and making a very visible change”. Editor Teachers in Ethiopia’s capital Addis Ababa, are currently on strike after their request for wage increase, freedom of expression, association, bargaining was ignored by officials’ As one veteran teacher who wants to remain anonymous advises government officials to respond the issue wisely and accordingly, saying “As the heart is to the human body; The teacher is to the nation". Teachers who spoke to ESAT, the diaspora basedsatellite TV broadcast revealed that, several hundred teachers from schools in Addis Ababa have staged a demonstration opposing the salary increase. Even though a severe notice was given, teachers at Kokebe- Tsibah school, Dr. Haddis Alemayehu Secondary school and Yeka Karra- Allo primary school have not returned to their work by staging demonstrations. Addis Ababa school teachers have released a resolution and signed a petition that they have passed their resolution and petition known to the relevant government authorities as they have started “a start/stop” method of protest as well. In the statement that the Addis Ababa Schools teachers released contains sentences like, “talks with the government through the teachers union, regarding teacher’s demands to adjust salaries and other benefits have been going on for a long time. We teachers, believing that the government respectfully will give answers to our demands have waited by fulfilling our duties. While awaiting a reply, the government recently released a document entitled, ‘researched salary increase adjustment of levels for teachers’. The document shows the contempt the government has for education and the teaching profession. Not only that, what is broadcasted by the media is immoral, far from reality and at best very misleading”. It was explained to ESAT reporter that, Addis Ababa, regional cities and Woreda administrative offices attempt to persuade teachers by calling meetings and use of intimidation to change their stance have failed. Schools administrations have applied unusual method of control on the teacher’s morning attendance lists. Eventeachers who were absent by producing doctors sick leave were considered as willingly quitting their jobs. According to the head of department of Kolfe School, an administrative intimidation has been applied by posting notices around schools to no avail. Meantime, according to ESAT, a diaspora based satellite TV broadcast, following a strike by teachers in Arba Minch at a school known as Haile Degaga, students have demonstrated in support of teachers and demanded that the voice of teachers to be heard. Police arrived on site and beat several students. The police action was taken when the students were getting ready to go out of the campus. The students were frustrated by the actionof the police and have vented their anger by throwing stones at the police.The whereabouts of five teachers from this school is unknown. A teacher who wants to remain anonymous told ESAT, since the teachers union is onthe side of the government party, it was unable to help stage an organized and sustained demonstrations. Due to this various schools are doing the demonstration at different days. The teacher also surmised that,the demonstrations might have brought a better result if staged at the same time. In his quarterly address to the parliament Prime Minister MelesZenawi undermines teachers' discontent over pay to the work of a few disgruntled elements itching for chaos and regime change.

Ethiopian Fossil find shows Lucy had tree-climbing cousin’

A partial fossil of a pre-human foot has been found in Ethiopia, which researchers said proves there were two species of hominins existing around 3.4 million years ago. It was previously thought that Australopithecus afarensis, a slender-built hominid known as Lucy, was the only ancestor of humans living at that time, research team leader Yohannes Haile- Selassie told reporters in Ethiopia's capital, Addis Ababa. The new find, which has a big toe that is splayed out to the side demonstrating an ability to climb trees, shows similarities with an ancestorthat lived 4.4 million years ago, said Yohannes. The fossil differs from Lucy's toes, which are aligned with each other. Foot bones unearthed recently in Ethiopia belonged to a contemporary of 'Lucy,' the 3.2-million- year-old early human discovered in 1974. But these bones seem to belongto a different species, one thought to have split its time between walking upright and climbing trees. Early humans clung to trees longer than expected. Learning to walk indicates a child's progression from infant to toddler. But walking on two legs is uncommon among mammals. Infact, standing and walking on our own two feet helps to set us apart from othermammals. New findings reported earlier this week in the journal “Nature” show that early hominins held onto their ability to climb trees longer than scientists previously thought. Discovered in Burtele, Ethiopia, recently unearthed right foot bones are about 3.4 million years old and is thought to belong to a new species. The stiff joints of foot and toe bones suggest that the early hominin was capable of bending its foot upward to enable walking. The thumb-like big toe, however, would have helped it to also climb trees, like African great apes. “It’s a lovely little foot to have,” paleoanthropologist Donald C. Johanson told The New York Times. Working in Ethiopia in 1974, Johanson discovered "Lucy," the first specimen of Australopithecus afarensis, a species thought to be either a human ancestor or a close relative of one. Johanson's discovery indicatedthat bipedalism preceded humanity's increase in brain size. This new finding suggests that the evolution of bipedalism was more nuanced thanwe knew. The dual-purpose bones are about the same age as Lucy's, butscientists think that Lucy's species mostly moved by walking upright.

Since two species of hominin existed at the same time, with different shaped feet, it appears that hominins evolved to walk more than once. There are still many unknowns surrounding the evolution of humans' bipedalism. Hominin bones of this age are uncommon. Their small size makes them susceptible to scavengers and deterioration. So there just isn't much evidence for scientists to use in their interpretations. Without the rest of the Burtele skeleton, it is difficult to determine precisely how this hominin moved. As this NPR story points out, bipedalism requires evolutionary changes from head to toe. "We need more fossils to determine what sorts of bodies went with these feet," wrote Daniel Lieberman, an evolutionary biologist at Harvard, in a commentary in this week's Nature. Scientists will continue to hunt for more fossil evidence toexpand their understanding of human bipedalism. This work, according toLieberman, "will require researchers to continue getting their feet dirty inthe field and the lab."

The Ethiopian water crisis by the numbers’

Of the 1 billion people worldwide who lack access to clean water and safe sanitation, approximately 75 million live in Ethiopia. With an average income of just over $100 a year per-head, Ethiopia remains one of the world's poorest countries. The water crisis counts among the most significant factors in the perpetuation of the poverty in Ethiopia, with women and children spending up to six hours daily scavenging for water. In an effort to raise awareness for the global water crisis, the Levi's® brand has partnered with Water.org to present "The Ethiopian Water CrisisBy The Numbers" - a statistical and photojournalistic account of water deprivation in Ethiopia.

The owner of Microsoft, Founder and Manager of the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation who is here on a two-day visit, said Ethiopia has registered a marked improvement in many areas particularly in the health sector’ Bill Gates, who is here in Ethiopia for the first time to discuss with government officials and stakeholders on the foundation' s activities on the health and agriculture sectors in the country, said in a news conference he gave here on Wednesday at Sheraton Addis that the healthextension program is an exciting program in which the country has embarked up on. He further said the health extension program has created a lot of access to health services to the public. A lot of positive things are happening in Ethiopia, Gates said, adding that the decrease in the child mortality rate, the increase in the vaccination coverage and the case of malaria displayed this fact. There are a number of successes in Ethiopia, he said, and adding, the success has to be measured in terms of health, nutrition and income benefits. He said the health centers and postshe visited made him quite enthused about the general direction going in there. He said the things he has seen during his visit and the discussions with various officials revealed the fact that there is an opportunity to do even better. He said his Foundation is involved in helping Ethiopia in evaluating and monitoring performance in this regard and make sure the training to the extension workers provided in a rigorous way.

Is a meaning for the Amharic word "faranji (s)" ?

It’s literally meaning for “French” used to describe white foreigners, especially belongs to the "trans-Caucacian race". It’s widely thought suchphrase had originated from the word "french", meaning that the word “faranjis” derived from the word “French” whos citizens were seen first inthe country.

The Rev. Dr. Marthin Luther King jr. quoted as saying on broad injustice’

“An injustice somewhere is an injustice everywhere”. If the constitution ofone nation does not work effectively, then what does a free man can do?,he asks.

Late and erratic mid-February to May ('Belg') minor-rains could significantly reduce crop yields in central and southern Ethiopia and adversely affect food security, warn relief officials’ There is concern about the food security situation in 'Belg'-producing areas," Ethiopia's spokesperson for the World Food Programme (WFP), told IRIN. "Field reports, as well as remote sensing, confirm that the 'Belg' minor-rains up to now are far below normal." She said there has been limited land preparation for, and planting of, sweet potatoes in northeastern parts of the Southern Nations, Nationalities, and People's Region (SNNPR). "Sweet potatoes are the major transitional crops consumed mainly among poorer households until the 'Belg minor-rains harvest season begins in June," according to the US Agency for International Development's Famine Early Warning Systems Network. In the Amhara (central highlands) region, for example, only 3 per-cent of planned cropland had been planted as of 16 March, according to an update by the UN Office for Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. 'Belg' crops there, and in eastern Oromia and Tigrayregions, are normally planted by the end of February. Belg season’s production accounts for 5-30 percent of annual food production in the northern 'Belg' cropping areas, and 30-60 per-cent, or more, of productionin southern 'Belg' cropping areas. Experts recently warned of a high probability of drought returning to the Greater Horn of Africa amid fears ofpoor rains in March to May 2012. "We don't think the situation will improve any time soon and the rainfall might not come, particularly in southern and major ' Belg' producing areas," Diriba Koricho, director of the Forecast and Early Warning Department at the Ethiopian MeteorologyAgency, told IRIN.

Ethiopian mobile phone network suffers multiple failures’

The sole mobile phone network in Ethiopia has suffered it’s second seriousoutage within two weeks reports the local Ethiopian Reporter newspaper. The first outage was largely caused by a nationwide power failure, however last Friday’s failure was due to a network expansion project beingundertaken by ZTE going wrong. “Such failure could happen again during the pilot test trials,” Abdurahim Ahmed, ETC’s Corporate Communications Division Manager told The Reporter over the phone late on Friday. Sourcestold the newspaper though that the failure was caused by the shut-down of existing base stations without refarming the radio frequencies. “It is simply illogical to switch off existing frequencies without a replacement and run a pilot test for the expansion project,” added the sources. “The simple reason for the failure was that some of the Ericsson stations were switched off temporarily.”

The Federal capital Addis Ababa, and it's Amharic translation’

Addis Ababa is the Amharic meaning for "New flower", called also "Finfine"or "Sheger" in local Oromiffa. The present site of Addis Ababa was chosen as a village by Empress Taitu Betul Menelik. The city was founded in November, 1886 and officially becomes the Ethiopia's capital, in 1889 by her husband, Emperor Menelik II. Currently Addis Ababa city has the status of City-Region, lies at an Altitude "roof-top of Africa", about 2451 mtrs. Addis Ababa is the seat of the African Union Commission (AUC), andthe United Nations Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA) often called, "the political capital of Africa". The Ethiopian capital is home to the nation's greatest diversity, and has one of the higher densities of slum- dwellers in the world, and known also for it's grand open-market in Africa known as usually “Markato” Italian meaning for ‘Market’. Addis baba city is"more of a scrambled egg", a lack of crime and a tradition whereby the rich seem to tolerate the poor living among them mean that Addis's slumsoften lie in the seams between office buildings and flats in the more afluent parts of the city.

Senior member of the ALEDJE opposition party warns’

The diaspora based opposition party ALEDJE’s known as "Timret", condemns the ruling-party for building an apartheid oriented minority rule. Ato Neamin Zeleke, a dissident resides in the US calls on Tigrean intellectuals to step up, and warns failing to do so would make them accountable for their actions.

A “good listening skill is one of the essentialcomponents of good governance” - political thinkers’

The massacre committed recently by the Liyuu (special) Police Forces inthe Gashamo District of Somali Regional state, Ethiopian has happened within the international borders of Ethiopia. There were not any armed group that crossed the border to commit attack. But the conflict was between the brutal-like Liyuu (special) Police Forces and innocent pastoralists whose human rights and self dignity was violated regularly. The pastoralist society who inhabit in this part of Ethiopia belong to Isaaq clan just as those people in Somaliland. This is a typical feature of all Somali clans in the Somali Regional state, Ethiopian. Most of Somali clans within the Ethiopia international border also inhabit across the border in countries neighbouring Ethiopian. For example, the Isaaq clan that populate the Shinile zone also dwells in the Republic of Djibouti. It’s needless to say that this is also the reality for Hawiye and other major Somali clans. However, no one heard any time when the Djiboutian was blamed for the conflict between Afar and Issas. The conflict in the southern Ethiopian around the Kenyan border between Geri Somalis and Oromos has nothing to do with the Kenyan government. As usually happens, both clans could get support from the same clans from across the border since they share clanship. In light of this, it is possible to see the blatant and systematic policy of providing wrong information based onannihilation and cleansing a particular ethnic group from the Ethiopia. Thisis a serious criminal offence both under the Ethiopian Federal and regionalconstitutions. As well known the Ogadien clan wants to establish an Ogadien state. As mentioned above, Ethiopia is a signatory to a number ofinternational instruments that prohibit cruel and degrading treatments, war crime and crime against humanity. The Ethiopian constitution also incorporated the sprint of most of these international agreements as national law and binding on any official. There is no doubt that this atrocity and massacre squarely meets the threshold for the crime against humanity, war crime and human rights violations. Ethiopia is a signatory to a number of international conventions, treaties, and agreements, whichprohibit such kind of atrocity against innocent and defenceless population.It’s so wise to listen the masses!

The Sudanese team in Ethiopia for crisis talks’

Top Sudanese security officials flew to Addis Ababa for crisis talks after a delay threw negotiations into uncertainty following fresh fighting allegedlybacked by South Sudan. After reaching the Ethiopian capital they held talks with the mediator, former South African president Thabo Mbeki, and other members of the African Union (AU) which is leading the talks at a luxury hotel. But they had yet to meet their South Sudanese counterparts.Sudan's delegation headed by the interior minister includes the intelligence chief, deputy armed forces commander and other senior officials. Sudan's foreign ministry spokesman, told AFP that the delegationdecided to travel to Addis Ababa, after a delay, once the AU informed them that the South Sudanese delegation had arrived the day before for the talks focused on security matters. Spokesman said combat on over the strategic town of Talodi, and allegations of a troop buildup south of Heglig, had held up the Sudanese ministers' trip and raised doubts as towhether the negotiations could proceed.

For lawyers and massmedia professionals “rule of law” does mean a term of art which generally signifies constitutional supremacy and adherence toprinciples of due process’ Political scientists use the phrase “Rule of law” to describe institutional mechanisms for policing the state and preventing abuse of power through established accountability procedures and guarantees of basic civil, human and substantive rights. The phrase is gaining popularity among economists who have come to realize that the rule of law is necessary to create a secure environment for business, investments, contracts and market transactions. Where there the rule of law prevails, good governance i.e. accountability, transparency, free and fair elections, etc. Democracy sits firmly upon principles of freedom, justice, social inclusion and participation in civil society. Where these qualities of fairness are absent so too is democracy. Prime Minister Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia, while talking the democratic talk to his Western friends, the African Union and donor countries, knows little of democracy, human rights or the manifestation of democratic principles. He rules Ethiopia with a heavy hand, severely restricting free assembly – a right written into the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), inhibiting the freedom of the media and in many ways denying the people of Ethiopia freedom of expression. While media independence throughout theworld is contentious at best, autonomy fromdirect state ownership and influence is crucial in a free society. Yet, the Ethiopian state owns and strictly controls the primary media of television and radio. Access to information is also limited, as Human Rights Watch (HRW) makes clear in its report//Feil! Hyperkoblingsreferansen er ugyldig. Increasingly, the Ethiopiangovernment has been systematically tightening controls, restricting the political space available to the opposition and stifling independent civil society. The main sources of information for the majority of Ethiopians are(the state owned) television and radio. The print media is of little significance, due to low literacy of the adult population (48 per cent), highlevels of poverty and poor infrastructure, making distribution difficult. Theinternet is also restricted, with access to the web the lowest in Africa. The World Bank estimates that only 7.5 per cent of the population has internetaccess. The government of Ethiopia also controls all telecommunications and uses its control to deny the majority of the population access to another key area of mass information. This is an additional infringement of basic democratic principles of diversity and social participation. As Noam Chomsky says, the most effective way to restrict democracy is to transfer decision-making from the public arena to unaccountable institutions: kings and princes, priestly castes, military juntas, party dictatorships or modern corporations. “Party dictatorship” fits the Ethiopian government like a glove. The ruling Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), is infact a dictatorship masquerading under the guise of a democracy. Ethiopia’s citizens cannot speak freely, organize political activities or challenge their government’s policies through peaceful protest, voting or publishing their views without fear of reprisal. The increasingly paranoid regime systematically tighteningits monopoly over information, suppressing free speech and suffocating media freedom. “Disempowerment is the aim, and the means are well known, crude and unimaginative: keep the people uneducated, deny themaccess to information, restrict their freedom of association and expression,and keep them entrapped.”

The renowned stage and political activist Tamagn Beyene told a gatheringof Ethiopians’

Blaming the whole Tigrai people for TPLF crimes is profoundly wrong, as part of the common people in Ethiopia, the people of Tigrai also tired of those who abuse and misuse power and the dictators who want to cling topower: Though, a wholesale condemnation of one people for the wrongs of the ruling elites is not only wrong but also worth condemnation, Tamagne Beyene said on March 24 in Seattle. He said TPLF crimes shouldn't be mistaken for the crimes of the people, for which the people have no say in the decision-making process whatsoever. He also expressed the signficance of the pro-unity step the young Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) leadership took in recent weeks. With visionary people in the OLF, Tamagne said, “I think Ethiopians would have hope fora better tomorrow”.

On the city's Chad street, around Abenet Hotel , at Lideta District of Addis Ababa right next to the Kebele 04/06 recreational centre, one can find a shabby house that looks like a mill’ The two-roomed house is packed with six electric clay griddles, blue plastic containers, sacks filled with teff flour,and a table that carries piles of injera, a yeast-risen flatbread staple food usually made out of teff flour. After a quick scan of the house, one can seethat it is operating as an injera bakery business. Oddly enough, instead ofwomen, young men are in the house. Contrary to local perception that baking injera is reserved for women, the young men are busy mixing teff flour with water, pouring dough on the electric griddles, and orderly putting the freshly baked injera on a plate. The young men bake and sell around 1,000 injera a day. Their biggest order comes from a nearby hotel,which orders 300 injera, everyday. Their business idea, seen as unique bymany, all started two years ago. A group of sixteen youngsters organised themselves to establish a micro enterprise with a starting capital of around 7,000 Br. After getting support from their local kebele administration, they formed their enterprise and named it “Ej Yalsetu Ejoch”, roughly translated as “Hands that Have Not Given Up”. The initial plan of the youth was to hire bakers and handle only the financial aspect of the business. Since they discovered that this would cost 25 cents for every baked injera, they soon started learning how to do most of the baking themselves. Ironically, the only girl in the group quit, objecting to this decision. Three others also left the business, while the twelve have continued to this day, gradually hiring two female bakers and increasing their production. Their story has attracted widespread attention, even getting the men some coverage on state media and some private newspapers. The trend in the teff price that they have attentively observed in the last few weeks, however, makes them believe that they will soon no longer be a success story. “It is hard to be profitable under the current conditions, especially with the current price of the staple grainTeff,” Mesfin Kebede, treasurer of “Ej Yalsetu Ejoch Enterprise”, complained to local journal Fortune. A month ago, items on the price hikelist were cereals like split peas, lentils, pulses, and vegetables. But, since three weeks ago, what has been most affected by volatile price increases is Ethiopia’s own indigenous cereal Teff.

The man who succeeded the late Kinfe Guebre-Medhin as chief of Statesecurity’

Getachew Assefa Is a Central Committee member of the Tigrai People Liberation Front (TPLF) and head of the notorious state security agency that operates now under the name, “Ethiopian National Intelligence and Security Service (ENISS),” is also having a deteriorating relationship with PM Meles Zenawi, commander-in-chief of the Armed Forces who also oversees the security because of the increasing power of his deputy, Issaias Wolde-Giorgis, in the NISS, reliable sources said, Issaias, who is half-Eritrean by blood, is now becoming the de-facto man in the NISS, andthat Getachew Assefa is looking for a way out. The state security and intelligence chief, Ato Getachew Assefa, is reportedly suffering from severe frustration, according to inner circles. Insiders added that Getachew Assefa’s phones have been tapped by the ETC, the state owned Telecom service. Analysts who are knowledgeable about the inner workings of the the ruling-party told that after Meles Zenawi consolidated his power by turning the TPLF into a family show, resentment has spreaded in the TPLF rank, forcing him to surround himself with half- Eritreans and Tigreans from the native Adwa sub-region whom Meles Zenawi relies on more.

The Sudanese delegation led by the Interior Minister, Ibrahim MohammedHamid conferred with the Ethiopian Prime Minister on the current tensionsat the North-South Sudan common border’ Armies of Sudan and South Sudan engaged in a direct military confrontation at the oil-rich border town of Heglig despite the "non aggression pact" they signed under the African Union (AU) mediation. Both sides trade accusations over who firstignited the clash. Sudan north has brought fresh accusations against the South Sudan of new incursion. While South Sudan is accusing its northernneighbor of continued aerial bombardment.

New threats are again on the rise in Gambella Regional State’

As the ruling EPRDF regime attempts to exert increasing federal control ofthe region, leading to new clampdowns against civilians. Many believe that these actions are meant to suppress the deepening indigenous people protest over the increasing land-grabs. With the new influx of troops, the increasing land-grabs, the dislocations of the people, the repression of all political rights, the rumored mass arrests, the disarmament, the shootingsand the increased human rights abuses; all accompanied by intense pressure on the people to cover up for the perpetrators of the genocide, no one knows what will happen next. The last disarmament preceded the genocide. What are the regime planning now as signs of their desperation are everywhere? An 18 years old Annuak youngster recently was shot dead at home in Gambella town by the regime security forces. He was accused of being a 'trouble-maker,', however, most believe it was intended to intimidate and silence the Annuaks and others. Similarly, another Annuak man was also shotdead by the security forces in Abobo district. The only thing that will stop the EPRDF elitist cronies from killing and oppressing the Annuaks, as well as other Ethiopians, is when they have taken all they want from one of the poorest regions in one of the poorest countries in the world.

The growing United Bank Sc Share company is set to open it's first branchin the capital city of Southern Sudan, Juba' The bank will be the first Ethiopian private bank to enter the newest country in Africa next to the state-owned Commercial Bank of Ethiopia (CBE). A branch in the new oil rich nation is expected to be significantly lucrative for the bank according to officials. United Bank Sc is also planning to open branches in other African countries in its bid to become a competitive financial institute on the continent said Berhanu Getaneh, CEO of the United Bank.

Ethiopian National Transitional Council Steering Committee (ENTC-SC)'

Is a civil society organization dedicated to promoting broad dialogue, debate and discussion on Ethiopia's future, plans to steer for "Ethiopian national transitional authority in-exile" held a press conference with members of the Ethiopian media recently. Former President of Unity University of Ethiopia who fled the country has launched an opposition campaign against the government of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi calledfor a united action to unseat the incumbent regime. He addressed the Seattle audience.

A convoy carrying the governor of Sudan's eastern state of Gadarif acrossthe shared borders with Ethiopia on Sunday was attacked by suspected members of the Ethiopian gang known as Shiftas'

The attack took place as the convoy of the governor, Karam Allah Abbas,was crossing Um Dabalo area in Abu Sanda Sudanese locality bordering Ethiopia. Abbas was on his way to the neighboring Amhara Region of Ethiopia for a meeting with its governor when he stopped in Um Dabalo after spotting an Ethiopian farmer working in the area. The governor started an argument with the Ethiopian farmer and told him that the land belongs to Sudan, at which point a group of armed Ethiopian men arrivedat the scene and opened fire on the governor's convoy. Although no one was harmed in the fire, Abbas immediately cancelled his trip to the Amhara Region and called in security reinforcements to escort his convoyback to Al-Gadarif. Sources told Sudan Tribune that the incident had infuriated the governor who later threatened to sever his state's ties withEthiopia without referring to the central government in Khartoum. SudanTribune

World Bank (WB) official told GoE'

“Ethiopia’s government may have to curb spending to avoid borrowing that will further stoke inflation” The Horn of Africa nation plans off budget investment of about $33 billion by mid-2015 on projects including dams, railways and sugar plantations as part of a five-year industrialization plan.More than half of the financing needs to be in foreign currency. The government is “keenly aware” there is a funding gap for the plan, Guang Zhe Chen, the bank’s country director, told reporters in Ethiopia’s capital, Addis Ababa. “The government is certainly concerned about inflation, wanting to limit the budget deficit and monetary growth,” Zhe Chen said. “There is a limited scale of how much the government can really invest onall these state enterprises unless you continue to borrow from the bankingsector, which is going to again be fuelling inflation.” Ethiopia had the second-highest inflation rate in the world last year, when it peaked at over 40.6 percent, according to Addis Ababa-based research group Access Capital Sc, which pointed to a surge in external debt and Central bank lending to the government. Inflation was 36.3 percent in February, 2012. The government’s target of bringing inflation below 10 percent during the plan’s lifetime is unlikely to be achieved, said Chen. “They probably expectthey can sustain a level of inflation of 15 to 18 percent,” he said. Ethiopia’s economy grew 7 percent to 8 percent annually in the five years to July 2010, according to the International Monetary Fund. Growth may slow to 5.5 percent this year, from 7.5 percent last year, according to the IMF’s website. The availability of low-cost financing has been limited by the Euro-zone debt crisis, leading Ethiopia to borrow at higher interest rates from emerging nations such as China, India and Turkey, Chen said. The government should try to attract more direct investment from foreign companies to achieve growth without increasing inflationary pressures, Chen said.
Aba-Mebreque Affeworq Tekle: The part of Ethiopian History’
OBITUARY: The honorable Maitre Artiste World Laureate Affewerk Tekle horsenamed “Aba-Mebreque” meaning Alpha Son of Thunder (In Amharic:Affework Wolde-Negodguad) has died in the late night of 10th of April, 2011 at the age of 80 at Kadisco Hospital in Addis Ababa’ Maitre Artist Affework Tekle, Ethiopia’s world renowned painter has died in late night of10th April, 2012. The country’s much-admired artist died due to severe illness of Alcer after receiving treatment in the capital Addis Ababa, a close family, who didn’t want to be named, told a local journal Capital. The artist’s passage and funeral plans are expected to be announced laterin the day. Affewerk Tekle was born on October 22, 1932 in the old historic town of Ankobar in Shoa Province, Ethiopia, according to the artist’s official web portal. Sent to England in 1947 to become a mining engineer, Affewerk’s artistic talent was soon perceived. He was accepted at the Central School of Arts and Crafts in London and later went to the Faculty of Fine Arts of the University of London, the famous “Slade”. Whilestudying in England he made several artistic pilgrimages to Europe. On the completion of his studies he returned to Addis Ababa where he held a one-man exhibition at the Municipality Hall in 1954. It was the first significant art exhibition of post-war Ethiopia. Soon after his exhibition he left Ethiopia for a study tour in Italy, France, Spain, Portugal and Greece. In addition to these countries, he carried out various studies in England.

He also made a special study of the Ethiopian illustrated manuscripts in the British Library, the Bibliotheque Nationale in Paris and the Vatican Library, thereby gaining a deeper knowledge of his own artistic heritage. After two years of this extensive study, Affewerk, by now a well–equipped artist, returned with full confidence to his native land, to tackle the task ahead. On his arrival in Ethiopia, Affewerk opened his studio in the National Library of Ethiopia. Soon afterwards he was given his first challenging commission by the Ethiopian Government: The decoration of St. George's Cathedral, one of the capital's two most important religious edifices, where he worked on murals and mosaics for three and a half years. Affework also designed his own house, studio and gallery, known as"Villa- Alpha". He was architecturally inspired by his own cultural heritage,especially by ancient Axum, the mediaeval castles of Gondar and the old walled city of Harrar. His paintings included titles such as "Backbones of African Civilization", "African Movement", "African Atmosphere" and "African Unity", and for Expo 67 in Montreal, Canada, "Africa's Heritage" which are now in the permanent collection of the National Museum of Ethiopia. After many studies he produced over ten designs for an African Unity emblem and flag. Affewerk's internationally famous stained-glass windows confronting the visitor in the entrance of Africa Hall, the headquarters of the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA), is one of his greatest achievements. The burial service has taken place in the 14th of April, 2012 at the St. Trinity Cathedral, Addis Ababa.
The Sudanese state of Gadarif is sending an official letter of complaint to the Ethiopian government over the recent attack by armed men targetinggovernor of the Eastern Sudanese state' A Sudanese convoy led by Gedaref governor, Karam Allah Abbas, while heading to Ethiopia's Amhararegion last Sunday came under attack by Ethiopian bandits in the border area of Um Dabalo on Sudanese soil. The reason for the attack remains unclear, however sources claim the governor was in a dispute with an Ethiopia man over land before his convoy came under fire by armed men.
The governor accuses Ethiopians residing near the common border ofcarrying out multiple deadly cross border attacks against Sudanese villages and claims Ethiopian authorities are doing little to resolve the issue. He alleged that cattle rustling perpetrated across the border is commonplace.
PEN American Center named Eskinder Nega, a journalist and dissident blogger in Ethiopia, as the recipient of its 2012 PEN/Barbara Goldsmith Freedom to Write Award' Eskinder Nega Fenta, a leading advocate for press freedom and freedom of expression in Ethiopia, was arrested on September 14, 2011, and is currently being tried under the country's sweeping anti-terror legislation, which criminalizes any reporting deemed to "encourage" or "provide moral support" to groups and causes which thegovernment considers to be "terrorist." He could face the death penalty if convicted. The PEN American Center cited "The Ethiopian writer Eskinder Nega is that bravest and most admirable of writers, one who picked up his pen to write things that he knew would surely put him at grave risk, yet he did so nonetheless. And indeed he fell victim to exactly the measures he was highlighting, Ethiopia's draconian ‘'anti terrorism’ laws that criminalize critical commentary. This is at least the seventh time that the government of Meles Zenawi has detained Eskinder Nega in an effort to muzzle him. Yet Nega has continued his spirited pursuit of freedom of expression. Such humbling courage makes Nega a hugely deserving recipient of the PEN/Barbara Goldsmith Freedom to Write Award.” Eskinder Nega has been publishing articles critical of the government since1993, when he opened his first newspaper, "Ethiopis", which was soon shut down by authorities. The award, which honors international writers who have been persecuted or imprisoned for exercising or defending the right to freedom of expression, will be presented at PEN’s Annual Gala on May 1, 2012, at the American Museum of Natural History in New York City.

Jeffrey Gettleman of the "New York Times" took the top Pulitzer Prize’

Jeffrey Gettleman of the New York Times receives the top Pulitzer Prize forinternational affairs coverage, and for his reporting on famine and conflict in East Africa. He says that the Ethiopian government has been abusing the word “terrorism” and twisting the anti-terrorism law to silence dissent.

Social commentator expressed his view on Meles Zenawi’

“Prime Minister Meles is not capable of telling the truth, even when you ask him his name, he doe’s not tell you the truth.” This statement was conciously quoted in 1995 by Professor Mesfin Wold Mariam, a veteran outspoken figure four years after the rebel EPRDF’s takekover of power inEthiopia. In a brief interview he conducted with diaspora based “Hibret Radio”, Mesfin told that Mr. Meles Zenawi is someone who is incapable oftelling the truth. He quotes as recent example, several thousand ethnic-Amharas whose were unjustly uprooted from their home by the Southern Ethiopian Nation Nationalities Regional Administration president’s direct order. These Ethiopians were even turned away from the church when they sought refugee. Because they did not have any choice, they went to the office of All Ethiopian Unity Organization (AEUO). Some of the people who were uprooted with their families, including infant children, were interviewed by the VoA and other media outlets from AEUO office. To hearthe outcry of the children is heart breaking; to hear grown men sound helpless because their basic human rights and dignity was violated by a government that is supposed to protect them is equally heart breaking. Asthe news of such brutality was spreading allover the world, the ruling EPRDF and its surrogates were at work to discredit the victims and to debunk the opposition. Ato Shiferaw Shegute, the president of the region,issued a press release about a week ago stating that no one was uprootedfrom the region. His despicable lies were repeated again and again in the airwaves that the EPRDF and its surrogates control. What a shame!

Adding insult to injury, the EPRDF completely denied the illegal eviction ofthe Amharas from southern Ethiopia and blamed the opposition for “spreading mere false propaganda. I don’t know how the regime could be such arrogant and oblivious in this information age. About 17 years after Mesfin’s outstanding remark, things still remain unchanged. At least in telling lies, Mr. Zenawi’s behavior is consistent. It is not surprising that members those who serve the ruling party with loyalty display similar behavior like the party boss. Such behavior is not unique to Mr. Meles andhis cronies; such behavior is a typical character of dictators. When you examine the typical characteristics of world authoritarian regimes, you begin to see consistencies in the way that authoritarian leaders and the people who serve them rationalize their brutal action. They tell the world that their subjects are better off because "their regime has established a stable government, there is economic progress, and the opposition is controlled and influenced by foreign enemies .. and so on." Such dictators claim to believe in the basic principle of human rights protection, democracy, justice and liberty. They claim that to achieve such objectives,the culture and the behavior of their subjects must change through the divine intervention of their iron fist rule. Because they believe that they are above everything, they consistently defy public opinion, distort history, defy human decency and orchestrate lies to execute their brutal behavior and action. Some of their mode of operands is to doublespeak, deny, and blame. These are the exact behaviors that we witness in present Ethiopia, a diaspora based Radio journalist remarked. Mesfin Wolde Mariam; is an Ethiopian peace activist and sharp critic of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who has been actively engaged in a peaceful movement to bring justice, equality and peace for all the people in his country. He is a founding member of the former Ethiopian Human Rights Council (EHRICO), and later founded the Rainbow Ethiopia: Movement for Democracy and Social Justice. Mesfin Wolde Mariam has won numerous awards for his struggle for equality and justice to the disadvantaged in hiscountry. On a recent visit to Addis Ababa, Baobab attempted to set up a round table with local journalists to talk about challenges to freedom of expression in Ethiopia. All but one of the participants withdrew at the lastminute, several admitting that they were afraid of arrest. The veteran humanrights activist, Mesfin Woldemariam, did turn up to express his frustration at how Western governments friendly to Mr. Meles Zenawi areprepared to ignore his government's human-rights abuses. Mesfin was nominated for the Sakharov Prize in 2006, the highest European Union's prize for human rights defenders. Mesfin Wolde Mariam is acknowledged as one of Ethiopias great social commentators and intellectuals.

Hollywood Super Stars Will Smith and his wife Jada Pinkett Smithin Ethiopia (Tigrai Online, July 03, 2012)

Hollywood Stars Will Smith and his wife Jada Pinkett Smith were in Ethiopia this week. The American super star couples are in Ethiopia withCharity:Water to highlight the acute water shortage in the world. Charity:Water is a global none governmental organization drilling fresh water wells throughout the world. The power couple has spent few days in Tigrai State in Northern Ethiopia this week. They visited many historical places of the state and participating in a fresh water drilling project. Holly wood Stars Will Smith and his wife Jada Pinkett Smith are not strangers to charity work in Ethiopia, they gave up their birth days tosponsor fresh water well in Adi Kokeb, Shire, Tigrai in 2010. In 2012 Willand Jada Smith decided to go in person to Ethiopia.

Foreign based Ethio-Media organizations call for boycott of EthiopianAirlines’

Several Ethiopian diaspora based media organizations issued a worldwide call for an economic boycott against the ethnic oriented regime. The call was made by 12 major Ethiopian electronic and print media that was heldat a tele-conference. The tele-conference was attended by over 600 Ethiopians around the world. The worsening political repression in Ethiopiaparticularly the recent ethnic cleansing of the Amharas from southern Ethiopia, and other committed horrible crimes against Ethiopians with impunity are the main reasons. The forced displacement of tens of thousands of people in Gambela and Afar regions, and the ongoing genocide against the Ethiopian Somalilanders inhabited the Ogadien region have prompted the media groups to make a joint call for boycott.

The economic boycott particularly focuses on the Ethiopian Airlines, a source of income for the regime and other major enterprises that are sources of hard currency, but many Ethiopians still argue that the EAL should not be targetted since it carries the Ethiopian national flag aroundthe world, according to media reports. Pan Ethiopians described EAL as cash-cow for the incumbent.

The Center for Creative Leadership (CCL), ranked among the world's Top10’

Leadership education providers by the Financial Times and BusinessWeek,launches its first Africa office on May 10 2012 at the Radisson Blue Hotel, Addis Ababa. This event coincides with the World Economic Forum (WEF) on Africa, where strengthening Africa's leadership will be a central theme. Located in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, home to both the African Union and the United Nations, CCL's new office enjoys a strategic position for advancing understanding, practice and development of leadership across Africa. "CCLhas been in Africa for many years, allowing us to grasp the region's aspirations," says Rudi Plettinx, Vice President and Managing Director, CCL Africa, Europe and the Middle East (EMEA). "However, this is CCL's first base in Africa, helping us meet the rising demand for African leadership development."

Ethiopia’s Cheetahs, Wild Dogs, and Lions Get National Action Plans’

Three of Ethiopia’s large carnivores – the cheetah, wild dog, and lion – received much-needed action plans today to address future conservationof these imperiled predators, which are increasingly threatened by development and human-related activities. The plans, endorsed by Dr.

Kifle, Director General of the Ethiopian Wildlife Conservation Authority, were launched today at a press conference held today at Wildlife Rescue,Conservation, and Education Centre in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. The plans were developed during national workshops by the Ethiopian Wildlife Conservation Authority together with representatives from key NGOs, including the Wildlife Conservation Society, Zoological Society of London,Frankfurt Zoological Society, and Born Free Foundation. Representativesfrom South Sudan Wildlife Service and Kenya Wildlife Service also attended and provided advice about transboundary populations. The workshops were funded by the Wildlife Conservation Society, Howard G.

Buffet Foundation, and Zoological Society of London, while the ColumbusZoo provided additional funding to support their implementation.

On-the-ground reports from Ethiopia reveal the government is stepping upits violence against indigenous Annuaks' In past weeks, sources say the military has attacked civilians in the Gambella region and poisoned water sources, forcing thousands of Indigenous people to leave their ancestral homelands. Wild animals are dying as they drink the poisoned water. The Ethiopian government is forcibly removing some 200,000 ethnic-Annuaks from their ancestral lands and then leasing their forests and farms to foreign agro-industrial companies. Human rights organizations, including Cultural Survival, charge that Ethiopia's "land grabbing" from its own people increases poverty and hunger, even as the country continues to receive more U.S. and foreign relief aid than any other African nation.

Cultural Survival, a non-profit organization that defends the rights of Indigenous people, is asking citizens of donor nations—the United States,the United Kingdom and countries of the European Union—to take action today to urge their governments to persuade Ethiopia to halt this forced relocation program. Concerned U.S. citizens can send letters to the U.S.

State Department via Cultural Survival's website, www. culturalsurvival.org/ take-action/ The Ethiopian government's programs ofland grabbing and forced relocation of Indigenous people in the Gambella region violate Ethiopia's constitution and international human rights laws, according to Cultural Survival Executive Director, Suzanne Benally. Drivenfrom their forests, fertile river valleys, and farmlands with no compensation, Annuak families are forced into government-built villages where they have no means of survival; the promised jobs, farmland, healthcare and schools have not appeared. The relocated Annuak families must depend on the government for food aid, most of which comes from western governments. foreign companies' bulldozers are not only destroying Indigenous people's farms, they are also destroying Gambella'slast remaining forests and wetlands, even inside Gambella National Park. Now, new reports indicate that the government has deployed more than 20,000 troops to Gambella. Cultural Survival has received reports of extra-judicial killings of unarmed Annuak youth. Hundreds of young people are fleeing to neighboring South Sudan and Kenya, fearing that another genocide like the one that occurred in December, 2003 may be coming. A diaspora based human rights activist says, "the Annuaks are subjected to increased military harassment, reminding them of a similar escalation of violence that culminated in the December 2003 massacre of more than 400 Annuaks. "We are very alarmed by these reports of increasing state repression in the context of land-grabbing and forced relocation of Indigenous people," says Paula Palmer, director of Cultural Survival's Ethiopia campaign. "It is shameful that U.S. tax dollars could bedirectly or indirectly supporting such devastating human rights violations,"she says.

Rastafarians in Ethiopia face hardship in "promised land'

A ceremonial fire burns as dreadlocked Rastafarians sway to drum beats, chanting "Haile I! Selassie I!" in praise of the former Ethiopian emperor whom they uphold as God incarnate. Marijuana smoke rises from the crowd, decked out in their trademark red, gold and green -- also the colours as the Ethiopian flag -- as they celebrate the 46th anniversary thismonth of Haile Selassie's visit to Jamaica. That trip prompted an influx of Jamaican Rastafarians to the Horn of Africa state, which they believe is their promised land. But some feel Ethiopia has not measured up -- and now want change. "After the visit of Haile Selassie in 1966 in the Caribbean, the Jamaican Rastafarians started to pour in" to Ethiopia, said researcher Giulia Bonacci at the French Centre for Ethiopian Studies in thecapital Addis Ababa. When the movement emerged in the 1930s among descendants of African slaves in Jamaica, it adopted Haile Selassie as the messiah, at a time when he stood out as the only independent black monarch in Africa. They even took their name from his pre-regnal title - "Ras" for "head" and his birth name "Tafari". A supporter of decolonizationand cooperation among African states when they were still largely under European control, Emperor Haile Selassie set aside land south of the capital in the 1950s to welcome back the African diaspora. The 500-hectare (1,200-acre) plot in Shashemene, 250 kilometres (155 miles) from Addis Ababa, was offered to descendents of slaves who wanted to return "home". It is one of Africa's few Rastafarian communities and residents hold fast to their cultural mainstays: dreadlocks, vegetarian diets, reggae music and marijuana smoking. But life changed in 1974 when Emperor Haile Selassie was overthrown in a coup led by Majour Mengistu Haile Mariam whose Marxist-Leninist regime confiscated the Shashemene plot, prompting most Rastas to flee its authoritarian rule.Though only 40 hectares have been returned to the community since Meles Zenawi, now prime minister, took power in 1991, the 600 or so Rastas from the Caribbean, North America and Europe living there today are "tolerated" by the government, holding neither citizenship nor any legal right to the land. "There is an absence of a clear policy of the Ethiopian government towards the Rastafarian community, which leaves alot of its members in limbo and facing difficult legal issues," said Bonacci, who has written a book about Rastafarians settling in Ethiopia.

Inflation in Ethiopia is expected to decrease to less than 10% byNovember according to PM’

It is expected that the inflation rate will continue to decrease according tothe trend seen in March and is projected to reach single digits by November said Meles. The annual inflation rate in Ethiopia slowed to 32.5% in March from 35.3% in February according to the Central Statistics Agency. Food prices rose by 40.9% in March as compared to thesame time last year, which is lower than the 47.4% increase seen in February. Non food inflation also eased rising 20.4% year on year as compared to 21.5% the month before. Consumer prices month on month rose by 4.6% in March from 2.7% the previous month according to the report from the agency. It is to be remembered that the National Bank of Ethiopia has been engaged in efforts to stabilize the market and foreign currency exchange rate in the past seven months according to TeklewoldeAtnafu, Governor of the NBE. The Central bank has initiated a range of activities to maintain an effective financial system to contribute to the national economic growth said Teklewolde Atnafu in a performance reporthe presented to the House of Peoples Representatives (HoPR).

Further policies to supervise the amount of loans being given to the government, to regulate interest rates and bid bonds were also implemented in the reporting period noted the NBE Governor.

The former Ethiopian head of state at a security risk'

Lt. Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam, the former Ethiopian head of state, who oversaw the murder of several thousands of his countrymen during the "Red Terror" campaign could be living on the edge in Zimbabwe as hisfuture after the demise of his friend President Robert Gabriel Mugabe is uncertain. Mengitsu Haile Mariam who also known as "the Butcher of Addis" has lived in the Southern African country for the past two decades as a special guest of his close friend -Mugabe. He fled his country in 1991 to settle in Harare as the Tigre People's Liberation Front and the Eritrean People's Liberation Front surrounded Addis Ababa. At the time, the UnitedStates asked Mugabe to accept Mengistu to end the bloodshed. A few years ago Mengistu was relocated from his Harare villa to a prime farm seized by ZANU- PF in the rich Mazowe Valley. His public appearances have been next to nil. In 2006, the then opposition Movement for Democratic Change (MDC) angered the ruling Zanu PF when it hinted thatit would withdraw the protection afforded by Mugabe's government and extradite him to Ethiopia. Nelson Chamisa, who was MDC's chief spokesman said the ex leader's extradition to Ethiopia would be "high on the agenda" of the new administration. Mengistu Haile Mariam, 69, has had his fair share of troubles in Zimbabwe. It is claimed that he once advised Mugabe on security matters and according to reports, he proposed the idea of clearing slums, which was implemented as Operation"Murambatsvina" or "Operation Get rid of the filth" in 2005, and chaired security meetings at which the operation was planned. Mengitsu is said to have warned Mugabe that the swelling slum and backyard population in Zimbabwe was creating a fertile ground for a mass uprising. The United Nations later estimated that more than 700 000 people had been left homeless in the move. And while Mugabe's then administration had made light attempts to squash the reports giving credence that Megistu played akey role, diplomatic relations between the man who toppled Mengistu Halie Mariam - Meles Zenawi and the Zimbabwean coalition administrationis not clear. Now Robert Mugabe is in poor health and speculation is that ifhe dies the ex-Ethiopian president Mengistu Halie Mariam could be in trouble. An official and the Foreign Affairs Ministry told "The Africa Report"that Mengistu and his government played a pivotal role during and after the liberation struggle and extraditing him "would be a betrayal".

Ethiopia earned USD 193.5 million from the export of manufactured products in the last nine months' According to the Ministry of Industry (MoI), the revenue earned exceeded the sum earned in the same period last year by 55.9 million US dollars or 40.7%. The revenue was earned from the export of leather and leather products, agro-processing, chemicals, pharmaceuticals, textile and garment said Makonnen Manyazewal, State Minister of Industry in a presentation of the ministry'snine month performance report to the House of Peoples' Representatives(HoPR). The export earnings were only 57.8% of the target set due to a shortage in raw materials, rising costs and the limited capacity of the manufacturing industry explained Makonnen. The Ministry has provided licenses to 457 investment projects valued at ETB 64.4 billion in its continued efforts to attract, enhance and support investment in Ethiopia he noted. 392 of the total number of investment projects licensed by theindustry are owned by international investors said Makonnen.

The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church in-exile requests the United Nations to protect the historic Waldeba Monastry' The Ethiopian OrthodoxTewahedo Church (EOTC) Holy Synod in-exile appealed to the United Nations to help protect the historic Waldeba Monastery in Ethiopia. In a letter to the U.N. Secretary General Ban ki-Moon, the exiled EOTC wrote:"We hope that the United Nations, along with the rest of the internationalcommunity, do not miss an opportunity to stand by the people of Ethiopiain their effort to preserve the Waldeba Monastery, one of the nation's oldest treasures, from eventual destruction."

Tewodros Kassahun nicknamed "Teddy-Afro" dominates Ethiopian MusicScene Once Again'

Teddy Afro, the prominent Ethiopian Artist whos most songs about unity, reconciliation and harmony continues to dominate Ethiopian music scene. The much-anticipated album of all time, Teddy Afro's Tekur Sew (or Black Man), was released last week on the eve of Easter. After his second albumof 2005, Teddy released several singles, but he did not make full album.

Since the last album, the singer who played a significant role through his music on the controversies of 2005 election went through several difficulties himself. The incarceration of the great singer Tewodros Kassahun nicknamed "Teddy-Afro" whos supposed to entertain fans is unjustly imprisoned for over a yearand to subsequent sentence for running over a man with a car raised his popularity to high level. The casewas treated as politically motivated. After his release from prison, his every move made news and everything he said was quoted in almost all private publications in the country. Regardless of the actions by the publicmedia to discount him, the private media was obsessed with him and so was the public. Teddy got the title of "The King of Ethiopian Music" which previously was assigned to the legendary Tilahun Gesesse. Teddy Afro gives the media something to write and talk about now and then. Whetherhe donates money for an orphanage, holds a concert for the poor, or saves a man who was arrested in Somaliland for killing and needed 700,000 birr for bailout, he always came to save the day and put his name to a hero status. Therefore, the media is never lack of something totalk about him. Meantime, the young and gifted Ethiopian artist Tewodros Kassahun (a.k.a. Teddy Afro) might just be the one who can help introduce Ethiopian music to the world. His latest CD, which is entitled

!Tiqur Sew" Amharic meaning for "Black person", is perhaps the most anticipated, controversial and scrutinized album in Ethiopian music history. In just one week, it sold well over a million copies and took Ethiopian social media by storm. The CD has 11 tracks and includes songsarranged by the Ethio-Japanese producer, Abegaz Kibrework nicknamed "Shiwota" as well as the artist himself. Teddy Afro's music is an anthem ofmany causes and among them is black power, African pride, love, country,and relationships are some of the themes. In the title track – "Tikur Sew"

-- he pays homage to an Ethiopian famous “Battle of Adwa” and its heroEmperor Menelik II in Amharic as well as in Oromiffa. "Tikur-Sew" meaning for "Black man"music video clip. It's a wonderful piece of art, a flashback to the epic "battle of Adwa" and a reminder of the legendary heroism of our grandfathers, our greatest generation, who fought like lions for their dignity and the dignity of the land they considered sacred. Itis the story of a humble King, army and people who, moments after defeating the enemy, went down on their knees to thank their God for giving them the power to repulse an imperial army. This album is expected to cement itself not only in the heart of fans, but also in the history of the Ethiopian musical journey. Similar to African music that is now known all over the world -- Mariam Makebe and Lucky Dube of SouthAfrica and Youssou N'dour of Senegal, for example- the music of Teddy Afro is on the verge of being discovered by an international market. “Des Yemil Sekay” (Happy misery) is a wonderful dance hall track with impressive lyrics. In Africaye (My Africa), Teddy Afro offers a wonderful tribute to the continent of Africa, while in Hail (Power) he mixes powerful words of his own with those from the late playwright Laureate Tsegaye Gebremedhin's great poem Feran coupled with beautiful Ethiopian Orthodox church hymns.

The Gilgel Gibe I dam, which was constructed to generate hydro-electric power, has reportedly been filled with sediment’ A government official hasadmitted in a parliamentary hearing convened by natural resources development and environmental protection sub-committee, the Minister ofWater and Energy, Alemayehu Tegenu, and the Electric Power CorporationMihret Debebe, admitted that unless the problem is dealt with soon enough it will have political and economic ramifications. A member of the parliamentary sub-committee said that the problem is so grave that the dam administration is trying to prevent overflowing using sand-filled sacks. He added that despite consultations with the Water and Energy Minsitry, no effective solution has been sought to mitigate the problem.

Another MP also said that she saw a film at a workshop under the theme “Nile Discourse” which shows the serious effect of sedimentation on GilgelGibe I. A member of theparliamentary sub-committee said that the problem is so grave that the dam administration is trying to prevent overflowing using sand-filled sacks. He added that despite consultations with the Water and Energy Minsitry, no effective solution has been soughtto mitigate the problem. It was also revealed that there was a request to broadcast the film on ETV but the request was rejected for fear of politicaland economic backlash. She also indicated that making an effort to mitigate the problem with sacks filled with sand can rather worsen the situation. “A concerted effort needs to be done to contain the situation before the crisis gives ammunition to government critics and may also linkthe situation with the Millennium Dam Project,” she said. Gilgel Gibe I andII were constructed by Salini Construction. It is to be remembered that Gilgel Gibe II was put out of use for a long time due to defects attributed to engineering errors.

Pan-Ethiopians are questioning about the US based “Walmart” working with corrupt Ethiopian officials? According to the New York Times, the giant US retailer Company has been caught bribing Mexican officials to thetune of $24 million dollars. Bribery and partnership with ruling party- owned businesses is a must for doing business in Ethiopia. What is Walmart doing in one of the poorest countries in the world? We call on Walmart to come clean and disclose its dealings in Ethiopia. Walmart, the US multinational retailer corporation that runs chains of large discount department stores and warehouse stores, and the Ethiopian government are conducting negotiating on the question of the former entering the Ethiopian market, it was learnt. According to sources, an Ethiopian delegation was in Washington DC last week to discuss the matter with officials of Walmart. The negotiations started while Walmart got the go- ahead with its 2.2 billion dollars purchase of a controlling share in a SouthAfrican chain, Massmart, earlier in the month month.

Road Fund Office covers renovation cost of 250,000 KM’

Road Fund Office said it has solicited more than ETB 8.5 billion and covered the renovation cost of 250,000 km over the past 14 years. The Office told ENA that the office has covered renovation cost of the stated length of roads at federal, regional, woreda and town level. It said it is striving to contribute its share for the realization of the Growth and Transformation Plan (GTP). According to the office, over 751.4 million Birr was collected in the past nine months. The office had planned to collect over one billion Birr in this Ethiopian fiscal year. It has renovated close to 17,800 km of roads in regular and seasonal maintenance in the reported period. The office has earmarked over ETB 1.469 billion to renovation, road safety and capacity building works Ethiopian Road Authority, regionalrural road authority and beneficiaries of the fund. More than ETB 791.6 million of the stated sum has already been channeled to beneficiaries. Theoffice has carried out awareness education to the public and with a view to reduce the road traffic accidents.

Ethiopian Muslims Decry “Ahbashism Campaign”

Hundreds of thousands of Ethiopian Muslims have taken to the streets to protest the government’s oppression on their community and interferencein their religious affairs. “This is the first time I see Ethiopian Muslims united against their common enemy,” Temam Mohammed, one of the protestors, said. “The ‘Majlis’ leaders thought they can impose their evil policy on us by using force,” he said, referring to the Supreme Council of Islamic Affairs. Thousands of Muslims protested across the capital Addis Ababa following the Friday prayers to protest the government oppression of their community. Chanting “We want our rights” and Allahu Akbar (Godis Greatest), the protestors condemn government restrictions on their community. Protestors say the government is spearheading a campaign incollaboration with the Majlis to indoctrinate Muslims with the ideology of a sect called “Ahbash”. The government of Ethiopian Premier Meles Zenawi has put the Ahbas in charge of the religious affairs of Ethiopia’s Muslims. Muslims say the government move was in violation of the constitution, which prevents the government interference in religious affairs. Muslims also accuse the Ahbash of launching an “indoctrination program” in predominantly Muslim areas, forcing people to attend “religious training” camps or risk police interrogation and possible arrest. “They thought they can draw a line between “Sufi” and “Salafi” and fulfill the interest of Ahbash which is a deviant business motivated sect seeking to expand its empire by dividing the people,” Mohammed said. “But we were fast enough to know their hidden agenda and strengthened the brotherly bondamong the Muslim society. That is why you see this large mass coming here to demand its right.” Founded by Ethiopian-Lebanese scholar Sheikh Abdullah al-Harari, Ahbash is seen by the West as a “friendly alternative” to Wahabi ideology, which the West sees as extreme and militant. Muslimssay Ahbash imams are being brought over from Lebanon to fill the Majlis and teach Ethiopians that “Wahabis” are non-Muslims. Muslims, Christiansand Jewsh beliefs in Ethiopia have a long-standing history of living peacefully among each other. This harmony is a threat to the ruling EPRDFregime and to their longevity. The fact that the ruling EPRDF is attemptingto fight terrorism publicly while covertly trying to advance the radicalization of Ethiopian Muslims who have always practiced a moderate form of Islam. Opinions and thoughts to stand together for the religious freedom of Muslim sisters and brothers right now, but also for the religious freedom of all Ethiopians to worship and practice one’s religion without government interference. Meantime, Police killed five protesters, including an elderly scholar, in Assasa town in central Ethiopia in the ongoing Ethiopian Muslim "anti-Ahbashism" protests that have spanned 13weeks. In the Ethiopian capital on Friday prayers, major mosques of Addis Ababa and the streets were taken by a wave of protesters that chanted “We want our rights! Stop Ahbashism campaign! Allahu Akbar!!” The protestors strongly denounced the continued government interference in the religious affairs and said “We must elect our religious leaders by ourselves. The current leaders of council of Islamic Affairs should be brought to justice for what they were doing on the Muslim society”. The Ahbashism campaign was aimed at enforcing the Muslims to accept the belief of a new sect called “Ahbash”. Sources also confirmed the death of at least five Muslims in Assasa town of Arsi province in central Ethiopia.

An elderly scholar was among the dead. The number Muslims protestingagainst the government orchestrated Ahbashism campaign is increasingfrom time to time. The small protest started at “Awaliya Mosque” three months ago has spread beyond Addis Ababa and reached towns like Dessie, Dire Dawa, Harrar, Shashemene, Assela, Gondar, Alaba, Baddessa, Assasa, Chagni etc. Ethiopian Muslims angered by the heavy-handed interference of the government, staged one of the largest ralliesfollowing Friday prayers on April 27, 2012. In a move that appears designed to attract Western money and support in the name of fighting extremism, the regime of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is inflaming a Muslim population that has largely been moderate and peaceful. Lately, the regime seems to thrive on antagonizing every segment of the population, according to political commentators. For more than three months, Ethiopian Muslims have been protesting against the “Ahbashism Campaign” supposedly masterminded by the government and the Higher Council of Islamic Affairs in Ethiopia (called “Majlis” in short). The protestsusually take place on Friday after the completion of “Salatul Jum’a” (Friday Prayer). Slogans like “We want our rights! Stop Ahbashism campaign! The people want the Majlis to step down! Allahu Akbar!!” have become formal mottos of the public. The Muslims denounce the continued government interference in the religious affairs; they also highly demand an indoctrination of the mass with Ahbash ideology (called by the people “Ahbashism Campaign”) to come to an end; the right of the public to electthe leaders of the Muslim community is the third request. The small protest started at “Aweliya Islamic Institute” has now spread beyond Addis Ababa and reached the towns of Dessie, Dire Dawa, Harar, Shashemene, Assela, Adama, Jimma, Gondar, Alaba, Baddessa, Assasa, Chagni etc. These protests are largely remained peaceful. But after the government security forces killed at least seven protestors in the town of Assasa on April 27/2012), tension highly grew in the country. Although Ethiopian Muslims were shouting for their rights for about ten months, their case came to the global media only after the Gedeb-Assasa killings. According to the Muslim informants representing the majority, in July 2011, the Ethiopian Supreme Council for Islamic Affairs (popularly called “Majlisul A’ila” or “Majlis” in short) has started a country wide program aimed at amalgamating the Muslim populace according to the beliefs and doctrines of the politico-religious faction called “Association of Islamic Charitable Projects” but whom the public know as “Ahbash” (the “Abyssinians”, a term denoting Ethiopia where Sheikh Abdullah Al-Harari, the founder of the faction, was born). The program started by training theleaders of the “Majlis” committee of the districts and imams of the mosques and in the long run, according to the informants, it will encompass all Muslims of the country. They call this effort of the Majlis “the Ahbashism Campaign” and they say that it is fully supported by the government of Ethiopia. They also say that both parties (the Majlis and the government) claim that “The new campaign is undertaken to eradicatereligious extremism from the country which a radical Islamist movement called ‘Wahhabiyya’ was sowing in every direction for more than a decade”. According to the informants, the wide majority (over 85%) of theEthiopian Muslims believe “the Ahbsashism campaign” to be unconstitutional and illegal blow aimed at suppressing their religious rightsand that they are struggling to repel the campaign by their struggle whichthey call simply “Anti-Ahbashism campaign” since they see the beliefs of the Ahbash organization as a deviant and heretical one which can never fitthe thoughts of the true beliefs of Sunni Islam. Ethiopia is a country whereIslam sets its foots during the life time of prophet Muhammad. In the early years of his prophethood, when his followers were prosecuted by thepagans of Mecca, the prophet advised some of his followers to seek refuge in Ethiopia where there was a just king who didn’t oppress anyone because of his faith. Accordingly, many of his early followers, including his daughter Ruqayya and her husband the caliph Uthman ibn Affan, came to seek asylum under that pious king (called “Armah” by Ethiopian writers and “ Al-Najashi” by Muslim writers). Since then, together with Orthodox Christianity, Islam established itself as one of the two dominant religions of the country.

Most of the Muslims of Ethiopia adhere to the Shafi'i School of law, one of the four legal schools of Sunni Islam. The Hanbali School has also a wide acceptance and its adherents are growing from time to time. The Hanafi and Maliki Schools have some followers in the northern and western peripheral areas. Tension within the Muslim society is very negligible and all of the followers of the four schools strive to recruit followers in peaceful ways. Furthermore, Muslims of Ethiopia developed an exemplary tradition of peaceful co-existing with other faiths especially the Orthodox Christianity. It's unclear, whether the governmentof Meles Zenawi handles such issues ranges from the soaring inflation on to food prices to the pervasive corruption within the government, from therise of Ethiopian Muslims for their rights to the pay demands of Ethiopian teachers.

Ethiopian Airlines, the first African airline to operate the 787'

EAL has trained eight pilots on the 787 Dreamliner at the Boeing Flight Services campus located at Gatwick, London. Additional batches of trainees are conducting 787 training in the same facility. Boeing has been granted approval by the U.S. Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) to provide flight training for pilots preparing to operate the new Boeing 787. With 787 training, pilots can transition to the new airplane in five to 20 days, depending on previous pilot experience. Boeing 777 pilots can qualify to fly the 787 in as little as five days, given the high level of commonality between the two airplane types. "This is an important milestone in the history of Ethiopian Airlines," said Captain Desta Zeru, Senior Vice President of Flight Operations for Ethiopian Airlines. "Our pilotsare now qualified as the first African pilots to fly the 787. "We are proud tosupport Ethiopian Airlines as they grow their business with the 787 Dreamliner," said Roei Ganzarski, chief customer officer, Boeing Flight Services. "World class training for a world class airplane is part of the Boeing Edge we work hard to provide to our customers." The Boeing 787 flight training program uses an innovative suite of training devices including a full-flight simulator, flight training device and desktop simulation station to ensure that pilots are ready to fly the Dreamliner.

Ethiopian Airlines, one of the largest and fastest growing airlines in Africa,made its maiden international flight to Cairo in 1946. With the latest addition of new services to Seychelles, Ethiopian provides dependable services to 65 international destinations spanning four continents.

A man sets himself alight in central Addis Ababa' Eye-witnesses said that the man in his early 30s doused himself with petrol and burned himself at around 5 pm local time in front of the famousstatue of Emperor Menelik Some people who were around the shocking incident tried to put off the flame that quickly engulfed the man causing severe burns. The man reportedly refused help and cried his desire to die than living under unacceptable conditions, it was learned. The eye- witnesses said that the man was severely burned above his waist including his hair which was seared and fell off his skull. A man sets himself alight yesterday in central Addis Ababa. Eye-witnesses said that the man in his early 30s doused himself with petrol at around 5 pm local time in front of the statue of Emperor Menelik. Some people who were around the shocking incident tried to put of the fire that quickly engulfed the man causing severe burns. The man reportedly refused help and criedhis desire to die than living under unacceptable conditions, it was learned.

Local Anbassa Bank Robbed In Addis Ababa At Daylight'

Anbassa Bank Share Company Sc, whos founded by ruling-party circles asit's shareholders being robbed about ETB 5.5 million from the city's sub- Gurd Sholla branch in daytime.

Students of the Addis Ababa University who gathered to demand inquiry into the self-immolation of a young man in the capital were dispersed by police' Some students who went to Yekatit 12 Hospital to visit the burned man who is getting medical care at the hospital were also dispersed by police. One of ESAT's Addis Ababa based correspondents reported that theman was former member of the Addis Ababa Police. He was reportedly dismissed as a result of internal review due to his views and efforts to question the justice system in Ethiopia. Inspectors have interrogated the man in hospital. The Ethiopian Television (ETV) has taken film footage of the person while getting medical attention in hospital. A reliable source told ESAT that members of the security and police have been harassing his friends in order to prevent the news from spreading. Some members of the Federal Police have been raising money to help the man, it was learnt.

Revelation: As junk food replaces traditional menu, obesity and diabetesbecoming more common'

Ethiopian Falashas women who have immigrated to Israel have integratedcheaper junk food into their diet at the expense of their traditional dishes,leading to obesity, osteoporosis and other chronic metabolic disease, according to a new study. Researchers at The Hebrew University of Jerusalem followed a group of Ethiopians who have been living in Israel for at least 14 years to examine how they were impacted by their exposure to a Western lifestyle and Israeli eating habits. Their study, published in the journal "Nutrition", showed that their consumption of dairy products, fruits and vegetables was negligible, while their intake of simple sugars was high. "They were not making a lot of wise food choicesand eating a lot of empty calories," said Aliza Stark from the Institute of Biochemistry, Food Science and Nutrition at the university's Faculty of Agriculture, who oversaw the research. "Their diet in Ethiopia had more whole grain and legumes. Coming to Israel they were more likely to incorporate hot dogs, hamburgers and so forth, which may be tastier, than to start incorporating fruits and vegetables." The study analyzed just53 women, but researchers said the group reflects the demography of Ethiopian immigrant families who were generally from low socio-economicstrata, have low levels of education and live in small apartments.

Ethiopia confers Honorary Citizenship on Dr. Catherine Hamlin'

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi vested an honorary citizenship of Ethiopia on Founder and Owner of the Fistula Hospital, Dr Catherine Hamlin in recognition of her outstanding humanitarian services she provided to fistula patients. Prime Minister Meles vested the honorary citizenship at a ceremony held at the Office of the Prime Minister. The premier told Dr. Hamlin was awarded the citizenship for serving the fistulapatients for more than five decades by establishing a fistula hospital in thecountry. Meles gave Dr. Hamlin Ethiopian passport and certificate of honorary citizenship during the ceremony. He said Dr. Hamlin has been able to rescue thousands of fistula patients which is very much commendable. Speaking on her part, Dr. Hamlin said "Although I was not born in Ethiopia, I love the country very much. "She said she was very happy to be given the honorary citizenship in recognition of her humanitarian services. It has to be recalled that Dr. Catherine Hamlin firstarrived to Ethiopia employed by the government as Chief Nurse of then Leui'lt Tsehay Haile Selassie nurse's nursing school in 1959.

The U.S.-based Genocide Prevention Advisory Network lists Ethiopiainstable'

Genocide Prevention Advisory Network lists Ethiopia recently as a countrythat is facing high risk of instability.

Inaddition to the existing massmedia and press proclamation number of 590/2000, a controversial printing service agreement that "Berhanena Selam Printing House" requested newspaper publishers to sign a standardpublishing agreement has sparked controversy' The Draft Printing Contract Agreement that Berhanena Selam, the biggest publishing house and which has a market monopoly in newspaper publishing, is insisting that the publishers sign puts in place "Censorship", the publishers fear.

The printing house has given itself a right to review newspapers beforepublication and can cancel orders if it deems any content to have legalconsequences or illegal. But the newspapers publishers have been protesting the new agreement and refused to sign.

Eritrea's president Issaias Affeworki as underscores' In a brief interview he conducted with the national media outlets, the neighbouring Eritrea's president Issaias Affe-worki underscored that the recent rumor regarding his state of health attests to the mounting frustration on the part of its authors. Explaining that in the past week he had been abroad on a 3-day working visit, and that upon return home he has been on a tour of inspection to Gash-Barka, Anseba and the Northern Red Sea regions from 21 to 22 April, the President said: "I am lucky; I enjoy robust health. The speculated ill-health is only in the minds of the authors of such a baseless rumor." Elaborating that the issue has nothing to do with his health status but designed to create anxiety among members of the public, President Issaias pointed out that it is but a continuation of the coordinated psychological warfare and anti-Eritrea smear campaign that has been going on for the past decade under variousguises. He further indicated that the fabricated ploy was concocted at a time when the nation is registering impressive development stride, coupled with the mounting popular resistance, and that the recent enemy speculation is intended to put their frustration on others.

State controlled Ethiopian News Agency Reports'

ENA reports that several employees, including Pakistani nationals, workingfor Al-Amoudi in the southwestern Ethiopian region of Gambella have beenkilled and wounded by an armed group' The gunmen attacked the camp ofan agricultural company owned by a Saudi billionaire Al Amoudi in southwest Ethiopia, killing at least four Ethiopians and a Pakistani, employees and were injured eight others at the Saudi Star Agricultural Business Headquarters in Gambellla Regional State The assault was took place on Saudi Star Agricultural Development Plc's premises in the Abobo area of Gambella region. Ethiopia's regime plans to lease out 42 percent of South Sudan-bordering Gambella to investors as part of a nationwide commercial farming drive. The U.S.-based advocacy group Oakland Institute says the program has led to rights violations and the forced relocation of more than a million Ethiopians. The government denies rightsviolations and says a resettlement program is voluntary. Opponents of the relocation and farming program shot and killed 19 students on a bus 20 kilometers (12 miles) from Gambella town on March 12, 2012 according tothe state-owned Ethiopian News Agency. There is "suspicion" that the same group carried out the recent attack. Saudi Star Agricultural Development PLC, which is owned by the Ethiopian-born Saudi billionaire, said in the earlier month that it wants to add another 290,000 hectares to the 10,000 hectares it intends to grow rice on in Gambella largely for export to Saudi Arabia. The Ethio-Saudi investor has been able to dominate every thing in Ethiopia because he is being back up by the rulig eltes. It's widely known that over 40 MIDROC-Group of companies owned by the weathy Ethio-Saudi investor Sheikh Dr. Mohammed Hussein Al- Amoud are currently operating in Ethiopia. The following over 40 sister companies are currently operating under Mohammed International Development & Research Organizations Company i.e. MIDROC-Ethiopia - (1) Addis Gas and Plastics Factory PLC (2) Addis Home Depot PLC (3) Addis International Catering PLC (4) Blue Nile P.P. & Craft Paper Bags Manufacturing PLC (5) Cabey PLC (6) Daylight Applied Technologies PLC

(7) East-West Ethio-Transport PLC (8) Elfora Agro-Industries PLC (9) Lame Dairy PLC (10) MAMCO Paper Products Factory PLC (11) MIDROC- Construction Ethiopia PLC (12) MIDROC-Energy House Electro-Mechanical Services PLC (13) MIDROC-Ethiopia PLC (14) MIDROC-Ethiopia Tecnology Group PLC (15) MIDROC-Foundation Specialist PLC (16) MIDROC-Gold PLC
(17) Modern Building Industries PLC (18) Moha Soft Drinks Industry SC
(19) Mugad Travel PLC (20) National Mining Corporation (NMC) (21) National Motors Corporation (NMC) PLC (22) National Oil Company of Ethiopia (NOC) PLC (23) Pharmacure PLC (24), Rainbow Exclusive Car Rental and Tour Services PLC (25), Salaam Health Care PLC (26) Saudi Star Agricultural Development PLC (27) Sheraton Addis (28) Star Soap and Detergent Industries PLC (29) Summit Engineered PLC (30) Trans- National Airways PLC (31) Trust Protection & Personnel Services PLC (32), United Auto Maintenance Services PLC (33), Unity University PLC (34), Unlimited Packaging PLC (35) Wanza Furnishing Industries PLC (36) Equatorial Business Group (EBG) PLC (37) Ethio Agri-Ceft PLC (38) Ethio Leather Industry PLC (ELICO) (39) Huda Real Estate PLC (40), Kebire Enterprise PLC (41) Kombolcha Steel Products Industries PLC.
A 40 member South African tour group arrived here to explore the fascinating tourist attraction sites of Ethiopia’ The group comprises the famous Ethiopian super model Hanna Getaneh, journalists and editors offamous magazines in South Africa, which have reputable record of supporting tourism not only in Ethiopia but also in Africa. During its four-day stay here, the group will visit tourist sites in Amhara State and also Bishoftu Town of Oromia State. The visit was organized in collaboration with the Ethiopian Airlines, the Ministry of Culture and Tourism as well asKuriftu Resort.

Ethiopia Kenya vow to save endangered grevy Zebra’

Conservation experts from Ethiopia and Kenya have drawn a roadmap forensuring the survival of an endangered type of Zebra. The experts from areas inhabited by endangered Grevy’s Zebra have developed a national action plan to guide efforts to ensure the survival of the Grevy’s Zebra whose five-year strategy exp red in the previous year. The meeting convened by Kenya Wildlife Service(KWS) with support from stakeholders was held at the Sportsman’s ArmsHotel in Nanyuki, Kenya. Participants were drawn from government, NGOs, local community, private land owners, people with interest in Grevy’s Zebra conservation and officials from the Ethiopia Wildlife Conservation Authority. The Grevy’s Zebra population has been declining from an estimated 15,000 in the late 1970s to current 2,400.

Dubai eye specialists confer gift of sight to hundreds’

More than 250 people from Ethiopia have been given a chance to see again thanks to Noor Dubai Foundation's third mobile eye camp. The eight-day camp, which began on April 26, has successfully conducted hundreds of sight-saving operations in the main city of the Silt'e region in Worabe, Ethiopia. Ethiopia, the second-most populous nation in Africa with82 million people, has around 1.2 million blind people and 2.8 million people with low vision. Around nine million children aged one to nine haveactive trachoma, an infectious disease that leads to blindness. At the latest count, more than 6,700 patients have been screened. Most patients were treated for cataract extraction and intraocular lens implantation. "The eight-day series of intensive operations to cure blindness in people suffering from cataracts and other causes of reversible blindness in Ethiopia was conducted in collaboration with international partners and supported by the Dubai Islamic Bank Foundation," chairman of The Noor Dubai Foundation, said.

Kenyan security minister appeared to blame neighbouring Ethiopia and Somalia for the cross border attacks experienced in the common borders’ The honorable George Saitoti said the presence of many illicit firearms andlight weapons has been a great source of insecurity along the common border and the interior parts of the countries. Kenya, Ethiopia and Somaliashare a common border. The minister said Kenya's efforts to disarm communities living along the borders have not yielded desired results due to 'lack of concerted efforts from all the countries in the region'. "There is a need to explore ways of harmonising our disarmament programme and the respective policing policies," Saitoti said at the 26th Ethio-Kenyan jointborder commissioners and administrators meeting in Mombasa. There have been incidences of Ethiopian Merile community invading Kenya and attacking the Turkana community. The latest was in April 16, 2012 when Merile bandits attacked an administration police camp in Todonyang killingthree officers and injuring five others. George Saitoti said Ethiopia and Kenya should deploy neutral a professional police force to the border as opposed to arming private citizens. "This way, the attackers will be dealt with expeditiously by the neutral forces," Saitoti said.

Defense troops opened fire on a group of terrified Annuak civilians, killingtwo students'

In Pokedi Village of the Gambella region, Defense troops opened fire on a group of terrified Annuak civilians, killing two students namely Zewudu Ochorjoo and Opiew Ojulu; a teacher, Mr. Obang Ochang and two local Annuak police officers names Owar Oman and Okung Oman. This is exactly what predicted would happen in "Saudi Star Pakistani Foreign Workers and Ethiopians Killed in Raid on Saudi Farm Compound—BelievedRelated to Land." The incident occurred only sixteen miles from last week's killing of ten workers at Saudi Star Agricultural Development PLC, a 10,000 hectare rice plantation owned by Saudi-Ethiopian businessman, Shekh Mohammed Al Amoudi, a staunch ruling party and government-supporter.TPLF/EPRDF defense forces would in turn target innocent Annuak civilians, supposedly of the same ethnicity as the suspected assailants, as a means to collectively punish all Annuaks. As the TPLF/EPRDF government tries to force the Annuaks to come out to promote the appearance of peace in the region in order to pacify the investors, rallies for other reasons would be outlawed. For example, it would be against the TPLF/ EPRDF law for the Annuaks, other indigenous people in Gambella or Ethiopians in general to rally against the land grabsand in support of indigenous land rights. The TPLF/ERPDF would never tolerate a rally that condemned TPLF/ERPDF-sponsored human rights violations and called them to account for crimes committed. Neither wouldthey allow a public demonstration in opposition to the villagization schemes where many Annuaks and other Ethiopians have been forced off their land into resettlement camps without services or adequate land and water. The TPLF/ERPDF wants the Annuaks to condemn the killing of the workers but to be silent on the killing of Annuak or anyone else.

Government officials who recently assessed the Gambella and Benishangul-Gumuz regions to evaluate the atmosphere for development and investors. The team was made up of Addisu Legesse, the former Deputy Prime Minister under Meles, who is now the Chairman of the Boardto a group designated to support what they call the "Backward regions" meaning the Gambella, Benishangul-Gumuz and the Afar regions; and, Tsegaye Berhe, the former president of the Tigrai regional state, who is now the national security advisor to the PM. Both were in Gambella in May, 2012. They identified security and stability as being the major roadblocks to development in the region. The vice president of the Gambella region also said the same thing. Their findings in the Benishangul-Gumuz region were different. They assessed the major obstacles to development as being ineffectiveness and inefficiency. Their conclusions were reported on government-sponsored websites. What some have been saying all along was confirmed—that nothing has changed in the Gambella region and that as a result, instability and insecurity in the region are increasing. It passes a classic message, according to commentators, simply forcing submission and silence will notalleviate the rising tensions, but will instead exacerbate them.

A report forecasting increasing hunger in parts of Ethiopia in the next fewdecades makes agonizing reading for a proud people eager to see their nation's reputation for human misery banished’

A surging population – the current population of 90.9 million will doubleover 22 years at the current 3.2 per-cent growth rate – combined with drier, hotter weather "could dramatically increase the number of at-riskpeople in Ethiopia during the next 20 years," according to the Famine Early Warning Systems Network study. The findings follow the Horn of Africa's worst drought in six decades, which left 4.6 million Ethiopians needing emergency assistance last year. Another 7.4 million are classifiedas "chronically food insecure" by donors. Harvests and pastures are already suffering because rainfall during Ethiopia's two wet seasons has declined 15 to 20 percent over the last 35 years.

National Press Club (NPC) of the United States has voiced its strong concern over the expected imminent sentencing of imprisoned Ethiopian journalist Eskinder Nega, who is accused of violating the country's draconian ‘Anti-Terrorism Law’ as a result of his high-profile advocacy of press freedom in the country’

The sentencing of Nega could come as soon.There is the chance he could be sentenced to death or ordered to spend 15 to 20 years behind bars under Ethiopia's 2009 Anti-Terrorism Proclamation. Nega has been imprisoned since September, 2012 after he posted an online column that called to account the Ethiopian government for its arrest of dissidents, use of torture in prisons and denial of freedom of expression rights. Nega after writing an article discussing the implications of the Arab Spring uprising for democracy in Ethiopia. He has been jailed on at least seven different occasions in the last 20 years. "When other journalists fled the Ethiopian government's crackdown on thepress, Eskinder Nega stayed and he courageously used his Internet platform to bring much-needed attention to government wrongdoing and abuse," Natitional Press Club President Theresa Werner said. "We call upon the government of PM Meles Zenawi to promptly release Nega and tocease its authoritarian persecution of journalists."

Journalists and human rights advocates around the world have called for the release of Eskinder Nega, who was honored with the PEN/Barbara Goldsmith Freedom to Write Award. The National Press Club, based in Washington, D.C., is the world's leading professional organization for journalists. The NPC represents more than 3,200 members worldwide representing every majornews organization. The Club was founded in 1908.

The state-owned Commercial Bank of Ethiopia (CBE), said it will open more branches in the main towns of South Sudan including one in UpperNile State going operational in the next few weeks’

The Ethiopian Central Bank, National Bank of Ethiopia (NBE) was granted regulatory approval by the South Sudan government in January 2009 andshortly after it opened a branch in Juba under the name CBE-Southern Sudan Ltd. with an initial capital of 15 million US dollars. Many foreign financial firms entered the region following the 2005 Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) that brought an end to over two decades of civil war between Sudan and South Sudan. Foreign banks dominate the banking industry in South Sudan. Before the country gained independence, there was only one bank operating to the 9 million estimated population of South Sudan. Based in Juba town, CBE-Southern Sudan Ltd. has over 4,000 depositors most of them Ethiopians, Sudaneseand Eritreans.

Aid activist and Irish pop star Sir Bob Geldof urged Ethiopian PM Meles Zenawi to be more inclusive and tolerant of civil society groups' "If they keep saying 'you can't write anything critical,' they're in trouble," Sir Geldof told AFP. "Have them participate, allow the pressure valve to comeoff," he added. He said Ethiopia must follow the example of Western nations, which developed only with greater freedom of expression. UnlessEthiopia becomes more tolerant, he cautioned, it could reverse recent economic and social progress. "It will stumble if they don't bring their people into the argument," he warned, adding that Meles is a "very intelligent leader who truly understands government." Rights groups havecriticized Ethiopia for using its anti-terrorism legislation to stifle peaceful dissent and restrict freedom of the press. Close to 200 people were arrested under the law in 2011. Sir Geldof said Ethiopia's system of federalism had bred dissent throughout the country, but warned that opposition activity could become a political threat if they are not offered avoice in national politics. "You cannot stifle people's voices. If it became more inclusive, if argument was allowed if the country -- if civil society is allowed to breathe -- then you would see a reduction in all this independence activity," he said. "One way or another, civil society will win. They will win, there's more of them, and people will breathe." He wasin the Ethiopian capital for the World Economic Forum. Ahead of the week's G8 summit at Camp David, Maryland, the musician and global poverty campaigner Sir Bob Geldof has returned to Ethiopia to highlight the issue of famine and climate change – 28 years after his charity appeals first made world headlines. The singer said G8 leaders have failedto adhere to aid targets set at the Gleneagles summit in 2005.It's widely recalled that Sir Bob Geldof led a "Band Aid" campaign to raise over USD100 million dollar for Ethiopian famine victims in the mid-1980s.

A top Ethiopian Orthodox Church leader has called on Ethiopians to join hands with their Muslim brethren in protest against the Meles Zenawi tyrannical regime' His Imminence Abune Melke-Tsadik, senior member ofthe Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church (EOTC) synod in-exile, told our Muslim brothers have been subjected to long-standing government repression. They have been enduring religious persecution in their own country. We have to unite in purpose and struggle together against the regime, the religious father told a news conference in Washington, DC. The Qatari-based global TV power broadcasts the Holy Synod message ofsolidarity with the protesting Ethiopian Muslim brethren. Aljazeera also includes the pro-democracy movement of the Ethiopian Diaspora.

Prominent religious leaders, scholars, humanrights activists are calling on all Ethiopians to join hands in the protest against the ethnic-oriented regime. Aba Filipos, Dr. Aklog Birara, Ahmed Ali Nur & activist

Tamagne Beyene, respectively, went on ESAT Radio and made a call for an Ethiopians protest against the regime that has deliberately disintegrated the nation along ethnic lines, while chocking the economic and political lifeof the Ethiopian people. Meantime, President Barack Obama urged to disinvite Meles Zenawi from G-8 Summit. “Remove Meles Zenawi from G-8 summit” amplified protesters, saying since he comes to power in May, 1991 by rebel insurgency, the government of Meles Zenawi turned out tobe worse than his brutal predecessor, he ousted back in May, 1991.

President Obama needs to stop supporting African dictators. Obama’s victory raised great excitement, hope and pride for the people of Africa. Unfortunately, his invitation of one of Africa's worst dictator, Meles Zenawiof Ethiopia to Camp David on May 18, 2012 dashed any hopes for Obama's redemption as a friend of Africa or pro human rights stand in thecontinent. As a Nobel Peace Prize winner, he was supposed to stand with the oppressed not with the oppressor. Like previous U.S. presidents he has decided to show a blind eye towards African dictators in the pretext offighting terrorism. In reality many African dictators are terrorizing their own people; in particular, Dictator Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia has been known to engage in extra-judicial killing, genocide, unlawful imprisonmentof journalists like Eskinder Nega and other political activists. It’s wel known that Meles Zenawi has committed enormous crimes, including crimes against humanity, genocide as well as practices of ethnic- apartheid, the Obama administration has cynically betrayed the people of Ethiopia by inviting Meles Zenawi to Camp David. Meles Zenawi has arrested, tortured and brutalized thousands, including journalists and political opponents; he has stolen many elections; he has gunned down over 193 innocent civilians who protested electoral fraud; he has massacred civilians in Gambella, Ogaden, Afar and Oromia. He is a war criminal that should be hauled before the International Criminal Court (ICC) in the Hague. Inviting a tyrant to a summit of the G-8 stature is regarded by Ethiopians and all other peace-loving peoples as an insult on the conscience of humanity, according to organizers of the pending protests.

Berklee College of Music Honored Ethiopia’s Musical Legend’

The legendary musical arranger Mulatu Astatque receives Honorary Doctorof Music Degree .The Berklee College of Music in Boston, Massachusets has honored the influential Ethiopian musician Mulatu Astatque. In his commencement address during the occasion, Mulatu, Berklee's first African graduate, thanked the college for opening doors for musicians from developing nations. Mulatu Astatque is an Ethiopian musician and arranger best known as the father of “Ethio-jazz”, he born in the western Ethiopian city of Jimma. Mulatu was musically trained in London, New YorkCity, and Boston where he combined his jazz and Latin music interests with traditional Ethiopian music. Mulatu Astatque led his band while playing vibraphone and conga drums—instruments that he introduced intoEthiopian popular music—as well as other percussion instruments, keyboards and organ. His albums focus primarily on instrumental music, and Astatque appears on all three known albums of instrumentals that were released during Ethiopia's golden musical years of the 1970s.

A Worldwide tele-conference on establishing Ethiopian National Transitional Council carried out' Chapters of the Ethiopian National Transitional Council (ENTC) Steering Committee will hold a joint electronictown hall meeting. Representatives of each chapter will discuss preparation of Ethiopians in European countries for the people's congress to be held in Dallas, Texas, commencing 28th June, 2012. The City of Dallas, Texas, selected to host the Council's founding convention, which will start on early July. The teleconference is also intended to create awareness about the purpose of establishing a national transitional council, and how any one can participate.

Conversation at the World Economic Forum in Addis Ababa was routine until the floor was opened for questions' A young South African woman stood up to ask a question that many had pondered, but few dared to pose."Good day. My name is Gobano Madnamaraso," she said. "When ourleaders are young most of them were visionaries. They have wonderful visions for our continent. They are admirable. They speak good, they do good. But something happens to them once they are seated in those chairs of power. My question is: We want to see our continent change, butwe are afraid of this power that corrupts even some of the best, most admirable leaders on our continent, and what is this poison that happens in these chairs of power and how can we prevent it? " But perhaps just asfrank as the question was the reply. Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi pointed to greedy foreign corporations as a main driver of corruption. "What is the poison that leaders face when you go to national palaces, and transforms people with vision sometimes into ordinary thieves? Let's start with the total amount of loot in Africa, and what our role as leaders in that loot[ing] is," said Meles. "The vast majority of the loot[ing] is done by properly organized companies through all sorts of accounting gimmicks." Meles said African leaders are forced to be facilitators for foreign companies who demand favors in return for their investment that might means jobs for their people. "It's a difficult thing tomanage because our bargaining cards are very limited," he said. "We need these companies to create jobs, in order for them to come to Africa. The image is very negative, so the risk is artificially spiked. And if the riskis artificially spiked, the return has to be commensurate with the risk. Andso it's difficult to attract them without extraordinary returns." The Ethiopian leader said that sometimes leaders give in to temptation. "Sometimes we facilitate without being paid," he said. "At other times we say, 'Okay, if your family's farm is being looted, why not join in?' I think that is the most insidious form of corruption. It affects everybody, including those whose hands are not in the till."

'TPLF is downsized to a single-family party' – A TPLF veteran'

A TPLF veteran told TPLF is no more exists today in the fashion that we used to know it years ago," said Seeye Abraha. He further noted, "the present socio-economic situation in Ethiopia is in the same state of expose with the final days of the military government of Lt. Colonel Mengistu Haile-Mariam, characterized by exorbitant cost of living and deepening public discontent. In a country where inflation is soaring over 30%, corruption has become the order of the day." Seeye admittes that "TPLF no more exists today in the fashion that we used to know it years ago" isa clear evidence that the criminal mercenary clique, that he was once a part of, has dissipated as organization and replaced, as the headline suggested, by a single family party of Meles and Azeb Mesfin, his wife.

The original mission of the organization was not clear to the Ethiopian people outside Tigray because the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF) was an ethnic based organization that sought for autonomous rights or, as the TPLF Manifesto exposed, an independent "Greater Tigrai".However, the power vacuum of May, 1991 invited the minority clique to power and, once in power it appears as though, the underlined mission became murky or, as Seeye claims, nonexistent.

Malaria is one of the leading public health problems in most of sub- Saharan Africa, particularly in Ethiopia' Almost all demographic groups areat risk of Malaria because of seasonal and unstable transmission of the disease. Therefore, there is a need to develop malaria early-warning systems to enhance public health decision making for control and prevention of malaria epidemics. Data from orbiting earth-observing sensors can monitor environmental risk factors that trigger malaria epidemics. Remotely sensed environmental indicators were used to examine the influences of climatic and environmental variability on temporal patterns of malaria cases in the Amhara region of Ethiopia. Methods: In this study seasonal auto regressive integrated moving average (SARIMA) models were used to quantify the relationship between malaria cases and remotely sensed environmental variables, including rainfall, land-surface temperature (LST), vegetation indices (NDVI and EVI), and actual evapo transpiration (ETa) with lags ranging from one to three months. Predictions from the best model with environmental variables were compared to the actual observations from the last 12 months of the time series. Results: Malaria cases exhibited positive associations with LST at a lag of one month and positive associations with indicators of moisture (rainfall, EVI and ETa) at lags from one to three months. SARIMA models that included these environmental covariates hadbetter fits and more accurate predictions, as evidenced by lower AIC and RMSE values, than models without environmental covariates. Conclusions:Malaria risk indicators such as satellite-based rainfall estimates, LST, EVI, and ETa exhibited significant lagged associations with malaria cases in theAmhara region and improved model fit and prediction accuracy. These variables can be monitored frequently and extensively across large geographic areas using data from earth-observing sensors to support public health decisions.

The exiled Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church (EOTC) Holy Synod meeting is convened in Washington DC's St. Gabriel Church' The Patriarch, His Holiness Abune Merkorios, secretary of the Synod, Abune Melke- Tsedik, and archbishops and priests from several countries around theworld are participating in the meeting. The Holy Synod is expected to make several important decisions on various issues related to the HolyChurch and the country. The Holy Synod has scheduled a press conference which will be broadcast live.

Ethiopia's Appeal for the International Community'

Ethiopia reported that it's two main refugee camps for people fleeing Sudan's Blue Nile state now housed at 29,494 refugees. The camps arelocated at Tongo and Sherkole.

Ethiopian security forces arrested ten Merille tribal militia fighters who areaccused of murdering three Kenyan policemen' The men participated in a raid on a Kenyan police camp in April. The Merille people have been fighting with the Turkana people. Both tribes are pastoralists. The tribes have clashed over water rights. Both tribes conduct cattle raids (mass theft of cattle herds). The Kenyan and Ethiopian government are trying toend the violence. Kenya recently arrested two Kenyan men for smuggling weapons to the Turkana.

Ethiopia will be one of four African countries attending the G8 summitlater this month'

The Prime Minister of Ethiopia, Meles Zenawi, and the leaders of Ghana, Tanzania, and Benin will discuss food security issues with the G8 leaders.

Djiboutian peacekeepers have deployed near Beledweine in centralSomalia'

The Djibouti contingent will secure an area north of the town. Ethiopian and pro-Somali government forces attack and clear an area of Al Shabaabfighters. African Union peacekeeping units then deploy into the liberated zone.

A senior Ethiopian opposition political figure told that Ethiopia must endtribal politics'

An opposition leader said "Ethiopia has only two tribes: the rich and thepoor".

A United Nations humanitarian official praised the Ethiopian Government for it's innovative and effective efforts to build resilience and food self- sufficiency amid increasingly challenging climatic conditions'

"Ethiopia hasmade quite incredible advances in mitigating the impact of drought," saidthe Operations Director at the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), John Ging, in a news release following a two-day visit to Ethiopia. "Multi-year investments in safety nets and significant advances in health and nutrition have saved countless lives andprotected millions from the famine experienced elsewhere in the Horn of Africa," he said, adding that "the successful policies pursued by the Ethiopian Government provide an invaluable experience to share, not just elsewhere in the Horn of Africa, but also across the drought-ridden Sahel."Meantime, the delay in long rains in North-Eastern Ethiopia is likely to affect food security in the region, which produces nearly half of the region's food needs, according to an assessment carried out by UN agencies. Despite the improvement in mid February to May, rains in the second half of the season is supporting new agricultural activities – including preparation of land for the June to September crops – in parts ofsouthern and north-eastern Ethiopia. The Southern and Eastern Nationalities (SNNPR) and Oromia, southern Tigray, eastern Amhara and north-eastern Afar, the overall delay in the rains means that many farmers have opted to plant short-cycle crops, rather than longer- maturing crops in order to have two harvests within the year. The harvest,which accounts for up to 40 per cent of annual production in some areas, is expected to be much reduced as a result, leading to growing food insecurity in dependent areas, the UN Humanitarian Office (UNOCHA) said. The geography of life-threatening food insecurity canvasses the peripheral southern regional states such as, the Southern Nations and Nationalities, Oromia, and the Ogaden-Somali. Ironically these south Ethiopia's regions are the greenest and the most fertile. They are simultaneously the scenes of ongoing low-intensity armed conflicts between the government of Ethiopia and the Oromo Liberation Front in Oromia, the Sidama Liberation Front in the SNNP, the Ogaden Liberation Front in the Ogaden and the Afar Liberation Front in Afar. The Horn of Africa experienced a food crisis last year that left an estimated 13 million people dependent on humanitarian assistance. Currently there are 15 million people facing food insecurity in Africa's Sahel region, which stretches from the Atlantic Ocean to the Red Sea.

Ethiopian government has dismissed reports'

GoE has dismissed reports of violence in the country's southwestern region that allegedly forced civilians flee into South Sudan's Jonglei State.A new humanitarian report released by the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) said that hundreds of ethnic Annuak Ethiopians have crossed into South Sudan to escape an alleged hostility between the government forces and little known Annuak opposition forces in the horn of Africa country's Gambella region. The Ethiopian government has dismissed the reported clashes between government forces and Anuak insurgents that allegedly occurred during the past few weeks. "There wasn't such an incident. Our forces didn't engage in any clash with whatsoever opposition force in the reported vicinity" Ethiopian government spokesperson, Shimeles Kemal, told SudanTribune. Kemal said the reports - which originally were published in OCHA's Weekly Humanitarian Bulletin 4-10 May 2012 - are "unfounded" and further termed them as "white propaganda". According to the Ethiopian official, the areas in question are quite peaceful and there wereno grounds for the Annuaks to flee to neighbouring South Sudan.

However, he said that people residing along the shared Ethio-South Sudanborder move frequently between the two territories for trade and other purposes. In the past, there were few reports that an Annuak armed group had been launching small-scale attacks from South Sudan, while it was still part of Sudan, targeting government forces and partly non- Annuak civilians as well. The Ethiopian government argues that currently there exists no active Annuak opposition force operating in the region. A recent UN report asserted that Annuak tribal civilians had fled fighting between Ethiopian security forces and Annuak armed rebels in Ethiopia's Gambella region (western Ethiopia, bordering on South Sudan's Jonglei state).

Ethiopian troops and pro-Somali government forces killed 17 Al-Shabaabfighters'

The Al Shabaab fighters had been operating road blocks in the Bakool region. The official statement did not specify where the Ethiopian-led attacks occurred, but an Al Shabaab spokesman said that its fighters hadengaged Ethiopian forces near the town of Hudur.

Ethiopian commander of the United Nations Interim Security Force for Abyei (UNISFA) confirmed South Sudan had pulled all of its forces out of the region' Abyei is claimed by both Sudan and South Sudan.

Ethiopia hasnow deployed 3,716 soldiers with the United Nations Interim Security Force for Abyei (UNISFA) on the Sudan-South Sudan border. Another 83 Ethiopian military observers are also serving with the force. UNISFA has an authorized maximum force of 4,200 military personnel.

Ethiopian troops fighting the Al-Qaida-linked militants in neighboringSomalia will soon be at home' Ethiopia's prime minister Meles Zenawi told a parliamentary session, regions of Somalia currently controlled by Ethiopian forces will be handedover to troops from Burundi, Kenya, Djibouti and Rwanda. The first threecountries have troops in Somalia as part of the African Union Peace keeping force. Rwanda does not currently have troops in Somalia.

Ethiopian troops moved into Somalia at the beginning of the year, Meles said the mission has accomplished "very good results" in fighting the Al- Shabab militants. He did not provide a timeline for such a withdrawal and handover. "The aim of our involvement was to aide the (Somali) transitional government and help weaken the Al-Shabab insurgents. And ithas been successful," Meles told the country's parliament. Meles said Ethiopian forces have met little military resistance in Somalia, although Al-Shabab has claimed to have carried out several deadly attacks against theEthiopian troops. He also told parliament that Ethiopia would not become involved in a war with archrival Eritrea, saying "Eritrea is too weak to launch military offensives against Ethiopia". It has to be recalled that in earlier month Ethiopian troops were moved into neighboring Eritrea and attacked three military training camps in response to militant attacks on tourists inside Ethiopia. Military analysts firmly believe that the invading Ethiopian troops were lost about 12, 535 soldiers in either being killed or disappearances during the war against the Islamic Courts Union (ICU) andahead with the current Al-Shabab militants since deployed in Somalia in September, 2006.

President of the Ethiopian Islamic Affairs Supreme Council Sheikh Ahmedin Abdullahi Chule has reportedly sought protection from the government' Sources say that the Sheikh now lives in a house assigned tohim by the government. Since Muslims in Addis Ababa and other regions have started protesting the Al-Ahbash Muslim sect chosen by the government and imposed through the Supreme Council, Sheik Amedhin has moved out of his home near piazza Banian mosque. The supreme council's chief has reportedly been sheltered in a villa around a barrack owned by the armed forces and which was previously occupied by the former Minister of Education Guenet Zewdie. The villa enjoys 24 hours security protection. The Sheikh is blamed for conniving with the Ethiopiangovernment to impose the Al-Ahabash sect on the Muslim community.

Though he the Sheikh was said to tender resignation within two months,he is being guarded by the security agents to safeguard his wellbeing.

Ethiopia Urges Foreign Investment In Railways'

Ethiopia has called for more foreign investment into the country's railways, as it plans to build a railway network of nearly 6,000 kilometers in the coming decade.The lack of infrastructure is one of the Africa's mostserious economic challenges, said Seyoum Mesfin, the Ethiopian Ambassador to China recently at a forum in Macao. "The development andInter-connection of our infrastructure (power, telecom, roads and railways) will pull the region together towards market integration, sustainable growth and common development," he said. The World Bank estimates the continent as a whole has an annual infrastructure funding gap of USD 90 billion. Mesfin said China's investment in his country was transforming the economic fortunes. "China has been playing an irreplaceable role in Ethiopia's economic transformation. China has unparalleled contribution towards funding our infrastructure." Chinese investment in infrastructure in Ethiopia dates back to 1972 when it financed the Woreta-Weldiya road across the Amhara region. Over the next three years, a Chinese State-owned company is to build the final section of a 339 km railway line linking Addis Ababa to the Red Sea state of Djibouti. A toll road along the same route has also got funding from China.

A new Indian company, ESIMO Flower & Agro Industries Plc, is investing 100 million dollars to start planting flowers' In July 2012 at a 71 hectares farm it acquired in Debre Brehan, 130 km north east of Addis Abeba, in Amhara Regional State.The farm, located three kilometres from the town,has finalised the land levelling and constructed a fence as well as a pack house, where harvested flowers are to be processed for export, accordingto Sanjaye Bangali, owner and GM of Esimo. This was confirmed by MayorGetaneh Zekie of Debre Berhan. The company was initially registered in 2009 with an initial investment capital of 10 million dollars. The company has increased its capital to drill water wells and build warehouses and Greenhouses, it says. The farm is dealing with Israeli, Indian, and Palestinian companies to get the greenhouse supplies for 15 dollars a square metre.

The American Idol judge and actress'

Idol judge and actress Jennifer Lopez, already has four-year-old twins Maxand Emme with estranged husband Marc Anthony, but after working with siblings who had been adopted from Ethiopia after their mother died on new movie "What to Expect When You're Expecting", Jennifer is considering the 'selfless act'. She told the Daily Mirror newspaper: "It's funny because before the movie I never really thought about adoption, I just always wanted to have my own baby and I was so focused on that and it took me a while to have my own. But after the film and during the making of the film when I held those two little Ethiopian twins I fell in loveinstantly and I can see how somebody can do this, how it is so easy to embrace a child who has nothing. "It's a beautiful, selfless act of love and it's something that you go, 'OK, I understand these feelings, I get this. I almost took those babies home. I fell in love with those babies." The desire to adopt has taken some would-be parents around the world. Now, the East African nation of Ethiopia is second only to China when it comes to international adoptions to the U.S.

The Ethiopian Prime Minister for the first time publicly hinted of an Oil discovery in the country after one year from now while he was addressingparticipants of the Ethiopia Investment Forum on, a sideline event to the 22nd World Economic Forum on Africa' Meles Zenawi told the participants of the forum comprising 200 international corporate CEOs and 200 local business leaders that there are investment opportunities in the extractive industry including Oil exploration while pointing his hand at Tewodros Ashenafi, Founder, Chairman and CEO of South West Energy (SWE-HK) Ltd, the first Ethiopian Oil and Gas exploration company, and saying "Tewodros will be the bearer of the good news." Meles told the participants that the fact Ethiopia has been registering a double digit growth for the last eight years, and that it has a population size of 85 million easily trainable workforce and consumers are some of the facts thedo-attract foreign investors to invest in the country in addition to the tax and other incentives the government provides. He went on to say that there are ample opportunities for foreign investors to tap into the miningsector including Oil exploration.

Ethiopians drawn from different European countries staged ademonstration in protest'

Ethiopians staged a demonstration in front of the European parliament in protest against repressions in Ethiopia. The rally, organized jointly by AfarHuman Rights Organization, Luqman Ethiopian-Belgian Muslim Associationand Ethiopian Committee in Belgium, drew Ethiopians from Germany, Sweden, Holland, Luxemburg, and the United Kingdom. The protesters condemned atrocities and repressions being committed by the Meles regime. The crowd chanted "Meles Zenawi is a terrorist! Meles Zenawi is a dictator! Free all political prisoners! Stop land grab…" and similar slogans.One of the organizers, Yared Hailemariam, Chairman of the Ethiopian Committee in Belgium, said that the protest rally was necessitated by the ever escalating human rights abuse in Ethiopia and the need to raise the awareness of EU parliament officials. Meanwhile, it was learnt that in the Netherlands government agents have been soliciting Ethiopians to buy theso-called the millennium bond.

Ethiopia's federal court ruled out that 11 people should face terrorcharges'

After prosecutors said they formed a cell with an Al-Qaida-linked group from neighboring Somalia, the charges come amid signs of increasing militancy in the East African nation. Ethiopian troops moved into Somalia at the beginning of the year to fight the Somali militant group al-Shabab. Prosecutors said the suspects, who include one Kenyan national, formed acell with the al-Qaida-linked group. Five suspects are in custody. Six others are to be tried in absentia. The charge sheet says the suspects have been mobilizing resources to train recruits and carry out attacks aimed at destroying Ethiopia's political, economic and public establishments.

Ethiopia and Sudan signed extradition agreement in Addis Ababa'

But there are fears that this may be a ploy to persecute Ethiopian opposition exiles in the neighbouring country. The agreement is a follow up to another one between the two countries in December 2011 in whichit was agreed not to host opposition figures from their respective countries. The two East African neighbours signed the agreement on the extradition of criminals intending to jointly battle crime, to enhance regional peace and promote justice in general. Ethiopian opposition politicians, however, doubt the new agreement is meant to only fight criminals and argue could have another hidden agenda.

Thousands of Ethiopian opposition members sought refuge in Sudan following the 2005election, which was characterised by violence, which claimed almost 200 lives. At the beginning of 2012, the international community criticized Sudan after it deported hundreds of Ethiopian opposition figures. The Berlin-based Solidarity Committee for Ethiopian Political Prisoners (SOCEPP) alleged in March 2012 that Sudanese police had raided houses and rounded up Ethiopians in Omdurman and many parts of the capital, Khartoum, for forcible deportation. Following the crackdown, a truck carrying Ethiopian refugees, who were held for deportation, was involved in an accident that left 1,242 Ethiopians and two Sudanese police men dead, SOCEPP said. The NGO also condemned the UN refugee agency (UNHCR) for failing to defend the rights of many Ethiopian refugees, who they say are still languishing in several detention facilities across Sudan asthey await deportation. The fresh agreement is meant to handover what they call "criminals". Ethiopia's biggest coalition of opposition parties, the Forum for Democratic Dialogue in Ethiopia (Medrek), has condemned the judicial agreement signed between Ethiopia and Sudan. Merrara Gudina, the Medrek chairman and member of the Oromo People's Congress (OPC),told Sudan Tribune on that the convicts exchange agreement between Khartoum and Addis Ababa could be a special arrangement to prosecute political refugees. According to Merara Gudina, the fresh judiciary accord is a cover to handover exiled opposition politicians.

Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) urged President Barack Obama should raise press freedom in "Africa Food Talks" In launching the G-8 food security agenda, he publicly should acknowledge that poverty alleviation and inclusive growth require afree press and encourage PM Meles to end his repressive practices. Good governance, accountability, and adequate response to crises depend, afterall, on listening to citizens’ voices and independent accounts. Urging the president to engage Meles Zenawi on ending Ethiopian censorship practices--such as suppressing independent reporting and denying media access to sensitive areas-- thatundermine international responses to food crises.

University of Wyoming students working on a water management researchproject in Ethiopia’

Ryan Anderson of Cheyenne and Jason Edwards of Spicewood, Texas, experienced life in a new culture and gained valuable research skills while working on a water management research project in Ethiopia. Anderson, amaster's degree student in the Department of Geography, and Edwards, adoctoral student in the Program in Ecology, last summer accompanied Department of Geography Associate Professor Steve Prager on a research project in Ethiopia's Blue Nile Basin. The three studied how social interactions contribute to the Ethiopian people's relationship with the environment. After he gave a talk on related research at the InternationalLivestock Research Institute (ILRI) campus in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, Prager was invited to work on a collaborative resource management project with the International Water Management Institute (IWMI). The institute also funded Anderson and Edwards' research in Ethiopia. Using survey approaches and structured questionnaires, the work treats humans and the environment as a single system, Prager says. "It's one way of looking at natural resource issues and social issues simultaneously," he says. Anderson says the research is important because of its interdisciplinary component. "We are acknowledging the ecological side ofthings, but also the social side," Anderson says. "The two factors are intricately interwoven, and we want to see the whole picture to hopefully improve living conditions in the rural areas."

Diaspora based civic organ “Tinsae Ethiopia” has called for nationwide protests to remove Meles Zenawi’s dictatorship from power’ Tinsae Ethiopia has launched its BEKA (enough) campaign in Ethiopia by distributing pamphlets and writing the Beka slogan in Addis Ababa and other cities. Beka is a slogan that calls for an end to the minority rule in Ethiopia. Writing "Beka" slogan on walls is part of Tinsae Ethiopia’s civil resistance campaign that includes an all out economic boycott, disabling the regime's economic infrastructure, and helping create a transitional national government. According to observers, Tinsae’s call of Ethiopians for the uprising is an encouraging sign. In a way it is also a reminiscence of the days of EPRP, whose signs and slogans were about freedom need tobe displayed upon tele poles, towers and buildings in the late 1970s. Let government employed civil servants, the police, the army and the general public be aware of the impending protest. The Ethiopian people are in direstraight and are fed up with corrupt ruling party thugs being in much of top and selected positions to lead Ethiopia more that they are all membersof crime family whos to be stopped here that they have done enough harm. Tinsae Ethiopia has stated that Ethiopians have rejected the Meles regime during the 2005 elections, but the regime has taken brutal measures to stay in power, while continuing to misrule the country and commits atrocities.

Addis Ababa is abuzz with rumor that Samuel Taffesse, construction mogul and the multi-millionaire business partner of Meles Zenawi’s wife Azeb Mesfin, has been arrested in Ethiopia’ The rumor started when he disappeared for several days starting early this month and his colleaguesbegan to raise questions. After transferring the day-to-day operations of his company to his deputy Yitbarek Getahun in early, 2012. Samuel Taffese was quietly came to the U.S. where he recently confided to his friends that Azeb Mesfin who is commonly known us the “mother of corruption” is giving him a hard time and that he might close down everything in Ethiopia and move to the U.S. Samuel recently finished a USD 5 million residential house for himself in Alexandria, Virginia, a suburb of Washington DC.The reason he is having troubles with the ravenous AzebMesfin is not clear, but Samuel is not the only business partner of Azeb Mesfin who is facing hard times. Almost every major businesses in Ethiopia, from flower export to real estate, must make Azeb a partner in order to have any chance of making profit. Samuel Taffese is a business partner and business partner of Azeb Mesfin, believed the richest womanin Africa. Samuel Taffese, owner of the “Sunshine Construction”, is a business partner of Ethiopia’s first lady and the second richest person in Ethiopia. Sammuel Taffese built a school in Axum, Tigrai, a region that gets the lion's share of the federal budget, while other regions are facing severe starvation. It’s through such tail wagging and expression of loyaltyto the minority regime that Samuel Taffese has been able to win lucrativegovernment contracts and amass enormous wealth that he is using to buymulti-million-dollar properties in the United States.

A young Washington-based Ethiopian journalist, stood up in the gallery atthe Food Security 2012 G8 Summit in Washington, D.C. and slammed theEthiopian PM Meles Zenawi' "Meles Zenawi is a dictator! Meles Zenawi is adictator! Free Eskinder Nega! Free Political Prisoners! You are a dictator.

You are committing crimes against humanity. Food is nothing without freedom! Meles has committed crimes against humanity! We Need Freedom! Freedom! Freedom!" Meles Zenawi was shocked, and completelydisoriented. Abebe Gellaw, an ESAT program producer rattles the prime minister with loud shouts, committed an act that would go down in historyas purely heroic. An award-winning journalist, unleashed an avalanche of indignant words and condemnations against prime minister Meles Zenawi who was ironically lecturing about global agriculture and food security at the G-8 Summit in Camp David, United States. The Ethiopian prime minister was visibly shaken as he was lecturing with audacity about food security when Abebe, brought the sky crushing down on the panic Meles Zenawi. Abebe chanted many times with a defeaning voice: in a voice thatbrought the conference to a screeching halt. Analysts recalled that the same was happened against the Ethiopian prime minister by pro- democracy protesters to a disorientation of his speech during an EU- African consultaion meeting held in Brussels, Belgium in November, 2006. PM Meles Zenawi has never been humiliated from such proximity as he lives surrounded by an army of security guards that keep civilians at bay. "By humiliating Meles with such patriotic act," as one commentator said, "I think Abebe Gellaw has broken the ice, and more acts of patriotism would haunt the dictator till he steps down." Abebe was escorted by policeofficers the journalist admired as very respectful and understading. But a nearby Meles security guard told Abebe, "We will kill you!" Abebe told the police that one of the security guards of Meles Zenawi had threatened to kill him. An act reserved only for the hero, Abebe's action speaks volumes about the political repression and frustration that has engulfed Ethiopians for over two decades. It has to be recalled that at a World Economic Forum in May, 2010 in Tanzania, Abebe has first challenged the Ethiopian prime minister when the journalist grabbed the mike and challenged a lecturing "Meles why was then Ethiopia starving under your rule?" Some Ethiopians are strong supporters of two-decade ruler Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, while others call him a dictator who suppresses freedoms. A historical parallel between Abraha Debotch and Moges Asgedom and that of Abebe's action who single handedly exposed the showy prime minister in an international forum, some say is "a blow that inflicted greater damage than the bomb shell that wounded Marshal Graziani,". Very fewEthiopian immigrants have an impartial view.

Dozens of police officers in riot gear contained more than 200 Ethiopian activists who jammed a small Maryland town's square to protest their prime minister's involvement in a global economic summit at nearby Camp David' Authorities reported no arrests during the three-hour demonstration that shut down the intersection of two state highways through the center of town. The commotion drew scores of spectators , many using cameras to document their town's latest role in world affairs. The flag-waving Ethiopian immigrants, mainly residents of the Baltimore- Washington area, were protesting the rule of Meles Zenawi, who was invited along with the heads of Benin, Ghana and Tanzania to discuss food security with leaders of the Group of Eight leading industrial nations.

Chanting with slogans "Meles is an architect of Ethiopian destruction; destroyer of Ethiopian identity; master of divide and rule; trader of thousands of our Ethiopian sisters to Arab countries; a killer of innocent Ethiopians; merchant of our fertile land and promoter of land grab; masterjailer of free thinking citizens; leader of mafia organization and supreme thief that looted Ethiopia of its precious and meager resources. When Meles Zenawi came to power in May, 1991, he stated his main goal to be to ensure that Ethiopians had three meals a day. Twenty one years later and after receiving billions of dollars in aid, more Ethiopians are hungry, eating only one meal a day or one meal in couple of days. ETV, Ethiopia's only television station, under government control, even reported that children were fainting in the classroom from hunger. Most Ethiopians are reporting the number one fear is not a terrorist or Al Shabaab, but finding food for their family. As long as there is a government that uses these funds without a high level of accountability and representation of diverse people, the obstacles for success of the New Alliance for Food Security andNutrition will be nearly insurmountable. Humanrights groups as well as pan-Ethiopians are asking President Barack Obama to re-evaluate the US

- Ethiopia relationship over allegations the leader of the East African nation is becoming increasingly repressive, and sharply citicised the president of not fulfills his electoral campaign promises. This is a call of allEthiopians who love their country and are courageous enough to come and face him off, show anger and disgust, and be heard loud and clear that his invitation is immoral and unacceptable and that he should never be allowed to to attend in respect of the millions who are his victims and suffering at home and abroad. This is a call for President Obama to stand by many Ethiopians who stood up with you during your election campaign in 2008. "President Obama we got your back on your election and now it is your turn to show us to what extent you go to be on our side". The US President has announced a USD 3 billion dollar in private-sector pledges tohelp boost agriculture and food production in Africa. The United States is amajor contributor of aid to Ethiopia, whose longtime leader has been accused of restricting freedoms and news media. "Shame on you!" chanted the protesters, many waving their country's red, green and yellow flag. Some held a banner reading, "Zenawi: brutal dictator, pathologicalliar, mass murderer et-cetra." Police restricted demonstrators to Thurmont, a town of 6,200 several miles from the presidential retreat.

A Human Rights Commission under Senator Tom Lantos held a House hearing on threats and restrictions faced by civil society and human rightsdefenders around the world' The hearing focused on laws recently enactedand pending legislation in countries such as Ethiopia that are limiting the ability of non-governmental organs to operate freely and independently.

One of the co-chairmen of the bipartisan commission, Democratic Representative James McGovern of Massachusetts, said there is a problemworldwide of some governments restricting the core rights of civil society. “From China to Russia, from Bahrain to Mexico, from Egypt to Zimbabwe, and in dozens of other countries, governments are preventing human rights defenders from carrying out their critical work as protectors of fundamental freedom,” he said. One of the witnesses at the hearing was Adotei Akwei, managing director of government relations at Amnesty International. He singled out Ethiopia for attacks on civil society. "Members of the commission, the recent and ongoing developments in Ethiopia linked to the policies and laws implemented by the government ofPM Meles Zenawi, have all but gutted civil society in Ethiopia,” Akwei said.Mr. Adotei Akwei called on the Obama administration to seize the opportunity presented by Meles’s visit at the G-8 summit near Washington. “Amnesty International feels that the current visit of the prime minister to the G8 summit presents a critical opportunity for the Obama administration to strongly urge the government of Ethiopia to move in the right direction and to change course,” Akwei said.
Abebe Gellaw, an ESAT program producer, who orally-attacks the Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi with loud shouts at the G-8 summitin Camp David couple of days before, has sent out his message for all Ethiopians’ Ethiomedia: "I voiced the anger, frustration and aspiration of the Ethiopian people in front of world leaders at the G8 food security symposium in Washington DC. Freedom! Freedom! Freedom!, was the clarion call that I spoke to power. I condemned Meles Zenawi and his dictatorship in front of his paymasters and sponsors. Ethiopia deserves better than a deceitful tyrant, who is brutally exploiting, abusing, jailing, torturing and killing our brothers and sisters in every corner of Ethiopia.
We need freedom. That has been made clear to the whole world", Abebeelaborated in his message.
“Abebe Gellaw just had to say a piece of his mind in the presence of the leaders of Benin, Ghana and Tanzania, all of whom - unlike Meles - came to power through the ballot box. Hours afterwhat transpired in the conference room, Meles’ lecture on food security (rather insecurity) was turned into a footnote, overshadowed by Abebe’scry”
Ethiopia has been able to raise electricity coverage to almost half of thecountry, as the nation claims to be have one of the highest coverage on the continent’ Ethiopia has raised its coverage to 2,140 megawatts (MW) from 370MW two decades ago, ensuring that 47 percent of the country is covered. The Horn of Africa nation has embarked on a multi-billion dollar power investment to generate about 10,000MW of power in the next four years. "The number of electrified towns and rural villages increased to over 6,000 from eight percent some 21 years ago, which brought the electric coverage to 47 percent," said Miheret Debebe, Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation (EEPCo) CEO. "Moreover, the total length of high voltage transmission lines has increased to 11,124 km from 3,578 km, while the number of power substations climbed to 140 from 82." Debebe told journalists that the length of low voltage transmission lines, which transmit electric power, had also been boosted to 133,838 km from 9,972km, an increase of more than a thousand per-cent.Ethiopia is focusing on developing the country's hydroelectric potential to meet domestic demandand increase electricity exports.

Ethiopia’s presence contradicts goal of G-8 Talks’ - Congressman ChrisSmith

The G-8 leaders will begin a summit at Camp David, MD, with discussions focusing on the global economic recovery and food security in the developing world, with President Barack Obama having invited the leadersof Benin, Ethiopia, Ghana and Tanzania to discuss food security, but the presence of Ethiopia's Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is causing growing concern because of the land grab issue in his country and unaddressed human rights abuses there. "Several years ago, I introduced legislation to sanction the Ethiopian government for the killing of peaceful protesters in 2005 and its broader violations of human rights," said Congressman Chris Smith (NJ-04), Chairman of the House Sub-committee on Africa, Global Health and Human Rights. "Not only do human rights violations continue in Ethiopia, but the government has now added the element of displacing their own people in favor of foreign interests farming Ethiopian land instead of their own citizens. Having Ethiopia at the table to discuss food security is counter-productive based on their land policies. "The only way the inclusion of Ethiopia at the G-8 summit makes sense is if this forum provides an occasion to have a serious discussion with Meles Zenawi abouthis unacceptable treatment of Ethiopian citizens, including policies that have made more of his people's food insecure," Chris Smith said.

Djibouti will pay US$18 million for power imports from neighbouringEthiopia’

Ethiopia has, in the past four months been exporting electricity to Djiboution a trial basis at 0.70 dollars per kilowatt. In line with the growth of power demand, which is expected to hit 175 megawatts, up from about 90megawatts, over the next fifteen years, Ethiopian Electric and Power Corporation (EEPCo) Wednesday inaugurated the Ethio-Djibouti electric power transmission project. Power consumption is on the rise in Djibouti, as 10 years ago the country used to consume about 0.17 billion kilowattsper hour. Djibouti's consumption rate was estimated to have grown to 0.22 billion kwh in 2006. The Djibouti project, worth US$65 million is largely financed by the African Development Bank (AfDB) and is estimatedto meet 75 percent of the country's power demands. The electrification project aims to raise access to electricity in the Horn of Africa country from 2003 level of 49.5 per cent to 60 per cent by 2015. Another sub- station has been constructed to supply 11 Ethio-Djibouti border towns around the Aisha, Dawale and Harawa areas. In the near future, Ethiopia plans to export to Sudan and Kenya.

Two members of the U.S. Congress, a Republican and a Democrat, havepublicly voiced indignation at Ethiopia's persecution of journalists under the leadership of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi’

Both declaring that stability and security are enhanced by press freedom. Senator Mark Begich, an Alaska Democrat, published a statement in the Congressional Record, the official daily journal of the U.S

Congress,following the Camp David G8 Summit last weekend during whichPresident Barack Obama convened four African leaders, including Meles ofEthiopia, for talks on food security in Africa. Senator Mark Begich in his statement "Ethiopia is a key partner of the United States in counterterrorism and regional stability and a major recipient of U.S. humanitarian assistance". Recalling Obama's 2011 commitment to a G8 declaration on democracy, Begich declared that "as the events in North Africa and the Middle East have shown, supporting reliable autocrats who are helpful on matters of security and economics at the expense of humandignity, basic democratic rights, and access to economic opportunity is more perilous than ever to long-term U.S. national security interests." Republican. Edward Royce sent a public letter to Meles Zenawi inwhich he expressed "deep concern with the Republic of Ethiopia's disregard for press freedom." Royce, a California Republican who chairs a House subcommittee on terrorism, said "national security must not cripple press freedom." Expressing concern over the prosecution of 11 journalists on terror charges, Royce said that "the judicial process clearly fails to meet international standards," citing as an example the government's use of national public media to pressure the courts. Hundreds of Ethiopian expatsgathered near Camp David to protest the country's slide into authoritarianism, according to news reports. In Ethiopia, a series of high- profile trials is being closely watched as a test of recently-enacted anti- terrorism legislation. A three-judge federal panel is hearing the trials of asmany as 150 people arrested on terrorism-related charges last year, including prominent politicians and journalists. Almost every week for the past few months, a small group of journalists and diplomats has gathered at Addis Ababa's Lideta federal court complex to attend terrorism trials.
The most high-profile is the case of journalist Eskinder Nega, recent winner of the PEN America “Freedom to Write” Award, and AndualemAragie, who had been one of the rising stars in Ethiopia's political opposition. They are accused of collaborating with the outlawed Ginbot-7 (May-15th) political party to carry out terrorist attacks. Two of the over 100 Oromo political prisoners are Bekele Gerba, deputy chairman of the opposition Oromo Federal Democratic Movement (OFDM), and Olbana Lelisa, a spokesman for the Oromo People’s Congress (OPC) – both have been imprisoned since August 2011. Human rights organizations have widely reported the persecutions of Oromo nationals by the TPLF-led Ethiopian government since 1991. And, the recent report by “Advocates for Human Rights”, a Minnesota-based human rights organization, lists a number of human rights violations by the Ethiopian government against the Oromo people. Some of the violated human rights of the Oromo people include the right to self-determination, the right to work, in which,in several cases, Oromo job-seekers are forced to change their Afan- Oromo names and hide their Oromo-ness in order to get jobs, the right toeducation, and the right to take part in cultural life. It’s to be noted that Metcha & Tulama Association’s leaders and supporters are currently in prison for promoting Oromo culture and history. The report, by The Advocates for Human Rights, had been submitted to the 48th session of the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

The U.S. Ambassador to Ethiopia Donald Booth was in the courtroom when a verdict in the case was due, but the judges postponed the announcement till the next month saying they needed more time. Amongthe other trials before the court was the case of two Swedish journalists captured in the restive Ogaden region in the company of members of theoutlawed Ogadien National Liberation Front (ONLF). The journalists were convicted of supporting terrorism, and given 11-year prison terms. Then there is the case of a senior United Nations security official who played a key role last year in negotiating the release of two World Food Program (WFP) employees abducted in the Ogaden. Shortly after the release, the U.N. officer was arrested and charged with having ties to the OgadienNational Liberation Front (ONLF).

Gibe III Dam, now under construction in Southwest Ethiopia, will devastate ecosystems that support 500,000 indigenous people in theLower Omo Valley and around Kenya's Lake Turkana’

The U.N.'s World Heritage Committee called on the Ethiopian governmentto "immediately halt all construction" on the project, which will impact several sites of universal cultural and ecological value. In August 2011, the Kenyan parliament passed a resolution asking for the suspension of dam construction pending further studies. Ethiopia is one of the world's highest recipients of foreign aid, and in spite of a poor record on human rights, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is one of the darlings of the international community. The World Bank, the African Development Bankand the European Investment Bank all considered funding for the Gibe IIIDam in 2009-10. In the end, none of them got involved in a project that caused an international outcry and clearly violated their social and environmental safeguard policies. The World Bank would like to turn Ethiopia and the Democratic Republic of Congo into regional hydropower "batteries" that can electrify large parts of Africa. Doing so would requirethe construction of large dam cascades and extensive transmission networks in Eastern and Central Africa. The record of dam building in Ethiopia and the Congo is such that the World Bank is not keen to get involved with these messy projects directly. Instead it plans to pour largeamounts of foreign aid into the transmission lines on which the power projects depend. On June 21, 2012 World Bank (WB) is expected to submit to its Board of Directors a credit of $684 million for a 1,000- kilometer-long transmission line from Ethiopia to Kenya. Strong evidencelinks this transmission line to the Gibe III Dam. The Resettlement Action Plan, an official project document, states that the line "is planned to provide reliable power supply to Kenya by taking it from Ethiopia's Gilgel Gibe hydropower scheme."

Ethiopian Airlines leads African pack’

Undoubtedly this is a milestone for the continent as a whole, but touring the US manufacturing giant’s premises in Seattle, EAL chief executive Tewolde Gebre-Mariam was keen to emphasise just how far ahead of the chasing pack his carrier is. “All of Ethiopia is excited about the delivery of our first Dreamliners and the whole country can be proud of being the firstin all of Africa to receive this game-changing airplane,” said Gebremariam.“Taking this step forward before so many other airlines is a true testamentto our drive to be the aviation leader in Africa and beyond.” Coming from a European or North American executive there might have been accusations of hubris, not to mention a little arrogance, following such a statement. But, when you consider the challenges Ethiopia Airlines has overcome to get to where it is today, it is easy to be in a forgiving mood. Later the year Ethiopia Airlines will become the first African carrier to operate the new Boeing 787 Dreamliner. Ethiopian Airlines is now one of the largest and fastest growing airlines in Africa, Ethiopian Airlines made its maiden international flight, to Cairo, in 1946. Six decades later, with the latest addition of services to Seychelles, EAL provides dependable departures to 65 international destinations spanning four continents. A Star Alliance member, Ethiopian is also a multi-award winner for its contributions to the development of the African Aviation Industry.

The Ethiopian Community Association in South Africa protestested outsidethe Sandton Convention Centre against the Ethiopian prime minister' Ethiopians in South Africa protested outside the Sandton Convention Centre against the Ethiopian prime minister Meles Zenawi who is attending the Global African Diaspora Summit. They gathered at noon on the corner of Alice Lane and 5th Street, outside the Sandton Convention Centre, which is hosting this year's Global African Diaspora Summit. "Freedom!" they cried. "Allahu Akbar (Arabic for "Praise be to God")," theyyelled. "Viva South Africa, viva!" they cheered. Most of the participants were political asylum-seekers from Ethiopia now living in Joburg. Their banners read "Meles Zenawi, most notorious, evil, brutal east African dictator Terrorist alive!". The Ethiopians living in South Africa voiced theirstrong opposition to Prime Minister Meles Zenawi's "dictatorship" at an AUsummit in South Africa after he suffers embarrassment and humiliation atthe G8 summit. Meles Zenawi, the Ethiopian premier for the past 21 years, flew secretly to South Africa to attend the three-day AU summit in Joberg, however the victimized communities who have sought refuge in South Africa quickly got hold of his presence, mobilizing a large protest.

They took to the streets of Sandton to handover a memorandum of demands to conference hosts. At the time of demonstration, officials of various countries were holding a summit at the Sandton Convention Centre in northern Johannesburg. Most of the participants were political asylum-seekers from Ethiopia now living in Joburg. Mulugeta Feleke, chairman of the human rights organisation "Better Ethiopian", left his home country seven years ago after family members were killed by the regime's security forces. "We can't protest like this in Ethiopia. The soldiers would just shoot us," he said. "We want the South African government to influence the international community to take action against Meles Zenawi. He must stop the harassment, release political prisoners and have real elections," said Feleke. As ealier newsreports, in protest of the Ethiopians in South Africa, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi's programmed address in South Africa forced to be cancelled. The demonstrators accused the Ethiopian prime minister of arbitrarily detaining thousands of people to suppress free speech and opposing political views. "Meles is also loosing legitimacy as he faces continued resistance at home and overseas. We all demonstrators here called for a democratic change in the east African country, said Mulugeta.

Amnesty International is concerned that Ethiopia and Rwanda are overlooking their commitments to human rights for the sake of economic growth' A new report from the human rights group AI says the authoritarian governments of both countries have stifled the opposition and persecuted journalists. In the past seven years, Ethiopia has sustained an 11 per-cent economic growth rate and substantially reduced poverty among its 83 million citizens. The country has gone to great lengths to incorporate the United Nations Millennium Development Goals into its national policy, enforced by an authoritarian ruling party that has been in power for the last 20 years. Amnesty Africa Program Director Erwin van der Borght says these improvements have come at a cost. "Certainly Ethiopia has made progress in terms of its economic development, but in a way it has neglected to respect and protect civil andpolitical rights such as the right to freedom of expression, association and peaceful assembly," said van der Borght. The Ethiopia chapter of Amnesty's 2012 human rights report highlights key rights concerns in the country, including legislation restricting rights organizations, and the arrests of hundreds of opposition members and journalists. AI says it is in Ethiopia's own economic interest to loosen political restrictions Ethiopian Muslim activists are reporting torture and abuses by security forces over growing opposition to an alleged government campaign to indoctrinate the community with Ahbashism campaign' "An Ethiopian female activist died after being tortured by electric shock and inhumane acts by government security forces," villager Ibrahim Nuseyra told OnIslam.net. He said a female activist, Firdaws, died last week after beingtortured by security forces after attending a meeting called for by the Supreme Council of Islamic Affairs known as "Majlis". The meeting, led by Federal Affairs Minister Dr. Shiferaw Tekelemariam, was attended by only three members, including Firdaws. Ibrahim said the female activist left themeeting after the Ethiopian minister insulted the Muslim Provincial Committee and branding its members as "terrorists". As she drove her carback home, the activist was reportedly kidnapped by security forces and taken to an unknown location. "Plainclothes were tortured her with electricshock and beaten her in an inhumane way," Ibrahim said. The activist waslater thrown at her home gate. "When her family and villagers got her at the gate, she was neither able to speak nor stand or move," he said. "Everyone couldn't believe what was happening, we were crying, we knewnothing about what to do," Ibrahim recalled. She was later taken to hospital and sent to Saudi Arabia for a proper medical treatment. "But shedied in hospital due to severe injury and nervous system damage," Ibrahim said. The villager said that the mother of the dead female Muslim activist was also taken by security forces. Muslims say that the torture of activists was not the first incident in Ethiopia.

Peter Heinlein of the VoA arrested in Ethiopia'

Security forces on Friday arrested Voice of America (VOA) correspondent Peter Heinlein while he was visiting a mosque in the Ethiopian capital. He was covering another proposed Muslim protest and interviewing some of the organisers, a source said. Peter Heinlein was talking to his editor on the phone when security forces stopped him but managed to relay news ofhis arrest to his editor before the phone switched off, the source said.

Earlier, Heinlein reported that "Ethiopia's 30-million strong Muslim community were organizing demonstrations to protest what they say is government interference in Islamic affairs. Tensions are rising as the government tries to preempt what it sees as the rise of a hardline strain ofIslam." In a formal statement from its headquarters in Washington DC, the VoA said, “The safety and welfare of our reporters is our utmost concern and we are working to gather more information about Mr. Heinlein’s status.” The statement said VoA is in touch with the U.S. Department of State seeking more information and “We urge Ethiopian authorities to allow Mr. Heinlein to carry out his journalistic responsibilitieswithout interference.” Tom Rhodes, East Africa spokesman for the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), said he understood that Heinlein was accused of acting “unprofessionally and illegally.” Rhodes said a government spokesman accused Heinlein, who is married to a Danish diplomat, of improperly using a diplomatic vehicle and refuses to show media accreditation. Rhodes added that the accusations seemed at odds with Heinlein’s reputation as a highly professional journalist who has worked for VoA since 1988. “However, I would add that Peter Heinlein is aveteran reporter, an experienced and professional broadcaster, so personally I find it rather hard to believe that someone like Heinlein wouldbe reporting unprofessionally.” Heinlein reported last week on rising tensions between the government and Ethiopia’s Muslim minority, which has held a series of demonstrations to protest what the community sees as government interference in Islamic affairs. The Voice of America (VoA) reporter detained while trying to cover a protest by Muslims has been freed shortly after, an Ethiopian government minister said, “Peter Heinleinis out of prison and does not face charges”, Bereket Simon, Minister of Government Communications, said. In a phone interview, Peter Heinlein confirmed to CNN that he was no longer being detained. "I am free from jail," he said, sounding shaken. "I got out of jail." Asked about his condition, he said: "The short answer is, yeah, I'm okay."

Ethiopian-American Muslims of the Washington metropolitan area announces it’s plan to stage a mass protest on late May, 2012’ The protestis a show of support to the peaceful struggle of the Muslims in Ethiopia as well as a condemnation of the violent government repression against them. The First Hijrah Ethiopian-American Muslim community in the Washington metropolitan area is gravely concerned about the Ethiopian government's forceful imposition of a religious sect which violates the constitutional rights of its citizens freedom of worship. According to Al- Jazeera Arabic, ESAT broadcast, and many other local Ethiopian news outlets, the Ethiopian government has admitted to the killing of five Muslim citizens, among whom was a six year old child. Immediately after the killings, hundreds of Muslims were rounded and sent to jail outside of the Assasa town in the Oromia region. The mass arrests continued as authorities went house to house rounding up women and sending them to prisons far away from their home towns. According to locals, there have been an estimate of 247 individuals arrested with the majority being citizens between the ages of 9 and 19 years old. News agencies such as Al-Jazeera and ESAT have also been covering the peaceful protest of the hundreds of thousands of Ethiopian Muslims. For the last three months, they have been protesting throughout the country, demanding an end to the government's meddling in their religious affairs. The protesters have remained peaceful although the government has completely disregarded their constitutional rights by forcefully imposing the "Ahbash" sect on the Muslim population. Therefore, the Ethiopian-American Muslims of the Washington metropolitan area announces its plan to stage a mass proteston May 31st, 2012. The protest is a show of support to the peaceful struggle of the Muslims in Ethiopia as well as a condemnation of the violent government repression against them. Among the invited speakersare Muslim and Orthodox Christian leaders as well as different communityrepresentatives.

Lake Qoqua is one of the lakes in the East African Rift Valley’

Lake-Qoqua is located in less than 100 kilometers southeast of Addis Ababa. Lake Qoqua - an expanse of freshwater that supports the lives of over 15,000 people. For years, it has served generations of peasant families as the only source of freshwater, fishing and water for irrigation. Now, this precious commodity is under irreversible pressure from economic development. A scientific study has found heavy metals, which are said to severely impair water quality, in samples taken from Lake Qoqua and adjacent factories - confirming the source of pollution. “We don’t know whom we could talk to, after all, since the responsible body ofthe government and the factory itself has so far not given any solution to the pollution and the impact that has been undergoing on the ecology andhabitat around the area,” a resident told The Reporter. “However, we still look forward that this could get solved by anyone who has the feeling of our suffering and understand the degree of the impact on our environment.” Tanneries, flower farms and various small-scale factories, manufacturing from soaps to sugar to plastic, have sprung up in the last 50 years around the area, especially in the last decades, along the Akaki-Awash river basins. Industrial effluents containing deadly chemicals, suchas heavy metals and organic pollutants, from these adjacent factories such like tanneries and flower farms stream into lakes and rivers that support millions of the area residents as the only source of water for drinking, cooking, and washing as well as livestock feed.

Clandestine committee within Ethiopia's 30-million strong Muslim community are organizing demonstrations to protest what they say is government interference in Islamic affairs’ Tensions are rising as the government tries to preempt what it sees as the rise of a hardline strain ofIslam. Worshippers arriving for Friday prayers at Addis Ababa's Awalia mosque found a notice posted at the entrance, which read as: "They managed to get in through the back door before. Let's make sure it doesn't happen again." The notice was signed by a mosque committee opposed to what it says has been a quiet government takeover of Ethiopia's Supreme Council of Islamic Affairs. The committee is demanding elections for new council members, to be held in the city's mosques. They rejected a suggestion that the vote be held in neighborhood government halls called kebeles. Standing at the entrance to the mosque, Ibrahim Hassan who teaches computer science at the Awalia Mission School, says holding the election in Kebele halls would open the door to mischief. "It should be inside the mosques, not in the kebeles because if it carried out in the kebeles there will be corruption, or some of the government authorities may participate. That is not fair. It's related to religion. There must not be interference of government in such tasks," he said. Addis Ababa's Awalia mosque has been at the center of protests against what many Muslims see as government efforts to ban theteachings of the conservative Salafist sect of Islam. The Islamic Supreme Council recently fired several teachers at the Awalia mission school, an Arabic language teaching center to it's shut-down. Teacher Ibrahim accuses the council of trying to indoctrinate Ethiopian Muslims into the little known Al-Ahbash sect that preaches non-violence, as opposed to themore militant Salafist brand of Islam. "They think that the committee itself may be terrorists," he said. "They consider us terrorists, but it represents all the Muslim communities. They said that [some] Salafists are members of Al-Qaida, but in Ethiopia all of Muslims are not members of Al-Qaida, they are simply Muslims." The Ethiopian Prime Minister last month signaled a crackdown on those he accused them of "peddling ideologies of intolerance." In a speech to parliament, he said a few Salafishad formed clandestine Al-Qaida cells in the southern part of the country. Days later, four protesters were killed and many others injured in the southern Gedeb.Assasa district of Oromia when they tried to prevent police from arresting a Muslim cleric accused of promoting a radical ideology. In the previous week, five men, including one Kenyan national, were arraigned in Addis Ababa's federal court on charges of operating an Al-Qaida cell out of a mosque in Oromia. And now, the regime has undertaken violent and barbaric attack on the peaceful prayers at Mosque,as recent example in town of Asassaa in Arsi, southeastern region of Oromia. During Friday prayer, dozens of young men were reported to have stood outside Anwar mosque with tape over their mouths in a silent protest' Young men standing at the entrance to Awalia mosque at last Friday's prayers said another big demonstration is planned for this week. EthiopianMuslims and Ethiopian Orthodox Christians agreeing to demand "ReligiousFreedom for All Ethiopians". Such historic decision brings Ethiopian peopleof faith together in condemning the regime's interference in their religious practice. The leaders of both faiths are now publicly supporting the religious freedom of each other and with it, condemning the Ethiopian regime of Meles Zenawi for its interference in the religious practice of Ethiopians. Such interference has already taken a major toll on both groups. When the regime appointed their own choice for patriarch over the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, it divided the church in two. As a result, many would not recognize the authority of the regime-controlled leadership and began a church in-exile in the United States. The same situation exists for the Muslims although the resulting schisms co-exist within Ethiopia. Such splitting has created divisions within families, villages and ethnicities, disempowering the needed influence of the churchand mosque in bringing righteous living and healing to a broken and alienated society. It appears government security forces oversighted by Meles Zenawi is trying to attack and destroy Muslim protestors, the regime has been frantically holding nationwide party meetings to divide and conquer the uprising. But Muslim anger and protests are intensifying. "Dimtsachin Yisema!" Amharic meaning for "Let our voice heared!", protests at mosques in religiously-diverse Ethiopia have stretched into their sixth month as Muslims object to what they see as unconstitutional government interference in their affairs. Since December, 2011 worshipers at Friday prayers nationwide have been criticizing the state's alleged attempts to impose the Al-Ahbash doctrine, a moderate sect of Islam, on the community via an unrepresenting, politicized Islamic Supreme Affairs Council (Majilis). Officials deny any interference. The protest movement in most major cities among the nation's 30 to 40 million Muslims – about one-third of Ethiopia's population – has been largely peaceful and contained to mosque compounds. The government is trying to dominate influential mosques to gain wider political control of thecountry, says Ethiopian political analyst Jawar Mohammed. To solidify Western support, it's playing up an Islamist threat – Ethiopia is widely perceived by strategists as a bulwark against Al Qaeda-affiliated Islamic terrorists across the border in Somalia and in the Middle East and North Africa. "It is an unnecessary, unwise, and untimely intervention that will have severe repercussions both for the current regime as well as for the country in the long run, unless the government reverses its current approach," says Jawar Mohammed. The regime appears to be ready to do what it does best: "arrest or shoot to kill" it's citizens while making sure the outside world does not see the attrocities. According to rights activists, the basic rights enshrined in the constitution must be respected. Organising, peaceful assembly, protesting injustice, petitioning authorities, freedom of expression…should be fully respected. A regime that does not respect it's own constitution is unconstitutional and unfit to govern. People have a legitimate right to demand the respect of their basic rights and to live in freedom without fear of persecution and extrajudicial killings. The constitution states, though on paper, that power belongs to the people. An unjustified fear of the power of people is contrary to the spirit of the constitution. Meantime, in a historic and unprecedented move, Ethiopian Christians joined their fellow Muslim Ethiopians in Washington DC to protest religious persecution in Ethiopia bythe regime. His Grace Abune Melke-Tsadik of the Ethiopian Orthodix Tewahdo Church (EOTC) called on Christians to support the uprising of Muslims against the Ethiopian regime. Abune Melke-Tsadik made the announcement at a press conference held in Washington, D.C. "Our Muslim brothers are being harassed and abused," said His Grace. He continued that the Church speaks out because "Our Muslim brothers are also Ethiopians… they are facing the same fate as Christians". The exiled EOTC leaders' stance will likely be a blow to the regime that has successfully divided and mis-ruled Ethiopia for the last two decades. Manyconvinced that the Ethiopian government understands very well the role ofthe two major faiths played in the development of culture, literature and socio-economic progress of the country in the past, as well as in this day and age. Particularly now where the government is enjoying strategies of "Divide and Rule" tactics for it's political gains undermining the well-being of church monasteries and its sacred sites, as crucial importance for it's survival. More than half of Ethiopia's roughly 90 million people are Christians, while an estimated 35 per-cent are Muslims. The Horn of Africanation has long prided itself on its religious tolerance. Inter-faith relations:Christianity, Islam, and Judaism have existed in Ethiopia for centuries in relatively cordial relations exemplifying mutual tolerance second to nonein the world..

Ethiopians will come out involuntarily in for an annual event to mark the “fall of the Duerg” military regime (28th May) and the beginning of the country's renaissance’ “Ginbot-20, 1983 E.C. i.e. May-28 G.C.” which officially marks the TPLF control of power in Ethiopia, was a day of celebration for the very few from the Adwa political elite establishment and party members (cadres), whose enjoy leftovers. For the majority in Ethiopia, specially the poors, it was the day of humiliation, renewed looting, different and intensified form of dictatorship. Under the current government who rules Ethiopia for the last 21 years, the have-nots are suffered the most while the haves got more richer. “May 28” literally commemorates the end of the Duerg regime in May, 1991, the Duerg was a military junta that ruled Ethiopia b/n 1974 to 1987, taking power following the ousting of emperor Haile Selassie I. Duerg, which means "Committee" or "Body" in the language Ge'ez, is the short name of the “Coordinating Committee of the Armed Forces, Police and Territorial Army”known as “Provisional Military Administrative Council-PMAC”The Duerg regime was overthrown by a combined force of rebels led by the EthiopianPeoples' Revolutionary Front (EPRDF) following 17 years bloody struggle.The struggle was necessary not least because of the terror that the military junta unleashed on it’s people, but also because of the repressive policies that deepened the age old underdevelopment and poverty. By its infamous “Red Terror Campaign” the military junta killed thousands, mainly students and workers, triggering massive exodus of thesurvivors. Moreover, its socialist economic policies that did not allow private investment led to economic stagnation and shortages of all consumers goods.

Ethiopian star Kenenisa Bekele prepares to defend his Olympic 10,000meters gold medal in London’

His toughest competition could very well come from his younger brother, 25-year-old Tariku Bekele. On Sunday in Hengelo, the Netherlands, Tarikuclocked 27:11:70, the fastest time in the world this year for the 25-lap race. The Dutch competition doubled as Ethiopia’s 10,000 meters qualification race for the London Games. Lelisa Desisa finished a close second, only 0.28 behind Tariku, to also book a ticket to London.

Ethiopia’s third Olympic 10,000meters berth was reserved for Kenenisa Bekele. Kenenisa is regarded as one of the greatest distance runners of alltime. He is the reigning Olympic champion and world record holder at bothfive thousand meters (12:37:35) and 10,000 meters (26:17:53).

However, he has not been in top form the past two years because of leg injuries. Another Ethiopian who has not been in top form in recent years isHaile Gebrselassie, a former world record holder and two-time Olympic champion at 10,000 meters who was hoping to qualify for his fifth Olympics. Haile Gebrselassie’s London-2012 Olympic 10,000m hopes ended. Ethiopian two-time Olympic 10,000m champion Haile Gebrselassie has failed to qualify for this summer's Games in London after finishing seventh at the Fanny Blankers-Koen Games in Hengelo. With the race being an official Ethiopian Olympic trial, Gebrselassie needed a top-two finish to qualify. But the 39-year-old ran a time of 27 minutes 20.39 seconds, nearly nine seconds behind the winner Tariku Bekele. But Father Time is one opponent the 39-year-old Ethiopian star has not been able to beat. Haile finished seventh in Hengelo, and afterwards hinted to reportersthat he is moving closer to retirement from athletics. He made journalists laugh when he said at the post-race press conference: “Well, after this you will see me you know not with a track suit – with a suit! Off the track,Haile has been wearing that business suit more often. He has become a successful businessman with several commercial ventures, including a resort hotel at Ethiopia’s Lake-Awassa.

An Ethiopian government-backed Police paramilitary force summarily executed 10 men during an operation on 16th March, 2012 in Ethiopia's eastern Somali region’ Detailed information on the killings and other abuses by the force known as the "Liyu Police" only came to light after a Human Rights Watch (HRW) fact-finding mission to neighboring Somaliland in April of the same year. The Liyu Police members fatally shota resident of Raqda village, in the Gashaamo district of Somali region, who was trying to protect a fellow villager. That day, men from Raqda retaliated by killing seven Liyu police members, prompting a reprisal operation by dozens of Liyu police in four villages on March 16 and 17. During this operation the Liyu Police force summarily executed at least 10men who were in their custody, killed at least 9 residents in ensuing gunfights, abducted at least 24 men, and looted dozens of shops and houses. "The killing of several Liyu Police members doesn't justify the force's brutal retaliation against the local population," said Leslie Lefkow, deputy Africa director at Human Rights Watch (HRW)." The Liyu Police abuses in Somali region show the urgent need for the Ethiopian government to rein in this lawless force." The Ethiopian government should hold those responsible for the killings and other abuses to accountand prevent future abuses by the force.

National Mining Corporation (NMC), a closely held company majority stakeowned by Saudi billionaire Sheikh Mohammed Al-Amoudi, said it has 128 tons of gold ready to be mined at its Okoteproject in south Ethiopia’ “With very little exploration work and by undertaking a definitive feasibility study the reserve could be turned into a big mine,” the Addis Ababa-basedcompany said in a statement e-mailed today. Okote, which is in the Oromia region, could contain a total of 454 tons, it said. The site may produce around 10 tons a year, almost doubling Ethiopia’s output of the precious metal, NMC said in March. Extraction will require investment of $121.5 million and the mine may generate profits of $4.3 billion for thecompany over 20 years, NMC said.

The honorable Gippy Graham, Mayor of Frankfort, KY presented HRH Ermias Sahle-Selassie Haile-Selassie the Honorary Key to the city of Frankfort (capital city of Kentucky) for his strategic leadership, active participation in designing programs to assist African peacekeeping, reconciliation, and border dispute resolution’ The Prince was also honored for his active role in African charitable works, cultural activities and historical preservation, as well as keeping the legacy of the institutions of Ethiopia's ancient monarchy from falling into oblivion. The event was held during the 13th annual inter-disciplinary conference on African Studies hosted by Kentucky State University (KSU). This year, the Conference focused on the theme “How will Africa’s growing Economic development Impact the people and the environment?” The conference brought scholars, KSU students and professionals from various disciplines and institutions to KSU to celebrate African heritage. During the event, Professor Gashaw Laque, Dean of the College Professional Studies at KSU introduced His Imperial Highness Prince Ermias, the President of the Crown Council of Ethiopia and the representative of the Ethiopian Crown inexile, as a guest speaker to the participants. Prince Ermias, in his speech, introduced his new initiative to bring safe drinking water to the People of Africa while helping to improve their ecological conditions. The project, which is named “The Prince Ermias Shale-Selassie Water Initiative for Africa (WIA), is a low-cost, new and environmentally friendly technology capable of rapidly transforming life for millions of people, not just in response to emergencies, but as a permanent building block for social development. The WIA offers these new technologies for all and works notonly on its own projects, but also with all other aid agencies and foundations to achieve Africa’s renaissance. Professor Gashaw Laque, whowas also one of the coordinators of the annual conference at KSU, praised the Prince’s noble personality as a great man who transformed the Crowncouncil and his own life into a mission to improve the welfare of Africans wherever they are. Prince Ermias Sahle-selassie Haile-selassie was named the recipient of the International Strategic Studies Association(ISSA), and was given the Silver Star Award of Outstanding contributions to strategic Progress through humanitarian achievements because of his work for Ethiopian Refugees in Africa.

Ethio-American Athlete Disqualified from ING NYC Marathon for Doping’

The United States Anti-Doping Agency (USADA) and the New York Road Runners announced that the an Ethiopian origin marathon runner EzkyasSisay had been disqualified from the ING New York City Marathon last November for doping. Ezkyas Sisay, 23, who finished ninth in the race inhis marathon debut in 2:11:04, was found guilty of using synthetic erythropoietin, or EPO, and has accepted a two-year suspension. “Sisay’stwo-year period of ineligibility, began on November 6, 2011, the date thedoping offense occurred,” read a statement from USADA released to the media. “As a result of the violation, Sisay has been disqualified from all competitive results achieved on and subsequent to November 6, 2011, including forfeiture of any medals, points, and prizes.” The New York RoadRunners confirmed through a statement today that Sisay had not receivedany prize money –payments are always withheld when a doping case is being resolved– and that American Ed Moran (2:11:47) and Swiss Viktor RÃthlin (2:12:26) would be promoted to ninth and tenth place, respectively. Both men will receive adjustments in their prize money to reflect their higher placings. All other male finishers in the race will be promoted by one position. Sisay –who can be easily spotted during races with his long dreadlocks– was also disqualified from two races he won lastJanuary: the Carlsbad Half-Marathon in California (1st place,

1:04:43), and the Mountain's T's Invitational 3000m in Flagstaff, Arizona (1st place,8:18.60). At the Carlsbad race he won $1500 in prize money which he is required to return. The ING New York City Marathon is an IAAF Gold Labelrace and part of the World Marathon Majors series. Drug testing is required at all IAAF Gold Label races which, when coupled with regular out-of-competition testing, helps reinforce the global effort to stop doping.

Ethiopia has been able to raise electricity coverage to almost half of thecountry'

The country claims to be have one of the highest electricity coverage levels on the continent. Ethiopia has raised its generation capacity to 2,140 MW from 370 MW two decades ago, ensuring that 47% of the country is covered. It has also embarked on a multi-billion dollar power investment to increase its generation capacity to about 10,000 MW within the coming few years. The number of electrified towns and rural villages increased to over 6,000 from 8% some 21 years ago, which brought the electric coverage to 47%, Miheret Debebe, Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation (EEPCo) CEO, says. "Moreover, the total length of high voltage transmission lines has increased to 11,124 km from 3,578 km, while the number of power substations climbed to 140 from 82." Debebe says the length of low voltage transmission lines had been boosted to 133,838 km from 9,972 km over that period. Ethiopia is focusing on developing the country's hydroelectric potential to meet domestic demandand increase electricity exports. Already it supplies power to neighbouringDjibouti and is preparing to exports to Sudan in the near future. Kenya and South Sudan have also signed deals to get power supply from Ethiopia. Ethiopia's power demand has been growing at an average rate ofbetween 25% and 32% a year and the amount of power necessary to provide for this demand by the year 2015 is forecast to be 10,000 MW. "To meet the demand a number of power projects are being executed in various parts of the country by allocating some two billion euro annually," Debebe says. The Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam on the Blue Nile with installed capacity of 6,000 MW and the Gibe III on the Omo River with installed capacity of 1,870 MW are the two main hydroelectric projects being carried out. "These projects, including the wind farm in Ashegoda and Adama in Tigray and Oromia states, respectively, will enable the country to meet local demand and raise the electric coverage to 75% by 2015," Debebe says. Debebe also says a feasibility study and other related preparations had been finalised to commence the Ethiopia-Kenyaelectric interconnection. The World Bank and African Development Bank (AfDB) have provided a US$1.3 billion loan for the project. Ethiopia has the capacity to generate over 60,000 MW from hydroelectric, wind and geothermal energy resources.

Ethiopian Ministry of Foreign Affairs (EMoFA) released strategy positionpaper'

Entitles "Ethiopia's Analysis of Somalia's Political Situation, and Ethiopia's policy towards Somalia," which defines where Addis Ababa stands in the current conflicts in the territories of post-independence Somalia. The tightly structured document provides an account of what the Ethiopian government judges to be a change in Somalia's threats to Ethiopia (from aGreater Somalia agenda to Islamic terrorism); a vision of a best-case scenario for Ethiopia's relation to Somalia (focused on access to Somali ports and cooperation on water sharing); a reading of the present politicalsituation in Somalia; and guidelines for Ethiopia's response to that situation. For the purposes of the present analysis, the important part of the document is its reading of the present political situation in Somalia; that reading is straightforward and realistic. It should serve as a touchstone for any discussion of the political dynamics of Somalia today.

The most telling feature of the Ethiopian document is its failure to mentionanything about the roadmap process, which has been orchestrated by the Western "donor"-powers through the United Nations, and which is supposed to eventuate in a new constitutional government for Somalia by August 20, 2012. That process appears to be at the forefront of every other actor's mind; Ethiopia is alone in passing it by. Addis Ababa seems to have judged that the entire "transition" of Somalia to an altered political arrangement will have no significant effect on its policy towards Somalia. The Ethiopian Ministry of Foreign Affairs has made the judgment "that the condition of instability in Somalia is likely to persist for some time."
Ethiopia's spy agency, Information Network Security Agency (INSA) in conjunction with the National Intelligence and Security Service (NISS) hasstepped up surveillance and internet censorship'
INSA has adopted Deep Packet Inspection (DPI) technology to eavesdrop,data mine, censor and intercept communications, according to the TOR Project. ." Ethiopia's only ISP, the state-owned Ethio-Telecom, has just installed a system for blocking access to the Tor network, which lets internet users browse anonymously and access blocked websites.
Repressive governments such as China, Iran and Kazakhstan routinely employ DPI technology. The Ethiopia's spy agency, INSA conducts muchof its surveillance through the Ethio-Telecom, the government monopolythat controls telephone and internet communications. According to information security experts, Deep Packet Inspection allows a spy agency to " look inside all traffic from a specific IP address, pick out the HTTP traffic, then drill even further down to capture only traffic headed to and from Gmail, and can even reassemble e-mails as they are typed out by the user." TOR promotes an open network that helps users defend againsta form of network surveillance that threatens personal freedom and privacy. Ethio-Telecom, which happens to be the sole telecommunication service provider in Ethiopia, has deployed or begun testing Deep Packet Inspection (DPI) of all Internet traffic. TOR previously analysed the same kind of censorship in China, Iran, and Kazakhstan. Reports show that TORhas stopped working in Ethiopia on or around 24thMay,2012.
Ethiopia's Coffee exportation fell by almost half'
Coffee exportation fell by almost half way short of the government's projection for this year. The government had projected $1.1 billion dollar revenue from coffee beans, but with only a month to go before the end of the fiscal year, the country has only managed to earn about $505.6 million from coffee exports. Coffee exporters have complained that the budget was complicated and affected their trade. They have also complained about the quality of the coffee. "Coffee was exported by mass without taking into consideration its quality and geographical aspects. Thisaffects our coffee exports in the budget year. "This is a serious problem that needs urgent action by the concerned bodies," a coffee exporters' body said.The Ethiopian Ministry of Trade is expected to call for an emergency meeting with the coffee exporters soon to thrash out issues affecting the sector. Ethiopia revolutionised trade in coffee and other grains, through the Ethiopian Commodity Exchange (ECX), a few years ago. The change saw the emergence of a number of disagreements between coffee exporters and ECX on how to export coffee to the international market. Ethiopia exports Arabica beans, a popular coffee worldwide.

More than one thousand flag-waving Ethiopians used the June 3rd, 2012 World Cup qualifying soccer match against South Africa at Royal Bofokengstadium to express their anger towards the brutal iron hand rule of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi' The drama started during the rendition of the national anthem as the vociferous and enthusiastic Ethiopian crowd heckled and jeered the ruling EPRDF-inspired anthem and loudly sang thepatriotic "Ethiopia yegna Memekia," much to the confusion of the players.The Ethiopians then turned their attention towards the less than 30 pro- TPLF fans who were waving pro-government flag and the South African security personnel watched in amazement as the marauding anti-Zenawi crowd confiscated the flag.

Afar Civic Group Report Reveals Human Rights Violations' Afar civic group report reveals human rights violations intensify in Afar region of Ethiopia. The conflict between Afars the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) led government has been intensified during the last few months. The core issue of this disagreement is related to forced eviction of the pastoralists and the aggressive land grabbing investment policy. The regime has continued its military repression, harassment and intimidation of the civilians as they refuse to submit and leave their homesto sugarcane plantation project owned by an Indian company. Hence, in many part of the Afar region a well-orchestrated and systematic human rights abuse has become a daily pattern. The recent strategy used by the regime is to instigate internal and external conflict in the Afar region and thereby use its military to silence the civilian resistance against the illegal land grabbing policy. In the north of the Afar Region, resource potential has been a serious issue at stake. Among others a huge Salt source of Amole, Salt block of Assale area, has been a well-known commercial item between Afars and Tigray peoples. This has been also a huge tax revenue source for the administration in the region. Throughout the history the Assale area is administratively situated within Brahle. However, lately the increasing economic significance of the Assale attracted much attention of the TPLF affiliated investors, who are effectively lobbying to control the area. Currently, the regime is being diverting the Salt rich area of Assale to Afdera district – another Salt rich area currently solely exploited by those Tigrean investors. The Barahle district administration has rejected the arbitrary decision of diversion of the Salt rich area to Afdera. However,the regime deployed its Military on the border area of Afdera and Barahle in order to implementits diversion plan. The Barahle district called for elders and mass meeting of 750 people to divert the conflict. These eldersled meeting is repelled by the regime and over 6 district leaders including the Head, Ali Osman, removed from their position in administration of Barahle and are kept at house arrest in Mekele.The local community is fretful about that this deadlock gradually could lead to army-led confrontation, where the Afars the two districts are positioned to fight each other. The conflict concerns about 70 000 inhabitants combined into two districts. The other serious confrontation is taking place along the Awash Valley in Rumaytoabout 3 km west of Aysaita. The regime arbitrarily assigned this area for a Sugarcane plantationproject. Local population is removed by force and forests are cleared by over 20 bulldozers day and night. The local community called for a self-defense to protect the forest and the land, because they have no other place to go.

The regime has placed a huge army around the Rumayto people and nobody is allowed to move in or out of the area. The ecological and forestdestruction is clear where the rain forest is destroyed. The armyof the regime threatens to clear the forest by force but the confrontation is at sight. The confrontation concerns about 50 000 inhabitants in the localities. In search of land for investment along the Awash Valley, the regime is allowing the neighboring Issa contrabandist not only to claim part of Afar Regional territory but also to inspire their claim and oversee their recurrent raids against the Afars along the Middle Awash Valley. As late as yesterday, June 2nd these raided was carried on a feeder road project at a place called Baareytain, Amibara district at Zone three. The project wasimplemented by Afar Regional government. In this confrontation more than 10 Afarswere killed and some more injuries werereported. The raid said to have supported by Issa Special Forces and alsoin turn backed by Djibouti government. Both the Regional and Federal governments are watching the incidents without any preventive action.

The Awash River which is a lifeline of the southern Afar as water sourcesis being curtailed by Dam and diversion so that thepeople have no alternative water sources, the Afar Human Rights Organisation (AHRO) report elaborates.

Organizers of Ethiopian National Transitional Council (ENTC) around the world discuss preparations for the Ethiopian people's convention in Dallas,Texas, from July 1 – July 3, to create Ethiopian National Transitional Council (ENTC)' Meantime, representatives of each chapter under discussion of preparation of Ethiopians of the world for the people's congress to be held in Dallas, Texas. Chapters in various cities of the Ethiopian National Transitional Council (ENTC) Organizing Committee heldtown hall meetings in preparation for the Ethiopian convention that is planned to be held in Dallas, Texas, from July 1 to 3, 2012. So far, it's been confirmed that representatives from over 35 cities and countries from as far away as South Africa and Sweden will come to attend in Dallas. By the time the convention starts, the number of cities represented is expected to reach over 40.

According to ESAT News, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi has been diagnosedwith blood cancer and is receiving treatment at a Belgium Poly-Clinic' Birhane Guebre-Kiristos and Dr. Tewodros Adhanom, both close confidantsof Meles Zenawi and senior members of the ruling party are currently functioning as day-today function. ESAT has reported recently that Meles Zenawi's appearance in the parliament has been pushed by one week, adding credibility to the report about the Meles' declining health. When Meles appeared at the G-20 meeting in Mexico last month he looked terribly sick and seemed to have lost a weight.According to recent ESAT newsreports, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is in Belgium's capital Brussels for scheduled medical check-up, embassy sources disclosed to ESAT. Ambassador Berhane Gebrekristos, his trusted confidante and former head of the permanent delegation at Brussels, has travelled accompanyinghim. According to trusted embassy informants, Meles suffers from a tumour in his brain which requires him to do frequent medical travels to see his private doctor in Brussels. Meles's health condition is said to be deteriorating lately. The information we received from our sources say Meles makes secretive travels to Brussels using unofficial charter flights every three months for his medical visit. His travel is kept so secret that only a few ruling insiders working in the embassy will have the information of his visit. Only two months ago Meles's secret medical visit to Brussels for medical purposes was divulged on Ginbot-7 radio. The disclosure has caused a furore in the embassy ranks that it ended up costing the career of a Philipina cook working for the mission and the job of an Ethiopian maid working at the Ambassador's residence. According toour sources whenever he comes for unofficial medical visits Meles stays atthe Ambassador's residence which has recently been refurbished with state of the art interior designs at a cost of 360,000 Euro. It has been rumoured that Meles would relinquish his grip on power until 2015 election, however his party is already waging a subtle propaganda campaign to build a populist support of some sort to set him up yet for another term at the primiership. The current Ethiopian Ambassador at Brussels, Dr. Kassu Ilala, is believed to be another trusted loyal ally of Meles Zenawi in the ranks of his party. Prime Minister Meles has in the past been feted by Western leaders and was a prominent member of the British-sponsored Africa Commission giving recommendations to the G8 group of rich nations on how to tackle the continent's problems.

Successful HIV testing campaigns in Ethiopia are showing a ten-fold jumpin the number of people testing each year since 2005' "Currently, 36 percent of women and 38 percent of men have ever been tested and received their test results," the latest Demographic and Health Survey noted. "Twenty percent of women and 21 percent of men have been tested for HIV and received their results in the 12 months before the [latest] survey," published in March 2012. "HIV testing has increased ten-fold since the 2005 EDHS [Ethiopia Demographic and Health Survey], when just 2 percent of women and men had been tested and received their results in the 12 months before the survey." First launched in 1999, HIV counselling and testing has been expanding - more than 2,300 sites now provide counselling and testing services across the country. Ethiopia uses both client- and provider-initiated testing, as well as community outreach testing and facility-based testing. Data from the recent EDHS also indicated that out of 6,000 cohabiting couples who tested for HIV,

98.3 percent were HIV-negative, 0.6 percent were both HIV-positive, and

1.1 percent of couples were HIV discordant.

GIBE III, the mud-coloured Omo River which snakes through green gorges, feeding lush vegetation and providing vital water to one of Ethiopia's most remote regions, will also power a contentious dam project' GoE says the Gibe III dam will boost development, give access to power for many Ethiopians – about half of the population – currently living without it, and generate revenue from the export of electricity to the region. But with construction underway for Africa's highest dam at 243 metres (nearly 800 feet), critics say Ethiopia must also consider the environmental and social impact it will have on some 500,000 people living downstream areas and at Lake-Turkana in neighbouring Kenya.

Their livelihoods rely on the river. "If they're going to build this huge hydro-power dam than it should be done in a way that benefits the peoplewho are most affected," said David Turton, a senior research fellow at Oxford University's African Studies Centre. The Omo River is over 700 kilometers (430 miles) long and supplies Lake-Turkana with 80 percent of its water. It is a source of annual flooding for the agro-pastoralists living in the South Omo valley, a UNESCO World Heritage Site. The completion of the dam in 2014, which will have a capacity of 1,870 MW, will regulate the river's flow and, according to the Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation (EEPCo), offer a predictable water source for communities living along theriver south of the dam. Agro-pastoralists in Omo's valley have traditionallyrelied on flood-retreat agriculture for cultivation and animal grazing. "Before, the wet season was two months, or maximum three months, then there was nine months of drought, now for 12 months there will be aregulated flow for all the downstream users," said EEPCo CEO Mihret Debebe. The centuries-old flood-retreat agriculture practised by the downstream tribes is a cultural mainstay of the Bodi, Mursi and Nyangatom tribes, famed for their lip-plate and body painting customs.

Reliable sources inside the Ethiopian Revenue and Customs Authority(ERCA) disclose'

Trusted sources disclosed to ESAT that the authority is contemplating on passing biometric data collected from tax payers to the government's security agency to use the huge private data for purposes other than tax and custom law enforcement' When the project was launched in 2009 it was a subject of discussion among the tax payers and the business community and many have questioned the wisdom of passing a private data to a government some accuse is not duteous with citizen's liberty. The tax authority's officials reassured the business community that the data will solely be used to modernize the data handling and managementcapacity of the authority. Since the project launch three years ago, the authority has collected photographic and fingerprint data from 1.8 milliontax payers of which about 2,500 are from expatriate Ethiopians and Ethiopians who have taken up citizenship of other countries. Tax payers who have given the requisite biometric data are issued with a tax payer'sbook that is valid for 10 years. According to our source, the tax payer's book is currently doubling as a citizen's identity card. There is a plan by the government to put all citizens' biometric data in the database in the near future and to subsequently use it for security and law enforcement purposes. Since the political upheavals in the North Africa and Arab countries the Ethiopian government is fast adopting different technologiesthat it believed would help it control the day to day lives of citizens all over the country.

The state-owned “Birhan-ena-Selam Printing Press” is demanding the right to censor the newspapers they print’ The prominent printing press fully owned by the Ethiopian government is ramping up pressure on newspaper publishers, observers of Ethiopian press accuse. Last weekend,a lot of weekly and bi-weekly papers in the country were forced to come out a day or two late because the printing press said it doesn’t have enough ink to serve them. Many of the countries newspapers are printed at the oldest and fully government owned printing press, “Berhan enaSelam” Reporters Without Borders (RWB) is very worried by these attempts to reinforce government control of news and information.

Reporters Without Borders accuses the biggest state printer, Berhan-ena- Selam, which almost has a monopoly on newspaper and magazine printingin Ethiopia, and other state owned printers, of trying to impose political censorship on media content before publication. In a proposed “standard contract for printing” recently circulated by state printers, they assume the right to vet and reject articles prior to printing. “This standard contractagreement could drag Ethiopia back more than two decades as regards media freedom, to the time of the Duerg’s brutal dictatorship in pre-May 1991 Ethiopia,” Reporters Without Borders said. “Allowing printers to control editorial content is tantamount to give them court powers. On what basis do these state-owned companies assume the right and independence to interpret the law? Does this reflect a government desire to suppress all criticism before it is voiced? “If this standard contract is adopted, we fear it could lead to widespread self-censorship, which is already very common, and to media subservience towards the government. Criticism, independence and media diversity would all suffer,and the vitality of Ethiopian democracy would suffer as well.” Ethiopia’s only ISP, the state-owned Ethio-Telecom, has just installed a system for blocking access to the Tor network, which lets internet users browse anonymously and access blocked websites. A system for monitoring large-scale Internet material was quietly introduced in Ethiopia, using a technology that allows to spy on all Web communications in the country, reveals the daily La Croix. In mid-May, 2012 the project Tor, a software censorship circumvention, noted that the number of users of their program falls sharply. After studying this abnormal traffic, the project concluded that the country had established a system of Deep Packet Inspection (DPI). The technology is to "scan" the data traveling over a network, directly without the intercept. Schematically, this is a little like reading the contents of a letter: the mail is not opened, but its contents have been read .. Regularly endorsed by the advocacy organizations Human Rights (PDF), Ethiopia has experienced over the last three years, an impressive building of its legislative limit freedom of expression, notes Reporters Without Borders.

Human Rights League of the Horn of Africa (HRLHA) is highly concerned about the Ethiopian Government-sponsored violence against its citizens inworship places and workplaces in general, and in the academic institutionsin particular’ A very recent case is the Ethiopian security forces stormed dormitories at Haromaya University in Eastern Harrarghe, Oromia, to break up a peaceful demonstration and arrest many Water Engineering Faculty students from their dormitories. In this demonstration, which occurred on June 1, 2012, upon the demand of students for the improvement of academic condition in their Faculty, all students of 2-5 years courses of Water Engineering Faculty were taken out of their dormitories by force and kept in open air for two days in the campus without food and shelter surrounded by the security forces. Among them,many students were severely beaten, and some were taken by the security forces to an unknown destination. In solidarity with the demand of their fellow friends, all the students of the other faculties at the Haromaya University quit to enter into classrooms on Monday June 4, 2012, and the teaching-learning process was interrupted since the incidence until this urgent action was compiled.

Hundreds of Konso people turned out in their famed town, 600 kilometres(375 miles) southwest of Addis Ababa, for the recent formal inaugurationof their inclusion in UNESCO's heritage list'

UNESCO chose the stone-walled terraces and fortified settlements in the Konso highlands -- spread over 55 square kilometres (21 square miles) --as it represents among other things a living cultural tradition spanning centuries. When the revellers came into sight, there was an explosion of colour -- women in bright orange skirts and men in striped neon yellow and red shorts, heads topped with decorative feathers and cowhide masks. The booming drums and lusty singing of Ethiopia's Konso tribe, celebrating their hometown joining the UN's list of World Heritage Sites, echoed down the road that winds through lush green hills. Under the blazing midday sun, Konso residents brandishing animal skin shields chanted as they streamed through the streets, followed by a full marchingband. The Konsos are among the last remaining people to produce, use and discard stone tools on a regular basis. It's new status makes Ethiopiathe top African country for protected sites and promises to preserve an ancient culture under threat in a rapidly developing country.

The British Broadcasting Corporation abbreviated as the BBC has announced recently it's first dedicated weekday TV news programme focusing exclusively on Africa' Called "BBC Focus On Africa", it will be broadcast from 18 June on BBC World News to audiences outside the UK.It will also be available on some free-to-air local TV stations in Africa which have partnered with the BBC. Komla Dumor and Sophie Ikenye willbe the main presenters of the 30-minute programme which will air at 17:30 GMT from Mondays to Fridays. The programme, in English, aims tobrings together the expertise of the BBC World Service's African Service and BBC World News on television, the broadcaster said in a statement. "After decades of turmoil and uncertainty, a new Africa is emerging," Mr Dumor said.

In a bid to expand its African network dominance, Ethiopian Air Lines (EAL) has resumed operations to Somaliland via Addis Ababa with new daily flights to Berbera, a port city in the northeast' After four years sincescrapping its services, a Q400 aircraft, carrying full passengers, arrived inBerbera on Sunday afternoon where it was greeted by officials. MohamudHashi Abdi, the Somaliland Minister of Aviation, was among a high-profiledelegation on board the flight from Addis Ababa including senior representatives from the Ethiopian national carrier and investors from both countries. Speaking at the welcoming ceremony, Mr. Abdi said the new route will increase trade ties between the two Horn of African nations.Abdirisaq Khalif Ahmed, the minister of commerce said the deal will contribute greatly to Somaliland and the region as more people return from abroad to rebuild and invest in the country. Ethiopian said it is happyto service its customers after a long absence. The airliner was welcomed to the port city by government ministers, regional leaders, business community and customers as well as the deputy representative of Ethiopia's government to Somaliland. The national flag carrier of Ethiopia suspended its flights to Somaliland's capital Hargeisa in 2008 due to security concerns. Hargeisa has said they have resolved most of the airline's concerns and there is an ongoing infrastructure upgrade in both Berbera airport and Hargeisa's Egal airport. Ethiopian will resume flights to Hargeisa after works are completed in six months time.

The rebel Ogadien National Liberation Front (ONLF) announced that it haskilled more than 50 Ethiopian soldiers in a recent attack on the Ethiopian army station in the region, reported VOA' The front's Foreign Communication Committee member and head of Ethiopia desk, Mr.

Hassan Abdulahi told VOA that the Ethiopian Defence Forces have massacred 18 peaceful Ethiopian ethnic-Somalis and wounded 15 others in the attack, the ONLF launched the attack as retaliation to the May 27, 2012 attack perpetrated by the Ethiopian Armed Forces at peaceful Somalis at a place called Deboch Hiriso. In addition to those killed, ONLF has burnt two vehicles owned by the Ethiopian Army and took control of various armaments and assorted communication equipments. The ONLF army also took control of the small town of Birqot until the army chose to relinquish it as a matter of military strategy. ONLF claim that it has killed 168 Ethiopian soldiers including six military officers at a rank of Army Majour in the last three months only. In related news Majour Mukhtar Sheik Mohammed, head of the Somali Regional State Police Forces, claimed that the regional militia force has killed 35 ONLF fighters and another 10 surrendered to the government. The region's police was accused of summary killing of 10 individuals at a place called Raqda in theSomali Regional State by Leslie Lefkow, the African Affairs vice Director atthe Human Rights Watch (HRW). Asked about HRW's accusation, Mr. Mukhtar dismissed it as baseless. He then went on to counter accuse HRWof involving in what he termed usual propaganda campaign against the region.

Remains of two alleged members of guerrilla group killed by local police inEthiopia's Northern Gondar Province, Sanja city of Lower Armachiho Locality was reported to have been desecrated

ESAT News - two individuals named Dagnachew Ayalew and ShenkonaKefyalew were long-time residents of the city, according to the weekly Andenet Party's organ Finote Netsanet. According to local residents, Mr Dagnachew left his normal life in the city and went into the bush followingirreconcilable disagreement he had with one other resident of the city while the reason for Mr. Shenkona's bush life is not yet known. However the local government officials claim that the two individuals are members of outlawed guerrilla movement that have revolted against the legally constituted government of EPRDF. Following a lengthy arms fight, the twoindividuals were killed and their remains were dragged for three hours towed to a municipality truck in the city streets. After they brutally dragged the corpses for three hours, the security officials left the two bodies in the middle of the city so that locals will see it. The locals weren'tpleased at all. People were rather expressing their anger at the level of brutality and lack of respect for human remains. Those who dared to openly express their disgust at the level of brutality and inhumane conduct were not spared from Police's physical abuse and taunt. After 5:00PM local time, the remains were taken to police station and were hung on trees for the entire night. The following morning the local administration ordered the burial of the bodies in some undisclosed location contrary to local custom. The families of the deceased have formally requested to take possession of the remains and to bury them ina church cemetery according to their religious traditions.

According to ESAT News, 15 farmers are reported to have been killed in 10th June, 2012 by the Ethiopian Federal Police in a conflict erupted at a place called Maygaba near the controversial sugar project in Gondar province on June 02, 2012' The conflict was started when the local government tried to forcibly remove the farmers from their ancestral land without their consent and proper compensation. In related news, residentsof Zarema town near Waldiba Monastery have spent the whole day yesterday blocking the traffic flow of the local town in a deliberate move to express their vehement opposition to a sugar project that they claim encroaches on the historical Monastery's estate. The confrontation stayed for the entire day. In the end, the locally stationed Ethiopian Federal Police forces resorted to force and broke into the oppositions' picket lines. In the confrontation many local youth were injured and more than 60 were reported to have been jailed at the local prison. The recently announced sugar plantation near Waldiba Monastery rouses passion among Orthodox Christian Ethiopians. It has recently been a subject of international demonstration by followers of the church and other Ethiopians who believe this is an issue of freedom of religion. The issue doesn't appear to be sitting very well within the government if self. Lately, the Government of Meles Zenawi itself is getting push back from within itsown ranks. The government has disarmed some of its own militia members after they expressed their opposition to the plantation. In a locality called Charaduka only 8 militias were willing to return their arms while others resist the move and are still keeping possession of their government issued arms. The tension near Waldiba and in the surrounding towns is high as ever. Fearing that there might be a conflict at the annual celebration at the Church of Mary on the June 28, 2012, the government is already rolling out a sizable reconnaissance mission aroundthe church and neighbouring towns.

Ethiopia's Council of Ministers has proposed a record 137.8 billion Birr (nearly $ 8 billion) annual budget for the 2012/2013fiscal year, focusing on combating poverty' The proposed budget, according to the Ministry of Finance and Economic Development, will mainly be allotted for priority projects such as infrastructure development, education, health and power generation activities, which will be carried out during the fiscal year, whichin Ethiopia begins in July beginning July. The majority 2012/2013 budget will be raised from internal income, while the balance – projected to be around $ 1 billion – will be mobilised from external sources in the form of loans and grants. Just over more than 26.8 billion Birr ($1.5 billion) of thestated budget serves as the country's regular budget, while over 54.4 billion Birr ($3 billion) is allocated for capital budget. Over 36.5 billion Birr ($2 billion) of the budget is allotted to subsidize regional states while 20 billion Birr ($1.1 billion) is earmarked to support activities aimed to meet the United Nations Millennium Development Goals (MDGs). The proposed draft budget, was formulated by taking into account the country's current,economic, social situation and other important factors and has been referred to parliament for final approval.

Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) and the Africa Media Initiative (AMI) called for the release of journalists being held under Ethiopia's anti- terrorism laws and requested a review of those laws as they affect freedom of speech' CPJ board member Charlayne Hunter-Gault, CPJ Deputy Director Robert Mahoney and AMI board member Dele Olojede met Friday in Addis Ababa with Communications Minister Bereket Simon, asenior figure in the government of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. In a two- hour meeting, the delegation also expressed concern about continuing prosecutions of journalists, particularly under the 2009 anti-terrorism statute, which independent publishers and reporters say has a chilling effect on Ethiopia's small private media sector. Ethiopia is holding seven journalists behind bars, according to CPJ research making it Africa's second leading jailer of journalists behind neighboring Eritrea. Three Ethiopian and two Swedish journalists are being held under the anti- terrorism law according to CPJ research. Ethiopian officials insist that journalists are not being held under security laws for what they have reported. Rather, they have accused the journalists of involvement in anti-government plots and other security-related offenses.

Several Principals of numerous schools in Addis Ababa are resigning from their positions citing a new wave government pressure to further politicizethe school system' This latest controversy arises from the new secret government directive to rank teachers' performance according to political affiliation and activities in recent job strikes. Sources close to the decisionsay the government has recently devised a new tactic to administratively harass and in some instances boot those teachers that are not willing to toe with the ruling EPRDF's official political line. Two months ago teachersof numerous government schools in Addis Ababa and some regional statescalled for a strike asking for a remuneration scale adjustment and a pay rise on par with the current runaway inflation. The strike couldn't get traction and was eventually called off a after a week. The collective actiondidn't sit well with the government. The Prime Minister called it a rogue measure in parliament and said it was entirely politically motivated and has nothing to do living standard and cost of living. He painted those who spearheaded the strike underperforming teachers who should have long been fired. Following the prime ministers angry condemnation in parliament several teachers were fired without any recourse for redress orreview. The sources say the EPRDF government is now taking a more proactive step to root out what the party cadres call hard core opposition sympathisers; and this current tactical directive is devised to do just that.The new directive ranks teachers from ‘A’ to ‘D’. According to our sources the principals are instructed to give those that are registered members and conform to EPRDF’s political line a rank of ‘A’. Those who are members but joined the recent strike are slated to be given rank of ‘B’.

Those who are not registered members of EPRDF and didn’t participate in the strike are to be given a rank of ‘C’. The last group consists of teacherswho are not members of EPRDF and were active participants of the call to strike and are deemed be given the least result of ‘D’. According to the directive those teachers that are given a rank of ‘A’ will enjoy promotions and pay rises while those that are ranked’ D’ will potential y face the boot.Teachers in Addis Ababa and elsewhere in regions expressed growing frustration with the government’s whimsical policy and administrative positions.

A crowd of people chanted slogans against visiting Ethiopian regionalgovernor Shiferaw Shigute’

The crowd was intended to protest against the attendance of Mr. ShiferawShigute, President of Southern Regional State and other Ethiopian delegation of top-level officials from Hawassa University to Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, Canada“. Shiferaw Shigute, a minister in the Meles Zenawinational government and chief of Ethiopia’s Southern Nations Nationalitiesand Peoples Regional State (SNNPR), arrived in Saskatoon and has been in private meetings with U of S officials. Ethiopians and Ethiopian Canadians residing in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta protested the visiting Ethiopian delegation to the University of Saskatchewan led by Shiferaw Shigute the president of The Southern Nations and Nationalities and Peoples State. The protesters specially accused Sheferaw of authorizing the wholesale expulsion of ethnic-Amharas from SNNPR. The protesters recited numerous slogans denouncing the university’s decision to host a delegation led by a person with a questionable human rights record. Shiferaw is part of a delegation discussing a longtime education and agriculture partnership between the two regions. Protesters and human rights groups say the partnership has produced many benefits for Ethiopian people, but Shigute’s involvement will raise many questions. Officials with the Canadian government’s Foreign Affairs and InternationalTrade department said they would look into the matter, but had not responded by press time. He is responsible for pushing thousands of people off their farms to places where there is no water, no food,” said Saeed, winner of the government of Manitoba’s recent Human Rights Commitment award. “Why are we in Canada associating with this man?” According to U.S., European and Ethiopian media reports, legal experts and human rights organizations, Shiferaw Shigute is leading the removal of peasant farmers from southern Ethiopia. Many of these families are allegedly being sent back to the region where the world saw shocking images of famine in the mid-1980s. Mr. Shiferaw Shigute has been cited for numerous acts of corruption by his country's own auditor, and was at the University of Saskatchewan to discuss an agricultural partnership withthe university.

A convoy of Ethiopian troops currently stationed in the Somali town of Beledweyn was attacked with improvised explosive device reports coming from Somalia say’ The report says several Ethiopian soldiers are believed to have died in the incident and a sizable number of others have sustainedvarious degrees of injuries. Ethiopian government officials haven’t said anything about the incident as yet. The explosive device is believed to be a remotely operated one. Military analysts say this is yet another indicatorof the level of sophistication insurgents in Somalia are gaining. In the immediate aftermath of the incident, Ethiopian troops were seen cordoning off the area and searching for what observers believed other IEDs and possibly the perpetrators as well. The Al-Shabab insurgency wasreported to have weakened after the sudden incursion of Kenyan and Ethiopian troops several months back. However, the number and sophistication of the attack insurgents are waging lately don’t suggest a weakened Al-Shabab, regional security experts contend. Four months ago Prime Minister Meles Zenawi declared in Ethiopian parliament his troops will leave Somalia within weeks however the Ethiopian troop are still in Somali in the thousands.

The Ethiopian government has passed new legislation that criminalises theuse of Internet-based voice communications such as Skype and other forms of Internet phone calling’ Authorities have also installed a new filtering system that monitors the use of the Internet in the tightly- controlled Horn of Africa country in a move seen as targeting dissidents.

The telecoms law strictly prohibits VoIP (Voice over Internet Protocol) which includes audio and video related social media communication, and the transfer of information packages through the fast growing global cybernetworks. It also authorises the government to inspect any imports of voice communication equipment and accessories, while also banning inbound shipments without prior permission. Anyone involved in "illegal" phone calling services will be prosecuted and could be jailed for up to 15 years or fined heavily if found guilty. Making an Internet phone call through different software is punishable by three to eight years-- automatically criminalising Skype and other similar voice services. The government in the law's introductory annex defends such legislation as a timely and appropriate response to the ever increasing security threats globally and in Ethiopia. But observers say the law is aimed at further limiting freedom of expression and the flow of information in the nation of85 million people. In the last five years websites and blogs critical of the government have been frequently blocked and all Amharic language broadcasts targeting Ethiopia jammed. In 2011, the International Telecommunication Union (ITU) puts the internet penetration rate in Ethiopia at about 0.7 %.

Ethiopian Airlines will start flying to Sao Paulo, Brazil’ in December, 2012’

Ethiopian Airlines will start flying to Sao Paulo, Brazil in December, 2012, the first scheduled flight to South America for the Ethiopian national flag carrier. Ethiopian will launch a thrice weekly flight to Sao Paulo with Dreamliner aircraft which the airline expects to receive from Boeing in August and September, 2012. Ethiopian CEO, Tewolde Guebre-Mariam, told Flight Global that the national flag carrier will operate the Sao Paulo flight via Lome, Togo where it’s West African venture ASKY Airline is based.

Lome is planned to be Ethiopian West African hub. ASKY will be used as a feeder to Ethiopian to the Sao Paulo flight. According to the CEO, Ethiopian will have a “heavy emphasis” on Brazil, China and India and claims these countries will drive the “huge growth” central to it’s Vision 2025 strategy. Ethiopian will also broaden its African base reach, Tewolde adds, with a hub in Southern Africa – in Zambia or Tanzania – aswell as a central hub in “one of the Congos”, to complement its base at Addis Ababa. Ethiopian will start new flights to Toronto, Canada in July, 2012 and to the Namibian capital Windhoek following in October- November, 2012.

Chinese President Hu Jintao met with Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi in Los Cabos, Mexico to discuss expansion of all-round cooperationbetween China and Ethiopia’ The two leaders met on the sidelines of a G20 summit, which will be held for two days in the Mexican resort. The meeting will focus on global growth and stability as the fragile world economic recovery is threatened by the eurozone crisis and other problems. Mexico, the host of the summit, has invited Ethiopia and some other non-G20 members to attend the Los Cabos meeting. China and Ethiopia have enjoyed traditional friendship. In recent years, the two countries maintained close political exchanges and dialogues. In August, 2011 Meles paid a visit to China, injecting new impetus to the development of bilateral ties. The two countries also enjoyed productive economic and trade cooperation. China has become Ethiopia's largest trade partner and main source of foreign investment.

Close relatives blamed ethnic cleansing on Azeb Mesfin’ According to ESAT News, two close relatives of Azeb Mesfin have made damning allegations that she betrayed her roots and played a key role in ethnic cleansing and atrocities committed against the people of Welkait Tsegede. Chalachaw Abay and Goshu Gebru, who are related to Meles Zenaw's wife on her mother's and father's side respectively, said in an exclusive interview with ESAT that she actively facilitated TPLF's illegal annexation of Welkait Tsegede, which was historically part of northwestern Gondar. The two condemned their relative for changing her identity from Amhara to being part of the TPLF's high command that has committed unspeakable crimes, torture, killings and ethnic cleansing against her native region. Azeb Mefin, widely referred to as the First Lady of Corruption, is a member of the most powerful TPLF group, a nine- members executive committee. Azeb also heads TPLF's multi-billion dollars business conglomerate, the Endowment Fund for the Rehabilitationof Tigray (EFFORT). Azeb is dogged with allegations of corruption, graft and abuse of power since her days as head of Mega Enterprises, which went bust under her leadership. The fresh allegations of crimes against humanity made by her own relatives will undoubtedly haunt her even after her inevitable departure from the pinnacle of power, according to commentators.

HRW’s New Report Confirms Land Grabs, Abuses and Forced Displacementin the Lower Omo Valley’ The sugar plantations will be irrigated in part by the Gibe III hydropower project, HRW says. The Ethiopian government is forcibly displacing tens ofthousands from their ancestral land to make way for state-run sugar plantations, a campaign group has said. The displacements are happeningin the country’s Omo Valley, according to a report by the New York-basedHuman Rights Watch (HRW). The valley, a World Heritage site, is also thesite of a controversial Gibe III dam. The Ethiopian government has denied forcing anyone from their homes and says the project will create jobs.

HRW says that in order to make space for the plantations, government security forces are compelling communities to relocate from their traditional lands, using violence and intimidation. In its report, the campaign group says that at the time of its visit to the area in June 2011

− "military units regularly visited villages to intimidate residents and suppress dissent related to the sugar plantation development". It added that "soldiers regularly stole or killed cattle". These allegations were denied by government spokesman Bereket Simon. "There is no forcing outof people from their residence, if there is any reason to relocate people, then it is based on an open communication," he told the AFP news agency.According to frustrated citizens, everything is being "grabbed" by the TPLFled regime irresponsibly — the land, the children, women and even futuresof it's own people as a whole—anything from which a kleptocratic regime might profit. In the case of children and child labour, investigations have revealed that in many cases, these children are not truly orphans, but regime cronies are getting away with it because they are above the law.

These children are sometimes exploited as commodities to unknowing andsincere prospective adoptive parents. In the case of women and teenage girls, Ethiopian employment agencies have made a business of "exporting"young and impoverished women to work as domestic workers in Middle Eastern countries like Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, the former Libya or the United Arab Emirates where many have become tragic victims of domesticservitude, physical abuse, sexual exploitation, suicide or even murder by their employers. The regime's ban on supplying such domestic workers to these countries seems to be meaningless as even a government controlledwebsite reports the intention to supply nearly 45.000 Ethiopian domestic workers a month to the Middle East.

A UN officer guilty of terrorism'

An Ethiopian security officer with the United Nations faced up to 10 yearsin jail after a court in Addis Ababa found him guilty of "participating in a terrorist organisation". "The defendant has not convinced us that he did not commit a crime...he's guilty," Judge Mulugeta Kidane said.

Abdulrahman Sheikh Hassan, who was based in Ethiopia's troubled south-eastern Ogadien region, was charged last July with having links to the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), a secessionist rebel group. He ischarged along with Sherif Baido, whom the charge sheet lists as a senior member of the ONLF and was convicted on the same charge in absentia, according to Kidane. According to the charge sheet, the hostages were kidnapped by members of the ONLF. The judge said Hassan failed to prove he did not have links to the ONLF and said he was guilty of collaborating with Badio. The two men face five to ten years in prison. Thecourt is expected to deliver a sentence on Friday. Hassan was arrested after negotiating the release of two UN World Food Programme (WFP) officers kidnapped in the Ogaden.

Judge Mulugeta said defence witnesses failed to prove Hassan did not have links to ONLF members. The key evidence used by the prosecution was recordings of phone conversations between Hassan and his co-defendants. The judge said the voices of Hassan and Baido had been matched to those on the tape after it was analysed by the cybercrimes unit. "It has been proved by the cybercrimessection that it was their voices," he said. Abdulrahman Hassan, an ethnic-Somali who does not speak Ethiopia's main language, Amharic stood expressionless as the judge reads the verdict in Amharic. He appeared in court wearing a clean white shirt and holding Islamic prayer beads. The prosecution called for the court to impose a strong sentence against Hassan, saying his case should serve as a warning to would-be offenders. "We want the court to take this as a really serious offence, he has a connection to the ONLF and he is a real danger to the country," the prosecutor told the court. According to the charge sheet, the hostages were kidnapped by members of the ONLF. The judge said Hassan failed toprove he did not have links to the ONLF and said he was guilty of collaborating with Badio. Abdulrahman Hassan, the head of UN security inEthiopia's troubled Ogadien region, was arrested in July, 2011 after he helped to negotiate the release of two UN World Food Programmehostages.

The Reporter warns of Gay ‘infestation’ in Addis Ababa’

A popular Ethiopian daily newspaper alleges the United States and Europe are plotting to export, spread and promote homosexuality in Ethiopia. In an article published by Yenga daily, on the 18 June, homosexuality was described as rapidly-growing ‘infestation’ whose carriers are now ‘estimated’ to have reached 16,000. The paper also alleged that gays havean average of 75 sexual partners a year, and their ‘promiscuous’ nature propels some to have seven to nine sexual partners a day. The article described how such ‘practices’ are being ‘exported’ into Ethiopia through students who receive scholarships to study in the United States and Europe. It further suggested that the millions of dollars spent on scholarships are really designed to spread the ‘culture’ of homosexuality whose ‘agents’ (i.e. graduate students) ‘recruit’ street children of 8-16 years of age. Other agents conspiring to ‘spread’ homosexuality are apparently the United Nations, Embassies of European and North American countries, International NGO’s with their gay staff and tourists.

The paper reported that the national anti-homosexual conference that washeld little over a week ago in Ethiopia’s capital, Addis Ababa, demanded urgent measures be taken by the government, including the death penalty, in order to prevent the rapid ‘spread’ of homosexuality and the apparent consequential sexual abuse of young boys. The article additionally demanded that the Ethiopian government block all pornographic sites because these factor in the spread of the ‘social evil’ identified by the conference. Ethiopian LGBT activists have reported increasing levels of homophobia since the anti-homosexuality conference, including receiving death threats. The conference included the main religious leaders of Ethiopia, government officials, members of the Ethiopian Parliament, leaders of political parties, youth organizations and representatives from other civil societies called upon the Ethiopian government to take measures and resist international bodies in their attempt to ‘subvert’ Ethiopian traditions by ‘infesting’ the country with homosexuality. The article said homosexuality was being spread from the West.

BHP Billiton is staying tightlipped on speculation’

BHP Billiton has decided to exit from a potash development in Ethiopia, even as the mining behemoth is expected to seek approval from its board later this year for the massive Jansen project in Canada. Joel Jackson, an analyst at BMO Capital Markets, said that according to local sources BHP isbelieved to have decided to withdraw from the potash project in the African country. The company is reportedly closing down the camp at the site and is in the process of auctioning off equipment, Mr. Jackson said in a research report. The Melbourne-based company said it isn’t its policy to comment on the specifics of its exploration programs. “In general, the location of our exploration programs will change over time as opportunities emerge and as exploration programs are completed or transitioned to another business within BHP Billiton,” spokeswoman Kelly Quirke said. BHP has been prospecting for potash in Ethiopia’s Danakil Depression, an area near the equator some 50 meters below sea level where temperature can exceed 60 degrees Celsius. Companies including Canada’s Allana Potash Corp. and Ethiopian Potash Corp. are also active inthe area. BMO’s Mr. Jackson said a withdrawal from Ethiopia is potentially positive for BHP, as it would mean it is now focusing on the Jansen projectin Saskatchewan. “But [it] could be seen as negative because the importance BHP places on potash is decreasing,” he added. Saskatchewan’s environment ministry last June granted approval for Jansen, which is set to begin production in 2015 and would in time produce about 8 million metric tons a year of agricultural-grade potash.BHP also has been studying other potential potash projects in the sameregion.

A disagreement between Ethiopian Government and the regional satellitecarrier- ArabSat‘

It doesn’t appear to be over yet. There has been an ongoing accusation byArabSat that strong jamming signals emanating from Ethiopia to stymie satellite transmissions of ESAT and Eritrean Government’s satellite broadcast are disturbing a wh le set of other transmissions in the region. As a result ArabSat was forcedto take the transmissions in the middle of the controversy off air. Only a few weeks ago this website reported the news that a delegation led by thecountry’s Minister of Communication Bereket Simon gave a written assurance to the Satellite carrier-Arab Sat that it won’t jam Eritrean Television’s satellite broadcast from then on. However there was a condition set forth by the Ethiopian government for Eritrean Television to obey so that his government can follow through with the assurance. The two conditions are the Eritrean Television shouldn’t be carrying any content from ESAT’s online archive, and political opinions of Ethiopian government’s opposition entities operating inside of Eritrea or anywhere else. If the Eritrean government is willing to obey those two conditions, Mr. Bereket promised that not only would his government stop jamming the satellite transmission it will also suspend airing the daily one hour transmission of the Eritrean prodemocracy opposition movement's broadcast from Ethiopia. The Eritrean government's response was less than positive. Simply put, the reply from representatives of the Eritrean Government was, 'If the Ethiopian government so wishes, it can increase the daily one hour transmission of the Eritrean opposition to a 24 hour." After several negotiation efforts and assurances given by the Ethiopian Government, the Ethiopian Television satellite transmission on ArabSat has now been restored. Our reporter was able to talk to one middle ranking Ethiopian government official privy to the negotiation. According to this source, Mr. Bereket was very vehement about ESAT during his talkwith ArabSat administration. He didn't mince his words when he told the officials what his government has in store if ESAT's transmission is to come back on ArabSat. Bereket said his government will do all what is necessary to safeguard the country's national security. However, he didn'texplicitly say what the government has in store. Ethiopian government can tolerate the Eritrean Television transmission on ArabSat. However, Bereket argued, ESAT is an organ of Ginbot7 Opposition Movement that has been labelled as a terrorist organization by the Ethiopian parliament. According to Bereket, ESAT is a media force bent on to cause anarchy in the country. As a result the Ethiopian Government doesn't in any way tolerate ESAT's comeback on ArabSat. Mr. Bereket also warned that his government wouldn't take responsibility for any effects of actions his government could take should ESAT's transmission is to come on ArabSat.ArabSat authorities on their part expressed to Bereket their unreserved right for discretion of what stations to host on their satellite. According to our source, Bereket didn't seem happy with ArabSat's official reply. He snap opened his briefcase and pulled out what he called DVDs of translations of incriminating content from ESAT's previous transmissions. The ArabSat officials didn't appear to be impressed with the exhibit and said to Bereket that they don't have the time to go through the DVDs there and then. Among the stacks of DVDs, one of the exhibit content wasan interview ESAT did with Father Nikodimos Asfaw, an Orthodox Church clergy. One ArabSat official our reporter has talked to expressed his surprise at the low quality argument made by the Ethiopian delegation as to why ESAT's transmission shouldn't be carried by ArabSat. The official said he found the distance the Ethiopian government is willing to travel tostifle opposition voices is quite revealing. The official then said the Ethiopian government's accusation of ESAT doesn't hold water. ESAT will eventually be returned to ArabSat. But the company requested patience as it is currently in the process of adopting and testing new technologies to beef up its ability to deal with interferences. He concluded his private remark by saying that ESAT has literally become an issue of serious contention between the Ethiopian government and ArabSat.

Ethiopia's Commodity Exchange (ECX) wants to increase trade'

ECMX needs to increase in maize and wheat by including some of its imported food aid and to offer additional items such as sugar, such as sugar, its chief executive said. "We are currently in discussions with the government about how to take on a much bigger way maize and wheat trading in the country, including monetisation of imported food aid into the country through the exchange," Eleni Guebre-

Medhin told reporters. Eleni did not elaborate on how this might work when asked for details, buta system to allow the government to sell surplus food aid would permit it to raise funds for initiatives such as drilling boreholes for water or improving the country's electricity supply. "We have been also in discussions about, to some extent, sugar trading and further fruit crops aswell," she said. Africa's biggest coffee producer has big plans to boost agricultural output by 2015, including coffee volumes to 700,000 tonnes. Its ECX commodity exchange, launched in mid-2008, also wants to expand. It currently trades coffee, maize, sesame and white pea beans through an open cry system. It announced plans last year to trade sorghum, chick peas, lentils and niger seeds by expanding warehouse facilities, and to introduce forward and future contracts within three yearsin a bid to tackle hoarding which has affected the coffee market. Eleni, who leaves her post to take on an advisory role in September, said planning for forward and future trading had stalled. "The policy dialogue (on future trading) was a bit stalled partly because of the various crises that keep occurring in the broader market globally and over fears that thedesign would have to really be cautious here in Ethiopia," she said. "For the moment that project is on hold." The exchange had a trading value of $1.5 billion and links over 2.4 million farmers through its information system. Traded volumes reached 608,000 tonnes in the last fiscal year, upfrom 502,000 tonnes the previous year, according to company figures.
The government is forecasting a rise in coffee export revenues to $1.3 billion from last year's $841 million, when output rose to 7.50 million 60-kg bags. The International Coffee Organisation (ICO) has forecast Ethiopia's crop at 8.3 million bags. Exports reached almost 200,000 tonnes last year, but have faltered with just 75,000 tonnes shipped in thefirst eight months of this fiscal year which ends in July, 2012.
EPRDF is on its latest assault on the human rights of the people’
The governing Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF)decreed certain activities on the internet to be illegal. Access to the internet inside Ethiopia is very poor. According to Open Net Initiative (ONI) Ethiopia “has the second lowest internet penetration rate in sub- Saharan Africa (only Sierra Leone’s is lower) … Only 360,000 people had internet access in June 2009, a penetration rate of 0.4 per-cent.” Internetfiltering in Ethiopia has been in place for some years, according to Freedom House. Its report, “Freedom on the Net 2011”, states: “Tests conducted by Freedom House found that in mid-2010 the websites of Freedom House, Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International were inaccessible. In March 2010, Voice of America reported that its website was blocked in Ethiopia.” The BBC reported that in June 2010 emails sent from Ethiopia to the Committee to Protect Journalists were also blocked. This latest invasion of privacy and restriction of freedoms comes on the back of a new law passed on 24 May which, among other things, bans the use of Voice over the Internet Protocol (VoIP) hardware and software, such as Skype, which enables people to use the internet as the transmission medium for telephone calls, and imposes a penalty of up to 15 years imprisonment for the heinous crime of making a telephone call toa family member or friend. Internet access, and national and internationalcalls, which have to be made through the state telecommunications provider, the ETC, are extremely expensive. A 2010 study by the International Telecommunication Union (ITU) found that Ethiopia's broadband internet connections were among the most expensive in the world when compared with monthly income, and come second only to those in the Central African Republic. The new legislation also allows the government to inspect any imports of voice communication equipment and accessories, and to ban such imported shipments without prior notification. One suspects this may well simply be the first step in establishing total government control over access and use of the internet,leading to monitoring of emails, social network sites, chat platforms and so on, all of which could now be targeted and monitored. Indeed, RWB has already voiced its fears that the DPI "will be misused for surveillance purposes by a government that already subjects the political opposition and privately-owned media to a great deal of harassment".

More than 200 farmers are thrown to jail for failing to pay a fertilizer debt'

The ruling EPRDF affiliated companies offered and in some instances forced farmers to take various quantities of fertilizers at the height of the 2010 election cycle. In the Amhara Regional State of Alefa Taqusa Localitysince the last couple of months the government cadres doubling as extension workers are harassing farmers to pay the whole debt in one installment. Most are subsistence farmers who have hard time to feed their own family. The government is now embarking on a campaign of whole sale imprisonment of those farmers who couldn't pay back their debt at a short notice. One farmer who chose to remain anonymous told our reporter that a lot of women and senior citizens are in jail right now asa result of this campaign. Able men usually abandon the area and move somewhere else to avoid the harassment. The law enforcement officers usually take the wives or parents to prison until the men submit themselves.

DNA clues to Queen of Sheeba tales'

The Queen of Sheeba's genetic legacy may live on in Ethiopia, according to new research that finds evidence of long-ago genetic mixing between Ethiopian populations and Syrian and Israeli people. The Queen of Sheeba, known in Ethiopia as "Queen Makeda", is mentioned in both the Bible and the Quran. The Bible discusses diplomatic relations between thismonarch and King Solomon of Israel, but Ethiopian tradition holds that their relationship went deeper: Makeda's son, Menelik I, the first emperor of Ethiopia, is said to be Solomon's offspring. Whether this tale is true or not, new evidence reveals close links between Ethiopia and groups outsideof Africa. Some Ethiopians have 40 percent to 50 percent of their genomes that match more closely with populations outside of Africa than those within, while the rest of the genomes more closely match African populations, said study researcher Toomas Kivisild of the University of Cambridge. "We calculated genetic distances and found that these non-African regions of the genome are closest to the populations in Egypt, Israel and Syria," Kivislid said in a statement. From its perch on the Horn of Africa, Ethiopia is the site of early hominin discoveries such as "Lucy", afossilized Australopithecus afarensis and an early human ancestor.

Ethiopia is also a gateway between Africa and Asia, according to Kivislid and his colleagues. But few genetic studies have delved specifically into the Ethiopian genome. Both agriculture and linguistics show a link between Ethiopia and lands outside of Africa. For example, archaeologists have uncovered wheat and barley farming in Ethiopia, agriculture that firstarose in the Fertile Crescent of the Middle East. Linguistically, Ethio- Semitic, a language spoken both in Ethiopia and nearby Eritrea, has been traced to a Middle Eastern origin. To better understand the genetic ties between Ethiopia and the rest of the world, Kivislid and his colleagues analyzed the genomes of 188 Ethiopian men from 10 diverse populations. The men came from different regions and spoke different languages. The results revealed that the Ethiopian genome is less ancient than those of some South African populations, and that Ethiopian genes are quite diverse. Language hinted at genetics, the researchers found: Speakers of Semetic and Cushitic tongues were shown to have genomes about half comprised of genes from non-African origins. Other groups were characterized by mixes of eastern and western African genes. Tracing the genomic changes, the researchers found that the non-African and African genes first mingled about 3,000 years ago rather than during more recenttimes, the researchers reported Thursday in the American Journal of Human Genetics. That timeline confirms what linguistic studies have suggested about links between the Middle East and Ethiopia during this time period, the researchers wrote. It also matches records and tales of the reign of the Queen of Sheba from about 1005 to 955 B.C., when traderoutes were established and a royal son, perhaps, was born. Relations between the Horn of Africa and the Middle East would continue for centuries. "These long-lasting links between the two regions are reflected in influences still apparent in the modern Ethiopian cultural, and, as we show here, genetic landscapes," the researchers wrote.

An overloaded boat carrying about 60 illegal immigrants from Ethiopiacapsized in Lake Malawi’

Is wintery waters, and all aboard are feared drowned, Malawi police said’ The capsized boat, believed to be carrying 60 people, capsized late on Monday in the remote northern district of Karonga. Police say the boat arrived from Tanzania. A BBC correspondent in Malawi says the country has become a key staging post for migrants fleeing drought and conflict inSomalia and Ethiopia, and trying to reach South Africa. Initial reports saidthe migrants were from Somalia but a team from the UN refugee agency which has visited the scene said they mostly were from Ethiopia. NorthernRegion police spokeswoman Mrs. Norah Chimwala told the BBC that 47 bodies had been recovered so far, and that three suspected Malawian human traffickers had been arrested. The accident happened in the northern Karonga district, 600 kilometers (400 miles) north of Lilongwe, the capital. Villagers started seeing floating bodies in the next morning. "They pulled out two bodies, then three, then five," Chingwalu told. "Theydecided to alert the police on the same day and we have so far pulled out47 people from the lake."The boat capsized because it was overloaded, there were men, women and children and goods as well", she said.

Immigrants from troubled countries further north often cross the borders between Malawi and Tanzania, and between Malawi and Mozambique, trying to reach South Africa, home to Africa's strongest economy. Police have not found any survivors and the other migrants are feared dead as the water in Lake Malawi is cold in the Southern Hemisphere winter, Mrs. Chngwalu said. According to a recent study everyone wants to leave Ethiopia, not only for safety but because life has become so unbearable for the majority. The 2010 Oxford Poverty and Human Development Initiative (OPHI) study shows, Ethiopia is the second poorest country in the world despite regime claims to double-digit economic growth. If their claims were really true, why would so many Ethiopian risk their lives to seek opportunity elsewhere? As a result, many sell everything they own topay human traffickers to provide them safe passage to other countries; however, many die on the way as they cross waterways in overloaded boats, as they are crowded into containers carried by trucks to the border,suffocating for lack of oxygen, as they are left to die in the Sinai desert after traffickers removed their organs—we have stories from the ground from their relatives—or as they encounter thieves or dangerous situations in other countries like Tanzania and Mali where numerous dead bodies of Ethiopian refugees were found floating in Lake Mali. Ethiopians are at risk both in their country and outside it.
Protest has erupted in Aleta-Chiko town in Sidama Zone of the SNNP'
According to sources, the protest is related to a renewed effort by the federal government to annex the region's capital city Awassa under federal government's administration. One police is confirmed to be dead and several others are rumoured to have died in the skirmishes. Four students have so far been reported to have sustained various degrees of injuries.According to sources there is a growing tension through out the Sidama Zone. Speculations are to be circulated among the public there will be a huge protest rally called for tomorrow to oppose the federal government's renewed effort to take back the regional capital's administration. There is unusual presence by the federal police and defence forces in the Zone. Fliers calling for a resistance are being circulated in Awassa and at various cities throughout the zone. One resident of the city expressed his anxiety to sources that a conflict could erupt any day and he said they leave in constant fear of an impending bloodshed reminiscent of the Loque massacre. The independent ESAT hasreported about the ongoing discussion between the federal government and Sidama Zone authorities to pave the way to annex the administrationto the federal government. It has to be recalled that on 24 May, 2002 a protest initiated for the same reason at a locality called Loque has culminated in the massacre of more than 100 innocent civilians by thefederal police.
Government Communication Affairs Office (GCAO) refuted reports of somewestern media saying the Ethiopian government has banned Skype and VoIP related services' In a press conference he gave here on Friday, GCAOState Minister Shimeles Kemal said the recent draft proclamation issued by the council of ministers does not prohibit such services. He said the draft proclamation is aimed at regulating cyber related crimes particularly telecom crimes and offences in the country. The Minister said the objective of the proclamation is to discourage and prevent illicit and criminal activities carried out through bypassing the domestic telecom service and thereby providing unlawful international calls. It focuses on a number of telecom related offences such as tampering and duplicating SIM cards and credit cards to gain illegal revenue. He said the prime target of the proclamation is to reduce the possibilities of defrauding the government's lawful revenue earning through taxation. Callback services, which bypass the national telecom system would cause a substantial financial damage to the national tele-communications service. According to Shimeles, the law primarily aims at preventing such illicit activities rather than prohibiting personal uses of the services.The council has also recently approved a draft legislation to regulate the advertisement business in the country, Shimeles said. In addition, he told "Skype and similar activities are not banned in Ethiopia. There is no law that prohibits or restricts their utilization here in Ethiopia. Nor does the [draft] law aim to prevent IP-related Ethio-Telecom internet activities, that is cyber activities like social media, Twitter, etc.", said a senior Ethiopian official in a phone interview. The remark was made in reference to the draft Telecom Fraud Offences proclamation, which was tabled in the parliament,on May 24, for first reading and referred to the relevant Standing Committee, for review. As the Ethiopian media regulatory framework lacksregulation mechanism regarding the advertisement business, the draft legislation will help to govern the industry. The legislation will protect consumers from false and misleading advertisement, regulate and ensure the practice of fair trade among the business community and provide a clear system of accountability. Regarding the recent attacks occurred in Gambella State, he said 14 members of the group, which attacked innocent civilians and put under control by the South Sudanese army, have been extradited to Ethiopia as per the criminal extradition agreementbetween the two countries. The criminal group, which recently attacked a public transport in Gambella State, had killed 19 innocent civilians.

Members of this criminal group had also participated in the killing of workers of Saudi Star Agricultural Business Group engaged in agriculture.Members of the group had fled to the border of South Sudan to escape from the command post established by the Ethiopian government to put them under control. During a clash between members of the group and South Sudan forces, two Southern Sudanese armed forces and several members of the group were killed, and 14 of them are put under control.He said investigation has commenced to bring the culprits to justice.

Trusted sources from Ethiopia disclosed ESAT that opposition politicians currently awaiting a verdict on their trial under the controversial anti- terrorism proclamation have started a hunger strike' Detained politicians Andualem Arage- Vice Chair and Head of Public Relations of UDJ party, Natnael Mekonnen- senior leadership in UDJ, Kinfemichael Bereded (aka Abebe Kesto), Mitiku Damte and other prisoners are said to have initiated the strike. According to our source, they haven't eaten anything for the previous three days. The strike is slated to be running for a week. The political prisoners are asking the Ethiopian government to improve the prison condition and their treatment while they are in custody. They are also asking the government to allow a visit by the Red Cross. In addition to the ongoing harassment inside of the prison, Andualem has endured a severe beating inside of his prison cell and was subsequently denied medical treatment even if he complained of splitting headache symptomatic of a possible head injury. Olbana Lelisa of the Oromo PeoplesCongress (OPC) party was also bashed inside his cell only two weeks ago. According to sources that has seen the prisoners in person, they appearedto be physically weakened. However their spirit is as strong as ever. No official reply is given to their demand from the government or the prison administrators. Instead, the prison officials are doing everything within their means to put a lid on the news of the strike. Except for immediate family members, their party comrades and friends are denied visits. The accused are expecting a verdict within a few weeks. They have repeatedly expressed their lack of trust in the legal process and the judiciary.

Awassa Residents In The SNNP In Mass Walkouts of High Profile Meeting'

Reports coming from Awassa, the capital of Southern Nations and Nationalities Peoples Regional State (SNNPRS) suggest the political turmoil in the SSNPRS if far from over. Residents of Awassa town who were called for a meeting with the regional state's president had to walk out on him after he bluntly declared that Sidamas' struggle for statehood is a wishful thinking. Other ethnicities living in Awassa say ethnic Sidamashave never felt antagonistic towards them. Instead they accuse the regional state government for the political controversy and ethnic tension pervading in the zone and Awassa city. They accuse of the regional government of litany of contradicting laws and what the residents termed unhelpful political propaganda. Passions are running high. One respected senior citizen of ethnic Sidama origin declared on the meeting that the demand for statehood is the most important agenda for Sidamas and the struggle will continue till that last man standing. One activist who was on the meeting told our reporter that the state government is trying to makethe conflict between Sidamas and other ethnic groups living in the Zone. The issue here is a popular demand by ethnic Sidamas to have a state of their own as is the case with other ethnicities of comparable demography and Awassa should remain the capital city of Sidamas only. Residents of the city who attended the meeting said Shiferaw was actively speaking to make the issue an ethnic conflict between Sidamas and others. He faced aloud grumbling and vehement pushback from the attendants who say the issue is completely different to what he is saying. Loosely grouped young ethnic Sidamas are distributing names of officials that they accuse are tipping activists name to the notorious Ethiopian Federal Police for torture and extra judicial incarceration. One 14 page document our reporter managed to get his hand on declares the establishment of a clandestine group led by local University Students to highlight the demands of ethnic Sidamas. In related news, the number of incarcerated individuals in ChukoCity of Sidama Zone has reached 15. The Ethiopian Federal Police that hascamped in the city are doing a frequent patrol and they disallow gatherings more than three people. Locals of Chuko are resorting to their tradition called "Afini". They are marching to the surrounding rural communities to consult with their clan leaders on the course of action theycould take heretofore. Keen observers of Ethiopian politics express their deep seated anxiety about the consequences of ethnic politics in the country. Meantime, the southern Ethiopian town of Awassa in a security lock-down; The government has sent thousands of heavily armed troops to prevent a protest rally that has been called. Security check points have been set up at several corners, buses have been ordered to stop services, and transportation in and out of the town has been restricted. During the past few days, pamphlets have been distributed throughout Awassa callingfor mass demonstration in opposition to some law that was recently passed to Awassa under the federal government.

Ethiopian Telecommunication Corporation (ETC), renamed “Ethio-Telecom”

A government owned and run body, and the Ethiopian TelecommunicationAgency (ETA) have exclusive control over internet access in the country. Websites of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the Economist magazine have recently joined the long list of blocked websites in Ethiopia. Sources inside of Ethiopia say the IMF’s official website “IMF.org”and the Economist magazine’s website “Economist.com” are no longer accessible since two days ago. IMF has recently stated that the Ethiopian government’s claim of 11% economic growth is unrealistic; instead the organization offered what commentators believed is a much modest growth forecast figure of 5% for the current fiscal year. Observers say theEthiopian government didn’t appreciated IMF’s forecast figure. According to these observers, this has been a point of departure during last week’s visit to Addis Ababa of IMF officials. There is no conclusive evidence to allude IMF’s website blockade to this difference. However observers say they believe the Ethiopian government wouldn’t take IMF’s figures lightly. Meles Zenawi often calls IMF’s figures and the organizations economic wisdom as the last word to make his economic case. The other website that joined the tally of several websites inside of Ethiopia is the website of The Economist magazine. The Economist magazine has recently written critical articles on the state of Ethiopian political economy. Informed sources believe these critical articles published on the magazine and widely available on the website have precipitated this blockade. Websites of CPJ, HRW, VOA News, and other 150 websites and blogs are currently inaccessible in Ethiopia. Aside from the Ethiopian law, something of rumors about governments seeking to regulate and tax the Internet through the upcoming World Conference on International Telecommunications (WCIT) in Dubai, Unites Arab Emirates.The recent telecommunications law in Ethiopia that restricts the use of Internet-basedvoice and video communications is continuing to generate online discussions and debates.

Farmers in northern and southern Ethiopia are swapping coffee for khat’

Farmers in northern and southern Ethiopia are swapping coffee for khat asfalling prices put a squeeze on their profits. The farmers prefer to grow khat because they say it brings more money. Ethiopia's coffee export continues to plummet due to chaotic government controls and enforcement of bad policies. The downward trending export that began falling in 2008/09 following the government's tightening of its grip on the sector continues to nose-dive in the face of favorable international prices that hit a 13-year high in 2010 and a 29% increase in total production.

According to the International Coffee Organization (ICO), Ethiopia's production during the current crop year was 549,745 tons and domestic consumption is estimated at 223,747 tons. Based on available cumulativedata, the current year's export is forecasted to be about 143,442 tons - adecline by about 30% from last year's 199,871 tons.

Australian government announced that its Ethiopian Adoption Program hasbeen closed’

Below is the notice published on the Attorney General's website: - Australia has closed its intercountry adoption program with Ethiopia, following several years of issues with the Program, a suspension of all adoptions between 2009 and early 2010, as well as long waits and uncertainty for Australian prospective adoptive parents. The Australian Government has taken this difficult decision, in consultation with State and Territory Central Authorities. - The best interests and rights of children are the most important consideration for intercountry adoption programs. - The adoption environment in Ethiopia has become increasingly unpredictable, complex and uncertain, leaving many prospective Australian parents in limbo for years. - The Government has concluded that this uncertainty, combined with obstacles to operating the Program in a sustainable and ethical way into the future, means the Program needs to be closed. - The Australian Government has decided toclose the Program at this time because it will not impact on any individualEthiopian children as there are none currently referred to the Program. - The Australian Government will continue to support Ethiopia in ensuring that the rights of Ethiopian children are protected. -The Australian Government will also continue to support children adopted from Ethiopia and their families in maintaining their cultural links with Ethiopia. - Prospective adoptive parents who have paid fees to the Program will havetheir fees refunded in full. State and Territory Central Authorities will provide advice in relation to whether fees paid to them can be refunded.

Ethiopians and friends of Ethiopians residing in Oslo protested’

Ethiopians and friends of Ethiopians residing in Norway protested against the Ethiopian government’s, extreme humanrights violations such as killings, electricuted tortures including, extra-judicial imprisonment, land grabbing, ongoing interference in religious affairs, politicized justice system and so on .. committed by the regime in Ethiopia. The demonstrators have also urged the allies of the tyrant regime in the US, Britain and the European Union to not tolerate the regime’s flagrant violations of rights enshrined in domestic and international law. And the demonstrators urged Norway to work with pro-democracy Ethiopians to help bring about a positive change in their country. The demonstration is apart of showing solidarity for all the ongoing Ethiopians' struggle for democracy and freedom from inside the country and allover the world.

During the demonstration, there had been strongly termed condemnationsfrom religious, civic and political groups. The demonstration started in front of the parliament at Stortinget and ends at the central station at the Østebanehallen.

Political Tension In Sidama Zone and in particular at Awassa City is farfrom settled - Reports’

There was a conflict between group of individuals and the Ethiopian Federal Police forces patrolling the city. One individual is said to have dies of gunshot wounds. According to ESAT news report, the conflict was initiated by the Federal police forces on a group of Sidamas on wedding celebration. The patrolling Federal Police forces opened fire on a wedding crowd at Wolde-Amanuel Dubale Avenue. The random firing and killing of one individual instigated the wedding crowd to throw stone at the armed police forces which led to the police forces to fire a lot of bullets. Gunfires are still heard in town. The city is being patrolled by heavily armed Federal Police forces. ESAT reporter says there is a growing fear for a much serious confrontation and conflict in the city. There is a palpable fearamong the people that the Ethiopian Federal Police forces could still respond to their demand heavy handedly reminiscent of the 2002 Loque massacre. Only last week university students, employees of Agricultural Bureau, the region’s police, and member of the region’s parliament have formed a strong 300 member organization called Sidama Youth Movement. The movement is tasked to spearhead the political fight to bring statehood to ethnic-Sidamas.

A Visiting Sudanese Delegation Held a Consultative Meeting’

A isiting udanese delegation held a consultative meeting in Addis Ababa with Ethiopian government officials on ways of enhancing cooperation on the tourism sector, said the ministry of foreign Affairs. A 24 member group of Sudanese delegation has been paying a visit in Ethiopia for a week. The visitors were Sudanese tour operators, travel agents and journalists from different Sudanese media houses. The visit was arranged by the Ethiopian Ministry of Culture and Tourism in collaboration with Ethiopian Embassy in Khartoum. The group has visited tourist sites in different parts of the country. Visitors said they have witnessed Ethiopia'shuge potential in tourism. The visit aimed to attract more Sudanese tourists to Ethiopia. At a farewell occasion, Ethiopia Minister for Culture and Tourism, Mrs. Tadelech Dalecho, said in collaboration with Ethiopian Airlines, "in-flight advertisements are being screened to encourage tourism between Sudan and Ethiopia as part of the activities to help meetthe goals for the sector under the Growth and Transformation Plan (GTP)"Ethiopian Airlines presently has 11 flights a week to Khartoum. During thejoint meeting the two sides agreed to further strengthen their cooperationin pushing forward the tourism industry to boost mutual benefit. The two neighboring countries will in future prepare an exchange tour programs topromote Ethiopia-Sudan tourism sector. Ethiopia has 9 heritages inscribedby UNESCO as World Heritage sites, making the Horn of Africa nation continent's leading nation highest number of sites registered under UNESCO. Among others, the sites include Axum obelisk, Harar Jugol Wall,Konso Cultural Landscape, Rock-Hewn Churches of Lalibela, and the Semien National Park. The country has seen an in increase the flow of tourists compared to last year. During the past 9 months alone nearly halfmillion tourists have paid visit to the country and 371.8 million US dollars revenue were obtained during the stated period, according to State Ministry of Culture and Tourism.

ENTC – Released A Press Statement’

The newly established Ethiopian National Transitional Council (ENTC) issued it’s first official press release. The founding conference of EthiopianNational Transitional Council has convened in Dallas, Texas, on the day of30th June, 2012. Delegates from several cities and countries from around the world were participating. Following a 3-day intense discussion, the Dallas conference has formed “Ethiopian National Transitional Council” (ENTC) on Tuesday, July 3rd, 2012. The conference decided that the primary goal of ENTC is to prepare conditions for creating an all-inclusive Ethiopian Transitional Government that will replace the Woyanne ethnic- apartheid junta. ENTC is composed of representatives of patriotic Ethiopians from around the world, thus it is a council of people’s representatives. The conference thoroughly discussed how to get organizations, such as political and civic groups, involved in the process ofcreating the transitional government. It was decided to let the ENTC leadership start negotiations with the various stake holders, taking into consideration the suggestions and ideas presented by participants of the conference. After writing and adopting the bylaws, the conference held anelection and the following individuals elected to the top 3 leadership positions of ENTC. Ato Sileshi Tilahun, London, Speaker (Affe-Gubae), Wzro. Mekdes Worku, Stockholm, Deputy Speaker (Mikitil-Affe-Gubae), Dr. Fisseha Eshetu, Washington DC, General-secretary (Wana-Tsehafi).

On top of the above three, the following individuals have been elected to the Leadership Council: Wzro. Ferehiwot Derso, Ato Mansur Nuru, Ato Ananios Kebede, Ato Dereje Demissie, Ato Abebayehu Alula, Ato Belay Woldemariam. The 3-day conference was televised live via video stream and broadcast live via two paltalk rooms. A delegation of the Congress of Ethiopian People’s United Struggle, led by it’s vice-chairman Professor Achamyeleh Debela, attended the conference and offered valuable ideas and suggestions. The Congress also called as “Shengo” was formed recently in Ottawa, Canada, and is composed of over 15 political and civicgroups. Before the Dallas conference was formally adjourned, the new leadership went straight to work and made a series of decisions on budget, membership dues, etc. The 3-day conference was closed with a brief remark by the renowned writer Ato Assefa Guebre-Mariam Tessemaand a swearing-in ceremony conducted by a young Ethiopian, Mikael Habte-Mariam.

An Ethiopian girl born with eight limbs’ successfully undergoes surgery for 'Parasitic Twin'. The Ethiopian teenagerhas a new lease on life after doctors there successfully removed her four extra limbs in an eight-hour surgery, according to MSNBC. The deformity resulted from a birth defect known as a "parasitic twin." Dr. Eric Gokcen, an orthopedic surgeon at the CURE hospital where the surgery occurred, described the condition as similar to the phenomenon of Siamese twins, except the second "twin" is incomplete, leaving extra limbs to protrude from the torso. "I thought that everybody was just like me when I was a kid. But then I began to realize that I was different from others when people made fun of my appearance in my third and fourth grade," said theteenager in a press conference after the surgery, adding, "I could not takethe mocking any more after my seventh grade and I dropped out of school. I have been staying at home since then."

The Israeli government to arrange arrival of last members of EthiopianJewish community by 2014'

The Israeli Cabinet has approved plans to bring in the last of Ethiopia's Jews over the next two years. More than 120,000 Ethiopian Jews live in Israel after waves of immigration over the past three decades. Advocatessay some 2,200 Jews remain in Ethiopia. They are Falasha- Muras, members of a community that converted to Christianity under duress more than a century ago but have reverted to Judaism. Some in Israel have questioned whether the Falash Muras are actually Jewish. Ethiopian immigrants are routinely required to go through a religious conversion process. Once in the country, many face problems assimilating because ofcultural differences. Some say they encounter racism. The government said recently in a statement that it will open a $4.3 million absorption center in September, 2012 to accommodate the newcomers.

The five recently incarcerated monks from Waldiba Monastery are being coerced to take responsibility for the slew of heavy construction equipments destroyed at the site' The five recently incarcerated monks of Waldiba Monastery are being coerced to take responsibility for the slew ofheavy construction equipments destroyed at the site of the controversial Wolkait Sugar plantation. According to a report published by the EthiopianOrthodox Blog Deje-Selam, the five monks hauled from their monastry a government sweep are currently being kept in a tin walled cell at Adi- Arqay Locality Police Station. The monks are taken from Waldiba Sequar Kidane-Meheret Monastery which is administratively in the Amhara Regional state. However the monks are in prison in the North Western Tigray Region and this has become a point of contention between the officials of the two localities. The five monks are accused of incite the public for opposition and discussing the project with foreign media. The five monks are currently being pressured by government officials to take full responsibility for the recent incident of burnt construction equipment and injured construction workers at the sugar plantation site. Deje-Selam has also reported that the resistance to the sugar plantation is far from over and there are reports of resistance and opposition coming from manycorners of the region.

The Out of control of conflict between rival clans of ethnic-Oromos Gabresand Borenas in the Borena zone of Arero locality is said to have resulted the death of many clan members' Residents of the area that our reporter have talked to have expressed their fear that the scope and coverage of the conflict is growing and if it is not resolved the soonest time possible, itcould result in many loss of innocent lives. No federal intervention is reported. The residents say excluding the toll of the last two days, up to 21 clan members from ethnic-Oromos Gabres and 19 from Borena Oromos have lost their lives. The conflict has reached Sululta locality of Yabelo. The ethnic-Oromos Gabres and the Borena Oromos have always lived in peace and harmony until EPRDF instituted ethnic politics and planted the seed of suspicion among neighbouring communities. Several months back ESAT has reported a conflict between the ethnic-Somali tribeof Geri and the Borena Oromos that have resulted in huge loss of life.

There are growing number of ethnic strife and increasing tension among ethnic groups in many regions of Ethiopia. Many of the conflicts in Borenazone are believed to be related to sharing of dwindling resources like grazing land and waters in the region.

Ethiopian Muslims protesting what they call Ethiopian Government's directmeddling in their religious affairs' The Muslim community say the government is pushing on with its scheming to derail their peaceful movement. They accuse the government of employing nefarious tactics tothwart their movement and warn any action by the government that contravenes with the constitutionally guaranteed rights of the followers to practise their religion would be unhelpful. On Friday prayer, at the Grand Anwar Mosque in the busy Markato area of Addis Ababa, and the Nur Mosque at Piassa, followers of the faith expressed their collective dissatisfaction and angriest on the way in which the government is trying to handle their demands. Ethiopian Muslims have for the last 6 months been demanding the government to refrain from dictating a certain sect ofthe religion in the country. The activists who are organizing the rallies allege the leaders of the head Islamic body "Majlis" of being staffed by government lackeys and demand the immediate dissolution of it. The government has so far agreed to dissolve the Mejlis however they allege the process to elect a new Mejlis is being systematically taken over by thegovernment in a way that wouldn't guarantee the outcome to be of satisfaction to the followers. The government is moving on with the preparation to undertake the election using the normal government bureaucracy despite the followers continued demand to use the Mosques as polling places. One follower who asked to remain anonymous told reporter that followers of the religious are loosing trust on the government. He accused the government of scheming and plotting insteadof answering to the demands of the followers.

The German born dean of Adama University has quit his post and his much touted reform of the university is terminated' The 68 year old German Professor, Hans-Peter Langfeldt, took up his current post two anda half years ago and he was signed to transform Adama University's programs fashioned in German ways. His team of five German professors have also left the university. The Ethiopian government has brought in South Korean Professors in their stead. Professor Hans-Peter Langfeldt was said to have been expressing his misgiving with the way education is delivered in Ethiopia. Reports show that he has objected to the government's ambitious plan to increase the number of graduates from 150 thousand to 450 thousand by 2015. One individual who knows the matter and asked to remain anonymous said Professor Hans-Peter Langfeldt is unhappy with the way DAAD conducts its development related business in Ethiopia and has repeatedly requested the German Government to reassess its development assistance. Some commentatorsargue the sudden termination of DAAD's much touted program at Adama University is related to Ethiopian government's displeasure with its German counterpart's demand for the immediate release of Swedish Journalists currently serving their 11 year sentence on terrorism related charges. Quality of higher education has become a subject of heated debate after the Ethiopian television recently showed post graduate level graduatesdoing menial job in a country where many believe there is a shortage of skilled labour.

According to ESAT News, the ruling-EPRDF controlled Ethiopian Parliamentin extraordinary step unseen in it's almost two decades history has postponed its final seating before the Ethiopian winter break by one more week' The constitution in paragraph 58, sub article 2 requires the prime minister to submit the next fiscal year budget and send the parliament offfor its winter recess by 7th July (Sene 30 according to Ethiopian calendar).The final seating takes place on preceding 7th July. Traditionally the next year budget will be debated on in the weeks running up to the final seating and be voted on in the presence of the Prime Minister on this finalday of the parliamentary season. This year unlike any other time in the past, next year's budget hasn't been debated on as of yet and the final seating of the parliament is pushed forward by one more week. Accordingto sources, the Parliament is believed to be seating next week to finalize these duties before it closes down for winter recess. Sources didn't say anything whether the Prime Minister will be attending or not. The deferment of the Parliamentary session is believed to be linked to the health of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has called off numerous other executive meetings and prescheduled appearances. The dwindling state of the Prime Minister's health has invoked discussion among politicalcommentators of Ethiopia. Many observers believe the reign of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is coming to close. Supporters of the Prime Minster believe the Prime Minister could have been poisoned while others speculate the Prime Minster is suffering from a metastasizing brain tumour. ESAT reporter has made numerous calls to the hospital where PMMeles is believed to be getting treatment. However the hospital staffs are not willing to disclose any information about patients. ESAT reporter has received credible information that Prime Minster Meles is registered at thehospital as the Ethiopian Ambassador and not the Prime Minister of Ethiopia.

Ethiopian Flower Exporters Considering Russian Market'

Ethiopian flower exporters are considering entering the Russian flower market directly. Exporters were not able to access the large Russian market because Ethiopian Airlines does not offer flights to Moscow according to sources. Currently Ethiopian flowers are exported to the Netherlands with the Netherlanders exporting to Russia under their own tag. Ethiopian Airlines, the Ministry of Transport, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and the Ethiopian Airlines are working to facilitate the processes tolaunch cargo flights to Moscow said Mr. Endashaw Yigezu, Head of Air Transport and Planning at a consultative meeting held by the Ethiopian Civil Aviation Authority. A challenge encountered has been that airports inRussia are owned by private investors and charge high landing fees explained Endeshaw. The airport fees are 30% higher than other European airports demand and which is more than the price of the flowers he added. Ethiopian, however expects to finalize processes to commenceflights in view of the market potential of the Russian flower market explained a source.

The Holywood legend couples Will Smith and Jada Pinkett Smith inEthiopia'

The couples who in 2010 used their birthdays to raise USD 109,000 for charity: water, a non-profit organization which brings clean water to developing nations, have taken it one step further. The couple just visitedEthiopia with charity: water and inaugurated a clean well for a village of 400. Spotted smiling at each other while receiving gifts from grateful villagers, the two witnessed the construction of a brand-new well in the Maego village of Tigrai, north Ethiopia and even manned the organizationsnew drilling rig, Yellow Thunder. The celebration for the new water supplywas made complete when the Smiths danced and sang along with the community. "Our trip to Ethiopia with charity: water was an incredibly eye-opening and authentic experience," said the Smiths in a statement. "It was extraordinary to meet and spend time with the people of Tigrai and to see first-hand how clean water changes everything for these communities." The Smiths also raised an additional USD 789,000 for charity: water by promising to take the top donors with them to Ethiopia.Ethiopia, the most populated landlocked country in the world, still has 50million people who live without clean water.

Controversial Telecom fraud bill to be voted'

The House of People's Representatives (HoPR), where 99.6 per-cent of theseats belonging to the ruling party EPRDF is expected to vote on the controversial Telecom fraud proclamation at its special parliamentary session without any amendments. The new law may allow for a prison sentence up to eight years for providing telephone call and fax through the internet and up to three years imprisonment for obtaining the service,and is alleged to allow up to 15 years imprisonment for using VOIP services like Skype. Though provisions in the draft law state about it, the government denies the allegations that the law bans VOIP services is untrue. International press freedom advocates in the likes of Reporters Without Boards have voiced their concerns over the new law sighting that the law is ambiguous and may be used to persecute government dissenters and can limit freedom of expression. The Ethiopian governmentinsists that the law is to protect the revenue of the sole state run telecom provider. Many observers argue either way the draft law doesn't conform to the constitution of the country and is ambiguous and ill intended. Ethiopia is said to have the second lowest internet penetration rate in thewhole world. Prime Minister Meles Zenawi`s government has long been under fire from a number of humanright groups and media watch organizations for growingly repressive media laws. Reporters Without Borders (RWB) wishes to correct a report published on its website on 7th June stating that the 2012 Proclamation on Telecom Fraud Offences had been ratified by the Ethiopian authorities. We understand that the document has not yet been approved, despite the fact that the agenda circulated to journalists covering Parliament on May 24 explicitly said: "Examine and Endorse a Proclamation on Telecom Fraud Offences". Morethan 99 percent of the assembly's members belong to the ruling party.

Reporters Without Borders understands from media reports that the bill was drawn up by the Information Network Security Agency (INSA), tabledfor discussion by the Ministry of Communication and Information Technology and has now been referred to the Science, Communication and Technology Affairs Standing Committee for further inspection.

Speculation Rife about Zenawi's Health, Political Ramifications'

The health and whereabouts of Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi have become a subject of much speculation. The situation appears to border on panic, especially among regime loyalists. Addis Fortune, an otherwise compliant pro-government business publication chimes in with its own concerns. There is growing confusion among MPs in Ethiopia aboutthe whereabouts and health of the Prime Minister as he keeps on canceling several scheduled events and constitutionally dictated parliamentary sessions. There is growing speculation that the Prime Minister's health is so dire that doctors have told him he may only be living for as short as a few months. The Prime Minister has so far rescheduled important parliamentary sitting to debate and vote on next years budge. He is constitutionally required to present a report on the state of the republic which should have happened at the last week before July 7 of the parliamentary season. A prescheduled award ceremony at the Science and Technology Ministry where he was slated to be the guest of honor has also been postponed indefinitely. He was expected to attend the one year anniversary of the independence of the South Sudan Republic where his Kenyan and Ugandan counterparts attended. Though itwas reported that a delegation from Ethiopia has gone to South Sudan for the festivities, Meles Zenawi were a no show. We have since confirmed the Ethiopian delegation is led by the Deputy PM Hailemariam Desalegn.

He is slated to be speaking at the African union Summit currently underway in Addis Ababa and many observers are keen to see if he comesout for the summit. Since Meles came out after a month in hiding after hewas publicly humiliated in Washington DC by Abebe Gellaw many are speculating on the condition of his health. In his first public appearance atthe G20 Summit in Mexico he looked emaciated and haggard. Apart from speculations, no credible source has so far said what his actual ailments are. Some sources claim he is suffering from a blood cancer possibly Lymphoma or Leukemia and others say his actual illness is a malignant form of brain tumor. Ardent supporters of TPLF presume a possible poisoning by his own adversaries in the TPLF circle. Sources say Meles Zenawi is already informed by his doctor that his life on earth is numbered. ESAT's effort to confirm the veracity of the speculation didn't come to pass. The Addis Ababa Weekly Addis Fortune in its gossip column-Fine Line- disclosed that government bureaucrats were scramblingto collect medical documents that include invoices of the Prime Minister's foreign medical expenses from the various bureaus and ministries in an apparent effort to dampen the speculation. Though many believe the heightened security in Addis Ababa could be for the 19th African Union Summit, some believe there is a palpable fear among the TPLF/EPRDF political ranks as a possible political uncertainty looms large as a result of the deteriorating health of the Prime Minister.

ECONOMY: Inflation in Ethiopia as of June, 2012'

Inflation in Ethiopia fells to 21% in June from 25.5% in May on a 12 month basis, said the Central Statistic Agency on Monday. According to the Agency the 4.4% decline in inflation in June was as result of a drop in food prices, which was the major player for inflation. However the inflationfigure for the non-food items remained unchanged at 19.6% for the month. The Ethiopian government had promised to bring down inflation toa single digit by this month. Much to the public's chagrin, the official inflation figure still stands in the lows of 20s. Recently the Prime Minister, in his parliamentary question and answer session, postponed the delivery date of his promised single digit inflation figure for November of the next Ethiopian fiscal year. Ethiopia`s inflation figure still stands to be the second highest in the world.

U.S. Department of State Announces Soccer Envoy Program in Ethiopia'

The U.S. Department of State's Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs and US Soccer announced today that they will send Tony Sanneh and KateMarkgraf to Ethiopia July 11-15, 2012. Former men's national team member and Major League Soccer (MLS) player Sanneh and former women's national team member Markgraf will participate in a U.S. government exchange program that brings people together for greater understanding through sports. The envoys will be at work in the eastern Ethiopian city of Dire Dawa, where they will head the soccer portion of a four-day Youth Culture, Sport and Friendship Camp sponsored by the U.S.Embassy in Addis Ababa. This camp, organized together with the Ethio- Italy Technical College, The Dire Dawa Mayor's Office, The Dire Dawa Sports Commission and the Dire Dawa Police Commission, is aimed at exchanging cultural traditions and promoting healthy living through sport and education. The envoys will work with young men and women, ages 13

− 20. Sport Envoys are current and retired professional athletes and coaches from a range of sports that travel overseas to conduct drills, leadteambuilding sessions, and engage youth in a dialogue on the importanceof education, health, and respect for diversity. In partnership with SportsUnited, US Soccer players, coaches and administrators have visitedover 18 countries since 2006. The athletes have offered soccer clinics for thousands of boys, girls, and coaches. SportsUnited is the Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs' premier sports exchange program at the U.S. Department of State. Athletes and coaches from a range of sports are chosen to conduct clinics, visit schools, and engage with youth overseas in a dialogue on the importance of an education, positive health practices, and respect for diversity. Since 2003, SportsUnited has broughtnearly 1,000 athletes from over 60 countries to the U.S. to participate in Sport Visitor programs. Since 2005, SportsUnited has sent over 220 U.S. athletes to more than 50 countries to participate in Sport Envoy programs.

Athletics legend Kenenisa Bekele leads Ethiopians in bid for Olympicberths'

Running legend Kenenisa Bekele spearheads a group of Ethiopian runners seeking to nail down berths at this month's Olympic Games in London in the coming days. The 10,000m trial for men will take place in Liege, Belgium, on Thursday, while the 5000m qualifying race for men is set to take place at the Diamond League meet in Paris on Friday. "We are ready now, we've already had good performances," Dube Jillo, technical director of the Ethiopian Athletics Federation, told AFP. Reigning Olympic 5000- 10,000m champion Kenenisa Bekele will run in Paris, and Dube said that despite suffering from an injury for the last two years, the runner was confident of performing well in the French capital. "The 10,000m (runners) are very strong athletes. I hope Bekele is in the team," he said. Ethiopia -

- known for a strong tradition of running and athletics -- won four gold medals in the 2008 summer Olympics in Beijing, the other two coming from Tirunesh Dibaba, who mirrored Bekele in claiming a 5000-10,000m double. Head coach Yilma Berta said he also had high hopes for Bekele, expecting high results for him in the London Games, which kick off on July 27. "He will fight with our athletes and all the other athletes and he will perform like he did in the last Olympics," Yilma said. Ibrahim Jeilan, who will be racing the 10,000m in Liege on Thursday, said he has high hopes for his teammates, both at this week's qualifying races and at the OlympicGames, with so many up-and-coming athletes taking part. "They are younger and new athletes, maybe for this year we have chance to win golds in both men and women's events," he told AFP. He said he was prepared for his upcoming race, despite being out of training for six months due to an injury. He hurt a tendon and only started training in May, which he said could affect his performance. "I don't have endurance,I haven't put in endurance training, that may be my problem in my race," he said, adding that mentally he feels ready to run and expects to come inunder 27 minutes, required to qualify for the Olympic team. "I'm feeling better, I am ready for this race, but one week ago I was disturbed, I was worried about injury and about risk. Now I am ready now, I am feeling free now," he said. Ethiopia has not yet finalized its Olympic team but is expected to announce the full list of competing athletes at the weekend. Only the marathon team has been finalized so far. The Ethiopian Olympic Committee on named a 40-member strong team to compete in this month's London Olympics:
Men
400m: Bereket Desta, 800m: Mohammed Aman
1500m: Mekonen Guebre-Medhin, Dawit Wolde, Teshome Diririsa, AmanWete (Reserve)
5000m: Dejen Gebremeskel, Hagos Guebre-Hiwet, Yenew Alamirew,Kenenisa Bekele (Reserve)
10000m: Kenenisa Bekele, Tariku Bekele, Guebre-EgziabherGebremariam, Lelisa Desisa (Reserve)
3000m steeplechase: Roba Gari, Birhan Getahun, Nahom Mesfin
Marathon: Ayele Abshero, Dino Sefir, Getu Feleke, Tadesse Tolla(Reserve)
Women:
800m: Fantu Magiso
1500m: Abeba Aregawi, Genzebe Dibaba, Mesekerem Assefa
5000m: Meseret Defar, Gelete Burka, Genet Yalew, Tirunesh Dibaba(Reserve)
10000m: Tirunesh Dibaba, Belaynesh Olijara, Werknesh Kidane, AberuKebede (Reserve)
3000m steeplechase: Sofia Assefa, Hiwot Ayalew, Etenesh Diro, ZemezemAhmed (Reserve)
Marathon: Tiki Gelana, Aselefech Mergia, Mare Dibaba, BezuneshBekele(Reserve)

A pan-Ethiopian says “all our athletes have not the tradition of comingback home empty handedly, though, I had not being ever ashamed ofthem previously, and of course, this time I will not be ashamed of myrunning legends”.

A veteran Ethiopian state journalist who was twice imprisoned on vague corruption and copyright charges and recently convicted on the lesser charge was released on account of a reduced sentence - Local journalists’A panel of judges at the Lideta Federal High Court in the capital, Addis Ababa, sentenced Abdulsemed Mohammed, a former senior producer withgovernment-controlled broadcaster Ethiopian Radio and Television Agency (ERTA), to three and half years in prison but said he could go free on account of time already served. The judges also put Abdulsemed on probation for two years, the local journalists said. Abdulsemed and another senior ERTA journalist, editor Haile-Eyesus Worku, were first arrested in 2010 on corruption charges--a non-bailable offense under Ethiopian law-- brought by the Ethiopian Federal Ethics and Anti- Corruption Commission, local journalists said. At the time, Ethiopian government spokesman Bereket Simon told CPJ the journalists had been caught "red-handed" trying to sell ERTA materials to an unnamed third party. However, prosecutors repeatedly requested additional time to carryout investigations and eventually dropped the corruption charges, amending the accusations to copyright infringement. The journalists were released on bail in July 2011, having served 15 months, according to localjournalists and news reports. Haile-Eyesus fled into exile, while Abdulsemed remained but was unable to work as a journalist, according tolocal journalists. Both had worked for the state broadcaster for more than a decade. Abdulsemed Mohammed was re-arrested last month after judges convicted him on copyright charges for possessing copies of ERTA'sprograms without the station's consent, according to news reports. Hail- Eyesus was convicted in absentia. "While we're relieved that Abdulsemed Mohammed has been released, he should not have spent a single day in prison on criminal charges that appear frivolous and politically motivated,"CPJ East Africa Consultant Tom Rhodes said. "This guilty verdict casts a further chill over a press corps that has been targeted repeatedly by authorities." ERTA, established by the Ethiopian constitution as a publicly- funded national outlet, operates under the tight grip of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi's ruling party, according to CPJ research. Ahead of 2010 elections, in which the party swept 99% of parliamentary seats, the Melesadministration replaced senior, independent-minded professional journalists like Abdulsemed with party loyalists, according to CPJ research and local journalists.

A prominent Ethiopian journalist and blogger has been sentenced to 18 years in jail for violating the country's anti-terrorism legislation’ Eskinder Nega and 23 others were found guilty last month. They were accused of links with US-based opposition group Ginbot-7, which Ethiopia considers aterrorist organisation. Opposition activist Andualem Arage was given a lifesentence by the court in the capital, Addis Ababa. In May, Eskinder was awarded the prestigious Pen America's Freedom to Write annual prize for his work. Human rights groups have criticised Ethiopia's anti-terrorism legislation for being too far-reaching. "The court has given due considerations to the charges and the sentences are appropriate," Reutersnews agency quotes Judge Endeshaw Adane as saying. Eskinder and Andualem, a member of the opposition Unity for Democracy and Justice party, were in court to hear their sentence - 16 members of the group found guilty in June are in exile, AFP news agency reports. The two men waved to family members and friends as they walked into the courtroom which was filled with crowds and family of the activists, as well as journalists and diplomats, the agency says. Eskinder Nega was arrested last September after publishing an article questioning arrests under the anti-terrorism legislation, especially that of well-known Ethiopian actor and government critic Debebe Eshetu. In 1993 Eskinder opened his first newspaper and has been detained at least seven times by the governmentof Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. After he was found guilty last month, the US-based campaign group Human Rights Watch (HRW) said the case showed that Ethiopia's government would not tolerate "even the mildest criticism". An Ethiopian guard working for the UN was jailed for seven years for communicating with the banned Ogadien National Liberation Front (ONLF) in June. In December, two Swedish journalists were sentenced to 11 years in prison for supporting the ONLF. Both the ONLF, which has been fighting for greater independence in the Ogadien area thatborders Somalia, and Ginbot-7, have been designated as terrorist groups by the Ethiopian parliament.

States should earn their seats on the Human Rights Council' - UN directorat Human Rights Watch' Philippe Bolopion, UN director at Human Rights Watch, "A little bit of healthy competition would help ensure that only those most serious about human rights get a seat at the table." The UN General Assembly resolutionthat established the Human Rights Council states that members shall uphold the "highest standards" of human rights, but Sudan and Ethiopia fall far short of that threshold, the organizations said. "States like Sudan and Ethiopia with records of grave human rights violations should not be nrewarded with seats on the Human Rights Council," said Hassan Shire Sheikh, director of the East and Horn of Africa Human Rights Defenders Project. "By endorsing their questionable candidacies, the AU would undermine the work of the council by tarnishing its membership, and turn its back on victims of abuses in these countries." The makeup of the Human Rights Council reflects the UN's geographic composition, with seatsallotted by regional group. Five of the 18 seats for which new members are to be elected to the 47-member council in November are allotted to African states. The African Group put forward a "clean slate" with as manycandidates as the number of reserved seats: Côte d'Ivoire, Ethiopia, Gabon, Sierra Leone, and Sudan. Without competitive elections, states aredeprived of the chance to select the candidates best suited to serve on thecouncil. The civil society groups urged the AU to support competition among African states for seats on the council and ensure that candidates are elected on the basis of their human rights records.

The notorious secretary of National Electoral Board of Ethiopia (NEBE) Tesfaye Mengesha, is no longer holding his position he has held for morethan a decade' Ato Nega Dufisa has been installed in his place.

Tesfaye Mengesha has repeatedly been accused of working with the ruling-EPRDFto set up a completely rigged process that in the previous three electionshas delivered sweeping election victory for the front. In the controversial May-2005 election, Tesfaye has singlehandedly played an instrumental role in rerunning selected elections where top officials of the ruling-EPRDFhad lost by huge margin there by swinging back the vote 100% in the EPRDF's favour. No information has been given by the board as to why Tesfaye Mengesha was sacked. Tesfaye has had an ongoing health issuesand observers of the institution allege he might be relieved of his responsibility because of his deteriorating health. Merga Beqana, head of the electoral board, has proposed Nega Dufisa and Wondimu Gola as secretary and vice secretary of the board in the extraordinary sitting of parliament. The parliament has approved the nomination with super majority vote except one may by the lone opposition parliamentarian, Girma Seifu. The new secretary and vice secretary are former heads of various branch organizations at the NEBE's national apparatus. MP Girma Seifu has registered his protest vote on their nominations citing their longcareer in a politically skewed bureaucracy of the NEBE. According to the MP, NEBE has proved itself to be an impartial organization, and he wouldn't expectthese individuals to show impartiality given the fact that they have been working in the same structure before their current nomination. Tesfaye Mengesha has always been depicted as the face of NEBE and many see him as instrument of outright vote rigging the country's elections are now famous for.

Speculation on PM Meles Zenawi engulfed Addis Ababa as he has not beenseen for over three weeks or so' It's well known that he is not in good health after he had been seen with Chinese President Hu Jin Tao in Mexico. As is the situation when information is not readily available peoplemake up all sorts of explanations to fill the void. Regarding Meles's health the speculation has gone viral and right now it is difficult to keep count of the possible scenarios. According to insiders withi the TPLF, one thing known for certain Meles Zenawi is holed up somewhere due to illness, vacation or even death. Nobody knows. His handlers are telling he is in perfect health but are no forthcoming on why he is hiding from 'his' people. It is perfectly sane to assume there is something gone wrong in Arat Kilo state house. What made the situation more alarming is his absence during the 24th Tigrai Martyr's Day Celebration. The Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is secretly receiving medical treatment in Meles Zenawi is "terminally ill" with cancer Brussels this week, after the 57-year-old former gurrella fighter was diagnosed with a severe case of blood cancer. Adding creditably to reports of his deteriorating health, Meles has rescheduled all public appearances for the last two weeks, including presiding over his rubber-stamp parliament, an unprecedented move. Meles, who has battled substance abuse his entire adult life, has not been publicly seen in weeks, raising speculation that his health is to blame. Sources say Meles suffers from a number of aliments, including blood cancer, brain tumor, type 2 diabetes and depression. "I've been tipped off by his inner circle that his rapid weight loss and frail appearanceof late is due to radical treatment being given to Meles in an attempt to save his life. Belgium doctors have informed him he is terminally ill and likely has 6-12 months to live. To put it bluntly: he's only buying time," said a source with ties to elusive Ethiopian National Intelligence and Security Service (ENISS). It is not clear who would take over Ethiopia if Meles' health continues to spiral out of control. Sources say TPLF bigwigs are split among two factions: General Samora Yunis and the Head of Government Communications, Bereket Simon. With the head of ENISS backing General Samora Yenus, and rank and file politicians supporting Bereket Simon, conflict almost looks certain. Reports indicate rebel groupsin the country have increased assaults on military position after learning of Meles health deteriorating. One military clash between TPDM and EDF inside the Enticho district killed 43 EDF members and wounded dozens more. Word is out in the Ethiopian community that Meles Zenawi is seriously ill or may even be dying. It has caused many to speculate—or panic, depending on one's position—about the future of the TPLF/EPRDF should Meles be suddenly gone from leadership, whether the reason is poor health, death or retirement—forced or voluntary—if rumors about an internal power struggle are correct. that Meles may be seriously ill and close to death may be credible. He has not been seen since June 18, 2012and has not shown up for two very crucial meetings where he typically plays a significant role. The first was the end-of-the-year meeting of Parliament when the final budget should have been presented by Meles along with the prime minister's address to Parliament. Secondly, he did not show up for the African Union meeting held today (7/13/12) in Addis Ababa, but no one in charge is talking about it. Why the secrecy? Is it because the "system of power" Meles has advanced was on a downward spiral already; however, if he dies now, his death may also signal the "political death" of the TPLF/EPRDF. No wonder his health condition is being hidden from the public. TPLF/ERPDF leaders need time and are ill- prepared to enter into such an urgent political struggle for power that maycost them dearly if they do not cling to it. We already hear of the rise in power of Azeb Mesfin and the animosity she is creating towards herself and among others who resent her power. These are TPLF loyalists like Bereket Simon, the generals who are with Meles and those opposing him, or Arkebe Equbay's group, who are ready to usurp power and to try to keep the status quo—especially for the sake of Tigrayans. Then there is the Hailemariam Dessalegn factor and the rise of the Southern Nations and the Oromos let alone the Amharas, the Ogadieni, the Afar and others.They also may be forced to taste the poisonous fruit of the ethnic-based venom they have so successfully spread over the past twenty plus years, which has alienated the people of Tigrai from the rest of the Ethiopians. Atthe same time, the "Anti-TPLF campaign, set in motion by some in the Diaspora, whether we like it or not, has furthered that hostility.

The Ethiopian primier, in a "critical" condition in hospital in Brussels and may not survive - Diplomatic sources' The 57-year-old premier has not been seen publicly for several weeks and missed a crunch African Union summit his country was hosting at the weekend at which a new chair waselected. The Ethiopian government has confirmed that he is unwell but repeated promises of updates on his condition have been delayed. On Wednesday, a Western diplomatic source in Brussels told the Telegraph that he is now "critically ill". "He is being treated as a private person and the information is confidential but it is understood that he is critically ill," the diplomat said. Mr Zenawi is thought to be receiving treatment for an unspecified condition at the Saint Luc University Hospital in Brussels. The hospital is a centre for the treatment of blood or "haematological" cancers.17 Jul 2012. Other diplomats told the AFP that Mr Zenawi might not survive his illness. "He is in a critical state, his life is in danger," said one. "He is in a critical state but is alive," another added. Ethiopia's ambassador in Brussels and the hospital authorities refused to comment on the reports. In Addis Ababa, however, Bereket Simon, a government spokesman, insisted that Mr. Zenawi, who has held power in the populous Horn of Africa nation for over two decades, was recovering. "He is not in acritical state. He is in good condition," he told AFP. Questions surfaced about Mr Meles's health when he missed a two-day African Union summit Sunday and Monday in Addis Ababa, apparently for the first time since 1991. He was last seen looking thin and pale at the G20 summit in Mexicoin June. Whatever Mr. Zenawi's condition, anger is growing among Ethiopians at the refusal of his government to provide clarity on the situation and speculation has begun to swirl about possible successors.

The one-time Marxist, who toppled the brutal dictatorship of Mengistu Haile Mariam in 1991, has run Ethiopia through strongly centralised control for two decades and analysts struggle to envisage how the countrywould be operate without him. Adjoa Anyimadu, Chatham House's Horn ofAfrica expert, said that Mr. Zenawi's force of personality meant that few other Ethiopian politicians were well-known. "He is the face of the Ethiopian ruling class so it's difficult to see who would take over from him," she said. "Ethiopia is also very closely involved in regional issues, from its conflict with Eritrea, mediating between South and North Sudan and providing troops to Somalia. The level of uncertainty if this carries on could have repercussions for the region." "He definitely has brain tumor, probably glioblastoma multiforme, stage 4; the tumor (slow growing) has been deemed inoperable from initial diagnosis in 2006; he is in hospital inBelgium; recent physical appearance probably due to intense regime of chemo and or radiation; similar diagnosis and prognosis as Senator Ted Kennedy." Other indepedent sources also add their voice that Meles Zenawi, who is at St. Luke Clinic in Brussels, Belgium has been in a vegetative or coma-like state on a life-support system from which recovery is nearly impossible.

China pledges $20bn in credit for Africa at China-Africa Forum Summit’

China has pledged $20bn (£12.8bn) in credit for Africa over the next threeyears, in a push for closer ties and increased trade. President Hu Jintao made the announcement at a summit in Beijing with leaders from 50 African nations. He said the loans would support infrastructure, agricultureand the development of small businesses. The Chinese leader also called for better co-operation with African countries on international affairs. As developing nations, China and countries in Africa should work better together in response to "the big bullying the small, the strong domineering over the weak and the rich oppressing the poor" in international affairs, said Mr Hu. The loan is double the amount China pledged in a previous three-year period in 2009, since which time China has been Africa's largest trading partner. Trade between the two hit a record high of $166bn (£106bn) in 2011, Chinese Commerce Minister Chen Deming wrote in the China Daily newspaper, ahead of the two-day forum. "We want to continue to enhance our traditional friendship... rule out external interference and enhance mutual understanding and trust," said Mr Hu. United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon is also attending the fifth ministerial meeting of the Forum on China-Africa Co- operation. Mr Hu and Premier Wen Jiabao held bilateral talks with key African leaders, including South African President Jacob Zuma. Africa is animportant source of raw materials to feed China's economic boom and a market for cheap Chinese products, and has benefited from huge infrastructure projects in return, says the BBC's Damian Grammaticas. Butthere are concerns Beijing turns a blind eye to corruption and claims its firms have committed labour abuses in Zimbabwe, Zambia and elsewhere,our correspondent adds. Moves by some Chinese enterprises to hire mostly Chinese nationals have also drawn attention. Mr Wen said that China would now focus on creating jobs for local residents and working with African countries for sustainable growth. At an economic conference held in conjunction with the summit on Wednesday, he said China would "expand imports" of African products and "further open" its domestic market to African countries. "We need to promote balanced development of trade between China and Africa," he said. He also pledged that China would pay more attention to environmental protection and cultural issues in its dealings with the continent. "As for some existing problems and newsituations in China-Africa co-operation, the Chinese government is actively working with African countries to seek effective solutions and measures," Mr. Wen said. According to political commentators, “when elephants fight the grass gets trampled” Communist china's voracious apetite for Africa's resources is insatiable: Russia is determined to regain it's status of supermacy: both countries have a poor humanrights record. Saudi Arabia in the sub-region is religious exteremist. India is utterly a corrupt country.Chinese companies are propping up by the weight of their government at the negotiating tables in Ethiopia and elsewhere in Africa. Western powersand all the countries mentioned above have either economic or strategic interests in the Horn of Africa. There is an opportunity to attract wide- scale western investment rivaling that already emanating from China. As example Beijing has underwritten most of the recent big-ticket investments in infrastructure, telecommunications and power grids in Africa. Meantime, Beijing Irate over Hillary Clinton’s Statement on China’s Role in Africa’ US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton’s subtle but pointed declaration that China is technically exploiting Africans of their resources seems to have struck some nerves in Beijing, a statement on the Chinese government official news agency’s website show. Secretary Clinton made this statement at the Senegal stop of in her still not concluded six country tour in Africa. The secretary called on African government to espouse democratic governance which she said is the only acceptable option they have. She rebuked African government’s that are seeking China’s economic and political patronage in a bid to circumvent scrutiny and accountability. The Secretary of state didn’t name China by name but it is obvious for any one that her sharp accusation is pointed at Beijing. In her speech she gave in Dakar Secretary Clinton said Washington is seeking forstronger partnerships in Africa that adds value, not extract it. The Chinese government didn't seem to take her remark too lightly. The Chinese government's anger was evident on the official government news agency Xinhua's website. The statement on Xinhua accused the secretary of nefarious plot to create suspicious and discord between China and African People. The English language statement then went on to paint the Secretary and what it called Western colonial powers of pure hypocrisy.

Xinhua called Hillary's accusation 'wide of the truth' and extoled the positive contribution Chinese investment has brought to African countriesdevelopment.

Meles Zenawi's health has been the hottest political talk among Ethiopiansall over the world even more so in Tigrai' Since the reappearance of the Prime Minister after a month long disappearance last June at a G2 Summitin Mexico, his health status has been a subject of discussion among the public. However the level of public interest and the rate at which various accounts are circulating around metropolitan Mekele has reached a fever pitch since last week. There are two opposing rumours going around. One section of the community believes either Meles is terminally ill or may even is dead while others think Meles has only a minor health issue and will be back in control sometime soon. Life is the same all over the region. Nonetheless given the level of public interest in the matter the situation could change easily if any of the rumours about the Prime Minister turn out to be accurate. A former comrade of the Prime Minister and now a member of an opposition party say 'the government has to be forthcomingwith the information about the health state of the Prime Minster. Any move to hide the truth from the public wouldn't serve either the government or the country.' The individual concluded his remark by downplaying the political ramification of the Prime Minister's illness or death in the immediate political dynamics of the country. Various account of the Prime Minsters health state is circulating at various outlets. Some speculation goes as far as declaring that he is dead. The speculation that has received traction is the account that he is terminally ill so much so he had to miss numerous important events ranging from Parliamentary sessions to AU and NEPAD meetings in Addis Ababa. Currently some say he is inside Ethiopia while others speculate he is still abroad getting treatment. Not long after Temesgen Desalegn of Fetehe Newspaper statedon his Facebook page that the Prime Minister is back in Addis, the London based daily Telegraph, quoting a diplomat in Addis, declared the Prime Minister is still abroad receiving treatment. The public interest in the health of the Prime Minister is huge. Our news desk is receiving a more than usual public request regarding rumours circulating around. The Ethiopian social media scene is abuzz with rumours, cartoons and political statements. Meles was born in Tigray, and the 17 year gorrilla war that brought him to power was initiated and waged from that region. Accordingto a Voanews report, the Ethiopian government is said to have organized a press conference for Wednesday afternoon to clarify the matter to the public.

National Youth Movement for Freedom and Democracy (NYMFD) known locally as “QEERROO” released statement’ “Since the EPRDF government came to power, neither the Ethiopian people, nor the Oromos in particular,have lived in peace and tranquility. The last 21 years on power, the regime has boosted itself as a guarantor of the right of nations and nationalities while it brutally imprisoned, tortured and killed those who have demanded for their legitimate right. Hunger, poverty, land grabbing, imprisonment and killings remain to be the visible face of the current dying regime. Despite the hugely hostile situation and unspeakable political tragedies meant to drag dissidents to submission, the people haveremained at odds with dictatorial regime in their struggle. The sacrifices were also immense. In Oromiya, the fear and animosity of the regime towards the people have resulted in massive and limitless imprisonment and displacement programs; even if that has in fact strengthened the people towards their struggle for freedom and self-determination. In theseyears of struggles, the merciless Woyane prisons have claimed the precious lives of thousands of Oromos. When the option for a peaceful struggle literally disappeared, the people were dragged into an armed struggle. The responses to the resistance of the people for the last two decades were imprisonment, killing and planned impoverishing programs. These heartless brutality and unaccountability have further heightened thesuppressed nations and nationalities in the Ethiopian empire to strive for more freedom and self determination. On the foundation of the high price paid by our martyrs for the cause of Oromo and Oromiya, our continued struggle for freedom and self determination to see the free and independent Oromiya has reached a new chapter. The man at the very center of these unspeakable repression, brutality and dictatorship, Mr.
Meles Zenawi, has failed and seriously ill that he could not have anymore the opportunity, ability and moral to lead the regime any further. With his double personality and endless lies, Meles has amassed the support and aid of the western government to sustain his regime at the height of his visible repression. The fact that business is not running as usual, and the countdown to the end of his days have further enhanced the fracturing and troubles in the ruling party. In addition to the shock of the regime, the firm and unbending resistance of the Oromo people coupled with the demand of the Muslim community for more freedom and demand a hand out of the religious matter has already pointed the 11th hour of the regime. Both the regime and Meles Zenawi are in comma. Accordingly, the movement of QEERROO National Youth Movement for Freedom and Democracy (NYMFD) confirms and underlines its continued presence in each and every popular uprising and resistance that leads to more freedom and realization of right to self determination of the Oromo people. Qeerroo calls up on the followers of Christianity and Waaqefataa religions to stand behind the quest of their Muslim brothers and sisters to bring down the current repressive regime and put an end to the misery that went through the last one century. It is also very crucial to underline and identify the fact that all answers will be available if and only if we were able to realize the free and independent Oromiya with our common effort and sacrifices. With its organizational network and coordinated struggle, Qeerroo confirms its support for all popular resistance against the current totalitarian regime and continues to work to bring an end to the Woyane regime. Especially, the struggle against the so called “Investors” or land grabbers, who have mercilessly marched against our people, robbed the nation and served the regime as backbone will be uncompromised and non-negotiable. It is the time for our people to protect and regains its dignity, properties, fight for and realize its freedom and its right to self determination. Our brothers and sisters, who have migrated to foreign lands due the repression and persecution, should also play their role and shake the dying regime to the ground. These who havealready engaged in divisive agenda of dividing brethrens and struggle of our people and trying to buys days to the dead regime should immediatelychange course and help their people to write a new chapter in the history of the nation, where equality, rule of law and democracy will flourish.

The Future of Democracy In Ethiopia’

Reports have been floating about the ill health of Meles Zenawi. There is, of course, a strong element of wishful thinking attached to the rumours – a reflection how reviled the regime is. Emotions aside, however, the situation calls for a sober assessment of our current situation and what is to come should a sudden change of event occur in Ethiopia. The “Arab Spring” that signaled the emergence of democracy in Libya, Egypt, Tunisia, Yemen and a number of Middle Eastern countries currently faces severe challenges. It seems overthrowing a dictatorship is much easier than building a functioning democracy and a stable society to replace it. The main reason is, of course, the absence of a democratic culture. In order to mold an obedient and docile citizenry, a totalitarian political system encourages a culture of passivity and apathy, therefore purposefully discourage free thought and suppress the emergence of various institutions -political parties, civic associations that would have created a culture of civil participation and with it the practice of peaceful negotiation and compromise. In the case of Ethiopia, the regime deliberately sowed the seeds of hatred and paranoia, and discouraged anyactive civic participation in public life as well as dissent. Therefore a carefully crafted transitional plan is of paramount importance. If want to avoid past mistakes in past history and chart a path to a prosperous and peaceful future for the embattled country. There are several factors to consider such as, elections and the opposition factors, ethnic, the militaryrole, regional factors, and of course humanitarian concerns.

EU should be paying more attention to the abusive policies being pursuedby Ethiopia's ailing Meles’

The cancellation of a scheduled press conference this week, to discuss the health of the Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi – currently in Belgiumfor treatment – started rumours flying. Belgians might be interested to know why Ethiopians are watching events in Brussels so keenly. Claiming to follow the Chinese model of development – economic growth first, rights later – is a tempting fig-leaf for despots around the world eager to justify their suppression of dissent at home. Ethiopia has praised the Chinese approach while insisting that it conforms to human-rights principles in its own constitution and respects the rule of law. Donors, keen to support Ethiopia's growth and attempts at reducing poverty, have been willing to tolerate its rights abuses in exchange for security partnerships and healthy statistics showing progress on the Millennium Development Goals. Meanwhile, the Zenawi government has allowed serious human-rights abuses committed by security forces – including warcrimes and crimes against humanity – to go unpunished. It has used a raftof repressive legislation to jail critical voices in the media and civil society,shut down or paralyse independent human-rights activity, and send a chilling message to Ethiopian citizens that any step out of line will meet with harsh consequences.

Office of Government's Communication Minister Bereket Simon said Meleswon't be back to his work anytime soon' Bereket said this in a press conference he gave yesterday to local and foreign correspondents in AddisAbaba. He also categorically denied widely circulating news of party infighting for control of the leadership should Meles' death come to pass.

Meles' ailment has been a subject of rampant internet rumour since he was seen thin and haggard at a G20 summit in Los Cabos, Mexico. ESAT, siting numerous credible sources, has made numerous news reports on the matter for well over three weeks now. The government has been largely mum on the health and whereabouts of the Prime Minister until yesterday. Several weeks ago Bereket's deputy, Shimelis Kemal, denied the news report accusing ESAT of fabrication. However the news got hugetraction after AFP and various other media published a news a few days ago mentioning diplomatic sources. Bereket attributed the long and bewildering silence of the government on the matter to an age old party tradition. Though largely the reports coming from credible media suggest Meles to be bed bound and in critical condition, Bereket was stern in his statement that Meles is only exhausted. He attributed his ailments to extraordinary work load and stated the Prime Minister will be back after completing the prescribed sick leave. Asked about the nature of the ailments, and the hospital where the PM is getting treatment at Bereket chose not to disclose anything alluding family privacy. A press conference was initially called for Wednesday afternoon Ethiopian time; however Bereket's office cancelled the planned press conference without giving further explanation. Another press conference is called again for Thursdayafternoon which was conducted in two successive instalments for local andforeign correspondents. In related development, the former President of the nation, Negasso Gidada, has returned back to Ethiopia after undergoing a successful medical treatment. Asked his opinion about the rumours circulating around the Prime Minister's health, Negasso said the level of confusion and commentary going around is not a good sign. He underscored the need for a policy change in the country whether Meles come back to power or any one replaces him. Negasso also speculated on the likelihood of power struggle inside the government should the uncertainty lingers for far too long.

Ethiopian PM's Health Still in Question'

Sebhat Nega, founding member of the TPLF and Ethiopia's ruling party is accusing opposition groups and European media of exaggerating the health problems of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. There have been conflicting reports about the condition of the longtime prime minister, whohas not been seen in public for two weeks. In an interview with VOA, Sibhat Nega of Ethiopia's ruling Tigrai People's Liberation Front denied European media reports that Mr. Meles is in critical condition at Saint Luc Hospital in Brussels. “I can tell you for sure that there is no undesirable eventuality regarding his health. I am 100 percent sure that he's recovering health-wise and he will be back to his official duty in a number of days.” Nega's statements are consistent with those of government officials, who told VOA on Wednesday that the 57-year-old prime ministeris sick, but not gravely ill. Sibhat Nega, who is friend of Mr. Meles, says the issue is not of major concern to most Ethiopians. He accused opposition groups of attempting to use his sickness to their advantage. “It's not a very important issue (among) the people. It is the opposition parties that are trying to exploit this because they are wishful thinkers.

Otherwise, in the normal situation, it's not a major issue.” Ethiopian dissident websites have published unconfirmed reports that the prime minister is suffering from brain cancer. Nega said the government has been functioning normally during Mr. Meles' absence, insisting that the “system does not depend on one person.” Although Ethiopia's parliamentpassed the prime minister's budget on Monday, the government abruptlycancelled a scheduled news conference Wednesday afternoon without explanation. An official with the Ethiopian Embassy in Kenya said Mr.

Meles is “a little bit sick” and “exhausted,” but added that the primeminister will be back at work soon. Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, an intellectual ex-rebel vilified bysome as a dictator but praised by others as a visionary, has dominated politics at home and in the region for over two decades’ – AFP The Ethiopian government said that Meles, a sharp-witted and charismatic player in the volatile Horn of Africa region, is in "stable" health but has been told to take a leave of absence. Iron-fisted and austere, Meles was propelled into the club of African rulers in power for more than 20 years by a landslide victory in 2010 elections, where he won 99 percent of the vote. From the revolutionary who fought to topple Mengistu Haile Mariam in 1991, the 57-year-old leader has created a new persona for himself as the champion of Africa's economic and environmental rights on the international scene. But while he has cast himself as the much-needed strongman capable of lifting his Horn of Africa country out of poverty, harsher critics say some actions are reminiscent of previous ruthless Ethiopian autocrats. Born on May 8, 1955, Meles abandoned his medical studies before he turned 20 to join the rebel Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) and fight Mengistu. After taking over the TPLF's leadership heforged a broader coalition with others regional movements to make up theEthiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), now the country's ruling party. With US backing, the rebellion toppled Mengistu's bloody dictatorship in 1991, a year after Meles abandoned Marxism. The diminutive Meles, with his characteristic goatee and arched eyebrows, hasbecome one of the most recognizable figures on the African scene. In recent years, Meles has challenged the world's powerful and spearheaded an African push for more fairness in key climate change talks. While he has been regularly singled out by rights groups as one of the continent's worst human rights predators, some Western observers have taken the pragmatic view that Ethiopia and the region needed Meles where he was. Former US president Bill Clinton once called him a "renaissance leader" while a leaked 2009 US diplomatic cable described him as "quiet, deliberative and certainly not a 'man about town'" adding he was a "voracious reader and very introspective." He is credited with Ethiopia's economic boom in the past decade, with economic growth shooting from 3.8 percent in the 1990s to 10 percent in 2010. Meles, who has earned degrees in business from Britain's Open University and in economics from Erasmus University in The Netherlands, lists his hobbies as reading, swimming and tennis. Sharp-witted, confident and charismatic, Meles has not, unlike many of his fellow African leaders, earned a reputation for having a taste for luxury. On the domestic front Meles has come under firefrom human rights organizations who regularly accuse him of gross abuses against ethnic minorities, including Ethiopia's ethnic Somalis in theeastern Ogaden region, where rebels have fought a long running insurgency. Similar ethnic conflicts have boiled amongst the Oromo peoplein central Ethiopia, the Afar in the far East on the border with Eritrea, and the Anuak people near the border with South Sudan. Meles brooks no criticism: in 2005, nearly 200 people died in a crackdown on demonstrations by the opposition, who accused Meles of rigging elections.But some Ethiopians argue that he has done what it takes to stabilize the vast and ethnically diverse state. The much criticized 2009 anti-terrorism law, which rights groups have said is far too vague and has been used to quash freedom of speech and peaceful political dissent, has seen multiple opposition figures and journalists, including two Swedes, jailed for lengthyterms. The US-based Committee to Protect Journalists accuses Meles of having used "the fight against terrorism as a cover to silent peaceful voices of dissent." In the wider region, Meles has never been afraid to make full use of Ethiopia's powerful and well equipped army. After overseeing the independence of Eritrea from Ethiopia in 1993; run by fellow ex-rebel fighters who had also fought to topple Mengistu; Meles returned to war, with a 1998-200 border war leaving tens of thousands dead. A peace deal led to a tense standoff, with Meles refusing to pull troops from the border town of Badme, even after an international court ruled the town belonged to Eritrea. The town has been the source of festering discontent between the nations ever since. Meles also invaded longtime Ethiopian foe Somalia, sending troops and tanks to topple an Islamist regime in 2006, before pulling out in the face of bitter guerrilla attacks. He sent Ethiopian troops back into Somalia in 2011. He is marriedto a former Tigray rebel fighter Azeb Mesfin, a member of parliament, women's activist and businesswoman, with whom he has three daughters.

News of Meles' illness highlights the general unreadiness of the opposition to assume power upon his departure' Presently, the most likely scenario that would unfold upon Meles' death or resignation would be his replacement by a Tigrayan EPRDF successor, with the military enforcing this unpopular choice. When this happens, tragically, due to its disorganization, the opposition will be unable to do more than weakly protest. The situation grows worse by the day as more people, especially the youth and potential military defectors, drift away, disappointed and alienated, from the older opposition groups. This state of affairs is because no one– whether it's the EPRDF, the military, the international community or even Ethiopia's people themselves, takes seriously a dividedopposition. But a united opposition will create a coalition sufficiently large and broad as to create an undeniable alternative to EPRDF rule. There is no shortage of well-known historic examples, and even simple fables, reflecting the truth of the power of unity. Yet, despite these unassailable facts, the opposition has failed to unite. Opposition leadership may cite various reasons for this, but the imperative is so great that no excuse can be sufficient and the opposition leadership collectively bears responsibility for this grave strategic error. Now, more than ever, it faces a stark choice:unify now, urgently, or allow itself, once again, to be passed over and miss this historic opportunity. There are real policy differences among the various opposition groups. But the opposition is already united on one, overarching goal– the end of undemocratic EPRDF rule and its replacement with genuine democracy. It can achieve this if its leaders meet on an emergency basis and, for the good of the nation, subordinate all other differences to form a unified action front under a coordinated command for the purpose of this single objective. Once the dictatorship is gone, they can submit their differences to a democratic process.

Unification will require agreeing on a common leadership. The existingleaders, whether they are currently talking to each other or not, can collectively succeed if they all get into the same room immediately and not leave until this is resolved. If they cannot agree on common leadership, they can, alternatively, elect one or more neutral figures to lead. This can be a non-political person, such as a respected academic, businessman, journalist, religious leaders, NGO administrator, royalty, athlete, technocrat or some combination. Almost anybody is better than nobody. If the opposition leaders are unwilling to do this quickly, Ethiopia's long-suffering people will benefit by demanding they do so. TheDiaspora can guide the way, if necessary, by uniting its various factions here in a similar manner and conditioning further support on the in- country leadership doing the same. A rare chance for the opposition to move into the coming political vacuum is emerging, but the opposition so far shows every sign of blowing it by failing to unify. Opposition leaders will be foolish to continue on this track and, if they do, they'll have no oneto blame but themselves. When overthrowing a dictatorship, opposition unification must come above all else. Now is Ethiopia's time to do it. The author, an American, was involved with anti-Colonel Mengistu activities inthe late 1980′s, advocated for Ethiopia's opposition to the US Congress starting in 1992, was an adviser to AAPO and CUD, published the first major media expose of Meles Zenawi's human rights abuses and was a senior strategic consultant to Kinijit during the 2004-2005 civil disobedience and election campaign.

The 120th Birthday Celebration of Emperor Haile Selassie I celebrated inShashemene town'

The event was primarily celebrated in the beautiful compound of the 12 Tribes of Israel and took pictures of the Niyabingis carnival-style celebration that took place on Hamle 16, 2004 Ethiopian Calendar (July 23, 2012 Gregorian Calendar). Apart from the Shashe Band of the City that performed musical and dance selections, popular and cultural, both inAmharic and Afan-Oromo, the Rastafari community demonstrated how to play the steel band, a Trinidadian musical instrument and the DJs, males and females, played great Reggae musical selections that let a large crowd rock all night long. There were also poetry readings. The Twelve Tribes began the birthday celebration by reading chapter selections from the Bible in what they call a devotional ceremony. The theme of 'mystical incorporation' or 'being born again' manifested in their readings. Accordingto the Twelve Tribes the scattered tribes gathered in Jamaica under the leadership of Dr. Carrington and the movement is now global. Ethiopia is one of the sites where the group resides, a site of what they call 'maximum blessing.' They invoked the names of Emperor Haile Selassie I, Crown prince Zera-Yaqob Asfawossen and Dr. Carrington in their devotional messages at the ceremony. One of the representatives of the Twelve Tribes narrated the biography of HIM. It's the Rastafarian Community that now owns the monarchial history. It is also the Rastafarian community that maintains a deep-rooted faith in the monarchy and the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church (EOTC) by performing rituals at least twice a year in conjunction with the Birthday and Coronation of HIM. The southern Ethiopian town of Shashemene is a commercial and fast growing city in the region and witnessed both the Rastafari and the local Oromo communities jointly celebrated HIM's 120thBirthday. It has to be recalled that the Rastafari community own some of the major hotels and restaurants in the town and there are several multi-storied buildings in various stages of completion in Melka Oda, a part of Shashemene where there is a large concentration of Rastafarians.

Junedin Sado Ethiopia's Minister of Civil Service, former President ofOromia regional state and minister of Science and Technology, is reportedly receiving treatment in SA after a car crash'

According to OPride sources, the incident occurred earlier this week nearKaliti, on the entrance to the capital, Addis Ababa. It is not immediately clear if foul play was involved. There was a brief report on social media about the crash but his whereabouts had since been unknown. Mr.

Junedin Saddo's wife, Habiba Mohammed, is in detention suspected ofaiding Muslim protesters opposed to the government's interference in religious affairs. Mrs. Habiba was nabbed on 17 July, at the Saudi embassy while trying to flee the country, sources told.

Widespread violations feared in clampdown on Muslim protests - AmnestyInternational'

AI is concerned over the fate of scores of Muslim protestors arrested by the government. The arrests took place in the context of ongoing protestsagainst alleged government restrictions on freedom of religion in the country. The detainees are at risk of torture and other ill-treatment, and there have been numerous reports of beatings in detention against those arrested. Some detainees have been held in incommunicado detention since their arrest without access to family members, often in unknown locations. Amnesty International is further concerned at widespread reports of the beating of protestors during demonstrations, and other examples of excessive use of force by the police during the arrests and the dispersal of protests, resulting in many injuries to protestors. Those arrested in July include members of a committee of representatives selected by the Muslim community to represent their grievances to the government and at least one journalist. Amnesty International fears that the arrests of community leaders, protestors and others in the Muslim community, and the pending charges against certain individuals, are based on their lawful exercise of the right to freedom of expression and the right to organize and participate in peaceful protests. Addis Ababa's Muslim community has staged regular peaceful protests throughout 2012 over grievances including an alleged government-backed effort to imposethe teachings of the minority Al Ahbash sect of Islam on the majority community, and government interference in elections for the Supreme Council of Islamic Affairs. Ethiopia's Constitution prohibits state involvement in religious affairs. The protests have regularly attracted large numbers of people over the last six months. On 13 July a police operation targeted a gathering at the Awalia Mosque and Islamic school compound, in north-west Addis Ababa. The gathering was reportedly discussing further protests and also planning and preparing for a Sadaqah(charity) event two days later, to distribute food to people living in poverty. On entering the compound, police are alleged to have used excessive force against those present, beating many men and women in the compound and made numerous arrests. The same evening, in response to news spreading about the events at Awalia, large numbers of people headed towards Awalia. Witnesses estimate several thousand triedto reach the compound. But the roads were blocked by police and violenceflared between police and protestors. Protestors allege that police again used excessive force including beating protestors. Several sources say that police fired live ammunition, resulting in some serious injuries amongthe protestors. Large numbers of those on their way to Awalia were arrested. The government confirmed that over 70 people had been detained on 13 July.

Ethiopia Barred Domestic Workers to UAE Over Right Abuses'

The Ethiopian government has banned its citizens from becoming domestic workers in the United Arab Emirates (UAE) to stop the widespread rights abuse and inhumane treatment Ethiopian workers face in the Middle East. The ban will remain imposed until an agreement that ensures the rights of citizens is reached with agencies at home and concerned bodies in the UAE. Ethiopia's Consular General in UAE, MesganuArga, said the temporary suspension is aimed at rooting out unscrupulous recruiters and abuses in the gulf nation. "We have suspended labour from Ethiopia to the UAE because a number of recruitment agencies are working illegally," said Arga. "We want an agreement with the UAE that ensures our nationals' rights." The Consul-General further said that his office in Dubai, which is the only Ethiopian mission in UAE, receives five toten complaints a day on a number of matters such as on unpaid salaries and physical abuse. Under Ethiopian law, sponsors are required to providemedical insurance and pay employee a minimum monthly wage of Dh660.All contracts have to be sent to the Labour Ministry in Addis Ababa, which provides workers with an ID card to work overseas. A lot of Ethiopians arebrought to UAE without proper work contracts or insurance, and most facehardship. Every year thousands of Ethiopian women make an economic migration to the Arab world seeking lucrative jobs but are subjected to cruel beatings, other forms of torture and are denied their wages. Others are thrown out of high-rise windows, face sexual abuse and are forced to work hard without sleep. Many end up mentally ill while others prefer to commit suicide. Many return home with horror stories and allege to being treated like slaves. According to the Consul, there are an estimated 100,000 Ethiopians in the UAE but only one agency is known to be legally recruiting Ethiopian workers. Last week, Ethiopia has banned dozens of illegal recruitment agencies based in the capital.

Ethiopia has started a test run of electricity supply to neighbouring Sudan'

As Ethiopia moves to set up a permanent power export to its neighbor, officials at the Ethiopian Electric and Power Corporation (EEPCo.) confirmed that the power supply testing started this week following the completion of the Ethiopia-Sudan Transmission Line, set up at a cost of US$41 million. The 230 kilovolt transmission line is 296 kilometre-long and stretches from Ethiopia's border to Sudan. Initially, officials say, Sudan will be provided with 100 megawatts of electricity as Ethiopia embarks on the test run. The two countries signed a power supply agreements a few years back. The World Bank financed the project with ENEGROINVEST constructing the transmission line and SUNIR International engaged as a substation contractor. European firms HIFABOY and FITCHER served as project consultants until the end of December 2010, with the Transmission and Engineering Office of the Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation taking over consulting and supervision as of 2011. The transmission lines in Ethiopia have three sections, Bahir Dar-Gondar (137.2Km), Gondar-Shehedie (122Km) and Shehedie-Metema (37Km). The final section has been connected with a transmission line in Sudanese city of Gadaarif. Ethiopia's power utility EEPCo says the Ethio-Sudan Transmission Line Project is expected to further develop the East African Power Pool which encompasses power interconnection projects between Ethiopia-Kenya, Tanzania-Zambia- Kenya-Uganda and Ethiopia-Sudan-Egypt. The Horn of Africa country is targeting production capacity of 10,000 MW of power in the coming four years. Ethiopia has embarked on constructing a 6,000 megawatt hydro electricity generation project on the Nile, believed to be the biggest in Africa. The dam is expected to start generating power within the next twoyears. Ethiopia has already started supplying power to neighbouring Djibouti, while exports to Kenya are expected to start soon,as the Horn of Africa country seeks to fulfil its dream as a continental powerhouse in electricity generation.

A power vaccume in post-Meles Zenawi Ethiopia is real'

The above description exactly defines Ethiopia's present condition. Whether Meles is already dead, incapacitated by disease, or has no much time left, one thing is sure: there is now a power vacuum and a struggle among contenders for his position has already started. The bare fact that the government has so far refused to provide any reliable information about his condition is indication enough that Meles's time is over. The assurance that he is now receiving treatment or resting and that he will soon resume his work is just a lie destined to prevent a popular uprising and conceal the on-going power struggle until the emergence of a winningfaction. On top of economic disasters, the failure to establish any firm institution demonstrates that the two decades of TPLF rule have been nothing but a colossal waste for Ethiopia and Ethiopians. The future is theoutcome of a creative process and as such bound to be unpredictable in its novelty. The best that analysis can do is to present possible scenarios,which are then possibilities, potentialities, not predictions. It's on the 36thday since Ethiopia's Meles Zenawi has disappeared from the public view.

The ruling party says Meles is recovering from a minor illness, but there isa growing belief that he is dead. The highly secretive TPLF meeting is continuing for over a week. A major announcement is expected by early next week, according to sources. Meantime, the Ethiopian public is demanding political leaders for concerted action. Ethiopians living in the country and overseas are requesting existing political party leaders to stepup to the plate. The demand is growing in intensity as the Prime Minister'spossible prognosis is reportedly grim. Ethiopian politics is largely blighted by division and lack of unity and the public are requesting political leaders to close rank at this critical time in the nation's political history. Asked about what his party makes of the growing demand UDJ's public relations head, Daniel Tefera, on his part said the desire of Ethiopians of all walks of life for a democratic change is captivating and this desire can only be fulfilled if political actors are willing to sit down and hammer out their differences. North Gondar representative of AEUP, Yared Girma, on his part said TPLF leaders have enriched themselves at the expense of the common Ethiopians. He reiterated the suitability of the time to work for a sweeping political change in the country and said the call for unity among political leaders is timely and paramount. A prominent humanrights activist who chose to remain anonymous has amplified the need for unity and demanded political actors to cast ethnic and religious differences aside to form a united front for political change. One vocal resident of Gondar city whom ESAT reporter talked to said on his part political playersshould be proactive to motivate and rally the youth that has so far been sidelined from political activities to spearhead a movement in the country.In the nature of constitutional succession in the event of death, disability, resignation, illness, incapacity or removal from power of the prime minster(PM) in Ethiopia, the Ethiopian Constitution makes no provisions for the orderly transfer of power in the event of a vacancy in the PM's office.

Simply stated, there is no constitutional process for succession of executive power in Ethiopia! The issue of succession has become critical inlight of the prolonged and mysterious absence of the current holder of PM's office and the garbled official explanation for his complete disappearance from public view. Some Ethiopian opposition leaders have apparently argued for the installation of the deputy prime mister (DPM) asa constitutional successor to the PM or at least serve as an acting-PM untilthe final health status of the current holder of the PM's office is established. Their argument is neither textually nor inferentially supportedby any reasonable reading of the relevant provisions of the Ethiopian Constitution. The office of the DPM is mentioned 4 times in the Ethiopian Constitution, three of which occur in Article 75; and once in Article 76 in which the DPM is mentioned as a member of the Council of Ministers.

Article 75 defines the totality of powers, duties and roles of the DPM: Political commentators stress such news is exciting to the opposition campas it should propel them to work even harder to enter Ethiopia and make use of the crisis to their advantage.

Ethiopia does not have a firm leadership succession plan if Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is no longer able to head the government – TPLF veteran' Seeye Abraha, a former defense minister, who worked closely with Meles Zenawi in the ruling party's executive committee but who is now a member of the political opposition, said that uncertainty and anxiety is growing over the nation's leadership during the prime minister's so-far unexplained absence. He blamed it on the country's one-party electoral system and Meles' one-man-rule style of governing over the past 21 years. "They don't have a system" [of leadership succession], Seeye said."This is a crisis situation and the dust has not settled." He said leaders of the ruling Tigrai People's Liberation Front (TPLF) and larger Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) parties had discussed a succession plan, but postponed any decisions until prior to a scheduled 2015 national election. Meles Zenawi has not been seen in public for over a month, even missing the African Union conference in Addis Ababa that was attended by 29 other African heads of states or governments. Some reports in the international press have speculated he is suffering from a serious illness and has been receiving treatment since June 26 in a Brussels hospital. Information Minister Bereket Simon told reporters in Addis Ababa in earlier week that a doctor has prescribed sick leave for the prime minister. Bereket assured the public that Meles is in "good and stable condition" and will return to work when he has recuperated.

Bereket, however, would not identify the illness or say where the prime minister was receiving treatment. Reliable news about the prime minister's health has been hard to come by in Ethiopia. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), the most recent edition of the independent weekly newspaper, Feteh, contained a report on the prime minister's health, but that issue of the publication was confiscated by the government printing house. Seeye Abraha said Ethiopia 'approaching the end of the one-party system', saying he does not know where the prime minister is or the nature of his illness. " I have serious political differenceswith the prime minister and his party," Seeye said of Meles and the TPLF. But he said that now is the time for Ethiopia's political and military leadersto work with the nation to plot a peaceful way forward. " We are approaching the end of the one-party system," Seeye said. Seeye was commander of the TPLF's rebel forces and a member of the small leadership team of TPLF fighters who ousted Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam's Duerg leadership in May, 1991. They then created the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia (FDRE). Seeye was defense minister for five years and later led planning strategy for Ethiopia's border war with neighboring Eritrea. The former defense minister said he and Meles finallyparted ways over continuation of the costly two-year war with Eritrea.

Meles expelled Seeye and three others from the TPLF executive committee. Then, Seeye was thrown in jail for six years on corruption charges he says were bogus. When he got out of prison, Seeye joined the opposition Unity for Democracy and Justice Party along with a former president, Negasso Gidada. He left Ethiopia for the United States in 2011. Seeye, 59, now lives in Boston where he recently completed graduate studies in public administration at Harvard University. A member of the TPLF's old guard, Sebhat Nega, told a VOA correspondent the same week in Ethiopia that the government is functioning normally despite Meles' absence. "The system does not depend on one person," Sebhat said, adding that whatever Meles' medical issues are, the government is secure.David Shinn, a former U.S. ambassador [to] Ethiopia in the 1990s, speculated last week that if Meles was aware of the need to plan for a successor, he would have had such a plan in place. He added, however, that if Meles' health problem came on suddenly, the political fallout could be more serious. " If this is a more abrupt situation, then it could be far more difficult," Shinn said. Opposition leader Seeye Abraha also warned ofpossible trouble, saying, any leadership transition would be difficult without Meles taking part. For the time being, Seeye said he believed a form of collective leadership was acting during Meles' absence. The TPLF veteran Sebhat Nega said such opposition speculation was the product of "wishful thinkers" hoping to take advantage of the current situation. He also denied that Meles ruled with an iron fist, noting the prime minister's efforts to de-centralize government rule in ethnically diverse Ethiopia overthe past two decades. "He doesn't have any hand in the affairs of the Oromos, the Amharas, the Tigres, or of the Afars, et cetera," said Sebhat. "He cannot have an iron hand. He can never be a despot." Seeye disagreed, saying that Meles has been consolidating power for years. "Meles is not just the chief executive officer of the administration, he is the law of the courts," said Seeye. "He could make his wishes the law of the land in a matter of hours. That's how he has been working." Despite his political differences with Meles, Seeye said he hopes the prime minister will recover soon. "I don't celebrate the pain of another human being or the passing of another human being," Seeye said. " I wish him recovery and I wish that he ends his political exit with a positive and constructive and historic note."

International news outlets, such as Reuters, Associated Press and the BBC, reported that Meles was hospitalized for an undisclosed condition' Reuters, the British news agency citing diplomatic sources, said he was being treated in Brussels, Belgium, although even that scant nugget of information was not officially confirmed. Back home, generally pro- government papers such as Addis Fortune told readers that Meleshad returned to Addis Ababa and would be back to work soon. The paper reported that the government provided little other information on his condition. A day later, though, the weekly The Reporterclaimed that MelesZenawi was merely abroad on holiday. The government censored the one domestic outlet that tried to report more detailed information. This weekend, the government ordered the state-run printing company 'Birhan Ena Selam' not to produce the latest edition of the weekly Feteh, which was to have carried front-page coverage of Meles' condition. The weekly Feteh, which has faced government harassment in the past over its criticalcoverage, had prepared stories citing information from international news outlets and an exiled Ethiopian group.

Ethiopian Olympic Team on the London 2012 Opening Ceremony’

The London Olympic Games officially kicked-off last night with the captivating opining ceremony dubbed "The Isles of Wonder" directed by Oscar-winning director Danny Boyle which is expected to be viewed by a billion people worldwide. The magnificent opening ceremony was viewed as the start of yet another unique Olympiad where history will be made and new heroes will come to the forefront. Ethiopians would also be glued to their TV sets as the 34-member athletics team largely composed of young athletes makes a stride towards the medals. All in all, the EthiopianOlympic side had 64 members which includes two swimmers, a category the country has not competed in Olympic Games before. The two swimmers joined the Olympic team through universal access window. On the other hand, the man who has managed to dominate Ethiopia’s athletics scene in the last four Olympic Games, Haile Gebrselassie, will nothit the tracks. Haile stayed on the top of his game since 1996, winning two gold medals in 10,000 meters in Atlanta and the famous Haile-Tergat stand-off at the Sydney Olympics. He also participated in the Athens and Beijing Olympics claiming fifth and sixth positions, respectively. However, his dream of running for Ethiopia in the most challenging race—the Marathon and becoming part of the legacy of legends like Abebe Bikila andMamo Wolde was disrupted when he decided to abandon his plan of takingpart in the Beijing Olympics marathon in the nick of time. All the running that he did this time is as an Olympic torchbearer, while scores of young Ethiopian athletes get a shot at carrying the Olympic legacy.

Ethiopia - Relapse In Inflation’

Prices of Food Items on Sharp Rise: According to ESAT News, less than a month after the Ethiopian Central Statistics Agency (ECSA) declared that inflation is easing and the Finance Minister, Sufian Ahmed, touted the figure in parliament, prices of basic food items are showing a sharp rise asof the previous week. Price of staple grain like “Teff” has shown a sharp increase compared to the price quoted two weeks ago. A report compiled by ESAT reporter in Ethiopia says it is very expensive if not impossible to get edible oil on the market. Scored of restaurants have shuttered their operations due to shortage of cooking oil. One resident of Addis Ababa, our reporter has talked to at the local market said “we used to say the inflation is hurting but these days it has become a lot worse. The cost of living is literally knocking many out of existence.” Independent observers say the overall performance of the market has shown a rapid decline sincethe day the speculation about the Prime Minister’s health was reported on the media. Numerous merchants that have close ties with the regime aremoving their capital outside of the country and this is believed to have contributed to the shortage of imported items like cooking oils. Some importers are hoarding a lot of imported stock in the expectation that there will be further increase as a result of the impending political uncertainty. Amidst this whole, ordinary citizens are having hard time to live of their meager income in a soaring market condition.

Word is still out in the Ethiopian community that Meles Zenawi is seriouslyill or may even be dying’

It has caused many to speculate—or panic, depending on one’s position— about the future of the TPLF/EPRDF should Meles be suddenly gone from leadership, whether the reason is poor health, death or retirement—forcedor voluntary—if rumors about an internal power struggle are correct. It's now over forty days since Meles Zenawi, head of the ruling EPRDF party disappeared from public view. The government says he is taking break on doctors advise in an unnamed country after getting treatment for an unspecified illness, but many believe he is either dead or incapacitated.

The Central Committee of the ruling-EPRDF central component the TigreanPeople Liberation Front (TPLF), has been holding secretive meetings for the past two weeks. It is not clear who is currently running the government, but definitely it is not the deputy prime minister HailemariamDesallegn.

According to Horn analysts and opposition figures, Shrewd, brutal, and a master at soliciting and spending aid money, Prime Minister Zenawi's 20 years of rule could be nearing its end. Following the news of the past few years, you might get the impression that flamboyance and bellicosity are signature traits of any long-tenured dictator. But for every Muammar Qaddafi there's a Meles Zenawi, the shrewd, technocratic PrimeMinister of Ethiopia. Inside of the country, he's known for imprisoning his political opponents, withholding development assistance from restive areas, stealing elections, and cracking down on civil society NGOs. In the rest of the world, he's often praised for his impressive economic record, though not for his human rights. Zenawi has attracted Western support bybeing a responsible steward of aid money, a security partner in a rough region, and a G20 summit invitee. Now, both his supporters and his detractors may have to contemplate a future without him. Zenawi is in a Brussels hospital with an unspecified stomach ailment that may or may not be fatal, depending upon what news reports you believe. Today, a government spokesperson announced that Zenawi would be taking a leaveof absence from running the country, which he's led since 1991. From a human rights perspective, Zenawi's rule has been abusive, heavy-handed,and self-interested.. Still, his apparently earnest dedication to sustainable development has long attracted international donors, whose money has benefited Ethiopia while propping up his regime. Zenawi, has fostered a friendlier environment for foreign investment. Between 2000 and 2010, Ethiopia's GDP enjoyed a staggering average annual growth rate of 8.8 percent -- China-like numbers. The country's public sector is hardly clean of corruption, but the Ethiopian state isn't as mismanaged or as predatory as others in the region. It ranks 120th out of 183 governments on Transparency International's Corruption Perceptions index, not exactly Scandinavian but still ahead of such regional leaders as Kenya, Uganda, and Nigeria. Under his leadership, Ethiopians have suffered from a lack of human, civil, and political rights. At the same time, their country has earned a reputation as a place where aid money can be responsibly and effectively spent. "The U.S. assistance portfolio in Ethiopia remains one of the United States' largest and most complex in Africa" according to an online U.S. government profile of the roughly $2.1 billion in aid the U.S. has sent to Ethiopia since 2010. The World Bank helps fund over $ 4.4 billion worth of projects in the country. This is the paradox of Zenawi's legacy. He has done much to simultaneously help and hurt his people, with just the kind of quiet skill that you hope to see in a benign leader anddread in a malevolent one. If he never returns to office, should he be remembered as the technocrat behind Ethiopia's amazing economic rise, or the brutal strongman who resisted democracy as much of Africa adopted it? Though one did not necessarily require the other -- a kinder, gentler Zenawi might have overseen even better growth -- the same character might inform both sides of his rule. "When I meet with Prime Minister Meles and [Ugandan] President [Yoweri] Museveni, I feel like I amattending development seminar," rockstar development economist Jeffrey Sachs said in a 2004 speech. "They are ingenious, deeply knowledgeable, and bold." Magnus Taylor, the managing editor of the Royal African Society's renowned African Arguments blog, wrote about Zenawi's ability to dazzle foreign investors at the World Economic Forum in Addis Ababa this past May, while challenging the democratic world's seemingly dogmatic belief in the causal relationship between political freedom and economic dynamism: Sitting astride this economic growth, and taking pride of place at this year's WEF, was Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. In an event that boasted such political heavyweights as former British PM Gordon Brown, and private sector luminaries like the Ivorian boss of The Prudential, Tidjane Thiam, whose $600 billion worth of assets makes Ethiopia look like a minnow, I was surprised by how much Meles came out as the dominant figure. A fiercely intelligent man, with a grasp of figures redolent of Brown (whom Meles referred to as 'Prime Minister' throughout) he seemed totally in his element. Perhaps it was the nature ofthe audience. He was never going to have to field too many tricky questions about Ethiopia's political space, (un)free press or tight government control over telecommunications and banking in front of a room full of CEOs and fellow technocrats. One senses that in certain crowds his statement that "there is no direct relationship between economic growth and democracy" would have got him in to trouble - important players were gnashing their teeth at this but Meles, kingpin of Western policy in the Horn of Africa, knows exactly how much he can loosen his Marxist instincts without upsetting his donors. The World Economic Forum was one of Zenawi's last public appearances. Even if he survives his illness, there is currently no public timetable for his return to Addis Ababa. As dictators across North Africa and the Middle East can no longer take their survival for granted, it's worth wondering whether Zenawi will be the model for the next generation of enlightened, western-coddled autocrats -- or one of the last of a literally dying breed. The Newsof Meles Zenawi’s deteriorating health offer an opportunity for reflection on his legacy and preparation for the day after his eventual demise. Whether Meles Zenawi passes away in the coming days or at some times in the future, we need to grapple with some serious vexing questions on where we are and where we are heading as a people and nation. First, on the past two decades: What is Meles’ legacy? How will he be remembered? How was he able to squander unique opportunity to bring about an enduring democratic process and freedom in Ethiopia? What should we learn from the process that resulted in replacing one dictator with another? In particular his successors who are said to be locked in power struggle over succession should pause for a moment and reflect, if at all endowed with an iota of wisdom? What factors enabled Meles to institute dictatorship and misrule for so long? What are the over-arching results of his policies? Did Meles' policies brought Ethiopia closer to the goal of building a society bound by common purpose and united in building a strong and prosperous democratic nation or did it succeed in fracturing the society along ethnic and religious lines? We have to look back to go forward. The future holds limitless possibilities and enormous potentials. Yet again, like all possibilities we can use it or lose it. Lack of vision and preparation will guarantee that we lose again. To acquire the right vision, we need to answer some of these questions: What are the tasks awaiting the future leadership in rebuilding the nation and the national spirit? What are the challenges? Assuming Meles' is gone tomorrow, is the opposition ready to play any role? What should the role be inside and outside Ethiopia? Who should the opposition engage? On what terms? What preconditions? Should it engage without preconditions?What is the goal? The goal must be building the framework of enduring, true democracy, protection of human rights and individual freedom. Who are the players? What is their record on these principles? What about the army? Will it stay neutral? Will it take sides? With whom and why? What should the role of western democracies and the US in working with groupscommitted to these principles. How can the opposition begin to strengthenand prepare itself to present a formidable power block? What are the lessons from previous coalitions and alliances? What type of coalition or collaboration should be formed? Should it be based on broad principles or specifics? Should it strive to be overly inclusive or selective? Is there a benefit to forming competing power blocks that loosely cooperate with oneanother where differences cannot be bridged among opposition groups? What are the metrix? These are but some of the questions that need speedy responses and actions. Indeed Ethiopia is at a crossroad. Other diplomats told the AFP that Mr Zenawi might not survive his illness. "He isin a critical state, his life is in danger," said one. "He is in a critical state but is alive," another added. Ethiopia's ambassador in Brussels and the hospital authorities refused to comment on the reports. In Addis Ababa, however, Bereket Simon, a government spokesman, insisted that Mr. Zenawi, who has held power in the populous Horn of Africa nation for overtwo decades, was recovering. "He is not in a critical state. He is in good condition," he told AFP. Questions surfaced about Mr Meles's health when he missed a two-day African Union summit Sunday and Monday in Addis Ababa, apparently for the first time since 1991. He was last seen looking thin and pale at the G20 summit in Mexico in June. Whatever Mr. Zenawi's condition, anger is growing among Ethiopians at the refusal of his government to provide clarity on the situation and speculation has begun to swirl about possible successors. The one-time Marxist, who toppled the brutal dictatorship of Mengistu Haile Mariam in 1991, has run Ethiopia through strongly centralised control for two decades and analysts struggleto envisage how the country would be operate without him. Adjoa Anyimadu, Chatham House's Horn of Africa expert, said that Mr. Zenawi's force of personality meant that few other Ethiopian politicians were well- known. "He is the face of the Ethiopian ruling class so it's difficult to see who would take over from him," she said. "Ethiopia is also very closely involved in regional issues, from its conflict with Eritrea, mediating between South and North Sudan and providing troops to Somalia. The level of uncertainty if this carries on could have repercussions for the region."

Ethnic clashes in southern Ethiopia are reported to have left at least 18 people dead and 12 others injured'
Tribal clashes in southern Ethiopia arereported to have left at least 18 people dead and 12 others injured. Morethan 30,000 people have crossed into Kenya to escape the fighting, the Kenyan Red Cross says. A spokesman told the BBC that people were continuing to cross the border although Ethiopian government forces hadintervened to stop the fighting. The clashes, in the Moyale area, are thought to have been sparked by a simmering dispute over land rights.
Fighting involving the Borana and Garri communities is said to have started mid-week, and to have continued. Local reports speak of armed militias taking up positions in outlying villages, with the fighting spreadingto Moyale town, on the Ethiopia-Kenya border. Many of those who fled across the border into the Kenyan side of Moyale are having to sleep out in the open. The Red Cross says it is providing those who have been displaced with food, water and tarpaulins.
United States Department of State shows a grave concern about the current state of affairs in Ethiopia'
With the ongoing problems that Ethiopia continues to face regarding human rights abuses in all its many phases- electorally, denials of freedom of speech, press, religion, and basically all personal freedoms. But now there is a new situation. As it's well known, Meles Zenawi has been seriously ill for weeks and has been evacuated to Brussels for treatment. This presents a question as to who isnow, or later on will be, running the regime. Any coverage of Meles' healthhas been banned in Ethiopia. Ethiopians are once again hoping to receive honest news and are not getting any. According to AP Ethiopian authorities have blocked some 30,000 copies of the independent weekly Feteh. They were blocked on grounds of "inciting national insecurity and endangering the government and the public," the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) said. The precarious health of Meles Zenawi seems to have provoked his minions in the regime to take an even harder line on reporting on his health. This, of course, only heightens the concerns of all Ethiopians about their futures. The scheduled Newsmaker at the NationalPress Club featuring Chris Smith (R-NJ) and chairman of the House Africasub-committee has been postponed to follow his hearing on Ethiopia withhis whole committee in September, 2012 but the very next day after the hearing Congressman Smith will speak at a Newsmaker at the National Press Club, as he has graciously accepted an invitation to appear at the event. Many such Press Club events are televised by C-SPAN. The All Ethiopia Unity Party (AEUP) has announced that it is officially opposed to the ongoing interference with religions going now in Ethiopia.
Civil Service Minister Junedin Saddo in fresh row with police over wife'sarrest' Ethiopia's Minister of Civil Service Junedin Saddo, embroiled in a public controversy after lambasting the police for failing to properly investigate his wife before her detention last month. The police say the minister, who recently sent an angry letter to the media, acted inappropriately, interfering with an ongoing investigation and judicial process. The row comes amid uncertain and secretive transition following the sudden disappearance of that country's longest serving prime minister, Meles Zenawi. Saddo's wife, Habiba Mohammed, was nabbed on July 17 under suspicion of lending aid to Muslim activists protesting against state interference in religious affairs. Mohammed was detained upon exiting the Saudi embassy in the capital allegedly with a stash of money totaling about $100,000 in her car – along with Arabic literature and dirty dishes that the police believed were from a Sadaqa (alms) muslim protesters held at the local mosque. Muslims in Ethiopia have been protesting againsta nationwide indoctrination and government's meddling in the election of religious leaders, a charge the government denies. In a recent interview with Bloomberg, Shiferaw Teklemariam, Minister of Federal Affairs and a point man on religious affairs, made no secret of the government's desire to link the protesters to "external forces," a veiled reference to Saudi- financed Wahabism, to isolate them from the larger Muslim community.

Mrs. Saddo's encounters with the embassy served as a perfect fit for the narrative to be easily passed up. However, a recently released U.S. StateDepartment Terrorism report contradicted the Ethiopian government's official statements. As a response to "a sense that fundamentalist sentiment was growing among some parts of the Muslim population, in July the Ministry of Federal Affairs began a controversial nationwide training program for religious leaders to counter violent extremism," the report said. In a letter to the local newspaper, Ethio-Channel, dated August 1, 2012, Saddo detailed his version of events. In a three-page document, the first official confirmation of the arrest, Saddo denied that his wife had any connection with what he called "extremists." Saddo insisted that the police failed to exercise due diligence. "Aside from sayingwe saw her leaving Saudi embassy several times, the police failed to investigate; where did she go next? What did she do with the money, whowere her contacts, what does she do in Arsi?" Saddo wrote. According to Junedin Saddo, the police acted prematurely without finding answers to these basic questions. Furthermore, the police could have effortlessly gotten to the truth by merely inquiring about her from the police detail [Mrs. Saddo travels with police escort] or requesting the agents to investigate the situation as well-placed detectives, he said. In an interviewwith Addis-based Sendeq newspaper, Federal Police Deputy Commander, Abebe Ze-Mikael, confirmed the arrest of the minister's wife and said she is currently under investigation in connection with terrorist activities. The police chief added Minister Saddo's claim about his wife's clean hands wasin bad form. "Innocence can only be proven in court of law," said Ze- Mikael. "It was inappropriate to say my wife is not guilty while there is a pending police and prosecutor charge against her."

The Good and the Terrible Legacy of an Ethiopian Leader'

According to ESAT news, Meles Zenawi, the Ethiopian Prime Minister has passed away from acute justifribilasis fatilosis at the age of 57 at St. LukePoly-Clinic in Brussels, Belgium . The foreign based ESAT has reported that its sources have effectively confirmed his death. However, there is noofficial word from the government. News of the sudden death of the PrimeMinister came as a shocking news to his party supporters inside Ethiopia and abroad.

Armenians contribution to Ethiopian Music highly praised'

In a one man's attempt to capture Ethiopian Armenians' dying legacy, the contributions Armenians have made to Ethiopian culture through the narrative of music and the large role they played in modern Ethiopian jazzwell recognised. The unique history of Armenians in Ethiopia—namely, thestory of the "Arba Lijoch", the 40 Armenian orphans of the genocide who were adopted by Emperor Haile-selassie I to be his Imperial Orchestra, and their contribution to modern Ethiopian music—ignited Kalayjian's curiosity. He aims to reveal the contributions Armenians have made to Ethiopian culture through the narrative of music and the large role they played in modern Ethiopian jazz. "I am not a descendant of the "Arba Lijoch", he notably told the Armenian Weekly, "but I am a passionate and profound music lover, which is one of the factors driving me to produce this documentary." Kalayjian says that his intention is not to prevent the inevitable, that is, the decline of the number of Armenians in Ethiopia. "Mydocumentary simply seeks to tell the phenomenal story of the Armenians of Ethiopia. It will describe the great historical and musical contributions Armenians have had in Ethiopia and bear witness to their current situation," he explains. However, the bleak situation of the diminishing Armenian community is acknowledged though several examples, such as the country's only Armenian church, St. Kevork, lacking a priest and a sermon. The deacon of St. Kevork's is Vartkes Nalbandian, the son of Nerses Nalbandian—a jazz musician and instructor who wrote the first anthem of the African Union, and the great-nephew of Kevork Nalbandian, composer of the first Ethiopian national anthem, which was played until September, 1974, the deposition of the emperor when the Marxist militaryjunta overthrew the monarchy. Corresponding to the Armenians' rich involvement in the nation's music scene, a few Ethiopian musicians have spoken candidly about the legacy of the Armenians, with warm words about the pint-sized community and its vast accomplishments. AlèmayèhuEshèté, a prominent jazz singer endearingly called as the "Elvis Presley of Ethiopia", gave glowing praise to his mentor, the aforementioned Nerses Nalbandian, whom he considered as his "second father."

Ethiopia: Gov't Rejects Latest Rumours About PM's Health As 'Fabrications'

Updates: Ethiopia has once again rebuffed media reports about the healthof prime minister, Meles Zenawi. In an interview with the state-run Ethiopian Television (ETV), information minister, Bereket Simon, said Zenawi's health has improved during the past few days following treatment in Europe. "The Prime Minister's health is now in much better condition after his treatment" he said adding, "he is taking some rest".

Simon's address on state television follows an a broadcast on exiled Ethiopian TV broadcaster ESAT , claiming Zenawi was deceased citing reliable sources in the International Crises Group (ICG). However, ICG dismissed the claims, saying it has no direct knowledge of Meles Zenawi'shealth condition. Simon said the latest reports are "campaigns of fabrications". He said "those forces are fabricating speculations about the health of PM Meles Zenawi to the extent of quoting international organizations like ICG, something the organization denied". Speculation about Zenawi's health peaked after the long-time Ethiopian leader failed to attend the African Union Assembly held in Addis Ababa recently. The last time Zenawi appeared in public during the G20 summit in Mexico in June, 2012. There are no official reports from the government regarding the nature of Zenawi's illness or country or the country in which he is receiving treatment. According to opposition groups Zenawi is suffering from brain cancer. It is thought that he received treatment at the Saint Luc University Hospital in Brussels, Belgium; an allegation he refused to confirm. The 57 year old Meles Zenawi has been Ethiopian leader since heassumed power in May, 1991. Meantime, Ethiopian leader 'getting better' Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is in "a good condition and recuperating", a government spokesman has told the BBC, dismissing reports he is critically ill. However, Bereket Simon declined to give any details about Mr Meles' whereabouts or what he is suffering from. Mr Bereket had earlier been quoted as saying the prime minister, 57, was onholiday. Speculation began when he missed last month's African Union summit. There were reports that Mr Meles was in hospital in Belgium, suffering from a stomach complaint. But Mr. Bereket was quoted as sayingby The Reporter newspaper that opposition forces were trying to "create confusion" by talking about the prime minister's health. He told the BBC Focus on Africa programme it was "not useful" to provide more details.

When asked who was in charge while Mr. Meles was being treated, he replied: "The status quo is maintained - there is no change and there will be no change in the near future." It is believed that Mr. Meles' last public appearance was at the G20 talks when the omnipotent Prime Minister of Ethiopia, last appeared in public on 19 June, he looked pale, thin and gaunt. The widespread conviction shared by most diplomats and experts isthat whether Meles is dead or alive, he is no longer in charge and never will be again. So the candidacy for his succession is open. Meles Zenawi took over power as the leader of a rebel movement which ousted the communist government of Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam in May, 1991.

He has won several sham elections since then, but his political opponentshave accused him of using repression to retain power. Meles Zenawi has led Ethiopia for more than 20 years. The EPRDF as Tigrai Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF) it’s central component, has never envisaged any form of power-sharing compromise. Not during the July, 1991 conferencewhich gathered opposition forces to organize the post-Duerg regime, nor after the May-2005 elections, when the opposition had nevertheless suggested it, nor at any other moment up to now. Ethiopian political commentators predict that even if Meles Zenawi is alive, he will not be able to resume his job, though the possibility of Meles’ succession offers anew opportunity. Will the EPRDF seize it? Many Ethiopians would like to wait and see, many also fear the risks it would involve, and few expect it to happen.

Meles Zenawi’s 21-year tyrannical rule comes to a screeching halt’

Ethiomedia Analysis: By Abebe Gellaw - July 31, 2012 - ESAT's decision toreport that Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is dead, according to reliable sources, has never been easy. It was two weeks ago that we received thenews from highly credible sources in Brussels. Our sources that want to remain anonymous as they were not authorized to speak to the media on this sensitive matter told us that the International Crisis Group (ICG) concluded that Mr. Zenawi was deceased. Headquartered in Brussels, withoffices around the world, ICG is the leading independent think tank on conflict prevention and resolution around the world. It was hard to ignore information from such a highly reputable international organization. As a responsible media outlet, ESAT tried to investigate and verify the tip meticulously before it decided to broadcast the news. To be fair to the facts, we have also scrutinized the conflicting and contradictory information coming out from the ruling TPLF clique. We have examined not only the statements and stories put out for public consumption by the TPLF, but also their conducts that tell their own stories.

As Meles Zenawi's 21-year tyrannical rule has surely come to a screechinghalt, the TPLF proved to be a heap of mess without its chieftain. Ethiopia appeared to be leaderless and cheerless. In the absence of its head, the regime appeared to be decapitated, incapacitated, incoherent, disunited, disorganized and disoriented. This is typical of a one-man regime unlike institutionally sound democratic systems (like Ghana) that cannot be easily shaken by the death or absence of one man. Like an untrained ship crew with no captain in sight, the ruling elite seem to be at a loss for direction in the face of a gathering storm. Look no further than the contradictory statements being issued by the high priests of the ethnic front on the well-being and whereabouts of Mr. Zenawi. While rumors are abounding on the death of the dictator, none of the officials has come out with a convincing explanation where the big man is. "He is resting from exhaustion… He will be back in ten days…. He is in hospital …. No, he is onholiday…. He is in town…No, he is in Europe… No, no, no…he is relaxing inAmerica…," TPLF officials told the public in the past two weeks. But Zenawi is nowhere to be seen. He was neither in the palace nor in his rubber-stamp parliament making and unmaking laws. And yet, TPLF's creative stories change within hours and each weird story adds more fuel to wild speculations and rumors.

After the May 18th incident that became a turning-point in the tyrannical life of Mr. Zenawi, he was not seen in public for four weeks. On June 18th,he finally surfaced in Mexico City where he flew to attend a G20 meeting. Instead of quashing rumors about his well-being, the PR stunt unwittingly started a more serious discussion. He significantly lost weight and looked more like a ghost than the charismatic dictator he once seemed. The Chinese state TV, CCTV, broadcast his emaciated image, which was recorded during his meeting with Chinese president Hu Jintao, proved the suspicion of so many people. That was followed by a photo opportunity with Mexican president Felipe Calderon. It was another flop. He looked haggard, tired and gravely ill. The effort led by Berhane Gebrekirstos turned out to be a PR disaster. On July 15th the newly-formed Ethiopian National Transitional Council (ENTC) issued a press release declaring the passing away of Mr. Zenawi. The news was received suspiciously. Some people questioned the motive of ENTC to declare the death of Zenawi. In fact, those of us in the news media also felt that ENTC should have passedthe information to the media for further investigation. In any case, ENTC attracted more attention on the mysteries surrounding Zenawi's puzzling health and final destiny spurred heated debate among Ethiopians across the world.

On June 14, 2012 Zenawi reportedly passed away after suffering a few weeks of agony and pains at St-Luke University Hospital in Brussels, Belgium. The news was received with mixed emotions. While most Ethiopians welcomed the departure of a brutal tyrant that has caused so much pain and suffering on millions of Ethiopians, the news upset the TPLF camp. "Liars! Liars! Liars!..," cried out camp TPLF without producing any evidence to disprove the news. For a few days, TPLF chose to be quite. Finally, it broke its silence via the Voice of America. On July 18, Sebhat Nega appeared on VOA Amharic service and told the apprehensivepublic that Zenawi only suffered a minor illness. He said he was somewhere in Europe getting medical care. According to Nega, who was widely believed to be the mentor of the former dictator, in the absence ofZenawi the "democratic institutions" were working smoothly. Until the chief comes back, according to him, the "deputy prime minister" is in charge. As usual, the old guard's answers were deliberately vague. They raised more questions than providing any serious answers.

Crisis communication management needs skills and some touch of professionalism. So TPLF felt the need to bring out its topmost communication expert. Unfortunately, the "expert" is the least trusted andone of the most detested members of the ruling elite. It was unwise of TPLF to send out the minister of miscommunication to convince the public that Zenawi is still alive and kicking. After cancelling his appointments with journalists a couple of times, Bereket Simon, came on July 19th to meet and greet local and foreign journalists. He was flanked by none other than Shimelis Kemal, who insisted all along that news on the illness of Mr. Zenawi was fabricated by ESAT. Mr. Simon said that Zenawi was exhausted after working restlessly for over thirty years. So an unnamed doctor forced him to go on sick leave. He dismissed reports that he was gravely ill. According to Mr. Simon, the big boss suffered no serious illness but exhaustion that needed a break. He assured us that he would soon bein office after enjoying his holiday. He also contradicted Mr. Nega by saying that Zenawi is in charge of running the country. It appeared that the deputy was not the task of ruling the nation even if the boss is exhausted and took a sick leave.

Mr. Simon was also asked why the Prime Minister's health and whereabouts have been shrouded in secrecy. According to the communication expert, this is something to do with the culture of the ruling party. He explained that since its days in the jungle, the ethnic frontdoes not dwell on such matters. He gave little weight to rights of the public to know about the health or death of a ruler. Mr. Simon, who was visibly nervous and sipping a glass of water quite frequently, gave inconclusive and bizarre statements that failed to convince us that Zenawiwas indeed enjoying his holiday in an unknown tourist resort. Addis Fortune is a newspaper close to the ruling elite. It is an open secret that the publisher, Tamrat Gebre-Giorgis, is a close associate of the minister ofmiscommunication and other officials. On June 22, it published a front page interview with a screaming headline: “Meles back in town.” The story, which the paper run as breaking news claimed: “A day after the Ethiopian government officially announced his ailment, Prime Minster Meles Zenawi came back to Addis Abeba, according to a credible source.

The Premier came back to town on Friday evening, July 20, 2012, and he is recovering well, the source revealed to Fortune.” Fortune’s publisher also told everyone that Zenawi is expected to surprise the public by appearing at a press conference. Apparently, the credible source feeding false information is none other than Bereket Simon, who probably thoughtthat disinformation may work to manipulate public opinion. But the widely expected press conference where Zenawi would take center stage never materialized.
Former TPLF propaganda chief and publisher of Ethiopian Reporter, Amare Aregawi, is also very close to the ruling elite. He is widelybelieved to be a privy to TPLF’s top guns including security chief Getachew Assefa. He too had breaking news for us. Contradicting Addis Fortune’s “big story”, he had a different headline: “Meles on vacation abroad”. The story dated 25th July declared: “Following the prescribed sick leave, PrimeMinister Meles Zenawi is currently on vacation outside Ethiopia, The Reporter learnt. Sources told The Reporter that Meles is enjoying the sick leave after he was ordered to take time outside office to recover from his illness resultedfrom “over workloads for more than three decades.” What was even bizarre was the fact that Reporter told us that Zenawi was enjoying his “holiday” in the United States. That was not the end of the story coming from officials sources. On July 28, Addis Admas, another paper linked to the ruling elite published an interesting interview with none other than thefamous TPLF veteran, Sebhat Nega. The stories keep on changing. But this time, it came to a full circle. He told the paper that Zenawi is having aspeedy recovery. “Where is the Prime Minister,” asked the journalist. “He is in Europe,” he answered. “Where exactly in Europe?” queried the journalist. “I don’t know exactly ,” says Sebhat Nega, who was supposed to be in the know. Tyrants are supposed to be seen in full control. How is it that the most visible and domineering man in the last 21 year vanishes into thin air? He is Europe, he is back in town…No, no, no…he is on holidayin the U.S. Who should the public trust? This must be one of the worst disappearance cases ever known in the history of tyranny.
As a journalist who tried to sift fiction from facts, Meles Zenawi is not backin town, nor is he on holiday in America. As far as I am concerned, our sources at ICG are more credible. I admit that I have not personally seen a death certificate or the dead body of Ethiopia’s former dictator. Based onthe credible information we have received from Brussels, I am convinced that Meles Zenawi is dead. I do not believe that such reputable think tanks like ICG will get this wrong. For the record, ESAT never quoted ICG.It quoted anonymous but credible sources working at ICG in Brussels. We are aware of ICG’s Tweet. Unlike Aigaforum and Tigraionline’s claim’s ICG statement does not disprove the story that Zenawi is gone. The Twit in question reads: “Crisis Group is not in a position to speculate about the fate of PM Meles Zenawi, nor have we commented on it to date.” ESAT never relied on a speculation or comment from ICG. We only had a privileged to confidential information held by ICG that conclusively claimed Zenawi was dead.

I personally challenge the TPLF high command to disprove this fact instead of fabricating conflicting and contradictory stories to convince us that he was alive and kicking. Though some TPLF officials may believe thatZenawi is a superman who can be in Addis Ababa, Europe and America at the same time most Ethiopians do no buy such a fantasy. The Ethiopian people has a right to know the whereabouts of its ruler. This will help the people of Ethiopia to make critical decisions on the future of the country.

Bring Meles Zenawi out alive or in a coffin for a final farewell. Then we willstand corrected. Whatever the case, Meles Zenawi's grip on power is over.The political dynamics has changed permanently with his long absence and the rise of competing forces for power and control. A vicious power struggle has already begun in earnest within the TPLF clique and its servant parties. It is fair to say good riddance to a brutal tyrant that has tortured our people for over two decades.

Importers Cry about Shortage of Hard Currency, Opening LCs TakeMonths'

Only six months after Prime Minister Meles Zenawi talked about surging foreign currency reserves, importers, foreign travellers and medical tourists travelling abroad are complaining about stifling shortages of foreign currency. Many who have gone to the National Bank, which is the reserve bank of the country, in the hope of opening letters of credits or acquire some hard currency have returned back empty handed. Some importers our reporter has talked to are perplexed by the stifling shortage. Many attribute the shortage to a possible hard currency hoarding by business people and the political class in light of the lurking political crises. It has been 47 days since the Prime Minister is seen on media and many are now coming to the conclusion that the Meles is not coming back and some sort of political crises is in the making. Many say business activity is slowing down by the day and the number of import requests is declining accordingly. However the lack of foreign currency even in such slow business environment has puzzled many. There is growing speculation that the National Bank has issued an internal memo halting the issuance of new letter of credits. It is feared that the shortage of hard currency would reverse the slightly easing inflation. Especially imported commodities are expected to show sharp price in increases if theshortage is to stay. One economic commentator stated to our reporter that there is sharply dwindling confidence among the business communityso much so many investors are flocking to Addis Ababa abandoning their investments in remote part of the country. The number of prospectus foreign investors and tourists that are calling ESAT to ascertain about reports they are getting from Ethiopia has shown a steep increase over the course of the past several weeks. Ethiopia gets the large chunk of its hard currency supply from remittances and foreign aid.

The pro-government journal “The Reporter” forced to admit Capital Flight’

Updates: Commercial Bank of Ethiopia (CBE) suspends letter of credit to stop capital flight' In what appears to be a nervous move by members of Ethiopia’s ruling party, the EPRDF and the well-connected elites in the wake of the disappearance of Ethiopian PM Meles Zenawi, a large sum of money is being transferred to overseas. The situation is so bad that even the pro-government journal, "The Reporter", is forced to admit “capital flight”. The CBE suspends opening Letter of Credit' The Commercial Bank of Ethiopia (CBE) has suspended opening letters of credit (L/C) to businesses after the much-talked about three-month export foreign currency reportedly depleted in a one-year time or so. CBE, the largest buyer of foreign currency from the National Bank of Ethiopia (NBE) and the biggest generator of foreign currency from its international banking department and from remittances, suspended opening L/C for two to threemonths, according to sources from the bank. The country’s largest bank currently opens L/C only for basic items such as petroleum and medicine, according to bank sources, while it is not now known when it will resume to provide the service for its customers and businesses. Shortage of foreign currency has hit banks for a couple of months now, while the reason for the depletion has left private bankers in the dark, according to prominent bankers in the sector. “The sad part is that we are notified the there is shortage of foreign reserve unprecedentedly,” said a banker who opted to remain anonymous. “The situation should have been known and disclosed earlier before it became critical. And it is very difficult to identify how the shortage was created, except for guessing or setting possible scenarios. There are bankers who say the problem has got to do with capital flight, both formal and informal. Yet while the informal capital flighthas got to do with over invoicing and under invoicing, it will not have an effect on the country’s foreign reserve. But the formal does.” Sources assert that there is a tendency for the reserve in forex offices to make their way or shift to the black market, which involves a huge volume of transaction. Some also claim that NBE’s control over foreign currency reserve and transactions is not as stringent as other regulations the governing bank imposes on commercial banks. The shortage of foreign currency has also made the come-back of the long and overdue queue at private commercial banks seen three years ago when the foreign reserve reached an alarming low in less than one year’s export. The daily foreign currency auction between NBE and the commercial banks came to a halt for a month now.(11 August, 2012)

Ethiopia diplomat jailed in UK for cannabis smuggling’

According to AFP report, a court in London jailed an Ethiopian diplomat fortrying to smuggle a large stash of cannabis through London's Heathrow Airport. Amelework Wondemagegne, an official at the Ethiopian embassy in Washington DC, had tried to claim diplomatic immunity when she was caught at the airport in April, 2012 with 56 kilograms (123 pounds) of cannabis. But Isleworth Crown Court in west London jailed her for 33 months after she admitted one count of drug smuggling. The court had found that the 36-year-old was not entitled to immunity. And judge Richard McGregor-Johnson told her: "The fact that you smuggled these drugs in the expectation that you would not be prosecuted if you were caught because of your diplomatic status is a significant factor in this case." Wondemagegne, a mother of two, initially said a man had given herthree suitcases containing the packages of cannabis before she left Addis Ababa airport for Heathrow. She had said she had believed the packages contained meat and spices. But judge McGregor-Johnson said Wondemagegne had told "a pack of lies". The quantity of cannabis she had tried to smuggle was "substantial", he added. "You knew perfectly well what you were doing...," he told her. Wondemagegne's two children, aged 10 and 17, are being cared for by the staff of the Ethiopian embassy in Washington as her husband died of cancer in 2005. She will be deported from Britain after serving her sentence. Police said the slabs of cannabis in the suitcases, which had been sprinkled with chili powder, hada street value of £160,000 ($249,000, 203,000 euros).

In Day-8 of London Olympic Games-2012’

Ethiopia’s Tirunesh Dibaba wins gold in 10,000 meters at London OlympicGames, defends her Olympic title with a dominant display as Britain's Jo Pavey and Julia Bleasdale smashed their personal bests. Leading with 500m to go, the 26-year-old Dibaba broke away from Kenya's Sally Kipyego and Vivian Cheruiyot to win in 30 minutes 20.76 seconds.

Dibaba's triumph was her third Olympic gold after winning both the 5,000m and 10,000m in Beijing - the first female athlete to do so. In frontof a noisy crowd clearly enjoying the first day of athletics in the Olympic Stadium, the Ethiopian runner established a 30m lead down the back straight. And she extended it further as she completed a final lap of 62 seconds to give her opposition no chance of stripping her of her crown. "Ethiopia has every reason to celebrate. She becomes the seventh athletefrom the country to win three individual gold medals. It was a fantastic performance, a brilliant run. You know what? She might have another in afew days time. This is the great Tirunesh Dibaba." -- Amplified Brendan Foster Olympic bronze medallist and BBC sports commentator. Dibaba's triumph was her third Olympic gold after winning both the 5,000m and 10,000m in Beijing - the first female athlete to do so. Meantime, Ethiopia’s superstar athlete Tirunesh Dibaba and teammates Meseret Defar, Gelete Burka, Tejitu Daba and Shitaye Eshete have advanced to Women’s 5,000 meters final. Previously, Ethiopian Olympic Committee didnot schedule Tirunesh to run in the 5,000-meter, but after her powerful performance in the 10,000-meter, the EOC relented and allowed her to run.

In Day-9 of the London Olympic Games-2012’

Ethiopia was basking in glory after winning its first Olympic Games gold medal in the women's marathon in 16 years. Ethiopia's Tiki Gelana won gold in the London-2012 women's marathon in an record time for the summer Olympic Games at 2.23.07. "She wasn't quite unknown, but to run in such a way was impressive. Gelana looked really relaxed until the last 200m-300m when she strained to reach the finish line. "I'm not sure many people would have tipped Gelana," echoed the BBC commentator and former Olympic 1500m silver medallist Steve Cram. The Horn of Africa country last won gold in the category at the 1996 Atlanta Olympic Games by Fatuma Roba. The country's first gold medal came from Tirunesh Dibaba in the women 10,000 meters race. The country is likely to increase it's medals tally with the men's marathon, and women 5,000mrace still to come later.

In Day-10 of London Olympic Games-2012’

Yanet Seyoum: A Champion Despite Coming Last. The first ever Ethiopianfemale swimmer to compete at the Olympics is a hero in a country more famed for its long-distance runners. Yanet Seyoum - the first swimmer from Ethoipia to ever make it to the Olympics - came last in her heat andfailed to make it to the semi-final. Her finishing time was a personal best of 32:41, a whole 2:40 slower than the heat winner Karin Clashing O'Reilly of Antigua and Barbuda and nearly eight seconds behind the fastest qualifier, the Netherlands' Ranomi Kromowidjojo. But the 18-year-old girl, a lone swimmer in a country famed for its long distance runners, has high hopes for the future. "I would like to see professional swimmers in my country," Seyoum told, speaking before the Olympics among the guests and leisure swimmers around the pool of the Ghion hotel, a popular hangout for Addis Ababa's middle classes. "But this requires swimming clubs." Ethiopia has won 38 Olympics medals, 18 of them gold,since the 1956 Melbourne Olympic Games, every one of them in running events of 3,000m or longer. When you look at the country's swimming infrastructure it is not hard to see why the sport has not featured. The Ghion's hotel pool, Olympic size but often cold and sometimes busy, is Seyoum's best option for training.

Ethiopian Airlines to Receive its first Boeing 787 on August 14, 2012'

The Ethiopian Airlines, the fastest growing airline in Africa, is pleased to announce that it will take delivery of its first Boeing 787 Dreamliner on August 14, 2012, in Seattle, Washington. EAL is proud to be the first airline from Africa, Europe, Americas and Middle East to take delivery of the Dreamliner, and to be able to offer it's passengers the ultimate travelexperience on-board this game changing aircraft before other carriers. “The fact that we are the first airline outside Japan to receive this ultra modern aircraft is an affirmation of our continuing pioneering role in African aviation. It is also a testimony of our commitment to give our passengers the best possible travel experience, with the best industry products and services.,” said Tewolde Guebre-Mariam, CEO of EAL. After taking delivery, Ethiopian will fly it's Dreamliner to Washington D.C. the next day, where the aircraft will be on display. During the exhibition, Ethiopian Dreamliner is expected to be visited by US Senators and House Representatives as well as Ambassadors, Executives from the World Bank and IMF, members of the Ethiopian community, the media and other invited guests. Ethiopian Dreamliner, the first to be received by a non- Japanese carrier, will make it's historic trip to Africa and will touchdown atBole Addis Ababa International Airport on August 16, 2012. The airline willhold celebrations in Addis Ababa for the arrival of the aircraft and will soonannounce its first Dream destinations.

ESAT, foreign based TV and Radio broadcast commends again it’s decisionto report Prime Minister Meles Zenawi’s death, has never been an easy task’ Updates: It was two weeks ago that ESAT received the news from highly credible sources in Brussels, Belgium. ESAT sources that want to remain anonymous as they were not authorized to speak to the media on this sensitive matter told that the International Crisis Group (ICG) concluded that Mr. Zenawi was deceased. Meles Zenawi's 21-years tyrannical rule comes to a screeching halt: Headquartered in Brussels, with offices around the world, ICG is the leading independent think tank on conflict prevention and resolution around the world. It was hard to ignore information from such a highly reputable international organization.As a responsible media outlet, ESAT tried to investigate and verify the tip meticulously before it decided to broadcast the news. To be fair to the facts, ESAT has also scrutinized the conflicting and contradictory information coming out from the ruling clique. We have examined not onlythe statements and stories put out for public consumption by the ruling elites, but also their conducts that tell their own stories. As Meles Zenawi’s21-year tyrannical rule has surely come to a screeching halt, the TPLF proved to be a heap of mess without its chieftain. Ethiopia appeared to beleaderless and cheerless. In the absence of its head, the regime appeared to be decapitated, incapacitated, incoherent, disunited, disorganized and disoriented. This is typical of a one-man regime unlike institutionally sound democratic systems like Ghana of west Africa that cannot be easily shaken by the death or absence of one man. Like an untrained ship crew with no captain in sight, the ruling elite seem to be at a loss for direction in the face of a gathering storm, according to political commentators.

An AFP report of 18 July, citing “several diplomatic sources” reported thatMeles Zenawi “is in a critical state" at a hospital in Belgium and that "his life is in danger” and “might not survive”. His wife Azeb Mesfin has also disappeared from public view since July 20. It was reported on July 20 that she went to Italy. She has not been seen in public since then, and she is not attending the TPLF central committee meeting that is underwayin Addis Ababa, even though she is a high-ranking member. As political commentators, "the Prime Minister and his political party, the EPRDF abdicated their path to democracy, in earnest, sometime back in 2005.

This was brought starkly to light when the results of a general election in which the EPRDF faced a strong challenge were reversed through killings and imprisonment of opposition political parties and supporters, a trend which continued in the subsequent election in 2010. In May, 1991, when the TPLF regime controlled Addis Ababa, economic development, political inclusion, and ethnic equality were its three very important promises that convinced the Ethiopian people to change their heart and give the incoming new regime the benefit of the doubt, despite all signs that TPLF was a party of one ethnic group. Today, after 20 long years, the Ethiopianpeople and many in the free world realized that the guerrilla movement that took power preaching liberal democracy and free market economy is neither democratic nor capitalist.

Meles’s death or incapacitation has created a situation of power struggle. This power struggle is essentially occurring within the EPRDF, but more importantly, within the TPLF, which is the decisive force. It is translated by the appearance of factions, often around individuals supposed to be influential. Whether Meles is already dead, incapacitated by disease, or has no much time left, one thing is sure: there is now a power vacuum and a struggle among contenders for his position has already started. The bare fact that the government has sofar refused to provide any reliable information about his condition is indication enough that Meles’s time is over. The assurance that he is now receiving treatment or resting and that he will soon resume his work is just a lie destined to prevent a popular uprising and conceal the on-going power struggle until the emergence of a winning faction". On top of economic disasters, the failure to establish any firm institution demonstrates that the two decades of TPLF rule have been nothing but a colossal waste for Ethiopia and Ethiopians. Even if the deputy Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, stays as head of the government, he would simply be a figurehead. A renowned political commentator hinted, "given the complete impotence of Hailemariam, the winning faction may find it wise to promote him to prime minister, at least until things settle down. Lastly, the direct intervention and real pressure of Western powers can have a serious impact in the direction of facilitating the creation of a government representative of all contending forces. Their pressure can thwart the scenario of military coup or of a refurbishing rule of the TPLF; itcan even prevent the start of a popular uprising. The two basic conditions for Western pressure to be effective are: (1) Western powers themselves must show a united front and act as honest brokers; (2) the opposition must speak with one voice and credibly argue in favor of a transitional inclusive government. This last possibility is by far the best course, for it alone promises a peaceful transition. Long time Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, missing in action for almost 2 months now, is reported to be in a coma leaving the Obama White House’s Crisis Team for Africa scrambling to find a replacement. Officially, Ethiopian “Prime Minister” Meles Zenawi has taken “sick leave” and “getting better”, end of story. In reality the situation in Ethiopia’s capital Addis Ababa finds the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) media handlers floating the idea that with MelesZenawi “sick” a “Transitional Government” will hold power until national “elections” scheduled for 2015 are held. Few are any longer denying the existence of a large, well armed rebel army based in northern Ethiopia with the Eritrean army behind them. Just how big they have become andif they are preparing to repeat history and launch an offensive to take Addis Ababa a la 1991 and the end of the Mengistu regime must be causing many sleepless nights in the Obama administration.

Constitutional crisis after Meles Zenawi's disappearance'

Concerns about the lack of stability of Ethiopia, post-Meles, are causing great anxiety within the ruling TPLF and in western capitals. His absence has already unbalanced the power base of the ruling EPRDF party, with dangerous implications for Ethiopia as divisions—ethnic, regional and ideological, will widen with unforeseen consequences.Interestingly enough, religious groups—Muslims and Christians—have found greater unity of purpose as leaders within each group support the religious freedom of each other and all Ethiopians, condemning extremism in any form. The fractious nature of Ethiopian politics is also a source of concern in the West, especially US, which views Addis Ababa as an important ally in the war against terrorism in the Horn of Africa, concerns about the political tyranny not withstanding. The US prefers EPRDF reaches out to the opposition, especially in the Ogadien region, which has waged secession war. Aware of the prime minister's failing health, international organisations that have long attempted to reconcile hostile Ethiopian communities tried in February to work out a power sharing deal, but it didnot materialise owing to a power struggle in the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Front (EPDRF). The talks, known as Ginbot-7 were intendedto bring the separatist Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) and Unity for Democracy and Justice Party (UDJ) led by prodemocracy campaigner and former political detainee Birtukan Midekssa, now exiled in the US. According to the Ethiopian constitution, the Prime Minister enjoys absolutepower, while the deputy, an appointee of the PM, exercises delegated power only. The position of the president, currently held by Girma Wolde- Giorgis (an Amhara), is largely ceremonial as it lacks executive powers.

According [to] the Ethiopian power structure, Zenawi heads the government, chairs the Cabinet, security and the military. Accordingly, hisabsence creates a power void, which not even the deputy prime minister can fill in the prevailing circumstances without eliciting the revulsion of thepolitburo. Political observers say Ethiopia is at a crossroads, saying it is not explicitly clear on the transfer of power in the event the office the prime minister falls vacant. "The constitution does state whether the deputy prime minister can succeed the president. In the Ethiopian government structure the deputy prime minister does not have a job description. Ordinarily, he is supposed to exercise executive power, but Meles Zenawi made sure that all power is concentrated in his hands for fear of ouster," says a political scientist. Saying, he foresees a constitutional crisis in the coming days, an eventuality with the potential of touching off a fresh round political conflict. The prime minister is elected by parliament, after which he is charged with the task of picking other senior government officials. The cronyism and nepotism that permeates all strata of government is expected to explode if the Prime Minister's long absence begins to take a toll on the management of public affairs, which he controls whimsically. It's well known that the EPRDF is an amalgamation of ethnic-based political organisations that converged following the ouster of former dictator Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam, now exiled in Harare, Zimbabwe since May, 1991 when he was forced out of power. EPRDF is made up of Tigrai People's Liberation Front (TPLF), Oromo People's Democratic Organisation (OPDO), Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM) and Southern Nations and Nationalities Party (SNNP). TPLF and ANDM, by virtue of their ethnic composition — the former is predominantly Tigrai of the north, while ANDM is Amhara, the largest tribe in Ethiopia — are the major partners in EPRDF, while the SNNP is a late comer in the power arrangement. However, the possibility of a smooth transfer of power is being undermined by reports of a constitutional crisis following the serious illness, and possibly death, of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi within the TPLF Politbureau between BerhaneGuebre-kristos, Dr. Tewodros Adhanom and Dr. Neway Guebre-Ab. The infighting has also sucked First Lady Azeb Mesfin, who won a constituencyin the north of Amharaland in the 2010 national elections. Azeb Mesfin, known as the power behind the throne has a reputation of influencing her husband's policy decisions, which has positioned her strategically to assume the reins of power from the ailing PM. In recent assessment of shifting power balance, Dr Opiyo Ododa, an expert on regional security and politics says: "Zenawi's leadership is oppressive and intimidating. He leads a fragile country, one likely to crumble and face internal fighting." Dr. Ododa observes that the current set up has the ingredients for internalproblems expected to preoccupy the next leadership in Ethiopia and reduce its role in sub-regional politics. "Stability within a country determines how a country's external policy is projected. Zenawi for a long time preoccupied his military with fighting externally — Eritrea and Somalia. Now Ethiopia's military excursions cannot continue because Ethiopia will be having leadership and succession problems internally to deal with." Meles Zenawi's personal assistant Ato Guebre-Tensae Guebre- Michael has been placed under house arrest few days ago, sources in Addis Ababa reported. He was one of the most trusted assistants of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. It is not clear why he was placed under house arrest, but there is an unconfirmed report that he was preparing to leave the country. There is also an unconfirmed report that another protege of Meles Zenawi, Mukhtar Kadir, who is a senior member of the Oromo Peoples Democratic Organization(OPDO), has been under house arrest for over a week.

A Free Ethiopia Armed Movement (FEAM) Up in Arms, Declares Supportfor Democracy'

It's announced a new clandestine group calling itself a Free Ethiopia Armed Movement proclaimed it's solidarity to Ethiopian peoples' quest for a free and democratic future. The movement's public relation person Captain Ephraim Teka made this statement in an interview he gave to ESAT radio two days ago. Captain Ephraim stated that clandestine cells that are very sympathetic with the democratic aspirations of the Ethiopianpeople have already been formed under the auspices of FEAM with in the army, federal police forces, and intelligence structures. He expressed the movement's keen desire and avowal to the Ethiopian people's democratic aspirations and its commitment to movement's to overthrow the EPRDF led government. Captain Ephraim said the pervasive ethnic fragmentationand open discrimination with in the army has made a lot of members bitter about the current political order. The political and economic reality with in the army is far worse than what the average citizens face outside of the army. There is a fast growing discontent and an ever increasing desire among members of the armed forces to spurn the TPLF army and join with the public for a sweeping political change. As hard as it is to organize within the army, Captain Ephraim believes the multitudes of cellsand networks FEAM has formed across the various military and security structures of the country would serve a great purpose in any movement for political change. He has called on political leaders to do a good deal of political messaging work to the ethnically skewed army of the country.

Free Ethiopia Armed Movement says change is long over due.

A Jamaican and three Dutch nationals have been charged with smugglingcannabis'

While allegedly using their investor licences as a cover for their illicit activities in the Horn of Africa country. A Jamaican and one Dutch citizen are in jail pending trial, while the other two Dutch nationals and their three Ethiopian accomplices are reportedly on the run. Prosecutors say theJamaican investor was in 2007 awarded a license to set up a food processing plant in Shashemene town, to the east of Addis Ababa.

However, the Jamaican investor, prosecutors allege, was involved in the illegal production of cannabis. The Jamaican citizen, who is alleged to be the ring leader, was reportedly sending the illicit drug abroad, mainly to the United Kingdom, via post office concealing it in cultural artefacts and other local foods, such as red pepper and flour. It is the State's case that last October, 2011 around 200 grammes of cannabis were seized at the Addis Ababa international airport after the Jamaican man had tried to bribe an airline's staff with US$16,000. The Jamaican evaded arrest but was later apprehended in neighbouring Kenya. It is believed that by then he had paid US$6,000 as an advance payment to the airline's staff to smuggle the cannabis. Also three Dutch investors who took a license fromthe government in textile industry charged for sending 50 grammes of cannabis to the UK at various times. The charge indicated that one of the Dutch men bribed airline staff so he could smuggle the drug. The Dutch are also charged for sending an undisclosed amount of cannabis in collaboration with a local man to the UK and other countries. Prosecutors say the Dutch international was caught red handed at the airport while giving US$ 6,000 to an airline staffer. The pair had their bail applicationsrejected, with the case expected to resume on 29 October, 2012.

China's role in funding Ethiopian dam draws ire'

Ethiopia says construction of a dam along the Omo River will create needed electrical power for itself and Kenya, and channel water for food production. Environmentalists worry it could drain a Kenyan desert lake central to people's livelihoods. Nairobi, Keny Kenyan environmental activists want the Industrial and Commercial Bank of China to hold off on a promise to invest $500 million in Ethiopia's $1.7 billion Gibe III Hydro- electric Dam, which they say threatens Lake Turkana – the world's largestpermanent desert lake, and a crucial source of water for half a million people. The controversial dam is being built on the Omo River in eastern Ethiopia, which supplies the lake in northwestern Kenya with 90 per of itswater. Once completed, the dam will affect the livelihoods of some 200,000 in the river valley and 300,000 more near the lake, the activists warn. Friends of Lake Turkana – a Kenyan organization representing indigenous communities in northwestern Kenya whose livelihood depend mainly on the lake – had earlier estimated that that Gibe III could shrink the lake, which straddles the Kenyan-Ethiopian border, by 10 meters (about 30 feet). This could cause an increase in salinity in the lake's water, making it undrinkable for indigenous groups who live around the lake with their animals. Recently, resource-related conflicts have ignited between the nomadic pastoralist communities, and are expected to increase if the dam is completed. “Lake Turkana is home to large number of some of the most massive Nile crocodiles, hippos, and other large animals, all which would find it hard to survive without the lake,” said Dr. Richard Leakey, a renowned Kenyan conservationist and paleoanthropologist. There are also a wide variety of unique birds and other wildlife all of which would find it hard to survive without the lake or if the water nutrients were to change as drastically as studies have predicated will happen if Gibe III is successfully completed, according to the groups. The lake's survival hangs in the balance as China decides whether to fund the dam project, says Ikal Angelei, founder of Friends of Lake Turkana and the winner of the 2012 Goldman Environment Prize for Africa. “The lake is in the danger of drying unless the Kenyan governmentand international agencies step in to stop the unsustainable development both within and outside Kenya,” said Ms. Angelei at a news conference in Nairobi. “While many would-be financiers have withdrawn ... China still holds [to its] promise,” she added.

Ethiopia’s Seyoum Mesfin is back from China’

Ethiopia’s Seyoum Mesfin is back in town as an Ambassador of the FDREand at the helm in Meles’ absence. According to ESAT news, the former Ethiopian Foreign Minister and a close confidante of Meles Zenawi, Seyoum Mesfin is back in Addis Ababa and leading the country according to a news report by the weekly local Amharic journal “Finote-Netsanet”. Ithas been more than seven weeks since the Prime Minister was last seen and people are wondering if the Prime Minister is alive. ESAT –citing sources in ICG–has broken the news that the Prime Minister has died in Belgium last week. Though the government was quick to deny ESAT’s news report, it couldn’t show the Prime Minister or any audio or video evidence to disprove the ESAT news. Seyoum Mesfin is currently serving as ambassador Plenipotentiary to Peoples Republic of China. It is a recent memory that his appointment as ambassador to China after serving at thehelm of as an important ministry as foreign affaires - has left with mystification.

Ethiopian Civic and Political Parties Formed a Grand Coalition'

According to ESAT news, 11 prominent civil societies and active political parties formed a grand coalition that they say will respond to the people’spopular demand for a united action. The organizations disclosed their newmove in unilateral press releases they issued yesterday. The coalition is said to be closely following the emerging political developments at home. In the press release, the member organizations say the will wage a unitedstruggle for political change and envisage the establishment of a new democratic Ethiopia where the rights of its citizens will be respected. The press release hopes for the immediate establishment of a transitional government in the event that the regime is toppled where a brand new constitution will be ratified with the full participation of the people of Ethiopia. An open and democratic political election will follow the ratification of a new constitution. Requisite committees that will organize,and expedite information sharing among organizations will be set up fromdiaspora and in country civic and political actors. The organizations have collectively called up on the people of Ethiopia to stand with them to extricate the country and themselves from the multifaceted socio- economic and the brewing political crises. The press release has called upon the army to desist from being an instrument of one individual or a political entity and stand by the people whom it is established to serve and protect.

Ethiopian President Girma Wolde-Giorgis meets visiting Editor-in-Chief ofXinhua News ‘

Xinhua News: ADDIS ABABA - Ethiopian President Girma Wolde-Giorgis in a meeting with He Ping visiting Editor-in-Chief of Xinhua, a News Agency of China, at the presidential palace. The President stresses, “Ethiopia is willing to deepen it's friendly relations with Peoples Republic of China, saying PRC has offered important support to Ethiopia in the fields of socialand economic development and poverty eradication, and Ethiopia is willingto further develop the friendly relations with China and deepen the cooperation between the two nations, said Girma. The President expressed his gratitude for China’s help in Ethiopia’s social and economic development. He said thanks to China’s positive support, Ethiopia has witnessed a fast growing pace of economy, especially in the infrastructure in recent years. He said he is willing to see the bilateral ties to stride forward, and he hoped the media could play a bigger role in boosting mutual understanding between the two peoples. He Ping, for his part, saidEthiopia is a country with not only a long history but a glorious tradition offighting for national independence. It is a common wish of the two peoplesto develop the Sino-Ethiopian friendship. He said he was glad to see the fast growing pace of the Ethiopian economy in recent years under the backdrop of a global economic depression. He said Xinhua News Agency would keep on reporting the progress Ethiopia has made in its social and economic development with authenticity, objectivity and comprehensiveness, and would seek to play a positive role in promoting the friendship of the two peoples. He Ping was paying a visit to Ethiopia on the invitation of Ethiopia’s Ministry of Office of Government’s Communications Affairs.

Marathon The Dramatic Race’

Kenyan and Ethiopian marathon rivalry resumes' Kenya and Ethiopia resume an intense if friendly rivalry in the men's marathon on the final day of the London Olympics on the final day, Sunday over a course featuring some of the city's most distinctive landmarks.London, which hosts the world's best annual big city marathon, played a significant role in a race inspired by Greek soldier Pheidippides who, according to legend, ran to Athens in 490 BC to deliver news of the Greek victory over the Persians at the Battle of Marathon. Spiridon Louis won the marathon run over approximately 40 kms for Greece at the first modern Olympics staged in Athens in 1896 to the delight of the home crowd but the next two in Paris four years later and St Louis in 1904 were disorganized shambles. At the 1908 London Games, the British royal family took an active interest, with the race starting in the grounds of Windsor Castle andfinishing in front of the royal box in the White City stadium. As a result, the now standard race length of 26 miles 385 yards was set, a distance which became firmly established after one of the most dramatic races in Olympic history. Italian Dorando Pietri, dazed and disorientated on a stiflingly hot day, was helped across the line by officials after collapsing several times. Following a protest from the Americans, the gold medal was awarded to Johnny Hayes who had finished second. Promoters, sensing their opportunity after the race attracted tremendous worldwide publicity, invited the pair to turn professional and they staged several rematches each time over the London distance which was formally established by theworld governing body 16 years later. "If you talk about the Olympics, you have to talk about the marathon," said Gebrselassie, who won consecutive10,000 meters gold medals in 1996 and 2000 before moving up to the marathon. Haile Guebre-Selassie is trying to figure out how to leave the sport heonce dominated'

The 39-year-old long-distance great from Ethiopia hoped for a farewell race and one last shot at an Olympic gold medal in the London Games marathon, but he didn't make his country's team. The former world-recordholder says he is unlikely to run the marathon at next year's world championships. He says he'll have to rethink how and when he bows out. "If possible, this (the Olympics) was the plan," he said. "The next world championships, I don't think so. Maybe something else." Guebre-Selassie broke his own marathon world record in 2008 at 35 and won two Olympic golds and four world titles in the 10,000 meters. He also set over 20 worldrecords and countless Ethiopian records, and ran successfully in distances ranging from 1,500 meters to the 26.2-mile marathon. Guebre-Selassie also failed to qualify for the 10,000 in London-2012, but he joked with reporters that he was still hoping to be a late addition to the marathon field. He'll watch the race on the final day, he said, but was disappointed the runners won't finish in the Olympic Stadium. Organizers decided the marathon will end on the Mall in central London and near Buckingham Palace. "For me, if it's possible to finish in the stadium, imagine," he said. "This is the best crowd I've ever seen in my life in athletics. If the marathon finishes in the stadium, ask the people." Guebre-Selassie said the marathon was still an iconic event for the Olympics and, "If we talk about Olympics, we have to talk about marathon."

It’s Day-55 since Ethiopia’s Meles Zenawi has disappeared from the publicview'

Updates: Meles’ wife Azeb Mesfin has also disappeared for over a month since a month and half since June 20. The silence of the international media and world leaders on Meles Zenawi’s disappearance continues. The CNN and Aljazeera have yet to say a word, while BBC and a few others reported minimally. It's has been nearly 55 days since Ethiopia’s Prime Minister Meles Zenawi has disappeared. The foreign based ESAT has reported that its sources have confirmed his death. However, there is no official word from the government. Meles Zenawi's absence is already causing the regime to start unraveling. Reliable sources in Addis Ababa reported that the regime’s hard currency reserve will evaporate in the coming few days, which will lead to the shortage of fuel and other essential supplies. The regime’s spies are also disappearing from local bars, internet cafes and other public places because of fear of backlash from the angry public. According to political analysts, Hailemariam Desalegn's appointment as vice prime minister and foreign minister in an October government reshuffle strengthens his position as a potential successor in 2015. Hailemariam’s party, the SEPDM, has also gained a further two prominent ministries, the defence and the federal affairs, strengthening the party relative to the traditional power bases in the TPLF,OPDO and ANDM. Some of the big names who have dropped out of the politburo or given up their parliamentary seats, such as Bereket Simon or Seyoum Mesfin, will still be around in a backstairs or advisory capacity and may even retain ministerial positions.?While Meles may retire in 2015,there is no clear successor. The TPLF is aware that it is probably out of therunning; Tigreans make up just 6% of Ethiopia's population and people want change. The Amharas and the Oromos, the two largest ethnic groups, argue that any successor should come from their own ethnic group. This tension will start to make itself felt in the year ahead. Meles's already strong position will be strengthened as new appointees become beholden to him and any rivals are edged out by the changes. The opposition will continue its attempts to form a united front, but ideologicaldifferences, the absence of a unifying leader and a wait of five years before the next election is held will make this difficult. Foreign policy impasses in Somalia, Eritrea and, potentially Sudan have been causes of concern in Addis Ababa. Prime Minister Meles Zenawi's long absence is causing uncertainty in the Horn of Africa nation amid speculation about hisdeteriorating health. Meles has not been seen in public since he attended the G8 summit in Mexico in June, 2012. And government has since confirmed that the Prime Minister was sick after weeks of spirited denials. Bereket Simon, a government spokesperson at the weekend told to the state owned ETV, Meles' condition was improving and he will return to work soon. Meantime, Simon told Radio-SBS Australia, "the PM's health is now in a much better condition after his treatment. He is taking some rest, then he will return from where ever he is before Ethiopia's New Year,which rests on the 11th of September". But Simon refused to disclose where he was receiving treatment following speculation that he was admitted at a Brussels St. Luke hospital. The limited disclosures by government had only served to fuel speculation with some Ethiopians having gone as far as claiming that Meles had died. According to opposition politicians, If Meles Zenawi is in "very good condition", why notrelease a photograph of him in that condition? 2) If Meles Zenawi is getting rest and relaxation, why not release a picture of him "vegging out"on the beach or touring the museums? The fact of the matter is that the last photograph and video of Meles Zenawi taken in Mexico showed him tobe in extremely bad condition. Instead of accusing the opposition of lying and exaggerating information about his health or alleged death, would it not be easier to put them all to shame by producing a one-minute video of him "in very good condition" taking a dip in the swimming pool or hanging out with four of his crew as reported in the last couple of days? Alternatively, how about one-minute audio tape of Zenawi telling the people that he is doing well and enjoying himself on vacation. "I am confused why the government wants to keep it secret about his whereabouts' and his illness. We have the right to know about him," said Solomon Metaferia, an Addis Ababa resident. "The government is telling us that Meles Zenawi is in a better condition. Why don't they show us thaton a television?" Salamawit Tasew, a university student said the situationhad been worsened by lack of information on the PM's health in the local media. "We are really confused what to do. Even the media's are unable to tell us the truth about his health where he is now," she said. A private newspaper-Feteh (Justice) - said it was barred from publishing by government after it wrote stories about Meles' health. According tough media laws the state owned publishing house Birhan ena Selam that printsmost of Ethiopia's newspapers can refuse to print a paper if it believes its content violates the 2009 anti-terrorism law. Media activists have condemned the ban saying it was symptomatic of the repression in Ethiopia. "The ban on Feteh's latest issue illustrates the depth of repression in Ethiopia today, and authorities' determination to suppress independent coverage of the Prime minister," Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) East Africa consultant Tom Rhodes said. "Every citizen has a right to be informed about the well-being of their leader and the conduct of their government. "Authorities should reverse their decision and allow the publication of Feteh's weekend edition to proceed." A renowned historian comments “given the history of Ethiopia, where secrecy is a cardinal virtue, emperor Menelik II, the founder of modern imperial Ethiopia, continued to “reign” for three years after he was incapacitated by a stroke. The latter successor, HRH Ras Taffari Makonnenhad took over once through a Shakespearian internal power struggles were over inside the palace.

Ethiopia’s Meseret Defar Refinds Olympic Magic'

The Ethiopian won her second Olympic 5,000m title' 8 years after the first,Mesert Defar of Ethiopia has still got it — that is, if she ever lost it. In the 5,000-meter final at the Olympic Games on Friday night, the first of two distance races held in the evening, Kenyan Vivian Cheruiyot was the heavy favorite. After all, the Kenyan has dominated nearly every major championship race in the past few years, with the exception of a fifth- place finish at the last Olympic Games in Beijing. There, Cheuiyot couldn’t keep up with Ethiopian rival Tirunesh Dibaba, who blazed a sub-60-secondclosing lap to win gold. In the end, Cheruiyot medaled on Friday, but again, it was an Ethiopian who got the best of her. Meseret Defar, the 2007 world champion, won gold in this event for the second time, crossingthe line in 15 minutes, 4.25 seconds. Cheruiyot had to settle for second in15:04.73, while Tirunesh Dibaba of Ethiopia, who won gold in the 10,000 a week ago, nabbed third in 15:05.15. It was Defar’s trademark finishing kick that won her the top spot on the podium, as the Ethiopian kicked pasther Kenyan rival coming down the final straightaway. Defar, who has battled back from injuries in recent years, last won this event in at the 2004 Games in Athens. The top runner from the United States was Molly Huddle, the American record holder at this distance, who came across the line in 15:20.29, good for 11th overall. Julie Cullley, the other U.S. entrant in the event, was 14th in 15:28.22. Nearly an hour later, 13 middle-distance aces took to the track to square off in a fully-loaded 1,500-meter final. Missing from the group, however, was reigning world champion Jenny Simpson of the United States, who failed to advance to the final. Still, the U.S. had 2011 1,500m world-leader Morgan Uceny and two-time Olympian Shannon Rowbury in the mix, but unfortunately, things did not bode too well for either of them. The race was extremely pedestrian through the first lap as Gamze Bulut of Turkey led the field through 400 meters in 75 seconds. Uceny hung in third position in the outside of lane one, while Rowbury was buried on the rail. Things didn’t take off until the second lap where Bulut still did the heavy lifting, dropping the pace to 68 seconds per lap. With almost exactly a lap to go, a bit of drama unfolded on the track when Uceny was tripped and fell. For the Cornell graduate and American medal hopeful, this was an unfortunaterepeat of her fall in the 1,500m final at last summer's world championships in Daegu, South Korea. Uceny rose to her knees and slammed her palms down in frustration while she watched the rest of the runners hurl themselves around the oval. In the end, Turkey claimed the top two slots. Alpketin, the European champion this year, won the gold medal in 4:10.23. The silver went to her compatriot, Gamze Burlut, in 4:10.40. The final podium spot was claimed by Bahrain's Maryam Yusuf Jamal, who crossed the line in 4:10.74. Rowbury was the top American in sixth place, running 4:11.26.

Ethiopian Reclaims 5,000-Meter Title From a Rival Countrywoman at a record time of 15.4.25' Updates: Ethiopia's Meseret Defar sprinted past compatriot Tirunesh Dibaba on Day-15 to reclaim the Olympic women's 5,000 metres title she won in 2004. Meseret says, "It's a great day for me. Since 2008, I have tried everything as I wasn't able to win the Olympics," Defar, the bronze medallist from Beijing-2008 told reporters. Defar crossed the line with her arms in the air before kissing a religious picture she had carried in her top and falling to the track weeping. For almost a decade, the Ethiopians Tirunesh Dibaba and Meseret Defar havebeen locked in a heated custody battle over the 5,000 meters. They havetraded world championships, world records and Olympic crowns, with Dibaba exhibiting a protective ferocity for the event for much of the last four years. In Beijing-2008, Dibaba snatched the Olympic title from Defaron her way to becoming the first woman to win the 5,000 and the 10,000in a single Games. On Day-15 Dibaba was trying to complete the double for a second time, and she took the lead into the last lap of a predictably tactical race. But as some said, Tirunesh fatigued from her gold-medal effort in the 10,000 as well as an undisclosed pre-Games illness.

A Qatar team wins Ethiopia stadium deal' - TradeArabia News Service

A Qatari/Australian led consortium's design for a FIFA/Olympic-standard stadium with a sunken arena has won an international architecture competition to create a national stadium and sports village in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. Doha-based Australian firm, Designsport, and AustralianLava (Laboratory for Visionary Architecture), in collaboration with local Ethiopian architects, JDAW, won the competition for their design which references Ethiopia's world-famous excavated architecture and the 'Mother womb', the skeleton of one of the first humans, Lucy, who is about 3.2 million years old. The stadium is shaped like a coffee bean, the main source of income in Ethiopia. The façade material that wraps around the stadium was similarly inspired by Ethiopian culture, modelled on the Massob, an Ethiopian communal serving basket made from woven grass. Work on the Addis Ababa stadium is scheduled to begin in 2014. The development is the largest sporting infrastructure project in Ethiopia, the second-most populous country in Sub-Saharan Africa and its fastest growing economy. The new facility, set on a 60-hectare site, will consist ofa 60,000-seat stadium, an athletics track, aquatic centre, residential village, sports halls and arenas, retail and commercial zones as well as theheadquarters of the Federal Sport Commission.

African Union (AU) - Power Shifts to The South'

A South African takes the helm at the continental organisation amidst at least four African crises that will test new chairwoman Nkosazana Dlamini Zuma's diplomatic and political skills. It was 1am on 17 July when a respectful hush fell over the silvery spaceship-shaped conference centre inAddis Ababa. Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma, resplendent in a green and purpleboubou, swore her loyalty to the African Union (AU) as the first woman to lead the continent's top organisation. "I pledge not to seek instructions," she intoned, "from any member state nor from any authority external to the African Union."It is one of those diplomatic fictions that when candidates for top international positions are elected, they instantly forgettheir nationalist aspirations. It was a fiction most energetically pushed by the South African government. Its lobbyists had worked hard to distance Dlamini-Zuma from her country's diplomatic record. "I'm not here to represent South African policy," she told journalists shortly before voting started for the AU job on 15 July.Until then, five states – Algeria, Egypt, Libya, Nigeria and South Africa – had respected the unwritten rule that they would not run for the AU's top position. But after a year of growing South African frustration with its handling of international interventions in Côte d'Ivoire and Libya, President Jacob Zuma's allies launched a bid for the top job late last year. The campaign stuttered and faltered.

Government insiders feared a resounding diplomatic rebuff.At the Januarysummit, AU chairman Jean Ping won each of three rounds of voting but failed to win the two-thirds of member states' votes necessary for victory.A stalemate ensued as criticism of South Africa's grandiose ambitions grew. Big countries such as Nigeria, Egypt and Libya objected to South Africa's pretensions of continental leadership. They may be too late. SouthAfrica is already Africa's representative in the emerging economies club known as BRICS – Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa. It is the only African member of the G-20 grouping of major world economies. It hosts the Pan-African Parliament, which is taken seriously as representingthe continent's political zeitgeist. Just as South Africa's seat on the UnitedNations (UN) Security Council expires at the end of this year, its former foreign minister takes over as head of the AU. Dlamini-Zuma quoted Marcus Garvey. Ping quoted Shakespeare South Africa has become the key point of diplomatic and economic contact in Africa for other emergingregions, as well as for the United States and the European Union. Should the efforts to reform the outdated power structures of the UN ever succeed, then South Africa is in pole position for the long-requested permanent African seat on the Security Council. There are plenty of clichés about an Anglophone-Francophone split in the AU, but they do notstack up. In the final round of voting, Dlamini-Zuma won the votes of 37 out of 51 voting states. Several Francophone states including Senegal, Chad and the Democratic Republic of Congo were among them. A frustrated Ivorian diplomat explained how the "fickleness" of his counterparts in Central Africa was responsible for Ping's defeat.Some of Dlamini-Zuma's staunchest opponents – Côte d'Ivoire and Gabon – are Francophone. But they worked with large non-Francophone countries: Nigeria, Ethiopia and Kenya. Most of the Arabic-speaking states of North Africa also backed Ping, at least initially. Voting split in different ways: regionally, linguistically, ideologically and on gender. A diplomat contrasted the speeches of Ping and Zuma at the closing ceremony.

Dlamini-Zuma quoted Marcus Garvey: "The history of a movement, of a nation, of a race, is a guide-post of that movement's destiny, that nation'sdestiny, that race's destiny. What you do today that is worthwhile, inspires others to act." Ping quoted Shakespeare: "All the world's a stage and all the men and women merely players; They have their exits and their entrances..." With a rueful smile, Ping ..

Gambella Nilotes United Movement/Army 1st anniversary'

August 10th 2012 is the first anniversary of GNUM/A. This day has a very special place in the history of the Gambella People for the commitment and common understanding made by the three parties' leaders who jointlyagreed to unite to fight for the freedom of the indigenous Nilotes, as the only way forward to bring freedom for the people of Gambella from the oppressive regime of TPLF/EPRDF corrupt leadership. The three parties include the Gambella People Liberation Movement/Force (GPLM/F), the Gambella People United Democratic Front (GPUDF) and the Southwest Ethiopia Nilo-Saharan Peoples Independent Movement (SENPIM).

The Washington Post: Ethiopian premier's Absence Draws Attention,Speculation'

Updates: Meanwhile, the government has cracked down on Muslim protesters and forced thousands of people from their land in Gambella andSouth Omo to make room for commercial agricultural projects. An aide to a U.S. senator involved in African affairs described Mr. Meles' absence as unsustainable and said it's anybody's guess how the country might unravel. David Shinn, a former U.S. ambassador to Ethiopia, said domestic unrest is unlikely to have much impact on Ethiopia's policy in Somalia because self-interest is guiding the government's involvement there. "Any government in [Ethiopia's capital] Addis Ababa will link unrest in Somalia to potential or actual unrest in Ethiopia's Odaden region," Mr. Shinn said, referring to the Ethiopian territory that borders Somalia. The Ethiopian government likely sees itself benefiting from the U.S. drone operation in terms of security and intelligence-sharing with the West. A spokesman in the U.S. Bureau of African Affairs said the United States hasbeen in contact with several Ethiopian officials since Mr. Meles' disappearance but would not speculate on what changes might occur should the prime minister not return to his duties. took power after the fall of the communist Haile Mariam Mengistu government in 1991 and wasre-elected amid accusations of voting fraud in 2005.

FINANCIAL TIMES – Horn Anxious Due to Meles' Disappearing, BrewingPower Struggle'

Updates: Meles' prolonged disappearance has initiated an internal power struggle among his party henchmen and is growingly becoming a source of anxiety for countries in the horn of African region TheFinancial Times reported. In its yesterday news feature, the London based newspaper, wrote at great length about the possible ramification of Meles' disappearance on the regional political and security dynamics. The paper recounted the unqualified support Meles has enjoyed despite his government's poor human rights record and he kept Ethiopians in absolute destitution. Meles' has long been considered as a bulwark againstterrorism in the horn of African region and the paper has attributed unqualified support he gets from the west to this role. The internal fissures among ethnic groups could pose a great danger should the powervacuum is to linger on. The Kenyan Prime Minister Raila Odinga said to the paper that he is on the dark as far as the whereabouts and health of Meles and expressed his deep seated fear about the leadership vacuum citing the fragility Ethiopian politics. FT has called the loose coalition of four ethnic parties Meles leads as 'notional' and highly controlled by the Tigrai People Liberation Front whose armed struggle Meles lead. Though Ethiopia government officials have continuously downplayed the immediate effect of Meles' disappearance, analysts are suggesting that there is a considerably jitter among party henchmen and sense of loss about political moves. There is an increasing report of internal power struggle among the TPLF ranks. Financial Times has suggested that Dr.

Tewodros Adhanom, Ambassador Berhane Guebre-kiristos, and the Prime Minister's influential wife Azeb Mesfin are at the front of the internal powerstruggle to succeed Meles Zenawi. Meles' disappearance has become a source of concern in the Horn.
Norway's Yara International profits may end in controversial MelesZenawi's regime'
The company has signed an agreement giving the Ethiopian regime, 30per-cent of the profits from the fertilizer project. Fertiliser use as a political instrument of power in the country, according to Human Rights Watch (HRW). In several articles Aftenposten has put the spotlight on Norway's extensive relationship with the controversial regime in Ethiopia, which in practice is regarded as a pure dictatorship. Large sums of aid pumped into the Ethiopian economy, which has experienced a solid growth. But the Norwegian business sector is heavily involved in the country. Fertilizer producer Yara International, where the Norwegian stateowns 36 per-cent, has grown to become the largest supplier of fertilizer in Ethiopia. 30 per-cent of the regime Now Yara has become the main shareholder in the company Ethiopotash, that extract raw materials for fertilizers. Yara is now planning to start a project to extract the raw materials through mining potash production. Documents obtained from Aftenposten.no Utenriksdepartemenet (MoFA) shows that one of the conditions that Yara will be running the project is that the authorities in the country will have 30 per-cent tax on profits, a royalty of four per-cent and a share of five per-cent. This means that nearly one third of the Norwegian company serving the business can end up in the pockets of what is considered as one of Africa's most brutal regimes. The project will,if realized, will have an income tax of 30 per-cent. There is absolutely no problem: that there is taxation on raw materials produced in Ethiopia, we see that quite naturally, says information director Esben Tuman Yara to Aftenposten.no. Do you think it will be profitable? It is hoped that it would, but for now it is in an early stage that it is difficult to give a probability assessment. He stressed that Yara is committed to complying with both "our own, the Norwegian and Ethiopian regulations."Lovise Aalen at the CMI said that Ethiopia has had a good economic growth in recent years, but that it is difficult to know exactly where the governmentrevenue ends up. Government party has good control over the economy, and the party people have many key positions in companies that have a strong influence. That way, even this income to help support the regime, she said.

Ethiopian Defence Forces Told to be on High Alert'

Updates: With the government still largely hushed about the fate of the Prime Minister and while there are growing reports of internal power struggle within the TPLF led coalition, the Ethiopian Ministry of Defence has instructed the Army, and the Air Force to be on high alert since three days ago. The immediate reason given by the defence ministry officials tothe unusually timed declaration of state-of-alert is the hitherto unresolvedtension with the Ethiopian Muslim community. However military analysts and sources within the ministry doubt the Ethiopian Muslims' by and largepeaceful movement would be a reason to alert and in some instances mobilize the Army and Air Force. These insider sources say the alert couldbe a lot more related to the uncertainty and the power vacuum created with the now eighth week absence of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. Our sources say the writ was passed to chiefs and subsequently to division heads of the Army and Air Force at the beginning of the week. All army Barracks and the main Air Force base at Debre Zeit are now operating 24 hours a day. Especially there is a heightened activity at the Department ofArmy Command and Deployment; and Department of Logistics. Security has also since been increased near and around military depots. Division heads working in the Department of Army Command and Deployment are at the highest alert and operating round the clock. ESAT's resident political analyst believes the government is preparing itself to disclose thefinal fate of PM Meles Zenawi and he suspects this whole preparation is fora possible backlash that comes with the disclosure. One other hypothesis for the unusual state-of-alert is a preparation to thwart a possible cross boarder attack by Eritrea to take advantage of the lurking political crises.

Post-Meles Zenawi Void Could Create Opening for Reform' (Updates) For 20 years, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi has been the undisputed ruler of Ethiopia. Zenawi was the leader of the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF), which in concert with its sister rebel group from Eritrea toppled the Moscow-aligned dictator Lt. Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam in May, 1991. Meles led his country in the 1998-2000 war against his former Eritrean allies and oversaw multiple Ethiopian military interventions into neighboring Somalia. An active and outspoken leader, Meles Zenawi is also credited with a pragmatic approach to economic development despite his Marxist roots, resulting in an average of 9 per- cent GDP growth over the past 10 years. Now the strong man of the Horn of Africa has disappeared -- literally: The Economist Magazine rhetorically inquired, "What if Mr. Meles goes for good?" Shouldn't the question be, "Isit not good for Ethiopia if Mr. Meles goes for good?" . On July 18, an Agence France Press (AFP) report citing "several diplomatic sources" reported that Zenawi is a goner “in a critical state” at a hospital in Belgium and he “might not survive”. Ethiopian Satellite Television (ESAT), citing an anonymous source at the International Crisis Group (ICG), reported that Zenawi is dead and gone. ICG issued an opaque denial stating that it had “no direct knowledge” of Zenawi’s “health” or death. In a staged interview with party-controlled media on August 1, Zenawi’s communication minister, Bereket Simon, declared “the prime minister’s health is in very good condition.” A week later, Simon said Zenawi will be back before the Ethiopian New Year which is usually celebrated on September 11. For almost two months, Zenawi has not appeared in public. Nor has he given any interviews and or any other indication that heis still alive, despite a high-profile summit of the African Union currently taking place in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa...

TPLF's veteran Sebhat Nega predicts on political fate of Meles Zenawi onindependent ESAT'

Founder and former chairman of Tigrai People’s Liberation Front (TPLF)talks to ESAT about Meles Zenawi’s political fate, condition and who is going to replace him’ It's Day-55 since Ethiopia’s dictator Meles Zenawihas disappeared. In his interview with Sisay Agena of ESAT, the TPLF veteran Sebhat Nega says whether Meles Zenawi is alive or not, there is aconstitutional order in which succession of power is conducted according to what is in the constitution. The latest puzzling development is the TPLFfounder and former chairman Sebhat Nega’s interview with ESAT yesterday to talk about Meles Zenawi. It’s unclear how Sebhat agreed to be interviewed by ESAT, a media organization that is labeled a ‘terrorist group’ by the incumbent government? ESAT’s line of questioning is also disquieting, to say the least. It's to be recalled that in the earlier week, the regime’s spokesman Bereket Simon says Meles will return before September 11, which is Ethiopian New Year.

Where in the world is Ethiopia's prime minister?

Updates;- The question is not a geographical brain teaser but a concernedquery about the well-being of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who has not been seen in public for nearly two months, and about Ethiopia’s commitment to U.S. counterterrorism efforts in neighboring Somalia.

Ethiopian officials say Mr. Meles, 57, is recovering from an undisclosed illness, but he has not been seen or heard from since he attended the Group of 20 summit in Mexico in mid-June. In his absence, the government has continued to brook little dissent from the media, activists and members of opposition parties. It also has announced that Ethiopian troops will remain in Somalia to help defeat Al-Shabaab, the Al-Qaeda- linked Islamist militant group that has ruled large areas of the Horn of Africa nation. What’s more, government insiders say Mr. Meles Zenawi hasbeen grooming his deputy, Foreign Affairs Minister Haile-Mariam Desalegne, to succeed him.

National Bank of Ethiopia Abbreviated as NBE Suspends Foreign CurrencyExchanges'

The Ethiopian government has suspended the provision of foreign currency in a decision that has been linked to the political uncertainties surrounding Prime Minister Meles Zenawi’s disappearance. A notice to thiseffect has been issued by the regulator, the National Bank of Ethiopia, to the country’s commercial banks as Addis Ababa. According to Agriculture minister Mitiku Kassa, the number of aid recipients was 3.2 million over the last six months, and have now increased due to the failure of rain in some parts of the country. The country's foreign currency reserves are running alarmingly low and can only cover the importation of basic goods such as petroleum, medicine and food. The measure is likely to lead to a black market boom that would further weaken the country's import-exporttrade, observers say. Banking in the Horn of Africa nation of about 85 million people is highly centrally regulated. Industry insiders say massive capital flight and illegal transactions are the main reasons for the rapid depletion of forex reserves. One of the fastest growing sub-Saharan Africacountries, Ethiopia's growth has touched seven per cent annually for the last nine years, according to the IMF. Big businesses owned by Mr Meles' ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) play a key role in the daily operation of the economy. The EPRDF owns banks, insurance firms, manufacturing and construction giants, hotel chains and media outlets among the more than 85 companies under the Endowment Fund for the Rehabilitation of Tigrai. The EPRDF is a coalition of four largely ethnically-based political parties, with the Tigrai People Liberation Front (TPLF) — representing Tigrai, who make up less than five per cent of the population — running the show and providing the power base for Meles and his government. Mr Meles, a Tigrai, has been absent from the public eye for two months due to an undisclosed illness, fuelling speculation of an internal power struggle his absence. Government officials refute this and say the long-serving premier would resume office soon. However, the government has to date failed to provide proof that heis alive. Ethiopia has lost $11.7 billion to outflows of ill-gotten gains between 2000 and 2009, a recent Global Financial Integrity report says. "That is a lot of money to lose to corruption for a country that has a per capita GDP of just $365. In 2009, illicit money leaving the country totalled $3.26 billion, doubled the amount in each of the two previous years," part of the report reads. About $194 million in cash or 314 metric tonnes of food is needed for the next four months. Forty-one per cent of the hungry as located in the Ethiopian-Somali region and the rest in Oromia, Southernand Amhara regional states.

Italy Memorial to ex-Fascist Icon Marshal Rodolfo Graziani sparks row'

A political row has erupted in Italy after a memorial was opened to fascistcommander Field Marshal Rodolfo Graziani, a convicted war criminal.

Graziani was honoured with a mausoleum and memorial park, built at taxpayers' expense, in a village south of Rome. He was notorious as Benito Mussolini's military commander in colonial wars in Ethiopia and Libya where he carried out massacres and used chemical weapons. Italy's main leftist party has protested against the commemoration. "Is it possible to allow, accept or simply tolerate that, in 2012, we dedicate a park and a museum to the fascist general and minister Rodolfo Graziani?" asked Esterino Montino, head of the Democratic Party in the Lazio region. He pointed to the "crimes against humanity committed by Graziani in Ethiopia in the 1930s", La Repubblica newspaper reports. Marshal Rodolfo

Graziani was sentenced to 19 years' imprisonment for war crimes in 1948 but was released from jail after serving only two years, and died in 1955. 'Butcher of Fezzan' The BBC's David Willey, in Rome, says that the cult of fascist heroes remains alive in certain parts of Italy despite the outlawing of the fascist party in the country's postwar constitution. He adds that it iscurious, however, that there has been no formal protest that a crypto- fascist mayor of a small town near the capital can, in 2012, publicly honour a man who brought death to thousands of Africans and dishonour to his own country. The mayor of the village of Affile attended the openingceremony on Saturday, together with a representative from the Vatican. Although almost unknown to modern generations of Italians, the Fascist military officer was known as the Butcher of Fezzan for the executions of Libyans he ordered while military governor of Cyrenaica in North Africa, the BBC correspondent says. He used poison gas and chemical weapons against Ethiopian troops and tribesmen during Italy's colonial war in what was then called Abyssinia. Towards the end of the war, Rodolfo Graziani was appointed defence minister by Mussolini in the short-lived Fascist Republic of Salo. He commanded Italian troops alongside the Germans at the Battle of Garfagnana in December 1944, one of the last military victories of the Axis forces. According to La Repubblica, the mausoleum in Affile cost 127,000 euros (£100,000; $157,000). About 100 people attended its inauguration, the paper adds. Mayor Ercole Viri was quoted assaying the memorial was of national importance and dismissing criticism as "idle chatter". Photos of the opening ceremony were posted in a galleryon the village's website, which lists Rodolfo Graziani as one of the village's"famous sons". Engraved on the mausoleum are the words "Fatherland" and "Honour". There is another side to Italy's often schizophrenic attitude to its recent history, the correspondent adds. Another ceremony was held the same weekend marking the anniversary of a tragic massacre of 560 Italian men women and children by German SS troops as a reprisal in a small town near Lucca, in Tuscany. Field Marshal Rodolfo Graziani, also known as the "Butcher of Fezzan", is known in history books for his brutality in putting down a local rebellion in Cyrenaica, Libya, in the 1920s. He is also notorious for the massacre of thousands of Ethiopians inanother of Italy's colonial wars a decade later, where he is reported to have said: "The Duce [Mussolini] will have Ethiopia with or without the Ethiopians". He ordered the use of poison gas and chemical weapons against Ethiopian troops in contravention of the Geneva Convention, whichItaly had signed. His final post was as defence minister in Benito Mussolini's short-lived Fascist republic of Salo, just before the end of World War II. After the war ended, he was sentenced to 19 years' imprisonment by an Italian war crimes tribunal for collaboration with the Nazis, though he was freed after serving only some of his sentence.

Call to free Ethiopia's jailed Muslim protesters'

According to AFP, Muslim leaders in Ethiopia jailed as part of a "brutal crackdown" must be released immediately, the US-based Human Rights Watch said Wednesday, a demand dismissed by the government. "The Ethiopian government should immediately release 17 prominent Muslim leaders arrested as part of a brutal crackdown on peaceful Muslim protesters in Addis Ababa," HRW said in a statement. The arrests took place following widespread protests staged by Muslims last month, to dispute what they said was unconstitutional government interference in religious affairs. According to HRW, the detainees have been "mistreated"in custody and are being held without charge or access to legal advice. "They have had no access to legal counsel or, in several cases, their relatives," HRW said. "Their lack of access to lawyers while detained in a prison known for torture heightens concerns about their safety." Muslim groups in the country have staged weekly gatherings since the beginning of the year at two mosques in the Ethiopian capital. Protesters accuse the government of forcibly imposing the Al-Ahbash branch of Islam, and appointing leaders of the Supreme Council on Islamic Affairs, who are traditionally elected by members of the Muslim community. Muslims officially make up about 30 percent of the country's 83 million people. TheEthiopian government denied repression and said the arrests were legal. "There is no crackdown. There are people who are legally apprehended, legally pursued, and this is within the legal bounds, the constitutional bounds, of the government," government spokesman Bereket Simon told AFP. This month, police said several people had been arrested in connection with the demonstrations for intending "to carry out acts of terrorism". They said the protests had been carried out illegally and accused the movement of extremism, according to a statement from the Foreign Affairs Ministry. HRW accused police of illegally harassing, assaulting and arbitrarily arresting protesters and urged the government to engage in peaceful dialogue. "The Ethiopian government should addressthe grievances of its Muslim community through dialogue, not violence... the security forces should be upholding the law, not breaking it," HRW Africa researcher Ben Rawlence said. However, Bereket Simon accused the rights group of meddling and said Ethiopia followed its constitution. "This is a blatant disregard for the sovereignty of Ethiopia and this countryis not led by Human Rights Watch so we go by our constitution, not by theinvisible hand of Human Rights Watch," he said. At least one of the arrested protestors is a journalist, while the bulk of the detained are members of an Islamic Committee created in January to represent the Muslim community when protests kicked off. Several Muslim leaders have recently gone into hiding, and many refuse to speak publicly, citing fear ofarrest. "They are afraid of going to prison .... The Muslim community is now afraid of the government," said one Muslim living near Awoliya mosque. Backed by the West, Ethiopia has long been a bulwark against Islamic extremism in the volatile Horn of Africa region. In 2011, Ethiopian troops and tanks rolled into neighbouring Somalia to battle Al Qaeda-linked Shabaab insurgents. Government interference in religious affairs is illegal, according to the constitution. In April, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said freedom of religion is respected under the constitution, but said some Muslims in the country were engaged in subversive acts and had attempted to establish an Islamic state.

The Meles Mystery'

Updates;- To many Ethiopians "the sudden disappearance of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, the rebel-turned-technocrat who has led Ethiopia since May, 1991, is mysterious. For some is a source of joy and excited expectation, for his die-hard supporters apprehension no doubt and concern for their leader. Is he dead they ask, or perhaps critically ill, has he run away, finally overwhelmed by guilt and shame at the way he and his ministerial cronies have treated the people of Ethiopia. Some continue to say, “its a mystery what has happened to Meles Zenawi and not even his own ministers know his fate,” an exiled Ethiopian source said.” According to a ‘government source’, (no name or status is given) speakingto the Guardian, Meles Zenawi is on holiday, well it is the summer after all, and is recovering from an illness. There is no mention of where he is holidaying or why he has not personally issued a statement, reassured hisfollowers, who are no doubt worried, and silenced the internal tussling within the EPRDF, that is undoubtedly taking place.

Campaign Group Reporters Without Borders (RWB) has accused Ethiopiangovernment’
RWB has accused the government of further intensifying press and Internet censorship using sophisticated technology used to selectively block websites. According to RWB, the state-owned Ethiopian Telecommunication Corporation (ETC), the country’s only Internet serviceprovider, has begun blocking access to the Tor network, an online systemthat allows users to anonymously browse blocked websites. The so-called Deep Packet Inspection (DPI) is an advanced network filtering method intended to block porn sites but mainly used by countries which have badpress freedom records such as China and Iran. ‘We fear that DPI will be misused for surveillance purposes by a government that already subjects the political opposition and privately-owned media to a great deal of harassment,' said the group. RWB further accused state- owned printers of trying to impose political censorship on media content prior to publication. The proposed ‘standard contract for printing’ allows them the right to vet and reject articles prior to printing. "If this standard contract is adopted, we fear it could lead to widespread self-censorship, which is already very common, and to media subservience towards the government. Criticism, independence and media diversity would all suffer,and the vitality of Ethiopian democracy would suffer as well. According to the group's Press freedom Index 2011-2012 Ethiopia is listed 127 of 179 countries. Eritrea and North Korea have the most restrictive press environments.
Updates;- ‘The Toronto Star’ Ethiopia's speculates Prime Minister Meles Zenawi hasn't been seen in public since June 18, prompting public speculation about his health and his whereabouts. Have you seen this Ethiopian prime minister? The propaganda chief Bereket Simon told Radio-SBS Australian reporter over the weekend that Meles will return from his ‘vacation’ before Ethiopian New Year on September, 11. Where is Meles Zenawi? It’s a question that is being asked by Ethiopians, local and international media, and making the rounds of blogs and Twitter. Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who has led the country since 1991, has gone missing. And his absence has triggered a political game of Where’s Waldo?, with everyone speculating on the missing leader’s location and the state of his health. His last public international appearance was at the G20 Summit in Mexico in June. At home he was last seen on June 26 at a meeting with Somali President Sheikh Sharif Sheikh Ahmed in the Ethiopian capital, according to media reports. His absence has fuelled speculation in media reports published by Think Africa Press, the Committee to Protect Journalists, World Politics Review, the Independent, the Guardian and the Washington Post, to name a few. Rumours about the57-year-old's health have circulated since 2009, when he was said to be receiving treatment for an unknown disease. But they have been front andcentre since he failed to attend the recent African Union summit in Addis Ababa, a parliamentary debate on the budget earlier this summer and a meeting of the New Partnership for Africa's Development. At first, reports had him in hospital in Brussels with a possible brain tumour, then other reports said he was in Germany getting treatment. Now some governmentofficials are saying he was sick, but is now away, resting and recuperating. For the moment, government spokesmen are remaining tight-lipped about Meles and his health. The ruling coalition — the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front — has confirmed that medical reasons are behind the prime minister's absence. And a government spokesman says Meles will reappear in public life before the Ethiopian New Year, which is celebrated on Sept. 11. His own information minister and close ally Simon Berekat has said that Meles is expected to return to work "soon" and that he had taken a sick leave, the Independentreports. But this answer hasn't stopped speculation that Meles might be dead and that government officials are just holding on to power so his wife Azeb Mesfin, who is an MP and member of the ruling coalition's nine- member executive committee, can take over. Ethiopians both at home and abroad are taking to Twitter — using the hashtags #WhereIsMeles or #MelesZenawi — to weigh in about the health of Meles and the future of their homeland. For those who have relatives who have been wrongly jailed in Ethiopia, the suggestion that Meles is dead brings bittersweet hope — the possibility that a new leader might abide with a long-standing tradition of granting amnesty to all political prisoners upon taking office.

Meles has ruled Ethiopia with an iron fist since he overthrew Col. MengistuHaile-Mariam's 17 year dictatorship. Analysts say he has used his securityapparatus to hang on to power. Some consider him a "darling" of Westerndonors and governments for the growth his country has seen under his leadership, but his reputation for ignoring human rights, oppressing political opposition and rejecting press freedom has tarnished his image.

Ethiopian leader's absence grips nation, fuels speculation - CNN News'

According to the CNN, Ethiopia's prime minister is "recovering well," a spokesman said Wednesday, amid frenzied speculation about the health ofthe usually visible leader, who has not appeared in public for two months. Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, 57, came to power two decades ago and is considered a strong force in the frequently volatile horn of Africa. He has not appeared in public since June, and the secretive nation has released little information about his whereabouts, prompting rumors and oppositionclaims that he is dead or facing a life-threatening illness. After weeks of speculation, the government held a news conference last month and announced he got treatment for an unspecified illness. Meles Zenawi is "recovering well, resting and performing his duties as prime minister and head of state," government spokesman Bereket Simon reiterated Wednesday. He declined to give exact details on Zenawi's whereabouts orthe nature of his illness. His absence has been a hot topic in the nation, with bloggers launching a counter of the number of days he's been missing. Citizens have taken to social media to discuss his whereabouts and exchange conspiracy theories. Searches for Zenawi are at their highest since 2004, according to Google trends. "Ethiopians are a bit confused," said Endalk Hailemichael, 30, of Addis Ababa. "In Ethiopia, there are traditions of secrecy and hiding the whereabouts of leaders.

People are afraid, there is a lot of uncertainty looming. A lot of rumors andunclear information going on." Hailemichael said the disappearance has sparked a lot of questions, including who would succeed him in case of a power vacuum. But most people are discussing it with fear of repercussions, he said. CNN reached several people in the nation who expressed their concerns about his whereabouts, but did not want to be quoted for fear of retribution. "People are afraid to talk about it. This is a police state," Hailemichael said. "They are talking about it, but they are looking over their shoulders. In bars, in taxis, coffee shops, that's all people are talking about. But they are afraid." His absence was more evident last month when Ethiopia hosted an African Union summit in its capital of Addis Ababa. Zenawi, a key player in talks on the tensions between Sudan and its rival neighbor South Sudan, did not attend. "Somepeople are worried, some people are crying," said Jemaneh Kassaye, 30, who lives near Addis Ababa. "While some people are worried about the instability that might occur .. others are happy that he may be gone." Kassaye said, while he is not a fan of the leader, he wants him to leave through a democratic process. "I need him to go because there is no democracy, no freedom of speech, no food, no justice, no accountability," he said. "But not like this. If he leaves like this, we will have another dictator who will take over power and stay for too long." Ethiopia, which isa key Western ally often lauded for effective use of aid money, is surrounded by unstable nations such as Somalia and Eritrea. PM Zenawi has been credited with working toward peace and security in the region.
The Ethiopian army has sent peacekeepers to battle Islamic extremist group Al-Shabaab in Somalia. More recently, the prime minister was working to broker a peace deal in the negotiations between Sudan and South Sudan, which split last year but still have unresolved issues. In an attempt to quash the rumors, the government censored a newspaper that tried to report information about his health, according to the Committee toProtect Journalists. "This weekend, the government ordered the state-run printing company not to produce the latest edition of the weekly Feteh, which was to have carried front-page coverage of Zenawi's condition," themedia advocacy group said on its website. Zenawi, a former guerrilla leader, is part of a group that toppled dictator Mengustu Haile Mariam in May, 1991. The shrewd politician is credited with economic progress and maintaining peace in the nation surrounded by volatile countries. However, dissidents blame Meles Zenawi "the tyrant finally died leaving uswith the legacy of his heinous crimes including genocide, victims of torture, incarceration of peaceful protesters en masse; extra judiciary execution of peaceful protesters, the wailing of mothers, the agony of bereaved families, toiling peasants in serfdom, inter-ethnic hatred, daylight robbery of electoral votes, pervasive corrupt practices, demised free media, government monopoly of all pillars of democracy, blocked freedom of expression, poor educational standard, forbidden academic freedom in tertiary institutions, abject poverty, rampant unemployment embarrassing lies, rampant breach of the constitution, regional instability et al. All in all it was a tragedy that befell brought Ethiopia to the precipiceof catastrophe that will require divine guidance, visionary leadership and hard work in a democratic environment. Human rights groups have accused his government of a heavy hand and a series of abuses, includinglimiting press freedoms and cracking down on opposition political parties. Last year, Ethiopia found two Swedish journalists guilty of supporting terrorism and sentenced them to 11 years.

What Might a post-Meles Era Bring?

As Prime Minister Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia concludes his 21st year of rule,and as rumours of his illness and possible demise abound, many are wondering what the future holds for the country. There is significant anxiety within Meles' inner circle about who will take the reins of power if the prime minister passes away and increased speculation amongst his enemies despite the regime barring the media from reporting on Meles' health. People are questioning whether succession will be easy and smooth or slow and difficult; whether the new leadership will be willing to share power with the growing opposition and many ethnically-inspired movements in the country; who the new rulers might be; and whether theruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) coalitionwill survive the end of Meles' paternalistic rule. As of now, however, questions are abundant but answers are few. Speculation about Meles' health began in 2009, when he was reported to be receiving treatment foran unspecified illness in the United Arab Emirates. And rumours resurfaced again recently after the prime minster missed a number of public events, including the recent African Union summit in Addis Ababa and a parliamentary debate on the budget on July 8. As the prime minister's health has visibly deteriorated and he has disappeared from thepublic eye for over a month and half, concern has grown not just about Meles' wellbeing but about what might happen in the eventuality of the highly influential leader's death. For two decades, Meles has dominated the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF), the group responsible for the overthrow of Colonel Mengistu Haile-Mariam's 17-year dictatorship in May 1991 and the party which forms the main part Ethiopia's ruling coalition, the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). Should the PM die or step down for health reasons, some possible successors as PM include Hailemariam Desalegn (the hand-picked deputy prime minister and foreign minister); Tewodros Adhanom (the health minister and close confidant of the Meles); and Azeb Mesfin, (an MP, member of the EPRDF's powerful nine-member executive committee, and Meles' wife). It is doubtful whether any of these individuals would be capable of holding together the complex coalition that makes up the EPRDF.

Military strength,US support, and individual charisma: The stabilityof Ethiopia's regime is anchored on the strength of its military, support from the US, and the individual intelligence and charisma of Meles. Meles has used his security apparatus effectively to hang on to power. His violent crackdown on demonstrations in 2005 following the allegedly rigged election was indicative of this, while the 2010 elections cemented one-party rule with a vengeance in the form of repression, quashing dissenting voices and shutting down of independent media. Furthermore, as dissident groups have emerged, Meles' regime has arrested and sentenced to long jail terms several dissidents, journalists, Oromo nationalists and Islamic activists, classifying them as terrorists. While opposition and discontent have been growing in Ethiopia, dissident groupsare relatively weak despite the noise from diaspora media and exiled Ethiopians, and Ethiopia's security apparatus is highly vigilant of such groups. The demise of Meles, however, could embolden the opposition, accentuating ethnic and religious cleavages in the country and disturbing the status quo. Currently, a sustained, large Muslim protest has become anew source of worry for the regime. The government attributes the unrestto infiltration from Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Somalia by Salafists and Wahhabists, but this attempt to externalise the issue is disingenuous.

Ethiopian Muslims who number anywhere from 30-50% of the population have historically been marginalised and grievances could undermine political stability. It seems fairly likely therefore that Meles' successors willcontinue to be dependent on the TPLF-dominated military. It also seems likely that Ethiopia will continue to enjoy the support of the US. Ethiopia iscurrently the biggest recipient of official development assistance in sub- Saharan Africa and the second biggest recipient in the world. Despite his Marxist roots, Meles has attracted Western investment and foreign aid, and has so far managed to hold together a difficult country racked by decades of war, famine and economic devastation. One reason Ethiopia attracts so much Western support is that Meles is the pillar of Obama's campaign in the Horn of Africa. Having established himself as an indispensable ally of the West in the fight against terrorism, Meles has enjoyed continuing American support in the face of his obdurate internal policies and effective isolation of Eritrea in the UN Security Council, Inter- Governmental Authority on Development (IGAD) and the African Union.

Ethiopia is seen as a vital ally in the "war on terror", a bulwark against Sudan, Eritrea and Somalia. Despite its concerns, the US is reluctant to send its own forces to stabilise Darfur, Somalia, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. It thus relies on local strongmen such as Uganda'sPresident Museveni, Rwanda's President Kagame, and Meles. In return, suppression of dissent in Ethiopia is glossed over, unlike in President Robert Mugabe's Zimbabwe or in President Omar al-Bashir's Sudan. For the US, Ethiopia is a military bridgehead to contain al-Qaeda infiltration in Somalia, the rest of the Horn and even across the Red Sea in Yemen. Thissupport is likely to continue. What seems most uncertain at the moment iswhether, without Meles' charisma, the leader's successor or successors will be able to galvanise the support of key party leaders and technocrats within the government. Challenges for the future:If Meles were to pass away or pass over the reins of power, the challenges for his successor willbe considerable.

For example, in spite of a reported average growth rate between 8-11% since 2000 - partially a result of foreign investment in thecountry's agricultural and manufacturing sectors - Ethiopia's economic challenges linger. Theft from state enterprises and participation in the black market, including widespread graft, is common. Meanwhile, increases in imported global food and fuel prices, rapid expansion of the broad money supply, and a large devaluation of the birr has led to high inflation in recent years. Furthermore, large and persistent government deficits and the absence of virtually any stabilising fiscal and monetary policies have accelerated a downward economic spiral. Another critical problem a post-Meles Ethiopia will have to grapple with is the powerful military. The military has acquired unprecedented levels of power under Meles and it will continue to be a decisive player. The forces are dominated by Meles' ethnic group, Tigrayans, and any attempt to create atruly representative national army may prove difficult. Attempts to undermine TPLF power and authority will undoubtedly be resisted by Meles' inner circle as serious threats. The military has significant control and influence in key economic sectors in Ethiopia and it will be tough to dislodge the forces from these activities and limit its role to a strictly military one. The military's role will also be affected by ethnic conflicts which may worsen after Meles. Meles' rule has been characterised by repression, war and interference across borders, which has engendered some resentment among different groups including the former ruling classes of the Amhara ethnic group. And tension along the disputed frontier with Eritrea has increased recently, following a cross border raid by Ethiopian forces, the first known incursion into Eritrea since 2000. Ethiopia's new leaders will also have to grapple with the country's regionalfrictions. Under the EPRDF, Ethiopia was officially declared a federal state though the strong centre never really allowed for the true spirit of federalism to emerge. And grievances of regions believing they re not getting their fair share, commensurate with their resources, remains unresolved. There is a long list of regional claims of mistreatmentby the centre including issues such as misuse of river waters and the "leasing" of indigenous land to foreign capitalists. Gambela, on the borderwith South Sudan, is possibly the region worst affected by land leasing and displacement. The government has earmarked almost half of the region to become commercial farms, and since 2008 a number of foreign companies have leased a total of 225,012 hectares in the state. In theory,the constitution contains provisions that protect the rights and aspirations of regions, but the high-handedness of the EPRDF regime has underminedregional autonomy, making a mockery of the concept of true federalism.
Grievances around these issues will be awaiting Meles' successor. Meles' record as prime minister has been complex and mixed. He has been criticised for his human rights record yet has a reputation for being technocratically focused on achieving pro-poor sustainable development.He has led his country to a level of modernisation it has never known yetfollowed in his predecessor's footsteps by withholding food aid against opposition. He has been the central figure in Ethiopia's fate over the pasttwo decades. It is little wonder that many are concerned about what a post-Meles era will bring. THINK AFRICA PRESS by

Yohannes Wolde- Mariam (August 9, 2012)

Information emerged that Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces General Samora (Mohammed) Yonus gravely ill: Chief of Staff of the Armed ForcesGeneral Samora (Mohammed) Yonus gravely ill, he left Ethiopia for medical treatment. Samora Yonus, the four star General and senior officerof the Ethiopian National Defense Forces was taken seriously ill and rushed out of the country for medical treatment, another shocking development that could weaken the regime's control of the military. The TPLF/EPRDF faces some difficult and anxious days ahead as the crisis of leadership deepens within their ruling party; all worsened by the growing anger, fear and resentment from Ethiopians towards their 21-year long iron-fisted, one-party, ethno-centric rule. The sudden death of Ethiopian Orthodox Patriarch Abune Paulos, following the disappearance of Prime Minister Meles, and now the rumored illness of General Samora Yonus, leaves three unexpected vacuums in the top leadership of Ethiopia. Who will replace them—a tribe or the most qualified leaders? The death of Abune Paulos on August 16, 2012 has caught many Ethiopians by surprise. The loss of another TPLF/EPRDF top linchpin must be causing increasing anxiety and fear behind the closed doors of the regime. His death only compounds the leadership vacuum created when Meles disappeared over two months ago. (August 17, 2012)

Ethiopian restaurant owner and his wife were found shot to death early morning on the front porch of their home in Dallas, Texas' Yayehyirad Lemma, 40, and Yenenesh Desta, 31, were attacked just after midnight when they returned to their Marquita Avenue home from a 16-hour shift at Desta, an Ethiopian restaurant Lemma owns on Greenville Avenue nearForest Lane. The couple have an 18-month-old child, who was not hurt. who spent long hours working at their Ethiopian restaurant was followed during a midnight thunderstorm to their Lower Greenville home and shot dead on their front porch. Yayehyirad "Yared" Lemma, 40, and Yenenesh "Yenni" Desta, 31, were attacked early Wednesday after they drove to their home on Marquita Avenue. They'd just closed for the night at Desta,the restaurant they ran on Greenville Avenue near Forest Lane. Dallas detectives are trying to determine a motive and had identified no suspects. The slayings happened quickly, they say, and the shooter was gone within minutes. Lemma's mother was in the home at the time, baby-sitting the couple's 18-month-old child, neighbor Francisco Espinaco said. Neither was hurt, but the mother emerged screaming from the home moments after the shooting. "I heard her say, 'My son, my son!'" said Margie Marshall, who lives with Espinaco. "I have a son, so I had to go help her." Shortly after midnight, police received multiple reports of gunshots in the Lower Greenville area. They arrived at the home just across the street from the San Francisco Rose bar to find the couple dead on the porch. Marshall and Espinaco, who live in a ground-floor apartmentacross the street, were awake at the time of the shooting. Espinaco described hearing two shots, dismissed as thunder by Marshall. Two more shots followed, prompting the couple to call 911. They remained indoors until they heard Lemma's mother screaming. Marshall consoled her and kept her away from investigators as other family members arrived during the night. A cousin led a prayer group in the middle of the street as rain poured down. The rain was too heavy for witnesses to see much of what happened just before the shooting, but surveillance cameras at the San Francisco Rose caught another car stopping behind Desta's Mercedes-Benzas the couple pulled up to the house. After the shooting, witnesses believethe vehicle — described as a dark SUV — fled with its lights off. On Wednesday afternoon, hundreds gathered at St. Michael Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, where the couple attended services. Women wept in a dining hall while chants were sung for the victims in the adjoining sanctuary. Abebe Negatu, who supplies bread for the restaurant,said the deaths hit everyone in the Ethiopian community. "We have a small community," he said, "so we grieve together." In online forums, fansof the restaurant mourned the loss and raved about the food and the owners' hospitality at one of the city's few Ethiopian restaurants, opened in 2010. Friend Teddy Tadesse described Lemma as quiet and shy. "Not what you would think for someone who runs a restaurant," he said.

Lemma and Desta's restaurant, which shares her name and means "happiness," was closed Wednesday. The couple have an 18-month-old child, who was not hurt. It's unclear whether the child was at home at thetime of the shooting. About midnight, police received multiple reports of shots fired in the Lower Greenvile area, just across the street from the San Francisco Rose. They arrived to find the man and woman dead. Dallaspolice are trying to determine a motive, as it remains unclear whether thiswas a robbery or something else. At least one investigator remained at the scene this morning, but Detective Michael Yeric said there's not much to add, only that it all happened fast. A shooter (or shooters) simply walked up and started firing, then fled. Neighbor Bell Velis, 81, didn't know the couple but has lived on that block of Marquita for 48 years, and this is the first bloodshed he can recall there. He said his wife heard two gunshots and he saw the police activity soon after. Jacob Hilton, who also lives nearby, said the neighborhood is typically quiet, but gets a lot of traffic. "I've never really seen anyone suspicious."

Obang Metho of the SMNE Calls for Calm, Caution and Dialogue' Meles Zenawi, prime minister of Ethiopia the darling of the West, but a ruthless strongman to his own people has passed away. After two months of rumors and speculation about his death or incapacitation, the government of Ethiopia finally announced his death. No one expected, even two months ago, that Meles' 21-year long, iron-fisted control over the one-party government of the Tigrai Peoples' Liberation Front (TPLF)— which controlled the coalition government of the Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF)—would come to such an abrupt end. Meles' absence will challenge the entire system and we must be ready, but patient. For years, opposition groups, as well as key stakeholders within and outside of Ethiopia, recognized the ability of this one man to either hinder or advance agendas of others to his own benefit,whether in Ethiopia or in the region. Now that he is gone, the TPLF/EPRDFsystem that maintained him and dominated every sector of society in Ethiopia, although still in place, may have taken a deadly hit. The future isuncertain as the new regime faces new challenges from inner TPLF power struggles, splits between Tigrayans, the renewed vigor from opposition groups and now, new demands from religious groups, both Muslims and Christians, for freedom from government interference in their religious affairs. As our dictator has been taken out of the game, Ethiopians may suddenly have a unique opportunity to win their struggle for a healthier, more inclusive and more prosperous Ethiopia. Today is a new day. We arenot going to celebrate the death of somebody but must still carefully appraise the real obstacles ahead that may not have been clearly revealedto outsiders or understood by us. Meles had two faces—one for outsiders and one among Ethiopians. To outsiders, like within the African Union, Meles was perceived to be a "uniter" but to Ethiopians, he maintained his power through fomenting division. He was the architect of the Ethiopian system of ethnic federalism, which discouraged a national identity as it accentuated ethnicity; all used as a divide and conquer tactic to maintain control of the majority by a minority group comprised of only 6% of the population. As a result, we all know that the Ethiopia of today is more divided by ethnicity than ever before. To state players concerned about global security, Meles played a role in the War on Terror and in sending troops to Somalia; but to his own people, Meles was our home-grown terrorist who most threatened our lives and futures and radicalized neighboring Somalia. The newly appointed transitional Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, will have a critical role to play. Whether he will take the side of the people or will attempt to continue the status quo, is unknown; however, if he rises to the challenge of advancing the interests of the people, it will require undoing the machinery of suppression so carefully put into place by this regime—like the Anti-terrorism law that has imprisoned democratic voices and the Charities and Societies Proclamationthat has eliminated civic institutions, replacing them with pseudo organizations controlled by the regime. It will require implementing broad reforms: creating an independent judiciary system, freeing the media, advancing the Internet, forming an independent election board and initiating all those key parts of any well- functioning democratic state. He must also release thousands of political prisoners who are only imprisonedbecause they became enemies of the regime simply for living out their consciences. As we face these next, uncertain days and weeks ahead, if we are to succeed as a people and avoid violence and revenge after yearsof simmering tensions, anger and frustration among us, we Ethiopians must see each other as one people—the Ethiopian people—and part of ourfamily of humanity. This is not a time for vengeance or destruction, but is a time to start reconciling with each other for the sake of the whole country. This is the beginning of reform. We are calling for dialogue among Ethiopians. We are also calling on those western state players, who supported Meles, to now support the organizations who are working to establish democracy, to preserve the territorial integrity of the country,to build institutions and to reject appeals of ethnic-based violence. We know that Meles received that support, despite his many human rights abuses and the repression of his people, because of the perceived greaterinterest in global security and stability in a geo-politically strategic region;but now it is time to reassess who will be the best long-term partners. It is the Ethiopian people. The man that charmed the west is now gone. It isa critical time to support genuine reforms and the people and opposition groups working for broad-based and meaningful change that can galvanize the people and serve their interests while enhancing the mutually shared interests of global partners and foreign investors. We in the SMNE call for calm among the people and restraint for the defense forces. Meles had a choice to be loved by the people when he ousted Mengistu in 1991, but he did not take it. We must be careful now to not create ingredients for fighting against each other either now or in the future. Ethiopian Defense troops and security forces with guns should not use them against the people. The taking of one life is too many. We Ethiopians have already shed too many tears; we have already spilled toomuch blood; we have already lived with too much pain and sorrow; we have already felt too much desperation; and, we have already lost too many of our people to death, abuse or hardship while trying to find a better life outside of Ethiopia. It is time to reclaim, rebuild and transform Ethiopia into a New Ethiopia where people want to stay. It will require all of us working together by each doing our share. In conclusion, everyone knows how Meles favored his own ethnic group, the Tigrayan, and his ownregion, Tigray, and even more his own birthplace of Adwa, but the Tigray should not be afraid. If you have not committed crimes, you have nothingto fear. You are part of us and will be part of the New Ethiopia. As we have said before, the SMNE stands to defend and to protect the well beingof each and every Ethiopian individuals and groups. You are part of that.

We cannot build a New Ethiopia without you. Our enemy is the system, not an ethnicity, a region, a town or a religion. You do not have to hold back. You are our brothers and sisters. With God's help, we can find healing for the past, reconciliation for the present and hope for the future.I am appealing to all my friends and colleagues to forward the litter to your friends. If you do, you will not just be giving a voice to our beautiful people, but you would be doing justice to our humanity. Knowing the truth is overcoming the first obstacle to freedom! Thanks so much for your never-ending support. Don't give up. Keep your focus on the bigger picture and reach out to others and listen! Care about those who are suffering. Think about our family of Ethiopians and humanity throughoutthe world.

Denver police have arrested Abiye Belette Girma they say killed anEthiopian couple'

Police have arrested Abiye Belette Girma they say killed an Ethiopian couple Yayehyirad Lemma and Yenenesh Desta who owns Desta EthiopianRestaurant in Dallas on the front porch of their M Streets home this week.Abiye Belette Girma was in Denver St. Mary Orthodox church, an Ethiopian reported to Denver Police. According to Dallas Fox news; Girmakilled Lemma Yayehyirad and Desta Yenenesh because "they had disrespected him." According sources, the alleged killer might spend two days and nights in Denver sleeping in his car. The suspect has been arrested by Ethiopians support in Denver. While Police identified him, Abey was in his Navy blue Nissan 2011 car next to the St. Mary Orthodox Ethiopian church, parked inside the school compound. Abey tried to escape but chased and arrested by Denver Police. Police found 15 guns and $20,000 in Abiye Girma's 2011 Nissan when he was caught in Colorado. The guy had with him a list of individuals prepares to kill or already might have killed. The authorities in Texas and Colorado are investigating the case. Both Denver and Dallas Police expected to release briefing about his arrest. Dallas police said Abiye Girma is their primary suspect. Detectives believe he followed the couple home from their North Dallas restaurant and shot them.

Ethiopian Orthodox Church Patriarch Abune Paulos Dies'

The leader of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, Abune Paulos, has died at the age of 76. No details of his death were made available. He had been receiving treatment for an undisclosed illness. Government spokesman Shimeles Kemal said a new leader will come into office based on what he called “the bylaws and canons of the Coptic Church.” Abune Paulos studiedat Princeton's Theological Seminary in the US after receiving a degree in theology from Addis Ababa University. He was arrested in 1974 by Ethiopia's military dictatorship. Upon his release, Abune Paulos fled to the US, where he spent several years in exile. He returned to Ethiopia in 1991when Mengisu Hailemariam’s government collapsed and Meles Zenawi assumed power. Shortly after, the Patriarch, Abuna Merkorios, was dethroned under disputed circumstances. The controversial process led to the election of Abune Paulos as head of the Coptic Church in 1992. Abune Merkorios and his supporters went into exile, establishing a rival synod in the United States. Many credit the Patriarch for championing the cause of the victims of the military regime. He presided over the funerals of Emperor Haile Selsassie in 2000, Crown Prince Asfaw Wossen in 1997 and Princess Tenagnework in 2004. He also officiated at the funerals of the 60former civilian and military leaders of the Imperial government in 1993, and the burial of Professor Asrat Woldeyes, the leading opposition leader,in 1998. Detractors accuse Abune Paulos of being too close to the Meles government, and for failing to speak out when security forces storm churches and brutalize peaceful demonstrators. He has also been accusedof vanity in overseeing the construction of his own statue in Addis Ababa in 2010. The office of the patriarch is expected to hold an emergency meeting Friday to finalize funeral arrangements. It is not clear whether Ethiopia's Prime Minister Meles Zenawi -- who has not been seen in publicsince June -- will attend the funeral.

Updates;- Patriarch Abune Paulos dies at age 76 His Holiness Abune Paulos,the fifth patriarch of the Ethiopian Tewahdo Orthodox Church, has died in a hospital in the Ethiopian capital, church sources reported today. He was 76. The patriarch died at Balcha Hospital where he has been receiving treatments, according to Dejeselam, a website of the church. In recent months, the health of the patriarch deteriorated rapidly and was unable to stand and walk without the support of assistants, Dejeselam reported. The life of Abune Paulos has been marred by controversies sincehe was enthroned in 1992 as patriarch of the Ethiopian Tewahdo OrthodoxChurch, which has over 40 million members. A year after Prime Minister Meles Zenawi came to power, Abune Paulos replaced a living patriarch, Abune Merkorios, who is now patriarch of the exiled Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church. Critics often accused the 76-year-old Abune Paulos of being very close to the Meles regime, to the point of ignoring the pleas of protesting university students who had taken shelter in church compoundsto escape police brutality. The patriarch sided with the government, let alone to condemn the police who stormed the churches and brutalized theyoung and helpless university students who were dragged to detention camps. He also took the Ethiopian society by surprise when he hosted American diva Beyoncé Knowles in 2007 and later oversaw the erection ofhis own statue in 2010. But the last straw that broke the camel's back set in when Abune Paulos remained indifferent over the desecration of the fifth-century Waldeba Monastery for sugar plantation and factories this year. Abune Paulos was born in Adwa, Tigrai region, on 3 November 1935.His death is very likely to have mixed public reactions: those who mourn his death as the loss of the father of the church and those who, along withthe reported death (or near death) of Prime Minister Meles, may welcome the loss as a divine intervention to punish criminals.

Updates- According to Deje-selam, a website of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church (EOTC), Abune Nathnael the archbishop of the Arssi Administrative region becomes acting patriarch' The state owned EthiopianNews Agency (ENA) reported that Abune Nathnael, the archbishop of Arssi, has been selected as acting patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church upon the death of Patriarch Abune Paulos. His Holiness Abune Paulos, the fifth patriarch of the Ethiopian Tewahdo Orthodox Church (EOTC), has died in the city’s Dejazmatch Balcha hospital, church sources reported. He was 76. The patriarch died at Balcha Hospital where he has been receiving treatments. In recent months, the health of the patriarch deteriorated rapidly and was unable to stand and walk without the supportof assistants, Dejeselam reported. The life of Patriarch Abune Paulos has been marred by controversies since he was enthroned in 1992 as patriarch of the Ethiopian Tewahdo Orthodox Church (EOTC), which has over 40 million worshipers. A year after Prime Minister Meles Zenawi cameto power, Abune Paulos replaced a living patriarch, Abune Merkorios, who is now patriarch of the exiled Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church. Critics often accused the 76-year-old Abune Paulos of being very close to the Meles Zenawi regime, to the point of ignoring the pleas of protesting university students who had taken shelter in church compounds to escapepolice brutality in 2002. The patriarch sided with the government, let alone to condemn the police who stormed the churches and brutalized theyoung and helpless university students who were dragged to detention camps. He also took the Ethiopian society by surprise when he hosted American diva Beyoncé Knowles in 2007 and later oversaw the erection ofhis own statue within the Bole Medhanialem church compound in 2010.

But the last straw that broke the camel's back set in when Abune Paulos remained indifferent over the desecration of the fifth-century Waldeba Monastry for sugar plantation and factories this year. Abune Paulos was born in Adwa, Tigrai region, on 3 November 1935. His death is very likelyto have mixed public reactions: those who mourn his death as the loss ofthe father of the church and those who, along with the reported death (ornear death) of Prime Minister Melesenawi, may welcome the loss as a divine intervention to punish criminals.

Updates;- Ethiopian patriarch's state funeral set for August 23' The state funeral of His Holiness Abune Paulos, patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church who died yesterday, will be held August 23 at St. Trinity Cathedral in the capital in the presence of world church leaders, foreign dignitaries as well as high-ranking government officials, a church source said today. In an extraordinary meeting led by His Holiness Abune Philipos, the Holy Synod announced that a round-the-clock prayers would be held Augst 16 in the presence of religious leaders from within and outside of Ethiopia. Abune Philipos will remain the highest authority until apatriarch is enthroned following the funeral. Earlier yesterday at Balcha Hospital, a quick medical exam was conducted for the deceased patriarch to dispel fears that there was a foul play in his death. According to Dejeselam, the unofficial website of the church, the autopsy (post-mortemexam) was held in the presence of top church leaders and unnamed high- ranking government officials.Many religious leaders from around the worldare expected to travel to Ethiopia for the August 23 funeral of the patriarch who died at the age of 76. Abune Paulos left behind over Eth.

Birr 22 million (US 1.23 million) in one state-owned bank but it was not known who would inherit the fortune, according to a piece by Deje-selam.Aug 16: Patriarch Paulos dies at 76. His Holiness Abune Paulos,the fifth patriarch of the Ethiopian Tewahdo Orthodox Church, has died in a hospital in the Ethiopian capital, church sources reported today. He was
76. The patriarch died at Balcha Hospital where he has been receiving treatments, according to Dejeselam, a website of the church. In recent months, the health of the patriarch deteriorated rapidly and was unable tostand and walk without the support of assistants, Dejeselam reported. Thelife of Abune Paulos has been marred by controversies since he was enthroned in 1992 as patriarch of the Ethiopian Tewahdo Orthodox Church, which has over 40 million members. A year after Prime Minister Meles Zenawi came to power, Abune Paulos replaced a living patriarch, Abune Merkorios, who is now patriarch of the exiled Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church. Critics often accused the 76-year-old Abune Paulos of being very close to the Meles regime, to the point of ignoring the pleas of protesting university students who had taken shelter in church compoundsto escape police brutality. The patriarch sided with the government, let alone to condemn the police who stormed the churches and brutalized theyoung and helpless university students who were dragged to detention camps. He also took the Ethiopian society by surprise when he hosted American diva Beyoncé Knowles in 2007 and later oversaw the erection ofhis own statue in 2010. But the last straw that broke the camel's back set in when Abune Paulos remained indifferent over the desecration of the fifth-century Waldeba Monastery for sugar plantation and factories this year. Abune Paulos was born in Adwa, Tigrai region, on 3 November 1935.His death is very likely to have mixed public reactions: those who mourn his death as the loss of the father of the church and those who, along withthe reported death (or near death) of Prime Minister Meles, may welcome the loss as a divine intervention to punish criminals.
Mulugeta Asrate Kassa Booted from His Advisory Post in UK EthiopianEmbassy' Information received from Ethiopian Foreign Ministry shows long time insider and staunch ally of the ruling EPRDF, Mulugeta Asrate-Kassa, is no longer playing the role of an advisor at the Ethiopian embassy in London. The visibly distraught Mulugeta was seen being escorted out of the embassy's chancery in London with two security guards. Mulugeta Asrate who is a member of the Ethiopian imperial family has long been serving the EPRDF government at non official advisory capacity in London. The reason for the boot is believed to be a recent interview he gave to the BBCin the wake of the Patriarch's death. Mulugeta contends the interview was given on his personal capacity as a good friend of the Patriarch and shouldn't in any way be considered as a transgression of his duty as an advisor at the embassy. In addition to the controversial Mulugeta Asrate- Kassa, Mrs. Ejigayehu Beyene is a long time close confidante of the now deceased patriarch.

Ethiopia gets first Boeing 787 Dreamliner in Africa' Ethiopia has become the second country after Japan to take delivery of the Boeing 787 Dreamliner. Ethiopian Airlines has bought 10 of Boeing's flagship aircraft, which are built from lightweight material, rather than aluminium, to save fuel. The BBC's Catherine Byaruhanga in Addis Ababa says that despite the pouring rain, a marching band gave a fitting welcome as the first plane arrived. Ethiopian Airlines is one of Africa's biggest airlines. Our reporter says when the first Dreamliner arrived, it was a very proud moment for the company's workers and many took photographs of the new plane. "As a continent this shows how much we are making progress as Africans... competing on the global stage and changing our image," Ethiopian Airline head Tewolde Gebremariam told reporters at Addis Ababa's Bole International Airport. The aircraft are supposed to cost $200m each but correspondents say airlines rarely pay this price, especially for bulk orders. Japan Airlines and All Nippon Airwaysare the only two airlines already operating Dreamliner aircraft. Ethiopian Airlines generally has a good safety record, apart from the 2010 crash of one of its aircraft off the coast of Lebanon. The state-owned company serves 69 international destinations.

Local press & Broadcasting Media: News tips, condolences, public mixedfeelings'

Tuesday 21 August, 2012: State controlled Ethiopian Television (ETV) in it's breaking news alerts, has just announced that Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is dead at the age of 57. After announcing Meles Zenawi's death, the Ethiopian Television started showing various photos of the prime minister with music on the background. Throngs of political allies, families,friends, representative of foreign governments, and mourners were in attendance yesterday at Bole International Airport to welcome the casket of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. Former comrades of the Prime Minister were seen visibly sad and some sobbing inconsolably. The family of the prime minister, including Meles Zenawi's widow Azeb Mesfin and daughters, high-ranking party and government officials as well as thousands of supporters of the PM are seen wailing. The body of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi flows into Addis Ababa's Bole International Airport via Thewodros Square passing through Fil-Woha to the National Palace.

There after close family members and friends will have a one hour officialgrieving session at the National Palace. A national mourning has been declared until Meles is buried, and the flag is flying at half-mast. A statement by the Council of Ministers said Deputy Prime Minister Haile- Mariam Desalegn will succeed the Prime Minister. The council of ministershailed Meles as a great leader and his death was a huge loss for Ethiopia.Residents of Addis are closely following the continuous update coming from government owned television stations and international media.

Deputy Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn is said to be taking the position of the prime ministership on an acting role. Ethiopian Television,which is fully controlled by the government, is continuously running sombre instrumental music. Government institutions are flying the national flag at half-mast and there are throngs of military and federal police forces patrolling all over the city. Service at government institutionshas virtually come to a standstill. Reports say there is a palpable tension in the capital, Addis Ababa. Ordinary Ethiopians are withdrawing money from banks. It has been witnessed that long queues at banks. The staple cereal Teff has shown a sharp price increase over night. A quintal of Teff that was sold for ETB 1,600 the day before is now selling for ETB 1,800.

The public appears to be getting ready for the ‘unknown’. Sources said thecountry is visibly gripped more by the fear of the unknown than the deathof the PM. The national palace is under heavy security. Meles Zenawi's body was taken to the National Palace from the airport as a historic cermony which is broadcasted live.

End game: AP August 21, 2012: Ethiopian state television ETV said the country's longtime ruler Meles Zenawi has died of an illness at age 57, having gone to get treatment overseas’ An EU spokesman said Meles Zenawi has died in Brussels. Meles Zenawi Asres (Ge'ez: ሜለስ ዜናዊ አስረስ Mäläs Zenawi Äsräs; 8 May 1955 – born to be Legesse Zenawi Asres) was the Prime Minister of Ethiopia from 1995 until his death in on 20th August,2012. From 1985, he was the chairman of the Tigrayan Peoples' LiberationFront (TPLF), and the head of the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). He was President of Ethiopia from 1991 to 1995 and became the Prime Minister of Ethiopia in 1995 following the general elections that year. While his government was credited with reforms such as those that led a multi-party political system in Ethiopia, introduction of private press in Ethiopia and decreased child mortality rates, his government was also accused of political repression and varioushumanrights abuses, as well as anti-dissent. Known as one of Africa's strongmen, he was also an ally of the United States' "War on Terror".

Updates;- "I always felt that when I talked to Ethiopians about him, it seemed like I was speaking about a different person,” said Richard Dowden, a former journalist who now directs the Royal African Society. “Itwas as if he had two personalities,” he said, one for Ethiopians, the other for Westerners. Zenawi’s cruelty to his own people and media was not unknown to the US. The US State Department documented human rights violations and restrictions on free press in it's annual reports, and Zenawi blocked the US government-funded Voice of America (VoA) broadcasts.

But he was a reliable ally who was willing to fight Islamic militants in neighboring Somalia on America’s behalf, and he allowed the US to set upa drone launch center inside Ethiopia. Ethiopians continue to mourn the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi who, according to the state radio, died August 21, 2012. Observers say Ethiopians mass mourning the deathof Meles Zenawi ala North Korean style shows the absence of freedom in that country and that dictatorship is entrenched and fear widespead. US officials responded to news of his death accordingly' “I am grateful for Prime Minister Meles’s service for peace and security in Africa, his contributions to the African Union, and his voice for Africa on the world stage,” President Barack Obama said in his condolence letter. Secretary ofState Hillary Clinton, who sits on the Broadcasting Board of Governors that oversees the VOA’s operations, admired and remembered Zenawi as “an important and influential voice in Africa.” The state-controlled ETV reported that Meles Zenawi has died yesterday, but the fact is that he diedin the early morning of Sunday, July 15, as first announced by the Ethiopian National Transitional Council (ENTC), and the ESAT news broadcast. Meles suddenly disappeared from the public view 61 days ago on June 20. On July 11, he went into a coma and was flown to Belgium, according to an eyewitness who is working for Ethiopian Airlines. After thedoctors at St. Luc Hospital tried to revive him for the next 4 days, he took his last breath on July 15. Ethiopia's government has insisted the country is stable following the death of long-time Prime Minister Meles Zenawi at the age of 57. Mr Meles died at a hospital in the Belgian capital, Brussels, after a long illness. His body is being flown back to the capital, Addis Ababa, and a period of national mourning has been announced. state media reported that Deputy Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn would take over duties until elections in May, 2015. Mr Meles's death has sparked fears of a leadership vacuum which could lead to instability in Ethiopia.

August 21, 2012: BBC reportrter from Addis Ababa says the Ethiopian PMdies after illness'

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi has died aged 57 in a hospital abroad, the government says. It did not give details but an EU spokesmanlater told journalists Mr Meles had died in Brussels, Belgium. Mr Meles hadnot been seen in public for weeks and speculation about his health mounted when he missed a summit in Addis Ababa last month. Mr Meles took power as the leader of rebels that ousted communist leader MengistuHaile Mariam in 1991. He is credited with spearheading economic development in Ethiopia - but, critics charge, at the price of respect for human rights. He was austere and hardworking, with a discipline forged from years spent in the guerrilla movement - and almost never smiled, says Elizabeth Blunt, the BBC's former correspondent in Addis Ababa.

Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf said Mr Meles was an "intellectual leader for the continent", and UK Prime Minister David Cameron called him"an inspirational spokesman for Africa" who had lifted millions out of poverty. But a spokesman for al-Shabab Islamist militants in Somalia - where Mr Meles twice sent troops to fight - told Reuters news agency theywere "very glad" of his death, saying Ethiopia was "sure to collapse".

Ethiopia's Council of Ministers announced "with great sadness the untimelydeath of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi" in a statement, state TV reported.

The statement said Mr Meles had been receiving medical treatment abroadfor the past two months and that his health was improving. But he developed a "sudden infection" on Sunday and despite emergency treatment, died at 23:40 on Monday. European Commission spokesman Olivier Bailly later told a regular news briefing that Mr Meles "passed away during the night here in Brussels". Over some eight weeks that Mr Meles had been absent from the public eye, concerns about his health had grown, and in July he was said to have been admitted to hospital. Reportssuggested he was in hospital in the Belgian capital suffering a stomach complaint but these were never confirmed by the Ethiopian authorities.
Three weeks ago, government spokesman Bereket Simon dismissed reports Mr Meles was critically ill, and declined to give any details about Mr Meles's whereabouts. Instability concerns. Deputy Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, who is also Ethiopia's foreign minister, will becomeacting head of government. A period of mourning had been declared until the funeral, government spokesman Bereket Simon told reporters. No date has been announced. Mr Bereket said the prime minister had struggled with illness for a year, but he had continued to work regardless. Concerns have been expressed - including by Kenyan Prime Minister Raila Odinga - that Mr Meles's death could lead to a power vacuum and dangerous instability in Ethiopia. But Mr Bereket insisted the country was stable and that "everything will continue as charted" by the late prime minister. This theme was echoed by state television, which stated that "even if Ethiopia has been badly affected for missing its great leader, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi initiated fundamental policies and strategies which will be further strengthened". It broadcast footage of Mr Meles accompanied by solemn instrumental music. Ethiopia's economy has grown rapidly in recent years, despite the secession of Eritrea and the subsequent war between the two countries. Under Mr Meles, Ethiopia became a staunch US ally, receiving hundreds of millions of dollars in aid over the years, and hosting the US military drones that patrol East Africa. He won accolades from the West for sending troops to battle Islamist militants in Somalia, says the BBC's James Copnall. But concern had been growing about the lack of democracy and human rights in Ethiopia, our correspondent in the region says. At least 200 people died in the violence that followed the 2005 elections, and many journalists and politicians havebeen locked up. One rights critic, Commander Assefa Seifu, called Mr.
Meles "a devil incarnate". "He was always talking about democracy, civilrights, adherence to [the] constitution and the like. But it was only a lipservice," he told the BBC.

Updates;- Ethiopia's Longtime leader Meles Zenawi to be buried in 2nd September'
Ethiopia’s Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who died of an unknown illness earlier this week, will be buried on September 2, 2012 the government spokesman said Thursday. The government had postponed an emergency session of parliament to swear in a new prime minister as many leaders attended the funeral of a church leader. Acting Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn was to be sworn in Thursday following Zenawi’s death on Monday. Bereket Simon, Ethiopia’s communications minister saidthe country had “ample time” to swear in the new prime minister. He said Meles will be buried in the capital Addis Ababa “There is no need to rush into it when the nation is grieving,” Bereket said. “What all the lawmakersand their constituencies and the nation at large want to do at this time is mourn the great loss and honor the late prime minister. We want to first honor this and handle the prime minister’s funeral with due diligence.” “The succession is already completed, and Hailemariam will take over as aprime minister,” Bereket said. Bereket also said the death of Abune Paulos, the head of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, was another reason for the delay. Hailemariam attended and spoke at the Thursday funeral.

Leaders from around the world are expected to attend Meles’s funeral.Meles who ruled Ethiopia for 21 year, died in a Belgium hospital late Monday from an illness that Ethiopian officials have not revealed. Hailemariam is a relatively young figure on Ethiopia’s political scene andit’s not clear if old guard leaders will allow him to hold onto the prime minister’s seat until 2015 elections Ethiopia is a strong U.S. ally on counter-terrorism issues, particularly in Somalia. Meles was hailed for advancing Ethiopia’s economic progress but was denounced by human rights groups for a heavy handed approach to political dissent. Prime Minister Meles Zenawi the darling of the West, but a ruthless strongman to his own people—has passed away. Analysis: After two months of rumors and speculation about his death or incapacitation, the government of Ethiopia finally announced his death. No one expected, even two months ago, that Meles’ 21-year long, iron-fisted control over the one-party government of the Tigrayan Peoples’ Liberation Front (TPLF)—which controlled the coalition government of the Ethiopian Peoples’ Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF)—would come to such anabrupt end. Meles’ absence will challenge the entire system and we must be ready, but patient. For years, opposition groups, as well as key stakeholders within and outside of Ethiopia, recognized the ability of this one man to either hinder or advance agendas of others to his own benefit,whether in Ethiopia or in the region. Now that he is gone, the TPLF/EPRDFsystem that maintained him and dominated every sector of society in Ethiopia, although still in place, may have taken a deadly hit. The future isuncertain as the new regime faces new challenges from inner TPLF power struggles, splits between Tigrayans, the renewed vigor from opposition groups and now, new demands from religious groups, both Muslims and Christians, for freedom from government interference in their religious affairs. As our dictator has been taken out of the game, Ethiopians may suddenly have a unique opportunity to win their struggle for a healthier, more inclusive and more prosperous Ethiopia. Today is a new day. We arenot going to celebrate the death of somebody but must still carefully appraise the real obstacles ahead that may not have been clearly revealedto outsiders or understood by us. Meles had two faces—one for outsiders and one among Ethiopians. To outsiders, like within the African Union, Meles was perceived to be a “uniter” but to Ethiopians, he maintained his power through fomenting division. He was the architect of the Ethiopian system of ethnic federalism, which discouraged a national identity as it accentuated ethnicity; all used as a divide and conquer tactic to maintain control of the majority by a minority group comprised of only 6% of the population. As a result, we all know that the Ethiopia of today is more divided by ethnicity than ever before. To state players concerned about global security, Meles played a role in the War on Terror and in sending troops to Somalia; but to his own people, Meles was our home-grown terrorist who most threatened our lives and futures and radicalized neighboring Somalia. The newly appointed transitional Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, will have a critical role to play. Whether he will take the side of the people or will attempt to continue the status quo, is unknown; however, if he rises to the challenge of advancing the interests of the people, it will require undoing the machinery of suppression so carefully put into place by this regime—like the Anti-terrorism law that hasimprisoned democratic voices and the Charities and Societies Proclamationthat has eliminated civic institutions, replacing them with pseudo organizations controlled by the regime. It will require implementing broad reforms: creating an independent judiciary system, freeing the media, advancing the Internet, forming an independent election board and initiating all those key parts of any well- functioning democratic state. He must also release thousands of political prisoners who are only imprisonedbecause they became enemies of the regime simply for living out their consciences. As we face these next, uncertain days and weeks ahead, if we are to succeed as a people and avoid violence and revenge after years of simmering tensions, anger and frustration among us, we Ethiopians must see each other as one people—the Ethiopian people—and part of ourfamily of humanity. This is not a time for vengeance or destruction, but is a time to start reconciling with each other for the sake of the whole country. This is the beginning of reform. We are calling for dialogue among Ethiopians. We are also calling on those western state players, who supported Meles, to now support the organizations who are working to establish democracy, to preserve the territorial integrity of the country,to build institutions and to reject appeals of ethnic-based violence. We know that Meles received that support, despite his many human rights abuses and the repression of his people, because of the perceived greater interest in global security and stability in a geo-politically strategic region;but now it is time to reassess who will be the best long-term partners. It is the Ethiopian people. The man that charmed the west is now gone. It is a critical time to support genuine reforms and the people and opposition groups working for broad-based and meaningful change that can galvanize the people and serve their interests while enhancing the mutually shared interests of global partners and foreign investors.

August 21, 2012: Meles' Death A Chance For Peace’

Ethiopia Rebel Group' An outlawed Ethiopian rebel group said on Tuesday the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi could usher in a new era of peace in Ethiopia, but reaffirmed its readiness to fight for self-determination. An outlawed Ethiopian rebel group said on Tuesday the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi could usher in a new era of peace in Ethiopia, but reaffirmed its readiness to fight for self-determination. "The death of the Ethiopian dictator may usher a new era of stability and peacein Ethiopia and in the Horn as a whole," a statement by the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), said. "ONLF will also work with any progressive open-minded opposition forces who are ready to recognise therights for self-determination for all nations and nationalities," it said. (Writing by Richard Lough; Editing by Jon Hemming)

Melese’s Departure: A Watershed Moment for the Democratization ofEthiopia'

According to a political analyst, "it has now been almost two months since Ethiopia’s strongman Melese Zenawi has disappeared from office. Despite the government’s obfuscation and theatrics to hide the truth from the public, Melese is either incapacitated or dead. If he were in a better state, a short audio or video message from him or a statement from his doctors would have calmed things down. In the absence of such evidence and withthe passing of each day, the chances of his returning to office in his former self is diminishing fast. Ethiopians of all stripes and persuasions would be well-advised to think through the consequences of his departure and engage in the deliberations that are necessary to bring back the country on to the democratic path it once started and to embark on the long arduous process of healing the wounds that have been festering for far too long. The first step is to recognize that with Melese’s possible departure Ethiopia has experienced a monumental political shift and that itis already in a transition to an era without him. Those controlling state power within the minority TPLF/EPRDF are busy scheming behind closed doors on how to perpetuate the incorrigible system that is benefiting themto the detriment of the large majority of Ethiopians. It behooves those in control and the powerbrokers around them to recognize that the system isunlikely to survive without Melese. This is simply because the TPLF/EPRDF, despite assertions to the contrary, has been a one-man showhinged on the extraordinary talents (though mostly used for the wrong purposes), intrigue and strategy of Melese as well as due to the external stature he assiduously built for himself. Even if Melese was to miraculously return, the status quo is unsustainable because the system isirreparably broken and reform is way overdue on its own merits.

Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) Calls “The Death of Meles Zenawi should betransmitted into the death of TPLF rule of minority domination and exploitation in Ethiopia” PR (August 21, 2012) - The death of the tyrant who has been terrorizing the Ethiopian peoples' for the last 21 years is indeed a good news. But we are saddened for his natural departure without facing justice for the thousands Ethiopian who were murdered byhis orders. However, it’s incremental step for the demise of minority hegemony in Ethiopia. But, it is not a time for jubilation at all. The struggle for freedom and justice in Ethiopia must be intensified until the minority hegemony in Ethiopia is replaced with true freedom, democracy and rule of law where the Ethiopian peoples’ will choice their leaders without fear of intimidation, arrest, torture and extra judicial killing. The struggle against TPLF dictatorial regime will continue until all Ethiopian peoples’ freely exercise their God given rights of self-determination in their affairs. The Oromo Liberation Front (The OLF) calls upon all Ethiopianpeople irrespective of regions and religions, opposition forces, and Ethiopian defense forces to stand together in dismantling the minority regime , and contribute for the establishment of true freedom and democracy in Ethiopia. The OLF also calls up on International community to stand with Ethiopian peoples in their effort to establish genuine freedom, democracy, and rule of law in Ethiopia.

Ethiopia After Meles Zenawi - International Crisis Group (ICG)'

A Press Release by the International Crisis Group (ICG) (August 21, 2012)which is one of the few western organizations that tells the truth about thevolatility of the Horn and the vulnerability of Ethiopia to exploding into ethnic-based violence, chaos and state failure. The Brussels-based think tank, International Crisis Group (ICG), has voiced in a strongly worded statement about political transition in Ethiopia. It says Mr. Meles's successor will lead a weaker regime facing mounting grievances along ethnic and religious lines and a likely increase in radicalism. Meantime, world leaders have paid tribute to Mr. Meles Zenawi for leading Ethiopia toan impressive era of economic growth but human rights groups say the new leadership now has an opportunity to usher in a fresh spirit of politicaltolerance lacking during Mr. Meles's rule. Analysts point out that Ethiopia plays a key role in the Horn of Africa, not only facing down its own rebels fighting for greater autonomy in the south-eastern ethnic Somali region, but supporting the fight against al-Qaeda linked al-Shabab rebels in Somalia. Mr Meles also carved out a major role for himself in Africa and internationally, mediating in the conflict in Sudan and South Sudan and taking a leading position in the African Union, which is headquartered in Addis Ababa. As early as 2009, the International Crisis Group (ICG), on Ethiopia: "Ethnic Federalism and Its Discontents" and Genocide Watch have issued warnings regarding the volatility of this region and the vulnerability of Ethiopia to exploding into ethnic-based violence, chaos andstate failure. Ethiopians also understand how the widespread grievances could explode without carefully orchestrated change. The continuation of ethnic-based leadership within the Tigrai Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF), only with a new leader of the party, could trigger a dangerous reaction and the present TPLF will be far less capable of holding the country together over the next months and year should something happen.

Instead, the U.S. should be on the right side of history by supporting African leaders who respect their people's rights. This is the time for Ethiopia's main allies, the U.S., UK and the EU, should support the democratization process of a country of 90 million population rather thanpreserving the "status quo" . The status quo is not safer but could jeopardize long-term U.S. national interests in one of the most strategic and conflict-prone regions of the world, with great implications for theMiddle East, Europe and Africa, the ICG statement noted.

Ethiopia's vice PM To Remain At Helm Until 2015 Election'

Ethiopia's acting prime minister Hailemariam Desalegn will run the countryuntil an election in 2015, showing that the ruling party is determined to ensure a swift and smooth transfer of power following the death of Meles Zenawi. Ethiopia's acting prime minister Hailemariam Desalegn will run the country until an election in 2015, showing that the ruling party is determined to ensure a swift and smooth transfer of power following the death of Meles Zenawi. "He (Hailemariam) will be the prime minister until 2015. He is to be sworn in and he is to finish the five-year term of government and that is indisputable," government spokesman Bereket Simon told Reuters. Parliament would be summoned within the next two days and Hailemariam would be sworn in as prime minister, Bereket said. Many Ethiopians complain that while Meles forged closer business ties withglobal powerhouses such as China, that did not translate into more jobs for Ethiopians and that despite a burgeoning middle class in urban areas, some three quarters of the country's population still live on less than $2 a day. Speculation had been rife that a potentially divisive race for the top post would follow Meles' death. Asked whether all coalition members of the party had approved Hailemariam's selection, Bereket said: "They haveno problem with this." Analysts said Meles' succession appeared a done deal but said there might still be horse-trading going on behind the scenesthat might flare up and destabilise the party.

August 22, 2012: Ethiopian Parliament session on Meles successiondelayed'

A special session of Ethiopia's Federal parliament arranged in order to endorse the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi's successor has been postponed. No reason has not been given for the delay. But officials say the appointment of Deputy Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn is not in dispute. Mr Meles, 57, died suddenly on Monday from an infection while being treated in hospital in Brussels. His body has been lying in state at the national palace in the capital. A state of national mourning has been declared but no date for the funeral has been set Mr. Meles has been praised for bringing development and economic growth to Ethiopia, but critics say they came at the cost of respect for plurality and human rights.e had not been seen in public for weeks before his death was announced, and there had been increasingly intense speculation about his health - though authorities insist he had been on the road to recovery when he was suddenly struck down by an infection.There is still no confirmation of the details of his medical condition.Mr Hailemariam was appointed deputyprime minister and foreign affairs minister in 2010.State media say he willtake over until elections in 2015. The BBC's Peter Biles says there is intense interest about Mr Meles' succession, because he had been at thehelm of Ethiopia's government for 21 years.

Leader's Swearing in Delayed for Funeral'

Ethiopia has postponed the emergency session of parliament to swear in anew prime minister. Acting Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn was to be sworn in Thursday following the death on Monday of longtime leader Meles Zenawi. Meles' deputy, Hailemariam Desalegn, will serve as acting prime minister, and many analysts predict he will emerge as the ruling party's chosen successor. Ethiopia's acting prime minister Hailemariam Desalegn will run the country until an election in 2015, showing that the ruling party is determined to ensure a swift and smooth transfer of power following the death of Meles Zenawi. But no policy change after Meles, says the acting PM Haile Mariam desalegne. Meles Zenawi, a former rebel fighter, took power after helping overthrow the communist military regimeof Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam in May, 1991. In Meles' more than two decades in power, opposition leaders and journalists were harassed and jailed, and independent voices of dissent were ruthlessly crushed.

Hundreds were killed in a crackdown after the 2005 election, when the opposition made significant gains, and since then Meles had strategically silenced his opponents. uman Rights Watch described Ethiopia under Meles as essentially a single-party state, after his government's "five-yearstrategy of systematically closing down space for political dissent and independent criticism." in July, well-known Ethiopian blogger Eskinder Nega was sentenced to 18 years in prison on terrorism charges. Prime Minister Meles Zenawi leaves behind a very conflicting legacy. He was a very clever politician on the international arena. While he worked hard to win friends abroad, and was seen more comfortable with foreigners, he shunned dialogue at home, was less accessible to Ethiopians, and rarely seen in public. He played a very prominent role and was praised on the international stage, but he remained a very divisive figure at home. He never attempted to solicit broad domestic support, and the one thing thatmattered most to him was international legitimacy to buttress his domestic hold on power. Consequently, he bequeathed widespread violations of human rights, abuse of power, simmering internal conflicts arising from the divergent attitudes about the character of Ethiopia, compounded by increasing clashes with various religious groups. Meles Zenawi came to power after building a coalition of rebel groups to overthrow Mengistu Haile Mariam's Marxist military junta in 1991. Since then he has consolidated power by purging potential rivals and promoting those loyal to him. He also strengthened the authority of the ruling party by cracking down on opposition parties and using counter-terrorism legislation to jail reporters and dissenters. The ruling party controls 546 ofthe 547 seats of parliament, all but ensuring Hailemariam's accession to premiership. The country's armed forces expected to pledge allegiance to the country's constitution and vowed to defend it during the post-Meles Zenawi era.

PM Haile Mariam Desalegn Profiled'

Born in the Wolaita Zone of Boloso Sore District of Southern Ethiopia, Haile-Mariam Desalegn studied and spent most of his youth in Wolaita. A water engineer by training, former College teacher, and dean at the latterwas former advisor to Meles Zenawi is a respected technocrat though he lacks the late prime minister's assertiveness. A member of the Wolaita ethnic group, Haile-Mariam Desalegne does not belong to the Tigrai- Tigrigna people, who made up the power base of Meles Zenawi. In previous years, he was President of the Southern Nations, Nationalities, and People's Region (SNNPR) from November 2001 to March 2006 and was promoted as Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs in October 2010. Hailemariam's ethnic origin is most frequently discussed.

Unlike the top of the ruling party, he hails from the South and not from the north of Ethiopia. An Ethiopian political analyst says that the appointment of Hailemariam is mostly symbolic:"He is not going to have the slightest of power in hand, he is going to be used as a puppet," said "Idoubt he will have power close to Meles because Meles power comes from his own personal assertive nature," he said. "And second is he was part ofthe armed struggle. And he built his stature, authority and command while he was still in the armed struggle. By the time he took power, he was the undisputed leader of the TPLF and also the undisputed leader of Ethiopia.” As many analysts, if Hailemariam were to put himself forward as a possible successor, his candidacy would be unlikely to receive much support from the Tigrai People's Liberation Front (TPLF) or from the powerful military. It is also questionable whether the influential orthodox church would support a Protestant as the country's leader. The candidateswith the best chances of winning are said to be the health minister and Meles' aide, Tewodros Adhanom, and his close associate from the TPLF, Berhane Guebre-Kristos. Meles' widow, businesswoman Azeb Mesfin, nicknamed as "Gual-Gola" who as a member of the all-powerful 9-memberstrong politburo has amassed a fortune and has been linked with corruption allegations, is also being tipped as a possible successor, thoughher chances of securing her late husband's job are said to be slim. The Oromo ethnic group will also wish to be consulted over Meles' successor.

They are numerically the largest ethnic group in the country, but this notreflected in their political weight. The position of head of state, which could come their way, is largely ceremonial.

Ethiopia: Meles' Death Sparks Succession Planning As El Cid Rides Again'

Analysis : Death of Ethiopian PM Meles Zenawi was announced this morning, following complications arising after a long illness. Yet for weeksnow, rumours have been flying around the internet that Zenawi had died in an overseas hospital, and that this news was kept quiet whilst the fiercesuccession battle took place. Whether true or not (and it would certainly not be the only time in recent months that the death of an African leader had been kept quiet until the struggle for succession had been won), the political elite in Ethiopia has almost certainly been seeking how to ensurea smooth transition since Zenawi's last public appearance in mid-June.

There are a number of interesting questions that emerge from this, for Ethiopia itself, for the international community, and for watchers of African politics and leadership more widely. Will the succession prove to be smooth and stable? The constitution says parliament should choose thesuccessor. But does anyone really expect this weakened institution to be given that authority? The struggle has likely already taken place and parliament will be asked to confirm that decision. If it hasn't, this opens up real concerns over stability whilst a succession battle takes place.

Ethiopian growth may still be relatively strong, but it is suffering from highinflation. For most Ethiopians, high inflation is a worse curse than lower economic growth, and this could foster social tensions. Tensions are growing between the country's Muslim population (around one-third of thetotal) and state authorities following a crackdown on Muslim protestors over the summer. Could this provoke wider ethnic and religious tensions across the country? How will the new prime minister deal with such tensions? Will there be an opening up of the political space to the opposition following the transition? Probably not. For there is not likely to be much real pressure by external powers to address the democratic deficit with stability being seen as the main priority.The political elite in Ethiopia is not the only group with a vested interest in an orderly succession. The international community has largely ignored, or downplayed, the government's poor governance record due to Zenawi's clever positioning of his regime as a major backer of the war against radical Islamic violent movements (much as Museveni has done in Uganda, which also successfully steered attention away from his own governance record). Ethiopia's deep engagement in neighbouring Somalia means the global north will be determined that the new government retains its commitment to this effort, and as a result will be far less concerned about the democratic credentials of the transition or the new leader. Finally, are we seeing the emergence of an El Cid policy in African politics?* Only four months ago, the death of Malawian president Bingu wa Mutharika was delayed for several days as the succession battle playedout in private. After months of rumours of his death, former Nigerian president Yar-'Adua spoke by phone to the BBC to show he was still alive (although he could not convince that he was still in effective power).

Africa is not alone in this, of course (official silence over the health of several Latin American leaders springs to mind). But whilst leaders clingas much power to themselves as possible, and seek to ensure no clear successor emerges who might challenge them whilst they are still in power, El Cid will continue to ride. AllAfrica.com by Mike Jennings (21 August, 2012)

TIME World : The Strongman Who May Be Missed'

Meles Zenawi, 1955-2012: The Ethiopian Prime Minister of 21 years leaves behind a mixed legacy of economic gain and repression — and a giant hole in African politics. The Ethiopian Prime Minister of 21 years leaves behind a mixed legacy of economic gain and repression — and a giant hole in African politics. Meles Zenawi always said he didn't intend to die in office. Speaking to TIME as long ago as 2007, the Ethiopian Prime Minister was talking about moving on: "I have been around for quite a long time," he said. "Time to start thinking about doing new things." In the event, Meles did not do anything else but stayed through another election in 2010 – rigged, said the U.S., E.U and human rights groups – in which his Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) and its allies won 545 of the 547 seats in parliament and 1,903 of the 1,904 on nine regional councils. The result was not surprising but was at least less bloody than the previous poll in 2005 when Ethiopian security services shot dead 200 protesters – more like 1,000, said the opposition –who were demonstrating against the ERPDF's victory in the streets of the capital Addis Ababa. Meles's version of events was that the opposition, having lost a free and fair vote, were trying to win power by other means."We felt we had to clamp down," he said. "In the process, many people died. Many of our friends feel we overreacted. We feel we did not." Still, though rights groups, opposition politicos and journalists he persecuted are understandably loathe to admit it, there was more to Meles Zenawi than a stereotypical African strongman. In the 1980s, Ethiopia was synonymous with famine and Live Aid, and a global symbol of African hopelessness. Under Meles, hunger still returned to Ethiopia every year (though that seemed partly a product of foreign provision of free emergency food aid, which saves lives in the short term but ruins commercial farmers in the longer term). But Meles's regime ensured less and less of Ethiopia's 85 million population was affected. Child malnutrition has fallen by more than a third since 2000. One of the most effective public health programs in the developing world also saw rates of malaria and child mortality halve between 2005-2011. Meles scored well too on that other answer to hunger: development. Since 2004, Ethiopia has posted rocketing economic growth of an average of 11% a year. The country now boasts Africa's first commodity exchange, turning over more than a billion dollars of coffee, sesame, wheat, maize, peas and haricot beans every six months. A quarter century ago Ethiopia was the land of famine. Today, its first yuppies are food traders. By Alex Perry (21 August, 2012)

A press statement by the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF)'

The Death of Meles Zenawi Can Be an Opportunity for a New Beginning' The death of the Ethiopian dictator may usher a new era of stability and peace in Ethiopia and in the Horn as a whole. Meles Zenawi's administration has caused unimaginable suffering to the Ogaden people,far beyond any of his predecessors. He has also played great role in creating conflicts and instability in the Horn of Africa in order to perpetuate his regime's dominance and hegemony of the region. The Ogaden National Liberation Front may consider this as an opportunity for the succeeding Ethiopian regime to initiate a new era of peace, stability, freedom and justice for the people of Ogaden and not to pursue the failedpolicies of the past. ONLF will continue to struggle for the rights of the Ogaden people to exercise their inalienable right to self-determination.

ONLF will also work with any progressive open-minded opposition forces who are ready to recognize the rights for self-determination for all nationsand nationalities. Finally, ONLF calls upon the international community to promote democracy and freedom in Ethiopia rather than backing a dictatorship. August 21, 2012:

Meles's Death and the post-Meles Ethiopia - National and RegionalImplications'

Chatham House (London) Analysis: The government of Ethiopia announced late last night that Prime Minister Meles Zenawi had died, ending weeks of intense speculation over his condition and throwing the country's leadership into the next phase of an uncertain transition. A tenseatmosphere in the country, especially in the capital, Addis Ababa, has been heightened, although stability has held throughout the period of Meles's absence from office since late June. Democratic Front (EPRDF), which is dominated by the Meles's Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF)

- to replace Meles. While not a founder of the TPLF, he rose to lead the insurgency which toppled the previous regime in 1991, and managed to stay on top of the movement and the ruling elite for the following two decades. He oversaw a purge of dissidents within the ruling party following criticism over his conduct of the 1998-2000 war with Eritrea, andhe orchestrated the crackdown on the political opposition following the heavily contested 2005 elections - during which nearly 200 people were reportedly killed, and tens of thousands detained. In the years since 2005,Meles pushed through a series of measures which closed political space, and entrenched the position of the EPRDF - dramatically expanding the party's membership base, and marginalizing the opposition. At the 2010 elections, the EPRDF and allied parties took control over all but one seat inparliament. Next leader? In theory, this leaves the EPRDF in a fairly comfortable position in terms of the impending leadership transition. Meles's death should precipitate a leadership contest within the EPRDF, and once this is finished, parliament is sure to endorse the party's new candidate for the premiership. There is little prospect of a sustained movement by opposition parties to destabilise the process, or life in AddisAbaba. While insurgent movements exist, none are in a position to challenge the military or seriously threaten security in the country.

However, the EPRDF is not a monolithic organization, and nor is the TPLF.Although Meles had initiated a process of 'renewal' in the party's senior leadership positions - which would in principle have seen him step down in2013 ahead of the next polls in 2015 - in practice, power rested firmly in his hands, and there were doubts about whether he intended to relinquishpower at all. Moreover, his death will have thrown any plans into disarray.Senior figures in the EPRDF, and especially TPLF, will now be looking to assert and protect their interests, with a view to maintaining their positions and influence under the new dispensation. In the near term, Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Hailemariam Desalegn will act as interim prime minister, and as interim chair of the EPRDF. However, there are doubts as to whether Hailemariam - an ethnic Wolayta, and former president of Southern Nations, Nationalities and People's Region - will take charge more permanently. Many see him as a figurehead, part ofa gesture by Meles and the ethnic Tigrayans to give more prominence to other ethnic groups under the system of Ethnic Federalism introduced by the EPRDF. Senior figures within the TPLF, nonetheless, remain in key posts - notably dominating the military hierarchy and key positions in the economy. The question now is whether the elite can come to a consensus on a new EPRDF leader, and then whether that leader will prove able to manage the balance between elite interests while keeping the country's economic and security agendas on track. For a country that has only had three changes of power since the Second World War, there is little useful precedent to shed light on how the process will play out. However, it seems certain that Meles can not be replaced, and that a change is coming to the way Ethiopia is governed. Regional and international anxieties: his raises interesting prospects, especially in terms of Ethiopia'srelationship with key neighbours - most importantly with Eritrea. It is unlikely that Ethiopia will shift its course with respect to its interventions in Somalia or its negotiations with Egypt and Sudan over the use of Nile waters, there were already signs emerging earlier this year that a decade of stalemate in relations with Asmara may have begun shifting. A leadership transition in Addis Ababa presents an opportunity for international engagement to promote reconciliation between the two countries' border stand-off. However, there is also the risk that Eritrea sees its interests best served by stoking any instability that emerges during the next phase of Ethiopia's transition; or that Addis Ababa seeks to pre-empt such a move by more robustly intervening in Eritrea. Meles's diplomatic absence will also be felt within the African Union, where he has been a key presence in multilateral negotiations - in the reigon, e.g. between Sudan and South Sudan, or beyond, e.g. over climate change or through the G8 or G20. Developments in coming weeks in Ethiopia have the potential to affect the Horn of Africa's political, economic and security landscape for years to come. Jason Mosley is Associate Fellow in the AfricaProgramme. (21 August, 2012)

Death of Ethiopian Leader Meles Brings ‘Opportunity for Peace - InterPress Service (IPS)’

Opinion Following Monday’s announcement of the death of long-time Ethiopian leader Meles Zenawi, Ethiopian civil society leaders and Westernrights groups are characterising the turn of events as an opportunity to heal decades of increasingly stark sectarianism. Many are also pointing to the U.S. government’s potential role as key. “Meles’s death has created anopportunity for peace in Ethiopia, meaning that this transition should not be business as usual,” Getachew Begashaw, a professor of economics at Harper College here in the U.S., told IPS. “This process needs to be something…that can put the country on the road to national reconciliation.It is important for the United States to realise that its long-term interests would be served best if we can resolve the internal conflicts of Ethiopia.” The potential for sectarian violence has been a top concern for those attempting to plan for the death of the Ethiopian leader, who had been sick for several months. Meles ruled with an increasingly authoritarian fist for more than two decades, and many worry that his absence could leave a political vacuum. Still undetermined is the impact that Meles’s death willhave on ongoing negotiations between Sudan and South Sudan, as well asin Somalia, talks in which the Ethiopian leader has provided leadership.

Currently, however, the focus for many is on more immediate concerns. “Iam afraid that a missed opportunity at this crucial point will lead to the total failure of the Ethiopian state,” Begashaw said. “Once the situation turns violent, it will be extremely difficult to turn around – we will have another Somalia. And if Ethiopia were to fail, the whole region would be massively affected.” For all the talk about Ethiopia’s recent economic revival, many warn that this development has yet to reach the vast majority of the country’s population. Instead, much of this wealth – and political power – has been retained by the ruling party and, particularly, by the tiny Tigrean minority community to which Meles belonged. Already Meles’s deputy prime minister, Haile-Mariam Desalegn, has been put forward to rule until elections can be held in 2015, although a meeting of Parliament to make this move official, slated for Wednesday, was suddenly called off. No puppet: “Meles Zenawi’s whole policy was based on short-term interest – what’s good for him, not what’s good for his nation. Today, Ethiopia is more divided today by ethnicity than ever, and that is his fault,” Obang Metho, executive director of the Solidarity Movement for a New Ethiopia, based here in Washington, told IPS. “The U.S. in particular used Meles as puppet. For the last 20 years, they’ve put their eggs in one basket, and that basket is now gone. So, it’s time to start a new plan, one that supports the Ethiopian people and is based on mutual national interest.” Obang Metho and others particularly emphasise the role of the United States in the upcoming transition. The two have a long and contested relationship, as Washington has funnelled huge amounts of military and development aid to the Meles regime, particularlyfollowing the start of the US-led “war on terror”. Today, the United States continues to run unmanned aerial “drone” flights out of a base in Ethiopia.The U.S. also continues to provide significant humanitarian aid to Ethiopia,which currently brings in more foreign aid than any other country in Africa. “The United States must seize this opportunity to recalibrate its relationship with Ethiopia and help to build strong, accountable institutionsand respect for the rule of law, lest it risk…a relationship with yet another ‘strongman’ and depend on the luck of the draw over his longevity,” Amnesty International said in a statement Tuesday. The ICG, in a report released, similarly called on the United States, in concert with the U.K. and E.U., to “seek to play a significant role in preparing for and shaping the transition”, especially by working to strengthen capacity within the opposition. While the initial U.S. response , including condolences from President Barack Obama and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, merely commended Meles for his role in strengthening Ethiopia’s democracy and economy while also noting his efforts in the civil war in Sudan, subsequentdays have seen a slight shift in tone. “We have not been shy about expressing concern .. with regard to journalists’ freedom, human rights, etcetera,” State Department spokesperson Victoria Nuland said Wednesday. “We would always look for further improvements that can strengthen the system and support for people across Ethiopia.” Going together: Strengthening the opposition and loosening the reins on civil society generally is particularly important, Begashaw said, in turning awayfrom the spectre of potential ethnic strife in a post-Meles Ethiopia. He saidthe United States needs to play a role as a “credible peace broker betweenthe opposition and the ruling party”, ensuring that the country’s politics open up, that political prisoners are released, and that organisations outlawed by Meles on grounds of “terrorism” are reinstated. “These groups must be given the legitimate right to peacefully to participate in the political life of the country,” Begashaw said. “We can only have peace when we are trying to accommodate everyone, so long as they are peaceful – and as far as I know, all opposition groups would like to participate peacefully.” Doing so, he explained, will buy time, allowing civil-society leaders and community opinion-makers to “go out and start talking to political activists, encouraging them to give a chance to peacefulresolution rather than armed conflict.” A dominant ruling party: Still, others suggest that the remnants of Meles’s regime remain so strong that there is little reason to expect an outbreak of violence anytime soon.“The ruling party is so dominant that I seriously doubt that there will be internal turmoil. They control 99 percent of the seats at the federal, regional and local levels,” a former U.S. official and Horn of Africa expert told IPS on condition of anonymity. “Look at the restructuring that has gone on in the past several years – the removal of the old senior leadership, bringing in a new generation of leaders, including the deputy prime minister. I think Meles knew how important a smooth transition wasand saw this as the process of handing power to the next generation.” Metho hinted that incorporating the ruling regime could well prove to be an important part of the opposition’s strategy. “We need to make the ruling minority realise that this is a new chapter: you have nothing to be afraid of;

there's room for you in the new Ethiopia," he said. "The old system has to be torn down, but they can be part of this." He continues: "We have an old proverb: If you want to go faster, go alone; if you want to go further, go together. Now's the time to go together with all Ethiopians." By Carey L. Biron (August 22, 2012)

Requiem for a Reprobate: Ethiopian Tyrant Should Not Be Lionized -Forbes Magazine' Opinion: With the dust beginning to settle on yesterday's death of Meles Zenawi—ruler of Ethiopia since 1991—Western leaders have been quick tolavish praise on his legacy. A darling of the national security and international development industries, Zenawi was applauded for cooperating with the U.S. government on counter-terrorism and for spurring economic growth in Ethiopia—an impoverished, land-locked African nation of 85 million people. In truth, democratic leaders who praise Zenawi do a huge injustice to the struggle for human rights and individual dignity in Ethiopia. U.S. Ambassador Susan Rice said Zenawi "leaves behind an indelible legacy of major contributions to Ethiopia, Africa, and the world." Gordon Brown called Zenawi's demise "a tragedy for the Ethiopian people," while David Cameron remembered him as an "inspirational spokesman for Africa." Bill Gates tweeted that he "was a visionary leader who brought real benefits to Ethiopia's poor." Abdul Mohammed and Alex de Waal took to the New York Times op-ed pages today in perhaps the most unspeakably sycophantic eulogy of Zenawi, declaring that the dictator's death "deprives Ethiopia — and Africa as a whole — of an exceptional leader." For years, the diminutive Zenawi had been a fixture on the Davos circuit, charming Western leaders with statistics of human development and business expansion. Under his control, Ethiopia's average annual GDP growth rate more than doubled to a gaudy 8.8 percent over the past decade, and trade and investment with the West boomed. He worked with the U.S. to capture terrorists—even invading Somalia to help oust an Islamist government—in return netting roughly a billion dollars a year in American aid. Ethiopia had been to hell and back in the 1970s and 1980s with famine, war, and genocide. For someone who came to power as a freedom fighter and liberator, who gaveone of the poorest countries on earth China-esque economic growth, and who became a key ally of the U.S., what was not to like? First off, many ofthe rosy development statistics given out by the Ethiopian government aresimply fraudulent; independent sources still rank Ethiopia at the very bottom of poverty indexes. Second, what genuine economic and public health transformations Zenawi did bring to Ethiopia were achieved with a top-down model that mirrored the statist command he implemented over all other aspects of Ethiopian life. Zenawi built a totalitarian state, guided by Marxist-Leninism, complete with a cult of personality and zero tolerance for dissent. Like Saddam Hussein or Bashar al-Assad, he filled the country's top political and economic positions with men from his own Tigaray ethnicity. When elections did occur, he won them with Saddam- like numbers, most recently, 99 percent of the vote. Civil society organizations were harassed into submission or banned. His government only allowed one television station, one radio station, one internet-service provider, one telecom, one national daily, and one English daily—all churning out government propaganda. Zenawi used this information hegemony to heavily censor news available to Ethiopians, taking special delight in preventing them from hearing news from exile groups outside the country. Zenawi's critics were jailed, killed or chased out of the country: in fact, more journalists were exiled from Ethiopia in the last decade than any other country on earth. Let's restate that: Zenawi kicked out more journalists than any other tyrant on the planet, thereby monopolizing control over information. His favorite tactic was labeling dissidents as terrorists. Journalists risked up to 20 years in prison if they even reported about opposition groups classified by the government as terrorists. The most emblematic case is that of Eskinder Nega, a PEN- award-winning author sentenced to 18 years in prison this July for questioning the government's new anti-terrorism laws. Many in the West like to credit Zenawi with "keeping Ethiopia together" despite ethnic differences, war, famine and regional instability. Dissidents, however, maintain that Zenawi was always at war with his own people. When townsand villages rose up against Zenawi's military regime, they were put downbrutally. There was, and still is, a climate of fear. With 85 million Ethiopians suffering under his thrall, Meles Zenawi constructed one of history's most depraved states in terms of numerical human suffering. So why is this monster being celebrated? Some, like Bill Gates and Ambassador Rice, choose to remain blind to Zenawi's systemic human rights abuses. He was, undoubtedly, charming. Others, perhaps more worryingly, excuse his tyranny for his development and economic acumen.Foreign Policy's managing editor illustrated this point of view while tweeting that "Meles Zenawi was a dictator but was better for his country than many democratically elected leaders." This kind of mentality is a dangerous one. There is no such thing as a benign dictator. Only those with a fascist mindset—who want to cut corners, who complain how messyand inefficient democracy can be, and who overlook two thousand years ofpolitical history—can believe in this chimera. From Cuba to Kazakhstan, the story is the same. For instance, Pinochet took Chile from being a run- of-the-mill right-wing statist dictatorship to an economic success story with the same liberalization principles that the Chinese tyranny has employed to transform itself into a world power. Is the Pinochet-Beijing model of a police state with economic freedom, attempted by Zenawi for Ethiopia, an acceptable one in this day and age? The New York Review of Books reminds us that this sort of ideology brought Ethiopia "appalling cruelty in the name of social progress." Anyone stating that they "like" theeconomic results from the Pinochet-Beijing model must accept thousands of tortured and disappeared in Chile and tens of millions dead in China (and 8 million political prisoners languishing in the Laogai as of today). Perhaps those admiring a strongman can accept such a condition with a John Rawls-type veil of ignorance without knowing what it is like to live under a dictatorship. It is easy to tolerate torture and disappearances if itisn't happening to your daughter, your brother, your mother, or you.

Those in the West heaping praise on Zenawi—all living in societies that suffered so much to achieve individual liberty—are engaging in dramatic hypocrisy by praising this thug. Would Bill Gates live in a country that denies people basic political freedoms? Whose government arrests and kills its critics en masse? Would he trade places with an Ethiopian university student who believes in free expression and whose stance will lead to certain prison and possible execution? Any arguments that Zenawi was mellowing (after 21 years in power!) are false. The past few years saw new sweeping “anti-terrorism” laws and stronger Internet censorship.In 2005, Ethiopia even saw its own Tiananmen Square. That year, Zenawidecided to hold freer elections, but the opposition won a record number ofparliamentary seats, including all those in the capital, Addis Ababa.

Throngs took to the streets to celebrate. In response, Zenawi lashed out brutally, arresting the opposition’s entire leadership and sentencing them to life in prison for treason; shuttering five newspapers and imprisoning their editors; murdering 193 protestors, injuring 800, and arbitrarily jailing 40,000 other men, women, and teenagers in a show of raw tyranny. According to The Telegraph’s David Blair, who was reporting fromthe scene, “a crackdown on this scale has not been seen in Africa for 20 years and the repression exceeds anything by President Robert Mugabe ofZimbabwe for the past decade at least. Apartheid-era South Africa’s onslaught against the black townships in the 1980s provides the only recent comparison.” By Thor Halvorssen and Alex Gladstein (22 August, 2012)

Foreign Policy -Document ‘

The Meles Zenawi I Knew' Ethiopia's late dictator was a complex and sophisticated leader -- a self-taught ex-guerrilla who brought his people economic growth and repression."A thousand years from now, when Ethiopians gather to welcome the fourth millennium, they shall say the eve of the third millennium was the beginning of the end of the dark agesin Ethiopia," he said to an ululating crowd. The speech was not only important because of the ambitious vision it outlined, but because it tookplace just two years after the episode that will likely overshadow his achievements more than any other -- the disastrous and bloody 2005 general elections. It's hard to overstate the fervor of that campaign.

Ethiopians who had never lived in a democracy before were promised theirfirst properly contested poll since Meles and his allies sent Mengistu fleeing to exile in Zimbabwe. In the end, when Meles declared that his party had won a parliamentary majority, the opposition screamed fraud.

In ensuing street riots, his police and soldiers killed almost 200 Ethiopians, most shot dead. Some were beaten to death. The reaction from Meles was cold. He was sorry for the deaths, he said, but he'd simply told the security forces to "stop the insurrection." These were not normal demonstrations, he insisted. Afterwards, opposition leaders were rounded up and jailed. With the opposition out of the way, along with several journalists, he ploughed on with the day-to-day running of government.

His economic achievements, and his role as an opponent of Islamism in the Horn of Africa, pleased Western donors, most of whom usually offered little more than a temporary slap on the wrist. That's not to say that Meles's attempts at reform were all mere window-dressing. The premier and his government did much to let the light in. Under his watch, a safety-net system -- a form of social welfare, he called it -- for the country's millions of hungry people was introduced, which, while unsuccessful at weaning them off foreign aid, ensured that the calamitous famine of 1984 and 1985 would never be repeated. Economic successes continued even after the political turmoil of the 2005 elections. Under the leadership of this former Marxist guerrilla, Ethiopia became one of the fastest growing economies not only in Africa but in the world, posting double-digit growth figures for the last seven years in a row. Infant mortality plummeted. A small middle class emerged. Roads were built. Rivers dammed. Villages electrified. Despite this undeniable progress, most Ethiopians remained poor -- something Meles insisted he was working toward eradicating with a series of five-year plans. Masterful at dealing with Western governments, he cleverly played off their own security concerns and their rivalry with China and India, to which he also cozied up. There were few African leaders who could berate their donor countries while simultaneously holding out their palm for more aid money, but Meles had the chutzpah to carry it off. These achievements are even more remarkable given the fact that, according to a Western intelligence officer who knew Meles when he was still a bush rebel and after he came to power, the premier entered office knowing almost nothing about economics. "When I had my final conversation with him after spending thebetter part of two months in Ethiopia immediately after he took over in the summer of 1991, I asked Meles what he would like me to do to help him before I left," the man recounted. "I need to learn something about economics," Meles told him. "Can you get me some basic books?" The intelligence officer then went to an embassy, looked through its library, and picked about a dozen volumes and had them delivered to the new leader. New era for the people of Ethiopia' Meles Zenawi was the worst dictator in the 21st century and gross human right abuser died at the age of 57 on 20 August 2012. When Meles came to the Ethiopian political scene before 21 years ago, he had the perfect historical opportunity to end the cycle of political violence, injustice, ethnic inequality and poverty that debilitated Ethiopia for centuries, but he deliberately not used this opportunity for the aspiration of the people of Ethiopia for freedom; justice, equality, and prosperity were met with divide and rule tactics.

Obviously, Meles and his era has gone, but the problem he created still a big assignment for all Ethiopians, such as, the ethnic division, the systemof corruption, and the repressive political machinery that he built for 21 years are ahead of us. The task of dismantling the TPLF system and building a true democratic Ethiopia falls up on the shoulders of the Ethiopians themselves. The death of Meles Zeanwi may create it’s own opportunity for the TPLF core regime to correct Meles Zenawi’s historical mistakes and use this opportunity to implement a peaceful democratization process and rule of law in Ethiopia. Reconciliation with allpolitical parties and civic groups in and outside the country, and the unconditional release of all political prisoners is on the table. Pan- Ethiopians urged the people of Ethiopia and the various political and civic groups to unite and struggle to free the Ethiopian people from Meles Zenawi’s legacy. By Barry Mallone August 22, 2012:

Ethiopian Exiles Seek Talks with Government'

Two high-level Ethiopian exiles branded traitors and terrorists for opposingPrime Minister Meles Zenawi are calling for renewed talks with government now that the long-time leader in Addis Ababa is dead. Berhanu Nega, a former mayor of Addis Ababa, has been branded an enemy of the state in his home country. Abdulrahman Mahdi and his rebelgroup, the Ogadien National Liberation Front (ONLF), are officially classified as terrorists. Both men have different ideologies and for years been waged separate battles against the government of Prime Minister Meles, who died in a Belgian hospital August 20, after more than two decades in office. And both Berhanu and Mahdi, who live in exile, say theywant the same thing now that Meles is gone: a voice in Ethiopian politics. A government spokesman says that is unlikely to happen. The Meles' government convicted Berhanu of treason and sentenced him, in absentia,to life in prison after his political group-in-exile was convicted in 2009 of plotting a coup. He denies the allegation. Berhanu left Ethiopia in 2007, when he was released from jail after being pardoned on a separate treason charge. He was among several hundred opposition leaders arrested after a contested May-2005 election and charged, tried, and thenpardoned on treason charges. Despite his time in prison, Berhanu says hehas no malice toward the late Ethiopian leader, but does believe the nation needs a new political system. (August 23, 2012)

Ethiopia funeral held for EOC patriarch Abune Paulos'

Several thousand people have attended the funeral of the influential headof the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church (EOTC), Abune Paulos, in the capital, Addis Ababa. Abuna Paulos died at the age of 76, four days beforethe death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. Abuna Paulos' funeral was held at the Holy Trinity Cathedral Church in Ethiopia's capital Addis Ababa.

Among the mourners was Deputy Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, who is set to take over as Ethiopia's new leaders. Priests dressed in yellowflowing robes and carrying staffs massed at the Church of Saint Selassie, where the patriarch was buried.Church choirs from across Ethiopia sang and danced next to the casket, amidst a strong security force presence around the church. Abune Paulos, who died aged 76, had been the Orthodox Church head since 1992, following the overthrow of the Mengistu Haile Mariam regime. About half of Ethiopia's population is madeup of Orthodox Christians.His successor has not yet been announced. The patriarch was a close ally of Mr Meles, who led the rebellion to overthrow the former regime.

Former US Ambassador to Ethiopia Describes Meles' Legacy as 'Mixed Bag'

- Former U.S. ambassador to Ethiopia' Mr. David Shinn said (23 August, 2012) he expects a "relatively peaceful and stable transition" of power following the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. David Shinn, adjunct professor at George Washington University's Elliott School of International Affairs, said, death of Ethiopian leader brings ‘Opportunity for Peace’. “I don’t think you’re going to see a collapse of the country or any significant opposition expressing itself in the streets or anything. I think it will go rather smoothly.” Jakkie Cilliers from the ISS believes there is a positive side to Meles Zenawi's departure and that "he's leaving at the right moment." Meles is not "hanging on like Yoweri Museveni of Uganda and Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe until he leads his country into the twilight. Soit is also an opportunity for Ethiopia." Meles' death is not the only recent event to harbor an element of destiny for Ethiopia. There will be a burial service for another key public figure, the head of the influential and conservative Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church (EOTC), Abune Paulos. The choice of his successor is not just an ecclesiastical matter. It, too, will reverberate through Ethiopian politics.The country's communications minister downplayed the possibility of changes in the country's domestic and foreign policies. But the lone opposition member of parliament, says the country's new leader could bring change. "Hailemariam is not Meles," he said. "It is natural for every individual to run things differently and the new leader, be it Hailemariam or another person, will employ his own mindset in running the country. I hope he changes things for the better and the ruling party establishment should allow it. If they don't allow that they must be really sick. (August 23, 2012)

Associated Press (AP) on Meles’ death’

Ethiopia’s Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who died of an unknown illness earlier this week, will be buried on September, 2, the government spokesman said. The government had postponed an emergency session ofthe parliament to swear in a new prime minister as many leaders attendedthe funeral of a church leader. (August 23, 2012)

The honourable Ana Gomes (MEP) told Meles Zenawi fooled only thosewho wanted to be fooled’

After the death of Ethiopian prime minister Meles Zenawi, S&D Group spokeswoman for foreign affairs Mrs. Ana Gomes made the following statement: “Meles Zenawi was a dictator. His rhetoric on development, democracy and combatting terrorism only convinced those in the EU and the USA who wanted to be fooled. His words were clearly at odds with thecruel repression of his people and his actions in banning human rights anddevelopment organisations and jailing opposition members and journalists − Ethiopian and foreign. “Two Swedish journalists are today still languishing in Meles Zenawi’s prisons, together with hundreds of brave Ethiopians who dared to work for freedom and democracy for their people,including Pen Prize winner Eskinder Nega. “The EU must immediately demand the Ethiopian caretaker authorities ensure their prompt release. Itmust call for an immediate and inclusive dialogue involving all opposition parties – including the armed groups – to ensure a peaceful transition until democratic elections can be organised to determine the future ofgovernance in Ethiopia." (August 23, 2012)

President Barack Obama Holds Telephone Talkes With Acting Ethiopian PM'

U.S. President Barack Obama has urged Ethiopia's acting prime minister to promote "development, democracy, human rights, and regional security", according to the VoA. Obama spoke by phone late Thursday with Hailemariam Desalegn, who was named acting prime minister this week after longtime leader Meles Zenawi died at the age of 57. The White House says Obama pledged continued U.S. "partnership" with Ethiopia, which under Meles has been a strong U.S. ally in the war against radical groups such as Somalia's al-Shabab. According tp diplomatic sources, President Obama's call to Hailemariam Desalegn was part of the U.S. effort to strengthen Hailemariam's position. However, the mid- and lower-ranking TPLF members are revolting against the decision to make Hailemariam the new prime minister, fearing that power could slip away from them. Ethiopians are still awaiting word on when a relatively little known politician Mr. Hailemariam will be formally sworn in. Parliament was set to install him on Thursday but the session was canceled. A government spokesman said Ethiopians wanted more time to mourn Melesenawi, who led Ethiopia for 21 years. The late prime minister's funeral is scheduled for September 2. Meantime, Ethiopia's acting prime minister to manage a tricky political transition' The country has only had three major leaders since 1930 – Emperor Haile Selassie, Colonel Mengistu Haile- Mariam and Meles Zenawi. This is the first time in 82 years since Haile Selassie's coronation that there is the prospect of an orderly change of power. Government officials have insisted that Mr Meles's policies will continue to be followed, and that the ruling party, the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), is solidly behind the leadership that will be provided by Mr Hailemariam when he is confirmed by parliament as the new prime minister after Mr Meles's funeral on 2 September. Mr Hailemariam, 47, served jointly as Mr Meles' deputy and asforeign minister. He represents the younger generation of Ethiopian leaders. He was not a rebel fighter in the years preceding the overthrow ofColonel Mengistu's regime in 1991. He studied water engineering in Finland, and comes from southern Ethiopia, rather than Tigrai the heartland of opposition during the war years. For this reason, the Brussels-based think-tank the International Crisis Group says Mr Haile- Mariam might only be "a figurehead stopgap". "It is probable the new government will be more fragile, the security forces more influential and internal stability endangered," says the ICG. There remains little doubt that the Tigrean elite have held the real power in Ethiopia since their tanks rolled into Addis Ababa 21 years ago. A source in Addis Ababa admits it will be harder for Mr Haile-Mariam as he will not carry "the sameclout" as Mr Meles, but points out that the new prime minister is highly regarded and has done a good job in charge of the southern region of Ethiopia, which has a complicated ethnic mix. The government has given assurances that Mr Haile-Mariam will serve as prime minister until the next national elections in 2015. However, it is not inconceivable that therecould be an EPRDF leadership challenge, leading to a change of prime minister. One person mentioned as a possible successor to Mr Meles during the illness that preceded his death was his wife, Azeb Mesfin. She is said to be deeply unpopular though, and lacks a serious power base.

Another prospective leader is Berhane Guebre Kristos, a former ambassador in Europe and America, who also hails from the northern province of Tigray. Sources in Addis Ababa say there has been no sign of disagreement or quarrelling within the EPRDF during the last two uncertain months. But the ruling party, while disciplined, has always maintained a culture of secrecy and suspicion, stemming from the years of warfare in the northern mountains, when they looked to Enver Hoxha's Albania for political inspiration.

Ethiopia's acting prime minister to managea tricky political transition. VoA News (August 24, 2012)

Thousands mourn loss of Ethiopian prime minister and church patriarch -The Washington Post Commentary: August 24, 2012: By now the world has heard about Tuesday's death of longtime Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, but Ethiopians are also mourning the loss of another major figure: Abuna Paulos, patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahado Church.The U.S.- educated Paulos died unexpectedly of undisclosed health related problemson Aug 16, four days before the prime minister's death was announced.

Paulos was 76. The two men were close allies and hailed from the same Tigray ethnic group. Home to some of the world's oldest churches, Ethiopia has an estimated 45 million Orthodox Christians, a little over halfof its 75 million population. There are also tens of thousands of followers and dozens of Ethiopian Orthodox churches in the Ethiopian-American community across the Washington region. Thousands of Ethiopian Americans attended a memorial service Thursday at several churches throughout the area. Back in Ethiopia, the council of the church will hold meetings in the coming weeks to appointment a new patriarch. The Ethiopian Orthodox Church was part of Egypt's Coptic Orthodox Church, but got its independence in 1959. Outspoken and active in public life, Paulos was the head of the church since 1992, and was appointed year after Meles and his party overthrew the communist government of Mengistu Haile Mariam. During Mengistu's crackdown on religion, Paulos was jailed in the 1970s and later went into exile in the United States.

While here he studied at St. Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminaryin the New York, and afterwards joined the doctoral program at the Princeton Theological Seminary. He was controversial because he was given the title of patriarch while his predecessor was in political exile, because of his ties to Mengistu. Paulos's appointment was seen as a violation because the Ethiopian Orthodox Church states that no new patriarch can be in charge if the former one is still alive. Still, Paulos is credited with reviving the religion inside Ethiopia and was at the forefront of pushing the church into offering social services for those displaced by war and drought, and was the first leader to openly break social taboos and pushing awareness about prevention of the country's high HIV-AIDS rates. He also started a series of peace talks between leaders of Ethiopianand Eritrean religious leaders when the two countries were on the cusp ofwar. He also met with Sudan's President Omar Hassan Al-Bashirto talk about ways to end the conflict in the country's western region of Darfur . "No one loves Africa more than Africans," Paulos famously said. He was also one of the seven current presidents of World Council of Christian Churches, an organization based in Switzerland. "He was a real bridge builder, someone who believed in extending a hand," said Prince Ermias Sahle Selassie, the grandson of the late Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie,who lives in the Washington region. "He was also a visible symbol of Orthodox Christianity around the world." Emily Wax is a former Africa bureau chief and now a feature writer for The Washington Post.

Egypt's Irrigation Minister Takes Part in Ethiopian Patriarch's Funeral'

Egypt State Information Service – Cairo - August 24 2012: Minister of Water Resources and Irrigation Mohamed Bahaa-Eddin took part in the funeral of Ethiopian Orthodox Church Patriarch Abune Paulos on Thursday23/08/2012 as a representative of the Egyptian government. Also, acting Coptic Orthodox Pope Anba Bakhomious led a delegation of the Church leaderships to the funeral procession. Abune Paulos led Ethiopia's 40 million Orthodox Christians - half the population - since 1992. The patriarch died on Thursday morning at the age of 76. Egyptian Ambassador to Ethiopia Mohamed Idris told MENA that Paulos was highly respected and appreciated among the Ethiopians and that he was a good friend to Egypt. He added that President Mohamed Morsi was keen to meet the late patriarch during his participation in the African summit in Addis Ababa last month. Idris said Egyptians are supporting their brothersin Ethiopia during this hard time that began with the death of the patriarch then the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi

Gulf News: Meles Death Leaves Ethiopia Reeling'

It says much when the long-time rulers of two of Africa's largest, most important nations, Egypt's Hosni Mubarak and Ethiopia's Meles Zenawi, had to fly to Europe for critical medical treatment because their own nations lacked facilities and specialists. Meles' untimely death at 57 last week in a Belgian hospital – probably from cancer – has left Ethiopia reeling. He and a junta of Tigrayans ruled Ethiopia's 90.8mn people withan iron first since 1991 after they overthrew the murderous Communist Derg regime of Col Mengistu Haile Mariam. Mengistu's Red Terror is saidto have murdered tens of thousands and starved to death a million peasants. Assessing Meles' rule is difficult. He was one of Africa's smartest, most sophisticated leaders. Meles maintained a reputation forfinancial integrity and personal austerity that was unusual in Africa, though his government was accused of widespread corruption. Under him,desperately poor Ethiopia enjoyed a stellar growth rate of 7-10% per annum, thanks in part to investments of $5bn apiece from India and China that includes major rail projects. Large dams were built on Ethiopia's mountain rivers that boosted crops, but brought threats of war from downstream Sudan and Egypt. However, the most important boost to Ethiopia's economy came from annul infusions of some $1bn in US military and economic aid. Under Meles, Ethiopia became America's policeman of the Horn of Africa. Ethiopia had played the same role under Emperor Haile Selaisse until his overthrow and murder in 1975 by Mengistu's Duerg. Western human rights groups accused the Meles regimeof gross human rights violations, political repression, and silencing media. Washington closed its eyes to Ethiopia's repression, as it did with Mubarak's regime in Egypt. Ethiopia and Mubarak's Egypt became the twinpillars of US influence over Africa and close Israeli allies. Israel blocked criticism of their human rights records in Washington. Egypt and Ethiopia formed an entente with four other close US allies, Uganda, Rwanda, Kenyaand the new, US-engineered state of South Sudan. The first three are nowsending troops into Somalia, financed by Washington. US drone aircraft now fly from Ethiopia. Ethiopia's 138,000-man armed forces, backed by Cuban troops, battled neighbouring Somalia in the 1970's Ogaden War and then breakaway Eritrea in the 1990's. In recent years, Ethiopia has twice sent its army into turbulent Somalia in an attempt to establish a non-Islamic regime aligned with US policy. In 2006, a moderate Somali government, the Islamic Courts Union, was overthrown by the Bush administration and Ethiopia, resulting in creation of the extreme Shebab movement against which the US and its allies are still fighting. Addis Ababa faces a bigger challenge than Somalia's quagmire. Ethiopia has been called Africa's last colonial empire. Its minority Amhara and Tigrayanmountain tribes – about 32% of the population - have long ruled over a restive majority of lowland Muslim Oromo, 40% of the population, as well as Sidamo, Somalis in Ogaden, and other minorities. Though renowned asone of the cradles of Christianity, Ethiopia is today a majority Muslim nation. Yet it remains ruled by a Christian, Amhara/Tigrayan-speaking minority, supported by the Western powers. Ethiopia's voiceless majority Oromo have been seething with rebellion for decades. So are democrats and regional movements. There is a real risk Ethiopia could unravel, losingsome of its lowland territories conquered by its 19th-Century warrior emperors. For Washington, which is increasingly involved in Africa's affairsand energy resources, Ethiopia's powerful army polices the strategic Horn of Africa and overlooks America's new clients in Central Africa. Equally important, Ethiopia is one of Africa's most important water sources and controls the headwaters of the mighty Nile. Its airline, Ethiopian Airways, is regarded as Africa's safest and most reliable. Historically, Ethiopian armies have crossed the Red Sea to invade Yemen and Arabia and Sudan.European powers and the Ottomans have sought to enlist Ethiopia as an ally since the 1500's. Though landlocked after losing Eritrea, Ethiopia remains a major power in the Red Sea region. Ethiopia may try to escape the long era of despotism, as Egypt is doing. But given its internal instability and foreign power interests, it’s likely Ethiopia may continue under authoritarian rule. Too bad. Ethiopians, one of Africa’s most capablepeople, deserve much better.

Experts Believe Limited Press Freedom to Continue in Ethiopia - VoA NewsAfrica’

Commentary by Rizwan Syed - August 25, 2012: The death of Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi has raised questions about the state of pressfreedom in the country. After weeks of government silence over Meles' health, he died suddenly in a Belgian hospital on August 20. Journalists who had reported on his health had seen harsh reprisals from the government, such was the case with Temesgen Desalegn, editor of the prominent Ethiopian weekly newspaper Feteh who was jailed late last month. Analysts say hardliners in the government, coupled with the country's one-party rule, will keep the Ethiopian press firmly under government control in the future. Mohamed Keita with the Committee to Protect Journalist's Africa Program says government prosecution and laws prevented a free press from developing under Meles. "Systematic persecution and criminalization of news gathering activities, critical reporting, investigative journalism never had a chance to grow under his rule because access to information never became a reality and his government continually enacted laws that ever restricted the activities of journalists and criminalized these activities," said Keita. The illness and whereabouts of Meles had been a source of rampant media speculation forweeks, including reports that he had died or gone on holiday. Keita says this is because of the government's culture of secrecy. "Because the government did not provide reliable information, refused to give details about his whereabouts and his condition," noted Keita. "This reflected the culture of secrecy within the ruling party and so in the absence of reliable information rumors ran wild and this is why there was so much speculation." Meles has been succeeded by Hailemariam Desalegn, who had been deputy prime minister. Keita thinks freedom of the press in Ethiopia will not improve under Hailemariam because of hardliners' influence in the ruling party. "The ruling party, there are hard-liners in theparty and they wield a lot of influence," Keita noted. "I don't think Hailemariam is a hard-liner, but I'm sure he's under a lot of pressure so I don't know if he'll have a chance to really break with the past." VOA correspondent Peter Heinlein, who was based in Addis Ababa, says the government made it increasingly hard to report during his several years there. "We saw a steady increase in the regulation of the news media andalso the government is very clever in limiting the number of sources that are available to reporters," Heinlein explained. "People in Ethiopia are generally wary of speaking to reporters and many times I would go back to a source or a person I'd spoken to and interviewed for a second time and found that after they appeared on VOA the first time they were warned that this is not the thing to do and some of them flat out told me

'I'm scared to talk to VOA. I'm scared to talk to the foreign press.'" Heinlein says it was difficult for the Ethiopian press to report accurately onMeles' deteriorating health because of the government line. "The state media and the private media were more or less hewing to the governmentline," Heilein added. "It's very difficult to really suss out what the truth is in an environment like that." Press freedom so far has not improved underMeles' successor. Feteh newspaper editor Temesgen Desalegn was deniedbail Thursday after being jailed for reporting on the health of the prime minister last month. Heinlein thinks press freedom will not improve under the new leadership. "Hailemariam is basically the same government as Meles Zenawi," Heilein noted. "Ethiopia is a one party state defacto and the policies won't change. The policies are dictated by a small politburo known as the executive committee and that executive committee has not relinquished one iota of its policy-making authority now that Meles Zenawiis gone." Amnesty International has condemned the government's detention of Temesgen, saying the arrest is a worrying signal that the government intends to carry on targeting dissent.

Ethiopia: Obama Urges New Leader to Promote Human Rights, Security -Sudan Tribune

VIEWS: US president, Barack Obama, has spoken with Ethiopia's acting prime minister, Haile-Mariam Desalegn, who has become nation's new leader following the death of his predecessor on 21 August. According to statement by the US embassy in Addis Ababa, Obama has urged the newEthiopian leader to promote regional security, democracy and human rights. During their phone conversation on Thursday, Obama pledged the US's continued commitment to partnership with Ethiopia, mainly on security areas. "We encourage the Government of Ethiopia to enhance itssupport for development, democracy, regional stability and security, human rights, and prosperity for its people" Obama lauded Zenawi's "life long" contributions to bringing development to Ethiopia and also admired his role for peace and security in Africa, mainly in Somalia and his responses to the crisis in Darfur, where Ethiopia deployed thousands of peace keeping forces. Obama also mentioned the late Ethiopian premier'scontributions to the African Union, and his voice for Africa on the world stage. Zenawi was the US's key security partner in the horn Africa region,mainly in the war on terror and particularly in the fight against Al-Qaida linked al-Shabab radical group in war-torn Somalia. After more than two months of illness, Zenawi died last Monday, leaving behind a mixed legacy. Under his rule millions of Ethiopians were lifted out of poverty andthe nation has seen double-digit economic growth for nearly a decade.

However he has been criticized of doing little to enhance democracy and human rights while leading the country for 21 years, after toppling the former dictatorial Derg Regime. Following Zenaw?s death, there are fears that nation may face a power vacuum and instability. Speaking to Sudan Tribune, many asked whether the achieved developments and consecutiveeconomic growth would be sustained after Zenawi. Others also raised questions about the political landscape and the nation's relationship with other countries. The unresolved Ethiopia-Eritrea border dispute is anothermajor concern for Ethiopians. The two countries fought a 1998-2000 war which killed 70,000 people. Communication Minister, Bereket Simon, downplayed the concerns saying the current leadership is united and will remain as strong as ever despite Zenawi's absence.

Xinhua, Chinese News Agency on Meles' Death'

Commentary: 25 August, 2012: Preparations are underway for the burial of the late Ethiopian prime minister, Meles Zenawi slated for the 2nd of September. Meanwhile, thousands of Ethiopians continue to pay tribute tothe late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi at the National Palace. CCTV's GirumChala has more on this. It has been 3 days Since Ethiopians started mourning for their departed Prime Minister. Unusually the national palace is filled with people, People who are gathered from every corner of the country toexpress their sorrow for their leader who died of accidental infections on Monday. Here at the national palace the government has organized anevent for ministers and the military as well as the wider public to say goodbye. Led by the interim Prime Minister Haile mariam |Desalegn theMinisters of Ethiopia were the first on the line to salute thebody of the Prime Minister. Then the military followed…..I spoke with fewmourners, they all were shockingly disturbed by the death. Tigist Ayele, mourner, said, "I felt a deep sorrow bythe death of our prime minister.

It's impossible to Express the sorrow of thearmy in general. Meles was Africa's greatest leader." Mesfin Girma, mourner, said, "Many of us have never beento the national palace before. It is his contribution to the freedom that enabled us to be here. I'm happy that I have expressed my condolences in person." Etsehiwot Abebe, mourner, said, "I think his death is a wakeup callfor all of us. Now citizens of this country should work together for a better tomorrow.And I believe if we do that he will livein our hearts" Ethiopia has never seen a leader die in office before. The death of the prime minister coupled with the citizens eagerness to come out of poverty, gave mourners a reason to be tough on themselves.

CCTV's Girum Chala said, "Tens of thousands of Ethiopians arepouring into the National Palace to express their condolences for the latePrime Minister Meles Zenawi. As you can see people are deeply touched by theloss.The funeral ceremony of prime minister Meles Zenawi will be held here in Addis Abeba on the 2nd of September 2012." (Source: CNTV.cn)

The Ethiopian woman who made ethical sandals fashionable - New Africa'

Commentary by Lucy Siegle 26 August, 2012: SoleRebels founder Bethlehem Tilahun Alemu was convinced she could make stylish shoes outof old tyres. The idea for footwear label soleRebels popped into the brain of Bethlehem Tilahun Alemu in 2004. Looking around her native Addis Ababa, she caught sight of the ubiquitous simple sandals made from recycled tyres and decided to turn them into an international brand.

Twelve months later, soleRebels was launched in a local workshop with just five staff. Made from recycled content, and bringing work to the local community, who are then paid equitably, soleRebels is as ethical as it gets. It is the embodiment of the drive to use commerce to bring about social change, and Alemu is an articulate and passionate believer. (She has twice made the Forbes "outstanding African businesswomen" list.) Butif you think she wants to create a worthy product to sell at church fetes, think again. "Actually, I don't even want to describe my brand in terms of Ethiopia. I want you to buy my shoe lines because they are fashionable and comfortable." No wonder soleRebels has earned the soubriquet, the Nike of Ethiopia. This year, it will turn over $2m and Alemu now employs 200 staff. Next month, soleRebels opens its first international store in Taiwan, and more are slated to follow. But Alemu has her eye on one place – New York. "If I can make it there, I can make it anywhere," she laughs.

Peoples'Alliance for Freedom & Democracy on the Death of Meles Zenawi'

The aforementioned peoples' alliance of Ogaden Somalis, Oromo, Sidama and the new candidates of AFD: After deliberating on the current situationin Ethiopia and carefully observing the level of struggle against the currentregime and the apparent confusion created by the sudden disappearance of Meles Zenawi, the "strong man" ruling Ethiopia for the past twenty one years; Being apprehensive of the current regime's attempts to delude the peoples in Ethiopia regarding Zenawi's fate and their attempt to maintain the status quo in order to continue their ruthless suppression of all peoples in Ethiopia; After considering, the current disarray and lack of political will of some opposition groups to embrace the political and social changes that Ethiopia has undergone in the last forty years and their archaic adherence to political precepts that are no longer tenable in the 21century, such as negating the rights of nations in Ethiopia to self- determination; After considering the opportunistic utterances of some sectors of the opposition regarding the aftermath of future change of polity in Ethiopia, which neglects the long struggle of the oppressed peoples in Ethiopia – who were subjugated, disenfranchised and virtually enslaved even before the current regime came to power in Ethiopia; Beingcognizant of the fact that some sectors of the opposition are aspiring to reversing the historic acceptance in principle, but not in practice, by the present regime of the rights of all nations and nationalities under Ethiopian rule for their inalienable right to exercise their self- determination; Asserting that the oppressed peoples who had fought with their blood and still keeps fighting successive oppressive regimes in Ethiopia will never allow the reversal of their revolutionary gains; The Peoples' Alliance for Freedom and Democracy reiterates and reaffirms the following: A peaceful and orderly transfer of power to the peoples in Ethiopia can only come through a comprehensive conference of representatives of all the different nations, nationalities and those committed to genuine democracy in Ethiopia that hammers out the future of the Ethiopian Empire; The basis of any future arrangement in Ethiopia must be based on democratic principles, including the exercise of the rightof self-determination and the respect of both individual and group rights; All changes, arrangements and configurations that are intended to end theperennial conflict in Ethiopia must be based on the will and consent of each and every nation and nationality in the Ethiopian empire; No single group, including the incumbent regime, can dictate the future of any of the nations and nationalities in Ethiopia; The Peoples' Alliance for Freedomand Democracy shall intensify its efforts to unite all the oppressed nationsunder Ethiopian rule to effectively struggle for their right to freedom and democracy; The international community shall respect the wishes, desiresand rights of all the nations and nationalities in Ethiopia in their engagements and understand that the status quo is untenable and a recipe for further disaster; Finally, the Peoples' Alliance for Freedom and Democracy calls on all concerned parties, including the current government of Ethiopia, the representatives of all nations and nationalitiesin Ethiopia with the facilitation of the international community to seize thisopportunity and hold a comprehensive conference to resolve the existing dysfunctional political and social dilemmas confronting the Ethiopian Empire. Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), Ogadien National Liberation Front (ONLF), Sidama Liberation Front (SLF)

EthioGuardian.com:

Opinion by Selam Beyene (Ph.D.):

August, 2012 Ethiopia: The misguided drama of TPLF diehards' Without regard to the opportunity presented by the death of the late autocrat Meles Zenawi to initiate dialogue, atone for the crimes committed by the ethnic-based regime, and reach out to the vast majority of the Ethiopian people they have disfranchised, impoverished and subjected to untold levels of oppression and misery in over two decades tyranny, the cadres of the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF) that still hold the reins of power in Ethiopia are harassing the people as they frantically prepare to make a distasteful spectacle of the despot's funeral services, fashioned after the theatrics of North Korea's Kim dynasty. In a bizarre and primitivepublic relations ploy, the cadres kept in the dark a country of over eighty million people and the rest of the world about the circumstances of the tyrant's ailment and death for months, thereby revealing a collective stateof mind that is unstable and a leadership cohort that lacks human decencyand the basic elements of governance and good diplomacy. When the death of the dictator was eventually disclosed, largely under pressure from the international donor community, the cadres again stunned the world by their lack of tactfulness, understanding of the nuances of the occasion and ability to conceal their panic, shame and naked desire to perpetuate the failed policies of an ethnic-based and corrupt system. As a venomous serpent that has most of its head severed, the TPLF is now convinced that its continued survival hinges only on the portrayal of a larger-than-life picture of the fallen tyrant and taking refuge in the shadow of such a portrait. Accordingly, while waging fierce internal struggles for control and leadership positions, the cadres are mobilizing allresources at their disposal to bid a dramatic and repugnant sendoff to their deceased boss in the vain hope of carrying on his wicked legacy.

Since the official announcement of the dictator's expiration, Ethiopia has been in a state of siege. From the smallest villages in central Shoa to suchregional towns as Debre Berhan, Jimma, Gondar, Adwa, Nazareth and Addis Ababa, all citizens from the unemployed to the professional, from famous singers to renowned athletes, from the army to the clergy, areordered to display their grief over the death of the tyrant during the lengthy mourning and funeral periods. Their embassy employees in majorcapitals of the world are busy persuading foreign dignitaries to attend the sendoff, while corrupt African diplomats in Addis are urged to persuade their respective autocratic leaders to eulogize the life of a fallen colleague.To critical observers, the unfolding dramatic events are reminiscent of theNorth Korean "Great Leader" phenomenon, with the veiled but unmistakable intention of continuing the repressive policies of the deceased despot. A Teachable Moment: if the TPLF minority rulers believethat they can continue the discredited ethnic-based policies of Meles Zenawi with business as usual, then they have not learned from their short history or the unfolding events in their neighborhood. They should wake up from decades of denial about the crimes they have committed and the immeasurable pain and suffering they have inflicted on the peopleof Ethiopia, and use this occasion to build bridges between them and the rest of the country. The sinister gambit to hide under the cover of fake growth figures, phony democracy, and fanciful invincibility cannot last for much longer. Thanks to the infantile and irresponsible ethnic policy of Zenawi, Ethiopia today is a tinderbox. The propaganda machinery and security apparatus notwithstanding, the harsh realities of life under TPLF authoritarian rule have created favorable conditions for a mass insurrection, with unpredictable and grave consequences. The sources of the billions of dollars aid money diverted to buy informants and train and maintain militias would soon dry up, and there would be no force strong enough to continue to thwart the people's desire for freedom and democracy. The TPLF cadres should, therefore, come to their senses and divert a calamity by integrating themselves into the Ethiopian society. It ishigh time they understand that a rule by a minority ethnic group, with a philosophy of inter-ethnic disharmony, corruption and anti-Ethiopianism, is doomed to be relegated to the dustbin of history. The Hypocrisy of the West: Over that last few days, we have watched with great consternation as gullible Western diplomats made attempts to lionize the brutal dictator,instead of demonizing him for the crimes he had committed against humanity. While their expression of admiration for the late dictator as an African intellectual and economic reformer is, of course, a measure of the contempt they harbor for Africa, their irresponsible statements have the potential to send the wrong signals to the followers of the dictator who still believe they can promote the failed ideology of their deceased leader.

Much has been written about the phony growth and development figures that the despot fed to naïve donor nations and so-called development experts. The West showered the dictator with billions of dollars in direct and indirect aid, in part as payment for his mercenary role in the “fight against terror”. The tyrant used part of the money to strengthen his grip on power, while he either stashed away the rest in his foreign bank accounts or used it to enrich his multi-billion dollar business conglomerates, such as the Endowment Fund for the Rehabilitation of Tigray (EFFORT). In a country that had been struggling to emerge from decades of civil war and a Soviet-style bureaucracy, a fraction of the aid money that was spent on superficial construction and other development activities, bolstered by statistics fabricated by party loyalists, was sufficient to give the impression of double-digit growth. To the naive donor institutions that are ever hungry for numbers, and to the phony academicians who are desperate to validate flawed development ideas, the fudged figures were essential inputs to complete annual reports or to corroborate fanciful theories, and hence were uncritically accepted at face value. Sadly, the facts on the ground are horrifying. According to a recent report of the Worldwide Governance Indicators (WGI) project, Ethiopia is ranked among the bottom of 213 economies over the period 1996–2010, i.e., on Zenawi’s watch, with respect to such governance dimensions as Voice and Accountability, Government Effectiveness, Rule of Law and Control of Corruption. And more shockingly, Ethiopia is ranked as the second poorest country in the world, just above Niger, based on the new international measure of poverty, the Multidimensional Poverty Index(MPI), developed by the Oxford Poverty and Human Development Initiative. With respect to human rights, Zenawi had the most despicable record of any leader in recent history. Since he snatched power from the previous despot, he had systematically wiped out all forms of opposition, and established a totalitarian state the likes of which had not been seen since the fall of the Berlin Wall. In 2005, when he was humiliatingly defeated at the polls, he massacred over 190 peaceful protesters, sent hundreds of thousands of suspected opposition supporters to concentration camps, and jailed all major opposition leaders. In the most recent elections, he decimated any potential rivals, and claimed 99.6% of the votes in openly rigged elections. It is time for the West to abandon thecontemptible policy of cuddling dictators in private while professing democracy and freedom in official communications. The career diplomats in the US State Department and in foreign offices of Western powers should take heed of the plight of the people under the yoke of tyranny andrecalibrate their policies to ensure lasting peace and stability in these fragile parts of the world. The Pentagon in particular should immediately sever its ties with a criminal regime that does not represent the will of thepeople, and refrain from tarnishing its time-honored responsibility as a bulwark of freedom and democracy in an imprudent aim of achieving short-term tactical objectives. A Golden Opportunity for the Opposition: The fractured opposition groups, both inside and outside of Ethiopia, havehitherto never missed an opportunity to miss an opportunity to bring an end to the tyrannical rule of the TPLF. Now these groups have a golden opportunity to join forces and work toward the formation of a system of government that is based on democratic principles, respect of individual rights, and equal opportunity for all citizens, irrespective of ethnicity, religion or other prejudices. It is imperative that all opposition groups come together under a common platform and press the international community and the TPLF cadres to chart a robust framework for a stable,democratic and prosperous Ethiopia. In this regard, the recent announcement by the Oromo Dialogue Forum should be viewed as a step in the right directions and followed by all concerned groups. Without a united front among opposition groups, in which individual ambitions are subservient to the common good, the TPLF cadres are likely to perpetuateZenawi's agenda of repression, and the West will continue to thwart any internal movement for freedom and democracy. A Call to Action: All Ethiopians back home and in the Diaspora should use this opportunity to exert pressure on the TPLF cadres and their foreign backers to chart a democratic path for Ethiopia. They should not be distracted by the misguided drama of the TPLF diehards who are futilely attempting to perpetuate the destructive ethnic policy of the late tyrant. No lavish funeral ceremony, or memorial edifices to immortalize one of the most vicious dictators in modern times should distract the people of Ethiopia from demanding their fundamental rights to live in freedom and choose their leaders without coercion and repression. We call upon Ethiopian intellectuals to engage more aggressively in the struggle to free our people from the shackles of tyranny, deprivation and perpetual misery.

Seldom in the history of the struggle against tyranny has a generation of intellectuals demonstrated such a level of inexcusable apathy as has been the case among many of the Ethiopian intellectuals in the face of unparalleled repression of the society they are a product of. Any segment of a society that is guided only by selfish principles, without regard to the common good, is destined to condemn itself and its progeny to perpetual servitude and slavery. Lastly, we call upon donor nations and institutions to withheld any and all aid to the criminal regime until it agrees to abide by international norms of good governance, invites all opposition groups to form a government of national reconciliation, unconditionally frees all political prisoners, and immediately guarantees the rights and freedoms ofall Ethiopians that are enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Without the subsidy of Western aid, the Stalinist system of government will crumble overnight, and a new era of democracy, stability and prosperity will dawn on that ancient land in the Horn of Africa.

Ethiopia: A Farewell to Meles Zenawi' - Ethiomedia

By Professor Al Guebre-Mariam - August 27, 2012: For over two hundred seventy five weeks, without missing a single week, I have written long expository commentaries on the deeds and misdeeds of the man who hasbeen at the helm of power in Ethiopia for over two decades. Meles Zenawihas now passed on. The cause of his death remains a closely guarded state secret. There is little I can say about what Meles has done or not done in death that I have not said in life. But his death saddens me, because as John Donne said, “Any man’s death diminishes me, because I am involved in Mankind. Death comes equally to us all, and makes us all equal when it comes.” As a committed human rights advocate, even the death of a tyrant diminishes me because I am involved in the cause of humanity-- justice, fairness, equality, dignity, benevolence, compassion, forgiveness, honesty, integrity and magnanimity. I bid Meles farewell not in words of lamentation or grievance but in words that record lost opportunities yet express hope, optimism and confidence in the future of Ethiopia. Meles Zenawi was a man who had an appointment with destiny. Fate had chosen him to play a historic role in Ethiopia and beyond. He wasone of the leaders of a rebel group that fought and defeated a brutal military dictatorship that had been in power for 17 years. In victory, Melespromised democracy, respect for democratic liberties and development.

But as the years wore on, Meles became increasingly repressive, intolerant of criticism and in the end became as tyrannical as the tyrant hehad replaced. In his last years, he created a police state reinforced by a massive security network of spies and surveillance technology. He criminalized press freedom and civil society institutions. He crushed dissent and all opposition. He spread fear and loathing that penetrated the remotest parts of the countryside. For over 21 years, Meles clutched the scepter of power in his hands and cast away the sword of justice he held when he marched into the capital from the bush in 1991. Meles was feared, disliked and demonized by his adversaries. He was loved, admired,idealized and idolized by his supporters. In the end, Meles died a man whohad absolute power which had corrupted him absolutely. In his relentless pursuit of absolute power, Meles missed his appointment with destiny to become a peerless and exemplary Ethiopian leader. But who was the Meles Zenawi we saw morphing from a promising democrat into a flagitious dictator over the past 21 years? Who was the man we accuse of human rights violations and crimes against humanity? Who was the man we blame for the stillbirth of democracy in Ethiopia and the creation of “anAfrican police state” as CNN recently characterized it? Is he alone responsible for the suffering and woe that have befallen that poor nation? Perhaps some may be surprised to hear one of Meles’ severest critics in life raising such questions in his death. But the truth must be told. We created and nurtured Meles over the past 21 years. We were his aiders and abettors. We share responsibility in his deeds and misdeeds. “We” arethe great nations who lionized and gave billions of dollars to Meles every year even as we meticulously documented his massive record of human rights violations year after year. “We” are the members of the political party that controls 99.6 percent of the seats in parliament who rubber- stamped his repressive laws that criminalized journalists and civil society organizations and made “terrorists” out of our best and brightest youth. “We” are the judges who made a travesty of justice by subverting the halls of justice into kangaroo courts. “We” are the soldiers, police and security operatives who used our guns on innocent civilians. “We” are the civil servants who stood at Meles' beck and call and did his bidding unquestioningly. "We" are the journalists for state media who covered up and justified his violations of human rights. "We" are the businessmen andwomen who profited from official corruption to line our pockets. "We" are the young men and women who signed up for party membership to accessopportunities in a system we knew to be corrupt. "We" are Ethiopia's intellectuals who chose not to stand up to Meles or stand up for principle. "We" are the opposition party leaders who bickered, quarreled and quibbled when millions looked up to us to lead us on the shining path to democracy. "We" are the Ethiopian Diaspora who kept silent, turned a deaf ear, muted lips and blind eyes as ordinary Ethiopians were subjected to extrajudicial killings, dissidents and critics jailed and political prisoners tortured and abused. "We" are the individuals who could have said or done something when Meles did wrong but chose to remain silent. The truth must be told. None of us can wash off our hands the sins of silence, complicity and indifference over the past twenty-one years. So "We" all should be mindful that when we point an index finger at Meles, three fingers are pointing at ourselves. Meles was an exceedingly ambitious manwho understood power, but only the dark side of power. He could not come to terms with the truth that real power comes from the consent of the people and must be exercised in accordance with the principle of the rule of law. He held the power of life and death, but used it more for the latter. He was the policeman, judge, jury and executioner. He was the law, and his will was the law of the land. Meles was blinded to the fact that with great power comes great responsibility. He scorned the idea thatthose who hold power must temper it with compassion, justice and tolerance. But having absolute power made Meles feel absolutely invincible, indestructible, indomitable and unconquerable. He missed his appointment with destiny. Meles could have been a peerless and exemplary leader in Ethiopia and in Africa. Many of the world's dictators inhistory were great leaders. Their "greatness" came from their brutal subjugation of their people. But exemplary leaders achieve greatness because they are loved, revered and cherished by their people. Their greatness comes from their openness of heart, mind and soul. Nelson Mandela is a peerless and exemplary leader embraced by the entire world even though he was in office for four years and spent much of his adult life languishing in Apartheid prisons. Today he is seen as an icon of humanity. What makes Mandela an exemplary leader is not his charisma, oratory, organizing or administrative skills. Mandela was concerned about people, not power. Mandela's first and foremost concern was dignity, the dignity of all South Africans and the dignity of all humanity. Mandela became a peerless leader because he took a single seed of love from his heart and planted in the arid soil of racial hate and watered it with goodwill, patience and tolerance. When the world wagered on a bloodbath in South Africa, in six years Mandela brought black and white South Africans together and baptized them in the holy water of truth and reconciliation. Today South Africa is a shining example of a multiracial society with its own imperfections. Meles had an appointment with destiny to walk in Mandela’s shoes and follow in his footsteps. He could have forged a strong and united Ethiopian nation. He had the chance to build bridges that connected people across ethnic lines, roads that linked heartsand minds. But he chose the path of ethnic division and fragmentation. Hechose to build edifices to decorate the cities, roads that led to nowhere and dams that damned the people and gave away the land to foreigners for pennies in the name of development and investment. Meles missed his appointment with destiny to forge a united Ethiopian nation. Meles had anappointment with destiny to become not only a peerless and exemplary leader bust also a compassionate one. He was a man with an iron will, which was also his undoing. He was quick to anger and intemperate in hisdisposition. He was unkind to those over whom he had total control. Whenhe jailed Birtukan Midekssa in December 2008, he said, “there will never be an agreement with anybody to release Birtukan. Ever. Full stop. That’s a dead issue.” Birtukan had done nothing wrong. When he denied an incubator for the premature baby of internationally-acclaimed husband and wife journalists, Serkalem Fasil and Eskinder Nega, born in prison, he showed himself lacking in fundamental human decency. When he told American diplomats that “we will crush the opposition with all our might”, he revealed himself to be a ruthless man. Whenever it was in his power toshow mercy, he chose vengeance. Like Mandela, by working with his adversaries, Meles could have made them his partners and eventually his friends.

Ethiopia: “Tougher Love” Needed for Ethiopia's New Leader – ICG’

The international community will need to be tougher with the successor toMeles Zenawi's leadership of Ethiopia to prevent negative consequences atboth national and regional levels the International Crisis Group (ICG) has said in a report published on 22 August. ICG said that the international community, particularly Ethiopia's key allies, the US, UK and European Union (EU), should play a leading role in shaping and encouraging the newleadership if one of its most important regional allies is to remain stable. Zenawi and his predominantly Tigrayan clique from the north of the country, ruled Ethiopia since 1991 after toppling the Communist Duerg regime of Mengistu Haile Mariam. Haile-Mariam Desalegn, tasked to carryon Meles's duty until 2015, will lead a weaker regime facing mounting grievances along ethnic and religious lines and a likely increase in radicalism, the group said. "Meles adroitly navigated a number of internalcrises and kept the different TPLF [Tigrai People's Liberation Front] factions under his tight control", says Emilio Manfredi, ICG's Ethiopia analyst. "Now that he's gone, the weaknesses of the regime that he built are more likely to be exposed, and the repercussions could be felt across the region". ICG said the new government in Ethiopia will most likely be more fragile causing massive impact across the region. Accordingly, increasing internal instability could threaten the country's role as the West's key counter-terrorism ally in the Horn of Africa, putting into question its responsibility to military interventions in neighboring Somalia and Sudan. It could further exacerbate tensions with arch foe Eritrea. Divisions along ethnic and religious groups, could make the political system and society more unstable. Should ethnic and religious extremism grow which possibly would link with other external armed radical Islamic groups, Ethiopia will, without Meles, fight back to control unrest that couldeasily spill beyond its borders. Meles Zenawi's government was under increasing pressure due to intensifying repression of political, social, and ethnic and religious liberties and ICG analysts say that his Tigrean elite could be forced to use more repression to keep control of other ethnic groups. The government has also been accused of stifling press freedom which eventually drove dozens of journalists into exile and gave others lengthy jail terms. His successor, Haile-Mariam Desalegn, is seen as a more moderate figure, but analysts do not expect him to loosen his grip on the press. "There are hard-liners in the [ruling] party and they wield a lot of influence," Mohammed Keita of the Committee to Protect Journaliststold Voice of America. "I don't think Haile-Mariam is a hard-liner, but I'm sure he's under a lot of pressure so I don't know if he'll have a chance to really break with the past." ICG noted a need from the West to extend political, military and development assistance to the opening of political space and an end to repressive measures further stressing the new Ethiopia leadership is shaped to lead an all-inclusive political landscape byconducting fair and free elections. AllAfrica.com (27 August 2012)

Gregory Stanton of Genocide Watch Remembers Meles as a DivisiveLeader' – ESAT News

The President of Genocide Watch, Professor Gregory Stanton, said Meles Zenawi's lasting legacy would be the proliferation of irredentist politics andethnic division. Dr. Stanton pointed this in an exclusive interview he gave to ESAT. The professor didn't mince his words to call Prime Minister just another African dictator. He accused Meles Zenawi of spearheading ethnic politics whereby he empowered his own ethnic group at the expense of the others. In addition to the two decade old tyrannical rule Meles Zenawi has led, the Professor has accused Meles of perpetrating genocide and crimes against humanity in Gambella and Ogadien region of Ethiopia.

Professor Stanton believes political systems built on the personality of dictators like Meles Zenawi are bound to create an environment for viciouspower struggle and strife which leads to a serious peace and security challenges. Dr. Gregory Stanton stated to have known the death of Meles long before it was officially announced by Ethiopian government. Dr.

Gregory Stanton is the founder of and presides over anti genocide non-profit– Genocide Watch– at George Mason University and was the lead prosecutor at the ICC for the trial of the genocide in Cambodia.

Ethiopia: Meles body to move to open air square- THE AFRICA REPORT

The body of Ethiopia's late Prime Minister, Meles Zenawi's body will bemoved to the open air - Meskel Square, to allow Ethiopians to view the body and to express their grief and condolences, as record crowds thronged the presidential palace. Meles' body has been lying in state at the presidential palace but security concerns at the huge crowds thronging there prompted authorities to move the body to an open square. The bodywill lie at Mesquel Square for three days from, Thursday. Meskel Square isa popular venue for big demonstrations, rallies and other national activities and has the potential to accommodate close to a million people. Various halls and tents have been set up at districts level, as the country goes through a time of national mourning and patriotism. Ethiopia's national television, radios and other private radio stations have been broadcasting special programmes since last week. The national television has also been broadcasting live from the palace and providing updates from outside the capital. Musicians and artists have also released various video clips in memory of the late leader. The documentaries show Meles's fight against poverty, as well as development vision for the country.

August 27, 2012

The Death of Africa’s Dictator-Diplomat' The Daily Star of Lebanon’

VIEWS: The recent death in Brussels of Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi finally brings to light what lay behind his mysterious two-month disappearance from public life. Ethiopia’s government had strenuously denied rumors of serious ill health caused by liver cancer. Now that the worst has, indeed, proven true, Ethiopia and all of East Africa will need to learn to live without the stabilizing influence of its great dictator-diplomat.Meles was certainly both. Ethiopia has undergone a remarkable transformation under his strongman rule since 1991, when his Tigrayan minority group from the country’s north came to power with the overthrow of the odious Communist Derg led by Mengistu Haile Mariam (who is still enjoying a comfortable retirement in Robert Mugabe’s Zimbabwe). Initially serving as the president of the first post-Derg government, and then as Ethiopia’s prime minister from 1995 until his death, Meles (his nom de guerre in the revolution) oversaw 7.7 percent annual GDP growth in recent years. Strong economic performance is somewhat surprising, given his party’s interventionist policy approach, but Meles showed himself to be a consummate pragmatist in attracting investment – particularly from China – to drive growth. Meles’ own politicalprovenance as the leader of the Tigrayan People’s Liberation Front was Marxist-Leninist. But when the Cold War ended, so, too, did his dogmatism. To his credit, child mortality was reduced by 40 percent underhis government; Ethiopia’s economy became more diversified, with new industries like car manufacturing, beverages and floriculture; and major infrastructure projects, including Africa’s largest hydroelectric dam, were launched. Once a basket-case associated in the world’s eyes only with famine and drought, Ethiopia has become one of Africa’s largest economies – and without the benefit of gold or oil. Perhaps more important than Meles’ domestic achievements was his diplomatic record.

He was an indispensable ally of the West in the fight against Islamist terrorism, culminating in Ethiopia's military operation in neighboring Somalia in 2006. More recently, Meles coordinated efforts with Kenya to stage limited strikes against the Al-Shabaab militia, which has waged an unrelenting war to turn Somalia into a fundamentalist Islamic theocracy. At the same time, Meles courted China as both an investor and as a hedgeagainst the West's criticism of his human-rights record. And yet he held out a hand of friendship to the breakaway region of Somaliland, before it became fashionable, and went as far as he could short of formal re- recognition of that ray of democratic hope in the Horn of Africa. Meles will be sorely missed in Hargeisa, as he planned to run a Chinese-financed gas pipeline through Somaliland territory from the Ogaden to the coast. More important, Meles put Addis Ababa on the map as the home of the African Union, and as a capital where Africa's worst problems could be discussed in a pragmatic manner, unburdened by colonial grudges. Meles himself became a major diplomatic player, particularly over climate-change policy,and most recently was active in mediating border and natural-resource disputes between Sudan and the newly independent (and oil-rich) South Sudan. He will be remembered for accepting the painful secession of Eritrea in 1993, rather than prolong the civil war, and for his efforts to reach an agreement with Egypt over the use of the Blue Nile waters. The great stain on Meles' record will always be his intolerance of dissent. To besure, his human-rights record was far better than the Derg's. For example, he allowed a private press to flourish, and in 2000 he became the first Ethiopian leader to hold multiparty parliamentary elections.

Moreover, compared to neighboring Eritrea under President Isaias Afewerki or Omar al-Bashir's Sudan, his regime was by no means the worst offender in the region. Nor was there much evidence of personal enrichment or widespread corruption. Nevertheless, following a violently contested parliamentary election in 2005, in which more than 30 parties participated, Meles demonstrated open contempt for democratic pluralism and press freedom, jailing several journalists in recent years. At the same time, he imposed increasingly strict central control on his ethnically and linguistically diverse country. Although nominally governed by "ethnic federalism," where this threatened secession, as in Oromia or the Ogaden,Meles was quick to ignore the constitutional setup. Although he strengthened religious freedom and peaceful coexistence between Muslimsand Christians, the human-rights situation in Ethiopia remained poor. For example, groups like Freedom House and Human Rights Watch have documented widespread official repression of the Oromo people. And yet Meles is irreplaceable – unmatched intellectually as an African leader (he dropped out of medical school to lead the revolution against the Derg, butwent on to teach himself impeccable English and obtain European university degrees by correspondence); and unmatched politically at home, with no obvious successor groomed to replace him. In the Horn of Africa, there is no leader of his stature who could ensure the strong governance the region so desperately needs.

Hailemariam Desalegn, Meles' foreign minister, will take over Ethiopia's government. But there will be considerable concern in the West about the danger of a power vacuum or struggle in a geopolitically vital but fractious country – and justwhen neighboring Somalia is supposed to be undergoing a transition to a new parliament and elected government. For his admirers and critics alike, Meles leaves behind a potent political legacy. He will be remembered as an African leader of historical significance: visionary, despotic and indispensable. Charles Tannock, a member of the European Parliament, is the European Conservatives and Reformists' foreign affairs coordinator and rapporteur for the Horn of Africa at the European Parliament. THE DAILY STAR publishes this commentary in collaboration with Project Syndicate © www.project-syndicate.org By Charles Tannock August 28, 2012

Abune Mekarios of the exiled EOTC Meets Opposition Movements Based inEritrea - ESAT News'

The Arch Bishop of the exiled Ethiopian Orthodox Synod is in Asmara to give blessings and words of encouragement to Ethiopian exile opposition movements who are waging a war against the Ethiopian government. TheArch Bishop will talk to the several armed movements currently operatingfrom inside of Eritrea. The Arch Bishop's recent move typifies the shift in public opinion to bring change in Ethiopia. Growing number of Ethiopians have come to the conclusion that change won't come through peaceful political avenues. The death of Prime Minister Meles and the brewing power struggle has created an opportunity for opposition movements to topple the 21 year old TPLF/EPRDF regime. The information received fromEritrea shows the Arch Bishop is well received and opposition fighters are upbeat.

Charges dropped against critical Ethiopian editor' - (IPI) by Naomi Hunt

The International Press Institute (IPI) on welcomed the news that chargesagainst Ethiopian editor Temesgen Desalegn have been withdrawn, and called for Ethiopia to reform its stance toward the media and free all journalists who are currently in jail for their criticism of official policies, and cease its harassment of Feteh newspaper.Prosecutors sent a letter to the 16th Criminal Bench of the Federal High Court saying that charges against Desalegn had been dropped to allow time to further investigate, the Ethiopian Reporter said. IPI was told that the journalist had been released from Kality Prison. Temesgen Desalegn, editor of the critical weekly newspaper Feteh, was arrested last week just after the death of Prime Minister MelesZenawi was officially announced, according to reports.He was charged with inciting the public to overthrow the constitutional order, defaming the state, and spreading false rumours to incite the publicagainst the government, a legal expert in Ethiopia told IPI. The prosecutorprovided examples of newspaper articles as evidence. Among others, theyincluded articles calling for protests inspired by the Egypt revolution, articles alleging that the government had implemented hateful ethnic policies, and an article alleging that the government had infringed on religious freedom and that Christian and Muslim leaders were ruling partycadres, according to the information provided by the source. Distribution of Feteh was blocked in July, 2012 at the request of the information ministry, sources told IPI at the time, after the paper planned to run frontpage articles speculating on Zenawi's health. The publication was blockedfor a second time one week later and hasn't come outsince then, reports say.

Meles Zenawi's Funeral to Be Held At Holy Trinity Cathedral' (EPA) - AddisAbaba

The funeral of the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi will be held next Sunday at the Holy Trinity Cathedral, the National Funeral Service Organizing Committee announced. Committee chairperson Speaker of the House of Federation Kassa Tekle-Birhan (Sherifo) told that though many people are interested to attend the funeral, it is impossible to accommodate all, and only some would take part on the final day of the ceremony which would be held at the Masqual Square. According to Kassa, only families, leaders and diplomats of different countries, senior government officials, state representatives and groups who are consideredto represent the community such as representatives of the private sector, students, universities, different organizations will only attend the funeral. Identification cards would be prepared to identify groups who would be attending the funeral which would be transmitted live, he added. Kassa said: "Since the arrival of the body, residents of Addis and those from the states are expressing their deepest sorrow at the Grand Palace and at state towns. We have given long time in order to let the people express their sorrow." Kassa added that, the Committee has organized a programme throughout the country to enable citizens pay their tribute to Meles Zenawi. On Thursday and Friday from 5:00 -1:00 p.m. a programme has been organized in which residents of Addis Ababa would gather at Masqual Square to say their final good bye to Meles. Residents of state towns would also do likewise. On these occasions, it is expected the people will reaffirm their commitment to realize what Meles aspired.

And on Saturday based on the request of different religious fathers, a prayer service would be held according to their respective religious doctrine. Kassa further indicated that over twenty heads of states and governments have already confirmed their presence at the funeral and this number is expected to rise. According to reliable sources, it's widely feared that mass funeral attendance might turn into uncontrollable anti- government mayhem. The Ethiopian security chief of the National Intellignce and Security Services (NISS), Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces, and head of the Addis Ababa Police are very concerned that the mass funeral attendance might get exploited by "anti-peace forces" to turn it into "uncontrollable" pandemonium. The Ethiopian Defence Forces solution to such eventuality is to flood Addis Ababa with close to one of it'selite army division's deployment in various part of the capital from the country's north part recently. Snipers are stationed at every available position i.e. on high rising buildings in the city to kill instantly if any suspected person. It is believed that more than a dozen heads of states will attend Meles' funeral and most countries will be represented by their foreign ministers and resident diplomats. If everything goes according to the plan, Addis Abeba – being the second most diplomatic populated capital of the world (over 100 embassies and heads of missions), next to New York will enable the funeral organisers to boost that Meles' funeral will be breaking record for being attended by more heads of states and governments, and diplomats from around the world. There is high risk that comes with such ambitious events i.e., securing the safety of heads of states, delegates and citizens. The organizers are striving to break record held by Egypt's Gamal Abdel Nasser funeral in September, 1971 that was attended by four million outpoured Egyptians and record numberof delegates from around the world.

No Change in Foreign Policy - The Sour Truth Against Devious Schemes' -EPA Editorial (Addis Ababa)

One of the common mistakes frequently made these days is the expectation that, now that H.E. Ato Meles Zenawi has died, Ethiopian foreign policy is about to change. This serious error must be an outcome of the fact that the people who expect this change have no idea of the nature and foundation of the Ethiopian foreign policy and of the way the government pursues this policy. It is clearly indicated in the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia Foreign Affairs and National Security Policy and Strategy document that the country's policy stems out of the most blatant and rudimentary problems that have combatted the nation's very existence for many generations. The first few sentences of the document provide the entire picture thus: "There can be no doubt that theattainment of speedy economic development, democratization and peace is fundamental to the survival of our country which finds itself in a state ofabject poverty and backwardness. That is why the Government gives priority to matters that are key to our survival and well-being. Unless the overall policy direction pursued by the government takes this basic reality into account, our national existence and security will face grave danger." The overall policy direction has it in its focus, among many other things, how best we can address our relation with the outside world. A policy thatis based on one nation's very survival must in essence respect the survivalof other nations. Ethiopians have historically learnt an unforgettable lesson from previous policies which, on the one hand, founded on the 'siege mentality' and, on the other hand, '[disregarded] internal problems that were fundamental to our national condition'. In the former case, our policies sweepingly condemned every neighbor as a potential enemy and prepared citizens for possible violence at any time anywhere. In so doing, they had, in fact, made even a potential friend to be suspicious, and always on its guard against attack. In the latter case, the policies simply neglected, or even trampled upon, internal issues that needed better and more urgent attention or resolution. In both cases, Ethiopia simply reached the point of floundering under the excruciating burden of poverty,famine, war and stagnation. The only thing that can be done, therefore, with regard to our foreign policy--and the national security policy, as it is inseparable--after our great leader's untimely death is nothing but a strengthening of this policy. There are two reasons for this determination,and this is so if we choose not to include a third: the popular desire to leave intact every monument of greatness left behind a greater leader such as Meles Zenawi has always been. First, the foreign affairs policy is intrinsically good and all-accommodating. Thus, who, with the healthiest of minds, can really give up something that is evidently good not just for oneself but also for others? One can simply look at the evidence that is plenty not just in number but in diversity, as well. Ethiopia and Egypt are now good neighbors, working together toward a common goal of making the Nile a source of peace and economic abundance rather than, as many predicted, a cause for war, an instrument of national and regional instability. Those of us who have read and studied the policy and strategy document in its every detail--and contributed to its implementation--knowthat the seed for this fruit was sown several years ago by none other thanthe current Ethiopian government. This is in addition to what Ethiopia has done to its relationship with its other neighbours. What more can one expect from a policy than its strengthening, a policy that has given Ethiopia, Kenya, Sudan, Djibouti and so on all the benefits of friendship and peaceful cooperation, and the sharing of resources? Secondly, Prime Minsiter Meles Zenawi has always been the leader of people who have chosen peace over war, prosperity over poverty, equality over oppression in all its forms, and democracy over authoritarianism. He has also served as the loyal son Ethiopia, as a nation, has longed for, a son-leader who would reach out for the many others who would work toward their country's renaissance. All these facts give meaning to the kind of government that has existed in Ethiopia during the past two decades. Ourleader's death does not, in any way, profess the death of his ideals, as these ideals have always been shared and maintained with similar perseverance. Therefore, expectations have to be reasonable. Those kindsof wishful thinking like that of Al Shabaab, for instance, are a result of unkempt foolishness, at best, and the usual ploy meant to confuse others.Ethiopia has never been against anyone, as an individual or as a group, just because who they are or what they think. Instead, it has reacted against them only when their actions violated or threatened to violate the foundations of its existence. And these are in the policy document. They had better read it, and modify theirs accordingly.

Meles Zenawi - Ruthless Visionary'

OPINION: Repressive and undemocratic, brilliant and determined, Ethiopiaand the Horn of Africa will not see another Meles anytime soon. Meles Zenawi, the late prime minister of Ethiopia, will be much missed as his ever expanding nation (now 85 million and heading to 120 million in 2025) faces a future laced with equal measures of promise and unnerving uncertainty. Meles was among the smartest of sub-Saharan Africa's leaders. Unlike so many of his confreres, he had a strong and broad visionof how Ethiopia, once among the poorest and least educated of Africa's states, could prosper and provide better outcomes for its peoples. Meles also knew that Ethiopia was not yet a nation, only a congeries of people united for a long time under the Amharic monarchy and Amharic Communist despotism and now forcibly glued together and conquered by Meles and his Tigrayan minority. Because Ethiopia is not yet a knitted together nation, with its disparate peoples and their disparate faiths capable of pursuing separatist agendas, Meles believed strongly that he had to be relentlessly centralising in his authoritarianism and forceful in his repression of dissidents while boosting educational opportunity and seeking the kinds of economic growth that would uplift the entire enterprise. For strategic reasons he therefore welcomed Chinese overturesand praised Chinese enterprise and initiative at every turn. He turned to the Chinese to build big dams on the Omo River despite massive local andglobal environmental protests. Ethiopia desperately needs the energy. He was also determined the interrupt the flow of the Blue Nile River with a giant Grand Renaissance Dam despite deep concerns in Egypt and the Sudan. Whether that project will proceed under his successors is not yet known. After Meles: Without Meles and his drive, the Grand Renaissance Dam and dozens of other projects may falter for lack of funding or lack of initiative. Likewise, no-one but Meles could have responded with alacrity when the US and the UN requested troops to keep the warring southern and northern Sudanese apart. His troops are also critically active in pushing back Islamists in Somalia, as they were in 2006 and 2007 at the request of the US. The Horn of Africa will be more fragile and more subject to volatile adventurism without Meles' willingness to try to keep the peace. Militant Islamists in Somalia and perhaps his antagonists in Eritrea might also be emboldened. At home, too, where he rigged two elections and was repressive against his opponents and all non-Tigrayans who refused to toe the official political line, a democratic space may develop. But the Tigrayan generals who fought with him against the Marxist Amhara before 1991 may refuse to tolerate any dissipation of their control. Nor might they and Meles' successors give more room to maneuver to the Oromo, the Galla, Somali, or Muslims who may wish to gain a stronger 'voice' within post-Meles Ethiopia. An intelligent autocrat: When I spoke with Meles a few years ago for several hours in his hideaway office in State House, he was much more forthcoming than the other autocrats in Africa whom have interviewed over the years. He was prepared to entertain hostile questions and to answer them. For example, he attempted persuasively to rationalise the falsification of the 2005 general election in Ethiopia and the subsequent jailing of nearly all of his opponents. He spun (as in "spin doctor") much more effectively than any of his all-powerful peers. Meles also understood that someone like me hada legitimate interest in some of the terrible things that he was doing to hispeople and to those who believed in the democratic process. Yet he never bristled, never cut the interview short. Nor did he, as others might have done, attempt to deflect me onto his undoubted successes - such as the economic development of rapidly growing Ethiopia. Instead, he successfully tried to impress me with his general intelligence, his leadership skills, his ability to see around corners and protect the Horn ofAfrica against malevolence, and his careful balancing of the US and Chinain ways to benefit his regime and his country. Ethiopia will not readily see his like anytime soon. THINK AFRICA PRESS by Robert Rotberg (August 28 2012)

Ethiopia - Army Commits Torture, Rape'

Gambella Atrocities Follow Attack on Commercial Farm; New 'Villagization'Abuses The Ethiopian military responded to an April 2012 attack on a large commercial farm in Gambella region with arbitrary arrests, rape, andother abuses against scores of local villagers, Human Rights Watch said today. Forced displacement, inadequate resources, and other abuses against Gambella's population persist in the second year of the government's "villagization" program, Human Rights Watch said. On April 28, 2012, unidentified armed men attacked the compound of Saudi Star Agricultural Development Plc., a company that has leased thousands of hectares of land for rice farming in Gambella region. The gunmen killed at least one Pakistani and four Ethiopian employees. Gambellaresidents interviewed by Human Rights Watch said that in the following days and weeks, Ethiopian soldiers went house to house looking for the gunmen in villages near the Saudi Star camp, arbitrarily arresting and beating young men and raping female relatives of suspects. "The attack on Saudi Star was a criminal act but it does not justify reprisals against Gambella's population," said LeslieLefkow, deputy Africa director at Human Rights Watch. "The Ethiopian government should put an immediate end to abuses by the military in the region and investigate and prosecute soldiersfound responsible for these heinous acts, regardless of rank." Human Rights Watch has previously reported on the Ethiopian government's policy of "villagization" or resettlement of Gambella residents from their traditional lands to clear the way for the commercial farms. The government has used threats, intimidation, and violence against those who resist moving. Hundreds of villagers from Abobo woreda(district) fled the military operation and crossed into neighboring South Sudan in the months since the attack on Saudi Star. In June Human Rights Watch interviewed more than 80 recent arrivals from Gambellain South Sudan.

Witnesses described to Human Rights Watch the military's human rights abuses against people in the vicinity of Saudi Star. The day after the Saudi Star attack, Ethiopian soldiers shot and killed four of the company'sAnuak guards, accusing them of complicity in the attack. In April and MayEthiopian security forces entered the five villages closest to the Saudi Starcompound in Abobo woreda, rounded up scores of young men and detained them in military barracks in Gambella. Many alleged that they were tortured. One former detainee told Human Rights Watch: "They saidwe were to go into the bush and show them where the rebels are – with whom they claimed we had a relationship. They beat me after I said I didn't know where the rebels are. After they beat me they took me to the barracks. I was in custody for three days. At night they took me out and asked me to show them where the rebels are. I said I don't know. So theybeat me and took off their sock and put it in my mouth to stop the screams." Human Rights Watch (HRW) 28 August, 2012: Ethiopia: Official Information Shrouded in Secrecy?

This was not the first time that Ethiopian officials had hidden important information from the public. Are Ethiopians the most secretive people in the world? The Polish journalist Rysard Kapuscinski once declared "Ethiopians are the most secretive people on Earth", as highlighted by journalist and blogger Graham Peebles: Ethiopians are notoriously secretive and distrustful, the great Polish journalist Rysard Kapuscinski in his classic work 'The Emperor', regarding the reign of the last Ethiopian Emperor, Haile Selasie and his inner circle, states "the Ethiopians are deeply distrustful and found it hard to believe in the sincerity of my intentions," elsewhere he goes further claiming that Ethiopians are the most "secretive people on Earth." Having lived in Addis Ababa and workedwith Ethiopians for a number of years, my experience certainly bears out Kapuscinski's comments reinforced by René Lefort, author of 'Ethiopia. Anheretical revolution?' when he states "given the history of Ethiopia, where secrecy is a cardinal virtue". Emperor Haile Selasie even tried to hide the 1973 famine, continued Peebles: An even earlier example of Ethopia's need for secrecy dates from the early 1900's when Emperor Menelik II's death was hidden from the public for years. When he died in December 1913, there was no public announcement officially confirming his death and burial: Another example of the secretive/duplicitous tendency of the Ethiopian people, creating a false or misleading image was the way Emperor Menelik II death in December 1913 was kept quiet. The death of Menelik II was hidden for over couple of years. He died and was buried without any public announcements after suffering a stroke and being unable to govern for several years. And this for and of a man regarded by many as the last true Emperor. As well as the Prime Minister, another prominent Ethiopian figurehead also died recently. Abune Paulos, the headof the Ethiopian Orthodox church died on 16 August, 2012. However, his death was announced immediately, although the public still does not knowthe cause and who is going to replace him. Global Voices Opinion (29 August, 2012)

The African Union (AU) organises Cermony to Pay Tribute to Late PrimeMinister Meles Zenawi'

The flag of the African Union is flying at half mast at its headquarters in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, following the death last week of the Prime Ministerof the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia Mr. Meles Zenawi. On this sad occasion, the African Union is organizing on Friday 31st August 2012 at its Headquarters, a ceremony to pay tribute to the latePrime Minister Meles Zenawi. The ceremony will bring together high officials and staff of the African Union Commission, Members of the Permanent Representatives Committee (PRC), representatives of the diplomatic corps, the United Nations agencies, and international communities based in Addis Ababa, as well as the Ethiopian Government. The program of theceremony will feature among others: the observation of a minute of silence; statement by the Chairperson of the AUC; tribute by the Chairperson of the PRC; tribute by the president of the AU Staff Association; sermon by a church minister and a video clip on the late Prime Minister focusing on his activities as an active player and spokesperson of the African Union in presenting the African common position in various world issues. There will be a word of thanks by a representative of the Ethiopian Government to crown the occasion. Worthrecalling that in his message of condolence addressed to the Governmentof the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia, on 21 August 2012, the Chairperson of the Commission of the African Union (AUC), Dr. Jean Ping,underlined the important role played by the late Prime Minister in the advancement of the objectives of the AU and the promotion of Africa's interests in global fora. “The death of Prime Minister Meles has robbed Africa of one of its greatest sons,” he underscored. African Press Organization (APO) (August 29, 2012)

Orderly transition in Ethiopia, business ties with India to grow: Envoy'

There will be orderly transition in Ethiopia despite the the death of its long-time leader Meles Zenawi, the country's envoy has said, and assured that robust business ties between India and the East African nation - Indiais the second largest foreign investor there - will continue and get even stronger. "In the last 21 years, Ethiopia has built strong institutions and arobust parliamentary system. There is an orderly succession plan in place,whereby the deputy prime minister will succeed the deceased leader," Ethiopia's Ambassador to India Gennet Zewide told IANS in an interview here. Rejecting speculation of a coup in some sections in the Western media, the envoy said emphatically: "In our system, the military will always be subservient to parliament and the civilian government. This is not going to change." Zenawi, 57, was Ethiopia's prime minister for 21 years till he died of illness Aug 20. He is widely credited for shepherding the transformation of Ethiopia, once known for famine, disease and poverty, into one of the fastest growing economies and a stable democracy in the Horn of Africa. Ethiopia's acting Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn will be sworn in after Zenawi's funeral Sunday. He will run the country till elections in 2015. Striking an upbeat note on the future of India-Ethiopia ties, Zewide said the strong foundations laid by Zenawi, who visited India four times, will only get stronger in days to come. "The prime minister (Zenawi) had a special affection for India.

During his tenure, India-Ethiopia relations scaled new heights. The new leadership is equally committed to deepening this strategic relationship,"

Zewide said. "The policies, strategies and vision of our leader will be continued. There is no uncertainty and there should be no anxiety on this front. Business will go on as usual," she added. The envoy identified agriculture, textile, infrastructure and technology as key sectors where Indian investments in Ethiopia will see a major upsurge. "We expect moreIndian companies to invest in agriculture. To make it easier for investors, the Ethiopian government has embarked on a new policy whereby we clear land, build access roads and provide power so that investors can start their operations as quickly as possible." In the last few years, India has emerged as the second-largest foreign investor in Ethiopia, investing around $5 billion. Bilateral trade between India and Ethiopia is estimated to be $660 million. The two countries are looking to scale up Indian investments in Ethiopia to $10 billion by 2015. Amid accusations of land grabbing by India, the envoy quoted Zenawi, who was fond of saying thatIndians don't come to colonise but to help develop the nation. In the textile sector, she pointed out that a host of Indian companies were planning major investments to set up yarn factories in Ethiopia. In a condolence message, Prime Minister Manmohan Singh said India's close and friendly relations with Ethiopia acquired greater substance under Zenawi's leadership. Minister of State for External Affairs Preneet Kaur willrepresent India at the Sep 2 state funeral of Zenawi. Daily News India (August 30, 2012)

Yes! I am happy for the death of Ethiopian dictator Meles Zenawi, becauseit's good for Ethiopia’s political future’ Guebre-Medhin Araya a former TPLFrebel and insider (ex-head of TPLF Finance) says,” I am happy to see the death of Ethiopian dictator Meles Zenawi, because it's good for Ethiopia’s political future’ Guebre-Medhin Araya, one of Tigrai Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF) veterans is known for his sharp critic to the late prime minister and his party’s heinous crimes since takeover of power. (30th August, 2012)

Gold mining promises big boost for Ethiopia's development'

OPINION: Exploiting Ethiopia's gold reserves should increase exports and diversify the economy – if the industry is properly regulated. A recent survey increased estimates of gold resources to 500 tonnes. The government says production could rise to 40 tonnes a year from just over four tonnes last year, earning the country around $1.7bn (£1.1bn) at current prices. This could dramatically boost development and reduce dependency on imports. In the meantime, the mining sector is forecast to increase exports and earn foreign currency. The largest gold mine in Ethiopia is Lega Dembi in the Sidamo province of southern Ethiopia. It wastransferred from the government to a company called Midroc Gold, owned by billionaire Saudi businessman Mohammed Hussein al-Amoudi, for billionaire and the government has attracted fierce criticism from government opponents. After gold, tantalum is the next most sought aftermineral in Ethiopia. Chinese firms are eyeing a deal with a state-owned company that claims it is the world's sixth-largest producer. Up to 80% of this precious metal is sold for use in the production of transistors for Chinese-assembled mobile phones, cameras and computers. Ethiopia has licensed 250 foreign firms, from countries including China, South Africa, the UK, the US and Canada, to prospect for minerals. Investment in the sector reached $1bn in 2009, according to official figures. An overstretched mines ministry is not accepting any further licence applications while it deals with assessing existing applicants and monitoring investments. Companies are now required to include an environmental and social impact assessment in their applications. A recent paper by the African Development Bank said a large number of resource- rich African countries are seeing little benefit from their mineral wealth. It also said some have not been accruing maximum benefit due to cushy deals for corporations. However, this could change if new legislation focusing on regulating the excesses of transnational mining companies hasthe desired effect. Ethiopia is planning to sign up to Publish What You Pay.The international initiative, subscribed to by more than 70 countries, holds governments accountable for the management of revenues from the oil, gas and mining industries. Once fully signed up, Ethiopia will be expected to divulge all company payments and govern ent revenues from its extractive industries. "We want the mining industry to be for the people and not just for big business," says Tolesa. "We have to be concerned about our community, our environment and the industry'scontribution to the development of our nation. The Ethiopian Mining Proclamation states that the government requests 5% free equity shares with every licensed mining company operating in the country, as well as 35% income tax and 8% royalties. As well as more money to plough into development policies. by opening up the mineral wealth to foreign investment Ethiopians could benefit from improved infrastructure, such asroads and greater employment opportunities. Investors see Ethiopia as a stable, investor-friendly country in the volatile Horn of Africa. Under Melesit attracted significant overseas investment – particularly from China – to help drive growth. Whether it will be business as usual in Ethiopia under Meles's successor, Hailemariam Desalegn, will be interesting to watch. As Nyota's Chase says: "Ethiopia is undoubtedly a frontier for exploration in Africa." News Global Development by Matthew Newsome (30 August, 2012)

$172m in 1997. In 2010, Midroc began its second gold mining operation inSakaro, near Lega Dembi. Amoudi has also made huge investments in Ethiopian agriculture, cement and transport. The relationship between the

The Ethio-Saudi billionaire Shekh Mohammed Hussein Al-Amoudi arrives inAddis Ababa Airport expresses his deep condolence over the death of PM Meles Zenawi’ When he was asked how he felt over the death of the PM, he replies "I lost my right hand", and he simply walked away in deep sorrow. According to US Embassy, Addis Ababa & the WikiLeakes cable MIDROC-Ethiopia owned by the wealthy Sheikh was accused by residents of Shakisso town in Oromia, southern Ethiopia for releasing toxic chemicals into the nearby river, causing illness to people and animals inthe area. EthiopiaFirst blog (August 30 , 2012)

Death of an autocrat’ What comes next for Ethiopia?

OPINION: The death of Meles Zenawi, under whom Ethiopia made strides despite repression, highlights the need for strong democratic institutions to maintain stability. Prime Minister Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia, who died last week after a long illness, liked to portray his country's leadership as collective. But there was never any doubt about who was in charge. As dictators go, he had much going for him. Stunningly smart, strategic, practical, he cared about his country and, by all appearances, resisted the kind of graft and corruption that has plagued many African nations. Duringhis rule, Ethiopia's economy expanded significantly, and he played an important role in the wider region. But Meles' death points up the limitations of autocratic rule. Because he failed to establish the rule of law and set up strong democratic institutions, Ethiopia is likely to face a periodof uncertainty, and possibly one of serious upheaval. The odds of finding another strongman of comparable skill are remote. I had two lengthy meetings with Meles before he took ill. In neither case did I mince words about the increasing severity of his repression: the thousands of political prisoners, the widespread torture, the counterinsurgency atrocities, the suppression of independent journalists and nongovernmental groups. He seemed to enjoy the opportunity to spar, as if tired of the sycophants surrounding him. During the first meeting, in his office in Addis Ababa, he was accompanied by a single aide who left halfway through the meeting.

At the second, during a conference in Munich, he summoned me to his hotel suite while his aides waited outside. Meles was not one to need helpmanaging difficult subjects. When I fired questions at him, he answered quickly and decisively, never conceding a point but always remaining calm: Why was he blocking foreign funding for civil-society groups?

Because they should rely on domestic support the way his student group did during his university days, and besides, the activists were just lookingto get rich. Why did he accept massive international aid to the government but refuse to allow international aid to Ethiopian nongovernmental groups? Because the government could stand up to foreign manipulation while private organizations wouldn't be able to. If Meles wasn't corrupt in the traditional sense — no fancy cars, Swiss bank accounts or foreign villas — he did have ways of rewarding the faithful. Asa detailed on-site Human Rights Watch investigation showed, the ruling party tended to steer donor-supplied benefits such as seeds and fertilizer to party supporters while punishing opponents by withholding services.

Meles told me he opposed this manipulation, but he refused to announce his opposition publicly so local officials could hear it. "We have other waysto communicate," he told me, but his government didn't stop the practice.International donors were complicit in this sleight of hand. U.S. officials and their European counterparts dismissed or ignored what they didn't want to see. They prized the "stability" that Meles promised. He helped to negotiate peace in Sudan and sent peacekeepers, aided counter-terrorism efforts in Somalia and, though ruthlessly, kept the lid on Ethiopia's multiethnic society. So rather than send investigators to the field the way Human Rights Watch did, Western donors commissioned a "desk study," which concluded from a distance that donor safeguards were sufficient to prevent such manipulation from happening, so it must not have occurred. Aid continued to flow without reprimand. Donor nations found Ethiopia attractive because, even if the aid was used as a political weapon, it was delivered to at least some people in need. Moreover, highlighting Meles' repression might undermine support at home for large aid budgets, so thedonor agencies kept quiet. Even Meles' economic success wasn't without its troubling aspects. Another Human Rights Watch study found that, in the name of development, the government forced some 70,000 farmers and pastoralists off their land into under-serviced villages while agribusiness investors waited in the wings. Local protests might have yielded fairer treatment of the displaced, but government repression madethat impossible. One problem with investing in an autocrat is the lack of a Plan B. The fate of Africa's second-most populous country, more ethnicallydivided than ever before, with a crushed civil society and stillborn democratic aspirations, now rests with interim Prime Minister HailemariamDesalegn, who served as deputy prime minister and minister of foreign affairs under Meles. He is expected to hold the reins until elections in 2015, but behind the scenes powerful figures will be jockeying for ascendancy. The new leadership may be tempted to employ even more brutal measures to suppress dissent, most recently, protests by Muslims. Without Meles' smooth facade, Western donors will have a harder time ignoring that grim reality. Better late than never; it is time for the international community to insist on respect for the basic rights that it never should have abandoned in the first place. Kenneth Roth is executivedirector at Human Rights Watch (HRW). Los Angeles Times by Kenneth Roth (31 August, 2012)

Ethiopian man suspected of murdering 101 caught hiding in Denver,Colorado'

A man with several aliases who was convicted of killing 101 and torturing many others in his native Ethiopia was hiding out in Denver, according to authorities. Referring to the man as Kefelegn Alemu Worku, Homeland Security Investigators and Immigration Customs Enforcement officers saidothers may have known the Ethiopian by a number of names, including Habteab Berhe Temanu or Tufa. Federal authorities said they now know Worku stole an identity to gain U.S. citizenship and to put a past life behind him — one in which he was a high-ranking member of a political party that killed at least 10,000 people in Ethiopia. Worku was living in anapartment at 8861 East Florida Avenue when he was arrested on Aug. 24.Federal agents were tipped off about Worku’s location by an informant who is also a native of Ethiopia and was an inmate at a prison where Worku worked in the 1970s. According to the indictment, Worku stole an identity that he used to forge his U.S. citizenship application. If convicted on charges of unlawful procurement of citizenship and aggravated identitytheft, he could face 10 years in prison. It is not clear if Worku would be deported back to Ethiopia, where he could potentially face charges of a much more serious variety. But deportment does not appear to be out of the question. "Homeland Security Investigations will not allow international human rights violator fugitives to seek safe haven in the United States," Denver Special Agent Kumar Kibble said. "In addition to investigating these fugitives, HSI also works to strip the U.S. citizenship from these individuals who fraudulently obtained it." Federal authorities say Worku was a high-ranking prison guard under former Ethiopian President Mengistu Haile Mariam. Worku is believed to have been working at the "Higher 15," a prison with the capacity for 1,500 inmates where political prisoners were often held. During 1977 — just one year of Mengistu's two-year reign, a time often referred to as the "Red Terror" — at least 10,000 people were killed in the Ethiopian city of Addis Ababa.

The federal informant told authorities he saw Worku personally torture prisoners in 1977 and later learned that many of those prisoners were being executed at Worku's hand. After digging further, federal authoritiessaid they spoke with two more Ethiopian refugees who are now naturalized U.S. citizens — both of whom also identified Worku and said they were personally beaten and tortured by him. Investigators also said they found a news story that indicates a prison guard named Kefelegn Alemu was sentenced to death for his role in the execution of 101 people.The story did not include last names, which is typical in Ethiopia, according to authorities. Worku is scheduled to appear for a hearing in federal court on September 4, 2012. FOX31 DENVER by Will C. Holden (August 31, 2012)

Oakland's Ethiopians divided over Prime Minister's legacy'

On a table by the door in Addis Restaurant on Oakland's Telegraph Avenue, a tall stack of solemn invitations sits amid piles of business cards advertising nearby Ethiopian-owned beauty salons, photography studios and computer repair services. "All Ethiopians and friends of Ethiopians who live in the Bay Area are invited to join us for the memorial service in Honor of the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi," the invitations read. Meles(Ethiopians are formally referred to by their first names) died August 20, at the age of 57, of an undisclosed illness. The Bay Area will host two memorial services on Sunday – in Oakland at the Jack London Aquatic Center, and in San Jose at the Masonic Temple. Nunu Kidane, Director of Priority Africa Network, a Bay Area-focused organization that serves thoseof African decent, estimates that between 20-25,000 Ethiopians live in theBay Area. "Most Ethiopians in the Bay Area would have heard about Meles'death by text message," she says. "I received seven texts about it myself." Biniam Girma, a volunteer at the Ethiopian Community and Cultural Center, said he first heard of Meles' death online. "I was following the announcements on the Voice of America Amharic website and also on ETV,'' he said, referring to Ethiopian Television, Ethiopia's state broadcaster. Many in the Ethiopian diaspora are likely to watch ETV's live coverage of Meles' funeral online and via satellite, broadcast from Addis Ababa on Sunday. Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi died August 20,at the age of 57, of an undisclosed illness. The SanFrancisco Gate (August31, 2012)

Human-Rights Progress Unlikely in Ethiopia'

OPINION: Rod McCullom writes in a piece for Ebony that the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi means little for the future of the African nationUnited Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon echoed these remarks, adding that Meles will be remembered for "exceptional leadership."None of these statements mentioned that Meles leaves a troubled record on human rights. Meles ushered in "a sharp deteriorationin civil and political rights, with mounting restrictions on freedom of expression, association, and assembly," reports Human Rights Watch.

Others were far less charitable and applauded the death of the man they described as a "blood-sucking ... genocidal terrorist tyrant." eles seized power in 1991 from a military junta that had achieved global infamy for policies that contributed to the famine, starvation and death of more thana million people. As many as 500,000 people alone were killed during Mengistu Haile Mariam's violent political campaign known as the "Red Terror" of the late 1970s. This was after the despotic 44-year-rule of Emperor Haile Selassie that Mengistu overthrew in September, 1974.

Read Rod McCullom's entire piece at www. ebony.com The Root aims tofoster and advance conversations about issues relevant to the black Diaspora by presenting a variety of opinions from all perspectives, whether or not those opinions are shared by our editorial staff. The Rootby Rod McCullom

In Ethiopia, a nation comes to bury Meles – and to praise him'

Ahead of the funeral Sunday of Ethiopian strongman Meles Zenawi, many Ethiopians are proudly assessing his abilities and the changes instigated. Less spoken of – at least publicly – is the intimidation of his opponents and nervousness about the future. People hold a picture of late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, during a candlelight memorial for him at Meskel Square in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, Friday, August 31. Tens of thousands turned out for the second of three days of planned commemorative ceremonies. Over the past week, in near silence, two endless columns of Ethiopians draped in black have shuffled through the grounds of the national palace before pausing beneath a coffin covered by the flag and breaking into wails and sobs. The masses in Africa's second-most populous nation are coming to mourn and pay respect to former Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, the nation's formidable leader of 21 years who diedof illness on August 20. Admiration for the man and his achievements is overwhelming. A former rebel who stepped up to govern after helping defeat a military junta, Meles Zenawi had an influence on contemporaryEthiopia that is hard to overstate. The Christian Science Monitor by William Davison, (September 1, 2012)

Meles Zenawi enters history lionised as Ethiopian hero'

OPINION: Ethiopia has had a long line of leaders dying in secret, hidden behind closed doors, but not a long history of funerals.In 1913, one of Ethiopia's most renowned emperors, Menelik II, died. His death remained a secret until 1916 when officials finally announced that he had succumbed to a stroke years earlier. Haile Selassie, Ethiopia's last emperor, officially died of natural causes in 1975, but is widely believed tohave been murdered by the brutal regime of Colonel Mengistu Hailemariam, suffocated and buried under a toilet. Last month, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi died of an unknown illness after a mysterious, two month-long disappearance from public view, and will be buried on Sunday in the first state funeral for a leader in over 80 years.

The cloud of secrecy and gossip that has surrounded the deaths of severalEthiopian leaders stems from a desire to ensure a stable succession, according to analysts. "If the death is announced there is the fear that it can provoke a lot of trouble because different people can ask for the throne," said Estelle Sohier from the University of Geneva, author of a book on Menelik. "To hide a death of a leader is a way to spare time, to save time, to settle the succession," added Sohier. Though Meles' death was announced hours after he died in a Brussels hospital, the secrecy surrounding his illness led some to question whether the government wasgetting its house in order to ensure a smooth transition. Days after Meles died, the government confirmed that deputy Prime Minister Haile-Mariam Desallegn will take over power until national elections in May, 2015.

Author Michela Wrong said this pattern of secrecy is common following thesudden deaths of leaders throughout Africa, not only in Ethiopia. "The ruling elite is motivated by the desire to maintain the status quo, from which it benefits. It wants stability," she said. Sohier draws parallels between the death of Menelik whose successor was disputed among the royal family, and the death of Meles, whose clear successor was not known until the government confirmed Hailemariam's takeover. Ethiopia's constitution states the deputy will take over in the absence of the prime minister, but does not specify what happens in the case of the leader's death. Meles will be given a state funeral on Sunday, the first offered to a reigning head of state since the death of Empress Zawditu in 1930. "This is the first time for 82 years that Ethiopians have had an opportunity to show what they think about their ruler," said Patrick Gilkes, an Ethiopia- based historian and author of "The Dying Lion," which examines feudalismin Ethiopia. The gesture solidifies his memory in national history, pointing also to the fact that Ethiopians have not had a chance to mourn the loss ofa leader in nearly a century following a series of rocky regime changes, observers say. No public mourning was staged after Haile Selassie's death while Mengistu, who was deposed by Meles in 1991, is still alive in exile inZimbabwe. Immediately after Haile Selassie died, many people in Addis were "very sad" said Ethiopian journalist Tsegaye Tadesse, 78, who was inAddis Ababa at the time, but Mengistu's regime did not permit a public funeral. "There was an outpouring of grief, yes, but it was limited," he said. Haile Selassie's remains were exhumed in 1992 and a public funeral was held though the government did not hold a state funeral for the late emperor, who was buried in Addis Ababa's Trinity Cathedral, where Meles too will be buried. The decision to bury the former Marxist leader in the same cathedral as Haile Selassie, deceased patriarchs of Ethiopia's Orthodox Church and war martyrs, suggests that authorities want Meles remembered as a national hero. "Eulogising late leaders, while glossing over their very obvious faults, is something you see across the world," Wrong added. "The leaders who were being vilified up until a moment agosuddenly take on a new, golden aura." Meles, while credited with widespread economic growth was also chided by critics for his human rights record. But Tsegaye said Meles deserves a place in history among Ethiopia's finest for the development he brought to Ethiopia. " "We have got top leaders like Menelik II, Haile Selassie I, but Meles, he is in my opinion even better than the others," he said. Ethiomedia: By Jenny Vaughan, AFP September 1, 2012:

Newly established Ethiopian National Transitional Council requests US, EUdiplomatic recognition'
The newly established Ethiopian National Transitional Council (ENTC) hassought diplomatic recognition from US and European countries. The civicorganization was formed last July following a three-day conference in Dallas, Texas, in the presence of participants and representatives from over 30 cities and countries. The transitional council aims to mobilize Ethiopians across the word to unite in the movement against what it described was “a standing dictatorship in Ethiopia”. The unity council ultimately plans the overthrow of the current government of prime minister Meles Zenawi, which has been ruling the horn of Africa nation since a coup in 1991. The group has sent a communiqué to Carl Bildt, Foreign Affairs Minister of Sweden. The letter was submitted to the Sweden foreign minister by ENTC’s diplomatic representative in Stockholm, Aba Biya Ketema Wara Badi. ENTC has also sent similar requests to the government of the United States, Australia and other governments of European countries. “The letter explains ENTC’s mission,and discusses the worsening political, economic and security crises in Ethiopia, as well as the need for the Sweden government to help with a peaceful transition to democracy” ENTC said.
Markatos cried foul for parading in front of the casket of Meles Zenawi saidNo Thank You!’

Editors Diaries: Ethiopian authorities have disputed with merchants in Ethiopia's largest open Market, commonly known as Markato when they attempted to force the merchants to pay tribute to the coffin containing the remains of the late Ethiopian Prime Minster Meles Zenawi. The coffin containing the remains of the late Prime Minister is being visited at where it is temporarily kept at, the National Palace hallway. He is set to be buried the next day. One merchant who was at the scene told “We were doing business as usual in the morning but in the afternoon, district and city officials of the regime came and asked us to come together and pay tribute to the remains of the Meles Zenawi. When we refused to do as we were all busy working, they forced us to close shops and join the march tothe Palace. After some squabble, most of us closed our shops earlier than usual and headed to our homes. The squabble was non-violent and lasted for a while. According to the businessman, some of the merchants had already been to the Palace to pay tributes individually or with other groupsand the rest didn't want to visit the remain at all. (September 1, 2012)

Inglorious End of a Brutal Dictator’

Views : The late dictator’s funeral scaled down because of security concerns’ The late Ethiopian dictator Meles Zenawi’s funeral Sunday has been scaled down because of security threats, according to sources in Addis Ababa. The gathering for the funeral at the Addis Ababa Holy TrinityCathedral has also been reduced to a small number of foreign dignitaries and senior members of the ruling party, while the people are being ordered to go to the various communal tents that has been set up throughout Addis Ababa and watch the ceremony on live TV. The number of people coming from other regions of Ethiopia for the funeral has also beenreduced to 200 per region. The main fear for that is a public riot could break out if there is a large crowd and things could easily get out of hand.

Egypt wanted to attack Ethiopia dam, reveals Wikileaks’

Bikyamasr: CAIRO (September 6, 2012) Egypt has long feared its lion’s share of Nile River water could be threatened by Ethiopia’s construction ofits Renaissance Dam project, the pinnacle of late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi’s efforts to give the East African country more sway over issues pertaining to the world’s largest river. In documents revealed by the whistleblower website Wikileaks, the Egyptian and Sudanese government appeared ready to develop a launching pad for an attack by Egypt againstthe dam. Wikileaks has leaked files allegedly from the Texas-based global intelligence company, Stratfor, which quote an anonymous “high-level Egyptian source,” which reported that the Egyptian ambassador to Lebanon said in 2010 that Egypt “would do anything to prevent the secession of South Sudan because of the political implications it will havefor Egypt’s access to the Nile.” Ethiopia’s massive dam project has seen much concern from Cairo and Khartoum, who fear the establishment of Africa's largest dam would affect previous colonial deals on Nile water- sharing. It is to be built some 40 kilometers upstream from Sudan on theBlue Nile. But even before the official announcement of Ethiopia's prime minister's passing on August 20, Egyptian officials told Bikyamasr.com that they believed a post-Meles region could bring forth new negotiationsand compromise over Nile water. An Egyptian ministry of water and irrigation told Bikyamasr.com last month, two weeks before Zenawi was pronounced dead, that with the combination of Egypt's new President Mohamed Morsi and the potential of seeing a new leader in Ethiopia, theyhoped the tension over Nile River water could be resolved.

"While this can in no way be official policy at this point, I believe that there would be more maneuvering with a new leadership in Ethiopia because there would be the ability to communicate and not be seen as antagonistic," the official said, adding that they were not authorized to speak to the media. "Let us be frank about the situation between Egypt and other Nile countries," the official continued. "We in Egypt have not been the best at compromise so I think overall, there is so much that canbe done to help bring countries together, and Ethiopia has been a leader in its criticism of Egypt so starting there would be good." With the Nile comes a new set of issues, and with Egypt holding onto a lion's share of water from the world's largest river, upstream countries such as Ethiopia have taken it on their own to begin building dams and other water relatedendeavors, much to the anger of Cairo. However, officials hope that solutions can be had in the new post-revolution Egypt that could see the growing tension between countries along the Nile reduce. "While Egypt never wants to mingle in another country's affairs, a new leadership in Ethiopia would go a long way to changing how things are run, just like it has in Egypt," the official added.

The cause of Meles Zenawi's death and its import'

News Analysis: In the absence of a legitimate autopsy report, a death certificate or a credible official statement relating to the reason behind thehospitalization and eventual death of the former ruler of one of the most populous countries in Africa, there are compelling medical and circumstantial arguments to suggest that the episode of May 18, 2012, in which the valiant Abebe Gellaw confronted Zenawi, might have played a major role in accelerating the demise of the dictator. Prior to August 21, 2012, when the TPLF cadres that are currently terrorizing the country announced his death, Zenawi had not been seen in public for several weeks, and there had only been conflicting reports about his conditions orwhereabouts issued by the Woyanne propaganda machinery. Nonetheless,there were several pieces of circumstantial evidence that indicated the deteriorating condition of Zenawi's health in the aftermath of the May18th encounter with Abebe Gellaw. Most notably, immediately after the confrontation, Zenawi reportedly failed to attend a function at the

Ethiopian Embassy in Washington, D.C., that was organized to express gratitude to his followers in the Diaspora. A few weeks later, he was seen as a ghost-like creature during his meeting with Chinese officials at the G20 summit in Los Cabos, Mexico. The final confirmation of his ailment later came when he failed to attend an African Union summit in Addis Ababa in July. While there is no conclusive medical evidence to indicate that shock can actually kill a person, there is ample literature to surmise that it can impact the cardiovascular system, and thereby exacerbate a deteriorating or compromised condition leading to death. In the medical literature, fear and stress are known to cause substantial biochemical conflicts between the sympathetic and para- sympathetic responses when a person is faced with an imminent danger, the so-called fight-or-flight phenomenon. In particular, shock, as an extreme stress reaction, ensues when the stress level is so high that the endocrine and nervous systems are unable to cope with the circumstance. People who have underlying health problems may, therefore, experience fatalities as a result of the exacerbation of these conditions. In their book, Gleitman et al. (2004) report that, in the face of extreme stress, catecholamine hormones, such as adrenaline, trigger physical reactions, including acceleration of heart and lung action, constriction of blood vessels, and shaking. For someone with cardiovascular problems, a huge release of catecholamines can lead to instant or eventual death. Some of the above events were, of course, observed in Zenawi's reaction to the unexpected challenge by Gellaw. In one of his weekly commentaries, Alemayehu G. Mariam poetically captured the moment as follows: "…. For seven seconds, the mighty Zenawi zoned out into a catatonic trance like the patrons of opium dens. For a fleeting moment, he seemed almost comatose. His head was bowed,his back hunched, his chin drooped, his lips quivered and his eyes gazed vacantly at the floor just like the criminal defendant who got handed a lifesentence or worse. A close-up video showed him breathing heavily, almostsemi-hyperventilating. His pectoral muscles heaved spastically under his shirt. An imminent cardiac event?" For a dictator who, distrusting the people he ruled with an iron fist, had insulated himself with one of the most skilled and highly armed protective security details in the world; for a dictator who, out fear and insecurity, had never interacted or mingled with the people that he had so despised, mocked and disparaged during his two decades of tyranny; the sudden outburst of such dreaded phrases as "Meles Zenawi is a dictator!" in that world forum was a shocking experience that his frail body had not been accustomed to or able to withstand. Although the secretive TPLF ruling party never revealed the general health condition of the dictator while he was in office, rumors did abound about his poor health resulting from a slapdash life-style, including smoking, drinking and other substance abuse – all risk factors for cardiovascular and oncological complications. In view of the indirect association of death and shock in a compromised person, and given the poor state of Zenawi's health prior to the event, it is not beyond the realmof possibilities to surmise that the May 18th confrontation might have contributed to his death. If Abebe Gellaw's heroic action had a role in the death of the dictator, then it would explain in part why the TPLF cadres kept the condition of the late dictator and the bona fide cause of his deatha highly guarded secret. Manifestly, any suggestion that the event of May 18th contributed to the demise of the dictator would hearten others to follow suit and challenge the repressive rule of the TPLF. Most importantly,if there was the perspicacity that one person could contribute in a momentous way to bring down a vicious dictator, despite his ostensibly impenetrable security details, the millions of oppressed citizens would be emboldened and an organized mass uprising would be inevitable to end the monopoly enjoyed by the minority thugs on the nation's political and military power structure and scarce resources. The North Korean style funeral ceremony and the idolization of the deceased is also part of an overall orchestrated stratagem to demonstrate spurious invincibility and tothwart any semblance of vulnerability. The attempt to paint a larger-than-life picture of the deceased despot, and the much advertized claim that hewas a respected leader in the world forum is, of course, at variance with the low esteem in which the despot was held by world leaders in private conversations. As revealed in the United States diplomatic cables leak, he was in fact a light weight in the eyes of diplomats and heads of states.

Contrary to the myth propagated by his henchmen, in the opinion of German Chancellor Angela Merkel, for example, he was an "economic illiterate", while in the assessment of George W. Bush he was nothing more than "an errand boy". What the TPLF cadres are doing in his death validates what Former US ambassador Donald Yamamoto observed when the dictator was alive: a "democratic deficit" example, and someone "begging to get world attention to have his ideologies acceptable." [3] Thedeath of the dictator a short while after his encounter with Abebe Gellaw may serve both as a metaphor and as a template for the demise of tyranny in Ethiopia. Authoritarianism inherently is an aberration in human society, and hence a sick political system. So, as in the case of Zenawi, a major shock could unavoidably trigger the collapse of the system, as has been recently observed in the Middle East and other regions ruled by tyrants. This shock could come in the form of popular uprisings, concertedresistance by the people, organized lobbying by the Diaspora to cut the supply line of foreign aid, or internal fractures spearheaded by pro- democratic factions. The only way out of this predicament for TPLF rulers is to recognize and respect the will of the people to live in freedom and liberty. In the short term, they should open up the political space and invite all opposition leaders for a genuine dialog to chart a framework for a democratic Ethiopia in which individual rights will be unconditionally respected, and all citizens will have equal opportunities in the pursuit of happiness and determination of the government of their choice. If the TPLF insists in propagating the failed autocratic, ethnic-based and corrupt policies of the late dictator, then all freedom loving Ethiopians back home and in the Diaspora should rise in unity and give the aberrant system a shock from which it will never recover. It is a mathematical impossibility for a minority group to dream it would be able to perpetuate its repressionover eighty million people for much longer. It is time for the West to refrain from continuing to nurture the activities of a criminal regime and derailing the aspirations of the people to live in freedom and prosperity. Inthis regard, pro-democracy groups and individuals in the Diaspora have a historic role to play and influence donor nations and institutions. Selam Beyene (Phd) EP

Capital Flight from Sub-Saharan African Countries:Updated Estimates,1970 – 2010.

Political Economy Research Institute University of Massachusetts, Amherst(October 2012)

By James K. Boyce and Léonce Ndikumana

The performance of Sub-Saharan African economies over the past decadehas inspired optimism on the region's prospects for accelerating progresstowards its development goals. Before the global financial and economic crisis, sub-Saharan Africa (SSA) grew by an average of over five percent per annum, a major turnaround from the 'lost' decades of the 1980s and 1990s.1 Even during the crisis, the sub-continent grew by 3% in 2009, trailing only East Asia as the second fastest growing region in the world. These achievements notwithstanding, SSA still faces major development challenges. It is now clear that the majority of the countries in the regionwill not achieve key millennium development goals.2

A key constraint to SSA's growth and development is the shortage of financing. Indeed SSA faces large and growing financing gaps, hindering public investment and social service delivery. At the same time, the sub- region is a source of large-scale capital flight, which escalated during last decade even as the region experienced growth acceleration. The group of33 SSA countries covered by this report has lost a total of $814 billion dollars (constant 2010 US$) from 1970 to 2010. This exceeds the amountof official development aid ($659 billion) and foreign direct investment ($306 billion) received by these countries. Oil-rich countries account for 72 percent of the total capital flight from the sub-region ($591 billion). The escalation of capital flight over the last decade coincided with thesteady increase in oil prices prior to the global economic crisis.

Assuming that flight capital has earned (or could have earned) the modestinterest rate measured by the short-term United States Treasury Bill rate,the corresponding accumulated stock of capital flight from the 33 countries stands at $1.06 trillion in 2010. This far exceeds the external liabilities of this group of countries of $189 billion (in 2010), making the region a "net creditor" to the rest of the world. The stereotypical view thatSSA is severely indebted and heavily aid-dependent is not fully consistent with the facts.

This report provides updated estimates of capital flight for 33 SSA countries from 1970 to 2010. It describes the methodology used to estimate capital flight and highlights important methodological differenceswith other existing studies. The report presents key results on capital flight both in absolute terms and in comparison to other capital flows, especially debt, aid, and foreign direct investment, as well as in relation tothe size of the economy (as percentage of GDP and in per capita terms).

The report stresses the urgency of efforts to stem capital flight and repatriate stolen assets as a part of the broader goals of scaling up development financing, combating corruption, and improving transparencyin the global financial system. (Text ends)

In contrast to the praise from world leaders, rights groups have criticisedMeles's legacy’

News Analysis: Many accusing his government of using anti-terrorism legislation to stifle peaceful dissent and freedom of expression. Nearly 200opposition members and journalists were jailed under the disputed legislation in 2011. 'The government and the next prime minister should take the opportunity for change represented by the succession of Meles Zenawi to move towards a greater respect for human rights,' Claire Beston, Amnesty International's Ethiopia researcher, told AFP. The 2009 anti-terrorism law has seen several opposition figures and journalists, including two Swedes, jailed for lengthy terms, and should be overturned,said the New York-based Human Rights Watch. Meles, a former rebel fighter who came to power in May, 1991 after toppling the bloody dictatorship of Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam, died in hospital in Brussels,officials said. In contrast to the praise from world leaders, rights groups have criticised Meles's legacy, accusing his government of using anti- terrorism legislation to stifle peaceful dissent and freedom of expression.

Nearly 200 opposition members and journalists were jailed under the disputed legislation in 2011. 'The government and the next prime ministershould take the opportunity for change represented by the succession of Meles Zenawi to move towards a greater respect for human rights,' ClaireBeston, Amnesty International's Ethiopia researcher, told AFP. The 2009 anti-terrorism law has seen several opposition figures and journalists, including two Swedes, jailed for lengthy terms, and should be overturned,said the New York-based Human Rights Watch. Meles, a former rebel fighter who came to power in 1991 after toppling the bloody dictatorship of Mengistu Haile Mariam, died in hospital in Brussels, officials said.

Meantime, The TPLF core of the ruling EPRDF has been spreading rumor inTigrai, its base of power, that the CIA is responsible for the death of the late Ethiopian dictator Meles Zenawi. To verify the information, sources called several residents in Mekele and some of them were willing to speakto reporters on the matter. Many people in the region’s capital Mekele think Meles was assassinated or poisoned by his political adversaries. But no one is sure what the TPLF would gain out of spreading such a rumor against the U.S Government. Meantime, Ethiopia has laid to rest Prime Minister Meles Zenawi on 2nd September, he who led the country for morethan 20 years before his death. Heads of state from around the continentpraised Meles' intellect and his vision for his country and Africa. Ethiopiansoldiers stood in formation as the flag-draped casket carrying the body ofMeles was carried into Meskel Square in downtown Addis Ababa.

Thousands of Ethiopians gathered to pay their respects to the late prime minister, who was credited with bringing economic development to the country during his many years in power. Foreign dignitaries, including heads of state from across Africa also attended the ceremony. Former South African President Thabo Mbeki praised Meles for his commitment to his country and the continent. In life, Meles was never accepted by most Ethiopians as a truly Ethiopian ruler. He was sharply criticized by human rights groups for cracking down on civil liberties and introducing anti- terrorism laws in 2009 that have been used to jail opposition politicians and reporters. He never belonged to his subjects. Ethiopians were always convinced that his true love and heart belonged elsewhere. He has done lasting damages to Ethiopia than any leader before him, one of which is rendering the country landlocked. He is someone who derived pride in robbing Ethiopia a sea outlet. The national security implication aside, the economic cost of being landlocked will remain a staggering blow for a poorcountry like Ethiopia. In the final analysis, the true and legitimate judges of Meles' legacy are Ethiopians themselves. If his successors want to leavea better legacy than Meles himself, at the very least, they must free all political prisoners, allow more freedom of the press, and open up the political space for opposition parties to operate freely and vie for political power peacefully. The country has to start a healing and reconciliation journey so the time comes when Ethiopians celebrate and mourn togetherthe lives and deaths of their future leaders. Many cite the roads and other infrastructures he built in Ethiopia as positives to his legacy. One has to note well of the more than $40 billion aid money he received over the years which is enough to build more than what he built over the 21 year rule. One is that Meles Zenawi has undoubtedly strong support from somesection of the society who have benefited from the system he put in place.Second, Ethiopians are culturally predisposed to showing mercy and a softer heart toward the deceased, so goes the amharic saying: 'yemote lij angetu rejim naw' meaning that .. The fact is if tens of thousands of Addisresidents came to the streets to receive Meles' coffin, millions were at their homes, perhaps nursing not his death but the uncertainty his departure has created. It was also a sad view to watch his wife Azeb Mesfin cry uncontrollably for the death of a husband with whom she had gone through thin and thick dating back their rebel days. -Editor

Ethiopian Muslims continued to engage in a serious of huge protest rallies following the end of Ramadan' The demonstrators refused to be intimidated by the massive presence of the security forces of the ruling Ethiopian Peoples Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). The protesterscalled for the release of jailed leaders and an end to government interference in their religious affairs. Editor

Ethiopian new PM in Mogadishu for presidential inauguration'

(ADDIS ABABA, ETHIOPIA September 17, 2012: Reuters/AP News) PM Hailemariam Desalegn attending the inauguration ceremony of Somalia'snew President Hassan Sheikh Mohamud. Somalia's new leader was inaugurated amid tight security in the capital, Mogadishu, four days afterPresident Hassan Skeikh Mohamud survived an assassination attempt.

Mohamud, a teacher and activist, won the election last week against outgoing President Sheik Sharif Sheikh Ahmed by the legislative vote of 190 to 79. The inauguration ceremony was attended by some regional leaders, including the prime minister of Ethiopia and the president of Djibouti. The attempt on Mohamud's life on his second day in office highlighted the serious security challenges he faces as he takes the helm of a volatile country that has not had a stable government for more than two decades. Mohamud himself acknowledged this fact, saying in his inauguration remarks that security was the paramount issue. He promisedto be a democrat and to create "an effective justice system" that serves all Somalis. "I promise (that) my government will deliver a new democratic beginning," he told a congregation at the Police Academy, the same venue where he was elected. His predecessor, Ahmed, said in his remarks that he was happy that a degree of security had returned to Mogadishu. He wished Mohamud success. The U.N.-backed political process that resulted in Mohamud's election was condemned by Islamist militants who said it was manipulated by the West. But Mohamud has the support of the international community, which wants him to succeed and bring stability to the troubled Horn of Africa nation. Augustine Mahiga, thetop U.N. representative to Somalia, said the inauguration of Mohamud wasa watershed moment for Somalia. "This marks the end of the transitional period and the beginning of a new era for Somalia," Mahiga said in a statement. "The change that was envisioned ... has arrived. The process was transparent, representative and Somali-owned and led." Somalia has seen much progress over the last year. Al-Shabab militants were forced out of Mogadishu in August 2011, allowing businesses to thrive and the arts and sports to return. The militants have either fled to northern Somalia and Yemen, or have retreated to Kismayo, the last major town they control. But occasionally they succeed in breaching security to stage terrorist attacks in Mogadishu such as the assassination attempt on Wednesday by suicide bombers who tried to infiltrate a hotel where the president was addressing reporters. Mohamud faces an uphill task unifyinga fractious country in the face of the al-Qaida-linked Islamist insurgency and rebuilding a bombed-out infrastructure, food security and institutions.Another challenge is fighting endemic corruption that plagued previous governments. While Somalia has had transitional administrations since 2004, it has not had a functioning central government since 1991, when warlords overthrew a longtime dictator and turned on each other, plunging the impoverished nation into chaos.Last month Somali leaders endorsed a new provisional constitution that expands rights for Somali citizens. The U.N. hopes that one day all of Somalia will be able to vote toendorse or reject the constitution. (Text ends)

Freed Swedish journalists accuse Ethiopia of using anti-terrorism laws tostifle journalism'

(Reuters News September 17, 2012) Two Swedish journalists pardoned byEthiopia after spending 11 months in jail for aiding a rebel group said on Friday they had been subjected to a mock execution, and accused the country of using anti-terrorism laws to stifle journalism. Reporter Martin Schibbye and photographer Johan Persson were arrested in July 2011 after entering the country from neighbouring Somalia with fighters from the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) rebel group. They said they had wanted to report on the effect of the work of a Swedish oil company on the local population and political situation in Ethiopia's Ogaden region and that the only way of entering the area was with the rebels' help. The journalists were pardoned and released on Monday. Schibbye said Ethiopian security officials had tried to get them to confess to being terrorists after their arrest. He said they were taken into the desert whereone official pulled him out of a jeep, told him "No more Mr Nice Guy" and ordered him to start talking. "A soldier lifted up his weapon," Schibbye told a news conference in Stockholm. But instead off shooting him, the soldier shot into a bush beside him, he said. Persson said he had been taken off in another direction and thought his colleague had been killed.

The men said they had been forced to make an apology on Ethiopian television in order to secure their release. Schibbye said he had not meantwhat he had said. Ethiopian government officials were not immediately available for comment. Schibbye and Persson were sentenced to 11 years in jail by an Ethiopian court in December for helping and promoting the ONLF. Some of Ethiopia's Western allies, including the European Union and United States, said they were concerned over the verdict. The pair were acquitted of terrorism-related charges after the court found they were not involved in carrying out any attacks. The men were pardoned along with more than 1,900 other inmates. Addis Ababa often grants masspardons and announces the decisions ahead of major holidays, in particular the Ethiopian New Year which is celebrated on September 11.

Schibbye criticised Ethiopia's anti-terrorism laws, saying they were aimed at stifling freedom of speech. "We should never forget that it is an international scandal that we were condemned to 11 years in jail for doingour job," he said. The government of the Horn of Africa country denies such allegations and has said its arrests of journalists have nothing to do with their reporting or political affiliations. (Text ends)

Ethiopia on track to complete Grand Renaissance Dam by 2015 -minister'

Ethiopia's energy minister played down concerns on about how it would finance the first of an array of mega-dams due to revolutionise east African power markets, saying it was on track to have three plants on line by 2015. The Horn of Africa country has laid out plans to invest more than $12 billion in harnassing the rivers that run through its rugged highlands to generate more than 40,000 MW of hydropower by 2035, making it Africa's leading power exporter. Energy chief Alemayehu Tegenu said the plan's centerpiece - the $4.1 billion-Grand Renaissance Dam along the Nile River in the western Benishangul-Gumuz region - was on course to becompleted on time in 2015. Ethiopia is building the largest hydroelectric dam in Africa on the Nile River known in Ethiopia as Abay River. Ethiopia contributes more than 80% of the water that flows to the Nile river.

Reuters (November 12, 2012)
Unity the path to change in Ethiopia - Researcher'
The King is dead long live the King - It is a new-year in Ethiopia, (belated)happy 2005 one and all. With it comes a new prime minister, HailemariamDesalegn, deputy PM under Meles Zenawi who died some time in August or was it July. A fog of misinformation and uncertainty surrounds the final months of Meles life, ingrained secrecy being both a political and national characteristic that works against social and ethnic cohesion, strengtheningmistrust and division. It is unclear what route the deputy PM, a Protestantfrom humble beginnings in the small, desperately poor Wolayta community, took to step into the prime ministerial shoes. Some believe the US administration through its powerful military machine Africom, engineered the sympathetic replacement. The US is Ethiopia’s main donor,giving around $3 billion a year, Ethiopia for it’s part and in exchange for such generosity perhaps, allows the US military to station and launch drones from it’s sacred soil into Somalia, or indeed anywhere the Pentagon hacks choose and the deadly drones can reach. (November 14, 2012)
New Prime Minister same old regime story’ - BBC Report
The new Prime Minister has worryingly vowed to continue Mr. Meles “legacy without any change,” a legacy littered with human rights violations and injustices, which has little to recommend it. Meles ruled over a single party State in all but name, for, as the International Crisis Group (ICG) (ii) make clear, “the Tigray People’s Liberation Front (TPLF) and his Tigrayan inner circle, with the complicity of other ethnic elites thatwere co-opted into the ruling alliance, the Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF).” A dictatorship in fact and form and as is consistent with such regimes, brutal, controlling and intolerant. No matter the accolades expressed on Meles death by senior politicians and diplomats around the world, who like nothing more it seems than a friendly tyrant. Hailemariam was chosen, it is alleged, simply to give the appearance of an ethnically balanced leadership, that he will have little independence, and dutifully tow the ideologically driven line of Revolutionary Democracy. Whatever the method and no doubt it was constitutionally correct, Hailemariam and deputy Demeke Mekonnen, are now enthroned, let us wish them well for there is much work to be done within Ethiopia. Old injustices urgent issues: Human rights issues cry outto be dealt with, starting with the immediate unconditional release of all so called ‘political prisoners’, tried and Imprisoned under the internationally condemned, unjust Anti Terrorist Proclamation, for the heinous crime of publicly disagreeing with the TPLF dominated government. The Ethiopian government should, HRW (iii) demand, “amend the law’s most pernicious provisions, which are being used to criminalize free expression and peaceful dissent.” Journalists, mainly working outside of Ethiopia and supporters of opposition political parties are the common targets, tried in absentia in Ethiopian courts by a judiciary that functions as little more than a sentencing body for the government and thinks nothing of handing down life sentences to dissenting voices, based on fabricated charges. Human Rights Watch (HRW) (iv) make this illegal pattern clear, stating “the use of draconian laws and trumped-up charges to crack down on free speech and peaceful dissent makes a mockery of the rule of law,” both Federal and International.

The government, immersed in paranoia and determined to control all forms of debate and platforms of expression, fire off accusations of terrorist activity to anyone seen to disagree with their disagreeable policies. The ambiguous provision of ‘conspiracy to commit terrorist acts’ is usually cited as criminal activity, or the even more foggy crime of offering ‘moral support’, which has little or no specific meaning and as HRW assert, “is contrary to the principle of legality.” Such ill-defined terms are employed to criminalize dissent and justify the unjust. Each urgently required reform flows into and out of the other, connected, as they are by the fundamental need to observe basic human rights, at the heart of which sits freedom and justice. Constitutional law provides for thestatutory observation of all freedoms of expression that are nevertheless denied in practice or at best grossly restricted. The press, TV and radio is almost exclusively State owned, television is firmly under government control and with literacy resting at around 48% of the adult population is the arm with the greatest reach and influence. Control of the World wide-web is also in the hands of the EPRDF, the sole telecommunications company being listed in the extensive business portfolio of the government, who control and restrict both Internet expansion and use.

Over 80% live in rural areas and currently a mere 0.5% (400,000) of the population have Internet access, the second lowest in Sub-Saharan Africa.Unity in diversity: With between 70 and 80 tribal sets within the seven major ethnic groups and a 45/35% Christian, Muslim split, cooperation tolerance and unity are essential factors in the countries wellbeing and strength, as well as its internal security. As imperial nations have long known a united civilian population is a threat; divide the factions, separatethe ethnic groups, fragment the people make them compete, even fight among themselves and maintain dominion. This, contrary to the EPRDF’s policy of Ethnic Federalism devised in 1991 when they took power, has consistently been the regimes approach. All political authority rests firmly within the party controlled by the TPLF, as the ICG report makes clear, “behind the façade of devolution, [the EPRDF] adopted a highly centralizedsystem that has exacerbated identity-based conflicts.” Self-determination and self-rule for the major regional groups was, on paper, a central component of Ethnic Federalism, however, as The international human rights group Advocates for Human Rights (v)(AHR) in its report on ethnic groups in Ethiopia found, the government, “actively impedes the rights of disadvantaged ethnic groups to self determination.” Far from building partnerships and cultivating cooperation and tolerance, policies flowing from the TPLF/EPRDF’s desire to maximize control in all areas of society, including the powerful religious groups work to encourage fragmentation, create religious dissonance, strengthen ethnic divisions and deny much needed social unity.

Ethiopia has the third largest population of Muslims in Africa and is thought to be the birthplace of Islam in the continent as well as the cradleof African Christianity. The government has for long controlled Muslim affairs via The Ethiopian Islamic Affairs Supreme Council, which is simply a mouthpiece for the ruling party. There has, as Crescent International

(vi) reports, “been no election in the council for the last 13 years. The council has remained against the rights of Muslims including wearing hijaband congregational prayer in universities.” Muslims have been calling withincreasing intensity for the removal of the unelected council and the Statesponsored imposition of Al-Ahbash (The Abyssinian) Islam, a movement that blends elements of Sunni Islam with Sufism. Protests against government meddling are now a regular extension to Friday prayers in Addis Ababa. The Washington Post 2nd November reports the new PM speaking to parliament on 16th October, stating, surprisingly given the EPRDF’s involvement in all things religious, that “the government fully respects freedom of religion and “would not interfere in the affairs of religion just as religion would not interfere in matters of politics.” It does indeed seem he is determined to follow in word and deed in the dictatorialduplicitous footsteps of his predecessor. The Government with predictableconsistency has labeled these legitimate demands the actions of ‘religiousextremists’ and In July this year resorted to violent means in an attempt to settle the issue, killing four Muslims at prayer and arresting scores more. HRW (vii)reported “Ethiopian police and security services have harassed, assaulted, and arbitrarily arrested hundreds of Muslims at AddisAbaba’s Awalia and Anwar mosques who were protesting government interference in religious affairs.“ Religious extremists as we all know means terrorists, the US Army definition of terrorism is worth relating at this point. It is, they say “the calculated use of violence or threat of violence to attain goals that are political, religious, or ideological in nature…through intimidation, coercion, or instilling fear.” (viii) Accordinglyif name-calling is the name of the game, the EPRDF’s policies qualify themunconditionally for the terrorist label, prefixed with the title, ‘State’ It’s worth noting that Orthodox Christian leaders have spoken out in support of their Muslim brothers and aired their own concerns at government interference in all things religious. The head Christian is also a regime appointee. The richness of the countries culture lies in its ancient ethnic diversity and a deeply religious nature that infuses all areas of cultural life, expressed by both orthodox Christians and Muslims who, despite the governments best effort have lived peacefully side-by-side as it were for generations. Ethnic division centralized discriminatory rule: Regional divisions are being strengthened as ethnic groups are forced to compete for life saving handouts administered by the EPRDF through their networkof regional councils. The Kebeles and Woreda's reach into every village and household, stomach and mind in the country, distributing a range of development support from international donors, including emergency foodrelief determined by allegiance to the ruling party. Along with this illegal immoral act that needs the urgent attention of donors, whose silence and apathy makes them complicit in the regimes criminality, AHR found the EPRDF use discriminatory tactics to "interfere with the rights of disadvantaged ethnic groups" in all areas of civil society. Employment is all too often conditional on party affiliation, teachers thought to be supporters of opposition parties are harassed, trade unions, supported within the liberal constitution, if not affiliated with the regime party face dismantling, the members and leaders intimidated and threatened. And Oromo business people, AHR discovered, "are denied business licenses without explanation and face police harassment targeted at customers, suppliers, and employees." In schools and colleges both teachers and students are exposed to political indoctrination and 'encouraged' to join the ruling party; continued employment and studies being a carrot, unemployment and expulsion the regime stick, membership of the OromoLiberation Front a guarantee of both. In areas relating to culture, AHR found "Oromo's e.g. do not feel free to speak Oromiffa in public or to use distinctively Oromo names," leading Oromo cultural figures have been persecuted and the Charities and Societies Proclamation – another poisonous piece of legislation that needs revising or scrapping, restricts the development of cultural relationships with members of the diaspora.

Forced from village to Villagization: Ethnic groups forced into villagization programs by the government as they sell off large tracts of land to foreigncorporations, make easy targets for a regime pursuing the fragmentation of society and the exploitation of the people. Large numbers have been forcibly re-located, in Gambella alone HRW report,(ix) "approximately 70,000 people were slated to be moved by the end of 2011," into settlements that provide no health services or clean water and often lack schools. Quick to capitalize on the child's plight Government officials, AHRreport "force schoolchildren in these villages to abandon their studies to provide labor for constructing shelters." An illegal action adding further, tothe catalogue of State criminality or to give it its US army title, State terrorism. It is projected that if the herding of indigenous people continues at the present rate, all rural dwellers, that's 80% of the population, will be living in one or other of these government created villagization centers by the next decade, without any consultation with those affected, no matter the party line on participation and voluntary movement. It's hard to discuss social engineering and ancestral land rights with armed solders whilst your home is demolished. Violent coercion is widespread, HRW again 'security forces enforcing the population transfers have been implicated in at least 20 rapes in the past year. Fear and intimidation are widespread among affected populations." Divide and rule extends into the very heart of ethnic communities, familiesare routinely broken up when driven into the villagization settlements, making women and children particularly vulnerable, as AHR found "in ruralareas typically populated by disadvantaged ethnic groups are often victimsof human trafficking. The Government has taken no meaningful measures to prevent such trafficking or to provide assistance or support to victims." Trafficking of women within Ethiopia and overseas, often to the Gulf States almost always equates to prostitution or forced domestic labor, where sexual abuse, violence and degrading treatment is the common experience. United in purpose: The EPRDF has divided, inhibited and controlled the people of Ethiopia. Fear and intimidation their weapons of choice, wielded without recrimination, compassion or regret, the 'international community', who supply a third of the national budget uninterested in their brutality act not in support of the people. The opportunity presented to and by the change of Prime Minister has (to date) proven to be nothing more than a hollow hope. The cry of the people ignored once more, their voices cast into the darkness and dismissed. The political opposition, fragmented and dysfunctional, offers no vision of change, however there is a powerful alternative responsible group; It is the worlds 'second superpower', it is the rich diversity of the people and the strength inherent in their potential unity, standing together in peaceful defense of social justice, freedom and human dignity.The people of Oromo and Amahra, Tigray and Somali, Sidama, Gurage, Wolaita and Afar, look to each other and fear not, look to your neighbors and friends, share your concerns, your hopes, and fear not; for fear is the weapon of the bully the enemy of the good. Look to the next village, communicate and organize, fear not, for fear inhibits and controls. Look tothe adjoining street and neighborhood where live others, who too shiver infear of the police and armed forces, the Kebeles and Woredas who in the full of light of day distribute food, jobs, education opportunities and healthcare based on illegal partisan discrimination. Unity of the people, rich in diversity united in purpose, is the need and song of the time, for Ethiopia and indeed for the world. Together there is safety and strength beyond measure, "when there is no enemy within, the enemies outside cannot hurt you," proclaims an African proverb. This truth applies to the individual, the family the people of a nation. Brothers and sisters of one humanity we are, our pains are shared, so too our joys and hopes. No government can withstand the unified strength of a people held together by a common and just cause, acting peacefully in honor of freedom and justice. Such is the need within the wonderful land of Ethiopia, the people of which have suffered much and for far, far too long.

By Graham Peebles

Ethiopia’s Special Police – ONLF’s Legitimate Bandits'

Brief Analisys: Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia is functioning based on federal system where regional authorities is independent to run its day-to-day affairs. Federal System was introduced in Ethiopia after collapse Mengistu Haile Mariam regime in 1991. Nine regional authorities form the Federal Government in Addis Ababa. As per federal constitution, the federal government in Addis Ababa interferes regional authorities at hard-time. Somali Regional State of Ethiopia (Somali: Gobolka Soomalida)is one of such regional authorities with Jigjiga city its capital; it is the largest state in Ethiopia geographically and third most populated between 68 million strong Ethiopians. However, the Somali-Ethiopians are unique compare to their countrymen; they involve Somalia heavily and are eligible to claim Somalia citizenship. Somalia’s constitution grants citizenship to everybody who speaks Somali language and from known Somali tribes including parts of Ethiopia, Kenya, Djibouti and Somaliland. This is result of land-expansion policy adopted in Somalia from last forty years until today. The policy of land-expansion allows Somali-Ethiopians to join Somalia Army and government, wliyuu policehere they occupy important posts. Many Somali-Ethiopians led the Somalia’s invasion in Ethiopia during 1977 war, including the current President of Somali State of Ethiopia Mr. Abdi Mohamed Omer (Cabdi-lley), and Chairman of ONLF wing that signed peace-deal with Ethiopia Salahudin Abdurrahman Mao’w. There are thousands of Somali-Ethiopians who utilized such privilege to become citizens of Somalia, and later reclaimed their original identity – Ethiopian – after Somalia government varnished. President Cabdi-lley wasformer soldier of Somalia National Army, starting from 1980 until collapse of Siyad Barre regime in 1991. He was member of 26th Battalion of Somalia Army in Hargiesa – current capital of Somaliland. After collapse, he returned to Ethiopia to start new life as an Ethiopian citizen. He did notattend school and possesses no certificate except military training in Somalia. He deserted Somalia Army along with another Somali-Ethiopian Colonel Omar Jees. Both President Cabdi-lley and Colonel Jees were part of a unit who surrendered to SNM freedom fighters. SNM allowed the unit to pass and return their homes. President Cabdi-lley returned to his original hometown of DHAGAXBUUR and started new life as Bus Conductor. Cabdi-lley joined ONLF enforcing his military skills against ONLF. He reverted to Ethiopia as one of the ONLF who signed the peace- deal with Ethiopia. The ONLF wing that signed the peace deal with Ethiopiafew years ago stormed in the institutions of the government of Somali State of Ethiopia, and they occupy 38 organizations. Even though, they selected peace over fighting, but they maintain close relation with the armed wing of ONLF which fighting Ethiopia Army. President Cabdi-lley and ONLF in Jigjiga want to take revenge against non-Ogaden tribes who did not support ONLF illegal war against Ethiopian Army in last three decades. Today, these non-Ogaden tribes are victims of their support to Ethiopia, while the killers of Ethiopian soldiers are enjoying the power in Jigjiga today – What an unfortunate for Addis Ababa regime! The hit-men who plotted the assassination of late Former Minister of Transportation Mr.Abdul Majid Hussein are part of the ONLF wing that signed the peace with Ethiopia, and are heading some of the most important security departments in the Somali State of Ethiopia. The Agenda of both wings of ONLF (Peaceful & violent) is the same: To dominate the government leadership and to take revenge from other tribes in the region who did notsupport the struggle of ONLF. The Federal Government of Ethiopia must understand the criticality of the situation in the Somali State of Ethiopia, as it needs quick intervention to avoid any tribal clashes, which will lead into civil war like Somalia. Federal Government must know that the key state government positions are not been distributed between Somali tribesequally, instead 90% goes to the tribe of the President Cabdi-lley (Ogaden − Absame), where other tribes are left behind and considered 'fraudulent' because they supported Ethiopian Army war against ONLF. President Cabdi-lley did not establish any development in the region, although, he misleads the public by claiming ownership of development projects by his successors. The major development projects like Jigjiga University, the under-construction big Jigjiga Hospital, Jigjiga Airport, the main road that links GODAY to Addis Ababa, and different vocational training centers including institutes of Minerals, Education, Technical Training, Health, Administration and Management, were established by former governments. If we examine the current basic social services in the region: Somali State of Ethiopia contains 68 districts and 99% of these districts don't have running and clean water. We all know, water is the lifeline of the human being. The question lingering is: what kind of development that Mr. Cabdi-lley talk about on the media. he is a walking month. Let us go back to the main topic, LIYUU BOLIS means 'Special Police' in English. LIYUU is an Amharic word that means 'Special'. It was formed few years ago to fight ONLF terrorists. The Federal Government of Ethiopia provided a lot of training and equipment to the LIYUU BOLIS, in order to end the illegal war of ONLF terrorist group. In this article, we will discuss the current illegal activities of the LIYUU BOLIS in the state, and if they are functioning within the scope of their framework laid by Addis Ababa government, which was to fight ONLF. The federal government plotted expensive budget for LIYUU BOLIS, and every year the government recruits new members, without examining and understanding the hidden and illegal agenda of LIYUU BOLIS leaders like President Cabdi-lley, which is to displace and eliminate all non-Ogaden ethnic groups from Somali State of Ethiopia. It is true that LIYUU BOLIS confronted ONLF fighters in many occasions, however, the question is in the manner, in which they combating ONLF bandits, and whether the current leaders of LIYUU BOLIS are serious of fighting ONLF? Starting from the creation of LIYUU BOLIS there are no major signs of damage in ONLF's military muscles, in contrary, the guerilla group increased its activities across the Somali Region and even recruits across Ogaden tribe. The majority of ONLF's new recruits were victims of torture at the hands of LIYUU BOLIS and want revenge. Now, security of many areas in the Somali State of Ethiopia is not reliable like FIIQ, QORAXAY, DHAGAXBUUR, WARDHEER and GODAY, even in Jigjiga, one may need security to move in many partsof the city. LIYUU BOLIS avoid visiting the locations known for ONLF fighters instead attack peaceful places like HARSHIN, DAROOR, BALIGUBADLE, GASHAMO and many other villages in the ex-Reserve Areabecause the majority of the inhabitants in these areas are non-Ogaden tribes, which gives LIYUU BOLIS the right to kill. Recently, LIYUU BOLIS killed more than 20 civilians in HARSHIN and GASHAMO districts and arrested many others in BALIGUBADLE. Such illegal attacks on non- ogaden tribes forced the residents of these villages to regroup and defend their families and properties, which led recent clashes between the residents and LIYUU BOLIS in HARSHIN. In this year, the LIYUU BOLIS arrested scores of unarmed civilians including highly respected tribe chiefswho visited the place of the clashes in HARSHIN, in order to reassure the wellbeing of their tribesmen. The people of these villages requested help from the government in Somali State of Ethiopia but ONLF regime in Jigjiga turned its back to the people. The people lost their trust in LIYUU BOLIS and government in Jigjiga, and they are taking up arms to protect their families and properties against LIYUU BOLIS, who commit mass- killing, rape and rob the livestock between non-ogaden tribes. Today and due to such illegal and tribe-minded activities, all the non-Ogaden ethnic groups in the Somali Region of Ethiopia describe LIYUU BOLIS as 'Legitimate Bandits'. Recently, there were tribal conflict in DhAGAXBUUR between sub-tribes of Isaaq community and Ogaden groups. The LIYUU BOLIS took the side of Ogaden killing the Isaaq community indiscriminately, which illustrates the hidden agenda of LIYUU BOLIS to enflame hatred between the peaceful tribes in the region. As usual, the government in Jigjiga remain silent-witness, as they are part of the ethnic-cleansing agenda against non-Ogaden tribes. In many occasions, the President Cabdi-lley asked the Isaaq community to leave their area in Ethiopia and go to Somaliland, as he believes that Somali State of Ethiopiabelongs to Ogaden only. He made such announcement on his mouthpiece websites like CAKAARANEWS, SOMALISTATE, XAAJO and ABAAQARO. In the SALLAXAAD Area of FIIQ, LIYUU BOLIS regularly insults the people of FIQI CUMAR (Sheekhaal) tribe, and displaced many of the Sheekhaal ethnic group. The president Cabdi-lley is devoted to the interest of his tribe – Ogaden, Absame – instead of serving all Somali-Ethiopians.The soldiers of LIYUU BOLIS are underage boys, which violates international rules against child-soldering. They don't respect codes of the culture, religion and even don't receive proper training on human rights. Majority of the LIYUU BOLIS members drink alcohol and other forms of drugs, which is against the culture of the Somalis in the region. Even, the majority of the civilians in the region believe that LIYUU BOLIS are not 'Believers' because of their inhuman activities. This will damage the recordof Ethiopia in human rights. It is very obvious that LIYUU BOLIS is operating against their framework and creating instability in the region, rather than, fighting ONLF terrorist group. The hidden agenda of LIYUU BOLIS is getting exposed day-after-day due to their illegal operations against the non-Ogaden tribes. However, LIYUU

BOLIS and their chief

Cabdi-lley must know that only the almighty Allah who created the non- Ogaden tribes in the region can only displace them. We can say that ‘Legitimate Bandits’, as Somali-Ethiopians describe LIYUU BOLIS, is a tragedy in the region, and needs correction and interference from the Federal Government of Ethiopia before the region turns into violent, whichcould attract other terrorist groups like Al-Shabab. Sources:
Diridhaba, Abdulaziz Al-Mutairi (November 15th, 2012)
Ethiopia - Over Nile water Sparks Anger' - LA Times’
Analisys: Ethiopia is a proud country. A country that doesn’t like foreign, especially colonial interference in its local affairs. The Nile River is one of those areas that across the board late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi was successful at bringing the country together. When the Los Angeles Times wrote a lengthy article on the Nile River, it sparked massive anger in Ethiopia over what many called the “orientalist” support for the Arab world. “I think this just shows that the so-called media has no idea how things really work in the world and just are getting behind countries and places where people want to read about,” said one government official who told Bikyamasr.com that the best thing the Zenawi regime did over the past two decades was to begin the process of building the RenaissanceDam. He said that “the future of Ethiopia and Africa depends on not standing by and allowing foreign treaties by occupiers to control our destiny,” noting the continued claims by Egypt to the lion’s share of Nile River water comes from a British-brokered treaty in the 1920s and 1950s.The LA Times article, which puts more weight and argues that if Egypt were to lose their allotment of water, the country could head to widespread shortages and agricultural detriment. But Egypt has already reported water shortages and has failed to use desalination and other means to secure water a priority, said Ethiopian researcher Mohamed Jabar, who urged both sides to think reasonably. “The Times article does not give any weight to the Ethiopia cause and this is unfortunate and angering,” he began, “but at the same time, the LA Times is not going to make policy or change how Ethiopia and Egypt deal with water issues. “Cairo should not be flouting itself as anti-West and independent and at the same time hide behind a treaty that was created on their behalf when the British were in control of the country,” he added. That treaty is a contentious issue here in Ethiopia. The British Water Nile Agreement of 1929 – brokered by the British when they were the colonial power – delivered Egypt as the sole recipient of Nile River water, at least the vast majority. Egypt was guaranteed 48 billion cubic meters of water. Followinga further 1959 deal, which did little more than reaffirm Egypt and Sudan’sright to a majority of the Nile, this was increased to 55.5 billion cubic meters, while Sudan is allotted 14.5 billion cubic meters. “It is not Ethiopia’s problem that Egypt’s sole source of water is Nile. Sure, our country is blessed with several rivers but it is absurd to suggest that we should spare Nile for foreigners. No international law prevents Ethiopia from utilizing its natural resources, no amount of war mongering from Egypt will stop the building of Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam. The author even mentions that Ethiopia uses just 3% of the water despite it supplies more than 75% of the water to Nile," wrote an editorial by Nazret.com, an Ethiopian news portal, on the topic of Nile water. Top Ethiopia government officials have told Bikyamasr.com that they are looking at jumpstarting the massive Renaissance Dam project along the Nile River in an effort to increase water resources and energy for the East African country. The moves could threaten the regional stability after the Egyptian government said it remained "concerned" over Ethiopia's actions along the Nile River. The International Monetary Fund (IMF) has also called on Addis Ababa to push the dam project to the backburner in order to focus on other economic initiatives. While Cairo has denied any intention of attacking the dam, as reported by whistleblower website Wikileaks, the country's Water Resources and Irrigation Minister MohamedBahaa el-Din said last month that his country was maintaining its concernsabout the construction of the Renaissance Dam in Ethiopia. He did say that officials at the Ethiopia foreign ministry "assured Egypt and Sudan that in case there was any impact on their water quota to the dam, other projects will be carried out to collect lost water and cover shortages." It is the latest in the ongoing battle for the world's largest river's water, with Egypt and Sudan continuing to remain obstinate in amending any of the colonial treaties that guarantee their countries with a lion's share of water from the Nile. Wikileaks released documents this fall that revealed Egypt and Sudan had been planning to attack an Ethiopian dam project to "protect" their rights over Nile water based on colonial era treaties. In documents revealed by Wikileaks, the Egyptian and Sudanese governmentappeared ready to develop a launching pad for an attack by Egypt against the dam. Wikileaks has leaked files allegedly from the Texas-based global intelligence company, Stratfor, which quote an anonymous "high-level Egyptian source," which reported that the Egyptian ambassador to Lebanon said in 2010 that Egypt "would do anything to prevent the secession of South Sudan because of the political implications it will have for Egypt's access to the Nile." Ethiopia's massive dam project has seen much concern from Cairo and Khartoum, who fear the establishment of Africa's largest dam would affect previous colonial deals on Nile water- sharing. It is to be built some 40 kilometers upstream from Sudan on the Blue Nile. Awramba Times, Mohammad Awad (November 15, 2012)

Reform in China versus crisis within the ruling-EPRDF'

Analysis: The 18th Congress of Communist Party of China (CPC) opened inBeijing with a keynote speech by its General Secretary (GS) Hu Jintao on 07 November 2012. The GS articulated the stunning achievement in economic growth in the last decade. He vowed continuation of the "construction of socialism with Chinese characteristics ", a phrase frequently used by Chinese officials and scholars. The CPC is the largest communist party in the world comprising 82.6 million members ruling 1.3 billion people with iron fist. The Congress, comprising 2307 delegates ‘elected’ from within the CPC, met in the Great Hall of People where animposing portrait of Chairman Mao was conspicuous for its big size.

Following deliberations during the period 7 – 14 November 2012 the Congress passed a number of major resolutions involving amendment to the CPC Constitution and replacing most of its affluent top leadership including the GS and the Prime Minister among others. The power transferin the one-party system of China was in all fairness a remarkable achievement far beyond the sham transfer within the EPRDF – the diehardcustodian of one of the legacies left behind by the late tyrant Zenawi whose party had signed a treaty of friendship with the CPC.

The GS extolled the Scientific Outlook on Development Guidance, based on Marxism-Leninism, Mao Zedong Thought, Deng Xiaoping Theory, is thebest achievement of the CPC in the past decade and told leading delegatesthat the Party must adhere for a long time for it shall be enshrined in the CPC Constitution as part and parcel of the new model for China’s all- inclusive development plan for the next decade. By the way Prime MinisterDeng Xiaoping Theory saved China from catastrophe due to the reckless experiment set into motion by Chairman Mao’s Cultural Revolution. And it is true that his Theory “over the past ten years, has enabled China to advance to the world’s second-largest economy from the sixth place in theworld.”

The GS in his speech to leading officials underlined the unprecedented stride in economic growth achieved in the last decade but asking them “toexercise strict self-discipline and strengthen supervision over their familiesand staff.” He said “Leading officials at all levels, especially high-ranking officials, must readily observe the code of conduct on clean governance and report all important matters” adding that “If we fail to handle this issue well, it could prove fatal to the Party, and even cause the collapse ofthe Party and the fall of the state”. He made a passionate plea that “the CPC must make unremitting efforts to combat corruption, promote integrity and stay vigilant against degeneration.” He singled out corruptionas a major problem in his closing speech also. And the incoming General Secretary Xi Japing strongly underscored the same thing in condemning the rampant corruption. On the other hand Ethiopia’s PM aggrandized the economic growth of China justifying why it is adopted as a role model for growth by developing nations. He said Ethiopia scored double digit growthin the past nine years ignoring the fact that the IMF and the WB have revised that growth downwards to single digit. He was dead silent on rotten corruption which, by the way, his predecessor did not deny.

I watched on the China Central TV (CCTV) renowned pundits including Western economists arguing and reaching consensus that the average economic growth for China for the period 2010 – 2020 would be 5% to 6%. The pundits noted that the double-digit massive growth in the last three decades brought corresponding mind boggling social problems withit – such as income disparity, social unrest, and rampant corruption. It was argued that the CPC cannot rectify its blunders by itself without check-and-balance in the political system. I thought the several dialogueshosted by CCTV during the proceedings of the CPC Congress are a sure sign of China opening up to the world. Therefore, the introduction of political pluralism in China is a must in the face of changing economic orientation from dependence on exports to domestic consumption coupledwith 6 million degree holding graduates annually flooding the job market seeking employment that the CPC cannot provide without the support of private business enterprises. Add to this the 500 million informed and angry Chinese having access to the internet using the social media to expose rampant corruption and calling for multi-party democracy to change the present 'vertical democracy' method of CPC of replacing the affluent top plutocracy in the CPC. The GS in all fairness deserves high respect for his courage and frankness for so clearly and unequivocally articulating the pervasive corruption within the CPC threatening to bring itdown. I cannot say the same for the EPRDF Prime Minister (PM) who had opted to copycat the Chinese aging model as a role model for Ethiopia andthe developing nations. I would quickly add that it is perfectly normal to adapt models of other countries, but only to the extent that they are suitable to one's strategic objectives and national characteristics.

Emulating best practices is laudable.

My argument is that the PM should rather pay serious attention to multipleproblems associated with the ongoing political and social crisis on the watch of his Stalinist party, which itself is incurably divided. A splinter group of TPLF has gone underground with determination to lead the government from behind; a second splinter group spearheaded by the senile Sebhat Nega is concocting to resurface the glory days of the all- pervasive TPLF supremacy; the widow of Zenawi controls all the resourcesof the TPLF in her capacity as the CEO of EFFORT that she grabbed from Sebhat; it is an open secret that the OPDO top brass, purportedly struggling for the right of the their ethnic group, are angry at being deniednot even one key ministerial post, which is humiliating to the great Oromopeople – the largest ethnic group in Ethiopia. So the PM has a lot to worry about and no wonder that the formation of his Cabinet is inordinately late and the government is in limbo. Reminiscence: The first time I met Chinese citizens physically in Ethiopia was well before the 1974 Ethiopia Revolution at Massawa on their commercial ship docked at the port of Massawa waiting for thousands of quintals of cargo of sesame from the renowned fertile land called Setite Humera – then part of Gonder/Begemder now merged with Tigray by force as part of the secret scheme of Zenawi to create an independent "Greater Tigray" by grabbing land for the surrounding areas including Wollo. I am mentioning the abovemeeting with the Chinese for the following reasons:-

The Chinese I had met then were reclusive and incommunicative reflectingrigid discipline under the iron rule of Chairman Mao. I and my colleagues were invited to the cabin and made to wait for the party representative for a few minutes silently. There was an eerie quite as the party official joinedus. He said welcome and we exchanged salutations. We were treated to a bottle of Chinese beer. He told us why his cargo ship came. He was the only one who spoke. I am saying this to admire the progress the Chinese have made through the years in engaging foreigners including Chinese in discussions and social interactions in my capacity as project manager of major engineering projects at home and abroad in the past 32 years.

China opening up to the world is the name of the game now! To underlinethe fact that Ethiopia at that time owned a vibrant Navy established by Emperor Haile Selassie and a harbor and in all fairness expanded and developed to an enviable high standard during His regime and that of theDuerg.

To bring out the fact that Setite Humera was a shining symbol of burgeoning agriculture in Ethiopia producing exportable cash crops on high demand from countries in Europe, America and as far places as Chinain Asia. To remind readers that one of the pernicious legacies of the late Zenawi was to give away the above mentioned vital national assets – the Navy, the harbor, burgeoning agriculture Ethiopia entrepreneurship in the spirit of self-reliance.

The Big question!: Indeed China has become the second global economic powerhouse involving 80% private sector partnership. It is a force in our global village to reckon with in terms of its military might, achievements in advanced science and technology to the extent of sending manned satellite into space – but all this at the expense of engendering draconian social problems including rampant corruption, environmental degradation,and suppressing human rights. President Hu Jintao candidly admitted that rampant corruption threatens to bring down the CPC and the government.Putting people first was underlined by the President as one of top priority tasks for the new leadership. My big question is, given the worsening injustice and social problems in Ethiopia, why Prime Minister Hailemariamis upbeat about developing nations adopting the Chinese model for economic growth under review for change by the CPC as a priority.

Shouldn’t the EPRDF learn from mistakes made by China in the past anddesign a model for growth that includes democracy and respect for fundamental human rights recognizing it as the foremost priority for the21st century?

Conclusion: President Hu Jintao’s candid admission that economic growth brought with it rampant corruption and a host of other problems threatening to bring down the CPC and the government is laudably respectable. The CPC in my strong opinion cannot correct its failings in this regard without at least one independent watchdog political rival, less so in view of rising demands for social justice and more freedom of expression. Therefore, in view of rapid progress made to date, one would be inclined to predict that there will be a multi-party political dispensationin China in next 10 years. The EPRDF PM is well advised to heed President HU Jintao's speech and design a growth model with Ethiopian characteristics – with due reverence to the 96% of the population believing in God and taking into account the rights of the rest of the 4% minorities including atheists. Government interference with religious affairs has to stop; EPRDF must respect its own constitution to avoid the impending instability in the region due to inordinate crackdown on religion, especially on the Ethiopia ancient Orthodox Tewahido Christian and Muslim faiths. The PM will have to bring to justice all the corrupt greedy top TPLF leaders including Azeb Mesfin; dismiss all incompetent ones within the entire EPRDF top leaders and make history by establishinghis Cabinet dedicated to real change to democratic order, principles and rule of law. Change is inevitable; the rest of us must expedite it knowing that Ethiopia's strategic location and the State-sponsored internal divisionof her people along ethnic and religious lines is making her more vulnerable to the danger of fragmentation. The name of the game in the 21st century politics is "people come first" or "putting human rights first" for sustainable economic development in a truly democratic society.

Finally, I repeat my call that all political prisoners Andualem, Eskinder, Reeyot et al must be released unconditionally without delay; that all restrictions on freedom of expression are lifted; political parties including MEDREK, AEUP, et al are regarded as partners rather than enemies publicly declared as such by the late tyrant Zenawi. IndepthAfrica, RobeleAbabiya (November 15th, 2012)

Ethiopia among those named by ILO as violators of freedom of assembly'

The ILO has named Argentina, Cambodia, Ethiopia, Fiji and Peru – out of alist of 32 countries examined – as the most serious and urgent cases regarding freedom of association. The ILO Committee on Freedom of Association examined cases concerning employers' and trade unions' rights to organize, collective bargaining and social dialogue. The ILO supervisory body dealt with the murder of four workers and injury of two others in Argentina. The murders happened during the eviction of over 500 workers, demanding decent housing, from a construction site in Mar del Plata in 2009. The Committee recalled the importance of an immediateand independent judicial inquiry in such cases to clarify the facts, determine responsibility, punish those responsible and prevent the repetition of such acts. It requested the Government to communicate the outcome of the judicial inquiries underway. It also examined the murder of three trade union leaders, Chea Vichea, Ros Sovannareth and Hy Vuthy, in Cambodia, which happened between 2004 and 2007. Once again, the Committee strongly urged the Government to carry out independent investigations into the assassinations of these union leaders, punish the guilty parties and bring an end to the climate of impunity in thecountry. Turning to Ethiopia, the Committee regretted that, four years after its request for registration, the National Teachers Union (NTA) had still not been registered. It strongly urged the Government to ensure that the appropriate authorities register the NTA, in order to fully guarantee the freedom of association rights of civil servants, including teachers in public schools. The Committee also asked the Government of Fiji to rapidly discuss the return of an ILO Direct Contacts Mission to the country.Last September, the Fijian government had stopped the ILO from carryingout a mission to verify complaints over the lack of freedom of association made by local trade unions. The Committee called upon the Government to undertake independent investigations without delay into the allegationsof physical assault, harassment and intimidation of trade union leaders and members. It also considered the case of Peru which concerns allegations of murder of a trade union leader in 2008 in clashes with the police during a protest in the mining sector. As it had not been possible toidentify the perpetrators of the act, the Committee asked for further investigations to clarify the facts. Finally, the ILO supervisory body reviewed the measures taken by the Government of Belarus to implementthe 2004 recommendations of an ILO Commission of Inquiry. The Committee deeply regretted that the Government had once again failed toreply to the Committee’s previous recommendations and to the new allegations of freedom of association violations. It urged the Government to be more cooperative in the future. The ILO body examined 29 other cases and noted with satisfaction that effect had been given to its recommendations in cases related to the reinstatement of trade union members in Colombia and Peru, and the registration of a trade union in Algeria. BikyaMasr (November 15, 2012)

Briefing Ethiopia's Muslim Protests'

Religion has never been and shall never be a problem in Ethiopia, given the "government" doesnt intervene! Religious harmony is one of the mainlessons which the rest of the world itself can learn more from Ethiopians.

Tensions have been simmering over several months between Muslims andthe government, with thousands holding demonstrations in protest at the government's alleged interference in religious affairs; the government hasblamed the protests on a small group of extremists. Around 60 percent ofEthiopia's 84 million people are Christians; Muslims make up about one- third of the population, according to official figures. Religion-related clashes have been rare in the country, but unrest over the past several months has led to several deaths and dozens of arrests. IRIN looks at thecauses of, and fallout from, the protest.

What sparked the protests? The leaders of the protests, which began in December 2011, accuse the Ethiopian government of trying to impose theal-Ahbash Islamic sect on the country's Muslim community, which traditionally practises the Sufi form of Islam. Al-Ahbash beliefs are an interpretation of Islam combining elements of Sunni Islam and Sufism; itsteachings are popular in Lebanon. Said to be first taught by Ethiopian scholar Abdullah al-Harari, the Ethiopian Al-Ahbash teachings are moderate, advocating Islamic pluralism, while opposing political activism.

In December 2011, the state moved to dismiss the administration of the Awoliya religious school in Addis Ababa. In July, police dispersed an overnight meeting at the school on the eve of an African Union heads of state summit, and arrested several protesters and organizers of the meeting, which police officials said did not have a permit. Those behind the meeting, an "Arbitration Committee" of 17 led by prominent religious scholars, said they wanted to dialogue with the government but insisted they would continue legitimate protests to oppose its continued interference in the administration of the religious school and the election of members of the country's supreme Islamic Council. They accuse the government of dictating elections to the council, which concluded on 5 November, and favour the Al-Ahbash Muslim sect.Temam Ababulgu, a lawyer representing activists who led the protests - some of them are currently behind bars - says they are appealing to a federal court to cancelthe election and its outcome, on the grounds that the elections were not conducted in accordance with the council's by-laws. allafrica.com (November 15, 2012: Ethiopia)

Ethiopian Muslims Condemn Israel’s Aggression on Gaza'

It’s all about Palestine here in Ethiopia for the Muslim community. For them, they believe the Ethiopian government’s relationship with Israel canbe used to help end the ongoing violence in Gaza, which has spiraled out of control on Thursday, seeing near constant air strikes by Israel after three Israelis were killed in rocket attacks. “I think what we are seeing is the beginning of a new war against Gaza and the Palestinians and we as asociety should not stand for the killing of civilians,” Muslim student Hassan Aboutaiba told Bikyamasr.com on Thursday after watching the news and seeing the destruction of Palestinian land by the Israeli military’s air assault. “For me, the argument that Israel is defending itself is simply stupid. They assassinated a top Hamas official and didn’t expect a retaliation. That is ridiculous and I hope the media talk about this,” he added. Other Muslims across Ethiopia have voiced their solidarity with Palestinians in Gaza and urged their government to do more to end the violence.

“We have a strong relationship with Israel. Our governments talk often, soI think it would send a message if we expelled the ambassador. I know it won’t happen, but when is enough civilian deaths enough?” added Aboutaiba. All the Muslim community in Ethiopia concerns stem from daysof air strikes on Gaza and rocket retaliations. Early Wednesday evening, Israeli forces launched “Operation Pillar of Defense”, striking over 20 sitesacross the Gaza Strip and assassinating Ahmad Jabari, Hamas military chief known mostly for his role as the brain behind the 2005 kidnapping ofIsraeli soldier Gilad Shalit. Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz told army radio that “there is no escaping…a military decision on Hamas in Gaza.” The Popular Resistance Committee (PRC) has vowed to avenge Jabari’s death, stating that Israel “opened the gates of hell” with the assassination. The PRC spokesperson urged “cowardly settlers” to flee to shelters or be buried in their homes. PM Netanyahu stated that 20 percent of the total Israeli population lives under the threat of rocket fire from Gaza. Israeli officials claim the latest round of fighting began when Hamas launched ananti-tank missile on an Israeli military jeep. Hamas and the Popular Frontfor the Liberation of Palestine, both of whom took credit for the jeep attack, claimed Israel started the conflict when it killed a Palestinian childduring an incursion in Gaza last Thursday. “Operation Pillar of Defense” isthe largest offensive on Gaza since the 2008 Gaza War. Three Israeli civilians died on Thursday morning in a rocket strike on a home in southern Israel. At least 11 Palestinians died in Israeli airstrikes since Wednesday afternoon. As of present there are no reports that a ground invasion is underway, though several outlets are reporting heavy Israeli airstrikes on densely populated areas in Gaza. “If this is the future of the world, our government and Ethiopians must stand for justice no matter how hard it may be,” Aboutaiba added. BikyaMasr, Mohammad Awad (November 15, 2012)

Meles Zenawi’s legacy for the Horn of Africa’

Analysis: Any recent visitor to Ethiopia would be struck by the ubiquitous billboards commemorating the late Prime Minister’s life, two months after his demise. Meles Zenawi’s photo form the backdrop to the TV screens and adorns the streets of all the major towns and villages. These sights were supplemented by the chorus of Africa leaders that attended the PM’sfuneral and who lavished praise on this “dedicated son of African soil”. He was depicted as the untiring leader who toiled for the upliftment of the indigent peoples of Ethiopia and Africa. Among this choir were African presidents and prime ministers whose own policies have degraded the lives of their people. The least distinguished of these visitors were the former President and Prime Minister of Somalia whose tenure in power was marred by their total subservience to the Ethiopia regime. One wonders if this orchestrated and well managed public love of the late Zenawi reflects the thoughts and feeling of the peoples of Ethiopia and theneighbouring states where the PM’s policies had the greatest footprint.

Putting aside the propaganda of the Ethiopian governing party, the admiration of his cohort of political friends and partisan Ethiopian critics,most objective analysts would agree that, unlike the visiting African leaders, Zenawi left behind a record that deserves critical scrutiny.

Zenawi’s legacy Zenawi’s legacy can be viewed through two analytical lenses: a) his domestic footprint; (b) and his regional impact. To assess the PM’s legacy, we need to understand the political and economic contextof Ethiopia and the Horn of Africa when Zenawi and his party, the Tigray People’s Liberation Front (TPLF), came to power in 1991. First, Ethiopia was devastated by a brutal military dictatorship that massacred hundreds of thousands of people, while it also presided over the catastrophic famineof 1984 that devastated several regions of the country. Additionally, the military regime wasted Ethiopia's meagre and precious resources to oppress the legitimate struggle of the Eritrean people, as well as others inside Ethiopia, such as Tigray, Somali and the Oromos, to mention a few.War, famine and oppression were the hallmark of Ethiopia in 1990, and the regime was exhausted and had run out of ideas and energy to move the country beyond multiple calamities. Then came the last drive of the Eritrean resistance against the regime since they already controlled the entire countryside and surrounded the capital Asmara. Their ally in Ethiopia (TPLF) then pushed towards Addis Ababa and within a couple of months, it became clear that the regime's days were numbered. Given theethnic character of the TPLF, it was not clear whether its takeover of the capital will induce a new civil war with the Oromo liberation Front and other communities. Concerned about the possibility of having another failed state in the region, with all the attendant problems such as a tidal wave of refugees, the United States brokered an agreement between the regime and the TPLF. This pact allowed for a "peaceful" takeover of the capital and Mengistu's departure for exile.

The TPLF brought with it a client group of ethnic political parties, the so- called PDOs (People's Democratic Organisations), who jointly formed whatbecame known as EPRDF. But there has never been any doubt that TPLF controlled the levers of power in the country. The junior partners of the "coalition" were supposed to provide national legitimacy for the new ethnicauthority, however, the Ethiopian public largely considered the PDOs as lackeys. The independent Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), which initially joined the ruling coalition, failed to understand TPLF's militarist agenda and paid the ultimate price as the latter swiftly destroyed its military base.After this defeat, OLF went underground where it has virtually become inconsequential. Establishing the new order and consolidating TPLF's power took nearly a decade after which the regime turned more of its attention to other matters. After 21 years in power, we can emphatically state that Zenawi's regime has been a Janus-faced order. Its political rhetoric exuded democracy, peace, national harmony and development, but behind that façade was a determined security apparatus that crushed even the most democratic attempts to challenge its authority. This rhetoric proved seductive enough for outsiders, but all indications are thatit has failed to sway a majority of the population. It is these two faces of the regime that the remaining section of this brief will focus on.

But I must first provide an explanatory note about the nationalist character of the regime. I can categorically state that the late Premier Zenawi was an Ethiopian nationalist, despite the claims of some of the opponents that he was building Tigray for an eventual secession, if needs be. Many critics of the TPLF regime claim that it exploited the resources ofmost regions in Ethiopia to develop its home province. There is a grain of truth to this assertion, but I would suggest that to be a nationalist does not exclude a regime from internally differentiating regions by privileging some over others. Most critics do not understand that there are two kinds of nationalists: civic and sectarian nationalists. Civic nationalists genuinelytry to treat all regions and citizens alike and fairly. In contrast, sectarian nationalists protect the territorial integrity of the country but also establish a hierarchy of power which privileges certain groups and politicalfactions. Zenawi and his regime represented the latter version of nationalism and are not alone in this regard in the developing world.

Domestic footprint Zenawi's group and those they invited to take part in the political conference in the early 1990s produced a constitution which nominally privileged ethnic identity. They subsequently divided the country into ethnic provinces. There is little doubt that this political architecture gave modest advantages to most ethnic groups in the countrywho were the subjects of the empire, but such gains belied the fact that Addis Ababa remained the decisive power centre of the country. More critically, a small group of TPLF cadre and the security establishment they strategically controlled have had the final say about all the major issues.

Even when the affiliates of the TPLF became senior ministers, they remained pliant cadre without a backbone. I have witnessed the humiliation that comes with such status. The absence of any degree of autonomy on the part of those affiliates manifestly demonstrates that belonging to EPRDF has been like George Orwell's Animal Farm where "All animals are created equal, but some animals are created more equal than others". Despite cowering their partners and most of the population, Zenawi and his regime can legitimately claim several major accomplishments. First, the regime has created a physical infrastructure for the country that is better than what was left behind by all the previousregimes combined. The road network that spans to most regions of the country can facilitate national integration and development if progressivelyused. Second, the number of public universities has increased substantially over the last decade and this has allowed many young Ethiopians to gain access to some form of higher education. Third, the electrically grid of the country has been expanded and more hydroelectric dams have been built or are under construction and this has expanded thecountry's energy supply. Some of these dams were initiated illegally because other riparian countries that have a stake in the rivers were not consulted and no agreements were reached to satisfy all parties. Despite such illegal and unethical preemptions, the growth in electric production bodes well for the country's economic growth. Fourth, an intensive regimeof mineral exploration has been put in place which could deliver dividends for the country in the long run. Fifth, Zenawi and his team have not ameliorated the population's vulnerability to famine, but fortunately the country has avoided the catastrophic famines that used to take hundreds of thousands of lives. Finally, there has been an increase in the volume of foreign investment inthe country and the rate of economic growth has been substantial despitestarting from a very low base. The regime's liabilities are also numerous, but here is a sample of the major ones. First, in spite of the seemingly smooth transfer of authority to the Deputy Prime Minister, power is still wielded by individuals without legitimate institutional anchors. As such, authority in Ethiopia is extremely concentrated in two nodes that completely overlap: the TPLF core and the security establishment. The ultimate anchor of power is the security apparatus which has been loyal tothe TPLF rather than the country and the constitution. Such concentration of power has enfeebled all other institutions and has created a political culture and society deeply marooned in fear rather than genuine loyalty and respect for national institutions. The political and social consequencesof this republic of fear are far reaching. Second, although the economic sphere has been somewhat more liberalised, loyalty to the regime is still central to an entrepreneur's ability to succeed. In many instances, party connections are essential to start a major business, and important sectors of the economy are dominated by the party and its friends. Third, the republic of fear has suffocated the entire political spectrum through its unwillingness to tolerate even a minor political opposition. By claiming to win over 95 per cent of the votes in the last election, the regime has created a make-believe world where it is adored by all. Fourth, in some parts of the developing world, academics are not free to present their ideas/work regarding their countries' ailments, and Ethiopia appears to bethe model of academic unfreedom. This has been accomplished through the elimination of tenure or long-term contracts for faculty and the appointment of political loyalists to top academic positions. If a professor indulges in critical analysis of the political and development affairs of the country, there is little chance that his or her contract will be renewed.

Fear is the life blood of this system and compels productive academics toeither leave the country if they can, or languish in the margins, or simplybecome sycophants of the regime to maintain their livelihoods. Nevertheless, there are a few courageous scholars who have stayed true to the ethos of the academy and still remain in the country against incredible odds. Fifth, poor people dominate the landscape of Ethiopian cities and towns, and the UN has reported that over 80 per cent of the building structures of the capital are of slum quality. Mindful of this image,the regime has embarked on urban renewal that will ultimately remove most of the poor from the city and allocate the "freed" spaces to shoppingmalls and investors. It intends to house the indigents removed from thoseareas in apartments built on the outskirts of the city without examining alternative schemes that will keep these residents in their neighbourhoods. Finally, the collective effect of these liabilities is that public institutions in the country are beholden to the individuals in power rather that embodying national ethos. The shameless use of the security forces to retain power or intimidate the political opposition, and the culture of fear this engenders means that Premier Zenawi and his regime reinforced institutions the public fears but they have failed to create legitimacy for the post-1991institutions. Without legitimate institutions that are autonomous from particular leaders, the country remains in danger of fully sliding into an ethnic political strife.

The regional impact The “winds of change” in the Horn of Africa in 1990/1991 created opportunities which could have produced a bright future for all. Post-1991, Eritrean and Ethiopian leaders were cut from thesame political cloth since they closely collaborated in the battle field to dislodge the Mengistu regime. Nevertheless, one major factor separated the two movements: one was mainly a national liberation movement whilethe other was primarily an ethnic liberation project. On the Eastern front, Somalia provided material and diplomatic support for the leadership of both the Eritrean and Ethiopian liberation fronts, and the Somali people keenly followed the advances of the two fronts against Mengisu’s military while they also hoped for the fall of the Somali dictator. I remember visiting the border regions of Ethiopia and Somalia after the fall of Siyaad and Mengistu where I saw the population relish their new freedoms on either side of the border. The hope was that a new and more progressive political chapter for the region was in the offing. But the new lords of Ethiopia were steeped in a sanitised imperial orthodoxy. During the first decade in power, Zenawi and his subordinates adopted the same ethnic political logic, tested in Ethiopia’s ethnic provinces, to manipulate Somali affairs in the old Republic. The authorities in Addis Ababa made no effort to reach out to Somali civics, but instead chose warlords and sectarian political actors as their best collaborators. Once the Somali people realisedEthiopia’s new strategy of “divide and rule”, old animosities resurfaced and the Ethiopian occupation of parts of the Somali Republic and its invasion of their country and capital in 2006-08 dashed the last residue ofgood well. Nearly all Somali civic nationalists now see Ethiopia as an enduring enemy. In the north, the Ethiopian and Eritrean leaders who claimed to be the best of friends slowly drifted towards conflict and imposed a horrible, costly and unnecessary war on the population. The goodwill which has been nurtured in the battlefield of liberation vanished. After a devastating war which wasted over 100,000 lives, the two regimesconsented to arbitration. An international boundary commission was set and both governments guaranteed to accept the commission’s findings.

Eritrea immediately embraced the findings once the commission renderedits verdict. Unfortunately, Ethiopia is yet to honour its commitment as it introduced new conditions to the process and the international communityhas failed to enforce the commission’s ruling. Consequently and unfortunately, the two countries remain in a virtual state of war.

The verdict There is little doubt that history will judge Premier Zenawi as one of the two major leaders in Ethiopian history. His regime will be remembered for holding Ethiopia together as one country even under the centripetal ethnic order which his regime officially introduced. Second, Ethiopian nationalists will celebrate him as the man who invaded Somalia and occupied Mogadishu. Third, his government will be regarded for developing the country’s physical and educational infrastructure, and for refreshingly having the ambition of becoming a developmental state. WhatEthiopian democrats will not forgive is the regime’s failing to establish a political order and national institutions that have earned the loyalty and respect of the people. The conflation of the regime's interests with the national cause and the use of the security forces to domesticate the population is not a sustainable strategy if Ethiopia is to ever evolve into a vibrant democracy. The republic of fear must give way to the rule of law to thwart a more foreboding future. On the regional front, posterity will not be kind to the Zenawi regime as it has totally squandered the opportunity to forge a more peaceful and collaborative relations with Eritrea and Somalia given the goodwill of these two peoples. Allowing Somalis the opportunity to rebuild their government and society in a democratic fashion would have eliminated traditional hostilities between the two countries and boosted their mutuality. Further, this approach would have shifted hundreds of millions of dollars from the war machine to development which is desperately needed. Instead of building on that goodwill, the regime embarked on a reign of terror to destabilise Eritrea and keep Somalia in its catastrophic condition. Sadly, the attempt to impose regional tyranny will ricochet on Ethiopia and shall perpetuate the misery of all the peoples in the region. It is not too late to change course and anchor developments on the significant and positive elements of the last two decades, but will there be the wisdom and the will in Addis Ababa?

EMF Abdi Ismail Samatar is professor of geography at the University of Minnesota and a research fellow at the University of Pretoria,South Africa.

Ethiopian Muslims make pilgrimage to meet venerated leaders at KalitiCentral Prison'

Thousands of Ethiopian Muslims on Sunday made a historic pilgrimage to Kaliti Prison to pay tribute to their venerated leaders who have been behind bars on trumped-up charges of "instigating violence." "We were about 100,000 inside the prison to greet our leaders," one woman was heard as saying. "Several more thousands were outside of the fence, and regrettably, they had no chance to see the leaders." Another visitor adds,"We were allowed to greet our leaders in groups of 20. The moral couragewe saw on the smiling faces of the leaders was very inspiring."

Ethiopian Muslims have been forwarding two clear demands to the government: First, Muslims should elect their own leaders (instead of the government-picked Majlis)and second, the government should refrain from imposing a new brand of religion Ahbash on the Muslim faithful. Thegovernment not only rejected the demands but also jailed the revered leaders of the Ethiopian Muslims. Though the jailed Muslim leaders were known for their peaceful leadership qualities, Bereket Simon, the top official in post-Meles Ethiopia told William Davidson of Bloomberg: "Thosearrested are people who instigated the violence. They were trying to undermine the constitution under the guise of religion."One marcher said the purpose of the march to Kaliti Prison was to demonstrate to the wholeworld that those arrested were the legitimate leaders of Ethiopian Muslims, and not "violence instigators" as the government would like to call them. March organizers were very careful to conduct the program in apeaceful way so that the security forces would never get a scapegoat to justify their usual accusation that the intent of the marchers was to sow the seeds of chaos and mayhem. There are plans to launch similar pilgrimages to Kaliti Prison every week.

Ethiopia's Commitment to Mutual Benefit With Nile Riparian Countries’

Various media outlets have been reporting as if Egypt was prepared to attack Ethiopia, to protect its stake in River Nile quoting the internal emails from the U.S. Private-security firm STRATFOR. It is also heard thatthe Chief of the General Staff of the Armed Forces of Russia General Nikolai Makarov in his E-mailed letter to President Putin reported EgyptianAir Force (EAF) bombers and fighter jets have been ordered to deploy to their secret airbase near Kursi in the west of Sudan's Darfur region following the news that Israeli Air Force (IAF) raided the Yarmouk militaryfactory in Khartoum. Owing the different factors around the Nile, I think itis less probable that such an imminent danger exists, but it requires watchfulness.

Ethiopia bring in new faces for the CECAFA Challenge Cup’

Ethiopia have announced a squad which includes more than a dozen uncapped players for this month's Cecafa Challenge Cup in Uganda. Ethiopia assistant coach, Seyoum Kebede, has defended the decision to test new players at the Cecafa Challenge Cup, insisting it is still part of their Africa Cup of Nations preparations. The East African nation are sending a squad which includes 14 uncapped players, of which three are based overseas. Ethiopia's 21-man squad contains just one regular playerfrom both the Nations Cup and World Cup campaigns. "It's been 31 yearssince we last played at the Nations Cup and we have to start thinking about building the national team in a different way," Kebede explains. Many were expecting the 1962 African champions to field their full-strength side as an opportunity to benefit from competitive games before heading to South Africa. Instead the Ethiopians have opted to scourEurope for eligible players, whilst building a second string side as part of their preparations for the Cup of Nations. "The players who've been part of the World Cup and Nations Cup campaigns need to recuperate," coach Kebede said. "We don't want to take them immediately from the Cecafa and straight into the Nations Cup because maybe their performance mightdecline. "We are also getting many contacts from Ethiopian-born players from different corners like Yusuf Salah from Sweden, who has arrived already and we would like to see him play at the Cecafa level. "Together with the head coach we have presented this plan to the federation and suggest that this will help us for future campaigns." The current head coach Sewnet Bishaw guided Ethiopia to the Cup of Nations in South Africa, but Kebede will be leading the coaching staff for the Cecafa Challenge Cup in Uganda. "After a 31-year absence we are now part of history, and when you go to a competition like the Cup of Nations it is not to go and participate. We have to do something," Kebede added. "Apart from the hosts, out of all the participants, Ethiopia will have the largest supporters in the (Cup of Nations) tournament because there is a huge community living there. "We have to make them proud and that is why weare preparing to send a strong team to South Africa." Kebede has said that even though his squad has no international experience they should not be underestimated. "The team we are taking to Cecafa is also excellent and they have good experience at their clubs, so in Uganda theywill get international exposure. "They say we are in the group of death. South Sudan have players who are playing abroad and they are not different in standards to the other Sudan we know. "Uganda have a good history in East Africa, and Kenya are also good, but I can assure you that our team is also not easy. We hope to be the surprise team of the tournament." The Waliya Antelopes will open the Cecafa Challenge Cup onSaturday against neighbours South Sudan in the first match of Group A, which also includes Kenya and the host nation Uganda. AFCON, November18, 2012: Ethiopia, more than ever, is committed to bring the Nile River issue onboard for mutual benefit’ OPINION: In the past two decades, through its foreign relation policy and strategy, Ethiopia has eagerly been striving to bring to the table the stakeholders to arrive at a consensus on the issue. The country, as always, pursued a policy of cooperation with its neighbouring countries to foster the political, economic and people to people integration. Ethiopia's ability to determine how to utilize the most contentious issue of water has now appeared an innovative achievement after years of being ignored by Egypt's and Sudan's Nile-based development since 1929. Egypt and Sudaninsisted keeping their share of the waters based on the colonial treaty of 1959. The water flows through their largely arid lands on the way to the Mediterranean. Ethiopia, which provides not less than 85 per cent of the flow into Lake Nasser from Abay where the Grand Renaissance Dam is being built and other watersheds, was not even considered as party state that contributes a drop of water let alone as of a riparian country. Emperor Haile-Selassie and Colonel Mengistu Haile-Mariam had been appealing of protesting to the international community, to no avail. There was a lot misunderstanding between these two countries, Egypt andEthiopia, and this has been going on since Sadat to Mubarek in Egypt and during Haile-Selassie and Mengistu in Ethiopia. It should be noted, however, Egypt had been playing a major role in the decades of Nile talks sponsored by donors and World Bank. The nine basin members, now the new state of South Sudan is added, discussed and drafted a Nile Basin Initiative to manage the entire resources of the Nile with greater equity and efficiency. Ethiopian Press Agency (Addis Ababa NOVEMBER 20, 2012) BY GOITOM T.

Ethiopia Denies Intention to Monopolize Water behind Millennium Dam’

The Ethiopian Minister of Energy and Irrigation, Ale maye hum Tegnu has denied any intention by his country to monopolize the water behind the Grand Millennium Development Dam inside the Ethiopian territories. The Ethiopian official who was addressing a workshop organized by the International University of Africa in cooperation with the Ethiopian embassy in Khartoum on the Effects of the Millennium Dam on Sudan andEgypt denied his country's desire to threaten water security in any Nile basin country. He stressed that his country adopts the policy of cooperation with Sudan and Egypt in this connection, adding that the damwill increase development opportunities, improvement of economy and trade exchange between Ethiopia, Sudan and Egypt. The minister pointedout that the water reserved behind the dam will increase the farmland in Egypt and Sudan, stressing that the arable land in Ethiopia is very small.

The Academician on the Ethiopian Renaissance Dam’

The Counselor of International University of Africa, Professor Hassan Mekki has indicated that the Ethiopian Renaissance Dam is the largest artificial lake in Africa, where it stores 50 billion cubic meters of water, pointing out that Sudan is the biggest beneficiary of the dam. ProfessorMekki praised the efforts of Ethiopian ambassador in Sudan Abadi Zemofor the success of the symposium and to achieve positive results for thebenefit of the peoples of Sudan, Ethiopia and Egypt. Sudan Vision November 20, 2012

AU Chairperson Urges Full Implementation of Addis Ababa Agreements’

The Chairperson of the African Union Commission, Dr. Nkosazana Dlamini Zuma, has welcomed the convening of the second ordinary meeting of theJoint Political and Security Mechanism (JPSM), held in Juba, from November 6th - 7th. The meeting was co-chaired by the Ministers of Defense of the Republic of Sudan and the Republic of South Sudan. The Chairperson, however, regretted that the meeting could not reach agreement on practical steps to implement security arrangements contained in the Agreements signed at the Summit between President Omar Hassan al Bashir of the Republic of Sudan and President Salva Kiir Mayardit of the Republic of South Sudan in Addis Ababa, on September 27th last year. The Chairperson of the Commission stressed the need for the "full and timely implementation of the security arrangements", to enhance confidence between the two States along their common border, and to facilitate the full implementation of all the other Agreements reached. The Chairperson also pleaded with the Government of Sudan andthe Sudan People's Liberation Movement- North (SPLM-North) to open direct negotiations under the auspices of the AU High-Level Implementation Panel on Sudan and South Sudan (AUHIP), to help move towards peaceful resolution to the conflicts in the two Sudanese states of

Blue Nile and Southern Kordofan. Government of Ethiopia, Addis AbabaNovember 20, 2012

Ethiopia will be in greater risk of conflict in 5 and 40 years time – Study'

Scenarios: The world will be a more peaceful place in 2050: An upcomingpaper by a political scientist will claim that in 40 years world conflict will plummet, with the greatest decrease occurring in the Middle East. HåvardHegre, a professor in the department of Political Science at the Universityof Oslo, carried out a series of statistical analyses to come to the conclusion, in collaboration with the Peace Research Institute Oslo (PRIO). The study reveals that in five years' time India, Ethiopia, the Philippines, Uganda and Burma will be at the greatest risk of conflict, while in 40 years time it will be India, Nigeria, Sudan, Ethiopia and Tanzania. The good news? Those conflicts ongoing in 2011, including in Iraq, Libya, Tajikistan, Syria, Senegal, Ivory Coast and Mauritania, will most likely be over. Among other things, this will be attributed to war becoming financially pointless (or unfeasible), education increasing, infant mortality decreasing and the world's youth populations becoming smaller. The timing of the publication, which is due to appear in the nextissue of International Studies Quarterly, may perhaps be a little troublingto Hegre, what with the world on tenterhooks watching the conflict between Israel and Gaza escalate, rhetoric growing more extreme by theday. Regardless, Hegre's hypothesis is one we'd all like to believe in. Theanalysis took into account things like historical conflicts from the past 40years, economics, population growth and infant mortality projections andeducation. The information was fed into a simulation programme built byJoakim Karlsen, a computer scientist at Østfold University College, whichwas then run 18,000 times. The resulting figures suggested that by 2050armed conflict — defined as being "between governments and political organisations that use violence and in which at least 25 people die" — would be occurring in every 12th country. Currently, that proportion is every sixth country, so it will take four decades for us to halve the numbers. War has become less and less popular since the Second World War, explains the paper, and that trend is set to continue because of a number of converging factors.

"War has become less acceptable, just like dueling, torture and the death penalty," said Hegre. "Conflicts that involve a high degree of violence, such as Syria, are becoming increasingly rare." However, he acknowledges that, despite land invasion losing gravitas as a reason for war, future "demands for democracy may be suppressed with violence andresult in more violence in the short term — as in Libya."

In fact, the recentconflict in the Middle East caused Hegre and his colleagues to reassess their initial predictions. "Prior to the Arabian spring, we expected five percent of the countries in the world to be involved in a conflict in 2050.

This percentage has now risen to seven percent. The conflicts in theMiddle East weaken the clear correlation between socio-economic development and the absence of civil war. The conflicts in Syria and Libya show that we also have to include democratisation processes in the model. To achieve this, we are now working on projecting democratic systems of government and regime changes." So even the current model could need some serious adjustments. And, considering the impact of Israel's current action against Gaza, it may need to be readjusted further to reflect the potential trickle affect across the Middle East and beyond, if Hegre failed to take this into account. The socio-economic factors largely remain the same, however. For instance, high infant mortality rates have been linked to high probability of conflicts, according to Hegre, and the UNhas predicted a steep decline in infant mortality everywhere. Factors contributing to future peace will be populations growing at a slower pace and the number of young people decreasing, except in African countries —consequently, the simulation has conflicts increasing in Tanzania, Mozambique and Malawi, as well as China, and decreasing significantly in Colombia, Turkey and Thailand, as well as Algeria. Education will contribute significantly to the decrease — it leads to fewer births, so thereare less mouths to feed — as will economics, which of course contributes to how all the other factors progress. "Economic changes in society have resulted in both education and human capital becoming important," says Hegre. "A complex economy makes political violence less attractive. It hasbecome too expensive to kill people. Modern society is dependent on economic development. It is too expensive to use violence to destroy this network. It has also become harder to take financial capital by force. It is easy to move capital across national borders. Therefore, a cynical leader will be less likely to choose violence as a strategy." It might be hard to trust any data with an optimistic outlook on world peace, however Hegre did verify its accuracy (as far as one can) by using the simulation data from the years preceding 2000 to predict conflicts occurring between 2001and 2009. Those stats, which used data from as far back as 1970, estimated conflict would be more than 50 percent in 20 countries. It overestimated by four countries. There are no doubt plenty of factors Hegre cannot possibly predict that will affect future global peace.

However, the simulation is a good general indicator of the factors affectingconflict. Along with adding democratisation to the model, he may do well to add other facets of warfare. For instance, the model only includes "conflict between governments and political organisations", and not tribal war or individual terrorists. Considering the latter has increased in some parts of the world in recent decades, its contribution to social stability should be considered significant, if only for how that impact drives foreign policy as well as institutional aggression and distrust. IndepthAfrica, by Liat Clark November 21st, 2012

Causes of deaths at Ethiopian hospitals'

Study: Ethiopia is encountering a growing burden of non-communicable diseases along with infectious diseases, perinatal and nutritional problemsthat have long been considered major problems of public health importance. This retrospective analysis was carried out to examine the mortality patterns from communicable diseases and non communicable diseases in public and private hospitals of Addis Ababa. Methods: Approximately 47,153 deaths were captured over eight years (2002– 2010) in forty three public and private hospitals of Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. Data collectors (43 hospital clerks) and coordinators (3 nurses)had been extensively trained on how to review hospital death records.

Information obtained included: dates of admission and death, age, sex, address, and principal cause of death. Only the diseases responsible for deaths are taken as the cause of death. Cause of death was coded using International Classification of Diseases(ICD-10) and data were double entered. Diseases were classified into: Group I (communicable diseases, maternal conditions and nutritional deficiencies); Group II (non- communicable causes); and Group III (injuries). Percentages, proportionalmortality ratios, 95% confidence intervals (CI) and Adjusted odd ratios (OR) were calculated. Results: Overall, 59% of the deaths were attributedto Group I diseases, and 31% to Group II diseases and 12% to injuries. Nearly 56% of the males and 68% of the females deaths were due to five leading causes (conditions arising during perinatal period, HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis, cardiovascular diseases and respiratory infections). Significantly larger proportions of females died from Group I (67%) and Group II diseases (32%) compared with males (where the respective proportions were 52% and 30%). Significantly higher proportion of males (17%) than females (6%) were dying from Group III diseases. Deaths due to Group I diseases decreased while those due to Group II diseases increased with age. Overall Group I diseases and HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis and still birth mortality in particular have showed decreasing trend while Group II and III increasing over time. Double burden in mortality was highly observed in the age groups of 15–64 years. Those aged >45 years were dying more likely with non- communicable diseases compared with children. Children aged below 15 years were 16 times more likely to die from communicable, perinatal and nutritional conditions compared with elders. Mortality variation with age has been identified between public and private hospitals. Conclusions: Theresults of the present study shows that, in addition to the common Group I causes of death, emerging group II diseases are contributing to high proportions of mortality in the public and private hospitals of Addis Ababa,Ethiopia. Thus, priority should be given to the prevention and management of conditions arising during perinatal period such as low birth weight and still birth, HIV/AIDS; tuberculosis, respiratory infections, cardiovascular diseases, malignant neoplasm, chronic respiratory diseasesand road traffic accident. The planning of health resources and activities should take into account the double burden in mortality due to Group I and Group II diseases. This calls for strengthening approaches towards the control and prevention of non-communicable diseases such as cardiovascular and malignant neoplasm. Source: -//BMC Public Health (November 22, 2012)

Web wiretapping 'Revolutionary' technology could allow governments tolisten in on your Skype conversations’ OPINION: Until now voice-over internet services have been difficult for police to tap. The technology is latest to offer governments a way to intercept web chats. New eavesdropping technology could allow government agencies to 'silently record' conversations on internet chat services like Skype in real time. Until now, so called voice over internet protocol (VoIP) services havebeen difficult for police to tap into, because of the way they send information over the web. The services convert analogue audio signals into digital data packets, which are then sent in a way that is costly and complex for third parties to intercept. That has led some countries to block VoIP services on security grounds and led the FBI to push for powers to force internet chat providers to build in 'backdoors' that its agents can use to wiretap suspects' conversations. But now a California businessman has obtained a patent for a 'legal intercept' technology he says 'would allow governments to "silently record" VoIP communications'. Secure.. until now: A patent filed by a California-based businessman describes technology that would make it easy for authorities to tap into peer-to-peer VoIP services like Skype. Mail Times, by Damian Gayle (November 21, 2012)

How Ethiopia lost its Teff genetic resources'

Views: The amazing story of theTeff Agreement has been uncovered and meticulously documented in a recent FNI report by FNI researchers ReginеAndersen and Tone Winge. Teff is a food grain endemic to the Ethiopian highlands, where it has been cultivated for several thousand years. Rich innutritional value, it is an important staple crop for Ethiopians. Since it is gluten-free, it is also interesting for markets in other parts of the world. A 2005 agreement between Ethiopia and the Dutch company HPFI gave HPFI access to 12 Ethiopian teff varieties, which it was to use for developing new teff-based products for the European market. In return, the company was to share substantial benefits with Ethiopia. The Teff Agreement was hailed as one of the most advanced of its time. It was seen as a pilot case for the implementation of the Convention on BiologicalDiversity (CBD) in terms of access to and benefit-sharing from the use of genetic resources (ABS). But the high expectations were never met: The only benefits Ethiopia ever received were 4000 Euro and a small, early interrupted research project. And then, in 2009, the company went bankrupt. In the years prior to bankruptcy, however, HPFI managed to obtain a broad patent on the processing of teff flour in Europe, covering ripe grain, as well as fine flour, dough, batter and non-traditional teff products. This patent, along with other values of the company, had then been transferred to new companies set up by the same owners. These companies now possess the exclusive rights to a large range of teff-based products. But as it was the now bankrupt HPFI that was Ethiopia's contract partner, these new companies are not boundby the contractual obligations of HPFI towards Ethiopia. Ethiopia thus ended up receiving practically none of the benefits promised under the agreement, and its future opportunities to profit from teff in internationalmarkets were smaller than before. FNI News (November 28, 2012)

Ethiopia’s leader has fired a government minister whose wife facesterrorism charges’

Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn on Thursday fired the country’s civilminister, Junedin Sado, whose wife is one of 29 people facing terrorism charges related to protests by Muslims who accuse of the government of meddling in their religious affairs. Junedin Sado published a letter in the country’s independent newspapers in which he defended his wife and criticized the federal prosecutor’s charges. Also in Thursday’s Cabinet reshuffle, Hailemariam promoted two ministers to double as deputy prime ministers, giving the country three deputy prime ministers for the first time, a sign the ruling party is favoring collective leadership after the August death of its longtime leader Meles Zenawi. Tedros Adhanom was appointed as the country’s new foreign affairs minister. AP (November 29,2012)

Ethiopian Prime Minister reshuffles post-Zenawi cabinet'

Ethiopia’s prime minister, Hailemariam Dessalegn, reshuffled his cabinet; his first since he assumed power in September following the death of his predecessor, Meles Zenawi. The House of People’s Representatives on Thursday endorsed the appointment of five ministers presented by PM Haile Mariam Desallegn Dessalegn. He appointed an additional two DeputyPrime Ministers, giving Ethiopia three deputy prime ministers for the first time in its history. Mukhtar Kedir was appointed with the rank of deputy minister. Civil service minister; Debretsio Gebremichael took the posts of deputy prime minister and information technology minister. Demeke Mekonnen was appointed as the deputy prime minister and minister of education. Former health minister, Tewodros Adhanom, has been appointed as minister of foreign affairs. Kebede Chane has become the trade minister. Keseteberhan Admassu is now the minister of health. No changes were made to key ministerial posts such as defence, justice and agriculture.

Minister Dismissed' In related news, Dessalegn today fired thecountry’s civil service minister, Junedin Sado, whose wife is facing terrorism charges in connection with the ongoing protests by Muslims who accuse government of interference in their religious affairs. Ethiopian Muslims, who make up over 35 percent of the country’s 84 million population, continued to stage protests in the capital, Addis Ababa, on Friday. They are seeking a review of the government’s religious policies.

Ethiopia, which fears a hard-line Islamist influence within the predominantly Christian nation, accuses the protesters of attempts to incite Islamic militancy. Sado has defended his wife and criticised the federal prosecutor’s charges. Sado’s wife is one among the 29 people who are currently facing terrorism charges, according to reports by localindependent newspapers. Sudan Tribune (November 29, 2012)

The Notorious Communication and Information Technology Ministerappointed vice PM'

The House of Peoples' Representatives (HoPR) today approved the appointment of two new Deputy Prime Ministers. Minister of Communication and Information Technology, Debretsion Guebre Michael, and Minister of Cabinet Affairs and head of the Office of the Prime Ministerwere both appointed to be coordinators for Finance and Economy Cluster with the rank of Deputy Prime Minister and Governance and Reform Cluster with the rank of Deputy Prime Minister respectively. Muktar was also appointed to be the Minister of Civil Service replacing Junedine

Sado. Hailemariam said that the new portfolio of his deputies is structuredin a way that his administration's focus is on good governance and reformas well as finance and economy. In an another unprecedented move Hailemariam appointed Tewodros Adhanom (Ph.D.), minister of Health, tobe Foreign Minister. Keseteberhan Admasu State Minister of Heath was appointed to be Minister of Health while Kebede Chane, who served as Minister of Trade for over a year without the endorsement of the House, has been confirmed in the same position. Acting Foreign Minister, BerhaneGebrekristos assumed his previous position of State Minister of Foreign Affairs. The fate of Junedine Sado, former Minister of Civil Service remainsunknown. Lone opposition MP, Girma Seifu, accepted the new cabinet reshuffle but turned down the appointment of Kebede Chanie. (November,29, 2012)

Meles Zenawi, the former Prime Minister of Ethiopia, has been dead foraround three months'

But the "Melesmania" personality cult, though discreet in his lifetime, shows no sign of fading. From giant portraits in the streets to stickers onthe windscreens of almost any vehicle, a smiling Meles is still everywhere. The sudden death of Meles shook the whole of Ethiopia. The shock quickly gave way to fear of an unknown and threatening future. Theregime did everything to exploit this fear for its own benefit. It has issued continuous calls for the nation to unite around the memory of the dead leader and, above all, around the project he designed and imposed with an iron hand. The new Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, endlessly repeats that he will pursue "Meles's legacy without any change". He has replaced not a single cabinet minister. It could be said that the regime is running on autopilot, with the Meles software driving the leadership computer. Plunged into disarray, the governing team is hanging on to thissoftware like a lifebelt. Why? Meles rules from beyond the grave, but for how long? By René Lefort, Open Democracy (November 29, 2012)

Meles Zenawi Considered A Tyrant'

Meles Zenawi who died at the age of 57 on 20 Aug, 2012, considered a tyrant in the 21st century and gross human right abuser. According to commentators, when Meles came to the Ethiopian political scene before 21years ago, he had the perfect historical opportunity to end the cycle of political violence, injustice, ethnic inequality and poverty that debilitated Ethiopia for decades, but he deliberately not used this opportunity for the aspiration of the people of Ethiopia for freedom; justice, equality, and prosperity were met with divide and rule tactic policy. Obviously, Meles and his era has gone, but the problem he creates still a big assignment forall Ethiopians, such as, the ethnic division, the sham federal arrangement, the rampant corruption, and the repressive policies that he created for 21 years are ahead. The Woyane revolution as a Tigrean ethnic revolution is buried with Meles Zenawi. Yes – the dream of Greater Tigrai, the dream ofTigrean dynasty, the dream of independent Tigrai nation state…. are all gone. Meles the revolutionary, Meles the face of TPLF, Meles the pride of Tigrai is buried in Addis wrapped-in Ethiopian flag. Yes, you heard it right?, not in Tigrean flag but wrapped-in Ethiopian flag; not in Dedebit, not in Adwa, not in Mekele, not even in Tigrai but in Shoa. The Tigrean safety net: Article Thirty Nine is null and void. The Tigreans have crossed the Rubicon. Now, it is safe to say, that the Tigreans are Ethiopians. Editor

New Ethiopian Prime Minister Changes Cabinet to Give Ethnic Balance'

Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn appointed two new deputypremiers to share the leadership of the government between the four ethnic-based parties of the Horn of Africa nation's ruling coalition. The second and third deputies are Muktar Kedir, a former adviser to the primeminister and leading member of the Oromo People's Democratic Organization, and Information Technology Minister Debretsion Gebremichael, who is also deputy chairman of the Tigray People's Liberation Front, Hailemariam told lawmakers today in the capital, Addis Ababa. Demeke Mekonnen, the education minister and leader of the Amhara National Democratic Movement, was appointed as a deputy prime minister in September. The appointments reflect a balancing act within the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front, said Jason Mosley, associate fellow of the Africa program at London-based Chatham House. "They've now got all four parties represented within the prime minister and deputy prime minister slots." Hailemariam leads a multi- ethnic bloc from southern Ethiopia in the ruling party. He was appointed prime minister in September following the death of former Premier Meles Zenawi on Aug. 20. Ethiopia, the continent's second-most populous nation, is a key U.S. ally in its battle against al-Qaeda in the region.

Ethiopian troops in December invaded Somalia for the second time in fouryears to join the battle against al-Shabaab, al-Qaeda's Somalia affiliate. Meles, an ethnic Tigray who ruled Ethiopia for 21 years after leading a victorious rebel movement and who oversaw one of Africa's fastest-growing economies, died from an infection contracted while he wasrecovering from an undisclosed illness. 'Awkward Phase': Today's changes confirm that the EPRDF is in an “awkward phase” as it tries to “rule by committee” and replace a leadership dominated by revolutionary fighters,Mosley said in an e-mailed response to questions today. “Hailemariam is not in a position to centralise power, whatever his personal inclinations might be,” he said. Among other changes, Tedros Adhanom, the former health minister and a member of the TPLF’s politburo, was appointed foreign minister, Hailemariam said. Debretsion, whose ministry oversees the state-owned Ethio Telecom monopoly and who is also chairman of theboard of Ethiopia Electric Power Corp., will coordinate the economy as a deputy prime minister, Hailemariam said. Muktar’s portfolio as deputy willbe governance and he also will become civil service minister, replacing Junedin Sado, whose wife is being tried on terrorism charges. Tedros is succeeded at the Health Ministry by former state minister Kesete Birhan, Hailemariam said. Tedros was given the 2011 Jimmy and Rosalynn Carter Humanitarian Award for his leadership of Ethiopia’s health program. His strategies helped to reduce the mortality rate for under-5s by 28 percent in the past five years, according to the U.S. Agency for International Development. Bloomberg News, by William Davison (November 29, 2012)

ECX is once again preparing to spend’

The Ethiopia Commodity Exchange (ECX) is preparing to spend some of the money that the government has borrowed from the Investment Climate Facilities for Africa Trust (ICF) and other donors on an online trading platform at an estimated total cost of more than $10 million (exactamount and details are withheld). The Ethiopia Commodity Exchange (ECX) is currently conducting a high-ticket international procurement - thefirst of its kind since a multi-million dollar bid was busted in 2010 due to alleged fraud and corruption during the bidding process. The bid for the supply, installation, and maintenance of a futures trading software that ECX floated back in 2010 was marred by dishonest maneuvering, seemingly to favor the Sri Lanka based company, Millennium IT, and World Bank withdrew ECX's award proposal and cancelled the loan. The loan was part of what the government had borrowed from International Development Association (IDA) for the purposes of financing the Rural Capacity Building Project (November 30, 2012)

Meles Zenawi's Death Dividend'

OPINION: The death of Meles Zenawi on August 20 at the age of 57 brought to an end more than two decades of controversial rule. In 1991, at the age of 36, Zenawi became the youngest ruler in Africa after leadinghis Tegrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF), an ethnic militia from the country's north, to crush Marxist dictator Mengistu Haile Mariam, and helping to save Ethiopia from the ruins of civil war. Ethiopia under Zenawican however be summed up in two key words: development and authoritarianism. Ethiopia under Zenawi saw a remarkable economic growth with the economy growing on the average of 10 percent in the last five years. The IMF rated the country the fastest non-oil growing economyin Africa. Confidence in the Ethiopian economy soared with investors from Europe, North America, Asia and Africa, including Tiger Brands of South Africa, Canada's Allana, Schulze Global Investments of America, Diageo and Heineken, all making their pitch in the country pumping hundreds of millions of dollars into the economy. Apart from direct Chinese investmentin the country, the Chinese government has been loaning the country about $3 billion annually, most of which has been used for infrastructure development including schools, clinics, roads, railway lines, hydropower stations and canals. The consequence is that there has been notable improvement in the lives of ordinary Ethiopians. Although poverty is still pervasive, a majority of the country's population are not starving. Food security in Ethiopia has drastically improved, and hunger and malnutrition,which featured in the country in the 1970s and 1980s, are not as threatening as before. The government of Meles Zenawi projected Ethiopiaas the pillar of stability in the Horn of Africa and in the process even cameto assume the status of policeman of the Horn of Africa. The UN Security Council in 2011 voted to allow Ethiopia to deploy about 4200 soldiers to Abyei, the oil-rich border town between North and South Sudan, which has become a major source of tension between the two countries. Ethiopia also played key role in mediating between the two Sudans. Since 2006, Ethiopia has played a pivotal role in trying to bring peace, security and stability to Somalia. Together with Kenya and Africa Union forces, Addis Ababa helped to push the al-Shabaab terror group out of Mogadishu and Beledweyne, and the terror group is now on the defensive. These efforts to bring stability to East Africa and to rid the region of terrorism made Ethiopia the most important ally of the West in East Africa. According to US officials, Ethiopia's military and security services have become the Central Intelligence Agency's most trusted allies in the war against extremism and terrorism in East Africa. Ethiopia's aggressive attitude towards terrorism has earned the country not only praises, but also more than $4 billion in development assistance annually. The country's leaders have also been rewarded by the West. Former Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, for example, was a regular participant in G8 and G20 gatherings. He also spoke at the World Economic Forum in Davos-Switzerland and during climate change negotiations in Durban and Copenhagen. Zenawi used his presence in these gatherings to project a voice for Africa helping to articulate Africa's interests on the international stage.

But the development initiatives and the aggressive stance on terrorism came at the expense of democracy, human rights, free speech, ethnic andreligious cohesion, and regional stability. In the latter part of his reign, Zenawi and his government became increasingly authoritarian and repressive. Democracy and human rights have suffered a terrible blow, particularly since 2005. Many opposition figures have either been imprisoned or have been forced to flee the country. Anti-terrorism laws passed in 2009 have been used to criminalise free speech leading to a number of journalists and activists either being imprisoned or freeing the country for their safety. Apart from the erosion of democratic values, Ethiopia has become ethnically polarised. This is largely due to the 1994 constitution which divided Ethiopia into ethnically-based regions. The Tigrai ethnic group of Meles Zenawi (which makes up about 6.07 percent of the population) dominates not only the ruling Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), but also the country's economy,commerce, political and military sectors much to the chagrin of Amharas, Gurages and other ethnic groups. The ethnicisation of the country has seen separatists' movements springing up in several places including the Afar, Oromo and Ogaden regions. The smooth and peaceful transfer of power to Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Hailemariam Desalegn put to rest (at least for now) the speculation of leadership battleand the much feared leadership crisis and helped to restore confidence in the country. Desalegn's confirmation shows that the ruling elite in Ethiopiaunderstand the importance of stability and positive continuity in their country.

The greatest dividend is that the death of Zenawi and the coming into office of Desalegn could mark the end of the old era of authoritarianism, political intolerance, ethnic and religious polarization, and the beginning ofa new era of democracy, respect for human rights, and decriminalisation of free speech, inclusive economic development and political stability. In fact, the appointment of Desalegn (a non-Tegrayan) may calm down ethnic tension both in the country and within the ruling EPRDF party. This has the potential to avoid the kind of instability that some analysts predicted. One of Desalegn's first acts in office was the release of two Swedes from prison, who were convicted of helping Ogaden National Liberation Front rebels to destabilise the country. Their release signals that the new PM might move away from some of the unpopular policies ofhis predecessor. The release of the Swedes also raises optimism that Desalegn might release opposition members, journalists and activists whowere incarcerated under Zenawi. Any gesture of that nature will mark a new era of relationship between the ruling government, civil society and the opposition parties and will have the potential of returning competitive politics and democracy in the country. However, this optimism has to be balanced with the realistic and critical question of whether the new PM willcontinue with the same policies of his predecessor or whether he will be his own man. The first part of the question is true. To begin with, Desalegn appears to have little influence within the EPRDF and will not be able to control the powerful Tegrayan bloc in the party and in the government. In fact with elections due in 2015, it is unlikely that the new PM will engineer any drastic policy moves that will antagonise the Tegrayan bloc. Even if he succeeds in carrying out major reforms, it is improbable that the Tegrayan elite who dominate the ruling EPRDF party will give grounds so easily and will fight to maintain their power, influenceand interests.

The fear is that if the Tegrayan bloc continues to dominate, control and shape government policies, it will further deepen the ethnic polarisation inthe country, erode democratic values, possibly break up the ruling EPRDF party, and threaten Ethiopia's fragile political, social and economic environment. The worst case scenario is that instability is likely to be final outcome. That said, Desalegn's is not expected to shift away from the leadrole the state plays in driving development. Ethiopia is also likely to continue to be involved in the internal affairs of her neighbours especially Somalia and Sudan. However, is also expected to cooperate with her neighbours in a number of areas including joint infrastructural development, intelligence sharing, defeating terrorism, and promoting regional peace, security and stability. Given the important role donor funds play in Ethiopia's development, the country's relationship with the West, and particularly the United States, is expected to continue unchanged and may deepen even further. The need to attract badly needed investment to promote economic growth, infrastructure development and poverty reduction will see Ethiopia deepening its relationship with China, India and Middle Eastern countries. Whatever changes that take place in the post-Zenawi era, especially with respect to democracy, human rights, inclusive economic development, ethnic and religious cohesion, and regional peace, security, stability among others, will be heavily influenced by the internal politics within the ruling EPRDF party. (November 30, 2012)Lord Aikins Adusei is an independent energy and security analyst on Africa. His research interests include security, development and energy.

Politics: Freedom of Religions’

OPINION: In Ethiopia, trial of Muslim leaders reveals simmering unrest' Last month, in a courtroom in Addis Ababa, 29 defendants listenedintently as the prosecution summarised charges. The accused were Muslimmen in their thirties, elderly sheikhs in religious attire, and Habiba Mohammed, the wife of Junedin Sado, Ethiopia’s Minister for the Civil Service and Chairman of the Board of Addis Ababa University. The crime? Organising protests against the government and participating in a far- reaching conspiracy to dismantle the constitution and establish an Islamic state in Ethiopia. The trial has: exacerbated existing tensions between Ethiopia’s Muslim community who make up about 34 per cent of the population and the national government; has claimed high-profile victims like Mr. Junedin, a once-powerful regional politician who has disappeared from the public eye; and revealed the tangled nexus between religion, politics and public life in Ethiopia. Temam Ababulgu, the lawyer for the accused, said his clients were being persecuted for opposing the government and had been tortured in prison. Rights groups such as Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International and the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom have criticised the government’s heavy- handed treatment of its Muslim minority; charges that the government denies. Government spokespersons did not respond to repeated requests for an interview. Ethiopia has served as the incubator for both Christianityand Islam; the Christian majority traces its lineage back to the fourth century reign of Emperor Ezana, while Muslims speak of the "First Hijra" when Prophet Mohammed's followers fled persecution in Arabia and sought refuge here in the seventh century. A Christian monarchy ruled thecountry up to 1974 when Emperor Haile Selassie was overthrown by a secular communist military regime that gave way to the current dispensation in 1991. The 1994 constitution established the secular natureof the state, but many Muslims feel that the government has consistently marginalised their community and restricted their freedom of worship in the guise of enforcing secularism. Ethiopia has no history of sectarian violence, and Muslim leaders have emphasised that their ire is directed at the government, not the Christian community.

INFLUENCE OF RADICAL GROUPS: In background interviews, government officials who did not want to be named said they were concerned by the influence of global radical Islamist groups like the Al Qaeda affiliated Al Shabab in neighbouring Somalia, and that wealthy Islamic charities in the Middle East were funnelling money into Ethiopia in a bid to radicalise Muslim youth. "There is a very real concern amongst the people that radical Wahhabi groups are establishing themselves in Ethiopia, and that the government is not doing enough to stop them," said an official. In thisparticular case, for instance, the government accuses two non- governmental organisations — the Albir Development Cooperation and Association and Nema — of providing material support to the defendants. Albir was established in 2005 by Sheikh Sultan Haji Ahman, who lived in Saudi Arabia for several years before returning to Ethiopia. He is one of the 29 defendants currently in jail. "Albir is not a religious organization. It is a registered NGO that works on water and sanitation, provides cash assistance and educational support for 1,401 destitute families in 21 sites across Ethiopia. About 50 percent of the families are Muslim," said an Albir representative. While Albir used to get money from Saudi Arabia, the representative said that, for the past three years, the NGO received all its money from Turkey and was working on a health project funded by the Islamic Development Bank. Activists, academics and Muslim elders interviewed by The Hindu said that government was wrongly conflating legitimate protests against the ruling party with terrorist acts directed at the state. Most requested anonymity as they feared harassment, and pointed to the arrest of Habiba Mohammed as proof that the entire community was under siege.

CONFLICT BEGAN IN 2011: The current conflict began in September 2011 when the government withdrew the licence of the International Islamic Relief Organisation, a Saudi NGO funding the religious school at the AwoliaMosque in Addis Ababa. "We wanted confirmation that they would not engage in religious affairs, which they could not provide," said a government spokesperson. Under Ethiopian law, the official said humanitarian organisations cannot run religious institutions. While the withdrawal of the Saudi NGO was not contested in December 2011, the Ethiopian Islamic Affairs Supreme Council (EIASC), a body that claims to represent the country's 30 million Muslims, removed the Arabic languageteachers at Awolia and dismissed several administrators. "They dismissed50 teachers [in total] without any reason, and closed the college. The council is not authorised to do that," said a Muslim activist, "The studentsbegan protesting against the council."

The protestors questioned the legitimacy of the EIASC, accused the body of acting on the behest of the government, and noted that the council hadnot held elections in over 10 years. They also accused the council of promoting a particular sect of Islam, known as Al-Ahbash, by dismissing imams who refused to preach Ahbashi doctrines at their mosques. Al- Ahbash was established by Shaykh Abdallah Muhammad al-Hariri, an Ethiopian imam who left Harar for Lebanon in the 1940s after he fell foul of Emperor Haile Selassie. In Lebanon, the Shaykh preached a non- political reading of Islam, opposed the Wahabi school promoted by the Saudis, and urged his followers not to oppose lawfully established governments. Prominent Wahabis and Al-Ahbashis have each accused the other of heresy. "The Ethiopian government brought 15 Lebanese Al Ahbash ulama during the summer of 2011 to help spread the 'moderate' version of Islam in Ethiopia," writes anthropologist Dereje Feyissa, in his paper Muslims Struggling for Recognition in Contemporary Ethiopia, "The coming of Lebanese ulema and a series of subsequent training…conductedduring the fall of 2011 for religious authorities and students angered manyMuslims …who have condemned what they consider an imposition of an 'alien' religion." The protests against Al-Ahbash reached a head in July thisyear when the police opened fire to disperse a crowd gathered at Awolia mosque. The mosque suffered significant damage and is yet to be reopened. Several people were injured and many were arrested in connection with the summer demonstrations, including the 28 men currently on trial for allegedly trying to set up an Islamic state in Ethiopia.Habiba Mohammed was arrested when the police found a large amount of money and several copies of the Quran in her car as she drove out the Saudi Embassy. The police have accused her of using the money to fund the protests. The Saudi Embassy did not respond to requests for an interview. In an open letter to the press, Mr. Junedin explained that the money was in fact intended to build a mosque in his village in accordance with his mother's dying wish. He has retained his ministerial post thus far,but has been expelled from the Executive Committee of his political party."You can't build mosques with undeclared money from the Saudis if you are a senior minister in the government," said a senior official, suggestingthat Mr. Junedin had acted irresponsibly. Mr. Junedin has been forbidden from travelling abroad until the case is resolved; he was unavailable for comment.

MINISTER'S INTERVIEW: In an interview this September to The Hindu, Ethiopia's Minister of State for Communications Shimeles Kemal said there was no move to promote Al Ahbash. “This is wide propaganda, there is nosuch sect [in Ethiopia],” he said, “The Islamic council has started to educate with the view to issue certificates for imams and other religious preachers to prevent any extremist creeds from being circulated in the mosques.” This month, the EIASC finally succumbed to pressure and held elections for a new group of leaders. However, the voting was held in localgovernment offices, rather than in mosques. Muslims activists across the country responded by calling for a boycott of the elections. “The government has already decided who will win the election,” said a protestor at one such demonstration, “Those living in government houses are threatened that they will be forced out if they don’t participate in the election.” In the September interview, Minister Shimeles denied these allegations, and said that the community was coming out in full force to vote. “Ninety three per cent of the 7.5 million registered voters participated in the elections,” said Rachid Mohammed, “According to the by-laws, elections should be held every five years. Due to certain mismanagement and incompetence, the previous Majlis missed one cycle.Apart from that, there were financial problems as well.” Mr. Rachid, who described himself as a professional management consultant providing technical assistance to the EIASC, said the new executive would do a much better job in serving the Muslim community. He dismissed the divisions over Al-Ahbash, claiming that Ethiopian Muslims didn’t see themselves as belonging to any particular sect, “We are all Muslims,” he said, “everyone has their own individual ideas and thoughts.”

The Hindu, by Aman Sethi (November 30, 2012) Overcoming Ethiopia’s Muslim, government divide'

A new United States report on religious freedom in Ethiopia has heightened ension between the country’s Muslim population and the government, even as Islamic Council elections were had in recent weeks that put hope forward for change in the status quo antagonism between the government and Islam in the East African country. For days, the fall- out from the report has left many Ethiopians frustrated over the current state of affairs, politically and socially, in the country. According to the report, the US said that the Ethiopian government is attempting to controlthe Muslim population, its leadership and cracking down on protests that risks stability in the East African region. Ethiopia, which has long been seen by the West as a stalwart ally against Muslim rebels in neighboring Somalia, says it fears militant Islam is taking root in the country as a result of government nterference in local council development. The US Commission on International Religious Freedom (USCIRF) argued that the government isarresting peaceful Muslim protesters, noting that 29 of them had been charged last month with what the authorities said was “planning to commit errorist acts.” “The arrests, terrorism charges and takeover of EIASC signify a troubling escalation in the government's attempts to control Ethiopia's Muslim community and provide further evidence of a decline in religious freedom in Ethiopia," the Commission said in a statement issued on Thursday. Commission Chairwoman Katrina Lantos Swett called on the US government to raise the issue with Addis Ababa. "USCIRF has found that repressing religious communities in the name of countering extremism leads to more extremism, greater instability, and possibly violence," she said. "Given Ethiopia's strategic importance in the Horn of Africa … it is vital that the Ethiopian government end its religious freedom abuses and allow Muslims to practice peacefully their faith as they see fit," she added. "Otherwise the government's current policies andpractices will lead to greater destabilization of an already volatile region." Muslims told Bikyamasr. com as they gathered following noon prayers earlier this month that they were "fed up" with how the government was attempting to "control" their internal beliefs and policies. "It is very frustrating that the government is continuing a policy that creates tensionand then blames us for protesting," said Mohammed, a 24-year-old Muslim, who told Bikyamasr.com that "we want to always maintain peaceful demonstrations and hope the government does not instigate any action against us." It was yet another Friday where Muslims took to protest mode after prayers. They are demanding the government end its attempts to control the country's Islamic Council. Protesters and security forces have clashed over the past few months, in a sign that has many fearing that tensions with the country's Muslim population could continue to escalate. But there are voices calling for unity. In late October, a group of concerned students told Bikyamasr.com that the ongoing tension between the government and Muslims should be ended and they called on the government here in Addis Ababa to do more to ensure that violence does not erupt again. "Webelieve that the government is creating this tension and fear of sectarian conflict in the country by not allowing the Muslim population to have theirwill in their own affairs," said the group meeting at a cafe. They added that the youth of the country should be consulted more "because we haveconnections with one another that goes beyond religious lines." "We have for so long been a fragmented country in many ways, with Muslims and Christians battling for their power," said Teresa, a 21-year-old marketing student and Christian. "Now, as we have the opportunity to really make a change in how the country is run, we have to move quickly or face the same dictatorship that tore us apart for decades," she told Bikyamasr.com, referring to the iron grip of late PM Zenawi. Her Muslim counterparts agree that the time is now for change, but how that will happen is anyone's guess. They remain skeptically optimistic that the country can gather around what Hassan Mahammad said was the country's most important resource, "the people." He argued that "Ethiopiais a large country and we are a diverse people, but that is what makes us special. We can debate and create a new foundation for all people, Muslim, Christian and other for the bettering of our society." For these young people, who represent their respective youth communities, they believe that togetherness is the only solution to creating a new Ethiopia with solid foundation in understanding and forward-thinking. Earlier this month, leading Ethiopian political thinker and professor Alemayehu G. Mariam said the time is now for Ethiopia to have “radical improvements” in its social and political climate following the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. “I say today is the perfect time for all Ethiopians to bury the hatchet of ethnic division, religious sectarianism, regional conflict and human rights violations,” Mariam wrote in an opinion article. “It is the perfect time to shake hands, embrace each other and get our noses to the grindstone to build a new democratic Ethiopia where the rule of law is upheld and human rights and democratic institutions respected.” He argued that the situation facing Ethiopia does not need to be a painful process of change and that the new leadership should learn from the pasttwo decades and its impact on the people. “Today, not tomorrow, is the best time to put an end to historic hatreds and resentments and open a new chapter in Ethiopia’s history. Today is the best time to unchain ourselves from the burdens of the past, close the wounds that have festered for generations and declare to future generations that we will nolonger be prisoners of resentments of the past,” the professor argued.

There is a tentative hope that democracy and human rights can be part ofthe transition away from authoritarian rule. Still, many experts have pointed to the reality that Ethiopia is unlikely to see democracy or a change in the status quo, despite the two decades rule of Zenawi coming to an end. For the university student group made up of Christians and Muslims, they are hopeful that the change can be made for the better. “We have long face this kind of attack from the government if we speak out, so we really want to see democratic change in Ethiopia because it willmean a better country for all,” the group told Bikyamasr.com. “Ethiopia deserves a country that is not ruled by one person, but a place where citizens and the people have a say in our future.” Corruption and greed has come to characterise the rule of the administration. The government is widely believed to be responsible for arbitrary killings, politically motivated arrests, detentions, assaults on journalists, political opposition leaders and civil society activists, restrictions on the right to a fair trial and a freedom of speech, press, assembly, and associations. There is alsorestriction on opposition parties. (November 2012)

A Panel pushes study on Ethiopia’s Nile dam amid Egypt crises'

VIEWS: The international panel of experts asked by Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan to assess the impact of Ethiopia’s controversial Nile dam project has continued its study despite fresh political turmoil in Cairo over a decree that gives Egypt’s President sweeping new powers. The panel of experts’ also known as tripartite committee has held its fourth meeting inAddis Ababa this week to further review the impact of Ethiopia’s grand renaissance dam. During the meeting held from 26-28 November, the team has evaluated a document presented by Addis Ababa which details the benefit the project offers to down stream countries of Egypt and Sudan. The tripartite committee has evaluated and studied the documentsand the possible environmental impacts of the Dam as well as its socio- economic benefits according to Engineer Simegnew Bekele, Project Manager of Ethiopia's renaissance dam. The document also provided details on the construction of the mega dam and other environmental studies made on site. Following the meeting, the team of experts paid a visit to the construction site, which is located in Benishangul Gumuz region, some 30 kilometers from the border with Sudan. After Ethiopia launched the construction of the Grand dam, Africa's biggest, on the Blue Nile River, Egypt has expressed fears that it will reduce the water flow significantly and has raised strong objections against the project and urged international donors to refrain from funding the mega dam. During the Mubarek era, Egypt refused to negotiate a more equitable utilization ofthe Nile's water, maintaining that any dam construction would be seen as a "national security threat" and warned upstream countries from doing so. This was been seen as overly aggressive stance by some upstream countries, particularly Ethiopia which is a source of around 85% of the Nilewater. According to a document published by the whistle-blowing organization Wikileaks, Egypt's Mubarak regime had agreed with the Sudanese government to an build air base in the western Darfur region to carry out airstrikes against Ethiopia's mega Dam. An allegation both Cairo and Khartoum denied. However, the issue of Nile water now seems to be far from being a top priority for post-Mubarak leaders in Cairo, who are tied in political disputes over the powers of the President and a new constitution that is due to be voted on later this month. Ethiopia which self-funds the $ 5 billion mega-dams project says construction is on track to complete the dam by 2015. Currently some 14 percent of the construction is accomplished. The international panel of experts which wasset to build trust and transparency among Nile riparian states is expected to reveal and submit its final findings on dam's impact to the governmentsof Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan, in May 2013. The Grand Renaissance Dam has a power generating capacity of 6,000MW and when completed it will enable the Horn of Africa nation to export more power to its neighbours. Currently Ethiopia is exporting hydro-power processed electricity to Djibouti and Sudan. It will soon start exports to Kenya, according to the state utility, Ethiopia Electric and Power Corporation (EEPCo) . Recently South Sudan has also signed a memorandum of understanding with the Ethiopian government to build a transmission linethat will connect their power grids, enabling Africa's newest nation to import power. Sudan Tribune (December 1, 2012)

Meles Zenawi's Vision For The Region of Tigrai'

Speculation: Azeb Mesfin reportedly revealed the existence of a project document prepared by her late husband Zenawi to transform Tigrai into an industrial center of the tribal-based Federation of Ethiopia. This rather surprising revelation and its timing has been a hot topic of debate with views converging on the question of what her husband's vision was for therest of the balkanized regions of Ethiopia. Notwithstanding my record of advocacy for the development of Tigrai, let me infer what traitor Zenawi had in mind for the rest of Ethiopia.In view of his intense hatred for the Amharas, Zenawi's vision for the Amhara regional state could only be to relegate it to the role of supplying raw materials to the his envisioned industrial state of Tigrai; the fate of Oromia region cannot be different for the strategy of the tyrant has all along been to emulate Mussolini's policy to make the Amhara and Oromo major ethnic groups politically extinct – reduced to the level of consumers and providers of cheap labor as slaves and suppliers of their regions abundant natural resources as directed by their ruling masters. Prime Minister Desalegn Hailemariam, who has perhaps under duress allowed erosion of his power by unconstitutionally appointing two more Deputy Prime Ministers, has to inform the SEPDM Council about his predecessor's 'vision' for the southern region. One can only have sympathy for the humiliated PM. Nightmarish issues for the EPRDF to resolve: The late tyrant Zenawi suddenly died mysteriously; the cause of his death has not been disclosed to date. His atrocious legacy hassubmerged his EPRDF Party in deep crisis. Ethiopia is on the threshold of catastrophe due to lack of an all-inclusive effective government amid brewing regional instability the Horn of Africa and souring relations with Sudan and Egypt over the Blue Nile River. The rudderless EPRDF in disarray at this critical time of the history of Ethiopia is faced with formidable issues, inter alia:-

Honoring the verdict of the International Court of Justice over Badmedispute

Border demarcation with Eritrea

Meeting the demands of secessionist dissidentsUnconditional release of all political prisoners Opening up of the political space

Honoring the constitution in regard to freedom of expression, religiousfreedom and the Independence of all pillars of democracy

Abject poverty; intolerably high unemployment, especially among theyouth

Rampant corruption of top TPLF/EPRDF leaders Runaway inflation coupled with depreciating currency

Provocative Mega Dam Project leading to bankruptcy and regionalinstability

The above signify the dilemma of EPRDF in deep crisis far beyond the competency of the criminal thugs entrenched in the upper echelon of the TPLF to resolve for they lack legitimacy and moral authority given that they actually stole 99.6% of the votes in the heavily rigged sham electionof 2010. Incidentally all the elections held in Ethiopia for the last 22 yearshas set a bad example spreading like bush fire over the rest of Africa.

Ethiopia shall stretch out her hands unto God: Psalm 68:31 Ethiopia in herlong history has been a victim of repeated naked aggression, subversion, and foreign-instigated terrorism, which the international community failedto condemn in most cases. It is agonizingly disheartening to see that help is coming from some quarters in the West to prop up dictators. Let me provide some historical facts interlaced with my comments regarding the harrowing experience that Ethiopia has gone through in her relations with foreign powers: The League of Nations, of which Ethiopia was a founding member, tacitly condoned the invasion of Fascist Italy, which brought untold sufferings to the Ethiopian people; British Field Officers, soon after World War II, conceived and created the first Waayane (Tigray Peoples Liberation Front) to dismember Ethiopia. It took a lot of sacrifice to defeatWaayane I. The Ethiopian people are presently engaged in a fierce struggle to end the tyrannical rule of the Stalinist Wayane II over the last 22 years;

The defunct USSR heavily armed the regime of Ziad Barre of Somalia for the vicious aim to destabilize Ethiopia because our country was seen to bean ally of the West during the cold war. As a result, Ethiopia's borders were violated; many Ethiopians were displaced, injured and killed in cold blood by the Army of Somalia; The US government: threatened to order air bombardment from its Air Force Base in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia, unlessthe Ethiopian Air Force complies with the order to bomb the Headquartersof the Imperial Bodyguard in Addis Ababa during the coup attempt by Brigadier General Mengistu Neway to overthrow the Emperor in December1960. The Carter Administration also later refused to deliver critically needed military equipment for which Ethiopia had paid, thus forcing the Military regime of Mengistu Haile Mariam to solicit for arms from the former USSR to fight Somalian aggression; The US government was quickand the first to give recognition to the Eritrean independence, which has left Ethiopia and her over 90 million people landlocked; this action by the USA resulted in the gravest damage to the economic lifeline of Ethiopia and her other strategic interests; Iraq under its evil dictator Sadam Hussein and other Arab countries like Saudi Arabia, Syria and Egypt were financing, arming, and training separatist guerilla fighters to destabilize, weaken and break up Ethiopia.

Pakistan played a similar role as an extremist Islamic state. The above historical facts and comments excerpted from my article titled "Ethiopians have only their God and themselves to end tyranny" show that foreign powers care less about the emergence of democracy in Ethiopia and welfare of her people, for their own interest is always paramount. They find it convenient to deal with dictators in the pursuit of their interests. President Bush pledged that democratic changes in every country can count on the support of the United States, but failed to make a public comment on the genuinely democratic election of 15 May 2005 and the despicable state-sponsored violence in its aftermath. Former President George W. Bush did not honor his promise to discard the policy of former US governments of forging alliance with dictators, as he put it, of the last sixty years. President Obama has disappointed Ethiopians during his first term so far. Will he reward Ethiopians during his 2nd term? Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon and his toothless United Nations Organization did nothing to address the rampant gruesome human rights violations and robbery of votes by the repressive TPLF/EPRDF regime. As if to add insult to injury, Ethiopia has been selected to serve in the Human Rights Councilof the Organization. This is pathetic to say the least – a mother of all contradictions.

Ethiopia played a leading role in supporting all liberations movements in Africa and the world at large. However, the defunct Organization of AfricanUnity (OAU) did not lift a finger to intervene in the saga of events leading to the dismemberment of Ethiopia in breach of its own Charter. It is even more shameful that the OAU endorsed election result of 2005 and one of its officials blamed the victors (opposition leaders) for the state-sponsoredviolence in the aftermath of that election. The African Union has been tightlipped about gross human rights violations; it endorsed election 2010 as free and fair despite contrary findings by the EU Election Observer Mission. When asked, in the aftermath of the 2005 election, what legal authority he had to by-pass the Parliament and declare a state of emergency, Zenawi responded by saying that, after all, the donors did notobject to the action he took. His response is solid proof, among others, that the monstrous killer was subservient to the interests of the donors at the expense of the vital interests of poor Ethiopia. Our beloved country Ethiopia continues to be a pawn on the chessboard of foreign players.

Zenawi had deceitfully and cleverly appointed himself as the champion forthe fight against terrorism in the Horn of Africa, ironically as if he was nota terrorist himself engaged in the massacre of Ethiopians. The US government chose siding with perpetrator of tyranny in Ethiopia shunningOpposition Leaders comprising principled Ethiopians, highly-educated in the West and currently enjoying the confidence of the overwhelming majority of Ethiopians.

Conclusion: So, fellow Ethiopians, we are on our own with only God on ourside. As demonstrated in the sudden death of Zenawi and the renegade Patriarch Paulos, God has done His part leaving to us what we can do.

Considering the turmoil in the Arab world whose dictators had always been vicious adversaries of Ethiopia, I renew my faith that the Almighty

God shall keep His covenant with her. The successors of the vulgar, abrasive, offensive and abusive late traitor, killer, and pathological liar arestrange bedfellows submerged in mistrust and incompetency; they have nothing new to offer. Therefore the only choice for us Ethiopians is to eradicate his obnoxious legacy through intensified and concerted struggle. Peaceful struggle does not mean staying put and wishing for things to happen in one's favor. It rather means engaging in activities including staging debilitating civil strike short of being the first to use the gun. I urge readers to heed the clarion call of Dr. Negasso Gidada made inhis courageous, enlightening and inspiring article in Amharic recently posted on esteemed democratic pro-Ethiopia websites. I also urge fellow Ethiopians everywhere to emulate the courage of Egyptians in their protest against President Morsi for his dictatorial declaration to govern above the law. We must never forsake our martyrs and all political prisoners and seek justice for the former and immediate release for the latter including Andualem Aragie, Eskinder Nega, Reeyot Alemu, leaders ofEthiopian Muslims peacefully demanding for respect for their constitutionalreligious rights et al. By Robele Ababiya (December 1, 2012)

New Lion species discovered in Ethiopia'

Revelation: Scientists discover an almost unbelievable number of new species each year. In 2011 alone, 19,232 were brought to light, 72.3% of which were invertebrates like insects, 11.5% of which were plants. Then came fungi (7.1%) and microbes (5.8%). Chordata, a phylum which includes mammals but also fish, amphibians, reptiles and birds, made up just 3.3% of new discoveries. The point being, large mammal species are rarely discovered. Uncovering a new species of wild cat believed by some to be so rare as to be nearly extinct—that's a discovery. And scientists from University of York, UK, and the Max Planck Institute for Evolutionary Anthropology, Germany, have done just that. By comparing the DNA of 15lions from the Addis Ababa Zoo in Ethiopia to that of six distinct types of lions found in the wild, the team discovered that the zoo lions—long notedfor their dark manes—were a genetically distinct species. Scientists have long noticed physical distinctions between wild lions and those at Addis Ababa, which have smaller, compact bodies and dark manes that "extend from the head, neck, chest and belly." While some specialists believe that that hunters have killed off the newly discovered breed from the wild entirely, according to Wildlife Extra, "Ethiopian authorities (believe) lions with a similar appearance to those at Addis Ababa Zoo still exist in the east and north-east of the country, notably in the Babille Elephant Sanctuary near Harar and southwards to Hararghe." Researchers are suggesting immediate conservation efforts including captive breeding to help save the new species. Of the few hundred lions believed to still exist in Ethiopia, 20 are kept in the Addis Ababa Zoo. These descended from lions owned by Ethiopia's late emperor, Rastafarian idol Haile Selassie I, who founded the zoo in 1948 with seven founder lions. By Carmel Lobello

Ethiopia vs Eritrea: To normalise relations between the two rivals’

Reflections: Historically, Ethiopia and Eritrea have not been united in one country. However, first Eritrea then Ethiopia have been occupied as Italiancolonies, which imposed upon them Italian culture. Another link between the two regions is the fact that the Tigrian peoples, who inhabit a region north of the Mereb in Southern Eritrea, and south of the Mereb in Northern Ethiopia, belong to the same ethnicity and speak the same language, Tigrinya, and have a common Axumaite heritage. Another link between the two Regions is that the Christian population in both Regions belongs to the Orthodox Coptic Church.

A third link between Ethiopia and Eritrea is the fact that the main languages spoken in them, namely Amharinya and Tigrinya, are both Semitic languages and are written in the same alphabet. The fourth link isthe existence of a substantial Muslim community in both countries.

However, developments from mid-twentieth century have driven the twoRegions apart, and today, hostility between them is at its zenith. In whatfollows, I reflect on the issues of War and Peace and future relations between the two countries.

As an expression of appreciation for the support of the Emperor of Ethiopia for the allies in the Second Atlantic War (1939-1945), the allies, as led by the USA and the UK, decided to join Eritrea to Ethiopia in a Federal unity without the due participation of the peoples of Eritrea in 1952. That measure constituted a grievance for the peoples of Eritrea. TheEritreans who experienced sixty years of Italian administration were more modernized. Under the Federation they suffered dissolution of their political parties, of their trade unions, and lost the relative press freedom. And to add insult to injury, the Federation itself was abolished by Ethiopia in 1958. In 1961, an armed Eritrean resistance to Ethiopia came into being.

Under the Emperor, Ethiopian administration was a backward Feudalism.It exercised forced Amaharization, and addressed the Eritreans in provocative language. The Emperor said in reference to Eritrea: we needits land, not its peoples. After the coup d’etat against the Emperor, a power struggle developed between the coup makers, in which Mengistu Haile Mariam emerged victorious. He proceeded to establish a Stalinism,which I described as the Fascism of the Left.

That Stalinist oppression further alienated the Peoples of Eritrea. Their resistance developed in several stages but ultimately Eritrean resistancewas led by the EPLF. The Mengistu Regime exercised similar oppression against the Peoples of Ethiopia particularly the Tigryan ethnicity, which organized its resistance in the TPLF.

Several movements with different identities participated in the strugglebut the TPLF came on top.

The leaders of the two Fronts, whom I came to know personally, were articulate Revolutionaries, who had much in common; the late Meles Zinawi and President Isaias Afwerki belonged to the same ethnicity, Tigryan, they spoke the same mother tongue, Tigrinya, they belonged to the same ideology, Marxism. During their period of struggle, they both enjoyed refuge in Sudan and came to have similar great appreciation for the peoples of Sudan. All these similarities would have been expected to make the TPLF and the ELPF close allies against the Mengistu Regime, andto establish a close relationship after they defeated the Mengistu Regime and came to power in Addis Ababa and Asmara.

Apart from the similarities between the TPLF and EPLF, there are several common features between the Peoples of Ethiopia and Eritrea, namely: The two main languages in the two regions: Amharinya and Tigrinya are both Semitic and written in Geez Alphabet. Yes there are numerous language and ethnic groups in both countries more so in Ethiopia than Eriteria, they both need stability for the management of diversity. Beyondthe language, there are close cultural affinities, in the cuisine, in national dress, in music, in marriage and mourning traditions and so on. More importantly, the geopolitical imperatives cannot be overlooked. In spite ofall these factors drawing them together, in 1998, over a border dispute around Badme, the two states confronted each other in a bloody war.

Since the sixties of the twentieth century, events have increased interchange between peoples of the Horn of Africa in an unprecedented way, particularly in terms of refugees, and sanctuary for opposition movements. As members of the Sudanese NDA we were freely residing in and travelling between Ethiopia and Eritrea. Similarly, Ethiopian and Eritrean refugees and opposition movements had access to the Sudan before their liberation. Therefore we were shocked by the 1998 war and I led an NDA mediation delegation to stop it. We met with the political and military leaders of both countries, they all received us most cordially, but we could see no avenue of reconciliation between them. We even offered a mechanism of mediation to no avail. My impression, which was substantiated by further events was that Badme was not the real issue, which caused all bloodshed and carnage. Successful revolutions, when they come to power, usually become ultra-nationalistic to consolidate theirlegitimacy, this phenomenon may be seen in the cases of East Timor and Kosovo.

This factor explains the behavior of the Eritrean leadership and the need to stand up to Ethiopia. For Ethiopian leadership, there was an added reason for ultra-nationalism. The TPLF was a secessionist movement, which was pushed into an all Ethiopian role by the vacuum created by thespeedy collapse of the Dergue. It had to prove its Ethiopian identity for example Napoleon who was identified with a secessionist movement, before he qualified for FRENCH leadership, the same goes for Mustafa Kamal of Turkey. Therefore, the two leaders and their movements were painted in an ultra-nationalist corner. By now, 14 years after the war, somany things have changed, namely:

It is not possible to settle differences unilaterally, and war provides no solution but loss in blood, wealth and lost opportunities. The Regional African Agenda has moved towards aspirations for African Unity. The International Human Rights Agenda has developed towards the guaranteeing of Human Rights as a basic duty of all sovereign states. In fact, Human Rights have become the real basis of legitimacy in the eyes of the International Community to the extent of intervention, if necessary,for the purpose of Responsibility (R2P). The majority of African states have become democratic. The Arab spring, which I call the new dawn, hasturned a new page in the direction of the empowerment of the peoples.

The need to eschew an attitude of hostile independence in the two statesof Ethiopia and Eritrea and recognize the compelling factors of interdependence is more than ever obvious.

Attempts at violent change will only lead to greater internal polarization, and greater external interference, to the detriment of National interests. What is needed in both countries is a broad based inclusive movement for democratic transformation. Such a transformation is necessary to reconcile Government with its citizens. Such reconciliation will be consistent with the march of history, and would lead to state to state reconciliation, even further; it would allow the forces of mutually beneficialintegration towards the two Sudans and other neighbors. I don’t know how receptive the Peoples of Ethiopia and Eritrea will be to my opinion, but I hope they consider them in the light of a sympathetic and fraternal brotherhood.

Al-Saddiq Al-Mahdi is the leader of the Umma National Party and former Prime Minister. He presented in a lecture at St. Anthony’s College -Oxford University on 17 November 2012. (December 2, 2012)

The ruling-EPRDF corrupted from top to bottom: Cleaning up HouseCritical For EPRDF – The Reporter'

You are hearing it from the horse’s mouth: the group ruling Ethiopia underthe moniker of EPRDF is corrupt head to toe according to a pro-regime newspaper, The Reporter. The mastermind of the group is the Tigrai Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF). The TPLF has engineered the largest transfer of wealth from a much-suffering population to a small tribalist coterie. The pro government paper is bringing up the issue of corruption to facilitate the purge of undesirables, to ensure Tigrean rule and to avoid systemic collapse.

Ethiopians and Tibetans thrive in thin air using different genes'

Revelation: Scientists say they have pinpointed genetic changes that allowsome Ethiopians to live and work more than a mile and a half above sea level without getting altitude sickness. The specific genes differ from thosereported previously for high-altitude Tibetans, even though both groups cope with low-oxygen in similar physiological ways, the researchers report. If confirmed, the results may help scientists understand why somepeople are more vulnerable to low blood oxygen levels caused by factors other than altitude — such as asthma, sleep apnea, heart problems or anemia — and point to new ways to treat them, the researchers say.

Living with less: Lower air pressure at high altitude means fewer oxygen molecules for every breath. “At 4000 meters, every lungful of air only has60% of the oxygen molecules that people at sea level have,” said co- author Cynthia Beall of Case Western Reserve University. To mop up scarce oxygen from thin air, travelers to high altitude compensate by making more hemoglobin, the oxygen-carrying component of human blood. But high hemoglobin comes with a cost. Over the long term, excessive hemoglobin can increase the risk of blood clots, stroke, and chronic mountain sickness, a disease characterized by thick and viscous blood. “Altitude affects your thinking, your breathing, and your ability to sleep. But high-altitude natives don’t have these problems,” said Beall, who has studied high altitude adaptation in different populations in Ethiopia, Peru and Tibet for more than 20 years. “They don’t wheeze like we do. Their thinking is fine. They sleep fine. They don’t complain of headaches. They’re able to live a healthy life, and they do it completely comfortably,” she added.

How do they do it? Research over the last four decades has revealed that people born and raised in mountainous regions cope with altitude in different ways. Native highlanders in Tibet and some in Ethiopia, for example, are able to maintain relatively low blood hemoglobin concentrations at high altitude compared to their counterparts in the Andes, a trait that makes them less susceptible to chronic mountain sickness. Tibetans and some Ethiopians have both evolved a dampened response to low oxygen, explained study co-authors Anna Di Rienzo and Gorka Alkorta-Aranburu of the University of Chicago. The researchers wanted to pinpoint the genetic changes that enable Ethiopians to thrive in thin air, and to see if the same genes play a role for Ethiopians as found inrecent studies for Tibetans. To find out, they analyzed the genomes of nearly 260 Ethiopian villagers belonging to two ethnic groups: the Oromo,who began settling at high altitude in the Bale Mountains of southeast Ethiopia about 500 years ago, and the Amhara, who have lived at high altitude in the Semien Mountains of northwest Ethiopia for at least 5,000 years. Research by Beall and colleagues in the early 2000s revealed that Oromo cope with thin air in much the same way that lowlanders visiting high altitude do — i.e., by making more hemoglobin. In contrast, Amhara highlanders — whose ancestors have inhabited mountainous regions for thousands of years longer than the Omoro — are able to maintain blood hemoglobin levels that are roughly 10% lower than Omoro living at the same altitude.

In a study to appear in the December 6, 2012 online issue of the journalPLoS Genetics, a team led by Beall, Di Rienzo and Alkorta-Aranburu analyzed both groups' DNA, which was extracted from blood and saliva samples donated by Amhara and Omoro villagers born and raised at high (3700-4000m) and low (1200-1560m) elevations. Using a statistical technique called a genome-wide association study, the researchers scanned the genomes of highland and lowland Ethiopians from both ethnicgroups in search of variants associated with hemoglobin levels in the blood. Same solution, different genes When they scanned the villagers' DNA, the researchers found a genetic variant associated with low hemoglobin levels in the Amhara. This variant was located in a different region of the genome than those previously found to be associated with low hemoglobin in Tibetans. In other words, the physiological coping mechanisms shared by Amhara and Tibetans in response to life at high altitude — ie., dampened hemoglobin levels — are due to different underlying genes. It is still unclear whether the first settlers of high altitude regions in Ethiopia and Tibet carried different genetic variants with them when they arrived, or whether different mutations occurred in these populations after they got there. But it's clear that each group followed a different evolutionary pathway. "They have a similar physiologic solution, but that doesn't necessarily amount to a similar genetic solution," Di Rienzo said. For the Omoros — who are relative newcomers to high altitude — the researchers also found differences between highlanders and lowlanders in DNA methylation, a chemical process that causes changes in gene activity, but doesn't necessarily alterthe genetic code. While the differences aren't linked to hemoglobin levels,the results suggest that such changes may play a role in the early stages of high altitude adaptation, the researchers say. ANI bY revelations

Ethiopia's new leader keen for face-to-face talks with Eritrean president'

Aljazeera News: Ethiopia's newly elected prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, on Wednesday affirmed that he is willing to hold direct talks with Eritrea on the long-standing dead-lock over border dispute. In an interview with Al-Jazeera. Desalegn said he is willing to hold face-to-face talks with Eritrean president, Isaias Afwerki, in the Eritrean capital. "If youask me, 'Do you want to go to Asmara and sit down and negotiate with Isaias Afeworki?' Then, I will say 'yes'",Hailemariam said, raising hopes of new peace talks between the two East African nations. Last month South Sudan said that would work to mediate between Ethiopia and Eritrea over their border row. South Sudan's minister for cabinet affairs, Deng Alor, then said that both Addis Ababa and Asmara have given the green light tocome for peace talks and the negotiation talks could start as of November.When asked if the new approach towards Eritrea was something that came under the new post-Zenawi leadership, Desalegn stated that the decision to deal with Asmara was in line with the policy laid out by the lateZenawi. "My predecessor Meles Zenawi had asked for more than 50 times even to go to Asmara and negotiate with Mister Isaias Affewerki," he said. Desalegn, who assumed power shortly after longtime ruler Meles Zenawi died in August, is seen as a more moderate figure and if he managed to hold talks with the Eritrean leader then he will be the first Ethiopian leaderto hold direct talks with Afeworki since the two countries ended their border war in 2000.Desalegn further said that his government's top priority is to fight poverty, to have regional integration and, "if we two [Ethiopian and Eritrea] do that, it will be much more productive." Eritrea gained independence from Ethiopia in 1993, after a 30-year rebellion.

They fought a border war between 2000 and 2002 that killed over 70,000people. Earlier this year, tensions between the two neighbours escalated,mounting fears of renewed conflict, after the Ethiopian army carried out cross-border attacks on military camps inside Eritrea. This was in response to the *killing and abduction of foreign tourists in January 2012*inEthiopia's remote Afar region by rebels allegedly backed by Eritrea. The cross-border attacks by Ethiopian troops was Addis Ababa's first and official military incursion since the two East African nations ended the bitter war in 2000 over the disputed town of Badme, which had been attributed to Eritrea by a UN border committee. However, the flashpoint remains under the control of Ethiopia, which seeks further negotiations.

Ethiopia and Eritrea frequently trade accusations of backing one an othersrebel groups to destabilise one the other. (ST) December 6, 2012

United Nations: "Land Grab Deals Hurt Local Farmers"

OPINION: Controversial farmland deals in developing countries can have anegative impact on the people who live on the land, according to a new U.N. report. While investment in agriculture is essential to help developingcountries reduce hunger and poverty, the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization says these large-scale "land grabs" don't always help. The surging global demand for food, fodder and fuel crops is driving a land rush in parts of the developing world. Investors are pouring money into large-scale farmland leases in Africa, Asia, former Soviet countries and elsewhere.

SURPRISE PICK: Meanwhile Muktar Kedir takes over as civil service minister following the dismissal of his predecessor Junedin Sado. His appointment as deputy prime minister, however, was dismissed as a merepolitical ploy by some opposition officials. Girma Seifu, the country's lone opposition member of parliament, said his selection was meant to appeasethe Oromo ethnic group which, though Ethiopia's largest in number, has never taken centre-stage politically. "Not having a significant position at the highest level has been an issue, and it's a big seller for the EPRDF (ruling party)," he told Reuters. "This cabinet reshuffle is an attempt to address this internal conflict." Another high-profile ministerial change made on Thursday was the appointment of Tewodros Adhanom as foreign minister. Educated in Britain, Tewodros has been health minister since 2005 and won international recognition for his work in combating disease and developing the country's healthcare system which has brough a significant reduction in Ethiopia's child mortality rate. He replaces his acting predecessor Berhane Gebrekirstos, a veteran diplomat who served as envoy to both Washington and Brussels Hailemariam retained SufianAhmed as the finance minister, and also made no changes at the top inthe ministries of defence, justice, education, agriculture and federal affairs.

‘Daylight robbery’: The Gambella region of Ethiopia is home to many suchleases. It is also home to some of the last best farmland on Earth. The Ethiopian government says it has leased more than 225,000 hectares to foreign investors, who have put more than $2 billion into the deals.

Ethiopian officials say this is just the kind of agricultural development the country needs to modernize farming, improve food production and providejobs. Obang Metho, who grew up in Gambella, sees it differently. “I am not anti-investment,”he says. “But I am anti-daylight robbery. What is going on in Africa is robbery.” Metho heads the Solidarity Movement for a New Ethiopia, an activist group based in Washington. He says farmers in Gambella have been pushed off their land to make way for companies from China, India and Saudi Arabia that are exporting the harvest back tothe home country. Human Rights Watch estimates that 42 percent of the land in the region is leased or on offer.

Hungry nation: Metho says that’s a serious problem for a country like Ethiopia, with hunger problems of its own. “If they have land to give to the Indians, or the Arabs, the Chinese, the Saudis to come,” he asks, “why did Ethiopia not use this land to feed the Ethiopian people?” Ethiopia’s Washington embassy says it’s not displacing small-holder farmers, and that it takes great care not to infringe on the rights of local people. But large-scale land deals in developing countries have become more common in recent years as global food commodity prices have spiked. Critics call them“land grabs.” “’Land grab’ is sort-of a controversialterm, but I think it’s accurate in this case,” says Michael Kugelman, lead editor of “The Global Farms Race,” a new book on agricultural investmentsand food security.

Search for farmland: He says food-importing countries are looking for farmland abroad to limit their exposure to volatile global markets. “These food importing countries also lack the land and the water at home to do the farming themselves,” he says. “So they’re going abroad to countries that are very willing to host them.” Data are sketchy, but estimates of land leased are in the tens of millions of hectares worldwide. Outcomes have been mixed, says Jomo Kwame Sundaram, economic and social development chief at the FAO. The organization’s new report highlights the need for investments in agriculture in the countries hosting these landdeals. But Sundaram says land deals may not always be the best way to do it. “Land acquisisions are one of the most difficult type of investments to produce the types of desirable outcomes that we have in mind, like food security, local economic development, etcetera,” he says. Countries get better results from public-sector investments in research and infrastructure, for example.

Pocketing the proceeds:Michael Kugelman says the food security and economic development benefits promised to the people of the host countries have not materialized. But he says manyof the governments have benefitted. “A lot of the governments in the countries hosting the deals are corrupt, they’re not very democratic, and they’re happy just to pocket some of the proceeds from these investments.” And some of these deals are sparking confli Protesters overthrew the government of Madagascar in 2009 in part because of a land deal that would have leased half the country’s arable land to a SouthKorean firm. The new government canceled the deal.

Responsible investment: International organizations, including the FAO and the World Bank among others, have developed voluntary guidelines for responsible land investment to try to promote more equitable investment. The FAO’s Jomo Sundaram says the investor community wants the guidelines, too. “There is quite a bit of demand by the private sector for those guidelines that will help them to protect their own investments,” he says. But Obang Metho from the Solidarity Movement fora New Ethiopia doubts that voluntary guidelines will change the behavior of corrupt and autocratic governments. “As long as the regime doesn’t respect the rights of their people, nothing will work,” he says. Meanwhile, the rising demand for food will continue to drive fierce competition for the limited remaining land on which to grow it. Steve Baragona (December 2, 2012)
Now a lot has been told about the flight and exile of the 4th PatriarchAbune Markorios’
Abune Merkorios especially recently. It has been said that the former Woyane PM, Tamrat Layne, was responsible for driving out Abune Merkorios from his Patriarchate to make him exiled. The former Prime minister Tamrat Layne is known to be a corrupt who has served many years in the central prison, is now living in the US as self-exiled. Tamirathas changed his tune and is now saying that he has found God within thePentecostal Church, and says that he is regularly talking to God. And many say he has also to face real justice just like his colleagues and the former Duerg officials. The Duerg is an all encroaching killing machine devoid of any semblance of mercy or humanity. No amount of browbeating or pontification on its behalf by the ruling party supporters and admirers could eclipse this brutal fact, now and forever! Since the aged president Girma assumed office in October 2001, he has been ‘playing’ at the background of the political scene. He is occasionally seen on ETV, receiving ambassadors and inaugurating the start and finish of projects. Luck has him that he was given a second term in office in October, 2007. His term will technically end in October, 2013.
President Girma advised for unity via reinstating His Holiness Abune Merkorios to his abandoned position' The president’s take of the reconciliation efforts underway between the two rival EOTC synods. In his letter addressed to the exiled patriarch, President Girma clearly highlighted the need to merge the two synods through reinstating His Holiness Abune Merkorios to his position in Addis Ababa. Meantime, in a separate letter addressed to the acting Patriarch Abuna Natanael in Ethiopia, the president requested the synod there to make a decision to reinstate the exiled Abune Merkorios as patriarch of EOTC. But then came to a big surprise; that the president forsook his letters and made it clear via the VOA that he wrote the letters out of sheer pressure, emotion, and hastiness. Dubbing the written letter as unconstitutional, the Office of the president indicated the need to write another letter. Accordingly, the letterwould clarify important points, among which one that Abune Merkorios would be allowed to compete for the position. According to the president'sVOA interviews, he believed that Abune Merkorios was forced to leave his office by the former PM Tamirat Layne. And he thought that bringing Abune Merkorios back to the now vacant position was the surest way to unite the EOTC.

But then came the ugly justification; president Girma argued that his letters were writen out of sheer pressure (from a committee who works for reconciliation), hastiness, and emotion. The hilarious thing is that the president's spokesperson indicated to VOA that the office will write another letter which among other things would indicate the fact that Abune Merkorios has the right and the possibility to run for the patriarchate office. That means, the office is to remind Abune Merkorios that he could nominate himself as one of the candidates who bid for the patriarch office. For sure, these developments have great national ramifications which warrant further reflection according to analysts. But for political reasons, the president has finally retreated from the truth and decided to talk emotional and immature, that effectively tarnished his already troubled image as head of state. EOTC is a big institution having its own rules and rigors when it comes to the choice and management of patriarchs. It has competent workforce and the moral and spiritual strength to deal with its own affairs. Meantime, the most recent round of mediation efforts that took place in Dallas, Texas in the first week of December, 2012 to bring the two EOTC Holy Synods—the exiled and the indigenous– into harmony has not been, from all indications, as reassuringas many of the faithful would like it to be. No new grounds were unearthed in the talks, nor has a promising drive toward a final resolution of the crisis, which has beleaguered the Church for more than two decades, been discerned. For all practical purposes, the issue of divide stillremains fully unaddressed. The core dispute within the centuries-old, storied Church is that the violation of the canonical law governing OrientalOrthodoxy was violated 21 years ago, when the regime that came to power removed a living Patriarch and replaced him with another, thereby forcing the former into exile. To exact "the wrong" then would be to returnthe exiled Patriarch to his rightful throne, without preconditions. However,the EOTC Synod at home is preparing to install a new Patriarch in spite of the talks in Dallas, Texas. (December 3, 2012)

Federal president’s VoA interviews’

Federal President Girma Wolde Giorgis reiterated he believes that Abune Merkorios was forced to leave his office by the pressure from the former PM Tamirat Layne. And he thought that bringing Abune Merkorios back tothe now open position was the surest way to unite the EOTC. But then came the ugly justification; president Girma argued that his letters were writen out of sheer pressure (from a committee who works for reconciliation), hastiness, and emotion. The hilarious thing is that the president’s spokesperson indicated to VOA that the office will write another letter which among other things would indicate the fact that Abune Merkorios has the right and the possibility to run for the patriarchate office. That means, the office is to remind Abune Merkorios that he could nominate himself as one of the candidates who bid for the patriarchate office. But for political reasons, the president has finally retreated from the truth and decided to talk emotional and immature.

That effectively kills his already troubled image as head of state. EOTC isa big institution having its own rules and rigors when it comes to the choice and management of patriarchs. It has competent workforce and the moral and spiritual strength to deal with its own affairs.

ESAT is back on air in Ethiopia'

Addis Ababa residents confirmed that ESAT is back on the air. ESAT also issued the following press release: ESAT has finalizing testing and is back on air in Ethiopia through New Horn TV. ESAT Management would like to announce that it has resumed its satellite TV program transmission to Ethiopia and neighbouring countries through New Horn TV. For the past few days the signal has been successfully tested. ESAT has been playing amuch more greater and useful role in absence of free speech in Ethiopia.

Writer prepares to retrace early humans “journey out of Africa's Great RiftValley”

Travel piece: Paul Salopek will begin trip in Ethiopia and hopes to reach most southerly point of South America in seven years. It will be a journalistic assignment like no other. Call it "the longest walk". In what isprobably the longest, most arduous piece of reportage ever undertaken, Paul Salopek, an experienced writer for the Chicago Tribune and NationalGeographic, is embarking on the astonishing task of retracing the journeytaken by early man tens of thousands of years ago. Beginning in the exotic surroundings of the Great Rift Valley in Ethiopia, Salopek will take an estimated 30 million steps, reaching his destination seven years later, three continents away at the most southerly point of South America.

Along the way he will be writing stories for National Geographic at the rateof one long article a year, while maintaining a website that will be filled with regular multimedia updates from his 21,000-mile journey. After its starting point in Africa, his route will cross the Red Sea into the Middle East, traverse China, head into Siberia, cross the Bering Strait into Alaskaand then walk all the way down the western coasts of North and South America. By Paul Harris, The Observer (December 10, 2012)

Stolen Childhoods: Child Prostitution And Trafficking In Ethiopia'
Analysis: The growing child prostitution and human trafficking in Ethiopia should put all Ethiopians to shame. Prostitution, perhaps the most distressing form of child abuse, is an epidemic throughout Ethiopia. The innocence of a childhood shattered, causing a deep feeling of shame, poisoning the sense of self and excluding the child from education, friendsand the broader society. A society, which stands idly by whilst children suffer, speaking not in the face of extreme exploitation, denying the truth of extensive child exploitation and acts not, is a society in collusion. In thecapital, prostitution abounds, "It is difficult to give an exact figure for the prevalence of child prostitution in Addis Ababa but observation reveals that the numbers are increasing at an alarming rate in the city"1 The jointSave the Children Denmark and Addis Ababa City administration (SCD) study states: "Interviewing children revealed that over 50% started engaging in prostitution below 16 years of age. The majority work more than six hours per day" There are many grades or levels of prostitution, "Some children engage in commercial sex in nightclubs, bars and brothels,while others simply stand on street corners waiting for men to pick them up." (CPAA) The SCD study "identified types of child prostitution: working on the streets; working in small bars; working in local arki or alcohol houses; working in rented houses/beds and; working in rent places for khat/drugs use. Each location exposes the children to different risks and hazards." "The major problems that have been faced by children engaged in prostitution include: rape, beating, hunger, etc. Based on the responsesof children engaged in prostitution, about 45% of them have been raped before they engaged in the activity". (CPAA) The dangers associated with child prostitution affect the girls physical and mental/emotional health.
Violent physical abuse, being hit and raped is common, Birtuken a 17 yearold child sex worker (CSW), "prostitution is disastrous to the physical and social wellbeing of a person." (CPAA) The impact on the long-term mental health of a child working in prostitution, can often cause chronic psychological problems, "the emotional health consequences of prostitution include severe trauma, stress, depression, anxiety, self- medication through alcohol and drug abuse; and eating disorders.
2. The risk of contracting sexually transmitted diseases (STD's) and HIV/Aids is great, so too the chances of unwanted pregnancies, as men, immersed in selfishness and ignorance, refuse to wear condoms. Their arrogance and macho bravado is a major cause in the spread of HIV/Aids in Ethiopia USAID3 suggests, "1.3million people are now living with the virus in the country". It is estimated that "70 per cent of female infertility is caused by sexually transmitted diseases that can be traced back to theirhusbands or partners."4 "Women in prostitution have been blamed for this epidemic of STDs when, in reality, studies confirm that it is men who buy sex in the process of migration who carry the disease from one prostitutedwoman to another and ultimately back to their wives and girlfriends." (EoP). There are various causes for the growth in child prostitution in urban and rural areas as well as Addis Ababa, arranged marriages, illegal under Federal Law is cited as a key factor, "Research carried out in 2005 established that most victims of commercial sexual exploitation found in the streets of Addis Ababa had been married when they were below 15 years of age" (SAACSEC) In highlighting the factors that drive children away from their homes and into commercial sex work, the CPAA study found that "Most of the child prostitutes came from regions to look for a job, due to conflicts at home, early marriage and divorce.

Poverty, death of one or both parents, child trafficking, high repetition rates and drop out from school and lack of awareness about the consequence of being engaged in prostitution are key factors that push young girls to be involved in commercial sex work". (CPAA) In addition toarranged marriage, which is a significant cause, the study found that "themajor reasons identified by the children themselves for engaging in commercial sex work are: poverty (34%), dispute in family (35%), and death of mother and/or father. 40% joined prostitution either to support themselves or their parents. Quite a large number of girls (35%) have joined prostitution due to violence within the home. Thus violence within the family is the main cause for children fleeing from home." The causes listed are complex and interrelated. At the epicenter of these diverse reasons though sits the family. Conflict at home is for many girls (and boys) the force driving them away from family and onto the streets of Addis Ababa, or one of the provincial towns and cities. Division and conflict grow from many seeds, repeated physical abuse at the hands of aparent or stepparent, rape at the hands of a Father, stepfather or extended family member, physical and verbal abuse, all are factors that force girls to leave the home and seek release from what has become a prison like existence of servitude, intimidation and fear. "When physical and psychological punishment becomes intolerable, it may lead to the child running away from home. Girls tend to become prostitutes when they run away from home." (VACE2)

Another burgeoning group from which many children fall into the net of prostitution is that resulting from HIV-orphans who have lost their parentsto the virus. "Ethiopia has one of the largest populations of orphans in theworld: 13 per cent of Ethiopian children have lost one or both parents…thenumber of children orphaned solely by HIV/AIDS has reached over 1.2 million. These children find themselves at a very high risk of entering commercial sex to survive, yet there is very limited support available for them either from government [emphasis mine] "(AACSE) Coherent or dysfunctional, the social fabric is a tapestry of interrelated, interconnectedstrands. Neglect by the Ethiopian Government in areas diverse, and fundamental is the glue that is binding together a polluted stream of suffering and pain. Bussed in Married off: In 2006/7, I worked with the Forum for Street Children Ethiopia (FSCE), running education projects for the children in their care. Girls living and working on the streets, mainly the hectic cobbled broken pathways around the Mercato Bus station. “Thisextremely poor neighborhood in the city has become ‘the epicentre of thecapital’s illegal [emphasis mine] industry of child prostitution’5

The children at FSCE ranged in age, although many did not even know their date of birth; most the children do not have documentation “the problem is further aggravated by a widespread lack of birth registration” (CPAA). Some were as young as 11 years old, “over 50% started engaging in prostitution below 16 years of age” the study states. “In almost every case the girls come to the city from the countryside, their families cast many out, others sent to Addis to work”. Arriving at the city’smain bus-station, shrouded in naivety and fear, with little or no education,the girls make easy pickings for the men that greet them, with a warm smile, and a cunning mind only to mistreat, use and exploit them. With nowhere else to go, and no alternatives, the girls find themselves workingthe street and the journey into the painful, destructive prison of prostitution has begun.

Many, according to Save the Children Denmark (STCD), come from the Amhara region, the second most populated region, with a population of over 20 million. These children arrive in the capital knowing nobody, with(probably) no money and no contacts.”Enforced child marriages, abuse, and the prospects of ending their days in the grip of poverty are factors pushing Ethiopian girls as young as nine years of age’” (VACE), to risk their childhood and their lives in the city. According to (CPAA) “There are many factors pushing the girls away from the region, (Amhara) including poverty, peer pressure and abuse. But child marriage is one of the most common explanations we hear when interviewing the girls,” Arranged marriages are widespread in the (Amhara) region in the north of Ethiopia,where young girls, children are forced to marry adult men, all too often this ‘union’ results in rape, abuse and violence, from which the innocent child is forced to flee, only into the clutches of exploitation, violence and abuse. And do they recover, is there healing and release, is a childhood stolen, a childhood lost, let us pray it is not so. Marriages entered into unwillingly by extremely young girls, some as young as seven years old usually in exchange for reparations of some kind, money, cattle, land, lead all too often to abuse and violence, “traditional practices like female genital mutilation (FGM) and early marriage, are causes for the increased violence against children.” 14-year-old boy 6 “in Wolmera Woreda, the practice of FGM is nearly universal since girls must be circumcised before marriage.” (VACE2) Once committed to a marriage, by parents who often regard the child as no more than an object to be traded, the girl is frequently raped and mistreated and treated as a servant. “Abduction, rape and early marriage may ultimately lead many girls to prostitution. Early marriage and abduction seldom produce successful marriages. In fact, such relationships are short-lived. As a result, most of these young girls run faraway from their husbands in an attempt to start a new and happier life elsewhere. Unfortunately, many of them end up as prostitutes.' (VACE2)

"Early marriage is illegal (except under particular circumstances), weak law enforcement [Emphasis mine] allows this practice to be widely followed throughout Ethiopia; the phenomenon is reported in almost everyregion of the country. Nationwide, 19 per cent of girls were married by theage of 15 and about half were married by the age of 19; in Amhara region, 50 per cent of girls were married by the age of 15. "When the marriage finally collapses, the girls usually migrate to urban areas since breaking a marriage arranged by their relatives is considered a shameful act and they are no longer welcome within their families and communities.

Once in larger towns they end up living in the streets given their lack of skills to find employment. Such dire circumstances lead many girls to be exploited in commercial sex." (CPAA). To break free of a forced marriageentered into against the child's will, and be punished by banishment fromthe family home, is a form of social injustice based on traditions, which have long failed to serve the children, the family or the community at large. It is time long since past that these practice's where changed.

Education, cultivating tolerance and understanding of the Human Rights ofthe Child are keys to undoing such outdated destructive sociological patterns, together with the enforcement of the law to deter parents and prospective 'husbands'.

No options, no hope: No child enters into prostitution when they have a choice, "prostitution is seen as a social ill that is unaccepted, prohibited and fought in most parts of our continent. Prostitution is not only a question of morality but a human problem, a problem of human exploitation, a problem of societal failure in providing equal opportunities."(CPAA) "At the end (of the interview) Belaynesh said that no girl/woman would like to be a prostitute but the problems force them to be in such a situation." The circumstances that lead a young girl away from the games and innocence of childhood and what should be, the love and gentle kindness of her family, into the shadows of prostitution, may vary and circumstances differ, suffering though is common to all those forced into such a lifestyle, the impact long lasting and severe, the consequences dire, destroying many lives.

The children at FSCE in Mercato told us their stories, often with shame, through tears and embarrassment, always with pain. A thread connected them all, yes poverty, was a major issue, so too poor education however,the stream that united the group of wonderful 11 to 18 year olds, was a breakdown in human relationships, of one kind or another. Once outside the family, and society, young girls desperate to survive have little choice but to work as CSW. For those recruiting and selling girls It is a business, for the children on the streets it a torture. “Almost all respondents do not like prostitution (99%). Almost all the girls are involved in prostitution notbecause they like what they are doing but due to other factors, to supportthemselves or their families.” (CPAA) “Child prostitution [is] a big businessinvolving a whole series of actors from abductors at bus stations, to blue taxis and bar/hotel owners who tend to see children as the spices of their trade. The business actors, oblivious to pervasive taboos, have long abandoned recruiting adult prostitutes.” (CPAA)

Trafficking lives: Child prostitution and trafficking of children are inextricably linked. They are of course both illegal. All international conventions, from The Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) to International Labor Organisation (IL0), as one would expect, outlaw them.So too do Ethiopia’s Federal laws, “The 1993 Labor Proclamation forbids employment of young persons under the age of 14 years. Employment in hazardous work is also forbidden for those under 18. The Penal Code provides means for prosecuting persons sexually or physically abusing children and persons engaging in child trafficking including juveniles into prostitution. Federal Proclamation no.42/93 protects children less than 14years not to engage in any kind of formal employment.” (CPAA) And yet both child prostitution and the trafficking of minors goes on, and on and on. “The United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF) reported that girls are trafficked both within the country and abroad to countries in the Middle East and to South Africa.”7

Children are brought from rural areas of Ethiopia to the capital city bybrokers, “ttraffickers, who feed on parent’s low awareness with false promises of work and education for their offspring.” The numbers are staggering, the money tiny, the damage unimaginable “up to 20,000 children, some 10 years old, are sold each year [for around $1.20 to

$2.40] by their parents and trafficked by unscrupulous brokers to work in cities across Ethiopia.”8 And who would do such a thing. Who would ‘sell’ an innocent child; condemn a child to slavery and brutal exploitation, painand acute distress? “These traffickers are ‘typically local brokers, relatives,family members or friends of the victims. Many returnees are also involved in trafficking by working in collaboration with tour operators and travel agencies.”9 “The Code of Conduct for the Protection of Children from Sexual Exploitation in Travel and Tourism has not been signed by any travel and tourism company in Ethiopia.” (CPAA) The Ethiopian Government acting in the interest of the children upon their homeland, and their responsibilities under international law, should rightly and immediately make all tour operators sign the afore mentioned treaty, or face closure, and criminal prosecution.

“The International Organization for Migration (IOM) stated that Ethiopianchildren are being sold for as little as US$ 1.20 to work as domestic servants or to be exploited in prostitution.” The Middle East is the major international destination of choice for traffickers, “Many Ethiopian women working in domestic service in the Middle East face severe abuses indicative of forced labor, including physical and sexual assault, denial of salary, sleep deprivation, and confinement. Many are driven to despair and mental illness, with some committing suicide. Ethiopian women are also exploited in the sex trade after migrating for labour purposes – particularly in brothels, mining camps, and near oil fields in Sudan – or after escaping abusive employers in the Middle East.”10 “At least 10,000 have been sent to the Gulf States to work as prostitutes.”(CTE). Let us noteven begin to look at the complicity of such states in the destruction of the lives of these children and women, the ‘little ones’ that dance upon the waters of life, seeking only a gentle heart to trust, finding the dark days of Rome, and in despair we cry “Men’s wretchedness in soothe I so deplore,”11 Meles Zenawi loves to ‘talk the talk’ to his western allies, the US, Britain, the European Union and the like, whilst turning a blind eye, a deaf ear to the cries of the child being beaten, the young girl being raped and traded for sex and the teenager separated from her family, her friends and her childhood, sold into servitude and abuse within Ethiopia and across the Red Sea in the oil rich ‘Gulf States’. By Graham Peebles

Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church To Hold Controversial Vote'

The Ethiopian Orthodox Church (EOC), one of the ancient and the largest of all Oriental Orthodox churches in the world, is to do a controversial votefor a new patriarch to succeed Abune Paulose V, who died on 16 August 2012 leaving behind the church anxious about its unity. Recently, the holysynod in Ethiopia has appointed the Arssi Diocese Archbishop, Abune Nathaniel as temporary managing archbishop of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, and has formed an election committee consisted of more than 7 Archbishops.

The holy synod and its supporters say that Abune Nathaniel could managean election in such a way which compromise the interest of the two rivalrysynods, and bring peace in the church. ”Abune Nathnael would make a wonderful Patriarch” an Ethiopian Diaspora in America said. “I have met him personally in few occasions. I remember him being involved in mediating a conflict between some Amhara and Gurage split in the Arsi Zone as well as between Muslims and Christians—-during the Arbagugu conflict.” However, the holy synod exiled in North America, which call itself“The Legal Holy Synod of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church” and many followers of the church don’t accept the appointment of the Archbishop, Abune Nathaniel, and the establishment of the electoral committee. They strongly claim that the appointment is not necessary since there is Abune Merkorios IV dethroned illegally by the ruling party, Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF).They say that the synod in Ethiopia is to conduct an “illegal election”.

Abune Merkorios was the 4th patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church; but, in September, 1991, after seizing power, the Tigrean People Liberation Front (TPLF), the dominant faction in the EPRDF coalition, removed him, violently, and replaced him with Abune Paulos who are supposed to be its most loyal. This incident caused the Ethiopian OrthodoxChurch patriarchate to be split into two holy synods — one exiled in North America, and the other in Ethiopia. The holy synod exiled in North Americais established by the Archbishops and other high ranking members of the clergy spurned the forced removal of the Patriarch and fled the country.

Many believe that the forced removal of the patriarch was intended to control and politicaliz the church by placing a government loyal person onthe throne. According to the Ethiopian Orthodox Church doctrine the enthronement of a patriarch while another is alive is strictly prohibited.

Having this ground, the holy synod exiled in North America and many followers of the church believe that Abune Merkorios has still been the legal Patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox church. According to the founders of the Synod, the Ethiopian Orthodox Church can only have oneSynod at a time and that Synod is in exile with the legal Patriarch- AbuneMerkorios IV. Following the move of the holy synod in Ethiopia many followers of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church are expressing their trepidation that the move of the synod might widen the difference between the two synods, and severely destruct the long lasting unity of the church.

“It is shameful for those so called fathers in Ethiopia who are rushing to embark on another election of a bogus patriarch while the legitimate patriarch is still alive”, Mr. Hailu said. ”Don’t they see the grave danger our church has been mired in for the past 21 years? Because of the division our church has been weakened… Letting the division to continue by talking about a shame election of a bogus patriarch will be yet another grave mistake worse than the one committed 21 years ago. Let Abune Merkorios assume the leadership of a united Orthodox Church for the rest of his life. Election shall be considered after that.”

The holy synod exiled inNorth America said in its press release issued on November 25, 2012 that:what the members of the synod in Ethiopia doing is absolutely unexpectedfrom them. It is expected from them to respect the doctrine of the church,to work in order to join the two synods, and to bring back the unity of the church… Trying to elect a new patriarch is disgracing the church.”

Following the current tension, a neutral team consisted of religious fathersand public figures is working to negotiate the two synods. Political activists, however, argue that it is totally impossible to bring back Abune Merkorios IV to the throne- since the holy synod in Ethiopia is under the substantial influence of the EPRDF, which dethroned the patriarch 21 years ago. They say that Abune Merkorios has still been considered by theparty to be a serious threat to its power. Since recent years, Abune Merkorios has been known in his strong critics towards the poor human right record of the government. He claims that the ruling party has committed enormous human right violations on law abiding citizens starting from the time it took power from the Duerg regime. In addition tothis, he believes that the government has exerted substantial influence onthe church, and it is threatening the existence of the church more than ever been. In the press release, the holy synod exiled in North America stressed that in order to join the two synods and bring ultimate peace for the church the synod in Addis Ababa should first accept Abune Merkorios as a patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church. EMF, by Betre Yacob

Stronger America Needs Stronger Ethiopia'

Views:On his return voyage from the Yalta Conference in February 1945, the then United States president, Franklin Roosevelt, held a successive one hour port-side chat with three kings. Aboard the heavy cruiser, USS Quincy, docked off the Great Bitter Lake of the Egyptian coast, the President discussed with King Farouk of Egypt, King Ibn Saud of Saudi Arabia, and the king of kings, Emperor Haileselassie I of Ethiopia. This was the first face to face encounter between the leaders of Ethiopia and the United States. Subsequently, the Emperor was able to meet with four US presidents in his six official visits to the United States, making him theleader with the highest number of official visits to Washington in the 20th century. Of course, the Ethio-American relation goes way back to the timeof Emperor Menelik and President Theodore Roosevelt. The United States was one of the pioneer countries to send a mission to Addis Abeba, after the victory of Adwa. Since then, the relationship between the two countries has seen highs and lows. From the military communication post of Kagnew Station (Radio Marina) and the massive military and economic aid to Ethiopia (Ethiopia used to receive more than 80pc of all military aid to Africa, even though it was less than 0.5pc from the world's share) to Point Four Program and the coming of peace corps, the emperor era was the high point for relations between the two countries. The picture completely changed after the emergence of the Dergue. Its intimacy with the eastern bloc, accompanied by the United State's support to the then Somalian government, forced relations between the two countries to hit rock bottom.

After 17 years of strained relations, however, the two countries resumed arather wary relationship once the EPRDF took power in May, 1991. After passing through some difficult times, most notably during the Ethio- Eritrea war and the post-election crisis of 2005, the relationship now seems to be standing on solid ground. This is further strengthened by Ethiopia's stabilising role in the chaotic Horn of Africa. Besides military anddiplomatic assistance,Ethiopia receives billions of dollars in development aid from the people of the US. Africom, the new US mission in Africa, is using Ethiopian military facilities, like the drone base at Arbaminch, for its missions in the horn and beyond. Acceleration is on the side of the relationship. But there is still room for further improvement, not only in scale but also in scope and focus. For this to happen, though, the Obama Administration must take into consideration the changing dynamics of Ethiopia and the region at large. Administrations look for a strong, reliableand consistent state that will protect their investment, as a prerequisite, before forging a long-term relationship with another country. And the United States Department of State has a lot of bad experiences on this particular subject. Yet, it is definitely not the case for Ethiopia, at least this time around.Ethiopia has started to enjoy political maturity. And this was manifested in the peaceful power transition, albeit intra-party, that it was able to achieve for the first time in its modern history. This achievement is even greater, when seen in the backdrop of the instability-ridden Horn of Africa.

Surely, Ethiopia still has some length to go before becoming a functioning democracy. But the country is moving forward. It has finally finished defining itself. And its state formation process, a concept that is still illusive for most African nations, seems coming to a close. Ethiopia has one of the most democratic and secular constitutions in the world. And thecountry has established a strong and efficient government, at least by African standards, and enjoys policy freedom that is unthinkable in most developing nations. And it has a clear vision of where it wants to go.

Ethiopia is home to one of the largest black population in the world, second only next to Nigeria, and it holds the second biggest market in thecontinent. Its economy, which is one of the fastest growing in the world, will be one of the four biggest in the continent, in a decade or so. The country is also claiming its rightful place in African politics, asserting itselfas a force to be reckoned with in the region and beyond. All this will makeEthiopia an ideal candidate for partnership in this multi-polar world. And the United States can take advantage and further strengthen its relation with this 'roaring lion of Africa'.

Therefore,Ethiopia's relation with the US should look beyond short-term benefits or missions. It rather ought to capitalise on the shared ideals and values and mutual long-term interests in the region and beyond. And this truth upholds whatever government takes the power in Ethiopia because there could not be inherent clashes between the values and interests of the people of the two countries.

And now is the right time for the Obama Administration to take this strongrelation to the next level and give Ethiopia its proper place in the United States foreign policy equation. In 1971, the Nixon administration was courteous enough to inform Emperor Haileselassie, in advance, about its decision to recognise the Peoples Republic of China; this clearly shows theplace Ethiopia used to hold in the foreign policy matrix of the United States. In the recent past, however, the United States has left Ethiopia out of the loop. The Obama Administration should start to take Ethiopia's interest into consideration when getting involved in the Middle East, especially with Egypt. After all,America's short-sighted strategies are the main reasons behind the unbalanced military and diplomatic capabilities ofthe upper and lower basins of the Nile River. The US should no more take Ethiopia for granted. And this should be corrected through different balancing acts as a strong and stable Ethiopia is in the interest of the United States. The US government should help the people of Ethiopia achieve their economic aspirations and enjoy the fruits of prosperity and live in dignity. It should give its political and diplomatic assistance for the equitable use of the Nile River. It also should work on strengthening economic ties between the two countries. As Ethiopia's economy is on therise, there is and will be enough space for US companies to take part in it.In addition to development aid, technological assistance, military and civilservice, should be scaled-up. Last but not least, the United States government should work with the people and government of Ethiopia for the realisation of a more democratic society. A state visit by President Obama will have a tremendous effect on all of these. It is certain that a stable and economically prosperous Ethiopia is very much in the interest of the US. And that is why the Obama Administration should rethink its relation with Ethiopia and upgrade its investment and engagement, and assist with 'the peaceful rise of 'Ethiopia so that the country realises its full potential. Only then could the United States have a reliable and strongregional ally to rely on for years to come. Mikias Merha-Tsidk is an Economist By Training (December 11, 2012)

ONLF Rebels and Ethiopian Forces killed in Dhaghabour’

Diplomatic sorces reveal that clashes between ONLF, Ogaden National Liberation Front and a coalition of Ethiopian military and Liyu Police Troopserupted in the restive Ogaden region, Dhagahbour zone. The sources said that 32 Ethiopian Troops and ONLF fighters killed in the fighting.

According to a diplomatic source based In Jigjiga told Ogadentoday Press that ONLF troops attacked, a Labbiga, a small village near to Dhagaxbour,where Ethiopian Troops had a military camp, the ONLF troop’s ambush killed 30 Ethiopian coalition troops, while two ONLF fighters killed, the source confirmed.

Ethiopian troops carried out a massive crackdown after the attack, some elders have been taken to prison; while some women are unknown wherehave been taken. Civilians in the area express concerns about the crackdown. There was no immediate word on the situation Tuesday from ONLF and Ethiopian Government. ONLF has accused of Ethiopian troops committing human right abuses in the Ogaden, but Addis Ababa denied the accusation. Human right organizations labels Ogaden Region, as Darfur of Sudan. Meanwhile the Ethiopian Government and Somali Regional administration says that they want the development of Ogaden Region and the production of Oil and Gas, there are poor human right records in the region which International Community widely criticized.

Thousands of civilians are detained in the region and hundred are killed for last months. Many flee in the Ogaden Region and registered the UNHCR offices in Kenya and Djibouti. There is no independent judicial system in the region, people in the region believe they are under martial law. Peace talks between Ethiopian and ONLF ended in the Kenyan capital without a breakthrough on October. Ethiopian Prime Minister Haile MariamDeselam told Aljazeera Television that ONLF refused to accept the constitution. No agreement of precondition said, ONLF officials. The ONLF has been fighting for self-determination for the Ogaden since the 1970s, and Ogaden people in the region and Diaspora supports the vision of ONLF. Ogadentoday Press (December 12, 2012)

Panic in the fading powerhouse of TPLF'
Scenarios: Center-stage within his party. The extinction of TPLF and the emergence of freedom for all Ethiopians are inevitable. There is fear in thevanishing TPLF powerhouse; now is the time to finish it off by staging a debilitating civil strike and invigorating the ongoing Ethiopian Muslims' demand for civil rights. EPRDF may contemplate transforming into a national political party, but this is unlikely given their parochial views of the past to which they are addicted and the phantom dream of TPLF bent on asserting its supremacy by maintaining the status quo. The nouveau riche in senior positions in public service and holders of monopoly .. will certainly support the status quo. There will be internal wrangling and external pressures; fighting for supremacy and lucrative positions; forming opportunistic or tactical exit alliances within their ranks and files as briefly discussed.
The mighty CPSU (Communist Party of the defunct Soviet Union) disintegrated leaving in its wake ruins upon which the process of buildinga democratic system flourished in earnest. The slogan "to each accordingto his needs and from each according to his ability" has long gone down the drain. Anti-corruption storm is sweeping across China, which is good news for the democratic opposition at home in Ethiopia and in the Diaspora - and a nightmare to the corrupt TPLF top officials. In the circumstances the TPLF borne out of Marxist Leninist League of Tigrai hasno chance to rebuild its gravely ruined powerhouse as argued in the paragraphs below.
Let us face the fact that the USA has to protect its huge investment on military assets in Ethiopia primarily for fighting Al Qaeda's surrogate the AlShabab in Somalia. This was the reason that President Obama had to call Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn and talk to him by telephone at the critical time that successor to the late tyrant was in doubt. The call was interpreted by many that the Ethiopian constitution must be upheld and that the Deputy Prime Minister should take over the reign of 'power'.
Obviously this would put the new PM under the control of the USauthorities by proxy.
The constitution had undergone rampant breaches before and President Obama did not make any comment in public; but he had to do it this timein the aftermath of the demise of Zenawi in order to safeguard the security interest of his country. Many Ethiopians were disappointed by the eerie silence of his Administration on the frequent grave violations of fundamental human rights perpetrated by the Zenawi regime in breach ofits own constitution in full view of Western democracies for years.

The security interest of the United States is to be appreciated and respected, more so following the gruesome event of 9/11. However alliance with dictators that terrorize their own people contradicts with the tenets of the United States government as a moral leader of the free world. It is hoped that President Obama will do the needful to address theplea of Ethiopian democrats in the opposition not to side with dictators in Ethiopia in his second term. He realizes to the detriment of TPLF that he has now the best chance to provide moral leadership worldwide and be remembered as one of the greatest Statesman and champion of human rights.

The EU will surely follow the leadership of the USA in protecting its security and economic interests. China will be careful not to infringe with the security interests of the Western world; it will preserve the huge traderelations with the Western democracies while protecting its mammoth investment in Africa. This is a good sign in view of the new Chinese leadership, spearheaded by General Secretary of the Communist Party of China, Xi Japing, dedicated to fighting corruption as its top priority and to opening up to the outside world. He is making an impressive move by setting example already.

The Renaissance Dam (RD) is going to be a 'white' elephant and a source of regional instability if it is not scaled down to the satisfaction of all stakeholders – Sudan and Egypt with Ethiopia holding a veto power over the development of the Blue Nile River Basin. There is no agreed cost/benefit analysis on return on investment for the RD. Scaling it down at the present site and building others in the Amahara, Oromo and Gambella regions for irrigation farming and power generation on Bile Rivertributaries would make a lot of sense, but the repressive regime is not open to reason. Why build the RM given that a study has shown that 50 smaller dams can be built and effectively used? Surely, the top EPRDF/TPLF leaders suddenly find themselves in a hostile political environment. The days of Stalinist hardliners and corrupt goons remainingwithin the TPLF are numbered. The spate of their recent gruesome acts of human rights violations and Kangaroo Court rulings are testimony to theirdesperate situation.

Outcome to date of the power struggle within TPLF. Personalities involvedin power struggle and their fate is briefly presented below:-

1, Azeb Mesfin nicknamed "Gual-Gola": She is a political liability to her crumbling party and a disgrace to the nation. This mother of corruption has so far left no stone unturned to cling to power as demonstrated by heradamant refusal to vacate the Palace until forced to do so via government notice. In her desperate effort she went as far as revealing the secret planof her husband to make Tigray an industrial hub of Ethiopia not to mention her betrayal of her Amhara ethnic parents. Her fate is awaiting trial and disgrace for her corruption. She is politically dead.

2, The senile octogenarian Sebhat Nega: Mr. Nega has been the arch- ideologue of the TPLF right from the start. I was reliably informed that theParty rules were so radically that in the nascent period the communist members were forbidden to wear jewelries including wedding rings. The old Party boss turned multimillionaire had the audacity to state his pleasure that his TPLF party has triumphantly erased the influence of the Orthodox Tewahido Christian Church and the Amharas from the Ethiopianpolitics. Despite his bragging, his effort to reinstate the old guards purgedor forcefully retired by Zenawi has failed miserably; he is now politically irrelevant. He was so right when he said that Zenawi went to the grave taking the TPLF with him. It is most probable that the remnants of the TPLF in power will make the rich old man Nega showcase of corruption in order to gain favor with Western donors.

3, Abay Woldu nicknamed “Dara”: This man is a diehard Stalinist and the self-appointed custodian and implementer of the legacy of Zenawi in 40- years of homework for that matter in the 21st century. This is a pipedream of an individual fossilized in communist ideology in his effort toresurrect an outdated ideology buried with the collapse of the gigantic CPSU in the 20th century. The seed of the ideology was planted at the wrong time and at the wrong place in Tigray, the bastion of Christianity.

So for Mr. Woldu the choice is to reform or die.

4, Others like Abay Tsehaye, Seyoum Mesfin have been shown cold shoulder by the late tyrant during his lifetime. Ambassador Birhane Guebrekristos is one of the filthy rich TPLF top officials probably awaiting trial for corruption.

Dominant groups in Ethiopian society: According to the CIA World Factbook the population of Ethiopia was 93,815,992 (as of July 2012 est.)with demographic as follows:-Ethnicity: Oromo 34.5%, Amhara 26.9%, Somali 6.2%, Tigraway 6.1%, Sidama 4%, Guragie 2.5%, Welaita 2.3%, Hadiya 1.7%, Affar 1.7%, Gamo 1.5%, Gedeo 1.3%, others 11.3% (2007 Census) Religions: Orthodox 43.5%, Muslim 33.9%, Protestant 18.6%, traditional 2.6%, Catholic 0.7%, other 0.7% (2007 Census) Languages: Amarigna (Amharic) (official) 32.7%, Oromigna (official regional) 31.6%,Tigrigna (official regional) 6.1%, Somaligna 6%, Guaragigna 3.5%, Sidamigna 3.5%, Hadiyigna 1.7%, other 14.8%, English (official) (majorforeign language taught in schools), Arabic (official) (1994 census). The combined total for religion is 96% of which Muslims constitute 33.9%.

Amharas and Oromos are dominant ethnically with a combined total of 61.4 % and 64.3% linguistically. The scared die-hard communists at thetop leadership of TPLF are hell bent on destroying the major two ethnic groups politically as well as unleashing further unconstitutional crackdownon religious affairs such as not allowing elections at Mosques.

Conclusion: It would be a shame if opposition democratic forces fail to cease this moment of political turmoil within the TPLF in the wake of Zenawi's demise in order to mobilize the Ethiopian people to partake in a coordinated debilitating civil strike to dislodge the oppressive TPLF regimefrom power. It should be understood that peaceful struggle can turn into armed opposition in self-defense by joining armed opposition forces that should be on standby for this eventuality.

The Egyptian progressive people forced their President Mursi to "annul hispower expansion decree"; their gut should inspire the enslaved Ethiopian people in the struggle for freedom, liberty, and democracy under the supreme law of the people, by the people and for the people. The President of AEUP was right in his interview with ESAT Radio on 04/12/12when he said that the Prime Minister presented to the Parliament what was written for him to read adding that he is suffocated by tight control ofthe TPLFites.

The PM should make a bold move to bust the trap in which he is being held by thugs - for example by opening the political space and releasing all political prisoners in Ethiopia including Andualem Aragie, Eskinder Nega, Reeyot Alemu, et al. His recent shameful denial in an interview withAljazeera denying that there are no political prisoners in Ethiopia would soon prove suicidal. The struggle at home, as the sole determinant factor for success, critically requires material and financial contribution from the Diaspora in addition to intensifying moral, political and diplomatic support.However, since the inordinate multiplicity of opposition parties is a hindrance; the parties should make more effort to bring down the numberthrough mergers. In closing I would like to renew my solidarity with the constitutional demand of Ethiopian Muslims and plead with fellow Christians to join them in public demonstration at home in overwhelming numbers. By Robele Ababya (December 12, 2012)

Frantic move by TPLF to split Christians and Muslims'

Ethiopia is one of the first countries in the world to accept Christianity in 330 AD welcoming the advent of preaching the New Testament to enrich the Old Testament that was in place. She was also the first country in the world where a Christian Emperor gave refuge to Muslims in 615 AD escaping persecution in Mecca. Harrar has been the main center of Islamicculture, learning, and propagation. The Christian Monarch stood for freedom of conscience! Suffice it to say that Ethiopia is a sacred land of God that had tolerated the Judaism, Christianity and Islamic faiths to live side by side in relative peace and harmony.

Flicker of hope for unity of the split Synods of EOTC: The Ethiopia Orthodox Tewahedo Christian Church (EOTC) Synod was seriously split due to violation of its cannon law. The split culminated in an illegitimate election of the late Aba Paulos as the 5th Patriarch of the Church. This ushered in a deep division threatening the centuries old Unity of the Church against the will of tens of millions followers of the Orthodox Tewahedo Christians at home and the Diaspora – all because of the deliberate divide-and-rule intrigues of the parochial minority group at thehelm of power in the repressive government for the last 20 years.

Due to considerable pressure exerted by the faithful and initiative of prominent Ethiopians forming as facilitators for reconciling the leaders of the split Synod, one in Ethiopia and the other in the USA in Exile, three meetings between high level delegations from both sides were held – withincreasingly productive outcomes , the third one by far yielding a flicker ofhope. The war on religion unleashed by the repressive regime for the last 21 years has been dealt a heavy blow by the Communique issued by the two sides at the end of their Peace and Reconciliation Assembly held in Dallas Texas from 26 November 2012 to 30 November 2012. The picture below shows members of the delegation of both sides. The Synod in AddisAbaba should summon courage to listen to the overwhelming demand of the people to restore the exiled 4th Patriarch Abune Merkorios to his sit and ensure the Unity of the Holy Synod of the EOTC. Written documents confirm that the Patriarch was sent into a forced exile by the ruling government of the late Zenawi. The EOTC was a victim of the Fascist Italian invaders from 1936 to 1941 inflicting a heavy damage on Church facilities and massacring monks everywhere including in the venerated Debre Libanos Monastery where hundreds of believers lost their lives.

These heinous crimes of genocide were inflicted on the members of EOTC due to the staunch support of the Church for freedom and independence from the Fascists. The incomparable martyr Abuna Petros whose statute isslated for removal by the ruling repressive government stands as an epic example of ultimate sacrifice.

The EPRDF/TPLF did no less in its attempt to diminish and eventually wipeout the longstanding influence of the EOTC on the diverse Ethiopian society and the embodiment of its enviable heritage in the field of systemsof law, literature, culture, setting of social norms (decorum), politics, quest for freedom and independence, compassion, and decorum, to mention but a few. It goes without saying that Islam had similar influenceon the Ethiopia society from its power base of Islamic culture, learning, and propagation emanating from Harar. Followers of both faiths are now facing the wrath of Stalinist communists entrenched in the TPLF; they have no choice except team up as compatriots to defeat their adversary. Moral standard in our country has sunk so low to the extent that a nakedwoman in Dera in north Shewa was forced to pull her naked husband in apublic display with a string tied to his private part. This was done in blatant contempt for spiritual values enshrined in Judaism, Christianity and Islam. The ruling EPRDF regime must be held account for this nauseating crime. The EOTC has endured 1682 years of trials and tribulations due to various internal and external adversaries attacking its dogma and cannon laws for political reasons. Its survival to date as dominant but tolerant faith in Ethiopia is a miracle that is only attributableto the will of the Almighty God, Creator of the universe. Vide Psalm 68:31:

Conclusion: Freedoms of conscience, worship, and expression are universal human rights under the UN Human Rights Declaration to whichthe TPLF is a party as enshrined in its constitution, which it rampantly violates. This flagrant and contemptuous violation is no longer tolerable and as such it should be stopped first and foremost by well-coordinated massive civil strikes nationwide to continue until the repressive regimes bows to popular demand and relinquish power to the people. EOTC followers and Ethiopia Muslims constitute 77.4% of the Ethiopian population. Each is a target of the vicious attack of the repressive regimestill effectively controlled by TPLF, but nevertheless in panic about its vanishing hold on power. The combined mighty force of Christians and Muslims is quite capable of delivering a massive blow to the dyeing regime. Let us join in overwhelming numbers our Muslim brothers and sisters who have set the trend irrespective of our creed or ethnic origin. As the old adage goes, hit the iron while it is hot!

Reform in China has begun in earnest. The fight against corruption has already resulted in the sacking/detention of 20 senior officials as reported by CCTV at the time of this writing. Issuance of the 8-point specific guidelines for discipline is laudable. Openness and interviews with Westernleaders seen on CCTV are testimony to the new leadership’s seriousness to commit to serious reform in China in sharp contrast to the vow in Ethiopia to continue with the legacy of Zenawi intact as if he was infallible.TPLF top goons are making frantic moves to build personality cult of their late boss because they depended absolutely on him during his lifetime; hissudden departure caught them totally unprepared to steer a new course with fresh ideas of their own. Now the thugs are at the watershed of their demise.

The mother of corruption Azeb Mesfin and others in the den of thieves should face justice soonest by popular demand. The do-as-told Prime Minister Hailemariam has already proved himself timid, habitual liar and incompetent leader; he cannot solve provide the required leadership to address the complex and multiple problems inherited from his ex-Boss. There must be no respite for the PM for he has made irreversible political moves already. The Almighty God has done His part leaving to us what wein the opposition and the Ethiopian people can do together. It is critical to act in unison to save Ethiopia. It is high time to boost the morale of renowned main opposition political entities and civic movements at home. A country with a responsible government give top priority to its citizens, unlike that of Ethiopia's, composed of a bunch of corrupt, and ethnocentricfascism.!!! By Robele Ababya (December 17, 2012)

The Stolen Ethiopian Prince buried in Windsor'Posted on December 17, 2012 by Lemn Sissay

His story has been written by the victors of the Battle of Magdala, but is the truth inhumed beneath the battleground? There's an Ethiopian prince buried in Windsor Castle at St Georges Chapel. He still can't get home. Hedied in 1879 and is said to be Queen Victoria's favorite prince. He is HIH Prince Alemayhu of Ethiopia son of King Tewdros II His tragic life is my chosen subject on BBC radio 4's Great Lives. My quest into his life begins with his death.

As one taken from his family through deception by the British governmentI have an interest in Prince Alemayhu. When I discovered him I can't admit that I wasn't excited to find a kindred spirit. Like his my childhood isdocumented by the British government who refused to return me to my Ethiopian mother and hid the letters of her pleading for my return. Not an hundred years earlier government refused to return Prince Alemayhu and, after his death it came to light, they'd hid such letters from him.

The narrative established for me was that my Ethiopian mother and familydidn't want me. Effectively the same narrative was established for the prince. Both were proven to be untrue. I have utilised my life to prove mycase. Prince Alemayhu didn't have that opportunity. To the story. His father The King of Ethiopia committed suicide as the British troops descended upon his castle atop a hill in Magdala. The British army then took his son Prince Aleymahu – he was seven years of age – from Ethiopiato England. What follows is the official british narrative that having lost the battle in which thousands of his countrymen died, and before committing suicide, King Tewdros II made his wish known to the victors that his son should be taken by them to England. To believe this without question is insulting to say the least and willfully naïve at best yet this is what British history documents.

Within living memory of Prince Alemayhu's passing journalist Hannah Poolwas taken from Eritrea on the premise established by nuns that her parents were dead. This was untrue. There are many more African adoptees that are told untruths or convenient half truths about their birthparents which serve to force closed the door of an alternative and altogether more human narrative.

If you wouldn't mind me swerving from the central story I'll try and explain what I mean by "an alternative and more human narrative". Whena mother gives up her child for legitimate adoption one could say it's one of the most selfless and painful acts of humanity for a woman and yet more often than not the birth mother is castigated. Neither Hannah, PrinceAlemayhu or myself were fostered or adopted in such a way still the fact remains.

Returning to the main story the circumstantial evidence of Alemayhu's taking suggests there were more vainglorious reasons rooted in the pomposity of Victorian culture, a pomposity most eloquently documented by Dickens. Though race was not his subject if I recall. Where are the other examples in Ethiopian history of Ethiopian Kings willingly giving theirchildren to the British? There are none to my knowledge.

However there is plenty of evidence of British soldiers raiding and lootingAfrica. Is it more likely Prince Alemayhu was one of the more vulgar exploits and spoils of The Battle of Magdala, to impress Queen victoria, ina primal exaltation of war. The army raided King Tewdros's castle taking gold, historical texts and even the clothing of his wife the Empress who died months later. These garments are displayed today in the British Museum. (Text ends)

Ethiopia: Post-Meles Possible Scenarios'

Analysis: The trouble with tyranny and personalized power is that institutional mechanisms of power transfer do not work. In most cases, such mechanisms exist and are enshrined in written and exalted constitutions. Nonetheless, to the extent that tyranny and the exercise of arbitrary power irreparably tarnish them, institutions do not command anyrespect or legitimacy. Instead, the need to pass on power unleashes a bitter struggle among various contenders. The proliferation of contenders is a natural effect of the arbitrary exercise of power: when power is exercised without the aura of legitimacy, it sends the message that it is upfor grab, thereby fostering contenders. Another effect of the demise of arbitrary power is the tendency to stimulate popular uprisings. People whoso far had accepted tyranny without protest suddenly feel an impetus to rebel because they sense the weakening of the repressive power of the state: both power struggle among the ruling elite and the orphan condition of repressive forces (police and armed forces), which repressive forces were shaped by an exclusive loyalty to the now disabled or dead dictator, give the picture of a disintegrating power system.

The above description exactly defines Ethiopia's present condition. Whether Meles is already dead, incapacitated by disease, or has no much time left, one thing is sure: there is now a power vacuum and a struggle among contenders for his position has already started. The bare fact that the government has so far refused to provide any reliable information about his condition is indication enough that Meles's time is over. The assurance that he is now receiving treatment or resting and that he will soon resume his work is just a lie destined to prevent a popular uprising and conceal the on-going power struggle until the emergence of a winningfaction. On top of economic disasters, the failure to establish any firm institution demonstrates that the two decades of TPLF rule have been nothing but a colossal waste for Ethiopia and Ethiopians. What concerns Ethiopians most is neither the fate of Meles nor of his cronies, but what developments are likely in post-Meles Ethiopia. My intention here is not topredict the future. Personally, I do not believe that the future is simply unfolding from past conditions. The direction of history depends on unpredictable variables and, mostly, on decisions that people and individuals make. The future is the outcome of a creative process and as such bound to be unpredictable in its novelty. The best that analysis can do is to present possible scenarios, which are then possibilities, potentialities, not predictions.

As previously indicated, Meles's death or incapacitation has created a situation of power struggle. This power struggle is essentially occurring within the EPRDF, but more importantly, within the TPLF, which is the decisive force. It is translated by the appearance of factions, often aroundindividuals supposed to be influential. We already know the names of the individuals. However, there is no guarantee that said individuals are reallyor remain the main players. In a fluid situation of power vacuum, little known individuals often emerge, just as new factions can appear, while the old ones disappear or are integrated into the new factions. In other words, we must expect some form of restructuration within the TPLF, a different alignment of competing forces.

Most probably, the winning faction will be the one that secures the support of the armed forces. In this raw situation of power struggle, no individual or faction can impose its will without the support of repressive forces. Since the TPLF alone is able to claim (at least at this stage) the loyalty of the armed forces, it follows that it is likely to stay in control after an internal redistribution, which can even take a violent form. Even ifthe deputy Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, stays as head of the government, he would simply be a figurehead. My guess is that, given thecomplete impotence of Hailemariam, the winning faction may find it wise to promote him to prime minister, at least until things settle down. What factors could possibly alter this scenario? One important factor could be that the army ends up by developing its own political ambition to the detriment of the civilian power of the TPLF. This possibility is not farfetched: experience shows that each time a faction appeals to the armyto prevail over other factions, it incites the ambition of the army. Why would the army work for somebody else when it could have it all for itself?But this scenario depends on the unity of the army: conflicts among or between senior and junior officers or dissenting voices from the rank and file can incapacitate the army and force it to accept the civilian leadership.

Another important factor that can jeopardize the continuation of the rule of the TPLF is popular uprising. Given the bubbling general discontent, therule of the TPLF cannot continue without the support of a strong and loyalrepressive force. Any sign of weakening cannot but encourage uprisings. The occurrence of a generalized uprising will greatly complicate the situation. It will further divide the ruling party, including the army, as the start of a bloody confrontation is necessarily fraught with dangerous and uncontrollable developments. One uncontrollable development is, of course, the ethnic reaction. Two decades of misrule and ethnicization ofEthiopia direct animosity, not only to state power, but also to ethnic groups. Some such confrontation will break up the EPRDF and will forcepeople to align around ethnic lines rather than class or national unity.

There are also other complicating factors. For instance, the Eritrean element: in the face of a serious unrest, Eritrea may again resort to military action both to recover the territories that it claims and punish the TPLF for its 2000 military victory. One other factor that is difficult to measure is the possible role of the opposition. If the opposition presents aunited face, and this is a big if, it can have some role in avoiding the worstscenario, namely, ethnic confrontations. It can even present itself as an alternative course if a popular uprising occurs. At any rate, its ability to displace the TPLF is congenitally dependent on the occurrence of a popularuprising. Even then, it will not have much impact if it remains divided. I note that Medrek has finally upgraded itself to a front, which is good news. But this is not enough: to appear as a real alternative to the TPLF, the union must be credible and reach out to other opposition parties as well as to the bureaucracy and military apparatus. Lastly, the direct intervention and real pressure of Western powers can have a serious impact in the direction of facilitating the creation of a government representative of all contending forces. Their pressure can thwart the scenario of military coup or of a refurbishing rule of the TPLF; it can even prevent the start of a popular uprising. The two basic conditions for Western pressure to be effective are: (1) Western powers themselves must show a united front and act as honest brokers; (2) the opposition must speak with one voice and credibly argue in favor of a transitional inclusive government. This last possibility is by far the best course, for it alone promises a peaceful transition. By Messay Kebede

Former Chief of Defence Staff sternly warns refugees against wagging anyarmed insurrection'

General Tsadkan Guebre-Tensay was in the Republic of South Sudan capital Juba, where he recently issued a stern warning to Ethiopian refugees against wagging any armed resistance to overthrow the incumbent EPRDF led regime in Ethiopia. It's reported that Lt. General Tsadkan Guebretensay the former chief of staff of the Ethiopian armed forces and Tilahun Hailemariam, the younger brother of former ruler Lt. Colonel Mengistu Hailemariam are in South Sudan working along with the South Sudanese defence and security forces. However, the most pre- eminent among hordes of loathsome TPLF warlords, General Tsadkan became famous during the 1998-2000 Ethio-Eritrean border war. When helater turned his anger on the late despot Meles Zenawi for bringing the war to an abrupt end without his consent, and threatened him of a potential coup, the senior officer has lost his job as the army's chief of defence staff. He then miraculously avoided execution or long term detainment due to his popularity within the armed forces and remains critical of Meles Zenawi's iron fist rule, but after the death of the tyrant,the man rejoined the ruling party along with other veterans TPLF members. Source: The Horn Times Newsletter

Ethiopian Muslim Activists Plead Not Guilty'

A group of more than two dozen Ethiopian Muslims pleaded not guilty on Monday to charges of terrorism. Federal prosecutors are accusing the group, which includes prominent clerics and journalists, with terrorism andattempts to create an Islamic state that would undermine the country's secular constitution. Among the 28 pleading not guilty was the wife of a former senior Cabinet minister who was fired last month after publicly defending her. One defendant did not plead and instead said he was mentally unfit to stand trial. "I have not committed any crimes but a crimehas been committed against me," one defendant told the court. The charges come amid running confrontations between authorities and Muslim protesters who accuse the government of unconstitutionally encouraging a moderate teaching of Islam called Al-Ahbash. Some of protests turned violent and eight people were killed in two spate incidents in regional towns.

The group of 29, through their 11 lawyers, had challenged the charges as unconstitutional. A three-judge panel at the country's federal court disagreed in a ruling read out Monday. For over a year protesters at a mosque in the capital, Addis Ababa, have demanded that the government stop meddling in their religious affairs. Right groups blame the government for the latest tension with the Muslim community. Amnesty International says the protests were first triggered when the state started "unconstitutionally meddling" in religious affairs and squashed peaceful protests with "excessive force." The United States Commission on International Religious Freedom has said the charges are part of an attempt to "crush" members of the opposition. The Ethiopian government blames "extremists" for the ongoing protests. "Despite the allegation of the USCIRF, it has consistently been the position of the government, both in theory and in practice, that religion is constitutionally excluded from thedominion of the state," the country's Ministry of Foreign Affairs said in a statement. The judges said the case would reconvene Jan. 22 to hear from the witnesses of the prosecution. By Kirubeal Tadesse (December 19, 2012)

Hellman/Hammett Award Honors Jailed, Exiled Reporters’

Four Ethiopian journalists have received the prestigious Hellman/Hammett“Free Speech Prize” award for 2012 in recognition of their efforts to promote free expression inEthiopia, one of the world’s most restricted media environments. Eskinder Nega Fenta, an independent journalist and blogger; Reeyot Alemu Gobebo of the disbanded weekly newspaper Feteh; Woubshet Taye Abebe of the now-closed weekly newspaper Awramba Times; and Mesfin Negash of Addis Neger Online were among a diverse group of 41 writers and journalists from 19 countries to receive the award in 2012. Eskinder, Reeyot, and Woubshet are imprisoned in Ethiopia; Mesfin fled in 2009. All four journalists were convicted in 2012 under Ethiopia's draconian anti- terrorism law. "The four jailed and exiled journalists exemplify the courageand dire situation of independent journalism in Ethiopia today," said LeslieLefkow, deputy Africa director at Human Rights Watch. "Their ordeals illustrate the price of speaking freely in a country where free speech is no longer tolerated."

The Hellman/Hammett grants, administered by Human Rights Watch, are awarded annually to writers and journalists around the world who have been targets of political persecution and human rights abuses. The prize isnamed after two American writers who were harassed during the 1950s anti-communism investigations. Lillian Hellman suffered professionally andhad trouble finding work while Dashiell Hammett spent time in prison. A distinguished selection committee awards the grants to honor and supportjournalists whose work, activities, and lives are suppressed by repressive government action. The journalistic work and liberty of the four Ethiopian award-winners has been suppressed by the Ethiopian government in its efforts to restrict free speech and peaceful dissent, clamp down on independent media, and limit access to and use of the internet. They represent a much larger group of journalists in Ethiopia forced to self- censor, face prosecution, or flee the country, Human Rights Watch said.

Eleven Ethiopian and foreign journalists have been charged and sentencedunder Ethiopia's anti-terrorism law in 2012. Critical blogs and internet pages are regularly blocked. The Ethiopian parliament passed a new telecommunications law in 2012, further controlling internet usage, just weeks after the biggest state printer, Birhanena Selam,issued a new contract for its publishers stipulating that it could censor the content of any publication it deems to violate the law. According to the Committee toProtect Journalists, the third-largest number of journalists forced to flee their countries since 1992 has been from Ethiopia, after Somalia and Iran.

Like many other journalists in Ethiopia, the four award-winners have suffered greatly, both personally and professionally, in following their profession and exercising their right to free speech, Human Rights Watch said. On July 13, after nine months in detention, Eskinder Nega, a veteranEthiopian journalist and the foremost critic from the media of the ruling Ethiopian government, was sentenced to 18 years in prison for conspiracy to commit terrorist acts, as well as participation in a terrorist organization and treason. His case is under appeal. He has been jailed numerous times.Eskinder and his wife, the fellow journalist and newspaper publisher Serkalem Fasil,were arrested, detained for more than one year, and charged with treason following the contested 2005 elections. They were acquitted of all charges in April 2007. Since his release, Eskinder has faced ongoing harassment, surveillance, and intimidation. The authoritiesdenied him a publishing license. In February 2011 he was once again briefly detained. Despite the ongoing harassment, he refused to leave Ethiopia and continued to write and speak out until he was again imprisoned.

Woubshet Taye: was the deputy editor of the Awramba Times prior to hisarrest on June 19, 2011. He was convicted, along with Reeyot Alemu, on three counts of terrorism in January 2012. Woubshet alleged in court thathe had been tortured during his pretrial detention, but the complaint wasnever investigated by the court. His arrest was not the first threat he faced as a result of his work. In 2010, prior to the general elections, an official from the government's media licensing office accused him of “intentionally inciting and misguiding the public.” Woubshet was also briefly detained following the 2005 elections.

Reeyot Alemu: was an English teacher and a columnist with one of the last remaining independent papers, Feteh. Reeyot was arrested on June 21, 2011, and convicted on January 19, 2012, on three counts of terrorism. In August, an appeals court reduced her sentence from 14 to 5years, maintaining one of the terrorism charges against her.

Mesfin Negash: works for Addis Neger Onlinewebsite, which he establishedalong with other colleagues after fleeing the country in 2009. Mesfin was convicted in absentia in the same trial as Eskinderunder the anti-terrorismlaw’s article on support for terrorism, which contains a vague prohibition on “moral support.”Mesfin was one of the editors of the now-defunct popular analytical Addis Neger newspaper, but was forced to close the paper and go into exile in November 2009, with most of the paper’s seniorstaff, after the authorities threatened him. (December 20, 2012)

Ethiopia: Professor Elected to the UN Committee On Child Rights'

Dr. Benyam Dawit Mezmur, an Ethiopian Professor of Law was elected a member of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child at a meeting of the State Parties to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on December 18th. Dr. Benyam was one of eight members elected to the committee, and the only successful candidate from Africa. Five others failed to win a place on the Committee. Dr. Benyam, 32, is currently an Assistant Professor at the Addis Ababa University, Faculty of Law. He is also the Chairperson of the African Committee of Experts on the Rights and Welfare of the Child of the African Union. He holds a Doctorate in Law (LLD) and has specialized on the rights of children. Ethiopia, a signatory tothe Convention on the Rights of the Child, was the only country from Africa and one of only 15 countries in the world to have submitted its 3rd report by 2008. Government of Ethiopia, (December 20, 2012)

SOCCER – Is Renaissance For Ethiopian Football?

Ethiopians the former champions are returning to the local football stadiaafter years of apathy that saw them switch to European Football and British Premier League for consolation. Apart from the world beating Ethiopian elite Athletes, the name Salahdin Said is regarded as the most celebrated soccer player in Ethiopian football.

Ethiopia Gets US Financial Support to Fight Malaria Breakouts'

The United States has given the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF)a $100 million grant to help Ethiopia control the spread of malaria. The grant will be used to support the country's National Strategic Plan for Malaria Prevention (2011-2015) through the provision of life saving anti-malarial drugs, diagnostic kits, and long lasting insecticide treated nets.

US ambassador to Ethiopia, Donald Booth said: "22 million Ethiopians living in malaria risk areas will benefit from life-saving insecticide treatedbed nets, rapid diagnostic tests, and medicine". The funds will help to buy and distribute 11 million long lasting insecticide treated nets, which will protect 22 million people living in malaria risk areas, procurement of 12.6 million courses of Artemisinin Combination Therapies (ACT) and 16.5million multi-species Rapid Diagnostic Tests and other anti-malarial drugs.Official data shows that results regarding malaria prevention and control to date have been encouraging with outpatient malaria illnesses declining by more than 48 percent. Severe malaria illnesses decreased by more than 62 percent, since 2004. Ethiopia still records five million clinical casesof malaria every year and the disease accounts for most outpatient visits, hospital admissions and inpatient deaths, according to USAID. UNICEF representative in Ethiopia Peter Salama said the grant will be disbursed over the next five years. "The goal is to consolidate the achievements made so far and to contribute to a further reduction of malaria morbidity and mortality in Ethiopia," he said.

Ethiopia's Health minister Kesetebirhan Admasu said: "people know that you can die if you do not treat malaria, but importantly, malaria unnecessarily taxes our population by causing avoidable illness and loss ofproductivity and limiting our overall economic potential". "Fighting malariais a critical investment and we are grateful to our partners the United States government and UNICEF for helping reduce the number of deaths and illness related to malaria in our country," he added. Government of Ethiopia (December 20, 2012)

Diplomacy - Ethiopia Versus Eritrea'

OPINION: Araya Desta Ambassador of Eritrea to the U.N specified in his letter dated at December 13 to the UNSC that the assertion by Tekeda Alemu, Ethiopia’s ambassador to the United Nations, that Eritrea supported terrorism in Somalia has never been proved by solid evidence. Mr. Alemu knows full well who the architects of the sanction regime were.The punitive measures against Eritrea were taken not for the alleged violations reported by the “independent” United Nations experts, but to cover up his government’s refusal to respect the final and binding verdict of the Eritrea Ethiopia Boundary Commission, brokered mainly by the United States. Ironically, Eritrea’s objection to the invasion of Somalia by Ethiopia and its refusal to recognize Somalia’s transitional government were the underlying reasons for the sanctions on Eritrea.The problem between Eritrea and Ethiopia is a question of occupation. The way to moveforward on this issue has always been for Ethiopia to withdraw from sovereign Eritrean territory. Peace, stability, mutual respect and better cooperation could prevail in the Horn of Africa if Ethiopia respected its treaty obligations. The New York Times (December 21, 2012)

British gov’t aid agency DfID under fire for mishandling human rightsconcerns in Ethiopia'

Aid officials accused of failing to fully investigate reports of abuse by Ethiopian authorities against ethnic groupsBritain's Department for International Development (DfID) is under fire for failing to adequately address allegations of human rights abuses in Ethiopia, a major recipientof UK aid. During a trip to South Omo in January, officials from DfID andthe US international aid agency, USAid, were told by men and women from the Mursi and Bodi ethnic groups of incidences of rape, arrests, withholding food aid, intimidation and threats as the Ethiopian government seeks to evict people from their land to make way for commercial investments. Audio transcripts of meetings, seen by the Guardian, record the aid officials acknowledging the severity of the violence the farmers say they have experienced. "They [government soldiers] … took the wives of the Bodi and raped them … then they cameand raped our wives, here," one Mursi farmer told the officials.

A DfID official promised to raise their complaints "very strongly with the [Ethiopian] government", according to the transcript, saying: "Obviously, we agree it's unacceptable, beating and rapes and lack of consultation or proper compensation." A joint USAid-DfID report of the January trip, published only after the UK international development secretary, Justine Greening, had been questioned on the issue in parliament, said: "As a consequence of these events, the Mursi and Bodi in particular stated that they were living in fear, resorting to other food sources or going hungry. The phrase 'waiting to die' was used." However, the report added that "although these allegations are extremely serious, they could not be substantiated by this visit", and suggested a "more detailed investigation"was made. Almost 10 months after the trip, however, Greening told parliament on 5 November that her department had still not been able to substantiate the claims. A DfID spokesman confirmed that the Ethiopian government had been asked about these allegations, but he refused to comment on whether the department had received a response, or what the British government was doing to press Ethiopian ministers on the issue, or if the UK was planning to further investigate the claims.

The department's reaction is at odds with David Cameron's "golden thread" of development, which promotes the rights and freedoms of individuals, good governance and justice for the poorest people. The South Omo region in south-east Ethiopia has a population of around 246,000, mainly pastoralists, composed of more than 12 ethnic groups. According to the Oakland Institute, these groups' existence is under "serious threat" as they are forced off their land to make way for the Gibe III hydroelectric dam project, road-building and commercial investors. "The suggestion by the UK minister that DfID has not been able to substantiate allegations of abuses in the Lower Omo valley is nothing short of a diabolical statement," said Felix Horne, a consultant for Human Rights Watch. DfID is embroiled in a separate legal action over its links with the Ethiopian government's controversial "villagisation" programme, which aims to move 1.5 million rural families from their land to new "model" villages in four regions across the country. The scheme has been hit by allegations of forced evictions, rapes, beatings and disappearances. Ethiopia is one of the biggest recipients of UK aid and a major donor to the Protection of Basic Services (PBS) programme, which human rights campaigners say is being used to pay the salaries and administrative costsof the officials running the relocation scheme. In September, an Ethiopian farmer, "Mr O", started legal action against DfID through London-based law firm Leigh Day & Co. He claims that in 2011 he was forcibly evicted from his farm in the Gambella region in western Ethiopia and beaten. He says he witnessed rapes and assaults as government soldiers cleared people off their land. Leigh Day is arguing that DfID money is linked to these abuses through PBS funding in Gambella, where the Ethiopian government wants to resettle 45,000 households – almost 100% of the total rural population – over three years. The Ethiopian authorities claim the PBS programme addresses the challenges of poverty through cost- effective service delivery to scattered and nomadic populations. Mr O has told his lawyers that when he tried to return home after being forced fromhis land, he was hit repeatedly with a gun, and taken to a military camp by government soldiers and beaten. Lawyers at Leigh Day say Mr O is claiming that his family was forced to resettle in a new village where they were given no access to farmland, food or water, and where they could not make enough money to feed themselves. Two assessments of the villagisation scheme in the region in February and June this year, which involved DfID, concluded they had uncovered no evidence of forced displacement or human rights abuses linked to the scheme. However, both acknowledged that basic services and shelter were not adequate in the new villages, and said about half the people they had interviewed had not wanted to move and that there had been pressure to do so.Lawyers atLeigh Day are trying to establish whether the UK government is doing enough to ensure that British money is not contributing to human rights violations. "The UK spends a considerable amount of money on international aid and DfID has a responsibility to ensure that this money does not contribute in any way to human rights abuses such as the ones suffered by our client," said Rosa Curling, who is representing Mr O. "Our government has a duty to ensure that the programmes it supports meet the highest compliance standards." In response to the claim, the DfID spokesman said: "We take the issue of human rights extremely seriously and we will respond in due course to this letter [from Leigh Day & Co]. "The UK does not fund Ethiopia's commune development programme. Weare aware of allegations of human rights abuses on the ground. We will continue to review the situation and raise any concerns at the highest levels of the Ethiopian government." The case is ongoing. Guardian.co.uk,Annie Kelly and Liz Ford (December 21, 2012)

SOCCER- Meeting Public Expectation’

The Walya Antelopes are returning to the Africa Cup of Nations after a thirty-one year absence - Ethiopia aim to defy the odds. It took Ethiopia 31 years to stage a comeback to the most prestigious football tournamentthat has ever graced Africa. But the team knows too well that for them to stamp their authority at the Africa Cup of Nations, it will not be a walk in the park. Coach Sewnet Bishaw believes the team will not be pushovers and any opposition, regardless of their status, that wants to pip them will have to go the extra mile to do it. "We beat our rivals Sudan to book the ticket and this was by no means a fluke," he said. "We really worked hard for it and people should know that. We wanted to qualify for AFCON and knew what was at stake, we went past all those hurdles and we won’t make it easy for our opposition." Bishaw, who steered the side to a back- to-back victory at the Council for East and Central Africa Football Associations (CECAFA) competition years ago, also revealed that despite being grouped alongside defending champions Zambia, heavyweights Nigeria and plucky side Burkina Faso, their eye was on the title. "We won’tgo to South Africa to be defeated. "Our aim has always been to bask in glory and we will go to the tourney to do nothing but win the title. We have given the youth a chance to prove themselves in this regional outingCECAFA and whoever impresses me in the process will make the team." Ethiopia, famously known as Walya Antelopes, have been on the global map for their achievement in athletics but by being the only representatives from East Africa, they have their weight of expectations shaped up as they seek to claim their first silverware on the continental stage since 1962. Ethiopia were last crowned Africa Cup of Nations champions in 1962. Source: Al Jazeera (December 22, 2012)

With the death of Meles Zenawi, the power of Adwa elite is buried for thebetter'

Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister for over two decades starting from May, 1991 to August, 2012 has taken the short lived power held by him and by his comrades from Adwa for good to the grave when he died in August of 2012. Currently no Adwa Tigrean holds major position of prominence, be it at the diplomacy, defence or security apparatus, besidesthe TPLF veterans’ illusion of acting as if they matter and as if they make things happen. More disturbing is that, Sibhat Nega primarily demoted byAzeb Mesfin in 2010, has not been reinstated to TPLF cc and doesn't hold any official position within TPLF. Azeb Mesfin in the other hand is still the Chief executive officer and president as well as chairman of EFFORT, a position she stole from Sibhat Nega. Sibhat Nega the once powerful man is so powerless now, he can't even push Azeb out of EFFORT as well as the TPLF's politbureau in which she is EC member. Azeb's refusal to evacuate Menelik palace is an indication to the support she still enjoys from meles' trusted and close friends Getachew Assefa and a Debretsion Guebre Michael were the only individuals who had the full knowledge of Meles's serious illness in the months of July and August of 2012 accordingto what is being talked in Tigrai during those black out months. (December 24, 2012)

100 Days In Office: PMHD Expresses Frustration To Close Confidants'

Ethiopia's new prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, has expressed frustration with the TPLF to a group of close friends he recently met. One long time friend of the prime minister (who wants to remain anonymous) told sources that Hailemariam is finding it impossible to get cooperation from the TPLF members who are dominating the bureaucracy and militaryon a number of issues, most particularly making personnel decisions. TPLFofficials also keep him in the dark on national security matters and he doesn't get timely reports as a commander-in-chief of the Ethiopian National Defence Forces (ENDF). Sources also told Hailemariam wants to give amnesty to all political prisoners, but hardliners in the TPLF-dominated state security are dead set against it. Asked if Hailemariam is concerned about his security, the source said that all his family and friends are extremely worried, but Hailemariam himself doesn't seem to be concerned. Hailemariam wants tomend relations with the Eritrean government and he was furious that the Ethiopian Football Federation (EFF) requested change of venue for the scheduled soccer match with Eritrea. Hailemariam believes that peaceful relations with Eritrea will solve most of the security issues in the region.

However, TPLF leaders believe that Eritrea policy is their domain and theydon't want Hailemariam to come near it, sources said. The Nile river dam project is another area where Hailemariam feels that he is being sabotaged. Ever since the late dictator Meles Zenawi died last July, the TPLF has almost completely withdrawn support for the project, which is currently facing a crippling shortage of funds. Construction workers are not being paid on time, and critical supplies and equipments are not arriving. Much of the funds that have been collected so far have also beenunaccounted for, the source said. Source: ER (December 22, 2012)

Ethiopia welcomes Chinese manufacturers to take on a larger presence'

As China's labor, manufacturing and resources costs continue to rise, Ethiopia, one of the least-developed countries in the world is hoping Chinese companies will consider opening more factories there. "China is one of our country's main donors in building infrastructure, a big constructor and a major technology provider," said Seyoum Mesfin, Ethiopian ambassador to China. "But China will also be a major factory owner in Ethiopia and a big market for products made in Ethiopia in the future. "Chinese companies are assembling goods in Ethiopia to ship backto China, which is more profitable than producing in China today." Mesfinsaid a good labor supply, low energy costs and high-quality materials support development in his country.

It was with plentiful labor, low-cost manufacturing and an export-driven economy that China accomplished its rapid development over the past three decades, and that is the model Ethiopia wants to borrow from. To follow in the footsteps of Chinese constructors and engineers of its infrastructure, the Ethiopian government has been inviting more manufacturers in recent years, making two industrial zones available for entrepreneurs to set up business. Huajian, a shoe maker, is one of the best known Chinese manufacturers in Ethiopia. The company is an originalequipment manufacturer from Dongguan in Guangdong province for leading global brands such as Calvin Klein, Coach and Louis Vuitton. After a meeting Ethiopian senior government officials last year, Huajian openedits factory near the country's capital, Addis Ababa, using an investment of $2 billion, which will create more than 100,000 jobs for local communitiesover the next decade.

"Ethiopia is an important manufacture base for us since we are going to be the OEM for world brands," Zhang Huarong, chairman of Huajian International Group, said during the World Footwear Development Forum in Dongguan last November. Zhang said a manufacturer should not only be able to build its own reputation, but also should be able to help others by providing insight on global strategy. "Within China, there are few opportunities to extend our manufacturing capability quickly," he said. "The best we can do is to maintain the status quo. But in Ethiopia, which is like China 30 years ago, we find many possibilities to make our businesseven bigger, with sufficient supplies of raw materials and labor. It's a beneficial business for the company and local people."

By the end of April, the company had opened three assembly lines in Ethiopia and hired 630 local workers in addition to 160 Chinese employees. A big contributor to Ethiopia's international trade, Huajian produces more than 2,000 pairs of shoes a day, all exported to Europe and the United States. Three more Chinese companies started operating in Ethiopia in September and October."It's exciting to see more Chinese companies moving to Ethiopia," the ambassador said. "They bring excellent experience to our garment and textile industry." With 85 millionpeople, Ethiopia is the most populous country in East Africa. The ambassador said more than half of the population is engaged in productive labor. The average wage for workers in Addis Ababa is 300 yuan ($48) per month, a quarter of that in Dongguan, one of China's main manufacturing bases. "We also have plenty of hydropower and wind power," Mesfin added. "In almost all major infrastructure programs in Ethiopia, you can find a Chinese company's footprint. They help us collect more natural resources and lower the cost of energy, which has become amajor attraction for international investors."

The Ethiopian government said China is the third-largest foreign investor in the country by direct investment volume, which to date totals $364 million. The funds are distributed across the automobile, textile, hotel andmachinery equipment sectors, and in the manufacturing of products for general use. In an interview with China Daily earlier this year, Ethiopia's then-prime minister Meles Zenawi said he highly valued China's role in hiscountry's development. "Many countries can see those advantages and opportunities in Ethiopia," Mesfin said. "Chinese companies didn't get those contracts easily. They are winning in a very competitive market." Compared with Western countries, which are the usual investors in Africa,Mesfin said they prefer the way Chinese investors do businesses in his country.

"Chinese investment has a very good policy of non-intervention in internalaffairs," he said. "This doesn't mean that China does not care about the situation of African's human rights or democracy. The highest-level investments from Western countries are attached to concerns about thoseissues, which damages prospects." To encourage more Chinese investment in Ethiopia, the embassy will host a weeklong event in Beijing next year to promote business opportunities and improve cultural exchanges between the countries. Thousands of Ethiopian students are studying in Chinese universities. Besides learning about China, they also attend activities at their schools to introduce Ethiopian culture to Chinese friends. "Our relationship is based on cultural exchanges at the people-to-people level," said Mesfin. "The more we understand each other, the better we can cooperate and seek common interest together. We welcome friends in China to come to our Ethiopian Week in Beijing next year to getto know us better." Source: China Daily (December 24, 2012)

PMHD - In Hot Seat For His Gesture to Even Travel to Eritrea – politicalcommentators'

VIEWS: In his recent trip to Doha, PMHD signaled that he would even travel to Asmara to talk to PIA of Eritrea if Eritrea is willing to negotiate. PMHD was criticized by TPLF kingmakers that he should have confined his comments to the scripted one i.e., Eritrea has to accept the five point planput in place by his predecessor Meles Zenawi. Despite Bereket Simon’s public rhetoric against Eritrean regime, he would like PMHD to extend a peace initiative to Eritrea. Bereket’s opinion on solving the Ethio-Eritrean dispute is also supported by the newly appointed FM Dr. Teodros Adhanom. However, hardcore TPLF figures like Seyoum Mesfin and Abay Tsehaye would like Ethiopia to pursue a policy that goes beyond containing the Eritrea regime, i.e., they would like to see regime change in Eritrea while Breket and Teodros Adhanom advocate that EPRDF has enough internal problems and adding the Eritrean issue into the mix wouldendanger the very existence of the front.

The US administration is slowly distancing itself from TPLF and would like PMHD to assume more authority, as ER wrote in it's recent article that PMHD is sharing his day to day frustration in running the nation with his close confidants. He also has been telling his frustration to US and UK ambassadors that he has been suffocated by the hardcore TPLF veteran leaders and he admitted that the opposition's assertion that he is nothing more than figurehead in the government is not far from truth. Those signsof frustrations by PMHD will be more likely to get worse and lead to more friction. And, such frictions will more likely push TPLF even resort to more authoritarian style of governance. In the meantime, security recording devices were found hidden in PM HD's bedroom and living room. Accordingto sources, remote listening devices were found inside the Ethiopian PrimeMinister's bedroom and the living room by his daughter namely "Itsub" which it makes the whole family in more distress. It has to be recalled that Ethiopia's new prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, has expressed frustration with the Tigrean People Liberation Front (TPLF) to a group of close friends he recently met. One long time friend of the prime minister (who wants to remain anonymous) told ER that Hailemariam is finding it impossible to get cooperation from the TPLF veterans who are dominating the bureaucracy and military on a number of issues, most particularly making personnel decisions. TPLF officials also keep him in the dark on national security issues and he doesn't get timely reports as a commander-in-chief of the Ethiopian National Defence Forces. Source: ER(December 24, 2012)

High Hopes for Ethiopia's Rising Classical Music Stars'

One evening last month, the sounds of classical Spain could be heard in an unlikely place: the Ethiopian National Theatre in Addis Ababa. Onstage were the talented students of the Yared School, Ethiopia's only institute ofhigher learning for music; directing them was Silvia Sanz Torre, conductorof the Metropolitan Orchestra of Madrid. And in more ways than one, the performance ended on a high note. "This concert has encouraged the students to continue studying and working a lot," says Yared School director Tadele Tilahun. "In Ethiopia, there has not been an orchestra concert in the last 30 to 40 years purely formed by students or teachers ofEthiopia." Around for over four decades, Yared, which is part of Addis Ababa University, has become a special spot for budding musicians, often fresh out of secondary school. To enrol, candidates must all demonstrate musical talent. But aside from that, each student's story is unique.

Inspiration from horticulture and Yanni: Take, Eyuel Mengistu. He plays double bass, though this wasn't the 24 year old's first instrument of choice. "I used to play the krar, a traditional instrument," he says about his primary school days. In fact, Mengistu hadn't even realized he wantedto pursue music until he had already begun a three-year study in horticulture - that's when he started on the keyboard and that's what led him to Yared. "When I got accepted, I wanted to study piano, but there were too many students with the same preference," he recalls. "Then I chose trumpet. But after six months, I decided to play double bass." Afterfive years, Yared students are expected to have completed their studies, earning Bachelor of Art degrees. Most students are reported to find jobs as classical musicians. Selamawit Aragaw is a case in point. "I have been an assistant at the Yared School and ... will start being a lecturer," she says. "But apart from that, I give a lot of violin private lessons and I havea quartet with which I play in different hotels."
By Borja Santos Porras, (December 25, 2012)

More Muslim activists rounded up in Kemmise'

December 30, 2012: Over 10 young Muslim activists were reportedly rounded up and detained Thursday in Kemise, Amhara region. A number of Muslim activists who were detained in previous raid have also been saidto have been taken to Addis Ababa and were jailed under the pretext of involving in acts of terrorism and handling weapons. Sources told that there was a house to house search that security forces conducted in the town activists suspected of involvement in protests over the interference of the regime in their religion. Meanwhile, Muslim activists challenging theregime over its undue intervention in Islamic affairs, including handpickingleaders of the Islamic Supreme Council and imposing the Al Ahbash sectarian faith, have planned to stage a nationwide protest on January 4. The nationwide protest is aimed at not only observing the first anniversaryof the start of the Muslim movement but also pressing the regime to desist from interfering in the affairs of Ethiopian Muslims, who are demanding respect for their constitutionally-enshrined freedom of religion.Source: ESAT News

Ethiopia: African Union 50th Anniversary to Kick-Off'

Preparations are well underway in Ethiopia for the celebration of the 50thAnniversary of the African Union. The Golden Jubilee will be celebrated with a variety of programs ranging from cultural shows panel discussions,documentary films, outdoor and indoor music extravaganza, mass sport, postage to stamp inaugurations, etc., highlighting the eventful journey Ethiopia and the organization made together in the past 50 years. The celebrations will kick-off this month and run until May 25th, the actual date of the establishment of the OAU in Addis Ababa 50 years ago. A National Committee composed of seven sub-committees drawn from various government offices, has been putting together the activities lined up to mark the occasion colorfully. The National Committee is now led by a Secretariat based at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The celebration is meant to reflect Ethiopia's unwavering commitment to the ideals of the OAU/AU and the active role it played in the Organization beginning with the formative stages of the establishment of the OAU, throughout the decolonization process, the post-independence era and the present period.In the past 50 years, Ethiopia has developed a special relationship with the OAU/AU working with it closely in realizing the vision articulated by the founding fathers 50 years ago. This cooperation has manifested itself in practical action in terms of promoting Africa's political, economic and social agenda in a wide range of issues, such as conflict resolution, peacekeeping and regional integration as well as the promotion of democracy and good governance. Source: GoE

Ethiopia - Gearing up for African Cup of Nations-2013'

Updates: Preparations are underway for the 2013 Africa Cup of Nations in South Africa, and Ethiopia's national team (The Black Lions), that qualifiedfor the tournament for the first time since 1982, is also gearing up for the continent's most prestigious soccer competition, which kicks off on January 19th in Johannesburg. By all accounts the past year has been very productive for Ethiopia. The website SouthAfrica.info noted, their games included a 1-1 draw against the host South Africa, which led to the dismissal of the country's coach Pitso Mosimane after a string of unconvincing results. The Black Lions also advanced past Benin and Sudanafter a draw at home with Benin followed by another victory over Sudan, against whom they lost 5-3 in Khartoum and then beat 2-0 in Addis. The team's star players are striker Saladin Said, who plays abroad for Wadi Degla in the Egyptian Premier League, and Adane Girma of Ethiopia's Saint George Club, who was voted the best player in the Ethiopian PremierLeague in 2011. Speaking about Saladin his former coach Belgian Walter Meeuws is quoted as saying: "Said is a very skilful player, technically strong, good speed and a good positioning as striker. He reads very well the game and the last year he became stronger in both power and physical strength." But in order for Ethiopia to have a performance worth remembering in South Africa, the team must first survive its challengers in group "C" that include Zambia, Nigeria and Burkina Faso. Source: Source StarAfrica December 31, 2012

We Are Returning To The Glory Days – Head soccer coach SeyoumKebede'

Ethiopia National soccer team head coach Seyoum Kebede has high hopeshis youthful team have a bright future and above all , they are destined tocreate a massive impact in the Orange Africa Cup of Nations slated in South Africa. Ethiopia will be part of the 16 teams taking part in the 2013 Africa Cup of Nations championships that go down in South Africa. The last time they qualified for the Africa Cup of Nations was in 1982. Despite winning the Cecafa Senior Challenge Cup four times, they have found it hard to penetrate into Africa’s biggest soccer bonanza, the Africa Cup of Nations. However, after beating Sudan 2-0 at home, they booked a place in the 2013 Africa Cup of Nations set to be played in South Africa. Ethiopiaused the Cecafa Senior Challenge Cup as a preparation ground for the championship as they are pooled in a tough group that has defending champions Zambia, Burkina Faso and Nigeria. Coach Seyum Kabedde is upbeat that the Antelopes can make a positive mark in the Africa Cup of Nations and he has set a goal of at least reaching the quarterfinals of the 16-nation tournament. Source: StarAfrica

Note: Ethiopia’s Cup of African Nations cup record’Nine previous appearances

Host: Januay 1962, January 1968, and February 1976 CAF cupsBest Finish: Champions (Januay 1962)

Co-founder of CAF, Ethiopia were one of just three teams to participate inthe inaugural Nations Cup in 1957 - unsuccessfully contesting that year'sfinal, before lifting the trophy on home soil five years later. Regulars at the first seven tournaments, the emergence of more nations, in the wakeof post-colonial independence, meant Ethiopia was caught up and overtaken by the rest of the continent. The Africa's second populated country of over 90 million, is appearing at it's first finals, since Libya '82. Source: NewAfrican

The war ravaged Somalia now gets 3G mobile, Telecom Service'

Hormud Telecommunications, one of the leading telecom companies in Somalia has added its telecom services, 3G mobile services which gives users a secure and fast connection to both the mobile internet usage. AbdiHakin, a head of Hormud sales department, said that users and clients in Somalia could get this service with very low rates. Chairman of Hormud telecommunications or Hortel, Ahmed Mohamed Yusuf who spoke at the launch of this new service , said that it is first time that such mobile service reached Somalia and it would benefit the Somali people. 3G, shortfor third Generation, is a term used to represent the 3rd generation of mobile telecommunications technology. (December 31, 2012)

Ethiopia - Hailemariam Not Like Meles Zenawi'

VIEWS: Some went so far as to hypothesise that an authoritative leader isa necessity for the system, and thus Hailemariam is a mere placeholder until the ruling party comes up with a more suitable candidate. A 100 daysafter taking oath as Prime Minister, Hailemariam has done little, if anything, to change this perception. In fact, there seems to be more evidence in favour of the 'placeholder' hypothesis. The state media has also been busy glorifying the late Meles, even in its broadcast of Hailemariam's parliamentary appearance. There is not much effort to buildHailemariam's image, thus far. In fact, Hailemariam himself seems to imitate Meles, in more ways than not. and often refers to the latter as "our prime minister" and "our great leader", in the present tense. But, these cases can be dismissed as temporary moves.

The glorification of Meles could be taken as a tactical move by Hailemariam and his colleagues, in order to maximise the impact of theunexpected public reaction to the passing of the late Prime Minister.

Though the great leader's narrative seems to undermine the stature of Hailemariam and that of the ruling party, it would have been even riskier to look ungrateful towards their deceased leader, at a time when every noteworthy personality was showering him with praise. Besides, attempting to scale the contribution of Meles opens up the Pandora's Boxof personality contests among the incumbents, and undermines the impact of the narrative. After all, Hailemariam will have enough time to build his image, once he fortifies the system, ruling under Meles' shadow,at least for a while. Needless to say, these factors are additions to the ruling party's tendency to overdo everything. But this speculation essentially rests on the fallacious assumption that Hailemariam needs to be as authoritative as Meles. The fallacy is taking Meles' leadership as therule, rather than the exception.

Neighboring Eritrea is losing it’s youngest and the brightest at an alarmingrate'

I am shocked, but not surprised, to learn today that 3 young Eritreans I met and befriended in Asmara 3 years ago have escaped by foot and arrived in Addis Ababa after spending one month at a U.N.-operated refugee camp in Tigray. One of them worked at the Ministry of Information and two of them worked at a cafe. I spoke with one of them afew minutes ago and asked him how he managed to escape. He said he and the group he was with walked through the countryside disguising themselves as peasants. They walked mostly at night and avoided populated areas. Once they crossed the border into Tigray, villagers fed them and took them to the refugee camp. He told me that he learned about what route to take from a friend who escaped previously. He also told me that hundreds of young Eritreans are crossing the border into Tigray daily. He and his friends are now awaiting the UNHCR to take themto Australia, U.S. or Europe. How is Eritrea going to survive as a country ifit loses a significant number of its young population? It is a country that isbleeding itself to death. Ethiopia is also losing its young people, but with 80 million people, the impact will not be felt as much. As in Ethiopia, Eritrea's #1 enemy is its government's misguided policies that give no hope to its young people. The people in power are too greedy and selfish to transfer power to the new generation. Source: ER by Elias Kifle (December 31, 2012)

Ethiopia and Sudan negotiating for energy trade balance'

Ethiopia and Sudan are in negotiations to balance the revenues earned from Ethiopia's sale of electric power to Sudan with the equivalent expenditure of oil imported from Sudan to Ethiopia, according to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Addis Ababa. After the completion of the Ethiopia-Sudan transmission line in February Ethiopia has, in a test run, started exporting 100 megawatts (MW) of hydro-power generated electricity to Sudan. Sudan will initially be provided with 100MW but this isexpected to increase over time. Ethiopia imports most of its fuel from Sudan, spending over 50 percent of the 4.4 USD made from the country's total 2012 export earnings to meet nation's fuel demand. Ethiopia sells electricity at a price of 0.6 Ethiopian Birr per Kilo Watt. This is equivalent to 0.07 USD for Kwh. Sudan was already a large importer of Ethiopian agricultural products before the electricity deal. Ethiopia also supplies 80 percent of Djibouti's electric power. Ambassador Dina Mufti, the spokesperson of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said the power deals Ethiopia is making with neighbouring countries "will also have an important role in supporting the African Union's efforts towards continental integration". The Ethiopian official did not detail where the talks were taking place but he said the state utility, Ethiopia Electric and Power Corporation (EEPCo) is handling it and is already working with Sudanese officials. The Horn of Africa nation is spending billions of US dollars constructing power plants including the dams on the Blue Nile, which have proved controversial with Egypt and to a lesser extent Sudan. As part of the country's five year Growth and Transformation Plan, Addis Ababa is aiming to boost its power production capacity from 3,000 MW - its current level - to 10,000 MW by 2015. Ethiopia is considered among continent's leading natural energy producer and has an estimated potential of producing 45,000 MW of hydroelectricity, according to data based on studies provide by the EEPCo. Ethiopia has a total of 12 hydro- power plants, including those under construction. The most controversial project is the Renaissance dam which is being built in Blue Nile River.

There are also other massive Dam projects such as Gilgel Gibe III along the Omo River. The dams on the Blue Nile River and Omo River dam projects will both have trans-boundary impacts. Environmentalists have been protesting against the Gibe projects, arguing it will affect the hundreds of thousands of nomads whose livelihoods depend on the watersource. In case of dam projects along Blue Nile River, down stream countries of Egypt and Sudan say the projects will reduce water flow to their territory and further say it violates a historic water rights treaty signed in 1959 b/n Egypt and the Sudan. Ethiopia is leading other upstream countries to demand a fair and equitable share of the Nile Basin's water sources. Despite growing protests Addis Ababa, however, insists to carry on the projects with or without external funds.

Source: Sudan Tribune (December 31, 2012)

Now a lot has been told of former PM, Tamrat Layne, was responsible for current EOTC's internal division' Ex-primeminister Tamirat Layne was responsible for driving out Abune Merkorios from his Patriarchate to make him exiled. Tamrat Layne is known to be a scoundrel and a thief who has served many years in the central prison. This sly fox is a wolf in a sheep's clothing who has been allowed by the regime to retain some of the loot forservices rendered and is now living in-exile in the US. He has changed his tune and is now saying that he has found God within the Pentecostal Church, and says that he is regularly talking to his God. Some of the gullible members of his Church believe what he says and cry Amen.

Accordingly, Tamirat also has to face real justice just like his colleaguesand the former Duerg officials. The Duerg is an all encroaching killing machine devoid of any semblance of mercy or humanity. No amount ofbrowbeating or pontification on its behalf by its staunch supporters andadmirers could eclipse this brutal fact, now and forever! Editor

Ethiopia: Trouble with the Political Oppositions'

Analysis: "The Situation and Direction of Ethiopia after Formation of Ginbot 7 Popular Force, and Will G-7 Popular Force become TPLF or ONLFof Amhara?" Overview: Ethiopia is one of the poorest countries in the world, and large percentage of the population lives in absolute poverty.

Ethiopia is the oldest independent country in Africa and one of the world'soldest continuous civilizations, and one of 51 original members of the United Nations. For decades, Ethiopia has been affected by famine and drought, conflict and political instability. Since the establishment of Ethiopia, the state has been associated with the Abyssinians (or Amhara/Tigray) socio-political leadership, and formation of one clan domination on all government issues. Ethiopia's political transition began in the early 1990s with the fall of the socialist military regime, the Derg. Under Haile Selassie and Mengistu Hailemariam, there were some efforts by students and grassroots movements to bring meaningful social and economic reforms. After May, 1991, the Tigrai People's Liberation Front (TPLF) / Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) made radical changes tothe institutional structures of the Ethiopia through writing new constitution. The TPLF/EPRDF has controlled the political process since that time. Some of the largest ethnic communities, particularly the Oromoand Somali (Ogaden), have been marginalized by Abyssinians (Amhara/Tigray) with little participation in the political representation, andare subject to regular and violent human rights abuses. Due to poor governance and political conflicts, many people as well as farmers and pastoralists were driven from their homes.

Therefore, politics and trouble with the political oppositions in Ethiopia areconnected with the Amhara and Tigray ethnic clans. Most of the presidents, senior government officials and positions are filled or occupied by politicians from these ethnics. However, after 20 years of peaceful integration and good friendship between Amharas and Tigrians in killing and displacing Ethiopians and looting their resources, the Amhara leadersand politicians decided to establish their own rebel group. The Amhara leaders and politicians believe that, peaceful change of leadership and power sharing has been made impossible by TPLF, and the only languageTPLF understands is Kalashnikov gun, and violent change should be inevitable.

Ginbot-7 Popular Force Formation: In 20 December 2012, the Amhara leaders and politicians and their friends officially announced Ginbot7 Popular Force Formation, and called on the oppressed people of Ethiopia to join the resistance and rise up in arms against the Tigrai People Liberation Front (TPLF) led dictatorial regime of Ethiopia. GPF believes thatall civilised options for peaceful political engagement in Ethiopia are firmly shut by the regime in Addis Ababa. the Amhara leaders and politicians said, GPF is committed to the forcible removal of the dictatorial regime of the TPLF, usher the condition for peaceful and democratic transition, play a part in the creation of a strong and capable national defence, security and police force whose only allegiance is to the constitution of the land, thereby, bringing an end to the existing affiliation of these institutions to the political forces in the country[1].

It's not clear the vision and future plan of the Ginbot 7 Popular Forces andwhether the base of the fighters of this group is in Amhara region (Ethiopia) or Eritrea. TPLF/EPRDF cadres see the formation of Ginbot 7 Popular Force as a new risk and threat, so they lost sleeping and direction on what to next. Some Tigrains raised questions about this and the pictureof the fighters on its website, and they believe the picture was taken from somewhere in Texas (USA) and not in Amhara region of Ethiopia. No matter whether this group operates in Amhara region or the picture is from somewhere in Amhara or Texas, but the key concerns are the vision and things with this group, the situation in Ethiopia after formation of the Ginbot 7 Popular Force, the demand of the Ginbot 7 Popular Force, the cooperation of the Ethiopian opposition groups and the way and direction they move, the possible changes "both positive and negative aspects" in the government positions and policies on dealing with the opposition groups, human rights and rights of the ethnic groups, political reform and power sharing issues, impact of these things on the war situation and peace negotiation in the Ogaden region, the Ethiopian Diaspora community, and role and reaction of the international and regional communities on these issues.

Reactions from the Main Groups in Ethiopia: 3.1. Ogaden Today (ONLF):Ogaden Today raised questions about possible and future collaborationsbetween Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) and Ginbot 7 Popular Forces "Fighters". The Ogaden Today statement said "The formation of Ginbot 7 armed group was good news for many Ethiopians, many questions were raised, but one of most important question was “will Ethiopian rebel groups (i.e. ONLF, OLF, EPLF and Ginbot) unite for new armed struggle against Ethiopian Federal Government? There are many challenges ahead uniting Ethiopian Armed Rebel groups, one of them is the vision of each political rebel group, second is the geographical diversity, and third are lack of supporting western countries which are anally of Ethiopia”[2]. This is a positive reaction from ONLF Ginbot7 PopularForce Formation.

Ogaden humanitarian crisis is the worst one in Africa and Middle East. Ogaden region is Ethiopia’s ‘own Darfur, where government runs military operations and blocks food aid delivery and trade as well as restriction of humanitarian access and operations. Ethiopian Government punished indigenous people (pastoralist community) of the region by accusing themthat, they support ONLF. Women, children and older people are the most vulnerable groups to suffer abuse and violence and misuse of humanitarian aid in these regions. Government diverts and distorts food aid to feed military forces and militias in the region. Foreign missions, donors, media and humanitarian agencies have no access to operate in the region and not allowed to visit drought and conflict affected areas andmonitor the situation on the ground. Because of the humanitarian crisis inthe region, government targets humanitarian agencies and their staff. Ethiopia’s donors, UN and NGOs are aware of these problems, but have done little to address the problems or tackle their own role in underwritinggovernment repression.
3.2. Tigray Online (TPLF/EPRDF) TPLF/EPRDF regime or Tigreans were shocked with Ginbot 7 Popular Force Formation and started circulating accuses and cheap propagandas, sending warning messages to the Ethiopians, as well as Amhara people and their friends, and Tigray people,telling them not to join Ginbot 7 Popular Force, and blaming others (including some countries) for supporting this group. In 22 December 22, the Tigray Online published shocking article under title “Ginbot-7 announces formation of military wing, is it bluffing to fool its followers”, calling Tigray people to fight and protect their kingdom and resources from terrorist group, EPPF ragtag bandits. The EPRDF/TPLF regime has warned Amhara and Tigray people and others that they would take military actions if they support Ginbot-7 military guerrilla force.
Following are the reactions of the TPLF/EPRDF regime on Ginbot -7 Popular Force Formation “Ginbot-7 announced the formation of a military guerrilla force. The Washington DC based terrorist group has been trying to incite mayhem and bloodshed in Ethiopia for past few years. Ginbot-7’sleader … Dr. Birhanu Nega who is living comfortably in the United States of America… was an EPRP fighter until he left Ethiopia for America after thousands of Ethiopian youth lost their lives on the faulty mistakes of EPRP. Now Dr. Birhanu Nega wants to start the slaughter of Ethiopian young people all over again, but this time by a remote control from his uxorious home in America. He wants to send the poor Ethiopian youth to their death to fulfill his own ambitions and the Eritrean one man's objectives. It wouldn't be surprising if the desperate Egyptians are financing those traitors since they can't invade Ethiopia. They have been threatening to stop any development in Ethiopia including the Ethiopian renaissance dam by any means. I highly doubt Ginbot-7 has gathered newrecruits from Ethiopia, but it is using the left over EPPF ragtag bandits to claim it has formed a new force. A certain death is waiting for those who are naive enough to believe Ginbot-7 will succeed militarily against the Ethiopian gallant defense forces. Ginbot-7 on its announcement tries to beg the people of Tigrai to join it on their own destruction. It should be abundantly clear to the Ginbot-7 leadership that we the people of Tigrai will fight it tooth and nail until the last man standing falls and to the last drop of our blood[3]".

Feeling the Heat: The Human Cost of Poor Leadership for Disasters: The current news on the Tigray Online show that, the TPLF/EPRDF governmentis declaring holly war on Amhara people and people in other regions, wereopposition groups operate, like Ogaden, Oromiy, Afar and Gambella. Theywarned "war with terrorists from these nations is imminent—that the terrorists "Amhara Rebels" are coming and will provide arms and support the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF),Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) and other groups.

The conclusion of the TPLF/EPRDF is that, "…any young person who had joined this false group is going to be facing the highly trained, highly disciplined, and one of the most feared military force in Africa… We have proved it time and again before we can fight and win the only difference this time around is we are armed to the teeth… we the people of Tigrai willfight it tooth and nail until the last man standing falls and to the last drop of our blood[4]".It's clear from above statement that, there is no change in the position and policies of the TPLF/EPRDF government on dealing withopposition groups, political reform and power sharing, and human rights protection issues, and also the war situation in the Ogaden and other regions, and peace negotiation with ONLF, regional conflicts among the ethnic groups will probably continue, and human rights violations will be increased against indigenous people of these regions. Does this mean lackof political will in the TPLF/EPRDF regime? Many Ethiopians strongly oppose this war and suspect the TPLF/EPRDF of using young Ethiopian men and women to fight in a war inside and outside Ethiopia for its own political survival. They question the fact and the reality, and believe TPLF/EPRDF is adding fuel to the current political conflict and border impasse.

Responding to the conflicts and emergencies in the world's poorest country is a major part of what good leadership does. Country like Ethiopia should be model for political reform, dialogue among the ethnic groups, religious tolerance, good governance and human rights protection.

Unfortunately, Ethiopia is very far from this style of governance system. Each conflict belongs to those who are directly involved. In the Ethiopia case, there is a lack of a coherent government policy to deal with the ethnic groups and political oppositions. Ethiopians and international community should recognize the extent of conflict induced displacement and disasters. TPLF/EPRDF regime should change its attitude and mentality, accept the reality of the country, talk to others and allow themto manage their issues and participate in the federal and regional institutions. International and regional communities, donors and UN should support Ethiopians, encourage TPLF/EPRDF and oppositions to meet the demands of the society "especially indigenous people; pastoralists and farmers" and solve political problems and instability through dialogue and peace negotiations, so they have to avoid and protect new genocide and massacre in Amhara, Oromiya, Ogaden, Gambella and Afar regions.

Conclusions and Recommendations: Tigreans didn't yet realize the establishment and agenda of the Ginbot 7 Popular Forces. Some of TPLF/EPRDF supporters raised questions on this group and its vision and direction, but went far by asking this question "how could a lesson be learnt if yesterday's criminals are today's freedom fighters?" It's clear from the above statements by TPLF/EPRDF regime in Tigray Online, the Woyane regime and cadres see the formation of Ginbot 7 Popular Force asa new risk and threat, so they must take military and security actions against these groups and its supporters, and also other opposition groups in Ethiopia. The above statement and reactions by TPLF/EPRDF leads to the question; who are these people TPLF/EPRDF is "using" to fight this war? Are they not the same people TPLF/EPRDF has been terrorizing for years? How TPLF/EPRDF can ask young people to give up their lives for such a brutal regime? Why TPLF/EPRDF decided bloody war against the ethnic groups, particularly Tigray strategic partners; Amharas? Why TPLF/EPRDF is refusing any discussion and peace resolution with the opposition groups from big ethnic groups, like Oromo, Ogaden and Amhara? Why should Tigray people fight "their fight for survival" when their survival means more of the same oppression and brutality to the people of Ethiopia? How tremendous!

The human rights groups, humanitarian protection experts, and committee to protect journalists have listed Ethiopia as the world's worst place for human rights and backslider on press freedom. TPLF/EPRDF doesn't have the experience and leadership skills or the ingenuity to govern the country. They are against the federal constitution, rule of the law, good governance and human rights protection, and have damaged the image of the Federal Government and Ethiopian people. Therefore, thenew Prime Minister should take urgent actions and hold the TPLF/EPRDF leaders and cadres accountable. The TPLF/EPRDF leaders and cadres, and everyone who run ethnic-based media (i.e. tigraionline.com, cakaaranews.com, etc) should be held to account and brought to the law for undermining the rule of law, threatening the security of the country and for sabotaging the efforts of the Federal Government and Prime Minister. Ministries of Foreign Affairs, Federal Affairs and Information should take immediate actions to close down these websites, TVs, Medias,and take managers and workers of these channels to the justice.

Genuine democratic progress is essential for ending current political crisisand human rights abuses in Ethiopia. All people in Ethiopia have the rightof self-determination and establish their organizations. But, they have to avoid any type of social and political conflict, seriously concern about the direction Ethiopia is heading, and think impact of social and political conflict on the vulnerability and sustainability of the country and the Hornof Africa region. Enough is enough, and the gun language is not and cannot be solution for solving the problems. Ethiopia should be “better prepared to fight famine and drought, not pushing the nation and its resources into internal and regional conflicts”.

Questions for discussion: What are the key issues between Amhara and Tigray politicians; the differences, common goals, what went wrong, and what’s new? Will Ginbot 7 Popular Force become TPLF or ONLF of Amhara?How many Ethiopians from Muslim and Christian families are now locked up in prison? How many have been massacred, tortured or have starved to death when it could have been prevented? Do we have freedom, political reform and rule of law in Ethiopia? Are Ethiopians better off than when the Derg regime was in power – or than we were five years ago?

Cooperation among the opposition groups and the way and direction theymove? Roles and reactions of the international and regional communitiesand organizations (i.e. USA, UK, EU, UN, IGAD, AU, Eretria, Sudan, etc) on these issues? I will leave these questions for the Amhara and Tigray politicians and readers.

Ogaden Online (December 29, 2012)

Politics –Does he live as Meles or as himself? - Ethiopia’s PMHD marks 100days in office'

Hailemariam Desalegn was sworn in as Ethiopia’s prime minister. He was regarded as a compromise candidate and many Ethiopians expected morepolitical freedom. 100 days on, hope is fading. A few days before Ethiopia's new prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, was sworn in, the Ethiopian government pardoned 2,000 political prisoners. Desalegn's inauguration coincided with the Orthodox New Year which falls in September. At the same time the Ethiopian government started negotiations in Kenya with the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), aseparatist group based in the eastern part of the country. The Ethiopian government classifies the armed wing of ONLF as "terrorists". When the new prime minister hinted at the prospect of peace talks with arch rival Eritrea, many Ethiopians believed they were finally entering a new era of political sunshine. The 47-year-old engineer and father of three daughters, is considered moderate and affable, compared to Meles Zenawi, Desalegn's charismatic predecessor. Zenawi ruled the country with an increasingly iron fist following the bloody 2005 elections. A technocrat, Hailemariam Desalegn was a former provincial governor, foreign minister and deputy prime minister. He was also one of the closestconfidants of Zenawi. Since he comes from one of Ethiopia's smallest ethnic groups, the Wolayta, many saw Desalagn as the best compromise candidate in the midst of political and economic infighting between the dominant Amhara, Oromos and Tigreer ethnic groups.

All hail Hailemariam: "Appointing someone from a small population like the Wolayta who have not traditionally been part of the power elite can have a strong symbolic value," Jason Mosley, an expert on Ethiopia at the Chatham House think tank, told DW in an interview. "But of course it has to work in practice." Opposition politician Wondemagegn Demeke of the All Ethiopia Unity Party (AEUP) shares Mosley's view. "Hailemariam's appointment is unprecedented in the history of our country, because he was not part of the armed struggle. We were all surprised," The oppositionhad been concerned that the succession would undermine the country's constitution. Fortunately that did not happen. But, according to Wondemagegen, the appointment of a new secretary of state showed thatthe executive is still controlled by the ruling coalition, the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). "Therefore, we regret that there has been no change in policy since his appointment," the opposition politician added. According to Mosley, "The policies towards its neighbor Somalia, as well as the Nile water policy towards Sudan and Egypt have not changed." He sees the recent cabinet reshuffle, which sawthe appointment of three deputy prime ministers, as primarily due to the ethnic balance of power in the EPRDF multi-party coalition. There is still a small question mark as to whether the policy towards northern neighbor Eritrea will ever change. "Continuity with the previous government is the need of the hour," Mosley noted.

Fading hope: The optimism that greeted Ethiopia's development from partners abroad seems to have faded. At the beginning of 2013, some 16members of the European Parliament appealed in an open letter to Hailemariam to respect the freedom of expression. "The new prime minister has a great opportunity to bring his country forward if he allows openness, criticism and freedom of expression," German MEP Alexander Graf Lambsdorff, one of the signatories, said. Nevertheless hardly a day goes without western diplomats watching cases against journalists. An example is the eleven journalists convicted under the draconian anti- terrorism law. Only after the Committee to Protect Journalists decried thearrests, and lobbied with other independent journalists, were some of theaccused freed. However by the end of 2012, six were still in custody including the award-winning blogger Eskinder Nega. Terrorism charges against 29 Muslim journalists, clergy and activists almost pushed Ethiopian Muslims to the limit. They have now made their Friday prayers in the Anwar Mosque in Addis Ababa a continuous protest against thegovernment.

Change of guard, not policies: Hailemariam has repeatedly stressed his intention to continue with the policies of his predecessor Meles Zenawi. The flood of cases against journalists and activists, and the crackdown by security forces on Muslim protestors after his first 100 days in office, haveobservers thinking that there could be a new strong man in this African nation which retained its sovereignty during Africa's colonial times.

Strategically located and hosting the seat of the African Union, Ethiopia isconsidered the "capital of Africa". However, the country on the Horn of African is facing huge challenges. The population, already Africa's second largest, is growing unabated. The economy, though booming with double-digit growth, is only benefitting a small urban middle class. And finally, Ethiopia is a frontline state in the international fight against radical Islamist terrorism in neighboring Somalia. These are all challenges that the new prime minister must address urgently with his new cabinet.

Meanwhile, his foreign policy plate seems to be full. In early January he was expected to mediate in the ongoing conflict between Sudan and SouthSudan. "The death of Meles Zenawi will not change Ethiopia's political landscape overnight. The media would like to see the leash dropped," Mosley said. "But since the bloody 2005 elections, Ethiopia's political line is to tighten its reins on power and release very slowly as much as the authorities deem appropriate and as permitted by the country's stability." With such a policy, Mosley concluded, nothing substantial has changed.

Source: DW. DE by Ludger Schadomsky and Susan Houlton (September21, 2012)

Meles Zenawi - In Life & Death’

He left no room for ambiguity. Of course he was loved and hated admiredand loathed with equal passion. And debating his legacy calls for clarity, purpose and passion too. Some of his supporters say he is one of a few African leaders who actually made time, engaged in and welcomed intellectual exchange, whether about politics, economics or social policies,an opposition figure remarked on his blog, the people had been mobilisedfor funeral service by the regime and ordered on to the streets. Another opposition voices, how Meles Zenawi lost the opportunity to be an exemplary leader - to be loved, cherished and revered by their people, like Nelson Mandela. "In saying farewell to Meles Zenawi, he chose to paraphrase Brutus' tribute to Julius Caesar, the friend he had slain in a power grab: " It's time to bury Meles Zenawi not to praise him. The evil that men do lives after them". History will not prove him right at all.

Editor

Africa Cup of Nations-2013: Ethiopia inspired by their past'

Ethiopia hold the dubious record of being runners-up in the Africa Cup of Nations without winning a game or even scoring a goal. That came at the inaugural tournament, held in 1957, after the Confederation of African Football was established by the Egyptian, Ethiopian, South African and Sudanese Football Associations. Ethiopia received a bye into the final afterSouth Africa were disqualified for refusing to send a multi-racial team, andthe Walya Antelopes were then beaten 4-0 by Egypt in Khartoum. Now, 31 years after their last appearance in the Finals, one of the founding fathers of the African game are back and aiming to make a big impact in South Africa.

Understanding the Treacherous Relationship Between the Ethiopian Regime and the Al-shabaab'

OPINION: Those who're familiar with the criminal nature of the Ethiopian regime and how it operates will not be swayed or convinced by the regime's recent announcement that it has "arrested 15 members of an East African terrorist cell affiliated with Al- Qaida" who have been trained by the Alshabab militants in neighboring Somalia and in Kenya and sent to carry-out terrorist attacks in Ethiopia. The inclusion of Kenya as a terrorist training base for Alshabaab is meant to solicit Kenyan support for the Ethiopian regime's hyped terrorism hoax.

The Ethiopian regime believes it is at war with other forces in the Horn of Africa region who reject its hegemony of the region and wants to convinceworld powers that it alone is fit to become the regional superpower. This isnot something which was started by the late Ethiopian dictator Meles Zenawi, who immensely benefited from the collapse of the Somali State and the subsequent opportunity the 9/11 attacks presented him, but it was a process that has been going on for centuries under different pretexts ever-since Abyssinian Kings begun invading other ethnic communities' lands and expanded their empire from the Northern Highland region to the South, in the process conquering the territories of the Oromos, Afars, Sidamas, Somalis and others. Emperor Menelik II's 1878 letter to Queen Victoria of England in which he claims "Ethiopia has been for four centuries a Christian island in a sea of pagans" and beg the assistance of the government of her Majesty and other Christian powers tohelp him 'to regain our sea frontiers,'offers a historic glimpse of the extentto which different Ethiopian rulers will resorted to in order to occupy otherpeople's lands and the tactics they employed to achieve their goal.

During the eras of King Johannes IV, Emperor Menelik II and Hallie Selassie, the ruse to attract the support of the prevailing Western powers of the time was to create the hype of a tiny Christian nation facing extinction due Islamic encirclement and expansion (Menelik II's "If truly you are the protectors of Christians, it is today that you must give us proof," typifies this era), today it is the imaginary existential threat posed by Islamic extremists to Ethiopia. The destruction of the Somali State, which had made the Somali race vulnerable to exploitation and abuse withno one to protect them, coupled with the competition for resources in the strategic region the Somalis inhabit (described by some as ‘empty and ungoverned spaces’) by the rising power of China and Western powers, had made Somalis the object of the ‘Empires’ Gaze’ so to speak, and Ethiopia, as usual and as in the past, wants to become the Dilala – dealerof the region. So if Menelik II insisted in his time, during the European Scramble for Africa: “I have no intention at all of being an indifferent spectator, if the distant Powers hold the idea of dividing up Africa…” and that he wants to secure his share – which he got eventually as the only black power that took part in the Scramble for Africa – the current Ethiopian rulers are fighting tooth and nail to secure their piece of the Somali pie which is up for grabs, using Islamic terrorism to solicit the backing of the terrorism-weary Western world. For the West to believe that the Ethiopian regime is genuinely fighting terrorism as it claims, the regime occasionally manufactures evidence to support its claim. And it comes handy in different forms: Alshabaab related terrorists captured here; an exposed bomb plot there; a plot to blow up the African Union headquarters prevented and foiled; killed tourists blamed to be orchestrated from a neighboring country and attacked, and so on and so forth.

Although some people may consider it as Conspiracy Theory however it iswidely known (by those who’re familiar with operations and tactics of the Ethiopian regime) that the Ethiopian regime’s secret services planted operatives inside Alshabaab ranks who help them direct how the terrorist movement operates. In the past, the Ethiopian regime justified its involvement in Alshabaab ranks on the pretext of wanting to know Alshabaab plots against Ethiopia, which may have convinced some in the international community as some of them also run a similar scheme, however it has become evidently clear that the strategy of the Ethiopian regime and the game it is playing is totally different from the one it has sold to Western powers: that Alshabaab poses existential threat to the security and stability of the Ethiopian State and that they’re fighting theminside Somalia in order to prevent the group from crossing into Ethiopia and causing chaos. It has also been revealed that Alshabaab receive the bulk of their weaponry from Ethiopia and that the Ethiopian regime doesn’t want Alshabab to be defeated, for Alshabaab is both a cash cow for the Ethiopian regime which it milks the International Community, and a nasty force that fights to prevent the re-establishment of strong and unified Somali State.

Ethiopia’s support for Alshabaab came to light when the Kenyan-led AMISOM forces, which were backed by the international community, decided to clear Alshabaab from the Juba region and captured Kismayo inSeptember last year. The first failed step the Ethiopian regime took was the planes loaded with weapons it has sent to Alshabaab held Baidoa. Andbefore anyone else knew about the planes, Somalia's former TGF president Shiekh Shariif, who was intricately connected to the Ethiopian regime, immediately claimed that Eritrea sent the weapons to Alshabaab.

The subsequent UN investigation cleared Eritrea of any wrongdoing but stopped short of accusing Ethiopia when it became clear that all arrows ofsuspicion pointed to the Ethiopian direction. Many times the inhabitants ofSomalia's Bay and Bakool region have witnessed Ethiopian troops crossinginto their region and dumping loads of arms and ammunition in prearranged sites, and soon after they leave Alshabaab militants arriving to collect the weapons consignment. Therefore it is no coincidence that Ethiopian troops always publicise which Alshabaab held territory they intend to attack in order to give Alshabaab enough time to vacate the area. That is why there is rarely face-to-face confrontation between Alshabab militants and Ethiopian forces.

Why the latest terrorism hype now? Ethiopian Muslims have been markingthis past week the first anniversary since they begun the peaceful protest against the Ethiopian government's unlawful interference in their religiousaffairs. The protests begun when the regime tried to impose – at the behest of Iran – an alien Shia sect on the body that runs Islamic affairs inEthiopia, the Islamic Affairs Supreme Council of Ethiopia (EIASC). Many religious rights organisation condemned Ethiopia's crackdown of the peaceful Muslim protesters, among them the US Commission on International Religious Freedom (USCIRF) which issued strongly worded statement: "The arrests, terrorism charges and takeover of Ethiopia Islamic Affairs Supreme Council (EIASC) signify a troubling escalation in the government's attempts to control Ethiopia's Muslim community."

Faced with this dilemma, the regime resorted to the only game it knows best: to smear the peaceful protesters and link them to terrorist groups. In this way the regime hopes to attract Western support for its crackdownof Muslim protesters. It is not difficult for the Ethiopian regime to sneak into Addis Ababa Alshabaab elements and orchestrate bombing campaignswhich might cause huge civilian casualties and then claim that the Alshabab group, which Ethiopian troops helped to defeat in Somalia, havecrossed into Ethiopian territory to exact their revenge on Ethiopia.The regime has already claimed the peaceful protesters have been infiltrated and inspired by violent extremist groups. It is was only a matter time before they produced 'evidence' to proof this accusation.

By demonizing Ethiopian Muslim protesters and linking them to Alshabab militants, the Ethiopian regime wants to kills two birds with one stone: onthe one hand, they want to re-energize the waning Western support for their sinister adventures in Somalia; and on the other hand, they want toprevent (by crushing them down with Western approval) the Muslim protesters from coalescing into a popular national, all ethnic and all religious, civic protest movement that can threaten the regime. But the International Community knows too well to be duped by the treacherous designs of Ethiopia's ruling Woyane ethnic clique.

What's pushing Ethiopians to flee off their country in droves?

Meeting Public Expectations' When Ethiopian Christmas was observed on January 7, many citizens were nowhere physically present to share the joys of this festive event and national occasion with family and friends. In 2012, a very substantial number of Ethiopians have perished on the high seas, in the cruel deserts as feeds for wild animals, or in the hands of human traffickers and abusers, or as victims of crossfires in conflict zones,and in some Eastern and Southern African countries as prisons, who have illegally crossed into their countries. Because of the severity and harshness of the environments they have been in and the enormous sufferings many have been subjected unknown numbers have also lost their lives. Some took their own lives, falling from high rise buildings or hanging themselves because their state of mind could not accept the dishonors they they have been subjected to. The danger for our country now is the fact that this trend is showing significant increases. Young boysand girls barely into their teen age years, even as young as 12, are frequently trekking out, as 2012 has shown. What is it that is pushing our youth out of their own country: The tragedy is that this has not excluded university graduates, who could neither find jobs nor could live in peace and security. If one is to consider only the case of those that have been known to countries of asylum and registered by the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the number is staggering. Not all of those that escape out of Ethiopia do register with the UNHCR. Therefore, since reliable data is hardly available, no effort has been made to put numbers on those that move into the developing world, especially Africa and the Middle East. Surely, their number is much higher and one reason why they do not want to be registered is the fear of rejection. Rejection means license for the host country to throw out the immigrant. After all, Ethiopia's image as a country, with double-digit economic growth has resulted in muddled thinking. The sense of fear or insecurity and the consideration of all the relevant factors that define unavailability of opportunities is ignored. People with real opportunities would not throw them away their chances that easily, unless there is real or perceived sense of insecurity or injustice. In other words, latest improved perceptionof Ethiopia's image in the eyes of the outside world seems to ignore or disregard the fact that the economy is not for everyone. That there is no equal justice for all, much as the traditional definition of equal opportunities phrase is not pivoted on the capacities of individuals to do things. That has been replaced by ethnicity and whether one is registered as member of the ruling party.

In such a situation, how could one consider himself/herself a citizen with equal rights, when a classmate or a neighbor's son or daughter from, whatMeles Zenawi over a decade ago described as the golden race, is picked for better education, good jobs, leadership position and, most of a real sense of security? Therefore, in Ethiopia today there is an aspect of Ethiopianness that entails either penalty or deprivation. Even by the nation's laws, such behavior is considered criminal. Unfortunately, this hasnot stopped the institutionalization in practice of the criminal activities by the very same people who have written and approved the laws that criminalize it in the first place. Unfortunately, in Ethiopia what the law says is one thing. And it is an entirely different thing what the state and its agencies do to carry out unlawful activities. These violations of the fundamental human rights of Ethiopian people is as much at the heart of the forced trekking of Ethiopians, much as the deprivation and their lack of opportunities to make life more meaningful. Prime Minister HailemariamDesalegn was in parliament for his second Q & A session. One of the things he discussed was human trafficking. It is unfortunate that, while heacknowledged the death of countless Ethiopians drowning in the seas, he made it sound as if these the consequences of their youthful flings. He attributed the causes of human trafficking in Ethiopia to the existence of criminals, tricking the young and the innocent and to make money out of human sufferings. He admitted that more than 90 percent of those trafficked die at seas or suffocating inside containers. However, he never stopped to ask why his own daughters or the children of the elites in power would not bolt out to the Middle East or Southern Africa. In brief, his view is twisted and a challenge to listen to him kowtowing the party line, with no sympathies whatsoever to those perishing or his veritable distortion adding to the silent erosion of the country's future. More pathetic is the fact that he had the courage to say that the money that people pay to human traffickers is a huge sum and these youngsters would have been better off investing the money in the country and starting businesses.

One fact Prime Minister Hailemariam ought to understand is what the realpush factors in the country are: state violence, brutality of security personnel, the absence of due process of law, repression and denial of opportunities the country's political economy has imposed on citizens. It has blocking them from applying themselves to cultivate their skills and belief in education in the hope that they would be able to accomplish thisor that. Instead, they are being pushed to learn to become second class citizen in their own country. Otherwise, why on earth would a person run away from his or her country, when they know the risks of being illegal immigrant is immense and costs once ilife? The stories of deaths of Ethiopians is widely reported on the government media. Unfortunately, it has not deterred them from trying to take their chances. According to theinternational media, since December 2012, 61 Ethiopians have lost their lives in unfortunate situations in different countries. This figure may be not bearer of the all those lost to the country. So, what is pushing Ethiopians to flee, poverty, a Never ending poverty and luck of Opportunity.
Source: Ethiopian News & Opinion by Keffyalew Guebre Medhin Urging The UK Government To Refrain'
Diasporans urged the United Kingdom to refrain from funding Ethiopia'snotorious Special Police Force'
The UK government is providing financial aid to human rights abusers in Ethiopia through funding training paramilitaries, who perpetrate summary killings, rape and torture in the impoverished African country, local media reported. Through its foreign aid budget, the UK government provides financial support to an Ethiopian government security force known as the “special police” as part of its “peace and development programme”, which would cost up to £15 millionin five years, The Guardian reported. The Department for International Development warned in a leaked document of the “reputational risks” of working with organisations that are “frequently cited in human rights violation allegations”, according to the report. The Ethiopian government’scounter-insurgency campaign in Ogaden, a troubled region largely populated by ethnic Somalis is being enforced by the 14,000-strong special police. This is while that the police forces is repeatedly accused bythe campaign group Human Rights Watch of serious human rights abuses.Claire Beston, Amnesty International’s Ethiopia researcher, said it was highly concerning that Britain was planning to work with the paramilitary force. “There is no doubt that the special police have become a significantsource of fear in the region,” she said.

Ruling Party Rejects The Return of Abune Markorios As “Patriarch ofEthiopia'

TPLF at it’s power to fully control the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church (EOTC). Since the death last year of the head of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, Abune Paulos Guebre-Yohannes, officials have been trying to haveanother Tigrean appointed as his replacement. Abay Tsehaye, senior leader of the ruling party in Ethiopia, made it clear to church leaders that the government doesn't want the return of Ethiopia's legitimate Patriarch Abune Markorios. Abay Tsehaye told a session of EOTC synod “it’s much better to reinstate Mengisu Haile Maraim, the former dictator than allowing Abune Markorios to cme back”, warns otherwise to set a separateTigrean Church Synod if necessary.

Ethiopia marching toward a failed state – US Intelligence'

Revealation: Ethiopia will be among the top failed states, according to a report by the Director of National Intelligence, an umbrella organization ofUS intelligence agencies. Entitled “Global Trends 2030: Alternative Trends”, Ethiopia is among the top 15 states expected to disintegrate and become ungovernable in the next fifteen years. The separation of Eritrea from Ethiopia is said to have ushered in the era of disintegration of Africanstates along tribal and ethnic lines. “The secessions of Eritrea from Ethiopia and South Sudan from Sudan are seen in retrospect as precursors of this era in which the boundaries across the Sahel are redrawn. States fragment along sectarian, tribal, and ethnic lines. “

The British MP responds to The Guardian Report’

The British MP Lynne Featherstone accuses her government of funding Special Police Force (Liyuu Police Hail) as mis-leading. "Not a penny of British money will go to the Liyuu force. We take human rights extremely seriously and recognise that reform of the special police is critical for achieving a safe and secure Somali region. That's why we are discussing with UN partners how we might work together to improve the police's human rights record. This is something that Human Rights Watch has called for. The Peace and Development programme as a whole will help over 300,000 people get access to safe, clean water, give thousands of young people an education and help 700,000 people get a job and earn anincome. This is in addition to the hundreds of thousands of people who willreceive better access to justice and security. The Somali region of Ethiopiais one of the most deprived areas in the country. This programme is intended to create the conditions they need to lift themselves out of poverty". Lynne Featherstone MP is the International development minister. Source: Somaliland Sun

Military's Metal and Engineering Corporation (MetEC)Tigthens Grip on theEconomy'

In mid-2010: Since the commencement of Growth and Transformation Plan (GTP), the nation’s current five-year development, MetEC- the misleadingly named that has come to dominate the Ethiopian economy in less than one year. Headed by Brigadier General Kinfu Dagnew, MetEC now controls fiteen industries and 100 factories. It has its fingers in everything from the so-called Grand Renaissance Dam to arms factories, to a spanking new fertilizer factory, to ten sugar factories, one of which presumably requires the tearing down of Waldiba Monastery. MetEC is the latest creative move by TPLF to tighten its grip and to control every aspectof the life of Ethiopianns. It entrenches a patronage system that gives a larger stake to the military while guaranteeing the survival of the regime. Disguised as economic development, the move is also further evidence of unabashed wealth transfer from a much-suffering population held hostageto an unrepresentative ethnic minority that has created a police state withthe blessing for foreign powers. Many of the foreign backers of the regimealso benefit from various illicit deals with the secretive regime. Establisheda year ago and entrusted with several government projects worth billions of Birr, MetEC, run by a high ranking military officer, Kinfu Dagnew (BGen), involves several projects including the electromechanical work of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam and the erection of a turnkey fertilizer and 10 sugar plants in various parts of the country. MetEC is engaged in the design, manufacturing, upgrading and maintenance of different products and services of the Defense Industry including upgrading combat aircrafts and helicopters, tanks, vehicles and weapons.

It is believed to be playing a pivotal role in helping the country’s ambitiousdevelopment plan of transforming itself into a middle income country by making contributions to the industrial development sector. The corporation was originally mandated to undertake the design, manufacturing, development, and supply for projects for both state-ownedenterprises and the private sectors seeing to ease the burden of steering the nation's drive to an industrial economy, including subcontracting various projects to domestic construction firms. However, it is now being said that it is swelling too much by amassing every development sector while undermining local and private companies. The fatter it gets the less able it is at running projects properly, say observers. "The very idea of thecorporation's establishment and it's vision is good for foreseeing the country's prosperity. The problem is to assure how its management capacity is reliable to run such huge commitments," observes say. Some also believe the actual trend of the corporations and wide engagement in multi-sectors is undermining other local companies, leaving them frustrated and incompetent. "The huge fish are swallowing the smaller andtiny fish." In the past five months alone, MetEC has inaugurated over three factories. Corporation Board Chairperson and Minister of Defense, Siraj Fagessa said the Corporation is "spearheading the realization of the Ethiopian Renaissance". The Corporation is a sub contractor of the electro mechanical work of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam Project. This work is mainly undertaken by the Ethiopian Power Engineering Industry, which is one of the industries under the Corporation. =

The Ethiopian Power Engineering Industry inaugurated a wire and cable factory which is one of its eight factories built in the Modjo town at a cost of 200 million Birr to produce electric cables that can carry 400 and 500 KV, especially for the power transmission of the Grand Renaissance and Gibe III dams. Similarly, the Corporation also inaugurated a heavy truck assembly factory, which is operating under the Bishoftu Automotive Industry. Siraj once said the Corporation is facilitating the industrializationprocess. It works by bringing together local micro and small enterprises aswell as medium industries with foreign companies facilitating the transfer of knowledge and technology. There is also a new armament factory that was the third factory inaugurated a few months ago. Currently, MetEC runs 15 industries and about 100 factories. As part of its expansion, the Corporation has also agreed to replace the electric meters operated by theEthiopian Electric Power Corporation. The project is valued at nine billion birr and is expected to replace electric meters with new 'smart' meters.

The new 'smart' digital meters are expected to automatically register electric consumption and report back to EEPCo without requiring manual reading like the analog meters currently being used. However, MetEC has failed to deliver the commitment it owes to EEPCo. As a result, the latter had to make an urgent and alternative deal with an Indian company. This also cost EEPCo more than USD 27 million foreign exchange. Hence, criticsclaim that these transformers could have been done by other local companies if MetEC hadn't muscled them down. It is to be remembered that the Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation is requiring all factories in Ethiopia to install devices that guarantee efficient use of power. The Metal and Engineering Corporation has snatched the responsibility to produce the devices known as power factor correctors. The efficiency devices willbe made available to all factories eventually on a one-year interest-free credit arrangement, according to EEPCo Officials.

The efficiency devices are expected to adjust the difference between realpower and apparent power in the use of electricity to a ratio of one.

However, still, private companies face sort of a setback from the device being manufactured by MetEC, which forces them to pay the electric bill, including the power leakage due to inefficient power meter.

MetEC is alsobuilding Yayu Coal Phosphate Fertilizer Complex project, 600km west of the capital in the Illubabor Zone, Oromia Regional State. It is one of the two fertilizer factories that the federal government wants built at a total cost of ETB 2.8 billion. A consortium of public manufacturing enterprises,which are under the control of MetEC, include Dejen Aviation, Bishoftu Automotive and Locomotive, Hibret Machine Tools Engineering Complex, Homicho Ammunition Engineering Complex, Gafat Armament EngineeringComplex, Power Engineering, Hi-tech Industry, Metal and Fabrication Industry, Adama Garment Industry, Ethiopia Plastic SC, and Adama (Nazaret) Tractor Assembly Plant.

Pan-Ethiopian flag arrives in Joburg'

Excitement and jubilation .. Excitement and jubilation as Ethiopian refugees received delivery of the the pan-Ethiopian flag. Shock, anxiety and bewilderment griped TPLF officials at the Ethiopian embassy in Pretoria as refugees totally rejected the satanic flag of the minority junta; a symbol of the brutal internal colonization of Ethiopia. The Pan-Ethiopian flag arrived in Johannesburg directly from China, ahead of the black lions (The Walia Antelopes) opening match against the copper bullets of Zambiain Nelspruit, much to the delight of thousands of patriotic fans. It was immediately distributed, all thanks to the sterling work of the Ethiopian Community Association in South Africa and the anti TPLF organization known as “Bête-Ethiopia”. It will be proudly displayed at Mbonbela stadium opening match The Black Lions (The Walia Antelopes) against thecopper bullets of Zambia in Nelspruit. “We have a big surprise for the enemy of our flag, our history and our tradition. We are going to shame the dead tyrant Meles Zenawi who once called our flag a ‘rug.’ In bringing this flag here, great gallantry has been displayed by great individuals herein South Africa. Long live the Ethiopian Community Association! Long live Bête- Ethiopia!” an elated refugee told The Horn Times. With some of the flag stretching for up to 10m, it is now all systems go nicely. Ethiopians publicly dumping the TPLF flag they received earlier from embassy officials. Meanwhile, despite the minority's attempt to sabotage the national team’s arrival, we are all at Oliver Tambo International Airport in Johannesburg to welcome the "Black Lions of Ethiopia (Walia Antelopes".

Source: The Horn Times

A Fox in sheep’s clothing? The famous singer frowned up on’

The controversial Ethiopian singer-cum-poet Tewodros kassahun aka Teddy Afro is in big trouble here in South Africa as raging refugees alreadyboycotted his concert scheduled for Sunday 20 Jan 2012 in Johannesburg after news emerged that Ethiopian embassy officials and TPLF cadres will use the occasion to market the so called renaissance dam bond sales.

Many are arguing that if the young singer who becomes overlord, sternand haughty is still worth listening to.

Ethiopia players get $110,000 if they win African Cup in South Africa' —(AP)

Ethiopia's soccer players were promised more than $100,000 each Wednesday if they win the African Cup of Nations on the country's return to the tournament after a 30-year absence. Ethiopia Football Federation president Sahilu Guebremariam said the players would get $111,000 eachto win the Cup, and $55,000 each to make the final in South Africa. Sahilusaid coach Sewnet Bishaw and his assistant coach would be rewarded with"significantly higher prize money" if the team progressed to the final.

Ethiopia won the Cup of Nations in 1962 but last qualified for the final tournament in 1982. It was drawn alongside tough opposition in Nigeria, Zambia and Burkina Faso for this tournament and is not expected to get out of the group. "It's football, there is room for anything, any surprise," Sewnet said. "Although it's a new environment for the team, they have recently done wonderful in tough games." Sahilu said the offers were "intended to boost the morale of the team." "I am sure others, such as investors and prominent people, will offer them more prizes and awards ifthey make us proud in South Africa," Sahilu said. Squad members were already given $11,000 each last weekend by Ethiopian-born Saudi billionaire Sheikh Mohammed Al-Amoudi for qualifying for the African Cup."The players know more is coming if they play their best during the competition," Sewnet said.

Ethiopian PM Hailemariam Desalegn to become African Union (AU)chairman'

Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn is to take over as chairman of the African Union (AU) from President Yayi Boni of Benin this month, the Ethiopian foreign ministry announced Wednesday. Mr Hailemariam’s appointment coincides with the celebrations of the 50th anniversary of thefounding of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU), the predecessor of the AU, which took place in Addis Ababa, on May 23 1963. Ambassador Dina Mufti, spokesman for the foreign affairs ministry, insisted that the election of Mr Hailemariam in the golden jubilee year — the focal point for the commemoration will be the Ethiopian capital — was not deliberate. "It’s not to coincide with the celebrations," he said. "But whether it is coincidental or not, it has outstanding significance for us, in the sense thatEthiopia was the birthplace of the AU." The announcement of Mr Hailemariam’s chairmanship also breaks AU protocol. The election of the chairman, who strictly rotates between the continent's five regions, usually takes place on the first morning of the January meeting of the AUAssembly of Heads of State of Government, due next year on January 27.

According to Mr. Dina, the decision that Ethiopia would hold the organisation's top job this year was taken two years ago, when it would have been expected that the late prime minister Meles Zenawi would haveassumed the role. Solomon Dersso, senior researcher at the Institute for Security Studies in Addis Ababa said the decision that Ethiopia would takeover from Benin emerged during the AU's July summit. "This gives Hailemariam a chance to pursue the agenda that Meles was passionate about," said Mr Dersso. "This includes issues relating to the strengtheningand enhancement of the Nepad (New Partnership for Africa's Development) process, providing leadership and drawing attention to the negotiations on climate change and most important, at a regional level, for addressing peace and security issues." He believes Mr Hailemariam, who replaced Meles after his death in August last year, will use his position as AU chairman to highlight negotiations between Sudan and South Sudan. Ethiopia has been playing a pivotal role in facilitating the talks. Mr Dersso said the prime minister would also be a strong advocate for Somalia's new government. The celebrations of the 50th birthday of the OAU will begin on January 27 and continue until May 25. "This is an African joyous moment. We are celebrating our achievements in liberation, our achievements in economic progress, our achievements in peace and security," Mr. Dina said.

Updates: Ethiopian PM tipped to take over as AU chair – AFP'

Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn is slated to take over as the chairperson of the African Union this month, replacing Benin presidentBoni Yayi as the head of the pan-African bloc, officials said Wednesday. "Ethiopia is going to pick up the chairmanship of the African Union," Ethiopian Foreign Affairs spokesman Dina Mufti told AFP. Hailemariam must be officially voted in by member states at the opening of this month's African Union heads of state summit, which runs from January 27to January 28. A new chairperson is elected every January at the annual summit and is awarded on a regional basis. Before current chairman Boni Yayi took on the role, the chairmanship has been successively occupied by northern, southern and central Africa. The last time East Africa chaired theAU was in 2008 when Tanzanian President Jakaya Mrisho Kikwete served as head of the bloc. Dina said the appointment is especially important for Ethiopia, which hosts the headquarters of the AU and is a founding member nation of the AU's predecessor, the Organisation for African Unity(OAU). "Taking over chairmanship of the African Union will give an opportunity for Ethiopia to work hard for the strengthening of the organisation," he said. It is the first time the country has occupied the seat since the founding of the AU in 2003, though previous Ethiopian leaders, including late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, served as chair of the OAU. Hailemariam -- Ethiopia's former foreign minister -- took over as Prime Minister in August following the sudden death of Zenawi, who ruledthe country for 21 years.The AU summit kicks off this month at the towering Chinese-built AU headquarters in the Ethiopian capital. It is the first summit since the election of Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma as chairpersonof the AU Commission -- the body's executive arm -- last July. The war against Al-Qaeda-linked fighters occupying northern Mali is expected to top the agenda but crises between rivals Sudan and South Sudan and in the eastern Democratic Republic of Congo will also be discussed.

Civil Society Crackdown in Ethiopia – Human Right Watch'

PR - January 1, 2013 - Ethiopia took up its seat on the United Nations Human rights Council. The uncontested election – Africa put forward five countries for five seats – has raised some eyebrows, given the country's own poor rights record. Elected member countries are obliged to 'uphold the highest standards in the promotion and protection of human rights'. Yet, in Ethiopia, hundreds of political prisoners languish in jails where torture is common and a crackdown on the media and civil society is in fullswing. The blogger Eskinder Nega exemplifies the fate of those who dare to speak out. Eskinder was arbitrarily arrested and jailed following the controversial 2005 elections. After his release from prison two years later,he was placed under ongoing surveillance and banned from publishing.

Then, in 2011, he was rearrested, convicted in an unfair trial under Ethiopia's broad terrorism law, and sentenced to 18 years in prison. Sincethe 2005 elections, the human rights situation in Ethiopia has progressively deteriorated: the government has shut down legitimate political avenues for peaceful protest; and opposition leaders, civil societyactivists and independent journalists have been jailed or forced to flee.

Furthermore, state-driven development policies, including large-scale agricultural development and 'villagization' programmes, have seen communities forcibly relocated from their traditional lands, without adequate consultation or compensation, to villages that lack basic services. The ruling party has passed a host of laws attacking the media and civil society, including the Charities and Societies Proclamation that has made independent human rights work in the country almost impossible. The state has frozen the assets of the last two remaining groups – the leading women's rights organization, the Ethiopian Women Lawyers Association EWLA) – which has provided free legal aid to over 17,000 women – and the Human Rights Council (HRCO). Ethiopia's security forces have in recent years been implicated in crimes against humanity and war crimes in the Somali and Gambella regions. But Ethiopia has not only succeeded in stemming criticism at the national levelbut also internationally. And the worsening human rights situation has notdampened donors' enthusiasm, even when their assistance has harmed democratic institutions or minority populations. Ethiopia's friends and partners in the region should use its three-year term on the Council to putits rights abuses under the international spotlight. They should use debates to urge the Ethiopian government to release all political prisoners,lift unlawful restrictions on civil society and the media, and stop blocking visit requests byUNhuman rights experts.

Ethiopian court finds 10 guilty of terror charges'

News: January 2, 2013: Ten men were found guilty Tuesday by an Ethiopian court of plotting terror attacks with Islamist extremist rebels from neighboring Somalia. Judge Bahiru Darecha said the group was making plans and getting supplies to attack political and economic targetsin Ethiopia. Eleven men were originally charged with the terror-related crimes but the judge acquitted one person. Six of the men found guilty were charged in absentia. Sentencing will be carried out on Jan. 15.

Prosecutors said the suspects, who include one Kenyan national, formed a cell that worked with Somalia's Islamist radicals, al-Shabab. Al-Shabab is affiliated with al-Qaida. The verdicts come amid signs of increasing militancy in the East African nation. Ethiopian troops moved into Somalia last year to fight al-Shabab. Among those convicted is a Kenyan national, Hassan Jarso. When first charged in May, Jarso pleaded guilty to the charges but protested the assertion that he is a senior leader of the group."We did plan the attacks and to open the (training) camp but none of it was realized," Jarso had told the court. He added that he was waiting for money from al-Qaida agents to establish the camp and start a militant group, based in Ethiopia's Oromia region. The other three convicts denied the charges. They are all religious teachers. In their defense they alleged that they were beaten by police to confess and sign documents and that exhibits were planted in their houses. Ethiopia's late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi in April told parliament that militants had formed al-Qaida cells in the country's southern Arsi and Bale areas. Ethiopia's military campaign against militants in Somalia from 2006-2009 angered al-Shabab. There are signs of rising Islamist militancy in Ethiopia. In late April four demonstrators were killed in a clash, after security forces arrested a Muslim religious leader in the Oromia region. Ethiopia's Federal Ministry on May 3 issued a statement accusing an unnamed group of trying to declare jihad against the government and working to incite violence in a number of mosques across the country. The statement said a dozen suspects were recruited by the group from the country's Oromia, Tigray and Amhara regions to carry out illegal activities. The government also expelled two Arabs who flew in from the Middle East on May 4. The government said the pair went to a mosque and tried to incite violence.

Source: Associated Press

Ethiopia: 24 Injured in Ethnic Conflict Among University Students'

News: January 3, 2013: At least 24 students were injured on Thursday when ethnic-based clashes erupted among university students on Arat Kilocampus of Addis Ababa University' The fights broke out when students heading to the cafeteria in the morning saw the walls of the main library on campus and other places covered with graffiti that denigrate the Oromo people. The violent clashes included window smashings and physical fights that continued into the middle of the day, though police tried to quell the unrest several times. Police also threw into custody a handful of students suspected of playing leading roles in the unrest. The government in Ethiopia has a history of sparking unrest among various ethnic groups. University students are no exception because, traditionally,political changes that resulted in the overthrow of previous governments trace their roots to student activism on campus. The tradition of universitystudents initiating political unrest in the country came to an end when thecurrent government seized power in 1991, and decreed "ethnic federalism" which in reality fragmented the unity of the Ethiopian people as well as university students. Students have little interest in starting clashes among themselves, and observers say the number one suspect is the government itself. By 2:00 pm Addis Ababa time, police had cordonedoff the area, and students were neither allowed to enter nor leave Arat Kilo Campus, which houses facilities of the Faculty of Natural Sciences.

Source: Ethiomedia

Prominent American journalists speak their mind about Reeyot Alemu'

News tip: January 4, 2013: Prominent American journalists, Christiane Amanpour and Cynthia McFadden have asked Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn to free jailed Ethiopian columnist, Reeyot Alemu.Christiane amanpour is the Anchor of ABC’s Global affairs program & CNN’s chief international correspondent and Cynthia McFadden is an anchor and correspondent for ABC News who currently co-anchors Nightline and Primetime.

Ethiopia hold Tunisia to draw in warmup match'

Soccer: January 6, 2013: (Reuters) - Ethiopia served notice of their potential at the African Nations Cup finals by holding Tunisia to 1-1 draw in a friendly in Doha on Monday. The Ethiopians came from behind to equalise in the 64th minute through Saladin Seid after Tunisia had taken afourth-minute lead from a penalty converted by their Swiss-based attacking midfielder Oussama Darragi. The draw in a warmup internationalin Qatar, where Tunisia are preparing, came after success for Ethiopia lastweek at home against Niger, another of the sides who will be competing inthis month's continental championship in South Africa. Ethiopia are playing at the Nations Cup finals for the first time in more than 30 years and remain something of an unknown quantity. They compete in Group C with defending champions Zambia, Nigeria and Burkina Faso. Tunisia are in Group D with Algeria, Togo and the much fancied Ivory Coast. The tournament starts on Jan. 19. (Reporting by Mark Gleeson in Cape Town; Editing by John Mehaffey)

Source: Reuters

The US Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) foils murder plot againstjournalist'

Intelligence: January 9, 2013: BOSTON, Massachusetts - The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) has foiled a murder plot on award-winning journalist Abebe Gellaw. The Ethiopian Satellite TV (ESAT) said on Tuesday the suspects were under FBI investigation. Goosh Abera (ጉዕሽ አበራ), who is staying in the US after seeking a political asylum and yet is an alleged spy for the TPLF ruling party in Ethiopia, was cited in the ESAT report as ring leader of a group of four in the assassination attempt on thelife of one of Ethiopia's most prominent journalists based in the US. The assassination was to be carried out when Abebe Gellaw would have travelled to Boston, MA, last December for an ESAT fund-raising event. Boston FBI spokesman Greg Comcowich said he wouldn't go into details but noted that the FBI takes such type of crimes seriously, and called on Ethiopians in the US to report to local FBI Bureaus whenever they spot spies who work for foreign governments. Dr Gregory Stanton, president ofGenocide Watch and a staunch human rights defender well acquainted with the conditions in Ethiopia, said TPLF's attempt to commit a crime in the United States was a matter of serious concern that should lead to recognizing the organization as terrorist. The FBI has secured messages that the alleged assassins were exchanging to carry out the murder.

Ethiomedia

Military coup attempt fails in Eritrea'

News: (NYT) - January 9, 2013: Eritrea, a sliver of a nation in the Horn ofAfrica that is one of the most secretive and repressive countries in the world, was cast into confusion on Monday after mutinous soldiers stormedthe Ministry of Information and took over the state-run television service, apparently in a coup attempt. According to several people with close contacts inside Eritrea, the coup attempt failed, with government troops quelling the would-be rebellion and no one rising up in the streets. But many analysts said it was only a matter of time before President Isaias Afwerki, Eritrea’s brash and steely leader for the past 20 years, is confronted again — and most likely from within. “There’s a lot of dissatisfaction within the armed forces,” said Dan Connell, a professor at Simmons College in Boston and the author of several books on Eritrea. “Ifthis is suppressed, it won’t be the end.” Eritrea is often called the North Korea of Africa because it is so isolated and authoritarian, with few friendsand thousands of defectors in recent years as Mr. Isaias tightens his grip and the economy teeters on the brink of ruin. In the early 1990s, when Mr. Isaias first took power, Eritrea was hailed as a beacon of hope in Africa, a country of low crime, ethnic harmony and can-do spirit along theRed Sea. The Eritreans fought for years in trenches and from craggy mountaintops to defeat a Soviet-backed Ethiopian government and win their independence. But the euphoria did not last. In the late 1990s, Eritrea and Ethiopia waged a costly war over their shared border, in which tens of thousands of people died. Shortly afterward, Mr. Isaias rounded uppolitical dissidents and journalists, dooming them to years in prison, oftenin sweltering, underground shipping containers. Thousands of young Eritreans have been drafted into the army and then required to work indefinitely for the government for pittance wages in what is called “national service.” Each year, many young people risk their lives to escape. Eritrea has waged war with just about all of its neighbors, and theUnited Nations has imposed sanctions on Eritrea over what is suspected tobe its support of Somali militants. By nightfall on Monday, it seemed that the government had beaten back the mutineers, with some analysts saying that the government broadcaster, Eri-TV, was back on the air. The rebel soldiers, believed to number around 100, made it as far as the director’s office in the Ministry of Information, forcing him to read a statement on air calling for the release of political prisoners. Then the broadcast abruptly cut out. They also may have briefly taken hostage Mr. Isaias’s daughter, Elsa, who is said to work in the ministry. It was not clear what happened to the renegade soldiers; analysts said that troops loyal to the government had surrounded the Ministry of Information and that the mutineers would most likely be captured and imprisoned. The State Department said that the situation remained fluid, and the small embassy in Asmara, Eritrea’s capital, sent out a warning on Monday to thefew American citizens living there. “The U.S. Embassy has been made aware of increased military presence in some sections of Asmara,” the warning said. “Employees of the U.S. government have been advised to limit their movements within the city, avoid large gatherings and exercise caution. We strongly recommend that private U.S. citizens do likewise.”

Ethiopia's Seyoum Mesfin – The Fulcrum man between Addis and Beijing'

Views: January 10, 2013: Shortly after Ethiopia's Prime Minister Meles Zenawi died on 20 August 2012, former foreign minister Seyoum Mesfin was back in the country's capital, Addis Ababa from his posting as ambassador to Beijing, China. The veteran politician, known for his calm temperament, was said to have had a vital role in managing the difficult aftermath. "He is – bar none – one of the smartest men I have met, Melesincluded, and good bit slicker," said a journalist who used to cover Addis. Although the leadership transition was successful, there have been rumours of factionalism within Meles's Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF). Leader of a southern bloc in the four-party ruling coalition, Premier Hailemariam Desalegn represents a younger generation who did not take part in the armed struggle that ousted the military junta in 1991.After Seyoum served in the foreign ministry for almost two decades, the leadership removed him from the TPLF politburo and sent him to Beijing in2010 as part of that regeneration process. Ensuring that Chinese lines of credit continue to flow, he is also a key cog in the TPLF. The Africa Report

Ethiopia Football Team Feels Pressured to Succeed'

Soccer: January 11, 2013 - Ethiopia’s football (soccer) team hopes to excel when it makes its first appearance in 31 years at the Africa Cup of Nations. The young players hope to relive Ethiopia's past glories at the tournament that begins next week in South Africa. Ethiopia participated inthe very first Africa Cup of Nations, in 1957, and won the trophy in 1962. But that was a long time ago, and national team coach Sewnet Bishaw said his young team is under a lot of pressure, as this is a new experiencefor all the players. “Most of them were not there when Ethiopia was qualifying for Africa Cup of Nations the last 31 years back. We have psychology class every two days, we teach them. And to erase this pressure we have arranged games to practice,” said Bishaw. Adane Girmais one of the top players in the Ethiopian football league. He said the psychology classes are very useful. He said that he thinks the team is feeling less pressured because the psychology and nutrition class is helping them a lot. Adane said they are being taught a lot of things that are helping them concentrate on every game, keep themselves well and have confidence in their abilities. Source: VoA News Africa Sport by Marthe Van Der Wolf

During team practices in the capital’s stadium, the stands are filled. Football fan Alazar, a young salesman who has high expectations for the national team, said he believes the national team will bring back the trophy as he witnessed good quality football when they were playing friendly matches. The team, nicknamed the Walya Antelopes, for an antelope found only in Ethiopia, qualified for the African Cup of Nations after beating Sudan, 2-0, in October. The last time Ethiopia participated was in 1982. The long-awaited appearance of the national team in the tournament comes after many changes within the Ethiopian football league. President of the Ethiopian Football Federation Sahilu Gebremariamsaid there were many problems to be fixed. “We used to interfere in all operational matters. Now we have a clear cut role and responsibilities," Gebremariam said. "All the technical matters, we left it to the professionals, we don’t interfere. The last three years we have been doingvigorously and a lot so based on that you can see the cumulative effect now.” The success of the Walyas has also generated much needed funds. The Ethiopian government granted almost half a million dollars, many local businessmen have donated sizeable amounts and international beer brewer Heineken just signed a $1.3 million contract with the team. One week before the start of the Africa Cup of Nations, coach Bishaw keeps training light so the players will be in perfect shape for their first match - against defending champion Zambia. Saladin Said is the only national team player who plays professionally in another country. The Egyptian Premier League forward says he feels the Walyas are ready to compete.

Ethiopia will play their match against Zambia on January 21. They will alsoface Nigeria and Burkina Faso in the first round.

Ethiopia-Fighting The Virus of The Zenawi Era:

Views: January 11, 2013 - This hideous foiled plot to conduct the savage act of assassination in the 21st century on the icon human rights activist and renowned journalist Abebe Gelaw, must be roundly condemned by all freedom loving humanity on our globe. The foiled plot is an act of terrorism designed to take place in the United States – in the land of the brave and free and bastion of democracy where the supremacy of law reigns supreme. There is no doubt that the TPLF thugs will pay for their lawlessness. Abebe Gelaw uttered on 18 May 2012 the immortal words with his thunderous voice repeatedly saying "Meles Zenawi is a dictator" and demanding "freedom before food". He was right, for it is written in the Holy Bible, in Matthew 4:4 that, "Man shall not live on bread alone, but onevery word that comes from the mouth of God." The unexpected heroic act of courage by the renowned human rights activist and journalist Abebeno doubt sent a cringing shiver of fear down the spine of tyrant Zenawi in full view of world leaders and prominent personalities at the Food SecurityForum chaired by President Obama at the Regan Building in Washington.

There is no doubt therefore that the top goons in the TPLF hierarchy arefully behind the assassination plot for revenge. IndepthAfrica by Robele Ababya

Britain spends millions on Ethiopian 'special police' linked to abuses' - TheTelegraph

Commentry: January 11, 2013 - Britain is spending millions of pounds from its foreign aid budget on training Ethiopian paramilitaries that have been accused of human rights abuses including summary killings, rape and torture. A government security force known as the "special police" operating in the eastern Ogaden region will be supported as part of a UK- funded "peace and development programme" lasting five years and costing up to £15 million. A leaked Department for International Development document warns of the "reputational risks" of working with organisations that are "frequently cited in human rights violation allegations", The Guardian reported. The special police, who are up to 14,000-strong, have led the Ethiopian government's counter-insurgency campaign in Ogaden, a troubled region largely populated by ethnic Somalis. However, the campaign group Human Rights Watch has recorded repeated serious allegations of human rights abuses against them. Claire Beston, Amnesty International's Ethiopia researcher, said it was highly concerning that Britain was planning to work with the paramilitary force. "There is no doubt that the special police have become a significant sourceof fear in the region," she told The Guardian. A Department for International Development spokesman said: "The peace and development programme will be delivered in partnership with non-governmental organisations and United Nations organisations, and no funding will go through the government of Ethiopia."

Ethiopia end preparation with Victory'

Soccer: Orange AFCON 2013 - January 12, 2013 - Ethiopia beat Tanzania 2-1 yesterday to claim a triumphant end of preparations ahead of the Orange Africa cup of nations 2013 to kick off Saturday January 19 in South Africa. US based, Fuad Ibrahim put the Walia Antelopes ahead just 13 into the encounter. It was 1-0 for Ethiopia after the first segment but Shaaban Nditi put both sides at the same level in the 51st. 18 minutes after, Shemelese Bikele's header ended the ball at the bottom of the net making it 2-1 for the Antelopes till the final whistle. In their AFCON warm-up matches, Ethiopia beat Niger 1-0 and drew 1-1 with Tunisia before yesterday's win over Tanzania. For the South Africa rendezvous, they have been drawn in group C alongside Nigeria, Burkina Faso and defending champions, Zambia. Starafrica.com

All Dreamliners Grounded Due To Fire Risk'

AFP - January 18, 2013: Airlines grounded all of Boeing's new 787 Dreamliners in service on Thursday until a fire risk is fixed, as the USaerospace giant reeled from the high-tech plane's deepening woes. Authorities in Chile, Ethiopia, Europe, India, Japan and Qatar followed theUS Federal Aviation Administration in halting all 787 flights after a smokealert forced a Japanese Dreamliner to make an emergency landing on Wednesday. The US FAA, in grounding all US-registered 787 aircraft late Wednesday, highlighted "a potential battery fire risk in the 787" after a suspected leak emerged as the focus of inquiries into an All Nippon Airways emergency landing. Last week, the FAA announced a comprehensive review of the 787 following a series of safety incidents.

Analysts said Boeing would have to handle the ANA incident with extremecare after making a big gamble with its next-generation plane. The aircraft's flight systems rely heavily on electronics rather than the hydraulics used in older planes, and Boeing's use of lightweight compositematerials is another breakthrough for airlines anxious to cut fuel costs.

Boeing chief executive Jim McNerney said the US aerospace giant "deeplyregrets" the impact of recent events on airlines and passengers, and vowed to take "every necessary step" in concert with the FAA to resolve the problems.

But he stressed that "we are confident the 787 is safe and we stand behind its overall integrity." The global groundings came as Boeing reclaimed its title as the world's biggest planemaker from European rival Airbus. Airbus chief executive Fabrice Bregier said he hoped the cutting-edge 787 would be back in the air soon. "I wish all the best to our colleague," Bregier told a news conference after the Toulouse, France-based posted 2012 orders below Boeing's. "A plane is designed to fly.

Even if a good 787 flies we have good solutions to face it. I don't bet on the difficulties of a competitor." All of the 50 Dreamliners in operation around the world have now been grounded, with Ethiopian Airlines the lastto say its four planes would undergo precautionary inspections despite nothaving suffered problems. Still, some airlines were sticking with their orders and even speaking out in support of Boeing. Top Mexican carrier Aeromexico said it was maintaining its order for 19 of the aircraft, noting in a statement that it "has absolute confidence in the Boeing company andall of its products." Australian airline Qantas, meanwhile, said it was cutting its request for Dreamliner planes by one, but noted it had planned to do so before the jets were grounded and that it still had 14 on order.

Qantas said production of its first B787 aircraft had just begun and it was confident current technical issues would be resolved by Boeing before it took delivery in mid-2013. Sector sentiment was summed up by Arun Mishra, India's civil aviation chief, who told AFP: "We will track the FAA enquiry into the Dreamliner. We can't say when we will allow it to fly again, it depends on when Boeing gives us satisfaction over safety concerns." Japan is home to 24 Dreamliners and the government in Tokyosaid it was taking no chances pending an investigation into whether the lithium-ion battery on the ANA plane had overheated.

Lithium-ion batteries are also widely used in consumer electronics such as laptops and mobile phones. The powerful lithium-ion batteries used on theDreamliner have emerged as the focus of concern in light of the ANA incident and another on a Japan Air Lines flight in the United States last week, with smoke reported on both planes. Electrolyte leaks and burn marks were found on the battery's metal casing, ANA said. Kyodo News reported that officials from the Japan Transport Safety Board were working on the principle that it had overheated. The batteries are made byJapanese firm GS Yuasa, one of many contractors in a complex global webthat contributed to three years of delays before Boeing delivered its first 787 to ANA in 2011.

GS Yuasa -- whose share price plunged by 4.98 percent in Tokyo -- defended its reputation for quality and warned the 787 investigation couldtake weeks. "It is impossible to predict at this point how long it will take, in terms of days or weeks, because we must study the system and GS Yuasa is not the only player involved," a company spokeswoman told AFP.GS Yuasa said it supplies its 787 batteries first to France's Thales Group, which then assembles an electric charging system for shipping to Boeing. ANA said the particular battery involved had been installed in October, ahead of the expected two-year replacement cycle because of a fault withthe previous one. "Liquid leaked through the (forward battery compartment) room floor to the inside of the outer wall of the aircraft," Kyodo quoted investigator Hideyo Kosugi as saying. Boeing shares fell 3.4percent on Wednesday, before the FAA announcement, but picked up 1.2 percent on Thursday.

Ethiopia frustrate defending champions Zambia - Aljazeera'

(AP) - NELSPRUIT, South Africa: January 21, 2013 -- Ten-man Ethiopiacelebrated its return to the African Cup of Nations by holding defending champion Zambia to a 1-1 draw in a Group C opener that featured a missed penalty and vuvuzelas thrown onto the field. Ethiopia last featuredat the continental showpiece back in 1982, and was buoyed by the presence of around 10,000 fans at the Mbombela Stadium who showed both their best and worst sides over an entertaining 90 minutes.

Supporters hurled vuvuzelas and other debris onto the pitch in anger afterthe first-half sending off of Ethiopia goalkeeper Jemal Tassew, causing an eight-minute delay to the match. However, their anger turned to unbridledjoy when Adane Girma's 65th-minute strike canceled out Collins Mbesuma's opener. Saladin Said missed a penalty for Ethiopia in the 25th.Ethiopia, back at the Africa Cup of Nations after a three-decade absence, overcame a red card to hold champions Zambia to a 1-1 draw in an explosive Group C encounter on Monday in Nelspruit. Ethiopia, one of the founding fathers of African football who had fallen on hard times before enjoying a recent revival, had keeper Jemal Tassew sent off in the first half of a game that also featured a missed penalty and disgruntled vuvuzela-throwing fans. Collins Mbesuma scored for Zambia in first-half stoppage-time after Tassew had been red carded for a dangerous foul on Chisamba Lungu and captain Adane Girma equalised midway through the second half for Ethiopia.

Ten-man Ethiopia overcome Zambia with 1-1’

Updates: Champions Zambia were held to a 1-1 draw by 10-man Ethiopiain an eventful Group C opener at the Africa Cup of Nations in Nelspruit.

Zambia striker Collins Mbesuma opened the scoring on half-time, after being played in by Isaac Chansa. But Antelopes striker Adane Girma equalised after the break, with a clinical right-footed strike. Saladain Saidearlier missed a penalty for the Ethiopians, before keeper Jemal Tassew was sent off for a wild tackle. The Ethiopians showed no signs of nerves on their return to the finals after a 31-year absence, preventing the Chipolopolo from settling into the game and responding with their own passing game. Zambia's defending was found wanting for long periods, asthey failed to make the most of their numerical advantage against an Ethiopian side who deserved their point. New Reading defender Stopilla Sunzu picked up the game's first card for a wild challenge on Ethiopia danger man Said, setting the tone for a game that would see some heavychallenges and several cards handed out. Said almost punished a mix-up in the Zambia defence, racing past defender Joseph Musonda, whose poorattempt at a clearance allowed the striker to lob over onrushing goalkeeper Kennedy Mweene, only for the ball to bounce over the crossbar. Said got his reward for continuing to press the champions' defence by being hauled down in the box by defender Chisamba Lungu towin a penalty, but was unable to convert the spot-kick, his weak effort palmed away by Mweene after diving to his left. The Ethiopian keeper then produced his moment of madness, clattering into Lungu after racing 40 yards from goal to bring down the onrushing defender, who had been played clean through. The keeper was carried off on a stretcher but received a straight red card for the reckless lunge, with referee Castane Otogo showing no sympathy for the wild challenge. The champions immediately attempted to press their numerical advantage with RainfordKalaba attempting to link up with Mbesuma, only for the striker's headerto fly wide. Mbesuma then managed to find the breakthrough. He was played through by a clever headed flick-on from Chansa, before coolly knocking it past substitute keeper Zerihun Tadell from close range.

Ethiopia continued to stick to their game-plan after the break, playing the ball out from the back, despite their one-man disadvantage. Zambia - whohad picked up three bookings in the first half, with Sunzu, Joseph Musonda and Lungu all given yellow cards - tried to take advantage of their numerical supremacy, with Katongo and Mbesuma both firing wide.

Antelopes back on target Ethiopia's equalising goal against Zambia was their first at the Nations Cup since 1976. They failed to score in their lastappearance in 1982.

Ethiopia's national squad coach pleased'

Aljazeera - January 22, 2013: "I'm happy as we missed a penalty and drew. This is our first experience after 31 years so, as you see, it was fantastic for our football," said Ethiopia coach Sewnet Bishaw. "The players have shown their characters, and shown the rest of the world theycan play football. "The goalkeeper also has to defend, he went to defend the ball, and shouldn't have been red carded." Zambia coach Herve Renard said: "First of all I would like to congratulate Ethiopia for a very good performance. I'm not surprised - I said be careful of this team, they are able to play very good football. "Today, we have to thank our goalkeeper - without Kennedy Mweene it could have been a very, very bad result. "Our fans expected more than we did today, and they are right. Today, it was the fault of the coach. I did not prepare the team wellto start the competition - we'll see how things go after the third game."I saw a replay on the screen (of red-card incident) and, for me, he deserved to be sent off." Zambia featured 10 of the XI that performed heroics in Gabon/Equatorial Guinea 12 months ago with out-of-form Nyamba Mulenga the lone absentee. The 40,000-seat Mbombela Stadium was only a quarter full, with barely a Zambian fan in the sparse albeit colourful crowd, but one that did turn up, a man, was in a bikini.

Penalty save: Against the run of play, Ethiopia almost pinched the lead when Said pounced on a poor clearance from defender Joseph Musonda and lobbed onrushing Kennedy Mweene only for the ball to bounce over the crossbar. Said then won a 23rd-minute penalty when he was felled byLungu in the box but his spot-kick lacked steel and was kept out by Mweene. At the other end, drama ensued after a high-velocity clash between Lungu and Tassew, who rushed out from his goal, boots flying.

The Ethiopian keeper came off worse in the reckless assault, lying strickenon the ground for an age before being stretchered off, with Gabonese referee Castane Otogo waving him goodbye, a red card in his hand.

This incensed the Ethiopian fans, who pelted the pitch with vuvuzelas andwater bottles. To add to the tension, a South African fighter jet chose thatmoment to scream low over the stadium, as Zerihun Tadele entered the fray to replace Tassew. Zambia went in front when Mbesuma ran on to Isaac Chansa's headed pass to shoot left-footed past Tadele with the Ethiopian defence at fault. This provoked another angry volley of vuvuzelas, cutting short the Zambian players' celebrations and prompting the arrival on the touchline of riot police. With their numerical advantage, Zambia emerged for the second half eager to put the game to bed. But Ethiopia had other plans. On 65 minutes, Addis Hintsa, seconds after coming on for Getaneh Kebede, picked out Said who, in turn, found AdaneGirma with the captain slotting an angled close-range shot past Mweene.Afrantic climax failed to change the deadlock, with Tadele producing a goodsave to deny a late shot from Mbesuma.

Saudis Turn to Ethiopian Maids After Asian Backlash'

News: January 24, 2013 - Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil exporter, has imported female servants for decades. The Indonesian government stemmed the flow after the beheading of an Indonesian maid convicted of killing her employer in June 2011. Maids from the Philippines had also stopped arriving, after Filipino lawmakers wrote a report on alleged abuses, including rapes and beatings. So the Saudis turned to Ethiopia, across the Red Sea, where most people live on less than $2 a day. "Saudi Arabia will choose the most compliant country," said Walden Bello, chairman of the Overseas Workers Affairs Committee in the Philippine House of Representatives. Unpaid Wages Nearly 160,000 Ethiopian women went to work in Saudi Arabia in the 12 months ending July 7, more than 10 times the number a year earlier, data from the Ethiopian Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs show. Tens of thousands more migrated illegally, according to the United Nations. While the government estimates the average college graduate in Ethiopia earns about $90 a month, a maid can make $200 a month in Saudi Arabia. 'Extremely Hostile' The kingdom employs more than 750,000 domestic servants, according to the UN's International Labor Organization. New York-based Human Rights Watch puts the number at 1.5 million or more. While many "enjoy decent work conditions," the nonprofit said in a 2008 report, "others endure a range of abuses," including conditions amounting to forced confinement and sexual and physical abuse. "The legal framework in Saudi Arabia is extremely hostile to migrant women's rights," said NishaVaria, a senior researcher at Human Rights Watch. A Saudi law guaranteeing one day off a week and limiting hours worked doesn't apply to housekeepers, according to the group. Employers control a worker's immigration status, including when he or she can leave the country.

Bloomberg

Ethiopia swept the board at the Standard Chartered Dubai Marathon'

Sports News: January 25, 2013 - Ethiopia swept the board at the Standard Chartered Dubai Marathon with a complete... lockout of the podium positions in both the men's and women's marathon races. Lelisa Desisa touching the finishing line during the Standard Chartered Dubai Marathon at Downtown Dubai. – Debutant Lelisa Desisa sprung a real surprise in the men's event as he pulled away from a five-strong leading pack in the final kilometre to emerge victorious with a winning time of 2:04:45s. It was the second successive time a newcomer had prevailed onSheikh Mohammed bin Rashid Boulevard following compatriot Ayele Abshero's first-time triumph last year. Lelisa Desisa celebrating his victoryafter winning the Standard Chartered Dubai Marathon. KT Photo by ShihabDesisa's countrymen Berhanu Shiferaw (2:04:48s) and Tadese Tola (2:04:49s) came home three and four seconds behind the outright winner for second and third respectively, while Bernard Koech was the highest- placed Kenyan in fifth (2:04:53s). The top five male finishers were separated by only eight seconds in the final reckoning. Desisa's triumph sparked joyous celebrations among his flag-waving supporters in the stands by the finish line and their delight soon doubled with firm female favourite Tirfi Tsegaye claiming the women's crown thereafter. Her 2:23:23s clocking was good enough to commandingly beat the runner-up,Ehitu Kiros (2:23:39s), by 16 seconds overall. Amane Gobena (2:23:50s) was a further 11 seconds back in third place. Participants compete during the 2013 Standard Chartered Dubai Marathon on January 25, 2013. KT Photo by Juidin Bernarrd Ethiopia made up the top six entirely, with sevenof their elite-level athletes inside the first 10 to cross the finish line. Japan(Misaki Katsumato), Namibia (Beata Naigambo) and Sweden (Issabellah Andersson) made up the remaining three runners, meaning Kenya had no representation among the female prize-money winners.

Ethiopian Muslims gathered at Grand (Anwar) Mosque'

News: January 26, 2013 - After the Friday prayer, tens of of thousands of Ethiopian muslims in the capital gathered around the Anwar mosque and denounced government's mishandling of their relgious demands. Several of them carried placards which call for the release of their religious leadersand immediate cessation of persecuting muslim university students.

Similar protests were held in Dessie, Shahemene and Nazareth (Adama).In Nazareth some of the protesters were reported to have been arrested.Source: ESAT News

African leaders meet in Ethiopia, with conflict in Mali expected to dominatethe agenda'

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia - January 27, 2013: African leaders met in the Ethiopian capital Sunday for talks dominated by the conflict in Mali as wellas lingering territorial issues between the two Sudans. The African Union says it will deploy a force in Mali, where French troops are helping the Malian army to push back Islamist extremists whose rebellion threatens to divide the West African nation. United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki- moon is attending the two-day summit in Addis Ababa, where Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn took over from President Yayi Boni of Benin as chairperson of the African Union. “We are determined to do what we can to help the people of Mali in their time of need,” Ban said. “Humanitarian agencies are helping suffering civilians. The United Nations has also sent specialists on the military and political tracks. This is a moral imperative for all in the international community. I have presented to the Security Council my recommendation on the logistics support package for (the Mali force).” With Mali at the top of the agenda, African leaders hope they can make quick progress in deploying a substantial number of African troops there. As the African leaders met, French special forces fighting alongside Malian troops were pushing farther north into the Malian desert in an offensive against al Qaida-linked Islamists who took control of northern Mali more than nine months ago.

Africa’s economic boom is threatened by violent conflicts across the continent, African Union officials said at the summit. “While we are proud of the progress made in expanding and consolidating peace and security on the continent, we also acknowledge that much still needs to be done toresolve ongoing, renewed and new conflict situations in a number of countries,” said African Union Commission Chairperson Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma. Dlamini-Zuma said the Peace and Security Council of the African Union will report to the summit on efforts to resolve conflicts in countries ranging from Mali to Madagascar. The Peace and Security Council of the African Union said in a statement Saturday that it wanted “the early operationalization of the African Standby Force” in Mali. The council also said it fully supports Mali President Dioncounda Traore but urged him to put in place a roadmap to free and fair elections. It also saidthe African Union is committed to preserving the unity of Mali and would “spare no efforts” to safeguard the country’s territorial integrity. A numberof African countries have pledged to send troops to Mali, and on Tuesday the African Union will hold a conference of donors with hopes that money will be raised for the Mali force. The Peace and Security Council of the African Union urged member states to “seize the opportunity of the donors’ conference ... to meaningfully contribute toward the mobilization of the necessary resources.” The council also urged the international community to contribute generously to the Mali force.

Meanwhile, the leaders of Sudan and South Sudan met at the summit in Addis Ababa, although African Union officials said they did not expect them to make much headway. South Sudan President Salva Kiir and Sudan President Omar al-Bashir earlier this month agreed to “the unconditional and speedy” implementation of deals they had reached backin September. But a subsequent meeting of the two countries’ negotiatingteams that should have outlined timetable for the deal’s implementation ended in disagreement. Ban urged the two Sudans to resume direct talks and spoke of the “dangerous humanitarian situation in Southern Kordofan and Blue Nile states." "In Sudan and South Sudan the parties have takenpositive steps to resolve outstanding issues," Ban said. "But they should make more progress in meeting their agreements." Mediators led by former South African leader Thabo Mbeki have until July to push the two sides to agree on the status of the disputed Abyei region as well as othercontested border areas. AP

A senior Eritrean diplomat denies coup reports - AP'

Addis Ababa, Ethiopia - Associated Press: January 27, 2013: A senior Eritrean diplomat denied on Saturday there was an attempted coup early this week in the Horn of African nation and said reports to the contrary are a deliberate disinformation campaign. Girma Asmerom, Eritrea's ambassador to the African Union, said in a statement that coup reports were "wishful thinking" by people he did not name. "There has never beenan 'attempted military coup' and there will never be a coup d'etat in Eritrea," Asmerom said. Without explaining the incidents on Monday, Asmerom wrote of acts of terror being called something else. "As is the case all over the world an armed crazy, stupid and terrorist individual or group can take stupid actions such as kidnapping of individuals or taking hostages by raiding government and private institutions and offices," he said. "Such isolated incidents which frequently occur in the West are considered terrorist acts. I don't understand why in Africa they are considered coup d'etats. It is the highest form of double standard and hypocrisy." But activists and experts said about 100 dissident soldiers stormed the state broadcasting at Ministry of Information in the capital, Asmara, and read a statement vowing to free all political prisoners and implement the country's constitution. Eritrean President Isaias Afworki took power when the country broke away from Ethiopia in 1991 after a civil war that lasted three decades. His regime is seen by rights groups as repressive. Ethiopia, which has no diplomatic relations with Eritrea, says the incident is not the first attempt to dislodge Afworki and that the president is likely to respond with brutal force. "In May 1993, embarrassingly a mere four days before the country's official declaration of independence, soldiers who had received no pay following the country'sde facto independence two years earlier, launched a major protest in Asmara, demanding a meeting with the president and to be paid," Ethiopia's foreign ministry said in a statement Friday. "When the president finally agreed to meet them and hear their grievances, he quickly promised to improve conditions and provide pay. The troops returned to the barracks but within a matter of days, with the protests over, hundredswere arrested.

PMHD Launches Nation's First Economic Council'

Analysis: January 27, 2013: A national body, styled on the United State'sNational Economic Council, has been launched by the administration of PMHD, aka Haile, comprising of two ministers and one senior advisor, to begin with, Fortune learnt. Debretsion Gebremikael (PhD), minister of Communications & Information Technology, has been appointed to chair the country's first such council, which has been on blue print since the beginning of the last days of the late Meles Zenawi. Sufian Ahmed, minister of Finance & Economic Development (MoFED), and Neway Gebreab, chief economic advisor to the Prime Minister, have been selectedto serve as members. Both are old hands in the EPRDF government, serving the administration up at Lorenzo Te'azaz Road for nearly two decades. They are also members of the macro-economic team, chaired bythe Prime Minister, and responsible for fiscal and monetary policy making. Such decisions have been made based on studies produced by various ministries and federal agencies, including the Ethiopian Development Research Institute (EDRI), housed inside the blue building of the Road Transport Authority, near Yidenekachew Tessema Stadium, and chaired byNeway.

Established in 1999, as a semi-autonomous policy research think-tank, and funded by both the federal government and donors, such as the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), EDRI was a source of whitepapers that influenced the policies of the late Prime Minister. It is thefirst time for the administration to set up a separate entity, with elected officials serving as its members. However, it was decided earlier on that the National Economic Council should not be chaired by the Prime Minister, and neither by a minister whose portfolio is directly related to economic policy implementation, sources inside the Administration told Fortune. The practice in the United States, from where the idea was borrowed, is slightly different. The National Economic Council (NEC) was founded in 1993, under the Office of Policy Development in the White House, by the executive order of former President Bill Clinton. NEC advises the President of the United States on "US and global economic policy" and coordinates "policy-making for domestic and international economic issues; ensures policy decisions are consistent with the President's economic goals; and monitors implementations" of said goals. Addis Fortune (Addis Ababa)

Ancient Stone Tools In Ethiopia Date Back 1.75 Million Years, May Show Rise Of Homo Erectus’

Revealation: January 28, 2013: Scientists have unearthed and dated some of the oldest stone hand axes on Earth. The ancient tools, unearthed in Ethiopia in the last two decades, date to 1.75 million years ago. The tools roughly coincided with the emergence of an ancient human ancestor called Homo erectus, and fossilized H. erectus remains were also found at the same site, said study author Yonas Beyene, an archaeologist at the Association for Research and Conservation of Culture in Ethiopia. Collectively, the finding suggests an ancient tool-making technique may have arisen with the evolution of the new species. "This discovery shows that the technology began with the appearance of Homo erectus," Beyene told LiveScience. "We think it might be related to the change of species." The findings were described today (Jan. 28) in the journal Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, Ancient tools: Human ancestors used primitive tools as far back as 2.6 million years ago, when Homo habilis roamed the Earth. But those tools, called Oldowan tools, weren't much more than rock flakes knapped in a slapdash manner to have a sharp edge. But nearly a million years later, more sophisticated two-sided hand axes or cleavers emerged. These Aucheulean tools could be up to 7.8 inches (20 centimeters) long and were probably used to butcher meat. Scientists recently discovered tools of this type a few hundred miles away near Lake Turkana in Kenya, datingto 1.76 million years ago. [Image Gallery: New Human Ancestors from Kenya] Because of its coincidence with the appearance of Homo erectus, scientists believed the sophisticated tools were made by the newer speciesof Homo, but proving that was tricky, because the dating of fossils and tools wasn't precise enough, said study co-author Paul Renne, a geochronologist and director of the Berkeley Geochronology Center in Berkeley, Calif.

Creating a timeline: Beyene, Renne and their colleagues, however, have found Aucheulean tools that are indistinguishable in age from those foundin Kenya, suggesting the symmetric hand axes were widespread in the region by that time. And the Konso, Ethiopia, site also harbors Homo erectus fossils, increasing the likelihood that this species was responsible for making the new tools. What's more, they have unearthed more than 350 of these two-faced stone tools in Konso, in different geologic layers that span about a million years of human evolution. The tool-making techniques stayed similar until 800,000 years ago, when the edges on thetools became more refined, the researchers found That the timing of this tool-making emerges at the same time as Homo erectus is intriguing, andallows for the possibility that the tools were made by this ancient lineage,said Leah Morgan, a geochronologist at the University of Glasgow, who was not involved in the study. But while the new study is suggestive that Homo erectus made these tools, it's not a smoking gun. "It's tempting to say, 'Well, Homo erectus was making these tools at Konso,' and that's very difficult to prove," Morgan said. Source: LiveScience by Tia Ghose, Staff Writer

African Union's newly elected chair, Haile Mariam Desalegn'

VIEWS: January 28, 2013: Addis Ababa - Newly elected African Union chairman, Ethiopian leader Hailemariam Desalegn, has risen within five months after the death of his mentor Meles Zenawi from a relatively littleknown politician to influential leader. Hailemariam, 47, a former water engineer, has defied critics who feared instability in Ethiopia following August death of Meles, taking over the leadership in a rare peaceful handover of power for the Horn of Africa nation. A protege of Meles, Hailemairam has managed an apparently smooth transition with little change in policy from Meles, who had ruled with an iron fist since topplingdictator Mengistu Haile Mariam in May, 1991. On Sunday, he took over as African Union chairperson, replacing Benin's President Thomas Boni Yayi inthe one-year post. In a country long dominated by its major ethnic groups -most recently the Tigray, the ethnic group to which Meles belonged - Hailemariam notably comes from the minority Wolayta people in the Southern Nations, Nationalities and Peoples Region. President of the region for five years, he was appointed to be deputy prime minister and foreign minister in 2010 after the ruling coalition party's fourth win, a landslide victory. He became the chairman of the ruling Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) shortly after Meles' death. But hewas also seen as an outsider by some, since some of the party's most influential figures - members of Meles's ex-rebel group turned political party, the Tigrean People's Liberation Front (TPLF) - hail from the northernTigray region. Lack of experience: Hailemariam - in Ethiopian tradition, known by his first name, meaning "the power of Saint Mary" - is also a Protestant, the first to lead Ethiopia, where the majority of Christians follow Orthodox traditions. Hailemariam has pledged to "continue Meles's legacy without any changes". At his appointment to Ethiopia's leadership, the International Crisis Group (ICG) think-tank suggested Hailemariam's appointment may be "window dressing, designed to placate potential critics, while the Tigrayan TPLF elite keep real power". But they also suggest that Hailemariam's position outside the Tigray power base could in fact prove a strength. "His ethnicity is considered an advantage, because it is a minority in a multi-ethnic region and, most importantly, notfrom the numerically dominant Oromo or Amhara," the ICG added. Critics also point to his relatively young age, lack of experience and the fact he was not part of the rebel movement which toppled Mengistu, unlike many in the ruling elite. Instead, Hailemariam, who studied civil engineering in Addis Ababa, was completing his master's degree at Finland's Tampere University when Mengistu fell. "He is a political novice, he has not been part of the old guard, he has not been in the bushes fighting with the rebels when they fought against Mengistu," exiled opposition leader and former mayor of Addis Ababa Berhanu Nega said last year. "He is a Medvedev for a group of Putins in the ruling party with their own internal squabbles," he added, drawing parallels with Russian political dynamics.

Hailemariam has spoken enthusiastically about ensuring democracy and accountable rule for the country, and two Swedish journalists jailed underMeles were released shortly after he took power. Source: SAPA

Briefly on the current status of EOTC'

Commentary: For many keen observers and supporters of reconciliation, the final blow came, of course, with the arbitrary decision of the Holy Synod in Ethiopia --- under duress from the regime --- to go forward withthe installment of the sixth Patriarch in spite of the peace talks that could have resulted in the return of the exiled Patriarch, His Holiness Abune Merkorios, to his rightful throne. Once again, the Ethiopian regime's obsession with imposing its will illegally on the selection of the next Patriarch was clearly and unambiguously on display, as a small group ofthe Synod's members in Addis Ababa successfully put into action the government's bidding in a dramatic show of force, supported by the mighty hand of regime operatives. Many other colleagues have written insightful pieces on this very subject, providing critical but timely analyses.

Grand Corruption at Arba Minch University of SNNPRS'

News: January 28, 2013 - Police arrested some officials of the Arba MinchUniversity of the Southern Nations and Nationalities Regional State (SNNPR) after the embezzlement of over 13 million Ethiopian birr was reported last week. The officials were suspected of purchasing printer inkswhich are not genuine. One official told ESAT that this was a minor case compared to the level of corruption in the region. He also said that as the officials are members of the ruling-EPRDF party and have good connectionwith the regional government, they could be released after the public outcry subsides. Source: ESAT News

EOTC Synod In Exile - Issues and Challenges'

OPINION: January 28, 2013 - Introduction: The reconciliation efforts underway between the EOTC home and exile synods seem to come to an abrupt halt. Technically speaking, it is the home synod who takes it to thelimit. The ratification of a law that governs patriarch choice, the selection of patriarch nominating committee, the crystal clear decision not to allow Abune Merkorios to reassume his position, and the firm decision to proceed with election of patriarch are four of the many 'hurdles' put forward by the home synod that freeze the unity negotiations. Putting God's will at a constant, one could reasonably conclude that the peace talks reached at a point of no return 'thanks' to the home synod. On the other hand, the exile synod made their own decisions that seem to indicate, among other things, the scale of their future engagement. The synod clarified a number of issues that were "incorrectly" raised by the home synod, including those related to the way the fourth patriarch was ousted. More importantly, the exile synod vowed to build its capacity at several 'fronts' and strengthen the spread of the Gospel in foreign lands. They are also poised to bring "neutral" churches under their authority.

Moreover, they plan to expose the ill-conceived 'moves' of the homesynod and the government in Ethiopia to international organizations.

I believe that the synod's decisions are kind of default measures to be taken. If reconciliation is just a dream, it is crucial to focus on growing thechurch in quantity and quality. Actually, a lot could be done in the years tocome. The synod rightly decided to build its organizational capacity for a better outreach. That EOTC believers live in nearly all major cities in the West and Asia makes it necessary to get strengthened administratively first. And that is quite possible. Innovative ideas and agile planning could make a significant difference. Still, it is great to remain open to and flexible about continuing the peace negotiations with the home synod if something develops, from both sides, at any point in time. My belief is that the exile synod could do great holy jobs in North America, Europe, Australia, Asia and Africa provided that some issues are well addressed in the beginning. There are several controversial and fuzzy issues that are raised in relation to the way the synod deals with some people and services. Social media circulated several issues, which are still active and fresh in the minds of many. In fact, these issues are provided as reasons why churches and individual Christians do not want to be under the authority of the exile synod. It is thus vital for the success of the synod and the church at large to first carefully and publicly address these and other issues. To me, the first task the synod should accomplish is to clarifyissues related to its 1) organization, 2) ambition and strategic plan, and 3)decisions made so far on core spiritual and administrative issues. This paper aims to frankly outline some of the core issues and challenges the EOTC synod in exile has faced and is likely to face in the times ahead. Unless the synod adequately addresses these and perhaps other ones, it would be a practical rarity to achieve their goals such as strengthening their international 'influence'. The only goal of this paper is thus to invite the synod to publicly entertain the issues that occupy the minds of the many. If people and churches are cleared of these, there is no convincingreason that forces them not to join the synod in exile. The major issues and challenges that need adequate and timely clarifications include the following.

Role model: To me, the synod has that huge task of 1) retaining their ownchurches under their reign, 2) attracting churches and individual Christians from neutral churches and churches that belong to the home synod, and 3) reaching non-believers with the Gospel. The challenge is asmuch capacity related as it is related to spiritual strength and integrity.

Although the reconciliation effort is technically given its embarrassing endby the home synod, the failure must be shared by the two synods. The debacle is a result of uncompromising agendas and prerequisites put forward by both. One could also argue that the exile synod's demand (to reinstate Abune Merkorios as patriarch) was much like a 'misguided missile'. Meaning, the patriarch was dethroned by the government who is still in power. What would happen if the home synod allows Abune Merkorios to reassume his position? Will the government allow that to happen or will it smoothly work with the patriarch? Absolutely not. So, thereconciliation should have been with the government and not with the EPRDF-controlled home synod alone. By default anyone who fails to forgive and make peace at any cost is not considered a spiritual role model. The division between the two holy leaderships erodes their credibility and integrity. That means, there might be a moral challenge for the exile synod to teach Christians to make sacrifices and to forgive. Spiritual power and grace expected from a role model is hard to be seen. The synod would have a particular problem preaching about peace, reconciliation, forgiveness, love, and unity even within its own jurisdiction.If the synod has that ambition of bringing the neutral churches and the churches that are under the home synod to their authority, they need to 'travel extra miles'. In a way, the synod is expected to demonstrate its integrity if it plans to expand services and structures around the world. In other words, they should identify and 'exhibit' the qualities that distinguishthem from the home synod. The issues and challenges outlined below seem to even complicate the matter. There are some signs and rumors that need to be clarified ahead. Some of the following issues concern some members of the synod. They could still adversely affect the integrityof the synod even if one or more of the following are considered to be false allegations. Regardless of their truth value and regardless of who raised them, the synod would benefit a lot if they clearly and publicly address them in good time. Just name calling: It seems that at least someof the Archbishops of the exile synod have very symbolic or ceremonial relationships with their churches. Some of them do not have the time and zeal to closely work with the parish councils and the Christian community at large. Part of the reason may of course be related to their limited human and resource pool. In fact, they do not seem to worry a lot about the growth and development of the churches. As long as their names are called during prayers and as long as they are invited to observe election ofparish councils, they do not mind. This leaves behind bad message to the church community, the message that the bishops care a lot about their personhood and future vs that of the church. In some places, some churches publicly complain about this already. It is recommended that thesynod members make carefully planned visits to churches and make genuine discussions with parish councils and the general laity. Discussionsmust include issues related to growing the church by numbers- how to increase membership and how to establish and maintain new churches. The laity must feel that they have someone at close range who listens toand solves their problems. Focus on and worry about the church and noton and about you as a synod or as a bishop. If this is taken up, it would be easier to identify real orthodox believers from people having reformistagendas.

The excommunicated: In the past, the home synod officially excommunicated some people for their wrong teachings related to EOTC dogmas and traditions. The excommunicated managed to leave for North America and join the churches administered by the exile synod. This appears to be a worrisome development to many believers. If the excommunicated abandon their wrong teachings and if they once again demonstrate their correct understandings of church teachings (and with penitence), that must be a great news and must be made public. If not, how does the synod explain this to the laity who appear to be very sensitive to and knowledgeable of church dogmas and traditions? This is a serious issue that needs to be handled with utmost care. If not dealt with,it would seriously compromise the very spiritual integrity of the synod.

Hymn: EOTC has its unique hymn, which has its base the Bible. The exceptionally sophisticated and soul- touching songs of Saint Yared are the real gifts from God. All the rhythms, melodies, and/or instruments of EOTC songs reflect these works and the Bible. Modern musical instruments are not thus allowed to be used for singing and prayers. But the exile synod seems to be a bit relaxed on this regard. There are at least some bishops who themselves use modern instruments for singing and praying. They believe that using these instruments is an aspect of bringing modern technologies to the church. I am a witness here- that oneof the Archbishops told the congregation with confidence and pride that heused and love to use modern instruments for prayers. This is something hard to swallow to many EOTC believers. This and other developments seem to tell the fact that the difference with the home synod may not be strictly speaking related only to administration. It seems to have these added dimensions. I am requesting the Holy Synod to clarify on this issue-whether the synod as an entity/organization believes in the use of modernmusical instruments for prayers and singing. If it is the belief of individual bishops, how could that still be explained to believers? If it plans to improve its outreach, the synod must come up with a clear communiqué about this and other issues related to politic Politics: The exile synod members appear to show a political ‘gesture’; some of them try to champion the efforts of Diaspora opposition. They endorse the formation of political parties and their decisions. One could ask: what is wrong with this? It is a good question. I believe that the synod and individual bishops have the obligation to defend the truth and to stand in defense of their followers. But this should be made in a systematic and spiritual fashion. It is difficult to understand why a bishop visits an armed group in the field. It just itches ears when a bishop calls the ruling party “.... .....» although we for certain know that the party is indeed that type. What am saying is that it is absolutely possible to oppose freedom violators without resorting to insults and words which arenot in tone with the talks expected of bishops. And I do not believe that it is a good idea for a bishop to endorse the formation of parties, groups andcampaigns. Fight injustices of any kind using the most ethical and spiritualstandards.

Another political issue raised in relation to the exile synod concerns its history. I recall several people shared the idea that the synod, particularlythe patriarch, used to ‘play at a silent mode’ during the reign of Mengistu Hailemariam. The point is that the patriarch kept silent when hundreds of thousands of Ethiopians were massacred in the name of Red Terror. As a patriarch of this great and historic church, Abune Merkorios was expectedto oppose the arbitrary killings. Some even believe that the patriarch has had a good relationship with the killer machine called Melaku Tefera of Gondar. The synod is expected to clarify what happened during that dark period of time to at least the young generation who begin to question andlearn from our past. A related but minor complain is that the synod is dominated by bishops of Gondarian origin, as the home synod is dominated by bishops of Tigrean origin. This sort of issues is beyond my imagination. How spiritual people who reached at the top of the hierarchyfound themselves in mindless and earthly matters such as the one raised here? I wish to see a solely merit-based future ordination of bishops!

Unless issues like this are not adequately clarified and considered forfuture moves, it would be a particular challenge for the synod to accommodate as many churches and Christians as expected.

Concluding Remarks: Although they put forward a hard-to-meet prerequisite for reconciliation, the synod in exile patiently waited for the decisions of the general assembly of the home synod. Knowing that the fourth patriarch cannot be reinstated back to his position, the exile synodpassed several decisions that are aimed at harnessing the growth of the EOTC in the other parts of the world. The ambitions are great and holy and could be met if the synod takes very strategic moves. Perhaps the first move may be winning the hearts and minds of believers. To do just that, the synod needs to clarify issues and rumors that are under circulation in the cyber world. I am not arguing that all those aforementioned issues are true; I am saying that rumors and false propagandas could ruin the integrity and credibility of the synod. The synod could profit a lot from campaigns that are aimed at 1) briefing the public on the organizational make-up and readiness of the synod itself, and 2) clarifying issues that are honestly raised in this paper and elsewhere.

Ethiopian woman found walking naked in Saudi Arabia'

News: January 28, 2013: Saudi police arrested an Ethiopian housemaid for walking naked in a public place and said they believe she is mentally ill. Internet users in the Gulf Kingdom, the largest base for Asian and African housemaids in the region, had circulated a YouTube film on social networks showing a woman talking off her gown and walking naked on a street in Riyadh at night. Police said the woman shown in the film is an Ethiopian maid who was arrested after they received calls from residents in the area. They denied a report associated with the film that the maid could have been raped. “The maid has been taken to a psychiatry hospitalfor treatment as she is not mentally normal…we have contacted her country’s embassy to follow up her treatment and arrange for her deportation from the Kingdom,” police spokesman Colonel Nassir al Qahtani said, quoted by Alsaudeh daily.

Police and residents of Kemessie at loggerheads'

News: January 28, 2013: A group of well armed police officers went to Sheik Salah Abdulkadir's house , a local religious leader who was released few days ago after an 8 month incarceration . Hearing that the motive of the police was to re arrest the Sheik, members of the community went outto oppose the action of the police. Perturbed by the people's action, the police then opted for negotiating the issue with the local leaders. The people, however, made it clear to the local officials that they would only budge to the Police's demand if and only if they got assurance from the government that the leader won't be re arrested. Kemessie is located 15 km from Metu, the capital city of Elubabour Zone. Source ESAT News

Addis Times Magazine seems to disappear forever'

January 28, 2013: Addis Times, one of the strongest political magazines inEthiopia, failed to be in circulation. The government was not willing to reissue the license of the publishing house. The magazine was published by Temsegen Desalegn, a renowned critic of the policy of the EPRDF government. Before joining Addis Times, Temesgen was Chief- Editor of Fiteh Newspaper. Fiteh was forced to close after Berhan ena Selam, the largest printing house in the country owned by the government, declined to print the paper. One observer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said "with the end of Addis Times, the government has once and for all declared the end of the private press." Source: ESAT News

A political leader and two lawyers arrested in Dawro zone of SNNPRS'

ESAT News: January 28, 2013 - Mr. Dubale Gebeyhu, a former EPRDF official and now a leader of one of the regional opposition parties, and the two lawyers, Mr. Gosahun Dosa and Mr Gizachew Tadesse are arrested in connection with the recent public protest in the Dawro zone of Southern Regional state. Dubale, who talked to ESAT on the phone when his house was being searched by the police, revealed that his arrest was the result of a personal feud with the Vice President of the Southern Region, and had nothing to do with the recent protest in the town. Two weeks ago violenceerupted in Dawro zone after the government refused to recognize the request by the people of Waka for recognition and status. Critics accuse the government of the ruling-EPRDF for fomenting discord among the various ethnic groups in the region. Source:

Endemic corruption may end the EPRDF rule?

Views: Lesson for Ethiopian opposition in fighting the corrupt EPRDF regime: Pervasive corruption is increasingly engulfing our global villagethreatening to topple governments in some countries. It is triggering popular wrath and fury at the scourge wrought by greed ushering in widening gap between the rich and the poor even in countries that hadchosen scientific socialism as a model of growth for many years. Someinteresting examples are provided below:-

1. China: In my article titled “Reform in China vs. crisis within EPRDF” dated 15 November 2012 I wrote: “The GS in his speech to leading officials underlined the unprecedented stride in economic growth achieved in the last decade but asking them “to exercise strict self-discipline and strengthen supervision over their families and staff.” He said “Leading officials at all levels, especially high-ranking officials, must readily observethe code of conduct on clean governance and report all important matters”adding that “If we fail to handle this issue well, it could prove fatal to the Party, and even cause the collapse of the Party and the fall of the state”. He made a passionate plea that “the CPC must make unremitting efforts to combat corruption, promote integrity and stay vigilant against degeneration.” He singled out corruption as a major problem in his closingspeech also. And the incoming General Secretary (GS) Xi Japing strongly underscored the same thing in condemning the rampant corruption.” Emphasis added The CPC and its government made a phenomenal progress in amassing wealth in the last decade but with poor distribution of that wealth going to members of the CPC top echelons not to mention flagrant abuse to human rights over the period. One has to watch the CCTV the progress China is making in fighting corruption, openness to the outside world and transparency at home. The lesson from China’s experience for Ethiopians is logically to take into account equitable wealth distribution, respect for human rights, social justice, and economic development together – respect for human rights taking precedence at all times.
2. Uganda: President Museveni has realized the danger that rampant corruption is posing to the stability of his government. So he is leading a concerted effort to fight the pervasive corruption in Uganda under the slogan: “Zero tolerance for corruption”. He is in part driven by the pressure of donors withholding funding for development projects and direct budgetary support plus the public cry demanding accountability for corruption. The opposition FDC led by its newly elected Party President is also promising to play a constructive role leaving behind the blame game of the past eight years. The recently formed group, which has christened itself: “Black Monday Activists” is also seen on the streets envy Monday wearing black dresses and sensitizing passers-by on the severity of corruption in the country and distributing brochures to that effect. The free print and broadcast media in Uganda and the East Africa region report profusely on the pervasive corrupt practices. The Uganda example is something opposition activists and civil entities back home in Ethiopia may consider to intensify civil disobedience against the inactive government. I hope that the broadcast from the CCTV station to Africa willnot be used in fostering the “vision of the dead man” Meles Zenawi, the former friend of Communist Party of China (CPC) China should act in its long term interest to side with the vast majority of the Ethiopian people by rethinking its policy of underpinning a minority TPLF party trading in the good names of the valiant people of Tigray.

3. Ethiopia: The late Zenawi openly and in full view of the public complained about pervasive corruption in his government and the business sector. The mother of corruption Azeb Mesfin, the former TPLF ideologue and Chief Executive Officer of Endowment FundforRehabilitationof Tigray (EFFORT) Sebhat Nega (the enemy of Amhara and the EthiopianOrthodox Tewahedo Christian Church) and others in the den of thieves should face justice soonest by popular demand. No audit report of this mammoth business monopoly has been made public. Azeb Mesfin, the widow of Meles Zenawi, replaced Sebhat Nega as CEO while her husband was alive.

The do-as-told Prime Minister Hailemariam is the flag bearer of the nauseating legacy of his predecessor. He is not expected to address the colossal corruption problem for he has already proved himself timid, habitual liar and incompetent leader. He cannot be relied on to follow the example of President Museveni in leading the fight against corruption. TheTPLF is a terrorist organization identified as such by Genocide Watch, the Global coalition to end genocide and mass atrocities. Genocide Watch has been vindicated by the recent plot of assassination on the renowned journalist and human rights Abebe Gelaw in the United States. We Ethiopians everywhere should relentlessly plead with the Obama Administration to rethink its policy of working with a terrorist organization perceived as such by the international community and verified by the heinous plot of assassination intended to be carried out on the homeland of the US citizens. Pervasive corruption in Ethiopia is certainly one of the top crimes of the EPRDF leading to the collapse of the regime. Opposition forces and civic organization at home and in the diaspora should seize corruption as a weapon to expedite the downfall of the EPRDF repressive government. President Yoweri Museveni of Uganda has realized the grave danger that rampant corruption is posing to his government and has takenthe lead in fighting the scourge. The same cannot be expected of Desalegn Hailemariam, the puppet Prime Minister of the EPRDF regime. Sothe best choice for us Ethiopians is emulating the Pakistani uprising against pandemic corruptionin Ethiopia of which the massively unemployed young persons are the main victims. In closing I would like torenew my solidarity with the 33 opposition parties in Ethiopia vying to initiate popular protest to assert their right to participate in the forthcoming local elections. My mantra: “The Almighty God has done His part leaving to us what we in the opposition and the Ethiopian people can do together. It is critical to act in unison to save Ethiopia. It is high time to boost the morale of renowned main opposition political entities and civic movements at home!!!

Soccer - Ethiopian supporters seen in RSA during the African Cup ofNations fined’

Johannesburg – January 28 2013: An Ethiopian soccer fan arrested for running onto the pitch during an Africa Cup of Nations match was fined.

Mpumalanga police said. Cherea Ablmenjine Regassa, 35, admitted guilt inthe Nelspruit Magistrate's Court and was fined R1500, Colonel Leonard Hlathi said.Regassa jumped over the barrier and ran onto the pitch during a match between Ethiopia and Burkinafaso. Source: SAPA

In need of an exiled EOTC Synod more so now than ever'

The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church (Amharic: የኢትዮጵያ ኦርቶዶክስ ተዋሕዶ ቤተ ክርስቲያን; Transliterated Amharic: Yäityop'ya ortodoks täwahedo bétäkrestyan) is the predominant Oriental Orthodox Christian church in Ethiopia. The Ethiopian Church was administratively part of the Coptic Orthodox Church until 1959, when it was granted its own Patriarch by Coptic Orthodox Pope of Alexandria and Patriarch of All Africa, Cyril VI. It should not be confused with the Ethiopian Catholic Church, which is a Chalcedonian church. One of the few pre-colonial Christian churches of Sub-Saharan Africa, the Ethiopian Church has a membership of between 40 and 45 million, the majority of whom live in Ethiopia, and is thus the largest of all Oriental Orthodox churches. The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church is a founding member of the World Council of Churches Tewahedo (Te-wa-hido) (Ge'ez ተዋሕዶ tawāhidō, modern pronunciation tewāhidō) is a Ge'ez word meaning "being made one" or "unified". This word refers to the Oriental Orthodox belief in the one single unified Natureof Christ.

Opinion by Deacon T.D. : January 29, 2013 - I have read an article statingthat the church is not divided and why the exiled synod is not necessary abroad. The writer himself stated his reasoning of why he thought the church was divided and agreed with the idea of exiled Synod. Well, ladies and gentelmen, the very same writer has now declared the church is not divided and thus no need for an exiled Synod. Until further notice, that is what it needs to be. We now have a "Synod" in Addis that does not speak for the poor, powerless, and those who do not have the freedom to speak for themselves. We now have a "Synod" in Addis who cannot even speak for the monks in Waldiba. We have a "Synod" in Addis who cannot speak for even to those members' of the "Synod" who got beaten and their house broken in bright day light. We now have a "Synod" meeting in Addisthat is chaired by top echelon of the power in the government instead of the Holy Spirit. We now have a "Synod" in Addis that smells, looks like a political appointee of the government. We now have a "Synod" in Addis that is focused on power and self worldly interest than its members that are flocking to other denominations in masses year after year. We now have a "Synod" in Addis that has lost taste of spirituality. The death of thelate Patriarch brought a golden opportunity to bring the church back to unity and reconciliation. After toying with the faithful emotions, wasted so much money for the reconciliation effort, knowing very well that the end result was redlined: hope it fails but if not break it. That is unexpected from "men of God" but that is the least of expectation from these people, it seems. We need an exiled Synod more so now than ever. The hopeless faithful needs a free exiled leadership now that we know it’s farfetched to expect any kind of religious leadership from the illegal Synod in Addis. Weneed a well-organized exiled Synod to lead the church abroad, which will include the independent churches before the death of the late Patriarch and be a hope for the church in Ethiopia. That will heal the hopeless faithful and lay a foundation for the future. I do not know the writer but I am assuming he is privy to the church and a concerned citizen should notmiss this matter of fact unless it’s all, “እኔ ያልወጠወጥኩት ወጥ አይወጥወጥ” አባዜ :: Source: Ethiomedia by

East Africa stagnates near bottom of the index, Ethiopia 137th'

RWB PR: January 30, 2013 - In Somalia(175th, -11) 18 journalists were killed, caught up in bomb attacks or the direct targets of murder, making2012 the deadliest in history for the country’s media. The Horn of Africa state was the second most dangerous country in the world for those working in news and information, behind Syria. In Eritrea(in last place in the index for the sixth successive year), no journalists were killed but some were left to die, which amounts to the same thing. With at least 30 behind bars, it is Africa’s biggest prison for journalists. Of 11 incarceratedsince 2001, seven have died as a result of prison conditions or have killedthemselves. Since the independent media were abolished more than 10 years ago, there are no independent Eritrean news outlets, other than outside the country, and terror prevails. East Africa is also a region of censorship and crackdowns. Omar al-Bashir’s Sudan, where more newspapers were seized and the arrests of journalists continued during the summer, is stuck firmly in 170th place, in the bottom 10 of the index.Djibouti (167th, -8), which also has no independent media, detained a correspondent of the foreign-based news site La Voix de Djibouti. Despitethe release of two Swedish journalists arrested in 2011, Ethiopia(137th) fell ten places because of its repressive application of the 2009 anti- terrorist law and the continued detention of several local journalists.

Political unrest in Mali and the Central African Republic: Mali (99th, -74), which was long presented as the continent’s star performer in democracy and press freedom, was prey to the political events that overtook it duringthe year. The military coup in Bamako on 22 March and the seizure of thenorth of the country by Touareg separatists and Islamic fundamentalists exposed news organizations to censorship and abuses. Many northern radio stations stopped broadcasting, while in the capital several Malian and foreign journalists were assaulted. All these occurred before the external military intervention in January 2013. The Central African Republic (CAR) was ranked 65th in 2012. Events after the outbreak of the Seleka rebellion at the very end of the year (radio stations ransacked, one journalist killed) were not taken into considerationin this index, thus preventing the country from falling more than 50 places. These will be included in the 2014 version. In Guinea-Bissau (92nd, -17) a media blackout and military censorship that followed thecoup on 12 April explain that country's drop.

Africa's predatory censors: Yahya Jammeh, King Mswati III, Paul Kagame,and Teodoro Obiang Nguema, together with other heads of state such as Issaias Afeworki (Eritrea) and Ismael Omar Guelleh (Djibouti) are members of an exclusive club of authoritarian African leaders, some eccentric others stern, who hold their countries in an iron grasp and keep a firm grip on news and information. Their countries, respectively Gambia(152nd), Swaziland(155th), Rwanda (161st) and Equatorial Guinea (166th), are all among the bottom 30 in the index. Media pluralism has been whittled away and criticism of the head of state discouraged.

The biggest losses: Chad, which fell 18 places to 121st, saw journalists harassed and roughed up, the publication of the newspaper N'Djamena Bi-Hebdo temporarily halted and its publisher sentenced to a suspended prison term, and a highly repressive bill kept under wraps. The slow but sure progress that followed the formation of a national unity government in Zimbabwe (133rd, -16) in 2009 and the granting of publication licencesto several independent newspapers appeared to have stalled. Violence andarrests of journalists still niggle and if elections go ahead as planned in 2013, the atmosphere for the media promises to be tense. Relatively high placed in 2011-2012, South Sudan(124th) fell 12 places after the murder of a columnist – the first killing of its kind in the new country – as news organizations and journalists awaited the approval of three new laws on the media.

Despite the holding of a national media conference in Cameroon (120th, -23), the future of the sector remains both uncertain and worrying. In the upper reaches of the index, Niger (43rd) nonetheless fell 14 places as a result of the irresponsibility of a few journalists who succumbed to the temptation to abuse the freedom that they enjoyed. Within the space of four months in Tanzania(70th, -36), one journalist was killed while he wascovering a demonstration and another was found dead, a clear victim of murder. Burundi (132nd) fell only two places but remains a low position. Summonses of journalists declined but the case of Hassan Ruvakuki, givena life sentence reduced to three years on appeal, has created an atmosphere of fear among the media.

Return to normality: After a dreadful year in 2011, marked by the dictatorial behaviourof the late President Bingu WaMutharika, a violent crackdown on demonstrations and the murder of the blogger Robert Chasowa, Malawi(75th) recorded the biggest jump in the entire index, up71 places, close to the position it held in 2010. Similarly, Cote d'Ivoire rose 63 places to 96th despite persistent problems. It had plummeted in the previous index because of a post-election crisis and the murders of a journalist and another media worker, as well as the civil conflict that brokeout in Abidjan in April. Uganda (104th) was up 35 places thanks to a better year, but things were far from satisfactory as far as the media wereconcerned. The year ended with President YoweriMuseveni making open threats to several radio stations.

Promising gains: For Senegal(59th, +16), 2012 was a year of hope. The presidential election took place in a peaceful atmosphere for the media, despite a few regrettable assaults on journalists, and President Macky Sall, who had declared himself willing to decriminalize press offences, tookoffice. Much remains to be proved in 2013, as was illustrated by the prisonsentence handed down on a journalist in December. In Liberia(97th, +13), the presidential election in November 2011 had been tainted by the closure of several media outlets and attacks on journalists. In 2012, the atmosphere improved greatly. In the summer, President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf became the second African head of state,after Mahamadou Issoufou of Niger, to sign the Declaration of Table Mountain, thereby undertaking to promote media freedom. Namibia (19th), Cape Verde (25th) and Ghana(30th) maintained their record as the highest ranked African countries. Source: PR by ReportersWithout Borders (RWB)

Cup of African Nations showed Ethiopian nationalism remains strongdespite over 4 decades of attack'

VIEWS: January 30, 2013 - TPLF and it’s ruling coalition partners waged amultifaceted war on Ethiopian nationalism for over four decades, and oncecame to power of Duerg's inability to efficiently manage, the EPRDF systematically tried to disintegrate Ethiopia in the guise of federalism, anddismantled all institutions that can promote pan-Ethiopianism (Ethiopiawinet). The strong Ethiopian nationalism that was in display at the African soccer tournament in South Africa proves that even though weare unable to remove the TPLF led regime from power as a result of our disunity, the people of Ethiopia have now successfully defeated the TPLF Manifesto. I was pleasantly surprised to see that the ugly TPLFite (Woyannes) flag was no where to be seen at the stadium in South Africa. The regime's cadres tried to flood the stadium with it. Pan-Ethiopian fans were also booing the Woyanne national anthem. I believe we can convert TPLFites themselves into pan-Ethiopianism, except old-guards. We can do that not by coercion, but by the power of persuasion and education. I believe this forum will help in that regard by setting an example of tolerance and discussing the benefits of Ethiopian national unity and pride.That is why we are allowing TPLFites to freely express their views here.

Not all Woyannes are evils. They were just brainwashed by evil individualslike Meles Zenawi who was born to hate Ethiopia. I would therefore like to congratulate the Ethiopian national soccer team and their fans for a jobwell done. Source: ER

Ethiopia leaves a mark in return to African Cup'

RUSTENBURG, South Africa (AP) — January 30, 2013: It was a wild returnto the African Cup of Nations for Ethiopia even though it failed to get past the group stage. Two goalkeepers were sent off, the team's federation was fined because of misbehaving fans and it scored its first tournament goal in 37 years in a surprising draw with defending champion Zambia.

Ethiopia was a win away from advancing to the quarterfinals but allowed two late goals against Nigeria in its final Group C match on Tuesday to finish last. The northeastern African country ended its participation with one point and scored only one goal, but it still made an impression. "We were happy to be here," Ethiopia coach Sewnet Bishaw said. "What we aregoing to do now is learn from our mistakes and try to be one of the best teams in Africa in the coming years." Ethiopia won the African Cup in 1962but hadn't played in the tournament since 1982. The team arrived in South Africa with few expectations and players admitted they were just looking to gain some experience. AP Sports Writer

Ethiopia’s Ezana Builds $17.8m Gold Plant'

News: January 31, 2013: Ezana Mining Development, a wholly-owned Ethiopian private company, is building a $17.8 million gold plant in Tigray,it was announced on Thursday.Addis Fortune reported the contract is to build a carbon-in-leach (CIL) gold plant at Terakimti, in northern Tigray, near Shire Endaselassie Town.It also said the construction had already begun at the plant, which is scheduled to be operational by the end of thisfiscal year. Ezana and the Ministry of Mines (MoM) signed an agreement three weeks ago, enabling Ezana to produce 2.017kg of gold within two years, according to Addis Fortune.“The technology we will use in the gold plant is no different from the one MIDROC uses, at its Lega Dembi mine inSouthern region,” a senior manager of Ezana, who asked for anonymity ashe is not authorised to speak to the media, said on Thursday.However, Ezana awarded the turnkey contract – a contract in which an operator or contractor agrees to furnish all labour and materials necessary to drill – to Manhattan Corporation, a South African mining services provider.Manhattan agreed with Ezana that its tasks will include design engineering, procurement, shipment, construction, installation, implementation and after-sales skills development.Manhattan was awarded the contract two months ago after beating four international companies that had also tendered for the Ezana contract. Established in June 1993, Ezana is one of the sister companies in the Endowment Fund For Rehabilitation of Tigray (EFFORT). Ezana has been conducting mining exploration in the northern part of the country for the past 20 years, according to the senior manager. The company also explores for iron ores and supplies raw materials to sister company, Messebo Cement Factory, according to Addis Fortune. Ethiopia earned $654 million from the exportof minerals, including gold, platinum, tantalum, decorative stones and gem stones, in 2011/12, according to data from the Ministry of Mines (MoM). This was largely accounted for by gold, of which 12tn was exported for a total of $602.4 million. MIDROC Gold Mine exported closeto three tonnes of that total.

New Ways of Fundraising for the Grand Renaissance Dam (GERD)'

News: January 31, 2013: Ethiopia: The National Secretariat of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) has announced that it will be introducing new ways of fund raising to help finance the construction of GERD. A special lottery and musical concerts are among the new fund raising methods which will be introduced shortly. The Secretariat also plans to collect 1 billion birr through Short Text Messages. Fekadu Ketema, Public Relations Head of the Secretariat, told reporters that fromthe total of 11.127 billion pledged so far, 4.1 billion birr has been collected. Government and private employees have contributed 1.8 billionbirr and started a second round of pledges of their monthly salaries.

Speaking about the progress of construction at the Dam, Ato Fekadu saidthat as of November just over 14% of construction had been completed and by the end of the year the project would be 26% complete.

Source: GoE, Addis Ababa

Khaimah-based pharmaceuticals firm Julphar is set to open its first overseas manufacturing plant in Ethiopia’ News: January 31, 2013: The pharmaceutical firm Julphar is set to open its first overseas manufacturingplant in Ethiopia. Once fully operational, the $9.6m, 40,000m^2 plant in thecapital of Ethiopia will produce 25m bottles of suspension and syrup, 500m tablets and 200m capsules annually, which will be exported throughout Africa. In an interview with Manufacturing Executive Middle East, the company's senior director for sales and marketing, Dr Aly Mousa, said Julphar is currently in the process of recruiting 50 staff in roles including quality control, quality assurance, production, maintenance, administration and regulatory affairs. "Ethiopia is an extremely interesting, dynamic and important market opportunity," said Dr Mousa. "As business and commerce across the African continent growsalong with a rapidly increasing population, the demand for quality, affordable healthcare is greater than ever. Our objective is to provide greater access to medicines throughout Africa, and in therapeutic areas needed the most, such as anti-viral." He said that the plant had been builtby Julphar's own in-house engineering and construction division, which ensures that its facilities meet the required international standards for pharmaceutical manufacturing. The Ethiopia plant is also due to be followed by future factories in Algeria and Saudi Arabia, with deals for both being signed last year.

Ethiopia – Variety of Ethiopian High Profile Civilian and Military Officials during imperial Ethiopia and the Provisional Military Administrative Council(PMAC) usually known as the Duerg'

What present Ethiopia lacks is democracy for all Ethiopians regardless of ethnic sense. Notable historians asserted that nobody was disadvantagedbecause he or she was Oromo or member of any other ethnic group.

There have been many high profile officials from Oromo and other ethnicgroups as well. Army commanders, Ministers, Governors, diplomats etc. also there have been many others who served in the military and civilianstructures. Here below list of various renowned personlities who were at helms of political, military and civilian powers during Emperor Minilik II, Emperor Haile Selassie I, and the infamous Duerg military regime.

COMPARISON: Variety of Ethiopian High Profile Civilian and MilitaryOfficials during imperial Ethiopia and the Provisional Military Administrative Council (PMAC) usually known as the Duerg'

(DIARIES) Variety of Ethiopian High Profile Civilian and Military Officials during Imperial Ethiopia and the Provisional Military Administrative Council(PMAC), usually known as the Duerg. What present Ethiopia lacks is democracy for all Ethiopians regardless of ethnic sense. Notable historiansasserted that nobody was disadvantaged because he or she was Oromo ormember of any other ethnic group. There have been many high profile officials from Oromo and other ethnic groups as well. Army commanders, Ministers, Governors, diplomats etc. also there have been many others who served in the military and civilian structures. Here below list of various renowned personalities who were at the helms of political, militaryand civilian powers during Emperor Minilik II, Emperor Haile Selassie I, and the infamous Provisional Military Administrative Council (PMAC), shortly known as the Duerg regime.

COMPARISON:High profile civilian and military officials of Oromo originsunder former Imperial Ethiopia

Ras Abbebe Aregay Bachire – Defence Minister Blatta Deresa Amentu – Vice Minister of Agriculture

Abba Hanna Djimma - Royal Treasurer

Affe-Negus Eshete Gedda - In charge of the Supreme Court

Dejazmach Geresu Duki – Governor-general of Illubabour and Gemugofa

Dejazmach Fikreselassie Habte Mariam – Governor-general of Wellegaprovince

Dejazmach Kassa Wolde Mariam – President of Addis Abeba University,and later Minister of Agriculture
Dejazmach Shiferaw Balcha – Administrator of Wollega and Abegaz ofJijjiga and Ogaden Dejazmach Kifle Dadi – Governor of Bege Midr & Smien provinceDejazmach Sebsibe Shiberru – Vice Governor of Shoa province
Dejazmach Bekele Weya – Adminstrator of Chebbo and Gurage, and laterAdiministrator of Chercher (former Harrarghe province)
Dejazmach Kebede Bizunesh – Governor of Kibre Menghist (Adola),Nazareth (Adama) of Yerer Kereiyu, and Menagesha
Fitawrari Hailemikael Zewde Goben- Administrator in various levelsFitawrari Lemma WeldeTsadik – Vice Governor of Sidamo
Majour-General Jagamma Kello – Commander of the Fourth Army Divisionand later Governor-general of former Bale province
Majour General Mulugeta Buli – Founder of the Ethiopian Armed Forces,Commandor of the Imperial Bodyguard, and later Minister of Culture
Majour General Abebe Gemeda – Commandor of the Second Army Division, Vice minister of Finance, Commander of the Ethiopian PoliceForce and later in charge of the Imperial Bodyguard
Majour General Waqjira Sarda – In charge of various army divisions
Majour General Kelbesa Bekka – Administrator in various levels, later chiefof Palace security
Majour General Abera Woldemariam – Vice Commander of the ImperialEthiopian Air Force
Majour General Regasa Jimma – Commander of various elite armydivisions
Majour General Demisse Bulto – Commander of various elite army divisions, and later Commander of the Second Revolutionary Army inEritrea
Brigadier General Tadesse Birru – Commander of the Special Police forces,locally known as "Fetno-Derash Police"
General Dawit Abdu – Commander of the army’s engineering division

Colonel Solomon Kedir – Vice Minister of customs and public security(yehizb dehninet guday)
Lt Girma Woldegiorgis – Vice Minister of the Civil Aviation and member ofthe Imperial Chamber of deputies Ligaba Bekele Wordofa Chengere – Responsible for the RoyalPalace(Ghibbi)
Ato Yilma Deresa Amentu – Ethiopian Ambassador to the U.S.A, Ministerof Foreign Affairs, Minister of Finance and Trade
Ato Guebremariam Amentu – Advisor of Telecomunications and Finance
Ato Amanuel Abraham – Ambassador, Minister of Police and Telecommunications, Advisor and member of the Imperial Crown Council
Ato Bulcha Demeksa – Minister of finance
Ato Solomon Guebremariam – Director, vice Minister in various ministries
Ato Tesfa Bushen – Vice Minister of ministry of Agriculture and ChiefAdministrator (briefly) of former Arussi province
Ato Teshome Guebremariam – Chairperson in the ministry of Justice, viceminister of mines
Ato Olana Nathnael – Vice Minister of Finance and head of monitorydivision
Ato Ephraim Boru – Ambassador plenpotentiary
Ato Molisa Rabu – Director-general in the ministry of Education & Fine Arts
COMPARISON: High profile civilian and military officials of Tigrai originsunder Imperial Ethiopia
HRH Leul Ras Mengesha – Grandson-in-law of the Emperor, Governor of Jibat & Mecha, Sidamo, Arussi, Minister of Imperial labor andCommunication, and later Governor-general of Tigre province ...
Ato Abebe Retta – Ambasador plenipotentiary, Imperial Minister ofAgriculture, later President of the Imperial Crown Council
Ato Belay Abay Kassa – State Minister of Planning and Economic Development, and later Minister of Land Reform (Meret-Yizota) and hasbeen appointed in charge of many other high ranking positions
Lique Mekuas Tadesse Negash – Chief director of ministry of Labour, Viceminister of ministry of Justice

Dejazmach Abbay Kassa – Governor of Chilalo in Arussi province Dejazmach Kidane Behailu – Vice president of the Imperial senateAto Wondwossen Hailu – Ambassador penipotentiary

Nebure-Ed Gizaw Abera – Administrator Raya & Azebo, Axum in then Tigreprovince, member of Imperial parliament

Majour-General Haile Baikedagn – Commander of the second Armydivision and later in the third Lions Army Division

Ato Yohannes Kidane Mariam – ?

Colonel Simret Medhane Guebrai – Chief of the Air force pilots, first CEOof the Ethiopian Airlines, Minister of social and labor affairs, and Ministerof Urban planning

Doctor Mengesha Guebre Hiwot – Vice Minister of Education & Fine Arts

Ato Yohannes Wolde-Gerima – Vice Mayor of Addis Ababa, vice minister ofministry of labour & social affairs

Majour Mesfin Yebegaeshet – Ambasador plenpotentiary and SpecialEnvoy

Dejazmach Guebre Hiwot Meshesha – Adminstrator of Hinticho and ShireGeneral Nega Haile Selassie – Adminstrator in various levels

Ato Kidanewold Haile – Ambassador plenipotentiary

COMPARISON: High profile civilian and military officials of Guraghe originsunder Imperial Ethiopia,

Dejazmach Guebre Mariam Gari – Regional AdministratorDejazmach Kifle Ergettu – Minister of Interior

Lt. General Wolde Selassie Bereka – Commandor of Special Forces in thearmy, and chief of staff of the Ethiopian Armed Forces

Brg. Gen. Wolde Yohannes – Second commander of the imperialBodyguard, Ambassador plenipotentiary

Brigadier General Teshome Ergetu – Commandor of the Armed Forces,Chief of provincial Police (Eritrea)

Ato Alfred Shafi – Director of Public administration, vice minister ofInterior, and later a minister

Kegn-Azmach Feleke Ergetu – Hh had been in charge of security (HizbDehninet), Administrator, and Minister

Lt. General Yilma Shibeshi – Commander of the Ethiopian Police Force

Fitawrari Habte Mariam Wolde Kidan – Director under the ministry ofPublic Health, Administreter of Bahir Dar and Gojjam

Ato Wolde Gabriel Ambaw – A judge in the Supreme Court

General Kifle Weldesenbet – Department Chief in the Ministry of Defence,In charge of training in the ministry of defence

Majour Assefa Lemma – Ambassador Plenipotentiary, Federal Republic ofGermany

General Gizaw Guebre Mikael – In charge of Human Resouce and Financeof the defence forces

Ato Seifu Dibaba – Administretor of Gojjam, Secretary of Trade and Finance, Auditor, and vice minister in the ministry of communication

Fitawrari Roga Ashame – Governor of the Lakes and Butajira

Brigadier General Tesfaye Habte Mariam - Commander of the elite Para-Commando Brigade

Majour General Taye Balker Sosum – Comander of Police force in formerEritrea region

Colonel Asfaw Sirago - Commander of elite army division in former Eritrearegion

Ato Haile Guebre Meskel – Former Shoa provincial inspector-general(Wanna tekotatari)

Azazh Hailu Habte – Palace (Ghibbi) AdministratorAto Ketema Abebe – Minister of Public Health

COMPARISON: High profile civilian and military officials of Afar, Harrari, Sidama, Gemu Goffa, Somali and Wollaita originsunder Imperial Ethiopia.

Fitawrari Desta Fisseha Tona – Governer of Wollaita, Member of ImperialParliament

Kawo Tona Gaga - The last king of Wolayta kingdom. Believed to be oneof the greatest warrior and the most powerful king of Wolayta. His armydefeated Kings Menelik's forces six times before lossing to the combinedforces of Menelik and Abajefar in 1896.

Dejazmach Girma Sanato - Commander of a southern Ethiopian militiaduring the Battle of Adwa Dejazmach Desta Feseha Tona - Grandson of Kawo Tona and Governor ofWolayta sub-region under Imperial Ethiopia.
Warrant Officer Manjura - One of the top officers in the Ethiopian Air Forceunder Imperial Ethiopia
Ato Minassie Lemma – Minister of Finance, Directer and Vice minister,Chief Auditor, Minster of Mines, Governor of National Bank of Ethiopia
Ato Bogale Walelu – Responsible of education in Sidamo provinceAto Mulu Mejja – Judge at the Supreme court
Fitawrari Abayneh Fanno – Member of the Imperial parliament
Fitawrari Zawdie Otoro – Member of the committee for jurisdication, Member of Imperial Parliament, Assistant Lemma Gutema – VP of theState Council, PDRE
Ato Ammanuel Habte Giorgis – Member of the Committee for Jurisdicationand Judge of Supreme Court
Fitawrari Makonnen Dori – Governor of Geleb and Hammar Bakko, andAss. Administrator of Gemu Goffa
Bitweded Ali Mirah Hamfere – Traditional Governor (Sultan) of Ausa, nowAfar Region
Ato Yakob Manna - Assistant Director at the Ethio-Djibouti RailwaysCustoms
Ato Abdulahi Mume – Harrarghe Custom Director, Assistance and viceMinister in the ministry of Finance
Dejazmach Omar Samatar – Administrator of the Ogaden
Fitawrari Dulani Rafle Guled – Administrator and tribal chief in the OgadenFitawrari Ahmed Ali Tase – Administrator in the former Harrarghe provinceFitawrari Ibrahim Hamid – Judge (Affe-Negus) in the Supreme Qadi Court
Fitawrari Mume Arfo – Administrator of Gara-Mulleta (former Harrargheprovince)
Fitawrari Sayd Weger – Administerter in various levels Dejazmach Adem Abdu Lemer – Administretor of Wenbera

Kegnazmatch Abdullahi Bede - Chief Administrator of former Harrargheregion

Ato Bashir Shekh Abdi – Chief Administrator of former Harrarghe region

COMPARISON: High Profile Civilian and Military Officials - Part or share ofpower of Eritrean origins during Imperial Ethiopia, and the latter.

Blatten-Geta Lorenzo Tizaz Mebrahtu – Different post under various ministries, Advisor of the Imperial Crown Council and Minister of ForeignAffairs

Blatten-Geta Ephraim Tewelde Medhin – Special envoy for emperor Haileselassie, Minister of agriculture, Member of the Imperial Parliament

Bitweded Asfaha Wolde Mikael – Special Envoy for Affairs concerningEritrea , Minster of Health, Advisor at the Imperial Council Crown

Dejazmach Tedla Bairu – Special Envoy for Eritrean Parliament, AssistantAdministrator of Eritrea, later ambassador plenipotentiary to the Scandinavians

Dejazmach Tesfa Yohannes Berhe – Special Envoy for the Eritrean Parliament, vice Governor-general of former Eritrea province, and brieflyImperial Minister of Mines under premier Lij Endalkatchew Makonnen

Dejazmach Haregot Abbay – Head of Economic of Eritrean parliament, andlater Mayor of Asmara city

Blatta Kifle Egzi – Judge (Affe-Negus) at the Supreme Court

Blatta Dawit Eqube Egzi – Special envoy of the emperor, Assistantminister in the ministry of Foreign Affairs

Ato Ammanuel Abraham - Minister

Ato Salah Henit – former Imperial Minister of Information

Ato Seyoum Haregot Abay – Assistant Prime minister, administrativeaffairs (yeastedader gudai wanna halafi) in the Prime ministers office

Ato Melese Andom – Special Envoy of the emperor, ambassadorplenipotentiary (Cairo, Egypt)

Dr. Tesfaye Guebre-Egzi – Interm Secretary-general of the former OAU,Ambasador, Assistance minister in the ministry of foreign Affairs InterimSecretary-general of the defunct OAU, and later Imperial Minister of Information

Dejazmatch Solomon Abraha – Behager Astedader Wanna director, laterGovernor-general (Enderassie) of Wollo province

Dejazmach Guebre Yohanes Tekle Mariam – Ambassador plenipotentiary,vice Minister in the ministry of Education & Fine Arts

Ato Sereke Berhan Guebre-Egzi –Ambassador plenipotentiary, Assistantminister in the ministry of Foreign Affairs,

Ato Araya Eqube-Egzi – Ambasador plennipotentiary – Chief commissionerof Tourism, Assistance minister in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs

Ato Yakob Guebre Leul – Commander of various army divisions in theArmed forces

Lt. General Aman Mikael Andom – Commander of elite army division andmember of the imperial senate

Brigadier General Mebrahtu Fisseha – Assistant Chief of the Ethiopian Police Force, Assistant minister of Maritime, and later Governor-general(Enderassie) of former Gemu Goffa province

Doctor Ambaye Guebre Mariam – Ambassador plenipotentiary, later viceminister in the ministry of Justice

Lt. General Essayas Guebre-Selassie – Commander of elite army division,and later Governor-general of former Sidamo province

Ato Osman Muhammed – Ambassodor plenipotentiary, head of nationalresources (Yehizb habt gudai), and later Assistant minister of Mayors, Ato Melake-Selam Dimetros – YeAksum Nebureed, in the rank of minister(beminister maereg) principal liaisoner of Churches affairs (yeabiate kirstianat wanna asfetsami), member of the imperial parliament.

Ato Hagos Tewelde-Medhin – Assistant administrative minister in the ministry of Agriculture, Chief Judge at the imperial court, (Mikitil Affe-Negus)

Ato Yohannes Tsige – Ambassador plenipotentiary, later Assistant ministerin the ministry of Public Health

Doctor Berekete-Ab Habte-Selassie – Professor at Haile Selassie I University , vice minister of Interior (mikitil yehager wist Astedader), Deputy Prosecutor-general (wannana mikitil Aquabe-hig), and law jurist.

General Assefa Guebre Egzi – Commander of Flight safety operations,Assistant commander of the Imperial Ethiopian Air Force

Doctor Abraham Demoz – Assistant Professor of Linguistics and History atHSIU.

Ato Beyene Solomon - President, council of Ethiopian Labor Union (CELU)Ato Tadesse Yaacob - head pension & social security affairs

Ato Paulos Abraham - Head of planning commission

Brigadier General Goitom Guebre-Izgy - Chief of Region' Police Force,Iloubabour province

Ato Eyassu Demoz - State Minister of Education

Brigadier General Zaraa-Mariam - Chief of Region's Police Force in EritreaBrigadier General Affeworki Wolde Mikael – Head of Peoples Militia Force Ato Yemane Araya- Minister of Social & Labor Affairs

Ato Ammanuel Amde Mikael - Law jurist

Ato Fisehatsion Tekie - General secretary, Council of Ethiopian LaborUnion (CELU)

Ato Affeworki Birhane - Mayor of Asmara city, and later briefly Minister ofPublic Health

Ato Mebrahtu Lebassi - WPE party secretary of Asmara city

COMPARISON: Share of power among senior party and government officials – During the PMGoE, known as the Duerg, and the latter PeoplesDemocratic Republic of Ethiopia (PDRE)

Lt. Col. Mengistu Hailemariam Wolde – PDRE President Father Oromo,Mother Wolaita not as claimed Amhara

Lt. Colonel Debela Dinsa- Member of the standing Committee of formerPMAC, VP State of Council, PDRE (Oromo)

Commander Lemma Gutema Debel – VP of the State Council, PDRE(Oromo)

Ato Yusuf Ahmed – VP of the State Council, PDRE (Harrari)

Lt. Colonel Tekka Tullu – Member of the standing Committee and head ofsecurity (Yedergu Yedehninet Gudai Halafi) of the PMAC (Oromo)

Colonel Tesfaye Wolde Selassie – Member of the WPE Polit-bureau,Minister of Interior and Chief of Public Security (Dorze)

Doctor Geremew Debele – Minister of Agriculture (Oromo)

Ato Tesfaye Dinqa – Alternate Member of the Politbureau, Minister ofIndustry, Foreign Affairs, Prime Minister (Oromo)

Lt. General Tesfaye Guebre Kidan – Member of the WPE Politbureau, Minister of Defence and later Acting President (briefly) of PDRE (Oromo)

Capitan Mengistu Gemechu – Special Administrative assistant to theEthiopian head of state (Oromo)

Majur Fisseha Geda – Tourism Commission Commissioner, Ambassadorplenipotentiary – Korea Peoples Democratic Republic

Maj-General Fanta Belay – Commander of the Ethiopian Airforce, laterMinister of Industry

Maj-General Amaha Desta Mitike – Commander of Ethiopian Airforce

Majour General Mesfin Guebre-Qual – Armed Forces Chief political officer,and later head of military operations at the Ministry of Defence (Eritrea origin)

Lt. Colonel Fisseha Desta – Member of the Politbureau and Vice Presidentof PDRE (Tigray)

Dr. Berhane Gebrai – Ambassador, Assistant minister in the Ministry ofEducation (Eritrea origin)

Brigadier General Lemessa Bedassa – Chief of Region’s Police in Eritrea(Tigri-Worji)

Brigadier General Yadete Gurmu – Chief of Addis Abeba Police force(Oromo)

Doctor Duri Mohammed – President of Addis Abeba University (Harrari)

Ato Simon Galore – Chief of Ethiopian Workers Party in Southern Omoregion of Ethiopia (Wolayita)

Majour-General Haile Giorgis Habte Mariam – Minister of DefenceMajour-General Merid Negussie – Chief of General Staff

Ato Abdul Hafiz Yusuf - Minister of Information and National Guidance(Harrari)

Rear Admiral Tesfaye Birhanu - Commander of the Ethiopian Navy(Wolayita)

Ato Taddese – GM, National Bank of Ethiopia (NBE), Minister of ForeignTrade and later Ambassador (NA)

Majour General Guebre Kiristos Bulli – Head of Revolutionary MilitaryOperations Command (Oromo)

Majour-General Demissie Bulto - Commander of the 2nd RevolutionaryArmy in Eritrea (Oromo)

Majour-General Kumlachew Dejene - Deputy Commander 2ndRevolutionary Army, Eritrea (Amhara)

Majour-General Abdullahi Umer - Head of Logistics, in the Ministry ofDefence (Harrari)

Majour-General Asrat Birru - Core commander of northwestern battle front(Oromo)

Majour-General Abera Abebe - Head of Military Operations in the Ministryof Defence (Oromo)

Majour-General Hussein Ahmed – Deputy commander of the 2ndRevolutionary Army in Eritrea

Brigadier General Worku Chernet – Political Commisar -2nd Revolutionaryarmy in Eritrea (NA) Colonel Taye Balker – Chief or Region's Police in Eritrea (Guraghe)

Commodore Belege Belete – Acting Commander of Ethiopian Navy (NA)Colonel Asfaw Sirago – Commander of elite army in Eritrea

Colonel Quejella Gemeda – Commander of former eastern HarrarghePolice force (Oromo)

Brg. General Guebre-Medhin Medhane - Commander of elite Tank Brigadein former Eritrea region (Eritrea origin)

Brigadier General Tesfaye Habte-Mariam - Commander of elite army inEritrea (Guraghe)

Brigadier General Merdassa Lelissa - Commander of elite army at Ambobattle front (Oromo)

Brg. Gen. Ali Hadji - Commander of elite army, Massawa front in formerEritrea region (Harrari)

Brg. Gen. Kassaye Chemeda - Commander of elite Tank Brigade northernbattle front (Oromo) Ato Shimeles Adugna Head of RRC later Minister of Children & Youth affairs (NA)

Majour Dawit Wolde Giorgis – State Minister of Foreign Affairs, WPEsecretary in Eritrea (NA)
Ato Leule-Selassie Temamo - Minister of Culture and Sports duringthe Interim period of 1991 to 1994. (Wolayita)

PMHD: Where's the Political Reform?

Opinion: February 1, 2013 - Mr. Haile Mariam Desalegn, the new PM, marks 100 plus days in office and brought frustration to all pro-democracycampaigners starting from his first exclusive interview with Peter Heinlein the Voice of America – VoA news correspondent. Some people predicted he will be a compromise candidate to bring more political freedom. Some say the predatory TPLF ruling party replaces the deceased Meles Zenawi by another stooge figure to continue dictatorial control. But it was not a secret that he is woven into TPLF autocratic regime in the past several years. In as much as he is the closest ally of the aristocracy of TPLF regime, in some of us thinking there is magical expectation he might bringbetter vision for the country, or at minimum he will make an effort of some kind for political reform including freeing political prisoners or respect - its own existing constitutions such as press freedom, guaranteesof the right of public assembly, etc.. In reality what we observed so far is our citizens continue to carry the yoke of oppression.

It is evident that ethno-centric TPLF paternalistic and arrogant views to Ethiopian people continued by forming a corrupt dictatorship political structure that contain three deputies to control the people along the ethnic line effectively. Due to highly personalized and abusive power structure from top to bottom, Hailemariam Desalegn is incapable of providing any adequate political reforms. Mr. Desalegn is retained by TPLFon this position mainly to give legitimacy to ethno-centric TPLF's reign. Hesupports the status quo unequivocally. He demonstrated - his determination to carry out past tyrant legacy on interviews, on news pressreleases, or addressing his rubber stamp parliament. The past twenty one years is a legacy of ethnics based rule by TPLF. Furthermore, the TPLF leaders built their political group on marriage ties, nepotism, sectarian loyalties and extensive network among them and other political cronies.

Hailemariam is a perfect fit as political cronies. PM or TPLF failed to focus on common causes and shared values of all Ethiopians. As we all know, some of the predominant factors for ethno-centric TPLF survival on power is based on divide and rule strategy. Consequently, the ethno-centric TPLFleaders become big fat fish in the country. They have created state apparatus bloated by rampant corruptions, bribe, and accumulation vast illicit fortunes and became a champion in running robust black market. Flourishing Corruptions and human rights abuse are cited with accompanying evidence on several free media (also for TPLF's individual'scharacters just read the recent Amharic series articles posted by (Eyerusalem Araya). It is upsetting and also an embarrassment to all fairminded Ethiopians.

The new PM unwillingness to rise to the responsibility as true leader and not launching better system is missing opportunity for him to be part of Ethiopian history legend. He has not expressed common vision of the people demands for freedom and social justice. Mr. Desalgen paid no attention to learn from past tyrant mistakes at all. As things stand now, the country is divided along ethnic lines, which is a ground work for anarchy. Examples include the recent ethnic-based clashes that erupted among university students on Arat Kilo campus of Addis Ababa University.Universities supposed to be - power house to disseminate knowledge in variety of field and search- out solutions for social ills. As we all know, Addis Ababa University which was once the home of the student activism inspired by Marxist ideas of class struggle, upholder of democratic freedoms and hot bed for dissent transformed by TPLF to recruitment center for single ethnic militants. TPLF leaders are proven to us again andagain they are not capable of rising above their ethnic line. TPLF's ethnic leadership behaviors followed by deception, blatant ethnic–based discrimination and try to alienate the Tigreans from the mainstream is notworking . Ordinary Tigrian people understood that the systematic pitting each other on ethnic line will not bring peace, democracy or justice. They knew all along we are multi-ethnic nation and have coexisted side by side peacefully for generations. Unfortunately the TPLF’s leaders failed to recognize that but relentlessly attempt to include them in part of their crimes.
Let me quote from Mr. Obama January 21, 2013 inaugural speech “What makes us exceptional - what makes us American - is our allegiance to an idea, articulated in a declaration made more than two centuries ago:” As we know it, America is most multi-ethnic nation allegiance to an idea not on ethnic origin. This illustrates that allegiance of an idea for national unity is key to achieve economic and social goals in Ethiopia. Imposing thecentury old Lenin's polemics nationality rights (ethnic politic) above libertyof individuals will not bring about true political changes, it will sustain the current corrupt thugocracy. The new PM has not shown even symbolic gesture to free up political prisoners or other needed political changes.
Even simple symbolic gesture can be powerful because it does describe something significant is at stake. Freeing up political prisoners is one of thing that got me to the heart of what has been bothering me since Mr. Desalgen becomes PM. I concluded that he is hopeless and lacks political leadership and must be viewed as a continuation of the previous fails politics. He is strengthened the ethno-centric TPLF power. As witnessed tothis date, he neglected the needs of Ethiopian people and become a de facto conduit to impose TPLF's dictatorial repression. Source: nazret.com security forces have detained for two weeks without charge the editor of anewsmagazine and accused him of incitement to terrorism, according to local journalists. The Committee to Protect Journalists calls on authorities to release Solomon Kebede immediately and halt their harassment of journalists affiliated with the weekly Ye Muslimoch Guday. Police in Addis Ababa, the capital, on January 17 arrested Kebede, managing editor of the now-defunct paper Ye Muslimoch Guday ("Muslim Affairs"), and took him to the Maekelawi federal detention center. Solomon's health is in poorcondition and he has been held without access to a lawyer, the journalistssaid. A court date has been set for February 13.
Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) protests arrest of Ethiopian journalist for covering Muslim protest' PR: February 1st, 2013: Ethiopian

Local journalists told CPJ they believed the arrest was linked to Solomon'scolumns that had criticized perceived government intrusion in religious affairs. Solomon had covered demonstrations staged last year by Muslims protesting alleged interference in Islamic Council elections. The protests were a highly sensitive issue for the government, which feared a hardline Islamist influence within the predominantly Christian country, news reports said. In an effort to suppress coverage of the protests, authorities began to crack down on Muslim-oriented publications. At least three papers, including Ye Muslimoch Guday, were forced to stop publishing, and police detained at least two reporters of the U.S. government-funded Voice of America. Authorities also arrested Yusuf Getachew, editor-in-chiefof Ye Muslimoch Guday,in July, news reports said. Yusuf is awaiting trial inKality Prison on vague anti-state and terrorism charges. In June, police raided the Addis Ababa offices of the private Horizon printing press and ordered the publisher to stop printing Ye Muslimoch Guday. The paper hasnot published since July 2012.

Local journalists also told CPJ that they suspected police may have arrested Solomon so they could question him on the whereabouts of two of his colleagues from Ye Muslimoch Guday. Senior Editor Akemel Negashand Copy Editor Isaac Eshetu fled into hiding in August after police kept their homes under surveillance for weeks, local journalists said. "We are troubled by the arrest of Solomon Kebede and the government's ongoingcrackdown against the staff of Ye Muslimoch Guday," said CPJ East Africa Consultant, Tom Rhodes. "We are also concerned about Solomon's well- being in the Maekelawi federal detention center, where numerous detainees have reported being tortured. Authorities should release Solomon immediately." Source: ER

Ethiopia - Bovine TB 'threatens health and farm incomes'Speed Read:

Almost a third of cattle from Ethiopian dairy farms tested positive forbovine TB.

Infected cattle may produce less milk and can infect humans.

Testing and culling the infected cattle recommended to control the spreadof the disease.

Research: February 4, 2013: The high incidence of bovine tuberculosis (BTB) in cattle on large dairy farms in central Ethiopia threatens farmers'incomes and public health, according to a study. As a result, the study calls for a concerted effort to control the disease and prevent the transmission of Mycobacterium bovis, the bacteria that causes it, to humans consuming dairy products from these farms. Around 30 per centof the nearly 3,000 dairy cattle from 88 herds around the capital, Addis Ababa, that were investigated for the study tested positive for BTB, whilemore than half the herds contained cattle that gave positive tests.

According to the authors, livestock is extremely important for people's livelihoods in Ethiopia and so the disease's impact on cattle increases theirfinancial burden. "It has been suggested that cattle with BTB have a reduced productivity affecting milk yield and carcass value," says the paper published in PLOS One.

The authors say that the high infection rate in the dairy farms is "likely to pose a serious risk to public health and deserves a targeted intervention as early as possible". The researchers suggest that "government and policymakers should work together with stakeholders to design methods for the control of BTB in intensive farms in Ethiopia". Mesfin Sahile, director of the National Animal Health Diagnostics and Investigation Center in Ethiopia and one of the paper's authors, says that separating sick animals from the herd for slaughter is agood way to tame the disease. According to Sahile, farms where infected animals have been culled should be cleaned and proper follow-ups carriedout to check that the rest of the herd remains healthy. The disease, he says, poses a high risk to those working with these animals as herders, milkers and butchers, as well as to those eating their products, especially unpasteurised milk. Henry Kiara, an epidemiologist and senior research officer at the International Livestock Research Institute in Nairobi, Kenya, agrees that the most effective control measure is to test and cull animals that test positive for BTB. There would have to be some form of compensation for farmers who volunteer the sick animals for this to succeed, hence the critical role of the Ethiopian government," he tells SciDev.Net.

This article has been produced by SciDev. Net's Sub-Saharan Africa desk.The Vision and Legacy of the Visionary Great Leader’

Views: The “Great Leader? The late Meles Zenawi, like all African dictators, sought to make himself larger than life. He was not only Ethiopia’s savior but Africa’s as well. He sought to project himself as a “visionary leader”, “inspirational spokesman for Africa” and supreme practitioner of “revolutionary democracy.” Following his death sometime inlate Summer 2012, the propaganda to deify, mythologize, exalt, immortalize and idolize him became a theatre of the absurd. Hailemariam

Desalegn, Meles' handpicked titular prime minster, in his speech to the party faithful in parliament virtually made Meles a lesser god offering blessings of "Eternal Glory to Our Great Leader." Even the original "GreatLeader" Kim Il-sung of North Korea achieved no more glory than being "The Sun of the Nation". Desalegn promised to consummate his own divinely delegated mission with missionary zeal: "My responsibility now…is to successfully carry out the aims and ambitions of a great and notable leader… Following in the footsteps of our great leader, we will strive to maintain and develop the influential voice in regional, continental and international forums" and "successfully implement the aims and vision ofour great leader. He was not just a brilliant generator of ideas: he was, par excellence, the embodiment of selflessness and self-sacrifice…"

Like all African dictators before him, Meles had illusions, delusions and obsessions. He did not have a grand vision; he had illusions of grandeur.Like Mobutu before him, Meles had the illusion of building Africa's largestdam, the so-called Grand Renaissance Dam, on the Blue Nile at a cost preliminarily estimated (unadjusted for cost overruns) at nearly USD$5 billion. Experts believe such a dam if built will "flood 1,680 square kilometers of forest in northwest Ethiopia, near the Sudan border, and create a reservoir that is nearly twice as large as Lake Tana, Ethiopia's largest natural lake…. The current cost estimate [for the dam] equals thecountry's entire annual budget…" Moreover, the dam "could cut the Nile flow into Egypt by 25% during the reservoir filling period" and substantially reduce the reservoir capacity of the Aswan High Dam.

According to a document obtained by Wikileaks from the private intelligence group Stratfor, "Sudan's president Omer Al-Bashir had agreedto build an Egyptian airbase in his country's western region of Darfur to beused for assaults on The Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) shoulddiplomatic efforts fail to resolve the dispute between Egypt and Ethiopia over Nile water-sharing." A legacy of regional war and strife?

Accusing The Fascist Marshal of Genocide and Object – A Worship byItalian Neo-Fascists'

Marshal Rodolfo Graziani is the leading architect of genocide in Ethiopia. Upon his recall to Rome in Dec 1937, Graziani was deemed an embarrassment to the Italian "Civilization Mission" and diagnosed as mentally unstable. He was then replaced by Duke of De Aosta, presumably a milder fascist. As Italy finally descended into civil war with the advance of the Allies, Field Marshal Rodolfo Graziani served as a loyal fascist military commander and followed Mussolini till his disastrous end- by-hanging. Marshal Graziani, however, was arrested and sentenced to 19years' imprisonment by the victorious Allies. This was punishment for his part in war crimes atrocities and for"collaborating with the Germans," andwas released from jail after serving only two years. After his release, he resumed active political life with the neo-fascist Movemento Social Italiano(MSI), and even served as its President. The MSI is the movement that nurtured contemporary neo-Fascists like long-time Italian President,and present day contender, Silvio Berlusconi. Graziani died in 1955 of oldage, while his victims continued to suffer in pain. Instead of persecuting the leading Fascist war criminals, the victorious powers were busy grooming leaders from the Fascist ranks, allegedly for establishing a bulwark against the rising tide of Communism in Italy.

The death of Meles in August, 2012 and the re-emergence of conflictwithin the TPLF - Who is the winner within the TPLF conflict?

Ethiomedia: Opinion: – February 2, 2013: Ethiopia's military victory was so imminent as Eritrean soldiers were already fleeing to Sudan, handing over their guns and ammunition to Sudanese security forces. In the capital Asmara, which was crowded with fleeing residents of towns alreadyoverran by Ethiopian defense forces, government officials were on the verge of fleeing the country along with their families. President Issaias himself was considering to move back to Sahel, his rebel-era base in the desert region of northeastern Eritrea.

For Meles, undoubtedly the architect of Eritrean independence, it would have been the most painful episode to see Ethiopian-flag carrying soldiersmarching in victory into the Eritrean capital. It would have negated Eritrean claim, which Meles bragged about time and again, that their 30- year-old war had resulted in the defeat of Ethiopia and the independence of Eritrea. The conflict arose between two groups: those who favored Ethiopian victory over Eritrea and those who favored Eritrean victory overEthiopia. To cut a long story short, Meles took swift measures against his half-hearted rivals and destroyed them in every sense of the word.

Prominent TPLF officials like Kinfe Gebremedhin and Hailu Gebremeskel were murdered in politically-motivated plots while Gebru Asrat et al werealmost deprived of their citizenship rights and thrown penniless onto the streets while former Defense Minister Seeye Abraha was thrown into jail for six years on trumped-up charges of corruption.

Inheriting The Wind'

Analisys by Al-Guebre Mariam: February 4, 2013: The Vision and Legacyof the "Visionary Great Leader": Like all African dictators before him, Meles had illusions, delusions and obsessions. He did not have a grand vision; he had illusions of grandeur. Like Mobutu before him, Meles had the illusion of building Africa's largest dam, the so-called Grand Renaissance Dam, on the Blue Nile at a cost preliminarily estimated (unadjusted for cost overruns) at nearly USD$5 billion. Experts believe such a dam if built will "flood 1,680 square kilometers of forest in northwest Ethiopia, near the Sudan border, and create a reservoir that isnearly twice as large as Lake Tana, Ethiopia's largest natural lake…. The current cost estimate [for the dam] equals the country's entire annual budget…" Moreover, the dam "could cut the Nile flow into Egypt by 25% during the reservoir filling period" and substantially reduce the reservoir capacity of the Aswan High Dam. According to a document obtained by Wikileaks from the private intelligence group Stratfor, "Sudan's presidentOmer Al-Bashir had agreed to build an Egyptian airbase in his country's western region of Darfur to be used for assaults on The Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) should diplomatic efforts fail to resolve the dispute between Egypt and Ethiopia over Nile water-sharing." A legacy ofregional war and strife?

Meles did not have a growth and transformation plan; he had delusional plans of economic growth and transformation. As I have demonstrated in "The Voodoo Economics of Meles Zenawi", Meles "has been making hyperbolic claims of economic growth in Ethiopia based on fabricated and massaged GDP (gross domestic product) numbers, implying that the country is in a state of runaway economic development and the people's standard of living is fast outstripping those living in the middle income countries." When the U.S. State Department reported an average inflationrate (FY 2008-2009) of 36 percent, Meles predicted a decline in inflation to 3.9 percent in 2009/10. His Growth and Transformation Plan (or what Icalled "Zenawinomics") which I reviewed in my June 2011 commentary "The Fakeonomics of Meles Zenawi", "is a make-a-wish list of stuff. It purports to be based on a 'long-term vision' of making Ethiopia 'a country where democratic rule, good-governance and social justice reigns.' It aimsto 'build an economy which has a modern and productive agricultural sector with enhanced technology and an industrial sector' and 'increase per capita income of citizens so that it reaches at the level of those in middle-income countries.' It boasts of 'pillar strategies' to 'sustain faster and equitable economic growth', 'maintain agriculture as a major source of economic growth,' 'create favorable conditions for the industry to play key role in the economy,' 'expand infrastructure and social development,' 'build capacity and deepen good governance' and 'promote women and youth empowerment and equitable benefit.' Stripped of its collection of hollow economic slogans, clichés, buzzwords and catchphrases, Meles' growth and growth and transformation plan is plain sham-o-nomics. A legacy of inflation, economic mismanagement, crushing foreign debt and environmental destruction?

Meles had no national vision; he only had a vision of ethnic division. His warped idea of "ethnic federalism" is merely a kinder and gentler reincarnation of Apartheid in Ethiopia. For nearly two decades, Meles toiled ceaselessly to shred the very fabric of Ethiopian society, and sculpt a landscape balkanized into tribal, ethnic, linguistic and regional enclaves.He crafted a constitution based entirely on ethnicity and tribal affiliation asthe basis for political organization. He wrote in Article 46 (2) of the constitution: "States shall be structured on the basis of settlement patterns, language, identity and consent of the people." In other words, "states", (and the people who live in them) shall be corralled like cattle in tribal homelands in much the same way as the 10 Bantustans (black homelands) of Apartheid South Africa. These tribal homelands are officially called “kilils” (enclaves or distinct enclosed and effectively isolated geographic areas within a seemingly integrated national territory). Like the Bantustans, the Killilistans ultimately aim to create homogeneous and autonomous ethnic states in Ethiopia, effectively scrubbing out any meaningful notion of Ethiopian national citizenship. Meles’ completely fictitious theory of “ethnic (tribal) federalism)”, unknown in the annals of political science or political theory, has been used to justify and glorify these Kililistans and impose an atrocious policyof divide and rule against 90 million people. A legacy of ethnic balkanization, political polarization, brutalization, and sectarian strife?

Under Meles, Ethiopia became the poster country for international alarmsand charity and crushing international debt. During his two decades plus tenure, Ethiopia has been among the largest recipients of “economic aid”,“development aid”, “military aid”, “technical aid”, “emergency aid”, “reliefaid”, “humanitarian aid” and aid against AIDS in the world. As I argued inmy commentary “Ethiopia in BondAid?”, Meles has successfully subvertedinternational aid and loans, particularly U.S. aid, to strengthen his tyrannical rule. A legacy of international aid addiction and beggary?

Corruption under Meles Zenawi has put Ethiopia on life-support. The WorldBank recently issued a 448-page report entitled, “Diagnosing Corruption inEthiopia” . The cancer of corruption has metastasized in the Ethiopian body politics. The Telecommunications Sector of Ethiopia is in terminal stage: Despite the country’s exceptionally heavy recent investment in its telecoms infrastructure, it has the second lowest telephone penetration rate in Africa. It once led the regional field in the laying of fiber-optic cable, yet suffers from severe bandwidth and reliability problems. Amid itslow service delivery, an apparent lack of accountability, and multiple courtcases, some aspects of the sector are perceived by both domestic and international observers to be deeply affected by corruption.

In the Construction Sector, “Ethiopia exhibits most of the classic warning signs of corruption risk, including instances of poor-quality construction, inflated unit output costs, and delays in implementation.” Corruption in the Justice Sector “takes one of two forms: (a) political interference with the independent actions of courts or other sector agencies, or (b) paymentor solicitation of bribes or other considerations to alter a decision or action.” Corruption in the Land Sector is inherent in the law. “The level of corruption is influenced strongly by the way policy and legislation are formulated and enforced. For example, the capture of state assets by the elite can occur through the formulation of policy that favors the elite.” In other words, the laws are written to rig the bidding process to give Meles’ cronies, buddies and supporters a significant advantage so that they can pick up state assets at fire sale prices. A legacy of endemic corruption?

Meles’ “revolutionary democracy” as an ideology or policy guide never quite transcended the sloganeering and phrase-mongering stage, but he indulged in its rhetoric whenever he was overcome by revolutionary fervor. In a seminal analysis of "revolutionary democracy" and arguably the "first paper to seriously examine the political programme and politicalphilosophy of EPRDF based on a review of its major policy", Jean-Nicolas Bach of the Institute of Political Studies (Bordeaux, France) in 2011 described "Abyotawi democracy (revolutionary democracy) [as] neither revolutionary nor democratic." Bach argued that revolutionary democracyis a ''bricolage'' (hodgepodge) of "Leninism, Marxism, Maoism, and also liberalism" concocted by a "small group of party ideologists around Meles,and a few agencies." As an ideology, "revolutionary democracy" "providesjustification for fusing political and economic power in the party-state runby EPRDF." A critical "review of party pamphlets and official party/state discourses reveals the degree to which revolutionary democracy has become an ambiguous doctrine vis-a`-vis 'liberalism'" and "remains a powerful fighting tool to exclude internal and external 'enemies'." One commentator recently likened revolutionary democracy to communism and fascism. Revolutionary democracy is responsible for delivering a 99.6 percent parliamentary victory to Meles' party in 2010. A legacy of rigged and stolen elections and bad governance?

Melesismo: Meles' Greatest Legacy: Meles' singular legacy is Melesismo, apolitical legacy I foretold in my December 2009 commentary entitled "TheRaw Machismo of Power". Meles perfected Melesismo--the political art of "My way, the highway, no way… or jail!" Melesismo reaffirms the ignoble principle that might makes right. Meles' worshippers proclaim they are marching in his footsteps with the same reverence of those who claim to walk in the footsteps of the Man of Galilee. They ostentatiously display raw machismo invoking the divine power Meles. How little things have changed? From a legacy of the divine right of kings to a legacy of the divine rule of a lesser god! Meles' worshippers seek to mythologize, canonize and idolize him. But they cannot reincarnate Meles as the "Messiah". Even the great Nelson Mandela is undeserving of "eternal glory". He said so himself, "I am not a saint, unless you think of a saint asa sinner who keeps on trying." Neither saints nor demons deserve "eternalglory". Meles will eventually be consigned to the dustbin of history as nothing more than another petty African tyrant. Meles' greatest legacy would have been what he said his legacy would be. In 2007, Meles said his "hope is that [his] legacy" would be not only "sustained and accelerated development that would pull Ethiopia out of the massive deep poverty" but also "radical improvements in terms of good governance and democracy." Without radical democratic improvements by Meles' worshippers, Meles will be remembered in history as a reactionary petty African tyrant.

Is it possible for Meleismo to hold the center after Meles? Will Melesismosurvive Meles? My friend Eskinder Nega, the personification of press freedom in Ethiopia today, who was jailed by Meles, was likely right in foretelling the inevitable implosion of the "EPDRF". Eskinder wrote, “Scratch beyond the surface and the EPRDF is really not the monolithic dinosaur as it is most commonly stereotyped. [It has become] a coalition of four distinct phenomenon: the increasing confusion of the dominant TPLF [Tigrayan People's Liberation Front], the acute cynicism of the ANDM[Amhara National Democratic Movement], the desperate nihilism of the OPDO [Oromo People's Democratic Organization] and the inevitable irrelevance of the incongruent SEPM [South Ethiopian People's Movement](a grab bag of some 40 ethnic groups from the southern part of the country).” Meles was a man with a mission who confused mission with vision. He has completed his mission. History will record his legacy to be human rights violation, press suppression, ethnic division, endemic corruption, obsessive secrecy and a political culture whose lifeblood is impunity, lack of accountability and transparency. Shakespeare wrote, “The evil that men do lives after them; the good is oft interred with their bones…” Scripture teaches that “He that troubleth his own house shall inherit the wind: and the fool shall be servant to the wise of heart.” Melesand his worshippers have profoundly troubled the Ethiopian house and they shall inherit the wind!

Professor Al Guebre Mariam teaches political science at California State University, San Bernardino and is a practicing defense lawyer.

Security forces detained Ethiopian journalist for reporting about Muslimprotests'

News tip: February 3, 2013: Ethiopian security forces have detained for two weeks without charge the editor of a newsmagazine and accused himof incitement to terrorism, according to local journalists. The Committee to Protect Journalists calls on authorities to release Solomon Kebede immediately and halt their harassment of journalists affiliated with the weekly "Ye Muslimoch Guday". Police in Addis Ababa, the capital, on January 17 arrested Kebede, managing editor of the now-defunct paper ‘Ye Muslimoch Guday’ (Muslim Affairs), and took him to the Maekelawi federal detention center. Solomon’s health is in poor condition and he hasbeen held without access to a lawyer, the journalists said. A court date has been set for February 13. Local journalists told CPJ they believed the arrest was linked to Solomon’s columns that had criticized perceived government intrusion in religious affairs. Solomon had covered demonstrations staged last year by Muslims protesting alleged interference in Islamic Council elections. The protests were a highly sensitive issue for the government, which feared a hardline Islamist influence within the predominantly Christian country, news reports said.

Interference with religious affairs: The rampant breach of its own constitution by the ruling party and its government is known to the international community. Freedom of expression is denied. The regime does not allow freedoms of conscience and religion as stipulated in Article27 of the federal constitution. The present heavy crackdown on the Ethiopian Muslim community and gross interference to determine the outcome of the forthcoming election of a Patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church (EOTC) are two examples in point. The followers of the two ancient faiths constitute 77% of the Ethiopian population and the repressive regime is scared of the ongoing unrest throughout Ethiopia scaling to full blown civil disobedience.

Zenawi's Death Leaves A Ticking Time-bomb'

The death of Ethiopian prime minister Meles Zenawi on the night of Aug. 20 will amount to no less than a time-bomb for the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) and for its hard core, the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) because it will ignite previously restrainedambitions of his would-be successors.

Haile Mariam Desalegn, former adviser to the Prime Minister and current vice prime minister, was named as acting leader. But there's no saying Desalegn, an engineer from southern Ethiopia who was Meles Zenawi's favorite, will be able to impose his authority in lasting fashion on TPLF bosses from the north of the country. Despite an appearance of calm, the fight for power has already begun behind the scenes. Some TPLF leaders like Meles Zenawi's widow, Azeb Mesfin, whose political ambitions grate onothers in the party, could seek the top post for themselves or for one of their own. The leaders Amharas and Oromos from EPRDF are calling for the post to fall to a non-Tigrean. ION

TPLF: Central Component of The Ruling-EPRDF: Too undemocratic to split’

Analysis: By Tesfai Atsebeha - It is being disseminated that a certain group of the TPLF and Bereket are trying to purge some veteran membersof the TPLF. Purges are not new in the TPLF, but it is a break from the tradition of the TPLF, if a group has really disclosed its intention before taking an irrevocable measure.

Ambushand pre-emptive attack: One aspect of the tradition of the TPLF, which is devoid of any transparency and accountability was that the perpetrators prepare their intrigues to harm their victims without informing the targeted victims and the rank-and-file-members of the TPLFand purge (as they did to Aregawi and Ghidey in 1985, to Seeye, Gebru Tewelde etc in 2001) or liquidate their victims (Abera Manka, Hagos Haileselassie etc., in 1977/78 and Teklu Hawaz in 1985). In all the cases mentioned, the victims did not get a fair chance to express their opinions and this practice of injustice applies to many others.

To put it in military parlance, the protagonists behaved as if they had to ambush their victims. They launched surprise attacks against their victimswhenever the latter list expected the attacks. Another aspect of the tradition pertains to the fact that the perpetrators used to go over to a pre-emptive attack, whenever they felt insecure and feared being held accountable for crimes or feared losing power. Accusing Kinnjit was for instance a pre-emptive attack. Those who ordered the massacre and those who executed the order after the election should have been accused, but the killer framed the accusation to pre-empt his exposition and the mobilization of the people against him. This also shows that conflict resolutions in the TPLF have always been zero-sum-games. On thesurface, the perpetrators seem to achieve their aims with dishonest accusations. In reality, it is the use and threat of physical force (the control of the army) which enables them to implement deceptive measures which they try to sell as sophistication and smartness.

During the armed struggle, they (the perpetrators) used to inform others after the fait accompli to justify their measures and silence any potential expression of any grievances in the case of purges. They kept liquidations secrete with the exception of that of Teklu. With the murders they committed in 1977/78, the perpetrators succeeded in making the none-CCmembers of the TPLF as apolitical as the weapons the latter carry by destroying mutual trust and instilling a feeling of suspicion and fear amongst the fighters of the TPLF. The evaluations (Gmgemas) are mainly meant to maintain the atmosphere of insecurity by forcing everybody control everybody else reciprocally.

A few individuals in the TPLF have been exploiting the lack of a democraticculture and consciousness amongst the members to maintain their repressive rule. Such individuals are perpetuating the undemocratic culture. In this connection, most members of the TPLF are victims, objectsof experiment for tyranny and tools of the oppressors at the same time.

The few who are in charge of the TPLF have the key (an organized and armed force) to control Ethiopia. They are controlling almost all key positions in Ethiopia that their dominance is too unjust to be tolerable andsustainable. As this lopsided ethnic relationship is the objective reality, exposing and opposing it should be the duty of any democrat. Objectivelyexposing the repressive and corrupt practices of the Tigrayan elite is not an attack on the people of Tigray. But there are also people who generalize. On both sides, some generalize deliberately, others innocentlyor due to their inability to differentiate.

Now, coming back to the alleged split, Sebhat Nega, in an interview with Dawit Solomon of Fnote Democracy (posted on 31 January 2013 in zehabesha) has said part of the truth, in saying that the TPLF has never experienced a split. The whole truth is that there were splits in the leadership, but no splits of the whole organization, because the none-CC- members have neither the right to make decisions nor the right to get information on the issues prior to the decisions. Generally, armed undemocratic organisations (like fascists, Stalinists and religious fanatics),do not split, because the leaders do not inform their members about their differences of opinion and let the members freely discuss as well as take sides on the issues. What the perpetrators do always is take measures on the dissidents and spread lies about them. And this was what the leadership of the TPLF has been doing so far.

Sebhat is trying to hide the fact that the TPLF is too undemocratic even tosplit. The clique which controls the TPLF cannot tolerate any differences ofopinion even within itself and that is why it subordinated itself to a single tyrant. Of course, a split would certainly have entailed war, since no independent groups would have tolerated each other. If the Sebhat cliquewere sincere and had confidence in the correctness of the decisions it arrived at, it would allowed the members of the Front to participate in theprocess of decision making. Since the clique is used to depriving its own members of their rights, it is depriving all Ethiopians of an alternative andharassing the opposition.

After speaking a single sentence with a partial truth, Sebhat resorted to his lies. He claimed that he and his cohorts are used to discussing as long as it takes, to iron out their differences. Meles gave a similar disinformation in the summer of 1998 while he, in violation of the regulations of the organization, was preparing to purge almost half of the members of the CC of the TPLF. The example Sebhat gave about a long discussion with Ghidey Zeratsion is utter nonsense. Ghidey and Aregawi, while expressing their opinions within the CC, were not aware that the Meles/Sebhat clique was preparing to get rid of them and there were no formal discussions amongst members not belonging to the CC on the issuebefore the purges. One of the reasons for the expulsion of Ghidey was his mild opposition to the Marxist rhetoric (the tactic not the strategy) so thatthe aid from the West may not be affected. The whole rhetorical jargon and the aim were totally abandoned after his expulsion.

In a similar manner, the claim by Sebhat that incompetent members are expelled does not correspond to the truth. The victims are mainly those who empress their opinions. By the way, why should incompetence, if thatwere the case, be a crime? Why are individuals who served the TPLF suddenly treated as enemies? The truth is, while incompetent people can be marginalized without being incriminated through elections in a democratic organization, those who control the TPLF are interested in blind loyalty so that they can maintain their power and their economic advantages. Differences of opinion within an armed organization and differences between armed organizations in Ethiopia are resolved eventually by intrigues and force and/or the threat of it. No major organization waging an armed struggle has restrained itself from going to war against any other in the recent past in Ethiopia. Therefore there is no basic difference between the feudal lords of the era of the princes and thepresent war mongers when it comes to attempts at monopolizing power by force. In spite of the similarities in intolerance, the present politicians are more hypocritical than the feudal lords of the past; because the present ones understand the concept of democracy and pay only lip service to it unlike those of the past who lived in an era in which democracy was unknown in the region. Even in the absence of modernity,Emperor Yohannes and King (later Emperor) Menilik were unique in their tolerance of each other and in avoiding war between them. Those who are agitating ethnic enmity should learn from the responsible behaviour ofboth emperors.1

Who are the contending groups, if there are any? We can talk about the groups, irrespective of whether or not the individuals have formed groups.One alleged group is supposed to include Sebhat, Abay, Seyoum, Tsegay and Qedusan. The first three (they will henceforth be called the trio.) are the most veteran, but also responsible for many cases of crimes against humanity and corruption. They were the individuals along with Meles who started their career in the armed struggle with an anti-Ethiopian and undemocratic obsession. They wrote a manifesto for the secession of Tigray from Ethiopia and undemocratically kept other members of the TPLF in the dark about the content. Despite their manifesto, they ironicallybecame the rulers of Ethiopia and continued committing crimes.

If the other group includes Bereket, he is a liability to his group. Azeb can get sympathy from some Meles Voodoo (spirit) worshipers. For critical minds, Azeb is a negative symbol of corruption linking her husband, the trio and a few others. The fact that Azeb, without a corresponding qualification controls EFFORT, such a business conglomerate worth billionsof dollars and the fact that she is the only female member of the politburoof the TPLF is an evidence of nepotism. Since Azeb got her position by virtue of being the wife of Meles, Meles was involved in this act of corruption. Pardon! He was involved in his own words, in acts of pervasiverent seeking and patronage, as is also the case with his political corruption of claiming an election victory exceeding 99% of the seats. EFFORT, whichcame into being with stolen (withheld) aid money, is basically a colossal evidence of the corruption of the TPLF mafia clique. (A propos aid, the best way for a fair distribution of aid under the rule of the EPRDF is to make an arrangement for the opposition and the EPRDF to mutually control each other. It is impossible for the donors to control the abuse of aid by the EPRF).

Several people have proposed that EFFORT should be controlled by external auditors. But I think any attempt at controlling is useless as longas our people are not free. It is only with the prevalence of freedom that any control can make sense. Notwithstanding the facts mentioned above,it is worth pointing out that many young Ethiopians have been so indoctrinated by the monopolized media outlets that they don’t perceive the evilness of the incumbent. In my opinion, those who attack emperorsYohannes and Menilik – the former mostly muslin extremists the latter narrow ethnic nationalists -belong to the most destructive elements amongst Ethiopians. I was shocked when I heard a person in the current Affairs pal talk room, on 13 February 2013, expressing his Schadenfreudeat the barbaric beheading of emperor Yohannes by the dervishes. The attack on emperor Menilik revolves around his alleged policy of dividing Tigrayans. This accusation should have been buried at least after the Tigrayans on both sides of the Mereb came to power and consolidated thedivision.

Possible results of the conflict: Abay woldu nicknamed Dara, in an angry speech after the death of Meles, had implied some sort of a conflict. If his anger was provoked by the suggestion that the loyal dissidents like Tsadkan should be readmitted into the TPLF, it does not make sense. His fear could not have been caused by the reintegration of the dissidents, butrather by the danger that someone would manipulate and dominate the TPLF to his disadvantage. Some latecomers in the TPLF leadership positions cannot, with the presumption of innocence, be considered as criminals (by commission). A single tyrant is not controlling Ethiopia for the first time in our modern history and that is in itself a welcome development; although the whole system has yet to be changed for the better. The new initiative of an open conflict may be resolved in several ways and entail different outcomes or it may bring nothing. The best solution would be for all members of the EPRDF, as a whole, to eventually participate in free discussions, get rid of the criminal and corrupt elementsand democratically elect a new leadership. Is this a wishful thinking? That may be the case, but it is worth wishing, provided those who can make the change, especially the unprivileged members who make up an overwhelming majority of the army share the wish of abolishing the totalitarian regime and respecting the rights of all Ethiopians. Source: Ethiomedia (February 20, 2013)
Ethiopia Celebrates With Miss Israel - Ynet News’
Yityish (Titi) Aynaw, the first Ethiopian-born woman to be crowned Miss Israel, is attracting media attention in her homeland as well, with intense coverage by Ethiopian newspapers, websites, television and radio stations.The Israeli Embassy in Addis Ababa issued a press release about the beauty pageant and the precedent set by its winner. The Embassy is planning to use the win as part of a PR campaign for Israel, which will include posting Aynaw’s pictures on billboards across Ethiopia.
Brain Drain: Can Developing Nations Sustain Enough Aircraft Technicians?Ethiopian Airlines loses technicians at high rate’ Ethiopia is, along Nigeria and Kenya, losing its skilled technicians to other countries. The Airlines says training and retaining highly skilled technicians is "prohibitively expensive." Ethiopian Airlines admits that it loses 5% of its technicians to brain drain every year. A skills exodus has long been a constrictive factor affecting emerging markets. Indeed, there are few industries where the impact has been more profound than that of aviation in developing nations. While the issue has been covered a number of times in the case of pilots – equally pressing is that which has brought upheaval to the maintenance sector. For quite some time now the loss of skilled maintenance technicians in developing nations has generated not merely ashortage in local markets, but posed alarming issues for air safety. As the loss of qualified technicians to more prosperous regions takes hold, air operators from as far afield as Sub-Saharan Africa, SE Asia and Central America are struggling to find the necessary technicians to meet their daily operational demands. In order to abate this issue, a closer look at skill retention strategies is vital. Low pay, poor conditions and protractedefforts to improve the status quo are routinely cited as reasons for the increasing shift of skilled technicians to other regions – in particular the Middle East and Asia-Pacific. For instance, Gulf airlines have shaped a wide pool of expat technicians, offering competitive salaries, tax- exemption and free accommodation, which by and large cannot be matched by airlines based in developing economies.

Succession, when African leaders die'

In-depth Analysis: March 18, 2013: In December 2008, a Guinean newspaper published a photo of a frail and ailing President Lansana Conté,who appeared to be struggling to stand up. The photo stoked rumours of the president's ill health. By the next day, on the instructions of security operatives, the publication's front page carried an even bigger photo of Mr. Conté — this time smiling broadly and looking spirited. But he died just a week later, justifying the newspaper's initial resolve to let Guineansknow that his health was failing. The head of the National Assembly, Aboubacar Somparé, later explained that leaders hid the president's "physical suffering in order to give happiness to Guinea." Mr. Somparé's clumsy explanation implied a need to avoid succession squabbles and potential violence. Yet six hours after the president's death was officially announced, the army staged a coup, suspended the constitution and threw the West African nation into political turmoil.

While Guinea's military, after a period of chaos and yet another coup, eventually organised democratic elections, the muddled aftermath of Conté's death draws attention to the broader issue of how African nations manage successions when their leaders die in service. Ten of the 13 worldleaders who have died in office since 2009 were African. In 2012 alone, presidents Malam Bacai Sanha of Guinea-Bissau, John Atta Mills of Ghana and Bingu wa Mutharika of Malawi, as well as Prime Minister Meles Zenawiof Ethiopia, have all died. Some countries have handled succession better than others. As chaotic as they were, the developments in Guinea were not as dire as the more recent situation in Guinea-Bissau. Since PresidentSanha died in January from an illness, the country has been embroiled in an ongoing transition crisis, with the military mostly controlling the affairsof state.

Malawi, on the other hand, had a relatively successful transition after 78-year-old President Mutharika's fatal heart attack in April. But the processcould have gone off the rails when some cabinet members tried to have the late president's younger brother, Foreign Minister Peter Mutharika, sworn in, instead of Joyce Banda, the vice-president and constitutionally designated successor. This effort followed the late president's expulsion ofMs. Banda from the ruling party to pave the way for his brother. Many Malawians agitated against any deviation from the constitution, supportedby donors, including a strong message from the US State Department: "We trust that the vice-president, who is next in line, will be sworn in shortly." And she soon was.

It is important to avoid such succession problems, argues Tesfaye Habisso, an Ethiopian writer and former diplomat. "Stability, predictabilityand continuity in leadership are important ingredients of good governanceand are assured by a well-planned and -managed succession strategy."Most African countries' constitutions specify that when a leader dies in office, his or her deputy or the head of the national assembly will step in until an election can be held. Some leaders, however, expect the designated "heir apparent" to display fawning personal loyalty. If he or she does not, political conflict can arise. In Nigeria, for example, Vice- President Atiku Abubakar had a frosty relationship with then President Olusegun Obasanjo, who wasted no time arranging Mr. Abubakar's expulsion from the ruling party. Some African leaders have groomed relatives as successors. When President Omar Bongo of Gabon died in 2009, the ruling party named his son, Ali Bongo Ondima, who was foreignand defence minister, as the new president. Presidents Faure Gnassingbé of Togo and Joseph Kabila of the Democratic Republic of the Congo succeeded their deceased fathers.

Yet picking a relative can spark a revolt, as was the case of Egypt, where President Hosni Mubarak's intention to install his son as his successor added to the opposition that erupted in the revolution of early 2011. In Burkina Faso, indications that President Blaise Compaoré may be grooming his younger brother, François, as a successor have stirred considerable controversy. Constitutions should be followed strictly when apresident or prime minister dies, says Adewalo Banjo, an expert in Africandevelopment. Without the rule of law, he argues, there can be "constitutional somersaults which bear all the hallmarks of what ridicules Africa before the world." The rule of law certainly prevailed in Ghana afterPresident John Atta Mills died in July. Unlike in Malawi, there was never any doubt as to who should take charge. Vice-President John Dramane Mahama took over the mantle of leadership in line with constitutional requirements and promptly rallied a distressed nation. Ghana's seamless transition reflected the strength of its democratic system, in which ruling parties have twice handed over power to the opposition, after electoral defeats in 2000 and 2008. Nevertheless, while a strong democratic tradition can facilitate smooth successions, considerations of political power may get in the way.

When Nigeria's Umaru Musa Yar'Adua died in May 2010, some Nigeriansdemanded that another northerner be sworn in instead of Vice-PresidentGoodluck Jonathan, a southerner. Mr. Jonathan eventually prevailed.

Following the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi in August, the succession process in Ethiopia was also successful despite initial hitches. There had been speculation that Mr. Meles' deputy, Hailemariam Desalegn, although a member of the ruling circle, could not be trusted with power. This was because he did not belong to the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF), a former militant group once led by the late primeminister and still a powerful faction within the ruling party.

EPRDF - No Identity and No Vision – Ginbot 7'

PRESS RELEASE: (March 28, 2013) For the past twenty one years, the Tigray People Liberation Front (TPLF) that has no mandate to rule Ethiopiahas actually ruled Ethiopia with iron fist dashing on the Trojan horse, the EPRDF (Ethiopian People Revolutionary Democratic Front). The EPRDF, a political front; composed of a hodgepodge of ethnically assembled organizations, is a hollow group of ethnic demagogues created by its late leader to materialize his lifelong fragmentation of Ethiopia dream of dividing Ethiopia along ethnic lines. Ironically, the EPRDF that blatantly boasts to have averted the disintegration of Ethiopia, firmly stood up to the dreams of its creator and augmented the, the very country it calls home.

On Saturday March 23, 2013, the EPRDF started its 9th and possibly what could be its last congress with an embarrassing; and to the vast majority of Ethiopians with a pointless theme of – "The Thoughts of Meles". In fact,if there is one good cause served by the 9th EPRDF congress, it should be that, the Trojan horse EPRDF proved to the Ethiopian people that it is a party in existence with a borrowed identity that rules over a nation of ninety million people with a dead vision of a deceased man. The EPRDF is a party that lives in the past, failed to cease the moment and has no vision for the future.

The four-day congress that ended on Tuesday came to an end with exactlythe same hollowness that it started. To the surprise of its own members and diehard supporters, the four -day congress looked like much of a eulogy of a man (dead for seven months) than an occasion to map a vision for Ethiopia's future. Despite all indications of the nation's chronic problems of ethnic conflict, poverty, human rights abuse, deteriorating living conditions, and alarming outflow of skilled manpower, the EPRDF vowed to extend its grip on power and carry on the same old failed policies of the past. All in all, the handmade toy, the EPRDF, shamelessly told the Ethiopian people that it has no vision of its own and nothing new on its plate.

The Al-Amoudi groups of companies in Ethiopia as of March-2013'

Updates: Group of companies listed below are owned by the Ethio-Saudi wealthy man Shekh Mohammed Hussein Al-Amoudi. These 40 companies are currently busy promoting investment in partnership with othercounterparts here below the list of companies and affiliates, Addis Gas and Plastics Factory PLC, Addis Home Depot PLC, Addis International Catering PL, Blue Nile P.P. & Craft Paper Bags ManufacturingPLC, Cabey PLC, Daylight Applied Technologies PLC, East West Ethio Transport PLC, Elfora Agro-Industries PLC Lame Dairy PLC, Mamco Paper Products Factory PLC, Midroc Construction Ethiopia PLC, Midroc Energy House Electro-Mechanical Services PLC, MIDROC Ethiopia PLC, Midroc Ethiopia Tecnology Group PLC, Midroc Foundation Specialist PLC, Midroc Gold Mine, Modern Building Industries PLC, Moha Soft Drinks Industry SC,Mugad Travel PLC, National Mining Corp., National Motors Corporation PLC, National Oil Ethiopia PLC (NOC), Pharmacure PLC, Rainbow ExclusiveCar Rental and Tour Services PL, Salam Health Care PLC, Sheraton Addis, Star Soap and Detergent Industries PLC, Summit Engineered PLC, Trans Nation Airways PLC, Trust Protection & Personnel Services PLC, United Auto Maintenance Services PLC, Unity University PLC, Unlimited PackagingPLC, Wanza Furnishing Industries PLC, Equatorial Business Group PLC (EBG), Ethio Agri-Ceft PLC, Ethio Leather Industry PLC (ELICO) Huda RealEstate PLC, Kebire Enterprise PLC, Kombolcha Steel Products Industries PLC (KOSPI).

New Life Sharing excitement of Ethiopian aliyah'

Opinion: Members of Israel, Overseas Committee of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto greet 240 new immigrants at Ben-Gurion Airport Jewry'sfinest hour." Despite the enthusiasm, not all media reports were necessarily positive. Several media outlets in Ethiopia wrote that Aynaw'swin was particularly exciting in light of the fact that Ethiopian immigrantssuffer from discrimination in Israel and sometimes experience hostility.

Beauty in thought:

YnetNews said that the crowning of an Ethiopian immigrant as Miss Israel had created great media interest. "The social networks are full of reports about the win. The Ethiopians feel it is their accomplishment too. This is the Ethiopian Full story: The Embassy is also initiating an unusual move: Sending a text message to every cell phone in Ethiopia to announce the crowning of an Ethiopian beauty queen in Israel. In addition, the Embassyintends on inviting Aynaw to the traditional Independence Day reception as the guest of honor from Israel. The Embassy is also marketing the victory of Ethiopian athletes in the Jerusalem marathon – with another positive reference to Israel. Israeli Ambassador to Ethiopia Belaynesh Zevadia, who set a precedent herself by becoming the first Israeli ambassador of Ethiopian descent, said: "I welcome the selection of a beautiful girl of Ethiopian descent. "It's heartwarming to see Israel and the world exposed to the beauty of the Ethiopian community in Israel. It is a beautiful community in every sense of the word." Israel's DeputyAmbassador to Ethiopia Leo Vinovezky told. David Shear

Human Rights In Ethiopia: Meeting Public Expectation'

Ethiopian Human Rights Commission (EHRC) and the Institute of Ombudsmen (IoO) have been founded under federal proclamation number211/2000. The National human rights institutions (NHRIs) are administrative bodies set up to protect or monitor human rights in a givencountry. The growth of such bodies has been encouraged by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) which has provided advisory and support services, and facilitated access for NHRIs to the UN treaty bodies and other committees. There are over 100 such institutions, about two-thirds assessed by peer review as compliant with the United Nations standards set out in the Paris Principles.

Compliance with the Principles is the basis for accreditation at the UN, which, uniquely for NHRIs, is not conducted directly by a UN body but by asub-committee of the International Coordinating Committee of National Human Rights Institutions (ICC). Institutions accredited by the ICC with 'Astatus', meaning full compliance with the Paris Principles, enjoy much greater access to UN human rights treaty bodies and other organs. The secretariat to the review process (for initial accreditation, and reaccreditation every five years) is provided by the National Institutions and Regional Mechanisms Section of the OHCHR.

NHRIs can be grouped together in two broad categories: human rights commissions and ombudsmen. While most ombudsman agencies have their powers vested in a single person, human rights commissions are multi-member committees, often representative of various social groups and political tendencies. They are sometimes set up to deal with specific issues such as discrimination, although some are bodies with very broad responsibilities. Specialised national institutions exist in many countries toprotect the rights of a particular vulnerable group such as ethnic and linguistic minorities, indigenous peoples, children, refugees or women..

However, in general terms national human rights institution have an explicit and specific human rights mandate and a broader mandate, whichcould include research, documentation and training and education in human rights issues, than the classical ombudsman model which tends towork on handling complaints about administrative deficiencies. While all human rights violations are maladministration, only a small proportion of the workload of an ombudsman deals with violations of human rights standards. In most countries, a constitution, a human rights act or institution-specific legislation will provide for the establishment of a national human rights institution. The degree of independence of these institutions depends upon national law, and best practice requires a constitutional or statutory basis rather than (for example) a presidential decree. Nations human rights institutions are also referred to by the

Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action and the Convention on theRights of Persons with Disabilities

Lucy’s Ancient Skeletal Remains Will Return To Ethiopia After April 28'

Updates: The world's most famous fossil was named after a Beatles song."Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds" was playing on a tape recorder in 1974 as scientists celebrated the discovery in Ethiopia of a remarkably intact, ancient hominid skeleton. At 3.2 million years old, Australopithecus afarensis, as it became known scientifically, was the oldest hominin remains discovered at the time. American paleoanthropologist Donald Johanson and his colleagues nicknamed their find "Lucy," after the 1967 tune by John Lennon and Paul McCartney. The nickname stuck. Through April 28, the Bowers Museum in Santa Ana is presenting "Lucy's Legacy: The Hidden Treasure of Ethiopia." The exhibition includes the ancient Lucyskeleton, of which 40 percent has been preserved. She remains the oldestand most complete adult human ancestor retrieved from African soil. "Ourmission is to bring the world's most important arts and culture to California," said Peter C. Keller, president of the Bowers. "When you get down to the basics of human origins, there's no more important piece than the oldest complete human, or human ancestry remains, than Lucy."The exhibit also features replicas of Lucy's skull, what she would have looked like alive, maps, time tables and explanations of human evolution,plus precious cultural objects from Ethiopia.

The exhibition was organized by the Houston Museum of Natural Science, in collaboration with Ethiopia's Ministry of Culture and Tourism. "Lucy's Legacy" was on display in Houston from August 2007 to September 2008,then traveled to Seattle and New York City. Lucy returned to the Houston Museum of Natural Science, where her remains were kept in storage for about four years. Thus, the Bowers waited for about five years to present this show. "I think the Ethiopians thought it was time to let it rest," Keller said. "Frankly, the rumor was that the Americans stole Lucy and she's never coming back. And, of course, anyone in government there knew that that was not the case." Recently, Ethiopia expressed a desire to bringLucy back, particularly so an exhibit at the National Museum of Ethiopia in Addis Ababa could coincide with the African Union's next meeting in May. So the Bowers show will be the last chance for people outside of Africa to see the famous and important fossil. "Lucy is our ambassador of good will," said Amin Abdulkadir, Ethiopia's minister of culture and tourism. "Lucy is our icon. She helps build the image of our country. It's very goodin terms of trade, investment and tourism." The Bowers exhibit showcasesLucy's remains in an airtight, bulletproof glass case. A backlit text panel says Australopithecus afarensis means "southern ape from the Afar region." When she was alive 3.2 million years ago, she measured 3 ½ feettall and weighed 60-65 pounds.

Nearby, a hairy model of Lucy demonstrates that she may have looked more like an ape or chimp than a 21st century human being. Her jaw protrudes like a gorilla's, yet her body shape and ability to walk bipedally on her legs do share some strong characteristics with people. Other displays explain human evolution over the centuries, comparisons of human versus ape and chimpanzee anatomy, and Australopithecus afarensis' distant connections to Homo sapiens. A case contains prehistoric tools hominins probably used for food and shelter, and anotherdisplay explains various dating techniques, including the argon-argon radiometric dating of volcanic ash used to estimate Lucy's age. "By looking at Lucy, you can actually look at how we became who we are today through the process of evolution," said Zeray Alemseged, senior curator of anthropology at the California Academy of Sciences in San Francisco. "Being dated around 3.2 million years old, she is halfway between the common ancestor of humans and apes today. So, she has played a pivotal role, not only in our understanding of the very first upright walking species, but also as a comparative model." Since Lucy's discovery, older hominin fossils have been found, some as ancient as 6 million years. In 2000, Alemseged himself discovered a skeleton older than Lucy, another Australopithecus afarensis about 3.3 million years old.Alemseged's discovery has been nicknamed "Selam," or "Lucy's child." However, despite subsequent discoveries, Lucy remains critically important. "Whenever you find a specimen now," Alemseged said, "you'll say it's older than Lucy. It's younger than Lucy. Shorter than Lucy. Taller than Lucy. So Lucy is basically a benchmark in the history of human evolution."

LUCY IN THE SCHOOLS: Most California school kids encounter Lucy in sixth grade. That's when human evolution is discussed in the state curriculum, usually in science classes. The Bowers is finalizing a teacher's guide to help instructors lead discussions about Lucy and aid in field trips to see her in person. The guide should be online next week at bowers.org/learn. Nancy Warzer-Brady, vice president of education at theBowers, said screenings of several Lucy-related films are also planned, along with lectures and scholarships for tours, art classes and transportation. "It's a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to see Lucy and havescience and history come alive because when the exhibition closes, Lucy will go back to Ethiopia and rest in her home," Warzer-Brady said. "It could be transforming to a young person who is interested in the sciences.It helps answer the question: Who am I?" Many adults may be asking thatquestion – and finding answers – as well.

Addressing abusive issues in reasonable manner’

Ato Obang Metho is widely recognized as a campaigner against ethnic division under the motto:“Humanity before ethnicity”and “no one is freeuntil all are free”. As Obang Metho, rights abuse, torture and cruel treatment of Ethiopians working in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia are not ground shaking breaking news; However, when such degrading and despicable videos once surfaced, it should cause everyone to pause and take a stand. The absolute lack of indifference shown by those committingthe torture and those standing around, indicates such behavior is a normaloccurrence. At Solidarity Movement for New Ethiopia (SMNE), we strongly believe "No one is free, until all are free"; and as such we are asking everyone to sign such petition and let your voices be heard. The kingdom of Saudi Arabia claims to be led by the principles of Islam and yet continues to allow its citizens and police to treat Ethiopians like animals.

Is this how Islam teaches to treat the poor? This abhorrent behavior cannot be tolerated. It should incense our sense of fairness and cause us to act as compassionate human beings. Let's put humanity before ethnicity or race and say loudly, "This type of behavior cannot be toleratedin this day and age!". What if these being tortured were Americans or British? Experience has taught us the reaction would have been completely different. We cannot afford to put a lesser value on any humanbeing just because of their socio-economic status. We are all children of God and our lives should be of equal worth.

Line of succession to the former Ethiopian throne'

We-Mezekir: The line of succession to the throne is described in the first section of the 1955 Revised Constitution of Ethiopia. Traditionally the succession was limited to descendants of Makeda Queen of Sheba and King Solomon of the Israelites. The 1931 and 1955 Constitutions formallyestablished a legal order of succession that placed the Imperial throne in the reigning Shewan branch of the Imperial dynasty, giving precidence tothe line of Emperor Haile Selassie I. In brief, the title of Emperor may pass only through male descendants of HIM Haile Selassie I, through the oldest male line before the younger. Other qualifications are that they be born in lawful wedlock, be an Orthodox Christian, and not be married to a foreigner or against consent of the Imperial Family. In the event that there were no qualifying male descendants of Haile Selassie I, the nearestmale relative who is descended from Sahle Selassie, King of Shoa state, would then be heir. According to most interpretations this would place thethrone in line of Emperor Haile Selassie's brother Dejazmatch Yilma Makonnen, followed by the family of his cousin Ras Imiru Haile Selassie.

In March 1975, the monarchy was abolished by the Duerg, the military junta that had forcibly taken over during a Communist revolution. The Duerg by its own authority abolished all royal and noble titles by proclamation at that time. The current Constitution of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia makes no provisions for a monarchy. The Crown Council of Ethiopia considers Crown Prince Zera Yacob Amha Selassie to be Head of the Imperial House. Although the current Ethiopiangovernment regards members of the Imperial family as private citizens, they do recognize their royal and noble titles as a matter of courtesy, effectively rescinding the abolition of those titles by Duerg regime. Foreign royal courts have continued to accord members of the Ethiopian Imperialfamily their titles throughout the period following the fall of the Ethiopianmonarchy in 1974.

IMPERIAL ETHIOPIA - The Line of Succession:

According to the 1955 orders of succession and with the assent of the Imperial Crown Council, the current order of succession among the living male descendants of HIM Haile Selassie I is as follows: HRH Crown PrinceZera Yacob b. 1953 (son of Amha Selassie I, grandson of Haile Selassie I)

HRH Prince Paul Wossen-Seged Makonnen Haile selassie, 2nd Duke ofHarrar b. 1947 (grandson of HIM Haile Selassie I)

HRH Prince Mikael Amde Yesus Makonnen Haile Selassie b. 1950(grandson of HIM Haile Selassie I)

HRH Prince Yokshan Dawit (Makonnen) Makonnen Haile Selassie b. 1978(great-grandson of HIM Haile Selassie I)

HRH Prince Joel Dawit Makonnen Haile Selassie b. 1982 (great-grandsonof HIM Haile Selassie I)

HRH Prince Philip Taffari Makonnen Haile Selassie b. 1954 (grandson ofHIM Haile Selassie I)

HRH Prince David Taffari Makonnen haile Selassie b.1992 son of PrincePhilip Makonnen (great-grandson of HIM Haile Selassie I)

HRH Prince Issaias Taffari Makonnen Haile Selassie b.1998 son of PrincePhilip Makonnen Haile Selassie (great-grandson of HIM Haile Selassie I)

HRH Prince Baeda Maryam Makonnen Haile Selassie b. 1957 (grandson ofHIM Haile Selassie I)

HRH Prince Ermias Sahle Selassie Hailie Selassie b. 1960 (grandson ofHIM Haile Selassie I)

HRH Prince Christian Ermias Sahle Selassie Haile Selassie b. 1992 (great-grandson of HIM Haile Selassie I)

HRH Prince Rufael Fiseha-Tsion Ermias Sahle selassie Haile Selassie b.1992 (great-grandson of HIM Haile Selassie I) Text ends ..

The abject living condition of Ethiopians stranded in Saudi Arabia'

It's realy shocking. Any one who says Ethiopia's economy is growing mustbe grossly and hopelessly stupid, unless he/she is a member of the rulingparty whose forced these young Ethiopians to flee their country. Innocent civilians will suffer more as long as such irresponsible leaders stay at thehelm.

Source: ER

Science: The Sugar Busters Diet Decoded: Foods You Can Eat for WeightLoss'

Revelation - Sugar: it seems so harmless, and yet sugar has given Americans problems for decades. How can one tiny, tasty crystal cause somuch trouble? That is what the experts who have designed the sugar busters diet have set out to discover. Sugar is present in many, many foods that we eat on a daily basis. Sugar, a carbohydrate, is quickly converted into fat if it is not burned off through cardiovascular activity. Inorder to lose weight, sugar is one of the first things that must be either drastically cut back or cut out completely. The sugar busters diet can helpdieters to accomplish this feat.

Sugar Busters Diet: What Is It? The truth about dieting is one that may shock seasoned dieters: low-fat choices are often the biggest culprits ofweight gain. Why do low-fat foods cause dieters to balloon up to their previous weights? The answer, in short, is sugar. Because fat provides agood taste to the foods we eat, low-fat foods are often loaded up with sugars to mask the “emptiness” of their taste. If you are serious about weight loss, you have to begin by cutting out sugar from your eating regimen. On the sugar busters diet, here are some foods which you caneat without worry:

Vegetables: Vegetables are your closest ally with this diet. Eat all the vegetables you want. Raw, of course, is better, but you can eat frozen orcanned vegetables as well. Avoid pickled vegetables with a high sugar content and watch out for starchy beans which can inhibit weight loss.

Whole Wheat Products: If you love bread, pasta, or tacos, you may find yourself frustrated with weight loss. White bread and pasta is made from enriched flour which is loaded with sugar. Change all your wheat productsto whole wheat and you will see immediate results.

Lean Meats and Eggs: Any diet that does not include protein should be immediately disregarded as unhealthy. We need protein to survive. Be sure to include lots of lean meats and eggs in this diet. If you are concerned about cholesterol, only consume the white of an egg, not theyolk.

Sweeteners: If you just can’t ignore that persistent sweet tooth, considera low-calorie, sugar-free sweetening substitute. These sweeteners can beconsumed on the sugar busters diet in moderation.

Widowed Azeb Mesfin told EPRDF delegates her late husband's monthly salary was only $250 a month' Azeb Mesfin nicknamed 'the mother of corruption' said that with a straight face to the 2,000 delegates who went to Bahr Dar to participate in the ruling party's congress. The amazing thing is there are some fools who believed that. The amount she claimed, 4,000 birr (about USD$250) per-month. It has to be recalled that the widowed Azeb Mesfin has recently being displeased to see the eulogy of Meles Zenawi incompleted. It's a bit amazing for her to preach the world how good her husband was. Let history judge or witnesses him. Accordingto sources, Azeb Mesfin nicknamed as the 'Mother of Corruption', who is currently campaigning to become the mayor of Addis Ababa, has also been observed at the conference lavishing the EPRDF delegates in Bahr Dar with lots of gifts. Azeb elected to the political bureau of the TPLF for the second time and to the all too powerful Executive Committee of the EPRDF, which she uses to clinch on to the power ladder. She knows that all those who were listening to her do not have the courage to challenge her, because they all lost their moral authority. If these people can speak their mind and tell her the truth, she would not have told that way. There will be a day she has to explain about her role in looting the wealth of the nation, according to sources. Professor A. P. J. Abdul Kalam, the renownedIndian scientist ("Missile Man of India") and the Eleventh President of India (2002-2007) quoted as saying, "If a country is to be corruption free and becomes a nation of beautiful minds, I strongly feel there are three key societal members who can make a difference. They are the father, themother and the teacher."

Ethiopia and the ethnic-based politics'

Opinion: By Teklu Abate - According to the National Electoral Board of Ethiopia, there are 79 political parties registered under Proclamation No573/2008. Of these, only 29% have country-wide (national) identity whereas 71% are regional parties that are organized around ethnic lines. Of those parties dubbed to have national outreach, some such as All Amhara People's Organization (AAPO), Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Front (EPRDF), Geda System Advancement Party, Oromo Federalist Democratic Movement, and All Oromo People Democratic Party do actuallyhave, as their names indicate, ethnicity as their organizing logic. Several armed groups and parties are also following suit. Stated simply, Ethiopian politics is heavily smeared with ethnicism. On average, each nationality (ethnic group) has got its own political party.

That means, the political philosophy of the EPRDF (ethnic federalism) seems to have gotten popularity from the opposition. By necessity, affinity, and/or rhetoric, the majority of opposition political parties make ethnicism their core. Meaning, ethnic federalism is what unifies EPRDF andthe opposition. Although the former has got the power/legitimation to enforce the ideology, the latter have been playing a no-less-than- important role in giving it real life. Some people tend to mistakenly trace the commencement of ethnic politics in Ethiopia to the political participation of the late Professor and accomplished surgeon Asrat Woldeyes. Following the ratification of the FDRE Constitution and in response to the rampant persecution and mass killing of the Amharas, which is still the reality, Prof Asrat was ‘forced’ to form the All Amhara Peoples Organization (AAPO). Although the party was technically formed as ‘fire fighter’ to fight all the injustices made against the Amharas, the party was tasked to demand and safeguard freedom and democracy at thenational level. In fact, Professor Asrat’s public speeches, some of which are available on YouTube, aimed at ensuring national unity, peace, and freedom. From the beginning, it was only the great surgeon who opposed the endorsement of the Constitution on the grounds that it undermined Ethiopia’s interest as an independent and unified nation. From that point onwards, Asrat attracted a lot of negative energy from the ruling party.

Despite all the odds that happened to him (e.g. he was fired from Addis Ababa University), Asrat intensified his struggle for the freedom of the poor. His formation of the AAPO was not in support of ethnic politics but was an immediate reaction to the massacre of the Amharas. Had Asrat been allowd to lead his life and career, we would have seen the immediate‘translation’ of the AAPO into a national party. Ethnic politics in reality has its roots in the now Tigray People’s LiberationFront (TPLF). The founders of this party happened to champion the interest of the Tigray people. After the 17 year protracted war with the Derg, with strong support from the West and with a little bit of luck, theymanaged to emerge victorious. At the eve of the victory, ‘sister’ political parties were formed representing major ethnic groups such as the Amharas, Oromos, and lately the Southern Nationalities. That fabric metamorphosed into ethnic federalism, which defines current Ethiopian politics. Consequently, the creator and God father of ethnic politics in Ethiopia must be the ruling party. The majority of the opposition political parties just contributed to draw its huge public face- they played a legitimating role. But what is an important question is not who started it but what unwanted consequences are there in relation to ethnic politics.

Source; Ethiomedia (April 5, 2013)

The Dramatic History of Addis Ababa: A Railway Terminal Linking the Capital to the Coast and to the Interior’ Wemezekir: By Professor RichardPankhurst - Addis Ababa owed much of its importance to its geographicalposition on the Horn of Africa, and, in particular, to its relative ease of access to and from the French-occupied Gulf of Aden Port of Jibuti, whichhandled a significant portion of Red Sea and Indian Ocean trade. It was indeed on account of this access that Menilek granted his first railway concession on 11 February 1893. It was very different in scope from the line which eventually emerged. It envisaged the establishment – and thegrant to Menilek’s Swiss technical aide and diplomatic adviser Alfred Ilg -of a 99 year monopoly for a railway, conceived as operating on three separate but related stretches of line: The first was to run from the French-administered port of Jibuti to Harar, along the principal commercialcentre of eastern Ethiopia. The second stretch was to go from Harar to Entoto, the country's former capital which had only been replaced as capital by Addis Ababa a few years earlier. The third stretch was to go from Entoto to the White Nile, which Menilek then claimed as his Western frontier.

The significance of three of the above six names changed materially in thenext few years. The age-old commercial town of Harar was thus soon eclipsed by Dire Dawa, itself a child of the railway. Entoto, as we have seen in an earlier article, was replaced as the Ethiopian capital by Addis Ababa – and the unfolding of the European Scramble for Africa resulted in Menilek abandoning his claim to the White Nile. Since the railway was to operate outside Menilek's domains, in territory recognised as part of the French Protectorate, it was understood from the outset that the French authorities would grant a kind of supplementary concession to cover the railway's operations in French colonial territory. Ethiopia's independence was then, however, not universally accepted, this being the time when Italy claimed a Protectorate over the entire country on the basis of Article 17 of the much contested Wechale Treaty of 2 May 1889. This impasse was overcome by Menilek's victory at Adwa on 1 March 1896 after which the French Government, with remarkable promptitude, granted permissionon 27 April 1896 for the railway to operate across French colonial territory. The granting of these and several other concessions and letters, which are outside the scope of the present article, facilitated and coincidedwith a significant growth in Jibuti's commercial contacts with the Ethiopianinterior, and most significantly, with Addis Ababa.

Construction work on the railway began in October 1897, with the erectionof the Jibuti railway station, offices, stores, staff-housing, and other buildings. This coincided with the shipping in of rails, sleepers, telegraph poles and cement. The sleepers, sometimes referred to in the trade as Menileks, were for reasons of economy no more than a metre long – and were -unusually - made of iron to protect them from being eaten by termites. There was also a large influx of both skilled and unskilled labour,from many countries. This included local Oromos, Afars and Somalis , as well as Arabs, Armenians and Indians, besides Europeans: Greeks, Italians, and Frenchmen. Many transport camels were also acquired.

Building operations meanwhile continued fairly steadily until the end of thecentury when it became apparent that the railway company was facing acute financial difficulties. This led the French Government taking over theline in 1902. Construction work was then temporally suspended, but the Ethiopian ownership of the project was later re-affirmed in a second Railway Concession which Menilek granted to his personal physician, a well-known medic, Dr Vitalian from Guadeloupe, on 30 January 1908.

Trade on the railway, previously by camel, consisted largely of the exportfrom Ethiopia of ivory, coffee and hides and skins; and the import of textiles, clothing and other manufactured goods, including fire-arms, with which Menilek was enabled to maintain his country's independence. Such trade was sometimes carried out by rail as well as by camel or other beastof burden. This was most notably the case after the railway reached Adama which was within easy access of Addis Ababa. Ethiopian and other entrepreneurs took advantage of the capital's proximity to make use of the railway as far as it went at any particular time – and supplemented it with a two-way transport service based on horse-drawn trucks. These once again transported articles to and from Addis Ababa which would havebeen impossible to handle without the help of wheels.

The value of the railway - and its superiority over the camel transport which it steadily superseded – can be seen in several directions. Firstly, and perhaps most importantly, the coming of the railway resulted in greatly increased speed – and safety - of transport. This led in turn to a significant expansion in the number of passengers, which, continued to increase, e.g. from 20,560 in 1915 to 194,030 in 1930. Secondly, the railway kept its clients in close telegraphic contact with the outside world. This enabled merchants in the Ethiopian interior to keep abreast of financial developments in Aden, Bombay, Cairo and elsewhere. Such information was particularly useful when the country's silver currency (notably that based on the Maria Theresa thaler) was subject to much speculation. A no less significant advantage of the railway lay in its ability to transport heavy, cumbersome and perishable goods. Prominent in this category was corrugated iron sheeting and all kinds of heavy machinery, including railway equipment, which could not be carried by camel or mule.Such articles therefore appeared on the Ethiopian scene only after the railway's arrival in Dire Dawa in 1902. All this led to a steady expansion oftrade, which continued to rise during the first years of the railway's operations. Exports thus rose from 10,885 tons in 1910 to 24,450 in 1930, and imports from 17,431 tons in 1915 and 42,162 in 1930. (Text ends)

In Memory the 40th Anniversary of It's foundation'

HISTORY: The History of Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), and the Oromos struggle for self-determination In Ethiopia. The OLF is an organization founded by Oromo nationalists to promote self-determination for the Oromo people against what they call "Abyssinian colonial rule". The Oromo Liberation Front [OLF] known in afan-Oromo as "Adda bilisummaa oromoo (ABO)" is a political organization that is struggling for the realization of the national self-determination for the Oromo people and establishment of independent state of Oromia. Actively ingaged in ethnic- separatism mainly in Ethiopia, additionally Somalia and Kenya. It has been outlawed by previous governments for decades.

After a grave internalcrisis that puts all the OLF members and supporters in a split, and the OLF itself to a weakening position, the OLF have once again declares in 2001 to 2005 the establishment of an Interim Arrangement of the OromoLiberation Front(IA-OLF).

The Oromo make up a significant portion of the population occupying the Horn of Africa. In the Ethiopian Empire alone, Oromo constitute about 33 million of the 65 million inhabitants of the Ethiopian Empire. During their long history, the Oromo developed their own cultural, social and political system known as the Gadaa system. It is a uniquely democratic political and social institution that governed the life of every individual in the society from birth to death. The land tenants had always been forced to share their production with those unproductive segments of the society known as "the landlords" without compensation when the Duerg was celebrating the formation of Commission to Organize the Party of the Working Party of Ethiopia (COPWE) in the Grand Congress Hall. Ras Taffaricontinued the same policy and turned the whole population into serfs that had no right to leave the land and were considered property of the new horde of settlers they called Nafxanyaa. He also made a good portion of most fertile Oromo land private property of his family that he called “Bete-Rist”.

For the peoples of Egypt, the Sudan and Somalia, life would be impossiblewithout Nile rivers. They carry millions of tons of rich soil to Egypt, the Sudan and Somalia every year. Somalia depends heavily on the Gannaallee (Juba) and Waabee (Shaballe) rivers, which come from Ethiopia. Ethiopia supplies almost 100 per-cent of the fresh water for Somalia and Djibouti. At present the Ethiopian government depends heavily on Awash in local oromos known as "Hawas" water as a source of electric power for its industries and irrigation water to grow sugar cane, cotton and fruits. The Wonji and Matahara sugar estates are good examples. There is a great potential in all these rivers for the production of electric power and for irrigation. Qoqaa, Fincha, Malkaa Waakkenna, Gibee-Tiqqaa, Gibe II, dams are exam ples of where hydro-electric poweris already being produced or in the process of being harnessed. Among the the lakes are Tanna, Abbaya, Langanno and Shalla. Many of these lakes possess a great variety of fish and birds on their islands and shores.

The Oromo are one of the Kushitic speaking groups of people with variations in colour and physical characteristics ranging from Hamitic to Nilotic. A brief look at the early history of some of the peoples who haveoccupied north-eastern Africa sheds some light on the ethnic origin of Oromo. The Cushitic speakers have inhabited north-eastern and easternAfrica for as long as recorded history. The land of Kush, Nubia or the ancient Ethiopia in middle and lower Nile is the home of the Cushitic speakers.

Social scientists of diverse backgrounds at different times have studied the Oromo Gadaa system. Many of them have testified that it is uniquely democratic.The history of the arrival of the Oromo people in the sixteenthcentury in East Africa from outside is a denial of historical facts. The so- called "Gala invasion of Ethiopia" is also a tale. It was first written around1590 by a monk called Bahrey and henceforth European historians and others almost invariably accepted this story as a fact. The recent discovery, (Lynch & Robbins, 1978), in northern Kenya of the pillars that Oromo used in the invention of their calendar system, dated around 300 B.C., is another indication that Oromo have a long history of presence as acommunity of people, in this part of Africa.

There follows a brief description of how the Gadaa system works: there are two well-defined ways of classifying male members of the society, thatis, the hiriyya (members of an age-set all born within the period of one Gadaa rule of eight years) and Gadaa grade. The Gadaa grades (stages ofdevelopment through which a Gadaa class passes) differ in number (7-1 1) and name in different parts of Oromia although the functions are the same. The following are the Gadaa grades:-

1. Dabballee (0-8 years of age)
2. Folle or Gamme Titiqaa (8-16 years of age)
3. Qondaaia or Gamme Gurgudaa (1 6-24 years of age)
4. Kuusa (24-32 years of age)
5. Raaba Doorii (32-40 years of age)
6. Gadaa (40-48 years of age)
7. Yuba I (48-56 years of age)
8. Yuba II (56-64 years of age)
9. Yuba III (64-72 years of age)
10. Gadamojjii (72-80 years of age)
11. Jaarsa (80 and above years of age)

The following are the Gadaa officials and their duties according to theTuullama Gadaa practice:

1. Abbaa Bokku - President
2. Abbaa Bokku - First Vice-President
3. Abbaa Bokku - Second Vice-President
4. Abbaa Chaffe - Chairman of the Assembly (Chaffe)
5. Abbaa Dubbi - Speaker who presents the decision of the presidium tothe Assembly

6. Abbaa Seera - Memoriser of the laws and the results of the Assembly'sdeliberations.
7. Abbaa Alanga - Judge who executes the decision
8. Abbaa Duula - In charge of the army
9. Abbaa Sa'a - In charge of the economy

Thus, the entire presidium consists of nine members, called "Salgan Yaa'iiBoranaa" (nine of the Borana assembly). The Abbaa Bokkus are the chief officials. (Bokku is a wooden or metal sceptre, a sign of authority kept bythe Abbaa Bokku, the president). The Abbaa Bokkus have counsellors andassistants called Hayyus who are delegated from the lower assemblies.

There are three level of assembly - inter-clan, clan and local chaffes, chaffe being the Oromo version of parliament. The chaffe assembly was held in the open air in a meadow under the odaa (sycamore) tree. The chaffe made and declared common laws and was source of the accumulated legal knowledge and customs. In the hierarchy of Gadaa chaffes, the assembly of the entire presidium of the ruling- Gadaa Class isthe highest body whose decision is final. It, is the assembly at which representatives of the entire population come together, at predetermined times, to evaluate among other things, the work of those in power. If those in power have failed to accomplish what is expected of them the assembly has the power to replace them by another group elected from among the same Gadaa class or Luba. And this was one of the methods ofchecking and balancing political power in the Oromo society. The second highest Gadaa assembly is the clan chaffe. It is from these assemblies that special delegates to the higher assembly are elected. The lowest Gadaa chaffe is the local chaffe. This is made up of local members of the Luba from among whom representatives to clan chaffes are elected. The holders of these responsible posts can remain in office for eight years only, in normal times, and are then replaced by a new group of officers. The power is handed over at a special ceremony at a special place and time. The office-holders conduct government - political, economic, social,ritual and military - affairs of the entire nation for this period. During wartime all capable men fight under the leadership of the group in office.

During the eight year period the officials live together in a village (yaa'aa village) and when necessary travel together. There are five Gadaas in a cycle of 40 years. If a man enters office (becomes Luba) now, his sons willbecome Luba 40 years from now. The five Gadaa (some times called Buttaa) in the cycle have names, which vary slightly from region to region. Among some Oromo communities the sets of five Gadaa names used by the sons are different from those of the fathers. Whereas among other communities the same set of Gadaa names are used for both fathersand sons. For instance the Gadaa practised in the Borana community usesthe following different sets of names for the five Gadaa (i.e. could be likened to five parties who take power in turns).

Fathers Sons

1. Birmajii Aldada
2. Melba Horota
3. Muudana Bifoole
4. Roobale Sabaqa
5. Duuioo Kiloolee

In this manner a given name repeats itself every 80 years. This is in fact the complete Gadaa cycle divided into two semi-cycles of 40 years each. The first 40 years is the Gadaa of the fathers and the second is the Gadaaof the sons. Although it is not known with any degree of certainty where and when the Gadaa system started, it is known and documented that theOromo have been practising it for well over 500 years. Recently archeologists found in northern Kenya (in 1978) the pillars that Oromo used in the invention of their calendar system, dated around 300 BC.

Some Facts About Oromos In Ethiopia

Language: Oromo, also called Afan Oromo or Oromiffa

Economy: Mainly agriculture (coffee, several crops, spices, vegetables)and animal husbandry; mining industry; tourism trade; medium and small-scale industries (textiles, refineries, meat packaging, etc)

Religions: Waaqqefata (the traditional belief in Waaqa or God), Islam,and Christian (Catholic, Orthodox and Protestant)

The Oromo make up a significant portion of the population occupying theHorn of Africa. In the Ethiopian Empire alone, Oromo constitute about ~50% inhabitants of the present Ethiopia.

Annexation: Oromo Liberation Frony (OLF) believes Oromos constituted topresent Ethiopia during the process of expansion, between 1870 and 1900

OLF Logo Description: A sycamore tree (odaa) is shown in the logo asa symbol of Oromo's egalitarian Gadaa system of governance, which is the guiding principle. The OLF actively ingaged in rebel ethnic-separatismuntil recently in Ethiopia based in the stateless Somalia and Kenya. It hasto be recalle that the OLF had been outlawed by previous Ethiopian governments for decades. (Text ends)

Despite tension, Ethiopia celebrated second GERD anniversary’

News Analysis: ADDIS ABABA: Ethiopia this week celebrated the second anniversary of the launching of Ethiopia celebrated second anniversary of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) construction project at the site. Deputy Prime Minister and Education Minister Demeke Mekonnen on the occasion said the Dam indicates the rebirth of ancient history and civilization of Ethiopia. Demeke, who is also President of the National Council for the Coordination of Public Participation in the construction of the Dam, said that the launching of the construction work demonstrates that Ethiopians are capable of accomplishing even what seems impossible.

He said construction of the Dam has brought about renewal of the ancientEthiopian history and civilization while attested the ongoing development in the country. So far, some one fourth of the required 80 billion birr has been secured for construction of the Dam, he said, adding the public havecarried out soil and water conservation activities, which helps to prevent silt from entering the dam. Water and Energy Minister Alemayehu Tegenuon his part said the project is well underway according to schedule. Alemayehu said the construction of the Dam indicates Ethiopia's effort to contribute in the fight against global climate change. Egypt and Sudan have both voiced concerns over the dam project, saying it will cut into their needed water allotment under historical treaties. Ethiopia argues thatthe dam project will not eat away at their northern Nile River partners, and this has been supported by international and local committees lookingat the water situation. Ethiopia's dam project has seen widespread criticism from Egypt, Sudan and now Saudi Arabia. Source: Bikya News byMohammad Awad (April 05, 2013)

Ethiopia: Bereket Simeon's Mother Lavish Funeral in Gondar'

Ethiopia's Deputy Prime minister Demeke Mekonen was among thousandsof mourners descended on the northern historic city of Gondar for the lavish funeral of the undisputed king maker Bereket Simeon's late mother.The old lady, said to be in her late 80s died in Bereket's mansion next to Tewodros square in Addis Ababa on March28 2013, after long battle with cancer. Before the funeral procession began, when a federal police marsh band attempted to march through the streets of the city playing the so- called liberation songs such as "Tigrai Adi Weyanay", "Tigrai land of bandits", a song regarded as profane and ethnocentric by many Ethiopians. Sensing trouble as angry crowd began to assemble the band was hurriedly removed from the streets. Source: The Horn Times April 8, 2013

'True Concern' To The Rescue of 'Koshe' Residents In western AddisAbaba'

Opinion: Three plastic manufacturers are preparing to buy waste directlyfrom Koshe area residents which would be recycled and used as raw material. Previously, these companies used to buy raw material from middlemen, who were the main beneficiaries from such deals. Oryx International, Techno Plastic Plc and Oxford Plastic Plc are all local companies, which have been buying waste plastic materials to be recycled and used. Oxford is working in conjunction with an Indian company.

Working in very close collaboration with the Kolfe Keraniyo Subcity, woreda 1, True Concern for community Development Association, a localnon-governmental organization formed by voluntary citizens from all walks of life, has taken the initiative to organize more than 120 women and form seven associations.

Besides lobbying these companies and persuading them to buy directly from these people, True Concern is providing trainings on entrepreneurship and recycling to residents to help them realize the importance of waste disposal and aid them in their interactions with thesecompanies. “Life has become better for these people, because from what they get from providing raw materials, they can buy what they need. But in the beginning, they never imagined that their life would change like this.” said Esayas Sutuma, Manager of the Association. Previously, waste used as raw material used to pass through more than three chains, he stated. But, by cutting the middlemen out, the residents have become themain beneficiaries and their income has increased fourfold, he asserted.

True Concern, which is funded by its members and through the donations of some generous Ethiopians, is established mainly to improve the social and economic situation of the residents of the area. “We have mainly beendoing three things,” he informed Capital. “We strive to improve the residents’ health. We teach them entrepreneurship and we at least help them to independently lead their lives.

According to the manager, this association has been furnishing medical and training services for the people around Koshe. “We had twice conducted medical campaigns and have provided more than 1,500 medications and performed surgeries,” he said. “Actually, our professionalmembers contribute what they can to help out, as we don’t receive any funding from foreign sources,” he claimed. The wastes are recycled and are used to make many things, including shoes, conduits and household materials. These people, who have been leading a subsistence life but nowhave a better future, have thanked everybody who contributed to their current success on Saturday March 9, 2013 at a thanksgiving ceremony they held at Koshe. From informal studies we conducted, there are about 200 companies who require raw material from Koshe. We are in fact approaching various companies in addition to the previous three.

According to the manager, about 50 percent Addis Ababa’s waste can berecycled. “Through our studies, we have come to know that there’s evenroom for exporting the processed waste,” he concluded. Source: CapitalApril 9, 2013

Over 80,000 Ethiopians Entered Yemen In 2012 – UNHCR’

(IRIN) – Record numbers of migrants from the Horn of Africa are crossinginto Yemen, most of them on their way to find better opportunities in Saudi Arabia and other rich Gulf countries. But many do not make it any further. Seeking a new life, they end up unwitting victims of a smuggling racket designed to exploit the migrants at each juncture of their journey. Recent years have seen Ethiopians make up the majority of these migrants: Of the 107,000 recorded migrants crossing the Red Sea/Gulf ofAden into Yemen in 2012, around 80,000 were from Ethiopia. Four irregular migrants with diverse backgrounds, all from Ethiopia, told IRIN about their journeys to Yemen.* While their stories differ in details, they all share a similar set of experiences: brutality, broken promises and extortion.

Ethiopia's Telecom Growth is Underestimated'

The use of Skype and Google talk are limited and tightly monitored in Ethiopia. Ethio-Telecom, formerly the Ethiopian Telecommunications Corporation (ETC) is the sole government controlled telecom. In contrast, Somalia offers some of the most technologically advanced and competitively priced telecommunications and internet services in the world. Somalia telecoms offer many services that are not even available throughout the continent. Customers can conduct money transfers such asthrough the popular Dahabshiil, other banking activities such via mobile phones, easily gain wireless Internet access, as well as other traditional way of transfer. There are over 20 telecom companies in Somalia and theyoffer the cheapest and clearest phone calls in Africa. There are presently around 25 mainlines per 1,000 persons, and the local availability of telephone lines (tele-density) is higher than in neighboring countries; three times greater than in adjacent Ethiopia. When you land in Somalia, travellers receive a free Sim card at the airport with small calling credit but you will need to recharge it and you can recharge with small fee like $.50 up to $100. As of 2012, Somalia has around 186 internet hosts.There were about 106,000 online users in the country in 2009.

African Land and Natural Resource Grabs Destroy Lives and Futures ofAfricans - SMNE'

'When the global food crisis of 2008 struck, with its food shortages, sky- rocketing food prices and widespread riots, it sounded an alarm that began the global race for fertile agricultural land, particularly land with access to water. Asian countries in the global south, like India, China, andSouth Korea, simply did not have enough unused, suitable land to meet the increasing need for food for their people. Some European countries were in the same position. Arid countries in the Middle East, like Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, and Kuwait, may have wealth from oil, but they were large importers of food and have little or diminishing arableland. Underground water aquifers were already being depleted in efforts to irrigate existing food crops. Soaring populations, decreasing available land, environmental degradation and lessening confidence in access to adequate imports caused many governments to search beyond their borders for new ways to ensure a supply of food for the future. At the same time, speculators, investors and multinational agri-businesses beganto see food as a high-profit commodity which could be profitable like oil, minerals and other natural resources.

In many countries in Africa freedom does not exist. Freedom House in their Freedom in the World Study for 2012 ranked Sub-Saharan Africa as 82% un-free or only partially free. People who dare to demand their rightsor who expose the dark side of those in power, do so at risk to their lives and futures. Those in power do not represent the best interests of their people, but instead represent their own interests. With the search for agricultural land, authoritarian governments with weak adherence to laws and few protections for the people are making secretive deals to lease both small and large swathes of some of the prime agricultural land to foreign and crony investors for negligible amounts (e.g. $1.19 per hectarein parts of Ethiopia) for up to 99 years. Equivalent land reportedly brings $350 per hectare in places like Indonesia and Malaysia and thousands inthe farm belt of the US.

Much of the food is destined for export or wherever it can bring the highest price. Most Africans are small farmers; though poor, they have been able to sustain themselves because of their land; however, the displaced will no longer be able to be self-reliant and may easily end uphungry or in need of food aid. Although some of the food produced will end up locally, food prices may well be beyond their ability to pay. The displaced are mostly in the rural regions where education and training have been lacking, leaving most ill-equipped to find other jobs.

Institutions, meant to strengthen civil society, often do not exist or are under government control. Because there is little accountability or transparency, it has opened the doors to high-level corruption, crony favoritism and illicit transactions as secretive deals, with vague contracts,are negotiated by regime power-holders.

Hundreds of thousands face relocation in Ethiopia's land grab’

A Focus on the Gambella region of Ethiopia, the epicenter of land grabs inAfrica: Ethiopia is one of the leading examples on the continent where large scale land grabs are going on. Gambella region, considered to have the potential for becoming the breadbasket of Ethiopia or the Horn of Africa, may now fail to feed its own. The region has some of the richest, most fertile land and abundant water in the country. The Anuak ethnic- group, —as well as other indigenous groups like the Nuer, the Mazengir, the Komo and the Opo—consider Gambella their ancestral home, but littleinvestment has been directed towards this marginalized and undevelopedregion. Now, Gambella is the region most significantly targeted for land grabs.

In 2003, related to natural resources, the current government of Ethiopia massacred 424 Anuak leaders within three days and went on to commit many more crimes against humanity directed towards this one ethnic group in the following three years. It was related to natural resources at the time and now, their land is being grabbed. It is happening in other regions as well. Already, an estimated 200,000 small farmers and pastoralists in the rural areas have been displaced from their land in orderto free it up for investors. Recently, thousands of people of Amhara ethnicity were forcibly evicted from the region of Benishangul. A year ago,70,000 other Amharawere evicted from land in the Southern Nation's region. In 2011-2012, 70,000 small farmers from the Gambella region were forced off their land. Many more will be moved to resettlement areasin the next year. In Gambella, a region with a total population of about 300,000, this means nearly three-quarters of the people will be affected.

In the vague contracts, previously made available on the government's website, investors are promised land "free of impediments." Impediments,a description which refers to the people now living on the land, are citizens of Ethiopia, but instead of their own government protecting their rights, they are seen as obstacles to be"cleared from their land" as if theywere squatters or intruders in their own homes. Even though the government claims the local people are choosing to leave voluntarily in order to access better services, resistance is met with human rights abuses.

This is most often occurring in rural areas among indigenous people who have no established land rights even though they and their families or communities have lived on the land for generations. Neither do they havethe power to resist the regime's security forces as many are forcibly evicted from their land and moved to resettlement areas where they are promised improved access to services; however, most often, those services do not exist and the land is inferior with less access to water sources. Some end up homeless, in refugee camps in neighboring countries or working for slave wages on land they used to own. In most cases those affected have neither been consulted nor compensated for their losses, in contradiction to national and international laws.

The government claims there is no relationship between the resettlementsand land leases; however, as soon as they are pushed off their land, the investors or agricultural companies move in to clear the land. For example, land grabs from small farmers have opened up 100,000 hectares—nearly 250,000 acres—for large agricultural farms like Karuturi Global Limited of India. Karuturi has been promised a total of 300,000 hectares—nearly 750,000 acres, which will require the expropriation of thevast majority of the best agricultural land in Gambella.Water for irrigation from this Upper Nile region is not being regulated and could greatly impact water availability elsewhere, including down river in other parts of Gambella, as well as in South Sudan, Sudan and Egypt.

Another agricultural company, the Saudi Star, owned by the second richest man in Africa, multi-billionaire Sheikh Mohammed Al Amoudi has been given 10,000 hectares to lease in Gambella. As part of his Derba Group, he plans to lease another 290,000 hectares in the same region. Healso allegedly has intentions to lease 300,000 hectares in Benishangul, another marginalized region, north of Gambella, and recently purchased three other farms in the country. There has been violent conflict related toSaudi Star. Within Gambella, smaller sized sections of land have been leased to regime cronies. In fact, it is estimated that nearly 70% of the domestic lessees of land in Gambella are either regime supporters or members of the ruling party's own ethnic group.

Ethiopia - Civil disobedience in Awi Zone of Benishangul-Gumuz'Self-defense Is A Natural Right'

According to analysts, self-defense at this critical time in the history of Ethiopia threatened by divisive ethnic policy being perpetrated by TPLF's warlords is a natural right. The Amharas subjected to ethnic cleansing andindeed the living under tyranny in abject poverty seek practical solutions to their multiple miseries quickly before it is too late to avert civil disorder of far reaching consequences to Ethiopia and the region of the Horn of Africa. The parochial EPRDF warlords in their airtight cage care less about peace and tranquility in Ethiopia and states in the region. The warlords arestrange cage-fellows mistrustful of one another and devoid of constructiveideas.

Activists claim anti-Amhara crime perpetrators should face justice'

The Amharas are the second largest ethnic group in the country. Some, infact, argue that Amhara could be the largest group in the nation if countedin unbiased manner. Ancient and modern history teaches that this population group existed with other ethnic groups in Ethiopia and the surrounding East African countries since humans started to live as society on this earth. However, the Amharas have never claimed certain regions of Ethiopia as their own sole state. A lot has been said about the battle of Maqdala, Adwa, Mychew, and The Five-Year War with Fascist where Amharas gave their chest for bullets and their whole body for mustard gasin order to transfer a proud and free country.

"My country, Ethiopia You are fool, deceivable You feed your murderers While you starve your martyrs!"

Unfortunately, TPLF created a segregated area called Amhara killil (Killil-a local term for segregation) for these grroups of people. The star actors of genocide and crimes against humanity in Rwanda, Liberia and Sudan are already facing justice. The tribal and racist-primitive rulers who have beencommitting ethnic cleansing and crimes against Amharic speaking people (the Amharas) for the last 22 years in Ethiopia are still leaving lavish livesat the expense of the resources of their victims-the Amharas. Newspaperssuch as Ethiopian affairs, Ethiomedia, covered on its March 17, 2013 frontpage, that 59 uprooted Amharas were killed by car accident in Benishngul Gumuz, western Ethiopia while they were forcefully evicted after their property was confiscated. Similarly the Ethiopian Satellite Television, an independent news outlet, reported that more than 3, 000 people were evicted from Benishangul Gumuz Region. These crimes were also discussed in the Voice of America (VoA) Amharic program. The evicted people and the deaths include children and pregnant women. Mind you, the victims only crime was being born Amhara. Dr. Yakob Hailemariam, one of the Lawyers who investigated the Rwandan Genocide, call this act of the TPLF lead government ethnic cleansing.The Amharas, who are mainly against this uncivilized jungle law, have been the prime victims of this brutal and retarded policy since the racist Tigrai People Libration Front(TPLF) took power through it's Trojan horse- the Ethiopian Peoples Democratic Democratic Front (EPRDF). Many including former members ofTPLF have stated that veteran leaders have been labeling theAmharic speaking people as their enemies since they organized themselves as communist guerilla fighters in the mid 70’s. The crimes committed against Amharic speaking people since this rebel group took power are the practical applications of this former communist guerilla fighters’ racist- jungle manifesto. Source: Ethiomedia

Ethiopia - Remembering The Solomonic Monarchial Order:

We-Mezekir: Ethiopia’s Conquering Lion Who Ruled For 50 Years'

Although it has been 38 years since Emperor Haile Selassie died in unclearcircumstances in his palace, echoes of this man who was revered and loathed in equal measure still reverberate across the globe. Red-hot coals,Chinua Achebe once warned, beget cold impotent ash. This appears to have been the case for the crafty ‘Lion of Judah’, who was unwittingly ushered into a nondescript car and metaphorically driven to the slaughter slab by his troops. Emperor Haile Selassie was only answerable to God, with his mandate and power permanently entrenched by the constitution and also supported by his royal lineage dating back to Biblical times.

Since the 13th Century, the family of Ras Tafari, who later became Haile Selassie, had withstood earthly powers. Not even the 500,000 heavily armed soldiers sent by Italian dictator Benito Mussolini were strong enough to permanently keep the crafty aristocrat from his throne. In the Caribbean and other parts of the world, Haile Selassie was worshipped as a god, Ras, by the Rastafaris, who considered him holy. In Jamaica, Rastafaris camped by the ocean shore, waiting for a ship to deliver themfrom ‘captivity’ to Ethiopia, where 500 acres of land donated by the emperor awaited them. Closer home, half a century after he first set footin Kenya, Haile Selassie is immortalised in the naming of two busy avenues in the two biggest cities, Nairobi and Mombasa.

FORGING TIES: It appears that although it has been 38 years since he died in unclear circumstances in his own palace, echoes of this man whowas revered and loathed in equal measure still reverberate across the globe. Some of the institutions he helped to establish have outlived himand earned his country, Ethiopia, a central place in the Organisation of Africa Unity (OAU) and its replacement, the African Union, which is headquartered at Addis Ababa. Haile Selassie’s dream of forging closer ties with Kenya persist in the Great North Road, to link Addis Ababa andNairobi, finally coming to fruition. All this is coming, 35 years after the flywhisk he supposedly gave Jomo Kenyatta has ceased mesmerising Kenyans.

According to parliamentary records, one of the most historic pacts between the two countries was signed on November 24, 1974, at the State House in Mombasa. The then Foreign Affairs minister Njoroge Mungai explained to Parliament how Haile Selassie had visited Kenya in June 1970 and ratified an agreement, which among other things, delineated the boundary between the two countries and helped solidify Kenya’s claim to Lake Rudolf (Lake Turkana), although Kenyatta had to cede some ground, too.

“Before the signing of the agreement, there had been no legally defined borders in existence between Kenya and Ethiopia. Even during the colonialtimes, there was only a vague notion of a border between Kenya and Ethiopia,” Mungai said. This ambiguity was solved by 30 boundary commission maps, which guided the erection of pillars to designate some of the areas along the boundary to the respective countries.

Consequently, Hara Dawa, Sam Kurar and Gadaduma water points were all ceded to Ethiopia. Kenya, in turn, gained substantial portions of Lake Turkana, especially the area around Namoraputh Police Post, which was previously in Ethiopia. The pact also said that the two neighbours would jointly hold inspections of the border every fifth year, although this was not possible as Haile Selassie was deposed four years later. Before his demise, Haile Selassie had made a name for himself at home, as he had a special place in the lives of the people. According to Martin Meredith, author of The State of Africa, Haile Selassie was only four years old in 1896, when the Italians sent 10,000 European troops to Ethiopia. He had been born in Ejarsa Gora, on July 23, 1892, and named Lij Tafari.

However, the Italian invasion was thwarted by the reigning monarch,Menelik II, who had appointed Ras Mackonnen, Selassie’s father, thegovernor of Harar.

Ras Makonnen was a cousin and close ally of Menelik II, who had no legitimate direct male heir. When Ras Makonnen died in 1906, Selassie was summoned to the court at Addis Ababa, where he was schooled in theintrigues of Menelik's household. However, he was passed over on the death of Menelik II in 1913, in favour of the emperor's grandson, Lij Yasu.Selassie had married Lij Yasu's niece, Waizero Menen, after her divorce.

When Lij Eyassu converted to Islam, the Ethiopian church excommunicated him, providing Haile Selassie with a shot at the throne. He executed a palace coup and declared himself the heir presumptive andRegent for Zauditu, a daughter of Menelik, who became the empress.

Later, he executed Zauditu's husband and put the empress under his control. "He also captured Lij Yasu and imprisoned him with golden chains.Yasu was, however, allowed to enjoy a variety of women provided by Haile Selassie," Alden Whitman wrote in an obituary published by The NewYork Times on August 28, 1975,. The wily monarch pre-empted Ethiopian' colonisation in 1923, when he negotiated for his country to join the League of Nations, the precursor of the United Nations, and then embarked on a tour of Europe.

His tour was memorable in that his six lions and four zebras accompanied him. He also had 30 servants at his beck and call. He finally eliminated theempress, who had attempted a coup in 1928, and was crowned emperor on November 2, 1930, and given the name 'His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie', which means 'Power of the Holy Trinity'. Whitman described himas the last emperor in the 3,000-year-old Ethiopian monarchy. His reign was interrupted four years after his coronation by Mussolini's invasion of Ethiopia. Believing that belonging to the League of Nations insulated him against such aggression, Haile Selassie protested the invasion on June 30,1936, in Geneva during a General Assembly, but in vain. He spent four miserable years in exile in Britain as an unwanted guest until Mussolini joined the Second World War on Germany's side. In a bid to clip Adolf Hitler's militancy, Britain's Prime Minister Winston Churchill strategically recalled that Haile Selassie was a friend, and went out of his way to assist him.

Churchill organised for the exiled emperor to be smuggled through Egypt as a 'Mr Strong', then Sudan. He arrived in Addis Ababa on May 5, 1941, hidden in the back of a car. After occupying Ethiopia for five years, Italy was kicked out and Haile Selassie restored as emperor. While he tried to modernise his kingdom to please his subjects, he also created the image of a freedom fighter who never tired in seeking friends. During his 50-yearreign, he visited 60 states and outlived more than five US Presidents.

FAILING MEMORY: During one of his trips to Brazil in 1960, a coup, whichinvolved one of his sons, Asfa Wossen, was attempted. He predictably crushed the coup, publicly hanged the commander of the bodyguards whohad mutinied, and disowned his son. As he grew older, his photographic memory started failing him. By 1972, his state of mind was such that, as Meredith records, he could barely recognise his guests. During one occasion, when Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire visited the palace, the emperorsummoned one of his officials and loudly wondered who the guest was and what he wanted! His fall from grace was precipitated by his fading mental capacity and failure to appreciate what was happening around him.When Wollo was gripped by a devastating famine, which claimed an estimated 200,000 people between 1973 and 1975, Haile Selassie insistedthat this was an inevitable natural catastrophe and there was nothing he could do. Ultimately, in 1973, a broken water pump in a military outpost triggered a mutiny, which kicked off a series of events that convinced Ethiopians that the dreaded lion had lost its tenacity. Selassie's failure to discipline the mutineers and his concession to their demands led to more mutinies, followed by students and workers demanding for better living conditions. Taking advantage of the weakened emperor, 108 junior military officers formed a committee in Addis Ababa, from where they plotted clandestinely. The committee systematically entrenched itself and forced senior officials to surrender their assets to avoid confiscation.

They later accused the emperor of corruption and squandering resources by undertaking costly foreign trips. The Ministry of Pen was abolished, as well as other imperial institutions. In September 1974, nine princesses, among them the emperor's only surviving daughter Leult Tenagnewarq and seven grand daughters, were imprisoned. Their heads were shaved and they were only allowed two mattresses to share in the dungeon-like cells. On September 12 of the same year, the emperor was dethroned butwhen the charges were read against him, he responded that if the revolution was for the good of Ethiopians, he supported it. He was then led out of his palace into a green "Volkswagen Beatles" and later detainedat the Grand Palace, where he died in controversial circumstances on August 27, 1975. By then, Majour Mengistu Haile Mariam had already established himself as the leader of the rising committee known as the Duerg, and started a revolution, which would haunt Ethiopia for many years.

Post Meles Ethiopia:

Ethio-Eritrea, Land Grab, Ethnic-Amhara Displacement , and Abay (Nile)Dam'

It has been a while since I have stopped writing articles; I guess about three years now. However, I have been following up all episodes that havebeen taking place in Ethiopia on daily basis. I am writing in reference of four issue which I believe are very relevant to the context of Ethiopia.

These includes Ethiopia after Meles, Ethio-Eritrea, land grab issue, the displacement of amhara ethnic from the southern part of Ethiopia. I have to be quite frank that I never liked Meles Zenawi in his life time due to merely the way he had handled the Ethio-Eritrea issue before the war andafter the war, even worse all the EBBC, Alger's agreement. I used to detest Meles Zenawi because of those things only. However, my heart completely flipped towards Meles Zenawi after the uncivilized way treatment of Meles Zenawi by Mr. Abebe Gelaw. Unfortunately, Meles did not stay long and he died. Thereafter, I was not sure what was in store forEthiopia. But to my surprise, I have been impressed by the way EPRDF handled Ethiopia after Meles. Now the dust has settled. All the doom day prophesy and oracles proved wrong by EPRDF.

However, the issue of Ethio-Eritrea still remains in the same state of no peace no war. I do believe the no war no peace state of affaires between Ethiopia and Eritrea is not a durable solution and it is not sustainable. As an Ethiopia who love both people equally and do not even believe in the independence of Eritrea due to the fact I am against anything that is related to colonialism. The fact I do not endorse Eritrea as independent state is not because I hate Eritreans. It is because I do believe it is not relevant and in the interest of the both people. I do not see the benefit 4 million deki Bahri Negash or deki Mereb Melash isolated in the north. I justdo not see the benefit even for them. Eritreans will better off working in a huge 94 million people market consumer Ethiopian than isolated like now. Time has proved me right that Eritreans did not get anything from independence than more suffering. My hope now is the after Meles EPRDF will end the Ethio-Eritrea issue a different way than before. In my opinion,I envision two solutions for Ethio-Eritrea problems: Put aside the past, andreunion of Eritrea with its motherland and work for better and democratic Ethiopia and eliminate all conflict, bias, hate, prejudice, war forever and the people live in peace as one people . That is a durable solution. It will benefit all people. Imagine, middle class Ethiopians spending weekends in Massawa Gurgusom beach all year round? Who benefit? It will be Tigrai and Eritrea. Because the rest of Ethiopians will shuttle through mekelle to massawa. Imagine the local tourism which benefit Tigreans and Eritreans in particular. This is the best scenario I think of as durable solution due to the fact that no peace no war is neither peace nor war. It is just keeps theproblem forever. Problem must be solved, but not postponed with no peace no war.

The second solution, if the above does not work, another durable solution can be portioning the red-sea into two: giving the third of the redsea to Ethiopia because Ethiopia owned the entire red sea for millennia and are entitled to own part of the Red sea. In my opinion, it must have 2/3 of theRed Sea and Eritrea must have 1/3 of the Red Sea. Thereafter normalize relation and let Eritrea determine its own destination. This is a durable solution. You can have a durable solution by appeasing only one side.

Durable solution must satisfy both parties and then both parties must bein peace after settling outstanding issues. I hope EPRDF will choose of these strategies. Then EPRDF has to deal with land grab issue another problem. I have red a lot of history books, the bible is my good resource.In biblical time, land used to be rented for share or rented up to ten years. The renter must pay rent and returned the land to the owner after the contract is ended. If someone failed to pay the rent, the owner used to take back the land and the renter. The renter used to become slave forthe landlord when he failed to pay the rent money. Apart from that, I never came across in biblical or modern time, land leased or rented for 100 years. There is no record in human history land rented or leased for 100 years.

It is weird EPRDF which claims it fought to liberate citizens engaged in thisunholy business of taking away land from land owners by removing peoplefrom their ancestral land. The government does not have a right to take away land from land owners to give it to foreigners. This is not hate of foreigners. In every country land is reserved for citizens. You do not leaseor give away land to people form another continent who has nothing to dowith welfare of the people. Even in biblical time, the land used to be leased up to 10 years only for locals. EPRDF has done a second blunder onthis. While we were crying the way EPRDF handled the Eritrean issue, theykept on adding more mistakes by inviting water, land thirst Arabs, Indians,… and giving them other people land. I think this requires a consorted protest and opposition from citizens. When government do blunders like this, citizens must stand and say no this wrong. I hope we will do this in a civilized manner and give back the land to our people in Gambela. This is unholy business which will not benefit anyone. In turn, the land issue brought another concatenated problem, the displacement ofamhara ethnic from the south is also something weird. While the government is claiming that Ethiopia has more land and inviting foreignersand give them land. The government removes Ethiopians by claiming there is no land for other Ethiopians. This is really heart-breaking. I never expected this to happen. I have to be also honest,I have a lot of information on this. I know land ownership through inheritance has a longhistory. I am not sure even locals are claiming ownership which was takenby settlers, amhra ethnic. If that is the case, the government must have had a law that protects citizens and also addresses claims.

For instance, in South Africa, the whites now own the land. But the land belonged to the local blacks. When the whites settled in Southern Africa, they removed the people and put them in designated area and they took the land away from them. Then they have been using the land as their own for 400 years. But now after 400 or 500 years, the blacks wanted back their ancestral land. Who owns the land? The people who took over or who settled there, that is the white have no right of ownership. In Zimbabwe, the land is returned to the owners. In South Africa, the issue isstill outstanding and the local craving to take the land back. I do not knowthe history of the amhara ethnic in Benshangul zone or state. I was just puzzled and I was thinking that may be the amhara ethnics were settlers and the locals are claiming the land back. I do not see any other good reasons to evict 5000 people? It is very sad such happens to our people.

Anyway, whatever the reasons are, anything illegal is illegal. One can notremove 5000 people from where they live without any reasons and without any legal procedure. That Amhara ethnic removal has exposed EPRDF ethnic policy weakness. It is good to have the ethnic federalism to ensure equality of ethnics, but it is not good not to have a law that enablecitizens to live and work across the country. It is my hope the governmentwill address this issue and such thing must never happen again. About theAbay Dam, whether we like it or not, Meles has passed but he has made history. Abay will be harnessed and only because of Meles Zenawi laid the corner stone. Diasporas who oppose the Dam are lost; and those people who oppose the dam leave alone to help Ethiopia? They can not help themselves. Abay will be harnessed and no one can stop it. All those who oppose the Dam are nothing but losers of all time. I do not believe even they have Faculty to think. .EPRDF has a big time on this Dam; they need to be applauded on this. We will defend the Dam and even die for it. Beingpolitical opponent is one thing, but opposing development is insaneness atits ugliest level.

Source: Awramba Times
HISTORY: On the Alequa Habte-Wold sons,Akale-Worq,Makonnen, Aklilu'
Mekonnen Habte-Wold (October 28/1893 - December, 1960) he who wasborn on local calendar, Tikimt 19/1886, was the first of the eight sons of the Aleqa Habte Wold family. The family was living in Adaa province, Dembi locality - 45 km from the capital.... Mekonnen studied Amharic writing and reading together with Psalms (Dawit) in his home town. He also studied Geez, Zema, Quine, Digua, Tsome-Diguwa in the famous Zequala Wonber Mariam Monastry. When Makonnen turned 15, he came to Addis Ababa Entoto Raguel Church, where his father Aleqa Habte-WoldHabteneh, administered and started serving as a deacon. While working for the church Makonnen was selected to attend the ailing Emperor Menelik at his palace. In this new position he reads to the Emperor scripture and attend to the daily ritual of bathing the Emperor with holy water known as locally 'tsebel'.
After the death of the Emperor Menelik, Makonnen found a new job - a cashier in the Filwuha Public Bath in Addis Ababa. In his spare time he educated himself at Alliance Francaise & mastered the basics of French and mathematics. Soon, Makonnen got another job in Customs Office, thistime as an accountant. It is here that his diligence and extraordinary capacity called the attention of the then Crownprince Ras Tefferi Makonnen. Makonnen was only 25 when the Crownprince promoted him tothe rank of Chief of Revenue in the Customs Department. As Makonnen stablished himself well in the capital, he decided to bring home his younger brothers, Akale-Worq Habte-Wold 9 and Aklilu Habte-Wold 6. By this time, his two young brothers were learning the traditional church education at Entoto Raguel church. Makonnen brought his brothers to his home and get them registered in the Menelik II School in Addis Ababa. Here the two brothers learned themodern education of the time from 1912 to 1919 EC. To further their education, the Crownprince sent Akale-Worq and Aklilu to Alexandria, Egypt, along with 33 fellow Ethiopian students. Makonnen was instrumental in pioneering the future of his younger brothers by supporting and educating them. During and after the Italian invasion the textile engineer Akale Worq and the lawyer Aklilu Habte-Wold served theirbeloved country in many capacities until they were brutally massacred by the Duerg regime in November 22, 1974. Makonnen was summarily executed by the plotters of the December, 1960 coup together with 13 prominent patriots and ministers of the Haile Sellassie government. It is apity that this country honors it's patriots and pioneers by summary execution and mass graves. But history and generations will always remember these pioneers of modern day Ethiopia.

Aklilu Habte-Wold (12 March, 1912 – 23 November, 1974): Tsehafi Taezaz("Minister of the Pen") Aklilu Habte-Wold (12 March 1912 – 23 November 1974) was an Ethiopian politician under Emperor Haile Selassie. He was foreign minister of Ethiopia from 1947 to 1958 and Prime Minister from 1961 until shortly before his death. Tsehafi Taezaz Aklilu Habte-Wold has served in various posts under Emperor Haile Selassie. He was foreign minister of Ethiopia from 1947 to 1958 and Prime Minister from 1961 untilshortly before his death. Biography: Aklilu Habte-Wold was the son of a rural Ethiopian Orthodox priest from the Bulga district of Shewa province. He and his brothers, Makonnen Habte-Wold and Akalework Habte-Wold benefited from the patronage of Emperor Haile Selassie, who had them educated in the country and abroad in his efforts to create a new western educated intelligentia and professional class in his country. Aklilu Habte- Wold a...cquired his education in France. He was a protege of the powerfulTsehafi Taezaz Wolde Giyorgis Wolde Yohannes, another man of humble birth, who became a powerful figure in Ethiopian government, and close advisor to the Emperor, with his appointment as Tsehafi Taezaz. Wolde Giyorgis recommended the Habte-Wold brothers to the Emperor, who promoted them through the ranks so that the two eldest, Makonnen and Aklilu, became particularly influential with the monarch. Their humble origins, and the fact that they owed their education and advancement solely to the Emperor, allowed Emperor Haile Selassie to trust them implicitly and to favor them and other commoners of humble origin in government appointments and high positions at the expense of the aristocracy, whose loyalty to his person, rather than to the institution of Emperor he suspected. The Emperor's preference for such men as Aklilu Hapte-Wold over the high nobles created resentment among the aristocracy, who believed they were being displaced by these new westerneducated "technocrats". Aklilu Habte-Wold was among those who joined Emperor Haile Selassie during his exile following the Second Italo-Abyssinian War. He acted as afundraiser for the beleaguered exile community and for the resistance inside Ethiopia. Aklilu lived in Paris for much of this period, and married aFrench woman, Collette Habte-Wold. Following the restoration the monarchy in May, 1941, Aklilu served as a representative to the Peace conference after the end of World War II, then served as Foreign Minister.During this time, Aklilu played a key role in the complex process that brought Eritrea into federation with Ethiopia. Following the fall from favor of Tsehafi Taezaz Wolde Giyorgis Wolde Yohannes in 1958, the Emperor appointed Aklilu to replace Wolde Giyorgis as Tsehafi Taezaz. Following the failed 1960 Ethiopian coup, the then Prime Minister, Ras Bitwoded Makonnen Endelkachew stepped down for health reasons, and was replaced with Aklilu Habte-Wold, who retained the powerful Ministry of thePen in his portfolio. As both Tsehafi Taezaz and Prime Minister, Aklilu clearly enjoyed a level of confidence with the Emperor that no one outsideof the Imperial Family shared. This appointment, and the following increase of commoner "technocrats" in positions of power and influence greatly disturbed the more conservative elements in the Imperial family, the aristocracy, and the Orthodox Church. Two camps evolved at court, with Prime Minister Aklilu and his fellow non-noble "technocrats" on one side, who dominated the various ministries and the Imperial Cabinet, against the nobility who wererepresented by the Crown Council, and led by Ras Asrate Medhin Kassa.

Although the Emperor forbade party politics, the two rival camps behaved as such, and manuveured against each other rather vigorously. Many issues such as land reform and constitutional change were blocked largelybecause of this rivalry. On the other hand, Bahru Zewde is of the opinion that "Aklilu's impact on Ethiopian politics is not so easily identifiable. He lacked the capacity for political manipulation shown by his predecessor as tsahafe t'ezaz, Walda-Giyorgis, and his own brother, Makonnen. Aklilu was more of a leading functionary than a power-broker." Former diplomat Paul

B. Henze supports this view that Aklilu was not interested in reform, butrepeats Aklilu's rival Ras Asrate's opinion that "Aklilu was the primary reactionary influence on the Emperor."

When student protests, military mutinies and an economic downturn caused by the oil embargo erupted in 1973 into a popular uprising againstthe government, calls went out for Prime Minister Aklilu to be dismissed. On 23 February and the following day, the Emperor made a number of concessions to the various groups of protestors; a few days later Prime Minister Aklilu resigned, the first time a Prime Minister in Ethiopia had fallen due to public pressure. However, instead of placating the protestors,this resignation only emboldened them to make further demands. The Imperial Crown Council then pushed the Emperor to appoint a nobleman to the position, and Lij Endelkachew Makonnen, son of the late former Prime Minister, was appointed. The new Premier attempted to address themany demands being put forward by the proponents of reform, and Ethiopia seemed to be on the verge of transforming itself into a democracy and a modern constitutional monarchy. However, a committee of low ranking officers called the Derg, who had been empowered to investigate corruption in the military, arrested Tsehafi Taezaz Aklilu and most of the men who had served in his cabinet, as well as the new PrimeMinister and his cabinet. The Derg deposed Emperor Haile Selassie on September 12, 1974 and assumed power as the marxist military junta that would rule the country for almost two decades. On the evening of 23November, Tsehafi Taezaz Aklilu Hapte-Wold, and his brother Akale WorkHapte-Wold were removed from Menelik Palace and taken to Central Prison known as Kerchelle where they were summarily executed with 60 other ex-officials of the Emperor's government. This act led to protests around the world, not only from Europe and the United States, but also from a number of African countries who expressed their concern for the well-being of the deposed Emperor.

The November Evening, 1974 Massacre: On 23 November 1974 Tsehafe Tizaz Aklilu Habtewold, his brother Akale Worq Habtewold along with 58 former great personalities of the Haile Sellassie I government were summarily executed by the brutal Duerg at ...the Addis Ababa main prison(Kerchele) compound. The executed authorities were buried in a mass grave inside the prison ground. After the fall of the brutal Duerg regime, the remains of the martyrs was unearthed from the mass grave and was moved to Menbere Tsebaot Holy Trinity Cathedral in Addis Ababa in February 1992. In July 1992 this monument was erected for the martyrs by an association of the martyrs families and the remains rested inside this monument. History and generations will always remember these Ethiopian martyrs who tirelessly fight Fascism, ignorance and poverty.

SPECULATION: The name ‘Meles’ is badly discouraged in Ethiopia thereare quite numbers of babies by that name nowadays.

As German parents have quitted naming their children "Hitler" since the mid-1940s, parents in Ethiopia now are not willing to name their children after the names "Meles" or "Zenawi" anymore, according to researches. An individual who researched the matter, looked through door to door approach, and hospital records in Addis Ababa and could not revealed thatany child who is named after either "Meles" or "Zenawi" for the last two decades, because of his implementation of divisive policies.

Failures in political leadership & consequences’

Personal Views: The incumbent EPRDF regime has been unwilling or incapable of resolving colossal issues inherited from Meles Zenawi. Theserequire the collaboration of all Ethiopians in a democratic environment, which does not exist now. The mega dam project is a time bomb that willexplode at the convenience of Egyptian authorities. Any Ethiopian opposition political entity would be right to link up with progressive forcesin Egypt in fostering regional democracy and prosperity.

Endemic corruption is certain to destabilize the regime. Moreover, the pledge by PMHD to continue with the destructive legacy of the late tyrantMeles Zenawi will lead to the eventual downfall of the regime sooner than later. The longer the TPLF warlords stay in their tribal hermetic cocoon, the more they will become isolated from the rapidly changing outside world in the sphere of politics, economic growth and social development.This intransigence will not augur well for the stability of Ethiopia and theHorn of Africa sub-region as a whole. EMF

Wemezekir: About Leul Ras Imiru Haile Selassie Abayneh who nicknamedby many contemporaries “the Red Ras”

Leul Ras Imiru Haile Selassie (Amharic: ዕምሩ፡ ኃይለ፡ ሥላሴ; November 1892 – August 1980) was an Ethiopian noble, soldier, and diplomat. He was also the cousin of Emperor Haile Selassie. He was acting Prime Minister for 3 days in 1960 during a cout de etat and assassination of Prime Minister Abebe Aregai. Born in Shoa Province, Imiru was the childhood friend of hiscousin Haile Selassie I (Imiru's mother was Haile Selassie's first cousin); both were tutored together under Abba Samuel Wolde Kahin, and were raised by Imiru's father Haile Selassie Abayneh, whom described as the Emperor's "real father", asserting that "Makonnen's son recalled the surrogate with affection, whereas he invariably referred to his father with formality and deference."[Both Imiru and his father accompanied the future ruler to his first governorship in Sidamo. In 1916/17 Imiru, by then a Dejazmach, was appointed Shum (Governor) of Harrar province by his cousin. In 1928, Imiru was appointed Shum of Wollo province when Ras Gugsa Welle failed to end a smoldering rebellion there.

In 1932, Imiru was promoted to Ras and made governor of Gojjam province. Ras Imiru replaced Ras Hailu Tekle-Haymanot, who had been convicted of treason for allegedly helping the deposed Eyassu V escape, and sentenced to life imprisonment. Upon arriving in Gojjam, Imiru was immediately faced with a revolt by Fitawrari Admassu, a natural son of theimprisoned Ras, who on 30 September, 1932 briefly held Debre-Marqos; not long afterwards Admassu ended his revolt, sending messengers to theEmperor to ask for pardon. Nevertheless, despite numerous reforms and efforts to modernize the province, which enriched both the producers and traders, Imiru found few friends in Gojjam and "was invariably viewed as an outsider, the emperor's agent, and, unable to rule by consensus, he governed by force." From October 1935, Ras Imiru led his provincial army and commanded the Army of the Left in the Second Italo-Abyssinian War. His early offensive deep into the Italian rear threatened the Italian advance. Ultimately Imiru was stopped and his army was destroyed by theuse of poison gas dropped from the air. In May 1936, Haile Selassie appointed his cousin Ras Imiru as Prince Regent in his absence, departing Ethiopia with his family to present the case of Ethiopia to the League of Nations (LoN) at Geneva, Switzerland. Ras Imiru fell back to Gore in southern Ethiopia to reorganize and continue to resist the Italians. For thisto have worked, he needed the revenue of the gold mines of Asossa, but the loyal Sheikh Hojali was driven out in July 1936 by rebellious Welega Oromos, who also made Ras Imiru's position in Gore untenable, and he retreated to the southeast. The Italians followed him, and pinned him down on the north bank of the Gojeb River, where he surrendered on December 19, 1936. He was flown to Italy and imprisoned on the Island ofPonza until freed after the formal surrender of Italy in September 1943.

After the war Ras Imiru was appointed a Crown Councilor and served as Ambassador to India, the United States, and the ex-Soviet Union. Always a man of modernist and reformist views, as well as deeply religious Ras Imru increasingly began to lean towards a left of center political stance that would probably have had him classified as a socialist in the western European sense. Both he and his son Mikael Imiru became advocates for land reform, and he went as far as distributing his own extensive estates to his tenant farmers. Due to these political views, Ras Imru was nicknamed "the Red Ras" by many contemporaries. Regardless of his leftist sympathies, Ras Imiru remained a confidant of the Emperor and a monarchist. However, when the Duerg deposed Emperor Haile Selassie in September 1974, they asked Ras Imiru Haile Selassie to accompany themto the Emperor's palace in order to witness the act. Eyewitness accounts relate that the Ras was visibly distressed as the members of the Duerg announced to the Emperor that he was deposed and that they required him to accompany them to his place of detention. The Emperor and Ras Imiru had a whispered conversation after which the Emperor agreed to go peacefully. The Ras then asked to be allowed to accompany the Emperor to wherever the soldiers were taking him, and became distraught when permission was refused. The members then assured the Prince that he could come to see the Emperor later in the day. It is believed that the Duerg did not want to subject Ras Imiru to the insults and humiliation thatwere directed at the Emperor by the Duerg sympathisers as he was drivenaway from the palace. After his death in August 1980, Ras Imiru Haile Selassie became the only member of the Imperial dynasty to be given a state funeral by the Duerg regime. Television and radio announcements ofhis death accorded him his full titles of Prince, Ras, and the dignity of "HisRoyal Highness" even though the Duerg had abolished all Imperial titles inSeptember 1974. He was publicly and officially eulogized as a former Prince Regent, a distinguished diplomat, an early progressive, and a leader of the resistance against the Italian occupation. No mention was made of his blood ties to the Imperial family or his lifelong close association with the late Emperor Haile selassie. (Text ends)

JUSTICE In-Exile: The Long Interrogation -The New York Times Magazine’(Published: June 4, 2006)

On August. 3, 1987, Kelbessa Negewo debarked from a T.W.A. flight in New York. He cleared customs and entered the United States. A strong, thickset man, just a few weeks shy of his 37th birthday, he was traveling alone. In his suitcase, he carried the remnants of his old life: a few sets ofclothes, an Ethiopian passport, a student visa issued at the United States

Embassy in Addis Ababa and a reference letter from a former employer, the Mugher Cement Factory. His pockets contained $200. Kelbessa spent that first night in a cheap motel room. The next morning, after a meandering tour of the outer boroughs with an unscrupulous cabdriver, hearrived back at the airport, exasperated and financially drained. America was suffering through a broiling heat wave;

Kelbessa sweated through his shirt as he struggled with his luggage. Living here, he realized, was going to be difficult. But Kelbessa had experienced far worse. The soles of his feet bore scars from a whipping.

He boarded a plane bound for his new home, Atlanta. An old friend, Ayalew Berou, met Kelbessa when he landed. (Ethiopians formally addressone another by their first names.) Ayalew took Kelbessa home, made him a meal and offered to put him up. He found Kelbessa a night job cleaning grocery stores. Kelbessa gradually settled into an immigrant's existence.

He worked hard and went unnoticed, renting tiny apartments in disfavoredsuburbs, toiling in the dismal reaches of the service economy. He didn't socialize much, not even with other Ethiopians. Kelbessa tried going to one of their Bible study groups for a while, but he got the feeling that people were whispering things behind his back, so he quit.

Six months after he arrived in America, Kelbessa applied for political asylum, saying he had been persecuted and imprisoned by Ethiopia's military dictatorship. It was the Reagan era, and Ethiopia was Communist;the application was quickly approved. Kelbessa then set about achieving his next goal: saving enough money to send for his three children, who were still stuck in Ethiopia. (He and his wife were divorced.) He worked the graveyard shift at a convenience store and took a second job, washingdishes at the Colony Square Hotel. Later, he was promoted to bellhop.

One afternoon, Kelbessa was outside the employee locker room, waiting for the service elevator. The elevator doors opened, and another Ethiopianwalked out, a young woman in a waitress's uniform. She worked at the restaurant upstairs. Kelbessa hailed her as a compatriot and introduced himself. He let the elevator go, and they had a brief conversation. Then the woman, whose shift was ending, hurried off to clock out. Kelbessa went on with his day.

Kelbessa started hearing rumors after that. The waitress was asking questions about him. One day, she brought a couple of Ethiopian friends into the hotel. The three women didn't say anything to Kelbessa; they juststood in the lobby and stared.

Not long afterward, in September 1990, someone else visited Kelbessa at work: a process server. He handed Kelbessa some papers, which informedhim that he was being sued in federal court on charges of violating international human rights laws. The lawsuit said he was far from a mere victim of Ethiopia's brutal regime. It claimed Kelbessa had once been its servant, a notorious torturer and killer, during a period known as the RedTerror a dozen years before. His chief accuser was a woman named Edgegayehu Taye — the waitress. Though neither she nor Kelbessa knewit then, the two immigrants were preparing to embark on a 15-year passage through the formative reaches of human rights law. Justice, andeventually even Kelbessa's freedom, would turn on a single question, decided by American judges, in American courts: What happened so longago, in the country they both left behind?

Lately, Kelbessa has had a lot of time to contemplate the vicissitudes of life. For the past 17 months, he has been imprisoned in Atlanta. He sits alone inside a stuffy jail cell for 23 hours of most days, breaking the solitude by teaching himself the basics of immigration law and by writing ajailhouse memoir, scrawled out on several notepads. The book begins witha discussion of peasant agriculture and Marxism and concludes with a description of prison life: the cold food, the constant racket. He vehemently denies the accusations against him and says that before the glancing encounter at the Colony Square, he never met the woman who accused him. "Every day I wake up in the morning in American prison," Kelbessa writes. "I think for a while, why am I in here?"

He is there because the federal Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement is holding him in detention while it tries to deport him back to Ethiopia, where he has been accused of committing many atrocities. Kelbessa's case, one of the first of its kind under a new law, is a product of many chance occurrences. If Edgegayehu Taye hadn't taken the waitress job, if their shifts hadn't overlapped that day, if she'd just kept quiet, if she'd never moved to Atlanta in the first place, then maybe Kelbessa could have lived in peace. But that is not the same as saying hisstory was unlikely. In a nation with a proud heritage as a haven for refugees, no conflict is too far removed. Immigrant communities may seem undifferentiated to native-born Americans, sealed off as they are bytheir foreign languages and customs. But in this time of impassioned argument over immigration, it is important to remember that the talk of human tides and huddled masses is just rhetorical shorthand. Each immigrant has his own reasons for making the journey; each brings to America his own history, and sometimes, his own secrets.

United States government officials estimate that as many as 1,000 foreignresidents may have once committed serious human rights abuses. Three years ago, a United Nations tribunal convicted a Rwandan pastor of genocide; he had been apprehended in Laredo, Tex. In Phoenix, more recently, agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department of Homeland Security, which now oversees immigration, arrested 24 Bosnian Serbs on suspicion that they committed atrocities during their homeland's civil war. In 1997, angry Haitian émigrés unmasked a former leader of a vicious paramilitary unit. He had been working as a real estate agent in Queens. Another Haitian, a key member of an ousted military regime, blew his cover when he won $3.2 million inthe Florida lottery.

Of course, unsavory exiles have been washing up on foreign shores for aslong as there have been wars and tyrants. But where once a czarist general or a Venezuelan caudillo could expect to live out his days withoutdisturbance, the world has changed in the 60 years since the Nuremburg trials. As far-flung societies have drawn closer together, they have gradually developed international standards of human rights and a patchwork legal system to judge crimes against them. The case of Kelbessa Negewo took place at the confluence of these two historic trends. An airplane brought Kelbessa to a place where no one knew his name. In a courtroom, his past was laid bare.

Kelbessa was born in rural western Ethiopia in 1950, midway through thelong reign of Emperor Haile Selassie. His family raised goats and grew onions. "Through my whole life, I observed and learnt power is very seductive," Kelbessa writes in his jailhouse memoir. The corrupt governorof his province, he recalled, collected taxes from his parents but never built a road for his village, as promised. Kelbessa had to trudge to schoolon foot.

There was no one to complain to. In those days, you couldn't fight the emperor. They called Selassie "the King of Kings." A slight, crafty politicalsurvivor, he held court in Addis Ababa surrounded by fawning, plotting nobles. The aristocrats were often members of Selassie's Amhara ethnic group. They were allotted huge estates in the African hinterland, which the local peasants worked like serfs.

This hierarchy was breaking down by the time Kelbessa came of age. Ethiopia was one of the few corners of the continent that had not been colonized in the 19th century. But the forbidding mountains that had repelled invaders could not keep out the convulsive spirit of Africa's independence era. University students were on the streets, calling for landreform, and the country was awash in pamphlets attacking the emperor.

Kelbessa, who by this time had earned a diploma in public health and hada government job, would read these missives furtively, in the bathroom. The turning point for him came when he won a government scholarship toattend college in the United States, and a government official, an Amharalike Selassie, pulled a string to send his nephew instead. After that, Kelbessa says, he hated the regime.

Kelbessa moved to Addis Ababa, where revolution was gaining momentum. In 1973, famine gripped Ethiopia. Selassie sat in his palace, increasingly isolated, tossing scraps of meat to his beloved dogs. In September 1974, army tanks surrounded the palace and the emperor wasbundled into the back of a Volkswagen Beetle and taken to prison.

Kelbessa, like many Ethiopians, embraced the revolution. The military established a 120-member Derg, or committee, to rule the country. It promised land reform and a prompt transition to representative rule. Kelbessa was thrilled. A month after Selassie's overthrow, the Derg closeddown the university and ordered its students to disperse across the countryside and "educate the people." Kelbessa volunteered to teach the basics of farming. Shortly after that, the Derg announced plans to establish a socialist one-party state, began confiscating property from the"feudalists" of the old elite and established a system of elected neighborhood councils that were to administer changes on a local level.

Kelbessa took up a position on his council.

These initial moves were popular with many of the country's Marxist intellectuals and young people, even some children of the elite. But disenchantment set in quickly. The military shocked the country by executing a group of 59 royals and other leaders of the imperial regime. Paranoia settled over the capital. Members of the Derg assassinated one another in a struggle for control, and eventually, an obscure army major named Mengistu Haile Mariam emerged. Mengistu secretly ordered Selassie's murder and had him buried in an unmarked grave. The Marxistssplit: one group supported Mengistu's methods; the other decided to fighthim. The opponents joined the clandestine Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Party (E.P.R.P.), which began its own campaign of bombings and assassinations.

In April 1977, at a public rally, Mengistu smashed glass bottles filled with blood, or some red liquid, and vowed to conquer the "enemies of the revolution." All over the city, corpses appeared on the streets, pinned withsigns bearing slogans referring to the government's Red Terror campaign.It would prove to be, according to a Human Rights Watch report, "one of the most systematic uses of mass murder by the state ever witnessed in Africa."

Kelbessa was never more than a midlevel figure in Ethiopia's government.At the time of the Red Terror, he was chairman of Higher Zone 9, a district of Addis Ababa. In this administrative post, he oversaw several neighborhood councils. Mengistu's proclamation of war, however, strengthened positions like Kelbessa's. The government instructed the local councils to recruit new "revolutionary defense squads," which were armed and given orders to root out any threat. Kelbessa took to strutting around his neighborhood with a machine gun slung across his chest, leading an entourage of militiamen. He cut a distinctive figure with his large afro and his bellicose oratory, and he was often in the newspaper oron television. Others were higher-ranking, but few were louder in proclaiming their ruthless devotion to the struggle. A series of memos, unearthed in the course of Kelbessa's legal travails, reveal that he was tireless in begging his higher-ups for more guns, more ammunition and more press coverage. He told them of great strides in "the process ofweeding out antirevolutionary elements."

Late one afternoon in February 1978, according to sworn testimony, a squad of revolutionary guards arrived at the home of Edgegayehu Taye, a22-year-old civil servant. They told her she was wanted for questioning.

She went without protest. The guards pushed her into the back seat of a Volkswagen and drove her some distance, until the car reached a corrugated metal gate marked by a sign that read: "Higher Zone 9." The guards took her into the main office. Edgegayehu was ordered to strip naked and was bound with rope at her wrists and knees. Then the guards ran a pole through the loops in the rope and hung her between two desks,like a pig on a spit. They lashed her with plastic cables.

Over and over again, the man behind the desk, the one with the afro,asked her, "Are you a member of the E.P.R.P.?"

Years later, when she saw the man standing by the elevator at the ColonySquare Hotel, Edgegayehu wasn't sure it was Kelbessa at first. He'd gotten older, gained some weight, lost his swagger. He certainly didn't seem to recognize her. Then Kelbessa smiled widely and greeted her, andshe knew for sure. "The voice," she told me. "You don't forget the voice."

Edgegayehu is an old Amharic name. Americans find it difficult to pronounce (it is pronounced ed-JIH-GAH-yu), so these days she goes by anickname, Edge. She is middle-aged now and lives in Ohio, in a home shehas decorated with reminders of Ethiopia. Even after so many years, the very mention of Kelbessa's name causes her voice to crack.

Edge told me the first thing she felt that day, as Kelbessa stepped into theelevator and she hurried out of the hotel, was a stab of nausea. Then incomprehension set in. "Seeing him here, I couldn't swallow that," she says, still sounding a bit disbelieving. "Kelbessa, that man, that big man, the person who acts like a god during his time, the person who makes youor breaks you, the person who decided whether you live or you die. That person, to see that person here, wearing that dishwasher's uniform? I don't think so."

After that first encounter with Kelbessa, Edge spent several months wondering what to do. She had never been able to talk about her torture,not even to her closest friends and relatives. Finally, she mentioned her run-in to a few friends. Word got around. An acquaintance, an Ethiopian who worked in the office of Andrew Young, then Atlanta's mayor, made some calls and got in contact with the Center for Constitutional Rights, a nonprofit legal organization based in New York. Someone from the center contacted Miles Alexander, a partner at the Atlanta law firm Kilpatrick & Cody. He agreed to look into the case pro bono.

Edge set up an appointment with her new lawyers. She was led into a wood-paneled corner office, where she met Alexander and Laurel Lucey, the associate assigned to the case. They told Edge there might be something they could do. There was a law, a very old law, called the AlienTort Claims Act. Passed as part of the first Judiciary Act in 1789, it said American federal courts had jurisdiction in cases in which injuries had occurred "in violation of the law of nations," regardless of where those violations occurred. No one was really sure what the First Congress meantby "the law of nations" — it may have had something to do with pirates —but in the early 1980's, a group of human rights lawyers had dusted off the dormant phrase, using it to go after the likes of Imelda Marcos.

To get started, though, the lawyers needed Edge to give them a detailed description of what happened back in Ethiopia. She really didn't know what to say. She had never put words to her memories before. She opened her mouth and started talking. But the story came out muddled. Itwas so hard to explain. Finally, flustered, Edge twisted around in her chairand pulled off her shirt. Alexander and Lucey, dumbfounded, stared at herback. It was crisscrossed by long, ridged scars.

Edge has been required to describe her ordeal on many occasions since then. But it is painful every time, she says. When she told me about it, she adopted a hunched-over posture, and her voice sank to almost a whisper. She says she has never been sure why she was arrested. That first night, between whippings, the guards dragged in a young man she knew. "He gave my name," she says, dabbing her eyes with one of the paper napkins she had left out in a stack on the coffee table. "Probably hedid that out of fear, out of pain. I don't blame him. I saw him. He was tortured very badly."

There really didn't need to be a reason. In a study of the Mengistu regime,René Lefort writes that "simply knowing how to read and write and being aged about 20" was enough to get a person branded a counterrevolutionary. But Edge fitted the profile of a rebel in some specificways. Her father had been a member of the old elite. She worked in a government ministry, as an architectural draftswoman, and she had told some co-workers that she was worried about the course the revolution was taking. Edge told me she was never involved in the clandestine attacks against the government. But she adds, "I sympathized, of course."

Kelbessa's men tried to beat a confession out of her for two days, Edge says. When that didn't work, she was transferred to another detention center, where she was tortured further. For 10 months, she lived in a small cell filled with as many as 30 other women. At night, guards wouldcome in and call out names, and those they summoned would be shot.

Edge heard more about Kelbessa from her cellmates. One of them, awoman named Sosena, was the daughter of a former supreme court justice. The story went that Kelbessa had ordered her father executed,and his body dumped by the roadside.

Eventually Edge was transferred to a regular prison, where she served a three-year sentence. When she was released, in 1981, she made a daringescape from Ethiopia, paying a band of Somali nomads to smuggle her across the desert to Djibouti. From there, via a refugee program, she immigrated to Canada. She married an Ethiopian and moved to Detroit.

Shivering through one winter, Edge read the novel "Gone With the Wind,"and something in it captured her imagination. She decided to move to Atlanta. She loved it there: loved the big Ethiopian community, loved thewarm weather, loved the red clay, which reminded her of the soil in Sidamo, the province where she was born.

Then she saw Kelbessa. "He made my life so miserable," Edge says. "He'sthe person who snatched away my happiness, my youth, my laugh at thatage. I didn't want to leave him alone. I didn't want to let it go. Knowing that he is living here, after he did so many crimes." She added: "I had to do something, even if it was a small thing. I hadn't any idea about the magnitude of this case. For me it is a simple case."

Her lawyers knew better. At the time, using the Alien Tort statute to pursue human rights violators was a fringe idea, the project of a small group of left-leaning legal activists. No one was even certain whether theapproach was constitutional. A judge in Atlanta might easily decide that the sorrows of Ethiopia were not of his court's concern. At the very least,the lawyers told Edge, it would help to have some additional plaintiffs, a few more victims to corroborate her story.

Edge went home and started working the Ethiopian immigrant network. She remembered that her old cellmate, Sosena, had a sister in Los Angeles named Elizabeth, who had been in prison. (For reasons of privacyElizabeth has asked that her last name not be used.) She agreed to participate in the lawsuit and called a close friend in Ottawa, Hirut Abebe-Jiri. The two women flew down to Atlanta. Edge took them to the Colony Square, and from a distance they watched Kelbessa, standing in the sky- lighted lobby in his gray bellhop's uniform. "It was unbelievable," recalls Hirut, who claims Kelbessa tortured and imprisoned her for three months."The guy who was leading all these people with his Uzi on his chest now becoming just a guy who was carrying a suitcase."

When the trial convened at the Atlanta federal courthouse, in May 1993, the gallery was filled with Ethiopians. Paul Hoffman, a prominent Los Angeles human rights lawyer, led a team of attorneys for the plaintiffs. Kelbessa, who couldn't afford a lawyer, defended himself. He wore a suit and a thick mustache and spoke with a heavy accent. "I have never tortured," Kelbessa said in his opening statement. "I'm not responsible for what Derg has done. Fifty-two million people are participating in therevolution. I'm an individual. I was working for the people."

Then the women testified, in gruesome detail, and Kelbessa cross- examined them. He assumed the manner of an interrogator, repeatedlyaccusing the women of having once been members of the undergroundresistance.

"You don't feel shame when you lie?" he asked Edge. "What did you do?"

"I didn't do nothing," she replied, her anger getting the best of her English. "I don't have to." She added: "You people are killing people, tortured people, detained people every day. You are the nightmare of Addis Ababa."

Three months later, the judge issued his decision, siding with the women and awarding them $1.5 million in damages. Kelbessa filed an appeal, declared bankruptcy and moved on. The verdict hardly troubled his daily existence; if anything, things improved. The Colony Square fired him, but he collected unemployment checks and used the free time to earn a degree in accounting from DeVry University. He later found a new job at the Westin. He married again, an Ethiopian 15 years his junior. When theyhad a son, in 1996, Kelbessa insisted on naming him Justice. The boy wasborn with a rare vitamin deficiency, however, and after nine months he died. They tried again and had a daughter, who is now a healthy and rambunctious 6-year-old. The year after the verdict, as he was pursuing his ultimately unsuccessful appeal, Kelbessa filed a naturalization application with the Immigration and Naturalization Service. On July 28, 1995, Kelbessa took an oath of allegiance and became a citizen of the United States.

The women who accused Kelbessa never thought their lawsuit would bringthem financial gain. (Over the years, they have managed to collect $798 in damages, which they have donated to charity.) They had, however, expected that all the trial publicity would prod the United States government to deport Kelbessa back to Ethiopia, where he would have to face real consequences. Mengistu's dictatorship had fallen, and Ethiopia's new government had appointed a special prosecutor to try those responsible for the Red Terror. Days after the verdict in Kelbessa's civil trial, the Ethiopian prosecutor formally asked the United States to turn him over. But the government never acted, and once Kelbessa became anAmerican citizen, deportation was out of the question. Around the time Kelbessa won his citizenship, Edge moved back to Detroit. If he was goingto be staying in Atlanta, she had to leave.

For the women, it was a wrenching turn of events. But the hard truth was,Kelbessa couldn't be kicked out of America simply on the basis of charges

— however substantiated — that he had tortured and killed people back home. American law, for complex reasons of history and politics, made it extraordinarily difficult to convey Kelbessa from his apartment in Atlantato a courtroom in Ethiopia, however much he belonged there.

The immigration law on the books, like the modern human rights movement itself, was a product of the Holocaust. In the 1950's and 60's,there were a number of cases in which fugitive war criminals were found to be living comfortable lives in America. Once they were discovered, it proved almost impossible to deport these people without evidence of recent crimes or fraud in the application process. So in the mid-70's, Elizabeth Holtzman, a New York congresswoman, proposed a law to bar Nazi criminals from the United States and a new Office of Special Investigations within the Justice Department to track them down. Yet thelaw was written narrowly, so that it would essentially apply only to Nazis.It was the cold war era; some of America's best friends were dictators.

With the end of the cold war, international human rights law evolved, coming to focus increasingly on conflicts in the developing world. The United Nations set up special courts to try those responsible for the carnage in the Balkans, Rwanda and Sierra Leone. The International Criminal Court, established in 1998, began investigating crimes committedin Congo, Uganda and the Darfur region of Sudan. In the United States, the use of the Alien Tort statute to pursue violators of human rights became an accepted legal practice, upheld (though somewhat narrowed) by a 2004 Supreme Court decision. But this international legal system — ifyou could even call it that yet — was still a jerry-built creation, with many hitches and flaws. For all the talk of universal rights, the world was still made up of sovereign nations with borders and rules. Kelbessa Negewo managed to find a haven in the wide gap between the aspirations of global justice and the reality of these earthbound things called laws. But only for a time.

When the women who accused Kelbessa heard that the government had awarded him citizenship, they were astonished and furious. Two of them flew down to Atlanta to tape a CNN segment, which was shown while President Bill Clinton was touring Africa. "This is a huge mistake they made," one of the women told the network. In 1999, Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, inspired by many similar stories — includinga Boston Globe account of a Bosnian baker in his home state who had been identified as a former paramilitary gunman — sponsored a bill to make past acts of torture or extrajudicial killing grounds for deportation, and to expand the mission of the Office of Special Investigations beyond Nazi-hunting.

Immigration and Naturalization Service officials, who apparently knew about the torture charges against Kelbessa when they awarded him citizenship, ordered a new investigation, the first step in the arduous process necessary to revoke it. The agency sent investigators to Ethiopiatwice to gather evidence and interview witnesses. "It was offensive that he was here as a citizen," says Kimberly Schroeder, the investigator whohandled the case, "and that bothered me terribly after meeting the women." Schroeder collaborated with the Ethiopian special prosecutor, who was preparing a case against Kelbessa. Under Mengistu the secret police had Soviet and East German advisers, and they had encouraged meticulous record-keeping. The prosecutors unearthed many archival documents that incriminated Kelbessa, like signed memos in which he described taking "revolutionary actions" — the favored euphemism for extrajudicial murder — on suspected resistance fighters.

"He is one of the most savage of all our cases," Yoseph Kiros, the prosecutor who handled Kelbessa's case, said in a telephone interview from Addis Ababa. Eventually, tired of waiting for Kelbessa's return, the Ethiopian prosecutors decided to try him in absentia before a three-judgetribunal, along with dozens of co-defendants from the neighborhood.

Because Kelbessa wasn't there, no defense attorney represented him. More than 100 witnesses came to testify. They accused Kelbessa of ordering many executions. One man was killed, according to testimony and written evidence, simply so Kelbessa could confiscate his Peugeot. InMay 2002, the tribunal convicted Kelbessa of several murders and sentenced him to life in prison.

Meanwhile, back in the United States, the legal barriers to Kelbessa's return home were finally falling. In 2004, after years of delays, Leahy's billfinally became law as part of the Intelligence Reform Act. The same autumn, as Kelbessa prepared to face a federal judge, he abruptly, and perhaps unwisely, decided to give up his citizenship without a fight.

Kelbessa had just bought a three-bedroom house in a subdivision south ofAtlanta. He did not have the money for years of appeals, and his wife as well as an attorney he consulted were urging him to get his legal battles finished. He signed a settlement agreement reluctantly, hoping his gestureof submission might persuade the government to leave him alone.

Three months later, on the morning of Jan. 4, 2005, armed federal agentsknocked at the door of Kelbessa's new suburban home. He was sound asleep; the night before, he worked a late shift at his hotel job. Kelbessa came downstairs in his nightclothes, groggy, asking what was going on.

The agents cuffed Kelbessa's hands behind his back. Then they put him ina car and drove him to a detention center.

I first met Kelbessa last December, a few days before Christmas, in a fluorescent-lighted room inside the Atlanta City Detention Center, a 14- story municipal jail where the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement leases space. He shuffled in, led by a beefy prison guard, hislegs shackled, his arms cuffed before him and affixed to a chain around his waist. He was wearing a bright orange prison uniform. His hair was thin, and his mustache was flecked with gray. Though only 55, he looked very frail. Kelbessa contorted his wrists within the cuffs in order to offer ahandshake. Then he sat down on a hard wooden bench.

"I didn't expect from America this kind of stuff, because this is a very highly civilized country," he told me. "I was trying to improve myself. Ibought a house. I was working hard. And all of a sudden, they accusedme, the government accused me." Kelbessa lowered his voice for emphasis and said, "I am not a torturer."

Kelbessa will be kept in detention for as long as his deportation case is pending, which is mandated by law, because his 2002 conviction in Ethiopia means that he is classified as a violent felon. "Because he's facinglife when he returns to Ethiopia, he's also considered a very high flight risk," Schroeder says.

Kelbessa says that that sentence was a product of a"sham trial." The damning memos that prosecutors uncovered have been taken out of context, he claims. When I asked him what he meant when he wrote his superiors about "weeding out" resistance fighters, he laughed. "That is revolutionary language," he said.

Kelbessa is terrified of what will happen to him if he is deported. He has seen the inside of an Ethiopian prison before. In 1979, as the Red Terror was winding down, the forces of the revolution turned against him, and hewas purged. Kelbessa was jailed, and only released when the military regime pardoned him several years later. Eventually it granted Kelbessa permission to emigrate to the United States, where he claimed asylum, saying, truthfully, that he had been a prisoner. "I was tortured for five years," Kelbessa said. He claimed he had never lied to immigration officials and said he believed that the United States had merely been duped by his home country's present government, which is led by Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, a former anti-Mengistu rebel. "I am just a victim," Kelbessa said. "I am a victim of the Ethiopian government. Before, I was avictim of the Derg military government. I can't tolerate torture now. I am old now for torture."

Kelbessa's fears may not be entirely unfounded. Prime Minister Meles's regime has gone to great pains to give the perpetrators of the Red Terror fair trials. It's a poor country, however, and the special tribunals have hadto deal with more than 2,000 defendants. Human rights groups have documented numerous irregularities. "Ethiopia has violated the rights of the defendants in its pursuit of justice," concluded a law review article by one American lawyer who consulted the tribunal. Prison conditions are uniformly awful. In the last year, Kelbessa is quick to note, Ethiopia's political situation has taken a drastic turn for the worse, as Meles has jailed journalists and opposition politicians. Human Rights Watch says political prisoners are sometimes abused.

Since the United States enacted its new, tough law aimed at immigrantswith a history of committing atrocities, some have questioned it, wondering whether the United States should be sending anyone, however loathsome, to places where their own rights might in turn be violated. "There has been a great deal of debate within the human rights community about the immigration option," says William Aceves, a law professor and the principal author of a 2002 Amnesty International report titled "United States of America: A Safe Haven for Torturers," which highlighted Kelbessa's case. "It's frustrating, because the human rights community is in favor of accountability, but we want to make sure that it'slegitimate accountability." Aceves and others point out that the United States has a federal torture statute, passed in 1994, which applies to acts committed anywhere in the world. But no one has ever been charged under the law. For now, the United States government is putting its energies into deportation cases instead. In less than two years, the immigration bureau has prosecuted or investigated more than 1,000 casesrelated to human rights abuses. Legal advocates for immigrants, however,caution that many of those caught thus far appear to be marginal figures, not masterminds.

Deportation cases are handled in a special nationwide system of immigration courts. As a result of the federal government's new vigilance about human rights abusers, these courts are increasingly playing a new role, as a way station between exile and, presumably, a trial back home. Even the best-run court system, however, would struggle with such distant events as the crimes of the Red Terror, with their complex politicaland ethnic overtones, and human rights advocates question whether the immigration court system, which is overburdened, underfinanced and opaque, is up to the task. "It's a really shocking system," says Carolyn Patty Blum, a Columbia University law professor who specializes in asylumand human rights cases. The standard of proof for deportation is lower than it is for criminal trials. There are usually few witnesses called. The proceedings are often closed to the public. There is no public defender. Normally, an Ethiopian facing deportation and certain life imprisonment athome could hope to find free legal representation within the network of lawyers affiliated with immigrant rights organizations. As a general principle, human rights groups like Amnesty International oppose trials in absentia like Kelbessa's. But after Kelbessa was arrested, his wife talked to every immigration lawyer she could find in Atlanta, and none would take his case. A few were sympathetic until they heard the details of his past. So for now, Kelbessa is fighting deportation on his own. In his cell, he keeps a large stack of well-thumbed trial transcripts, plaintive letters toAttorney General Alberto Gonzales and legal briefs, which he writes by hand on notebook paper.

Kelbessa's deportation hearing took place over two days last July. The judge in the case, William Cassidy, has a reputation as one of the nation's toughest. In a reprise of the last trial, 12 years before, Edge, Elizabeth and Hirut told their stories, and Kelbessa, in his orange prison garb, cross-examined them. He threw around a few unfounded accusations. But he just wasn't the same ferocious questioner. Kelbessa called just two character witnesses in his defense. When his wife took the stand, their fidgety daughter sat on her lap, and she swore she had never heard Kelbessa raise his voice in anger. Even the women testifying against him felt a twinge of pity for the family. But then again, none of them had everhad any children. "I couldn't bring any child in this world," Hirut told me. "It's not safe."

Kelbessa has never expressed sympathy for the women who say they endured so much suffering. "These are the feudal children," he told me when I visited him a second time, in March. "Their fathers used to have big land, and so many tenants." Edge's father was a senator. Elizabeth's was a supreme court justice. Hirut's was a lawyer and a confidant of Haile Selassie's son. As children of privilege, he said, "they didn't accept the change — they didn't like the change." They were in their teens or just barely beyond, but to Kelbessa, fired as he was by fear, ambition and resentment, their parentage was enough to identify them as threats. "They are not innocent," he said. "There are no innocents. In Ethiopia, youcan't say, 'innocent.'"

When he looks back on the whole saga now, the 17 years since that chance meeting at the Colony Square Hotel, all Kelbessa sees is one large,many-faced conspiracy, orchestrated by his enemies back in Ethiopia. "I think you know about third world politics," he told me. "They want revenge." The idea that there might be motivations other than vengeance,that there might be no dark political force at work, that this might simply be a story of happenstance and justice, seems genuinely never to have occurred to him. He can see the world only as a struggle between two ruthless forces. For him, the Red Terror has never ended.

Last July, Judge Cassidy ruled that Kelbessa should be deported and dismissed his claims that he would be tortured in Ethiopia. The case is now making its way through a long, lurching appeals process, which couldtake anywhere from a few more months to a few years. If no court overturns the deportation order, then one day, federal agents will come toKelbessa's cell. He will be allowed to change into civilian clothes. He will be handcuffed and escorted onto a flight to Addis Ababa. At the airport, the agent will hand Kelbessa over to Ethiopian officials. Then he will most likely be taken to Kaliti Prison, on the outskirts of the capital. There he willbegin his new life.

Andrew Rice is writing a book about Uganda. His last article for themagazine was about low-income housing. (Text ends)

IGAD News: Ethiopia, Kenya to help rebuild Somalia'

NAIROBI, Kenya (Apr il 24, 2012) – Ethiopia and Kenya have reaffirmedtheir commitment to continue working together with Somalia to help its government towards reconstruction. Speaking after holding bilateral talks with the Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn in Nairobi, President Uhuru Kenyatta said that conflict in Somalia had affected its neighbours. The Head of State said: “On IGAD and regional peace and development, we focused on our efforts to contribute to sustainable peace, reconstruction and development in Somalia.” “Kenya and Ethiopia remains strategic partners especially within the IGAD framework in the search for peace and political stability of Somalia. Kenya and Ethiopia continue to bear a disproportionate burden occasioned by the long standing crisis which afflicted that neighbourly state more than 20 years ago,” the president added, saying that they also touched on efforts towards the positive developments on the negotiations between Sudan and South Sudan. The president reaffirmed his government’s commitmentto enhancing the relations with Ethiopia while opening opportunities that benefit people in the two countries.The Head of State said the bilateral relations between the two countries were not only hinged on a long tradition of friendship but also on a Special Status Agreement. Within the framework of co-operation for mutual benefit, the two Heads of State alsoconferred on the modalities of actualising the Lamu Port-Southern Sudan-Ethiopia Transport Corridor (LAPSSET) project as part of the common destiny, as neighbours and a region. President Kenyatta and the Prime Minister also spoke on matters relating to the African Union, of which Desalegn is the current chairman. With regard to the AU which is commemorating 50 years since its launch, the president assured that Kenya would remain a strong supporter of the pursuit of Africa’s unity andvision of a common development agenda. Source: Capital FM News

Ethiopia: Fire Destroys UNESCO-Registered Coffee Forest'

(OPride) – April 30, 2013: A recent massive brush fire in the Illu Abba- Boura zone of Oromia region, Ethiopia has wiped out a sizable portion of the UNESCO-registered Yayu Coffee Forest Biosphere Reserve, reports said. The cause of the blaze, which has spread around the Yayu forest over the last several weeks, remains unknown. According to eyewitness accounts, the blaze has scorched an estimated 50 to 80 acres of the thickcoffee forest. “Such fire has never happened before in the history of the Yayu forest and the knowledge of the people living in the area,” one Yayuresident, who asked not to be named, told OPride. “It has been burning for several weeks without any intervention from the government except that of the local community to contain it to protect its advancement to their side.” The internationally recognized Yayu forest is home to the last remaining species of wild coffee Arabica and some of Ethiopia’s rare floraand bird species. Several diaspora-based activists have accused the government for setting the forest ablaze to make a way for its development projects. The state-run media ignored the fire, and instead reported on a new fertilizer factory being built near the area. Citing several “journalists working for the government TV and radio stations,” New York-based political analyst Jawar Mohammed said, Ethiopian authorities have once again imposed a media blackout warning local reporters, including those working for state-run media houses, not to cover the story. EPRDF, Ethiopia's ruling party, now in power for 22 years,has been accused of setting forest reserves on fire in the past. For example, in 1999 and early 2000, a similar forest fire in Bale and Borana, also in the Oromia region, led to Oromia-wide student protests and the government's slow response caused a strong public outcry. At the time, instead of putting out the fire, the government resorted to cracking down on students. As was the case in 2000, eyewitnesses said the government is blaming the current fire on locals amid reports of some arrests.

"The Ethiopian regime is known for playing the blame game on others for its own crimes," another Yayu native told OPride last week. "The government doesn't want the image of the coal mining and fertilizer factory projects to be associated with such environmental destructions," the source said. Eyewitness reports indicate that the government alleges, "the fire was lit by people doing forest honey collection, a process associated with the life of the local people." The OPride source noted, the locals lived collecting honey for generations, "but never witnessed such incidents of disaster." According to a new research by Plos One, a peer- reviewed online international publication, while there is some wild coffee in the Bale mountains range, the Yayu forest has "the largest and most diverse populations of indigenous (wild) Arabica" anywhere in the world. Ethiopia's overall forest reserves have dwindled in the last two decades due to growing population, land scarcity, and uncontrolled deforestation inthe name of development. In 2010, the Food and Agricultural Organization(FAO) estimated Ethiopia's forest cover at 12.2 million hectare or 11 percent of the total landmass. The study noted a decline from 15.11 million hectare in 1990 (a year before the current regime took office).

While statistics on forest fire is rare, the FAO study said, "in 2008 fire affected 16 163 hectare of land in the autonomous region of Oromiya." UNESCO Biosphere Reserves are meant as sustainable development test cases in efforts "to reconcile conservation of biological and cultural diversity and economic and social development through partnerships between people and nature." The Yayu forest reserve is one such effort bythe international body to find sustainable ways for the forest to be preserved. But as another Yayu native, who asked not to be identified dueto fear of repercussions told OPride, little has been done besides symbolicUNESCO designation as the initiative crosses the "the political border of national development interest." The source added, the federal "government never really supported the designation of the Yayu afromontane forest area as a UNESCO reserve." "Rather, a team of scientists at Addis Ababa University led by Dr. Tadesse Woldemariam, which used the forest as a research base for several advanced studies supported by German based institutions affiliated to the interest in the forest coffee put a great deal of effort into this."

Evidently, the federal government has struggled with how to proceed with its development agenda in the area. According to our source, more than ten years ago, local youth raised concerns that the development objectives didn't offer benefits for the local people. To "address" this local discontent and lend the projects some legitimacy, the federal government turned to few elites who grew up in the area but whose parents were relocated from Tigray during the infamous 1985 famine. Speaking about the government's efforts to assuage local grievances, the source gave an example of certain Getachew Atsbeha, a graduate of the local high school,who flew in with an Ethiopian Defense Forces helicopter last year leading ateam of visiting researchers of the new project. While the recent Yayu forest fire has been contained, in large part thanks to heavy rain and community involvement, the lingering issues over planned projects remain. "The government seems intent on selling the land," one caller saidon ESAT Radio program last week. "People have been displaced to make ways for the factories...government officials and state-owned enterprises are moving in...even the daily laborers are coming from Tigray." Accordingto sources familiar with the ongoing projects, the main project under construction is a multi-purpose fertilizer factory. "The project became a cause for developing the area such as the road in Yayu town and constructing houses for the staff in the project," the source said. "This hasdirect links to other national projects such as the sugar industry...the fertilizer will be used to support the sugarcane production, while other mechanized farming in Gambella and Benishangul regions [are expected to] become immediate consumers." As fertilizer prices continue to soar worldwide, the building of a local manufacturer would reduce the import of fertilizer. In addition, the sugar factories around the country would operate on coal that would be produced in Yayu alongside the fertilizer.

The alternative energy source will then reduce over reliance onhydroelectric power.

Last January, local newspaper Capital Ethiopia reported, the state-owned engineering company, Metal and Engineering Corporation, "is on the righttrack to produce fertilizer for the next cropping season." By the end of themuch-publicized Growth and Transformation Plan, which ends in 2015, "Ethiopia envisions building eight fertilizer companies in the Oromia Regional state as per its governing five-year economic plan," the report said. "The construction of Yayu fertilizer factory number one and two will reach 65 percent and 33 percent completion rate, respectively, this year. The design work for the Dap factory is already completed, while civil workand equipment production is underway." The Ethiopian government has commissioned several feasibility studies on the Yayu coal reserves for many years. Most recently a Chinese firm called COMPLANT did a study with a price of 12 million birr. The study found the Yayu area has over "100 million tons of coal", which could "produce 300,000 tons of Urea [used in the manufacture of fertilizer], 250,000 tons of Dap, 20,000 tons of ethanol and 90MW of electric power annually for decades." Following the feasibility study, "in March 2012, METEC awarded the construction of the first fertilizer factory in the country to Tekleberhan Ambaye Construction Plc at a cost of 792 million birr," according to Capital Ethiopia. The government turned to COMPLANT, after a 2005 study by a European consultancy firm, Fichiner, deemed the project not environmentally responsible temporarily forcing the government to reconsider the project, according to Addis Fortune.

The Long Run: Running Wild in Ethiopia'

Endurance: Last month I had the thrill of traveling to Ethiopia for a uniquecultural running adventure. When we weren't busy volunteering at a campto help improve eye health, helping to develop sustainable education practices, visiting schools, and learning how to cook traditional Ethiopian cuisine, we were running with some of the world's best distance runners. My runs in the Tigray countryside and amid the hustle and bustle of downtown Addis Ababa provided insight as to what makes the Ethiopian running culture so special. And through it all there was one simple aspect that stood out: the runners of Ethiopia use their surroundings, whatever they may be. Every day, as the call to morning prayer and mass could be heard echoing in the darkness of Addis Ababa, runners of all ages and abilities gathered at Meskel Square for exercise. The rows of an outdoor auditorium turned into a running labyrinth as adults and children ran the dirt maze, snaking their way down a row until they reached the end and moved up to the next level, repeating the process until they reach the top row, totaling 5 kilometers. Some people did dips and pull-ups on the scaffolding of the adjacent billboards; another group did sprints up the center aisle stone steps; still others used cement pillars for a calisthenic circuit routine. With no real equipment, Meskel Square isn't a state-of-the-art or even official gym, but I was amazed at how hundreds of people were able to accomplish a morning workout so effectively and efficiently. Icouldn't help but think of the times I question having the right training equipment or terrain and needing the latest technology to get the best workout.

Ethiopia's Distance Running Legacy: The next day in the hills above Addis Ababa at YaYa Village, we ran with the great Haile Gebrselassie. At 9,000 feet above sea level, the vegetation is a mix of high grassland, small bushes and eucalyptus trees. We followed in a line behind Haile as he darted overland, bouncing along the natural carpet of grass and ducking inbetween trees. It was almost like we were a herd of playful gazelles chasing Haile, never knowing when he would take a sharp corner and slip through a small passage between bushes. For 30 minutes we played his game of follow the leader in an area no larger than a square kilometer, and I honestly felt like a kid again. I was amazed at how effective this natural obstacle course running could be for developing technique, speed and agility, not to mention fun. It made me think of how I might add this type of training on my own running routes.

Two days later, I led our group to the Mekele track for the Sunday sunriseroutine of the local junior athletes. When we arrived in the pre-dawn light,the simple dirt track was abuzz with activity. Hundreds of children and adults were running in groups around the track, doing calisthenics on the infield and bounding up the bleachers. Some of the girls and boys were ripping around the track in jelly sandals or bare feet. The energy emitting from the track was an electrifying blend of inspiration and motivation, enough to make anyone want to run laps and maybe run just a little fasteror farther. Running around the outside lanes, I reveled in what I was witnessing. These young Ethiopians were using each other to get out and run no matter their equipment, ability or training goal. There is a reason why these young runners weren't out doing their own individual runs on the roads. Maybe running is more social than we like to believe? The atmosphere I discovered on my trip — a joy of running, a sense of community and a passion for the simple aspects of life — is what makes the Ethiopian running culture so rich and produces some of the world's greatest distance runners. Sometimes the secrets to success are in our own backyard. Source: Competitor Magazine by Scott Jurek

On Ethiopian Embassies And Head Missions Abroad'

The Ethiopian Ministry of Foreign Affairs maintains that Ethiopia has about40 missions (embassies and consular offices) in Europe, North America, Asia, and Africa. These missions officially represent Ethiopia and poise to serve the Ethiopian Diaspora and Ethiopian-origin nationals. They also intend to encourage and facilitate the transfer of capital, technology, and science to Ethiopia. Since recent times, missions seem to aggressively work on 1) winning the hearts and minds of foreign investors particularly from the Arab world, India, and China, and 2) collecting funds for the construction of the "Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD)". To what extent Ethiopian missions abroad accomplish their missions? This is not forsure easy to answer mainly because information about the operations of the missions is not made readily available. But from media reports and mission-organized events, one could identify several areas such unregulated exportation of labour force (young unmarried women) to Middle Eastern & Gulf Arab states, collecting funds from the Ethiopian Diaspora, on national image building, and of course, on knowledge transfer such as facilitation and transfer of capital, technology, and scientific technology to Ethiopia where missions seem to perform inadequately.

Ethiopian missions could, in addition to their consular/visa-related services, embark on ambitious and more significant projects. They do have all the opportunities to exploit the talent and resource of the Ethiopian Diaspora. They could learn from foreign countries' democraticideals and practices. In a way, they could be change agents when it comes to Ethiopian politics and economics. This is possible if and only ifthey start to be dictated by logic, reason, evidence and principles of human rights versus party affiliation and mere indoctrination. Missions need not limit their missions to the service of governing parties: they are supposed to represent Ethiopia as a nation. They should also consult the government on such key strategic issues as the rule of law, democratic governance, and generally freedom of all sorts. But before that, they haveto make sure that they themselves believe in and advance democratic cultures and alternative voices. Reducing ambassadorial role to 1) the collection of small funds from a limited number of the Diaspora, and 2) the invitation of foreigners to cheaply invest in Ethiopia is nothing but a miscalculation and misrepresentation of national interest.

ETHIOPIA - Farewell Archbishop Abune Petros’

The statue of Abune Petros, which erected in 1941 in memory of the archbishop of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, moved to its temporary location recently (on Friday, May 02, 2013). The decision to relocate the statue came after the Ethiopian Railway Corporation (ERC) began the construction of the 34Km Addis Light Rail Transit (LRT) project. The LRT project runs in two directions. In the north-south direction, the project begins fromAdwa Square, a few hundred meters from where the statue currently stands and passes through it in an underground tunnel. After therelocation, the contractor, China Railway Group Limited (CREC), will commence digging up the area and construct concrete walls for future underpass of the city's first ever electric rail transit.

UN chief aware of crimes against humanity in Ethiopia'

The cry of Amharas in Benishangul-Gumuz, Gura-Ferda, and Waldiba monastry who were ethnically cleansed and dumped as landless and homeless by cruel and inhuman TPLF/Woyane thugs carrying the ID of "Nations and Nationalities" is indeed the turning point in the bitter struggle. The UN Secretary General was aware of what was going in Ethiopia especially the Ethnic Cleansing even before he received the protesters letter. The PM has stated without any equivocation was that removing Ethiopian “peoples” from an area based on their ethnic identity is an act by anti-people groups; the phrase he used was ጸረ-ሕዝብ, and he emphasized the fact that every Ethiopian has a constitutional right to workfreely anywhere in Ethiopia. The Ethnic Cleansing of the Amharas was to secure land for TPLF landlords. The list of the people who are directly connected to the crime against humanity were out to the public and UN . Umed Obang, (Gambella) Shiferaw Shigute, (Gura Ferda and South Omo Valley), Ahmed Nasir, Beni Shangul-Gumuz, Abdi Mohamud Omar, (Ogaden) Abay Tsehaye and Sebhat Nega , Waldiba monastery was also inshort list for crimes against humanity present and past for which many Ethiopians demanded for UN investigation. Prime Minster Hailemariam wasforced to admit in the parliament about Ethnic Cleansing after his European tour. He blamed onto "local administrators" for carrying out the crimes. Yes crime is committed locally but order was given from the central government whose some were heard saying on VoA and ESAT Radio that they needed to clear the land for foreign investment. The past crimes against the Annuaks, the Mursis, the Oromos, and Ogaden population who were executed under the direct order of the late prime minister Meles Zenawi. The crowd condemned PM Hailemariam Desalegn as a "leader" who is backed by TPLF thugs behind the curtain to finish the Job the late Meles Zenawi started two decades ago. Bereket Simon and Shiferaw Tekelamriam directors of the Movie "Jihadawi Harekat", Christians vs Muslims anti Muslim propaganda were among the ones accused of crimes against humanity. US Secretery of State John Carry who is travelling to Addis Ababa for the 50th anniversary of OAU/AU next month would be expected to engage in a serious of discussions with seniorgovernment officials on government backed ethnic cleansing and other human rights violations in Ethiopia, the protest organizers told Ethiomedia.

TPLF veteran's second child arrested'

ESAT News: May 03, 2013: The second child of Asgede Gebresellasie, author of three volumes of critical writings titled "Gahdi" and known for revealing human rights abuses committed in Tigray Region, has been arrested. Yemane Asgede Gebresellasie, 28, a graduate of software engineering and teacher in Wekro area, Tigray Region, was deployed to a desert area when the recruiters first found out that he was the son of Asgede, his father said. Asgede said that when Yemane travelled with his mother, Major Geday Wolde Michael for medical treatment to an area where his grandparent lives, Adahlaye, a school found in the area was burnt. The officials were unsuccessful in accusing his son as the person who burnt the school as the residents whom the officials gathered and were informing said it was a false accusation and opposed it. After the completion of the meeting, the officials arrested Yemane. Asgede said his other son, Akhfom, 26, who was arrested in the secret illegal prison calledBado 6 prison few weeks ago, has been transferred to another prison andhe was able to see him for the first time since his arrest through the pressure of the international community. He is set to appear in court afterone month. Asgede said there are many prisons known as Bermuda in Tigray Region. "Their (officials) children study on people's wealth but our children suffer in prisons. There is no human rights abuse than this" he said.

Int'l organs and states condemn Court's decision on Eskinder, Andualem'

ESAT News: May 03, 2013 - The upholding of the decisions of the Supreme Court, yesterday, on appellants Andualem Arage, Eskinder Nega,Nathnael Mekonen, Kinfemichael Debebe, Yohannes Terefe, Shambel Yeshewas Yehunealem and Andualem Ayalew is being condemned internationally. The U.S. government, an ally of the Ethiopian government, condemned the decision and called for the release of the prisoners also through its Deputy State Department Spokesman Patrick Ventrell. It also called for the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation to be re- examined. The Spokesman, pointing the close relationship of the two countries, stated that his government will put the necessary efforts for therelease of the prisoners of conscience. He said “the United States is deeplydisappointed that Ethiopia’s Federal Supreme Court upheld the conviction and harsh sentencing of journalist Eskinder Nega and opposition politician Andualem Arage under the country’s Anti-Terrorism Proclamation and the Penal Code. Today’s decision further reinforces our serious concern about Ethiopia’s politicized prosecution of those critical of the government and ruling party, including under the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation. We continueto urge the release of those who have been imprisoned in Ethiopia for exercising their human rights and fundamental freedoms.”

Similarly, international organizations have condemned the Court’s decisionon the prisoners of conscience; they said that the government has again missed its chance of showing that it respects international law. Freedom Now, Amnesty International, CIVICUS: World Alliance for Citizen Participation, the Committee to Free Eskinder Nega, the East and Horn of Africa Human Rights Defenders Project, the Electronic Frontier Foundation,English PEN, the International Press Institute, the International Women’s Media Foundation, Media Legal Defence Initiative, the National Press Club,PEN American Center, PEN Canada, and the World Association of Newspapers and News Publishers, condemned the decision by the Ethiopian Supreme Court upholding the 18-year sentence imposed againstindependent journalist and blogger Eskinder Nega. The organizations said that the misusing of the anti-terror legislation to stifle and silence critical voices and the peaceful work of journalists like Mr. Nega and his colleagues Reeyot Alemu and Woubshet Taye, undermines the credibility and interest of the government to fight terrorism. After the sentencing, the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention foundthat the continued imprisonment of Mr. Nega violates Ethiopia’s obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,to which it is a party, and called for his immediate release. In related news, Bitset Hailegiorgis, 70, mother of Kinfemichael Debebe (Questo), one of the appellants whose sentence was yesterday reduced from 21 to 16 years, said that her son was innocent and did not commit any crime and said that she was not pleased with the five years reduction. Bitset said that she was proud of her son’s struggle for truth and said she was unhappy that her son was labeled a ‘terrorist’.

Chewing the Stimulant Khat Increasingly Popular Among Ethiopians – VoA'

ADDIS ABABA — By Martha van der Wolf - The cultural tradition of chewing khat, a leaf that is a mild narcotic, is on the rise in Ethiopia. The East African nation is one of the world’s chief exporters of the crop, earning hundreds of millions of dollars a year. Khat’s popularity is growing as more members of the middle and upper classes are chewing the leaf. The natural stimulant is considered to be mildly addictive and the leaf hasbecome the country's number-two export behind coffee. But in Ethiopia itself, the government has banned khat houses. That means men now gather in private homes to chew and discuss daily life, politics and sports. "I started chewing about seven or eight years go," one man explained. "Itgives me energy to do more work. When I'm chewing I feel happy and I'm more effective." "I started chewing about a month ago," another man said. "I wish I started chewing before because it gives me pleasure and more energy to do work. You just have to be careful not to become addicted." Khat not only boosts energy but boosts Ethiopia's economy.

Although official numbers are not available, thousands farmers are believed to be growing khat. The plant can be harvested up to four times a year, and with millions of people using it in East Africa, Yemen and in the diaspora, it is more profitable than other crops. The sector not only provides employment in rural areas, it also creates jobs in the cities. Now,there is a new phenomenon in capital city Addis Ababa: khat home delivery boys on scooters. "There are some people who don't want to be seen at a khat shop by other people so we deliver for those people," a delivery boy explained. "There are also other people, they want to sit in their house, they just want to relax." As the demand for the leaf in Ethiopia has increased, so has the price. "Khat was very cheap 10 years ago compared to today. The highest price then was 20 or 25 birr. But today, half a bundle of khat is 60 birr and a full bundle of khat is 120 birr," a khat chewer complained. Studies show that health consequences of chewing khat are limited. Dawit Wondimagegn is dean is the Addis Ababa University Medical School. He questioned whether a growing number of users is desirable. "The question we need to ask is whether khat chewing results in a lack of productivity or lack of opportunity [and] predisposes young people to chew more khat," he remarked. "In places like ours, where there is no meaningful employment, people get bored andthey could go and start chewing khat to spend their time. We have to analyze this question very carefully." While students and professionals use khat in hopes of improving their school results or work performance, sometowns in the country empty out in the afternoon after people start chewing. So while khat production is flourishing, it is not yet clear if more users will create less productive Ethiopians.

Tensions are high in Jigjiga as Region's President Abdi Iley accuses members of his cabinet to be ONLF'

JIGJIGA - The latest news reaches from Ogaden confirms that Jigjiga is in turmoil, griped by tension and confusion related to reliable news indicating the expected removal of the notorious Abdi Iley from his post as head of the so-called Somali RegionalState (SRS). The removal of Abdi Iley is spearheaded by Ethiopian PM Hailemariam Hesalegn who tried several times to replace him but could not succeed as senior Tigrean army generals based in the Ogaden have objected to it. Abdi Iley established close relationship with the Tigrean Generals by bribing them with money he siphoned off from the coffers of the Somali regional administration. Sources within the regional cabinet reported that Abdi Iley was summoned to Addis Ababa 10 days ago to beinformed that he will be removed from his current post and appointed asminister in the Federal Government, to which Abdi Iley apparently rejected.

Abdi Iley tried desperately to convince PM Hailemariam Desalegn of his indispensability as head of Somali Regional State reasoning that there is no capable person at present who is as trustworthy to Ethiopian regime ashe is who can do his job of securing the security of the Somali regional administration. He played as usual the ONLF card by saying to Mr.

Desalegn: "I've been cleansing 'anti-peace elements' from my administration for the last three years. But I found out just last month that some members of my cabinet have secret relations with the ONLF." He also told the Prime Minster "The ones you're trying to replace me withare secretly working with the ONLF." He blackmailed the Federal Government that the Liyu Police will defect in large numbers to the ONLFif he is removed, since they trust no one else.

After that squabble, Abdi Iley was instructed to go back to Jigjiga and waitfor the arrival in Jigjiga of a delegation from the prime minister's office.

When Abdi Iley returned to Jigjiga, he immediately convened a closed door meeting with senior commanders of the Liyuu Police from his Ogadeni sub-clan. They are: Abdirahman 'Laba-go'le, head of Liyuu Police operations; Abdi Aden Waris, commander of the Liyuu Police; and Shiekh Mukhtar, head of the secret service. Abdi Iley instructed these men to tell Hailemariam Desalegn's delegation when they arrive in Jigjiga that there is no one they can trust and work with other than him (Abdi Iley); that they will stop working if Abdi Iley is replaced; and that they suspect seniormembers of the regional administration for having connections to the ONLF.

These men then went into action and organized what they called an attempt of desertion from the Liyu Police that was followed by large scale round-ups of Liyu Police men, and the extra-judicial killing of senior Liyu Police officers. Sources also confirm that Abdi Iley is organizing a ploy against several persons he suspects that Hailemariam Desalegn intends toreplace him with. It is expected that he will soon arrest some of these men and accuse them of being ONLF. In the midst of this created confusion and turmoil, Abdi Iley intends to eliminate those he has grudgesagainst, sources indicate. The Tigreans army commanders in the region are in cahoots with Abdi Iley in this dirty game in apparent attempt to show Mr. Hailemariam Desalegn the heavy price he will pay by interfering with their backyard in Ogaden, and probably to force a change in the PM desire to replace president Abdi Iley. Source: ONA

Ethiopia – Public anger flares after Eritrea supports Egypt's "historicrights" to Nile waters'

ADDIS ABABA: Anger is fomenting in Ethiopia following last month's statements from the Eritrean government over who has a right to Nile River water, which has become a contentious issue in recent years between Ethiopia and Egypt, who claims the lion's share of water from theworld's largest waterway. The Eritrean government said in April that it supported Egypt's position over a controversial colonial-era treaty that grants Egypt a right a majority of the Nile's water resources. The Red Seanation expressed its support in a message sent from the Eritrean president and delivered to Egypt's president by Eritrean Foreign Minister Osman Saleh and Presidential Adviser for Political Affairs, Yemane Gebreab. The Egyptian president, Mohamed Morsi, has highly welcomed Eritrea's position towards Egypt's "historic rights" over the sharing of the water of the Nile River. Morsi said that he looks forward to meeting his Eritrean counterpart.

Here in Ethiopia, government officials told Bikyanews.com that the issue has led to increased tensions between the two neighbors, which have fought wars over territory. "This is just not right and we demand the Eritrean government issue an apology and deliver what is Ethiopia's to Ethiopia. The Nile River cannot be an issue that leads to violence," a waterofficial said, hinting that war over water in the region is on the rise. The dam project has seen widespread concerns from Egypt and Sudan, who have echoed the Saudi official's sentiments over the project, which they see as an infringement on their historical rights to Nile water. The dam could threaten the regional stability after the Egyptian government said it remained "concerned" over Ethiopia's actions along the Nile River. The anger comes as Ethiopia and Eritrea both attempt to mend relations strained over the years. Ethiopian government officials this week reaffirmed their commitment to have peace discussions with longtime foe and neighbor Eritrea with the aim of ending decades of tension along the border that has seen war and strife.

During his meeting with the United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki- moon in New York, the Ethiopian Minister of Foreign Affairs Tedros Adhanom Guebre Eyesus accused the Eritrean government of refusing to engage in peace talks. Adhanom said his country is ready to sit down for direct negotiations with Eritrea without any preconditions regarding to level, time or venue. But the Ethiopian top diplomat stressed "the belligerent party opposed to these talks has always been the Eritrean side". According to the ministry of foreign Affairs, Tedros expressed solidarity with the people of Eritrea whom he said are continuously suffering due the regime's "brutality and obstinacy to peace". Ethiopia andEritrea fought a border war in 1998-2000 that has killed an estimated 70,000 people. The two East African adversaries remain at loggerheads since the disputed key town of Badme had been awarded to Eritrea by an international border commission. Government officials here in the Ethiopiacapital told Bikyanews.com that they are "confident" that the situation willfinally be resolved. One foreign ministry spokesperson, who was not authorized to speak with the media, said that they hoped “the ongoing discussions between government officials would lead to a finality of the situation and help to build and mend the broken ties between the two countries.” It is still unclear where the people fall in the ongoing negotiations, with many telling Bikyanews.com that they believe the timeis now to end the tension along the border and start to build new economic relations. BN

A Female Doctor headed to Ethiopia’

SPRING HILL - When Dr. Natalie Leibensperger steps off of the airplane in Ethiopia this summer, sightseeing will likely be the farthest thing from hermind. Leibensperger, medical director at My Gynecologist in Spring Hill, will be working at Soddo Christian Hospital. Soddo, a city of about 80,000,is in south-central Ethiopia, just more than 200 miles from the country’s capital, Addis Ababa. With 120 beds, the hospital serves some 3 million residents in the immediate, rural region. Leibensperger said she has wanted to do mission work for quite a while, but has only recently been able to arrange time away from her own practice. A colleague with whom she worked with in Michigan retired to Ethiopia a few years ago and practices at the hospital there. Leibensperger will be filling in for him as hetakes time off from his duties of performing emergency C-sections at the hospital. “He’s working harder now than when he was in practice” in the United States, Leibensperger said.

Anxious and excited about spending her July in Africa, Leibensperger saidthe most daunting thing is she doesn’t quite know what to expect. “Medicine there is not medicine here,” Leibensperger said, explaining the women who do deliver their babies at the hospital often stay just a few hours before returning home. A woman delivered surprise triplets recentlyafter the hospital lost its ultrasound machine. In Spring Hill, she’s in control. In Ethiopia, she doesn’t exactly know what kinds of cases are waiting for her. Due to the lack of resources and organized health care there, Leibensperger is raising money through her church, Vineyards Christian Church, in hopes of purchasing equipment the hospital desperately needs — a new ultrasound machine and a hysteroscope. A new ultrasound can cost up to $40,000, she said, and a hysteroscope lessthan $10,000. Leibensperger said the Ethiopian government has tight restrictions on bringing in used medical equipment, so cash donations arethe best way to help the cause. Source: The Tampa Tribune

Ethiopia: Easter (Fasika) - Impulsive Purchase Burdens Livelihoods'

May 5, 2013 - Holidays in Ethiopia involve tight transaction sessions between consumers and traders. The sessions vary from transactions at livestock to consumables markets, as could be seen from the pictures taken at the different markets of Addis Abeba. Come Sunday, followers ofthe Orthodox Church shall be celebrating Easter. For most of them, the 55 days of lent, fasting from meat, poultry or dairy products, will come to anend, heralding the spell of feasting. As the countdown starts to tick, the holiday prone community indulges into a frenzy of shopping. The race between security forces and street vendors soars high. People from all walks of life commit their savings to spend on all the goods and commodities that they can lay their hands on, irrespective of the selling price. In an already unstructured market economy, transactions of any type can involve a price quoting of any amount by anybody standing behind the counter.

Experts in the field try to explain in vain what causes inflation and how thefigures translate into real delivery of marketable materials. The laity only cares about what they can buy with the money they have in their pockets,regardless of what point leaders try to get across the table. What really matters is what is happening down on the ground. For instance, recently, I had been to one of the Tej Bets in the vicinity of Arada, better known as Dejach Wube Sefer. The weather was fine, allowing me to sit outdoors to be at a vantage point and see what goes on around. The container of tej, which is a round bottomed glassy flask, was filled with the yellow brew of honey mead. Every customer knows that tej is a long drink. They have to pose for a while before they gulp it down. When observed holistically, theygive the general picture of people sitting side by side and getting ready to blow yellow balloons! After a while, a vendor carrying a cardboard box filled with brandished knives came by. He took his seat and ordered a flask of tej as a token to delude the bartender about his real intentions. Ofcourse, it was understandable that he was there for business. Some regulars started choosing knives of their liking. Some were feeling the sharpness of the knives with the tips of their thumbs.

What better test could there be than the law of the thumb? Many of the customers were trying to crack jokes on the subject. They said that there is no point in vending knives when there is nothing affordable to use it for.Livestock market prices have risen alarmingly. Some of the regulars had been saving for months to buy an ox and share the meat. In the past eight or 10 men were able to slay an ox worth 4,000Br. These days, however, an ox costs four times as much. That kind of yearly arrangementhas now thinned away and only those with better incomes continue to do so. Knife acquisition is rather an extra addition that goes to decorate the Easter celebration symbolically, rather than pragmatically. Holiday marketing in this country does not seem to confine itself with the natural economic laws of supply and demand, and price equilibrium. There is a general tendency of buying goods and commodities at any cost so long as it is for the holiday celebrations. This sort of impulsive transaction is not only unwise but also a pacemaker for fixed price escalation after the Easter holiday. And it goes against the basic principles of thoughtful economic life. The need to save it also nullifies the efforts being exerted tocurb the rate of inflation.

The knife-vendor introduced himself as Gabre Worku, a father of three and a man of all trades. I had an interesting chat with him. Gabre was born in the Guragie Zone and came to Addis Abeba when he was only 12.He was a shoeshine boy before he was able to save enough money to start a small coffee plantation at a place called Durame. Gabre goes to Darame during coffee picking season and returns to Addis to do all sorts of odd jobs, until the coffee berries require his attendance. He sells kniveswhen Easter holiday approaches and slays oxen or herds. He also vends hides and skins. Easter Holidays, religious as they are, are also occasions that put housewives into the challenging tests in their ability of cooking good chicken stew and their skills of making local brews like tella or tej.

The whole preparation starts with their making decisions on what ingredient to buy, when and where, not to speak of the extra effortsexerted to roam around in search of better quality and affordable bargains. Merkato, being the epicentre of the business in the country, gets more overcrowded than ever before by both buyers and sellers gathering fresh food from all over the country. Even pack animals laden with sacks of grain straw or fuel wood shove and rub with pickup trucks and delivery vans. Their caretakers carrying leather flogs whip them hard to coax the beast to move on. Vendors barking and shouting calls of sales and announcing what they market run between spots, pushing and passing through the thick crowd of people without even pausing to beg due pardonfrom their victims. Alganesh Wossen is a popular trader of butter at a small shop located in behind the Asfa Wossen Hotel, in the middle of Merkato. She is well known for the freshness and good quality of butter she buys from Sheno, 78km north of Addis Abeba. She sells a kilo of butter of the youngest age for 150 Br, while the second grade is sold for 130Br.What is more interesting is that she scales the butter rather generously quenching the desires of the customers who remain seated quietly until their turn of service. The poultry trading spot in Merkato has of late been reduced to little more than a very narrow corridor where a handful of traders operate under very hard conditions, cursed by the lack of space. Buyers prefer to acquire poultry from vendors instead of walking the long distance and being exposed to fthe oul smell in that area.

I may have painted the Easter holiday with the wrong brush by focusing on spending. But, then, what is money for? Of course, money spent on holiday festivities and shopping could be taken as something that could bring some enjoyment and satisfaction. But it should not be forgotten thattoo much indulgence in eating fatty foods could invite peril and untimely death because of subsequent ailments. Let us watch out. Happy Easter!

Source: Addis Fortune (Addis Ababa)

Ethiopia: Billion Birr Retail Enterprise Under Formation'

News Analysis: May 5, 2013 - A spirited negotiation is taking place between Ethiopian authorities and senior managers of Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the world's largest retail firm, on the prospect the latter will enter the Ethiopian market through a management contract, reliable sources disclosed to Fortune. The talks between the two parties have reached the advanced level, whereby Ethiopian authorities have agreed to form a new state owned company, Ethiopian Trade Enterprise, that will eventually be managed by Wal-Mart, according to these sources. Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn hinted two weeks ago, during his question session in Parliament, that his administration is close in forming a cash and carry company, hoping to fight inflation on consumer goods caused by constraints on supply and market inefficiencies. Subsequently, the Councilof Ministers has decided on the formation of the Trade Enterprise which will have an initial capital of one billion Birr, and a paid up capital of 250 millionBr., Fortune learnt. A European based consulting firm, A. T. Kearny,is also contracted to set up theEnterprise, which is expected to start operations in the next Ethiopian fiscal year, according to a source close to the issue. The Enterprise to be set up will deal in supplying general merchandise, with a special focus on food commodities, especially those where there is a supply problem such as sugar and edible oil, according toseveral sources. The pilot project will start in Addis Abeba, but the company will expand its branches to other regions. It is also expected to have 13 warehouses within 10 years, in all regions except for Benishanguland Afar, according to these sources. With time thisEnterprisewill replace the current Merchandise Wholesale & Import Trade Enterprise (MWITE), the source also told Fortune. It may also overtake MWITE's vast warehouse networks.

The federal government has been juggling the idea of forming a local stateowned firm to be managed by a foreign company and inviting mega retailers from other countries to open shop here. The latter options required a change of the nation's investment laws, that keep the business of retailing an exclusive domain of domestic investors. Unable to tame escalating prices on consumer goods, even after it took control of their subsidised imports and distributions, the administration of former Prime Minister Meles Zenawi had warned local businesses that he would open the sector to the test of foreign competition. It was then that a discussion was initiated with Wal-Mart executives on the prospect of the company coming toEthiopia. Wal-Mart is an American multinational corporation, andthe biggest private employer with over two million employees. Largely controlled by the Walton Family - it was established in 1962 by Sam Walton - the company has 8,500 stores in 15 countries with 55 names. It had registered in 2011 a revenue of 422 billion dollars, 13 times the size ofEthiopia's GDP, where it made a net income of 15.4 billion dollars. The appearance of C. Douglas McMillion, president and CEO Wal-Mart International, at the World Economic Forum forAfrica, held in May 2012 in Addis Abeba, was seen as a strong sign in the company's interest to do business here. Nonetheless, a policy disagreement within macroeconomic advisors of the late Prime Minister appears to have discouraged Wal-Martfrom pushing the discussion. During his stay in Addis, McMillion had met no other official but Eleni Guebre Medhin (PhD), former CEO of Ethiopian Commodities Exchange (ECX). It was a sign that preliminary talks with Ethiopian authorities on the possibilities of bringing its South African subsidiary, MassMart, did notcarry through. Wal-Mart had offered at the time to reduce prices on itemsit sells inEthiopia, but stood on its ground not to carry locally produced items for fear of substandard qualities. Some of the macroeconomic advisors were of the view that the arrival of such a giant retailer inEthiopiacan only be at the peril of the emerging and venerable domesticindustrial establishment. There was also an idea floated around at the time to form a giant corporation, amalgamating three already existing wholesale enterprises: Merchandise Wholesale & Import Trade Enterprise (MWITE), Building Materials & Supplies Enterprise, and the Procurement Services Enterprise. It was a proposal developed under the Privatisation &Public Enterprises Supervising Agency (PPESA), before the government put a halt to it around three months ago.

Lately though, a steering committee comprising experts from ministries and chaired by macroeconomic advisors at the Ethiopian Development Research Institute (EDRI), a federally funded economic think-tank chairedby Neway Gebreab, took on the job of exploring new options. They came up with the formation of the new enterprise, which will be given out in a management contract to a foreign firm, which very likely become Wal- Mart or its African subsidiary. The administration is confident that throughthe new enterprise local suppliers and retailers will be able to get business, for the management company would agree to take on all locally available items from domestic companies, according to a member of the steering committee who speaks on condition of anonymity for he is not authorised to speak to the media. Nonetheless, negotiators on Wal-Mart's behalf are still pushing for equity participation in the new company, according to sources. And this could become a deal breaker, according to this source. But whether the administration creates a new company or brings a management firm, the problem is not one of management but structural constraints in supply, according to a macro-economist Fortune talked to. "There is no use in creating another MWITE," he said. "Unless the government works hard to increase supply capacity, especially when itcomes to agricultural products, and provision of foreign currency, setting up another enterprise would not help." Source: Addis Fortune (Addis Ababa)

AfDB Launches US$1.26b Kenya - Ethiopia Electricity Highway - SPONSORWIRE'

TUNIS - AfDB: May 7, 2013 - The African Development Bank (AfDB) todaylaunched the 1,068-kilometre high-voltage electricity highway to be built between Kenya and Ethiopia. The project, which is expected to be completed in less than five years, involves the construction of transmission lines of about 437 km in Ethiopia and about 631 km in Kenya and associated AC/DC converter stations at Wolayta-Sodo (Ethiopia) and Suswa (Kenya) substations with a transfer capacity of up to 2,000 MW in either direction. Speaking at the launch, organized to brief on the project'stechnical resources, African Development Bank's Regional Director for EastAfrica Resource Centre (EARC), Gabriel Negatu, reiterated the importance of the project to the East Africa's cross-border trading. "The African Development Bank recognizes of each of the country specific economic blueprints as well as the region's economic priorities. This project establishes power trade between Ethiopia and Kenya and the wider East Africa region. It not only improves electricity access at affordable prices and enhances cross-border trade, but also provides an important opportunity to generate revenues for countries having excess power generation capacity, as is the case for Ethiopia," said Negatu. He added: "The direct beneficiaries of the project are households, businesses, and industries in communities located in Kenya, the direct off-taker of the power. The interconnection with Ethiopia will ensure access to reliable and affordable energy to around 870,000 households by 2018." AfDB played a leading role in the preparation of the project by financing some of the feasibility studies required to making the project bankable.

The African Development Bank, the World Bank, the Governments of Ethiopia and Kenya will finance the project. In addition the French Development Agency expressed interest to finance the project. The financing for the project breaks down as follows: African Development Bank, US $338 million; World Bank US $684 million; Government of Ethiopia, US $32 million; Government of Kenya, US $88 million; and the expected financing from the French Development Agency, US $118 million. The African Development Bank's financing will be used for the financing of the total cost of the transmission line subcomponent and partof the cost of the converter station subcomponent in Ethiopia; part of thecost of the transmission line subcomponent in Kenya; the total cost of theconsultancy services for supervision and management for both Ethiopia and Kenya, as well as part of the cost of capacity building component in Ethiopia and in Kenya. The World Bank's financing will be used for the financing of the total cost of the subcomponent converter stations in Kenya and total cost of transmission system reinforcement in Kenya and the major part converter stations in Ethiopia as well as part of the cost ofthe capacity building component in Ethiopia and in Kenya. Financing fromFrench Development Agency is expected to cover part of the transmissionline subcomponent for Kenya. Source: African Development Bank (Tunis)
Archbishop (Abune) Petros in our heart’
We-Mezekir: By Yilma Bekele - (May 8th, 2013) - On July 29, 1936 AbunePetros was executed by the Italian fascist that were trying to colonize our country for his refusal to submit. On May 2nd. 2013 the monument that was built to commemorate our Holy Father was removed by the order of the TPLF party that is currently ruling our country. Our Holy Father died for the first time. The murder by a firing squad was an honor and showed his deep love for his people and country. The fascist killed his body but hemade his home in every Ethiopian soul for ever and ever. We all carry Abune Petros in our heart. 'Abune Petros Adebabaye', 'Abune Petros Hawelt' is not just a location but the symbol of our pride and the true meaning of sacrifice for a higher cause. The order to Kill Abune Petros wasgiven by the fascist Viceroy Graziani but the trigger was pulled by solders from the North that were faithfully serving the fascist invader. The order to remove our monument to our beloved father was given by the TPLF party but the backhoe and flatbed truck was driven by modern day Banda's. They claim the removal is temporary. That is not the issue. Was it necessary is our question. Could it have been avoided is our point.

Aren't there some things considered priceless is our contention. The samepeople that moved heaven and earth to bring back our stolen Obelisk anderect it in its rightful place felt no qualms about dispatching daily laborersto bring our hero down and place him in a warehouse. We rejoiced when our obelisk was returned because it is the symbol of our glorious past.

Although their leader dismissed our joy and happiness and tried to claim itas his peoples private history we bit our tongue and dismissed his rudeness for immaturity.

I agree it is difficult to personally relate to a stone like an obelisk. Nevertheless it is the product of our ancestors and a symbol of their ingenuity for that period in our past. But Abune Petros is a living symbol every one of us would have no problem claiming, admiring and silently thinking 'would I have courage to act like him?' Abune Petros is what I always thought we Ethiopians were like. I was raised at a time when beingan Ethiopian was something special. There was not enough adjective to describe our country and people. Yes I am aware that we had lots of problems to resolve after all forging a nation is not a cake walk. There were many that were left behind and quite a few that did not get a fair share of what was on the table. We are still trying to come to terms with that. That still should not dampen our glorious past. Abune Petros was oneof those bigger than life Ethiopians that added a positive value to our experience. He defined patriotism, resolve, love, spiritual guidance and commitment to the truth. He accompanied our Emperor and the civilian army to Maichew and confronted the fascist army. He witnessed the gallantry of his people and the savageness of the European invaders. Theycame with modern weapons and poison gas to scare us to submission. Welost the battle but it only made us realize defeat was not an option. Surrender was not the language of the Ethiopian at that time. Yes timesdo change. A visitor would have a hard time believing the current generation descended from those that even washed the shoes of the foreigners least they take our soil with them.

Abune Petros continued to fight the way he knew. His religion and his lovefor his country were his weapons. From the monastery of Debre Libanos tofar away churches he continued to rally his people to stand up straight and took the cry ‘By any means necessary!’ to drive the invader out of ourcherished land. During his interrogation this is what he told the fascist authority when asked to accept Italy’s sovereignty over Ethiopia or face death. “The cry of my countrymen who died due to your nerve-gas and terror machinery will never allow my conscious to accept your ultimatum. How can I see my God if I give a blind eye to such a crime?” His last words before the bullets tore our bishop and Holy Father were: “My fellow Ethiopians, do not believe the Fascists if they tell you that the patriots are bandits, the patriots are people who yearn for freedom from the terrors of fascism. Bandits are the soldiers who are standing in front of me and you, who came from far away to violently occupy a weak and peaceful country.May God give the people of Ethiopia the strength to resist and never bow to the Fascist army and its violence. May the Ethiopian earth never accept the invading army’s rule.” His defiance and heroism became the battle cry of our patriotic army thru out the land and it echoed in our valleys and mountains from north to south east to west and the invader never saw a day of peace until they were driven out.

The OAU & Emperor Haile Selassie’s Rightful Place in History'

We-Mezekir - HIM Emperor Haile Selassie’s leadership, commitment and dedication to the establishment of the OAU/AU, and to the freedom and independence of Africa and African peoples are unmatched by any other World leader. Let us work together for a common purpose and see to it that the late Emperor Haile Selassie receives his rightful place center frontof the African Union building. "Agerna tarik aymotum; yetarikinim kibir yemeetebiqew tewlid new!" Meaning that, "A Nation and its history shall not be perished; for this reason it's up to each generation to preserve andrespect the sanctity and honor of history" -Emperor Haile Selassie

Ethiomedia Analysis - May 8, 2013: As Addis Ababa prepares for grand festivities, galas and events in celebration of the 50th Anniversary of the establishment of the African Union (AU), formerly known as the Organization of African Unity (OAU), on May 25, 2013, we, Africans, and peoples of African descent, pay homage to the visionary leader of the OAU, His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I. We honor the “Father of Africa,” Emperor Haile Selassie, for his visionary leadership and everlasting contributions to the freedom and independence of Africa and African peoples, and for the key role he played in establishing the OAU/AU. We, Africans and peoples of African descent, appeal to the OAU/AU to build and erect, center front of the OAU/AU building, a statue of Emperor Haile Selassie in symbolic honor and respect for his unparalleled dedication, commitment and contributions to African independence and unity, and to the establishment of the Organization of African Unity. It is a well-known fact that prior to the establishment of the

OAU/AU, a major rift existed between African nations on how the concept of African Unity should be implemented. This divide resulted in the establishment of two main separate factions: The Monrovia and Casablanca groups. These two groups had opposing philosophical beliefs regarding the implementation of African Unity. The Monrovia and Casablanca groups also differed in opinion on the autonomy or scope of authority that should be warranted to an organizing body tasked with the responsibility of making the vision of African Unity come to fruition. As thephilosophical differences between these two groups in the late 50s and early 60s continued to grow, the prospects of achieving African Unity appeared bleak. It was not until after the relentless diplomatic efforts of the then Foreign Minister, Ketema Yifru, and under the visionary leadership of Emperor Haile Selassie, that the Monrovia and Casablanca groups reconciled their differences in Addis Ababa, culminating in the establishment of the OAU/AU on May 25, 1963. History can neither forgetnor deny the riveting and compelling speech made by the "Father of Africa," Emperor Haile Selassie, who, in uniting the two splinter groups byhosting the First Conference of African Heads of State, also declared in hisaddress: "This Conference cannot close without adopting a single charter. We cannot leave here without having created a single African organizationpossessed of the attributes We have described. If We fail in this, we will have shrinked our responsibility to Africa and to the people we lead. If wesucceed, then, and only then, will we have justified our presence here."

It was this call of duty Emperor Haile Selassie bestowed upon African Heads of State, many of whom were assembled out of the great admiration and respect they had for him and the gallant history of Ethiopia, that a single unifying charter was drafted and ratified enabling the vision of African Unity to become a reality. It is an undeniable fact thatEthiopia and, particularly, Emperor Haile Selassie played a pivotal role in the establishment of the OAU/AU more than fifty years ago. In reflecting on the Ethiopian contribution to the creation of the OAU, Gwendolyn Carter, in her book entitled, National Unity and Regionalism in Eight African States, affirmed that "What Nasser or Nkrumah or the Casablanca or Monrovia… grouping could not do, [Emperor] Haile Selassie accomplished with little difficulty." Carter further attests that during Emperor Haile Selassie's era, "Ethiopia committed itself to Africa…[and that] the Ethiopian government [was] an important spokesperson for Africa not only in the United Nations, but also in diplomatic exchanges with the United States and other countries." This may also be said about the role Ethiopia and Emperor Haile Selassie played on an international level as well. As recorded in history, Ethiopia joined the League of Nations on September 28, 1923. This was seven years after Emperor Haile Selassie was appointed Ras, one of the highest rankings in the Ethiopian nobility, and approximately forty years prior to the establishment of the OAU. Emperor Haile Selassie's conscientious decision for Ethiopia to join the League of Nations, and the subsequent role Ethiopia assumed in the UN representing not only itself, but the interest of Africa and Africans as well, arguably served as the impetus towards the establishment of the OAU, in which Emperor Haile Selassie undeniably played a formative and leading role. Emperor Haile Selassie was a firm believer in and strongly committed to the principles of collective security and world peace. Despitebeing abandoned by the League of Nations when Ethiopia was invaded by Fascist Italy in 1935, Emperor Haile Selassie demonstrated his commitment to collective security when Ethiopia was called for duty. In 1951, in support of the United Nation's (UN) mission during the Korean War, Emperor Haile Selassie sent over 3,000 Ethiopian troops, including those from his own Imperial Guard, to fight as part of the American-led UN force supporting South Korea. The Ethiopian troops gallantly fought aspart of the US 7th infantry division, at a time when the US military just started to become racially de-segregated. The heroic Ethiopians fought in 253 battles, including the Battle of Pork Chop Hill, against the communist North and its ally, China. Ethiopia was the only country in which not one of its citizens was taken prisoner of war. Emperor Haile Selassie demonstrated his unwavering commitment to the principles of collective security and the independence of Africa and Africans in the case of Congo as well. In an effort to liberate the Congolese from Belgian rule and ensure the existence of a unified and independent Congo, Emperor Haile Selassie sent 3,000 Ethiopian troops, constituting ten percent of Ethiopia'smilitary resource at the time, to Congo from 1960-1964. The outcome resulted in the restoration of independence, peace and stability including the prevention of Katanga's secession from Congo. There is a section in Addis Ababa Stadium that was named in honor of the Ethiopian patriots sent to Congo by Emperor Haile Selassie as part of the UN peace – keeping force. That section to this day is known as Katanga and represents the area where the Ethiopian troops sent to Katanga previouslysat.Ethiopia and Emperor Haile Selassie, in particular, played an instrumental role in supporting liberation movements in Africa to ensure freedom, independence, stability and lasting peace. The highly adorned freedom fighter and African leader, former South African President, NelsonMandela, confirms this assertion as well.

In his Autobiography, Long Walk to Freedom, President Mandela asserts the significance of Ethiopia and Ethiopianism as the inspiration for his political party, and the struggle for freedom in South Africa: "[The] fundamental tenets of the Ethiopian movement were self-worth, self- reliance and freedom. These tenets drew the advocates of Ethiopianism, like a magnet, to the growing political movement. That political movementwas to culminate in the formation of the ANC in 1912. It is in this sense that the ANC traces the seeds of the formation of our organization to the Ethiopian Movement of the 1890s." Prior to the establishment of the OAU in 1962, Nelson Mandela met with Emperor Haile Selassie, and explained the plight of South Africans under Apartheid rule. During his time in exile, Nelson Mandela received military training in Ethiopia, and was provided with a Bulgarian made handgun. He was also issued an Ethiopian passportand given the chance to re-enter South Africa under an alias name and Ethiopian identity to continue the struggle for freedom and independence.In his Autobiography, Nelson Mandela stated,“Ethiopia always has a special place in my imagination and the prospect of visiting Ethiopia attracted me more strongly than a trip to France, England and America combined. I felt I would be visiting my own genesis, unearthing the roots of what made me an African.” As the former President of the last African country to gain its independence from White colonial rule, and Africa’s de-facto Spiritual leader, Nelson Mandela is unarguably the most respected leader in Africa since Emperor Haile Selassie. As an African leader of Nelson Mandela’s stature, morality and contributions, despite being deservingof accolades and admiration in his own right, Nelson Mandela demonstrates the utmost respect and deference to the “Father of Africa,” Emperor Haile Selassie, and to Ethiopia as his spiritual homeland. The same sentiment about Emperor Haile Selassie and the significance of Ethiopia expressed by Nelson Mandela and countless others in the Black Political movement and beyond is also shared by millions of Africans and peoples of African descent around the world. There are many other examples that demonstrate why Emperor Haile Selassie has been dubbed the “Father of Africa.” During the repatriation or back to Africa movement,to his children of African descent that had been dispersed in foreign lands, Emperor Haile Selassie, the “Father of Africa,” provided a spiritual homeland. To his sons and daughters throughout Africa, Emperor Haile Selassie, the “Father of Africa,” provided scholarships to the then Haile Selassie I University, now known as Addis Ababa University, so that the dream of African Unity could be realized.

In 1937, under the direction of the “Father of Africa,” Emperor Haile Selassie, Dr. Melaku Bayen, an Ethiopian foreign-exchange student, established the Ethiopian World Federation, Inc.(EWF) in Harlem, New York.The EWF was arguably the first international organization encompassing of all peoples of African descent that physically linked Africans and the Black Diaspora for a common purpose in Africa. This organization galvanized African Americans to sign up and actually fight alongside their Ethiopian brethren for Ethiopia’s independence against Fascist aggressors. It was an unprecedented event in history, the first of its kind, which physically linked the struggle of African Americans and Africans towards collective action. If it has been established by history that Ethiopia, and, Emperor Haile Selassie, in particular, played a key, formative and instrumental role in establishing the OAU/AU, then why is itthat Emperor Haile Selassie was denied the symbolic honor of a statue in front of the newly built African Union building? Was this intentional or indicative of a conscientious decision made by African Heads of State, a particular committee, sub-committee or the idea of a select few? What was the criteria and process for selecting the former President of Ghana, Kwame Nkrumah, another great African leader also deserving of recognition for his contributions to the OAU? Did his selection rule out thepossibility of a statue being built in honor of Emperor Haile Selassie or forthat matter other founding fathers of the OAU? What was the rationale behind building a statue in the first place? We, Africans and peoples of African descent, want to know the details. More importantly, we Africans and peoples of African descent, with utmost conviction compellingly call for a statue of Emperor Haile Selassie to be erected at center or front of the OAU/AU building in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. Emperor Haile Selassie is more than deserving of this honor for his demonstrated vision and leadership in establishing the OAU/AU, and for his everlasting contributions to the freedom and independence of Africa and African peoples. Let us all join hands in supporting this initiative and appeal to luminary African Leaders, like-minded institutions of the world in generaland the OAU and its leadership in particular, to see to it that His Majesty,Emperor Haile Selassie's statue be erected and take its rightful place alongside President Kwame Nkrumah, at front or center of the AU/OAU headquarters in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

Ethiopia: Statement delivered at African Commission reveals violation ofFreedom of Expression' Revelation: A document delivered by Arid Lands Institute (ALI) at the 53rdordinary session of the African Commission on Human and Peoples Rights in Banjul, the Gambia reveals Violation of Freedom of Expression in Ethiopia. "Today in Ethiopia freedom is still a pie in the sky. Today, Ethiopia lives through the sword of the Damocles drawn against it. The scourge of the old days of the Red Terror grips the population. 90 million Ethiopians, a total population of a few countries in Africa put together, livein absolute fear. A simple test for the prevalence of unfreedom and absolute violation of freedom of expression is whether or not the population of a given country is gripped with fear when it comes to freedom of expression. That is the reality in Ethiopia today and no amountof claims on the contrary can change this fact". Source: ALI (May 9, 2013)

Prominent Ethiopian Somalis condemn the Regional President's secretspeech'

ESAT News updates - May 9, 2013: Mohammed Hassen, an ex-diplomat during the EPRDF's transitional period, educator, journalist and author of several history books has said that what the Somali Regional President, Abdi Mohammed Umar recently said on a leaked video clips was "what hasbeen cooked and given to him by Woaynes (TPLFs)". Mohammed says "The man (Abdi) is an illiterate murderer" and was the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi's right hand man. The Somali Regional State is a region where the Generals of Woayne (TPLF) get fattened and what the Presidentspoke in the video was not his own thus it shouldn't be taken seriously, hesaid. Mohammed said the video revealed by ESAT shows the level of maturity of the officials of the Somali Regional State. He also stated that those with leadership skills are not needed in the Region. Asked if the Federal Government would take measures after the revelation of the videoclips, Mohammed said that the ruling party EPRDF would not get a cruel man as Abdi, however, it was also easy to understand the government'spolicy via the President of the Region.

Similarly, the External Relations Head and Spokesperson of the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), Hassan Abdullahi, said what the Regional President spoke to the clan chiefs was the exact policy of the Woaynes (TPLFs). "We have no hate to the people of Ethiopia. This is the divide and rule policy of the government and the ruling-party" Hasan said.Asked if the Federal Government would take measures after the revelationof the video clips, the Spokesperson said "not at all". Sources revealed a secret video that showed Abdi Mohammed Umer, President of the Somali Regional State speaking to Somali Region clan elders and chiefs with an explicit advocacy for an ethnic and power relook on Tigrean, Amhara and Oromo ethnic groups. He was heard as saying that "Tigre does not want Amhara to come to power. Tigre likes Ogadenis (Somalis) people more than anyone".

Ethiopia - Holiday marketing : stable looking local market still tough forbuyers'

ESAT Assessment: May 4, 2013 - Data collected from Shola and Sarris Markets in Addis Ababa reveal that although it seemed to have stabilized, the commodity price is still far beyond the buying capacity of low income earners. Accordingly Magna Teff is being sold between1850-2000 birr per quintal, Netch (white)Teff is being sold between 1750-1800 birr per quintal and Sergegna Teff 1600 to 1700 birr. A kilo of first quality butter isbeing sold between 180 to 195 birr, a kilo of fresh Sheno butter is being sold at 200 birr, Habesha (Ethiopian breed) chicken from 130 to 170 birr, Yeferenje (non Ethiopian breed) chicken is being sold between 120 to 140 birr. A Habesha chicken egg is being sold between 2.40 to 2.50 birr and Yefernje (non Ethiopian breed chicken egg) is being sold between 2.25 to

2.35 birr. Ethiopian/ Habesha red onion is being sold higher than its regular rate between 13 to 15 birr and a kilo of Yeferenje Onion is being sold between 7 to 8 birr. A kilogram of white onion is being sold between30 to 35 birr. Although the price of white onion seemed to be lower thanthe usual price, it is still very expensive for buyers.

Similarly, a kilo of lemon, often used for washing chicken, is being sold between 22 to 25 birr and a kilo of chili pepper is being sold between 20 to 22 birr. A small lamb is rated up to 1200 birr and is being sold betweenbirr 850 and 1500 birr. A medium sized sheep is being sold between 1400to 1800 birr and a big sheep costs between 2000 to 3000 birr. The government is reportedly strictly monitoring the price caps it has set on vegetables and fruits in the biggest open vegetable market (Atkilet Tera), Addis Ababa, although the effects on commodity price is still not known. Asimilar measure taken by the Addis Abeba Trade and Industry Bureau hadresulted in price hike of onion as most traders had shied away from selling onion. In related news, following the Holiday market, drivers are complaining that they are being plundered by Traffic Police officers. Somedrivers in Addis Abeba told ESAT that Traffic Police officers in Addis Abebaare coming out in droves in the evening and are collecting money from drivers. Especially on the Addis Ababa to Harrar Road, some Traffic Police officers are even engaged in squabbles with drivers.

No Rights Abuse In Ethiopian Prisons – Justice Minister'

ESAT News: May 9, 2013 - Berhan Hailu, Ethiopia's Minister of Justice, who recently has been removed blamed with inefficiency from his executive posts from the ANDM and EPRDF, said there is no human rights abuse in Ethiopian prisons. Berhan gave this response to a question that was posed by the sole opposition MP, Girma Seifu, while he was presenting his Ministry's nine month report to the Parliament. Noting the Minister's report about his confirmation of the respect of human rights in prisons from his recent visit, Girma asked the Minister what he learned from his visit. MP Girma also stated that he himself had travelled last Saturday to visit prisoners but was denied entrance and returned. "The prisons are breaching the Constitution that this Parliament would not evenbreach" Girma added.

The Minister said, during his visit, he learned that prisons were highly crowded due to the large number of prisoners and there was shortage of utensils and lack of infrastructure like drinking water. Berhan said these problems would be solved. He also mentioned that prisons weren't accountable to the Ministry of Justice but to the Ministry of Federal Affairs.Berhan also said that there was no human rights abuse in prisons and even if there was, it could not be considered as the breach of the Constitution. Another parliamentarian said as constitutionally guaranteed rights of imprisoned journalists, politicians, members of the Muslim community such as rights to be visited by their spouses or partners, closerelatives, friends, religious councilors, medical doctors and their legal counsel, was being fully trespassed by officials of the Prison Administration, what the Minister said was a "clear denial".

The Minister was also asked why some prisoners who sought pardon werereleased while those who fulfill the requirements for pardon were not released. The Minister disparaged the question by saying that pardon wasthe discretionary right of the Government but not the prisoner's thus it cannot be questioned as a right. Berhan said pardons are given based on the recommendation of the Prison Administration after examining the characters and interests of the prisoner to improve, is submitted to the Pardon Board of the Justice Ministry. The Minister's explanation has however been critiqued by another parliamentarian. Noting that the Minister mixed parole with pardon, the MP said in the case of parole characters are not taken into account. He criticized the Minister's speech recalling that leaders of the opposition Coalition for Unity and Democracy (CUD) were not released after their behavior was examined. In the past nine months, 2958 pardon applications were made out of which 2149 ofthe applicants were released.

Edu-corruption and Mis-education in Ethiopia' Analysis: Excerpt from Professor Al Mariam articles.
I will admit that in the hundreds of weekly commentaries I have written over the last half dozen or so years, I have not given education in Ethiopiathe critical attention it deserved. I have no excuse for not engaging the issue more intensely. In my own defense, I can only say that when an entire generation of Ethiopian scholars, academics, professors and learnedelites stands silent as a bronze statute witnessing the tyranny of ignorance in action, the burden on the few who try to become the voices of the voiceless on every issue is enormous. “Education is the most powerful weapon which you can use to change the world,” said Nelson Mandela. For the late Meles Zenawi and his apostles (the Melesistas) in Ethiopia, the reverse is true: Ignorance is the most powerful weapon you can use to prevent change and cling to power. They have long adopted the motto of George Orwell’s Oceania: “Ignorance is Strength”. Indeed, ignorance is a powerful weapon to manipulate, emasculate and subjugate the masses. Keep ‘em ignorant and impoverished and they won’t give youany trouble.
I have previously commented on the lack of academic freedom in Ethiopian higher education and the politicization of education in Ethiopia. In my February 2008 commentary “Tyranny in the Academy”, I called attention to the lack of academic freedom at Mekelle Law School. I defended Abigail Salisbury who was a visiting professor at that law school when she was summarily fired by Meles after she published an academic commentary on her experiences at that law school: …I was absolutely shocked, then, when I started reading my students’ work. Out of the hundred third-year students I teach, probably forty of them had inserted aspecial section, right after the cover page, warning me of what might happen to them were their paper to leave my hands. A number of students wrote that they would never give their real opinions to an Ethiopian professor because they fear being turned in to the government and punished. Others begged me to take their work back to America with me so that people would know what was going on…
In my September 2010 commentary, “Indoctri-Nation”, I criticized the Meles regime for politicizing education. The “Ministry of Education” (reminds one of Orwell’s “Ministry of Truth” (Ignorance)) at the time had issued a “directive” effectively outlawing distance learning (education programs that are not delivered in the traditional university classroom or campus) throughout the country. The regime had also sought to corner the disciplines of law and teaching for state-controlled universities, creating a monopoly and pipeline for the training of party hacks to swarm the teaching and legal professions. I demonstrated that "directive" was inflagrant violation and in willful disregard of the procedural safeguards of the Higher Education Proclamation No. 650/2009. It did not faze them. (Itwas time to mint a new legal maxim: "The ignorant are entitled to ignore their own law and invoke ignorance of their own law as a defense.")

The "directive" was at odds with the recommendations of the World Bank (which has been assisting the regime in improving education administration and delivery of services) for increased emphasis on the creation of a network of "tertiary educational" institutions (e.g. distance learning centers, private colleges, vocational training services, etc.,) to help support the "production of the higher-order capacity" necessary for Ethiopia's development. In its 2003 sector study "Higher Education Development for Ethiopia", the World Bank had recommended "a near term goal [of] doubl[ing] the share of private enrollments from the current 21% to 40% by 2010." By 2010, the Meles regime had decided toreduce private tertiary institutions, particularly the burgeoning distance learning sector, to zero!In my October 2010 commentary, "Ethiopia: Education Unbanned!", I was pleasantly surprised but unconvinced by theMeles regime's apparent change of strategy to abandon its decision to impose a blanket ban on distance learning and reach a negotiated resolution of instructional quality issues with distance learning providers. Ipointed out a few lessons Meles and his crew could learn from the bureaucratic fiasco. (Is it really possible for the closed- and narrow- minded to learn?)

I focus on educational corruption in Ethiopia in this commentary for four reasons: 1) I was appalled by the corruption findings in the recent World Bank 448-page report "Diagnosing Corruption in Ethiopia". That report, with bureaucratic delicacy and hesitancy, demonstrates the cancer of corruption which afflicts the Ethiopian body politic has metastasized into the educational sector putting the nation's youth at grave risk. 2) There is widespread acknowledgement that education in Ethiopia at all levels is in apitiful condition. For instance, a 2010 Newsweek "study of health, education, economy, and politics" showed Ethiopia with a population of 88million had a literacy rate of 43.3 percent, and ranked 98 out of 100 countries on education. 3) Few Ethiopian educators and scholars are examining the issue of educational corruption and its implications for the future of the country and its youth. Hopefully, this commentary could spursome of them to investigate corruption in education (and other areas) andconduct related policy research and analysis. 4) I had promised in my firstweekly commentary of 2013 to pay special attention to youth issues in Ethiopia during the year. Nothing is more important to Ethiopia's youth than education. Youth without education are youth without a future and without hope. Youth without education are emblematic of a nation in despair.

Minister and 16 others arrested on corruption charges – BN'

Bikya News (May 11, 2013) Ethiopian activists have praised efforts by thegovernment to crackdown on corruption in the East African country. They said the arrest of a minister and 16 other people show that Ethiopia is pushing forward on efforts to help end the rampant corruption within government and business in the country. “I believe this will turn out for the better because we need to clean up our government,” one activist, who also works in finance, told Bikaynews.com For him, the arrests are “the beginning of a new Ethiopia free from the politics and past craziness and greed that had been part of the country for far too long.” Businesses in the region regularly complain of corruption as an obstacle to their work. Transparency International ranked Ethiopia 113 out of 176 nations worldwide in its 2012 perception of corruption index, where No. 1 is considered least corrupt.

That ranking puts Ethiopia above most nations in the Horn of Africa and east Africa regions, although Rwanda is ranked 50. Melaku Fenta, a seniorruling party member and director general of the revenue and customs authority with the rank of minister, was arrested alongside two other officials from the authority, government spokesman Shimeles Kemal said.“They were under investigation on suspicion of corrupt practices,” Shimeles told Reuters, without giving details. The spokesman later told Bikyanews. com that “we will not back down in the face of corruption no matter who is involved.” The move is the highest profile arrest of any official in the country on corruption charges and has activists praising the government’s efforts to curtail illegal activity within the government sphere. “We are long void of a proper justice system and policing, so hopefully this will help make things better and progress the country toward goals set,” Monique Mariam told Bikyanews. For her, as a former consultant for the government, “corruption was widespread and dangerously high, so this is a great move to start to end it.” Editors note: According to reports, the “director general” (the alleged kingpin of the “corruption” ring) Melaku Fenta was appointed by late prime minister Meles Zenawi in 2008. He has been a “senior cabinet member”. He is credited for “overseeing several tax reforms including widening the tax base, by requiring businesses to install cash registration machines and to become registered for Value Added Tax (VAT).” According to one report, “Under [the “director general”], the amount of revenues the federal government mobilized has reached 71 billion Br in 2011/12, a dramatic increase from the 19 billion Br collected before he took the position.”

Ethiopia: Corruption 'claims' senior govt. officials, businessmen - PANA’

Corruption Ethiopia - May 12, 2013: Ethiopian police on arrested about 13officials, including the Director-General of the powerful Customs and Revenue Authority (ECRA) and his Deputy on charges of corruption filed by the Ethics and Anti-Corruption Commission (FEAC), the state-owned Ethiopian News Agency (ENA) reported Saturday. Also Friday, Ethiopian Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, sacked his Justice Minister, Berhan

Hailu, for inefficiency, a prominent private English weekly, Fortune, reported on its website. The developments came just a day ahead of the meeting, here Saturday, of the Executive Committee of the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), designed to discuss 'urban and rural reports as well as supervision report on activitiescarried out during the current Ethiopian year'.

The Committee will also discuss the local and Addis Ababa City Council elections held in April and discuss activities to be undertaken to implementdecisions passed by the ninth EPRDF Congress held in March. ENA, quoting from an FEAC's statement, reported that the Director General of the Revenue and Customs Authority with Ministerial portfolio, Melaku Fanta, and his Deputy, Gebrewahed Gebrgiorgis, were arrested along 11 others, including prominent businessmen, after the FEAC had undertaken thorough investigations into allegations that the 13 were involved in high- level corruption. Those arrested include mega-rich businessmen Ketema Kebede, owner of KK Trading, Simachew Kebede, owner of Inter-Continental Addis Hotel, Nega G/Egziabher, owner of Netsa Trading, Mihireteab Abraha, identified just as an investor, among other less-known ones.

FEAC said 'It is imperative to keep the suspects under police custody untilfurther investigation is undertaken before they appear in court.' During parliamentary address earlier this year, Prime Minister Hailemariam, who came to power in August 2012, urged the public to provide tips on corruption, pledging to personally follow such cases. He assumed power following the death of long term ruler, Meles Zenawi, in August. Both Melaku and Berhan were members of EPRDF's Executive Committee and the Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM), one of the four constituent regional parties that form EPRDF. Berhan lost that position in March after he was harshly criticized by the bigwigs of the ANDM for incompetence as Justice Minister. Brehan Hailu had been Justice Minister since 2005. He assumed that position after his previous office, the Ministry of Information, was dissolved by law. Source: PANA News

Ethiopia lesbian couple tell of attack, as fear of anti-gay action rises'

ADDIS ABABA: May 13, 2013 - They call themselves Lucy and Tina. They are Ethiopian. They are lesbians. They are a couple who have been together for five years. But last week, while dancing at a local club in Addis Ababa, they told Bikyanews.com they were attacked by other women, beaten and forced out of the nightclub. The reason: they are lesbian. “The women just kept yelling at us and screaming and pushing when we started to hold hands,” Lucy told Bikyanews.com, her eye still dark from the marks of the assault. “They shoved and punched at us untilwe were forced to leave.” Tina also has bruises on her arms. The couple said they were enjoying a night out of dancing at a club they often go to for relaxation. They said they’d never had any problems. “It is shocking because we don’t show a lot of physical intimacy, but we do try to enjoy our time,” chimed in Tina. “And then all hell broke loose. It is becoming more and more common in Ethiopia to be attacked because people are gay or lesbian. The campaign against the community is growing.” They both alluded to the recent calls from an Evangelical organization that is pushing for the death penalty against Ethiopia’s lesbian, gay, bisexual andtransgender (LGBT) community. An anti-gay organization that held a recent workshop on lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) issues in Ethiopia is reporting that the death penalty against gay people in Ethiopia may be on the horizon. The workshop reportedly looked with the social ‘evils’ and ‘disastrous’ effects of homosexuality in Ethiopia, and wasled by United for Life Ethiopia, a Western Evangelical Christian organization with local representation. Government officials, religious leaders, leading heath professionals, charities and members of the public attended the event at the Bethel Teaching Hospital in Addis Ababa, last week. In the workshop police alleged ‘homosexual family members and neighbors’ have sexually abused 117 boys last year.

It comes on the heels of much antagonism toward the LGBT community inEthiopia. An article recently published by Bikyanews.com has received virulent anti-gay sentiments from users inside the country. A number of comments and angry emails have been flowing in that call for the death ofEthiopia’s small lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) community. “kill them all these rubbish people ,the country never allowed this kind of community,” one comment at the end of the article stated. In yet another, a user linked anti-LGBT sentiment to the Bible in claiming that Ethiopia’s LGBT community should leave the country or face reprisals.“No the same sex marriage in Ethiopia because that is the historical and Christianity country so that is the better thing …in the bible also not allow to be same sex marriage it is a big sin ..sorry for you guys who is the gay ppls …shame on you …also,” it read. The article detailed a young man whowas hopeful that Ethiopians were becoming more accepting and open to the gay community, but the comments show that there remains a staunchanti-LGBT sentiment in the East African country. “Sometimes you just canget around those types of people,” David Emete, the man featured in the article, told Bikyanews.com after seeing the comments. “If they don’t understand or meet gay people, they won’t know better.” But the community as a whole seemed bent on attacking LGBT people. “Our community dont tolerate such disgusting practice, if you want to be a gay then please leave our country and practice where ever fits your bulshit place,” wrote another comment. For Lucy and Tina, they fear that their lives could quickly become in danger and are looking to apply for sexual asylum in Europe or the United States. “What else can we do with all this hate and anger but leave and that is what people want,” added Lucy.

Bikya News

How big is corruption in Ethiopia? $16.5 billion lost to illegal smuggling ofcash'

New York ((TADIAS) – May 13, 2013: Global Financial Integrity (GFI) saysEthiopia lost US$16.5 Billion to illicit financial outflows in the last decade. Last week police in Ethiopia conducted a high-profile corruption sweep in Addis Ababa, the biggest of its type in the Capital in more than ten years, arresting 13 people, including a Minister and his deputy in charge of the Ethiopian Revenues and Customs Authority (ERCA). But how big is corruption in Ethiopia on the global scale? We placed a phone call to the Washington, D.C office of Global Financial Integrity (GFI), which tracks illicit financial flows out of developing countries worldwide. According to Clark Gascoigne, a spokesperson for GFI, the organization's latest available research data show that the amount of money that Ethiopia lost to illegal smuggling of cash out of the country, both by the government and the private sector between 2001 and 2010, totals 16.5 billion U.S. dollars.

Mr. Gascoigne pointed out GFI's statistics are based on official data provided by the Ethiopian government, World Bank, and IMF. "Our numbers indicate all funds that illicitly left the country in a ten year periodincluding by individuals and private companies illegally funneling their money out of Ethiopia," he said. Ethiopia also ranks 113 out of 176 countries in the Corruption Perception Index of Transparency International, the global civil society coalition that encourages accountability initiatives by regular citizens. Meanwhile, the Federal Anti- Corruption Commission in Ethiopia said that Melaku Fanta, a Minister and the Director General of the Ethiopian Revenues and Customs Authority, and his deputy, Gebrewahed Woldegiorgis, are two of the highest rankingofficials apprehended so far on bribery, kickback and fraud accusations.

The other individuals currently in custody on similar indictment include Ketema Kebede, who is the proprietor of KK Trading, Simachew Kebede,owner of the Inter-continental Hotel, and investor Mihretab Abraha, as well as Nega Guebre Egziabeher of Netsa Trading Plc.

Corruption and the Ethiopian Regime'

In-depth Analysis By Semahagn Gashu Abebe (PhD) - May 13, 2013: The legal measures undertaken by the Ethiopian regime last week has once again brought about the issue of corruption to the spot light. According to the statement released by the Ethics and Anti-Corruption Commission of Ethiopia, high ranking government officials and prominent business personalities have been arrested for their alleged involvement in corruptedpractices. A measure against such high profile personalities prompts us to look at the various perspectives of addressing corruption in the country.

The measure gives an impression that the regime is determined to fight the rampant corruption in the country. But there are numerous issues surrounding the problem of corruption in the country and its implications.

Some commentators associate the measure taken by the regime in relation to the internal strife emerging within the party after the passing way of the godfather of the regime some eight months before. After the deaths of the only unifying force within otherwise a fragmented EPRDF leadership, the emergence internal struggle for dominance is a natural sequence. After all, applying the parameters of corruption to root out dissent within EPRDF is not a new phenomenon. Leaders of EPRDF, particularly Meles Zenawi, have been applying the rhetoric of fighting corruption to attack political opponents. The imprisonment of the former prime minister of the country Tamerat Layne as well the veteran TPLF leaders such as Seye Abreha in 2003 were largely associated with the use of corruption rhetoric to purge out power rivalries with in TPLF and the larger EPRDF circles. If the current campaign against corruption is taken inlight of the rivalry among the various factions within the vanguard party, the implications are more serious to the survival of the regime and stability for the country in the short term since the power struggle is now conducted without any apparent 'big man' that may manipulate the powerplay to emerge victories. Due to this new scenario, the consequences of this power struggle may not be a limited one as it was before.

To emerge as victors in this power rivalry, each group will use every opportunity to attack the strong hold of the other groups. The problem willmake the issue complicated as security officials and army generals are also involved in the power struggle and they are implicated in the rent- seeking trends rampant in the country. The involvement of the security and the military in the power struggle will create division that leads to conflict within the army. This will in turn creates political instability havingserious implications to the country given the ethnicized political environment and the precarious economic situation that has been galvanized by hyper inflation. Since there are no strong institutions such as the media, civil society groups or other governmental institutions that may facilitate the smooth transition, the division may take the country into an unpredictable situation we have never dreamt of.

The other perplexing question with regard to the contemporary campaign against corruption is whether the regime is willing and capable of fighting corruption to the very end. In order to have some response to the issue, itis imperative to study the nature and behavior of the Ethiopian regime. Inlight of the power relations and the decision making process that have been developed within the regime, there appear to be no efficient system that could fight corruption effectively. As a typical African state, the Ethiopian regime is a neopatrimonial one where patrons use state resources in order to secure the loyalty of clients in the general population. Such a system is characterized by an informal patron-client relationship that can reach from very high up in state structures down to small villages.This has been the case with in the EPRDF controlled regime in Ethiopia. The regime claims to have more than 6 million members and increasingly forcing others co-opt with it for it has become increasingly difficult to get a job or freely conduct business without directly or indirectly supporting the regime.

EPRDF has monopolized productive resources such as land, capital, telecommunications, the banks as well as public utilities that expand rent-seeking behaviour. In addition to controlling government resources, the ruling party owns and manages businesses engaged in manufacturing andservice industries that receive preferential access to land leases and credit. This has forced citizens to co-opt into the status quo for survival and obtain access to economic benefits. Since access to employment or benefits directly or indirectly requires loyalty to party policies, people are increasingly attempting to obtain favour in the eyes of the power holders rather than developing their competence, personal integrity and commitment to the rule of law.

The rent-seeking trend is exacerbated by the fact that the whole state machinery is largely controlled by less competent individuals who have much to gain by joining the ranks of the party. These less competent individuals are particularly attracted to the rank and file of the party structure due to their rent-seeking motives rather than because they are convinced by the system's policies. From the beginning, their motive of joining the party is not ideological affiliation or commitment to public service. When such people are assigned to some positions, they immediately engage in corruption and due to lack of competence, they render poor public service. Such kind of personalities have infested the ranks and file of the institutions such as the parliament, the administrativeagencies, regional legislative and executive organs up to the smallest kebele administrative units.

The whole power relation is entirely functioning on patron-client loyalty motivated by undue economic benefits rather than merit or ideological commitments. Such power relations have made corruption systemic in thecountry rather than an isolated incident you fight it through establishing anti-corruption commission or arresting few individuals. Since corruption is systemic in the country, fighting corruption to the very end will threatenthe survival of the regime itself. Due to the threat to its very survival, the regime will stop the campaign against corruption at certain stage or only target junior government officials. If the regime determined to address corruption altogether, it is likely that the regime will disappears in the coming few years as its members and supporters will no more be interested to work with the system once they knew that the regime could not render them the benefits they were receiving for their support to the regime. The regime will be unlikely to engage in such kind of suicidal alternative that will wipe it out from its grip to power.

The regime's action rather reminds me of a very interesting story we find in the bible under the Gospel of John chapter 8. In this text, Jesus went tothe Mount of Olives and the scribes and Pharisees brought to him a woman taken in adultery. They said to him 'Master, this woman was takenin adultery, in the very act. Now Moses in the law commanded us, that such should be stoned: but what sayest thou?' But Jesus stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground, as though he heard them not. When they continued asking him, he lifted up himself, and said unto them,He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. And again he stooped down, and wrote on the ground. After that, being convicted by their own conscience went out one by one, beginning at the eldest, even unto the last: and Jesus was left alone, and the woman standing in the midst. In the same way, who in the regime is clean enough to accuse the others and cast the stone? One way or the other theranks and file in the regime from top to bottom are engaged in corruptive practices. The very lifeline for the support of the regime is related to the army of supporters and members who have joined for job opportunities, financial incentives and getting priorities in public funds. Fighting corruption primarily requires clean hands and pure conscience!

The most effective way of fighting corruption is establishing accountable,transparent system where rule of law reigns. As things stands now, the percepts of revolutionary democracy do not permit the existence of independent institutions such as the media, civil society groups, effectiveparliament, the judiciary, Ombudsman and other democratic institutions that are instrumental in addressing corruption in the country. Without such institutions, it is almost impossible to address the trends of corruption consuming the country's limited resources. The regime is unlikely to allow the existence of such institutions in the country as their existence amounts to the end of the police state it runs. What is the alternative way out? I presume we are yet to live with the rampant corruption in the country until the appointed time for freedom comes andwe are able to install the institutions that address the root causes of corruption!

Over 60 detained in Chilga, and many deserted the area'

ESAT News: (May 13, 2013) Federal police have opened fire on framers who opposed a plan by local Administration to remove them from their possession in the name of giving the land for a local investor in Ameklin,Alemtsehaye Kebele of Chilga Woreda found 55Km from Gonder City.

Those who opposed to leave their land have been beaten and taken to Ayekel Prison on May 8, 2013. According to eye witnesses, due to severe beating by the police, Wube Azanaw, a young student of grade 7, is receiving medical treatments in Gonder Hospital. The problem began afterthe Local Administration decided to distribute their possessions to a local investor without consulting and discussing with the residents. Berhanu Zegeye, Tegenu Degefa, Demeoz Adane, Eyayu Kassie, Yenehun Abera, Andarge Getu, Tadele Alemayehu, Aweke Chekol, Babeye Abi, Mulu Atenaw, Amare Demisse, Babye Abebe, Alemneh Mekashaw, Deacon Tadios Tesema and Baye Belaye are among those who have been beaten by Police. Local priest Tefera Tsige's hand has been broken due to police beating while Priest Tekle Belay had his head injured. Sources said police is still continuing to surround the area. Many have deserted the area and fled into the desert. The Police officers that fired on the residents and beaten the people were cheering as if they had achieved victory over enemy forces, the source said. In related news, over three thousand farmers living in Kokit Kebele of Metema Woreda, North Western Ethiopia,have protested refusing to give up their land. A resident of the Woreda told that the problem was related to a process known as Land Bank and land being given to investors.

Identity of Bahir Dar mass shooter still undisclosed'

ESAT News: (May 13, 2013) The motive and identity of the Bahir Dar mass shooter, who killed a 2 year old child and 17 other civilians on Sunday May 12, 2013 at 8:45pm in Kebele 11, Abay Mado, Bahir Dar City,North Western Ethiopia, has not been disclosed. Some sources say the suspect, who is allegedly a member of the Ethiopian Federal Police, killed the civilians after a girl he had fallen in love with told him that she was not interested to continue relationship with him. On the other hand, other sources say "as he hails from a different ethnic group, he was trying to show his hate for the other ethnic group". Some residents have said to ESAT that the Officer first went to the girl's home and as he failed to find her, he shot her mother and all those that he found in the vicinity.

Following reports that the shooter comes from a different ethnic group and the shooting took place in front of the highly secured office of AmharaNational Democratic Movement (ANDM) and the Martyr's Statue where there were enough soldiers, ESAT's reporter in Bahir Dar says most peoplein the City are now beginning to comment that the murder "could be political". Commander Dereje Achamyeleh, Department Head of the Bahir Dar City Police Commission, in an interview with Voice of the ruling Party, Radio Fana, said "the individual killed 12 people and as police went after the suspect, he drowned himself into the river". The Commander confirmed that the suspect was a member of the Federal Police and the motive of the act was "personal".

The ruling EPRDF has dispersed its main members in the City to explain that the shooting was not "political". The people have become even more suspicious after the government reduced the number of the deceased to just 12. Most eyewitnesses have confirmed that the number of the deceased has reached 17. The residents are refusing to accept the government's report which says the suspect had drowned himself to death. A 2 year old child is among those killed. The funeral of the seven people has been conducted in the presence of Ayalew Gobeze, the Region's President. It is to be recalled that have been reported that a member of the Federal Police had shot a number of people to death in thetown of Koso Ber few months ago. Even though, the crimes committed bymembers of the Federal Police force against the civilian population on theincreasing, since the government has not taken any preventive measuresso far.

A rebel disguised as "federal police trooper" carried out Bahir Dar attack -EUFF'

Media updates - BAHIR DAR (May 14, 2013):

Government says suspect is a Federal Police member Government says suspect is not known by name Government says suspect drowned in a near by river flowGovernment says couldn't find his body Government says body of the suspect found at a nearby river wearing amilitary camouflaged uniform with fresh blood at his tongue.

Government said a 'disgruntled' federal police officer was responsible for the deaths of at least 12 civilians in this resort at night but the rebel EUFFsaid it was one of them who was disguised as a policeman and gunned down 12 regional ruling party officials.

No other independent source has verified the news report. Ethiopian Unityand Freedom Force (EUFF) said four women and a child were also killed during a crossfire shot that was opened to keep the retreating insurgent safe. Radio Fana, a ruling party property, said the alleged killer was a disgruntled Federal Police trooper believed to have died after jumping off the Blue Nile Bridge. Searches couldn't find the body, the radio added.

Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn condemned the killings, and vowedto launch investigations. But counter to his words, state radio reported that seven of the civilians were buried about half a day later on Monday, and without disclosing their identity to the public. The curious mind may ask, "Why the haste?" The rebel EUFF has promised to release the list of those killed. (Text ends)

Amhara Police Chief says shooter had no ethnic motives'

ESAT News: May 14, 2013 - The Amhara Regional Police Commission saidthat the police officer that shot over 17 civilians including a 2 year old child to death in Kebele 11, Bahir Dar City, has been identified. Following ESAT’s report that the Police officer comes from a different ethnic origin than the dominant ethnic group in the Region, i.e. Amhara, some people have been commenting that the killing could have some ethnicity related motives. The body of the shooter, identified as Constable FikaduNasha, has been recovered by divers near Cherechera Dam, located between Tana Lake and Abay River. Eyewitnesses have said the suspect’s face hasbeen eaten by fishes. Mulugeta Worku, Police Commissioner of the Amhara Region, who spoke with the reporter told that “the suspect committed the crime after, Zebider, the lady he was inloved with, refusedto continue relationship with him’’. The Commissioner said that he does not accept the allegations that the shooting was related to ethnic issues.Residents of Bahir Dar told that the city was still in grief.

Ethiopia: Refusing a ‘diminished self’ - Informed by prison experience, activist-scholar imagines a more open Ethiopia’ HARVARD gazette Analysis: By Birtukan Midekssa: The unholy marriage between authoritarianism and ethno-nationalism’ Four years ago this spring, Birtukan Midekssa was in solitary confinement in an Ethiopian prison. Her cell was 13 feet wide and 20 feet long and had no window. She was allowed only two visitors: her elderly mother and her 3-year-old daughter.Midekssa left Ethiopia in 2011, after two imprisonments that consumed 41months of her life. She stayed first in Washington, D.C., and then at Stanford University. Today — grateful, happy, and energized — she has an office (with a window) at the W.E.B. Du Bois Institute, where she is a fellow this year. (A lawyer by training, Midekssa is also a Visiting Fellow with Harvard Law School’s Human Rights Program; starting in the fall she’ll pursue a one-year mid-career master’s degree in public administration through the Mason Program at Harvard Kennedy School.) Most apt of all her local connections, perhaps, is her role as a Harvard Scholar at Risk. The program — based in New York, with dozens of affiliates at universities across the world — guarantees a year or more of refuge for scholars, writers, and scientists who in their native lands are under threat of death, imprisonment, or harassment.

“I was in prison because I spoke,” said Midekssa. She was first sent to prison in May-2005 — entering when her daughter Halley was 8 months old — and then again in 2008. Both times she was sentenced to life (the second time her original sentence was death). Both times Midekssa was pardoned because of pressure from international human rights groups. But she was ready to live her whole life in a cell. “I was being imprisonedfor a right cause. What else could I do?” said Midekssa. “If you restrain your self-expression, you are left with what? Your diminished self.”

Midekssa had entered Ethiopia’s political arena in 2002 after serving nearly six years on that nation’s federal criminal bench. “Most of my yearswere full of challenge,” she said of being a judge — a struggle to “keep myindependence and professional standards.” While she was on the bench, Ethiopian officials routinely tried to influence her decisions, she said. But she refused to go along, despite pressure that sometimes ratcheted up to threats of death. Her most notorious act of defiant honesty was to free a former defense minister, Siye Abraha, who’d been accused of corruption on dubious grounds, charges that had already cost him years in prison. (Abraha himself was in the Mason Program at Harvard Kennedy School, from 2011 to 2012.) From girlhood, Midekssa had been enthralled by the idea that Ethiopia one day could be an open democracy, despite the fact that such a concept remained entirely theoretical during her early life. Shewas born in 1974, the last year of a dynasty of Ethiopian emperors that had started in the 13th century, and grew up in the capital city of Addis Ababa during a military dictatorship that lasted 17 years, ending when shewas a senior in high school. Before the next dictatorship took hold, Ethiopia enjoyed a brief Golden Age of open political discussion, said Midekssa. “Naturally, I aspired to see a country in which individual liberty is protected — in which nobody is killed for their views.”

Midekssa knew that such killing was possible. In the mid-1970s, universitystudents and others had rallied behind the idea of a Marxist-Leninist utopia for Ethiopia — an opposition movement that led to the death and disappearance of thousands. Her uncle, a promising student headed for university studies, was one of them, and his disappearance hovered over young Midekssa’s household. Her uncle’s story was both a warning and aninspiration. Her mother often told Midekssa how unwise it was of her uncleto be in politics, she said — but “if I were his age I would have done the same thing.” Her childhood contained another influence that could be called political: her neighborhood. “The community life was very fervent,” said Midekssa. “I grew up in a big family of small families.” Mutual support, collective trust, and affection were the norms, she said, and the egalitarianism of her childhood “was an inspiration for a fair and democratic society.” Her mother was a housewife; her father a soldier.

Both were illiterate, she said, but intensely interested in education, andproud of the acuity their daughter displayed in the classrooms of her youth.

By age 25, Midekssa was a federal judge specializing in criminal law — just one young face in a wave of young judges who replaced those associated with the deposed military regime. “I was full of enthusiasm from what I learned in law school,” she said, “but the experience in court was entirely different.” It was her struggle with maintaining the rule of lawwhile on the bench, and her close-up view of official corruption, Midekssa said, that finally propelled her into politics. During the May-2005 national elections, her Coalition for Unity and Democracy party won every parliamentary seat in the capital, and scored other big wins over the ruling front of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. But within days of the results she was in jail, along with other party members and a raft of independent journalists — all charged with treason. The arrest set her on a path to becoming Ethiopia’s most famous opposition figure. In 2010 she became the first woman in Ethiopian history to chair a political party, Unity for Democracy and Justice.

At Harvard, in her law school setting, Midekssa has studied how the judiciary in closed societies can remain independent. But at the Du BoisInstitute her focus has been investigating how Ethiopia can achieve democracy. There is a strong appetite for democracy there already, shesaid, along with a tradition of Christian-Muslim religious tolerance that suggests to her that democracy would thrive. But along with bedrock values there are also bedrock problems. For one, Ethiopia’s new constitution, in 1995, redrew the nation of 85 million along ethnic lines, fragmenting the overarching national identity into 80 ethnic identities within nine member states. That left Ethiopia “hollowed out,” she said,“deprived of its national symbols and emblems.”

Meanwhile, the federal government has ruled with a strong hand, sometimes by regional proxies. Midekssa called the arrangement “an unholy marriage between authoritarianism and ethno-nationalism.” Ethiopia’s aggressive central government and its weak regional states, shesaid, undermine “the virtues of federalism” and make the practice of democracy very unlikely. Leaders have also tightened their hold on the judiciary, the media, and the electoral process — a further “narrowing of the democratic sphere,” Midekssa said. So what is to be done? The first step is to “recast the past,” she said, to reclaim symbols and a national narrative that would make Ethiopia one again. Also, re-imagine the future,said Midekssa, by promoting the shared social values that, for instance, her own childhood represented. Then there are the practical steps, she said, including an official language, an independent supreme court, nationwide political parties to supplant those drawn along ethnic lines, andmulticultural education to “help Ethiopians to imagine democratic Ethiopia,with all her mosaic.”

Ethiopia celebrates the return of its iconic fossil’

ADDIS ABABA - (May 15 2013, 08:17) WELCOME home Lucy banners adorned Ethiopia’s National Museum in Addis Ababa where residents, bus loads of schoolchildren and curious foreign tourists waited to catch a glimpse of a 3.2-million-year-old celebrity skeleton. Lucy, an early humanancestor and known to science as australopithecus afarensis, is more familiar to her Ethiopian compatriots by her Amharic name of Dinknesh (literally, "you are amazing"). She recently returned home from a controversial five-year US tour and has received the type of reception usually reserved for the country’s sporting heroes. Lucy is not the oldest hominid fossil ever found, nor is she the best preserved. So why the fuss?"From a scientific point of view her species sits on the (human) family treeat a very pivotal point," says Dr Donald Johanson, the American anthropologist who discovered Lucy in 1974 at the Awash Valley in Ethiopia’s Afar Depression. "There is a major split … one that leads to creatures that we put in the genus homo that had large brains and began to make stone tools, and another branch that ultimately died out," he saidon the day of Lucy’s homecoming last month.

At the time the diminutive Lucy was unearthed (she measures just 1m) she was the oldest and most intact hominid ever excavated. Dr Berhane Asfaw, a resident researcher at the National Museum of Ethiopia, explains the significance: "It was not a single specimen — not a mandible or a skull — it was a skeleton. It was the first of its kind of that age with that kind ofcompleteness. It was 40%, but that 40% … gives us the full information about that particular (species)." Lucy left for the US in 2007 amid much controversy. It was late prime minister Meles Zenawi's idea to send her asan ambassador to illustrate Ethiopia's rich history. The money raised fromthe tour was used to upgrade research and storage facilities at the national museum which are now said to be among the best in the world.

"Some of us didn't agree," says Dr Berhane. "We didn't think that it was important, even for the money. I was the first one to say no. I said no upuntil the end and I'm still not convinced it was important." Dr Berhane feared it would set a precedent, but his main fear was that Lucy would bedamaged. "If she is endangered then the loss is not only for one country.The loss is for the whole of humanity." After her departure, there were rumours Lucy had been sold in the US. Even now, when the actual skeleton rather than a replica is on display at the museum for the first time, doubts remain. "Is she the real Lucy?" Meseret Tesfaye muses before visiting the exhibition.

"How do we know it is her?" Along with important cultural artefacts from across Ethiopia, Lucy was exhibited in Seattle, Southern California, Houston and at New York's Discovery Museum where hundreds of thousands of people came to see her. She is known and loved throughout her homeland. The exhibition in Addis was extended beyond the scheduledfive days because so many Ethiopians wanted to see her. In honour of hername, the women's national football team is known as the Lucies. "I thinkthat she is of such interest to people worldwide because people perceive her as an individual, as a person," says Dr Johanson. He also attributes her popularity to her "friendly" name which was chosen as The Beatles' song Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds was playing in the camp on the night she was discovered. Beyond being an envoy for Ethiopia, Dr Johanson thinks she has a wider, global significance. "Lucy's message to humanity is that we all have a common origin," he says. "We are united by our past and in a way she expresses the view that if we have a common ancestry and we are a common people today, we have a common destiny."

Elissa Jobson is based in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, and writes for Business Day.

John Kerry's Ethiopia Opportunity'

By MARTIN SCHIBBYE AND PATRICK GRIFFITH – (May 15th, 2013)

This month, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry will travel to Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, to attend the 21st African Union (AU) summit. The message he brings will speak volumes about the future of American engagement on the continent. In announcing the visit during a U.S. Senate hearing last month, Mr. Kerry expressed concern about the potentially negative impactof China's and Iran's increased presence in Africa. He noted that graft andpoor development choices could undermine the stability of some African governments, and he acknowledged the need for more U.S. engagement. Further American cooperation on development and security would be goodnews for Africa. But the U.S. must continue to focus on another potentially destabilizing factor in the continent: ongoing violations of basic human rights and fundamental freedoms. Since their inception, the AU and its precursor, the Organization of African Unity, have embraced the principlesof the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The African Charter on Human and People's Rights expressly protects a raft of basic human rights, including freedom of association, free expression and political participation. But despite these affirmations, the protection of such rights remains inconsistent across AU nations. Some governments continue to ignore certain provisions entirely. If he needs an example, Mr. Kerry needonly look out his window in Addis Ababa. This month the Ethiopian Supreme Court upheld an 18-year prison sentence against independent journalist Eskinder Nega. Though the Ethiopian government is often touted as a close U.S. partner on security and poverty-reduction efforts, ithas a dreadful record on rights. After parliamentary elections in 2005, thegovernment jailed opposition leaders such as former judge Birtukan Mideksa and independent journalists who reported on the post-election unrest.

Mr. Nega and his wife Serkalem Fasil, herself a prominent publisher, wereamong those arrested. They spent 17 months in a detention center on trumped-up charges of treason and genocide before they were finally released. Pregnant at the time of her arrest, Ms. Fasil was denied prenatalcare for seven months and gave birth to their son Nafkot while in custody.In the spring of 2011, as popular uprisings gathered momentum across North Africa and the Middle East, Mr. Nega wrote extensively about their possible impact on Ethiopia. Despite warnings that he was going too far, Mr. Nega continued to write and speak publicly, often criticizing the government and calling for democratic reforms, while emphasizing the importance of nonviolence. But like fellow journalists Reeyot Alemu and Woubshet Taye, and opposition activists such as Andualem Aragie, Mr.

Nega was charged in September 2011 under Ethiopia's widely criticized2009 Antiterrorism Proclamation. He now faces 18 years in prison.

The African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights has expressed grave alarm at Ethiopia's persecution of journalists and peaceful activists.In April the U.N. Working Group on Arbitrary Detention also weighed in, declaring Mr. Nega's detention illegal under international law and calling for his immediate release. But these admonitions have so far not convinced Ethiopian authorities to change course. When U.S. President Barack Obama laid out his administration's agenda for sub-Saharan Africa last summer, he emphasized strong democratic institutions and respect for the rule of law, noting that these promote both prosperity and stability. But as long as journalists and political activists are imprisoned for speaking their truth to power, such principles will remain illusory. Mr. Kerry has an important opportunity this month to convey that very message to his counterparts in Addis Ababa. Mr. Nega and his colleagues deserve nothing less. Mr. Schibbye is a Swedish journalist who was detained in Ethiopia for 14 months under the country's antiterror laws and held at Kaliti Prison with Eskinder Nega. Mr. Griffith is an attorney with Freedom Now, a legal advocacy organization that works to free prisonersof conscience, including Mr. Nega.

The Irony of Meles Zenawi's Foundation'

VIEWS: May 17, 2013 "The tyrant finally died leaving Ethiopians with the legacy of: sellout of Ethiopia's vital national interests such as active support for the separation of Eritrea; grisly heinous crimes including genocide, victims of torture, incarceration of peaceful protesters en masse; extra judiciary execution of peaceful protesters, the wailing of mothers, the agony of bereaved families, filthy jails in which hundreds of political prisoners are cruelly kept, toiling peasants in serfdom, interethnichatred, daylight robbery of votes, pervasive corrupt practices, culture of pathological lies, demised free media, government monopoly of all pillars of democracy, blocked freedom of expression, poor educational standard, forbidden academic freedom in tertiary institutions, a land-locked country,fertile farmland ceded to the Sudan; leasing large chunks of fertile farmlands to unscrupulous foreign investors at tiny price; massive unemployment largely affecting the youth; demoralized youth addicted to psycho-thermal drugs; abject poverty; embezzlement of national treasureand diverting donor fund;rampant breach of the constitution; regional instability et al" – to which I have referred a couple of times in my previous articles. All in all it was a tragedy that befell Ethiopia bringing herto the precipice of catastrophe that will require divine guidance, visionary leadership and hard work in a democratic environment in order to nullify the gruesome legacy of tyrant Zenawi. Therefore in view of his above atrocious records the establishment of Zenawi's Foundation with the approval of the rubber stamp Parliament is an irony in contempt of the intelligence of the Ethiopian people.

The saga of the sharing of Nile waters'

A study was completed during the reign of Emperor Haile Selassie for constructing electric power dams over the Blue Nile River (BNR) but was withheld only due to lack of funds. I recall that the Imperial regime circulated flyers promising to construct irrigation dams to divert attentionin the 1974 revolution but that propaganda did not save the fall of the regime.The same fate awaits the EPRDF.

In 1977 Mengistu Hailemariam vowed at a meeting to make Egypt pay forevery barrel of the water it is getting from the BNR. That was at a time when the Siade Barre forces made deep penetration into the Ethiopian territory in several fronts. This writer said that it was impractical to provoke Egypt which enjoys the support of the Arab world and Western powers at that time when we have alienated the latter due to our leftist ideology. This intervention made sense to him and was greeted with a sigh of relief by worried participants.

This writer was entangled in an incident in 1978 over his remarks that Ethiopia was not a party to any treaty on the sharing of the BNR waters and therefore she has the right to keep a fair share of the waters within her territories. The representative of the Sudan fumed but lost in the debate. He also recalls that in the 1980s suggesting, in his private capacity at a reception in the Egyptian Embassy in Addis Ababa, that amicable cooperation and collaboration among Ethiopia, Sudan and Egyptwill go a long way in creating a regional power under the umbrella of the OAU.I still do!

So this writer's present stand over the sharing of BNR waters is not for thepurpose of political opposition to the TPLF/EPRDF regime. It is out of deep concern based on five cardinal reasons: (1) negative environmental impact of the Mega Renaissance Dam (MRD); (2) the MRD is a white elephant that will never recover the investment if built at all; (3) its (MRD's) intended size raises an intolerable security concern to Sudan and Egypt leading to regional instability or even war; (4) MRD project is politically motivated without conducting a comprehensive cost-benefit analysis; (5) no international financial institutions or governments would invest in the project as seen in the past under the previous regimes

"ዓምላካችን ያበረከተላትን ይህን ታብቷን (አባይን)ለሕዝቦቻቸውሕይወትና ደህንነት በማዋል እንዲጠቀሙበት ከጎረቤት ወዳጇ አገሮች ጋር በለጋስነት በጋራ ለመካፈል ዝግጁ ብትሆንም፤ ይህን የውሃ ንብረቷን በቁጥር እየጨመረ ለሚሄደው ሕዝቧና በማደግ ላይ ላለውኢኮኖሚ ጥቅም እንዲውል ማድረግ የኢትዮጵያ ተቀዳሚና የተቀደሰ ግዴታዋነ ው። "-ቀዳማዊ ኃይለ ሥላሴ፤ ጥቅምት 1957ዓ ም

Ethiopia: The corruption Game - Scapegoating or "anti-corruption"?

Truthful lips endure forever, but a lying tongue lasts only a moment" BibleProverbs 12:19 VIEWS: May 20, 2013: According to a Wikileaks cablegram, Tigrean People's Liberation Front (TPLF), the current ruling party in Ethiopia, "Upon taking power in May 1991… liquidated non-military assets to found a series of companies whose profits would be used as venture capital to rehabilitate the war-torn Tigray region's economy…[with] roughly US $100million… Throughout the 1990s…, no new EFFORT [Endowment Fund for the Rehabilitation of Tigray owned and operated by TPLF] ventures have been established despite significant profits, lending credibility to the popular perception that the ruling party and its members are drawing on endowment resources to fund their own interests or for personal gain. The World Bank also reveals, roughly half of the Ethiopian national economy isaccounted for by companies held by a business group called the Endowment Fund for the Rehabilitation of Tigray (EFFORT) cloasely allied with the ruling EPDRF party. EFFORT's freight transport, construction, pharmaceutical, and cement firms receive lucrative foreign aid contracts and highly favorable terms on loans from government banks. "Generals" and other military leaders have managed to accumulate properties worth hundreds of millions of dollars. Last year, a regime general told Voice of America Amharic that he was able to build a number of multistory buildings worth tens of millions of dollars because he was “given bankloans.

Time for a new game, a new hype. How about “corruption”? It’s a chic topic. The World Bank is talking about it. Everybody is talking about it. Even the corrupts are talking about corruption. Imagine kleptocrats callingcorruptocrats corrupt? Or the pot calling the kettle black? The so-called “corruption investigation” appears to be a case of scapegoating. Tradition has it that on the day of atonement a goat would be selected by the high priest and loaded with the sins of the community and driven out into the wilderness as an affirmative act of symbolic cleansing. It made the peoplefeel purged of evil and guiltless. The “corruption” suspects were supporters, defenders and handmaidens of the regime. Now they are made out to be loathsome villains. The sins and crimes of the regime are placed upon their heads and they driven out into the wilderness. The high priests of the regimes are telling the people they have been cleansed and the community is free from evil. In this narrative, the regime “anti- corruption warriors” become the white knights in shining armor. But no amount of scapegoating can divert attention from the real situation. It is wise for those who live in glass houses not to throw stones. Professor Alemayehu G. Mariam teaches political science at California State University, San Bernardino and is a practicing defense lawyer.

Burden on the conscience; the million dollar question; an all-out uprisingto save Ethiopia'

VIEWS: The Ethiopian Youth National Movement (EYNM) has unequivocallyexpressed its solidarity with the SEMAYAWI (Blue) Party’s call for protest demonstration in front of the AU Headquarters on May 25, 2013. Other youth groups are either in the battle field or on the way to joining it in droves to save their motherland inherited from their heroic ancestors. Thequestion is what is the silent majority of elites going to do? This writer’s conscience dictates that he must keep his own long held pledge to engagein an all-out uprising against the TPLF/EPRDF regime, to demand change to a genuine democratic order.

The ongoing crackdown on rampant corruption is a tip of the iceberg; the war on distortion of history, ethnic cleansing of the ethnic-Amharas and rampant breach of the constitution must continue. The phrase “ጎ ሐፍ ጽረ ጉ ለ ይ”(clean the filth) coined by the late dictator Meles Zenawi should be applied to: (a) dismantle the Zenawi Foundation; (b) erase Melesist thoughts; (c) tear down his statutes and remove his photograph from all public squares and government offices; (d) wipe out from office all corruptTPLF warlords, including the notorious liar Azeb Mesfin, and bring them to justice. Demand the immediate and unconditional release of all prisoners of conscience including Andualem Aragie, Eskinder Nega, Bekele Garba, Reeyot Alemu, Olbana Lelissa, leaders of the Ethiopian Muslims et al.

African Union celebrates 50th year - AP

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP) — African nations this week mark the 50th year since the founding of a continentwide organization that spearheaded efforts to liberate Africa from colonial masters. Now leaders want to map out the next 50 years of political and economic integration. Konjit Sinegiorgis was a young diplomat tasked with distributing documents to the assembled heads of state when the founding congress of the Organization of African Unity was held in May 1963. Sinegiorgis said the OAU ‘‘brilliantly’’ accomplished its primary task. ‘‘Its primary mandate wasto liberate Africa from the shackles of colonialism and apartheid. I think inthat regard it has done brilliantly,’’ said Konjit, now Ethiopia’s ambassadorto the African Union, the successor to the OAU. The weeklong 50-year celebrations culminate Saturday in the Ethiopian capital where African leaders will be joined by foreign dignitaries including United States Secretary of State John Kerry. African leaders will also consider Agenda 2063, a blueprint they say will bring socio-economic and political transformation to the continent. Kerry, who recently expressed concerns over China’s growing influence in Africa, is expected to be joined by Chinese President Xi Jinping’s special representative, Vice Premier Wang Yang, at the celebrations in the AU headquarters, a building whose $200 million constriction costs were paid by Beijing. The 53-member African Union, which began in 2002, has been trying to emerge as a force for stability on a continent regularly troubled by violence, conflicts and coups.One key achievement of the OAU and AU ‘‘has been to set standards and norms that we are now using at the continental level,’’ said Erastus Mwencha, deputy chair of the AU. ‘‘We are now talking of having norms such as a protocol on governance, on elections and so forth.’’ As the AU strives to make peaceful transfers of power across Africa the norm, it often sanctions coup leaders and suspends membership of states. But it also often fails to mobilize resource to enforce its decisions. The AU is alsoa long way from its founders’ dream of a united Africa. The continent seesa huge disparity in the economic and political conditions of its nations.

South Africa is an economic power, while citizens in countries like Somalia, Sudan, Congo and Chad suffer from warfare and poverty. A coalition of over 120 civil society groups from across Africa and the MiddleEast on Wednesday issued a warning about conflicts in Sudan. The groupscalled on the AU to support a bolder approach to peace there. But the continent also boasts nine of the world’s 15 fastest growing economies, Rwanda President Paul Kagame wrote last weekend in The Wall Street Journal, and the AU head says the continent’s future is brighter than its past. ‘‘If you look at the last 10 years, Africa has been growing economically,’’ said AU chair Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma.

‘‘There has been quite a lot of development even in terms of infrastructure, not enough yet, but countries have been working hard.’’ The United Nations Economic Commission for Africa says Africa’s medium-term growth prospects remain strong, at 4.8 percent in 2013 and a projected 5.1 percent in 2014. ‘‘Yet this impressive growth story has not translated into economic diversification, commensurate jobs or faster social development,’’ said the U.N. in its latest report. ‘‘Most African economies still depend heavily on commodity production and exports, withtoo little value addition and few forward and backward linkages to other sectors of the economy.’’ Improvements are being seen in education, childand maternal mortality rates, and gender equality. As Africans leaders meet later this week, the 50-year strategic plan is expected to be high on the agenda. Dlamini-Zuma said the decades-long quest for Africa’s political and economic integration are to be answered by the blueprint. Energizing and galvanizing the people of the continent toward an African Renaissance is the aim of the week’s celebrations, Dlamini-Zuma said overthe weekend. As Africa looks to write plans for the future, activists are calling for more efforts to respect its citizens’ rights. The Committee to Protect Journalists wrote to John Kerry to urge him to include the issue of press freedom in his discussions at the AU Summit.

BBC’s George Alagiah Show at African Union (AU) in Addis Ababa!

Commentary: By Tedla Asfaw - May 20, 2013 - GMT BBC World News from 7am to 8am ET devoted 15 minutes of its time on George Alagiah or George, one of its correspondents on mission to cover the 50th anniversary of OAU/AU in Addis Ababa. The Headlines News on BBC tells its listeners that Ethiopia is one of the fastest growing economy in the world. The small shoe factory, the coffee bean exporter who promised to bring British financed machinery to export the finished coffee product to the world market was the success story to support the claim. George was honored by ringing the bell on the floor of Ethiopian Commodity Exchange,the first of its kind in Africa according to the BBC. These “economic miracles” and similar “owned” by the very few minority ethnicity are what the BBC Headlines declared the fastest growing economy of Ethiopia.

Prime Minster Hailemariam Desalegn who was interviewed on the programwas boasting of converting Ethiopia to manufacturing or industrialized country in the coming decade. However, China will not be happy mentioning Taiwan as one of the models for Ethiopia. Hailemariam is not as sharp as the late Meles Zenawi. Is Ethiopia doing business with both Taiwan and China at the same time?

George’s AU Show in the coming day or days will cover the roads and buildings in Addis Ababa to support the march to industrialization. If he travels to the outskirts of Addis Ababa flower farms which is bringing in hard currency for the ruling mafia are replacing food producing farm lands. If he goes far he will see the mechanized farm of Sheik Al Amoudi and similar huge tracts of land under the control of the foreign landlords and the government. All these “growth” are at the expense of small farmers and indigenous people. The British development agency and USAID are financing the land grab. Europe has its flower and America hasits security, period! George invited two students from university, two street dancers and one female architect to his show at AU Studio this morning. The street was very quiet looked like the Green Zone of Americain Baghdad. We did not see the security forces but I can assure you that George Show was well protected not from ” terrorists” but from the widerpublic. If George wants to talk to the young people he could have gone toschools and colleges, why did he ask the school and college to come to him ? He went to Ethiopian Commodity Exchange floor why not go to the universities ? The truth is this. He is in total control by his hosts, the government cadres, because Ethiopia is run by armed group of minority clique which bans free assembly and speech throughout the country.

Speech and Assembly are only allowed under the eye of security thugs orgovernment picked paid agents. A Female Architect who informed us that she wants to stay in Ethiopia because construction is booming. If George goes around freely which he might not will find hundreds if not thousands of doctors leaving hospitals not because of lack of job but because of lack of basic freedom in Ethiopia.I challenge George to take his show to the people not bringing selected people to his studio at AU and feeding us tons of propaganda which the Ethiopian people are tired of. The one minute talk about human rights with Hailemariam Desalegn is very shameful. For BBC what matters is “Food/growth” not Freedom. I want to give tip to George before he finished his AU Show most likely at the end of this week to Visit the Anwar Mosque and Kaliti Jail in Addis. If you are Muslim you can pray if not wait and follow the prayer. Talk to the young female and male and ask them what “growth” means to them. The journalists and political leaders locked up at Kaliti will not be allowed to talk, some were shipped out not to spoil the AU Show, but why not try to talk to family members, mothers,fathers,wives,husbands and children, who are coming daily for year or years to see their loved ones. Last but not least I want George to cover the peaceful rally of May 25 organized by the newly formed Blue Party/Semayawi of Ethiopia (Blue). They will try to come out right where George is , BBC AU studio. I do not want to give you their Web address because it is blocked. One thing George should not forget to report in few days he enjoys life in Addis is the “growth” in Internet blocking. Ethiopia isthe worst abuser of all but BBC does not matter much because its correspondents are blocking themselves. Go Blue Go !!

Emperor Haile Selassie I never accepted demarcation with the Sudan -Scholar'

SILVER SPRING, Maryland - The statement made by the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi that Emperor Haileselassie's government had agreed with the Sudan to accept the demarcation initiated by Major Gwynn in 1903 and 1909 is false, a prominent Ethiopian told a group on May 18 here in Silver Spring, MD. Alem-Ante Guebre Selassie, a law professor, told the Ethiopian Border Affairs Committee (EBAC) meeting onMay 18-19, 2013 that the imperial government had always rejected the unilateral decision made by Major Gwynn on behalf of the Great Britain, which was the colonial master of the Sudan at the time. "The 1972 Exchange of Notes between Ethiopia and Sudan didn't accept Gwynn's demarcation. On the contrary, the Notes clearly provide and call for the re-demarcation of the boundary starting from Mt. Daglish from the southto the Setit River, in the north" Prof. Alemante said. The distinguished Ethiopian scholar said the Notes also call for what it refers to as "minor rectifications" of the boundary south of Mt. Daglish. "It's quite clear that no previous Ethiopian administration has in the past accepted Gwynn's line. It is the EPRDF led government that for the first time declared its acceptance of the Gwynn line. This position is not only a treasonous and shameful act, but also a radical departure from the attitude and patriotismof previous Ethiopian rulers," Professor Alem-Ante said. Ethiopian Border Affairs Committee (EBAC) members met on May 18-19, 2013 at Courtyardby Marriott in Silver Spring, MD, and reviewed performances and achievements. EBAC specially focused on the huge stretch of land ceded to the Sudan by Ethiopia's late prime minister Meles Zenawi. Natives of the Ethiopia-Sudan border as well as scholars who did research on the issue shared their views and understandings with fellow members.

Source: Ethiomedia
Femal Genital Mutilation News: Ethiopian awarded for anti-FGM work’
Ethiopian activist Bogaletch Gebre has won an international prize for her campaign to eradicate female genital mutilation (FGM). She was awarded the King Baudouin Prize in Belgium for confronting "culturally entrenched taboo subjects", the selection committee said. Ms Bogaletch helped reducecases of FGM from 100% of newborn girls to less than 3% in parts of Ethiopia, it said. FGM is practised mainly in communities in Africa and the Middle East. Also known as female circumcision, it is seen as a traditional rite of passage and is used culturally to ensure virginity and to make a woman marriageable. It typically involves removing the clitoris, and can lead to bleeding, infections and childbirth problems.
Jamaican PM leaves for African Union summit in Ethiopia’
Prime Minister Portia Simpson Miller was scheduled to leave the island yesterday for Addis-Ababa, Ethiopia, where she will attend the Special 50th Anniversary Summit commemorating the establishment of the Organisation of African Unity/African Union. Simpson Miller is accompanied by Foreign Minister A J Nicholson; Permanent Secretary in the Office of the Prime Minister Onika Miller; Jamaican High Commissionerto Nigeria, Ann Scott; Ambassador Carlton Masters, special envoy to the African Union, and members of her support team. The prime minister will deliver a keynote address to the summit, and in keeping with Jamaica's foreign policy objectives, will use the opportunity to not only deepen relations with the African Union but also engage in bilateral talks aimed atfurthering Jamaica's growth and development agenda and mutual interests. Transport and Works Minister Omar Davies will be in charge ofthe Government in the prime minister's absence.

Source: Jamaica Observer (May 23, 2013)

GM Relief Aid: America’s GM Grain Surpluses Sowing the Seeds of Faminein Ethiopia'

Global Research Analysis - This article, which describes how genetically modified seeds granted as “food aid” was instrumental in triggering famine. It was first published in The Ecologist in September 2000. It wasone the first articles published on Global Research in September 2001. Itwas also published as a chapter in the second edition of Michel Chossudovsky’s “Globalization of Poverty and the New World Order.

Theme: Biotechnology and GMO, Global Economy

The “economic therapy” imposed under IMF-World Bank jurisdiction is in large part responsible for triggering famine and social devastation in Ethiopia and the rest of sub-Saharan Africa, wreaking the peasant economy and impoverishing millions of people. With the complicity of branches of the US government, it has also opened the door for the appropriation of traditional seeds and landraces by US biotech corporations, which behind the scenes have been peddling the adoption oftheir own genetically modified seeds under the disguise of emergency aid and famine relief. Moreover, under WTO rules, the agri-biotech conglomerates can manipulate market forces to their advantage as well asexact royalties from farmers. The WTO provides legitimacy to the food giants to dismantle State programmes including emergency grain stocks, seed banks, extension services and agricultural credit, etc.), plunder peasant economies and trigger the outbreak of periodic famines.

Crisis in the Horn

More than 8 million people in Ethiopia – representing 15% of the country’spopulation – had been locked into “famine zones”. Urban wages have collapsed and unemployed seasonal farm workers and landless peasants have been driven into abysmal poverty. The international relief agencies concur without further examination that climatic factors are the sole and inevitable cause of crop failure and the ensuing humanitarian disaster.

What the media tabloids fails to disclose is that – despite the drought andthe border war with Eritrea – several million people in the most prosperous agricultural regions have also been driven into starvation. Their predicament is not the consequence of grain shortages but of “free markets” and “bitter economic medicine” imposed under the IMF-World Bank sponsored Structural Adjustment Programme (SAP). Ethiopia produces more than 90% of its consumption needs. Yet at the height of the crisis, the nationwide food deficit for 2000 was estimated by the Foodand Agriculture Organization (FAO) at 764,000 metric tons of grain representing a shortfall of 13 kilos per person per annum.1 In Amhara, grain production (1999-2000) was twenty percent in excess of consumption needs. Yet 2.8 million people in Amhara (representing 17% of the region's population) became locked into famine zones and are "at risk" according to the FAO. 2 Whereas Amhara's grain surpluses were in excess of 500,000 tons (1999-2000), its "relief food needs" had been tagged by the international community at close to 300,000 tons.3 A similar pattern prevailed in Oromiya, the country's most populated state where 1.6 million people were classified "at risk", despite the availability of more than 600,000 metric tons of surplus grain.4 In both these regions,which include more than 25% of the country's population, scarcity of food was clearly not the cause of hunger, poverty and social destitution. Yet no explanations are given by the panoply of international relief agencies and agricultural research institutes.

The Promise of the "Free Market"

In Ethiopia, a transitional government came into power in May 1991 in thewake of a protracted and destructive civil war. After the pro-Soviet Dergueregime of Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam was unseated, a multi-donor financed Emergency Recovery and Reconstruction Project (ERRP) was hastily put in place to deal with an external debt of close to 9 billion dollars that had accumulated during the Mengistu government. Ethiopia's outstanding debts with the Paris Club of official creditors were rescheduledin exchange for far-reaching macro-economic reforms. Upheld by US foreign policy, the usual doses of bitter IMF economic medicine were prescribed. Caught in the straightjacket of debt and structural adjustment,the new Transitional Government of Ethiopia (TGE), led by the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) – largely formed from the Tigrean People's Liberation Front (PLF) – had committed itself to far- reaching "free market reforms", despite its leaders' Marxist leanings. Washington soon tagged Ethiopia alongside Uganda as Africa's post Cold War free market showpiece. While social budgets were slashed under the structural adjustment programme (SAP), military expenditure – in part financed by the gush of fresh development loans – quadrupled since 1989.5 With Washington supporting both sides in the Eritrea-Ethiopia border war, US arms sales spiralled. The bounty was being shared between the arms manufacturers and the agribusiness conglomerates. In the post-Cold War era, the latter positioned themselves in the lucrative procurement of emergency aid to war-torn countries. With mounting military spending financed on borrowed money, almost half of Ethiopia's export revenues was earmarked to meet debt-servicing obligations. A Policy Framework Paper (PFP) stipulating the precise changes to be carriedout in Ethiopia had been carefully drafted in Washington by IMF and WorldBank officials on behalf of the transitional government, and was forwardedto Addis Ababa for the signature of the Minister of Finance. The enforcement of severe austerity measures virtually foreclosed the possibility of a meaningful post-war reconstruction and the rebuilding of the country's shattered infrastructure. The creditors demanded trade liberalization and the full-scale privatization of public utilities, financial institutions, State farms and factories. Civil servants including teachers and health workers were fired, wages were frozen and the labor laws wererescinded to enable State enterprises "to shed their surplus workers".

Meanwhile, corruption became rampant. State assets were auctioned off to foreign capital at bargain prices and Price Waterhouse Cooper was entrusted with the task of coordinating the sale of State property. In turn,the reforms had led to the fracture of the federal fiscal system. Budget transfers to the State governments were slashed leaving the regions to their own devices. Supported by several donors, "regionalization" was heralded as a "devolution of powers from the federal to the regional governments". The Bretton Woods institutions knew exactly what they were doing. In the words of the IMF, "[the regions] capacity to deliver effective and efficient development interventions varies widely, as does their capacity for revenue collection". 6

Wrecking the Peasant Economy

Patterned on the reforms adopted in Kenya in 1991 agricultural markets were wilfully manipulated on behalf of the agribusiness conglomerates. The World Bank demanded the rapid removal of price controls and all subsidies to farmers. Transportation and freight prices were deregulated serving to boost food prices in remote areas affected by drought. In turn,the markets for farm inputs including fertiliser and seeds were handed over to private traders including Pioneer Hi-Bred International which entered into a lucrative partnership with Ethiopia Seed Enterprise (ESE), the government's seed monopoly.

7 At the outset of the reforms in 1992, USAID under its Title III program "donated" large quantities of US fertilizer "in exchange for free market reforms": [V]arious agricultural commodities [will be provided] in exchange for reforms of grain marketing… and [the] elimination of food subsidies…The reform agenda focuses on liberalization and privatization inthe fertilizer and transport sectors in return for financing fertilizer and truck imports…. These program initiatives have given us [an] "entrée" …indefining major [policy] issues… 8 While the stocks of donated US fertiliser were rapidly exhausted; the imported chemicals contributed to displacing local fertiliser producers. The same companies involved in the fertiliser import business were also in control of the domestic wholesale distributionof fertiliser using local level merchants as intermediaries.

Increased output was recorded in commercial farms and in irrigated areas(where fertilizer and high yielding seeds had been applied). The overall tendency, however, was towards greater economic and social polarisationin the countryside, marked by significantly lower yields in less productive marginal lands occupied by the poor peasantry. Even in areas where output had increased, farmers were caught in the clutch of the seed andfertilizer merchants.

In 1997, the Atlanta based Carter Center – which was actively promoting the use of biotechnology tools in maize breeding – proudly announced that“Ethiopia [had] become a food exporter for the first time”.9 Yet in a cruel irony, the donors ordered the dismantling of the emergency grain reserves(set up in the wake of the 1984-85 famine) and the authorities acquiesced.

Instead of replenishing the country’s emergency food stocks, grain was exported to meet Ethiopia’s debt servicing obligations. Close to one milliontons of the 1996 harvest was exported, an amount which would have beenamply sufficient (according to FAO figures) to meet the 1999-2000 emergency. In fact the same food staple which had been exported (namely maize) was re-imported barely a few months later. The world market had confiscated Ethiopia’s grain reserves. In return, US surpluses of genetically engineered maize (banned by the European Union) were being dumped on the horn of Africa in the form of emergency aid. The US had found a convenient mechanism for “laundering its stocks of dirty grain”. The agribusiness conglomerates not only cornered Ethiopia’s commodity exports, they were also involved in the procurement of emergency shipments of grain back into Ethiopia. During the 1998-2000 famine, lucrative maize contracts were awarded to giant grain merchants such as Archer Daniels Midland (ADM) and Cargill Inc. 10

Laundering America’s GM Grain Surpluses

US grain surpluses peddled in war-torn countries also served to weaken the agricultural system. Some 500,000 tons of maize and maize products were “donated” in 1999-2000 by USAID to relief agencies including the World Food Programme (WFP) which in turn collaborates closely with the US Department of Agriculture. At least 30% of these shipments (procuredunder contract with US agribusiness firms) were surplus genetically modified grain stocks. 11 Boosted by the border war with Eritrea and the plight of thousands of refugees, the influx of contaminated food aid had contributed to the pollution of Ethiopia’s genetic pool of indigenous seeds and landraces. In a cruel irony, the food giants were at the same time gaining control – through the procurement of contaminated food aid – over Ethiopia’s seed banks. According to South Africa’s Biowatch: “Africa is treated as the dustbin of the world…To donate untested food and seed to Africa is not an act of kindness but an attempt to lure Africa into furtherdependence on foreign aid.”

12Moreover, part of the “food aid” had been channelled under the “food for work” program which served to further discourage domestic productionin favour of grain imports. Under this scheme, impoverished and landless farmers were contracted to work on rural infrastructural programmes in exchange for “donated” US corn. Meanwhile, the cash earnings of coffee smallholders plummeted. Whereas Pioneer Hi-Bred positioned itself in seed distribution and marketing, Cargill Inc established itself in the markets for grain and coffee through its subsidiary Ethiopian Commodities.12 For the more than 700,000 smallholders with less than 2 hectares that produce between 90 and 95% of the country’s coffee output,the deregulation of agricultural credit combined with low farmgate prices of coffee had triggered increased indebtedness and landlessness, particularly in East Gojam (Ethiopia’s breadbasket).

Biodiversity up for Sale: The country’s extensive reserves of traditional seed varieties (barley, teff, chick peas, sorghum, etc) were being appropriated, genetically manipulated and patented by the agribusiness conglomerates: “Instead of compensation and respect, Ethiopians today are …getting bills from foreign companies that have “patented” native species and now demand payment for their use.”13 The foundations of a “competitive seed industry” were laid under IMF and World Bank auspices.14 The Ethiopian Seed Enterprise (ESE), the government’s seed monopoly joined hands with Pioneer Hi-Bred in the distribution of hi-bred and genetically modified (GM) seeds (together with hybrid resistant herbicide) to smallholders. In turn, the marketing of seeds had been transferred to a network of private contractors and “seed enterprises” withfinancial support and technical assistance from the World Bank. The “informal” farmer-to-farmer seed exchange was slated to be converted under the World Bank programme into a “formal” market oriented system of “private seed producer-sellers.” 15 In turn, the Ethiopian Agricultural Research Institute (EARI) was collaborating with the International Maize and Wheat Improvement Center (CIMMYT) in the development of new hybrids between Mexican and Ethiopian maize varieties.16 Initially established in the 1940s by Pioneer Hi-Bred International with support from the Ford and Rockefeller foundations, CIMMYT developed a cosy relationship with US agribusiness. Together with the UK based Norman Borlaug Institute, CIMMYT constitutes a research arm as well as a mouthpiece of the seed conglomerates. According to the Rural Advancement Foundation (RAFI) “US farmers already earn $150 million annually by growing varieties of barley developed from Ethiopian strains.
Yet nobody in Ethiopia is sending them a bill.” 17Impacts of Famine
The 1984-85 famine had seriously threatened Ethiopia’s reserves of landraces of traditional seeds. In response to the famine, the Dergue government through its Plant Genetic Resource Centre –in collaboration with Seeds of Survival (SoS)– had implemented a programme to preserveEthiopia’s biodiversity.18 This programme – which was continued under the transitional government – skilfully “linked on-farm conservation and crop improvement by rural communities with government support services”. 19 An extensive network of in-farm sites and conservation plots was established involving some 30,000 farmers. In 1998, coinciding chronologically with the onslaught of the 1998-2000 famine, the government clamped down on seeds of Survival (SoS) and ordered the programme to be closed down. 20

The hidden agenda was to eventually displace the traditional varieties andlandraces reproduced in village-level nurseries. The latter were supplying more than 90 percent of the peasantry through a system of farmer-to- farmer exchange. Without fail, the 1998-2000 famine led to a further depletion of local level seed banks: “The reserves of grains [the farmer] normally stores to see him through difficult times are empty. Like 30,000 other households in the [Galga] area, his family have also eaten their stocks of seeds for the next harvest.”21 And a similar process was unfolding in the production of coffee where the genetic base of the arabicabeans was threatened as a result of the collapse of farmgate prices and the impoverishment of small-holders.

In other words, the famine – itself in large part a product of the economicreforms imposed to the advantage of large corporations by the IMF, WorldBank and the US Government – served to undermine Ethiopia’s genetic diversity to the benefit of the biotech companies. With the weakening of the system of traditional exchange, village level seed banks were being replenished with commercial hi-bred and genetically modified seeds. In turn, the distribution of seeds to impoverished farmers had been integrated with the “food aid” programmes. WPF and USAID relief packages often include “donations” of seeds and fertiliser, thereby favouring the inroad of the agribusiness-biotech companies into Ethiopia’sagricultural heartland. The emergency programs are not the “solution” butthe “cause” of famine. By deliberately creating a dependency on GM seeds, they had set the stage for the outbreak of future famines.

This destructive pattern – invariably resulting in famine – is replicated throughout Sub-Saharan Africa. From the onslaught of the debt crisis of the early 1980s, the IMF-World Bank had set the stage for the demise of the peasant economy across the region with devastating results. Now, in Ethiopia, fifteen years after the last famine left nearly one million dead, hunger is once again stalking the land. This time, as eight million people face the risk of starvation, we know that it isn’t just the weather that is toblame.

Remembering Ketema Yifru the ex-top diplomat & the architect behind theOAU'

A country is best represented by its people or leadership and leaders are the ones who are of the people by the people and for the people. As a result, leadership shapes the character, behavior and culture of its people and the country. A country’s good or bad image is determined by the goodor bad image of its leader. In this regard, it is the right time for Ethiopia to talk about the demonstration of the above facts. Ethiopia is hosting oneof the biggest continental events. As a seat of the continent's grandest institution, Addis Ababa is colorfully celebrating the Golden Jubilee of Organization of African Unity/African Union (OAU/AU). Because of this all eyes are focused here. Fifty-four African countries are represented and have convened here to celebrate the union.

This historical advantage has lifted the country's image to the highest stage. So who to be praised? No doubt, its brightest leaders. Certainly, Emperor Haile-Selassie I. He is considered by many to be the Father of Africa. In the last half of the 20th century, Haile-Selassie's name has never been omitted whenever the OAU is mentioned. It seems that His Majesty had amassed all the credit for the country's success in the formation of OAU. However, little attention is given to those who were doing the work behind the scenes. Sometimes, the success of these individuals goes unnoticed. Obviously, one Ethiopian has been overshadowed by Emperor Haile-Selassie's grace and reputation regardingthe OAU. The man who looks to be left under the surface is the architect and the master whose role was instrumental. Also he is the person who was able to make Addis Ababa the home of the OAU.

He is the late Ketema Yifru, Haile-Selassie's Foreign Minister . He is rarely heard of and that is why some call him the "unsung hero" while others describe him as the "Amed Afash" (a person who is negatively rewarded). After serving as a foreign minister for ten years from (1961 to 1971) he spent eight years in prison when the Derg was in power. Ketema Yifru wasalso recognized by the media as having played a prominent role in the creation of Africa's regional organization. In a recently published article onhis personal blog, Ketema Yifru's son, Mekonnen Ketema quoted that his father as saying: "Based on the discussions I had with my father as well as his taped and written interviews, I now clearly understand what he meant when he said, 'Only a few are aware of the hard work and all the effort that brought about the creation of the OAU.' Most of the public is not aware of the shuttle diplomacy, the closed door negotiations, and all the tireless effort, in general, that paved the way towards creating the OAU. In addition, the majority of the public are not aware of the fierce diplomatic battle that was fought by a number of states to have the OAU headquartered in their respective capital cities.

Legacy In Vain?

Ketma Yifru's widow, Rahel Sinegiorgis, was approached by The Reporteryesterday at her home located around Enderase Sefer, Casanchis. She said that she is unhappy about neglecting Ketema's contribution towardsthe formation of OAU. "His legacy is really ignored," she says. Asked whether she was invited by the for the AU celebration she said, "No one remembers me and he was considered as if he was an ordinary person who has no contribution towards the existence of the organization." She remembers what the feeling was among the family when Ketema was about to propose the possibility of Ethiopian success to achieve the formation of OAU and making the seat of the OAU in Addis Ababa. “It wasreally in an overwhelming moment when he first intended to propose his idea to His Majesty the emperor . Our concern was if his idea would become unsuccessful that will eventually bring shame and humiliation for the Emperor as he was a respected and graceful leader throughout the world” In his will, he wrote from prison to his wife and children he describe himself as a person who came from a humble family, who did notdo any crime but has done an outstanding job to help his country be the seat of OAU. Documents reveal that the former Foreign Minister was the man responsible for the staging of the 1963 Addis Ababa Summit Conference, which paved the way to the creation of the OAU.

After being promoted to the rank of Foreign Minister in 1961— a period inwhich the rift between the Monrovia and Casablanca Groups seemed to have caused a permanent division in the continent— Ketema was an active participant in all the meetings and negotiations that led to the creation of the OAU. Among others, he also played a leading role in the August 1963 Dakar Foreign Ministers Conference, where the question regarding the location of the OAU’s headquarters was once and for all resolved. Even after the 1963 conference, Ketema had traveled throughout all 32 independent nations to convince every country that Addis Ababa would be the right place to be the home of OAU.

In his article Mekonnen, describes it by quoting his father as saying, “His next step was to convince both the Monrovia and the Casablanca blocks toattend the proposed Summit Conference in Addis Ababa. It was decided that the Ethiopian government, in the person of Ketema Yifru, would lobbyboth groups, while the Guinean government, in the person of Diallo Telli, who became the first Secretary General of the OAU, would lobby the Casablanca Group members. It is important to note that by now the Ethiopian Foreign Minister was given full autonomy on this matter. The Emperor, who had envisioned himself as being the key player of such a diplomatic event, would give free reign to his young Foreign Minister.” His wife’s remembers Ketema’s tour and said that he even had faced an accident but survived narrowly. “…while he was on flight to Congo, the wing of his plane collided with a tree in the dense forest of the Congo jungle. But he was lucky and survived.” she said. The widow also shared her feeling with The Reporter saying, “I feel sad wherever AU’s meeting isheld every year because it reminds me of my husband.” Especially, the very picture that comes to her mind is associating the African Hall and Ketema alongside His Majesty. He was happy and considered himself as a luckiest person as he has seen OAU keep going for long years constantly and without interruption.

Verbatim from Ketema Yifru: This was the letter written by Ketema Yifru,former foreign minister and instrumental person in the formation of the Organization of Africa Unity (OAU), to his family from prison. Ketema Yifruwas among the sixty ministers, generals and high-ranking officials of the Imperial era who were thrown into jail after the Duerg came to power. “…..As far as I am concerned, I am confident that apart from serving my country with all my capacity and good intentions, I have done nothing wrong; hence my conscience will always be clear. If I have at all committed any crime, it would be that I, coming from a humble farmer, family rose to claim the top government position in Ethiopia which stayed under the monopoly of a few individuals for so long. Indeed my crime is toseize the opportunity that my country has offered me and achieve great things in way that is exemplary to my fellow Ethiopians with humble begins. I always cherish the time I had and my contribution to the countrywhile I was working in the foreign ministry. Especially, my contributions towards the formation of Organization of African Unity (OAU) and securingthe permanent seat of this organization to be in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia willalways shine upon me like a morning sun, and will always be a source of pride for my wife and children. Ketema Yifru written from palace prison, ..July 14, 1979 (ER: May 25, 2013)

African Union: Is meeting the needs of ordinary Africans?

Aljazeera Analysis – The African Union headquarters complex in the capitalAddis Ababa stands in stark contrast to its immediate surroundings. The wide planetarium-like structure sitting comfortably attached to a $100m lightly glazed tower dominates the city’s skyline. Inside, the combined leadership of 54 nations gather in state of the art conference rooms to contemplate Africa’s future. Outside the complex, taxi cabs jostle for parking space and pedestrians are questioned by security guards, while local residents navigate the grime and dust of urban life walking along narrow alleys. The continental bloc might be celebrating 50 years on Saturday, but there is an unmistakable cynicism surrounding the nature and value of the union in meeting the needs of ordinary Africans. The AU plans to host commemorative celebrations at a reported cost of $1.3m, despite ongoing conflicts and insecurity in five countries across the continent, including Sudan, the eastern DRC and Mali. Disarray still reigns in Guinea-Bissau, the Central African Republic and Madagascar. Moreover,despite recent economic growth across the continent, living conditions remain abysmal for many average people, with the UN’s signature index suggesting that 24 of the 25 countries at the bottom of the human development index are African. These types of statistics compel criticsto describe the AU as a talk shop, rudderless and crucially disconnected fromAfrican citizens like its predecessor, the Organisation of African Unity (OAU).

Change of focus: Joram Biswaro, Tanzania’s ambassador to Ethiopia,believes criticism of the AU is unfair and out of context. Despite its limitations as a continental bloc, the fact that Madagascar, CAR and Guinea-Bissau were banned from attending the summit for ongoing political irregularities signalled the AU was headed in the right direction, he said. “Perhaps had it not been for this organisation, Africa might not have achieved what it has achieved … If you want to assess its performance, one should look at its charter,” Biswaro told Al Jazeera. The original organisation, the OAU, built by 32 African nations originally on May 25, 1963, focused primarily on liberating countries on the continent from the grip of colonialism. The OAU came under sever scrutiny for its inability to intervene in member states during times of strife, coups or government repression earning the name of “dictators’ club” for upholdingthe interests of member country’s leadership above all else. But since the formation of the AU in 2002, with a renewed focus on solving conflicts, engineering socio-economic development and improving governance, hardquestions are being asked over the political will of the AU to reignite the lost dream of pan-Africanism. During the Arab Spring of 2011, the AU wasan anonymous spectator as a revolutionary fervour that was born in NorthAfrica spread across the Middle East. The AU appeared to be particularly hamstrung in its response to the armed revolt against Muammar Gaddafi in Libya. “The crisis in Libya was a very difficult time for the AU’s Peace and Security Council to reach an agreement,” reminisced Yemane Nagish,a political analyst at The Reporter Newspaper, in Addis Ababa. It is this type of accountability, transparency and political will that needs to improve, says Ashebir Woldegeois, the chairperson of the Health, Labour and Social Affairs of the AU’s Pan-African Parliament.

Accountability issues: With 60 percent of its annual budget reportedly funded by overseas donors, it remains unclear how much political clout and independence the African Union can wield in reality. Solomon Dersso, senior researcher at the Institute of Security Studies (ISS), says he has no issue with African countries partnering with outside groups to solve problems. Difficulties on the continent need to be viewed in proper context, he said, as some problems are come from outside sources, ratherthan from within Africa. “The idea is not that only Africans should do it; the idea is that Africans should be at the centre for the search of solutions,” he told Al Jazeera. Other observers wonder if ordinary Africans are actually at the forefront of the AU’s concerns. With so many Africans living in politically repressive regimes, like Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia andthe Gambia with limitations on freedom of expression, and restrictions on opposition parties, the AU is not yet representative of the African people, critics say. “Despite being home to several of the world’s worst performingcountries in terms of respect for human rights, the region saw overall if uneven progress toward democratisation during the 1990s and the early 2000s,” Freedom House, a US think-tank, reported in regards to Sub- Saharan Africa. While elections are being held regularly across the continent, these apparent gains towards a culture of democracy are sometimes little more than masterful con jobs.

Election issues: Votes are scheduled this year for fragile states like Zimbabwe and Madagascar, and scrutiny has fallen on the efforts of the African Union to be an honest broker for democracy. In the past, Human Rights Watch has slammed the AU as an organisation ostensibly created to support democracy and freedom but wary of grassroots social movements. The idea is that Africans should be at the centre of the searchfor solutions. Solomon Dersso, senior researcher at the Institute of Security Studies, “the AU, however, has not been aloof to the challenges posed by political repression on the continent. In 2007, the organisation adopted the Charter for Democracy, Elections and Governance to address a tendency towards authoritarian rule in some African countries.”

Highlighting human rights, the rule of law, democratic elections and unconstitutional changes of government, the charter aims to “reinforce commitments to democracy, development and peace in Africa”. There certainly is no faulting its intention but critics say commitment to the Charter has been poor. Woldegiorgis, the parliamentary member, said thesituation has improved, despite set-backs. “We are getting there, but many opposition parties in Africa are still immature; many are not willing to work hard in the villages, build their constituencies.” But other observers said the root problem of representation at the AU can be seen in the group’s founding constitution. “Compared to the United Nations charter which starts off with ‘We the people of the United Nations, the AUconstitution starts off with ‘We the heads of the state and government,” said Dersso, the researcher. “Make no mistake, this [the AU] is in many ways still a club of heads of state and government and not necessarily a body that truly represents the African people.”

Young and the restless: Almost 65 per cent of Africans are below the age of 35, and many are uninterested in the traditional politics of patronage. The face of the continent has changed. The new AU Commission Chairperson, Dr Nkhosozana Dlamini-Zuma, has vowed to frame the next five decades around the themes of African identity, integration, economic development and democratic governance, among others. But without action, analysts warn the continual talk shops at summits can last only forso long. “There is a great sense of empowerment on the part of the youth,” Dersso said. “If the actions of leaders are not in sync… [than] these types of governments have no future in Africa.” As African leaders enjoy the pomp and ceremony in Addis Ababa this weekend, many outsideits headquarters still believe the continental body is adrift from the aspirations of its people. (Text ends)

Commemorating the 50th Anniversary of the OAU, the Forerunnerof the AU'

May 25, 2013 will mark the 50th anniversary of the founding of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, the continental organization formed by all of the heads of state to acceleratethe liberation from colonialism and the political, economic and social unification of Africa. The OAU was formed by 33 independent states including some of the leading figures in the Pan-African struggle such as Presidents Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, Ahmed Sekou Toure, Modibo Kieta, JuliusNyerere, Gamal Abdel Nassar, H.I.M Haile Selassie, among others.

After five decades of the OAU and its successor, the African Union, formedin 2002, it is necessary for a thorough assessment of the progress and challenges facing Africa and the Diaspora in light of the escalating imperialist militarism being carried out by the United States, France, Britain and other NATO countries. Today in 2013, African states are being invaded once again by troops from the Pentagon, various NATO forces, Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) operatives and other intelligence organizations from throughout North America and Europe as well as transnational corporations and banks determined to maintain western hegemony over the continent, its people and resources.

Five years ago in 2008, the Michigan Emergency Committee Against War& Injustice (MECAWI) held a similar conference in the wake of the formation of the U.S. Africa Command (AFRICOM). In 2008 we predictedthat the formation of this Pentagon command specifically geared toward Africa would prove disastrous for the continent. Unfortunately what we anticipated has been proven correct.

AFRICOM coordinated the overthrow of the government in Libya under themartyred Col. Muammar Gaddafi, a longtime leader of his country who served as a co-founder of the AU and its chairman in 2009-2010. Althoughthe headquarters of AFRICOM remains in Stuttgart, Germany, the U.S. hasestablished a military base in Djibouti along with drone and CIA stations inSomalia, Niger and other countries across the continent.

The current war in Mali, although said to be waged by France for humanitarian reasons, is merely designed to penetrate the continent andexploit its oil, uranium and gold. Africa is playing a greater role in supplying oil, platinum, natural gas and other strategic resources to the western industrialized capitalist states.

Therefore we believe that a renewed anti-imperialist campaign aimed at enhancing solidarity with Africa and its people is necessary during this period. This conference will take up some of the most important aspects ofthe struggle for the total liberation and unification of the continent and theDiaspora. Some of the issues that will be thoroughly discussed at the Africa & U.S. Imperialism Conference will include:

-Historical review of the OAU and the AU from 1963-2013

-The role of AFRICOM, the CIA, NATO and other intelligence and militarygroups

-African Decade of Women (2010-2020): the need for full gender equalityand empowerment

-Youth and development in Africa and the Diaspora

-The impact of the global economic crisis on Africa and the Diaspora–

Africa and the global class struggle against imperialism

-Africa in solidarity with Latin America, the Middle East, Asia and allstruggling peoples

-China's role in Africa and its implications for the worldwide struggleagainst imperialism

This conference will seek the support and participation of all genuine anti-imperialist, left, Pan-African, social justice, women, anti-war, peace, environmental, community and social justice organizations. The Conference will be self-financed and organized. Source: MECAWI

British aid to Ethiopia inflicts much pain on the poor: Daily Mail'

UK foreign aid, the final insult: Ethiopian sues Britain after claiming our

£1.3billion programme supports 'Stalinist' regime that sent him to world's biggest refugee camp. Four million people forced off their land by security forces while their homes and farms are sold to foreign investors 'Mr O' said by suing British Department for International Development he fights on behalf of Ethiopian people who are being relocated. Questions raised about British role in atrocities as annual payouts contin. When he refused to leave his land, he was taken to military barricks and tortured. Refugee camp over Kenyan border overflowing with Ethiopians is now largest in theworld. British aid to Ethiopia inflicts much pain on the poor: Daily Mail' UK foreign aid, the final insult: Ethiopian sues Britain after claiming our

£1.3billion programme supports 'Stalinist' regime that sent him to world'sbiggest refugee camp

Four million people forced off their land by security forces while their homes and farms are sold to foreign investors 'Mr O' said by suing British Department for International Development he fights on behalf of Ethiopianpeople who are being relocated. Questions raised about British role in atrocities as annual payouts contin. When he refused to leave his land, hewas taken to military barricks and tortured. Refugee camp over Kenyan border overflowing with Ethiopians is now largest in the world.

In Support of the Blue (Semayawi) Party'

On June 2, 2013 (EC Ginbot 25, 2005): Tens of thousands of young people demanding their rights in a peaceful demonstration. Over one hundred thousand young men and women marched in the streets of AddisAbaba demanding the release of political prisoners, religious freedom, respect for human rights and the Constitution and public accountability.

They demanded action on youth unemployment, inflation and corruption.They marched armed with cell phones, placards and banners. They criedout for justice. They sang songs of unity: “Ethiopia! Our Country!” They marched for their rights and the rights of their brothers and sisters and mothers and fathers.

Planning more protests'

Ethiopia’s opposition Semayawi (Blue) Party, which yesterday held the country’s largest protests in eight years, said it’s planning more demonstrations unless the state meets demands including the release of “political” prisoners. Thousands of people demonstrated near government buildings yesterday in the capital, Addis Ababa, according to State Ministerof Communications Shimeles Kemal. Most of those who took part in the peaceful protest were Islamist extremists, he said in a phone interview today from the city. The Blue Party is demanding the release of journalistsand political leaders convicted on terrorism charges, Getaneh Balcha, headof organizational affairs, said in a phone interview today. Religious leadersbeing tried for terrorism offenses should also be freed and the state should take steps to combat high inflation and corruption by officials, he said. “We are protesting for our freedom,” Getaneh said. More protests will be held if the government fails to address the party’s demands within the next three months, he said. The demonstration yesterday was the biggest since May, 2005, when government opponents protested over the outcome of a disputed election, leading to the deaths of at least 193 people in a crackdown by security forces. In 2009, Ethiopia introduced anti-terror legislation that has been used against opposition politicians andreporters and which has been criticized by the U.S. and the United Nations. “It’s good we break the fear,” Telayeneh Adugna, 63, said in an interview at the demonstration yesterday. “Breaking the fear is no small thing.”

Convicted Journalists: Opposition politicians and journalists including online writer Eskinder Nega and Woubshet Taye, former deputy editor of the defunct Awramba Times, were convicted last year under the terrorism law for crimes including trying to incite anti-government protests and linksto banned groups. Members of a committee formed to ask the government to stop unconstitutional interference in Islamic affairs are on trial for terrorism charges. Protesters have gathered at mosques regularly after Friday prayers for more than 18 months to protest the interference and the arrests by the government. In terms of political opposition, only one chair of Ethiopia's 547-seat parliament is occupied by an opposition member, while the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolution Democratic Front (EPRDF) party holds all other seats.

Prominent Ethiopian scholar Professor Taddesse Tamrat passed away'

Ethiopian intellectual Taddesse Tamrat, the pre-eminent historian of medieval Ethiopia, died Tuesday in a hospital in Chicago, where he was being treated for acute sickness. He was 78. A towering figure in Ethiopianmedieval history and one of the first full-time members of staff at the Department of History of Addis Ababa University, Taddesse became an active and prolific scholar and teacher whose students became well-knownacademics in the field.He is the author of the internationally acclaimed “Church and State in Ethiopia: 1270-1527″, seen as a pioneering monograph on nineteenth century Protestant and Catholic missions in Ethiopia.Accessibly written, it reached a large public and inspired an interest in church history and monasticism in many casual readers, as wellas in some who went on to enter the profession. Professor Marilyn E. Heldman, author of African Zion: The Sacred Art of Ethiopia, described thebook as “the essential text for the history of the highland Christian state of Ethiopia during the period of its development as the dominant state in the Horn of Africa”. Professor Charles F Beckingham, Emeritus Professor ofIslamic Studies at the University of London, wrote that the book offers “the reader much more than the title might suggest, for it examines most aspects of the Ethiopian state and the Ethiopian church from the supposedrestoration of the supposedly Solomonic dynasty to the eve of the Muslim invasion [Ahmed Gragne] in the sixteenth century.”

Professor Taddesse has also produced several articles on Ethiopia that have appeared in numerous academic journals, magazines and newspapers. He helped form the Institute of the Ethiopian studies, centre for the international studies of the arts of Ethiopian, and was one of its Directors and the Addis Ababa University Press, where he was one of its most admired figures for a decade, serving as director, and editor. Living in the United States for a number of years, the late Professor served as a visiting professor at the University of California, Northwestern University, and University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. Professor Taddesse was awarded an Honorary Fellowship from the School of Oriental and African Studies (SOAS) in London in recognition of his work as one of Africa’s foremost modern historians. He received his PhD in History from SOAS in 1968, specializing in the history of Ethiopia and he was published extensively throughout the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s. As an eminent Ethiopianist, Prof. Tamrat was highly regarded for his views on the historyof Africa and the Ethiopian people,according to a post on the SOAS website. He was a strong advocate of an indigenous history of Africa written by Africans rather than the Europeans, it was said.He was also an accomplished linguist, translating Tobbya, Ethiopia’s first novel, which appeared in Amharic in 1900. Professor Tamrat was frequently interviewed for his views on modern African history and guest lectured at numerous international symposiums and conferences. Tadesse is survivedby his three daughters.

Ethiopia - On Federal Ethics & Anti-Corruption Commission (FEAC)’

EM Commentary: This is the first high level corruption case that came from the controversial anti-corruption watchdog in over a decade. The lasttime they hit the headlines when Seye Abraha was put in prison that took six years of his life. For many he was the raison d'être of the FEAC itself. The rhetoric that FEAC is the result of the Civil Service Reform notwithstanding, the Commission was largely an outcome of the power struggle among the hardcore of the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF). It was established just a month after the split within the Party's leadership. The message couldn't be clearer when the Commissioner was directly appointed by the Prime Minister himself. In March 2001 TPLF splits; May - FEAC established; July - Seye is arrested. Could all that be coincidence?

Does "conflict of interest" have any meaning in Ethiopia or for the anticorruption crusader?

A government minister can write a book and asks a businessman to pick up the bill, who dares to say no? When Bereket Simon, the de facto number two person at the time, wanted to bash his nemesis Dr. Berhanu Nega, he approached the Ethiopian born Saudi tycoon Sheikh Mohammed Al Amoudi. The billionaire not only paid for the publication of the "memoir"printed in Kenya, but also threw a lavish party for the launch of the book at the Sheraton Addis.

Is the anti-corruption crusade for real?

One of the reasons the public is not sure of the real motives of the FEAC'slatest moves, there are so many officials, civilians and in uniforms alike, who are said to be making huge fortunes out of their official positions. TheIndian Ocean Newsletter mentioned scores of ministers as having various business interests. We don't know if the businesses are fair game or whether they are registered with the FEAC as the law requires. The Newsletter report published in 2009 listed the business of top governmentofficials who own fleet of lorries, hotels, factories, rental buildings in the posh area of the Capital, import and export businesses, trading in plots of land which is particularly popular among the army top brass. Ethiopia's ambassador in China Seyom Mesfin, Minister of Information Bereket Simon, Army Chief of Staff Samora Younis, the Federal Police Chief Workineh Gebeyehu, Addisu Legesse, the widow of the late Prime Minister, Azeb Mesfin are among the officials cited in the business hall of fame.

The illegal capital flight out of the country is also staggering. According toa report by Global Financial Integrity, Ethiopia lost close to $12 billion since 2000 to illicit financial outflows. The amount is too huge to ignore. What has FEAC done to curb this scourge? These are some of the reasonswhy the Commission will be hard pressed to convince the public that it indeed means business this time around. However, they can also turn this opportunity to win the public's trust by truly looking into the legitimate concerns of citizens. Otherwise, they will only open the door for more speculation with each arrest. Around 60 people have been arrested on suspicion of various charges that can be bundled as corruption. The detention of Melaku Fenta, the Director General of the Ethiopian Revenueand Customs Authority (ERCA) with the rank of a minister; his powerful deputy, along with a coterie of others, has caught the public by surprise.Businessmen also made part of the five dozen suspects awaiting trial.

Notable among them are Ketema Kebede and Mehreteab Abraha, both ofwhom familiar to the courts and the detention centers. The last time Mihreteab, brother of Seye Abraha, faced the judges he was in the company of his family.

Remembering the 8th June post-election victims massacres of 2005'

On 8th June 2005, the regime's heavily armed Agazi forces, which were directly controlled by the prime minister himself, were deployed in the streets of Addis Ababa. Agazi massacred innocent civilians for taking part in a demonstration demanding the respect of the outcome of the electionsin the country. Most of the deads had gunshots to the head and hundreds were wounded while thousands were abducted and sent to remote militaryprison camps. These murders are regularly referred to just in numerical statistics. But each of this numbers represent fellow Ethiopians, with dreams, loved ones and life plans. Below are a few descriptions on what happened in the two days of the start of the still ongoing massacres, 8th June 2005: EPRDF's heavily armed forces deployed in the streets of Addis Ababa massacre at least 42 innocent civilians for taking part in a demonstration demanding the respect of the outcome of the elections in the country. Most of the dead had gunshots to the head and hundreds were wounded while thousands were abducted and sent to remote militaryprison camps.

8th June 2005: Business owners, taxi and mini-bus drivers take strike action to protest over the ruling party's alleged massive election fraud andits fierce violations of human rights. The streets of Addis Ababa under the intimidating control of the TPLF's armed forces. The government places opposition leaders under house arrest.

9th June 2005: Amnesty International issues a press release saying that 'over 1,500 students and other demonstrators are at risk of torture [and]further arrests are reportedly continuing in Addis Ababa and in other towns where student demonstrations took place'. The organization condemns the excessive use of force by the police, who it says 'used liveammunition against peaceful protestors'. 'The excessive and indiscriminate use of force is in contravention of international human rights standards,' said Kolawole Olaniyan, Amnesty International's Africa Programme Director.

Message of His Holiness Abune Merkorios, Patriarch of The Holy Synod ofEOTC in-exile'

The Head Office of the Patriarchate of the Legitimate Synod of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church (EOTC) in North America deeply laments and pleads to the Almighty God that He give His blessings and mercy to our people in Ethiopia, who are undergoing through a tremendous hardship, suffering, and despair, stemming from both politicaltyranny and economic injustice, and more importantly, from ethnically- motivated displacement of selected population groups from their homes and communities around the country. Even the most sacred of our religious sites, such as venerated statues and monasteries, have not beenimmune from government intrusion. It is against this backdrop, unfortunately, that we were observing The Great Lent (Abye Tsome) of fasting and praying— in the great tradition of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church— as a remembrance of the 40 days and nights of fasting of our Lord Christ after His baptism. Surely, our usual upbeat celebration of this epic Orthodox Tewahedo tradition has been tempered this year by the grim reality of the many misfortunes afflicting our people back in Ethiopia.

Ethiopia - Free to protest, just a bit - Could political demonstrations in Ethiopia herald greater freedom?

The Economist Nairobi - June 8, 2013: ARARE flicker of political protest graced the streets of Ethiopia's otherwise regimented capital, Addis Ababa, on June 2nd. Demonstrators marched peacefully through the city, many carrying pictures of imprisoned loved ones. Later they gathered on Churchill Avenue, the capital's main thoroughfare, where they were told that a new struggle had begun. YilekalGetachew, chairman of the opposition Semayawi (Blue) party, demanded the release of political prisoners and railed against unemployment and corruption. Campaigners claim that as many as 10,000 people attended; government officials say the number was nearer 4,000. Whatever the truefigure, it was the biggest demonstration in Ethiopia since 2005, when protests amid claims of election rigging were violently suppressed, leavingnearly 200 unarmed protesters dead and thousands arrested.

Since then the political opposition has been eviscerated. Its leaders have been jailed or have gone into exile, the media have been muzzled and theruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) has acquired millions of new members. At the last election, in 2010, the party managed to get 99% of the seats in parliament. By the time he died last year, Meles Zenawi, who had been prime minister since 1995, had createda single-party state in all but name. Little suggests that his system of "authoritarian development", which got the economy to grow faster at theexpense of individual freedom, is now about to unravel.

Opposition numbers at the recent protest were swollen by Ethiopian Muslims who accuse the government of meddling in religious affairs. But turnout was still modest compared with the million-strong crowds of eight years ago. That may explain the government's muted reaction. It granted protesters permission to march, but with a week's delay to ensure they did not embarrass the new prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, while he hosted the summit that celebrated the 50th anniversary of the African Union and its forerunner. The police chose not to harass the demonstrators. Fears that the post-Meles transition would presage instability have so far not been borne out. Some of Ethiopia's economic strains were evident in the protests, with complaints about joblessness and inflation. But the decision to allow the march to go ahead suggests confidence in the senior ranks of the ruling EPRDF rather than any concernthat the regime will be swept away in a kind of "Ethiopian spring".

Suggestions that the protest marks a sea-change in the country's politicsmay be premature.

Political Opposition Has New Energy in Ethiopia - VoA News/Africa'By Marthe van der Wolf - ADDIS ABABA

News updates - Ethiopian opposition supporters carried out their first peaceful protest against the government in eight years last week. The demonstration has raised hopes the ruling coalition will give political opponents more room to operate. Three opposition leaders from the pastsaid that no matter what happens, the opposition faces major challenges. Thousands of Ethiopians took to the streets last week in the capital, Addis Ababa, in a demonstration against Ethiopia's government. Itwas the first time authorities had allowed such a protest since the disputed 2005 elections and was organized by the Blue Party, a relatively new party with many young active members. Hailu Shawul is one of the opposition leaders imprisoned following post-election demonstrations in 2005 that turned violent. He said last week's demonstration was a huge success but he questions the long-term effect. "I can assure you, not much will change, but it encourages us to probe the people into action," Shawul said. "The whole point of the demonstration is for people to steamoff, it's for the government to listen and maybe change their policies, but here, this has never happened." Ethiopia has been ruled by the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) since 1991. The four- party coalition controls virtually all of the seats in parliament, and critics have accused it of turning Ethiopia into a one-party state. Opposition leader Asrat Tassie shared his prison days with Hailu and is still politically active as secretary-general for UDJ (Unity for Democracy and Justice), theonly opposition party with a seat in parliament. He too believes the demonstration was a big achievement.

"I hope this new spirit after 2005 will gain momentum, and hope all the others will follow. There is no choice for the opposition parties but to keepon pressuring the government," stated Tassie. Beyene Petros, an opposition leader since 1991, also applauds the efforts of the Blue Party and its young members, but said there are many challenges ahead. “It may sound like it is an easy road to ride on; they need to be seasoned. They need to be addressing these complex Ethiopian political parties within a broader perspective, and not only narrow interests," Petros said. "I see their likes simply pick one line of thinking and then try to harp it. And that will not be a solution.” During the 2005 elections, four oppositionparties worked together and won a large block of seats in parliament.

After disputes over the election results, massive protests broke out and hundreds of demonstrators and opposition members were either imprisoned or killed. Asrat reminds the younger generation in the opposition that fighting for their beliefs comes with many sacrifices. “We have to struggle for our freedom, and freedom is not free. There are goingto be risks, otherwise we have to close our shops if we are not able to courageously confront the government,” he said. The Blue Party says it will hold another demonstration in three months if their demands, such asreleasing political prisoners and more political freedom, are not met.

Because of the big turnout of last week’s protests, other opposition partiesare currently also looking into organizing public protests.

Egypt planned to bring the TPLF led coalition to its knees?

ER commentary: Egypt doesn’t need to launch a military strike against theWoyanne junta, although from an Ethiopian point of view, that would be great. The fastest way to bring the Woyanne junta that is ruling Ethiopia to its knees is for Egypt to start a dialogue with Ethiopian opposition groups (the pro-Ethiopian unity ones; not the secessionists) with the goal of reaching an agreement on Nile river that is mutually beneficial to both Ethiopia and Egypt. After reaching an agreement, Egypt doesn’t have to lift a finger, other than providing assistance to Ethiopian opposition groupswho will be happy to dismantle Woyanne and replace it with the a government that works to bring peace to the entire region. During Emperor Haileselassie’s reign Egypt made a mistake of supporting anti- Ethiopia forces such as TPLF (Woyanne) and EPLF both came to power in May, 1991. Genuine Ethiopian leaders were always accommodated Egypt’sneeds, but Egyptian governments were not content with that. They wanted to destabilize and keep Ethiopia weak by supporting secessionist groups.

Meles Zenawi, who launched the GERD project to save his political life off popular uprising by diverting the people’s attention, was a leader of one ofthe many anti-Ethiopia groups that Egypt funded. Meles was a regular visitor to Egypt and when his group, TPLF (Woyanne), came to power withthe help of Egypt, one of his first foreign trips was to Cairo. Now Egypt has an opportunity to fix the grave mistake it made by dealing with anti- Ethiopia forces. Instead of signing secret agreements with such forces, Egypt must work in a transparent way with pro-Ethiopian unity forces whohave been at war with Woyanne. This is the most effective and much less costly way of stopping the TPLF (Woyanne) grand dam. With the help of Egypt, Sudan and other countries, Ethiopia can build micro dams over Nileif necessary. The dam as it is advertised now is not beneficial to Ethiopia, Sudan, and Egypt.

Ethiopia - 42% of Gambella in western Ethiopia up for sale, the size of theNetherlands'

The Christian Science Monitor by William Davison - A 15-hour drive west from Ethiopia's capital past coffee forests and jigsaw fields brimming withcattle and people, the road leaves the high country and enters the Gambella region — an expanse of flatter bush and forest with rich grasslands and rivers. The land is sparsely populated; locals are taller anddarker than their upcountry compatriots. Most are of Nuer or Anuak ethnicity. The Nuer, whose statuesque men display parallel horizontal markings on their foreheads, herd cattle and grow maize in the water- blessed expanses. Gambella, long ignored if not invisible, has recently become a battleground over development, modernization, and human rights – one creating a furor inside the World Bank, which approved programs worth $920 million in Ethiopia last year.

People use a new water pump in the village of Tegni in Gambella, Ethiopia. The government cites Tegni as a successful example of its controversial resettlement scheme. Ethiopia's effort to resettle local farmers into main villages while also leasing land to foreign corporations or wealthy Ethiopians has put Gambella under scrutiny for charges of violent forced relocations. Now the issue is coming to a head: Ethiopian authorities since 2010 have embarked on a plan known as "villagization" to move some 45,000 households. The plan takes scattered families and consolidates them into fewer settlements. It is sold as a scheme for betterschools, clinics, cleaner water, and, authorities say, more democracy.

Yet simultaneously Ethiopia is trying to lease up to 42 percent of Gambella

− a state the size of the Netherlands – for agricultural investors. India's Karutui Global Ltd and Saudi Star are the most prominent. Both have started huge farms for export of rice and other crops. Saudi Star is ownedby Ethiopian-born Saudi billionaire Mohamed al-Amoudi and is the nation'slargest single investor.

The result is a bitter dispute in which NGOs like Human Rights Watch (HRW), and local people, some of them now in Kenyan refugee camps, allege that villagization mirrors previous brutal resettlement campaigns. They charge the government with Stalin-style collectivization that has increased poverty, carried out by beatings, rape, and killings. They say forced relocation occurred to clear land for investors. The government denies all allegations. Former regional president Omod Obang Olum oversaw the plan in Gambella and says it was voluntary andsuccessful. Some 35,000 families were gathered to 100 new or enlarged villages, putting them closer to roads and services. "You're going to transform the economic structures, the social structures, even political structures," Mr. Omod affirms. "It's an area for good governance, not onlydevelopment." The situation is a dilemma for Western donors in Ethiopia who deliver over $3 billion a year. They trust Ethiopia, Africa's second most populous nation, for growing the economy, building infrastructure, and reducing poverty. Yet the essentially one-party state's use of authoritarian methods to quash dissent and affect radical change has put institutions like the World Bank and UK overseas aid programs into a difficult spot. Ethiopia is infamous among NGOs for its repressive tactics and restrictions on media and open expression.

In coming weeks the Bank must decide whether to enable a panel to further investigate allegations of funding involuntary or forced resettlements (see sidebar below) of local people. The aid program financed by the Bank and other donors pays up to 60 percent of teachers, nurses and development workers in Gambella. Also, a London law firm on behalf of a "Mr. O," an Anuak man in a Kenyan refugee camp, is suing theUK Department of International Development for helping fund the means by which he alleges he was tortured and forced to flee Gambella. There is little doubt that civil servants indirectly taking World Bank and UK development funds have staffed the resettlement sites. But donors say thepoor would have suffered if the funding was withheld.

Mass land appropriation is a very new trend in Africa. (See accompanyingprint story on Masai lands in Tanzania under bitter dispute.) But the controversy around opening up land for corporate use is hardly restricted to this continent, but can be traced across the equator, to Cambodia and Indonesia among other places. Land is marketed for mining, farms, tourism, suburbs, and multi-purpose crops like palm oil. The core question: Are these crass "land grabs," or a messy yet progressive move?Today the scale and speed of land deals are larger and faster, says a Western expert with Ethiopia experience, and the interests of people are brushed past in the competitive market. "In Ethiopia part of the government may be interested in land rights. But it doesn't stand a chance against the agriculture and commerce wing," the expert says. Thedegree to which mass displacement has been used to turn around commercial farms is unclear. One village in a Karuturi farm remains unmoved. Mr. Omod says commercial agriculture and resettlement in Gambella are designed to achieved "accelerated development." The government of Ethiopia has said however it will not cooperate with a larger look at the issue by donors.

Girma Yifrashewa, Pianist-Composer, at Issue Project Room'

Ethiomedia By Steve Smith June 10, 2013 - Girma Yifrashewa, a 45-year-old Ethiopian pianist and composer who performed at the Issue Project Room in Downtown Brooklyn on Saturday night, offers a rare and fascinating example of aesthetic adaptation and convergence. Precious little information is available in English about Mr. Yifrashewa’s life andwork, apart from his Web site and a succinct biography included in theprogram distributed at the concert. Initially trained on the kirar, an Ethiopian harp, he discovered the piano while in music school in AddisAbaba and pursued formal studies at the Sofia State Conservatory of Music in Bulgaria.

Since returning to Ethiopia in 1995, Mr. Yifrashewa has promoted awareness there of the standard classical repertory, while also writing newpieces that apply European techniques to Ethiopian musical and folkloric sources. His recital here, one of two American concerts mounted with support from the independent record label Unseen Worlds, was split between canonical works and original music.

Given his European education, Mr. Yifrashewa’s expertise in the standardrepertory came as no surprise. Performing from memory for a rapt audience, he brought bluesy languor and a crisp elasticity to Gershwin’s Prelude No. 2; Schumann’s Arabesque (Op. 18) rippled and tumbled agreeably; Debussy’s “Clair de Lune” was suitably dreamy. Opening a group of Chopin works, Mr. Yifrashewa was airy and unfussy in the Waltzin C-sharp minor (Op. 64, No. 2). He balanced sweetness and obsessive tension in the “Raindrop” Prelude (Op. 28, No. 15) and closed with a sensibly paced, handsomely characterized Fantaisie Impromptu (Op. 66).

Soccer: South Africa face Ethiopia in key match'

Soccer: (June 12, 2013) South Africa midfielder Oupa Manyisa has challenged Ethiopia to back-up their claims that they will walk all over Bafana Bafana on Sunday. With two rounds of 2014 World Cup qualifiers remaining, Bafana's trip to Addis Ababa at the weekend for their clash with Group A leaders, The Walia Antelopes, is a must-win encounter. The Ethiopians are the front-runners in the race to book a ticket to Brazil, withSewnet Bishaw's men at the summit and two points ahead of the South Africans.

The two teams played to a 1-1 draw in their first-leg encounter last year in Rustenburg, with Katlego Mphela's 77th-minute strike having cancelledout Saladin Said's first-half opener. Manyisa, who has of late delivered several composed performances for his country, is confident Gordon Igesund's men can make their East African opponents eat humble pie. "I read in some publications that Ethiopia is promising to stop us from getting a result against them, and that they will beat us and whatsoever,but I think they should wait for the match-day and try to talk on the fieldrather," the Orlando Pirates' link-man told the club's official website.

"We have been in this game for a while and such talk does not move us. We know it will be tough; that is for sure but we know we can beat them. "They are the Group leaders at the moment and I think they achieved thaton merit, but to say we will not survive as if we were just any team, I don't understand that." He added: "Let's wait and see... we travel to Ethiopia on Friday - so far everything is good. We had a massive win in Central African Republic last Saturday, so we go to Addis Ababa with our morale boosted -Ethiopia can expect a tough challenge from us, that is forsure." Source: football411.com

Ethiopia coach warns South Africa’s Bafana Bafana'

By Collins Okinyo (June 14, 2013) Ethiopia’s coach Sewnet Bishaw has warned South Africa’s Bafana Bafana not to expect an easy time when thetwo sides clash on Sunday in a crucial World Cup qualifier in Addis Ababa.Bishaw reiterated that their aim was to get all the three points and furthercastigated Bafana Bafana coach Gordon Igesund for questioning the suitability of the National Stadium in Addis Ababa.

“Our expectations are to beat South Africa and qualify for the third round. We expect to win justthe way as we did against Botswana last week. Playing at home is an added advantage since the whole country will be behind us.” “Our secret of success has been the unity and understanding in the team and this has helped us to go past our opponents easily,” Sewnet Bishaw told supersport.

“I really fail to understand why the South African coach should be complaining about the pitch. Those are clear signs of fear and I dismiss his opinion and urge him to let the game be decided on the pitch.” On whether his players had improved in their disciplinary issues witnessed during the Afcon hosted by South Africa in January, Bishaw was categorical. “The players are now more disciplined and more experienced. Most of them were playing Afcon for the first time and that made them very nervous but we have since improved a lot and we have brought in the referees committees to enlighten them on the rules of the game.” Source: supersport

Bafana Bafana not underestimating Ethiopia - Captain'Related Stories:

Crunch time for Bafana

Sink-or-swim time for Bafana – RantieIgesund could go for pace

Bafana should beat Ethiopia - Igesund

Proteas, Bafana face must-win contests

Johannesburg (June 14 2013) Bafana Bafana captain Itumeleng Khunesays the key to overcoming Ethiopia in their 2014 World Cup qualifyingmatch on Sunday will be scoring goals. “We have to hit them where it hurts the most – in the back of the net," said Khune. "They have a coupleof dangerous players but we know what we need to do. We are confident even though we will have the crowd against us." Khune said his charges would not underestimate Ethiopia, who were currently top the group and two points ahead of Bafana, with two games remaining.

"Ethiopia are a very strong side; very organised and they like to play carpet football but I think we have equally good players that can deal withthat threat. "We have shown great discipline and good attitude in our matches and that can go a long way in giving us results we need." Khune said despite his team's 3-0 crushing of Central African Republic last weekend, the victory would mean little if they did not beat Ethiopia as well. "It is important to finish what we started. We will not have achieved our goals if we were to go back home with just three points from both games. "Maximum points is our target. I believe we have a great team that can beat Ethiopia in their backyard."

The goalkeeper said it was the dream of every player in the side to make it to the 2014 World Cup in Rio de Janeiro. "We all want to play on the bigstage. Most of the players in the current team played in the 2010 World Cup tournament, so we know what its like to be there and we would wanta repeat of that. "More importantly, for the country to be represented at the World Cup is a great feeling. For me personally, I would really love to play in my second World Cup tournament, so this game means a lot to allof us." – Source: SAPA

Ethiopia vs South Africa: Bafana Bafana Arrived in Addis Ababa'

Addis Ababa, June 15, 2013: Bafana Bafana last night safely arrived in Addis Ababa, the capital city of Ethiopia for their Brazil 2014 FIFA World Cup match against the host nation. The two countries face off on Sunday,16 June 2013 at the National Stadium at 16h00 (15h00 SA time). BafanaBafana were received with song and dance from a small group of South Africans, most of them working at the South African embassy in Ethiopia.They were waving flags and one was blowing a vuvuzela, putting smiles on the players. There was also a large group of Ethiopians who also cameto greet the team and take pictures of the players.

Midfielder Siphiwe Tshabalala was the hit with the fans, with young and old chanting his name throughout and wanting to either take a picture of him or pose for a photo with him. Some even wanted to climb inside the Bafana Bafana bus just so they could see the dreadlocked player who is famous after becoming the first African player to score the opening goal ofthe first FIFA World Cup tournament on African soil in 2010. Even the hotel staff where the team is staying only had one question on their lips - "Where is Tshabalala," "This is it boys, we have arrived in Ethiopia, we arealmost nearing the end of our mission. The clock is ticking," said Bafana Bafana head Gordon Igesund to the players at dinner.

"Go get some much-needed rest, we have work to do tomorrow (Saturday) and Sunday is the big one." Bafana Bafana will have one last training session on Saturday afternoon (15 June) at the match venue before the qualifier on Sunday. Bafana Bafana last night safely arrived in Addis Ababa, the capital city of Ethiopia for their Brazil 2014 FIFA World Cup match against the host nation. The two countries face off on Sunday,16 June 2013 at the National Stadium at 16h00 (15h00 SA time). BafanaBafana were received with song and dance from a small group of South Africans, most of them working at the South African embassy in Ethiopia.They were waving flags and one was blowing a vuvuzela, putting smiles on the players.

There was also a large group of Ethiopians who also came to greet the team and take pictures of the players. Midfielder Siphiwe Tshabalala was the hit with the fans, with young and old chanting his name throughout and wanting to either take a picture of him or pose for a photo with him. Some even wanted to climb inside the Bafana Bafana bus just so they could see the dreadlocked player who is famous after becoming the first African player to score the opening goal of the first FIFA World Cup tournament on African soil in 2010. Even the hotel staff where the team isstaying only had one question on their lips - "Where is Tshabalala," "This is it boys, we have arrived in Ethiopia, we are almost nearing the end of our mission. The clock is ticking," said Bafana Bafana head Gordon Igesund to the players at dinner. "Go get some much-needed rest, we have work to do tomorrow (Saturday) and Sunday is the big one." Bafana Bafana will have one last training session on Saturday afternoon (15 June)at the match venue before the qualifier on Sunday. Source: South African Football Association(Johannesburg)

SOCCER - CAF World Cup 2014 Qualifiers: Result: Ethiopia 2 – SouthAfrica 1

EMF (June 16, 2013) - (ዋና ዳኛ Mohammed FAROUK (Referee)፣ 1ኛ መስመር ዳኛ Ayman DEGAISH (1st Lineman)፣ 2ኛ መስመር ዳኛ (2nd Line man) እንዲሁም 4ኛ ውውዝግብ ከተነሳ የሚዳኘውየ ውጭዳኛ Mahmoud AHMED (reserve Referee) ሁሉም ከግብጽ ናቸው፡ Ethiopia beat South Africa on Sunday in a fight for the top spot in Group A . With Central Africa Republic and Botswana already eliminated from qualified, South Africa and Ethiopia have a chance to decide which team will qualify for the third round. The group winner will take on another African group winner in a two-legged playoff for a chance to earn a berth at the World Cup finals in Brazil next summer.

Ethiopia currently holds the lead in the group with 10 points in four matches. South Africa trails them but just two points with eight points intheir first four games. If Ethiopia defeats Bafana Bafana, they will clinch their spot in the third round as Africa would trail them by five points withone game to go. A loss would give South Africa the group lead while a draw would preserve the current two point difference.

The two teams faced off in their opening match of the campaign on June2, 2012; they battled to a 1-1 draw. Since then Ethiopia has managed three straight wins while South Africa has won twice and drawn once.

South Africa is coming off two straight victories against Central African Republic by a combined score 5-0; they have only scored two goals against the other two teams in the group. Meanwhile Ethiopia has managed to score six times in four games. Both sides have only concededtwice.

Ethiopia After Meles Zenawi'

WASHINGTON, June 25, 2013 – African Press Organization (APO) – Testimony - Donald Y. Yamamoto -Acting Assistant Secretary, Bureau of African Affairs. Before the House Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, Global Human Rights, and International Organizations - Washington, DC -June 20, 2013.

"Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, thank you for inviting me to discuss the situation in Ethiopia since the death in August 2012 of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. Post-Meles Ethiopia presents the United States with a significant opportunity to encourage Ethiopia to improve its human rights record, liberalize its economy, and provide increased space for opposition parties and civil society organizations. Post-Meles Ethiopia also presents a significant challenge since Ethiopia plays an important rolein advancing regional integration and mitigating regional conflict in Somalia and Sudan. Our partnership with Ethiopia balances these interestsby focusing on democracy, governance, and human rights; economic growth and development; and regional peace and security. Ethiopia and the United States enjoy strong ties on several levels. More than one million people of Ethiopian origin live in the United States. Many of these individuals are returning to their homeland to expand the political and economic ties between our two countries. A wide range of groups and individuals in the United States provide humanitarian support to Ethiopians. Ethiopia is also home to one of the oldest Peace Corps programs".

ESFNA - In the theme of “Bringing Ethiopians Together”

Ethiopian Sport Federation in North America’s 30th year weeklong (30th June to 6th July, 2013) celebration held at Byrd Stadium, in University OfMaryland.

The veteran sports journalist honored at ESFNA’s festival in Maryland

Fekrou Kidane (Ye-Piazza Lij) born in Addis Ababa in the 1930's and thefirst Ethiopian sports journalist in the 1950's for local newspapers and Voice of Ethiopia. He was the first to broadcast the first football match between Ethiopia and Sudan live from Addis Ababa stadium in 1957.

Employed by the Ministry of Information, he was the first Secretary

General of the Ethiopian Cycling Federation, Tennis Federation, National Olympic Committee, Shoa Football League and Public Relations Officer of the Ethiopian Football Federation. He is also the founder and the first president of the Ethiopian Sports Journalists Association in 1968. Taking roles of expanding responsibility, Ato Fekrou was Secretary General of theAfrican Sports Journalists Union (1970-1974), member of FIFA Press Committee, director of the executive officer of the president of The International Olympic Committee (IOC) and The Department of International Cooperation, correspondent for BBC, Voice of America (VoA),Voice of Germany (DW), Radio France International (RFI), France Football Weekly, amongst others. He is now a consultant for sport related organizations, a lecturer and an advisor to the president of Confederation of African Football (CAF). Ato Fekrou is a lifelong learner who still teaches and learns from amongst others his grandchildren. His latest book "Ye Piassa Lidjj" was a best seller. Ato Fekrou is next only to the late, great Yidnekachew Tessema for his contribution to Ethiopian sport in the world stage. Ato Fekrou is a regular in ESFNA tournament. He does not miss ESFNA tournaments unless he is busy attending a World Cup representingCAF.

The late music legend Tesfaye Lemma, remembered at a sports festival' was a composer, choreographer, conductor, and cultural expert. His artistic endeavors are known throughout Ethiopia and within the Ethiopianpopulation of the United States, primarily within the older generations.

Perhaps Ato Tesfaye's most notable profession was his role as Director of Orchestra Ethiopia, an orchestra of up to 30 traditional instrumentalists, vocalists, and dancers from many different Ethiopian regions and ethnic groups. It was the first ensemble of its type, as these diverse instruments and ethnic groups previously had never played together. Ato Tesfaye served as its third director from 1966-1975. In addition to directing, Ato Tesfaye composed and arranged music for the ensemble. Under Ato Tesfaye's direction, and with the help of a Peace Corps volunteer, Charles Sutton, Jr., the group toured the United States, performing in twenty cities under the name "The Blue Nile Group." Orchestra Ethiopia also released two LP recordings, one in 1969 and the other in 1973. The ensemble disbanded in 1975 because of the Derg revolution in Ethiopia. Inthe 1980's, Ato Tesfaye Lemma came to the United States as a refugee.

In the 1990s, he created the Ethiopian-American Cultural Center, the NileEthiopian Ensemble and the Tesfa Museum, all to relate Ethiopian art, music, and culture to Americans. In 1998, Ato Tesfaye Lemma entered a nursing home for serious medical care and was unable to continue these cultural efforts. Ato Tesfaye Lemma passed away on February 1, 2013.

We-Mzekir: Ankober Palace'

By Eduardo Byrono (June 29, 2013) "Ankober Palace" located in SemeneShewa zone on the top of Ethiopian highlands about of 40 killo meters to the east of Deber'Berhan. The historical Statehouse has served as the original residence of Emperor Menlike for 13 years by the time he was the Neguse of Shewa from 1866-1889. Ankober is also known as (Gorobela) in fact in the year 1844 Emperor Menelik was born around the same area in a small town called Angolala. In the year 1889 after the sudden death of Emperor Yohannes, Neguse Menelik was anointed as the Neguse Negestof Ethiopia and moved to the hill of Entoto Mariam.

Until the year 1899 the Royal facility has served as the second residence of Emperor Menelik than around the year 1901 it was changed to become as a maximum security prison to keep away those who raise rebellion or war against the kingdom of Menelik. "King Gaki Sherocho" the last ruler ofKeffa was imprisoned there for 12 years and was released in the year 1913 after the death of Emperor Menelik. When Lij Iyasu Mikael took overthe kingdom in the mentioned year above immediately ordered all the prisoners included " Gaki Sherocho of Keffa" who has been confined in thepalace under the custody of his grandfather to be set free.

In the year 1899 Ras Mengesha Yohness of Tigray raised a serious of rebellion against Menelik II only to be defeated at the battle of Zion and sentenced to Ankober Palace prison to spend the rest of his life. But 7 years later in the year 1906 he was found dead under a mysteries circumstance. Ankober Villa has come from a long way, Scholar Wylde quoted, one time has served as residence of a king and the next moment as the last destination of criminals. Ankober Palace — with Mohamed Jama.

Haile Guebreselassie wants to be the next President of Ethiopia'

CCTV (June 28, 2013) Haile Guebreselassie is the undisputed world athletics champion, breaking records in the ten and five thousand metresand even named "a man from another planet". This long distance runner is now aspiring to join the political scene and says in an exclusive interview with CCTV's Girum Chala that he wants to be the next Presidentof Ethiopia. Prioritizing good governance, Haile says he'd like to see a more prosperous Ethiopia under his leadership.

MUSIC: A beloved Ethiopian musician of a generation ago now stays quietin D.C.

The Washington Post (June 28, 2013) - He's carried his music around the planet, but if you want to hear him play it, you have to go to his house. Inhis living room, there's an upright piano where he coaches his fingertips through jazz standards for 30 minutes each day. In his dining room, thereare framed photographs where he's sporting bell-bottoms and broad smiles alongside his seven bandmates in Ethiopia's beloved Walias Band. And in his garage, there's a graphite gray Washington Flyer taxi cab where he spends his workweek dashing to and from Dulles International Airport — if his passengers happen to be from Ethiopia, the ID hanging from the cab's sun visor might catch their eye. "Hailu Mergia the musician?" they ask, pivoting from delight to disbelief. "Some of them say, 'I grew up listening to your music! . . . How come you drive taxi?'" Mergia says on a recent Saturday afternoon. "I tell them, 'This is what Ido. I am perfectly happy.'" But with Mergia's 1985 solo album, "Hailu Mergia & His Classical Instrument," being re-released this month, the 67-year-old has been wondering how it might feel to play music outside of the Fort Washingtonhome he shares with his wife. "Of course, I want to go back to [performing], but it depends how," says Mergia, who hasn't stepped on a stage since the early '90s. "If you ask me to play organ in a restaurant bymyself, I'm not going to do it . . . . I grew up in a group." That group first landed at Dulles in the final days of 1981. After soundtracking Addis Ababa's night life for more than a decade, Mergia's storied Walias Band was in need of a change. So the octet came to America to accept a residency at Washington's now-shuttered Ibex Club at the corner of Georgia and Missouri avenues NW, as well as embark on a coast-to-coasttour, performing for diaspora communities that had fled Ethiopia's protracted civil war. It was a blast, then a grind, and after two years, the musicians linking arms in the black-and-white photos on Mergia's dining room wall had split apart. But their music didn't vanish.

"Walias Band was a very influential band," says Thomas "Tommy T" Gobena, the local Ethiopian-born bassist of Gogol Bordello. "They backedlegendary Ethiopian singers and had distinct, killer grooves. . . . 'Tche Belew' has to be one of my all-time favorite tunes." That song, a woozy instrumental from the '70s, captures Walias Band at its hypnotic heights — American soul grooves and traditional Ethiopian rhythms woven together with meticulous melodic trills that still flow from Mergia's fingers when he practices at the piano in his living room. He first learned his way around a keyboard at age 14, as a boy scout in the Ethiopian army. By 18,Mergia had left the military to sing in the streets, hoping someone might hire him for a paying gig. "The competition was very high," he says. Mergia points to another picture on his dining room wall, "See that guy sitting with me?" It's a blown-up snapshot of Mergia and Tilahn Gessese, atenor from Ethiopia's "golden age" of pop music, a singer so revered, his nickname was "The Voice." "At that time, everybody had to be like him," Hailu Mergia says. "So I switched to accordion."

The veteran diplomat passes away of natural sickness'

Ambassador Birhanu Dinqua, a veteran Ethiopian diplomat, passed away on Monday (July 8th) in New York. The late Ambassador Birhanu, a careerdiplomat, also worked for the United Nations and the African Union.

Most recently he was a member of the Truth, Justice and ReconciliationCommission (TJRC) in Kenya. The Commission was established with the objective of promoting peace, justice, national unity, healing, reconciliation and dignity among the people of Kenya in the aftermath of post 2007 election violence. Fellow Commissioners said: “He chaired our report-writing committee, and returned to Kenya – while convalescing – toguide the process to the very end. He gave the TJRC process his very best”.

The late Ambassador Birhanu Dinqua served his country for over 27 years,in the Ethiopian embassies in Monrovia, Cairo and Washington, D.C., before becoming ambassador plenipotentiary in 1975 and heads the African Department and the Middle East Affairs in the Ethiopian Ministry ofForeign Affairs. He was the first Ethiopian ambassador to the Republic of Djibouti (1980-84) and then Permanent Representative to the UN in New York with concurrent accreditation to Canada. In 1992 he moved to the UN and served in Cambodia, South Africa and Somalia.

He assisted in the Abuja talks on the conflict in Darfur when requested by the African Union, chairing the Power-Sharing Commission until the DarfurPeace Agreement (DPA) was concluded in Abuja in March 2006. The Ethiopian Ministry of Foreign Affairs expresses its deepest condolences to members of his family and friends.

Haile Guebrselassie to run for parliament in Ethiopia'

(July 10, 2013) Haile Guebrselassie, the Ethiopian distance runner considered one of the greatest of all time, has announced that he plans tostand for parliament with the aim of winning a seat in the country's 2015 election. Guebrselassie is regarded as a national icon by many Ethiopians.He has set 27 world records, won two Olympic 10,000m golds in Atlanta and Sydney and four world championships at the same distance. Asked about his political ambitions by the Guardian in 2002, he said: "Eradicate poverty. This is all that matters in my country. When I am out training I think about this a lot; when I am running it is going over in my mind. As acountry we cannot move forward until we eradicate poverty." He has yet to state which party he will run for in the general election. Ethiopia's parliament is dominated by the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). There is only one opposition MP. The government has been accused by Human Rights Watch of waging a coordinated assault on political opponents, rights campaigners and journalists.

Guebrselassie announced his retirement in 2010 after suffering a knee injury in the New York City marathon. But he soon reversed his decision and went on to compete in further races. He is known for his distinctive running style, with the right arm swinging back and forth while the left arm remains static and cocked, which he says he developed while runningto school carrying his books. In April, 2013, he won his third consecutive Vienna half marathon and also took part in the Great Manchester Run inMay, finishing in 3rd place.

Source; the guardian

Wemezekir - Red Terror in Ethiopia killed thousands between 1976 and1978’

The Denver Post: (July 11, 2013) Between 1976 and 1978, a Marxist Duerg military government in Ethiopia killed as many as 500,000 of the country's citizens in a bloodbath called the ‘Red Terror’. The terror grew out of a relatively peaceful movement to end the reign of Emperor Haile Selassie I. A political vacuum was created when the emperor was deposedby a military junta in September, 1974 and a council of military members known as the Duerg took over power. The Marxist government abolished the parliament, suspended the constitution and arrested the emperor, whodied in custody later in August, 1975. The Duerg nationalized all land using the slogan "land to the tiller of the soil." In 1976, the Duerg began rounding up and killing those suspected of being members of the resistance movement, EPRP. According to a website that memorializes victims of Africa's human rights atrocities, arbitrary arrests, torture and sexual assault became the norm. Prisoners were burned, flogged, hung bythe arms. People had fingernails ripped out, and men had their testicles crushed.

Invited chair of Semayawi (Blue) party speaks to 35 residentAmbassadors in Addis'

Top News: July 11, 2013: Engineer Yilkal Getenet, Chairman of the opposition Semayawi (Blue) Party, delivered a remarkable speech to over 35 foreign Ambassadors in Addis Abeba. The Chairman was invited to speak at the annual “Partners group” meeting in the American Embassy inAddis Abeba. The Development Assistance Group (DAG), which is composed of many donor countries such as the United States of America (U.S.A.) and many other European countries has particularly invited the Chairman of Blue Party to make a speech. Yilkal said in his speech “We in the Blue party, and I believe the vast majority of young Ethiopians, are not stuck on the ethnicity nationality debate, Tribal divisions, religious rivalry and regional differences are least important to us. We see them asroadblocks to our collective progress. We want to build a country that maximizes opportunities for all youth regardless of social background. Wedo not want to fight the old battles of past generations over divisive issues, we want to acknowledge them and move forward because young people all over the world are moving forward”. The Chairman also listed the areas that his Party needs help from both Ethiopians and the international community such as building a democracy culture and promotion of youth civic engagement. Yilekal discussed the Party’s programs and current Ethiopian issues with the Ambassadors for around one hour and half.

From Chopin to Ethiopia, and Partway Back Again’

Great Ethiopian pianist and Composer Girma Yifrashewa at Issue ProjectRoom'

MELODDY: (July 13, 2013) “Classical music is music without Africa,” BrianEno bluntly declared in a 1995 interview published in Wired magazine. “Itrepresents old-fashioned hierarchical structures, ranking, all the levels of control,” he said. An art-rock provocateur, Mr. Eno managed to patronize two cultures in a single blow, fetishizing a free-floating independence in African art that he found lacking in rigid European traditions.

Yet if Mr. Eno’s statement oversimplified a complicated global exchange, relatively little evidence indicates that the Western classical tradition has held as much sway in Africa as it has in other parts of the globe, from Venezuela to China. So Girma Yifrashewa, a 45-year-old Ethiopian pianist and composer who performed at the Issue Project Room in Downtown Brooklyn on Saturday night, offers a rare and fascinating example of aesthetic adaptation and convergence. Precious little information is available in English about Mr. Yifrashewa’s life and work, apart from his Web site and a succinct biography included in the program distributed at the concert. Initially trained on the Kirar, an Ethiopian harp, he discovered the piano while in music school in Addis Ababa and pursued formal studiesat the Sofia State Conservatory of Music in Bulgaria.

Since returning to Ethiopia in 1995, Mr. Yifrashewa has promoted awareness there of the standard classical repertory, while also writing newpieces that apply European techniques to Ethiopian musical and folkloric sources. His recital here, one of two American concerts mounted with support from the independent record label Unseen Worlds, was split between canonical works and original music. Given his European education, Mr. Yifrashewa’s expertise in the standard repertory came as no surprise. Performing from memory for a rapt audience, he brought bluesy languor and a crisp elasticity to Gershwin’s Prelude No. 2; Schumann’s Arabesque (Op. 18) rippled and tumbled agreeably; Debussy’s “Clair de Lune” was suitably dreamy. Opening a group of Chopin works, Mr. Yifrashewa was airy and unfussy in the Waltz in C- sharp minor (Op. 64, No. 2). He balanced sweetness and obsessive tension in the “Raindrop” Prelude (Op. 28, No. 15) and closed with a sensibly paced, handsomely characterized Fantaisie Impromptu (Op. 66). Source: New York Times by Steve Smith

Haile Guebreselassie intends to lead Ethiopia with a message: anything ispossible'

(July 13, 2013) Greatest runner of all time says democracy can't come overnight as he targets a new career in politics. But he hopes he can lift the pace of progress "Yichalal" is a word made popular in Ethiopia by HaileGuebreselassie, arguably the finest distance runner ever to grace track or road. It means "it is possible", or "it can be done". Guebreselassie for president? Yichalal. That was the widespread reaction last week when the 40-year-old, who has conquered the worlds of sport and business, announced that in 2015 he will be running not for gold but for political office. The only dissenting voice appeared to be that of his wife. In many ways, politics seems a natural next step for a man whose rise mirrors thatof the skyscrapers in Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia, where Bob Geldof is now a less likely foreign visitor than investors lured by one of theworld's fastest growing economies. Guebreselassie, an idol to millions withthat crucial political asset, a winning smile, is seen as embodying the new optimism also sweeping much of Africa. "We Ethiopians had many problems," he told the Observer last week, speaking by phone while driving towards Addis Ababa. "If you come to Ethiopia now you see the difference. Things are changing very fast." But despite projected growth of11% next year, poverty remains widespread. "Now Ethiopia is moving in agood way but the speed is not what we need," Guebreselassie said. "We need to move more quickly and join the middle-income countries. There isno Usain Bolt. The more you sprint, the more you break world records. If Ibecome an MP I will push for a pick-up of speed." Few would bet against the 8½-stone runner who has defied injuries, lifelong asthma and the passage of time. One of 10 children raised at high altitude in the hills of Asala, 160 miles south of the capital, he used to run six miles to school and back every day. He won his first official race when he was eight, took part in his first marathon at 15 and, at 18, was discovered by the Dutch former distance runner Jos Hermens, who remains his coach and agent.

Guebreselassie won Olympic gold medals in the 10,000m in Atlanta and Sydney and claimed four world titles at that distance. He switched to themarathon and was still able to smash his own world record at the age of 35. In all he set 27 world bests, although some of them were not over officially recognised distances. He became known for a distinctive running style with the right arm swinging back and forth while the left remains static – he says this developed when he was running to school carrying books. Yet all the time he was also building a business empire, riding the wave of Ethiopia's economic renaissance to become one of its richest men,employing hundreds of people. Typically rising at 5am, he owns a hotel, cinema, car showroom and a property business that has financed several of the capital's tallest buildings. Recently he opened a coffee farm. And it will do Guebreselassie's election prospects no harm that he is also a philanthropist. He has built two primary schools in Ethiopia and is heavily involved with the Great Ethiopian Run, which works with NGOs and the UNto raise awareness of education and health.

So why politics? "Why? Good question," he laughed. "I've always wantedwhat is useful for the country and myself and the people of Ethiopia. I'vebeen in athletics for 25, 26 years and it's time to share my experience with others. When you do sport, you're alone, but in business you work with others, and in both you have to win. In politics, too." Guebreselassie already has some political experience as a member of the Elders, a groupwho have mediated in political crises in the country since 2005. His next target is a seat in parliament at the next election in 2015 and, such is hiswild popularity, he knows expectations will be high. "They will ask me: 'What is your plan?' I cannot do everything they need. 'I will try to plant the first plant, and the rest you can do yourself.' It's hard to explain: I don't know the language yet." Asked if he would like to be president one day, he replied: "Who doesn't like that?"

