The Ethiopian presidency is a largely ceremonial role given to an individualwithout party affiliation, whereas true power lies with the prime minister, currently in the iron grip of the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). There is only one opposition MP in the 547- seat parliament. Guebreselassie is adamant that he will run as an independent candidate, saying that he agrees with the EPRDF on some points and disagrees on others. He is evasive when asked about the criticisms of authoritarianism and human rights violations. "For me it is difficult to say. I need to know what's going on. If you come back after three years, I will answer that question." It was only in 1991 that civil war ended with Ethiopia's repressive communist regime being overthrown, he recalled. "Human disaster happened in this country. Millions died in the 'red terror' [in which hundreds of thousands died in the late 1970s]. Are you expecting Ethiopia to become a democracy like America or the UK? Ofcourse everybody likes good government, but we are young. If you look back 20 years at what we had, what do we expect? My hope is in another 20 years it will be better than now."

Expressing a sentiment that echoes some of Africa's longest serving leaders, Guebreselassie added: "It's better to have a government withoutdemocracy than no government. In our neighbour Somalia, they didn't have a government for many years. Do you think they had democracy?

They lost everything. You cannot bring democracy overnight. First you have to educate the people and show them how things are done." Such anapproach is unlikely to win plaudits from Amnesty International, which hasaccused the EPRDF of stamping out dissenting voices, dismantling the independent media, obstructing human rights organisations and stranglingpolitical opposition. It says Ethiopia's jails are packed with suspected political opponents.

Claire Beston, Amnesty's Ethiopia researcher, said: "Haile Guebreselassie would be hugely popular and it would be very difficult for the government to react against him as they have against other opposition leaders if he was outspoken and called for reforms. We hope he will. The presidency could be used to great benefit in relation to freedom of expression and theright to participate in the political process."

Analysts agree Guebreselassie's status in Ethiopia will make him all but untouchable.

Hallelujah Lulie, a researcher at the Institute for Security Studies in AddisAbaba, said: "Most ministers have a positive attitude towards him. I don't think they'll intimidate or arrest him. They won't crack down as they do against other opposition parties." Known for his single-minded determination, Guebreselassie can become an inspiration on the political stage, Lulie added. "The political sphere is deeply polarised. Haile Guebreselassie is one of the few unifying figures we have in this country.In the 1990s the only good news we had in Ethiopia was his victories all over the world. He's a well-disciplined workaholic and he represents the ideas Ethiopians should work for. From him we learned the motto, 'It is possible'." Source: the guardian

Andargachew Tsige transferred to a secret location outside Addis Ababa'

ER News (July 15, 2013) The TPLF secret police has taken Andargachew Tsige, the kidnapped Ethiopian opposition leader, to a secret location outside Addis Ababa, perhaps the Tigray capital Mekele, according a reliable source in Addis Ababa. Ethiopian Review's source, who is a disgruntled ANDM member, said that the TPLF leaders kept the abductionand interrogation secret from the other factions of EPRDF because they suspect that ANDM has been infiltrated by Ginbot 7. The paranoid TPLF secret police that is led by Debretsion Gebremichael and Getachew Assefais currently monitoring the phone, email and SMS of all ANDM senior leaders, including Deputy Prime Minister Demeke Mekonnen. Ato Andargachew was a founding member of ANDM before he joined the opposition Ginbot-7.

Ethiopia’s Anti Terror Task Force says making strides in weakening Ginbot 7; boasts ability to even abduct Issaias Affeworki' ESAT News (July 14, 2014) In a deliberation held between the Ethiopian regime’s Anti-Terror Task Force and the officials of the Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) last Saturday in the office of the Prime Minister,the Task Force stated that it had allocated $3, 400,000 for its activities.

The report presented by the Force boasted saying “we are in a state whenwe can even catch Isaias Afwerki if there need be” and added “EPRDF has now caught the bee thus it is on the doorsteps of winning the next generalelection.”

In this deliberation attended by all heads of regional Intelligence and Security offices, discussions were held on the possible attacks that could come from Ginbot 7 Movement. The Defense Forces have been ordered tocover regions that it has not paid much attention to and be cautious. The report stated that Ginbot 7 can enter as near as Gonder, Ethiopia with nohindrance thus the loose Defense and Intel need to be strengthened. The participants critically debated this point.

Some of the participants argued that it can control Gonder by distributing weapons to the people while the other group sharing the view said this can only succeed if it is only supported by Shabiaa (the Eritrean government). There were also others who argued that imagining this itself is a dream. At the end of the discussion, the participants agreed the Defense Force has been weak and thus decided that it should be supported by a new Agazi brigade. Decision was also made to increase the number of the Intel and role of the Tigray Anti Terror Task Force in the mission.

The arrest of main opposition members following the abduction and arrestof Andargachew Tsige has deflected the attention from the later; the TaskForce praised itself for such an act that is full of “wisdom.” Others have commented that the detention of Abraha Desta, Habtamu Ayalew, Daniel Shibeshi and Yeshiwas Asefa could increase the aversion towards the EPRDF and lead to the resurrection of opposition parties. The Task Force has been given an order to produce a documentary that would be aired onstate television, ETV One and Police Television Programs.

Similarly, Ethiopians residing in Norway have protested outside the BritishEmbassy condemning the abduction and transfer of Andargachew Tsige toEthiopia. They have asked the UK to explain what it has been doing to free Andargachew. The demonstrators also protested outside the Norwegian Ministry of Foreign Affairs calling for a response regarding Okello Aquay, a Norwegian-Ethiopian activist, who has been abducted by Ethiopian securities from South Sudan few months ago. (Text ends)

Side note: Ginbot 7 is one of five organisations proscribed as terrorist organisations by the Ethiopian parliament in 2011. In 2012, Andargachew Tsige was prosecuted in absentia on terrorism charges (alongside journalist and prisoner of conscience Esk...inder Nega, and others) and sentenced to life imprisonment. Previously, in 2009, he was convicted in absentia on charges related to an aborted coup attempt and was sentenced to death. He was also tried in absentia in the 2005-2007 trial ofpolitical opposition members, journalists, activists and others. In recent years, many Ethiopians wanted by the authorities on the grounds of their political activities have been kidnapped in neighbouring countries and forcibly returned to Ethiopia. This has often involved the collaboration of security forces in those countries. Another of the defendants in the 2012 trial had been kidnapped and forcibly returned from Sudan. All those returned are at risk of arbitrary detention, torture and unfair trial. Andargachew Tsige is a former member of the ruling Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) party and was Deputy Mayor of Addis Ababa from 1991 to 1994, when he resigned on account ofdifferences with the government. (Text ends)

European Human Rights Committee Denied Access to Ethiopian KalitiPrison'

(July 17, 2013) A delegation from the European Parliament’s Subcommittee on Human Rights paid a three-day visit to the African Union (AU) and Ethiopia, from July 15-17. After assessing the HR situation in Ethiopia, the committee condemned violations of political and civil rights and called on the government for the immediate release of journalists and political prisoners. The committee was denied visiting the Kaliti Prison. Members of the delegation, during a press conference held atAddis Ababa Hilton on Wednesday, said that this special visit has allowed them to conduct meetings with several government and opposition representatives and members of civil society organizations.

Members of the European Parliament (MEPs) told reporters that they witnessed some positive developments in the field of human rights, such as the adoption of the National Human Rights Action Plan and the establishment of the Human Rights Commission and of the Ombudsperson. They also appreciated the efforts made in the field of economic and social rights, most importantly in relation to poverty alleviation. However, they expressed “substantial concern regarding the respect of civil and political rights”. The delegation called for the opening of more space for civil society and free media. They stressed that civil society organizations should be allowed to function freely, without interference and any form of harassment. “The Ethiopian authorities should acknowledge the important role of civil society actors and of tradeunions in reaching their ambitious development objectives. The restrictiveNGO framework should be urgently revised,” Barbara Lochibihler, chair ofthe EP delegation, emphasized. Lochbihler further noted that a “free, independent and pluralistic media is one of the cornerstones of any democracy”. She was worried about the fact that certain media are jammed and access to the internet and social media highly restricted. She said blocking the free flow of information wasdirectly at odds with the Ethiopian Constitution, which she said guaranteedfreedom of expression. The human rights group called on the government to “release all journalists, members of the opposition, and others arbitrarily detained or imprisoned for exercising their legitimate right to freedom of expression, freedom of association, as well as freedom of religion and belief”.

In a statement, the EP Committee recognized the highly volatile security situation of Ethiopia’s neighboring countries. However, MEPs raised questions on the reported misuse of controversial anti-terrorism laws for silencing dissent. Contrary to Article 78 of the FDRE Constitution, MEPs noted flaws in the impartiality of the judicial system. The Government of Ethiopia must guarantee freedom of opinion, speech and the right of peaceful assembly at all times, in accordance with its Constitution and obligation under international law, the statement read. With regard to conducting fair and free elections, it said the 2015 elections should be anoccasion for the Ethiopian government to demonstrate its commitment to democratic principles. In this regard, the MEPs requested that the government address a range of shortcomings and called on it to ensure “an open and fair competition between all political parties”.

MEPs asked for the possibility to visit the Kaliti Prison, which they believewould have allowed for a first-hand experience of detention conditions.

Despite the approval of the visit by the Ministry of Federal Affairs, admission, including a meeting with prisoners, was however denied. The delegation expressed its disappointment for the inability to assess further potential cooperation in improving conditions in prisons. They called for additional efforts to improve the treatment of detainees and the detentionfacilities. MEPs deplored the unexpected refusal of the prison visit without prior notification, after arrival at Kaliti. MEPs reiterated their support for a strong African Union, stressing the need to push forward the integration process of the continent. “This support should be underpinned by concreteassistance from the side of the European Union, notably by contributing tobuilding the capacity of the AU human rights mechanism,” the statement reads.

The Members congratulated the AU for its achievements in the field of peace and security, discussing current challenges in this field such as the crises in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) and Mali, and the forthcoming elections in Zimbabwe. On human rights, MEPs, together withtheir AU interlocutors, agreed that AU political decisions and legal instruments have to be better implemented. “National governments must be more accountable for what they have signed at AU level and should translate these acts into domestic law in order to have a real impact on citizens’ rights,” declared the chair of the EP delegation. A priority issue for the EP delegation was the fight against impunity. In this respect, Lochbihler declared: “Africa has played a pivotal role in the establishment of the International Criminal Court (ICC). We owe it to the African victims of atrocious war crimes that those responsible are brought to justice.” Lochbihler regretted the fact that Nigeria, and ultimately the African Union, allowed once again the Sudanese president Omar Al-Bashir to travel freely despite the existing ICC arrest warrant. It is to be recalled that recently the AU and the ICC were at odds, with the former denouncing the ICC’s arrest warrant of the Kenyan President and other authorities because of allegations of involvement in the 2007 general election ethnic clashes. The European parliamentary delegation was led byBarbara Lochbihler (Greens, Germany). The other participating MEPs wereJacek Protasiewicz (European People’s Party (EPP), Poland), Jörg Leichtfried (Socialists & Democrats, Austria) and Jean-Jacob Bicep (Greens, France). reporter english july 20 2013

Ethiopia’s rights abuses ‘being ignored by US and UK aid agencies’

The guardian.co.uk (July 17, 2013) The UK Department for International Development (DfID) and USAid, the American aid agency, have been accused of ignoring evidence of human rights abuses allegedly linked to their support for a multibillion-dollar social services programme in Ethiopia. A report published on Wednesday by the US-based thinktank theOakland Institute details a long list of grievances presented to aid officials from the UK and US by communities in the Lower Omo Valley in southern Ethiopia. They claim they suffered intimidation, beatings, rape, forced evictions and other abuses as a result of the government's controversial "villagisation" resettlement programme, which seeks to clear land to makeway for commercial investments.

"Donor agencies were given highly credible first-hand accounts of serioushuman rights violations during their field investigation, and they have chosen to steadfastly ignore these accounts," says the report, written by Will Hurd, an NGO worker who served as a translator for a team of DfID and USAid officials on a visit to the region in January 2012. Transcripts ofparts of these meetings, which have been made public alongside the report, show community members ignored aid officials' questions about the state of education, development and health clinics, and repeatedly tried to bring the conversation back to the subject of abuse. According tothe transcripts, one of the two DfID representatives present told community members: "[O]bviously we agree that it's unacceptable – beatings and rapes and lack of consultation and proper compensation …

[I] would raise very strongly with the government as the wrong way to dothis. It just simply is wrong. It simply is wrong. Obviously, we totally agree and it's worrying to hear about those things."

The allegations linking claims of abuse to aid funding centre around the relationship between Ethiopia's Protection of Basic Services (PBS) programme and the government's Voluntary Resettlement programme (villagisation). PBS, which has the support of several large international donors, is a multibillion-dollar social services project described as "expanding access and improving the quality of basic services in education, health, agriculture, water supply and sanitation". Human rightscampaigners have attacked donor support for PBS on the grounds that funds are also being used to plan and implement the villagisation programme as aid money is being spent on health, education and other services in the resettlement sites. "The problem is that these services willnot be provided unless the people accept resettlement," says the OaklandInstitute report, which insists the two programmes are connected and cannot be neatly separated by donors who do not want their funding to appear tainted.

Leigh Day & Co, the London-based law firm that last September took up the case of an Ethiopian farmer, "Mr O", who claims he was forcibly evicted from his farm in Gambella, in the west of the country, argues that through its support for PBS, DfID helps finance the infrastructure and salaries required under villagisation. Another report, also published by theOakland Institute on Wednesday, adds: "It is difficult not to conclude that DfID and USAid have decided to support the current policy of the Ethiopian government, their strategic ally in the Horn of Africa, despite themajor human rights abuses this government is perpetrating in the Lower Omo Valley. "By doing so, they are willful accomplices and supporters of a development strategy that will have irreversible devastating impacts on the environment and natural resources and will destroy the livelihoods ofhundreds of thousands of indigenous people."

The UK spent £261.5m on aid to Ethiopia in 2012-13. In DfID's annual report, it said: "Ethiopia has experienced impressive growth and development in recent years, but remains poor and vulnerable. The UK government continues to track and raise concerns about limitations on civil and political rights. The government of Ethiopia's approach to politicalgovernance presents challenges." Last November, the development secretary, Justine Greening, said DfID had not been able to substantiate allegations of human rights abuse received during its visit to Lower Omo in January 2012, and that it would return to the area to examine these further. This has yet to happen, though there are plans for a visit this year.

A DfID spokesperson said on Wednesday: "It is completely wrong to suggest that British development money is used to force people from theirhomes. Our assistance has helped millions of people in Ethiopia, a countrythat has suffered famine and instability over many decades. We condemn all human rights abuses and, where we have evidence, we raise our concerns at the very highest level … "To suggest that agencies like DfID should never work on the ground with people whose governments have been accused of human rights abuses would be to deal those people a double blow."

Meanwhile, the World Bank has decided to undertake a full investigation into allegations that its support for the PBS programme has financed human rights abuses in Ethiopia. The bank has previously denied any connection between PBS and villagisation, but its internal watchdog, the Inspection Panel, argues that this is not a "tenable position", saying: "Thetwo programmes depend on each other, and may mutually influence the results of the other." The panel had recommended an investigation earlierthis year after receiving a complaint from indigenous communities in Gambella describing incidents of intimidation, beatings, arrest and torture.

Ehiopia - Fingerprints of International Aid on Forced Relocation,Repression, and Human Rights Abuse'

Two new reports from the Oakland Institute, Development Aid to Ethiopia:Overlooking Violence, Marginalization, and Political Repression and Ignoring Abuse in Ethiopia: DFID and USAID in the Lower Omo Valley, show how Western development assistance is supporting forced evictions and massive violations of human rights in Ethiopia.

Ignoring Abuse In Ethiopia: DFID and USAID in Ethiopia's Omo Valley:

Oakland Institute OAKLAND, CA—The Ethiopian government's controversial "villagization" resettlement program to clear vast areas for large-scale land investments is funded largely by international development organizations. The first report, Development Aid to Ethiopia, establishes direct links between development aid–an average $3.5 billion a year, equivalent to 50 to 60% of Ethiopia's national budget–and industrial projects that violate the human rights of people in the way of their implementation. The report also shows how indirect support in the form of funding for infrastructure, such as dams for irrigation and electricity for planned plantations, plays a role in repressing local communities by making the projects viable. Ethiopia is one of the largest recipients of US development aid in Africa, receiving an average of $800 million annually–even though the US State Department is well aware of widespread repression and civil rights violations. A strategically located military partner seen as a leader in the "African Renaissance," Ethiopia is gently described as having a "democratic deficit" by the United States Agency for International Development (USAID). Yet this phrase does not begin to describe or justify the kind of routine violence and coercion taking place on the ground and documented in the Oakland Institute's newreport, Ignoring Abuse in Ethiopia: DFID and USAID in the Lower Omo Valley.

The massive resettlement of 260,000 people of many different ethnic groups in the Lower Omo Valley has been fraught with controversy andhas set off an alarm among international human rights groups. Information around forced evictions, beatings, killings, rapes, imprisonment, intimidation and political coercion, has been shared, and these tactics have been documented as tools used in the resettlement process. In response to allegations, DFID and USAID launched a joint investigation in January of 2012. After completing their visit, they came tothe puzzling conclusion that allegations of human rights abuses were "unsubstantiated." The contents of this new report, which include first- person accounts via transcripts of interviews that took place during the aidinvestigations last year, overwhelmingly contradict that finding and question the integrity of the inquiry.

The interviews paint a very different story from what DFID and USAID reportedly saw and witnessed, and for the first time are made available tothe public here. "[The soldiers] went all over the place, and they took thewives of the Bodi and raped them, raped them, raped them, raped them. Then they came and they raped our wives, here," said one Mursi man interviewed during the investigation. Another man added: "the Ethiopian government is saying they are going to collect us all and put us in a resettlement site in the forest. We are going to have to stay there. What are the cattle going to eat there? They are our cattle, which we live from.They are our ancestor's cattle, which we live from. If we stay out there inthe forest, what are they going to eat?" It is worrisome that aid agencies rubber stamp development projects that are violating human rights.

Worse, they have chosen to ignore the results of their own investigations.

“Bottom line, our research shows unequivocally that current violent and controversial forced resettlement programs of mostly minority groups in Ethiopia have US and UK aid fingerprints all over them,” said Anuradha Mittal, Executive Director of the Oakland Institute. “It’s up to the officialsinvolved to swiftly reexamine their role and determine how to better monitor funding if they are indeed not in favor of violence and repressionas suitable relocation techniques for the development industry,” she continued.

OBITUARY - Pregnant former Olympian from Ethiopia dies at 26, babysaved in surgery’

HARTFORD, Connecticut AP -- A former Olympic and professional runner from Ethiopia who was due to give birth in three weeks has died after collapsing at a Connecticut restaurant, but doctors were able to save her baby, her friends said. Meskerem Legesse, 26, who lived in Westport, Conn., was with her 2-year-old son when she collapsed at a Chinese restaurant in Hamden, said her friend, Fatima Sene. She was transportedto a hospital where she died and the baby was saved, Sene said. The cause of death wasn't clear. Sene said Legesse had suffered heart problems in the past. "It is very sad. She was a very good person," Sene said. "She would do anything for anybody. And she loved that little boy she left behind." Legesse ran in the 1,500 meter competition at the Athens Olympics in 2004. She finished 12th in a first-round heat with a time of 4:18:03 and didn't advance to the medal race. She moved on to aprofessional running career in the U.S., competing in events including theBoston Indoor Games, Fifth Avenue Mile in Manhattan and the Millrose Games in New York. She apparently hadn't raced within the past few years. Legesse's children are now with their father, and arrangements are being made to bring Legesse's body to Ethiopia, Sene said. Legesse was planning to get married to the children's father, she said. Legesse's death was first reported by Hartford-area CBS affiliate WFSB-TV, which obtainedsurveillance video from the restaurant showing Legesse entering with her son, sitting down in a chair and collapsing to the floor within seconds.

Legesse had ordered takeout and was picking it up, said Sene's sister, Fatima Cisse, another friend of Legesse. Legesse knew the two sisters from a hair salon down the street from the Chinese restaurant, they said. Hamden firefighters and paramedics with American Medical Response were called to the restaurant at about 2 p.m. Monday and performed CPR on a pregnant woman who collapsed, according to fire and police officials who did not release the woman's name. Doctors at Yale-New Haven Hospital were able to save the baby because of the CPR efforts both in therestaurant and in the ambulance on the way to the hospital, Hamden Fire Chief David Berardesca said. A spokeswoman for the state medical examiner's office said the agency declined to perform an autopsy, citing Legesse's past health problems. She declined to elaborate.

Murdering a Sheik in bid to incriminate peaceful Muslim Protestors?

The Ethiopian government's intelligence services have resorted to the most cruel and bizarre tactic in a desperate bid to incriminate Muslims in Dessie town who have been holding more than a year of peaceful protests, part of a nationwide protests against government interference inreligious affairs. According to reports, Sheikh Nuru has become the first victim of the government's desperate and devilish attempt to demonize the consistently peaceful movement of the country's Muslims demanding the full respect of constitutionally guaranteed religious freedom and government non-interference in religious affairs.

Muslims across Ethiopia have been peacefully protesting against the government's bold attempt to impose a Lebanese-born sect called al- Ahbash for nearly two years now. Sheikh Nuru, reportedly a follower of the al-Ahbash sect, has been defending the government's infamous policyof imposing the new sect. He was often presented on the national TV speaking against the legitimate demands of the country's Muslims and denouncing the ongoing peaceful protests.

KSA stops hiring workers from Ethiopia - Arab News'

JEDDAH: By IRFAN MOHAMMED: Saudi Arabia has slapped a temporary ban on recruitment of workers from Ethiopia. The ban will continue until investigations are completed into the killing of Saudi children by some Ethiopian maids. The decision was taken by the Ministries of Interior and Labor, an official statement said. Sherif Keri Osman, a senior diplomat at the Ethiopian Consulate, said his country had not received any informationabout the ban. "Ethiopian authorities have not received any communication regarding the recruitment ban," he told Arab News.

Ethiopians were the most hit when Saudi authorities launched a crack down on illegal and undocumented workers. Most Ethiopians enter the Kingdom through the southern border without any formal visa. Everyday dozens of Ethiopians have been arrested on their way to Jeddah and Riyadh for illegally entering the Kingdom. There were incidents of violenceinside the Kingdom's prisons involving Ethiopians and other nationalities.

Young Ethio-Jazz band to star at Heritage Festival in DC'Preserving Their Ethiopian Heritage in Jazz:

Yonathan Estfanos, who plays trumpet, describes The Young Ethio Jazz Band's sound as, "Unique and mellow and lively. And nothing like anythingpeople have ever heard of, especially people of this generation." Like many of the band members, Estfanos says the band has allowed him to preserve his cultural heritage. "I feel like I'm going back to my culture; you know? I feel like I'm going back to my roots," he said.

From Rasela's Jazz Club in San-Francisco to Washington, D.C.:

In January of this year, The Young Ethio Jazz Band made their debut public performance at Rasela's Jazz Club in the Fillmore District of San Francisco. They covered a number of Ethiopian Jazz numbers with eachmember taking a solo part in many. They are coming to perform in Washington, D.C. to reach out the youth and to be a role models of theEthiopian Heritage for Ethiopian Americans.

The Father of Ethio Jaz:

The Young Ethio Jazz Band plays Ethio-jazz, a style that blends American jazz and Latin rhythms with traditional Ethiopian sounds. Led by musicianssuch as Mulatu Astatke, known as the Father of Ethiopian Jazz, Ethio-jazz flowered during the 60s and early 70s. Astatke's music has been played on many NPR stations and provided the soundtrack for the 2005 film "Broken Flowers" starring Bill Murray. His sounds are the inspiration for the group.

The Roots of The Young Ethio Jazz Band:

The young men of The Young Ethio Jazz Band came together under the tutelage of Sirak Tegbaru. He and the young musicians are members of Oakland's Medhani Alem Ethiopian Orthodox Church. The band members are trained and aspiring jazz musicians, but were new to Ethio Jazz. Most of this Ethiopian music hasn't been written; their leader, Tegbaru, studiedeach song carefully, learning the keyboard, horn, bass, and drum parts toteach them. Months later, using modern instruments yet learning by ear, the youngsters were ready for their performance at Rasela's last January.Due to that performance, they are receiving some critical acclaim. Prior tothat they had been performing at community events or at venues in their respective schools.

Ten things that make Ethiopia extraordinary' By Oliver Robinson, for CNN on 20 July, 2013

Fairy tale castles, superb coffee and the Ark of the Covenant (OK,possibly) are just some of the unexpected attractions of this African country.Freebies on an Ethiopianroad trip: the extraordinary views around every corner.

What sets Ethiopia apart from its African neighbors?The excellent coffee?

The fact that it was never colonized?

Or that Rastafarians regard it as their spiritual home?

Or could it be the smooth, well-maintained roads, so rare on thecontinent, that make exploring the country by car such a joy?

After a 1,430-kilometer drive through Ethiopia's Northern Circuit -- upmountains, through Martian-like landscapes, into lost kingdoms of yore -- we found 10 crucial thingsthat define the country.

1. The best Italian restaurant in the world (according to Bob Geldof)

2.The buzzing bedlam of Mahatma Gandhi Street in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia’s capital, is the setting for Castelli’s -- arguably the best Italian restaurant this side of Bologna. An Italian soldier, Francesco Castelli, founded the modest-looking eatery at the end of WWII. Since then it's gained a global profile thanks to endorsement from celebrity diners such as Bob Geldof, Bono and Brad and Angelina. But, high-profile praise aside,it’s the food that makes Castelli’s worth a visit before setting off from Addis into the Ethiopian wilds. Ristorante Castelli, Mahatma Gandhi Street,Addis Ababa; +251 1 563 580, +251 1 571 757

2. Italian-style Coffee

Like great Italian food, coffee is one of the legacies of the Italianoccupation of Ethiopia during WWII. While Mussolini’s men proved inept colonists (the Allies defeatedthem in 1943), their tenure in the country did at least ensure that an Italian-style espresso machinewas installed in most cafes, restaurants and -- weary travelers will be pleased to know -- evendilapidated roadside shacks. Ethiopians love their coffee and take pride in the fact that the plant’sinvigorating effects were first discovered in the Oromia region of the country (see the2006 documentary Black Gold).

3. Chinese roads

Made in China. Actually made by China. The country is investinghundreds of millions of dollars in Ethiopia's infrastructure.Aside from coffee and pasta, Ethiopia excels inroads.

Other African nations have roads -- it’s just that few are a patch withthose in Ethiopia.

The quality tarmac comes courtesy of huge Chinese investment -- in2009, it was estimated that China had poured $900 million into Ethiopia’s infrastructure, a figurethat's since increased exponentially.

Anyone who's driven into Ethiopia from Kenya, via the perilous Marsabitroute (fraught with bumps, brigands and bandits) will attest what a difference a nice road makes.Ethiopia’s incredible mountain-top highway vistas don’t hurt, either.

4. Tanks

... lots of them into unusual climbing frames for kids, in the case ofEthiopia.Don't worry: unless you get horribly lost and venture into Somalia, the tanks you'll see along theroadside are burned-out remnants of the Eritrean-Ethiopian War (1998-2000).

Seen throughout the country, these defunct war machines stand asforbidding reminders of Ethiopia's troubled past -- and double as fun climbing frames for localchildren. (Next door Eritrea is the place see if you really dig disused materiel.)

5. Underground churches

Lalibela's monolithic churches still impress nine centuries later.Ethiopiasags under the weight of its cultural treasures, such as those at the UNESCO World Heritage siteLalibela.

In the late 12th century, Gebre Mesqel Lalibela had 13 churches --Ethiopia is one of the oldest Christian nations -- carved out of solid rock.

His achievement (meaning that of his stonemasons and slaves) is stillincredibly impressive nine centuries on.

Lalibela -- the first major point of interest on the Northern Circuit -- is a10-hour journey from Addis Ababa. Head north up Route 1, passing through Debre Birhan, Kombolchaand Dessie. At Weldiya, leave the highway and follow the road west to Gashena.At Gashena, take the road north to Lalibela.

6. Martian landscapes

"The cruelest place on Earth?" Pretty, though.Located in the tumultuousAfar region on the Eritrean border, the Danakil Depression is strewn with volcanoes and salt lakesand is one of the hottest places on the planet.

So why visit what National Geographic calls “the cruelest place on Earth?”

Well, this also happens to be one of the most arresting natural sightsyou'll see in Africa -- or anywhere else.

With an unforgiving landscape that’s difficult to navigate, it’s also one ofthe few places in Ethiopia where you shouldn’t travel alone: most people go with an escort or in aconvoy.

Tours can be arranged in Abbis. Reputable agency Ethiopia Travel andTours charges around $550 for a four-day trip

7. Men-only monasteries

Debre Damo houses some of the most ancient Christian scripture inAfrica. Gentlemen: you'll have to describe it to the ladies.Just off the main road between Lalibela andAksum lies Debre Damo, a monastery that can be reached only by scrambling up a 15-meter-highcliff face.

There is, however, a discriminatory door policy: only men are permittedto make the perilous ascent to the monastery.

That rule doesn't apply just to female humans -- even livestock of thefairer sex apparently risk distracting the monks from holy contemplation.

Gents who brave the climb can enjoy stunning vistas, as well as a chanceto eye some of the most ancient Christian scripture in Africa.

Be warned that unofficial "guides" will try to extort inflated fees for theirservices before letting you back down the cliff -- negotiate the charge beforehand.It's practical to visit Debre Damo en route to Aksum.

The monastery lies just outside the small town of Bizet, 12 hours' drivenorth of Addis and about 50 kilometers west of Adigrat, the last stop on Route 1 before turning weston to Route 15.

Follow the road to Bizet and keep a keen eye out for the turn to DebreDamo on the right.

8. The Ark of the Covenant

Final resting place of the Ark of the Covenant? Nice if you could get pastthe tracksuit guys and see it.The Lost Ark? In Ethiopia?

Someone should have told Indiana Jones that before he set off for Cairo.

According to enthusiastic local sources, the historic town of Aksum -- focalpoint of the Aksumite Empire (AD 100-940) -- is the resting place of the Ark of the Covenant.

The catch? No one's actually allowed to see it.

The closest you can get is by paying a few dollars to one of the tracksuit-clad men posturing as guards outside the temple where the ark is purportedly kept.

Luckily, Aksum is home to plenty of ancient tombs and other monuments, which makes the drive to one of Ethiopia's northernmost towns worthwhile
-- ark or not.

Though Aksum can be reached by a small road west of Mek'ele, peoplewanting to visit Debre Damo monastery as well should take Route 1, turning west on to Route 15 at Adigrat, and join Route 3 at Adwa.

9. Roadside Rastafarians

Rastafarian kids in Ethiopia, regarded as the movement's spiritual home.The Rastafari movement is most often associated with Jamaica, butit was the Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie who inspired the religion. Ethiopians are proud of their former ruler's supposed status as Jesus incarnate and some have adopted the dress and lifestyle habits of theirJamaican counterparts -- which makes meeting them in the Simien Mountains all the more bizarre.

The roadside Rastas you're likely to meet are a friendly bunch, who'll happily talk you through points of interest in the area (often relating to high cliffs off which Italian soldiers were thrown), as well as hawking red,green and yellow hats and accessories.

10. A fairy tale kingdom

Ethiopian fairy tale: an imperial castle in Gondar.British and Dutch colonialbuildings attract the most architectural attention in east Africa, but Ethiopia again stands out as the only country on the continent with its own fairy tale castles Aside from a few eye-catching art deco buildings leftover from the Italian occupation, the castles of Fasilades, Iyasu and Mentwab, in the former imperial capital of Gondar, are the structures that stay in the mind.

Gondar is a five-hour drive southwest of Aksum. Follow Route 3 through the Simien Mountains. A good stopping point is Debark, with its mountainvistas. What defines Ethiopia to you?

Deconstructing The Construction Corruption In Ethiopia'

EM Analysis: (July 22, 2013) - The cancer of corruption in the constructionsector the World Bank (WB) documented in its "Diagnosing Corruption in Ethiopia" is just as malignant and metastatic as in the land, education andtelecommunications sectors. According to the World Bank report: "In the construction sector, Ethiopia exhibits most of the classic warning signs of corruption risk, including instances of poor-quality construction, inflated unit output costs, and delays in implementation. In turn, these factors appear in some cases to be driven by unequal or unclear contractual relationships, poor enforcement of professional standards, high multipliersbetween public sector and private sector salaries, wide-ranging discretionary powers exercised by government, a lack of transparency, and a widespread perception of hidden barriers to market entry." Ethiopia's "construction sector" falls into four categories: roads, water supply and irrigation, power, and other public works including constructionof universities, schools, hospitals and markets. Annual spending on roads alone is estimated to be US$1.2 billion. The "government" totally dominates the construction sector. "Ethiopia is unusual compared with most other African countries, which have already fully privatized the design and construction of public works." There are multiple and "interrelated drivers of corruption in Ethiopia's construction sector." Thesedrivers are "related to deficiencies in accountability (transparency based on clear performance criteria), capacity (availability of sufficient material and human resources and proper procedures), and trust (confidence in the market that allows businesses to invest in increasing their own capacity). In Ethiopia, "A lack of capacity makes corruption possible, a lack of accountability makes corruption happen, and a lack of trust allows corruption to take root."

The WB report highlights corruption in Ethiopia's construction sector alongsix dimensions. The policymaking and regulatory processes are at high- risk area of corruption. Such corruption "has a major effect on sector governance." Policies and regulations could "encourage, or help hide, corrupt practices" and unless corrected perpetuate corruption by groups orindividuals. The Ethiopian "government" "controls the price of constructionmaterials, access to finance, and access to equipment. It controls professional and company registrations. It maintains high-level, bilateral infrastructure deals with China and lacks independent performance audits." According to the WB report, "Many stakeholders are concerned about the possibility of a connection between the dominant role of Chinesecontractors in the road sector and high-level links between the Ethiopian and Chinese governments" and the "lack of effective competition, with Chinese contractors dominating the international market and a limited set of domestic contractors dominating the national market." These problems are compounded by other factors such as poor quality control, weak enforcement of professional standards and overall lack of transparency.

Professionals in the construction sector are reluctant to complain "for fearof being victimized" and believing there is no truly independent body to which they can appeal." Since the "government is a major client", "there is a reluctance to express dissent."

US Calls on Ethiopia to Release Religious Freedom Advocates on Trial'

WASHINGTON D.C. (PR) -- On the one-year anniversary of the crackdown on Muslim protestors for peacefully advocating for their religious freedom rights, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom (USCIRF) calls on the Ethiopian government to release 29 individuals who have beendetained and put on trial. In July 2012, the government arrested hundredsof Muslims peacefully demanding that it cease interfering in their religious affairs and allow their community to vote freely for representatives on the Ethiopian Islamic Affairs Supreme Council (EIASC). While most were released, 29 were charged on October 29, 2012 under the government's Anti-Terror Proclamation, accused of “intending to advance a political, religious or ideological cause” by force and the “planning, preparation, conspiracy, incitement and attempt of terrorist acts.” It was the first timethat Ethiopia’s terrorism law was used in connection with a religious freedom issue.

“We are deeply concerned that Ethiopia’s government is seeking to silencepeaceful religious freedom proponents by detaining and trying them in secret under trumped-up terrorism charges. They should be released now and their trials halted,” said USCIRF Chair Katrina Lantos Swett. “When USCIRF was in Ethiopia in December 2012, we met with lawyers for the 29who reported that their clients had been tortured and experienced other ill-treatment in detention. Since then, the Commission has expressed concern about a February 2013 program, Jihadawi Harekat (Holy War Movement). This program, which the government aired on Ethiopia TV andportrayed the protesters and those arrested as terrorists, could prejudice the outcome of their trial. The U.S. government must increase its advocacy to ensure that the defendants' religious freedom and human anddue process rights are respected."

Starting in December 2011, Muslims in Addis Ababa and across Ethiopia held weekly peaceful demonstrations in mosques after Friday prayers to protest efforts by the government and the EIASC to impose al-Ahbash, a foreign interpretation of Islam, on their community. While officials did notstop the protests for almost six months, as they grew in size, protestors reported that security forces began intimidating them and their families todiscourage continued demonstrations.

The first arrests occurred on July 13, 2012, when police raided the AweliyaMosque as individuals gathered to plan for both a charity event and protests to coincide with an upcoming African Union Summit in Addis Ababa. Protestors reportedly were beaten and arrested, with some witnesses alleging police use of tear gas and live ammunition. On July 19- 20, the police continued to arrest Muslim community members, including journalists and the 17 members of the Arbitration Committee the protestors had elected to negotiate with the government. On July 21, police broke up a sit-in protesting the arrests. According to witnesses, protestors were subjected to beatings, tear gas and arrests. Those charged include nine members of the Arbitration Committee, the editor-in-chief of the Ye’Muslimoch Guday Yusuf Getachew, and Habiba Mohammed,the wife of the (now former) Minister of Civil Service, Junedin Sado.

DIPLOMACY: Ambassador Statement to the U.S. Senate

(July 24, 2013) The newly appointed US Ambassador to Ethiopia PatriciaHaslach in her July 24, 2013 statement to the Foreign Relations Committee, Ambassador Haslach said that she will devote herself to persuading the Ethiopian people and their government that commitment to human rights, liberalization of the economy, and a transparent,inclusive political process are central to our common future.

If confirmed, I will work to facilitate economic reforms that can benefit

U.S. trade and investment, while improving economic freedom and self-sufficiency for Ethiopians.

If confirmed, I will press the Government of Ethiopia to respect the rightsof all its citizens regardless of ethnicity, clan, political views, or religious affiliation.

Politically motivated trials, ongoing tensions between some in the Muslimcommunity and the government, and restrictions on non-governmental organizations cause seriousconcern. If confirmed, I will work with the Ethiopian government to open political space, and advance reforms that promote freedom of expression, association, and rule of law.

If confirmed, I will be committed to promoting our efforts and policy approach on gender-based violence and discrimination against the LGBT community. Domestic violence, especially spousal rape and the lack of legal remedy or support for survivors, are challenging problems of criticalfocus.

Daughter of the late Ethiopian PM has deposited $5 billion in a bank inNew York'

ER – (July 26, 2013) Semhal Meles Zenawi the daughter of the late Ethiopian Prime Minister has deposited $5 billion in one of the banks in New York. During a recent presentation at the House of Commons in the U.K, Dr. Wondimu Mekonnen, an academic and opposition figure said Semehal Meles Zenawi, 25 years old daughter of the late Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, has deposited $5 billion in one of the banks in NewYork. The date on the cheque that Wondimu distributed states the money was lodged on October, 2011. Wondimu also showed and distributed a copy of the cheque of the money she lodged to the members of the Housewho attended his presentation. Celebrity Net Worth site said Meles Zenawigot a net worth of $3 billion. What a shame! That is wrong guys.

Absolutely wrong. I have got a copy of a cheque signed by Semhal Meles Zenawi, the daughter of Meles Zenawi himself, depositing in one of the New York banks $5 billion. I have got and I will give you the copy. Don't ask me how it came into our possession but that is a fact. Dr. Wondimu further said "I think, Celebrity Net Worth, got it entirely all wrong. If thatwas the case, how come, a check in the name of his elder daughter Semhal Meles Zenawi, for USD 5 billion was deposited into a bank in NewYork city? We will let the investigation to Department of Fraud and MoneyLaundering Investigation of the United States".

Ethiopia and the next revolution'

Ethiomedia Analysis: By Abebe Gellaw (July 31, 2013) - Exactly a year ago, ESAT declared the death of Meles Zenawi. That was the most important breaking news in the last two decades. TPLF went into frenzy tobury the news under a barrage of counter-propaganda. Bereket Simon went on ETV to curse ESAT and reassure the nation that the "great leader"would return intact. The propaganda chief and his foot soldiers had already kept the local media extremely busy with so many bizarre stories. The zeal to bury the truth was too evident to miss. But the spin and misinformation campaign got out of control beyond anyone could have imagined. Addis Fortune, Addis Admas, Reporter, ETV, Walta…had all different versions of the same story. All of them said Meles was alive and kicking and was on his way back to his throne. The lies were too fast to catch. Addis Admas, which has a bad habit of publishing fabrications, told us that Meles was working from the palace. Addis Fortune famously splashed its front page with a memorable headline: "Meles back in town." But it was ESAT that accurately told the story that truly mattered. And then, Meles finally returned home in a coffin….It was a watershed momentfor Ethiopia after the great demise of the late tyrant.

Frenzy attacks: After suffering for 21 years under the brutal grip and bouts of Meles Zenawi, Ethiopians had to witness a political melodrama. The plot was twisted, the lies were sinister, the propaganda was shameless and the mass hysteria, carefully planned for weeks, was one ofthe worst in the world. Ethiopians were told to come out and shed their tears to bury the "great leader" who was feeding them lies, kicking, torturing and killing their children and nephews with tyrannical ruthlessness. As the lead investigator to verify the death of the despot, I was focused on a leak from the Brussels-based International Crisis Group (ICG). Despite conflicting rumors, it was the most compelling and verifiable information one could get about the death of the despot at St.

Luc University Hospital in Brussels, Belgium. A few hours after ESAT's breaking news on July 30, 2012, I published the story online, which was deliberately titled, "Meles Zenawi is dead". The TPLF camp launched moresavage campaigns, death threats, defamation and saber rattling. Tigrai Online took the lead in the frenzy attacks.

'Dilwonberu Nega', a certain TPLF scribbler and apologist, doodled and scribbled a lengthy piece full of insults on Tigrai Online. "So Abebe "The foolish heart" and the gang of cowboy journalists at ESAT came up with a 'brilliant' idea of hoodwinking the international community by concocting a"Breaking News" on the "death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi…. ESAT's future, as a result of its totally irresponsible act of concocting the death ofPrime Minister Melees Sinai, is now vulnerable to a quick and painful deathas people who have been contributing money to ESAT are bound to ask a justifiable question: Are they or Ethiopia getting value for their money?

The answer is a big NO." While the foolhardy TPLF and its puppets are still confused and depressed, ESAT and the movements for change are gainingground and building momentum. TPLF is still unsure of its future one yearafter the demise of the captain of the ship destined for a tragic wreck. ICG's report, "Ethiopia after Meles", was written in July 2012 but the release had to be delayed until the official announcement. After exhaustive planning, TPLF decided to reveal its top secret that it could nolonger keep. It admitted that the tyrant was dead on August 20, 2012, over five weeks after his demise. ICG released its analytic report the nextday. We were vindicated again.

Cracking pyramid: ICG warned that the one-man regime, without its creator, could be unraveling sooner rather than later. "For more than two decades, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi managed Ethiopia's political, ethnicand religious divides and adroitly kept the TFPL and EPRDF factions undertight control by concentrating power, gradually closing political space andstifling any dissent. His death poses serious risks to the ruling party's tenure," the report said. ICG's prediction was on target that reflects the current reality. "Deprived of its epicenter [Meles], the regime will find it very difficult to create a new centre of gravity. In the short-term, a TPLF-dominated transition will produce a weaker regime that probably will haveto rely increasingly on repression to manage growing unrest." Meles Zenawi was supposed to last longer. In a 2002 article, "Ethiopia Proves There Can Be Life after Death," British journalist Jonathan Dimbleby had even quoted him as saying: "Africa's downfall has always been the cult ofthe personality. And their names always seem to begin with M. We've hadMobutu and Mengistu and I'm not going to add Meles to the list." Meles, who built a personality cult still in place, envied lifetime dictators and wanted to outlive Mugabe, Mengistu or Mubarak.
The Meles regime was built like a pyramid to serve him. He had created a monolithic power structure. On top of the highly corrupted ethno-power pyramid sat the emperor himself followed by his most trusted lieutenants.At the very bottom of the pyramid, the masses shouldered the whole brunt and weight of the top-down tyranny. It was a system designed to crush and oppress the multitude at the very bottom of the pyramid. The man on top of the pyramid is no longer there. Now this system built to serve the strongman is cracking and unraveling slowly. The reasons are not complex. In reality, no one has replaced Meles Zenawi. No one has hispower and privilege. No one has his skills to rule with brute decisiveness and Machiavellian tricks. Everyone assembled in the power structure is thetyrant's loyalist. No one can hold the cracking pyramid as much as he did…. After all, Meles Zenawi was the supreme ruler, a kind of superglue that held together the complex ethno-political structure. Without the superglue, the pyramid cannot survive long enough.
Crown without sword: The pro-TPLF Ethiopian Reporter has recently admitted that Hailemariam Desalegn can only dream of succeeding Meles.It declared that the puppet has been given a crown without the sword.

Just a few weeks into power, we were told that Hailemariam was only partof a new “collective leadership” scheme. He was awarded three deputies, two figure heads and a real one. The Reporter grievingly repeated what every ordinary citizen has been saying all along. Hailemariam the puppet is just a pawn in the game.

So how can the ship facing internal and external pressures navigate itselfout of storm without wrecking itself? The regime may implode or even explode without applying Zenaw’s Machiavellian calculus that sustained itfor over two decades. The trouble is only Meles could have done it cunningly. That is why they are vowing to keep his “visions” alive. His photos hanging all over the walls, the dead tyrant’s ghost is more powerful than Hailemariam and the rest of the gang called the “cabinet”. The man poised to play Meles, Debretsion Gebremichael, TPLF’sspymaster and pseudo-intellectual, has more leverages than the three TPLF puppets, i.e. Hailemariam, Muktar Kedir and Demeke Mekonnen, added together. He is among the privileged and entitled TPLF ruling elite. The three have no power base and leverages. They are outsiders. Unlike Debretsion, and the other TPLF bigwigs moving the system from behind the curtains, they only serve as bellboys whose main duties are to create the illusion of diversity and a semblance of power sharing within EPRDF’s cheap ethnic goulash.

Debretsion is “Deputy” Prime Minister in charge of economy and finance. He is the Deputy Chairman of the TPLF. He is Minister of Information and Communication Technology. He is board chairman of the EthioTelecom and the Ethiopia Electric Power Corp., both plagued by unbridled corruption. Most importantly, he controls the security apparatus.

With a bogus PhD from a controversial online university called Capella, Debretsion has significant leverages of power. The security apparatus directly reports to him instead of the “Prime Minister.” And yet, he lacks the charisma and leadership skills needed to hold such a highly monolithicsystem that has not yet been reconstructed after the demise of its undisputed architect. Even if he is in charge of the telecommunication service, those who know well say that Debretsion doesn’t have telephone skills let alone speaking like a ruler. As a spymaster cunningly eavesdropping the secrets of the other game players, he is widely feared but not trusted. Bereket Simon, who played a key role in organizing the mass hysteria and creating the illusion of the “great leader”, was widely believed to be one of the contenders for power. As the propaganda chief, he was practically the most visible face of the regime. In a surprising move, he was banished into oblivion with a ministerial position without portfolio. Bereket is now Hailemariam’s policy ‘adviser’, researcher and archivist. His lack of experience and expertise makes it apparent that he was just pushed to the backyard. Given the fact that Hailemariam the puppet has already special advisers well-trusted and liked by the TPLF, Bereket Simon will find it hard to fit into the army of advisers.

TPLF's affairs: One of the worst case scenarios of a power struggle is that conspiracy becomes dangerously rife. The more conspiratorial the game players are, the more likely they tend to shoot at each other. So far the shootings are not out in the open but a sudden move by a player to dominate the rest can seriously disturb and unsettle the precarious regimestill walking on eggshells. Whatever the case, the internal power struggle is mainly a TPLF affair. That doesn't mean that the non-TPLFites would notbe needed. Far from it, they are needed for the same purpose of diversity and loyalty to the major players. Azeb Mesfin, the Amhara oddball in the TPLF, faces an uncertain future. Her power and privilege was totally basedon her husband. Her recent bid to resurrect her fading clout by becoming the mayor of Addis Ababa failed miserably as she could not win the backing of TPLF's kingmakers. TPLF's ethnic business empire, EFFORT, is likely to slip out of her hand. Although she seems to be determined to stay relevant, she is highly vulnerable. Many speculate that she could be surprised at some point with charges of corruption, a TPLF tactic used in times of great crises and power struggle. Her hope is pinned on the Meles Zenawi "foundation". In her recent appearance on TV to talk about the bogus foundation and beg for money, it became apparent that she is becoming a lone wolf. She appeared incoherent, stressed-out and ill. All the symptoms are bad for the queen of Mega, mother of corruption—as some prefer to call her. Sibehat Nega, TPLF's veteran master of political intrigue, cannot be underestimated. After all, he mentored Meles Zenawi under his bosom. He still holds enormous political clout and continues to pull strings from behind…There is also a group that continues to complain from Mekele. Meles Zenawi's successor and heir apparent, as chairman of the TPLF, was supposed to be Abay Woldu, the President of Region One (now renamed Tigray Regional State). His group feels s overshadowed by those positioned in and around Arat Kilo, especially his 'deputy' Debretsion. Unless Abay Woldu gets a means of coming closer to the seat of power in Addis, he will remain a regional warlord with no credible leverage to lead TPLF's domination on the rest of the nation.

The sleeping giant waking up: Slowly but surely the sleeping giant is waking up. The opposition is regrouping again. Dissidents are breaking theshackles of fear. For the first time after the tragedy of the 2005 crackdowns, Semayawi Party and UDJ are coming out with stronger and bolder messages. There seems to be a healthy competition to make an impact and build a movement for change. Muslims Ethiopians continue to march for equality condemning TPLF's tyranny at least every Friday. ESAT is providing a critical voice and filling the void in the airwaves of Ethiopia. There is no more silence and fear in Ethiopia. The voices of freedom are getting louder and bolder. And yet collaboration, more than competition, is still needed among all stakeholders.

Ethiopia remains restless and unpredictable. The opportunities that opposition groups need to seize on are too many. The missing link is visionary leadership with smart strategies…. Opposition groups need to reinvent themselves and correct their mistakes and failures. Whatever thecase, change is on the horizon. The cracking pyramid left by tyrant cannotchange withstand the internal and external pressures that can wreck it into pieces….The opportunities after the great demise of the tyrant are toomany to count. There are still some that expect the system to rot and fall down by itself. There are even those that wait for change to come from above. That is not the kind change Ethiopia needs. The revolution must becreated and smartly dictated by those who are struggling to transform Ethiopia for the better.

Those who are saying that nothing has changed may not have good eyes for details. As Che Guevera said, “The revolution is not an apple that falls when it is ripe. You have to make it fall.” The regime is weak and divided. The socio-economic and political conditions, still dominated by the TPLF, provide fertile ground for a revolution. Divisions and bickering are still the major problems that revolutionaries and change-makers of Ethiopia must overcome to seize the moment…As it is always the case, change is constant and inevitable. “When dictatorship is a fact, revolution becomes aright,” Victor Hugo once said. Nobody should wait for a revolution. With the right mindset, we are the ones who can make a revolution our destiny. The Egyptian revolutionary Waem Ghonim is right: The power of the people is greater than the people in power. The demise of Meles was only the beginning of the end to TPLF’s apartheid system. Ethiopia’s next revolution is inevitable as long as the people realize their real power and unleash it against TPLF’s tyranny, inequality, discrimination and injustice.

Ethiopia: ILRI Scientist Honored By Australian University'

Ethiopian Radio and Television Agency (ERTA) (August 3, 2013) - Addis Ababa, by Nasru Jemal - Azage Tegegne, a senior scientist working with the International Livestock Research Institute (ILRI) in Ethiopia has received recognition from Australia's James Cook University for his outstanding contributions to agricultural research in Africa. Tegegne, an Ethiopian, was one of 12 recipients of the 2013 James Cook University Outstanding Alumni Award given on 26 Jul in Townsville, Australia. The award pays tribute to graduates of the university who 'have made an outstanding contribution in their field of endeavor and to the community'.This year's winners include lawyers, health workers, a school principal, anengineer, a wildlife conservationist and a businessman and represent citizens from Afghanistan, Ethiopia, Northern Ireland and the Philippines. 'I accept this award and honor in the name of my beloved wife, Tsehay Azage, who passed away on 17 Jul 2013', said Tegegne. His wife's funeraltook place on 21 July in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia - just five days before the award ceremony. Tegegne was honored by his alma mater for his more than 25 years of work, including being a founder member of the EthiopianSociety of Animal Production and a founding fellow of the Ethiopian Academy of Sciences. Tegegne has authored or co-authored more than 280 scientific and professional articles in journals, proceedings volumes and book chapters and has supervised and coached more than 65 PhD andMSc/DVM students. Tegegne, who is deputy representative for ILRI's director general in Ethiopia, manages one of ILRI's largest research projects in Ethiopia, called 'Livestock and Irrigation Value chains for Ethiopian Smallholders (LIVES)'. The project works to support millions of Ethiopian smallholder farmers who depend on livestock and irrigated croplands for their agricultural livelihoods. Tegegne is a recipient of several other awards, including an honorary doctorate degree of sciences given to him in 2012 by Ethiopia's Bahir Dar University in recognition of his contributions to agricultural research and 'the betterment of farmers' lives' in his native country. Earlier this year, he was appointed representative of the Australia Awards Ambassador Initiative of AusAID to help better bridge development efforts between Africa and Australia.

In Honor of The Great Runner: Google Doodle - Google Dedicates Its Home Page to Abebe Bikila' Google Doodle show a race track with presumably Adebe Bikila running over the finish line. Adebe Bikila was a double Olympic Marathon Champion born in Ethiopia and most famous forwinning his Gold Marathon Olympics Medal at the 1960 Summer Olympicsin Rome Italy. Originally Adebe Bikila was not included into the 1960 Olympics but due to the misfortune of his team mate Wami Biratu who broke his ankle in a football match, he made the team at last moment literally just before the plane took off for the Rome Olympics. Adidas, the shoe sponsor at the 1960 Summer Olympics, had few shoes left when Bikila went to try out shoes and he ended up with a pair that didn't fit comfortably, so he couldn't use them and he ran the Marathon bare foot and still won. After the race when asked why he ran the race bare food Abebe Bikila said that, "I wanted the whole world to know that my country, Ethiopia, has always won with determination and heroism." Adebe Bikila was born on the 7th of August 1932 and died 25 October 1973 at the age of 41. His legend lives on today and he is a heroand role model for Olympic Athletes today.

Ethiopia sees Muslim anti-government protests'
By Kirubeal Tadesse, AP - ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia August 5, 2013: — The government has accused Moslem protesters in Kofele, Oromia region, of killing three policemen on Saturday. Three policemen may have been killed, but it is almost always true the policemen are killed by the government itself for two purposes: a) The number of civilians massacred by government forces is high and there should be a cover-up story to offset the crime, and b) and that cover-up story should be to project the unarmed civilian protesters as "armed and dangerous." This has been the modus operandi of the regime since it fired its way to power in May, 1991.Anti-government Muslims in Ethiopia called for mass demonstrations to beheld on the religious day of Eid al-Fitr later this week to protest the arrests of 28 people on terror charges. The calls followed a weekend of violence in which three people were killed after security forces clashed with what police labeled Muslim "extremists." Hundreds of people held rallies near mosques in the capital, Addis Ababa, and some regional townson Friday and Saturday. Police in the Oromia region said some protesters fired guns at police. The state news agency said all three killed were policeofficers and that 11 people were injured during the hours-long unrest.

Muslim leaders, however, said that police stormed a peaceful protest andkilled about a dozen people. Some in Ethiopia's Muslim community — about one-third of the predominantly Christian nation — have been protesting alleged government interference in religious affairs for about two years.

The Muslim protesters accuse the government of unconstitutionally encouraging a moderate teaching of Islam called Al-Ahbash. Other protests have also turned violence in the past. Rights groups and the U.S. Commission on Intentional Religious Freedom blame the government for the ongoing tensions with Muslims. Most of the protest leaders are now behind bars and face terrorism charges. In December, 28 activists pleadednot guilty to the terror charges. The trial has since then continued behind closed doors with the press and family members denied access to the proceedings. Defense lawyers say the court is yet to deliver a verdict.

During the latest protests at the Grand Anwar mosque in the capital, someshouted slogans demanding the release of the activists. "The illegal activities are being spearheaded by few Salafists who have been plotting terror attacks including the killings of religious scholars," the country's federal police said in a statement. "The Ethiopian government and Ethiopian people will continue to work together to protect the peace and stability of the nation that enjoyed religious tolerance during its long history."

Ethiopians on the Japanese culture, tradition and philosophy'

(VIEWS) Japanese culture and philosophy had also been introduced into Ethiopia," Study of Japan was so widespread in Ethiopia in the early 20th century that the term "Japanization" was coined to refer to a school of thought that compared the country with Japan and encouraged young andeducated Ethiopians to create a modernization movement something like the Meiji Restoration. In elementary school written by a successor to a Japanizer that depicted how Japan managed to rebuild after World War II and become one of the world's most advanced economies, several commonalities between the countries that seem so far apart, both in location and culture. For example, there exists in Ethiopia a music genre that sounds similar to Japanese enka (ballads) with similar musical beats,he said. Also, a "coffee ceremony" popular in Ethiopia resembles Japan's traditional tea ceremony in many ways. Typically done at home, the neighbors come together to drink coffee and exchange views or information. "Coffee is ground and prepared manually in front of the people. The coffee ceremony is a way of socializing between Ethiopia andJapan, the countries that seem so far apart."

Ethiopia eyes access to sea, territory swaps with Eritrea'WikiLeaks Analysis: (August 7, 2013)

A leaked Cable of US Embassy Addis Ababa reveals Ethiopia threatened to'reoccupy the Temporary Security Zone (TSZ), which lies entirely within Eritrea, in the event UNMEE withdrew' back in 2004. The Cable also indicates Ethiopia deems negotiation on 'access to the sea' and 'territory swaps' as key issues to resolve the current 'no peace, no war' situation with Eritrea. The Cable, prepared by the then Chargé d'affaires of the Embassy, Viki Huddleston, is a summary of a November 7, 2005 meeting at the US Embassy in Addis Ababa where Amb. Kenzo Oshima, Chairman of the UN Security Council's Working Group on Peace-keeping Operations,gave a briefing on the status of the Ethio-Eritrean relations. According to the Cable, the meeting was attended by diplomats in Addisrepresenting UN Security Council members and troop-contributing countries (TCC), as well as Special Representative of the UN Secretary- General (SRSG) Amb. Legwaila Joseph Legwaila, his deputy Amb. AzouzEnnifar, and UNMEE Force Commander Major-General Rajender Singh.

The meeting was held following Amb. Oshima's meeting with Ethiopian Foreign Minister Seyoum on the same day and his expected visit the following day to Asmara, Eritrea. Amb. Oshima defined his mission as "technical" and 'his most important message was to push Eritrea to lift itsrestrictions on UNMEE'.

Background: UNMEE was established following the 1998-2000 war between Ethiopia and Eritrea, which the later started. Following the humiliating defeat by the Ethiopian army which advanced deep into her territory, Eritrea agreed that the contested areas remain under Ethiopian forces and for a demilitarized zone 25 KM deep into her territory patrolled by peacekeeping forces. That is, until the disputes are resolved, as per theAlgiers Agreement signed by both parties in June 2000. Ethiopia reported to have lost slightly above 17 thousand troops in the war, though the International Crisis Group (ICG) estimates the combined loss of the two countries around 70,000. Consequently, in 2002, the Ethio-Eritrean Border Commission (EEBC) issued a decision, which counts as border delimitation, that divided the 40 km long Badme district into two comparable areas, though the town is awarded to Eritrea.

Though the decision is unpopular in Ethiopia, the parliament adopted in 2004 a 5-point resolution accepting the ruling 'in principle', yet demandingthe demarcation process be conducted 'according to international norms' and also a negotiation to resolve outstanding issues 'in a give and take' manner. What Ethiopia wants to negotiate on has always been a subject of speculation, as the government refused to disclose its negotiation strategy, except that a sustainable peace is the objective. On the other hand, Eritrea continued to breach the Cessation of Hostilities Agreement and elements of the Algiers Agreement by engaging in a range of activitiesto destabilize Ethiopia, an allegation corroborated by UN reports.

Moreover, Eritrea continued to obstruct the operation of UNMEE, whose presence is a pre-requisite for conducting the border demarcation. In fact,Ethiopian forces withdrew from Eritrean territory at the end of the war was on the condition that a demilitarized zone patrolled by UN would be established in the Eritrean side of the border. As Eritrea's obstruction of UNMEE troops movement picked in 2004, so did tensions in the region, thus prompting the UN Secretary General send on Amb. Oshima, who wasJapan's UN Permanent Representative at the UN Security Council and alsoChairman of the UN Security Council's Working Group on Peace-keeping Operations. Amb. Oshima met the then Ethiopian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Seyoum Mesfin on Nov. 7. Later that day, at the US Embassy, Oshima described the meeting as follows, according to the Cable: Seyoumcontinued to assert that actual demarcation of the border would require "readjustments," e.g., to ensure that a village not be divided in two.

Seyoum also had said that the border issue was not the sole issue between Ethiopia and Eritrea: economic trade, normalization of relations,and access to the sea were also key.

Amb. Legwaila Joseph Legwaila, Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General (SRSG), who also attended the US Embassy meeting was quoted as saying: SRSG Legwaila observed that Ethiopia had, on several occasions, proposed swapping territory, and that the final point ofPM Meles' five-point plan proposed dialogue, which Eritrea had rejected.

Commenting on the issues Oshima said: Oshima said that while it would be useful if the GOE were to state publicly that it accepted the Ethiopia- Eritrea Boundary Commission's (EEBC) decision as "final and binding," asstipulated by the Algiers peace accord, the GOE continues to agree with the decision only "in principle". Highlighting the difference, Oshima questioned whether "I will marry you in principle" meant the same as "I will marry you unconditionally." Amb. Legwaila Joseph Legwaila, added:

Describing himself as an "expert in linguistic contortions," SRSG Legwailaagreed that this represented a significant caveat. Legwaila said mutual acceptance of the EEBC decision would be a good basis for parties to begin dialogue. Not accepting the finality of the EEBC decision was a violation of article 415 of the peace agreement, Legwaila added. Oshima also made a vague remark that was presented on the Cable as follows: According to Oshima, Eritrea's charge d'affaires in New York had told himthat the GSE had proposed a bilateral arrangement to Ethiopia, but had not pursued it further, as Ethiopia had rejected it.

Concerning the possibility of another war, Legwaila cautioned that: allowing UNMEE's withdrawal would be the "quickest way to war," as the Government of Ethiopia had pledged to reoccupy the TSZ in the event UNMEE withdrew (ref A). The TSZ was intended to keep Eritrean troops 25kilometers from the border, he said. Current restrictions hampering UNMEE's freedom of movement, especially during the night, were thus notonly "making nonsense of the Temporary Security Zone," but also breeding suspicion, which could ultimately "force war quickly," he said.

Legwaila said movements of troops, tanks, or aircraft were a secondaryconcern, compared to the GSE's flight ban on UNMEE; reversing the banwould allow UNMEE to monitor and assess such movements. The French and Indian ambassador concurred with Legwaila's assessment.Legwaila also asked for satellite imagery from US, according to the Cable. He was quoted as saying: the restriction on UNMEE flights prevented UNMEE from monitoring 60 per cent of the border. UNMEE could not determine whether Eritrea was now building up forces along its side, he said. He noted that UNMEE had requested satellite imagery from the United States (ref C), as "there is no other alternative" to aerial surveillance. Without aerial surveillance, UNMEE Forc Commander Singh said he would need 15 times more troops (i.e., 45,000) to monitor the border. (Text ends)

State-sponsored terrorism against Ethiopian Muslims must stop' SMNE (August 8, 2013): warning to the TPLF/EPRDF to Uphold Its Constitution: Stop Unlawful Acts of TPLF/EPRDF –Sponsored Terrorism Against Ethiopian Muslims or Face Future Charges - Ethiopians of Muslim faith have taken to the streets of Ethiopia to peacefully demand religious freedom in Ethiopia. According to their demonstration organizers, the numbers of protesters will increase to new levels of participation in the coming days and weeks; while at the same time, the TPLF/EPRDF government warns of new cracks down, some of which have already takenlives, injured young and old and resulted in the arrests of thousands of political prisoners. This is no easy issue to resolve. Freedom of religion is close to the hearts of millions of Ethiopians, not only Muslims but all people who seek to pursue their faith and conscience without restriction.

This has created a deadlock where the TPLF/ ERPDF's position is unsustainable without making concessions; however, based on past actions, it is highly doubtful that the TPLF/EPRDF will take the necessary steps to prevent the situation from escalating out of control, especially if the TPLF/EPRDF-sponsored violence against civilians is continued. The Solidarity Movement for a New Ethiopia (SMNE) strongly urges the TPLF/EPRDF and all its security forces to genuinely uphold the Ethiopian Constitution, first by not interfering with the legal right of Ethiopian citizens to peacefully protest. Any violence at the hands of the TPLF/EPRDF or others, resulting in injury of murder, that is directed at unarmed, peaceful protesters may be considered acts of terrorism against the Ethiopian civilians. Those individuals involved, both those giving theorders and those executing them, may be charged with terrorism in duetime. Under international laws, perpetrators may also be charged with crimes against humanity. We caution the TPLF/EPRDF to not harm any peaceful protestors during this legal protest even more so because yourgovernment is already becoming increasingly known for its serial humanrights violations against innocent Ethiopians.

Ethiopia: Muslim Protests Raise Slender Hopes of Change in Ethiopia'DeutchWelle Analysis: By Philipp Sandner – (August 9, 2013)

Muslims in Ethiopia staged protests to coincide with the end of Ramadan. The opposition joined them. Both criticize the government for carrying outarbitrary arrests. Muslims in Ethiopia are angry over the detention of 29 religious leaders and activists and are calling for their release. They believe they have been wrongly accused of terrorism. Speaking to DW, Claire Beston, an expert on Ethiopia at Amnesty International said "we think that these people are persecuted because they got themselves involved in a peaceful protest movement." "We have seen that the Muslimprotest movement which has been active for more than 18 months, continues to be subjected to a massive oppression," Beston added.

Muslims are in the minority in mainly Christian dominated Ethiopia, but they have been in the country for more than a thousand years and now make up at least a third of the population. The constitution says religion and the state should be kept apart. Some Muslims are outraged because they believe the government is violating constitution by giving financial support to the moderate Islamic group "Al-Ahbash." The government, they say, is forcing moderate religious education on the country. They also accuse the government of meddling in the appointment of key figures in Ethiopia's supreme Islamic council. Three people have been killed in a protests that sparked a confrontation between security forces and protestors.

Under the guise of fighting terrorism: Confrontation between security forces and protesters is frequent. According to government figures, last Saturday's (03.08.2013) protest left three people dead. Eyewitnesses andbloggers, however, say that dozens were killed that day. The Ethiopian police claimed that Salafists coordinated the protests. "The government says there is a link between the Muslim protest movement and terrorism,"said Beston. "It also says the same about other political parties and protest movements in the country," she added. Political activists are repeatedly detained under the pretext of being suspected terrorists. The government says it is acting in accordance with the law on combating terrorism, which came into force in 2009. That law says any one who makes statements or remarks which can be construed as encouraging terrorist acts will be punished by up to 20 years in jail. Human rights activists have been complaining for years that this law is open to broad interpretation and can therefore be easily misused to restrict personalliberty. In 2012 the German Heinrich Boell Foundation closed down itsoffices in Addis Ababa in protest at the worsening of human rights situation in Ethiopia. Muslim protest movements and oppostion groupshave been protesting agains arbitrary arrests

A glimmer of hope: Over the last few weeks, political opposition groups and Muslims have been protesting against arbitrary arrests. The opposition "Blue Party", which has a large youth following, is calling for a liberal democracy. In early June, the party organized a large demonstration in the capital Addis Ababa, which was attended by thousands of people. Unlike previous years, the autocratic state's authorities let the protests go ahead . According to Hallelujah Lule, who works at the Institute for Security Studies in Addis Ababa, the demonstrators had shrewdly chosen the right time for their rally. "The first demonstration took place a few days after the 50th anniversary of the African Union." According to Lule, the government had initially allowed theprotests in order to avoid upsetting the international celebrations. But then the demonstrations spread to the northern Ethiopian cities of Gondarand Dessie. There they were also permitted to proceed. Nevertheless, it istoo early to assume that the government is now open to reform, says security expert Lule. The organizers of the protests are always being subjected to pressure and threats. Speaking to DW, Yilkal Getnet, the chairman of the Blue Party, said he has been receiving anonymous threatening phone calls. "They rang several numbers telling us we should stop criticizing the government." But Getnet says he is not prepared to be intimidated. "We are always in danger, but we are ready to do everything to defend our rights." Protesting against the political leadership in Ethiopiawas until recently unthinkable. In 2005 the government of former Prime Minister Meles Zenawi launched a violent crackdown on public protest sparking an exodus of dissidents. Now that the opposition can afford to make itself heard, shows there is a glimmer of hope, commented Hallelujah Lule.

ArabSat has ceased the ETV broadcast’

EMF – August 10, 2013: ArabSat took Ethiopian’s propaganda machine ETV off air on Friday next day after Ethiopian Federal Police brutal act against Ethiopian Muslims. Ethiopian activists reached out to Arabsat and asked ETV to be removed from platform, alleging ETV broadcasting hatredand false accusation against oppositions and Ethiopian Muslims. Source told to EMF, Arabsat asked Ethiopian government to give reasonable explanation why Police brutally attacked peaceful Ethiopians in Addis Ababa and other cities of the country. According to EMF source, Arabsat will shut down Ethiopian TV signals until it gets reasonable explanation from Ethiopian Government. Ethiopia has been a land of absolute military dictatorship before and after the death of the late Meles Zenawi. It is believed that the current Ethiopian prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn Boshe has no-say on actions taken by the military and security forces. Themove by Arabsat will give the opportunity to ESAT and other Ethiopian Media to gain control of covering events unfolding in Ethiopia. Ethiopian opposition Media accused the current Ethiopian regime for the killing of hundreds and violation of Human Rights in the country. Following Thursday's violation, Amnesty International released a statement calling on the Ethiopian government to end "repressive tactics against demonstrators". Recently, Arabsat stopped the broadcasting Syrian, Libyaand other dictatorial regime, government Television channels including Press TV.

Ethiopia- Police Muslims round-ups across the Nation'

ESAT News (August 10, 2013) After the arrest spree and crackdown on Ethiopian Muslims on Thursday, it was learnt that several number of Muslims have been rounded up from Addis Abeba and other regional citiesover night by Ethiopian security forces. Thousands are believed to have been detained since Thursday. Hundreds have also reportedly been released yesterday. According to the Dimtaschen Yisema Group, five people have been killed including a pregnant mother yesterday; ESAT hasnot confirmed the number of dead people from other sources. Many Ethiopian Muslims are expressing their frustration against the harassmentby the government.

Our efforts to speak to government officials on the matter have not been successful. Meanwhile, Unity of Democracy and Justice (UDJ) Party called the regime to stop the use of violence to resolve the conflict and that the perpetrators face justice. It also called for the release of those that have been detained "for requesting noninterference in their religious". The Partyhas recalled that since the past two years, it has been advising for the respect of the legitimate questions of Ethiopian Muslims, the interference in their religious affairs to stop and the problem be resolved in an absolutely peaceful manner. Similarly, the Ethiopian Community in South Africa has strongly condemned the violent actions of Ethiopian securities on Ethiopian Muslims.

The Eritrean people will do very well under the Ethiopian Constitution - A Marriage of Equals and the Role Eritreans Played. By Engineer Ghirma Aug11, 2013

Media source: Lt. General Aman Michael Andom

Ethiopian History depends on who wrote it; and when it was written. I amnot a Historian; however I have read enough of Ethiopian history, as theysay, to attempt some damage! I have read for starters, that Queen Saba gave birth to her son Menelik I, the son of the biblical King Solomon of Israel, in Asmara specifically on the banks of Mai Bela River. Without venturing into the slippery slopes of Ethiopian History again, I can point cautiously, to archeological findings within present day Eritrea which predate Axum; or at least match it. One theory which may support the flight of Ethiopian Monarchy from Medri Bahri (present day Eritrea) to Axum was the alleged constant threat of incursions into Ethiopia from across the Erythrean Sea /Bahre-Ertra/ Red Sea. The preferred Ethiopiansea port back then was Adulis/Zula.

If some Ferenj stranger half way around the world, asks you whether youare an Ethiopian, trust me, you are an Ethiopian; regardless of which partof Ethiopia (Eritrea included) you originate from! How many a time have we in the Diaspora, gazed at a stranger in a foreign land, and said amongourselves: "yegnan ager sew ymeslal or tmeslalech"? Often times the stranger(s) would acknowledge by smiling and nodding in the affirmative,as if we read each other's mind. What a feeling!

By far more battles in the defense of the Ethiopian Empire were launched from within Eritrea than any other region. Be it against Egypt at Gundet and Gurae or against Italia at Dogali, most of Ethiopia's enemies met theirfate inside Eritrea. Guess who fought in those battles in most predominantnumbers? Eritreans of course: By virtue of their proximity, the local people knew the terrain of the battleground better than any other group. Moreover, intelligence information about the invaders, made Eritrean contribution towards victorious outcomes inevitable. The dictator MengistuHaile Mariam had erected a landmark depicting Ras Alula's victory at Dogali; which was ironically, later demolished by Isaias Afwerki.

Marriage among the different Ethnic groups had various objectives. One such objective was for long distance traveling convenience. The idea was to provide accommodation for family members during extended trips awayfrom home; be it for business or for pleasure. Significant population movements from one region to another were common. It is recorded in Ethiopian History, for example, that the Gurage Nationality has its origins in Gurae, in Akeleguzay (Eritrea). The Bilien people in Keren originated from Gojam. The Adere Nationality in Harar originated from Seraye (Eritrea). The ancestors of the people living in many areas of Asmara are from Tigrai; who accompanied Ras Alula when he was Emperor Yohanes' representative in Eritrea. One such area in Asmara is a place called Tselot.The significance of Tselot is that it is common knowledge among Eritreans,for being the ancestral home of Isaias Afwerki. Yes, Isaias Afwerki is Tigrawai! Technically Isaias can be court-martialed for being a traitor (a joke)!

Last but not least, Somalis are said to have migrated from Hamasien. There is sufficient evidence of that, which is reflected in the names of cities like Kebri Dehar within Somali State.

It is only befitting for the "Eritrean Nation" to rejoin the rest of Ethiopia's"Nations and Nationalities". Eritrea gave us Zer'ay Deres; the man who went to battle on behalf of Ethiopia single handedly; with only a sword asa weapon against the Fascist army in Roma! Imagine that! Then there were Abraha Deboch and Moges Asgedom; young men who challenged Italia's Rodolfo Graziani and made a daring attempt to kill him in Addis Ababa in 1937. Their gallant attempt rekindled the support of the Leagueof Nations for Ethiopia, which eventually led to the defeat of Italia. I am happy to hear that plans are underway to build a monument in Addis Ababa in honor of the two Ethiopian super-heroes.

In the field of diplomacy, few can rival Dr. Lorenzo Taezaz. Simply stated he was a genius in all walks of life. He was Ethiopia's Permanent Representative to the League of Nations in Geneva during World War II. The following is a quote from Dr. Daniel Kindie's paper titled "Dr. Lorenzo Taezaz And The Italo-Ethiopian War (1935-1941)": Lorenzo, who lacked neither ideals nor insight, successfully played several roles as a pressman,diplomat, intelligence officer, agitator, and counselor, and discharged his responsibilities with great distinction. In the process, he displayed great fortitude and endurance. For no one can dispute the key role he played in Ethiopia's liberation. But more than most, Lorenzo's commitment to duty must have strengthened Haile Selassie's faith in education." To read the complete report please go to [http://www.zikkir.com/ethiopianreview/?p=138].

General Aman Michael Andom, the darling of the Ethiopian Army; also known as the Desert Lion, Eritrean by birth. A special mention is warranted for the great General Aman Michael Andom, the darling of the Ethiopian Army; also known as the Desert Lion. General Aman Andom led Ethiopian forces to the Korean war. He was the recipient of the highest honor, from the UN for his accomplishments; and thereby brought honor to Ethiopia in the process. General Aman is perhaps best remembered for his heroics in Ogadien in the early sixties; much like the gallant Dejazmach Afewerk Wolde Semayat who led the Ethiopian resistance army in the Ogadien during the Italian invasion in1935. General Aman was elected by the Derg regime as its Chairman in 1974, primarily because of his immense popularity within the then Third Army Division stationed in Harar. He was well known for his fair mindedness; which was why he was opposed to the proposed wholesale executions of the detainedex-Ministers and other dignitaries, belonging to Emperor Haile Selassie's regime; fifty-nine in all. The unwarranted executions took place immediately after General Aman was killed.

General Aman was also opposed to escalating the conflict against the guerilla forces in Eritrea; opting for a diplomatic solution to the problem. He was very popular among the Eritrean people to the extent that he was perceived as a threat to ELF and EPLF on a personal level. My Eritrean sources tell me that the people were beginning to turn against the ELF andEPLF after General Aman's elevation to Chaiman of the Derg. He was a uniting force among all Ethiopians including Eritreans. For the record, if the cowardly Mengistu Haile Mariam had not murdered General Aman Andom on November 23, 1974, after the latter's brave last stand against Mengistu’s tanks, Eritrea’s “war of liberation” would have been early on,nipped in the bud by Eritreans themselves!

In the context of Ethiopian Nations and Nationalities, Eritrean role has been significant since the beginning of time. One without the other is unrealistic. The nationalities on either side of the fictitious border must demand rectification of this egregious error in our history. The idea that aborder line drawn at Badme, Tserona, Zala’nbesa, Hamed Ela, Bure, alongIrob Land, or any other spot along the common border will separate Ethiopians on either side permanently is a farce! It will never work! The time is now, to resolve this nonsense, once and for all peacefully. The Eritrean people will do very well under the Ethiopian Constitution. (Text ends)

Children and grand children of the Korean war veterans Seek Asylum InRoK'

EM LONDON (August 11, 2013) - 40 young Ethiopian professionals some of whom are the children and grand children of the Ethiopian war veteranswho took part in the 1950-53 Korean war, have requested for a political asylum and their host country has handled their request without a hitch.

The Ethiopians of whom 10 are women wrapped up their eight-month-oldtraining season before they decided not to return to their country on grounds of "gross human rights violations." Speaking on the phone, SisayWoldegabriel, he himself the son of an Ethiopian soldier who took part in the Korean War, said his colleagues have committed themselves to struggle against the repressive regime. "It is suffice to mention how Ethiopian Moslems are being brutalized by police and government forces because they asked that their basic rights be respected," Sisay told Ethiomedia with a tone of resentment and anger.

He said political repression in Ethiopia has hit rock bottom that the only solution is for all Ethiopians to join hands in the fight against the brutal regime in power. "We have all decided to join pro-democracy Ethiopian groups around the world," Thomas said, speaking on behalf of his compatriots at the Henan Refugee Camp. Asked how life has been in the midst of the Korean people, both Ethiopians expressed enormous gratitude to the Korean people and government. It has to be recalled thatwhen South Korea came under communist invasion in 1950-3, Ethiopia was part of a UN multinational force that sided with South Korea and fought against the northern communist invaders. Almost 65 years later today, an affluent South Korea remembers the camaraderie, and pays tribute with a solemn gesture. Ethiopia sent one army infantry battalion tohelp South Korea repel invading communists from North Korea during the 1950-53 Korean War and 122 of them were killed in action, according to a2006 AP report.

ETHICS: A Crime Against Humanity’

A youth activist media group recorded on video a group of young Amhara women who became sterile after they were vaccinated against an undisclosed type of disease. The women, who were spotted near a remotechurch, were drinking holy waters with the hope of treating their illness.

All admitted they were sterile and sickly following the "vaccine.' Schools are empty because there were no children born in our village, many of thewomen said. Government critics have been accusing the TPLF/EPRDF regime of deliberately de-populating the Amharas, and the video delivers a powerful evidence of government crime against humanity in Ethiopia.

The Machakil vaccine and the accompanying cruelty - Zeleke WA'

Views: August 13, 2013: Recently, I read a paper written in Amharigna concerning an unethical and illegal sterilization practice performed in the name of infection prevention among the native people of Machakil in Gojjam, Ethiopia. This paper has been circulating to individuals in variouselectronic communication media. According to the writer of the paper, thesterilization procedure involved the administration some kind of unidentified tablets to men and the injection of tetanus vaccine to women aged 18 t0 49 years. Both "medicines" were described to be donated by an American NGO. The tablets were given to the men under the cover of preventing trachoma. Shortly after taking these tablets, the men were reported to suffer from severe fever, gastrointestinal disturbances, hemorrhoids, and impotency. Some men who could not stand these toxic effects were reported to die. None of the women was given any such medicine for the claimed trachoma prevention.

In the name of tetanus prevention, the women within the age group indicated were injected "tetanus vaccine" every month, whether they wereat a risk of contracting the infection or not. Most of these women were reported to experience sicknesses of various types, miscarriages, sterilization and even death. Neither males nor females outside the above age range were given any vaccine for tetanus prevention, although there was no scientific justification for not doing that if the program conducted was truthful as communicated to the local people involved. From the information provided in the paper, it is not possible to know the nature of the tablets given to the men unless one gets hold of them or makes analysis of specimen obtained from the men who have taken them.

However, since" tetanus vaccine" was mentioned to have been given tothe women, comments can be made on this aspect of the deceptive scheme carried out in Machakil.

Under normal circumstances, a tetanus toxoid vaccine is given to a personto prevent the effect of tetanus (bacteria) infection, which usually occurs through an open wound. The incidence of infection with tetanus is higher in areas with poor sanitary conditions, particularly in farming communities. Once antibody to the tetanus bacteria is formed in the bodyin response to the administered vaccine, it stays effective at least for ten years. During this time, a person can be protected from tetanus infection.However, since the times of vaccination, and hence the duration of antibody protection, are not usually recalled correctly by most people, thevaccine is given to suspected victims of infection more often than is needed in order to avoid the risk of infection consequences. To minimize inconsistence and possible risks of adverse consequences, there is a standard care practice in many places for giving tetanus toxoid vaccine.

Within a reasonable time limitation and dose, the administration of the right kind of vaccine does not cause any major harmful effects. As such, tetanus vaccines are recommended for infants, children, teens and adults of both sexes to prevent tetanus. Authorities also support that it is okay toreceive the tetanus vaccine during pregnancy when the need arises.

Normally, in all these situations the side effects produced by the vaccine are mild and quite tolerable by most people. From the above discussion, itseems that the tetanus vaccine given to the women in Machakil was different from the standard vaccine used for tetanus prevention: (1) it wassex and age selective and (2) it was administered far more frequently, with no regard to the duration of action of the antibody formed and to the possibility of over-dosage toxicity by the vaccine. In addition, the medical history of the female patients described clearly suggests that there is something more to it. Reviewing published materials on related topics reveals similar incidences in different parts of the world with the use of vaccine preparation given under the cover of preventing tetanus. These places included some regions of Mexico, China, Philippines, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Bangladesh, India, Thailand and Yemen. As with the observed toxic consequences, the vaccine preparations, the selections of persons for“vaccination” and the frequencies of injections were more or less similar inall these places and Machakil. Since the goal of this unusual vaccination was to induce sterilization in women (during their reproductive ages) in the other places identified, this should be the reason for its implementation in Machakil too. How does a vaccine supposed to work against tetanus infection ends up working as a tool to sterilize women?

Here is a possible explanation.

Under proper conditions, following sexual intercourse between a man and a woman, the egg of the woman gets fertilized and the processes of pregnancy kick off. Until the time of delivery, pregnancy is maintained by complex mechanisms, involving the actions of various types of endogenous chemicals known as hormones. One of the crucial hormones involved in maintenance of pregnancy is the human chorionic gonadotrophin (HCG). HCG works indirectly by stimulating the release of other hormones which can, more directly, enable the uterus to maintain pregnancy. If the formation/release or function of HCG is impaired for anyreason pregnancy cannot be maintained as it occurs naturally. Previous investigations have shown that the tetanus toxoid preparation that has been implicated in sterilization contains HCG conjugated to the toxoid molecule. After administration of this preparation, anti-HCG antibodies are produced in the body, which are capable of neutralizing the effect of the naturally occurring HCG. HCG then becomes ineffective to maintain pregnancy thus leading to miscarriage or sterility. Therefore, when a woman has sufficient anti-HCG antibodies in her system due to the administration of multiple doses of HCG-coupled tetanus toxoid, she is rendered incapable of maintaining a pregnancy. Along with this, the veryhigh doses of the counterfeited tetanus toxoid administered cause a number of other toxic effects, some of which are describe above as reported by the victims of the Machakil scheme.

To the knowledge of this writer, the Machakil sterilization scheme is the first of its kind in Ethiopia. As noted above, since similar experiences havebeen encountered by people in other countries, a lesson can be learnt from those experiences. Among the actions taken in favor of the victims ofsuch harmful vaccines were refusal to be injected with suspected preparations, filing of law suits against perpetrators of such crimes, and the provision of support from fellow countrymen, health professionals and human rights groups. Similar avenues should be explored to help the victims of Machakil and possibly those next in line. Although similar cases are known to have existed in other places, the Ethiopian situation appearsto be unique and more serious. A specific ethnic group identified as Amhara was targeted for vaccination and mass sterilization. In addition, unlike the situation in other places, it was not only women who were the targets of this grand conspiracy, but men were also made to be part of it, as stated in the paper referred to above. In this regard, it is highly important to follow the cases of the men and identify the toxic tablets given to them. This inhuman and cruel treatment of innocent fellow human beings of selected ethnicity is far beyond the violation of medical ethics, but it is a pure act of genocide. The matter should be dealt with accordingly and the perpetrators of the crime should be brought to justice.For the sake of humanity and for everybody’s interest, every effort should be made to assure this.

Mohammed Aman: A rare runner among the Ethiopian elite - IAAF'

MOSCOW – August 13, 2013: History, of sorts, was made when Mohammed Aman became the first Ethiopian to win a world outdoor 800mtitle as he kicked hard coming off the final bend to snatch the gold medal on Tuesday night (13). The spectacular victory in Moscow’s Luzhniki Stadium supersedes his 2012 World indoor 800m title and came against aterrific field. To make the result even sweeter his winning time of 1:43.31 is his fastest of the season. Until now his countrymen have dominated 5000m, 10,000m and Marathon podiums but Aman, a sprinter turned middle distance star, has ignited a new flame of belief amongst the youth of his country. Still, only 19 years of age and the youngest man to win a medal in his event, let alone a gold, Aman understands the significance ofhis accomplishment. “Ethiopians are known for marathons and for long distance and now middle distances so I am very happy,” said Aman, who learned English in high school and practices by watching movies andreading.

August 14, 2013: Ethiopia - Government's Acts of Genocide’Open letter to the US Secretary of State John F. Kerry

2201 C Street, NW, Washington DC, 20520

Sir, Ethiopia is a major US ally in the Horn of Africa, yet America does not seem to be concerned about the blatant violations of human rights, lawless governance and unmitigated corruption by the regime in Addis Ababa. I would like to present you my sincere compliments for the strong commitment you have made to solve the difficult problem of the Palestinian and Israel conflict, which may be key to the general instability that prevails now in the Middle East. I am writing this letter to bring to your attention the serious political and social crisis that is developing in Ethiopia and the area of the Horn of Africa.

Ethiopia with the second largest population in Sub-Saharan Africa has an important geo-political position that encompasses the Red Sea, the Arabian Peninsula, the Indian Ocean and in general Africa and the Middle East. It is also a repository of two major Religions, Christianity and Islam, whose adherents have cohabited the land for over 1300 years, and have shared common sacrifices and struggles to maintain the freedom and independence of their country Ethiopia. In the past two decades , for reasons deemed to beof US national interests, the ruling regime in Ethiopia has enjoyed the unbound political and economic support of the United States, in spite of itsblatant violations of human rights, lawless governance, unmitigated corruption and overall misdeeds with complete disregard to the very principles that the US advocates. The regime's flagrant interference both in Christian and Muslim religious affairs has created rifts and contentions amongst the religious communities. In the past the regime was boasting to have broken the back of the Orthodox Christianity with similar terrorization of innocent civilians; at this moment, in the guise of an unproven terrorist activity, it is conducting indiscriminately a most vile campaign of terror, mass arrests, killings and tortures against the Muslim Community in Ethiopia.

For the United States policy makers neither economic development nor any strategic interests can justify such unlawful and criminal behaviour, without incurring an expansion of such kind of crisis in other areas; nor should the US must be viewed as accomplice to this kind of foul play. In view of the important political and strategic importance the United States gives to Ethiopia and the area of the Horn, I would like to suggest that immediate measures be taken to alleviate the present dangerous situationand bring a legitimate democratic rule to the country. It is time for the United States to stand with the people instead of supporting armed criminal political regimes.

The ignored questions of Ethiopian Muslims and the anxiety of the rulingparty:

Religious Affairs: (August 13, 2013) - The top leadership brass of the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) has been in anxiety after most of its Muslim members expressed their anger on how the regime was violently attacking Ethiopian Muslims. The worries of the top leadership of the EPRDF increased when the members of the Front at all levels began to openly express their displeasure at the violent methods the regime has been trying to resolve the problem. Though, without any success in practical terms, the Front has been training its Muslim members to inculcate them about its ideology and get them to oppose the Muslim protesters. All the plans and decisions of the government have been leaking and reaching the Muslim and protesters, causing the top leadership of the regime to be alarmed. The regime has thus been worried about the internal grievances than the protests since recently, the sources said. To resolve this, it is planning to organize awareness trainings and workshops ahead of the Peace Conference set to be organized at the end of this month. Sources also said that if the grievances of Muslim members of the ruling party continue with such a scale and speed, the Front is likely to be divided. Meanwhile, Prime Minister Hailemariam Dessalgn warned that measures will be taken on those that have started the "Dimstachen Yisema" (Let our voices be heard) movement and on some opposition political parties. In an interviewwith the voice of the EPRDF, Walta Information Center, Hailemariam said the government will take measures on those that it labeled "radicals". He has warned some opposition political parties without being specific about the names. Five Ethiopian Muslims have been killed during the 1434th Eid al-Fitr celebration by government securities last week.

The consortium of Parties condemns govt's handling of Ethiopian Muslims'

News tips: August 15, 2013 - The consortium of the 33 opposition parties in Ethiopia has condemned the actions of the Ethiopian government on Muslim protesters. In their press release sent to ESAT, the parties have called Ethiopians to oppose the violent actions of the government they described as "an illegal and dictatorial act committed on citizens' constitutional, human and democratic rights". Local and international media, members of the free press and social media do have a professionaland national responsibility of saving people from the government's destructive propaganda that are disseminated to create distrust and division between Muslims and Christians, the parties stated. The parties called on the government to stop its dictatorial activities, cease using violence against peaceful Muslim protesters, to release members of the Muslim Arbitration Committee and other citizens that have been detained for asking religious freedom, and those responsible for the illegal activitiesto face justice. They have also called human rights organizations and the international community to condemn the illegal actions of the governmentand the baseless propaganda campaign which labels the peaceful struggleas “terrorism”.

The parties said the government’s attempt to resolve the conflict through “plot and violence” could lead the country into an unnecessary road. This can only be averted, they affirmed, when people, undivided by religion, come together and oppose the government’s violent acts. The parties’ statement came days after Prime Minister Hailemariam Dessalgn said the violent measures of the government against Muslim protesters were proper and would continue. Hailemariam had also warned that his government will take measures against “political parties that are linked with the Muslim protesters”. Similarly, the Unity for Democracy and Justice (UDJ) party’s newspaper, Finote Netsanet, said in a statement thatthe ruling EPRDF has began giving training to its senior members on “howto stop UDJ”. EPRDF has allocated huge sum of money for the training.

Finote Netsanet also said that the government has sent a directive to allstate media to start a propaganda campaign against UDJ accusing it of working with “terrorists that want to form a Sharia government in Ethiopia”. As part of this plan, training has started in Kutaber Woreda ofSouth Wello Zone for 200 members of the ruling party that drawn from each Kebele. The ruling Front has also started training its members in Gonder under the theme of “Health Army”. It has to be recalled that hadbeen reported last year that one of the questions of the trainees was the“jamming of foreign based media broadcasts”.

Speculation: S*ecurity agents killed former Minister* of Civil service'

Unconfirmed reports told that former Ethiopian politician, ex-governor of Oromia Regional State and former Minister of Civil Service Junedin Sado was killed by under cover agents in Robbii, Shewa part of Ethiopia when he secretly returned to the country from Kenya. He was thrown out of theEPRDF government due to his disagreement with certain policies that the ruling government imposed on the governing system and alleged accusation of involvement in his wife, Habiba Mohammad’s plot of terrorism in the country. Sources haven’t confirmed his death but eye witnesses are saying, he was killed in Robbii, Shewa when he secretly returned back to the country in July, 2013 after fleeing to Nairobi, Kenya with 8 other colleagues. Junadin Sdo awas president of the Oromia Regional State from 28 October 2001 until 6 October 2005 when he was replaced by Abadula Gemeda. During his government, he was a stake holder in killing, arresting, and torturing thousands of Oromo students in many parts of the region. The Oromo diaspora community had repeatedlywarned him to stop working with this government, but he refused and continued his atrocities against his own people, but at the end, he lost hislife at the very hands of the people, he served for so many years. Junedinsubsequently was appointed Minster of Transport and & Communication, which is the office he was holding when Prime Minister Meles Zenawi moved him to the Ministry of Science & Technology in October 2008.

Following the 2010 general election, Junedin Sado was again appointed Minister of Civil Service. The government sacked him from his position as a minister when he subsequently rose disagreement with the government.

Former First Lady lost EFFORT, the Cash Cow'

Analysis: By Abebe Gellaw - August 17, 2013: The Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) has quietly removed the late dictator's widow AzebMesfin from the helm of EFFORT as Chief Executive Officer a few months after her husband's demise, it emerged. Azeb, widely known as the 'Queen of Mega' and 'mother of corruption' among Ethiopians, had snatched the reins of power within the Endowment Fund for the Rehabilitation of Tigray (EFFORT) from her bitter rival Sibehat Nega and Abadi Zemo. She was once the de facto second in command in her husband's tyrannical regime. The new boss appointed to as the Chief Executive Office (CEO) of TPLF's multi-billion dollars business empire and corruption cash cow emerged to be Berhane Kidane Mariam Yihdego, a Central Committee member of the TPLF. According to informed sources,

Berhane is a close confidant and business partner of Sebhat Nega, a multi-millionaire in his own right like most members of the TPLF ruling class. Berhane, who enjoys multiple high profile positions as a privilegedTPLF loyalist, was the former General Manager of TPLF's propaganda mouthpiece Walta Information Center (WIC) from 2006 up to last year. Besides being the President of the nepotistic and corruption-plagued Ethiopian Olympics Committee (EOC), he sits on the boards of WegagenBank, which is also owned by the TPLF, and Mekele University. The new EFFORT chief also claims to be the founder and Deputy Board Chairman ofa private company called "Ethiopian Quality Award Organization," according to his CV obtained by Addis Voice.

TPLF's move to replace Azeb with the new loyalist was confirmed by Berhane himself who recently sent an updated CV and a profile to the Switzerland-based Association of National Olympic Committees (ANOC), where he represents Ethiopia as EOC president. In his profile posted on ANOC's website, he listed his current professional position as "Board of Director and Chief Executive Officer of EFFORT Investment Group" since 2012. In spite of the fact that the exact month of his appointment was not mentioned nor made official, the ANOC website indicates that Berhane's latest profile was updated on May 2, 2013. The French and Spanish versions of his profile web pages also carry exactly the same information. Walta reported recently that Berhane Kidanemariam, the new "Director of EFFORT and TPLF CC member conducted a successful meeting with the Diaspora in Seattle." The meeting, hosted by the Union of Tigrians in North America (UTNA), focused on how EFFORT is implementing its objective of developing Tigray and making it self-reliant, it stated.

Heaping praise on its former boss, Walta promoted the corrupt conglomerate's new chief as eloquent, persuasive and visionary. "BerhaneKidane Mariam, with his eloquent and persuasive ability, spelled out the objective of his presence in Seattle and explained the development in Tigrai and the role of EFFORT to uplift the hope and aspiration of many Tigrians from poverty to self-reliance," Walta declared.

According to an insider, who confirmed the reshuffle, Azeb is deeply resented and despised among high-ranking TPLF leaders and her fall from grace and power has been quick and spectacular. The only playing card at her disposal is her husband's foundation, which is not even given attention bythe TPLF bigwigs. "Without her husband, she is like a fish out of water.

Her survival among her rivals like the wicked Sibehat Nega will be short-lived. Losing TPLF's blood-sucking machine is a big blow against Azeb," the insider said.

Sibhat Nega has recently been quoted as saying that Meles is being used as a cover and a bargaining chip by some who are exaggerating his success as a ruler. The veteran TPLF strongman has been critical of those who tend to heap praise on Meles Zenawi, whom he slashed to have betrayed the TPLF and endangered its unity by enforcing his will through his secretive inner circle. Meanwhile, Azeb is demanding huge plots of landaround the metropolis in the name of the Meles Zenawi foundation. "All the best land goes to the TPLF as usual. It seems the TPLF has subverted the revolutionary slogan "land to the tillers" with "land to the killers." All the corrupt TPLF generals and officials have scrambled for the best land allover the country," Yalem Zew, a political commentator said. The late dictator appointed his wife to control the immense wealth of EFFORT in early 2009. EFFORT, the biggest business monopoly in Ethiopia, controls vast resources and over 60 companies in Ethiopia but TPLF claims that it is the an endowment, and exclusive asset of Tigrians by virtue of their ethnicity. The corrupt conglomerate has been widely criticized to have multi-billion birr loans from state owned banks written off and for engaging in blatant tax evasion enjoying a "non-profit" status as an endowment. Ethiopian activists often mention the parasitic EFFORT as anexample of TPLF's apartheid policies that have deliberately created huge economic and political disparities between the Tigrian ruling class and theoppressed people of Ethiopia.

Pro-EPRDF supporters collect petitions to interrupt Congressman Smith'sreintroduced HR Bill'

News tips: (August 17, 2013) - Members and supporters of the ruling- Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) have started collecting signatures to oppose the decision of U.S. Congressman Chris Smith to introduce a new Human Rights Bill on Ethiopia. Congressman Chris Smith of the Republican Party announced that the 'Ethiopian HumanRights Act' would be re-introduced with very serious benchmarks during the "Ethiopia After Meles: The Future of Democracy and Human Rights," hearing held on June 20, 2013 at the Sub-committee on Africa, Global Health, Global Human Rights, and Int'l Orgs when Dr. Berhanu Nega, Obang Metho, and ex-Amb. Donald Yamamoto were among those that witnessed. The members and supporters of the ruling Front have are nowsending letters to the Congressman opposing that he invited people that the Ethiopian government labeled them "terrorists". Even before the bill is complete, the regime agents in the Diaspora are working day and night to stop the bill that is being written by Congressman Chris Smith. Such bill designed to put pressure on EPRDF to stop humanrights abuse in Ethiopia. This bill will put a precondition on theruling party if it wantd to get US aid in the future. The ruling party supporters sponsored petition letter indicates that the new Bill could affectthe relationship of the two countries, Ethiopia would not change its stand and positions due external pressures and also that he should rather introduce a new Bill which would help the country. In this "urgent" email message sent to members of the ruling party, it was stressed that if the Bill was passed, it could have grave impact on Ethiopia. Hidasse, the group of EPRDF members and supporters executing this scheme, expects to collect around 10,000 signatures and send them to the Congressman.

It is to be recalled that a similar Bill introduced after the 2005 Ethiopiangeneral election had been terminated due to lobbies made by the globallaw firm DLA Piper.

While the neighbouring strong team of Kenya finished fourth in the medals table after the Russian Federation, the United States and Jamaica with 5 Gold, 4Silver and 3 Bronze. On Friday (August 16), Mohammed Farah, Britain's Somaliland-born runner, took the gold medal in the men's 5,000m. Hagos Gebrehiwot (Ethiopia) won the silver medal, literally an inch or two aheadof Kenya's Issaiah Kiplangat Koech who took the bronze medal. This victory by Mohammed Farah means he has accomplished the extraordinary achievement of taking the two gold medals at 5,000m and 10,000m in both the World Championships and the Olympics. The only other person to have achieved this feat at these distances in both the World Championships and the Olympics is Ethiopia's Kenenisa Bekele.

Kenenisa holds the world records at both distances. Ethiopia's Meseret Defar, twice Olympic champion at the women's 5,000m, regained the World Championship gold medal she last won in 2007. Mercy Cherono of Kenya took the silver medal and Almaz Ayana of Ethiopia won the bronze medal. The marathon was won by Stephen Kiprotich of Uganda, who is also the current Olympic champion. Lelisa Desisa and Tadese Tola, both ofEthiopia, took the silver and bronze medals respectively. Rhythm divine: The Ethiopian nun whose music enraptured the Holy Land'

The Guardian: (August 19, 2013) Jersusalem's classical music lovers honour Emahoy Tsegué-Mariam Guebrù, 90, after a life devoted to God and the piano. From a small, spartan room in the courtyard of the Ethiopian church off a narrow street in Jerusalem, a 90-year-old musical genius is emerging into the spotlight. For almost three decades, Emahoy Tsegué-Mariam Guebrù has been closeted at the church, devoting herself to her life's twin themes – faith and music. The Ethiopian nun, whose piano compositions have enthralled those who have stumbled across a handful of recordings in existence, has lived a simple life, rarely venturingbeyond the monastery's gates. But this month the nonagenarian's scribbled musical scores have been published as a book, ensuring the long-term survival of her music. And on Tuesday, the composer will hear her work played in concert for the first time, at three performances in Jerusalem. Guebrù may even play a little. Her music has been acclaimed by critics and devotees. Maya Dunietz, a young Israeli musician who worked with Guebrù on the publication of her scores, says in her introduction to the book that the composer has "developed her own musical language". "It is classical music, with a very special sense of time,space, scenery," Dunietz told the Guardian. "It's not grand; it's intimate, natural, honest and very feminine. She has a magical touch on the piano. It's delicate but deep. And all her compositions tell stories of time and place." Guebrù's inspiration comes not only from her faith, but from her life: an extraordinary journey from an aristocratic family in Addis Ababa, with strong links to Emperor Haile Selassie, to a monastery in the historic centre of Jerusalem . She was born Yewubdar Guebrù on December 12 1923 and lived in the Ethiopian capital until, aged six, she and her sister were sent to boarding school in Switzerland. In one of two seminal moments of her life, there she heard her first piano concert, and began toplay and study music. After her return to Addis Ababa, and a period of exile for her family followed by yet another return, Guebrù was awarded ascholarship to study music in London. But she was unexpectedly denied permission to leave by the Ethiopian authorities. In the bleak days following this calamity, Guebrù refused food until, close to death, she requested holy communion. Embracing God was the second seminal moment of her life. She abandoned music to devote herself to prayer, andafter several years joined a monastery in northern Ethiopia. She spent 10years there, barefoot and living in a mud and stone hut.

Ethiopia signs mobile expansion deal with China's ZTE’

ADDIS ABABA, Reuters (August 19, 2013) By Aaron Maasho - Ethiopia signed an $800 million deal with China's ZTE to expand mobile phone infrastructure and introduce a high-speed 4G broadband network in the capital Addis Ababa and a 3G service throughout the rest of the country. The agreement with ZTE, China's second-largest telecoms equipment maker, is half of a $1.6 billion project split with Huawei Technologies Co Ltd , the world's second largest telecom equipment maker. Huawei signedthe agreement last month. Both firms will provide low interest loans to Ethiopia through an arrangement known as vendor financing, Ethiopian officials and both firms said. Africa's rapidly expanding telecoms industry has come to symbolise its economic growth, with subscribers across the continent totalling almost 650 million last year, up from just 25 million in 2001, according to the World Bank. China has recently extended its economic influence on the continent in recent years, winning road construction tenders in Kenya, signing deals for construction of energy projects in Uganda as well as running mining projects in various countries.Andualem Admassie, acting chief executive officer of state-run Ethio Telecom, said the agreement would enable the Horn of Africa country to double subscribers to more than 50 million.

"The expansion is vital to attain Ethio Telecom's objective of increasing telecom service access and coverage across the nation, as well as to upgrade existing network to new technology," he said in a speech. Ethio- Telecom is the only mobile operator in the country of more than 80 millionpeople, one of the last remaining countries on the continent to maintain a state monopoly in telecoms. Although lacking much of a telecoms industry, the government last year gave approval for private companies toprovide value-added services - all services other than standard voice calls.The Ministry of Communications and Information Technology says it has received applications from more than 200 firms to provide such services.

South Africa's MTN Group, Africa's largest mobile phone company, has already been granted a licence. The government has ruled out liberalising its telecoms sector saying the 6 billion birr it generates each year is being spent on railway projects. Ethiopia plans to build 5,000 km of railway linesby 2020.

Some marched for Freedom while others bothered for Condominium’

Views: By Sadik Ahmed August 21, 2013 - "The Ethiopian regime has lost everything; all attempts to divide the nation have failed miserably; the regime has one remaining item, and that is ETV. They want to dispatch the same ETV propaganda through their puppets in DC airwaves by wasting tax payers money. The dollar is good for those who work on it, but dollar is very bad for those who happen to be enslaved by it. Some of the DC radios possibly sold their integrity for fear mongering but the wisdom of Ethiopians will render useless their evil plot through love and unity," said Yohannes Takele, a distinguished activist in Washington DC metropolitan area. Officials and state department representatives from African desk have received a letter from the demonstrators. The enthusiastic slogans in English and Amharic were unwavering. Poems wereread out and vows of commitment and unity declared till noon. “All prisoners of conscience in Ethiopia could have different cases but theyhave one destiny; surely their destiny is ours; their pain inside notorious Ethiopian prisons is ours; we don’t have boundary due to our religion or ethnic background; we will struggle for freedom and justice for our beloved motherland until the malicious minority authoritarian regime surrenders power to the people or is deposed,” the demonstrators declared in unified consensus at the end of the rally. Amid this demonstration in front of the State Department, some people gathered inside Ethiopian embassy, not to demonstrate but to register their names for condominiums in Ethiopia, our sources have confirmed. Sources also complained that the Ethiopian government is using condominiums as a weapon to silence diaspora. It is an exercise in futility as people of conscience definitely prefer freedom to life of servitude.

Ethiopia: African Media Leaders Must Boycott Ethiopia’

Guest column: August 21, 2013: Ethiopian journalists have come to expect the worst from our government. One of the world's most hostile governments to an independent press, it has jailed friends and colleagues,forced them to leave the country and unjustly branded them as terrorists or enemies of the state for doing their jobs. But until now we have at leastbeen able to count on the moral support of fellow journalists, media organizations and others opposed to injustice. That has been changed by the deeply disappointing decision of the African Media Initiative (AMI) to hold its annual convention, the African Media Leaders' Forum, in Addis Ababa this year. Far from helping to improve Ethiopia's media environment, as suggested by the AMI's chief executive, Amadou Mahtar Ba, this move will instead embolden the government in its ongoing war against the press. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists, at least 49 Ethiopian journalists have been forced into exile since 2007. Nine of our colleagues languish in prison, making the country the second worst jailer of journalists in Africa after Eritrea. Just last year, the government forced the closure of Feteh ("Justice"), the prominent independent newspaper in Addis Ababa, because of its critical editorial line. Its publisher, Mastewal Berhanu, who was forced to leave the country after receiving threats from security agents, is one of those who have said that the AMI's decision is a blow to jailed and exiled Ethiopian journalists. We have held the AMI in high esteem because of its stated commitment to"promote the development of pluralistic media". But we believe its justification for holding the forum in Ethiopia is self-serving and insensitiveto Ethiopia's independent media community, and we cannot understand why Mr. Ba calls the decision "courageous".

The AMI's suggestion that holding the forum in Addis Ababa will further a process of "constructive engagement" with media stakeholders, including the government, is either naïve or aimed at benefitting narrow interests that do not really serve the Ethiopian media community at large. Neither the publishers' association nor the media council with which the AMI has interacted represent independent journalists, nor do they defend their rights. Despite all the Ethiopian government's actions to stifle press freedom, I used to believe that if the press could organize itself it could gain enough strength to overcome its multi-faceted challenges. To test my belief in practice, I tried in 2011 to organize a monthly informal journalists' roundtable, bringing the highly-polarized media together to discuss investigative journalism, particularly on corruption issues. This platform sought to help the media play its watchdog role and I hoped it would grow into an investigative or anti-corruption journalists' association.But over ten months of meetings, the arrest and intimidation of journalists, along with the closures of local rights groups, rendered members frustrated and hesitant about forming an independent association. Even the monthly roundtable meeting could not be sustained as participants gradually dropped out. Stringent laws, arrogant bureaucracy, threats and other challenges sapped the media of its energy,leaving it too weak to build one strong local media association which could help protect itself.

Today, professional media associations are either under the concealed patronage of the government or too scared to speak out for unlawfully imprisoned journalists such as Eskinder Nega, Reeyot Alemu, Woubshet Taye and many others. The Ethiopian government has ensured that thereis no strong and vibrant media association that can stand for freedom of speech and press freedom. Mr. Ba's suggestion that the government- sponsored media council "is known for its independence and commitmentto building free and balanced media" confirms our fears that the AMI, its handful of local partners and the Ethiopian government are speaking withone and the same voice. I appreciate the Pan-African approach of Mr. Ba. But Pan-Africanism begins with African solidarity, based on the understanding that injustice against one African is an injustice against allAfricans. The Ethiopian government is willing to have the AMLF meet in Addis Ababa because it can use the event as a counter to international pressure for freedom of speech and press freedom. In our struggle to realize the freedoms promised in our constitution, Ethiopian journalists have seldom heard African intellectuals, media leaders or the African Union call out our government on its grave abuses and support those struggling to be free. Apartheid and colonialism were not defeated with "constructive engagement" or apathy and silence. Business interests thatworked with the apartheid regime are marked with shame forever. The AMI should reconsider its plan to hold the meeting in Addis Ababa.

The State of South Sudan calls on Ethiopia, Eritrea to resolve disputes’

(ADDIS ABABA) August 21, 2013: South Sudan’s Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation Minister, Barnaba Marial has called on Ethiopia and Eritrea to return to the negotiating table to resolve their long-standingborder dispute through peaceful means. Although relative peace and stability has returned in the volatile east African region, Marial said the stalemate on the frontier between Ethiopia and Eritrea remains a major concern for regional peace. The South Sudanese foreign Minister made the remarks while addressing the congregation at memorial service held on Tuesday in Addis Ababa to commemorate one year since the death of former Ethiopian Prime minister, Meles Zenawi. Marial cited the peace achieved in Sudan and South Sudan as well as the relative stability gainedSomalia as cases in point to show that the region was getting more stableand peaceful. However the South Sudan Foreign Affairs minister said the standoff between Ethiopian and Eritrea is one challenge that needs to be addressed. “We would love to see Ethiopia and Eritrea shoulder to shoulder and smiling together once again”, he said.

In 1998 Eritrea and Ethiopia fought a two year bloody border war that killed over 70,000 people. The two countries ended fighting in 2000 undera cease-fire agreement signed in Algeria allowing an international boundary commission to rule on the disputed border. In an April 2002 ruling, the commission awarded the disputed town of Badme to Eritrea however Addis Ababa refused to accept the ruling and kept its troops in the town insisting on further talks to resolve the dispute. Eritrea refused to engage in further talks with Ethiopia and relations between the two neighbours has since remained strained. Ethiopia’s current Prime Minister,Hailemariam Desalegn, who assumed power after his predecessor Meles Zenawi died in August last year said he is willing to travel to Asmara for peace talks with his Eritrean counterpart. Some African countries includingAfrica’s newest state, South Sudan, have proposed to broker peace talks between the two countries. However no peace talks is yet to take place.

But South Sudan’s Barnaba Marial said he is optimistic that Ethiopia and Eritrea will peacefully resolve their conflicts. “We are hopeful for the bestoutcome and for the sake of peace in our region”, Marial said. (ST)

ETHIOPIA - Foreign Policy One Year After Meles Zenawi - an Opportunityfor Transformation’

By Alfredo Tjiurimo Hengari: analysis: Today, on 21 August 2013, a year has passed since the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, the man considered to be the leading architect of post-Derg Ethiopia. Following hisdeath, the future of a resurgent Ethiopia hung by a thread. Uncertainty mounted in the vast country of over 80 million inhabitants, with over 60 diverse ethnicities and two major religions that have cohabitated uncomfortably for decades. The death of Meles did not result in friction ormajor collapse, nor did it lead to impermeable divisions within the ruling party, the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF).

The EPRDF leadership handled the succession process deftly and out of public sight, mainly in line with its five-year succession plan of 2011, allowing the late Zenawi's deputy prime minster, Hailemariam Desalegn, to step into the position of Prime Minister until the general elections in 2015. The legitimisation of, and overwhelming vote of confidence in Desalegn (representing a minority from the South) as leader of the EPRDFby the 180-member party council in September last year signalled the gripof the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) within the ruling party.

Moreover, it illustrated a concern with the fragile ethno-religious equilibrium and porous political alliances that have been at the centre of Ethiopian politics since the founding of the EPRDF in 1989. Irrespective of the tense political situation and delicate transition of 2012, according to the World Bank's June 2013 Ethiopia Economic Update, economic growth over the past decade has averaged 10.7%, making it one of the 10 fastestgrowing economies in the world. However, Ethiopia's relative stability and remarkable economic growth rates do not mask the domestic fault-lines - religious and ethnic - that have a profound impact on the country's foreignpolicy, and particularly the country's role in the Horn of Africa. The degreeto which Ethiopia under Hailemariam Desalegn can re-engineer the domestic order to reflect democracy as one of the country's foreign policy stated doctrines remains an obstacle to a bolder Ethiopian diplomatic and economic role within and beyond the Horn of Africa.

REGIONAL SECURITY AS DOMESTIC STABILITY: With the exception of Kenya, with which Ethiopia has a stable border and cordial relations and free movement of people, including Kenya's constructive role in the Ogaden conflict, the country's regional policy is navigating a myriad of security challenges that interact dangerously with its domestic stability. The country's unstable borders include an defensive Eritrea to the North, afragile Somalia to the south, and South-Sudan and Sudan uneasy co-existence around its western borders. This explains why Meles' Ethiopia pursued an ambitious regional security policy, largely concerned with the structural requirements for state survival. Thus, the country's diplomacy has been pragmatically focussed on domestic stability, food security and climate change, including harnessing aid and investment in order to deal with pressing domestic developmental challenges. These priorities in the country's foreign policy have been articulated in several ways. 1st , under Meles, Ethiopia became a staunch ally of the United States (US), by far (alongside the United Kingdom) the country's largest bilateral donor. 2nd ,the country hosted US bases with their complement of drones for patrolling Somalia and to combat terrorist organisations.

Finding common cause with an America fighting al Qaeda emerges from the serious threat of sectarian violence in Ethiopia that the EPRDF leadership is all too aware of. In this vein, the country twice sent troops into Somalia, first in 1996 and again in 2006 to fight Islamist militants linked to Al-Qaeda, including Al-Shabaab. 3rd , in order to secure peace on its northern border, Ethiopia under Meles allowed Eritrea to secede in 1993, then fought - allegedly against Zenawi's own advice - a bloody war with the new country from 1998-2000. Fourth, Ethiopia is the sole troop- contributor (4,200 increasing to over 5,000 in the short-term) to the UN Interim Stabilization Force in Abyei (UNISFA) on the border between South Sudan and Sudan. Ethiopia plays an important role in advancing regional integration and mitigating regional conflict in Somalia and the twoSudans. Playing such a role, including through military force, is consideredto be in Ethiopia's interest because the country continues to host a stream of refugees from Eritrea, Sudan, South Sudan and Somalia. Moreover, since taking office Prime Minister Hailemariam has organised two summitsof the leaders of the Sudan and South Sudan to facilitate negotiations. He pressed Sudan to negotiate with rebels from the Sudan People's LiberationMovement; and urged Sudan to allow humanitarian aid into Blue Nile and South Kordofan provinces. The Government of Ethiopia has also contributed more than 2,000 personnel to the United Nations-African Union Mission in Darfur (UNAMID). In light of these initiatives, there is greater appreciation in Ethiopian foreign policy that the country should continue playing a crucial role in fostering peace and stability across the volatile Horn of Africa, particularly in weakening al-Shabaab. But what tools should be available in the Ethiopia's foreign policy for it to play a more strategic, transformational and developmental role in the region andbeyond?

Ethiopians and Ethio-Americans held a joint rally in front of the US StateDepartment’

Washington DC: August 22, 2013 - Amid the government’s massive propaganda to divide the nation, the participants were adamant to upholdtheir mutual values not as people who share a land but as a people who have shared blood. The demonstrators have uncovered what they call a plot to occupy the diaspora airwaves through corruption and cadres.

However, they have stated clearly: those who collaborate with this dictatorial regime will be isolated and held accountable before each andevery community. Sheik Khalid Omer is an Imam for an Ethiopian Muslims' prominent organization called First Hijrah. On his motivationalspeech during the demonstration, he said: "We chose peaceful strugglenot because of our fear for the Ethiopian government but due to its effectiveness on this generation. We will protest peacefully till the dictatorial regime responds to our demands."

Ethiopia: When a Traditional Past Collides with an Irrigated Future’

Analysis By William Davison, Bloomberg : August 22, 2013: KANGATON, Southern Ethiopia - Are the government's large-scale developments in southern Ethiopia forcing local populations to move with the times or just move out the way? A short stroll away from the bloated Omo River in Ethiopia's far south, a new type of settlement is forming on the outskirts of Kangaton, a frontier town occupied by Nyangatom people and highland migrants. The empty domes are traditionally built: bent sticks lashed together with strips of bark and insulated with straw. But instead of the typical handful of huts ringed by protective thorn bushes, hundreds of newhomes are clustered on the desolate plain. This is a site in the Ethiopian government's villagisation programme, part of an attempt to effect radicaleconomic and social change in the Lower Omo Valley, an isolated swathe of spectacular ethnic diversity. Agro-pastoralists such as the Nyangatom, Mursi and Hamer are being encouraged to abandon their wandering, keep smaller and more productive herds of animals, and grow sorghum and maize on irrigated plots with which officials promise to provide them onthe banks of the Omo.

The foreign ministry stated in July that Egypt is deeply worried about Ethiopia's unresponsiveness to an invitation extended by Egypt's minister of water resources and irrigation. The minister of water resources called for holding a meeting in Cairo in order to discuss the implementation of an international experts committee's recommendationsfor the dam. Source: Aswat Masriya

Device found at Bole airport was not an explosive – Gov't spokesperson

ADDIS ABABA: August 23, 2013 - A senior government official said that adevice found at Addis Ababa's international airport was not an explosive, as was recently was reported by Sudan Tribune and other media outlets. "The device was not an explosive or type of bomb but just a flammable cylinder gas", communication minister Shimels Kemal told Sudan Tribune, adding that a counter-terrorism team had been established to deal with the incident. Kemal said the situation is under investigation and no suspect has yet been arrested. Airport authorities today similarly confirmed that the devices found were gas cylinders. The two gas cylinders, which could potentially explode if they caught on fire, were firstfound by airport janitors.

The two devices were found around the departure terminal of the country's largest airport. Airport officials said details of the incident will beannounced once the investigation is complete, declining to provide furthercomment on the matter. The investigation team is yet to determine if the devices were deliberately deposited at the airport in order to commit a terrorist attack. Addis Ababa Bole International Airport is one of the continent's busiest airports, with a current traffic movement of nearly 2 million passengers per year, according to Ethiopian Airports Enterprise (EAE). EAE has finalized an expansion and upgrade project at the airport which would enable it to park more passenger jets at a time. The airport has been serving to the East African nation as an international gate way for over 40 years. (ST)

National Diet: Recipe for Ethiopian flat bread 'Injera' remains a treasuredsecret'

By Sarah Stuteville: Special to The Seattle Times: August 23, 2013

The bakers of some of Seattle's best injera keep the secrets to making thefamed Ethiopian flatbread close to the vest. Bakers are good at keeping secrets. And Yodit Seyoum is no exception. "Only me and my husband make the dough," she told me over the phone when I asked her if I could tag along on a batch of what some call the best injera in Seattle. Injera is a soft, sour flatbread made with an Ethiopian grain called teff and is eatenthroughout East Africa as well as in Ethiopian, Eritrean and Somali restaurants and homes in the Pacific Northwest. I first encountered injera as a teenager when I hung out with my Garfield High School buds at the cluster of Ethiopian restaurants on Cherry Street. These restaurants offered inexpensive platters of spicy stews piled on huge disks of bread —which served as both a platter and a utensil. But I didn't really get to know injera until I was on reporting trip to Ethiopia a few years back. There it was served as a staple at every meal and inspired a deep pride inthe Ethiopians I met, many who peppered me with facts about its origins and nutritional merits. Recent out-of-town guests, excited to sample whatthey described as "Seattle's famous Ethiopian food," got me wondering where the very best local injera might be found. And that's how I ended up in the back of Amy's Merkato (a name inherited when Seyoum and herhusband bought the Central District restaurant 13 years ago) staring into a 32-gallon vat of light-brown batter as the thick steam from hundreds ofinjeras rose around me. "You never know how it's going to turn out until you start baking it," Seyoum says while packing the day's orders into plastic bags stamped with a gold oval seal. “It depends sometimes on theweather ... or when we make the dough.” Teff is crucial to the taste of injera. A small, ancient grain native to the highlands of Ethiopia, it is highin iron, naturally gluten-free and very, very sour.

Traditional injera is made exclusively with teff. But Seyoum, who is originally from Ethiopia, says that American injera commonly contains additional flours such as wheat, corn or barley. Like most breads, the trickisn’t in a complex list of ingredients, but in the subtle chemistry of ratios, timing and temperature. The fermentation process of injera in those big vats is particularly important. It helps mellow the natural sourness of teff as well as create the signature, uniform holes that dot the bread. In fact, it’s so important to the process that Seyoum is particularly cagey about sharing those details of her recipe. “I’d rather not talk about that,” she says with a sly smile when I ask, though she’ll admit that the dough ferments for two to three days on average. Like any serious baker, Seyoum and her husband, Filli Abdulkadir, go to great lengths to protect the secrets of their trade. She says they haven’t taken a vacation togetherin years — in part because they wouldn’t trust their recipe with anyone else. Whatever they’re doing, they’re doing it right. As cupfuls of the batter hit sizzling rows of electric griddles (overseen by relatives of Seyoum and Abdul kadir), Seyoum explains that the 5,000 injeras they produce per day are shipped around the Pacific Northwest and as far as Alaska and Colorado. The rise in popularity of gluten-free diets has also raised injera’s profile. (Seyoum and Abdulkadir produce 100 percent teff injera for special orders). Seyoum says she supplies a local caterer that makes spinach wraps out of injera. She’s also heard of injera being used to make Ethiopian “burritos” sold to young professionals in San Francisco, and that she’s even thinking of packaging individual injeras for sale in stores around Seattle. But when she serves me, she says I should try it “the traditional way.” As I tear off a piece of fresh injera — a little crispy on the thin edge, the spongy middle soaked with flavor from a scoop of yellow lentils — I realize Seyoum has kept her secrets so close that I haven’t actually learned much about how this bread is made. But by the time it’s in my mouth, I’m not sure I mind.

Ethiopia – Telecoms Out of Reach - Government expands mobile-phonenetwork but tightens its grip’

The Economist LONDON August 23, 2013: - Ethiopia has Africa’s last big telecoms monopoly. The absence of competition has seen a country of more than 80m lag badly behind the rest of the continent in an industry that has generally burgeoned alongside economic growth. Mobile-phone penetration, which averages 70% of the population elsewhere in Africa, iscloser to 25% in Ethiopia. A paltry 2.5% of Ethiopians have access to theinternet, compared with 40% in neighbouring Kenya. Ethiopia’s authoritarian leaders are as keen as any on the economic benefits of modern telecoms but fear the political ramifications; pesky dissidents become even more irritating when wired. That explains a $1.6 billion agreement with China's two leading telecoms-equipment companies to upgrade its network. The deal with Huawei and ZTE will preserve Ethiopia's state dominance and further put off the opening up of one of Africa's largest economies. A deal in 2010 between France Telecom and Ethio Telecom was seen in some quarters as a step towards privatisationand competition. It drove down calling costs but appears to have falteredwith the recent departure of Bruno Duthoit, the French chief executive.

Little further improvement is likely now, says Markos Lemma, a local entrepreneur. What the government wants from China are cheap loansand more control over its citizens.

The new deal will provide soft loans to buy a Chinese-built 4G broadband network for the capital, Addis Ababa, and an expanded 3G network for therest of the country. A similar deal with the same companies in 2007 expanded Ethiopia's mobile-phone subscriber base but did little to shortenits digital lag. Hopes that other companies might get a look in were alwaysoptimistic. The prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, has dubbed the telecoms industry a "cash cow" needed to pay for a rail link to neighbouring Djibouti. Ethio Telecom delivers more than $300m a year to the state coffers. Customers grumble that its slogan should be "Disconnecting Ethiopia from the future". The country is one of the world'slast big untouched telecoms markets. The government could earn as muchas $3 billion from auctioning licences. But the powerful security services have routinely objected. The Committee to Protect Journalists, a New York-based free-speech lobby, accuses the government of conducting a "systematic effort to control all forms of communications" after it passedlaws imposing prison sentences of up to 15 years on anyone caught bypassing online censors. Yidnek Haile, a student in Addis Ababa, was arrested two years ago for showing customers at an internet café how tomake online calls.

August 23, 2013: Document reveals that it would take 20 years for Condominiums to be obtained' Administration of the Addis Abeba City in its recent Five Year Strategic Document revealed that it could take 20 years for Condominium registrants to get their places. The Administrationregistered over 800 thousand people for the Condominium houses but planned to only build 178 houses. This means that it would take 20 years to build up the condominiums for the 800 thousand registrants. The previous Administration of Kuma Demeksa built 175,246 houses in five years in addition to the 36,700 houses that have been built by the Care Taker Administration. Since the program started eight years ago, 100,559 houses have been transferred to registrants. During the discussion on theStrategic Plan, many officials of the City Administration opposed the plan stating that the public would not accept the ambitious plan and sought that it be revised. The plan of changing more than half of these land possessions into Lease has also been opposed.

Dr. Martin Luther King and his brilliant leadership in the Civil RightsMovement’

We-Mezekir: Augut 28, 2013: Just this day back in 1963, Dr. Martin Luther King was delivered a historic speech that transformed the Americansociety at the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D.C., still remains favorite:“I Have a Dream.” It is simply one of the most important, thoughtful and emotionally stirring speeches of modern times. Just like his Birmingham letter, “I Have a Dream” also has a universal appeal that speaks truth to people of every nationality. It was an eye-opening document that illustrated the suffering, humiliation and struggle that African Americans had to endure in order to attain justice, equality and civil rights. Every time the speech or read its text, reminded of the necessity to speak against injustices around the world. It is a highly inspiring speech that gives tremendous hope to all people who are languishing under wicked oppressors and ruthless dictators.

Government of Norway Partners With World Bank to Support Ethiopia’

Environment: August 30, 2013: Government of Norway and it’s partnerswith World Bank to support Ethiopia in scaling up climate-smart land management system. Ethiopia, a country highly vulnerable to extreme weather events, land degradation, deforestation and food insecurity, is stepping up its efforts to fight climate change, promote sustainable ruraldevelopment and build resilience. Today, two agreements were signed between the Government of Norway and the World Bank to provide significant financing for sustainable land management, climate-smart agriculture and forest protection in the country. The first agreement injects an additional US$50 million grant funds from the Government of Norway through a trust fund to co-finance the Sustainable Land Management Program (SLMP II) aimed at reducing land degradation andincreasing land productivity of smallholder farmers.

In the second agreement, Norway provides US$13 million through the World Bank's BioCarbon Fund (BioCF) to support Ethiopia's Climate Resilient Green Economy (CRGE) Facility and to promote climate-smart agriculture, forest protection and land rehabilitation at the landscape level.Norway's contribution complements initial funding of US$5 million from the United Kingdom's Department for International Development (DFID), and ongoing financing from the Forest Carbon Partnership Facility (FCPF).

"Norway is pleased to collaborate with the World Bank in supporting Ethiopia's ambitious efforts to fight land degradation, deforestation and climate change while promoting sustainable development in the land use sector. The two complementary programs have the potential to protect the natural resource endowment and to promote climate-smart land use inorder to adapt and mitigate climate change and increase food security andresilience in a vast area of the country," said Tove Stub, Charge d'affaires a.i., Royal Norwegian Embassy in Addis Ababa.

WB Report: ‘Diagnosing Corruption in Ethiopia’

News & Opinion: August 31, 2013 - On the findings of the World Bank’s “Diagnosing Corruption in Ethiopia”, a 448-page report covering eight sectors (health, education, rural water supply, justice, construction, land,telecommunications and mining) reveals that for decades, corruption in Ethiopia has only been discussed at the margins. Perhaps because many have not experienced corruption as a significant constraint to their lives and businesses, or perhaps because a culture of circumspection has dampened open dialogue, Ethiopia has neither seen the information flowsnor the debate on corruption that most other countries have seen in recent years. This study attempts to fill this information gap. Conducted by the World Bank (with financial support from the UK, the Netherlands and Canada) in conjunction with the Federal Ethics and Anti-Corruption Commission of Ethiopia (FEACC), the study is an independent overview ofcorruption. It attempts to map the nature of corruption in eight sectors inthe country.

Ethiopian New Year September 11 (Inqutatash): New Promises, and NewDeeds’

Ethiopian New Year (11th September) of the Julian Calendar every year seem to herald new beginnings in Ethiopian cultures and traditions. Thereis a huge sense of euphoria and at times seriousness in relation to these public holidays. Relatives, friends, neighbors, and even those who appear to be ‘distant’ express to each other best wishes. The first day of a new year seems to beg for a new start in some one’s life. On the 11th of September 2013 (Gregorian calendar), Ethiopia celebrates the entrance ofits new year, 2006 of Julian calendar. Offices will be closed and families and friends will visit eachother. Although festivities tend to overwhelm thehorizon, there is a lot serious business going behind the scene. People plan and plan for the next 12 months. Several promise to quit indulging themselves in bad habits. If one, for any reason, fails to do the planning for themselves, others close to them will ask them to enlist some.

Typical plans include those related to quitting smoking or excessive drinking, getting married or engaged, building or buying houses, advancing to the next level of education, getting better jobs, and changing residence. People are expected to change in some ways in new years.

Mind the gap though that I am not saying all the planning happens when the new years kick off. In a way, nearly everyone (I mean an adult) is implicitly expected to reflect upon what happened last year (2005) and what should be done in the new year. This is obviously a very useful habitthat needs to be acknowledged encouraged. What seems a pity is that while doing their planning, people tend to focus on their personal lives related to jobs, bad habits, studies, spirituality, and health conditions.

Very limited numbers of people tend to make plans related to otherdecisive aspects of life.

Democracy: The missing pillar in Ethiopia's Foreign Policy’

SAIIA Joburg - Ethiopia's Foreign Affairs and National Security Policy and Strategy of 2002 position the country as a viable multi-ethnic entity, ableto advance the goals of peace and security, democracy and development.While foreign policy-makers have been modestly successful in morphing the country from a militaristic regional profile to a slightly more progressive posture, acutely aware of the potential developmental boon from a regional peace dividend, democracy has been the missing link andweakly articulated. For the country to posit democracy as an important guiding principle in its foreign policy implies a domestic order that is fairlyconsistent with this aim. At present this is hardly the case, and Ethiopia'sregional security challenges mirror to a certain degree its own domestic order. But a very important step has been made less than two weeks agounder Hailemariam Desalegn's gentle hand when the Ethiopian government allowed the opposition Semayawi (blue) party to stage peaceful protests demanding the release of prisoners of conscience.

Allowing peaceful assembly and protest can only bode well for the country's image and prestige. This could in turn have positive ramifications for the country's foreign policy and role as a regional broker,able to sponsor transitions to democratic orders in the region. Ethiopia canplay a better regional and continental role when it integrates sufficiently the normative anchors of its foreign policy as not just mere principles thatinforms the domestic environment, but crucially part of the country's own external projection. A year after the death of Meles Zenawi, the current leadership should pursue the transformation of the country's domestic order, and crucially its foreign policy, to adequately reflect its own codifieddemocratic aspirations that can potentially pacify the Horn of Africa. His Holiness Abune Teklehaimanot remembered’

(August 31, 2013): It has to be recalled that the late third Partiarch of theEOTC His Holiness Abune Teklehaimanot became the Patriarch of EOTC in August 31, 1976. Abune Teklehaimanot’s name until he became patriarch was Mekuria WoldeMichael. He was born on September 18, 1917, in a small village called Wotebet located in Amanuel District of Debre Markos atown in Gojjam Province. His father’s name was WoldeMichael Wondimu and his mother’s Zewditu Kassa. When Mekuria came of age, he joined the Orthodox Church school in the area run by Merigeta (which means “mentor”) Begenaw Wassie. There he learned the Amharic alphabets, to read the Psalms, and to write. He also studied the church music called Wazema. When he had finished studying under this mentor, he went to Gojam’s Bichena District to a church village called Yerez Saint Michael andjoined the school led by Memhir i.e. teacher LisaneWork and studied Qine.When he was sixteen years old he left for Sidamo Province and settled in Wolayta District at Sodo (Southern Ethiopia). There he met a virtuous hermit monk called Desta at the Wolayta Sodo Debre Menkirat TekleHaimanot monastery. Before Mekuria’s arrival, this monk had prophesied to the monks that a great hermit would soon come to the monastery. At this time Mekuria changed his name to Melaku because he did not want to be discovered by his relatives, who might try to bring himback to his village. At the monastery, he started to help Hermit Desta by bringing him water and dry food to keep him alive. When his mentor died he replaced him in the monastery and continued his mentor’s work. He was responsible for teaching the people and building schools in the area.

The Wolayta people loved and respected him as a father and they obeyed him. He led a life of purity and never begged for a living. He raised moneyto build many churches and schools in the area. The people’s contributionswere the main source of income for these churches and schools. When theDuerg regime took over the government of Ethiopia, Aba Melaku was denied the necessary income to run the institutions because the laws had changed. So he went to Addis Ababa to get money and tabots (duplicates of the Ark of the Covenant) from Patriarch Tewoflos at the Ethiopian Orthodox Church headquarters to supply the most recent churches he hadbuilt. He was given two out of five tabots he requested and was told to return later for the other three.

Aba Melaku arrived in Addis Ababa on the day of his appointment to see Patriarch Tewoflos but, little did he know, the patriarch had been forced toleave his position and was under arrest. The main office had established acommittee to find a replacement. Aba Melaku went into the office of the president of this nomination committee and gave him the traditional greeting of respect. As director and chairman of the board of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church office, Dr. Kinfe Regib, who was earnestly seeking a hermit monk as a nominee for the election of the next patriarch, was very happy to see Aba Melaku walk into his office as if driven by God. Dr. Kinfe Regib asked him the cause of his visit. When Aba Melaku told him that he had an appointment with Aba Tewoflos, he was told that Aba Tewoflos wasaway for a while and would meet with him at a later date. In the meantime, Dr. Kinfe Regib asked if he was willing to answer a few questions about himself, his job, and his responsibilities. Aba Melaku agreed and gave him the details he wanted. Aba Melaku told the chairmanthat he had built sixty-four churches and twenty-four schools–all this without any salary from the Ethiopian Orthodox Church central administration office. When asked where he was born, he answered: "For a monk, is there any particular place? Any spot of Ethiopia where I live is my country." He refused to identify his birthplace out of principle. Dr.

Kinfe Regib, amazed by the divine providence that had brought him there,took notes on him and put them in an envelope. He then asked Aba Melaku to take the envelope to the main nomination committee secretariatoffice outside the office where they were meeting. So Aba Melaku obediently took the envelope and delivered it to the secretariat office but he had no clue what was going on at the time. The person in charge took the letter and opened it. Seeing the contents of the mysterious letter, he looked the monk over very carefully and then allowed him to leave.
The next morning Aba Melaku returned to the main office hoping to meet with the patriarch only to discover that he was no longer in charge and had been detained by the government. Shocked, he immediately returnedto Wolayta. Soon after that, short profiles of two bishops and three monks, Aba Melaku included, were published and distributed in Addis Ababa. Everybody who read the short biography of Abba Melaku was touched by his personality. Soon everyone knew his name and was talkingabout him. On the day of the election, Aba Melaku was elected patriarch by a very high number of voters. Up until that day, he had followed his routine lifestyle of praying, fasting, serving the church, and teaching his followers. Suddenly, he was ordered by the governor of Wolayta to go to Addis Ababa and report to the main church headquarters. He left immediately not knowing what the rush was about. Upon his arrival, without even having a change of clothes and or any shoes on his feet, he was taken to the Menbere Tsebaot Kidist Selassie Cathedral, where all thebishops and thousands of Ethiopians were waiting for him. He wore a brown hand-sewn khaki robe over a wide pair of trousers and over that hehad a folded bed-sheet as a shemma (shawl) and on top he had a hand- treated goat skin. This was his habit since he had become a hermit. Whenhe arrived, everyone honored him with respectful applause and great shouts of joy known as elelta ("elelelelelel" is a shout of joy that Ethiopianwomen make when they are overjoyed), and Hotta. ("hohohohohohoho" isa shout of joy for Ethiopian men). After a short introductory speech by Dr.Kinfe Regib, it was announced that Aba Melaku WoldeMichael had been elected patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church. Shocked, Aba Melaku's eyes filled with tears and he cried. He made a short speech on the election and said: "How can this be? What strength do I have to fulfill the responsibility? However, if it is the will of the God of Daniel, who took him out of the pit of lions, what else can I do?" This took place in Julyand August of 1976, and until the final day of celebration, Aba Melaku spent his time in prayer with others praying for him as well in St. Mary Church. They tried to persuade him to change his clothes and wear shoes but he refused.

On the 31st August, 1976 (Nehasse 23,1968 EC) Abba Melaku was assumed the patriarchate as the third Partiarch of the EOTC, taking the name of "Abuna TekleHaimanot". The occasion was celebrated with prayerand special sermons at the Chair of the Almighty Holy Trinity Cathedral in Addis Ababa. Aba Melaku took his place of authority, and for some time continued to receive guests sitting on the Patriarch's Chair in his common clothes. Later on, his hermit monk friends persuaded him to change his habit out of respect for the Orthodox Church. He finally agreed to wear a cotton cloth dyed yellow with a proper shemma over it and a pair of sandals. Patriarch Tekle Haimanot was very well accepted by the Duerg regime and was allowed to visit Europe in sandals. He visited Greece, Poland, Austria, Germany, Rome, and Jerusalem. He ate only bread and drank only tea the whole time of his visit. The church people of Europe were amazed at his personality and considered his piety unique. As a result, it is said that the archbishop of Poland, out of respect for Patriarch TekleHaimanot, personally drove him around in a car during his visit to that country, instead of using a driver, in order to witness his piety and partake in his blessings. The Ethiopian head of state, Lt. Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam, used these visits by the Patriarch as a political strategy to show the West that he was not against religion and had appointed to this important position a person who represented the workers. He also wantedto change international opinion who viewed him as a ruthless tyrant for removing and killing Patriarch Abuna Tewoflos in 1979. As Patriarch Tekle Haimanot was assumed to be have little administrative skills, one of his assistant officers tried to misappropriate church money that was supposedto go to the government. When the Patriarch opposed him, he began to defame him by saying that he was too old, did not know anything about administration, and should be replaced. The Patriarch informed Mengistu Haile Mariam of this individual's unscrupulous behavior and gave him an ultimatum, saying that if this man was not removed from office in three days, no one would prevent him from returning to his monastery.
Mengistu immediately removed the officer.
The Duerg regime's high officials, being anti-church communists, asked the Patriarch's permission to convert several old churches located aroundthe government offices in Addis Ababa into museums. He answered, "these churches are not my personal property for me to give permission, that they belong to all Ethiopian Christians. I will have to discuss the matter with church members and let you know." This was a smart answer that the officials did not expect from him. Mengistu was aware that this monk is not an easy person to deal with and at the same time knew that ifhe pushed him harder, he would initiate a clash between the Duerg regime and the Christian nation, so he dropped the idea. Thus, as it turned out, the Patriarch was not a person to be pushed bossed around like a puppet. Rather, he proved an able leader of the church for twelve years before he died in 1988. Shortly before he died, the Patriarch went back to Wolayta to start construction on a church building that an outside donor agency wanted to erect. When he arrived, he gave his blessing and set a foundation stone in place. After the ceremony was over, he was ushered to a nice, comfortable residence that had been prepared where hecould rest, but he refused to go in. Instead, he wanted to go back to his old hut. He went into the hut and rested. A short while later, he felt a sharp pain and collapsed into unconsciousness. He was brought back to Addis Ababa by helicopter and hospitalized. Shortly thereafter he died at the age of 71. He was buried at the Holy Trinity Cathedral in Addis Ababa.

Ethiopia arrests top security official on allegations of corruption’

His arrest may be a prelude to the arrest of Former First Lady AzebMesfin, aka "Mother of Corruption"

Ethiomedia: WASHINGTON, DC - August 31, 2013: Police have arrested high-ranking Ethiopian intelligence official on allegations of corruption. According to the Federal Ethics and Anti-corruption Commission (FEACC), Woldeselassie Woldemichael, senior official of the nation’s intelligence agency was arrested on graft charges. He was charged with abusing publicauthority to accumulate wealth whose source is unclear. Fana the ruling party affiliated radio told, the top Ethiopian security official has been arrested on corruption charges, the official, Woldeselassie Woldemichael, a close friend and confidant of Azeb Mesfin, the widow of the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, was thrown into jail as part of the ongoing hunt forofficials who have amassed wealth on grounds of corruption.

Woldeselassie was a close friend of Gebrewahd Woldegiorgis, former deputy head of Revenue and Customs Authority, who has been in jail formonths accused of corruption. Observers say the arrest of the ranking security official could be a prelude to the arrest of Azeb, who is billed "Mother of All Corruption" in the country.

"It is a matter of time before Azeb joins the ranks of the corrupt officials now behind bars," a source said. Azeb was recently relieved of her post asCEO of EFFORT, the business oligarchy that has never been audited despite comprising major multi-billion-dollar companies such as Sur Construction, Mesfin Engineering, Almeda Textiles, and nearly two dozen business enterprises that have been the cash cow of the Meles-Azeb family and their inner-circle liutenants. When Meles Zenawi was alive, Azeb was the most feared and powerful woman who at party meetings lashed out at current security chief Getachew Assefa for corruption and extravagant lifestyle. Azeb had insisted that Getachew should be fired andher favorite, Woldeselassie, promoted.

The once powerful and aggressive woman is slowly turning into the most vulnerable following the death of her husband in August last year. She now doesn't have any known official job. Critics have been blaming her forbeing corrupt on the one hand and incomptetent on the other that she can't work as CEO of EFFORT. Though not officially reported, there were anti-Azeb protests at a number of EFFORT-affiliated companies that calledfor her removal. Azeb has been counting on the political clout of Abai Woldu, a TPLF politburo official who is at loggerheads with the Addis- Ababa-based Getachew Assefa and behind-the-scene powerful man, Debretsion Gebremichael, who is deputy chairman of TPLF and minister of Communication and Information Technology. In reality, many consider Debretsion as Number One in the power hierarchy, and his side leading the anti-corruption campaign means the days of Azeb as the spoilt brat of the palace are over.

A Sudden Attack On The Blue Party of Ethiopia And It’s Boomerang Effect’

EMF- August 31, 2013: On the eve of the Blue Party called rally in Addis the Blue Party head office was surrounded by heavily armed police and security forces where more than one hundred members and supporters of the Blue Party were taken to local prisons beaten up savagely according to Engineer Yelekal Getenet the party’s president. Theregime security thugs unleashed similar beatings on fellow Ethiopian Muslims on the Eid al-fiter Celebration this month. The regime believes such brutal beatings of women, children, elderly and the young will deter people not to join any peaceful protest anywhere in Ethiopia. The regime organized rally in Addis Ababa labeled as a rally to ‘condemn Islam extremists’, is a rally to denounce the Ethiopian Muslims for their more than 18 months old struggle questioning for religious freedom in the country. Another target of this “No Food” if you do not come rally is the Blue Party/Semayawi which is the first party in Ethiopia that stood with the Ethiopian Muslims by supporting their quest for religious rights which it was denounced by the PM in public. The Blue Party of Ethiopia leadership according to the interview Eng. Yelekal Getenet gave on ECADEF paltalk room the party headquarter is now under regimesecurity control and he is not sure if they can ever assemble there.

The hundreds thousands supporters and members of the Blue party we allsaw three months ago in Addis should turn the regime sponsored rally in to an opposition rally. Ethiopian Muslim activists had made it clear that they will do that. The Blue Party leadership is not in any position to contact its supporters before the rally therefore it is up to activists to coordinate a successful counter rally like ‘The Great Run’ in the past had been used by activists as a protest plattform. We should not let the regime saboteurs (Hode Aders) supporters to endorse the regime killing, Jailing in thousands and beating of Muslims this month alone and today more than one hundred Blue Party members and supporters. Let Addis Ababans come out in huge numbers and denounce the regime for its brutality and terror against his own people. The Extremism force in Ethiopia is the regime itself. Peaceful opposition like the Blue Party if it is allowed to be destroyed by terror no other peaceful opposition will ever exist in Ethiopia. Religious establishments who are hired by the regime should be condemned by all of us because they are serving inhumanely forces. Like fellow Ethiopian Muslims the Christians in Ethiopia should be courageous to say no to the religious cadres in their religious institutions. Aaccording to Ethiopia analysts, the current crack down on Semayawi (Blue) party should not surprise anyone, because this is the least activistsand dissidents to expect from the ruling-EPRDF, this may rather be a hugedisappointment, unexpected and sad news for those who advocate peaceful struggle and accuse the opposition for preferring use of all available means including seeking a sanctuary in neighbouring countries such as rival Eritrea to wage a war against the incumbent regime and it's affiliates in Addis Ababa. The Ethiopian public have been convinced that the Blue (Semayawi) Party of Ethiopia is the peoples party and no matter how many of its members and supporters are beaten up or jailed the struggle. The analyst concludes "the alternative may be: one-the existing civic and political groups in this country should discuss this issue within their respective groups and do what they may think is appropriate at a national level. The other alternative may be - one responsible body shouldarrange or call for an all inclusive inter-party discussion which would continue until the unelected, corrupt and terror oriented regime is removed from power".

Semayawi (Blue) Party calls for protest demonstration in Addis Ababa onSeptember 7'

Local News: September 2, 2013 - Ethiopian Semayawi (Blue) Party to demonstrate in Addis Ababa on September 07 2013. Ethiopian oppositionSemayawi Party has regrouped itself and is calling another protest rally inAddis Ababa for next Saturday September 7, 2013. Its plan to hold a demonstration on August 31 was called off when the regime's heavily armed security forces stormed the party's headquarters and attacked its members. According to an international Law jurist, denial of due process of fair trial is the highest form of corruption imaginable in the "justice sector" because it results in the arbitrary deprivation of a person's life, liberty and property. In a latest development, Semayawi (Blue) Party postponed the protest demonstration until September 21'

Meles' selected speech: completing the story'

EM commentary: By Hindessa Abdul (September 2, 2013) - It has been ayear since long time Ethiopian ruler Meles Zenawi died of unestablished causes in a Belgian hospital somewhere between June and August of 2012. The Government hasn't come out clearly about the cause of his death. During the last several weeks the state run media were preoccupied portraying a person akin to a saint. The praises showered upon him were more than needed to canonize him. 21-gun salute was fired; millions of trees planted; fellow leaders of neighbouring countries were at hand to give pomp to the event; scores of parks renamed after him, and the list goes on and on. University professors, army generals, cabinet members, and party operatives were paraded to give testimony about the deeds of his excellency. They said he was an intellectual, a military strategist, a farmers's best friend, and man of the people. ETV even took a page from North Korean manual on cult of personality. They took us to his office showing the working area displaying a document he allegedly was working on; Koreans already did that telling the story of KimIl-sung (the senior Kim). If that is any indication, everything Meles touched may be preserved as historical relic. For those whose thirst about Meles' myth were not quenched, the Sunday shows came up with the selected speeches that tried to make an entertainer out of the chief priest of "revolutionary democracy."

Meles had all the answers for every question under the sun; he was talking to the rubber stamp parliament ready to giggle at every phrase uttered; he was addressing the youth, the business men, the revelers at a millennium party, you name it. While the nation propaganda machine wants to paint a demigod, it is only fair to complete the story. As they say, journalism is "the first rough draft of history." Here are some of his pronouncements that were willingly left out: In April 1990 a year before Tigray Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF) controlled Addis Ababa, Meles had an interview with the late CIA and National Security specialist Paul B. Henze in the TPLF's Washington office. "We can no longer have Amhara domination," Meles told him. While it was no secret that Henze sympathized with TPLF, he still confronted the rebel leader to which Melestried to soften a bit: " When we talk about Amhara domination, we mean the Amhara of Shoa, and the habit of Shoan supremacy that became established in Addis Abeba during the last hundred years."

In a visit to the Tigray region shorty after his ascendance to power the then Ethiopian President played to the emotions of the public somewhat inthe line of Hitler's rhetoric about the Aryan race: "We are proud to be bornout of you...we are proud to be gotten out of you." (Enkwae abhatkum tefetirna...enkwae abhatkum terehibna)– That part of the speech is always left out when ETV takes sound bytes from that "historical" speech, not to offend the "nations and nationalities." In August 1994 (some say it was October 1995), Meles Zenawi visits the U.S. and confers with members of Ethiopian community in Washington D.C. Flanked by his yes- men like Seyoum Mesfin, Berhane G.Kristos, Dr Tekeda Alemu and other TPLF top brass, Meles was entertaining questions from the audience. A lady asks him what his vision was for Ethiopia ten years from then. Meles responded his vision was to make sure the people eat three times a day.–

Decade after the promised era, Ethiopians scavenge for left overs atrestaurants or in city waste disposal sites.

In an interview with Professor Donald Levine - a renowned U.S. sociologistand professor of Ethiopian studies - the late premier retorted: “The Tigreans had Axum, but what could that mean to the Gurague! The Agew had Lalibela, but what could that mean to the Oromo! The Gonderes had castles, but what could that mean to the Wolaita?” That comment was to haunt him on the eve of the 2005 general elections where he was afraid toface any opposition politician for debate. In his last appearance prior to the vote, Meles explained that gaffe saying it was taken out of context.

But he implied that the Minister of Youth, Sports and Culture (then Ambassador to France) Teshome Toga who hails from Wolaita Zone was put in charge to counter the perception his words created. Teshome eventually oversaw the return of the Axum Obelisk in April 2005. When history is written by historians rather than victors, those speeches and comments hopefully will get their rightful place in the interest of posterity.

Ethiopia denies crackdown on Semayawi opposition’

BBC News: September 2, 2013: Ethiopia's opposition Semayawi (Blue) party were arrested and some badly beaten over the weekend, the party says. Party chairman Yilekal Getachew said equipment such as sound systems were confiscated ahead of a rally on Sunday which was banned. Communication Minister Shimeles Kemal denied there had been a crackdown. The government said the venue had already been booked by apro-government group condemning religious extremism. The governing EPRDF maintains strict control over public life in Ethiopia. The public protest Semayawi organised in June was the first major demonstration on the streets of Addis Ababa since 2005 when hundreds of protesters were killed in violence. It was called to demand the release of jailed journalists and activists. The rally planned for Sunday was to call for political reforms.Mr Shimeles said that any group which wanted to organise a public protesthad to seek a permit. He said the authorities could not refuse to grant a permit but could insist that the event be held at a different time or place to that requested. Hailemariam Desalegn took office as prime minister a year ago, following the death of long-time leader Meles Zenawi. Ethiopia isa US ally against Islamist militants in the region.

ATHLETICS: Tirunesh Dibaba Sends Out Message She Is Ready For Bupa’

IAAF (September 2, 2013) - Tirunesh Dibaba sent a message she is ingreat shape before defending her Bupa Great North Run title, when winning the Tilburg 10k road race on Sunday. Dibaba, hindered by changing winds, may have missed Paula Radcliffe's 10-year-old Worldrecord by nine seconds but her winning time of 30:30 was the fourth fastest ever witnessed.

The Ethiopian, after the expected pacemaking proved fruitless, hit the front just after 3k, then running against the clock went through the halfway point in 15:21. That left the 28-year-old World 10000m gold medallist behind schedule in erasing the performance Radcliffe achieved inSan Juan, Puerto Rico in 2003. But a 15:09 second split brought her homein a new national record, 19 seconds quicker than she achieved at the Bupa Great Manchester Run in May.

Now Dibaba, although having lost to fellow countrywoman Meseret Defarover 5000m in Zurich last Thursday, must feel she will be in the driving seat when they clash at the Bupa Great North Run a fortnight after her latest victory. On paper Defar may be 10 seconds faster over the half marathon distance with a personal best of 1:07:25, but their eagerly awaited head-to-head over the Newcastle to South Shields course promises to be a thriller.

Indeed given the intense rivalry between both African women and, if the conditions are perfect, their natural ability despite being inexperienced at the half marathon may see them approach the World best performance of 65:40 which still belongs to Radcliffe after a decade. Tilburg saw Kenya's Esther Chemtai finish runner up in 32:06, outpacing Ethiopia's Genet Yalew by three seconds. Britons Lauren Howarth 6th, Alyson Dixon a placebehind and Emily Wicks 13th, recorded times of 33:48, 33:54 and 34:21.

Tirunesh Dibaba has just become the most decorated female athlete in thehistory of the IAAF World Championship.

ETHIOPOLITICS: Is a reformist group emerging within the TPLF?

EM: (September 2, 2013) - There are strong signs to suggest that a class of reformers is emerging within the TPLF, once the sole property of the late prime minister. To refresh ones memory about the era under Meles Zenawi, the late premier the key factor that he expects from any high- ranking appointee was one thing, "absolute loyalty." As long as one displays absolute loyalty, Meles would make them immune from any accusations, such as corruption and embezzlement charges. That's why civilian officials and army generals became uber rich in Zenawi's time. Butthat title and extravagance of Meles loyalists may come to an end soon if the anti-corruption campaign continues at the current pace. And credited for the "hunt" is none other than Debretsion Guebremichael, the most tech-savvy of all TPLF (PhD in electrical engineering), a TPLF politburo member, a deputy PM, and most importantly a life reportedly clean from corruption. Debretsion is - party wise - the boss of Getachew Assefa, the powerful security chief now aiding the Ethics and Anti-Corruption Commission carry out its duty effectively without fear of reprisals. From what has been achieved so far, it is possible to say a group within TPLF has emerged to curb the widespread corruption that has further pushed ordinary Ethiopians into the depths of sordid poverty. Of course the reformist group is not without challenges. The Azeb supporters in the likes of Tigrai regional president Abay Woldu and General Samora Yunus (the latter known for his opportunism), may try to stir trouble within TPLF andconfront the reformists. From the measures taken so far, however, the reformists look like they are winning. It has to be recalled that Azeb Mesfin was recently removed from her post as CEO of EFFORT, the business oligarchy that has never been audited despite comprising majormulti-billion-dollar companies such as Sur Construction, Mesfin Engineering, Almeda Textiles, and nearly two dozen business enterprisesthat have been the cash cow of the Meles-Azeb family and their inner- circle liutenants.

When Meles Zenawi was alive, Azeb was the most feared and powerful woman who at party meetings vilified those who don't bow to her as womanizers and alcoholics. Recently, she lashed out at current security chief Getachew Assefa for corruption and extravagant lifestyle. Azeb had insisted that Getachew should be fired and her favorite, Woldeselassie, promoted. The once powerful and aggressive woman is slowly turning intothe most vulnerable following the death of her husband in August last year. She now has no known official job. Critics have been blaming her forbeing corrupt on the one hand and incomptetent on the other that she can't work as CEO of EFFORT. Though not officially reported, there were anti-Azeb protests at a number of EFFORT-affiliated companies that called for her removal following the death of her husband. Azeb was counting on the political support of Bereket Simon, the lazy and cynical former government spokesperson who had lived much of his life as the second-in-command during the Meles time, but lost power recently when he was thrown into the dark alley as the "advisor to PMHD." In the absence of Bereket Simon, and the ailing General Samora Yunus, Azeb may now lean on the political clout of Abay Woldu, the regional president. Abay is leading the war against the Addis Ababa-based "power breakers," and he is on the losing side despite being a TPLF politburo member and president of Tigrai region. Like Azeb, Abai has also been at loggerheads with Getachew Assefa and behind-the-scene powerful man, Debretsion Guebremichael, who is deputy chairman of the TPLF and minister of Communication and Information Technology, and one of the three DPMs.

In reality, many consider Debretsion as Number 1 in the power hierarchy,and his side leading the anti-corruption campaign means the days of Azebas the spoilt brat of the palace are over.

Inter-religious, inter-cultural dialogue valuable for world peace’

Addis Ababa (WIC) September 3, 2013: - Fostering mutual respect and clearer understanding between cultural and religious groups through education is indispensable to ensure peace, tranquility and co-existence across the globe, according to a press release issued by United ReligiousInitiative (URI). The remark was made at a High-level Conference on Inter-religious and Inter-cultural Dialogue in Addis Ababa, at the Headquarters of the African Union Commission with the theme: “The Image of the other: Inter-religious and Inter-cultural Education – Best Practice in Africa." The conference is believed to offer an inventory and assessment of best practices, materials and methods in Africa which couldbe utilized in formal education around cultures and faith traditions. The conference was organized by King Abdullah Bin Abdulaziz International Centre for Inter-religious and Inter-cultural Dialogue (KAICIID) in partnership with African Union Commission (AUC) and United Religions Initiative-Africa in connection with the celebration of the 50th Anniversaryof the Golden Jubilee of the African Union. It was also meant to fostering mutual respect and clearer understanding between cultural and religious groups through education, dialogue and mutual understanding.

The release quoted African Union Commission Representative Dr. Jinmi Adisa as telling conference participants: "This unique event is taking placeas part of the 50th Anniversary celebration of the African Union and has underlined the crucial intent of leadership of the AUC to effectively mobilize all relevant constituencies of our people within and outside the continent along our partners and friends to champion the cause of African Renaissance." He further said that the conference will help to enhance theAfrican Union Inter-faith Dialogue Forum officially declared by Nigerian President Goodluck Jonathan in June 2010. The objective of the Forum was to explore and fully utilize the vast spiritual resources of the continentand harness it to the goal of integration, peace and development in Africa.The AU Commission would work closely with KAICIID, URI Africa and other stakeholders and partners in a manner that will add value to the work of the African Union in promoting peace, security, prosperity and regional integration. KAICIID Deputy Secretary General Cludia Bandion- Ortner also said the Centre is aggressively working towards facilitating inter-religious and inter-cultural dialogue and understanding thereby enhancing cooperation, respect for diversity, justice and peace and we arelooking forward to working in partnership with the African Union and its member states and all its partners like URI Africa. Representative of URI to UNECA and AU Ambassador Mussie Hailu, who isalso the focal person for the conference, on his part said: "In the era of civilization and globalization, dialogue is a prerequisite and a decisive toolto peaceful co-existence. Therefore, as we are celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Golden Jubilee of the African Union, it is very relevant to highlight the Inter-religious and Inter-cultural Education best practices in Africa. This in turn helps every state underline and well acknowledges the role of different religions and cultures to promote a culture of peace, mutual respect, harmony and understanding other than being a cause of conflict and violence." He also said that peaceful co-existence and harmony among different religions and cultures can be significantly enhanced by inter-religious, inter-cultural and inter-civilization constructive dialogue, education and cooperation. One practical action which helps promote inter-faith and inter-cultural harmony is the teachingof the Golden Rule which says 'Treat others the way you wish to be treated.' He acknowledged and appreciated the effort of the government of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, Austria and Spain for establishing KAICIID to enable, empower and encourage dialogue among followers of different religions and cultures around the world. “As we gather today to reflect on inter-religious and inter-cultural issues in Africa, we shall pray for peace and stability to prevail in Egypt, Syria and in all countries wherethere is political instability and conflict,” he said. (EH) The high-level conference brought together experts, educators, policy makers, high levelgovernment officials, and leaders in the field of inter-religious and inter- cultural education from Africa and outside of the continent.

40 Ethiopian asylum seekers in Korea tell stories of persecution inEthiopia’

By Bahk Eun-ji: THE KOREA TIMES September 3, 2013: - A group of 39 Ethiopians seeking asylum here are having difficulty filling in forms as they are obliged to write in either English or Korean. They are the descendants of Korean War veterans who have received job training, suchas mechanic, welding and electrical skills under the official development assistance (ODA) programs held by the Korea International Cooperation Agency (KOICA) for the past nine months starting from last December. A total of 60 descendants came to Korea through the KOICA program, and 39 are in the process of refugee applications, according to Refuge pNan, anon-government organization (NGO) aiding asylum seekers. The Ethiopians have finished the training session and are about to receive certificates. Most of the asylum seekers say they apply for refugee status in fear of persecution if they go back to their country, as they joined the political party against the Ethiopian government and engaged in various political activities. A 29-year-old woman who didn’t want to be identified, said she was persecuted because of being Muslim. “We are helping them to fill in the application form. The document has to be written in either English or Korean, but most applicants can’t speak those languages,” said Kim Ji-yoon, the legal coordinator of Refuge pNan. Kim said the language matter is an endemic problem for refugee applicants, because most of them have never learned English or Korean. Under the Immigration Law, immigration officials should help asylum seekers fill in necessary application forms when they have language problems. But they were denied the services from immigration officials, according to officials from Refuge pNan. They have to fill in 14 pages of application forms. “Asylum seekers can’t speak Korean or English. How can they, who are mostly poor, get translators to fill the form without helpfrom immigration officials or other public servants?” Kim asked. For its part, the Ministry of Justice said that the immigration office cannot help in filling out forms because of lack of manpower to support them. “As of now, we cannot provide translation support as we lack people who speak French. But we are trying to find ways to help them,” a ministry official said. Refuge pNan is now providing shelter for the asylum seekers and working to fill in their applications for asylum with the help of some students from Ethiopia. Ethiopia is the only African country that fought forSouth Korea during the 1950-53 Korean War. Among the dispatched 6,037 soldiers at that time, 122 were dead and 536 wounded in the war. Veterans of the war and their descendants have been discriminated by theEthiopian Communist government since 1974. They mostly live in a shantytown called Korea Sefer, meaning Korean Village.

Kenya and Ethiopia help dismember Somalia'

NewStatesman Analysis: - September 4, 2013: By Martin Plaut - A new deal has recognised Jubaland, a strip of land in southern Somalia and bordering on Kenya and Ethiopia, as yet another quasi-independent entityin the region. After nine days of late night meetings and plenty of arm- twisting, the fragile government of Somalia was finally forced to accept that a further slice of its territory had slipped beyond its control. The deal,signed in Addis Ababa, recognised Jubaland as yet another quasi- independent entity. This strip of land in southern Somalia and bordering on Kenya and Ethiopia, it is the illegitimate heir of both of these countries.Jubaland is of critical importance to the whole of southern Somalia. Trade through the port and airport of Kismaayo is a lifeline for the region. In theory Jubaland will be the 'Interim Juba Administration' and last for just two years, while Somalia re-forms itself into a Federation. In reality it is now outside Mogadishu's control – just like those other fragments of Somalia, including Puntland, Galmadug and the self-declared independentstate of Somaliland.

President Hassan Sheikh Mohamud, who was only sworn in as Somali president a year ago, was unable to resist the intense pressure of his neighbours and agreed to the deal. The entire sorry saga was witnessed by Nicholas Kay, the UN's Special Representative in Somalia; welcomed byCatherine Ashton for the European Union and supported by the African Union. Nkosazana Dlamini Zuma, the South African chair of African Union described the agreement as "historic", declaring that it was "a further illustration of the capacity of the Somalis to triumph over their differences." It is hard to see what there was to welcome.

The deal officially recognises Ahmed Mohamed Islam (known, like all Somalis by a nickname - 'Madobe') as the 'leader' of Jubaland. Yet only a month earlier Sheikh Madobe was described in a major UN report as a "spoiler" and one of the chief threats to Somali stability. The Sheikh was said to be "subverting the efforts of the Federal Government leadership and its partners to extend the reach of Government authority and stabilise the country, particularly in Kismaayo."

What the Baroness Ashton and her colleagues have done is anoint a man who has been roundly denounced by the Monitoring Group, established bythe UN Security Council. Its July report pointed out that the Sheikh had been a member of the short-lived Union of Islamic Courts, which was ousted by Ethiopia during its 2006 invasion of Somalia. What happened next is interesting. As the report puts it: “Madobe’s forces returned to Kismayo in August 2008, when Al-Shabaab and Hizbul Islam recaptured the city following the withdrawal of Ethiopian troops from Somalia.” At thistime the Sheikh Madobe was a key player in the al-Qaeda linked network. But, as is ever the case in Somalia, clan and inter-clan rivalry came into play and the Sheikh fell out with his former allies. He threw in his lot with the African peacekeepers and the Federal Government. But Sheikh Madobe did not cut his ties with al-Sabaab altogether and the UN report accuses him of continuing the export of charcoal from territory controlled by the Islamists – a trade long since outlawed by the UN because of its catastrophic impact on the Somali environment.

Under the new arrangement the Sheikh retains the port and the airport, although he is required to hand control to the Federal Government within six months. Since this would cut his income and hence his power, there seems little chance of the handover ever taking place. The outcome has been a triumph for Somalia’s neighbours, even though Kenya and Ethiopiawill continue to vie for influence in this critical part of the country. The Kenyan foreign ministry has long seen the establishment of a buffer state along its northern border as vital to its security interests. Thanks to Wikileaks, we know that Kenya’s Foreign Minister, Moses Wetangula, practically begged the United States for its support when he saw Johnnie Carsons, President Obama’s most senior US Africa official, in January 2010. The Kenyans were requesting backing for an invasion of Somalia to create Jubaland, but the Americans were far from keen. As the confidential embassy telex puts it: “Carson tactfully, but categorically refused the Kenyan delegation’s attempts to enlist US Government support for their effort.” It was, said the telex, the third time Wetangula had made the appeal, but Carsons resisted, pointing out – rightly – that “the initiative could backfire.” Critically, Carsons warned that: “if successful, a Lower Juba entity could emerge as a rival to the TFG” (Somalia’s Transitional Federal Government). This is exactly what has nowcome about. Brushing these concerns aside, Kenya sent its troops into Somalia in October 2011. As predicted, they found it very heavy going and it was to take almost a year before al-Shabaab were driven from Kismaayo. For theEthiopians, the establishment of Jubaland is a further fragmentation of Somalia, its sworn enemy since the Somalis invaded their country in 1977. It was an attack that is imprinted on Ethiopian memories, fuelling adetermination to see the end of a powerful, centralised Somali state. As ifthe situation was not complicated enough, newly created Jubaland could be sitting on reserves of oil. Several fields have been detected in the waters along the Kenya-Somali border, but, like many African frontiers, the location of the border is a matter of dispute. The Somali government refuses to recognise oil licenses granted to multinational companies by Kenya, and has persuaded several oil-majors, including Total and the Norwegian state owned Statoil, to withdraw their claims. But, said the UNin July, the Italian firm, ENI, was still pressing ahead with its claims. As Johnnie Carsons remarked in 2010, Jubaland “raises more questions thanit answers.”

Alcohol and the Youth in Ethiopia’

Excerpts from “Commentary on occasion of September Recovery Month”

Revelation: (September 4, 2013) By Worku Abebe - In a study conductedin 1998 by a group of Ethiopian researchers, it was shown that out of a total of about 400 high school students, 33% were engage in the abuse ofsome kind of mind-altering substances. Among the reported substances, alcohol was considered to be major, with a prevalence rate of 58% in a private high school and 18% in urban as well as rural public high schools.The majority (68%) of the students in urban and rural public high schoolsstarted abusing alcohol between the ages of 6 and 19 years, while those in private school (73%) abused between the ages of 6 and 22 years.

When a combination of multiple substances was used, with a fewexceptions, alcohol was the first to be tried.

In another study carried out elsewhere, it was found that out of approximately 1700 high school students in a semi-urban setting, about 22% reported consuming alcohol. While the mean age of the consumers was 17 years, the consumption of the substance increased with the ages of the students. The majority of alcohol consumers in this study area weremales. A 2011 survey report demonstrated that among approximately 600undergraduate medical students of Addis Abeba University, 22% reported drinking alcohol in the previous 12 months. The majority of the consumerswere males and Orthodox Christians. The consumption of alcohol by thesestudents increased with the years they attended university. Researchers also showed that the consumption of alcohol by high school students in Adiss Abeba in 2000 was associated with increased engagement in sexual activity (by 38%). Since only 40% of the males reported condom use intentions, alcohol use was suspected to enhance the risk of exposure to sexually transmitted diseases (STD). Comparing the sexes, the influence of alcohol for inducing sexual activity was even greater in male students. In a similar study performed in a semi-urban town elsewhere, it was found that alcohol abuse by high school students was linked to increased engaging in premarital sexual practice (by 30%). In this practice, there was is a greater tendency for young people to have multiple sexual partners and running the risk of contracting STD, includingHIV. Male students were generally reported to be engaged in such practicemore often. With regard to college students, there is a report that the abuse of alcohol was also associated with enhanced risky sexual behaviors, which were defined as patterns of personality that can expose to HIV infection.

With regard to college students, there is a report that the abuse of alcoholwas also associated with enhanced risky sexual behaviors, which were defined as patterns of personality that can expose to HIV infection. There are a few research reports addressing the problem of alcohol abuse as a risk factor for violent behavior among high school and college students in Ethiopia as well. Based on a study conducted in semi-urban high schools in eastern Ethiopia, it was noted that the use of alcohol by female students (14-24 years old) was related to higher levels of sexual violence victimization, and this behavior was reported to increase when both women and men abused alcohol. Similarly, as assessed by self-expressed manifestation of anger and negative life events, the use of alcohol was also linked to increased manifestation of violent behavior (by 67%) amongundergraduate college students in central Ethiopia. In addition, alcohol was also reported to contribute to increased risk of committing an act of violence by male students towards women. Female students who consumed alcohol also expressed encountering greater gender-based violence against them. Different reasons have provided by students who participated in the above studies for initiating the use of alcohol, and these are summarized below.

- For relaxation and entertainment
- To relieve stress or tension caused due to various reasons
- For socialization
- Out of curiosity
- Influences of relatives (including parents), friends and peers
- Effects of use of other substances; for example, consumption of alcoholfollowing khat chewing sessions to overcome the stimulant effect of the latter.
- To alleviate the inhibition for performing certain activities normallythought to be risky or unacceptable.
- Influence of advertisements (media, billboards, etc.) From the reportssummarized, it is obvious that the studies conducted so far concerning the abuse of alcoholby students in Ethiopia is very limited, implying that a lot remains to be done. However,based on what is generally known about alcohol from numerous scientific studiesperformed elsewhere, it is predictable that the abuse of alcohol has additional and even moreserious consequences.

September 5, 2013: Football/Africa: African race for WCup spots heats up’

REUTERS: Former quarterfinalists Ghana and Senegal are among five countries a point away from clinching a place in the final stage of Africa's World Cup qualifying campaign as the preliminary group phase concludes this weekend. Seven groups are yet to be decided with the winners set tojoin Algeria, Egypt and Ivory Coast in the playoff round. The trio guaranteed top spot in their respective groups in June. Cameroon, Ghana,Nigeria, Senegal and Tunisia need home draws to ensure they advance but their respective opponents can usurp them with away successes, making for an exciting finale. Ethiopia must beat the war-ravaged CentralAfrican Republic on neutral territory to avoid opening the door to South Africa. They face Botswana, who maintain slim hopes of qualification.

Congo, who take on Niger, and Burkina Faso, who play Gabon, are in astraight battle for glory in their group.

The 10 group winners go into a draw on September 18 for five two-leggedplayoff matches in October and November, which will determine Africa's representatives at the finals in Brazil. Ghana renew their rivalry with Zambia and, having lost their last two meetings, they are seeking to change their fortunes by hosting the match in the provincial city of Kumasi, where they hope passionate support at Baba Yaro Stadium on Friday will spur them on. Ghana welcome back Dede Ayew, Kevin-Prince Boateng and Michael Essien but there are concerns over the fitness of captain and main striker Asamoah Gyan, who was injured in training on Tuesday. Zambia, who are one point behind the Black Stars in Group D, have to secure an unlikely away win without key Dutch-based striker Jacob Mulenga, who has a thigh injury. Senegal, hoping to reach the World Cup for the first time since their giant-killing run in 2002, host Uganda in Marrakech, Morocco on Saturday as they are banned from theirhome stadium. They lead Uganda by one point in Group J.

"WHITE DUDE" Nigeria are two points ahead of opponents Malawi in GroupF going into a match in Calabar, which has been overshadowed by a spat between their opposing coaches. Malawi's Tom Saintfiet complained to FIFA of racism after Nigeria's Stephen Keshi called him "a white dude who should go back to Belgium". The issue, however, looks to have subsided as the pre-match posturing has tailed off.

Samuel Eto'o, who recently joined Premier League Chelsea from Russian club Anzhi Makhachkala, leads Cameroon as they seek to hold off Libya in Yaounde. Cameroon leadLibya by one point in Group I after their 2-0 defeat by Togo in June was turned into a 3-0 win as their opponents had fielded a suspended player.

Tunisia are favourites to seal top spot in Group B as they lead opponents Cape Verde Islands by two points going into a decider match in Tunis, where fans will be allowed to attend the game despite recent security concerns. Ethiopia, who lead South Africa by two points and Botswana by three, will top Group A if they beat the Central African Republic in Brazzaville. An Ethiopia draw would give South Africa a chance to qualify while a defeat would hand Botswana the opportunity to leapfrog both theirrivals should they win in Durban. Congo have given away a substantial lead in Group E but still head Burkina Faso by one point. Congo will qualifyif they win away in Niger on Saturday while the Burkinabe are at home to Gabon at the same time.

Ethiopia: One Year after Meles's Death, Citizens' Rights Have Yet to BeRevived in Ethiopia'

PR: Freedom House (September 5, 2013) - The death of Ethiopian prime minister Meles Zenawi in August, 2012 after two decades in power sparked hope that the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) would undertake reforms to open up the political system and loosen the harsh restrictions imposed on civil society, the media, and opposition parties. However, one year into the administration of Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, Meles's successor, not much has changedin the highly repressive country. Meles's rule had become increasingly authoritarian, particularly after the disputed 2005 elections, when securityforces killed some 200 people and imprisoned tens of thousands, includingleaders of the opposition, journalists, and civil society activists. In the years that followed, Meles presided over a system that criminalized dissent through the use of repressive laws and an unrelenting crackdown by security forces. At the time of Meles's death, the EPRDF held all but one of the 547 seats in the federal parliament and exercised a growing dominance over all forms of public life in Ethiopia.

Farmer from Ethiopia's Oromia region may be the world's oldest livingperson'

TV Oromiya (September 5, 2013): At an estimated 160 years of age, Dhaqabo Ebba, a retired farmer and well-known community elder from theOromia region in Ethiopia, could be the oldest living person ever. In an interview conducted by the state-run TV Oromiya and published online on Aug. 12, 2013, Ebba — who has no birth certificate to prove his exact age — says he has lived through and witnessed a transfer of power among all of the five Gadaa Oromo political parties in four rotations. As per the Gadaa system of government, a democratic socio-political institution of the Oromo people, one Gadaa leader serves for a period of eight years. There are five Gadaa parties within this system among which leadership rotates. If Ebba had indeed lived through four such rotations, that makes him at least 160 years old. The average life expectancy in Ethiopia is 60 years, according to the CIA's World Factbook. It would be impossible to establish Ebba's age as birth takes place at home in rural Ethiopia and themajority of Ethiopians still do not own birth certificates. "When Italy [first]invaded Ethiopia [in 1895], I had two wives and my son was old enough to herd cattle," Ebba tells the reporter in Afan Oromo, the Oromo language, at his house near Dodola town. There are no living witnesses tocorroborate his story. "Not even one of my peers is alive today," says Ebba.

However, Ebba who claims to have the largest extended family in the areahas seen his great-grandchildren grow up. And he is by far the oldest known person in the area. Ebba lives in a one-room house constructed by tightly woven bamboo poles which are intricately fastened together. Its corrugated metal roof, clinched together with nails, covers a cleanly sweptdirt floor where Ebba and neighbors were huddled together for the interview. According to Guinness World Records, Jeanne Calment of France, who died in 1997 at 122 years and 164 days, is the oldest person with a verified age. Earlier this month, the Associated Press reported, Bolivia's Carmelo Flores could be the world's oldest manat 123 years. If true, Ebba's story may change that. Born sometime in the 1850s, had there been better communications, Ebba would remember the Berlin Conference of 1884 that set the stage for European colonization of Africa. Within the context of Ethiopian history, he was born before the conquest of Oromo country by Abyssinian invaders. In his own account, Ebba has lived under the reigns of at least seven Ethiopian rulers starting from Emperor Yohannes IV to the current regime, the EPRDF. The Oromo are Ethiopia's single largest ethnic group, estimated at 40 percent of the total population. Largely marginalized, they fought against all seven rulers thatEba has outlived during Ethiopia's imperial expansion to the south from itsnorthern highlands.
During the 30-minute interview, Ebba recalls life under previous Ethiopian rulers — and notes a relative improvement for his community under EPRDF, particularly in areas of road transportation and telecommunication. He says in his generation it took eight days on horseback to visit Addis Ababa, Ethiopia's capital, some 240 kms away from his village. Today, it only takes a couple of hours. Ebba speaks with a firm, articulate voice while recounting his life story. He may no longer beable to see but his memories of historical facts seem sharp. As the local journalist noted at the end the interview, given that the Oromo like many African cultures are an oral society, "each time an elder dies, a library is lost." Ebba's is one such library from which much can still be preserved.
Hamid dhaqaboIt is indeed remarkable that Ebba's eldest son Hamid Dhaqabo could not chew Qorso — a local snack made by roasting barley seeds — while Ebba, who has his full teeth intact, had no problem doing just that. "I can eat sugarcane [by chewing] all I want without any problem," Ebba proudly tells the reporter with a firm voice. Locals, who acknowledge mistaking father and son, tease Hamid for aging faster thanhis father given his white hair and lack of teeth. A point he begrudgingly concedes with a forced, toothless grin adding: "God took them all away."

SMNE denounces government violence against Semayawi (Blue) Party’

Solidarity Movement for New Ethiopia (SMNE), the diaspora based civic group denounced the illegal and violent actions by the ruling EPRDF that prevented the Semayawi Party from carrying out its peaceful rally on Sunday, September 1. Despite receiving the go ahead from authorities to stage this lawful rally nearly two months ago, with no warning, federal police stormed and ransacked Semayawi [also known as the Blue Party] headquarters on Saturday, August 31, 2013. After first cutting off all electricity utility to their office, the EPRDF police officers forcibly took overthe office of the Semayawi Party. Leaders and volunteers working on final preparations for the next day’s rally were beaten and kicked by authorities before being detained for a number of hours. After further harassment, interrogation and intimidation in detention, they were released, but the federal police maintained control of Semayawi headquarters until the nextmorning. During that time, the federal police ransacked their office and confiscated and/or destroyed their computers, flyers, flags, T-shirts, banners, office documents and nearly all other Semayawi property; essentially making it impossible for the Semayawi party to move ahead with their plans for the rally.

Land-grab has made Ethiopia Africa's most neo-colonized nation’

EMF commentary: By Barnabas – (September 7, 2013) According to the Guardian (UK), Ethiopia has offered three million hectares (7.4 million acres) of virgin land to foreign corporations at knocked down prices. The Ethiopian government says 36 countries including India, China, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia have leased farm land there. One of the biggest buyers are the Chinese. The Ethiopians have sold their land to China for 100 years. They could do whatever they want with that land. Now, they are cutting the rain forest and turning it into farms. Moreover, as you know, inChina, there is one-child policy, that is, they could not have more than 1 child in a family. However, in Ethiopia, they do not have that limitation. Once they populate Ethiopia, do you think they will leave Ethiopia after 100 years? Be that as it may, after the Ethiopians have sold their lands tothese foreign investors, with that money, they are feeling good –at least for now. For now, they are able to build few highways here and there, andfew more high-rises here and there. However, this will undoubtedly be very short lived. Take for instance, our neighbors in Eritrea. They could also have done the same. The government could have sold the potash andgold mines to foreign investors now and could have given the Eritreans temporary solution. The difference is Ethiopia is interested in a temporarysolution within a short time now --at the cost of a potential long-term conflicts and instabilities; while Eritrea is looking into a permanent solution and long-term stability --at the cost of self-sacrifice now. Palestinians were also happy when they sold their lands to the Jews. With that money, momentarily, they felt good. However, their temporary dream was turned into a long-term and perpetual nightmare. Little did they know that this simple, seemingly harmless act would result in their imminent, slow and painful death. Little did they know, that, when they signed off their lands to the Jews, they were also signing off their own doom with their own hands.

Sheikh Mohammed Hussein Al Amoudi: Ethiopia's Richest Man SpotsOpportunities At Home'

VENTURES AFRICA – September 8, 2013: Mohammed Hussein Ali Al Amoudi born in Ethiopia to an Ethiopian mother and Yemeni father, SheikhMohammed Hussein Ali Al Amoudi's life has always straddled East Africa and the Middle East. A Saudi Arabian citizen since 1965, he has never losttouch with his African roots, investing billions of dollars in projects as diverse as agriculture, construction, oil and media, all the while becoming one of the world's richest men. According to recent figures, Al Amoudi is now worth more than $13 billion, which makes him the richest person of Ethiopian descent. He is also Ethiopia's leading investor and, unusually, the largest foreign investor in Sweden, thanks to his significant oil interests. Originally working in construction and real estate investment in Saudi Arabia, Al Amoudi acquired Sweden's largest oil company, OK Petroleum, for $750 million in 1994, at a time when the Swedish economywas having severe difficulties. Because of his strong Saudi links, Al Amoudi was able to connect Swedish and Middle Eastern oil interests to their mutual benefit. For Al Amoudi, the acquisition was an opportunity to enter the growing markets of Eastern Europe, such as Poland, with its 40 million population. For OK Petroleum it meant access to Saudi Oil, which was cheaper and less dangerous to produce than its traditional sources of oil from the North Sea.

Al Amoudi changed the company name to Preem Petroleum and invested in its refinery capacity, its chain of gas stations and its exploration facilities. The latter included Svenska Petroleum Exploration, which has drilled for oil in the Baltic Sea off the coast of Sweden as well as in Africanwaters, off the Ivory Coast. He put further investment into civil and industrial contracting in Sweden and other engineering assets. Although AlAmoudi put Svenska Petroleum up for sale in 2012, with a reported price tag in the region of $2 billion, no sale has yet taken place. Another oil- based investment followed, this one in a country that couldn't be more different to Sweden: Morocco. Al Amoudi established Samir Sami in Morocco, expanding its operations through the years to the point that it now boasts profits of $57 million per year. Both the Swedish and Moroccan oil interests are controlled by Al Amoudi's company, Corral Petroleum Holdings, one of several companies through which the billionaire runs operations in countries all over Africa, the Middle East andEurope. Al Amoudi also owns and operates Mohammed International Development Research and Organisation Companies (MIDROC). MIDROC has extensive interests in Ethiopia, covering mining, agriculture, hotels, hospital, finance and engineering.

Al Amoudi first took an active interest in investing in Ethiopia in the mid- 1980s, founding MIDROC in 1994. He has consistently stressed that his main ambition for the country is to increase the standard of living of its people, to build infrastructure and to create jobs. Nevertheless, he has come under frequent criticism for what some see as his using his contactsin government to acquire assets at discounted prices and further enrich himself. Al Amoudi counters that he has donated many millions of dollars to good causes in Ethiopia, funding a 140-bed healthcare facility, sponsoring sporting events such as the Council of East and Central AfricanFootball Associations (CECAFA) cup tournament (the oldest football competition in Africa), and bringing prosperity to many parts of a country,known in recent years for natural disasters and impoverished people.

Among Al Amoudi's Ethiopian investments is a gold mining business, which produces around five tons of gold each year. In 2007, his company,National Mining Corporation, bought from the Ethiopian government in 1997 for $172 million, announced that it had found a massive discovery ofgold in the southern Oromia region of the country, with a possible valuation of up to $1 billion. The company is also prospecting for silver deposits in the Northern Amhara and Tigray regions. Ever versatile, Al Amoudi decided in 2004 to move into the private airline business, formingTrans Nation Airways to provide both domestic and international passenger and air cargo services. The airline also covers the industrial needs of farmers, medical professionals and exporters through activities like crop spraying, emergency evacuations, geological surveys and searchand rescue operations, among others.

The extent and range of Al Amoudi's business empire has continued to expand through the years. In 2008, he signed an agreement with Tigray State administrators in Ethiopia to launch new investment projects, spanning mining, leather products, glass goods, sugar and soft drinks manufacturing factories. In late 2012, he announced the development of amassive steel mill in Toussa, Ethiopia, with a production capacity of 1.3 million tons per year. MIDROC's agricultural interests have also grown in the last few years. In 2008, the company announced that it would invest 250 million Birr ($15 million) to develop 250,000 hectares of land in threedifferent areas of Ethiopia. Ethiopia Horizon Plantation will develop palm tree, rubber tree, Jatropha and tea plantations in the Mezenger, Metekal and Bench-Kaji areas of the Gambella, Benishangul-Gamuz and South Ethiopian Peoples' States respectively. This was expected to create up to 50,000 jobs for local people, in addition to residential units, schools and other infrastructure projects. In 2011, Al Amoudi announced a plan to develop a $2.5 billion rice farming project in Ethiopia, leasing tens of thousands of hectares in preparation. This and other projects may now need Al Amoudi's political skill to complete. This may no longer be easy.

Previously, Ethiopia's leaders appeared keen to offer assistance to Al Amoudi, granting him 3,000 square metres of land to construct a residence, naming a street in the town of Mekele after him and erecting a large picture of him in the town centre. The state also presented Al Amoudi with the Highest Martyr's Medal for his contribution to increasing trade and investment in the area. But his relations with Ethiopia's ruling elite suffered a hitch in August 2012 when his long-standing ally, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, died. Al Amoudi's relations with his fellow Ethiopians have not always been smooth. During the disputed 2005 elections in Ethiopia, he was spotted wearing a T-shirt marked with 'Bee' in support of the ruling party, EPRDF, which was accused of intimidation and violence in the run-up to the election. As a result, Al Amoudi found himself facing severe criticism in the press, since many people felt that hewas endorsing and assisting a repressive government. Al Amoudi was deeply shocked by this reaction and went to great lengths to reverse this tide of hostility. Most dramatically, he wrote an emotional plea to his fellow Ethiopians both at home and in the United States, begging them tojudge him on his actions as an investor and philanthropist, rather than asa political supporter. "You will recall that as a result of my exercising my democratic right during the recent elections in Ethiopia, there have been campaigns of hate and vilification against me, both in Ethiopia and abroad," he wrote. "These attacks were maliciously designed to force me to leave my country and people to whom I am deeply attached and to abandon the many investments in Ethiopia and the large number of employees and their families who are dependent for their livelihood on these investments."

Al Amoudi stressed that he would love nothing more than to see true multi-party democracy take root in Ethiopia. While some Ethiopians praiseAl Amoudi's investment and philanthropy in their country, others point outthat a free press should be able to make criticisms. Much of his difficultieswith the press stem from his decision, in 1998, to give financial support toan organisation called the Islamic Assembly of North America, not realising that it supported a jihadist ideology. This caused him embarrassment in Time magazine and elsewhere. Al Amoudi's MIDROC group issued a press release following the Time magazine article, calling the report "baseless", saying it was made to "undermine the Sheikh's development efforts" in Ethiopia. Al Amoudi no doubt prefers those days when he can focus on developing businesses and organisations in Ethiopiaand elsewhere that bring prosperity and improved living conditions to millions of Africans. These acts of wealth generation (for his countrymen as much as for himself) are little mentioned in the international press – partly because Al Amoudi rarely speaks to the media and shies away fromthe spotlight. Nevertheless, his dedication to improving the lot of his country – and of Africa as a whole – is much to be admired.

RELIGION - Muslims of Multicultural Ethiopia: Historical Timeline’

New York (TADIAS commentary) - September 9, 2013: Recently, according to the Ethiopian government, there is a real concern about the rise of a small, imported and militant sect that is spreading a foreign brand of radical Islam in the country. The new phenomenon of “religious extremism” has become a rally-poster issue in Ethiopia. State-sponsored media has also attempted to link the two-year old Friday protests demanding the release of jailed religious leaders as efforts supported by these same sects. What seems to be missing from the public view, however, are independent voices that can add to the state sponsored interfaith council that is pushing only a one-size-fits-all slogan rather thanseeking long term solutions. It begs the question: How about the majorityof Ethiopian Muslims? What do they want? There is a need for the government to open up the space for an all inclusive dialogue without political bias. In fact, Article 27 of Ethiopia’s constitution bars the state from meddling in religious affairs. If anything the recent show of force by police against demonstrators would not bring permanent closure to this festering crisis. So far the interfaith committee has produced no viable solutions either, except to repeat and amplify selected speeches of minority religious fanatics that authorities say are becoming a major threat. Straightforward answers are hard to come by; queries by journalists remain without response.

Ethiopian religious history is an intricate recording of Christian, Jewish andMuslim citizens who have lived side by side enjoying relative freedom to worship freely. To the west of the country, the gated city of Harar is considered the 4th holiest city for Muslims and is listed as a World Heritage site. While the Kebre Negest book cites the introduction of Judaism to ancient Ethiopia through the line of King Solomon, it is an Ethiopian Christian king who saw it fit to grant asylum to the relatives of the Muslim prophet Mohammed who were fleeing religious persecution.

The prophet is recorded to have said “Abyssinia is a land of justice in which no one is oppressed,” and forbidding “holy war” against Ethiopia. Today the Al Nejashi mosque in the northern region of Tigray still stands as one of Islam’s oldest mosques. Given today’s heated politicization of religion in the country, it may seem almost an afterthought that Ethiopia’sheritage actually includes the beginning of the world’s three major Abrahamic faiths. A quick scan of the last millennium by itself reveals thatmany empires and leaders have come and gone, but the spiritual and multicultural fabric of the Ethiopian people have remained intact.

Additional highlights are included in the following timeline, which we hopewill serve as an independent and interactive historical data visualization, and as a starting point for the development of a more well-rounded backdrop to the current issue of religious freedom and its implications.

A Marylhurst University scholar digitizes Ethiopian manuscripts of the OldTestament’

MARYLHURST University: (September 9, 2013) - Dr. Garry Jost of Marylhurst University joined colleagues from Portland and Texas to digitizeEthiopian manuscripts of the Old Testament while attending the EMML @ 40: The Life and Legacy of the Ethiopian Manuscript Microfilm Library conference at St. John's University in Minnesota in July 2013. EMML is a project of Hill Museum and Manuscript Library, which has projects in a number of countries for the sake of preserving their manuscript heritage. At the conference, scholars from the USA, Germany, France and Ethiopia gave presentations. For three days prior to the conference, Dr. Jost joinedcolleagues from Portland and Texas to collate – i.e., type into electronic form – Ethiopian manuscripts of the Old Testament, whose microfilm or digital images are only available onsite.

These manuscripts are written in the Ge'ez language, the ancient Ethiopic language, which remains the liturgical language of the Ethiopian OrthodoxChurch. The modern Amharic language, which is the national language of Ethiopia, developed from Ge'ez. This work is part of the Textual History of the Old Testament project directed by Dr. Steve Delamarter, George Fox Seminary. The collation of these manuscripts paves the way for research to identify manuscript families, to be presented at the Society of Biblical Literature annual meeting in November 2013 in Baltimore. Dr. Garry Jost'sareas of expertise include biblical languages, biblical interpretation, Hebrew Scriptures (Old Testament), and the history and faith of Judaism. He is an ordained minister, and his background includes teaching high school German and Spanish and serving as pastor of a Mennonite congregation.

Debretsion Guebremichael, the man behind the e-Security’

ER: (September 11, 2012) - The death of Meles Zenawi has left the Ethiopian ruling partner, TPLF in disarray. Because Meles did not put a succession plan in place, TPLF and its umbrella organization, EPRDF, are now engulfed in a dangerous power struggle that could erupt in a bloody clash. The major actors in the power struggle include: Azeb Mesfin (TPLF),Abay Woldu (TPLF vice chair), Sebhat Nega (TPLF), Seyoum Mesfin (TPLF), Debretsion Guebremichael (TPLF), Tewodros Hagos (TPLF), Bereket Simon (ANDM), Addisu Legesse (ANDM), Hailemariam Desalegn (SEPDM), Kuma Demeksa (OPDO), Abadula Gemeda (OPDO), Aster Mamo(OPDO), to mention a few of them. The most dangerous of all these guys is TPLF Politburo member and Minster of Communication & Information Technology Debretsion Guebremichael. All the TPLF/EPRDF intelligence and security apparatus report to him. He chairs the joint security commission whose members include Getachew Assefa, head of the National Intelligence and Security Service (NISS), and Workneh Gebeyehu, head the Federal Police, among others. His agents and assassins are also embedded through out the bureaucracy and the military. In short, Debretsion is the Henrich Himmler of TPLF. Debretsion before becomes TPLF politburo member, was responsible for jamming radio and TV signals, blocking web sites, tapping phones, other forms of electronic security. Before that he was a spy and member of NISS death squads who were sent out at night to knock off political opponents. Now Debretsion is the one who is expected to execute decisions if TPLF decidesto carry out purges and assassinations within EPRDF. According to sources, Debretsion is currently engaged with tracking movements of PMHD and all those who are suspected of posing a threat to the ruling party's future domination. His department monitors phone conversations of senior government authorities, records all their meetings, and gets feedback of all surveillance reports of suspicious activities.

Ethiopian female journalist on hunger strike over mistreatment in prison'

IMWF - September 13, 2013 As stories about the political crisis in Cairo have been dominating the news from Egypt, there has been limited coverage on a brewing international conflict between Egypt and Ethiopia –two countries that do not share a border but are indivisibly connected by the Nile, the world's longest river. Amid works to construct a giant hydro- electric dam, and much to the anger of the Egyptian government, Ethiopiahas started diverting the Blue Nile, a tributary of the Nile, prompting a furious debate about if and how the "Great Ethiopian Renaissance Dam" will affect Egypt's water security. While there may not be a definite answer anytime soon on whether this dam will have any impact on water security in Egypt, there is no doubt that it has already negatively impacted press freedom in Ethiopia. Earlier this summer, for instance, theCommittee to Protect Journalists reported that Ethiopian officials arrested a reporter seeking to interview people evicted from their homes in the region where the contentious hydro-electric dam is being built. More notable, however, was the arrest of Ethiopian columnist Reeyot

Alemu more than two years ago.

A critic of the government writing for the now-defunct newspaper Feteh, Alemu had raised questions about the funding and merits of the dam shortly before she was arrested on bogus terrorism charges and sentenced to 14 years in jail. Although two of the three terrorism charges against her were later dropped on appeal and her sentence reduced to fiveyears, Alemu continues to suffer from her government's efforts to silence dissenting voices and scare independent journalists into self-censorship. Atumor in Alemu's breast remains untreated as she is denied access to medical care, and threats of solitary confinement linger over her every move in Ethiopia's notoriously ill-maintained Kaliti prison.

While the Ethiopian leadership insists on the country's adherence to the rule of law, there seems to be little doubt in the international community that Alemu's arrest and conviction was politically motivated: The International Women's Media Foundation honored Alemu with its Courage in Journalism Award last year, and in May 2013, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) recognized her

According to the Committee to Protect Journalists, Ethiopia jailed more journalists than any other country in Africa in 2012 (with the exception ofEritrea), and 45 Ethiopian journalists have been forced into exile since 2008. Swedish journalist Martin Schibbye who gained first-hand experience with Ethiopia's crackdown on press freedom after being arrested there himself in June 2011, delivers a damning verdict on the rule of law in Ethiopia: "There is no such thing as an independent justice system, it's completely politicized. If the order comes from the federal level that Reeyot is to let go, she will be free. But if they feel that they gain more from keeping her in prison, they will keep her locked up. This decision lies entirely in the hands of the Ethiopian government," he said.

But the Ethiopian authorities seem to be determined to keep Alemu silenced. Earlier this week, as Ethiopians were preparing for their New Year's celebration, prison officials denied Alemu visits from anyone but herparents. It remains unclear whether the decision to keep her separated from her friends, siblings, and fiance is in response to an open letter Alemu wrote in August, criticizing Ethiopia's Anti-Terrorism Proclamation, but it appears to be unlikely that the timing of the new restrictions is coincidence. Protesting the prison's decision to deny her visits from friendsand relatives, Alemu has gone on hunger strike. The IWMF is deeply concerned about Alemu's health and well-being, and calls on the decision- makers at Kaliti prison to re-instate Alemu's full visitation privileges immediately.

Ethiopia - More land grabs, more indigenous people pushed out’

A journalist's visit to South Omo, where rights groups say police have raped women and otherwise pressured locals to leave an area tagged tobecome a huge sugar plantation, was quickly curtailed by authorities.

The CSM (September 16, 2013) By Will Davison - As night wore on in a remote valley in southern Ethiopia, one policeman dozed and another watched a DVD comedy on a battery-powered laptop. Close by, in a clutchof thorn trees and grass huts, an ethnic Mursi man tried to explain to outsiders why he is so concerned for his people, who have lived here as semi-nomads for generations but may soon be evicted to make way for a giant sugar plantation. "We Mursi [people] do not accept this ambitious government ideology," the man said of an official state plan to house them in new villages in exchange for their compliant departure. He is speaking in the village of Hailewuha, his face lit by flashlight. Cattle shuffle and grunt nearby. "What we want is to use our own traditional way of cultivation," he says. Ethiopian officials say the Mursi, like a growing number of ethnic or tribal groups in Ethiopia, are voluntarily moving out oftheir ancient lands; human rights groups say this is untrue. The ongoing controversy is not new in Ethiopia, and "land grabs" by governments for lucrative leasing deals have become a story across the continent. For example, in Ethiopia's lush Gambella region, in the western area borderingSudan, locals have been forcibly relocated to make way for the leasing of farms to foreign firms. This year, the World Bank and British aid agencies were swept into controversy over charges they helped fund the relocation including salary payments to local officials involved in the clearing of land.

The Mursi have lived in Omo for centuries. Partly for this reason they get frequent visits by tourists and anthropologists alike. Tall and elaborately decorated, their scarified bodies are daubed with paint and ornamented byhooped earrings and bicep bangles. But now the Mursi may be those mostaffected by government operations to overhaul South Omo, an area that officials in Addis Ababa are calling economically and socially backward.
The plan would turn this scrub and savanna into about 700 square milesof state-owned sugar plantations that would in turn require building Ethiopia’s largest irrigation project. The water to feed the sugar cane year-round is to come from the Omo river, and is made possible by GibeIII, a partly Chinese-funded hydropower dam that may be completed as early as next year. The cane will be processed at some five local factories.The people of this valley, the Mursi, Bodi, and Karo, some of whom number only a few thousand, would need to reduce their cattle -- their most prized possessions. Then many if not all will move into enlarged permanent villages.
Controlling the flow of the river will mean the end of an annual flood that makes fertile a strip of land for crops once the seasonal waters recede. An ongoing attempt to control Mursi traditions now means that at public meetings, state authorities implore the group toend “very bad” cultural practices like stick fighting and their characteristic lip-plates. To be sure, Ethiopian authorities promise new jobs, public services, and plenty of irrigation for every Omo household that agrees to move out. But this is not the view of international human rights groups who claim that Ethiopia is broadly and constantly harming locals as part ofan authoritarian model of development.
In the most recent salvo, the Oakland Institute accused the state of using killings, beatings, and rapes as methods of forcing South Omo residents toaccept the sugar cane projects. The California-based advocacy group also accused Western aid agencies and some US and British officials of covering up evidence of the abuses they heard about on research missions. Instead of investigating claims made by Survival International, Human Rights Watch, and the Oakland Institute, Ethiopian authorities smear them as anti-development. These groups help "drag Ethiopia back to the Stone Age," is how the prime minister's spokesperson, Getachew Reda, recently described Oakland's agenda. “We have a scar from them [critics]," says the chief administrator of South Omo, Molloka Wubneh

Toricha, about the activists and journalists who make the 400 mile journey from Addis Ababa to the Kenya-border area, hoping to monitor developments. "They try and blacken our image." Yet in the single nighttime interview the Monitor was able to conduct with the Mursi, the criticism of the rights groups were echoed: "The government uses our ignorance and backwardness to control us," said the Mursi man. "They force us to do farming…. Those who have been in the bush shall settle together in common village and be brothers. But our leaders do not acceptthis."

It is impossible to verify whether these comments reflect the community'sopinion since officials and police prevented further inquiries by reporters ina trip there in August. While regional officials at first permitted access to the Mursi, a few hours later, the administration backtracked. Reporters onan independent visit were forced to camp next to the Hailewuha police station. A security commander regularly called in on a shortwave radio to check that the journalists were still corralled. Senior regional police arrived the next morning to escort them back to the regional capital, Jinka. Later, apologetic officials in Jinka all had the same explanation: there had been a "misunderstanding." Yet rather than a genuine mix-up, the obstruction seemed to stem from a basic mistrust of outside eyes and voices. Mr. Molloka said journalists frequently "divert" the views of residents: "This is what burns our hearts," he says, "at public meetings wetold all the people not to give information to journalists." With media muzzled and most civil society initiatives stifled by restrictive laws, there is little independent information about what is happening in South Omo.

Along with the plight of the Mursi, for example, little is known about the impact of as many as 700,000 migrant workers that may move here to work on the sugar cane plantations. Tewolde Woldemariam, a scholar andsenior figure in the ruling party, who left in 2001, and an academician, Fana Gebresenbet, argue that the people, cultures, language and rights ofSouth Omo people, which are theoretically protected by the constitution, are threatened by the new influx of migrant workers. "Unless the problemis realized and mechanisms to tackle it are put in place, this demographic change puts the cultural and linguistic rights of the indigenous ethnic groups…at great risk," they wrote for a conference in April at the Institute for Peace and Security Studies at Addis Ababa University.

The sugar and resettlement projects are well-intended but the scholars note there is little official response about possible adverse effects. "The attitude of lumping everyone who raises the possibility of negative consequence of the development project on the local culture as one who wants to permanently perpetuate the pastoral lifestyle for tourist purposesis rampant at all levels of the region," they said. The Mursi man that was interviewed at night said this: "If we will be mixed with external people, perhaps we will be exposed to some contagious diseases like HIV/AIDS which we have never experienced in life." One important failing of trying to engineer and control the future of Omo, say analysts sympathetic to the nomads, is that local residents are kept from the design and involvement in policies concerning them. The Mursi man who we spoke to asked: "The government forces us to accept this project. Do you think thisis a good way?"

Ethiopia - Giant underground blob of magma puzzles InternationalScientists'

NBC News: (September 19, 2013) The Afar Rift in Ethiopia is marked by enormous gashes that signal the breakup of the African continent and the beginnings of a new ocean basin, scientists think. The fractures appear eerily similar to seafloor spreading centers, the volcanic ridges that mark the boundaries between two pieces of oceanic crust. Along the ridges, lavabubbles up and new crust is created, slowly widening the ocean basin. Buta look deep beneath the Afar Rift reveals that the birth announcements may be premature. "It's not as close to fully formed seafloor spreading as we thought," said Kathy Whaler, a geophysicist at the University of Edinburgh in Scotland. Whaler and her colleagues have spotted 120 cubic miles (500 cubic kilometers) of magma sitting in the mantle under the Afar Rift. Hot liquids such as magma like to rise, so the discovery is a conundrum. "We didn't expect this, because magma wants to pop up like a cork in water; it's too buoyant compared to the surrounding medium in the mantle," Whaler told LiveScience's OurAmazingPlanet. Models predict that at spreading ridges, magma should sit just under the rifts, in the crust. That's what geoscientists see in the oceans, at places such as the Mid-Atlantic Ridge and the Juan de Fuca Ridge. But not only is the giant pool at Afar extremely deep, but it is also mostly below the sleeping Badi volcano, many miles west of the scene of a 2005 series of underground magma intrusions, Whaler said. "You just wouldn't expect to have a blob of magma still underneath this other area," Whaler said. "It's one of the things we're still having a lot of discussions about." The findings, published Sept. 5 in the journal Nature Geoscience, add a new twist to theAfar Rift puzzle. Thanks to intense international attention — from scientists intrigued by the 2005 intrusions — the region is one of the best-studied spreading centers in the world. But a lively debate continues over whether the Afar Rift is a unique case or a textbook example of a fracturing continent.

Triple threat: The Afar region sits at the junction of three tectonic plates, all of which are spreading apart. Here, Earth's brittle crust fractures as theplates tear away from one another, but the mantle underneath adjusts by stretching like warm plastic. The mantle rocks rising beneath the thinning crust melt from lowered pressure, creating magma. [Infographic: Tallest Mountain to Deepest Ocean Trench]. In 2005, a series of earthquakes in Dabbahu, Ethiopia, announced the arrival of new magma squeezing into the crust. Vertical fingers of molten rock shot into underground fractures, 14 in all. The longest intrusion was about 26 feet (8 meters) wide and spread through 37 miles (60 kilometers) of crust in just 10 days.

Fractures along the Afar Rift in Ethiopia resemble those at a mid-ocean ridge, where two pieces of oceanic crust spread apart. Whaler and her colleagues searched for the source of these vertical injections, called dikes, with instruments that measure changes in magnetic and electric fields in the Earth. Both are sensitive to underground liquids, which have ahigher electrical conductivity than rock (meaning electrons have an easier time moving through them). The team discovered the feeder for the magma intrusions: a shallow, small chamber directly under the dikes, about 4 miles (7 kilometers) wide and 3 to 6 miles (5 to 10 kilometers) below the surface.

Rare reservoir: But in the mantle, the layer beneath Earth's crust, a huge 18-mile-wide (30-kilometer-wide) region of very high conductivity reachesdown to a depth of 20 miles (35 kilometers), well below the 12-mile-thick (20-kilometer-thick) crust. This giant magma zone isn't one big pool, but a series of interconnected pockets, scientists think. The findings were bolstered by research in geochemistry, rock composition and seismology from other teams, Whaler said. "The results from standard electrical conductivity get a huge range, so the additional information gives additional bounds. I suspect nobody would have believed us without somesupporting evidence from other techniques." For example, a study published in the journal Nature on July 4 shows the mantle under the Afarregion is about 180 degrees Fahrenheit (100 degrees Celsius) hotter than it should be. And although the crust is thinner than in other spots around the planet, it is actually thicker than models predict. [What is Earth Made Of?]

Questions remain: Taken together, the recent discoveries suggest researchers still don't understand how the final stages of breakup occur in continental crust, Whaler said. "Most people have said we can look at the Afar Rift and it's a good on-land analogue of midocean ridges," she said. "But what this result says is, there is still quite a distinct difference between the crust and upper mantle beneath a fully formed spreading ridge and the Afar Rift." For Roger Buck, a geophysicist at Columbia University's Lamont-Doherty Earth Observatory who was not involved in the study, the discovery raises questions about what controls the timing ofmagmatic activity such as dike intrusions. "A commonly held view is that long, quiet periods occur because there is no magma available in the crustto trigger dike opening and volcanism at spreading centers," Buck wrote inan accompanying editorial published in Nature Geoscience. "However, the results ... bring into question this standard view. Instead, there may always be large quantities of magma available in the mantle and shallow crust at many spreading centers."

Ethiopia-USAID and other international aid agencies accused of ignoringhuman rights abuses ‘

EAN - September 19, 2013: The World Bank, the US Agency for International Development (USAID), and the UK's Department for International Development (DFID) have consistently failed to act on allegations of human rights abuses in Ethiopia, including ones that are tiedto their aid programmes, according to new reports by Human Rights Watch (HRW) and the Oakland Institute, a California-based think tank.

The Ethiopia case is a microcosm of the issues regularly faced by wealthy western governments and international aid organisations attempting to provide health and other types of foreign assistance to governments with questionable records on issues like human rights, corruption, and governance. Ethiopia is one of the biggest recipients of foreign aid money,according to the Oakland Institute, receiving an average of US$3·5 billion a year from donors, which accounts for more than half of its national budget.

Djibouti commences a U.S.$600 Million Rail to Link Ethiopia, South Sudan’

ERTA: ADDIS ABABA - September 20, 2013: The Djibouti Government on said that its rail project under construction would facilitate business activities and improve revenue for countries in the East African region.Therail project is being undertaken by China Civil Engineering Construction Corporation (CCECC) at a cost of 600 million dollars and financed by the China EXIM Bank. Djibouti's Transport Minister, Moussa Ahmed, had on Tuesday inaugurated a committee to supervise the project expected to be completed within two years. Ahmed, who is attending the Joint Rail Commission meeting in Addis Ababa told News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) on Thursday that the railway line "will facilitate access to different marketsin the region and will also link Djibouti to South Sudan through Ethiopia." Meanwhile Ethiopia's Transport Minister, Workneh Gebeyehu said that the new railway line would change the socio-economic conditions of the two countries as well as generate jobs for youths. Workneh appealed to the project handlers and the government of Djibouti to ensure its completion within the time frame for the speedy realization of its economic benefits tothe countries. The Ethiopian Government is also undertaking a similar project handled by the Chinese company linking Addis Ababa with Djibouti. The Ethiopian project is also expected to be completed within thenext two years, the Ethiopian transport minister said.

Ethiopia: Fiscal Ethiopian year-2006 Promises to Be a Year of Change’

Addis Fortune opinion: Addis Ababa (September 22, 2013) - The Ethiopian2006 fiscal year promises to be a year of change up on Lorenzo Te'azaz Road, those at the gossip corridors anticipate. If nothing else - and little isin store in substantive policy changes - there is no doubt there will be a change of guard in many federal agencies, including those whose custodians have not changed for over a decade, claims gossip. A little overa year in office, Hailemariam Desalegn appears to be moving ahead slowlybut surely. His pace does seem to give the impression to the larger public that he is too slow, however, according to gossip. He might have learnt a trick or two from his former mentor, Meles Zenawi, that it is always to his advantage to be underestimated by foes and friends alike, gossip claims. Having an enormous political capital, including from sceptics who chose togive him the benefit of the doubt, he has already started the reshuffling process within his administration, gossip noticed. The veteran ideologue ofthe Revolutionary Democratic movement in Ethiopia, Abay Tsehaye, has been relieved off of his responsibility as chief of the nation's nascent Sugar estates, as of the first week of October 2013, gossip disclosed.

Abay may have a sharp difference of opinion on the fate and evolution of the Sugar estates under development in the south and north-west of the country, according to gossip. Strapped with cash, the federal government may be compelled to rethink, in order to draw in its horns from developing10 of these estates, gossip observed. An alternative is to develop them through joint venture arrangements, where there is already a strong desire demonstrated by investors from the Middle East, particularly Kuwait, gossip disclosed. In as much as there are those in the administration who are in favour of the latter's option, Abay is reportedly in the camp where he would rather see a complete state hold on the estates, claims gossip. Perhaps free from the nitty-gritty of daily governance, he will now have time to focus on his advisory role on strategic policy directions, joining the league of Bereket Simon, Kassu Illala (PhD) and Kuma Demekissa, gossip says. On the active governance front though, Abay's move in two weeks is just a signal of what is yet to come. The old guard in the movement is giving way to the second generation of EPRDFites, which Hailemariam himself belongs to, accordingto gossip.

The change of guards in the military and security establishments is where those at the gossip corridors claim backroom politics is currently underway. In the forefront, however, a Prime Minister - who appears to befed up with bureaucratic bottlenecks, which have nearly neutralised the nation's competitiveness - has established a council he himself is there to chair. Largely composed of private sector leaders representing the variousindustry lobby groups and associations, the National Competitiveness Council was launched on Friday, September 20, 2013, winning a unanimous support of those who took part at the Council of Ministers meeting. It is a Council designated with the ownership of responsibilities, and is legally mandated to hunt for road blocks, from policy to regulatory and officialdom, and pushes its way through the jam, gossip anticipates.

For much of the problems originate from the inefficient and incapable, ifnot the corrupt, people installed into high offices as rewards for their political loyalty, it will be inevitable to see the Council and its members encounter hostility from the very officialdom that has little incentive to support it, gossip anticipates.

Battling the brain drain: Training doctors in Ethiopia'

EAN - Medical Press (September 24, 2013) Brain drain is so severe in Ethiopia that the nation's health minister has complained there are more Ethiopian doctors in Chicago than in his own country. The good news is that the East African nation has one of the world's fastest-growing economies and is recovering from the nightmare decades of civil war and famine. Tackling the health care crisis is high on the priority list of the government, which has opened 13 new medical schools in the last two years. But training the doctors is still a huge challenge. One physician whois playing a key role in Ethiopia's bold medical initiative is Senait Fisseha, an associate professor of obstetrics and gynecology at the University of Michigan. She's leading a U-M effort to develop a postgraduate training program for doctors of obstetrics and gynecology that is fast-becoming a national model for Ethiopia.

Fisseha said that U-M has learned from its work in other African nations—especially Ghana—that one of the best ways to retain medical talent is to offer doctors training and other opportunities to advance their careers. "People don't want to leave their country if they have the option to stay there. Nobody wants to be a second-class citizen somewhere else," Fisseha said. Last year, Fisseha established a postgraduate OB-GYN training program at St. Paul's Hospital in Ethiopia's capital, Addis Ababa, with the help of Tim Johnson, chair of U-M's department of OB-GYN, and Joe Kolars, senior associate dean for Global REACH. Her work is funded bya $1.6 million grant from an anonymous foundation. She has received an additional $270,000 per year for the next five years from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the American International Health Alliance. When she began working at St. Paul's, the hospital only had two OB-GYN doctors. One was an administrator and the other was the department chair, assisted by 16 midwives. "They have about 250,000 visits per year and they do about 4,000 deliveries. That's equivalent to what we do at U-M," Fisseha said. "But we have over 80 OB-GYN faculty, 24 residents and 25 fellows."

Since the start of the partnership with U-M, the hospital has been able to recruit six more OB-GYN physicians who decided to leave their private practice or jobs at nongovernmental organizations. The doctors—who can make seven times more money in private practice—were willing to trade higher pay for better career opportunities, Fisseha said. When the OB-GYNtraining program started last year, seven residents were enrolled and 13 are taking part this year. "Now, there are 200 OB-GYNs in the country with a 90-million population," Fisseha said. "In four years, we will be able to contribute about 50 OB-GYNs. It's a quarter of what the country has now. It's a massive contribution." Postgraduate training programs are extremely rare in Ethiopia. After students earn their medical degrees as undergraduates, they're sent out into the field as generalists, often working on their own with little supervision. "They are the surgeons. They are the OB-GYNs. They learn to do everything while they are deployed to the rural areas after medical school and internship," Fisseha said. The U-M doctor knows Ethiopia well because she was born in Addis Ababa andexperienced much of the violence and tumult of the dark days.

Fisseha came to the U.S. in 1989 after finishing high school. After earningdegrees in medicine and law at the University of Southern Illinois, she decided to do her residency at U-M, impressed by the university's work inAfrica. "We go and deliver," Fisseha said, summing up U-M's approach to capacity building—transferring knowledge and skills. After finishing her residency in 2006, she was eager to start a training program in Ethiopia, but the timing wasn't right yet. The prospects started looking promising two years ago when progressive officials in Ethiopia began mobilizing global resources to improve health care in the country. "Everybody who travels to Ethiopia says that this is a robust time for change," Fisseha said. "It's easy to implement things. You can move things quickly. Peoplefunction differently." Fisseha has also been collaborating with other departments in the medical school and arranging exchanges between Ethiopian and U-M faculty in other fields, such as surgery, nephrology, radiology and anesthesia.

A postgraduate training program in general surgery was launched this month and planning is in place to start internal medicine and radiology training programs in 2014. The partnership is now expanding beyond the medical school and she has colleagues from the Ross School of Business and the William Davidson Institute as well as biomedical engineering collaborating with her in Ethiopia. The country also has much to offer U-Mmedical students, she said. "The kinds of diseases they see in Ethiopia arevery rare here," Fisseha said. "Diseases are detected early in the U.S. Forexample, you don't see advanced breast cancer eroding through the breast. You only see it in textbooks." Ethiopian doctors are also highly skilled at practicing cost-effective health care because of limited resources. "It's a tremendous learning environment for our students," Fisseha said.

traditional and seasonal whole bean coffees offered at Starbucks retailstores nationwide.

"We've taken great care in sourcing this coffee and applying the signature Starbucks roast to create a flavor profile that is both uniquely Starbucks and unique to specialty coffee," said Craig Russell, senior vice president ofGlobal Coffee at Starbucks. "We want to honor Ethiopia's rich coffee heritage while also giving our customers an exceptional flavor experience from the birthplace of coffee." With its high elevation, rich volcanic soil, and more than 10,000 coffee varieties, Ethiopia produces some of the most extraordinary coffee in the world. Coffee was discovered in Africa more than 1,200 years ago and is where the first arabica beans were grown. Today, coffee remains central to Ethiopian culture and heritage and is shared with familyand friends through daily coffee ceremonies often occurring throughout the day lasting up to several hours. Multiple steps in the ceremony include pan-roasting green coffee, grinding the roasted beans using a mortar and pestle, and preparing the roasted and ground coffee in a spherical-shaped pot called a jebena. The coffee is then served in traditional tasting cups. Ethiopia coffee is availableat Starbucks® retail stores and starbucksstore.com for the suggested retail price of $13.95 U.S. per pound. Customers can sample Ethiopia coffee at participating Starbucks® stores in the U.S. on National Coffee Day, September 29, and those who purchase a 1 lb. bag of Ethiopia wholebean will receive a commemorative Ethiopia tasting cup, while supplies last. Ethiopia coffee will be available for customers to order as a brewed option through October 15,2013 at select Starbucks stores.

Starbucks Four Fundamentals for Brewing Great Coffee at Home:

The following are quick tips for getting the most from brewing Ethiopiacoffee (or any Starbucks coffee) at home:

Freshness - Once you have opened the bag of coffee, Starbucks recommends grinding coffee fresh and using it within a week. Storing coffee in the refrigerator or freezer causes condensation on the bean and can negatively affect the flavor.

Proportion - Starbucks recommends 2 tablespoons of coffee per 6 fl oz. offresh water.

Water - Start with clean, filtered water heated just off the boil (195° to 205°F). For a milder cup, add hot water after brewing versus changing theration of coffee to water.
Grind - From a fine grind to course, there are different grind texture fordifferent brewing methods. Starbucks is happy to Grind - From a fine grind coffee for customers while they wait, but if grinding at home is preferred, here is a helpful guide: Espresso grind = powdered sugar, Pour over grind = granulated sugar, French press grind = Kosher salt, Standard drip brewer grind = cornmeal, Uncommon Grounds: The History of Coffee and How It Transformed Our World byMark Pendergrast.

Political repression in Ethiopia'
EM commentary (September 24, 2013) By Graham Peebles: They speak ofdemocracy, but act violently to suppress dissenting voices and control the people through the inculcation of fear: they ignore human rights and trample on the people, they are a tyrannical wolf in democratic sheep's clothing, causing suffering and misery to thousands of people throughout Ethiopia. The Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) government repeatedly scoffs at international law and consistently acts in violation of their own Federal constitution – a liberal document written by the regime to please and deceive their foreign supporters. They have enacted laws of repression: the widely condemned Charities and Societies (ATD) law (CSO law) and the Anti Terrorism Declaration, which is the main tool of political control, together with the 'Mass Media and Freedom of Information Proclamation' they form a formidable unjust arsenal of government control. Freedom of the media (which is largely 'state- owned') is denied and political dissent is all but outlawed. Against this repressive backdrop, the Semayawi (Blue) party, a new opposition group, organized peaceful protests on the 2nd June in Addis Ababa. Ten thousand or so people marched through the capital demanding the release of political prisoners, "respect for the constitution" and Justice! Justice!
Justice! It was (Reuters 2/06/2013 reported), an "anti-Government procession…. the first large-scale protest since a disputed 2005 election ended in street violence that killed 200 people", a 'disputed election' result that was discredited totally by European Union observers and denouncedby opposition groups and large swathes of the population.

The Chairman of the Semayawi Party, Yilekal Getnet, told Reuters, “We have repeatedly asked the government to release political leaders, journalists and those who asked the government not to intervene in religious affairs”. In keeping with the recent worldwide movement for freedom and social justice, he stated that, “if these questions are not resolved and no progress is made in the next three months, we will organize more protests. It is the beginning of our struggle”. To the disappointment of many and the surprise of nobody, the government has made no attempt to ‘resolve’ the questions raised, and true to their word a second demonstration was planned for 1st September in Addis Ababa. Inthe event, as the BBC report, around “100 members of Ethiopia’s opposition Semayawi (Blue) party were arrested and some badly beaten”, and “equipment such as sound systems were confiscated”, ahead of the planned rally, which was banned by the EPRDF. Government justification formed, and a cock and bull story was duly constructed with Communication Minister Shimeles Kemal stating “the venue [for Semayawi’s event) had already been booked by a pro-government group condemning religious extremism”. Non-interference in religious affairs is one of the key demands of the Semayawi party, a demand based upon theconstitutional commitment of religious independence from the State, which Muslim groups claim the government has violated. Enraged by government interference in all matters religious, the Muslim community have organised regular small-scale protests and sit-ins in the capital for the last two years. In early August, Reuters 8/08/2013 reported “Demonstrators chanted "Allahu Akbar" and hoisted banners that read "respect the constitution", referring to allegations that the government has tried to influence the highest Muslim affairs body, the Ethiopia Islamic Affairs Supreme Council”. Around 40% of Ethiopia’s population (around 85million) are Muslim, for generations they have lived amicably with their Orthodox Christians neighbours, who make up the majority in the country;they are moderate in their beliefs and peaceful in their ways. The EPRDF in contrast are violent, intolerant and ideologically driven; ‘Revolutionary Democracy’ being the particular tune to which the democratic dictatorship hums and drums its partisan rule.

Why Kenya Police Alert at Border With Ethiopia?

EAN (September 24, 2013) Security has been tightened at the border of Ethiopia and Kenya following the Westgate attack. Marsabit county commissioner Isaiah Nakoru said the security apparatus in the region have been upscaled and the patrols intensified to ensure that the suspected attackers don't flee out or into the country. He said all police chiefs have been ordered to beef up their security checks and ensure no one gets in or out of the country. Nakoru directed all lodges, hotels, barsand Public Service Vehicle operators in the region to review their security arrangements, including screening visitors. He was addressing officers atMarsabit Catholic Hall on Sunday when he presided over a forum for uniformed officers. Nakoru said officers have been deployed in communalplaces such as churches to check on the security. He said adequate security measures have been put in place to avert the terrorist attack.

GOSSIP - Former first lady Azeb Mesfin's arrest appearing to be real'

EM (September 25, 2013) - Azeb Mesfin, the widow of Ethiopia's deceaseddictator, is facing multiple charges of corruption and her arrest is imminent unless she leaves the country, according to Ethiopian Review sources in Addis Ababa. Political and business associates of Azeb Mesfin are dropping like flies. The biggest one to fall was Gebrewahid WoldeGiorgis, a senior official, who was charged with stealing over one hundred million birr. Others are leaving the country with their families.

Since May 2013, over 50 high profile TPLF officials and businessmen havebeen arrested on charges of corruption. All of them are associates and partners of Azeb. Azeb, aka the 'Mother of Corruption', is currently being protected by Abay Woldu, chairman of the Tigray Peoples Liberation Front(TPLF), and Bereket Simon, former propaganda chief, but both Abay and Berket are being marginalized politically, and Abay is fighting to maintainhis diminishing authority over the TPLF now.

ETHIOPIA - Feudal past still discourages farmers from planting trees'

BOGOR, Indonesia - commentary by Andrea Booth (September 25, 2013) Despite recent measures to encourage Ethiopia's farmers to plant trees ontheir land, the country's complex feudal past still lingers to discourage tree planting in the country, says a study by the Center for International Forestry Research (CIFOR). "Tree planting on farms is influenced by the sense of security farmers have about their land tenure. Since the expansion of the Ethiopian kingdom in the 13th century, when kings wouldgrade the landscapes wherever they went, many farmers have stopped planting trees," said CIFOR scientist Habtemariam Kassa, lead author of Reading the landscape past: Explaining the lack of on-farm tree planting in Ethiopia.

Unless tree planting activities are intensified, Kassa said, Ethiopians not only risk further degradation of their land — they're also missing out on anopportunity to tap into potentially lucrative commercial forestry business opportunities. In 2010/11, Ethiopia's central statistics agency reported thenational poverty head count index — the share of the population whose income or consumption is below the poverty line – was at 29.6 percent.

Total annual household income could be increased by at least 30 percent iffarmers were planting trees on their lands not suitable for crop production, showed a 2003 study. "In the same timeframe, Ethiopia's import of timber and other wood products amounted to more than $120 million," Kassa said. "So there are huge domestic trade opportunities that farmers could tap into by growing timber trees and there's also demandfrom neighboring countries and the Middle East," Kassa said.

An ever-increasing demand for wood: Most of Ethiopia's rural population depends on wood fuel for its primary energy source. Scientists have predicted that if Ethiopia is to meet next year's wood demand (which is three times as high as supply), it will have to plant trees on 6 million hectares (14.8 million acres) of land. It has a long way to go: an assessment in 2000 estimated Ethiopia's planted area at 216,000 hectares(534,000 acres). "The demand for food and wood by the urban and rural population for construction and for energy is growing as Ethiopia's population grows. And this demand must be met by bringing trees into theequation if we are to reduce huge wood import bills, and avoid soil erosion, wood and food shortage, drought and subsequent famine," Kassa said. In countries like Ethiopia where land degradation and drought frequency are undermining the production of annual crops, tree growing could constitute an opportunity for landscape rehabilitation, Kassa said. "But despite this, tree planting has remained marginal. To understand whyfarmers sometimes plant trees around their homes but rarely on their land, Kassa and his team interviewed farmers, examined legal documents and used maps and satellite images to examine past and current trends inthe country's Rift Valley. What emerged was a complex feudal history thathas, for hundreds of years, discouraged farmers from planting trees on their land.

Thy kingdom come: In the 13th century, Ethiopian kings would constantlymove from place to place to evade their enemies, with tens of thousands of soldiers and followers in tow exhausting fuel wood sources and degrading the landscape in each region. As the Ethiopian kingdom expanded to the south, much of the land came under the ownership of thestate, with large areas of agricultural land allocated to military officials and senior civil servants. The peasants were turned into tenants who had to pay parts of their produce to the new owners of the land. Landlords also discouraged tree planting, as it competed with grain for space. "This may have instilled a feeling of instability that influenced farmers, particularly in central and southern Ethiopia, not to plant trees," Kassa said.

Ethiopia-The Depths of Corruption under the poverty ridden economy'

ADDIS ABABA/LONDON (IPS) September 25, 2013 – Ethiopia may be oneof the fastest-growing, non-oil producing economies in Africa in recent years, but corruption in this Horn of Africa nation is a deterrent to foreigninvestors looking for stable long-term partnerships in developing countries. "Bankers, miners and developers presenting projects to investment committees in countries that fare badly in corruption rankingsfrequently struggle to get investment. Corruption raises red flags becauseit makes local markets uncompetitive, unpredictable and therefore largely hostile to these long-term players," Ed Hobey, the East Africa analyst at the political risk firm Africa Risk Consulting, told IPS. On May 11, in the biggest crackdown on corruption in Ethiopia in the last 10 years, authorities arrested more than 50 high profile people including government officials, businessmen and a minister. Melaku Fanta, the director general of the Revenue and Customs Authority, which is the equivalent rank of a minister, his deputy, Gebrewahid Woldegiorgis, and other officials were apprehended on suspicion of tax evasion. But the arrests have raised questions about the endemic corruption at the heart ofthe country's political elite. Berhanu Assefa of the Federal Ethics and Anti-corruption Commission of Ethiopia told IPS that these arrests highlighted how corruption has insinuated itself into the higher levels of officialdom. "Corruption is a serious problem we are facing. We now see that corruption is occurring in higher places than we had previously expected. Areas vulnerable to corruption are land administration, tax and revenue, the justice system, telecommunications, land procurement, licensing areasand the finance sector," he said. Ethiopia ranks 113 out of 176 countries on the Corruption Perceptions Index of Transparency International, a global civil society coalition that encourages accountability. The country has also lost close to 12 billion dollars since 2000 to illicit financial outflows, according to Global Financial Integrity (GFI), whose statistics arebased on official data provided by the Ethiopian government, the World Bank, and the International Monetary Fund (IMF).

Dr. Getachew Begashaw, a professor of economics at Harper College in the United States, told IPS that there was a fear that the recent high profile arrests were merely political theatre designed to placate major donors such as the World Bank and the IMF, and to give credibility to the new regime's fight against corruption. Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn took over leadership of the country after Prime Minister Meles Zenawi died in August 2012. "They are using this as a PR stunt to appeasenot only the donors, but to also dupe the Ethiopian people. Because many non-party affiliated Ethiopians in the business community are complaining,and this complaint is trickling down to the average people on the streets," he told IPS. According to the World Bank, companies held by business group the Endowment Fund for the Rehabilitation of Tigray (EFFORT) account for roughly half of the country's modern economy. The group is closely allied with the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPDRF), an alliance of four parties. EFFORT is a conglomerate formed from assets collected in 1991 by the EPRDF to rehabilitate the Tigray region in northern Ethiopia after it had been decimated by poverty and conflict. The Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) is the lead party in the EPDRF coalition. Tigrayans, however, only account for eight percentof the country's 90 million people. According to Abebe Gellaw, an exiled Ethiopian journalist and founder of Addis Voice, a web platform that provides news that is otherwise censored by the Ethiopian government, EFFORT has become a business racket for the Tigrayan elite who are monopolising major sources of the country's wealth. "The TPLF controls key government institutions and a significant portion of the economy. Forover 15 years, EFFORT has been used by the TPLF to channel public resources and funds to the coffers of the TPLF through illegal deals, contracts, tax evasion, kick-backs and all sorts of illegal operations," he told IPS.

Azeb Mesfin, Zenawi's widow, currently manages the multi-billion-dollar business empire. She claims her husband paid himself a modest salary of 250 dollars a month, yet the online website "the Richest.org", which publishes the net worth of the richest people in the world, recently divulged that Meles was in fact one of Africa's wealthiest leaders having amassed a personal fortune of three billion dollars. This has led many to question the provenance of the erstwhile leader's wealth – when he had no known business engagements. Illicit financial flows as a result of corruption are a major hindrance to a country's development, undermining institutions, economies and societies. According to the Africa Progress Panel's Africa Progress Report 2013, the continent is losing morethrough illicit financial outflows than it receives in aid and foreign direct investment. A commitment to greater accountability and transparency to curtail illicit financial flows should occur on both the national and international levels, according to E. J. Fagan, deputy communications director at GFI. "Reforms and policies are needed to strengthen customs enforcement and make governing apparatuses more transparent. The international community can create a multilateral system of automatic exchange of tax information that African countries like Ethiopia can access, so as to make it difficult for illicit actors to hide money and transfer large amounts of illicit money without detection," he told IPS. Begashaw added that corruption in the social sphere also breeds social inequality, disenfranchisement and a breakdown in national unity and civilsociety. "The very existence of parastatals and TPLF-affiliated endowed business conglomerates like EFFORT is a major source of corruption. The Birr (Ethiopian currency) will depreciate and inflation will skyrocket. The capacity of the state to provide public goods and services will decline. Freemarket competition will be eroded. Government revenue will be reduced and the budget deficit will rise. "If they are really serious about combatingcorruption, they should start doing so from the top," he said.

Religious Holiday: Ethiopia Celebrates Mesquel (the feast of the HolyCross)'

Yellow daisies are collected to mark the religious holiday - A ChristianHoliday All Its Own

IBT OPINION: (September 27, 2013) A massive bonfire blazed in the central square of Ethiopia's capital city, Addis Ababa, on Thursday night. But by Friday morning, the mess had been swept away, leaving nothing but a giant spot of soot on the asphalt. Thousands of people had flocked to the arena, called Meskel Square, to watch the ceremonial lighting of the fire for the eve of Meskel, a national holiday also known as the Finding of the True Cross. Ethiopians from across the country -- and visitors from around the world -- carried yellow daises, wooden crosses and wax candles as the pile of wood burned down to the pavement. Smaller bonfires were lit after sunset throughout the city, in backyards and on street corners, and celebrations continued throughout the night. On Fridaymorning, the square was still buzzing; Orthodox Christians, many with soot on their foreheads in the shape of a cross, congregated at Meskel Square or paid a visit to the nearby Estifanos Church. After the spectacle of Meskel eve, the holiday itself is a time for rest, family togetherness andfeasting -- though Sept. 27 fell on a Friday this year, a fasting day, which means that Orthodox Christians will have to abstain from meat.

"Families come together for the ceremony," said Johannes, 34, who is pursuing his Master's degree in Addis. "It's a celebration to join people together, hand to hand. For the people, for God, for the government, and for prayer." Legend has it that on this day around 330 AD, St. Helena -- who is known as Nigist Eleni in Ethiopia and was the mother of Rome's first Christian emperor, Constantine -- found the cross on which Jesus hadbeen crucified. In accordance with a revelation she'd had in a dream, Helena burned a giant pile of wood and frankincense. The smoke rose intothe sky and then arced back down to earth, showing her the spot where the cross had been buried. Fragments of the cross were distributed to churches around the world, and one found its way to Ethiopia, where it is now said to be buried under the Gishen Mariam Church in the northeastern Wollo region. Ethiopia, which has one of the most devout Orthodox communities in the world, is the only country that celebrates thefinding of the cross on a national level. The Meskel festival is about 1,600 years old, but it wasn't always celebrated this grandly. During the 1970s and 80s, when Ethiopia was ruled by a Marxist military junta called the Derg, religion took a backseat to politics and the giant bonfire was bannedfrom Meskel Square. During that time, Ethiopians suspected of supportingthe resistance were often killed -- up to 500,000 people died during the Red Terror, a period of government-backed brutalities during the mid- 1970s -- or detained. Johannes himself was only 16 when he was arrestedand thrown into prison for one year. "At that time," he said, "there was noreligion."

The Duerg fell apart as the Soviet Union, its biggest benefactor, withdrewfrom the world stage during the late 1980s. It was ultimately defeated bythe Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front, or EPRDF, a coalition of rebel groups that has since become the country's ruling party.Today, 63 percent of Ethiopians identify as Christian, two-thirds of whomare Orthodox, and the churches are packed with worshippers on holidays like Meskel. Even non-Christian Ethiopians have reason to rejoice on Meskel; the festival marks the end of the rainy season in Addis Ababa.

Since June, the city -- which sits at an altitude of more than 7,000 feet(2,200 meters), much higher than the rest of the country -- has been cloudy, wet and cold. But sure enough, the sun shined brightly all day Friday, and it's expected to keep shining for nine more months until the rains come again. Now is also the time of year for Meskel daisies: bright yellow blossoms that bloom all across the country. Families have been collecting them all this week in anticipation of the festival; the flowers were used to decorate stacked wood for the bonfires, and women and children all over the square on Friday carried little bouquets to celebrate the changing of the season. As the only country on earth to celebrate Meskel, Ethiopia is petitioning UNESCO to register its annual celebration inAddis Ababa as a cultural heritage experience. The Foreign Ministry says the holiday "deserves this designation because of the ancient nature of the celebration, its color and significance and the attraction it has for a growing number of tourists as well as the immense participation of the society and of people of all ages which adds to its inimitable quality."

Ethiopia bans access to student's critical article'

PittNews Commentary: (September 27, 2013) Abigail Salisbury is an enemy of the state of Ethiopia because of an op-ed column she published online. Salisbury, a student in the Graduate School of Public and International Affairs, spoke about her article to an audience of about 10 ina “Let’s Talk Africa” lecture on Wednesday in 4130 Posvar Hall from 1:30 to 3 p.m. The Ethiopian government blocked her article, titled “Human Rights and the War on Terror in Ethiopia,” one day after she published it online. While in Ethiopia, Salisbury noticed an extreme lack of freedom of speech and press for Ethiopian people and decided to write the piece, which criticizes the Ethiopian government. Salisbury was working as an assistant professor at Mekelle University Law School, a small college outside of Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia, when she published the article. After the university administration discovered her article, Salisburysaid the university “basically asked [her] not to work there anymore.” “I was told that, based on what I wrote, that if I had been an Ethiopian person, I would have been put in prison,” Salisbury said. “I don’t think they want me back.” Ironically enough, Salisbury said, she was in the country teaching international human-rights law, a class required for graduation from law school in Ethiopia. Anna-Maria Karnes, a representative of the Africana studies department, also attended the lecture and interjected throughout. Karnes, whose parents live in Ethiopia,has a thorough grasp of the political climate in the country. “Skype was outlawed two years ago in Ethiopia,” Karnes said. “There were people jailed for using Skype.” When Karnes first discovered the Skype law, she worried that she would not be able to get in touch with her parents because that was their primary source of communication. But Skype was illegal only for Ethiopians, not for foreigners.

“As a Westerner, you are treated differently,” Salisbury said. “Better.”Ethiopians subscribe to a different race and caste system than many Americans are used to. Salisbury said that when African-Americans traveled to Ethiopia, they were treated the same as whites. Ethiopians believe that everyone else in Africa is black but that they, themselves, arered skinned. Salisbury recounted a story of when someone in the street approached her and asked, “Have you seen any black women today?” Salisbury said she was surprised by the scale of differences between the learning environments in Ethiopia and the U.S. Because of the country’s limited resources, students learn to memorize verbatim what professors say in lecture. Salisbury said she’s seen students reproduce a lecture rightdown to the “ums” and “likes.” Ethiopian education also differs from Western education because, Salisbury said, there could be “watchers” present at any time, in any classroom. Watchers are government representatives on the lookout for those speaking out against the government. “What would creep me out if I were in that class?” Salisbury said. “I don’t know if I would be raising my hand with opinions.”

In addition to an extreme lack of freedom of speech, Salisbury said Ethiopians also struggle with tough racial tensions and “ethnic federalism,”or preferential treatment for one ethnic group that is officially recognized by the government. With Ethiopia located in a contentious part of the world, Salisbury said U.S.-Ethiopia relations are crucial “Ethiopia is really instrumental in the U.S. agenda and the global war on terror that we’re engaged in,” she said. Salisbury and Karnes opened the presentation with an activity about African knowledge. They divided the audience into small groups and asked them to label a map of Africa with the names of as many countries as they could. Even with several African students and faculty in the audience, no one was able to label the entire map. “You can’t know the whole of Africa,” Director of Africana Studies Macrina Lelei said. “That’s part of why we have African studies here at Pitt ... to share those experiences.”

Ethiopians in Norway vowed to stand beside Ginbot 7 popular force’

DCESON News (September 28, 2013) - A successful fundraising was conducted for Ginbot-7 Popular Force (G7pf), whose recently established and struggles against the ruling corrupt regime. The fundraising event, staged 16:00pm to 24:00 p.m. local time, was coordinated by a taskforceestablished by Democratic Change in Ethiopia Support Organization in Norway (DCESON). The event was able to attract many participants fromall over Norway and other parts of Europe. The event was one of the success stories in the history of fundraising in terms of both participation and fundraising. The official announcement of the founding of the Ginbot-7 popular force has been a positive development and was welcomed by most Ethiopians residing in Norway. Ginbot-7 popular force has added a momentum to the armed struggle and elevated the moral, hope, and aspirations of Ethiopians for Freedom and Democracy. The formation of this force marks a new and decisive phase in the struggle against the ethno-racist rule exists in Ethiopia. The successful staging of the event was made possible through the cooperation and contributions of the participants as a whole. This event demonstrated what Ethiopians in thediaspora can achieve through cooperation and working together for a common goal.

Rival opposition UDJ held a large protest demonstration in Addis Ababa'ADDIS ABABA EAN commentary (September 29, 2013):

Is that an opposition resurgence in Ethiopia? – Unity for Democracy andJustice party (UDJ), was organized the largest protest event since the post-2005 elections crackdown that left thousands of people dead and wounded. The demonstration, named 'Millions of Voices for Freedom,' started at the party's main office in a neighborhood known as Kebena, however, as the marchers headed toward Meskel Square, they were blocked by the police. Concerned about violent confrontations with the police, the organizers redirected the march to a smaller public square nearthe party's office. The march, which was joined by 33 other opposition groups, demanded economic reform and the release of political prisoners. In the days leading up to the September 29 march, UDJ's chairman and former President of Ethiopia Negasso Gidada was detained twice, but the march was held without any serious incident. After the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi last year, Ethiopia's new leadership seems to be willing to allow opposition parties to stage protests, while making it difficult for them to organize large public rallies. The opposition groups themselves, after being crushed by the late prime minister with no international consequence, are regrouping themselves in a manner that is not too threatening to the ruling party.

Football/Africa: Midfielder Teshome vows Ethiopia will clip SupperEagles inWCQ playoffs'

StarAfrica (September 30, 2013) Ethiopia midfielder, Minyahil Teshome, has declared that Nigeria will not stop Ethiopia from making their first ever World Cup finals. The Dedebit F.C. (Ethiopian Premier League) midfielder has asserted that Ethiopia took time to study Nigeria's play style during their 2 – 0 defeat against the Super Eagles in the 2013 Nations Cup. "Nigeria are a good side. We played them at the Nations Cupin Africa and they defeated us. But we fought on that day. We know them and are confident that we are going to defeat them to qualify for our first World Cup," The Punch quoted Teshome. Teshome, it should be recalled, was the ineligible player fielded against Botswana who caused the FIFA to deduct three points from Ethiopia. Teshome however brought back glory to his name when he scored the winner in their 2 – 1 win against Central Africa Republic in their last group game on September 07 to place Ethiopiaat the peak of Group A with 13 points. "We are counting on our fans to help us achieve this objective. In fact, we are already seeing beyond Nigeria. It is the World Cup we are preparing for, where we hope to play against Spain and Argentina on the field. We believe that our dream will be realised", Teshome added. Teshome is part of the 23 home-basedplayers who are in camp preparing for the first leg of their World Cupqualifiers playoffs billed for October 13 in Addis Ababa.

Spectacular Change in ETHIOPIA, Now!

Ethiopians protest anti-terrorism law of January, 2009'

SZH/HSN News updates (September 30, 2013) - Ethiopians have taken tothe streets of the capital, Addis Ababa, to protest against an anti- terrorism law, Press TV reports. The demonstration on Sunday was organized and led by the opposition. Protesters also demanded political reforms and equality as well as the release of political prisoners. Leader ofthe opposition Unity for Democratic Justice (UDJ), Negasso Gidada, called for the government to abrogate the law and "release all political and prisoners of conscience immediately." Opposition lawmaker Girma Seifu said, "The very intention of the anti-terrorism law is just to ban the activities of the civil society, the activities of media, and the activities of parties." The law was adopted in 2009. Demonstrators say the government has been criminalizing Ethiopians who express their opinions about government policies ever since. They also say Addis Ababa must clarify its broad definition of terrorism. However, the government says theopposition is seeking to glorify convicted terrorists and is "downplaying the danger" Ethiopia is facing as a result of terrorism. According to the New York-based independent Committee to Protect Journalists, over ten journalists have been charged under the anti-terrorism law. The committee says Ethiopia has the highest number of exiled journalists in the world. Human rights groups accuse Ethiopia's government of using thecountry's anti-terrorism legislation to end peaceful dissent. The Ethiopian constitution, however, guarantees the right to freedom of expression.

International Criminal Court (ICC) on an African Safari?

EM commentary (September 30, 2013) By Alemayehu G Mariam

Hailemariam Desalegn, the titular prime minister of Ethiopia, says the International Criminal Court (ICC) is on African safari. In May 2013, according to the BBC , Desalegn said, "African leaders were concerned that out of those indicted by the ICC, 99% are Africans. This shows something is flawed within the system of the ICC and we object to that. The process has degenerated into some kind of race ing." Last week a spokesman for the ruling regime in Ethiopia chimed in. "We never appreciated what the ICC has been doing, particularly when it comes African leaders, and its belittling and it's disparaging the African leadership." Earlier this month, Hailemariam reportedly sent a letter to "the ICC copying the UN Security Council (UNSC) formally demanding thatthe charges against both president Uhuru Kenyatta and his vice president William Ruto be dropped." African leaders are going ballistic and threatening a mass withdrawal from The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (the treaty that established the international crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and the crime ofaggression). They have scheduled an extraordinary summit in Addis Ababa on October 13, 2013 for that purpose.

The ICC's chief prosecutor, Gambian international lawyer Fatou Bensouda,has stated repeatedly that most ICC cases are opened in cooperation with African countries. She has rejected the idea that the ICC is engaged in selective prosecution of Africans. The specific reason for the mass withdrawal of African countries from the ICC treaty is "race hunting". I have heard of race baiting, race discrimination, the race card and even therat race. But never "race hunting". Is Hailemariam, in his provocatively dramatic phrase, trying to suggest that the ICC is on an African safari hunting down and prosecuting innocent black Africans? Does he mean the ICC has "degenerated" into a white racist lynch mob using legal institutionto chase, capture and hang crimeless and guiltless African leaders? Is he saying that the ICC was established to selectively prosecute African because "99%" of its indictees are Africans? Is he saying that the West is using the ICC to neutralize and punish African leaders who have an axe togrind with the West? Who are the 99% of Africans being "race hunted" (indicted) by the ICC"?

Last week, the vicious African warlord and ex-Liberian president Charles Taylor lost his appeal in his criminal conviction by the U.N. Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL). Taylor was found guilty of murder, rape, mutilating civilians, conscription of child soldiers, sexual slavery and otheracts of terrorism in in Sierra Leone over an 11 year period beginning in the mid-1990s. Over 50,000 people died in that conflict. Taylor's trial tooknearly four years; and he testified on his own behalf for seven months.

The Taylor trial cost USD$250 million! A total of 22 other suspects were indicted by the SCSL on similar charges. Fourteen were convicted and nineare now serving long prison terms. The rest died before trial or were released following a short imprisonment. When Taylor was convicted in May 2012, I wrote a commentary titled, "Justice for Sierra Leone! No Justice for Ethiopia? " I argued that the Taylor "verdict is undoubtedly a giant step forward in ending the culture of official impunity and criminalityin Africa. African dictators and tyrants may no longer assume automatic impunity for their criminal actions." David Crane, the chief prosecutor of the SCSL correctly pointed out, "This is a bell that has been rung and clearly rings throughout the world. If you are a head of state and you are killing your own people, you could be next." U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon described the Taylor verdict as "a significant milestone for international criminal justice" that "sends a strong signal to all leadersthat they are and will be held accountable for their actions."

Ethiopia politics - Is Opposition leader Negasso Gidada becomes popular?

Views (October 1, 2013) - Former president Dr Negasso Gidada hastransformed himself overnight from the butt of jokes into the most popular politician in Ethiopia with a few simple acts of courage. Unfortunately, his popularity came as he is about to conclude his politicalcareer. He announced that he will step down as chairman of the Unity forDemocracy and Justice (UDJ) next month.

Negasso's emergent popularity: Compared to the scarifies that Andualem Aragie, Eskinder Nega, Reeyot Alemu and other heroes are paying, what Dr Negasso did is too insignificant. All he did was put himself in front of the young UDJ activists and lead from the front in preparation for Sunday's Millions of Voices for Freedom march. But by leading from the front, he exposed himself to the same dangers young activists are facing every day. By leading from the front, he also helped many people to overcome their fear and join the march. The success of Sunday's protest march was due in large part to Negasso Gidada's leadership. On two occasions last week Dr Negasso was detained briefly by police. When he was detained the second time, it was because he went to the police station where several UDJ activists were detained and demanded their release. When the police refused, he asked them to arrest him instead andrelease the activists because he told them that he is the one who sent the kids out to distribute flyers. The police obliged and arrested him. The young activists were released. That little act of courage earned the former president tonnes of love and respect. On Sunday, when he came out of the UDJ office, he was received with a hero's welcome by the thousands ofpeople who were preparing for the march to Meskel Square.

Late boomer: Dr Negasso was one of the most despised personalities in Ethiopian politics when he was a figurehead president under the TPLF junta. Some of the good things he did, such as refusing to sign death warrants (official orders authorizing executions of prisoners), were overshadowed by all the evil acts that were being committed by the late dictator Meles Zenawi and his tribal junta on a daily basis. In one remarkable incident, after Dr Negasso refused to sign an execution order against Jemil Yassin, the alleged killer of General Hayelom Araya, Meles Zenawi's thugs simply dragged him out of his prison cell and showered him with bullets, in total disregard for the constitution. President Negasso did not speak out about this incident, as well as the countless other crimesthat the TPLF thugs were committing while he was the president. After being pushed out from the ceremonial presidency by Meles Zenawi, Dr Negasso became a strong critic of the regime, later on joining the UDJ andbecoming its chairman. But it was hard for many people to take him seriously — until now. It is not too late for Dr Negasso to continue providing leadership — some thing that is terribly lacking in the Ethiopian society of today. One doesn't necessarily have to become a chairman of some political party to lead. Hopefully, he will put his newly earned political capital to good use by continuing to speak out on behalf of voiceless Ethiopians.

Ethiopia most restrictive Sub-Saharan Country, Freedom House reports'

FH: (October 3, 2013) - In a Global assessment of Internet and Digital Media, Freedom House finds that, when it comes to Internet freedom, Ethiopia is the most repressive among the Sub-Saharan countries it examined. Over the past years, the global number of censored websites has increased, while internet users in various countries have been arrested, tortured and killed over the information they posted online. Iran, Cuba and China remain among the most restrictive countries in the World and Ethiopia tops the list of most restrictive nations in Sub-Saharan Africa. In September 2012, Ethiopia's government passed the Telecom Fraud Offences law, which is supposed to combat cybercrime but also includes provisions that toughen the ban of VoIP, requiring users to register all ICT equipment including smartphones. Manyazewal Eshetu, a 21 year old university student was also arrested and charged with criminal defamation for posting a comment on Facebook criticizing the 'rampant corruption' in a local university. He still remains in prison and has not been persecuted. The well known dissident Eskender Nega was found guilty under the anti-terrorism law and sentenced to 18 years of prison forhis alleged links to a 'terrorist group' after he posted online articles that criticized the government's use of the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation to silence political dissent. Freedom House's country report on Ethiopia also recalls that Ethio Telecom had deployed deep packet inspection to enable more sophisticated selective internet filtering of internet traffic. The most recent ONI tests in September 2012 found that filtering by Ethio Telecom primarily on "independent online news media, political blogs and Ethiopianhuman rights groups' websites. Of the 1,375 unique websites tested, 73 were blocked including online portals such as Cyber Ethiopia", the report states on page 278. Indeed, since May 2006, CyberEthiopia.com has beenblocked in Ethiopia along with many other popular Ethiopian web sites with an apparent objective to prevent the dissemination of information that is critical of the regime in Ethiopia.

Ethiopia - Why now Jigjiga is hosting the Ethiopia Nations Nationalities,and Peoples Day?

Ogaden Today Press (October 3, 2013) By Mohammed Faarah Jigjiga - The Ethiopian Somali Regional (Ogaden region) administration is hosting in their first time the Ethiopia's Nations', Nationalities' and Peoples' Day. Leaders of nine federal regions in Ethiopia will gather in that day, speeches are addressed, federalism is commanded and former communistregime led by Mengist Hailemarim is denounced. The main player of the ceremony is, EPRDF, "Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front",a coalition of four parties of Ethiopian ruling party who tells people (regional states) that they fought against the Derg regime, referring former communist regime in Ethiopia Mengist Hailemariam. In Ogaden, where many see they are still under occupation, and nothing different from the Mengist Hailemariam see the ceremony as a beatification of other colony under the name of Federalism. The region (Ogaden) is isolated from other part of Ethiopia, politically, culturally and economically, many of Ogaden do not speak even, the official language ofthe country, Amharic, a study show that the reason is mistreatment they have faced from the successive regimes of Ethiopia. Elders in Ogaden tell their children that the only thing they see from Ethiopia used to be soldiers who are unkind, and kills the civilians. Unlike the former regimes,The regional administration claim that Ogaden has now their regional administration, claiming schools, hospitals, and roads are constructed, much employment are also the other changes in Ogaden comparing otherformer regimes, critics says it is a propaganda and exaggerated. Since 1994, the Conflict taking place in Ogaden killed thousands, many fled andseek asylum in neighboring countries, thousands are reported under prisons, right groups accused the Ethiopian government committing crimeagainst humanity in Ogaden and called on international investigations. UNhas not still intervened Ogaden conflict to find political solution.

Ogaden and the Federalism Ceremony: It is the first time that the ceremony to be held in Jigjiga, the capital of Somali Ogaden Regionalstate since Ethiopia adopted federalism in August, 1995, where many people in Ogaden are against the Ethiopian occupation in Ogaden.
According to a regional official, who asked Ogadentoday Press not to publish his name because of the sensitive of the issue informed that the federal government has decided the ceremony to be held in Jigjiga after, ONLF, the Ogaden National Liberation Front and Ethiopian peace negotiations stalled in Kenya last year. The group (ONLF) refused to sign the Ethiopian federal constitution and demanded the constitution should be voted by the people in Ogaden, the move which the government rejected. Ethiopia Federal government has repeatedly said people of Ogaden are Ethiopians; the move that many none Somali Ethiopia realizedand doubted that Ogaden people was not as part of Ethiopia and questioned the future of Ogaden region as being the part of Ethiopia.
Holding Ethiopia’s Nations’, Nationalities’ and Peoples’ Day in Jigjiga does not mean, Ogaden people is accepting constitution, a political commentator based in Jigjiga told Ogadentoday Press through the phone. The approving and accepting the constitution by the people is a legal matter and international law, it is something far from holding a ceremony,said a regional diplomat. Many think that Ethiopia wants to show International community that Ogaden people are happy with federalism and constitution at the same time sending signal message to the separatist group (ONLF), added by the political commentator. People mustgo to polls and vote for the constitution, says Addis Ababa University student, or Ethiopia must revise the constitution and make practically live,added the student. Regional parliament’s power is limited, and many see as hostage parliaments, this fuels the demand of the people, they can notdebate freely on the interest of the region, they are not allowed to speak on the article of 39 which gives self-determination. Historically Ethiopia seized Ogaden region in the late of 19the century. The region is populated by Somali ethnic group and its population is estimated approximately 4-5 million. According to the regional administration, the ceremony day meansto them closing the chapter of conflict between, Somalia and Ethiopia overOgaden Region.

However the administration not realized the fighting is now between Ogaden people and Ethiopia but wants to divert the conflict. Ethiopia and Somalia fought over Ogaden in 1977 war, which Somali wanted to liberateOgaden region. Many Somalis are still dreaming the Greater Somalia (Somaliwein) concept composed of, Southern territory of Somalia, Somaliland, Ogaden Region of Ethiopia (Western Somalia) Djibouti (French Somaliland), Northern Front District (NFD) in Kenya, many otherssee the opportunity of pan-Somalism collapsed. Ogaden people wants to be independent state, a vision that many holds after the collapse of Somalia in January, 1991. Still in Ogaden there is a conflict between ONLFand Ethiopia and the aspiration of independence of Ogaden region has notyet dead, many believe that Ogaden will be independent state a day in their life or their future ancestors will see that bright day, it is a really a long dream. Ogaden National Liberation Front, "ONLF" is a secessionist group fighting for the independence of Ogaden Region in eastern Ethiopia since 1994, the group was founded by Somali Ogaden former fighters of Western Somalia Liberation Front (WSLF) and Intellectuals from Ogaden region. The group is supported by the majority people of Ogaden Region. The author of this article is Ogadentoday Cheif Editor Mohamed Faarah

Animal welfare in Ethiopia’

According to BBC In Pictures (October 4, 2013)

There are more than two million horses in Ethiopia with many peoplerelying on them for their livelihoods.

Horse-drawn carts are one of the country's main forms of transport,especially outside the capital, Addis Ababa.

People use them as taxis, as well as to take goods to and from markets.

Due to a number of factors, some horses are not well cared for and willoften have worms, fungal infections, open skin wounds and untreated infectious diseases.

They are often malnourished and have a short life-span.

Regular mobile clinics allow owners a chance to have their animalschecked and to receive free veterinary treatment.

Cart-horse owners are taught better methods of looking after theiranimals and the advantages of maintaining a healthy horse.

Horse owners are taught about the advantages of using appropriate bits and harnesses, and inhumane bits are exchanged for ones that are moregentle.

Many will come from homes where horses and donkeys are regularly used.When they go home, they are able to teach their parents and peers betterways of caring for their animals.

A British charity, the Society for the Protection of Animals Abroad (SPANA)has established programmes in Ethiopia to enable families to look after their horses better and ensure that they are as productive as possible.

Bekelech Bezuneh who is 12, attends a weekly class. “I love learning about animals. I now know that I shouldn’t hurt animals and beat them inappropriately. I have also learnt that it is important to not overload horses and I have been able to teach other members of my family what Ihave learnt.”

Music - Hailu Mergia, the music legend goes on tour, gets remixed’

Washington City Paper (October 4, 2013) - Listen when the legendary musician plays one of his memorable hits of the 70s. In the 1970s, keyboard player Hailu Mergia performed in one of Ethiopia's best-known jazz/funk ensembles, Walias Band. But after a tour of the United States, Mergia decided to settle down permanently in the D.C. area in 1981, andhe (mostly) left his old band behind. Here, he played with another outfit,Zula Band, with some of his former Walias bandmates, and for several years in the 1980s, he also ran a club on Georgia Avenue NW. The club closed and Mergia moved on. Now, he lives with his wife in Fort Washington, Md., and drives a cab out of Dulles Airport six days a week.As of this summer, Mergia hadn't played a live show in 20 years. But as Mergia told Washington City Paper in June, he missed playing out, and he'd happily do it again if the right opportunity arose.

Riots Hit Ethiopia Refugee Camps and Three Eritreans Killed’

Reuters: October 7, 2013: A prominent human rights activist claims threeEritrean refugees have died and many more have been injured at refugeecamps in northern Ethiopia after a memorial vigil dedicated to the victimsof the Lampedusa boat sinking turned violent. Meron Estefanos, also a radio presenter in Sweden for Radio Erena, exclusively told IBTimes UK that a riot erupted in the Mai Ayni refugee camp after Eritrean refugees started expressing their frustration at authorities. Police opened fire to disperse the riot and four children were wounded as a result. The unrest spread to other refugee camps such as the Adi Harish and three people were killed. "Refugees, who contacted Eritrean independent Radio Erena, disclosed that the initial objective of the gatherings was to remember those who perished in the Lampedusa disaster, but quickly turned into a protest over what refugees considered corruption in the refugee resettlement process as well as issues over camp security," Estefanossaid.

Who was Hakim Workneh Martin'

Wemezekir: (October 8, 2013) - Hakim Workneh Martin was only 3 years old when he was taken prisoner at the Battle of Magdala, in April 1868 during the war between Abyssinia and Britain along with Prince Alemayehu, the son of Emperor Tewodros II. After they confirmed that theEmperor only had a son, Workneh was later adopted by Reverend Martin who raised him in India. Reverend Martin raised Workneh in good condition. And workneh had attended medical school later to become a surgeon in Scotland. He later worked as a district medical officer in Mynamar (now Burma). The name Workneh adopted later with his second name as Charles Martin. He had his own son and named him Tewodros.

He moved to Addis Ababa after the battle of Adwa. At first Hakim WorknehMartin started treating patients at Janmeda soon after he returned to Addis Ababa. One day a woman would stare at him and he asked her whatshe was looking for. She said that her nephew was taken at Magdala and she came from Gondar after she heard about him. She said he had a birth mark and was only 3 when taken. His parents had since passed. The birth mark confirmed that the little boy was indeed Charles Martin. His name was Workneh a name he later adapted. What was the real cause of emperor Menelik's death? It was who Hakim workneh Martin has took careof Menelik II, who had hypertension and suffered from stroke. According to Hakim Workineh Martin, low salt diet was the only medication available at the time to treat hypertension but Empress Taytu Bitul would refuse to do that. She wouldn't allow the King of Ethiopia a low salt bland diet!

Though, Stroke hypertensive stroke becomes the cause for the emperor'sdeath. That was what Hakim workneh told at the time to his son.

Who is Ethiopia's 5th post-moarchial president Mulatu Teshome Wirtu?

Views & Commentary: (October 9, 2013) - The Ethiopian president is appointed by the Tigrean People Liberation Front (TPLF), one of the 4 organizations that make up the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). Real power in Ethiopia is in the hands of TPLF, which is the central core of the EPRDF. The other parties in the governing "coalition" are puppets and the TPLF is their master. TPLF controls the military (90 percent of the top officers are members of TPLF), the security (heads of the main security agencies, Debretsion Guebremichael and Getachew Assefa, for instance are senior members of TPLF), the economy (TPLF-owned companies monopolize all the key industries in Ethiopia), and information (all the mass media in Ethiopia are controlled by the TPLF). Mulatu now replaces Girma Woldegiorgis, the age old president, believed he will serve his masters while masquerading as an Oromo and an official of an Oromo organization named OPDO that was created as disguise. The reason the ruling party is able to rule over Ethiopia with little challenge for the past two decades is that it has surrounded itself with people like Mulatu Teshome and Girma Woldegiorgis, who have surrendered the rights and the will of the people they claim to represent for the crumbs that the ruling throws at them. While serving as Deputy Minister of Economic Development, Mulatu's job was to provide a cover while the Meles crime family has looted the region known as Oromiya andthe entire Ethiopia. In one infamous case, under Mulatu Teshome and his bosses Girma Birru and Sufian Ahmed's watch, Meles Zenawi's wife and co-horts have stolen over 9 million kilograms of coffee (worth over $100 million USD), as Meles himself admitted during a discussion with coffee traders. Mulatu Teshome was such a loyal that he was then promoted to Minister of Agriculture in 2001 and continued to give blind eye while partysupporters have leased in millions of hectares of fertile Ethiopian lands toforeign investors after evicting Ethiopian farmers. Such policy brought what NGOs termed "Green Famine" to southwestern Ethiopia, the most fertile region of the country.

The Guardian Newspaper in London wrote: "The rains have come, the landis lush but Ethiopians still go hungry." It is because the farmers were being evicted and their land was being leased to Chinese, Indian and localinvestors from tigray region. The Ethiopian "Green Famine" was caused byTPLF and its puppets like Girma Birru and Mulatu Teshome. Before becoming the Minister of Agriculture in 2001, Mulatu had to prove his loyalty to his TPLF masters once more by calling for the arrest of PresidentNegasso Gidada, his former mentor since his college days. Mulatu called for Dr Negasso's arrest because the latter dared to confront TPLF boss Meles Zenawi on a number of issues. Such loyalty brought more "fortune" to Mulatu, while Negasso was stripped of all his privileges as former president, including his house and pension.

While in school, according to those who knew Mulatu, he was a mediocre student at best who left no impression on any one. But he excelled at one thing — wagging his tail to get what he wants. That seems to have served him "well." After high school, he wagged his tail to China on scholarship, even though there were other students who had been more qualified than him. When EPRDF came to power, he rushed to volunteer as one of the new regime's loyal ethnic puppets, and went on to be appointed "president".

Ethiopians and Eritreans risk lives to flee war and persecutions'
CHRISTIAN TODAY (October 10, 2013) - The latest tragic incident of hundreds of African migrants drowning in European waters tells a wider story. Scratch beneath the surface and for many of the migrants, their stories are not only of wanting a better life. Often they will be of fleeing persecution or conflict at home, and paying their life savings to smugglerswho promise their passage to the safety of European shores. The sinking of a boat carrying around 500 migrants October 3, killing at least 181 of them, is the latest in a long line of accidents in which vulnerable migrantspay with their lives after the failure of vessels often described as "unseaworthy". Father Mussie Zerai, Chairman of the Habeshia Agency, which works on behalf of these migrants, says he believes the majority ofthose involved in last's week's shipwreck were Christians. "I look at the list of the survivors and 90 per cent is Christian," he said. "They are coming from Eritrea and Ethiopia. The situation is very bad because politically in Eritrea there is a dictator and they live without any type of freedom or democracy. Many Christians are persecuted because of their faith. It's not easy for them to live in Eritrea at this moment."
An Ethiopian migrant who survived the same crossing hit the European media last year when five human rights groups wrote a letter to the Netherlands then-minister of immigration and asylum affairs, to plead forhim to be given the right to remain. Abu Kurke Kebato, in his early 20s, was one of only nine survivors in a boat carrying 72, which had left Libya,only to languish at sea for two weeks before drifting back to Libyan shores. Kurke Kebato told the BBC that he had then been arrested by theLibyan authorities while "on his way to church" after his arrival back in Libya. "Upon his forced return to Libya in 2010, Mr. Kurke Kebato was then detained for eight months during which time he alleges he was subjected to torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment," wrotethe five human rights organisations. He then made a second attempt to reach Europe, with his wife, and this time they were successful. However,the couple were set to be deported from the Netherlands until human rights organisations intervened. He now lives there and says he is "happyin a democracy". The UN High Commission for Refugees' Adrian Edwards agrees that many migrants seem to have little choice but to flee their home countries when it becomes a matter of life and death. "You have tothink of the tragedy that lies behind this, which is that many of these people are likely to have been fleeing war, fleeing persecution, fleeing human rights abuses in their own countries, so this is a tremendoustragedy of multiple layers," he told the BBC.

The ship had travelled from Libya, but many of its passengers had alreadytravelled a great distance in their quest to reach Europe. According to the UN, most of the passengers on the boat, which sank nearby the island of Lampedusa off the coast of Italy, were from Eritrea and Somalia, about 2,000 miles from Libya's coast. The number of immigrants dying while attempting to reach Europe's borders in the last 25 years has risen to almost 20,000. Pope Francis, whose first official visit was to the island in July to witness the mass migrant arrivals, condemned "global indifference"to the plight of immigrants, and said the incident was an "outrage," callingFriday a "day of tears". Figures from the UN say 3,000 people try to flee Eritrea each month, while human rights groups have said the country is becoming a giant jail, with estimates of around 10,000 political prisoners. Somalia, meanwhile, has been ravaged by two decades of war and large parts of it are under the control of Islamist militant group al-Shabab.

More than 30,000 immigrants have journeyed to Italy by sea so far this year, including 7,500 each from Eritrea and Syria and 3,000 from Somalia, according to the UN. Fr. Zerai says the international community must do more. Granting asylum to a few is not enough, he says. "All massmedia, all international organisations and civic society need to push the international community to do something to change the situation," he toldWorld Watch Monitor. "In Eritrea, even in Ethiopia, we need more freedom, democracy and peace. That is the solution. We can give them asylum, but that is not the solution." In May, World Watch Monitor reported that religious persecution in Eritrea is at its "highest ever level and getting worse", according to Christian charity Open Doors International. The number of Christians incarcerated in Eritrea because of their faith is thought to be around 1,200, according to the charity, although some estimates claim the figure is as high as 3,000. Eritrea is ranked 10th on the World Watch List, which ranks the 50 countries in which Christians are most under pressure for their faith. "When Christians[in Eritrea] are discovered, they are arrested and held in shipping containers in military camps. At least 105 Christians were arrested in 2012, and 31 Christians were reported to have died in prison," the World Watch List reports.

Proposals by the former Imperial Government for an Exchange ofTerritory'

Wemezekir: The National Archives, Kew, Richmond, Surrey, UK Internal Memorandum: (October 12, 2013) - Crucial document reveals

Ethiopia offers Britain land in exchange for Zeila port of Somaliland. The Crucial document found in a British commonwealth archieves reveals thatthe Imperial Ethiopian Government offered The Great Britain part of the Haud reserved area (areas close to Somaliland border) in exchange for Zeila port of Somaliland to have access to the red sea in August, 1946. The document is dated August 6 , 1946 and was sent to Sir Norman Brook

, His Britannic Majesty's Government by the Secretary of State for ForeignAffairs and the Secretary of State for Colonies: Here is a summary made of the correspondence by Mohamed Ali-medeshi:

1-The Ethiopians came up with a proposal that if a corridor to the sea, to the port of Zeila in British Somaliland, could be given to Ethiopia, they would in turn, be prepared to cede to British Somaliland part of the Ogaden in exchange . They said that Ethiopia was ready to convene a conference on Lake Tana and to have a Boundary Commission at once meet the British governments requirements in respect of the ratification offrontiers on the Kenya and Sudan borders which have been continuing source of trouble for many years.

2- That it would be helpful to consider the Ethiopian proposal for an exchange of territory in Bristish Somaliland since the Kenya and Sudan governments have little or nothing to offer in exchange for the ratificationwhich they seek.

3- In respect of British Somaliland , the Ethiopian proposals offer good prospects of meeting , to a very considerable extent , the long standing requirement of the British Somali tribes for free and undisturbed access tograzing areas essential to their livelihood.

4-We are anxious , now that the Ethiopian government have themselves moved in the matter, to seize the opportunity which may not recur, of rectifying the injustice done to the British Somali tribes by the treaty withEthiopia in 1897 which left their grazing grounds on the Ethiopian side of the frontier. We therefore think it desirable to open negotiations on the general basis proposed by the Ethiopians without delay.

5- In addition to the interests of British Somaliland alone and our relationswith Ethiopia, there are also certain extraneous factors to be taken into account. The first of these is the uncertain future of Italian Somaliland.

The the territory which the Ethiopians have offered to Britain includes theonly useful land communications between British and Italian Somaliland, and would be of considerable importance if, as a result of the eventual settlement of the Italian Colonies, Britain would find itself responsible forthe Italian Somaliland.

6- French reactions have also to be taken into account , since French Somaliland lies on the other frontier of British Somaliland, and the proposed corridor would substitute Ethiopia for Great Britain as the neighbour of French Somaliland on this side. Moreover, the whole object of the Ethiopia's proposal is to obtain direct access to the sea, thereby by-passing the French port of Djibouti and the French controlled railway which leads to it and which at present is Ethiopia's main commercial outlet. It is therefore probable that the exchange of territory, if affected,would not be welcomed by the French. Documents supporting similar agreements are found in the British Foreign Office archives at the PublicRecords Office of Kew Gardens (London).

African Leaders Seek Prosecution Immunity for heads of state'

ADDIS ABABA: By William Davison (October 12, 2013): African leaders want sitting heads of state to be immune from prosecution at internationalcourts, said Hailemariam Desalegn, Ethiopian prime minister and the current chairman of theAfrican Union. "We have agreed that no charges shall be commenced or continued before any international court or tribunal against any serving heads of state or government or anybody acting or entitled to enact in such capacity during his or her term of office," he said in a speech after leaders met in Addis Ababa today.

Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta won't appear at the International Criminal Court until theUnited Nations Security Council responds to requests to delay his trial by a year, Ethiopian Foreign Minister Tedros Adhanom told reporters. All of the active cases before the ICC are againstAfricans, including Kenyatta and his deputy William Ruto, prompting complaints from the continent's leaders that the tribunal is unfairly targeting the continent. Ruto is on trial on charges of crimes against humanity in connection with ethnic violence following a disputed 2007 election. Kenyatta's trial on similar charges will begin next month. More than 1,100 people died in the clashes. Both men deny the accusations. If the security council doesn't defer Kenyatta's case, the AU will request a postponement of the trials, Tedros said, without giving further details. TheAU will discuss the issue at a summit next month if the response is negative, Tedros said.

Security Council: "We don't want to pre-empt it without seeing what the progress will be," Tedros said about the possible decisions at the summit.Fadi El Abdallah, a spokesman for the ICC, didn't immediately return a voice-mail message left outside normal office hours today. African foreignministers created a five-member committee to discuss with the security council deferring the Kenyan trials and the case of Sudanese leader Umaral-Bashir for a year, which the New York-based body has the authority todo, said Hailemariam. Kenyatta, 51, is the second sitting president to be indicted by the ICC after Bashir, who is wanted for suspected war crimes and genocide in Sudan's western Darfur region. He says he is innocent ofthe charges.

Rome Statute: "African sovereignty means nothing to the ICC and its patrons," Kenyatta told leaders today, according to an e-mailed copy of his speech. Thirty-four of the 122 state parties to the Rome Statute that created the ICC are African, according to the court. The African membershave been asked to raise the "issue of indictment" of sitting leaders at a meeting of other signatories to the court, Hailemariam said. In May, the African Union called for the ICC cases against Kenyatta and Ruto to be referred back to domestic courts after Kenya enacted a new constitution in2010 aimed at strengthening the accountability of the country's judiciary. While lawmakers in Nairobi last month passed a motion to withdraw from the Rome Statue, the state isn't bound by the decision. South African Nobel Peace Prize laureate Desmond Tutu has criticized Kenya and Sudan for urging African nations to shun the ICC, saying such a move would make the "world a more dangerous place." He spearheaded an online petition to gather at least 1 million signatures in support of the court before today's summit. Kenyan Foreign Secretary Amina Mohamed said onOct. 9 that the East African country hasn't lobbied other African nations towithdraw from the ICC and reiterated that Kenyatta and Ruto are fully cooperating with the tribunal.

Over 15 thousand EPRDF members file for resignation'

Top News: (October 12, 2013) - Over 15 thousand members of the rulingFront, EPRDF have filed resignation letters during the current evaluation meetings of the Front. Lose of trust on the Front, unacceptable service payment, dear membership fees and nepotistic appointments are some ofthe reasons for their resignations. The largest exodus came from the Oromia region with 9,456 resigning, and Amhara, Southern Ethiopian region, Tigray taking the following shares of resignations respectively. Although the EPRDF boasts of over 5 million members, only less than 2 million members are believed to be active. It was stated during the meeting that most university students join the Front to find jobs upon graduation, however only a quarter of the new entrants have been able toget jobs. Although there were graduates with remarkable academic grades, old hand members of the Front were employed ahead of them in Awasa, Bahir Dar and Mekele cities. EPRDF labelled those who filed the resignation as "spongers".

The leadership of one of the member parties ofEPRDF, the Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM) is said to be involved in corruption. ESAT will air letters titled "For members of the Organisation" that exposes the corruption within the ANDM leadership.

Similarly, the training that the government called in Haramaya Universityon "extremism and terrorism" has been interrupted. Students and lecturers of the University opposed the policy and ideas of the training arguing they should not be manipulated in such trainings and that the whole concept of labelling others as "extremists" is subjective. Accordingto BBN Radio, the proposal to ban veils and prayers of Muslim students within the University has been opposed by all students. In the training, attended by around 12 thousand students, many students have directly opposed the proposals of the meeting chairs while scores walked out of the training.

SWEDISH MAGAZINE: A LOOK AT ETHIOPIA AFTER MELES ZENAWI'

Daily Ethiopia: (October 15, 2013) When Meles Zenawi died a year ago, many people hoped for a liberalization of state control in Ethiopia, while others feared bloody power struggles and revolts. Both hopes and fears came to naught. A new Prime Minister was appointed, with roots in the southern region. The same ruling group retained control of Ethiopia and many say: "Meles still rules." There is no tradition of democracy in Ethiopia, the authoritarian patterns are deeply rooted and the country hasexperienced only short spells of freedom to debate and criticize. A dividedopposition has been easy for Ethiopian security services to handle. Trying to quell a third of the population who feel their religion is oppressed can prove a lot more difficult. Prime Minister of Ethiopia Meles Zenawi died a year ago. He led the armed uprising that toppled the military dictatorship in 1991. For 20 years, he cemented his power in Africa's second most populous country. When Meles died, many people hoped for a liberalization of state control in Ethiopia, while others feared bloody powerstruggles and revolts. Both hopes and fears came to naught. What happened, on the surface, was that a new Prime Minister was appointed −Hailemariam Desalegn − with roots in the southern region. The same ruling group retained control of Ethiopia and many say: "Meles still rules."In June, the opposition held demonstrations that were not put down brutally. This brought hope and led to new manifestations − where demonstrators were reportedly arrested and killed. Ethiopia's developmentagenda is defended with harshness. Neither critical journalism or demandsfor more religious freedom by Muslims, nor nomadic groups' claims for a reasonable pace of life changes are really listened to.

There is no tradition of democracy in Ethiopia, the authoritarian patterns are deeply rooted and the country has experienced only short spells of freedom to debate and criticize. Ethiopia is composed of a large number ofethnic groups. Soon after taking power, the governing coalition party EPRDF instituted a federal reform. The regional administrative divisions aimed at developing the whole country but it has not led to significantly greater devolution and control over resources. Meles was Tigrean. This ethnic group represents only 8 per cent of the approximately 85 million Ethiopians but the Tigrean Peoples' Liberation Front TPLF led the overthrow of the military dictatorship in coalition with three other parties. The military and security services are dominated by Tigreans. It is easy toimagine that the fragmentation and division could have disastrous consequences. Eritrea's liberation was preceded by 30 years of bloody struggle, followed by a devastating − for both sides − war in 1998 and continued tensions affecting the entire development of the Horn of Africa. Ethiopia has for several years enjoyed impressive economic growth. The education and health services are being expanded and many curves point in the right direction. Massive housing construction projects are transforming cities, replacing corrugated sheet slums by flats. But inflationis sky high. In the cities there are widespread discontent with the price hikes, unemployment, lack of opportunities and political repression. Many people dream of leaving the country and everyone seems to have close relatives abroad. The political opposition is based in the U.S. Intellectuals and journalists flee the country to escape imprisonment. Countless young women are part of the so-called ‘maid trade', working in households in various Arab countries.

The urban population has been favoured at the expense of the rural areas.Now this is being partly reversed. Market reforms and the introduction of new technologies have given farmers the tools to raise themselves out of poverty. In the past, a farmer had to sell to government agents, but now the producer can sell to anyone and use a cell phone to find out the pricesin town. Many are excited about the progress, despite Ethiopia's rural areas being still very poor. Land is formally owned by the state and the uncertain land rights have discouraged farmers from investing. But farmers can now get legal titles to the land they farm. The roads are better and the products can be transported to market. There is also a safety net in the form of food assistance from the government via donors if there is lack of food before harvest or during droughts. There is a three–pronged strategy to accelerate Ethiopia's development: (i) New hydropower projects to provide electricity for the rural areas and export earnings when excess electricity is sold abroad; (ii) Expanding manufacturing to produce goods hitherto imported as finished goods; (iii ) Production of sugar, rice, soybeans and other crops in large plantations to turn Ethiopia's large imports into even greater exports to a richer and fatter world. The government has been blamed for extensive land-grabbing with displacement of nomads and poor peasants. It is understandable that Ethiopia would like to use the sparsely populated lowland areas to increase growth and exports and create jobs for a growing population. The scheme intends to create irrigation systems that benefit the farmers. Roads and schools will be built. There will be development. The lease is very cheap but the government is supposed to set conditions for investors to ensure wider development impact. People move to new villages with schools and clinics. The government claims thatthis is voluntary, but human rights organizations have testified about forced displacement when land is being developed. There is no empty landand the record-breaking land-leasing to domestic and foreign investors forcommercial agriculture threatens to destroy traditional ways of life and wildlife habitat. There has been a veritable scramble for land in Ethiopia.

Still the positive results have not been seen.
Hydropower is an important driving force for the development the Ethiopian government wants to achieve. An enthusiastic expert advisor highlights: "The rivers start flowing in this country. We must be able to make use of them " It is not as obvious as it sounds. Egypt wants exclusive rights to the Nile waters. Ethiopia's construction of the big dam on the Blue Nile has been dogged by conflict-ridden negotiations with thedownstream neighbours Egypt and Sudan. But Egypt is now weakened bydomestic crises and Sudan has just been divided into two countries.
Ethiopia is accelerating construction. The Ethiopian government is negative towards civil society organizations working on human rights issues. Foreign-funded organizations grew up like mushrooms after the fall of the military dictatorship. In 2009 a law was passed that banned groups working on human rights to receive more than 10 per cent of theirfinancing from abroad. There was an outcry. But the government had decided: foreign money should not influence policy. Civil society is thus depressed. The political opposition is mostly in prison or in exile. Terroristlaws introduced in 2009 are used arbitrarily to detain people. Journalists and opposition take big risks. Bloggers write critically. However, security is effective. In the 80s when I lived in Addis, it was the East Germans whohelped with the mind control. Now it is the Chinese. Critical websites are blocked at a brisk pace, new ones opened just as fast. But there is opposition from a new perspective. About a third of the inhabitants of thiscountry with a long Christian history are Muslims. There is a pride in that the groups have co-existed peacefully. But now there is growing discontent among Muslims who accuse the government of interfering in the internal religious questions. This contradicts the country's constitutionwhich guarantees freedom of religion. Muslim groups have for nearly two years conducted peaceful protests outside mosques. The government has in some cases responded with violence and 29 Muslim leaders are detained under terror laws. The threat of real terrorism is quite realistic inEthiopia which is allied with the United States, has a military and political key role in the Horn of Africa and has troops fighting Al Qaeda-allied al Shabaab in Somalia. But the authorities' heavy-handedness against peaceful religious practices may well contribute to a political radicalizationof the protests. A divided opposition has been easy for Ethiopian security services to handle. Trying to quell a third of the population who feel their religion is oppressed can prove a lot more difficult. Ethiopia's Current Governance – Post Meles'

PERSONAL VIEW: Despite the death of the former prime minister of Ethiopia, Meles Zenawi, whose death was officially announced in August 2012, little has changed for the people of Ethiopia. His successor, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, now has taken Meles' place but was neverpart of the ethnic-based Tigrayan Peoples' Liberation Front (TPLF) that hasruled the country for over twenty years under the guise of the multi-party,Ethiopian Peoples' Democratic Front (EPRDF). He appears to have little control over the party and what happens in Ethiopia; instead, the power remains in the hands of some in the central committee. The entire systemof dictatorship was set into place by Meles before he died and has not been dismantled at his death. He fathered an increasingly authoritarian government following the more open election of 2005 when the oppositionnearly succeeded in challenging the status quo.

It has to be recalled that two million Ethiopians came out in protest of a flawed election, protestors were shot and killed, opposition leaders were jailed and in the years preceding the 2010 national election, the regime heavily cracked down on dissent, the media, journalists, political groups, and civic institutions. Reports from Human Rights Watch give evidence of the misuse of aid money to gain support for the government during the election. The TPLF/EPRDF won by 99.6% of the votes—or so they claimed.Since the new prime minister was appointed, many were hoping for some reforms or at least hints of change; however, most people now agree that he has no power to enact such changes even if he wanted to do so. The goal of the central committee is clearly to continue to hold power by any means. PM Hailemariam and the TPLF/EPRDF will face elections in 2015, but few expect there to be an opening up of political space, as the ruling party has demonstrated that it seeks self-survival above all else. However,new pressures may test them.

Ethiopia: Blast likely an accidental detonation'

NAIROBI, Kenya AP - (October 15, 2013)— A blast in Ethiopia's capitalover the weekend appears to have been an accidental detonation of explosives by two Somali militants who may have planned to attack a soccer game, a state TV report said. The report came amid heightened concern of attacks by al-Shabab, the Somali militant group that took responsibility for an attack on a mall in Kenya that killed dozens of peoplelast month. Sunday's blast at a home in Addis Ababa killed two people, both Somalis, state controlled ETV reported. The explosion affected a home used by personnel of the U.S. Embassy in Addis Ababa, an FBI document said. There did not appear to be any American casualties from the blast. Ethiopia's anti-terrorism task force found a gun, grenades, explosives, a detonator and a belt at the home where the explosion took place, state TVreported. The jersey of Ethiopia's national soccer team was found at the site of the explosion, in what was perhaps an indication that the would-bebombers hoped to mingle among soccer fans of a game being played Sunday, the state TV report said. No militant group has claimed any link to the explosion in Addis Ababa, but the area where it occurred hosts a large Somali population. Last month in Kenya, 67 people were killed in anal-Shabab attack on a Nairobi shopping mall. Al-Shabab in 2010 detonated bombs in Uganda's capital during the World Cup final, killing more than 70 people. The Somali militant group said those attacks were retaliation because Kenya and Uganda have troops in Somalia. Ethiopia also has troops in Somalia.

An FBI document obtained by The Associated Press says the blast "impacted the wall of a U.S. employee residence." The U.S. Embassy on Monday warned that a Twitter message purporting to be run by al-Shababwarned that more attacks were planned in Addis Ababa. The embassy saidit cannot determine the credibility of the threat. Experts on terrorism contacted by the AP previously have said the Twitter account is fake. The U.S. Embassy said it was issuing its warning because many Americans livein Bole, the Addis Ababa neighborhood where the blast occurred. But the embassy said it has no specific information that suggests an imminent threat to U.S. citizens or facilities in Ethiopia.

US Embassy in Addis Ababa issues warning to U.S. citizens in Ethiopia'

US EMBASSY, ADDIS ABABA (October 15, 2013) – Subsequent to the Emergency Message posted below, the U.S. Embassy in Addis Ababa became aware of a Twitter message from Al-Shabaab claiming credit for the October 13 bombing in Addis Ababa and also claiming that two additional bombs were planted on Churchill Road and in the Piazza centresof Addis Ababa. At this time, we cannot determine the credibility of this threat but, given its gravity, we are sharing it widely, said the embassy.

According to Ethiopian State Radio, two people were killed on Sunday, October 13, 2013 by a bomb blast. Quoting the Ethiopian National Intelligence and Security Service (NISS), State media reported that twounidentified individuals were killed in a residential house in the Bole District.

In light of this report, and the fact that many American Citizens live in theBole neighborhood of Addis Ababa, the U.S. Mission in Ethiopia is issuing this Security Message to remind U.S. citizens to practice good personal security habits. While there is no specific information available to suggestthere are imminent threats to U.S. citizens or facilities, U.S. citizens should take every precaution to be aware of their surroundings and to adopt appropriate safety measures to protect themselves when traveling and when visiting public areas. All U.S. citizens are reminded to practice good security at home and on the streets. Limit unnecessary travel to unfamiliar areas and be aware of surroundings. When at home be sure to lock all exterior doors and use your home security alarms, if available.

Carry communications systems, e.g., a cell phone, at all times. Avoidlarge crowds or areas, including mobs, demonstrations, and protests.

Is endemic corruption ending the EPRDF rule?

News Analysis: This piece is prompted by the recent development of crisisin Pakistan where Pakistan‘s Supreme Court has ordered the arrest of the country’s prime minister on corruption charges, heightening the already extreme political uncertainty and fears the country’s fragile democracy could be derailed.” Pakistan is a conservative Islamic state where one would have expected least corruption but, lo and behold, endemic greed issurprisingly becoming the foremost issue threatening to plunge the fragilecountry already beset with severe politico-economic problems into a morecatastrophic situation. Pakistan’s Prime Minister, Raja Pervaiz Ashraf, has been arrested in connection with a scandal involving contracts for power stations. The news broke on television stations as a “Muslim cleric, Islamicscholar Tahir-ul-Qadri, addressed tens of thousands of protesters who have massed on the capital city for an extended sit-in to protest against corruption and electoral malpractice by Pakistan’s politicians.” Qadri declared to his supporters that the “false mandate of the rulers is over” and ordered President Asif Ali Zardar to dissolve parliament immediately. He told the crowd that the power of the President is over adding: “There are only two institutions in Pakistan that are functioning and doing their duties of the people. One is the judiciary of Pakistan and one is the armedforces of Pakistan and nothing else.” Qadri declared: “Victory, victory, victory by the grace of God!” Source: Google

Rampant corruption is increasing at an alarming rate in Ethiopia as admitted by the inactive EPRDF government waiting for its own downfall by popular uprising because the courts in the country are mere stooges ofthe ruling party. The determined public display of Pakistanis against corruption is one that impoverished Ethiopians should emulate knowing that the kind of support the judiciary and the military enjoyed by the former may not be available to the latter although it is worth soliciting through persuasion. Nevertheless, the Ethiopian people have the all the justification to stage a series of debilitating and massive protests publicly to hold their incompetent and greedy leaders to account for, among other things, have failed miserably to bring corruption under control. Only an all-inclusive uprising comprising all stakeholders can effectively deal withthe draconian and multiple problems created by the EPRDF over the last 21 years.

Lesson for the opposition in fighting the corrupt EPRDF regime: Pervasive corruption is increasingly engulfing our global village threatening to topplegovernments in some countries. It is triggering popular wrath and fury at the scourge wrought by greed ushering in widening gap between the rich and the poor even in countries that had chosen scientific socialism as a model of growth for many years. Some interesting examples are provided below:- 1. China: In my article titled "Reform in China vs. crisis within EPRDF" dated 15 November 2012 I wrote: "The GS in his speech to leading officials underlined the unprecedented stride in economic growth achieved in the last decade but asking them "to exercise strict self- discipline and strengthen supervision over their families and staff." He said "Leading officials at all levels, especially high-ranking officials, must readily observe the code of conduct on clean governance and report all important matters" adding that "If we fail to handle this issue well, it couldprove fatal to the Party, and even cause the collapse of the Party and the fall of the state". He made a passionate plea that "the CPC must make unremitting efforts to combat corruption, promote integrity and stay vigilant against degeneration." He singled out corruption as a major problem in his closing speech also. And the incoming General Secretary (GS) Xi Japing strongly underscored the same thing in condemning the rampant corruption." Emphasis added. The CPC and its government made a phenomenal progress in amassing wealth in the last decade but with poor distribution of that wealth going to members of the CPC top echelonsnot to mention flagrant abuse to human rights over the period. One has towatch the CCTV the progress China is making in fighting corruption, openness to the outside world and transparency at home. The lesson fromChina's experience for Ethiopians is logically to take into account equitablewealth distribution, respect for human rights, social justice, and economic development together – respect for human rights taking precedence at all times.

2. Uganda: President Museveni has realized the danger that rampant corruption is posing to the stability of his government. So he is leading aconcerted effort to fight the pervasive corruption in Uganda under the slogan: "Zero tolerance for corruption". He is in part driven by the pressure of donors withholding funding for development projects and direct budgetary support plus the public cry demanding accountability forcorruption. The opposition FDC led by its newly elected Party President isalso promising to play a constructive role leaving behind the blame gameof the past eight years. The recently formed group, which has christeneditself: "Black Monday Activists" is also seen on the streets envy Monday wearing black dresses and sensitizing passers-by on the severity of corruption in the country and distributing brochures to that effect. The free print and broadcast media in Uganda and the East Africa region report profusely on the pervasive corrupt practices. The Uganda example is something opposition activists and civil entities back home in Ethiopia may consider to intensify civil disobedience against the inactive government. I hope that the broadcast from the CCTV station to Africa willnot be used in fostering the “vision of the dead man” Meles Zenawi, the former friend of Communist Party of China (CPC) China should act in its long term interest to side with the vast majority of the Ethiopian people byrethinking its policy of underpinning a minority TPLF party trading in the good names of the valiant people of Tigray.

3. Ethiopia: The late Zenawi openly and in full view of the public complained about pervasive corruption in his government and the business sector. The mother of corruption Azeb Mesfin, the former TPLF ideologue and Chief Executive Officer of Endowment FundforRehabilitationof Tigray (EFFORT) Sebhat Nega (the enemy of Amhara and the EthiopianOrthodox Tewahedo Christian Church) and others in the den of thieves should face justice soonest by popular demand. No audit report of this mammoth business monopoly has been made public. Azeb Mesfin, the widow of Meles Zenawi, replaced Sebhat Nega as CEO while her husband was alive. The do-as-told Prime Minister Hailemariam is the flag bearer ofthe nauseating legacy of his predecessor. He is not expected to address the colossal corruption problem for he has already proved himself timid, habitual liar and incompetent leader. He cannot be relied on to follow the example of President Museveni in leading the fight against corruption.

Conclusion: The TPLF is a terrorist organization identified as such by Genocide Watch, the Global coalition to end genocide and mass atrocities. Genocide Watch has been vindicated by the recent plot of assassination onthe renowned journalist and human rights Abebe Gelaw in the United States. We Ethiopians everywhere should relentlessly plead with the Obama Administration to rethink its policy of working with a terrorist organization perceived as such by the international community and verified by the heinous plot of assassination intended to be carried out on the homeland of the US citizens. Pervasive corruption in Ethiopia is certainly one of the top crimes of the EPRDF leading to the collapse of the regime. Opposition forces and civic organization at home and in the diaspora should seize corruption as a weapon to expedite the downfall of the EPRDF repressive government.

President Yoweri Museveni of Uganda has realized the grave danger that rampant corruption is posing to his government and has taken the lead infighting the scourge. The same cannot be expected of Desalegn Hailemariam, the puppet Prime Minister of the EPRDF regime. So the bestchoice for us Ethiopians is emulating the Pakistani uprising against pandemic corruptionin Ethiopia of which the massively unemployed youngpersons are the main victims. In closing I would like to renew my solidarity with the 33 opposition parties in Ethiopia vying to initiate popular protest to assert their right to participate in the forthcoming local elections. My mantra: “The Almighty God has done His part leaving to us what we in the opposition and the Ethiopian people can do together. It is critical to act in unison to save Ethiopia. It is high time to boost the morale of renowned main opposition political entities and civic movementsat home!!!

FOOTBALL- Ethiopia deny attack on Nigeria team bus’

BBC Sport, Addis Ababa: (October 19, 2013) Updated - The Ethiopian Football Federation (EFF) has denied that there was an attack on the Nigerian team in Addis Ababa after their World Cup play-off first-leg tie. The Nigeria Football Federation (NFF) said the team bus was attacked by Ethiopian fans and that midfielder Nosa Igiebor was injured. The Super Eagles, who won the match 2-1, have reported the incident to FIFA. But the Ethiopian FA says an investigation led to no proof of the incident taking place. "There was no attack," EFF president Juinedin Basha told BBC Sport. "There was no one injured - either players or individuals from the Nigerian team on Sunday. This is what we found out from our investigation. "We have checked everything. We've got nothing that showsthat a player or any other individual was injured by fans. "The Ethiopian people are known to be respectful to any African from every corner. This is our culture, this is our history and the Nigerians are our African brothers," he said. Junedin Basha, however, acknowledged that there were some angry fans, following a late penalty, which was converted by Nigeria's Emmanuel Emenike. "Of course the stadium was full of angry fans, who were disappointed by the referee's decision, especially after he ruled out the first goal." The Walya Antelopes thought they had opened the scoring after 24 minutes through Saladin Said, only for Godfrey Oboabona to clearoff the line. The NFF said in a press statement that fans attacked the teambus with stones after the match, and that the rear window of the bus was shattered. "Igiebor was the unlucky one as the stone slashed his right palm leading to profuse bleeding that was immediately attended to by team doctor, Ibrahim Gyaran, Ben Alaiya, the Super Eagles press officer, said. The Ethiopian FA was fined last January after travelling Ethiopian fans at the Africa Cup of Nations in South Africa threw bottles at Zambian players. The East Africans travel to Calabar on 16 November for the returnleg of the play-off, with the winners progressing to the World Cup finals inBrazil.

Human Rights Watch World Report 2013-Ethiopia’

(HRW) PR – (October 19, 2013) The sudden death in August 2012 ofEthiopia’s long-serving and powerful prime minister, Meles Zenawi, provoked uncertainty over the country’s political transition, both domestically and among Ethiopia’s international partners. Ethiopia’s human rights record has sharply deteriorated, especially over the past fewyears, and although a new prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, took office in mid-September, it remains to be seen whether the government under his leadership will undertake human rights reforms. Ethiopian authorities continued to severely restrict basic rights of freedom of expression, association, and assembly in 2012. Thirty journalists and opposition members were convicted under the country's vague Anti- Terrorism Proclamation of 2009.The security forces responded to protests by the Muslim community in Oromia and Addis Ababa, the capital, with arbitrary arrests, detentions, and beatings. The Ethiopian government continues to implement its "villagization" program: the resettlement of 1.5million rural villagers in five regions of Ethiopia ostensibly to increase theiraccess to basic services. Many villagers in Gambella region have been forcibly displaced, causing considerable hardship. The government is also forcibly displacing indigenous pastoral communities in Ethiopia's Lower Omo Valley to make way for state-run sugar plantations.

Ethiopians Who Fall Prey to Human Traffickers on Rise'

(October 20, 2013) As Europe struggles to respond to the growing numberof African migrants, root causes should not be ignored. In the case of Ethiopia, one of the largest refugee-sending countries in Africa, what are the conditions that compel Ethiopians to take such life-threatening risks?

Are there humane and sustainable solutions for receiving countries beyondsimply coping? Is it time to examine how one's own policies may either deter or contribute to root problems? Many of us feel especially touched by this topic after the recent tragic shipwreck off the coast of the Italian island of Lampedusa, where 500 people, mostly African migrants, were crowded onto an unsafe boat, which eventually lost power, caught on fire and sunk. Only 155 people were saved. The display of their coffins has leftheart-wrenching images in our minds. Only four days prior to this, 13 other African migrants drowned off the coast of Sicily. These are only the ones we know about. Most of the victims were reported to be Eritreans and Somalis—two countries of immense suffering; however, Ethiopians were also among the dead and were also possibly underreported due to the practice of Ethiopians taking on Eritrean nationality as a short-cut to being accepted for asylum. To outsiders, these people are undocumented African migrants, but to us, they are our family members and neighbors.

To their families, each has a name, an age and a story behind them. The pain we are feeling as fellow humans when seeing these coffins, especiallythe small white ones holding young children, is heart-rending; imagine how difficult it will be to the deceased's loved ones?

REVELATION: Baobab (ባ ምባ): The ancient African fruit that fights diabetes'

(October 21, 2013) Could an African 'superfruit' prove to be the latestweapon in the battle against Type two diabetes?

By Laura Milne: It contains three times as much vitamin C as an orange, twice as much calcium as milk and tastes like a cross between a pineappleand melon. But the chances are most of us won't have heard of the baobab fruit yet - let alone tuck into one for breakfast in the morning.

Prized in Africa for centuries for its health-boosting properties, the fruit from the ancient baobab tree is an extremely rich source of polyphenals,known to be beneficial in reducing the glycaemic response - the rate at which sugar is released into the bloodstream.

Now scientists from the Oxford Brookes University have established that this benefit can be transferred into foodstuffs, raising the possibility of creating a range of "functional foods" produced specifically to reduce the effects of Type two diabetes. Researchers at the Functional Food Centre atthe university, who have just published their findings in the scientific journal Nutrition, measured and extracted the polyphenal contents of the baobab fruit. Using healthy human volunteers, the research team measured the rate of starch and sugar breakdown in their blood supply after they had eaten the baobab extract contained in either white bread ordissolved in water. They found that baobab fruit extract added to white bread significantly reduced the rate at which sugar was released into the blood supply post digestion and likewise when added to water. There was no effect on satiety. The research provides evidence that there is potentialfor baobab to be added to the food and drinks of Type two diabetes patients to help them to control their symptoms. "Further human studies on glycaemic response would be essential for determining the optimal dose of baobab fruit extract in reducing post-prandial glycaemia," the researchers concluded."

Grown in 32 African countries and in some parts of Australia, the baobabfruit is high in calcium, potassium, thiamin and vitamin B6 - all nutrientsimportant for general health. The flesh of the fruit is also high in protein and carbohydrates and in many poorer countries it is considered to be a valuable food source, whilst oil extracted the fruit is noted for its moisturising and healing properties. It is also traditionally used to treat many ailments ranging from diarrhoea to fever. It dries naturally on the branch before harvesting, the seeds are then removed and ground into apowder. Since launching in the UK last year, health-conscious Brits haverushed to buy the nutrient-dense superfood and sales have rocketed by 1,600 per cent. Paul Gugenheim of Minvita, the company which sells baobab in the UK in tablet and powder form, and is partnered with The Eden Project in Cornwall says: "This exciting research confirms that Baobab is a fruit with extraordinary health-giving properties.

Diabetes is one of the main health issues of our time, and is projected to affect millions of people and cost the NHS billions of pounds over the next25 years. If a natural, readily available product can be found to be useful in controlling the symptoms of this dreadful disease it can only be of benefit to us all." Dr Sarah Brewer says: "Baobab offers a number of nutritional health benefits which are only now being recognised in the West. It carries high concentrates of anti oxidants, energy, immune boosting vitamins and minerals and bone strengthening calcium. "Rich in iron, high in potassium and containing vital blood clotting ingredients it can even help support the circulatory system whilst the high-fibre contentbenefits the digestive system." But Bridget Benelam, senior nutrition scientist at the British Nutrition Foundation says: "Many sources say that it is high in vitamin C and calcium but you have to eat it in a processed form such as a powder or jam rather than the whole fruit." She adds: "I am sceptical of how much difference such foods actually make to people's nutrient intakes as realistically, most people will not eat them that frequently or in large quantities compared to the foods that are a more staple part of the diet." Boabab is available from Holland & Barrett, PlanetOrganic and health food shops, priced from £8.49 for a 250g tub of superfruit powder. £19.99 for 90 tablets. Or order online from minvita.co.uk

ERCA to hold Chinese Telecom Huawei's responsible for U.S.$13 MillionWorth of Equipment'

Addis Fortune: (October 22, 2013) - The Ethiopian Revenues & Customs Authority (ERCA) is to confiscate 13 million dollars worth of equipment imported in late 2012 by the Chinese telecom company, Huawei Technologies. The equipment was allegedly imported in the name of ethio telecom without the latter's knowledge. The measure came following successive investigations by the Ethiopian Shipping & Logistics Service Enterprise (ESLSE), Ethiopian Cargo (ET Cargo) and the House of People's Representatives (HPR). The investigations finally pointed out that the company had imported the equipment on behalf of ethio telecom. The latter signed an 800 million dollar telecommunication expansion deal threemonths ago with Huawei. Huawei imported a total of 235 items, which included energy storage units and various types of batteries through the ESLSE, on November 19 and 20, 2012. These were described on the commercial invoice as for 'ethio telecom network expansion projects'. On the other hand, other equipment, including microwave telecommunication products, with a gross weight of 11,334kg, were brought into the country through ET Cargo by the company on behalf of ethio-telecom, on December 8, 2012. The equipment has been stuck at ET Cargo and the Modjo Dry Port since late November 2012. This is about nine months before the company signed the deal with ethio telecom. The disclosure came as the ESLSE lost patience with ethio telecom for leaving what it believed was its property for over two months at the dry port, leading to congestion. The Enterprise filed an appeal with the Transport Standing Committee at the HPR, which then appealed at the Science, Communication & Technology Affairs Standing Committee. The latter contacted ethio telecom at the end of the last fiscal year to request an explanation. When asked by the House, however, ethio telecom claimed that it has no property at the dry port. In a letter ethio telecom wrote to the ERCA last week, it stated that the properties do not belong to them, nor did they allow Huawei to import the equipment. The state-owned telecom service provider signed a 1.6 billion dollar telecom service expansion project with Huawei and its Chinese rival, ZTE, on July 25 and August 18, 2013, respectively. Their specific assignments, however, are yet to be determined. Following ethio telecom's letter, a second letter wasdispatched, this time from the ERCA's head office, directed to the Customs Clearance Procedure Department of the branch office found inside ET Cargo. The Department, which is responsible for handling goods imported through the airline, was told to take the appropriate measure 'per the law'. "Discussion was held among officials here and the goods will be confiscated," an official at the Customer Service Directorate at the ERCA told Fortune, on condition of anonymity. A similar measure is to be taken at the dry port as well, Fortune has confirmed. The law says goods left at the port for more than two months should be confiscated. "They [Huawei] have been using our weakness and tolerance inappropriately," said Desalegn Tefera, port & operation service deputy CEO at ESL. Celia Huang, Huawei's public relations officer, declined to comment on the issue.

Migrants Death in the Mediterranean Sea Spark Debate, but Little Action'

SOMALILAND SUN: Migrants have been losing their lives trying to cross the Mediterranean on unseaworthy, overcrowded vessels for years, but until two weeks ago, their deaths rarely generated headlines. The sheer scale of the tragedy that occurred off the coast of the Italian island of Lampedusa on 3 October, however, was hard to ignore. A boat, which disembarked from Libya carrying an estimated 500 Eritrean asylum seekers, was only half a mile from Lampedusa's coast when it caught fire and capsized. So far, Italian authorities have pulled over 350 bodies from the water. The disaster has precipitated much discussion about what the European Union (EU) and its members states should be doing to prevent further loss of migrant lives at sea, even as the death toll in the Mediterranean continues to mount, with dozens of Syrian and Palestinian refugees losing their lives on 11 October when another boat capsized between Malta and Lampedusa. Compared to last year, 2013 has seen a marked increase in the numbers of migrants attempting sea crossings to Italy and Malta. While some 15,000 migrants and asylum seekers reachedthe two southern Mediterranean countries in 2012, according to the UN Refugee Agency (UNHCR), over 32,000 have arrived so far this year. The spike in numbers of migrants using the so-called Central Mediterranean route - which usually involves departures from Libya, but also includes those from Egypt and the Turkish coast - is not unprecedented. Following the collapse of the governments in Tunisia and Libya in 2011, 60,000 migrants used the route, with most of them arriving in Lampedusa. The Italian website Fortress Europe, which tracks migrant deaths, estimates that since 1988, nearly 20,000 people have died trying to penetrate Europe's borders, the vast majority of them at sea.

Responsibilities unclear: Most of the discussion since the recent tragedieshas focused on increasing search-and-rescue capacity. EU Home Affairs Commissioner Cecilia Malmstrom proposed that the role of EU border agency Frontex be expanded from the patrols it currently coordinates off the Italian coast to span the entire Mediterranean. Such a move could address the current lack of clarity surrounding which countries are responsible for rescuing boats in distress and where their occupants should disembark. But the six member states with Mediterranean coastlines have already voiced their opposition to a proposed regulation that would govern Frontex-coordinated operations, arguing that international laws already deal with such matters. "Prospects for it to be adopted soon are quite low," said Kris Pollet, a senior legal and policy officer with the Brussels-based European Council on Refugees and Exiles (ECRE). "There's no real sign that this is going to be a decisive moment."Meanwhile, the European Parliament has just approved a new state-of- the-art border surveillance programme called Eurosur, which will implement a system for monitoring the EU's external borders and sharinginformation between various national border security agencies. Eurosur will launch in December and, according to Malmstrom, could also be usedto more quickly identify migrant boats in distress.

However, Philip Amaral of Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS) Europe pointed outthat Eurosur has been in the pipeline for several years, long before the recent tragedy in Lampedusa. "The real basis is to tighten borders and prevent irregular migration; there's a heavy emphasis on the use of satellite imagery and drones," he told IRIN. "A byproduct could be that more lives would be saved at sea, but it doesn't establish clear lines in terms of which countries are responsible for migrant boats in distress. We think it's a missed opportunity," he said. Amaral also lamented the fact that the Eurosur regulation does not include language that would absolve ship masters from criminal responsibility when rescuing migrant boats. "In Italy, they're very reluctant to rescue ships in distress because they fear, rightly so, that they'll be prosecuted" for aiding irregular migration, he said. Ensuring that shipmasters cannot be prosecuted for facilitating the smuggling of migrants is among a list of 10 urgent measures that UNHCR is calling for to prevent further loss of life and increase burden sharing across the EU. "It is shameful to witness hundreds of unwitting migrants and refugees drowning on Europe's borders," said UN High Commissioner for Refugees António Guterres in a 12 October statement. He expressed particular concern that Syrian asylum seekers were among the casualties of recent boat tragedies. "They escaped bullets and bombs only to perish before they could ever claim asylum," he said.

In the absence of any EU-wide agreement on how to handle irregular migration across the Mediterranean, Italy announced on 14 October that itwould triple its air and sea presence in the southern Mediterranean to better respond to potential shipwrecks. The following day, Italian authorities reported that 370 migrants had been rescued from three boats in the waters between Libya and Sicily. Amaral welcomed the move by Italy but emphasized that the responsibility for search and rescue shouldbe shared with other member states. "The EU is all about solidarity, so itcan't just be left to Italy and Malta. Other countries need to pitch in and help out," he said. Legal migration options needed: EU Commissioner Malmstrom has joinedmigrant rights organizations in pointing out that, in the longer term, the only way to discourage migrants and asylum seekers from paying smugglers to take them across the Mediterranean in rickety vessels is to provide them with more legal channels for entering Europe. "Currently there's no political will for opening the doors of Europe and mainstream public opinion is very far from that" However, Pollet of ECRE said there was little willingness among member states to even engage in a debate about opening up legal channels for low-skilled migrants and asylum seekers to enter Europe. "At the moment, it's a very hypocritical approach," he said. "The whole discussion is focusing now on increased search and rescue capacity and trying to prevent irregular migration; it's really focused on the symptoms of the problem rather than the root causes. There's very little talk about how are these people supposed to get into Europe." Amaral agreed. "There is definitely a needed [legal] channel, especially for asylum seekers," he said. "But currently there's no political will for opening the doors of Europe and mainstream public opinion is very far away from that."

Ethiopia: Melaku Fenta et al former ERCA officers go on corruption trial'
ADDIS FORTUNE: (October 22, 2013) Melaku, former director general of the Ethiopian Revenues & Customs Authority (ERCA) and Gebrewahed Wolde Giorgis, the-then deputy to Melaku in the law enforcement division,have passed orders for the imports by some companies to get an inspection clearance without actually being inspected and thus avoid paying appropriate customs duties, reads the indictment presented today at the Federal High Court by the Federal Ethics & Anti-Corruption Commission (FEACC). This is the first of eight indictment files against the high-profile government officials and businessmen that the Commission started detaining in May 2013. The 84-page file, which was heard at the Federal High Court 15th criminal bench, named 31 defendants and included 26 corruption charges. Melaku, Guebrewahed, and Amogne Tagele, director of ERCA's Adama Branch Office, were included in the file. So were some of the big names in business, including Nega Guebre Egziabhere of Netsa Trading Plc, Ketema Kebede, of K.K. Plc, Getu Gelete,of Get-As International, and Guebreselassie Haile Mariam, of Comet Trading Plc. Barring Amogne, only one of the 26 charges was levied directly against these big names. Senior ERCA officials were accused of relaxing the inspection procedures for undue benefits, by using the mutually beneficial relationship they established with these businessmen. The charge specifically mentioned the personal connections of Nega and Guebrewahed, as well as Ketema Kebede with Melaku. Other big name companies whose goods get inspection clearance with only invoices as proof rather than actual inspections, include PETRAM Plc, Nyala Motors S.C., Al-Sam Plc, Metals & Engineering Corporation (MetEC), Salini Construction, and Total Ethiopia, according to the indictment file. Most of these companies were declared by ERCA as Authorised Economic Operators (AEO), which can get preferential treatment in the customs process, including shorter clearance time, as an incentive to tax-compliantcustomers. The charge however states that these were companies selected by Melaku himself and that the system has created a convenient atmosphere for further corruption and fraud. The charge also accuses Melaku and Guebrewahed of contravening a law that instituted impromptuinspections at ERCA's Adama Branch, after a study revealed that the customs clearance system in Adama was looser than Kaliti and thus preferred by alleged tax evaders. The study was conducted to investigate why the Kaliti customs was gaining such low revenues. This has also led for corrupt practices to take root, the charge reads. The remaining 22 charges were made against mostly customs officials from ERCA's Adama Branch and Modjo Dry Port and Terminal, freight-forwarders and their family members. Federal judges Berihu Tewoldeberhan and Mulugeta Kidane alternated in reading the charges – a process that took the whole day after the court session started at half past 10 in the morning. Due to time constraints, pleas by oral arguments were rescheduled for tomorrow. So was the hearing for two other indictment files, which include 18 and 17people respectively. Melaku and Guebrewahed are included in both these files; they are named in three of the eight indictment files that the Commission has registered in court. In the file that includes 17 people, other high-profile businessmen including Fikru Maru (MD), who runs AddisCardiac Hospital, and Simachew Kebede of Addis Inter-Continental Hotel, as well as Ketema Kebede and Nega Guebre Egzibher, are named.

Ethiopia - Here are some widely acknowledged facts to ponder'

1. Until recently, Azeb Mesfin, the widow of Meles Zenawi, was in charge of EFFORT, a multibillion-dollar conglomeration of over 60 large industrialcompanies. EFFORT (The Endowment Fund For the Relief of Tigray) dominates every industrial sector in Ethiopia. This fact cannot be denied even by the TPLF lie factories. It is a well-established fact that Azeb siphons of money from these companies. Additionally, she has forced some of the biggest companies in the country to make her a partner. For example, she has ownership interests in Dembel City Center, the largest shopping mall in Ethiopia. How can she be a partner of such multimillion-dollar company with her $200 per month salary?

2. Between 2000 – 2009, over $11 billion (USD) in hard currency wastaken out of Ethiopia, as reported by the Wall Street Journal. No one,other than TPLF officials, has access to such capital in Ethiopia.

3. In 2011, Meles Zenwi had admitted that 9 million kilograms of coffee (worth over $100 million USD) has disappeared from a government controlled warehouse. He brushed off the theft by saying, “don’t do it again!” This is the thief that Obama’s national security adviser Susan Ricepraised as a “brilliant leader.”

4. Ethiopia’s mining sector is monopolized by Al Amoudi and his TPLF partners. Gold that is mined at the Legedembi and other mines in Ethiopiais taken out of the country without the knowledge of Ethiopia’s Ministry ofMining. Private airplanes owned by Al Amoudi, with security provided by TPLF, carry the gold and take it directly to the London market.

5. Ethiopia’s livestock and food export is also under the control of TPLF and Al Amoudi. As Al Amoudi himself said, major restaurants in UAE andSaudi Arabia are serving organic Ethiopian vegetables and meat.

6. Despite a strict law against khat import and distribution in the U.S., theillegal drug is widely used by Ethiopian immigrants in the Diaspora. The reason is that most of the smuggled khat is brought by TPLF diplomats. Since they have diplomatic status, no one searches them when they arrivein the U.S.

7. Last May 2013, the TPLF-controlled media, such as ETV, reported that tens of millions dollars in cash (USD and Euro) as well as vehicles and buildings were confiscated from two of Azeb Mesfin’s allies who served asheads of the Ethiopian Revenue and Customs Authority. These two individuals were arrested and their assets were seized following a power struggle inside TPLF. If Azeb Mesfin’s allies in the ruling junta have amassed such wealth, is it hard to come up with an estimate of Azeb’s own net worth?

The facts listed above are just the tip of the iceberg. Because of restrictions on press in Ethiopia, most of the looting is going unreported. Those who try to dig information, such as Reeyot Alemu, who was investigating the corruption surrounding the Nile Dam project, end up in prison accused of terrorism. These are irrefutable facts. Through such “grand theft Ethiopia” and an epic looting spree, the TPLF officials have become among the richest people in the world in the span of just 22 yearswhile the people of Ethiopia are subjected to extreme poverty, so much sothat tens of thousands of Ethiopian children in the capital city scavenge forfood at the city trash dump known as ‘Qoshe’.

World Sports: Hawassa - Ethiopia's first marathon draws crowds to 'landof runners’

AFP: Over 350 participants had gathered in Ethiopia, the land of runners, for the country's first international marathon organized by athletics legendHaile Guebrselassie. Sunday's October 20 race, which drew 150 elite Ethiopian athletes and about 150 foreign "fun runners", promises to boost professionalism in a country that has produced scores of world-class runners, many of whom started running barefoot along dusty country roads. "Believe me, we can produce more big names, we can produce more marathon runners, more Olympic champions, world champion and world record holders," said Guebrselassie, two-time marathon record- breaker and 10,000 Olympic champion. Race organizers sought to draw Ethiopia's top athletes to the race in Hawassa, 275 kilometers (170 miles)south of Ethiopia's capital, by offering the largest cash prize in Ethiopian racing history – close to $5,300 (3,855 euros) each for the top man and woman competitors. The marathon is part of an overall boost to Ethiopian athletics, which in the past two years has been bolstered by new world- class training centers and a series of competitive races that have drawn crowds from around the world.

Ethiopia - EU envoy to Sudan meets Ethiopian minister of foreign affairs'

The two sides commended the visit ofSudanese President to Juba as a positive step towards facilitating implementation to a series of security and economic agreements signed between the two countries. Ethiopia is the current chair of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) which brokered the 2005 peace agreement that allowed South Sudan's independence, and continues to mediate on the outstanding issues between the two countries besides an African Unionpanel headed by former South African president Thabo Mbeki.

Ethiopia-Terrorist bomb explosion in Oct. 13 was planted by the regime –eyewitnesses'

Top News updates: (October 22, 2013) - Multiple witnesses confirmed thatthe Oct. 13, 2013, alleged terrorist bomb explosion in Ethiopia's capital Addis Ababa was planted by the regime. According to our sources, the night before the explosion, two dead bodies were taken by TPLF security agents from Menilik Hospital and placed inside the house where the explosion took place. The house was allegedly rented by Somali nationals, but it has now been exposed that the Somalis were brought from the Somali region by the regime's security agents a few days before the incident took place and were transported back right after the explosion.

Ethiopian Review's investigation has uncovered that the Somali nationals were brought to Addis Ababa by a special unit named 03 within the TPLF (ruling party) security apparatus that is under the direct command of Debretsion Guebremichael and Getachew Assefa, both members of the TPLF politburo. Contacted by Ethiopian Review, officials at the local police station have said that they are not part of the investigation and do not know the identities of any of the individuals, including the owners of the house who are allegedly involved. But according to residents in the neighborhood, the house belongs to well-known TPLF supporters who are suspected by every one of being spies. The regime has so far not been willing to reveal the true identities of those who have reportedly been killed while setting up the bomb.

This is not the first time that the TPLF junta has exploded bombs and blamed it on its enemies. A diplomatic dispatch sent to Washington DC by American diplomats in Addis Ababa confirms (in a WikiLeaks release) that the regime in Ethiopia is known to fabricate bombing incidents. It needs also to be noted that the TPLF juntais one of the major sources of weapons to the Al Shabab terrorist group, according to South African Ambassador to the United Nations, Dumisani Kumalo, who was serving as chairman of the U.N. Security Council's Somalia sanctions committee. Al Shabab itself is the creation of the TPLF junta. Without the invasion of Somalia by TPLF, Al Shabab would not havecome into existence.

Rebel ONLF says it has attacked gov't officials'

Top News (October 22, 2013): On an attack launched against the delegation of the Deputy Prime Minister of Ethiopia Demeke Mekonnen, nine regional leaders, domestic and foreign investors, who were visiting Ogaden Region last week, the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) said it has killed several Ethiopian troops at the airport and destroyed twovehicles. Hassan Abdualhi, Spokesperson of the Front, said to ESAT that the attack was launched as soon as delegates landed in Kebridahar town Airport last week. coming to the Region so we were already prepared to execute the attacks"Hassan said. The Ethiopian government has not commented on the reports so far. It is to be recalled that artists and journalists had been sent to the Ogaden region to visit the "peace and developmental activities" there.

No protection, leave power: UDJP

Top News (October 22, 2013) - In a press release that came after Prime Minister Hailemariam Dessalgn said last week in the Parliament that the government may ban peaceful demonstrations as it cannot provide protection, the Unity for Democracy and Justice (UDJ) said yesterday a government that cannot provide protection to citizens should step down. UDJ said such a government should not deny the people their right but apologise and give the power to the people. The Party said that it will continue to fight for the respect of political, social, economic and all other questions of the people and the government's interference in religious affairs to stop unchallenged by the government's intimidations. UDJ has also criticised the positions of some African countries including Ethiopia onthe International Criminal Court (ICC). It said "there is no immunity committing genocide". According to UDJ, African leaders should not meet to say "ICC should not sue us" but they should instead meet to cleanse the tears of their citizens. All those that abuse and torture their citizens, should appear before justice, said the Party.

Ethiopia – Winning legend says staying fit at 40 is all mental; still runs35kms a day'

EMF: (October 23, 2013) Aged now 40 but barely slowing down, Haile Guebrselassie says his enduring presence in international athletics has nothing to do with fancy foods or the latest gizmos. The key ingredient, hesaid, is in the mind. "You have to have three things: discipline, commitment and hard work," said Guebrselassie, a double Olympic gold medallist in the 10,000 metres, four-time World Champion over the same distance and two-time world record-breaker in the marathon. It is this discipline which drives Guebrselassie to train twice a day and clock a dailyaverage of 35 kilometres. Preparing for a race provides a goal to commit to, and he said some of his best training comes ahead of a big event. He admits that the workload is not getting any easier, with middle-aged aches and pains ever-present. So fighting through physical pain and mental laziness is important too, he said. "One of the secrets, thank you for reminding me, is to accept the pain. Without pain, no gain," he told AFP.

A Calabar attack awaits Ethiopian national squad'

Football/SuperEagles: (October 23, 2013) - Nigeria's Super Eagles willqualify for the 2014 Fifa World Cup in Brazil even if they lose 0-1 to Ethiopia's Walia Antelopes in the second leg of their playoff tie on November 16. Nigeria’s 2-1 win in the first leg in Addis Ababa on October 13 puts the African champions in the box seat ahead of the return fixture in Calabar but head coach of the Super Eagles, Stephen Keshi has dispelled fears that his players will sit on their lead. Keshi insists the Super Eagles will “play our normal game” and attack the Ethiopians at theUJ Esuene Stadium, Calabar. “We will play our normal game of holding on to the ball and keeping possession. We will try to enjoy ourselves and get the best possible result,” Keshi told supersport.com. The trainer then discussed the first leg in Addis Ababa revealing the reasons behind the team’s slow start against the East Africans at the Ydnekachew Tessema stadium. “We suffered a lot in the first leg because of the altitude in Addis Ababa. They had a plan to wear us out inside the first 30 minutes. “That was why they started out the way they did. They tried to make us run all over the pitch and tire us out but these things are expected when you playaway from home and in such a place. “I had a frank discussion with my players at half time and we knew we had to correct the situation. We changed our tactics and the Ethiopians got tired after 70 minutes which made our job easier,” he said. Nigeria’s last three internationals have been prosecuted by the same 23 players and Keshi also spoke on whetherhe will ring the changes ahead of the decisive second leg game against Ethiopia next month. “Nothing has been decided yet even though I am pleased by the progress of (defender, Kenneth) Omeruo following his surgery. “I am aware some players (I invited for the last three fixtures) have not been playing for their clubs. I am monitoring the situation and we will see how it goes. Since replacing Samson Siasia as Super Eagles coach in 2011, Keshi has not lost a competitive game to African opposition. Ethiopian president educated in the formerly Peking University of China’

China.org.cn - (October 24, 2013) Mulatu Teshome's election as Ethiopia'snew president on October 7 has created a sensation at two prestigious Beijing (formerly Peking) -based universities which were the cradle of the outstanding statesman. In 1976, Teshome came to China for the first time. As a government-funded student, he studied at Beijing Language and Culture University (BLCU) for one year and then moved on to Peking University, where he successively obtained his BA, MA, and PhD degrees.

"He [Teshome) was more mature and diligent than his peers when studying at BLCU. He also showed great respect for all teachers." Zhao Yupin, an associate professor from BLCU, recalled. Zhao taught Teshomeessential Chinese language courses when the young man was there to learn Chinese in 1976. BLCU is a university specialized in teaching the Chinese language and culture to foreign students. Zhao, who was deeplyimpressed by Teshome, added, "He was active and brave in expressing himself in class. He used to finish his homework on time and would ask me questions on whatever he didn't understand."

Teshome made rapid progress in learning Mandarin Chinese and soon gotacquainted with his new environment. The cheerful student made a lot ofChinese friends. In his spare time, he would often stroll around the streets, have a beer and a chat with his Chinese classmates. The student,who got familiar with Beijing's hutongs during this time, developed a strong interest in Chinese history and culture. In 1977, Teshome went onto study at Peking University, where he stayed for 14 years -- until 1991.He obtained his bachelor's degree in Philosophy of Political Economy in 1982. From 1985 to 1991, he received his master's and doctor's degrees in International Law under the supervision of Zhao Baoxu, a well-established Chinese political scientist.

Required qualifications & Independent mindedness: Mulatu Teshome an economist by profession served in various ministerial positions before he was appointed as an Ambassador plenipotentiary under PM Meles Zenawi'sadministration. He had been serving in various positions such as state minister of Economic Development, Ethiopia's ambassador to China and Japan as well as Ethiopia's Minister of Agriculture. For some one to become president of Ethiopia under EPRDF led government is not an easy task, one has to be obeyable or should have the soul of loyalty or yesmanship. The ruling EPRDF doesn't fit any one who doesn't have such "personal qualities" to come near the presidency, particularly after the debacle involving Dr. Negasso Gidada Solon, who quits the ceremonial title after his tenure of 6 years 12 years ago after outspokenly revokes Meles Zenawi: "You are looking more and more like Mengistu Hailemariam". Does Mulatu Teshome has all these personal qualities?

The role of the federal president under the Ethiopian Constitution: Editor'sNote: (October 8, 2013) – Now Ethiopia is having a new president in the name of Dr Mulatu Teshome, who was born in 1955/56 in Arjo town of former Wollega province, in western Ethiopia. Dr. Mulatu served in variousministerial positions before he was appointed as an Ambassador plenipotentiary to Turkey under PM Meles Zenawi's last period of administration. He is also the executive member of the Oromo Peoples' Democratic Organization (OPDO). Mulatu Teshome originated from the ethnic-Oromo tribe, the country's largest ethnic-group. He has also servedas Ethiopia's ambassador to China and Japan as well as Ethiopia's Ministerof Agriculture. Ethiopia's parliament is dominated by the ruling party, withonly one opposition member. Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn himself took office in September 2012, a month after the death of long- time ruler Meles Zenawi. In tradition, such portfolio being considered for ethnic Oromos as experience in the last 23 years. There is no need of competency to take presidential power in EPRDF era. The only thing the president-elect has to serve as senior member of EPRDF/OPDO. Even though EPRDF believes that power is divided fairly among all the four ethnic-based parties that make up the EPRDF coalition, the presidential position is nothing more than receiving bouquets of flower, and welcoming foreign dignitaries that arrive to the country. The job of ceremonial president is in accordance with the Ethiopian constitution's Article 71, thatstipulates the president does not have any influence in the politics of the country. For a better understanding, the Federal constitution Article 71 in it's sub-article "Powers and Functions of the President", states duties of the federal president as followed, Shall, open the joint session of the House of Peoples' Representatives andthe House of the Federation at the commencement of their annual sessions.

Shall, proclaim in the Federal Negarit-Gazeta laws and internationalagreements approved by the House of Peoples Representatives in accordance with the Constitution.

Shall, upon recommendation by the Prime Minister, appoints ambassadorsand other envoys to represent the country abroad.

Shall, receive the credentials of foreign ambassadors and special envoys.

Shall, award medals, prizes and gifts in accordance with conditions andprocedures established by law.

Shall, upon recommendation by the Prime Minister and in accordance withlaw, awards higher military positions and titles.

Shall, in accordance with conditions and procedures established by law,grant presidential pardon.

Ethiopia imposes KSA travel ban'

Arab News: (October 25, 2013) The Ethiopian government has imposed asix-month ban on its citizens from traveling to Saudi Arabia for work.

Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn said the conditions of Ethiopians working in Saudi Arabia, particularly domestic workers, had continued to get worse. "Effective next month, we will not send our citizens to Saudi Arabia to work for a period of (at least) six months," he said in Ethiopian Parliament. Abdulbaqi Ahmad Ajlan, the Saudi Ambassador to Ethiopia, said the embassy has not received official directives from the Ethiopian government to stop exporting workers to the Kingdom and that the embassy is still issuing visas and completing paperwork for those who hadobtained two-year visas. Yehia Al-Muqbel, chairman of the Recruitment Committee at the Jeddah Chamber, accused the Ethiopian government of creating obstacles to send housemaids to the Kingdom. "The Ethiopian government wants to stop exporting home maids to the Kingdom throughdelaying their travel procedures. The Ministry of Labor, however, is still looking for new markets for recruiting housemaids." The recruitment suspension comes in the wake of several incidents involving Ethiopian housemaids, the most recent of which includes the stabbing of a Saudiemployer by a housemaid.

ETHIOPIA - Walmart About To Turn Up’

A deal would seem to be on the cards after lengthy negotiations betweenthe American company Walmart and the Ethiopian government.

Power outage at Black Lion Referal Hospital in Ethiopia’s capital causesdisruption’

FBC: (October 25, 2013) - A 7 hour power outage disrupted work at AddisAbaba’s largest public health facility, Black Lion Hospital, yesterday. Due to the power outage, patients in severe conditions who needed surgery were left stranded as general surgery rooms as well as emergency surgeryrooms were out of service. Hospital staff were seen administering oxygen manually to patients. Experts say routine care including basic diagnostic services become difficult to administer during a power outage. According to doctors and nurses, patients who were scheduled for surgery had to be rescheduled for a different day. This is expected to cause an overload on the hospital’s schedule over the next few weeks.

The hospital usually receives power from two sources. If for some reason these sources fail, the system is designed for a backup generator to take over. According to media reports, the power failure resulted from a problem with the power transmission mechanism. Power outages are regular in Addis Ababa, however, on this occasion, the backup generator failed to come on as usual. This incident highlights the need for a lasting solution to the power problem in this city. In order to make sure this doesnot become an issue in the future, the hospital has placed a request with the Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation to supply a third power source tothe hospital. In addition to this, the hospital plans to purchase a new generator and install small generators in vital areas around the facility.

Hospital officials believe these precautions will ensure the hospital’s patients do not suffer from lack of treatment due to power outages in thefuture.

Increased Political Participation Helps Narrow Global Gender Gap in 2013’

Global Gender Gap Report-2013 (October 25, 2013) Geneva, Switzerland, 25 October 2013 – The world’s gender gaps narrowed slightly in 2013 on the back of definite if not universal improvements in economic equality and political participation between the sexes, according to the Global Gender Gap Report 2013, which is published today. Economic participation and opportunity – salaries, participation and highlyskilled employment Educational attainment – access to basic and higher levels of educationPolitical empowerment – representation in decision-making structures Health and survival – life expectancy and sex ratio.

World Economic Forum: (October 25, 2013) Most Ethiopians live under obscene poverty where children in the capital city scavenge for food in trash dumps. DIARY-Emperor Menelik II had investments in America’

Menelik was intellectual who spoke French, Italian, English fluently, hadpersonal collection of 10000 books, invested in American stocks. WAY AHEAD OF HIS TIME! - New York Times:

(Originally published November 7, 1909)

BRUSSELS (Oct. 27, 2013) - Abyssinia's Ruler Said to be a Heavy Buyer ofAmerican Railway Stocks Has Aided His People. Remarkable Progress During His Reign - Baron de Jarlsburg Tells the Monarch, Now Reported Dying, Special Correspondence The New York T imes.

Baron de Jarlsburg, the Belgian explorer, just returned from Abyssinia, has much to relate about Emperor Menelik, whose serious illness was recently announced. "Menelik," said Baron de Jarlsburg, in an interview with the New York Times correspondent, "has since accession to the throne, twenty years ago, transformed Abyssinia from a semi-barbarous power to a State modeled on the lines of a European constitutional monarchy. "The sovereign, who styles himself somewhat pompously, Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Juda, Elect of the Saviour, King of Kings ofEthiopia, who shattered Italy's colonial ambitions by his victories at Amba-Garima, is the ruler of a nation of 7,000,000 inhabitants, the mysterious origin of which is lost in the night of ages. "When Menelik was crowned Emperor of Ethiopia on Nov. 4, 1889, after King Johanne's death, he was far from being the accepted ruler of all the States which constitute the Abyssinian empire. It was only after much hard fighting that Menelik finally succeeded in subjugating those rebellious chieftains who did not recognize him as Johanne's legitimate successor.

"Since then, Menelik's one aim has been to introduce European civilizationinto his country. The Emperor, after abolishing the feudal laws still extant in the empire, and emancipating the slaves, established compulsory free education throughout his dominions. As a result in another generation education will be as widespread in Abyssinia as in several European countries. "Menelik is himself an altogether unique figure among African potentates. As a diplomat, as a financier, and as a soldier, he can hold hisown with the most up-to-date of his brother sovereigns. As a soldier and adiplomat, he showed his worth at the time of Italy's defeat by the Abyssinians. In late years, however, it is particularly as a financier that Menelik has distinguished himself. he had a natural bent for finance, evenas a young man, before his accession to the throne, and at that timewentfor stock speculation on the Paris Bourse to a considerable extent. These youthful speculations proved successful, and were only interrupted by theevents which followed Menelik's accession.

"To-day the Abyssinian ruler has extended the range of his financial operations to the Unted States, and is heavy investor in American railroads. What with, his American securities and his French and Belgian mining investments, Menelik has a private fortune estimated at no less than twenty-five million dollars.

"The most striking fact about Abyssinia'sdusky ruler," said Baron de Jarlsburg in conclusion, "is his versatility. Anaccomplished linguist, he speaks French, English, and Italian fluently.

Notwithstanding all the time he is compelled to devote to state affairs, hestill finds the opportunity to keep up in surrent European literature, and israrely at a loss when a new author is mentioned. At Adissaba Palace - to give him the title by which he is known to his subjects -- takes particular pride in his library of ten thousand volumes, collected by himself.

ONLF warns again foreign oil exploration companies operating in Ogaden’

OgadenToday (October 27, 2013) - Information Bureau of Ogaden National Liberation Front, ONLF a group fighting for the Self-determinationof Ogaden Region in eastern Ethiopia has warned on Sunday the Foreign oil companies interested in Ogaden Region. According to ONA, Ogaden News Agency the ONLF has warned several times for the oil companies but ignored the threats. “It is unfortunate that African Oil Company ignored the warning and they must know that without consent of the people Somali Ogaden region, oil and gas explorations in the region is impossible. The information bureau has said that if African Oil Company isspending millions of dollars on security and the genocide taking place in Ogaden for the name of oil and gas exploration, ONLF and its people will take a tough action.

Hussein Nur, head of the information affairs of the ONLF, said in an interview with Ogadentoday Press that they would suggest the foreign companies to abandon oil searching operations in the region for their security and economy. We are aware of the complicity of genocide that oilcompanies played a role in the Africa, if the move is that, history will be written and the accountability of the genocide will be witnessed, the Information Bureau said in statement. The group stated that they want forthe development of the Ogaden region and the benefit of their people but Ogaden people and their struggle front see the oil companies as looters ofthe natural resource of Ogaden until political solution and the demands the people are met. We urge all foreign companies to exercise corporate responsibility and steer clear of Ogaden so long as our people are victimsof genocide, the information Bureau says in the statement. People of Somali Ogaden are ready to defend their country and their oil, the statement stated. The Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), ethnic Somalis fighting for self-determination since 1984, claimed responsibilityfor the pre-dawn raid on the Chinese-run oil exploration field in April, 2007.

It’s About The Dam: ‘Joint Dam ownership with Egypt and the Sudan,what does it mean?

Public debate: Joint Dam ownership with Egypt: What does it mean? On October 7, PMHD made some remarks in a Press Conference that will resonate for years and make or break his political future, as well as the future of Ethiopian partisan politics. What is the most incredulous statement by the Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn so far, he announced that he will welcome the participation of Egypt and Sudan in the construction of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) and that his government and he consider the Dam to be “jointly owned” by Ethiopia, Sudan, and Egypt. Are we going to be fool and share our right onour natural resources with Egypt and the Sudan for centuries to come? I am not clear with this idea. This matter is not as simple as allowing leasing a land for foreigners for a certain period. In other words, it is like allowing Egypt and the Sudan to decide on our sovereignty issue regarding the Dam. Please, this question should not be decided by the good will of one single Government official or anybody else. Look, how theEgyptians are smart enough and fast to accept this kind of ideas, which gives them to control the Dam indirectly. About Meles Zenawi, for instance, when former US President Jimmy Carter advised him in 1989 regarding the importance of an outlet to the sea, that Meles shouldn't punish the future generations of Ethiopia by turning the country into a landlocked nation, Meles Zenawi posed as an Ethiopian citizen and told Jimmy Carter, "Ethiopia had never had a port. The Eritreans fought against Ethiopia for over 30 years because we have had annexed their territory." Dr Yacob Hailemariam in his recently published book: "Assab Yemanat?" (Who owes Assab?) - When Ethiopia falls into the hands of a popularly-elected government, the legal campaign for the restoration of port of Assab, as an outlet to the Red Sea of its natural owner, undoubtedly Ethiopia will begin a new era with earnest. Although, many firmly believe Eritrea would be content with its own closest port of Massawa, while readily to handover the southern stretch of the Red Sea toits natural owner, Ethiopia. Let the public open discussion on this matter and have their say.

Ethiopia and the sovereignty over the Blue Nile - Joint Dam owership:What does it mean?

Public debate: From about three thousand treaties and agreements dealing with the navigation and non-navigation use of waterways and international rivers, only a handful deal with dams. Even then, the record of the legal and political problems surrounding such jointly owned dams ought to raise a red flag for Ethiopia. Even within African nations involvedin joint ownership of dams there are some serious conflicts of equitable sharing of both water and generated hydropower. In South America all ofthe jointly owned Dams are the sources of serious conflicts. The same types of conflicting interests of joint owners of dams in Africa are also similar causes of conflicts as is the case with their counterparts in South America. One must study carefully the cases of joint ownerships of dams indicated here in below, before jumping into a minefield of such legal controversies by creating a joint ownership of the Great Renaissance Damand the Blue Nile and its Basin. 1) Senegal/Gambia Dams – contentious relationship a far cry from a harmonious state cooperation. 2) Cabora Bassa Dam, Mozambique/South Africa. 3) The Kariba Dam, Zambia/Zimbabwe. 4) Salto Grande – Argentina and Uraguay. 5) YaciretaDam - Argentina and Paraguay. 6) Itaipu Brazil shared with Paraguay. 7) Narva Reservoir Russia shared with Estonia

The Guardian: Elephantiasis in Ethiopia'

Health-Mapping Elephantiasis in Ethiopia: (October 28, 2013) In June 2013, Ethiopia launched a national master plan for neglected tropical diseases. Its success depends on understanding the geographical distribution and burden of NTDs to target priority areas, find overlaps and improve control. Podoconiosis and lymphatic filariasis, two forms of elephantiasis, are among the eight NTDs targeted in the plan. Funded by DfID, the Wellcome Trust and the End Fund, health providers are mappingthe extent of elephantiasis prevalance in 692 districts. Ethiopia now has a national plan for eliminating neglected tropical diseases, but success depends on disease mapping, monitoring, and making data accessible for policymakers There are two principal causes of elephantiasis, or lymphoedema, in the tropics. The most common cause, and already known to be a significant public health problem, is lymphatic filariasis (LF). The other main cause is podoconiosis: a form of elephantiasis arisingin barefoot subsistence farmers who are in long-term contact with irritant red clay soil of volcanic origins. The disability associated with elephantiasiscreates considerable stigma, and reduces productivity in patients.

According to a study in Ethiopia, published by Tropical Medicine and International Health, the total direct costs of podoconiosis amounted to the equivalent of $143 (£88) per patient per year and a productivity loss of 45% of total working days per year. Ethiopia recently launched its national master plan (2013-2015) for neglected tropical diseases, and podoconiosis and LF are two of the eight NTDs prioritised within it. In order to achieve the goals of this plan, health and development organisations will need a clear understanding of the geographical distribution and burden of the diseases. With that knowledge, they will be able to target priority areas and determine geographical overlaps among the disases to enable integrated control. Elephantiasis is one of the NTDswith a clear potential for elimination. LF infection can be prevented and treated with a combination of medicines, while podoconiosis is easily preventable if shoes are consistently worn, and early stages can be successfully treated. For those who developed advanced disease of eithercause there are proven ways to manage symptoms and prevent disabilities. Nonetheless control and elimination efforts can be hampered by a lack of information on the geographical distribution of the diseases. One of the best ways to overcome this problem is by using integrated mapping. Mapping can help to identify populations at risk of diseases, indicate priority areas, target resources and help to monitor control progress. A new initiative to map LF and podoconiosis in Ethiopia is underway, through a collaboration between several organisations.

Supported by the Wellcome Trust, DfID and End Fund, the Ethiopian Health and Nutrition Research Institute (Ehnri) is working with Brighton and Sussex Medical School (BSMS), the Centre for Neglected Tropical Diseases, the Global Atlas of Helminth Infections at the London School ofHygiene & Tropical Medicine to map 1,384 communities in 692 districts, covering more than 130,000 individuals.

What the Bible Says About Money is shocking’ Money News Commentary (October 29, 2013) - Most people know Sean Hyman from his regular appearances on Fox Business, CNBC, and Bloomberg Television, but what they don’t know is that Sean is a former pastor, and that his secret to investing is woven within the Bible. Perhapsthat can explain why, despite his uncanny ability to predict precise movesin the stock market, Sean is often laughed at for his unique stance on investing. For example . . . a few months ago Sean appeared on Bloomberg Television. At that time, Best Buy (BBY) was dropping to all- time lows of $16 a share. Sean predicted the stock could go down to $11 a share, and would then quickly rebound to $25 per share, and after that would rally to $40 per share over the next year. Another commentator on the show actually mocked Sean for his stance, saying “$40 on Best Buy? If that’s the case Apple (AAPL) is going to $1,500. That’s the most ridiculous thing I have ever heard!” (Editor’s Note: At the time, Apple was trading at $650 per share). Within a few weeks, Sean would receive the last laugh. Best Buy dropped down to $11.20 a share and has since rebounded up to $42 a share — a 360% gain — exactly as Sean predicted.(Ironically, Apple has dropped down to about $400 per share). During a recent private dinner with Sean, once he’d blessed the food, I wasted no time asking him what his secret is for investing so successfully. I expectedSean to say that it was his years of experience at Charles Schwab or perhaps one of the complicated algorithms he uses for timing the stock market. So when Sean responded that his secret to investing was the Bible, I was thoroughly shocked. Yes, I knew Sean was a Christian (anyone who spends more than 1 minute with him will pick that up!).

However, people usually keep their faith separate from things like . . .investing.

But not Sean: For Sean, the Bible is his FOUNDATION for investing. He explained to me how there is actually a “Biblical Money Code” woven into Scripture. Sean says it is this Biblical Money Code that took him from making a mere $15,000 a year to now giving away up to $50,000 a year. Sean also credits this code with helping him turn his father’s $40,000 retirement account into $396,000. Certain investment titans, Sean says, such as Warren Buffett and John Templeton, have already used this code to amass billions. What Sean had to say impressed me so much that I asked him to put a presentation together that reveals how anyone could use this “Biblical Money Code” I’ve personally watched this presentation several times and it is already spreading virally. During the video, Sean uses the teachings of King Solomon, Jesus of Nazareth, and the Apostle Paul to show how anyone can get out of debt . . . make sound investments . . . and morally build substantial wealth. Sean even reveals a“debilitating ‘financial sin’ that blinds many . . . and could be costing you up to 41% of your life savings at this very moment.” What’s so deceiving about this sin is how innocent and safe it appears at first. And at the end, he finishes up with his “12-12-12 plan for investing.” This is a simple step-by-step plan to go from being a saver, to an investor, to a philanthropist.

Ethiopian forces accused of killing civilians in Ogaden’

EAN (October 30, 2013) Ethiopian paramilitary forces are reported to havekilled three civilians in Godey – a renowned town in the disputed Somali Ogaden region, southeast of the country. According to a report by the Somali Sun which quotes an unidentified non-governmental organization worker in the area, the men who were killed were accused of being supporters of the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF). According to the informant, Ethiopian paramilitary forces arrested six civilians in Hadhawe, Ogaden, for their supposed affiliation with the ONLF. The prisoners are said to have been moved to Godey town, where three of them were put to death. Two of the three executed men are reported to be business owners in Ogaden. Ogaden has been a point of contention since the region was handed to Ethiopia by the British in the 19th century.The town, which separates Ethiopia and Somalia, has historically been ruled by both Ethiopian and Somali rulers – although it currently has a larger percentage of Somali inhabitants. The ONLF, which was created in 1984, has waged a war on Ethiopia for self determination of the Ogaden region through it's military arm, the Ogaden National Liberation Army (ONLA). The fight has been a bloody one thus far, with both sides recording hundreds of casualties.

The Ethiopian government has, on several occasions, been accused of human rights violations in the war against the ONLF. According to human rights groups, Ethiopian forces carry out unlawful detention and extra- judicial killing of civilians thought to be supporters of the ONLF. Ethiopian forces are also accused of forcefully recruiting civilians to join in the war against the rebels. However, the government flatly denies these charges. Authorities say paramilitary forces in the area are working to cut off the crucial support the rebel group is receiving from the Ogaden clan. Despiteclaims from Ethiopian officials that the ONLF has been severely weakened.Only four days ago, the ONLF announced that they had carried out a series of attacks on Ethiopian paramilitary forces stationed in the region.

According to reports, twenty-four Ethiopian paramilitary soldiers were killed in the attacks. There has been no confirmation from Ethiopian authorities regarding this claim. Some Experts speculate that the arrest and killing of these civilians may be a retaliation for the recent rebel attack. Meanwhile, local elders in Ogaden are reported to have requested that the governor of the area, Abdi Sonkor, provide an explanation as to why the civilians were murdered. Ogaden has been virtually isolated fromthe world since 2005, after the government of Ethiopia placed a ban on allinternational aid and media organizations from operating in the region.

Currently, some media houses and aid organizations are reported to beoperating in the region with the permission of the Ethiopian intelligenceservice.

Ethiopian Leaders to Face a Trial for Genocide in the ICC Hague court -(ICJ)'

Ogaden2 – (October 30, 2013) The International Commission of Jurists (ICJ) reported to have begun to work to bring Ethiopian authorities to justice for having committed a genocide in the Ogaden region. The International Commission of Jurists is a known international human rights organization composed of jurists (including senior judges, attorneys, and lawyers). The commission is known for its dedication to ensuring respect for international human rights standards through the law. The report cameright after different Swedish TV channels showed a movie smuggled out from Ogaden by an Ethiopian refugee, who had been a government official in the region. The 100 hours long movie is said to have many evidences ofgenocide committed by the Ethiopian government in the region. Speaking to journalists, Stellan Diaphragm, the commissioner of the Commission, said that he would do everything necessary to bring the case to the International Criminal Court (ICC). Reports indicate that although Ethiopiais not a member of the ICC, the country can possibly face trial for crimes under international law. The Ogaden region is a territory in Eastern part ofEthiopia, and populated mainly by ethnic Somalis. Since 2007, the region has been a site of brutal struggle between the government troops and theOgaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), a rebel group seeking for more autonomy for the region. Different human right organizations accuse the Ethiopian government of committing grave human right violation (including genocide) against the civilians in attempt to control the ONLF's public support. According to the Genocide Wach, the crimes committed in the region include extrajudicial killings, arbitrary detention, rape, torture, disappearances, the destruction of livelihood, the burning of villages and the destroying of life stock.

Bole's St. Rufael Church calls for help'

Top News: (October 30, 2013) Melake Berhan Tekeste Kasahun, Administrator of the Bole Lemi St. Rufael Abune Ewostatiwos Church, in a letter he sent to His Eminence Abune Estifanos, the assistant of the Patriarch to the Addis Abeba Diocese and Senior Pope of the Jimma Diocese, said that he has been ordered by government officials to demolish the Church within seven days. The letter stated that the Church has been built four years ago and was waiting for a confirmation of the ownership of the place. It also mentioned that government officials had come in different times and often ordered them to demolish the Church asthe place was an "Industry Zone". On a letter dated October 22, 2013, theBole Sub City Woreda 11 Office sent them a letter to demolish the Church within seven days as the place was wanted for developmental purposes.

The worshipers have been highly disgruntled by the decisions of the government and have attached a 10 page letter of complaint asking for the His Eminence to write an urgent letter to the Mayor of Addis Abeba, Diriba Kuma. The Bole Sub City Woreda 11 Office, responsible for the execution of such decisions said the order for the demolition of the Churchcame from the Bole Sub city Land Development and Management Office.

Written by Getachew Addis Feleke, the letter confirms that Office will be responsible for the demolition of the Church unless the Church itself takesan action within the seven days. The responses of the Addis Abeba Diocese and the Patriarch's Office have not been known so far. It is to be recalled that clergies of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church had recently criticised the government for putting pressures and repressing the Church.

Wrong perceptions on definitions of 'Freedom/Slavery'

Editor’s note: (October 30, 2013) Ethiopia is one of the oldest and independent countries in Africa. As far as most Ethiopians agreed Eritrea is part of Ethiopia even though the ruling Fronts EPRDF (Ehadeg) and EPLF(Shabiya) divided the Eritrean state based on ‘bush agreement’ without the consent of the Ethiopian people. Eritreans were forced to give their vote for Referendum based on the wrong perceptions of “Freedom or Slavery”. The reference to making a choice between Slavery & Feedom was found in two sources. The first was in a story published in The Observer on 28th March 1993. The author reports: The local radio in Asmara describes the referendum choice simply as: 'Do you choose Freedom or Slavery?' Because of the high level of illiteracy, the referendum ballot papers are coloured. Blue is for Yes. Red is for No. Or, as the local radio helpfully puts it, 'Red is for Blood.' (Observer: 28 March 1993). In an Addis Tribune opinion piece, the international jurist Dr. YacobHaile Mariam wrote: When Eritreans voted in favor of the bizarre referendum question 'Do you want to be free?' as if anybody in his right mind would want to be a slave, they voted for a concept known as Eritrea and not for a definite geographic entity (Addis Tribune; 3rd December, 1999).

Arrests under Ethiopia’s Anti-Terrorism and Freedom of PoliticalAssociation’

By Ada Lacevic – (October 30, 2013) The broad scope of the Ethiopian Anti-Terrorism Proclamation — accompanied with a sharp increase in the arrests of journalists and students — has raised concerns that the law haseffectively circumvented constitutional rights to freedom of press and speech. The 2009 Proclamation was enacted in the aftermath of a numberof Somali militias groups attacks on civilians and a growing discontent among domestic political opposition groups. Ethiopia has seen regional discontent from the Semayawi as well as those in the Oromia region, whohave sought autonomy for over fifty years. When the Oromo Liberation Front was labeled a terrorist group by the government under the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation, however, many students were also arrested for providing “moral support” to terrorist organizations. In October 2012, hundreds of protestors were arrested after demanding elected representation in the Ethiopian Islamic Affairs Supreme Council on charges of intent to advance an ideological cause and planning to induce aterrorist act.

Under the CSOs Proclamation, Article 5 and 6, also affects journalists covering issues regarding public discontent with the government, two articles that stipulate that anyone who writes or disseminates promotionalstatements encouraging, supporting, or advancing terrorism could be punished with imprisonment from ten to twenty years . The moral supportprovision under Article 5b "Rendering support to Terrorism"which states that "Whoever, knowingly or having reason to know that his deed has theeffect of supporting the commission of a terrorist act or a terrorist organization:…provides a skill, expertise or moral support or gives advise…" is punishable under the Anti-Terrorist Proclamation. Two journalists namely, Mesfin Negash and Abiye Tekle Mariam, were arrestedunder the provision for inciting "moral support" for protestors. In July 2012, Eskinder Nega, an outspoken journalist was sentenced under the Proclamation to eighteen years imprisonment for supporting the Arab Spring movements in northern Africa and creating parallels to the situation in Ethiopia, a conviction that drew international condemnation.

Ethiopia's Constitution protects freedom of speech and political association. Under Article 29, journalists may publicize and disseminate material regarding the government, whether fact or opinion. Articles 29 and 30 of the Constitution protect expression not only through speech butalso through assembly, which includes public demonstration and petition. The expression of this right, however, seems to create criminal liability under Articles 1, 5, 6, and 7 of the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation. In this sense, the constitutional right to association (Article 31) is practically constrained by the implementation of the Proclamation since association could lead to the "moral support" of a terrorist group or the participating in a terrorist organization.

The UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention has reiterated that arrests as a consequence of free expression render the detention arbitrary under international human rights standards. Political opposition leaders as well as their supporters have been arrested under the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation for committing acts of terrorism. Journalists reporting on their cause have been jailed as well under the broadly stated provision forencouraging or supporting terrorism. The detentions have raised constitutional concerns since the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation seems to run counter to the freedom of expression of rights enumerated in the Constitution. Apart from Ethiopia's domestic duty to uphold human rights the government has ratified various international treaties and covenants which uphold freedom of speech and expression such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), Freedom of Association andProtection of the Right to Organise Convention, and the African [Banjul] Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights.

Ethiopia: Addis Ababa, the seat of AU in a bad light'IndepthAfrica: By Kiflu Hussain

Addis Ababa, capital of Ethiopia where I was born and built my life until I had to abandon it in January 2007, had recently been cast in a bad light. Those who might be familiar with Addis including its blackouts that earnedthe state owned Electric Corporation a nickname "Power of Darkness" whose formal name in Amharic literally means "Power of Light," may assume that I am going to talk about this sector's abysmal failure despite the much hyped "development." Unfortunately, but deservedly, it's The EastAfrican Newspaper (October 19-25, 2013) that cast a terrible light on my hometown that has been the seat of AU/OAU for over five decades. As if the regime's record that's blotted with blood by constantly waylaying human rights and ignoring rule of law is not enough, it led a chorus of African rulers who had shown the latest temerity to perpetuate impunity inthe name of Africa.Thus, it made Addis, which was the venue for these rulers who ganged up against ICC, the focal point of almost all EA columnists. Kalundi Serumaga in a piece titled Tantrums at Addis Ababa; Why servants don't win arguments with their masters, aptly depicted the nuances in the symbiotic relationship between our dictators and their Western patrons as follows.

"The African dictators are now genuinely confused. Not so much as to whythey are being singled out among all the world's dictators and warlords forICC indictment, but more as to why they are being prosecuted at all, given that at bottom, they have only been carrying out what they believedwere the wishes of the Western corporations and the Western governments that promote them. In arguments laced with copious pan- Africanist and anti-imperialist rhetoric, a cabal of esteemed Excellencies and ministers from Rwanda, Uganda, Ethiopia and Kenya tried to mobilizethe body to support a mass withdrawal from the 1998 Rome Statute that creates the ICC, and to which most are signatories. They were most unconvincing, and for good reason." Another columnist, L.Muthoni Wanyeki in her An Africa-wide coup at Addis? 14 out of 53? seconded Serumaga's assertion on their being "most unconvincing." She pointed outthat "despite the media spin that only 14 of Africa's heads of state and government bothered to show up for the extraordinary session."Thus, sheproceeded to conclude that "this was by no means the Africa-wide coup that it was made out to be." Charles Onyango-Obbo also strengthened herthesis by pointing out the unwillingness of the French-speaking African countries to gang up against ICC as well as furnishing his own theory on why rulers such as Museveni assumed the role of a gang leader to quash ICC which they dread now like a Frankenstein Monster.Jenerali Ulimwenguopined to this effect too and dismissed our rulers ganging up in the name of Africa by adding "Not enough African rulers are summoned to The Hague, if we go by the crimes they have committed against their own people."

The Guest Columnist: The coup de grace in delivering a final blow on Addis's superficial image, though, came from a guest columnist. Laetitia Bader; an African researcher at Human Rights Watch struck a chord on a close friend of this writer who’s more like an alter ego. The very first words she employed in Torture in the heart of Addis, even as leaders gather in gleaming AU building sent him on a memory lane, albeit unpleasant. This close friend who had the "privilege" to spend time in thetorture chamber Laetitia referred to as Maekelawi and the "concentrationcamp" known as Kality in 2005-06, reminisced about the summary execution of 60 Emperor Haileselassie era officials in November 1974 where the new "gleaming AU building" rests. Although, he was a child then, he clearly remembers that the former prison called Kerchele which was "torn down," was a few blocks away from the formerly OAU headquarter. For this reason, my alter ego never entertained any illusionabout OAU/AU.

Rather; he collated his own experience with what Laetitia wrote. While acknowledging torture of political prisoners, he’s of the view that it’s not as routinely as the "apolitical" inmates had to endure. He mentioned seeing detainees at Maekelawi with bruises and lacerations back from fresh torture in a cell nicknamed "Sheraton."It earned that name in comparison with the suffering meted out to inmates cited by Laetitia as Chelema Bet (Dark House) and Tawla Bet (Wooden House).He agreed thatLaetitia is also spot on by corroborating a story of a disabled "apolitical" detainee who had a mobile stool fixed for him by his own money to use it in the lavatory since his condition made it difficult to use the pit latrine in the "concentration camp" called Addis Ababa Correctional Facility. Becausehe refused to be subjected to extortion by the prison wardens, his stool was confiscated for some time. The list can go on like this up to a point where inmates were clubbed to death.

And so, he intimated that though he understands Laetitia’s exhortation as a human rights advocate for AU, ACHPR as well as foreign donors to reign on the Ethiopian régime, he has little faith on it. He buttressed his cynicism by even pointing out to an organization that calls itself African Media Initiative (AMI). Despite a claim to work for a "vibrant free media" in Africa, this organization bankrolled by the British DFID and other African and non-African "do-gooders" is going to hold its annual African Media Leaders Forum (AMLF) in Addis Ababa, one of the top tormentor of journalists. Irrespective of reports as to how journalists like Eskinder Negaare denied visitation right by severely limiting his contact with family members and friends; irrespective of Reeyot Alemu’s, a female journalist being repetitively subjected to solitary confinement as well as denial of medical treatment; irrespective of Woubshet Taye’s incarceration 200 km away from Addis to deny him visitation from family and friends, AMI defends its flirtation with their tormentors as "constructive engagement." In a nutshell, therefore, Addis Ababa, like a glittering brothel, will continueto attract and pander to the perverse need of our global actors who cloak their perversion with international respectability. Ethiopia – An imagined event? National laughter day celebrated -

Press TV: (October 31, 21013) In Ethiopia the national laughter day is a day when Ethiopians of different walks of life and ages, the sick and the visually impaired meet to just laugh. There is no reason whatsoever for their laughter. It is a moment where people let themselves free for some hours and forget any worries they may have. Ethiopia is one of the few countries in the world that celebrates national laughter day and the rationale behind it is to develop a positive thinking amongst its citizens. Those who have attended several laughter days that has been honored forthe past 10 years in Ethiopia have developed a psychological change.

They now believe that the action or soundof laughing is the remedy they need to relax and free their mind from existing political, social and economic hurdles. The initiator of the laughter day is Girma Belachew an Ethiopian who broke the world record In the World Guinness ImpossibilityChallenger Event held in Germany Munich in 2002 when he laughed non stop for three hours and five minutes. Girma who owns a school that teaches people how to laugh has shared his laughter concept by having laughing sessions with the military, medical professionals, patients with different ailments, amongst other professionals in Ethiopia.

Thousands of Ethiopian Jews gather in Jerusalem to celebrate return toIsrael on Sig'd holiday' Biblical holiday held annually 50 days after YomKippur to pray for repentance, and deliverance to Jerusalem.

THE JERUSALEM POST (October 31, 2013) : Thousands of Ethiopian Israelis from across the nation gathered in the capital Thursday to celebrate Sigd, a holiday marked 50 days after Yom Kippur by repenting for sins and praying for a return to Zion, the coming of the Messiah and a Third Temple. Officially designated a national holiday in Israel in 2009, it is said that Sigd was observed for 2,500 years by Jews in Ethiopia. Since their mass exodus from the country, mostly in the 1980s and early 1990s, Ethiopian Israelis now gather annually in Jerusalem to mark the day.

Thursday's ceremony, held at the Sherover Promenade in the southeastern part of the city, was attended by Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat, Absorption Minister Sofa Landver, Minister of Education Shai Piron, Sephardi Chief Rabbi Yitzhak Yosef, and numerous MKs, rabbis and priests. "Today is important because this holiday began in Ethiopia a long time ago," said Tamir Sanbatao, 32, of Petah Tikva, who immigrated with eight family members during Operation Moses in 1984. Sanbatao, now thefather of three, noted that in Ethiopia the holiday was observed in a fashion far different from Thursday's festivities, which included dozens of food vendors, singing and dancing. "In Ethiopia we fasted the entire day and climbed a local mountain to pray for forgiveness and deliverance to Jerusalem. Now that we're here we pray the Messiah will come and that a third Temple will be built," he said. "Even though we're celebrating today,:he explained, "we're still waiting and praying for this day to come." Thirty-eight-year-old Mevrat Lior Perdu, arrived with his family during Operation

Moses and is a teacher living in Azor, near Tel Aviv. “This holiday is very special because in the Kaballah it says that there are 49 gates to go to heaven after Yom Kippur, and if someone didn’t get forgiveness he has a second chance on the 50th day, which is today,” Perdu said. While he is pleased to live in Israel, he added that his “journey” will not end until theMessiah comes and the Third Temple is built. “We are still on our journeyhere because we will not reach the last stop until that time,” he said. “Wewill never quit until then.” Meanwhile, actor and producer Shai Fredo – who founded the Sigdiada Festival in Tel Aviv two years ago to celebrate Ethiopian culture with other Israelis as a prelude to Sigd – described the holiday as “beautiful.”

“It’s a beautiful day for us because in Ethiopia we’ve celebrated it for 2,500 years,” Fredo said. “Finally, after thousands of years, we are here and we can pray and celebrate to say thank you to God for taking us here.” He added that he hoped one day the holiday would be embraced bythe entire nation. “This holiday is for everyone, not just the Ethiopian people,” he said. “The reason I started the Sigdiada Festival was to show other Jews the beauty and diversity of our culture.” Pnina Rada of Tel Aviv, who came during Operation Moses at the age of seven, echoed Fredo’s sentiments. “I’m deeply, deeply happy that we are keeping this holiday because it’s the reason we’re here,” she said. “The adventure now is to make this a holiday for all of Israeli society.” Asked if she believed whether the Ethiopian immigrant community had been truly integrated into society, Rada said much work still needed to be done. “I don’t think we’re in a place of 100 percent integration because we are still not gettinggood jobs or being adequately represented in businesses,” she said, attributing this to general ignorance about Ethiopian people and culture. “People think they know everything about Ethiopians, but they don’t and we want them to know the diversity of our culture,” Rada added. “We don’t want people to think of us as ‘uneducated Ethiopians.’” While she conceded that complete integration remained a problem, she was optimistic that one day Ethiopians would be viewed as an integral part of Israeli society. “I hope there will be a time when Israeli society sees Ethiopian people as an important part of it, and I think we are on our way,” she said. The Ethiopian mass exodus to Israel began during the Marxist-Leninist dictatorship of Mengistu Haile Mariam, who murdered thousands of African Jews, separated families, displaced survivors, orphaned children and forbade all from practicing Judaism. This oppression – compounded by unparalleled famine, the highest infant mortality rate in the world and the constant threat of war – resulted in an untenable existence for the country’s tens of thousands of Jews. Under theauspices of the Israeli government, covert rescue missions known as Operations Moses and Joshua, and 1991’s massive Operation Solomon, saved more than 21,000 Ethiopian- Jewish lives.

Ethiopian opposition alleges killings, abuse’

Globalpost/GlobalPost (November 1, 2013) A leading Ethiopian opposition party said in a report Thursday that scores of its members and supporters had been killed, abused or jailed over the past two years. “The report has information on human rights violations on members of UDJ, on supportersand other political party members and leaders… in different parts of Ethiopia,” said Unity for Democratic Justice (UDJ) leader Negasso Gidada. Negasso said seven party supporters had been killed in southern Ethiopia and around 150 supporters had faced intimidation, arrest without charge, abuse, abduction and confiscation of property by police and security forcesacross Ethiopia. The Ethiopian government said it had not seen a copy of the report, but accused the party of routinely coming up with “concoctionsand spurious accusations”, Information Minister Redwan Hussein told AFP.UDJ is among a handful of opposition parties in Ethiopia, where only one out of 547 seats in parliament is occupied by an an opposition member.

Negasso, the former president of Ethiopia, said the report will be submitted to the Ethiopian Human Rights Commission and that he hopes the document will send a strong message to the government. “We want the government to stop human rights violations and we are asking the government to bring those people concerned to justice,” he said, adding that his party had not lost any strength as a result of the violations documented in the report. “The intimidation, the threats has not discouraged our members and we will continue our struggle,” Negasso said. Last year, a leading member of the UDJ, Andualem Arage, was sentenced to life in prison on terror-related offenses. UDJ has staged a series of demonstrations across Ethiopia this year, calling for the release of opposition members and journalists charged under Ethiopia’s anti- terrorism legislation. Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn has issued stark messages to protesters in recent months, warning them that they will face harsh consequences if the break the law. Rights groups havesaid the 2009 anti-terrorism law is vague and used to stifle peaceful dissent.

Ethiopia: Infrastructure success or demise?

Commentary: (November 2, 2013) Ethiopia is developing country, in urgent need of massive infrastructure for economic development to feed its population growing at alarming rate. However, the country can’t afford capital intensive mega infrastructures such as dams, airports and highways that are key to economic activities. So it has to partly depend onthe foreign financing entities. The current infrastructures under construction or planned to be, are mostly financed by Chinese Communist government owned banks.

About $500 million USD cost of the Gilel Gibe III dam is financed by Industrial and Commercial Bank of China, the turbines and associated electrical equipment of the Grand Ethiopian Renascence Dam hydropowerplants costing about $1.8 billion USD are reportedly financed by Chinese banks. Keep on going, the Chinese Import and Export (EXIM) Bank is to finance the stylish Meskel Square-Bole (Africa Avenue) road upgrading project. Other similar projects constructed or either planned in the countryare going to be financed by Western banks or Chinese lenders. The question that puzzles most citizens is the surprise and the speed at which these projects emerge from ground without public knowledge. Most citizens don't have idea when, why and how most developments comes to existence and question the quality. Vividly roads constructed in Addis are deteriorating within few years of service and left without maintenance because of luck of money or poor planning.

Successful regional infrastructure planning and implementation is not as easy and simple as seen on the streets of Ethiopia cities and townships. Itrequires years and years of proper planning effort that involves key stockholders and extensive analyses. Such required analyses are; cost/benefit, local economic implication, life time cost, social impact, future demand, environmental and ecological impact … etc. Above all, providing alternative analysis to justify why particulate project was chosenis a core element for the 'success' and 'sustainability' of any economic development. All these, along with other fundamental infrastructure planning and implementation approaches, have never been done or hidden from the general public. Projects financed by China Development Bank (CDB) and its descendent lenders such as EXIM Bank, has never be seen with such comprehensive planning analysis let alone in Ethiopia but in their homeland. Looking at the execution of major projects, mostly theyare undertaken by Chinese contractors. This means money that provided as loan goes back to China. The involvement of endemic private contractors and consultants are very limited. Since nobody has seen economic analysis report stating the benefit and impact of the project on the local community and the country at large, it is really difficult to assessand predict where the country is now heading.

Ethiopian politics - Settling for Dominant Party System - Whose Fault IsIt?

The Reporter Analysis (Addis Ababa) By Asrat Seyoum (November 2, 2013) - It was one of those rare occasions where high-profile politicians from the two branches of government - the executive and the legislature -came together outside of the parliamentary building. Although the discussion covered many pertinent issues, the part where the head of the executive branch urged the legislature to step up its role of monitoring and oversight grabbed the attention of many. Indeed, the statement madeby Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn was far from ordinary. Basically, the PM asked for a more challenging House - a place where the activities of his administration would constantly be placed under the microscope.

For that unfamiliar observe, many questions come to mind. The first andmost important would be why the leader of the executive branch, who apparently answers to the legislature, urges his overseers to tighten the scrutiny. Could there be a deficit in that regard? Even if there are gaps in monitoring the executive, should the concern not come from therespective constituencies of the members of the House?

Luckily, Hailemariam’s address did provide an explanation to these questions. There seems to be a logical context and back-story to what thePM said about the legislature. The existing political reality in Ethiopia, where the ruling party the Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) enjoys an overwhelming 99.6 percent dominance in the lower House, was indeed reason enough for Hailemariam to address the matter at this time. It is the most dominant the party has been in the course of its 21-year rule. Although pundits assert the reverse, previous elections, especially the 2005 national and regional event, gave rise to thenotable presence of an opposition camp in parliament. Recognizing the changing dynamics, Hailemariam's predecessor, the late Meles Zenawi, hinted in the week of the 2010 election that the country might be headingtowards a dominant party democratic system in the near future. As campaign chief for the party at the time, the outcome of the 2010 electionhad Hailemariam's fingerprints all over it. "As the dominant party in the parliament it will be our responsibility to make sure that the concern of the people is heard in the House," he told parliamentarians. What he clearly meant was that the lack of adequate representation of the opposition should not curtail the plurality of opinion in the House. Rather, it is Hailemariam's belief that the House should be a place of debate; a place where the system of check and balance can be effectively put to work.

Second best democracy Although there could be no reasonable objection to what the PM was proposing, one cannot help but wonder why he madehis case at this particular time. From his explanation, it can easily be discerned that Hailemariam has given up hope of a multi-party system in Ethiopia, where strong political parties, including his own, can alternate inpower. He told the gathering that there is no question Ethiopia is headingtowards a dominant party system. Thus, the responsibility of keeping the sanctity of the House as a forum, where the general public can be heard, rests on the ruling party politicians, the PM underscored. Furthermore, it can be understood that the debate is no more about the political system that the country is trying to build. It seems that time has run out for thatone. It looks like Hailemariam's concern is all about dealing with the existing political reality. How did things get here? Broadly speaking, scholars are divided as to what precipitated the evolution of a dominant party system in the country. Some strongly argue that it was the grand design of the party to establish an unchallenged political hegemony from the very start. This group say that the federalism system, based on ethnic-lines, was part of this plan to perpetuate EPRDF's power. On the flip side, there are those who assert that it was rather the effort of the ruling party to build suitable conditions for the existing system that helpedto maintain its influence. Professor Andreas Eshete is one such scholar. Hesays that EPRDF's dominance is the only logical outcome, since the federal system that was put in place would favor such a party. However, Andreasrejects the premise that EPRDF has built the system only to ascertain its perpetuation in power; any other party with a similar set up can contest for power at any time. Whatever the case, the outcome is a dominant party system under Hailemaram's party.

For the record, almost all the ideological publications of the ruling party inthe past few years have tried, in one way or another, to discuss the evolution of democracy in Ethiopia. Sure enough, the party's position, expressed time and again, indicates that a dominant party democracy is the second best choice for the EPRDF. The Party's ideological publication, Addis Raey (New Vision), said in a number of publications that it was in the best interest of the nation to have more than one strong party; this isto increase the chance that diverse views are raised in public. For that, it never preferred the dominant party system to a multi-party structure.

Exchange of blame. If political rhetoric is to go by, both the ruling party and the opposition camps do not differ on the type of democratic system they envision for the nation. Yes, both the EPRDF and notable opposition parties in Ethiopia would like to see a more liberal political system, where strong parties would take turns to lead the nation. And both, of course, blame each other for the current turn of events that marked the inevitability of one-party domination. As far as the EPRDF is concerned, it is the weakness of the opposition that has prevented Ethiopia from havingan emerging multi-party system. There is not much debate on the weakness of the opposition parties in Ethiopia, it seems, but there is whenit comes to why they are weak. Opposition groups place the blame entirely on the ruling party repression, narrowing the space for political activism. Of course, the fact that a multi-party system in Ethiopia is only 20 years old would definitely weigh on the young opposition parties, not tomention the relative differences in terms of financial resource. This fact is appreciated by both sides, but the feud is about what the ruling party should or could have done?

The theoretical dimension of this debate is also worth looking at. In countries where a dominant party system is starting to take root, the biggest challenge for the ruling party would be to keep the affairs of the government and the party separate. In the case of Ethiopia, during the last two national elections, the primary concern for observers in Ethiopia was the unlawful use of state property for party campaigning. The most important question here is, why would sharing resources between the ruling party and the government even be an issue? It is simply because itwould be undemocratic for the incumbent party to use state (tax-payers')properties to ensure a continuation of its tenure in power. This is not evenabout the dominant party; the concept seems to be true for any system. Similarly, dominant parties in such political systems do not only have to keep their hands out of the state coffers, but they also have to make sureto provide the service that is expected, even to the citizens who did not vote for them. Still further, the dominant party has to offer proper supportto the opposition parties, whether it likes it or not.

Hence, thinking of the responsibilities of the dominant party, it could easily be discerned that the ruling party in a dominant party system wouldbe responsible for the nurture of the opposition camp as part of the process of democratization. To this effect, Mushe Semu, a well-known local politician, says that part of the present opposition camp weaknesses could be attributed to weaknesses of the dominant party itself. "It is our right to get support from the government, which should not be confused with the party," he argues.

Although Mushe did not deny the structural weaknesses in the opposition camp, scholars like Kasahun Berhanu (Ph.D.), political science lecturer at Addis Ababa University, believe that the dominance of the EPRDF is a combination of both a weak and fragmented opposition and a ruling party shirinking away from its responsibility to support them. Kasahun says that as much as the opposition camp is weak, the ruling party is also using this weakness to justify not helping them; and that is the main factor for the emergence of a dominant party system in Ethiopia. Partner and competitor Of course, constitutional provision allowed the operation of political parties since the early days of EPRDF's ascendancy to power. However, the development ofthe political environment has rendered the legal provision ineffective since then. And now it seems that the ruling party itself is admitting that a dominant party democracy is the de facto system. However, Mushe feels amulti-party system was never in place in Ethiopia.

Breakthrough democratic experiences like the 2005 election notwithstanding, Mushe argues that the EPRDF has always been the dominant party and it has never opened its doors for cooperation with other parties. The EPRDF, for its part, contends that it never closed the door on working with the opposition camp. This, in fact, leads to the important issue of striking a balance between the dominant party's responsibility to create favorable conditions for opposition parties, and its desire to defeat them as political opponents. Party publications have frequently dwelt on this issue. They have covered in great length why the EPRDF could not work with the opposition camp, with the main reason cited as the question of continuity. The EPRDF argues that most of the opposition parties in Ethiopia do not believe in the constitutionally guaranteed federalist state structure. And hence, it would be counter- productive to support a party working to reverse the political system that it fought tooth and nail to protect. And this is another controversial stance. According to Mushe, as long as political forces ascend to power via constitutional means, there should no reason why they cannot make changes to the political environment. He say that as long as it is the will ofthe people to pick opposition party to introduce change, it will be undemocratic to stand in the way. Meanwhile, the EPRDF says that making changes to the basic structure of the country is as good as taking the nation back twenty years.

Ethiopia - Number of border crossing Eritreans on the rise’

EM News & Commentary: (November 2, 2013) At the end of the day, Eritrean People Libration Front (EPLF) led by Issaias Affewerki with the support of the Tigray People Liberation Front (TPLF) led by the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi isolated Eritrean state and its people from Ethiopia which somehow creates hatred between the Ethiopian and Eritreans who don’t clearly understand the drama of the two groups. Finally this creates chaos in the two sides in the pretext of border conflict which lasts for two years that costs more than 80,000 lives in the two sides. Having said I want to go back to the main agenda of this paper title. Currently the number of ethio-eritrean crossing the Shabia administration area is more than doubled over the past two years. Per Liya Nuru sources, and according to Nur-Hussein Mohammed, Program Coordination Office for Northern Eritrean Office head, the number of Eritreans crossing the borderinto Ethiopia daily has more than doubled over the past two years taking the total number of Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia to over 82 thousand. A fourth and new camp has been opened at a place called 'Hitsats' in an effort to accommodate the influx.

More than five thousand Eritrean refugees have already been received since the opening of the camp some five months back. Of the Eritrean refugees in Ethiopia, over 80 percent are youngsters; 40 percent are ex-soldiers; the remaining are civil servants who have completed national military service. Mandatory national military service, human rights violations and high cost of living are the major factors forcing Eritreans to migrate, some of the refugees have said. With the same token all Ethiopian people are prisoner of conscience since the EPRDF administration came to power more than ever. This shows there is a need of cooperation between the Ethiopian and Eritrean to free ourselves from those cruel regimes and bring a democratic Ethiopia. Don’t forget the number of peoples who lost and lose their life when they try to evacuate from these dictatorship in the hope of getting a better future and freedom.We are in prison in the free world. We need to stand in unison to free ourselves. “We are in prison in the free world”

Growth In Addis Ababa Paints The Urban Poor Into A Desperate Corner'

IMF ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (November 3, 2013) — For urban areas across the African continent, rapid development has become a double- edged sword. As economies grow — the IMF projected this week that sub-Saharan Africa’s economic output will expand by five percent this year andsix percent in 2014 — urban areas are developing at a breakneck pace.

That means plenty of new construction, which creates employment opportunities and raises standards of living. But to make room for luxuryhotels, sparkling shopping centers and towering residential centers in already-crowded urban areas, something has to give. And despite governmental efforts to make development work for everyone, the urban poor are increasingly paying the highest price for economic expansion. Traffic flows down a main street in Ethiopia's capital Addis Ababa, where the city government aims to clear 200 hectares of slums and informally inhabited areas each year in order to make way for new construction. It has to be recalled that the Washington-based lender the IMF in mid- October of this year said, "Ethiopian Economic Growth May Slow Without Policy Shift, saying "Ethiopia's economic expansion may continue throughnext year before "tapering off" from 2015-16 because of funding gaps forpublic projects and foreign exchange shortages", the International Monetary Fund (IMF) said. Gross domestic product is forecast to rise to 7.5 percent in the 12 months through July 7 and 2014-15, and then ease"slightly in subsequent years under current policies."

'Land to the tillers' to 'Land to the grabbers'

Attack on Indian-owned farm in Ethiopia turns spotlight on farmlandpolicy'

All land in Ethiopia belongs to the state, giving the government unusualleverage in its dealings with local communities.

THE HINDU By AMAN SETHI (November 3, 2013) A violent attack on a teaplantation leased by Indian-owned Verdanta Harvest Plc, a subsidiary of the Noida-based Lucky Group, has renewed concerns over Ethiopia's policy of leasing out large tracts of land to international investors. On October 20, unidentified individuals destroyed buildings and machinery worth approximately $140,000, according to Verdanta officials. Media reported that locals set the plantation on fire "on account of destroying the rich forest resources", a claim denied by the company. Community leaders in Gambella did not comment on the attack, but rights groups have warned that a policy of leasing out 42 per cent of Gambella's land and resettling over 30,000 agro-pastoral communities is the likely cause of the unrest. In 2011, for instance, armed gunmen killed five workers ona farm developed by a Saudi Arabian company. All land in Ethiopia belongs to the state, giving the government unusual leverage in its dealings with local communities. Rights groups like the Oakland Institute claim Indian companies have acquired 6,28,000 hectares of agricultural land under a government programme to lease 3.6 million hectares for export-oriented agriculture.

Disagreements: More than half the land deals, worth an estimated 3,65,000 hectares, have since fallen through due to disagreements amonginvestors, communities and the various levels of government. Verdanta said its land was acquired by the government in the 1980s. The attack comes after nearly three years of discord with local officials and some sections of the community. In 2010, Verdanta signed an agreement for 3,012 hectares in the hope of harvesting 500 hectares of tea by 2015.

Thus far only 169 hectares have been cleared and 70 hectares planted.

“We met the local officials and found their expectations were a little too high. So we asked for another piece of land,” said Manojeet Barkataky, General Manager for Verdanta Harvests, explaining the community had demanded roads, electrification, schools and a hospital before the company began its project. “We said we will implement our CSR [corporate social responsibility] once the project begins.” Nine months later, Mr. Barkataky said, the government claimed to have consulted thelocal community and urged the company to start work.

In February 2011, Ethiopian President Girma Woldegiorgis wrote to the Ministry of Agriculture, expressing concern that Verdanta had been allotted forestland, a claim denied by the government and the company. When the federal government in Addis Ababa demarcated a plot for the company, its counterparts in Gambella issued a different map, reducing the plot by 327 hectares. An additional 80 hectares was earmarked for acultural site revered by the community, but the federal government dismissed their claim. These competing claims over the size and scope ofthe project exacerbated the tension in the region. “It is a total incompetence, inefficiency, and neglect on the part of the local government up to the federal government,” said Mr. Barkataky. “Why couldn’t the government finalise the boundary in the last three years?”

Displeasure: At a press conference last month, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn indicated his displeasure with the development of the agriculture sector. “Until now the progress is very slow,” he said. “It isnot a problem with the investors, the problem is infrastructure. Our futureplan is to engage heavily in infrastructure development.” Verdanta has halted all work on its project until the government guarantees security forits operations.

Ethiopia - Blue Nile Plc, the new Winemakers that acquired Awash WinerySC from PPESA'

ADDIS FORTUNE, ADDIS ABABA (November 3, 2013) - Blue Nile, the private company that acquired Awash Winery SC from the government, isgetting a 147 million Br loan from Awash International Bank (AIB) to pay off the balance owed on the 458.4 million Br deal it signed with the Privatization & Public Enterprises Supervising Agency (PPESA).The PPESA was able to eventually sell the sole winemaker currently in the market in Ethiopia, on its seventh attempt on February 22, 2013. The buyer, Blue Nile Investment Plc, was declared the winner on September 5, 2013, in a tender that required a shorter payment plan. Blue Nile was established byMulugeta Tesfakiros, shareholder of Muller Real Estate and Langano Bekele Molla Hotels, and 8 Miles Plc, an equity firm chaired by Robert "Bob" Geldof, the Irish singer-songwriter and political activist linked to aidactivities in Africa. Blue Nile, which initially paid PPESA 312.9 million Br, will sign the loan agreement with AIB over the coming week to cover the remaining payment, according to an official from the Bank, who requested anonymity. Ethiopia imported 10,637hl of wine in the 2011/12 fiscal year,at a cost of 27.8 million dollars, according to Ethiopian Revenue & Customs Authority (ERCA). The volume and value of imported wine showed 10.5pc and 12pc increases, respectively, compared with the previous year. However, according to 2011 figures from Data Monitor, a market research firm, demand for wine in Ethiopia is estimated at 50,687hl. The Winery, whose factory is located in Lideta district, has a 500ha farm in Merti Jirsu, which was previously owned by the Upper Awash Agro Industry, and a 42ha plot in Zeway, about 163kms south of Addis Abeba. Only 80ha out of the 500ha is currently being put to use, according to Mulugeta who is a 49pc shareholder in Blue Nile. The Winerywill focus on developing a vineyard and improving spare parts in the coming year, says Mulugeta. It also plans to invest five million dollars on its farms and acquire an additional 100ha farm to provide grapes for the factory. Awash Winery has been in production since 1943. It produces 12 brands, including Awash, Axumite and Gouder.

Saudi Police rounds up thousands of illegal immigrants and those who tryto escape were brutally attacked' REUTERS (November 4, 2013) Here is the news about the crackdown in saudi arabia from Reuters. Saudi authorities rounded up thousands of illegal foreign workers at the start ofa nationwide crackdown ultimately aimed at creating more jobs for locals,media reported on Tuesday. Hundreds of thousands of workers have already left the kingdom following a grace period of seven months during which authorities told expatriates that if they did not fix their legal statusthey had to leave the country or face jail. The government hopes that reducing the number of illegal workers will create opportunities for Saudi job-seekers. The official Saudi unemployment rate is 12 percent but excludes a large number of citizens who say they are not seeking a job.

However, the majority of the kingdom's nine million foreigners are unskilled labourers or domestic workers, jobs usually shunned by Saudis."Since early (Monday) morning, the security campaign got off to a vigorous start as inspectors swung into action," Nawaf al-Bouq, a police spokesman, told Saudi Gazette newspaper. Police carried out raids on businesses, markets and residential areas to catch expatriates whose visas are invalid because they are not working for the company that 'sponsored' their entry into the kingdom. For a second day on Tuesday parts of the capital Riyadh were unusually empty as many expatriates stayed at home to avoid potential arrest.

CHALLENGE: Raising private sector employment in a country where most Saudis are in government jobs and where businesses employ more foreigners than locals is a major challenge for the kingdom. Bouq told the paper that at least 1,899 illegal workers had been arrested in the Red Seaport city of Jeddah. The paper also said police had arrested at least 2,200 people in the southwestern city of Samta, 379 in the Eastern Province andhundreds of others in other cities. In Jeddah, dozens of Indonesian workers, mostly women, staged a sit-in to pressure the authorities to hasten their deportation, according to Arab News newspaper. Many workers cannot leave the country because they lack official papers, including passports, the paper said. The remittances sent home by expatriates in Saudi Arabia are often vital for their own nations, which include Yemen, Ethiopia, the Philippines, Indonesia, India, Pakistan and Egypt. Saudi Arabia's mass expulsion of Yemeni workers in 1990 in retaliation for Sanaa's support of Iraq after it invaded Kuwait contributed to an economic collapse that accelerated the impoverished Arab country's1994 civil war. For decades, Saudi authorities ignored irregularities such as working for firms that had not sponsored their visas or in trades other than those listed on their immigration documents. That spurred a black market in which foreigners overstayed visas, set up illegal businesses or took low-paid jobs in areas where authorities wanted Saudi workers hiredon higher salaries. This thwarted implementation of wide-ranging labour reforms to penalise companies for hiring more foreigners than locals.

Ethiopia - SMNE calls Investors in Confronting Official Corruption inEthiopia’

Press Release Washington DC: (November 4, 2013) The Solidarity Movement for a New Ethiopia (SMNE) calls for strong measures from the International community, donors and international investors in confrontingofficial corruption in Ethiopia. “The Government of Ethiopia is broadly soliciting for development aid, foreign-based business partnerships and financial investors; yet, the unpopular ruling party has been accused of abuse of state power, misuse of donor funds, widespread party-run business monopolies, illicit financial practices and endemic corruption. It istime to demand accountability from all involved and concerned. The SMNEbelieves a more open, transparent and competitive market economy, supported by viable institutions and reasonable protections, which provides equal opportunity, will result in greater prosperity to the people rather than keeping it in the hands of a few political elites. In light of this, the SMNE urges the international community, donor nations, charitable organizations, and the international financial and business community to make demands on the Government of Ethiopia (GoE) for compliance with national and international laws. This must include holding companies affiliated or owned by members of the ruling party, including those businesses associated with their business conglomerate, Endowment Fundfor the Rehabilitation of Tigray (EFFORT), accountable. Additionally, measures should also strongly support restoring autonomy to independentinstitutions, the judiciary, and the Media and upholding the human and economic rights of the people. Until these measures are taken, the SMNE urges these stakeholders in the international community to withhold investments, development financing and other forms of partnering with the regime and its cronies. The ruling TPLF/EPRDF party has misused its state power and expenditures of foreign aid to corner the market through its companies and affiliates in all sectors of the economy. Illegal expropriation of land and public resources, corruption, illicit capital leakage and dubious allegiances riddle these secretive deals, putting prospective partners at high risk for future liability or other uncertain consequences." The Solidarity Movement for a New Ethiopia (SMNE) is a non-political and non-violent social justice movement of diverse people that advocates for freedom, justice, good governance and upholding the civil, human and economic rights of the people of Ethiopia, without regardto ethnicity, religion, political affiliation or other differences.

Indian writes Ethiopian language primers for foreigners'

THE TIMES OF INDIA: ADDIS ABABA (November 4, 2013): An Indian scholar in Ethiopia has so far published over a dozen books specially designed for foreigners to learn Ethiopia's languages, particularly Amharic.His story reads like a journey in reverse to the one made centuries earlier by the Siddis - Indians of East African descent brought to India mostly as slaves, who live mostly in Gujarat and have embraced the local language and culture. Apart from 'Amharic for Foreigners', K Sekhar from the Indianstate of Andhra Pradesh, who teaches business management at Mizan TepiUniversity in southwestern Ethiopia, has also written language primers in Tigrigna, Oromiffa, Nuer, Kafi Noono and Hadiya. The last two are the firstto be written by an expatriate.

"Languages have a trait of similarity at some point and finding out these traits is the way to understanding them," Sekhar, a self-thought linguist and lexicographer, told IANS in an interview. "The similarities I feel between the two countries (Ethiopia and India) are also important and made things easier for me", he said. The first expressions Sekhar heard inEthiopia, like "selam new" (are you at peace), and "dehna" (I am fine), were easy for him to memorize, he said. Within eight months he was able to communicate in Amharic with the help of his colleagues. "It is then I wondered if there were other books. Then I started looking at how the books were written and I thought I could do something better, which could be easier to be understood by many foreigners who face difficulties",Sekhar said. He has devised an innovative teaching method whereby eachletter is separated by a box and each syllable has been separated, to help pronounce easily and sound as close to native speakers. "It is difficult to read the whole word for foreigners so the structure is aimed at giving clarity for the people to get the idea", Sekhar said, adding "otherwise if I simply take the idea of the sentences there is no base at all or systematic approach to make it easy to understand".

In addition to the Amharic book, he has also written a Hindi primer for non-Hindi speakers in the English and Amharic versions. "At first I did notbelieve when I was told that there is such a book but then when I saw it at a bookstore it was like a dream come true for I have always wanted tolearn Hindi", said 25-year old Mohammed Bajaro, a tourist guide who is obsessed with Hindi because of the movies he has watched since childhood. According to Ajay Kumar, chairman of the Vedika-Ethiopian Telugu Association, Sekhar's books are not just good reference for conversations on movies or with tourists but also of help to business visitors to Ethiopia. "We are grateful for the fact that he has promoted ournational language in a country where the people are so fond of Indian culture and traditions," Ajay Kumar told IANS. "His books would also be preferable aids for Indian investors and the community to communicate with the locals", he added.

Ethiopia - Mining corruption (የ ማዕ ድ ን ሙስ ና በ ኢ ት ዮ ጵ ያ)'

PERSPECTIVE: (November 4, 2013) In the past few months, the ruling regime has been grandstanding its “anti-corruption” efforts by corralling afew officials of the “Revenue and Custom’s Authority” and businessmen oncharges of corruption. The kangaroo court corruption drama for those suspects is an amusing political theater staged for the entertainment of international loaners and donors who have recently intensified their pressure on the regime to show greater transparency and public accountability. For the domestic crowd, the regime’s grandstanding has been a cynical ploy to underplay, trivialize and cleverly mask the deep- rooted nature of official corruption with high profile prosecutions. The fact of the matter is that corruption in Ethiopia is not a simple problem limited to a few rogue or crooked officials and their friends and cronies importing goods without paying customs duties. Corruption in Ethiopia is structural; it is a cancer that has metastasized throughout the whole Ethiopian body politic. It is no wonder that the World Bank (WB) titled its massive report “Diagnosing Corruption in Ethiopia”. It should have read “Diagnosing the Metastasizing Cancer of Corruption in Ethiopia”.

Anti-corruption crusade or window dressing corruption? On paper, the regime has “laws” to detect, prevent, prosecute and punish corruption. The “Federal Ethics and Anti-corruption Commission Establishment Proclamations No. 235/2001 and No. A33/2005” and provisions in the Criminal Code impose serious sanctions on a whole range of corrupt and racketeering practices. But these “laws” are not worth the paper they are written on. They are selectively enforced and used by regime leaders often to neutralize political opponents. The late leader of the ruling regimeeffectively used the “anti-corruption laws” to jail rivals in his party including a former prime minster (Tamrat Layne) and a defense minister (Seeye Abraha) and other disfavored civil servants. Recent corruption arrests are a manifestation of the internecine struggle taking place within the ruling regime and less of a demonstration of a sincere and determinedeffort to enforce the anti-corruption laws. These arrests are also intended to send a clear message to other potential regime opponents of what theyshould expect if they dared to show openly their opposition. Corruption prosecutions are a powerful cudgel in the hands of the regime, the Sword of Damocles that invisibly hangs over the head of every politician and business person in that country. The fact of the matter is that if those accused of corruption in the recent sweep at the Customs Authority are guilty, then their accusers are equally or more guilty. As I have previouslyobserved hearkening back to an old Ethiopian saying, “There can be no beauty contest among monkeys.” The WB report cites a 2008 Annual Performance Report by the “Federal Ethics and Anti-Corruption Commission” (FEACC) documenting the mindboggling audacity of regime officials in stealing gold worth millions of dollars in broad daylight:

The budget year also saw a huge scandal at the National Bank of Ethiopia(NBE). It was dubbed by many as ‘the huge scandal of the year.’ Here is the trick. The NBE is by law entrusted with procuring and reserving gold. Some businessmen, who were allowed to supply gold to the NBE, supplied many kilograms of gilded iron, instead of gold. Some employees of the Bank, business people, managers and other government employeeswere allegedly involved in this disastrous and disgracing scandal. The government lost nearly 16 million USD to this particular gold scam. Let the official facts speak for themselves on how the regime is window dressing corruption. According to official reports, a total of 422 “federal” corruption cases were filed with 57 convictions, or a success rate of 13.5 percent! It is well known that the regime “interferes with the FEACC’s work” and “does not always act on the findings of FEACC’s reports.” The regime’s predictable response is to deny allegations of corruption and savagely criticize the critics. The fact of the matter is that the regime’s so-called anti-corruption effort is mere window dressing staged to hoodwink the international loaners and donors. The Bertelsmann Foundation 2012 Ethiopia Country Report best described the hollow nature of the regime’s “anti-corruption” crusade: Ethiopia’s Anti-Corruption Commission was founded by and remains dependent on the government. Its efficiency is not regarded as high. Officeholders who break the law and engage in corruption are not prosecuted adequately under the law, but occasionally, in the case of allegedly disloyal civil servants, do attract adverse publicity… Officeholder corruption is not well investigated or prosecuted atany level. Some EPRDF officeholders and their family members have become wealthy as a result of corruption and illegal practices… There are a number of companies close to the government and the ruling party, which leads to a lack of transparency and corruption… Anti-corruption policy has not been very successful. A political system which eliminates allmajor institutional checks and balances cannot be expected to cultivate a political culture of tolerance and fairness. The mentality of the TPLF and the four EPRDF coalition member parties seems to be locked in old- fashioned war culture thinking, supported by values of neo-patrimonial loyalty.

ETHIOPIA – Sovereignty Over The Blue Nile’

EM Commentary (November 4, 2013) - In General: The events of the last four weeks may as well have determined the future course of Ethiopia’s sovereignty and territorial integrity. On October 7, 2013 Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn made some remarks in a Press Conference that will resonate for years and make or break his political future, as well as the future of Ethiopian partisan politics. What I heard on video of the News Conference of October 7, 2013, is the most incredulous statement by Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn so far. He announced that he will welcome the participation of Egypt and Sudan in the construction of the Renaissance Dam and that his government and he consider the Dam to be"jointly owned" by Ethiopia, Sudan, and Egypt. To make this type of statement at this early stage of the controversy by a Head of Governmentis unconscionable and the worst form of negotiation strategy I have ever witnessed or read about in our long history. Such fast retreat of leadership in front of a national controversy is unheard of in Ethiopia's long political life.

However, to be fair to all concerned, let us examine the situation surrounding this sudden reversal of historic position, carefully and dispassionately. Mind you that there is no serious threat by anybody against Ethiopia except some habitual bullying by Egypt, and a few months ago by an errant Prince from Saudi Arabia (who was promptly removed from office) that the Prime Minister of the Ethiopian Governmentshould be trembling with fear and trepidation and recapitulate so easily.

Even if there is real military threat against the sovereignty and integrity ofEthiopia, is the statement by the Prime Minister within acceptable discretionary power of his office? I think not. The Prime Minister has far exceeded his duty and power circumscribed by the provisions of the 1995 Ethiopia's Constitution: Article 55 (2) (a); 55 (17); Article 74 (6); Article 86, when he spoke of creating some kind of joint ownership of an Ethiopian asset that borders of surrendering sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Ethiopian State. As a simple strategy of negotiation one does not show the hand that one holds at the initial stage of confrontationwith a historically ever belligerent foreign national government. Egypt andthe Arabs in general have been the relentless enemies of Ethiopia for centuries to this day. They have sought the destruction of Ethiopia despiteadmonishment of the Prophet Mohammad since the eighth century. They never heeded the words of their own Prophet. At this very moment they are busy mobilizing to halt the development effort of Ethiopia by throwingobstructionist threats. A type of prescription I have for my fellow Ethiopians is that when we seek peace and development we need get ready for war.

The construction of the Great Renaissance Dam on the Blue Nile within Ethiopian territory is indisputably an act of Ethiopia's Sovereign power. Whether such construction was premature, too ambitious, problematic dueto lack of technical expertise et cetera are issues that should not be confused with competence or sovereignty. Ethiopian successive Governments for almost a hundred years have openly stated their desire to take into account the national interests of both Egypt and Sudan in the effort to create an equitable use of the waters of the Nile and its Basin for all riparian states. Egypt has refused to recognize the fundamental sovereign rights of riparian states to use the waters of the Nile some of such states being originating/source countries. Currently, the Ethiopian Government seems to be committed in its effort to bring about fairness and equitable use of the Nile waters among riparian states to the extent ofoffering the Great Renaissance Dam in joint ownership to Egypt and Sudan. As I stated earlier, I am not convinced such generosity on the partof Ethiopia will help solve the greed of Egypt. Issues to consider: Even though such unbelievably generous offer by the Government of Ethiopia may be applauded by some, I am much concerned not only with the future of the Dam itself but also with the continued existence of Ethiopia. Some of the most pressing issues are as follows: What is the meaning of "joint ownership"? What are the risks for Ethiopia sharing ownership of its natural resource with foreign sovereign countries and their governments? Are there legal regimes and/or political modalities to insure the Sovereign right of Ethiopia on the Dam and the Water resource of the Blue Nile and its basin at all times? What effect would such "joint ownership" have on other riparian States of the Nile River? What is the need for secrecy (lack of transparency) of the Ethiopian Government? food for thought: "Compromise makes a good umbrella, but a poor roof; it is temporary expedient, often wise in party politics, almost sure to be unwise in statesmanship." UK and US Complicity in Ethiopia's Mass Displacement'

THINK AFRICA PRESS Analysis: (November 6, 2013) By David Turton - In the face of evidence, the UK and US continue to deny systematic human rights abuses are occurring in the Lower Omo as thousands are displaced for an irrigation scheme. The US-based think tank, the Oakland Institute, recently accused the UK and US governments of aiding and abetting the eviction of thousands of people from their land in Ethiopia's Lower Omo Valley. The accusation was not new – it had been made before by Survival International and Human Rights Watch amongst others. What was new about this report was that it made use of transcripts of interviews conducted by officials from the UK Department for International Development (DfID) and the US Agency for International Development (USAID), during a field visit to the lower Omo in January 2012. The interviews were recorded by the report's author, Will Hurd, who accompanied the officials and acted as their interpreter. The recordings contain vivid first-hand accounts of the abuses suffered by local people at the hands of the government, the police and the army.

Hurd, an American human rights activist who speaks one of the local languages, decided to release the recordings to journalists when both agencies claimed publicly, months after their visit, that they had found no evidence of the 'systematic' abuse of human rights. Having spent 40 yearsworking as an anthropologist in the area myself, I am confident of the accuracy and authenticity of the report and of the interviews on which it isbased. The abuses being carried out by the Ethiopian government in the Lower Omo are incontrovertible. Thousands of agro-pastoralists are beingevicted by government fiat and without compensation from their most valuable agricultural land along the banks of the Omo in order to make way for large-scale commercial irrigation schemes. By far the largest of these schemes is being set up by the state-owned Ethiopian Sugar Corporation. The evictions are being accompanied by a resettlement or 'villagisation' programme which, although described by administrators as 'voluntary', is forced in the sense that those affected have no reasonable alternative but to comply.

This is a glaring example of how not to do river-basin development. No impact assessments, feasibility studies or resettlement plans have been published. No plans have been announced for compensation, benefit sharing or livelihood reconstruction. And no attempt has been made to give the affected people a genuine say in decision making. In short, the project appears to have been conceived as a quasi-military operation, withthe police and army acting as an occupying force amongst a recalcitrant and 'backward' civilian population. Not surprisingly in these circumstances, there have been reports of beatings, arrests and sexual violence by military personnel. We know from 50 years of academic research on 'development-forced displacement and resettlement' as well as from countless reports by NGOs and development agencies that, if the project continues in this way, it will have a devastating impact on the economic, physical, psychological and social wellbeing of the displaced population. To use an expression from Michael Cernea, formerly the WorldBank's Senior Adviser on Social Policy and Resettlement, river-basin development in the lower Omo looks like its becoming yet another "disgracing stain on development itself."

Aiding and abetting: Ethiopia receives $3.5 billion a year from international donors, which amounts to approximately half its annual budget. In March 2011, it was announced that the UK would be giving $2 billion in development aid to Ethiopia over the following four years, making Ethiopia the biggest single recipient of British aid money. The UK is also the biggest state contributor to the World Bank's 'Promoting Basic Services' (PBS) programme for Ethiopia. PBS funds provide budget support for local government expenditure on education, health, agricultural extension and road construction. Since resettlement in the Lower Omo is the responsibility of the local administration, it would be stretching credulity beyond reasonable bounds to believe DfID's claim thatno UK money is being used to finance this activity. Over the past two years I have tried to alert both the Ethiopian government and DfID to what I believe is a disaster in the making. The Ethiopian officials I have spoken to simply denied that there was any basis for my concerns. I havelearnt that critics of Ethiopian government policies are liable to be treated either as 'enemies' of Ethiopia or as well meaning friends in need of remedial education. DfID staff were interested in what I had to say but the official line is that the British Government takes a 'robust stand' on human rights and, ‘where it has concerns’ it raises them ‘at the very highest level’ – to which the only answer, if you’ve had to stand by and watch your fields and grain stores flattened by a sugar corporation bulldozer, is ‘Yeah, right’. Whatever is going on behind closed doors, public statements made by British officials about allegations of human rights abuses in the lower Omo have been consistently supportive of the Ethiopian government. On 5 November 2012, the Minister for International Development, Justine Greening, announced in reply to a question in Parliament that DfID had not been able to “substantiate” the allegations made to it during its visit to the lower Omo in January that year. She promised that another visit to the area would be made “to examine these further.” Another visit was indeed made, by DfID and USAID staff, a week after the Minister’s reply. But no report of this visit has been released despite a Freedom of Information request from SurvivalInternational. Meanwhile, Sir Malcolm Bruce, Chairman of the International Development Committee of the UK’s House of Commons, repeated the Minister’s line on a visit to Addis Ababa in March 2013.

Speaking to a local newspaper, he said “we cannot make decisions basedon allegations….what we have now is mostly allegations, many of which the government has already addressed”.

A robust stand with Ethiopia: On this showing, DfID’s proud boast that it takes a ‘robust stand’ on human rights looks like empty rhetoric – cynical,politically expedient and morally bankrupt. Nor would one have to be a great cynic oneself to at least wonder whether the allegations made to DfID and USAID staff by lower Omo residents in January 2012 would haveseen the light of day if they had not been tape-recorded and published by Will Hurd. It needs to be stressed that the allegations were not principally about rapes, arrests and beatings. These have certainly occurred, but theymay or may not have been part of a systematic campaign of intimidation. What is undeniable is the forced, large-scale, ongoing and systematic eviction of whole communities from their land by their own government, without consultation and without compensation. And it is clear from the interview transcripts, published along with the Oakland Institute report, that this was the most deeply felt, vehemently expressed and frequently repeated allegation of human rights abuse made to DfID and USAID staff during their January 2012 field visit. Any “further examination” of this allegation, if indeed it is necessary, should not take long to complete. The British government is helping to sustain, with its financial, moral and political support, a project which, if it continues without change, will lead to the needless suffering of thousands of people. This is not a technical problem. We know very well what practical steps should be taken, now, toprevent or at least mitigate the worst consequences of the project. But the UK’s politicians are not only “turning a blind eye” to the problem, as the Oakland Institute’s report puts it, but repeatedly denying it exists. We must conclude that they will only have second thoughts about this policy ifthey come to doubt its political expediency. Or, as a colleague of mine once put it, more colourfully, if it “comes back to bite them in the bum”.

Two Recent Wikileaks Files that Froze the Regime's Spine'

WikiLeaks (November 7 , 2013) - Secret Wikileaks Cable Reveals Recent Bombings in Addis Ababa the Work of the Woyane minority regime in Ethiopia' According to a cable released by Wikileaks, the TPLF minority regime in Ethiopia planted bombs in Ethiopia's capital Addis Ababa and killed innocent people in a bid to frame neighboring Eritrea for the terrorist crimes, as most pictures of the crime incidence in Addis Ababa captured by Reuter's correspondent in Ethiopia. U.S Embassy cable: Zenawi's contempt for Ethiopian lives and his deceptive nature exposed in Wiki files' Here again, on another eye boggling denials by the shameless minority Ethiopian regime after embarrassed by a series of revelation froma secret US Embassy cables released by the whistle blower website Wikileaks. Yesterday, they issued a frantic 'press statement' with the usual denials and full of armature diplomatic languages concerning 'two issues' raised on the Ethiopia Wikileaks files. The first issue that hits the nerve of the Addis Ababa regime was the release of the file that exposes the pattern and behavior of the Ethiopian security forces on how they plant bombs in the city then later blame on the opposition and neighboring Eritrea.

ETHIOPIA: WIKILEAKS SUBJECT

RECENT BOMBINGS BLAMED ON OROMOS POSSIBLY THE WORK OF GoE

Classified by: VICKI HUDDLESTON CHARGE D'AFFAIRS OF THE USEMBASSY IN ADDIS ABABA FOR REASONS 1.4(b)AND(d).

1. (S) SUMMARY A series of explosions were reported in Addis Ababa on September 16, killing three individuals. The GoE announced that the bombs went off while being assembled, and that the three dead were terrorists from the outlawed Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) with links to the Oromo National Congress (ONC). An embassy source, as well as clandestine reporting, suggests that the bombing may have in fact been the work of GoE security forces. END SUMMARY 2. (U) On September 16,three bomb explosions were reported in the Kara Kore area of Addis Ababa. The explosions were heard at 4:45 a.m., 7:00 a.m., and 10:00 a.m. The National Intelligence and Security Service (NISS), together withthe Federal Police Anti-terror Task Force later reported that the bombs were "part of a coordinated terror attack by the OLF and Sha'abiya (PFDJ)aimed at disrupting democratic development." The NISS said that the intended terror plot had failed and the bombs had mistakenly gone off while the suspects were preparing them while hiding out at an illegally built house. Two of the suspects died immediately, while another died on the way to the hospital. One other is in critical condition. The police task force reported having others in custody related to the plot and that evidence shows the terrorists had ties to Oromo groups – the Mecha &Tulema Association (MTA) and the ONC. They also said that the bombs used contained parts sourced from Eritrea and were consistent with bombs used in previous terrorist attacks. 3) (S) On September 20, Dr. Merera Gudina (strictly protect), the former leader of the ONC (and a typically reliable information source), contacted Post to report that the deceased had not died not while constructing a bomb, but rather at the hands of GoE cadres. Dr. Merera said that the men had been picked up bypolice a week prior, kept in detention and tortured. He said police then leftthe men in a house and detonated explosives nearby, killing 3 of them. Hedid not indicate whether the men were ONC or OLF affiliated. 4) (S) Clandestine reporting indicates that the bombs did not explode inside the structure, but rather appear to have been placed outside and detonated. [Ambassador Vicki] HUDDLESTON

This latest revelation is to their complete disadvantage specially at a time when they were seeking, in a frenzied campaign together with Susan Rice,for more severe economic sanctions on Eritrea under the pretext that Eritrea planned a terror bomb attack during an African Union summit last January in Addis Ababa. The report from a 2006 US Embassy cable reference id: #06ADDISABABA2708, said: “An embassy source, as well asclandestine reporting, suggests that the bombing may have in fact been the work of the Government of Ethiopia (GOE) security forces.” The Wikileaks report goes on, “A typically reliable information source contacted Post to report that” the bodies of three men found at the bomb sites were “men [who] had been picked up by police a week prior, kept in detention and tortured. He said police then left the men in a house and detonated explosives nearby, killing 3 of them.” This high profile US government report irrefutably witnessed the pattern and behavior of the minority regimes identical lies about a nearly identical “terrorist attacks” that are staged time and again in different parts of Ethiopia in the hope ofgetting some short-lived propaganda gains on its opponents by playing the blame game. However, this also raises some serious questions about the credibility of the recently released report by the UN Monitoring Group for Eritrea and Somalia which blames Eritrean and the OLF for the January bombing attempt at the African Union summit in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

The second issue that makes the Addis Ababa junta a bit uncomfortable isthe release of the file that exposes Zenawi’s ill advice to the Americans onthe option of seeing an Al Bashir free Sudan. The January 30, 2009 reportreleased by Wikileaks shows discussions that took place between Zenawi and Acting Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Phil Carter and during the discussion, Zenawi told the officials that, “Toppling the government led by Sudanese president Omer Hassan al-Bashir would be the ideal scenario for Washington.” Zenawi then went on to wrap up his views by saying that, “If he [Zenawi] were the United States’ he would look at two options and the first one, which he clearly conveyed as the preferred choice would be “removing the Bashir regime.”

Ethiopia - Tasty & Delicious traditional food offers full range of flavor,culture’

(November 7, 2013) Gursha is the traditional way of eating an Ethiopian meal. During gursha, diners share the meal. The food is scooped or grabbed with torn pieces of the flatbread. No utensils are used. “The mealcreates a bond, like family,” For those who prefer dining in a more Westernized way, utensils are available, and items can be ordered a la carte. The menu consists of various wats, or thick stews, of spicy marinated beef or chicken and tibs, which are sauteed dishes such as cubed beef or lamb. Wats and tibs also come in vegetarian or vegan options such as red lentils or yellow split peas simmered in red pepper sauce. Most Ethiopian dishes are vegetarian or vegan, because pork and shellfish are forbidden by most of the religions of the country, including the predominant Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Christian faith. Beef and chicken often are a luxury. Items such as collard greens, cabbage and lentils are seasoned and cooked to be substantial entrees. “Ethiopian fooduses a lot of onions and spices in most dishes and stews.” “The food is closer to Mediterranean food.” All entrees are served with the sourdough–like injera, a flat bread, which is low in gluten. Some restaurants also offers a coffee ceremony. The ceremony, traditionally served in the mornings in Ethiopian neighborhoods, involves a hostess who brews the coffee in a clay pot and serves it in small cups at a station plate set up forthe service. A basket of popcorn and the burning of frankincense pass thetime while the coffee brews. The coffee service allows family, friends and neighbors time to discuss the latest news. The time will be well spent hearing about the culture of the country and interesting trivia, such as thefact that Ethiopia has ‘13-months of calendar’. In addition to the coffee service, most restaurants offer soft drinks, juice and spiced tea. Beer and a traditional wine known as locally ‘Tej’ made up of honey also are offered.

Ethiopia's Special (Liyuu) Police Force is the New Horn of Africa Crisis inthe Making'

SomalilandSun Analysis (November 7, 2013) - Ethiopian paramilitary Force or Liyuu Police militia better known as "Ethiopia's Janjaweed" is killing, raping, torturing, and arresting unarmed civilians in Ethiopian-Occupied Ogaden Region. The Militia's human rights violations are well- documented by the Rights Groups-such as Human Rights Watch, AmnestyInternational and Genocide Watch. The Guardian reported that this criminal institution to receive £19 million from UK's department for International Development or (DFID), a report denied by the DFID. Twenty-three year-old, Nafis, who only gave her first name for fear of reprisal, told me how she escaped from her town Hamaro, in the Fiq province, on phone. "A large number of paramilitary soldiers stormed our houses while I was in the vicinity of the town, killing any-one in sight andtaking few people with them including my 2-year-old baby, Neima Mohammed, she said. Two hours later, she was confirmed that her baby, Neima, was taken and detained in "Ogaden Jail" for political background. The baby's father, Mohammed, is one of the ONLF-sympathizers and that is the reason behind the baby's detention. But Nafis was shocked and wasmore gut-wrenching for the news of her baby. Now a refugee in Yemen, Nafis's message to International community is simple: "I want my little baby back".

The aforementioned reveals down-to-earth reality in Ogaden: the local people face a stark choice indeed, namely either to remain at home in Ogaden, and be exposed to various deprivations, extreme suffering, routine army brutality, long imprisonment, and brutal scorch earth tacticsor flee and manage to get to some refugee camps in the neighboring countries whereby safety is not an issue anymore, but the conditions of life are truly miserable and the humanitarian assistance is very limited.

Nafis is one of more than 3,000 Ogadeni refugees currently living in Yemen's Capital, Sana'a under UNHCR's mandate. Liyuu Police-controllednotorious prison locally known as "Jail Ogaden" in the regional capital of Jigjiga is one of brutal prisons on earth that is held many inmates withoutcharge. About 5,000 inmates are in Ogaden jail among them are women,children and babies including men. This prison is known for "dishing out not just physical torture to its inmates but mental as well." I will write in details for my upcoming articles.

According to human rights groups, Ethiopian forces and its ally, Special police, carry out unlawful detention and extra-judicial killing of civilians sought to be sympathizers of the ONLF. Ethiopian forces are also accused of forcefully recruiting civilians among them children to do its war against Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) but Liyuu Police members are defecting one-by-one and Ethiopian forces may not rely on it any longer, as a former Liyuudefector, Captt. Hassan Aafo, told me. This academy for qualified murderers enjoy international community's silence when it comesto human rights abuses being committed against the unarmed Somali civilians in Ethiopian-occupied Ogaden region by the Liyuu Police militia and Ethiopian Army. Many people were forced out Ogaden region and diedin the seas; therefore, Liyuu Police militia is not only a new regional crisis but international one.

According to Swedish Paper, Aftonbadet, Swedish War Crimes Commissionhas launched a preliminary investigation against Ogaden Regional President, Abdi Mohamoud Omar and his vice president Abdilahi Yusuf Werar. The Report came right after different Swedish TV channels including Swedish Television SVT, showed a movie smuggled out from Ogaden by an Ogadeni Refugee, Abdilahi Hussein, who had been a government official in the region. The 100 hours long movie is said to have many evidences of genocide committed by the Ethiopian governmentin the region. According to a report by the Ogadentoday Press three civilians were executed in Godey, quoting an NGO-worker in the area, whodeclined to be named, said, that the men who were demised were accusedof being sympathizers of Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF). The its residents are ethnic Somalis. The region was Italian and British-colony,but in 1954, British handed over the region secretly to Ethiopia a decisionrejected by the Ogaden Somali population and fight for full Independence ever since.

ETHIOPIA - PMHD, the shrinking premier & Ethiopian immigrants abusedby Saudi security forces'

ER Commentary (November 8, 2013) - The two TPLF factions are appearing to be close to resolving their differences and turning their attention to getting back the prime minister's position from Hailemariam Desalegn, their puppet known as 'the identikit of the late Meles Zenawi', according to reliable sources. The Sibhat Nega faction reportedly has the upper hand, and party boss Abay Woldu and friends have chosen to retreat instead of getting crushed. TPLF insiders have informed Ethiopian Review sources that Tewodros Hagos has emerged as a consensus choice to lead the party and become the next prime ministrer, but Sibhat Nega's camp is still campaigning to put Teodros Adhanom in the PM's office. And Hailemariam is done. He is to be disposed of before the 2015 fake elections get underway, our sources said. It's been over a year since Hailemariam became the prime minister in Ethiopia, taking over from the khat-addicted former dictator Meles Zenawi who died in July 2012. Under the current constitution, the prime minister in Ethiopia has dictatorial powers. Meles Zenawi and his wife used the position to loot the country, mete out punishments against their political opponents, and launch adventurous wars, among other misdeeds. Hailemariam, who claims to bea devout Christian, could have used such power to the good use. Instead,he has allowed the TPLF to continue using him as a puppet, loot the country and torment the people. After one year in power, Hailemariam has not only done any thing good for Ethiopia, his stature, which was small to begin with, grew even smaller. With his slavish behavior toward the TPLF, he made himself useful only to his masters. In the end, he will be remembered as a puppet and a coward who lives only to fill his stomach. After one year in power, Hailemariam could have solidified his position and make it impossible for TPLF to push him out. He has failed tobuild and expand his own constituency and assert his authority. He is heldin such contempt by his TPLF masters that they don't even bother to provide him with "national security" briefings. While Hailemariam was the prime minister over the past twelve months: a, TPLF thugs continue to arrest, torture and murder innocent Ethiopians. b, TPLF thugs continue to loot the country while millions of Ethiopians suffer from extreme economicdeprivation. C, Unable to find jobs in their own country, young Ethiopians continue fleeing to other countries, facing extreme dangers. In countries like Saudi Arabia, Ethiopians are treated worse than dogs. d, Members and leaders of opposition parties continue to be harassed, beaten up and arrested. PMHD cannot escape both moral and criminal accountability for these and other countless crimes committed by the ruling party against the people of Ethiopia.

Ethiopia’s Indigenous Excluded from Rapid Growth’

OMO VALLEY, Ethiopia, IPS (November 11, 2013) – As the construction ofa major transmission line to export electricity generated from one of Ethiopia’s major hydropower projects gets underway, there are growing concerns that pastoralist communities living in the region are under threat. The Gibe III dam, which will generate 1,800 megawatts (MW), is being built in southeast Ethiopia on the Omo River at a cost of 1.7 billion dollars. It is expected to earn the government over 400 million dollars annually from power exports. On completion in 2015 it will be the world’sfourth-largest dam.[pullquote]3[/pullquote]

But the dam is expected to debilitate the lives and livelihoods of hundreds of thousands of indigenous communities in Ethiopia’s Lower Omo Valley and those living around Kenya’s Lake Turkana who depend on the Omo River. The Bodi, Daasanach, Kara, Mursi, Kwegu and Nyangatom ethnic communities who live along the Omo River depend on its annual flooding to practice flood- retreat cultivation for their survival and livelihoods.

But the semi-nomadic Mursi ethnic community are being resettled as part of the Ethiopian government’s villagisation programme to make room for alarge sugar plantation, which will turn roaming pastoralists into sedentary farmers. The hundreds of kilometres of irrigation canals currently being dug to divert the Omo River’s waters to feed these large plantations will make it impossible for the indigenous communities to live as they have always done. “We are being told that our land is private property. We are very worried about our survival as we are being forced to move where there is no water, grass or crops,” a Mursi community member told IPS. The Omo Valley is set to become a powerhouse of large commercial farming irrigated by the Gibe III dam. To date 445,000 hectares have been allocated to Malaysian, Indian and other foreign companies to grow sugar, biofuels, cereals and other crops. “The Gibe III will worsen poverty for the most vulnerable. The government already has trouble managing hunger and poverty [among] its citizenry. By taking over land and water resources in the Omo Valley, it is creating a new class of ‘internal refugees’ who will no longer be self-sufficient,” Lori Pottinger from environmental NGO International Rivers told IPS.

Top global financiers, including the World Bank and the African Development Bank (AfDB), have committed 1.2 billion dollars to a 1,070 km high-voltage line that will run from Wolayta-Sodo in Ethiopia to Suswa, 100 km northwest of the Kenyan capital, Nairobi. The transmissionline, powered by Ethiopia’s Gibe III, will connect the country’s electrical grid with Kenya and will have a capacity to carry 2,000 MW between the two countries. According to the AfDB, it will promote renewable power generation, regional cooperation, and will ensure access to reliable and affordable energy to around 870,000 households by 2018. Although the latest U.N. Development Programme Human Development report ranks Ethiopia 173rd out of 187 countries, Ethiopia, Africa’s second-most populous country, is one of the continent's fastest-growing economies. According to Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, Ethiopia's economy is set to maintain a growth rate of 11 percent in 2014. Fully exploiting its massive water resources to generate a hydropower potential of up to 45,000 MW in order to sell surplus electricity to its neighbours is central toEthiopia's Growth and Transformation plan, a five-year plan to develop thecountry's economy.

The Horn of Africa nation currently generates 2,000 MW from six hydroelectric dams and invests more of its resources in hydropower than any other country in Africa – one third of its total GNP of about 77 billion dollars. According to a World Bank report published in 2010, only 17 percent of Ethiopia's 84.7 million people had access to electricity at the time of the report. By 2018, 100 percent of the population will have access to power, according to state power provider Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation (EEPCO). "We are helping mitigate climate risk of fossilfuel consumption and also reduce rampant deforestation rates in Ethiopia.Hydropower will benefit our development," Miheret Debebe, chief executive officer of EEPCO, told IPS. The Ethiopian government insists that the welfare of pastoralist communities being resettled is a priority and that they will benefit from developments in the Omo Valley. "We are working hard to safeguard them and help them to adapt to the changing conditions," government spokesperson Shimeles Kemal told IPS.

However, there are concerns that ethnic groups like the Mursi are not being consulted about their changing future. "If we resist resettlement wewill be arrested," a Mursi elder told IPS. "We fear for the future. Our way of life is under threat. We are being told to stop moving with our cattle, tostop wearing our traditional dress and to sell our cattle. Cattle and movement is everything to the Mursi." The importance of ensuring that benefits from Ethiopia's national development projects do not come at a price of endangering the lives of hundreds of thousands pastoralist tribes is critical said Ben Braga, president of the World Water Council. Braga decried governments that failed to compensate communities like the Mursias displacement of surrounding communities is always an inevitable consequence of major dams that need plenty of advanced planning to avoid emergencies. "How can we compensate these people so that the majority of the country can benefit from electricity? There is a need for better compensatory mechanisms to ensure that benefits are shared and that all stakeholders are included in consultations prior to construction," he told IPS.

Saudi Arabia intensifies raids against Ethiopian immigrants; 4 killed in carcrash'

ARAB NEWS (November 11, 2013) – News updates: Riyadh - Thousands of Ethiopian immigrants have been subjected to murder, rape and beatings in a savage Saudi crackdown on "illegal immigrants." At least have been killed, an Ethiopian told activist Sadik Ahmed from a Saudi town yesterday. "I've seen with my naked eyes Ethiopian women being dragged by Saudi thugs for a gang rape." Ethiopians don't have an Ethiopian government since 1991, when a mercenary tyrant called Meles Zenawi took over power and soiled the good image and respect Ethiopianshad in the international community. Hundreds of Ethiopians, including at least 70 women, armed themselves with knives, rocks and broken bottles and threatened police, pedestrians and motorists in Manfouha district's narrow streets. Anti-riot police fired in the air and used truncheons to break up the crowd. In the ensuing clashes, two men were killed — a Saudi and an Ethiopian. The Saudi victim, 32, was struck on the head witha rock. More than 70 people, including 28 Saudis, were injured and 104 vehicles were damaged. Several shops were ransacked. Police arrested 561 people. The district's schools remained shut on Sunday, according to eyewitnesses. Riyadh police chief Brig. Gen. Naser Al-Qahtani said police had cordoned off central Riyadh to control the crowd and arrest troublemakers. Medical personnel reported that victims suffered concussions, bruises and knife wounds. On Sunday, police established an asylum center at the intersection of King Abdul Aziz Road, south of RiyadhRing Road, where hundreds of undocumented Ethiopians surrendered in response to police calls. Reacting to the riots, Jamal Khashoggi, Alarab TV chief, said that whoever opposed labor action to rid the country of illegal workers and regulate the market should now think of the worst-case scenario. "No country would ever accept illegal workers," he said. Hamad Al-Qadi, a former Shoura Council member, said: "We shouldn't be deterred by rioting. We should continue with the campaign against illegal workers for the interest and security of our nation. This forms part of our fundamental right to protect our sovereignty … Nobody can argue against that." Ghazi Al-Shammari, head of the Family Cooperation Committee at the Eastern Province Governorate, has warned Saudi families who employ Ethiopian maids against acts of vengeance, especially when they have easy access to news through their cell phones. "The security of our nation is a red line that can't be crossed," he said, calling for full cooperation withsecurity departments and warning against coverup businesses at all costs.Many Saudi bloggers have asked for the eradication of visa trading and coverup operations. "This is an old problem that has worsened over the years," said Yousef Al-Mubarak, who called for a final solution. "Now is thetime to keep up the momentum." Meanwhile… one police officer and four Ethiopian immigrants were killed on Sunday when the vehicle transportingthem to the Shumaisy deportation center overturned. Another policeman and three Ethiopians were injured in the accident, which took place near Al-Jaizah police station in Al-Laith Governorate. The vehicle rolled over several times as a result of a flat tire. The officer who died in the crash was identified as Sgt. Maj. Hamdan Al-Maliki. "The accident was caused bya tire burst," said Col. Moammar Saleh of the traffic department in Al- Laith. He confirmed that the vehicle was transferring seven Ethiopian illegal expats to the Shumaisy deportation center.

Historic grief: Ethiopians Denounce the Saudi Crimes Against Humanity’

DEMANDS FOR AN IMMEDIATE CESSATION OF VIOLENCE AGAINST IMMIGRANTS BY SAUDI ARABIAN SECURITY FORCES AND VIGILANTES!

ESAT NEWS: (November 12, 2013) International calls on an immediate stop to the cruel, callous, and unjustified killing, raping, and beatings of Ethiopian immigrants by the government Saudi Arabian Security forces and Police backed youth Vigilantes being louded. Ethiopia and Saudi Arabia enjoyed a peaceful and fraternal relationship in the past dating back in earlier centuries. As history attest, the Prophet Mohammed had taken refuge in Ethiopia and was pleased and blessed Ethiopians and Ethiopia for their hospitality. Further, today there large farms and fertile lands were given to the Saudi investors far below the market price. Yet, inthe past few weeks, the Saudi Security forces and youth backed by the government have been engaged in shameful act of violence against Ethiopians. The Security forces and the vigilante youth have brutally executed Ethiopians on the street, raped and abducted young women, and severely beaten defenseless hundreds using many types of weapons. As many Ethiopians around the world are following this grave act of gross actof Human Rights violations with shock and dismay, diasporans call upon all human rights organization, the United Nations, and the U.S. government to intervene in stopping the brutal killings without any delay. Calls upon the KSA authorities to launch an immediate investigation on the issue. The Kingdom should issue an order to stop further killings, rape, and beatings by both the security forces and the Police backed youthvigilantes.

Ethiopia: Shocking Widespread Arrests in the Ogaden’ SomalilandSun by Ahmed Abdi (November 12, 2013) - The Silence of Western and African diplomats when it comes to human rights abuses in the Ogaden Region, is not being Somalis in Ogaden, Muslims and Ethiopian government, Christian as many locals believe, but injustice happens anytime, any-where says, an Ogadeni intellectual, Sulub, citing astory happened in a Somali village. "A father willed all his property (livestock) as a heritage to his sons when he was at his bedside, not sooner than his corpse buried into the grave,the elder son started to sell the livestock one-by-one without the consent of his younger brother or giving him a share. The Younger brother continued to complain to the elders that his older brother was selling the livestock without the consent of him or giving him a share, but nobody listened to him as his older brother refuted the claim. As he (the younger brother) got older, he borrowed a gun from his sympathizer friend and made known to everybody in the village that he had only two options: 'Either to get back his share or to kill his corrupt, older brother?' Then Everybody listened to him and involved in the case'.

This story samples to International Community,mainly the Western and African diplomats that hold meetings in Addis Ababa and ignore the plight of the Somali population in ogaden Region, he said. Ethiopian Governmentmade very difficult for Journalists and writers about the region to enter into region to cover what is going on freely. The Only way to receive the news is to send calls to the people on the ground. On Monday night,I spoke with Sahra Hassan(Not her real name) on phone and she said:"I was walking the main street, Kara'marda,when gradually I encountered a lot of Liyu Police,I saw them blocking all the lines and scooping out all the people that were passing through.Then, arresting and taking young men between 15 to 30 years old.And Beating with their guns those resisting arrest" "I had completely shocked and scared,then I returned to my home,It was the strangest thing I have seen recently",she added. The Notorious Liyu Police militia is accused of serious human rights abuses by the rights groups such as Human Right Watch,Amnesty International and Genocide Watch.

According to local sources,several thousand people were arrested.This Security sweep comes after the Regional Administration of Jigjiga preached for several months that its hosting the Ethiopia's Nations' and People's Day which is due to the end of November.And It's believed that the puppet Administration is draining the sea to secure the big fish. In an Ogadentoday Press portal,writer Mohammed Farah reported civilians killedin a part of this crackdown. As the Group, Ogaden National Liberation Front website states, "The Notorious Jail Ogaden, where thousands of innocent civilians are tortured to death is located just few hundred metersaway from the festival area". Nobody can visit his/her jailed relatives in Ogaden Jail and those arrests will likely to end up in Ogaden jail without taking them to court. MSF and Red Cross were operating and providing assistance to villagers in the Ogaden, but expelled from the region when they were accused of middling in the political affairs in the region, a charge they strongly denied.

Those (NGOs) remained in the region are under government surveillance,and when it comes to reporting human rights abuses in the region that they witness occurring in front of their eyes. They(NGOs) face a stark choice indeed, to remain in Ogaden region to keep proving the little assistance to population and watch incidents of human rights violations asit happen, like watching a movie trailer, or to speak out to break the silence which is likely to be very risk-taking to be detained, kidnapped, expelled, killed or injured by landmines planted by the Ethiopian Army.

The Oil-rich Ogaden Region borders Djibouti, Kenya and Somalia and many of its residents are ethnic Somalis. The region was Italian and British-colony, but in 1954, Britain handed over the region secretly to Ethiopia, a decision rejected by the Ogaden Somali population who have since fought for full independence. The Pressing question on the minds ofmany Somalis from the region is how long will it continue the silence of the International Community, and Ethiopian donors when it comes tohuman rights violations of the Region?

Three Eritrean officers defect to Saudi Arabia – website’

DUBAI REUTERS (November 12, 2013) Three Eritrean military officers have asked for political asylum in Saudi Arabia after Saudi air force jets forced their aircraft to land in the southern part of the kingdom, the local news website Sabq reported on Tuesday. Sabq quoted Yassin bin Ahmed al-Qassem, a spokesman for the Jazan Emirate, as saying that F-15 planes were deployed when the Eritrean aircraft entered Saudi airspace without permission. "The aircraft forced to land in the King Abdullah bin Abdulaziz airport was carrying three Eritrean officers seeking political asylum," Sabq quoted Yassin as saying. The Eritraen aircraft were militarybut used to carry equipment and not fighters, Yassin added.

Eritrea, whichsplit from Ethiopia in May, 1991, is one of Africa's most secretive states and dissent is dealt with harshly. Located on the opposite side of the Red Sea to Saudi Arabia, it has long been at odds with the United States and isaccused of human rights abuses by international monitors. In January, dissident soldiers backed by tanks briefly took over the Information Ministry in Asmara, demanding all political prisoners be freed. Calm soon returned to the capital but Eritrean opposition activists in neighbouring Ethiopia cite growing dissent within the army over economic hardships.

With a population of about 5.5 million, mass defections have become more common in recent years. In February,18 Eritreans who disappearedfrom their hotel during a football tournament in Kampala were granted political asylum by Uganda. In April, Saudi media said an Eritrean militarypilot sent by Asmara to reclaim a jet stolen by two fellow officers when sought asylum in the kingdom had herself defected.

The U.N. refugee agency says more than 250,000 Eritrean refugees and nearly 15,000 asylum seekers live across the Horn of Africa.

USA - Global Alliance for the Right of Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia (GAFRESA) has been formed to co-ordinate efforts to stop violence against Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia’ (November 12, 2013) “በኢትዮጵያዊያን ላይ የሚካሄደውን እልቂት ለማስቆም እ.አ.አ በ November 12, 2013 በተደረገ አስቸኳይ ስብሰባ ዓለምአቀፍ ትብብር ለኢትዮጵያውያን መብት በሳኡዲ አረቢያ ብሄራዊ ግብረ ኃይል በይፋ ተመሰርቷል”

The Holy effort at the Global Alliance Group: It is high time to mobilize, organize and raise funds to help Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia. And for the foot soldiers of democracy and freedom, this is the time to march into ourneighborhoods where we live and work knocking at the door of the next door neighbor. Thanks to all of the patriotic guys who have worked hard to organize thisHoly effort at the Global Alliance group. Now, the next phase is the implementation phase that requires the response of every patriotic Ethiopian who has witnessed this Saudi Arabian horror on Facebook andother media outlets as well as from eyewitness reports.

The anger, the mourning, the protests, and the emotional outbursts and the articles about them should subside. And we should quickly move into the effort of actually rescuing our people by being the foot soldiers in our neighborhoods by mobilizing the fundraising effort on top of exposing whothe villain is for all these horror on our people.

New round of security searches in Addis Ababa’

Top News: (November 13, 2013) - After Ethiopia’s National Intelligence and Security Service and Federal Police Joint Counter-terrorism Task Forcelast week said it has reliable evidence indicating that the terrorist group

Al-shabaab and terror groups assisted by Eritrea are preparing to carry out terror attack in various parts of Ethiopia, new rounds of searches and check have began in Addis Ababa. Radisson Blue and Jupiter InternationalHotels in Kazainches area in Addis Ababa have been compelled to install modern security check machines. Similarly, other service providing organisations are also now busy installing the electronic security machines. Following this, police has been conducting unexpected house tohouse searches in Sarris area of Addis Ababa. Police has also been stopping and searching vehicles. Ethiopia had said two Somali nationals were killed in a bomb blast at their home in the Bole area of Addis Ababa while in the process of manufacturing the bomb last month. The blast occurred a few miles from a stadium packed with fans purchasing tickets for the game between the Walya Antelopes of Ethiopia and the SuperEagles of Nigeria. The authorities had warned the public to be careful when dealing with foreign nationals and to take precautionary measures and full background details of their clients.

Ethiopia – Diaspora civic organs condemn Saudi crimes, plan protestrallies'

Ethiomedia: SEATTLE (November 13, 2013) - Ethiopian opposition and civic organizations expressed their anger and outrage against the atrocities Saudi security forces committed against defenseless Ethiopians in the kingdom. While condemning the government in Ethiopia for the shame and humiliation Ethiopians have been reduced to since 1991, they also called for the Saudi regime to be held accountable for the crimes it committed. Worldwide protest rallies are planned infront of Saudi embassies. Following is a summary report of what the opposition and civicorganizations said in their respective statements:

The Ethiopian people, who had a glorious history of honor and glory, todaylive in shame and humiliation mainly due to a government that has no love of the country on top of adopting a misguided policy. The remark wasmade by Andenet, a popular opposition party has used strongest phrased statement that held the Saudi government responsible for crimes against humnity on the one hand the government in Ethiopia for lack of interest todefend the rights and dignity of Ethiopians. The Saudi government should be held accountable for the crimes committed against defenseless Ethiopian immigrant workers in the kingdom, Andenet said, urging the government in Addis to heed its responsibility to brief the Ethiopian peopleon what really had happened in Saudi Arabia against the Ethiopians, incuding women and children.

Meanwhile, the Solidarity Movement for a New Ethiopia (SMNE) also published stories of agonies in Saudi Arabia, directly quoting the victims of either rape of brutal beatings.

Saudi police in uniform broke into our home and ordered us to lay flat. Weobeyed their order when one of us, a woman, told the police that they have legal papers. The police kicked her in the head, asked for the documents. When he was given, he tore the papers to pieces. They took the men to an unknown destination while the remaining five officers resorted to rape, one women told SMNE. The First Hijrah Foundation, a US-based Ethiopian-American Muslim Organization, said, "Information on social media both audio and videos indicates that so far about 13

Ethiopian have lost their lives and many others are severely injured duringthe crackdown. Most alarming is that as the authorities rounding up the males, Saudi youth thugs are going around raping the women in their places of residence. This is contrary to Islamic teachings and any international laws protecting refugees."

Atrocity against Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia continues’

Top News: (November 13, 2013) The atrocity against Ethiopians detained in different concentration camps in Saudi Arabia has been continuing for the past five days. State media said that the Ethiopian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr. Tedros Adhanom has discussed with his Saudi Arabian counterpart over the phone. Dina Mufti, the Public Relations Head of the Ministry said the attack against Ethiopians showed aslight decrease after the discussion of the two ministers. This statement had saddened many Ethiopians. The Ministry also said a high level delegation has also travelled to Saudi Arabia. Dr. Tedros has been criticised on different social media spheres for not taking the severe abuseof Ethiopians seriously. Many Ethiopians told ESAT that the statement of the Ministry about the decrease in attacks was false and it has rather harshly increased. An Ethiopian residing in Riyadh said many Ethiopians have been rounded up and are now concentrated in remote camps.

Anti-Saudi Demonstration in New York’

News updates: (November 13, 2013) The door at the 10th floor 809 plazain New York proudly said, " Saudi Arabia, Human Rights Council Member, 2014-2016 ". We have to stop right there to drop the letter addressed to the King of Saudi Arabia, King Abdullah Bin Abdulaziz and H.E. Abdallah Y.Al-Mouallimi, Saudi Ambassador to UN as we were told to do so by the Ambassador's Office in our telephone conversation with them yesterday.

We politely asked the security before dropping the letter if the Ambassador Secretary can talk to us for few minutes. He called the office and told us to just drop the letter. From our previous experience trying sometimes work and we insisted to meet her or other staff. The security officer yelled, "Drop and Just Leave". We stayed firm, his outburst made us more to be firm on our request. He kept on yelling " Drop and Just Leave". His loud noise forced the ambassador's staff to come to front to witness what was happening. It was a blessing in disguise for us. What wedemanded was any staff to come out and talk to us and make sure someone received the two envelopes. Yes we got more than what we wanted. One gentleman and one lady were there listening to their angry security guard cursing us "Just Leave, Just Leave" holding two envelopes. It was not a package bomb. It was pictures of the beaten and dead Ethiopians staring at them.

It is a warning to them to Stop or face the consequence !!! Wow this simple test show us how the Embassy of Saudi Arabia is run in a Free World. We left the building after we did our job and contacted the embassy form outside. We asked one of the embassy staff the reason whywe were yelled at by their security guard on the 10th floor. She told us that she did not hear which was totally absurd. The noise has brought many of them to the front and I can assure you that the noise can be heard in a wider area for anyone without hearing problem. We told her that we did our job by handling over the two letters to the ambassador's office as we were asked to do so by the Ethiopians residing in New York City. We also informed her that the campaign to expose the Saudi Regimecrime against Ethiopians will continue. We will expose the Saudi Regime for its crime against humanity. Such regime can not and will not be a defender of Human Rights at local and global level as the Saudi UN Ambassador boasted on his speech at UN yesterday. A country that is raping, killing and beating Ethiopians should be refereed to International Criminal Court (ICC) not rewarded a seat as a member of Human Rights Council. As we informed the staff on the phone the next phase of our campaign will bring huge crowd in front of Saudi Arabia Embassy and expose its crime to the world.

Over 23,000 Ethiopians ‘surrender’ in Saudi after clamp down’

BBC Coverage (November 14, 2013) Ethiopia has complained about the treatment of its citizens in Saudi Arabia. About 23,000 Ethiopians have surrendered to Saudi authorities since a clampdown on illegal migrant workers began in the oil-rich kingdom last week, officials have said. The clampdown has led to clashes in the capital, Riyadh, with at least five people killed. Saudi authorities say they are trying to reduce the 12% unemployment rate among native Saudis. An estimated nine million migrant workers are in Saudi Arabia. They are said to make up more thanhalf the workforce, filling manual, clerical and service jobs.

Hurling rocks: Ethiopia’s ambassador in Riyadh, Muhammed Hassan Kabiera, said the embassy had been informed by Saudi officials that some23,000 Ethiopians had so far handed themselves in. Some of them have already been repatriated, with the first group arriving in Ethiopia’s capital,Addis Ababa, on Wednesday, reports from Ethiopia say. In renewed clashes on Wednesday in Riyadh’s Manfuhah district, a Sudanese national was killed, Saudi Arabia’s state-owned SPA news agency reports. Illegal migrants “rioted, hurling rocks at passersby and cars”, it quoted police as saying. Many migrants do low-paid jobs in Saudi Arabia Police said they intervened and “controlled” the situation, SPA reports. Manfuhah is home to many migrants, mostly from East Africa. On Sunday, Ethiopia’s ForeignAffairs Minister Tedros Adhanom said he had information that three Ethiopian citizens had been killed in clashes since last week. However, Saudi authorities say two foreigners have been killed, along with three Saudis. Riyadh governor Prince Khaled bin Bandar bin Abdulaziz said the clamp down was aimed at illegal migrants, and not any “specific group”. “We will continue these campaigns until we ensure all residents in our country are staying legally,” he is quoted by al-Riyadh newspaper as saying. Earlier this month, the authorities began rounding up the migrantsfollowing the expiry of a seven-month amnesty for them to formalise theirstatus. Nearly a million Bangladeshis, Indians, Filipinos, Nepalis, Pakistanis and Yemenis are estimated to have left the country in the past three months. More than 30,000 Yemenis have reportedly crossed to theirhome country in the past two weeks. Four million other migrants obtainedwork permits before the deadline expired.

Savagery against Ethiopians: Shame on you Saudis and Khalid bin Sultan'

PERSPECTIVE: By Tecola W. Hagos (November 14, 2013) If anyone doubts the subhuman status of Saudis, the events of three days ago, which is still in process, leaves no rooms for such doubts. The Saudi Government sanctioned brutality against Ethiopians, irrespective of their visa status, is barbaric and beyond any legal justification. I watched a video of four or five uniformed Saudi men in army fatigue brutally attacking two Ethiopians in separate events in what seems to be a garage.There was no provocation or resistance from the Ethiopians they were justsimply brutally attacked dashed on a concrete floor, even being pulverizedwith a mounted tire and possibly murdered. What is the point in such barbarity? I ask the abominable subhuman Saudis to explain their barbaricand murderous acts. By contrast during that same period when Saudis and their savage Government were brutalizing defenseless Ethiopians, TheJerusalem Post by coincidence was championing the rights of immigrants (Ethiopian-Israelis) for equal treatment and urging all Israelis to live in harmony with the people that are not from within the community. Israel too has as many illegal immigrants in ratio to its population as Saudi Arabia and other Arab States, but Israel as a people will never act in such subhuman manner as the Saudis, for Jews are a moral people unlike Saudis whose moral content is no better than that of an amoeba. What a contrast between a civilized people like Israelis and a savage and barbaric people like the Saudis.

Of course, we must read the subtext in all this sudden unprecedented level of violence against a helpless group of people by Saudis and their Government. It is to be recalled a few months back the so called "Prince" more appropriately Pantagruel Khalid bin Sultan was raving and ranting about Ethiopia being a threat to Egypt because of the construction of the Great Renaissance Dam. I believe it is this same group of individuals that are behind the present brutality of the Saudi Government. The father of Khalid is Sultan bin Abdul Aziz one of the Seven brothers from the same mother, who is now dead, who was known for his corruption and unstableviolent mind. His sons have inherited that characteristics and are feared and also mistrusted by the rest of the family members of the founder of the dynasty King Abdul Aziz Saud, the real Gargantuan. The present King Abdulla is from a different mother than Sultan and his six brothers. We must see the Sultan branch of the Saudi Dynasty as being rabid and particularly hostile to Ethiopia. We must also recognize the fact that thereis power struggle going on right now within the Saud Family between KingAbdulla and the Khalid bin Sultan group.

We Ethiopians are at war. I urge Ethiopians to drop this illusion that Saudis or other Arabs are our friends. No one in that deranged oil socked filthy area is our friend. The Saudis never contributed to human civilization. Most of the inhabitants of what is now called Saudi Arabia were just scavengers and desert dwellers involved in small time trade supported often with looting and robbery when they could on travelers who happen to be crossing the Negev Desert. It is the Ottoman Turks whobrought to the area some order and a shadow of civilization before they were expelled as part of the Wests check on Ottomans domination in that part of the world. No wonder the Saudis are still savages and barbarians even though they may be driving around in Ferraris or flying in luxury jet liners. None of that is their work product, but the windfall petrodollar, for the sale of oil pumped from fields they claim to be theirs. Even that is done by foreigners. In fact, as far as Ethiopia is a target, things will get worse, for the next step the Arabs will try to cripple Ethiopia's economic growth. All the scheme is to put pressure on the Ethiopian Government togive up its effort to use the Blue Nile water to generate hundreds of millions of dollars of income for Ethiopia in years ahead after the Great Renaissance Dam is completed.

Right now before we do anything else, however, it is imperative that we get all of our people to come home from Saudi Arabia posthaste and from all other Gulf States soon enough. I urge that we all keep records of events from news and videos on the atrocities committed against Ethiopians by Saudis and their Government. Even more so, the Ethiopian Government ought to keep detailed records and oral testimonies from victims. Medical examination of all victims including those raped must be done as soon as possible and all evidentiary material must be saved. In fact, the Ethiopia Government should establish a high caliber task force that will be completely devoted to the task of repatriating Ethiopians immediately and taking up also the task of collecting extensive evidence of the brutality committed by Saudis on Ethiopians. The massive transportation could be done by leasing ocean liners as well as passenger planes. We should not worry about cost at all. A year's gold yield that easily exceed a billion dollar from our gold mines could easily cover all that. I do not think Al'Amoudi will object to that having witnessed all the atrocities committed by his Saudi friends in high places. At the same time,the Ethiopian Government must start sending high level delegations to nations around the world in order to mobilize support for the form of excruciating suffering and humiliation born by thousands of our people in the hands of barbaric Saudis and their savage Government. The EthiopianOrthodox Church, the Islamic Ethiopian Conference, and all other religiousorganizations must participate in exposing the type of crime committed against Ethiopians by Saudis and the Saudi Government.

Right now, the most pressing life and death question is how to bring our brothers and sisters back home from Saudi Arabia. Demonstrations at Saudi Embassies around the world, even though highly appropriate, must not be our sole focus; let us do the intensive campaign through the internet posting videos of the savage beatings of Ethiopians and the life stories of those who are home already. The Ethiopian Government task is multifaceted and complex. I am not at this crisis point blaming or pointingfingers at any Ethiopian official. There will be plenty of time for that later. Instead, I urge all opposition leaders and all organizations to stand up by the side of the Ethiopian victims of Saudi brutality. In doing so, I urge all concerned Ethiopians both in the Diaspora and at home in Ethiopia to refrain from attacking the Ethiopian Government at this point. I urge the Ethiopian Government to add manpower to the task at hand, which is monumental. It must systematically help fully all those who are repatriated. They should be promptly given accommodations in the tens ofthousands available new apartments on a temporary basis. Jobs must be created around the nation to take in those that are brought home. The spirit of Ethiopiawenet must be the guiding light to all. I believe this is theopportune time to make drastic changes in the Ethiopian leadership, especially in our military command structure. Long Live Ethiopia and All ofHer Beloved Children.

Anti-Saudi Protest – Ethio-Americans in US remind the Saudi regime to fight against Al-Qaeda than migrant workers' WASHINGTON, DC (November 15, 2013) - The Saudi regime should fight against Al Qaeda than against innocent migrant workers, a prominent human rights activist said while leading a protest rally here on Thursday. Tamagne Beyene, a US-based human rights activist addressed a protest rally in front of the Saudi Embassy in DC that Ethiopia was home to the First Hijrah that sheltered followers of the Prophet Mohammed who were fleeing religious persecution. Saudi Arabia will pay a price, chanted Tamagne along with a huge crowd of activists, the reference of which may mean Ethiopian migrant workers never deserved the kind of humiliation and punishment from a country which had a unique historical link direclty to the Prophet Mohammed. Fearful for their lives, tens of thousands of Ethiopian workerswere being sheltered in temporary camps in Manfouha district of Riyadh, awaiting repatriation to their native country. The weak and corrupt Hailemariam Desalegn regime remains indifferent to the plight and suffering of the migrant workers who were being hunted down like pests over the week. Video clips showing the brutality of Saudi security forces have gone viral over the Interent, thus fueling the anger of many people around the world whose compatriots were being displaced from Saudi towns with the most dehumanizing ways. Saudi investers have in recent years acquired vast tracts of agricultural land in southern Ethiopia. They plan to meet the rice needs of the kingdom from their Ethiopia harvest alone. But given the deepening animosity of the Saudis against Ethiopians, their dream for agricultural bonanza from the lush green tractsof land of may turn into a nightmare.

Arrests at anti-Saudi protest in Ethiopia’

Police crackdown on demonstrations against targeted attacks on Ethiopianmigrant workers in Saudi Arabia.

Aljazeera AFRICA (November 15, 2013) - One protester, Asfaw Michael, who was beaten, said he did not understand why Ethiopia wanted to shieldSaudi Arabia from the protest. According to the Ethiopian government, three Ethiopians were killed last week in Saudi Arabia in clashes with police. Saudi authorities are in the process of repatriating at least 23,000 illegal immigrants from Ethiopia. "The police came and they beat us...and now more than 100 people are at the police station," said Getaneh Balcha,a senior member of the opposition Blue Party movement, adding the partychairman and vice chairman were among those held. The government saidprotesters did not have a permit to demonstrate and confirmed that arrests had been made, but did not say how many. "It was an illegal demonstration, they had not got a permit from the appropriate office," Shimeles Kemal, a government spokesman, told the AFP news agency, adding charges could be brought against the organisers. "They were fomenting anti-Arab sentiments here among Ethiopians ... the demonstration itself was illicit, so the police took measures and apprehended some," he said. Many foreign workers in Saudi Arabia are fleeing or are under arrest amid a crackdown on the kingdom's nine million migrant labourers. Close to 500 Ethiopians have been repatriated. Last weekend, Saudi residents fought with Ethiopians and a video emerged of a crowd dragging an Ethiopian from his house and beating him. The security sweep in Saudi Arabia comes after seven months of warnings by the government, which has created a task force of 1,200 Labour Ministry officials who are combing shops, construction sites, restaurants and businesses in search of foreign workers employed withoutproper permits. More than 16,000 people have already been rounded up, according to authorities.

Saudi Embassy in Stokholm denies the crimes against Ethiopians’

STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN (November 16, 2013) Saudi Embassy in Sweden denies the killings, beatings and rape that is currently undergoing againstEthiopians. In its response to the letter ENTC sent, the embassy said thatit is just following international laws in executing the immigration reform law in its country. Thank you for your email. The Embassy would like to clarify to you that there were no killings, rapings or beatings of Ethiopiansin Riyadh. The Saudis always appreciate Ethiopian participation and thereare numerous Ethiopians who are currently enjoying working in Saudi Arabia and who have never been subjected to any harm. However, we would like to point out the following in this regard. A) The government’s intentions are to streamline their legal status in Saudi Arabia in order to ensure the adherence of their residency to the laws and regulations that organize foreign residents in Saudi Arabia. B) The aim of applying laws and regulations is to safeguard the rights and obligations of all foreign labor alike, without targeting any specific foreign labor from any country, nationality or ethnicity. Such action is in accordance with national and international agreements and rules that protect the rights and obligations of foreign labor working in Saudi Arabia. Furthermore, the Saudi authorities gave all illegal aliens in the country a several months deadline to correct their illegal status in the Kingdom. D) We would like to assure you and the Ethiopian Community here in Stockholm through you that the Government of Saudi Arabia is keen at respecting national and international rules and agreements that protect foreign laborcurrently working in Saudi Arabia. Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia are facing unspeakable horrors'

News Analysis: For the past few years, there has been systematic persecution of Ethiopians living, working and seeking refuge in Saudi Arabia. Even Ethiopians practicing their faith in the complete privacy of their homes have faced criminal prosecution and deportation. In 2011, according to a Human Rights Watch report, Saudi police arrested "thirty five Ethiopian Christians for 'illicit mingling,'" while the "Ethiopians gathered to pray together during the advent of Christmas, in the private home of one of the Ethiopians." It is no exaggeration to say it is open season on Ethiopian migrant workers and others seeking refuge in Saudi Arabia. Every day this month, Saudi police, security officials and ordinary Saudis have been hunting Ethiopians in the streets, beating, torturing andin some cases killing them. The video clips of Saudi police torturing Ethiopians are shocking to the conscience. The video clips of Saudi mobs chasing, attacking and lynching Ethiopians in the streets requires no explanation. The photographs of crime against humanity committed against Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia today are surreal and beyond civilized comprehension!!!

What's the regime in Ethiopia doing to help the estimated 300,000 plusEthiopians in Saudi Arabia?

Commentary: Not a damn thing! By its own admission, the regime has noidea how many Ethiopians are living in Saudi Arabia, but ludicrously promises to bring them all back "as soon as possible." The malaria researcher-turned-"foreign minister", Tedros Adhanom, blathered that hisregime "has condemned Saudi Arabia for its brutal crackdown on migrantworkers in the kingdom. This is unacceptable. We call on the Saudi government to investigate this issue seriously. We are also happy to takeour citizens, who should be treated with dignity while they are there." "Unacceptable" is the most condemnatory language the regime could muster in the face of such monstrous cruelty, unspeakable barbarism and horrendous brutality and criminality. Al Jazeera reported that when outraged Ethiopians sought to peacefully protest in front of the Saudi embassy in Addis Ababa, they were arrested and beaten by regime policemen. "'The police came and they beat us…and now more than 100 people are at the police station," said Getaneh Balcha, a senior member ofthe opposition Blue Party movement, adding the party chairman and vice chairman were among those held.'" But should we really be surprised because…

Ethiopia: Addis Ababa Has Won a Name for Itself As an International'

Addis Fortune, Addis Ababa (November 17, 2013) Addis Ababa has won aname for itself as an international conferencing destination. From the 3,000-delegates who met last week to discuss family planning, to the annual summits of the African Union (AU) heads of state, the political capital of Africa finds itself being extremely busy. Indeed, it now hosts thousands of people almost every other week.

Addis Ababans have good reason to feel proud at having a city that boasts the fourth largest presence of diplomatic corps, following New York, Washington DC and Brussels, claims gossip. Hosting close to 25 UN agencies, with their army of employees bordering on 3,000, Addis Abeba's attraction as an international conference city has seen the arrival of celebrities and prominent internationally personalities, gossip observed. Take, for instance, the pop star from the band U2, Paul D. Hewson, aka Bono, who came here to attend the Mo Ibrahim Foundation's annual leadership eventtwo weeks ago. He irked some of his Ethiopian fans who are vocal in the social media circle, after making some positive remarks on how much he was impressed by the progress Ethiopia had made.

Meeting Prime Minister Hailemarmaim Desalegn, he acknowledged Ethiopia's success in the provision of social services in community health and changing the lives of farmers. He went to the extent of suggesting other African countries should emulate Ethiopia's growth policies and strategies. He displeased those who are active in voicing their dissent in the virtual world of Facebook and Twitter, gossip observed.

Interestingly, there is yet another rabble-rouser personality who is rumoured to be setting foot in Addis Abeba soon, gossip learnt. The European leftist politician from Portugal, Ana Gomez, has applied for a visa to come to Addis Abeba in order to participate in the EU-ACP summit to be held here next week.

Lady Gomez has remained famous or infamous - depending who refers to her - in Ethiopia's contemporary politics since her role as chief of the EU's team of election observers in the 2005 national elections.Known to have sided with the main opposition coalition, the CUD and one of its leaders now in exile, in the end she provoked perhaps the longest "letters to the editor" rebuttal ever published in the history of newspapers,by the late Meles Zenawi, which appeared in The Ethiopian Herald, a daily newspaper.

The summit will be a three-day event, where members of parliament fromthe EU, and the Africa, Caribbean and Pacific (ACP) countries will congregate to discuss politics, trade and goals set in the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs). There will be breakout sessions, where Ethiopia's policies on housing provision and employment opportunities for youth and women will be talked about. Co-chairs of the EU joint parliamentary assembly, Louis Michel and Joyce Laboso, and their delegates are scheduled to privately engage Ethiopian authorities over thelatter's program of a green economy. A spokeswoman of foreign affairs forthe Group of the Progressive Alliance of Socialist & Democrats (S&D) in the European Parliament, Lady Gomez's inclusion in this private meeting isyet to be confirmed, gossip disclosed. Nonetheless, the possibility of her presence across the aisle in a conference room where Hailemariam and Abadula Gemeda, speaker of the House, are to address the delegates, appears to be within the bounds of possibility, claims gossip. EU Commission leaders in Brussels placed their official request for a visa on behalf of Lady Gomez last week, gossip disclosed. After what was described as a long pause, Brehane G. Kirstos, state minister for Foreign Affairs, who is quite familiar with Lady Gomez, while serving as an ambassador in Brussels, granted permission for her travel to Addis Abeba,gossip revealed. Ethiopian authorities wanted to neutralise what they see as a plot devised by Lady Gomez, in which she may have hoped that her visa application was declined, and thus create cause for hue and cry, claims gossip.

Saudi Arabia: The kingdom of shame’

PERSPECTIVE: (November 18, 2013) By Tedla Asfaw - The largest crowd in recent years, New York City Ethiopian protest rally, estimated in few hundreds shouted in a mild Monday, Nov.18., " Shame on King Abdullah, Shame on Saudi Arabia", the cry on First Avenue in front of the Saudi Arabia Mission to UN at 809 Plaza echoed from 3pm to 5pm. In the morning the mission was contacted by phone to send their representativesdown to our rally. The office told us that the Ambassador had received a letter that was handed to him on Nov.13 and his government has taken the "appropriate action" as was demanded on two letters for King Abdullahand the Saudi Ambassador, to stop the killing, raping, beating of Ethiopians. We know for sure that the attack against Ethiopians has not stopped. Deaths are still reported. The crowd wanted to send that warningloud and clear to the Saudi Mission and chanted, "Stop the raping. the killing ,the beating and looting of Ethiopians". The Saudi Embassies all over the world has a Public Relation problem in addressing protests. May be they are not accustomed to it. In the last week or today alone I am notsure if they ever sent their representatives to talk to protesters. New York was not different.

"Saudi is a Terrorist", "How comes you forget the First Hijrah", "Was it notEthiopia that received the persecuted Prophet Mohammed followers ",

"Shame on Saudi Arabia, Shame, Shame, Shame". College students of theCity of New York who called the protest on Facebook most of them womenwere very emotional on what happened to fellow Ethiopian sisters and brothers. They took the microphone one after another to say slogans that they deeply care. They said, "Where is human rights", "We demand justice", "Shame on Western medias" for downplaying the humanitarian crisis in the Ethiopian Community in Saudi as a "Immigration crackdown". It was not an ordinary "Crackdown". It was deportation by rape, killing and looting targeting Ethiopian neighborhood in Saudi Arabia. Our community now is segregated in a camp similar to concentration camp.

Due to Diaspora pressure and the protest back home the Governor ofRiyadh was forced to visit one of those camps to repair the damage. Damage has already been done. The protesters demanded " Send Ethiopians home to their families immediately".

Poems and letter from one of the organizers Weizero Zewdetu addressed to the Ambassador was read. Religious leader brought the story EthiopianKing Kaleb who went to war into Arabia to fight another Christian King who was persecuting Muslims. He said the King of Saudi Arabia in our time is allowing the sons and daughters of that benevolent king to be murdered and raped on his soil. Shame on King Abdullah !!!! Shame on him !!! Fellow New Yorkers have indeed stood with fellow Ethiopians who have been in harms way for almost two weeks in Saudi Arabia like fellow Ethiopians all over the world. They promised to keep the pressure on Saudi Regime to protect all Ethiopians who are now treated as enemy in Saudi soil. Each life lost they will pay for it dearly. Allah has sent the firstpunishment by heavy rain and flooding few days ago in Saudi Arabia. Thecry of our people was heard by God !!!

Make no mistake this is not about being legal or illegal immigrant issue like the Saudi and the Western media is playing. The issue is being Habesha/Ethiopian is a crime. We are worried for the safety of our people especially the house maids who are abused by their employers. The Arab news is full of stories of Ethiopians maids as "dangerous". The truth is thatthey are living in danger with no one protecting them. The Woyane regimethat shipped these women as "commodity" do not care about them.The regime is on the side of the abusers. Many countries are checking on theircitizens in Saudi Arabia. Woyane Regime is the reason why our people aretargeted for vicious attack for the last two weeks alone. Saudis know that Woyane is their strong ally. The Last Friday rally organized by the Blue Party in Addis Ababa in front of the Saudi Embassy was dispersed by the Woyane security once again to prove that "solidarity with Saudi". Another rally was not even allowed to start last Sunday organized by MEDREK. Theslogan in Addis Ababa in front of the Saudi Embassy said it loud and clear "Saudi companies should leave Ethiopia". We added another slogan on to that, "Saudi Citizens to leave Ethiopia immediately". Saudi Arabia citizens should not enjoy the good weather of our country. No more harvesting a single crop.No more fresh tomatoes and vegetables every Wednesday.Say

No to Saudi Arabia in Ethiopia. The Woyane regime can not guarantee anysafety for them. Ethiopians are Very Angry. We want the Shameful Kingdom to get the message and Get out of Ethiopia !!!!

Ethiopians back from Saudi Arabia recall beatings, robbery, jail'

(AFP) ADDIS ABABA: When Abdallah Awele moved to Saudi Arabia from Ethiopia last year, he thought he would land a good job and earn enough money to send home to his family. But instead, Abdallah, 21, said he was beaten, robbed and jailed for living in the country illegally "I wanted a good salary and a good life, that's why I crossed the border," he said. "When I was in Saudi Arabia, I was successful, I was saving a lot of money and I had nice things. But I lost all of it. Now I am home and I won't go back there." Abdallah was one of at least 23,000 Ethiopians living illegally in Saudi Arabia, and part of a group of close to 400 flown home on Friday after being expelled. According to Ethiopian officials, threeof their nationals were killed this month in clashes with Saudi police as theclampdown — set in motion after a seven-month amnesty period expired — got under way. "I had 3,500 Saudi Arabian riyals (930 dollars, 690 euros). We were taken to prison, I lost my luggage, and all of my money was collected by the police," Abdallah said. "Even my shoes were collectedby the police," he said, speaking barefoot after leaving the airport with about 30 other men. Abdullah, who had a job guarding animals, was jailedfor six months — during which he said he was denied food and medical help. "There is a lot of unhappiness in there," he said, showing off scars on the back of his neck. Facing limited job prospects and harsh economic realities back home, large numbers of Ethiopian men and women head to the oil- and gas-rich Arabian peninsula every year seeking work. The International Labour Organisation said many face physical and mental abuse, menial pay, discrimination and poor working conditions, and the Ethiopian government announced last month it was banning domestic workers from travelling to the Middle East to look for jobs after widespread reports of mistreatment.

Saudi Arabia capital hit with rare floods, at least 18 dead, 4 missing, residents urged to stay indoors' RT - Severe flooding is being reported in Saudi Arabia, especially in the kingdom's capital of Riyadh, with the government closing schools and urging people to stay indoors amid heavyrain. Flooding is rare in the country dominated by the Arabian Desert.

The tragic saga of Ethiopians in Arab lands'

PERSPECTIVE: (November 19, 2013) By Neamin Zeleke - In the pastweek, Ethiopians all over the world have watched the barbaric acts committed against our sisters and brothers in Saudi Arabia with deep sorrow and outrage. These inhuman acts are not committed by illegal bandits or criminals operating in the underground, they are committed in broad daylight by the Saudi security forces and government backed youthvigilante. Defenseless Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia continue to face randomkillings, gang rape, severe beatings, and mass arrest by brutal government forces and government supported mobs. There are an array of irrefutable evidences of the Saudi government's brutality, utter disregard for the rule of law, and common human decency. Video images and eye-witness testimonies confirm Saudi Arabians have employed extensive use of torture. These acts of gross human and civil rights violations call for an investigation by the United Nations and Internationalrights groups' into the full extent of the horrific crime committed by the Saudis. The plight of our brothers and sisters in Saudi Arabia begs the question of why so many Ethiopians are forced to flee their country in thefirst place. Why are millions of Ethiopians suffering around the world as helpless refugees, undocumented aliens, and, in many cases, beggars? What relegated Ethiopians to live a life of second-class, even third class citizens around the world is nothing but the repression, discrimination, and brutality they face in their own country in the hands of an ethnocraticregime well -equipped with the tools and arsenals of repression.

Millions are forced each day to choose between a wretched existence at home and uncertain search for hope in a strange land. Fed to the brutal whips of the unscrupulous and racist slave drivers in Saudi Arabia by theirown government, Ethiopians cannot look for their leaders at home to come to their aid. To those unwitting sympathizers of the criminal regime in Ethiopia, the continuing suffering of helpless Ethiopians at the hands of racist Arabs should come as a wake up call. We should not only blame theperpetrators of the crime; we must also hold accountable those who madelife unbearable at home for millions of Ethiopians. A government that demonstrates no concern for the suffering of its people that it systematically drives to a life of exile, servitude and inhuman treatment should be held accountable, condemned, and ultimately removed. Today the blood of innocent Ethiopians colors Arab streets. Let there be no doubtthat their blood will not be spilled in vain. This tragedy should serve as a cause for action and for redemption. It is a call for action for those of us inthe Diaspora and back home, who have served as apologists for the criminal regime, trading the time-honored Ethiopian pride and patriotism for petty material gains.

Today, Ethiopia is a country that is ruled by corrupt despots who have utter disregard for basic human rights. They are thugs that have no allegiance to the flag and depraved souls without an iota of national and patriotic ethos. The sacred and time honored ethos that were protected bythe blood and sweat of generations of Ethiopian compatriots are being replaced by the callous deeds of morally debauched thugs who have condemned millions to a life of abject poverty, ignorance, disease and abysmal sense of hopelessness. For those who have paid attention to the reality in Ethiopia, it is abundantly clear that the dehumanization and humiliation of our brothers and sisters in Saudi Arabia did not begin on Saudi streets. Many found themselves facing the brutality of the Saudi police after being forced to leave their country because of a similar formof brutality at home. The fact is that most young Ethiopians, besides facing high rate of unemployment, are subject to some of the most serious rights abuses, including extrajudicial killings, incommunicado detention, arbitrary arrest, torture, and inhumane prison conditions in Ethiopia.

The criminal regime, which has incarcerated genuine Ethiopians such Eskinder Nega, Bekele Gerba, Andualem Arage, Reyot Alemu and thousands of others, has institutionalized corruption as a means of controlling the greedy professionals. The ethnocentric tyrants lead lavish lifestyles, while millions suffer under extreme repression and lack of basic necessities. Members of the ruling ethnocentric thugs and their cohorts travel to watch a Premier League game in England, to shop at expensive boutiques in the fashion capitals of the world, or to visit a doctor in Bangkok for minor ailments, while tens and thousands are fleeing their birthplaces in search of a better life in Arab lands. When these Ethiopians who flee their country in search of hope and opportunities face inhuman treatment, including dismemberment and death, the so called governmentshamefully apologizes to the criminal Saudis who committed the atrocitiesin the first place. Credible accounts have demonstrated that the ethnic- based thugs in power have embezzled billions of dollars that they have secured in the form of aid and loans from donor nations and organizations. According to a recent report, in the past few years alone, the criminal regime has borrowed over 16 billion dollars in the name of the people of Ethiopia, and has looted the vast percentage of the money.

The fraction of the loan and donation spent on sub-standard construction projects littering the country and paraded as “Development”, has trickled to the lackeys who serve as subcontractors of the Endowment Fund for the Rehabilitation of Tigray (EFFORT) and other financial outfits of the regime. Greedy professionals, including many medical doctors, engineers and even professors, are shamelessly bowing to these criminals in their despicable effort to be the recipients of the loot. It’s no wonder, then, that thousands of our brothers and sisters risk their lives to travel to foreign lands just to be able to feed themselves and their families. The regime’s response to the onslaught against its people in Saudi Arabia has added insult to injury. Instead of demanding redress for the Ethiopian victims in a visible and public way, the officials of the thugs in power in Addis Ababadid not waste time to use the horrific tragedy committed against Ethiopians in Riyadh to beg for money from the Saudi government in different forms of appeasements and apologies. Ethiopians must unite against the unscrupulous and decadent ethnocentric dictatorship that has condemned its citizens to a life of misery, dehumanization, repression both at home and in exile. We must hold those in power responsible for the tragic predicaments of our fellow citizens in Arab lands. The ultimate remedy, therefore, is for all Ethiopians to unite in common cause to bring about freedom, democracy, hope and all the requisite social and economicconditions to lead a free and dignified life in our homeland.

London: Ethiopians come in force against Saudi crimes'

EM PERSPECTIVE (November 19, 2013) By Wondimu Makonnen - Ethiopians are protesting in thousands against the ongoing murder of ourmen and gang rape of our women, incarceration of our brothers and sisters in subhuman and degrading conditions by Saudi authorities throughout the main cities of the world. London is not an exception, except that the turnout has not been witnessed anywhere in the world!

Hundreds of metropolitan police in yellow reflective force failed to contain thousands of protesters, therefore a special force in black, armed to the teeth in riot gears, took over to manage the crowed and protect the Embassy of Saudi Arabia from angry and outraged Ethiopians. Today's demonstration is unprecedented. According to a friend who had a good view from a higher platform, four to five thousand strong men and womenturned up at the Saudi Arabian Embassy. Ethiopians put aside their petty differences for the first time in years and came out as one to voice for the23,000 or so voiceless Ethiopians stranded in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Political differences did not matter. There were Ginbot 7, Andinet, Southerners, EPRP, AEUP, civic organisations and so on. Religious differences did not a priest and a sheikh stood side by side. There were Orthodox Christians, Catholics, Protestants, Muslims, Jewish and others.

Ethnic difference was not an issue. There were Amharas, Oromos, Guraghes, Tigres, Hadiyas, Kambatas, Harraris and all representatives the80 ethnic groups were glued together as Ethiopians. Ethiopians are obviously outraged by what had happened in Saudi Arabia to their brothers and sisters. There is a common cause to stand together. The SOScall from Saudi Arabia was too loud to ignore! London Ethiopians made their point! They demanded to stop the murder and rape of Ethiopians.

Ethiopians demanded that the Saudi Government instruct its Police force to stop brutality against Ethiopian migrants. The Saudi Police were not only breaking into houses of all Ethiopians, whether they had residence permit or not, but summarily rounding up, beating up and killing in cold blood. In one gruesome video, there is an incident where an Ethiopian man was beaten up, forced to carry tyres and set alight to burn alive. Whowould expect such savagery in 21 century? This brutality has been witnessed by somebody who was video-taping the whole incidence and shared. Once the men are rounded up, the women are left for the Arab Youth gang called "Shababs" to take the women and gang rape them, at the watchful eyes of the Saudi police. This is a disgrace! This is national humiliation for Ethiopians. This is something Ethiopians could not step aside and ignore. That was what brought them united. An Orthodox Priest,Kesis Berhanu Bisrat encouraged Ethiopians to stand together and voice for the voiceless. He led prayers for the victims. A Muslim brother electrified the crowed with a very uplifting speech touching on everyone'sheart, stressing on our past glory, the kindness of Ethiopians, who took inpersecuted Muslim immigrants from the First Hijira, brutalised Greeks andArmenians. He questioned the Saudi Arabians, if that was the reward we deserved, for the charity Ethiopians showed to the Muslims, to preserve the faith that the Saudi Kings claim today to be protector of Islam. The Muslims of Ethiopia are outraged by what had happened to our brothers and sisters in Saudi Arabia. He stressed on the unity of our people, whatever happens, as at any time in our history and concluded, with "Allahu Akbar!" The crowed repeated after him. The Police escorted representatives of the demonstrators inside the compound to handover a protest letter to the Saudi Arabian Embassy. They were reluctant at first to receive the letter as civilized members of the world. However, one wayor another the letter was delivered. In the meantime, the actions of the regime in Ethiopia are shameful. As if the regime's crackdown on Samayawi Party protesters at the Saudi Embassy in Addis Ababa last week was not shame enough, the regime is attempting to cash on the misfortune of our brothers and sisters in Saudi Arabia. It has shut down its Embassy in Riyadh for the last four days providing no services at all, so that it would gain an opportunity to milk the international community for hard currency with an excuse to repatriate the Ethiopians. The Saudi's are ready to transport Ethiopians, but reports reaching us reveal that the regime in Ethiopia is deliberately avoiding processing travel documents, with the lame excuse of difficulty toprove victims' Ethiopian identity. God! Can't the regime tell Ethiopians from the rest of the other nations? Had there been any trace of Ethiopian DNA left in the blood stream of traitors, the brutal action of Saudi Arabia would have enraged them, and forced them to scramble on bringing hometheir citizens safe. It hurts to hear that the regime blurting "Saudi Arabians have the right to deal with the illegal immigrants!" We all know they came to power with Saudi dollars, but defending the Saudi action is unforgiveable crime in our history. Excuse me! What kind of government on earth would justify the gang rape of its citizen women by Arab gangsters, murdering of men and incarceration of thousands in such degrading conditions as the right the Saudi Arabians? Instead, maliciously,it organised its few supporters in London and sent them to 10 Downing Street yesterday, Saturday 17th November 2013, to demand that the British government help the regime with cash so that it would bring home its citizens from Saudi Arabia.

The blood of Ethiopians cries out for justice'

newint.org (November 20, 2013) By Chris Matthews Cries of 'shame on you' rang around Curzon Street in London on 18 November as more than300 [Report from police indicates there were four to five thousand demonistrators] Ethiopians gathered outside the Saudi Arabian Embassy to protest against the treatment of migrant workers in the country. Waving flags, singing in unison and holding placards adorned with slogansdemanding action – ‘The blood of Ethiopians cries out for justice’, ‘Stop the torture’ and ‘Being poor is not a crime’ – hundreds of London’s Ethiopian diaspora crowded the usually busy west London street. The protest, in response to Saudi authorities clampdown on migrant workers, came after several migrants, including at least two Ethiopian nationals, were killed during violent clashes with security forces in the oil-rich Gulf State last week. Sunday 3 November saw an end to a seven-month amnesty demanding that all migrant workers without legal status in the country be deported, resulting in the mass demonstrations and riots seenacross the country and in the capital Riyadh. Saudi Arabia is home to an estimated nine million migrants workers, many from Ethiopia and neighbouring East African nations, and authorities argue that the clampdown will reduce growing unemployment levels among Saudi nationals.

However, there are widespread accusations of abuse towards migrant workers in the Kingdom, with numerous reports of murder, rape and torture against members of the foreign population. Zelealam Tesdema, one of the organizers of the London protest, urged the Saudi Arabian government to take action and called for those responsible for such acts to be brought to justice. ‘This protest is part of a global movement to stopthe brutality, the rape and the murder of migrant workers. The government needs to stop the violence and bring the security forces and authorities to justice,’ Zelealam Tesdema said. As numbers swelled and voices became louder and more fervent, a police cordon formed in front ofthe protesters, barring any advances to the gates of the Saudi Arabian embassy. Zelealam Tesdema said it was vital people had the opportunity to ‘voice their concerns’. A petition calling on the ‘Saudi government to stop the brutal and inhumane treatment’ of Ethiopians was delivered to the embassy. More than 23,000 Ethiopians, who were living illegally in Saudi Arabia, have now surrendered to officials there, and the Ethiopian government has already started repatriating those ordered to leave the country. The UN Refugee Agency said that in excess of 51,000 Ethiopians have made the journey across the Gulf of Aden this year alone. Another ofthe protest’s organizers, Bekele Woyecha, who has lived in London for six years, fears that many of those on return flights to the capital Addis Ababa will now be left with nothing. ‘A lot of people who left Ethiopia in the first place were doing so because of economic or political problems and so for them returning it will be difficult. These people have nothing now – the authorities in Saudi Arabia have taken everything that they have.’

In a country where labour laws are routinely abandoned and workers’ rights systematically ignored – highlighted by images of maltreatment against migrants circulating online in recent days – an environment of abuse has festered and Adam Coogle, Middle-East Researcher for Human Rights Watch, believes such malpractice is likely to continue. ‘Many migrant workers are unaware of the official rights available to them. SaudiArabia will still be dependent on migrant workers for many years to come

− the labour laws provide conditions in which abuses can take place.’ Thelarge number of undocumented workers in the country has created a vastunder-the-table economy and Coogle says that many employers have ‘complete power’ over migrant workers, often confiscating travel documents and preventing workers from changing jobs once they begin working for an employer. And although such treatment of migrants is a problem not unique to the Arabian Peninsula, the tragic events of recent weeks have a shone an alarming light on the darkness that pervades in the country. The protest on the streets of London has helped bring awareness to the human rights violations and ongoing plight of migrant workers within the Saudi state a little more into focus.

Retaliation to carnage on Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia’Inexcusable heinous crimes of Saudi authorities

EMF PERSPECTIVE (November 20, 2013) By Robele Ababya: The obnoxious shocking news of the spate of barbaric attacks, murders, gang raping, and humiliation inflicted on Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia has opened a floodgate of outrage, fury and revulsion on an unprecedented scale by fellow citizens at home and in the Diaspora against the perpetrators of theheinous crimes. This is a deep rooted contempt and hatred of Ethiopia by Arab slave traders. This barbaric act demands national response to the corrupt Saudi Royal Family. And that response should be equivalent to those made against foreign aggressors in the course of our long history because successive Kingdoms of Saudi Arabia have been working for the demise of our motherland Ethiopia. They have been acting in violation of the edict of Prophet Mohammed in the Holy Quran directing Muslims underpersecution in Arabia to seek refuge in Ethiopia where they will find solace, which solace they were granted by a Christian King. It was, is today, and shall be the will of the Almighty God that Judaism, Christianity,and Islam lived, now live, and shall live in Ethiopia in relative harmony as a shining example to the world beset by religious rancor. The gruesome crimes inflicted by the security forces of Saudi Arabia in full view and endorsement of top officials of the Kingdom constitute national shame to Ethiopians and therefore must be met with resolute and effective responseso that the contemptuous act of evil on fellow Ethiopian citizens will never happen again. We owe this much and more to our Martyrs who gave their lives, shed their blood and suffered humiliation on the soil of Saudi Arabia.This response has to be done with full knowledge of the historically long ambition of the Saudi Kingdom to put Ethiopia under its influence with theaim to controlling her eventually.

The reclusive, exclusive and divisive TPLF thugs captured the helm of power by deception, stealing aid meant for victims of drought in Tigray.

Their refined method of clinging to power with evil deeds is continuing to this date when the Ethiopian people are trapped in abject poverty. The colossal damage done by the TPLF thugs catapulted to power with the support of foreign powers is incalculable. Democracy is dying in donor- financed lawless Ethiopia in full view of some Western leaders squanderingtaxpayers' money while propping up tyrants who intimidate, torture and kill innocent Ethiopian citizens with impunity. So, Ethiopians have every right to heed what President Lincoln had underlined by this famous quotation: "This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing government, they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it, or their revolutionary right to dismember or overthrow it."

Emperor Haile Selassie gave up His power peacefully in September, 1974;it would be foolhardy to expect the brutal regime to do likewise easily; theshort lived peaceful change through democratic election in 2005 was snatched by force. Emulating the example of the successes of civil rights movements spearheaded by Mahatma Gandhi, Martin Luther King is farfetched given the monopoly of all pillars of democracy by the ruling thugs. Therefore, the TPLF occupying regime is Ethiopia's number one enemy that has revealed its true color of partnering with Saudi Arabia beyond doubt in destroying Ethiopia. It is therefore reasonable to concludethat genuine Ethiopians have every right to retaliate in self-defense with all means at their disposal to save their country and independence.

Retaliation to the carnage on Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia is a justified nobleact of the moment. The formation of the Global Alliance for the Rights of Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia is a most welcome bright beacon of hope for ushering in democratic change; it would prove to become a formidable force in coordinating and guiding the mammoth task of retaliation to the beastly act of the Saudi Kingdom and beyond any reasonable doubt, its accomplice the TPLF regime.

One country, Ethiopia; one person one vote!

It is recorded in history that the Kushite Kingdom with its capital at Meroepersisted until the 4th century AD, when it weakened and disintegrated due to internal rebellion. By 1st century AD The Kushite capital was subsequently captured by the Beja Dynasty, who tried to revive the empire. The Kushite capital was eventually captured and burnt to the ground by the Kingdom of Axum. Source: Google Ethiopian History

We Ethiopians are a mixture of Kushites and Semites, descendants of Kush and Shem. Ethiopia's present population is 91 million comprising about 83ethnic groups all of them originating from the descendants of two of the three sons of Noah – Japheth, Shem, & Ham. Kush is the eldest son of Ham or grandson of Noah who survived the Great Flood, vide Book of Genesis chapter 6. Moreover we are a mixed race intermarried over centuries. Our earliest civilization is indigenous starting with the Kushite Kingdom in the far north of our country, Ethiopia. This explains in my opinion the nature of our distinct mindset of spontaneously rising to external threats which endanger affecting our common values deeply seated in our hearts. It is time to make full use of our unique spontaneousreaction against our common external enemy which in this case is the corrupt Royal Family of Saudi Arabia.

Inspiring lessons from the past for future action:

1. The Great Leader, Emperor Menilik II, rallied the Ethiopian people with the clarion call to rise up against the aggressor in order to defend the honor of their wives and sanctity of their private property including land. The wise Monarch knew and upheld that the honor of Ethiopian ladies andprivate land ownership were inviolable sacred core values of our ancestorsat the time. The genius leader was thus able to mobilize huge volunteer militia forces from all corners of Ethiopia that dealt a humiliating defeat tothe Italian aggressor. Ethiopia was recognized as an independent country by the imperialist European powers scrambling for colonializing the Africancontinent.

2. Emperor Haile Selassie I was also able to mobilize huge but poorly equipped militia fighting forces from all over Ethiopia. According to Parlesak (vide Habešská Odyssea (YeHabesha Jebdu) የሃበሻ ጀብዱ by Adolf Parlesak Translated by Techane Jobre Mekonnen) the Monarch lost victoryin the last minute due to hitherto unexplained betrayal attributed to the Raya Oromos in Tigray. Fascist Mussolini's invasion in revenge 40 years later in 1935 after the Battle of Adwa culminated in untold carnage on patriotic Ethiopians fighting for their freedom and independence of their beloved country. His Majesty went into exile to continue with His struggleas Head of State while Ethiopian patriots at home engaged the Fascist occupier in guerrilla warfare, the first of its kind in the African continent. He regained His throne in 1941 with the help of British forces. To the credit of our ancestors, Fascist Italian soldiers taken prisoners were humanely treated at all times. This is a proud legacy of this generation.

3. The Duerg was able to mobilize millions of militia volunteers against aggression by the Somalia Army under Mohammed Siad Barre. The deceptive TPLF regime was able to do likewise during the 1998 – 2000 meaningless fratricidal war between Ethiopia and Eritrea that claimed tensof thousands lives on both sides. .

4. Ethiopia was one of the first four powerful nations along with Persia, Rome, and China, during the Axumite Kingdom bordering Egypt. Emperor Kaleb was in power from 520 AD in the Axumite Kingdom controlling Yemen in the 6th century. A Jewish King around 523 AD named Dhu Nuwas "came to power in Yemen and, announcing that he would kill all the Christians, attacked an Axumite garrison at Zafar, burning the city's churches. He then attacked the Christian stronghold of Narjan slaughtering the Christians who would not convert. Emperor Justin I of the Eastern Roman empire requested his fellow Christian, Kaleb; to help fightNuwas and around 525 Kaleb invaded and defeated Dhu Nuwas, appointing his Christian follower Sumuafa Ashawa as his viceroy." The Monarch did not attack Islamic institutions. Emperor Kaleb had his own naval power in the Red Sea at the time. I saw the ruins of his Palace in Sana, Yemen.

Paragraphs 1 – 4 above confirm the psyche of Ethiopians to come together to counter external threat. The ongoing mammoth demonstrationglobally is a vivid reflection of the legacy of our ancestors in dealing with external threats to their existence as a free people in their land.

Summary

1. Immye Menilik II believed that the dignity of Ethiopia ladies and the right to private property including land is sacrosanct and central to our national values as Ethiopians. Let us enliven that belief to regain our freedom and pride as Ethiopians with cultural diversity. The above photo symbolizes the grief, agony, desperation, and horrendous pain inflicted bythe TPLF security organs of the TPLF/EPRDF regime. It must end. Rampantunemployment of the youth and the suffering of over 80 million peasants in serfdom must end!

2. Rampant Corruption, youth unemployment, monopoly of all pillars of democracy, gross mismanagement of strategic national resources and numerous other treasonous acts will demolish the brutal TPLF regime. Letus hasten the demise of the reprehensible ruling regime.

3. Ethiopians at home and in the Diaspora are showing their unprecedented unity in anger and tears condemning the Kingdom of SaudiArabia and its accomplice the TPLF warlords. This mammoth movement will no doubt continue until Ethiopia is free from TPLF puppet regime. The "Global Alliance for the Rights of Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia" is already playing a commendable leading role in advising Ethiopians on the way forward to combat the heinous crimes of Saudi Arabia and the complicity of the TPLF regime. Help the distinguished trio to which the objectives of the arduous task have been entrusted. To my delight I watched enlightened Eritreans rendered help by demonstrating alongside their Ethiopian brothers and sisters.

4. I implore the security and the defense forces of the TPLF regime to joinand support the invincible popular movement. Emperor Haile Selassie I wisely gaged the mood of the people and gave up his power without a single shot being fired; just about 25 years Dictator Pinochet of Chile succumbed to the referendum results that the people did not want him astheir leader; the General gave up his power without a single bullet being shot. The security and defense forces can do likewise and make history byputting pressure on the corrupt TPLF warlords to relinquish power peacefully without bloodshed. I close this piece with: Calling on the Saudi Kingdom to stop its beastly atrocities on Ethiopians and to fully compensate the martyrs and victims that lost their lives and shed their lives on its soil; and Calling on the TPLF/EPRDF regime to immediately and unconditionally release all prisoners of conscience et al!

Egypt and Ethiopia leaders meet over Nile row’

First talks on Ethiopia's plan to dam the Nile since Egypt's Mansour tookpower end without agreement in Kuwait.

Aljazeera AFRICA (November 21, 2013) - The Egyptian and Ethiopian leaders have met for the first time to discuss tensions over Ethiopia's construction of a huge hydropower dam on the river Nile but the meeting ended without any agreement, sources said. The Egyptian interim president, Adly Mansour, and Ethiopia's prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, met on Tuesday on the sidelines of an Afro-Arab Summit in Kuwait, sources familiar with the meeting told Al Jazeera. It was the first meeting between leaders of the two countries over the Grand RenaissanceDam since the deposed Egyptian president, Mohamed Morsi, met Hailemariam in May. Ethiopia began diverting the Blue Nile in May to buildwhat will be Africa's largest dam when it is finished in 2017. Thirty percentof its construction has already been completed, according to Ethiopia. The hydropower station will have a 6,000-megawatt capacity when finished.

Egypt, almost totally dependent on the river, fears the dam could diminishits water supply. Ethiopia, which hopes the hydropower dam will boost its economy through power exports, has said there will be no major impact.

The sources said the Egyptian side had requested the meeting to "negotiate" over the project but that nothing was agreed. Hailemariam, a source said, rejected a request from Mansour that he be involved in discussons about the project. Colonial-era treaties negotiated by the British gave Egypt and Sudan a majority share of Nile waters. Seven othercountries through which the river flows argue the agreements were unjustand need to be torn up. Egypt’s only current recourse lies with a panel of 10 experts from Egypt, Ethiopia, Sudan and other countries who have been reviewing the social and environmental impact of the dam. The panelhas issued a report about the project's potential impact on water levels, which has not yet been made public. At a one-day meeting in the Sudanese capital Khartoum this month the water ministers of Egypt, Sudan and Ethiopia agreed to form a panel to implement the expert recommendations. But Egyptian objections about the composition of the committee have been delaying its formation, Ethiopia's water minister hassaid. A second round of negotiations is scheduled for Khartoum on December 8.

Perceived insult

Egypt has previously sought to delay the construction of the dam and its requests to inspect it have been rejected by the Ethiopians, who say Egypt needs to relinquish its power to veto projects on the Nile, which it was also given as part of the 1929 and 1959 treaties. Under those agreements, Egypt is entitled to 55.5 billion cubic meters a year, most ofthe Nile's total flow of about 84 billion cubic meters. However, about 85 percent of the river's water originates in the Ethiopian highlands. A new deal signed in 2010 by other Nile Basin countries, including Ethiopia, allows them to work on river projects without Cairo's prior agreement. Egypt has not signed that deal. The meeting on Tuesday, thesources told Al Jazeera, was almost called off because Hailemariam, whois also the current chairman of the African Union, was insulted by a request that he should go to Mansour. The issue was resolved when the leaders ageed to meet halfway - in a corridor.

Saudi Arabia and its labourers – Go home, but who will replace you?

CAIRO Economist print edition: Middle East and Africa: (November 21,2013)

Millions of pious pilgrims flock to Mecca every year, but the Muslim holy city's newest, biggest hotel serves a different clientele. Just months after opening, the Shumeisi Deportation Centre already holds more than 20,000Egyptians, Ethiopians, Indonesians, Yemenis and citizens of other nationalities, nearly half of them women. They will not be there for long.

Nearly all will soon be packed off home, joining an exodus that has seenperhaps one in ten of Saudi Arabia's estimated 9m foreign workers leavethe kingdom in little more than a year. The number awaiting deportationhas swollen dramatically. An amnesty meant to allow migrant workers toconform to new, stricter employment rules expired on November 4th.

Since then, Saudi police have mounted sweeps of worksites and the districts where foreigners live. Thousands have turned themselves in voluntarily, some camped out in public, luggage in hand, awaiting arrest and a free flight home. But others prefer to resist: on November 10th twopeople died when a police raid targeting Ethiopian residents of a slum in Riyadh, the Saudi capital, sparked a minor riot. The campaign has caused other disruptions. Some 6,000 street-cleaners in Mecca, mostly from Bangladesh, mounted a five-day strike to protest against harassment by immigration authorities as well as non-payment of wages and poor working conditions. With much of the kingdom's pool of manual and semi-skilled labour afraid to show up for work, such vital services as water delivery, the pumping out of septic tanks and the washing of bodies for burial have all but halted. Wholesale markets and city souks are operatingat a fraction of normal turnover. A Saudi daily newspaper, al-Medina, saysthat more than half of 200,000 firms registered as building contractors have temporarily closed.

Similar troubles sprouted when the new rules began to be enforced lastspring, prompting the hasty announcement of a seven-month amnesty.But this time the Saudi authorities appear determined to finish the job.

The campaign aims both to regulate the flow of immigration to the oil-richkingdom and to open opportunities for Saudi workers. It comes as part of a long-term drive towards “Saudisation” of the distorted labour market that has included enforced quotas, a ban on foreigners in some professions, and a crackdown on firms that supply imported labour, whichaccounts for two-thirds of the overall workforce, and a far higher proportion in the private sector. All this is meant to lower the kingdom’s unemployment rate, officially 13% but believed to be twice as high amongthe young. Although trimming the foreign workforce will theoretically free up jobs for locals, few Saudis seem likely to seek them, least of all those of the menial kind, which the kingdom’s 19m citizens tend to shun. Still, some economists expect longer-term benefits, as an overall rise in labour costs makes Saudis more attracted to lower-prestige and starting-level jobs, where wages have long been kept down by the abundance of foreignlabour.

Even so, critics of the clampdown assert that similar goals might be achieved with less drastic, police-heavy methods. Many immigrant workers have fallen foul of Saudi laws less by intent than because of the unfairness of the visa-sponsorship system that the kingdom, along with states such as Qatar, continues to impose. This requires every immigrant to have a Saudi kafeel, or sponsor, who usually demands an annual fee inexchange for providing legal cover. All too often, kafeels “employ” their charges in fictitious companies, when in fact they seek work on the open market, in breach of rules that restrict foreign workers to the job described in their visa. Not only is this form of gatekeeping often criminally extortionate. Its scale has created a powerful lobby that has serially resisted attempts at reform. It does not help that generations of Saudis have grown used to being served by a pliant underclass with few rights. Most Saudi families regard foreign servants as a necessity rather than a luxury. Among other things, since women are banned from driving,they must have chauffeurs. Until recently, Saudi labour recruiters boldly advertised the services of reliable and fast-moving Sri Lankan, Sudanese or Filipino workers. Immigration will not be so easy in future; wages are likely to rise. Even so, most Saudis endorse the crackdown. Vigilantes have helped the police round up suspected “illegals”, showing a particulargrudge towards the reputedly rowdy Ethiopians. “I have hired maids fromdifferent nationalities, but I should say Ethiopians are the most arrogant and stubborn ones,” Arwa al-Hilal, a working Saudi mother, is quoted telling the Arab News, an English-language daily. “I did have two Ethiopian maids previously and both of them were too hard to handle andalways spoke back to us, though we paid their wages on time.”

Lady Anna Gomez is coming to Ethiopia’

Awramba Times, Addis Ababa (November 21, 2013) – Ms. Anna Gomez,head of the European Union Election Observation Mission to Ethiopia in May-2005 and member of the European Union Parliament will visit

Ethiopia in the coming few days to participate at the 26th session of the Africa Caribbean Pacific – European Union (ACP-EU) Joint Parliamentary Assembly. Ms. Anna Gomez had been critical to the government of prime minister Meles Zenawi inconnection with the disputed May-2005 Election that resulted in almost 200 people being killed and 30,000 opposition supporters, journalists and civil society leaders detained. Ms. Anna Gomezis considered to be a close friend of Ginbot 7 leader, Dr.Berhanu Nega. In repressive Ethiopia, new 'Blue Party' struggles to offer a choice'

With 1,000 Ethiopian laborers being sent home daily from Saudi Arabia,the opposition Blue party is channeling popular outrage.

CSM Commentary Addis Ababa, Ethiopia (November 21, 2013) - Ethiopiais a definite success story in expert opinion about post-cold war Africa.

The civil strife that wreaked havoc and made headlines in the 1980s has disappeared. Investments in roads, health, education, and water have improved the daily life of millions. Yet Ethiopia's ruling coalition seems intent on maintaining a tight grip on power until its project to transform Africa's second-most populous nation into a middle-income country is complete. That authoritarian control makes any opposition difficult – though of late a group called the Blue Party, made up of young Ethiopianswho describe themselves as progressive, have attempted to move, if not shake, the nation's politics in ways not seen here for a decade or more.

Last week the Blue Party tried to organize a protest outside the Saudi Arabian embassy in Addis Ababa, feeding off widespread public outcry over the treatment of Ethiopian migrants and laborers in the Saudi kingdom. Some 1,000 Ethiopians a day are being deported back home andmigrant clashes with police in instead of allowing Ethiopians to demonstrate their anger, the governmentforcefully broke up the protest, upsetting even those normally supportive of the government. What remains unclear is how much repression the rising educated middle class in cities is willing to ignore in the Horn of Africa regime. Ethiopia enacted a liberal constitution in 1994 that promised a free press, autonomy for some 80 ethnic groups, and multi- party politics. Yet dissenting journalists have still been jailed, minority groups complain of oppression, and elections are uncompetitive. In the last vote in 2010, out of 547 seats in parliament, the opposition won one. Ethiopia has been governed by the multi-ethnic Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front since 1991, when rebel groups overthrew a military regime.

Riyadh are hitting social media here. Still,

In 2005, the opposition, led by a group called the Coalition for Unity and Democracy, won 173 seats in the first competitive election. But months later some 200 people were killed by police when the opposition protestedthe outcome was rigged. Opposition leaders were jailed en masse. But now there is some resurgence of opposition against the ruling (EPRDF) coalition. The Blue Party held the first large demonstration by a political party since 2005 in July, when several thousand supporters marched in downtown Addis Ababa. They demanded the release of jailed politicians and journalists, as well as action against corruption, unemployment and inflation. Another more established opposition group peeking its head out of the bunker is the Unity for Democracy and Justice. UDJ held a moderately successful demonstration in the capital as part of a “Million Voices for Freedom” campaign. They demanded the release of "political prisoners" and the repeal of the anti-terrorism law used to convict them. With new voices now emerging the government is taking a two-track approach: Last month Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn said that multi-party democracy is constitutionally protected and that his administration wants a "constructive, progressive, opposition." Yet he issued a warning: If opposition parties mix with banned groups, they will be prosecuted. "Anyone who plays with the fire, then that fire will burn them," Mr. Hailemariam said. And there is evidence little has actually changed: Both the Blue Party and UDJ complain of harassment, with offices raided, members arrested and police arbitrarily preventing activities such as distributing leaflets. Still, Blue Party leader Yilkal Getnet,in his thirties, believes his party will win a majority of the vote in 2015. Heis counting on young people that want more freedom and want to move past the divisive ethnic politics of the past and embrace national unity. Mr. Yilkal also thinks another bleary and non-competitive election will lead to increased frustration and instability.

Merera Gudina is a leading member of the Oromo Federalist Congress. TheOromo are Ethiopia's most populous ethnic group and frequently allege that they have remained excluded from power under EPRDF rule. Mr.

Merera has raised funds in the US but thinks the Blue Party optimism ismisplaced. He digs out a cardboard box from beneath his desk at Addis Ababa University, where he is a political scientist, and shows an uncounted ballot from 2010 elections. He says that thousands of votes forthe opposition were discarded by the ruling party cadres. But Merera allows that if the ruling coalition does a fair election they may suffer a shock greater than 2005. "If they open up they are going to lose easily inless than one month of campaigning," he says. There are latent frustrations brewing in the current dynamic in Ethiopia, analysts feel, where construction profits are accruing to a corrupt elite tied to the rulingparty -- while the cost of living for the masses rises. "Even if they open a small window they know there's going to be a repeat of 2005," one senioranalyst who could not be named, argues. Merera says Ethiopia's political stagnation is also due to divided challengers that can't agree on a "common agenda," a analysis detailed in book “Ethiopia: From Autocracy to Revolutionary Democracy, 1960s to 2011.” In Ethiopia, parties only emerged after the downfall of absolute monarch Emperor Haile Selassie in1974 and they have primarily been vehicles either for rivalry between traditional ethnic elites, or among different Marxist revolutionaries. "Sectarianism, conspiracy and political intrigues have become the hallmark of the Ethiopian political parties and their leaders," leading to public disillusion, Merera writes. Ethnicity is a key fault-line among the nascent opposition. Oromo activists argue that in practice, the focus on national unity or universal values by the likes of the Blue Party will bring more of the exploitation that Ethiopia's minorities historically experiencedat the hands of traditional rulers.

Ethiopia: Former Paramilitary Commander tells right Abuses in Ogaden'

SOMALILAND SUN (November 21, 2013) Illays Program, a London based Somali Ogaden web journalists have presented a video about human rightabuses in Ogaden. Commander Hassan Abdi Mohamud has revealed reports of arrest, rape and civilian killing in remote Somali ethnic populated region in eastern Ethiopia Ogaden Region. Mr. Hassan 27 old tells that he joined with the paramilitary forces in 2009 after the Ethiopiandefense forces announced the regional federal troops are needed. Many people are killed, looted their property and raped, I was a witness while dozes of women are raped somewhere minors, I have raised the issue to the regional administration and they did not take an action, even they encouraged the campaign. Let me give you an example, Sahra was raped,she is well-known, and after she wanted a justice about her rape, she hasbeen accused of as ONLF supporter and even she would be killed if she talks about defaming the troops, said former commander defected from the Paramilitary forces. The major issue is when a member of Liyu Police wants to get married a woman, if she refuses she is blamed to be marrieda member of ONLF, and she is an anti-peace element, she is arrested andraped, 16 cases happened in Guna-Gado District. Hassas claim that he defected after he could not stop the right abuses committed his troops and the regional administration ignored the accusation. There are injustices in Ogaden Region, and I have been waiting a long time how to escape, said Mr. Hassan. A human cannot accept just to be a witness about the crimes, added Hassan. I have been stationed in Dhagagbour Zone, Bulale vicinity; there have been a looting and committing crimes in the area. People are killed, raped, and arrested because of their family members are ONLF fighters, Ogaden National Liberation Front, a group fighting for self-determination of Ogaden Region. Speaking about the especial target women, Mr. Hassan said women who are married ONLF members are commonly raped. Mr. Hassan said there is no independent media presence in the region and I believe that the reason the government banned is to fear to reveal the human right abuses taking place in the region. After years of human rights abuses in Ogaden region without international independent investigation, Ogaden region seems to finally have a good news story. Sweden will be the first European country that is investigating what Swedish Prosecutors say serious human rights abuses committed at Ogaden region. In 2007, Ethiopia crackdown againstinsurgent of ONLF, Ogaden National Liberation Front, a group fighting for self-determination of Ogaden region has left thousands of Ogaden civilianswho are mainly women and children. Ethiopia government refuses the wide accusations against their mistreatment of civilians in Ogaden region. Media and journalist are banned in the Ogaden region and that is why the conflict in Ogaden is not getting international attention. The past few daysthe region has seen an increase in heavy fighting. Since 2005, Ethiopia government isolated Ogaden region from the World, Ethiopia imposed a ban all international aid and media organizations in Ogaden despite some are operating under the permit of intelligence surveillances. Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) fighting for the self-determination of Ogaden Region in Ethiopia since 1994.

The late PM had ordered the confiscation of Ethiopian Community in Saudiand building of Embassy'

ESAT Commentary (November 22, 2013): Reliable sources told that the former Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi had ordered the confiscation of the resources of the Ethiopian Community Association in Saudi Arabia that was saved for the building of a school and other purposes. The finance was used for the building of the Ethiopian Embassy in Riyadh, the Ambassador’s residence and a Consular Office in Jeddah. The Community at the time had saved 50 million Saudi Arabian Riyal (SAR) or $13.5 million. Fearing that the Saudi administrationmight interfere with the money, the heads of the Community had agreed with the previous Ethiopian government officials to keep it in the Bank account of the Ethiopian Embassy and move it when necessary. The account had been managed by the signatures of the Chairman of the Community and the Councillor General in Jeddah.

As soon as the Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF)government took power, it showed an interest of using the money and started to appease the leaders of the Community Association by proposingthem benefits. The government promised to give them land in Addis Ababa to build their own houses. However, the Community leaders refused the offers saying that the money belonged to the people and wasfor building school thus would not allow the government to use the money. The late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who got later involved in the issue, had promised them saying “even if there was no land, I would break Meskel Square into pieces and give it to you”. Learning the unwavering position of the Community leaders, Meles had given a direct order for the money to be used for construction purposes.

Erqu Geda, the then Chairman of the Community had attempted to take the case to Court; soon enough, the Embassy got him replaced by a pro EPRDF Chairman. Despaired by the developments, some of the Community members had then come to Addis Abeba and beseeched for land which they were not given. Some observers say if the government had not used the money; it would have been employed to rehabilitate the thousands of Ethiopians repatriated from Saudi Arabia. Although ESAT phoned Dina Mufti, the PR Head of the Ethiopian Ministry of Foreign Affairs(MoFA), on his handset to get his responses on the issues, he rebuffed saying that he was in a meeting. Insiders said to ESAT that the government had also exploited the finances of the Ethiopian Communities of other Gulf countries for the Construction. The Ethiopian Community Association in Saudi Arabia has been one of the strongest Ethiopian communities outside Ethiopia.

Human Rights Abuse in Ogaden Gets International Attention'

SomaliCurrent PERSPECTIVE (November 22, 2013) By Ahmed Abdi - Afteryears of human rights abuses in Ogaden region without international independent investigation, Ogaden region seems to finally have a good news story. Sweden will be the first European country that is investigatingwhat Swedish Prosecutors say a serious human rights abuses committed at Ogaden region. “I absolutely welcome the good news of holding those who committed the atrocities and human rights abuses in occupied- Ogaden responsible”, said Mohammed Hared, a 31 year-old Somali activist and an active member of Ogaden Youth and Students Union, OYSU-North America. Established in Denmark in June 27th, 2010, The Ogaden Youth and Students Union or OYSU is a non-governmental, non- profit Organisation as the name refers to OYSU consists of youth educators around the Globe that their mission is advocate for the rights ofthe youth, Students, children in diaspora and in Ogaden Region as well aspromoting and advocating for justice, Freedom and a lasting peace in Ogaden Region

Early of this year,the Organization extended its role and waged a campaign to draw the attention of the International Community what it says “The Ignored Hidden Genocide in Ogaden” in the last couple of years.Two great events are about to held in South Africa and North America between November 27 and 29. Despite well-documented evidences by theRights Groups, the Ethiopia Government has been denying any wrong doing for the last 7-8 years when it times to human rights abuses committed at Ogaden region, but now nothing is ever hidden from the International Community. “I don’t really think the atrocities committed at Ogaden have ever been hidden from the international community. It is just that many countries around the World chose to ignore the plight of the Somali people in occupied-Ogaden”, said Mr. Hared, in an email response. Rights groups such as Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International, and Genocide Watch have been collecting a large number oftestimonies for the war crimes and crimes against humanity”

Documenting and recording for Evidence after evidence of rapes,detentions,tortures,and extra-judicially killings of the civilians as well as villages razing to the ground by the Ethiopian Army and the notorious paramilitary force known as Liyu Police. Now an Ogadeni whistleblower, Abdullahi Hussein, that is making very difficult to Ethiopia to keep hiding such human rights violations against Somalis in the Ogaden region has defected to Sweden bringing what he says is over 100 hours of filmed evidence.
Stellan GÃ¤rde is a lawyer at international commission of jurists. He says Swedish authorities can take action based on the material.It has come a time that International prosecutors are now following up the case. The Preliminary inquiry about serious crimes against international law was started on the 24th of October. Swedish Prosecutors are currentlyworking on particular cases-and frequently asking questions for the victims of the notorious Liyu Police, Militia, Ethiopian Army, Regional administration, and judiciary (federal or regional). Hence, the prosecutors started to talk to more Somalis from Ogaden Region that have specific points of interest on certain issues. And those have some particular cases-very bad experiences, interesting,or an usual will collaborate with the Court.
The Regional Commentators believe that the investigation will likely to be brought in front of Justice all those involved in the case including in the Ethiopian appointed Chief Abdi Mohammoud Omar known as Abdi iley, his vice Abdullahi Yusuf Werar aka Abdullahi Ethiopia, General Abraha Weldemariam and Alias Quarter who are a close ally of Abdi Iley. The Oil- rich Ogaden Region is home to 8-10 million ethnic Somali pastoralists, andit borders Djibouti, Kenya and Somalia. The region was Italian and British-colony, but in 1954, Britain handed over the region secretly to Ethiopia, a decision rejected by the Ogaden Somali population who have since fought for full independence.

PERSPECTIVE: By Will Davison (November 22, 2013) Ethiopia is a definitesuccess story in expert opinion about post-cold war Africa. The civil strife that wreaked havoc and made headlines in the 1980s has disappeared.

Ethiopian Migrants Victimized in Saudi Arabia'

CounterPunch commentary (November 23, 2013) By Graham Peebles - Inthe last 10 days persecution of Ethiopian migrant workers in Saudi Arabiahas escalated. Men and women are forced from their homes by mobs of civilians and dragged through the streets of Riyadh and Jeddah.

Distressing videos of Ethiopian men being mercilessly beaten, kicked and punched have circulated the Internet and triggered worldwide protests by members of the Ethiopian diaspora as well as outraged civilians in Ethiopia. Women report being raped, many repeatedly, by vigilantes and Saudi police. Ethiopian Satellite Television (ESAT), has received reports of fifty deaths and states that thousands living with or without visas have been detained awaiting repatriation. Imprisoned, many relay experiences of torture and violent beatings. Earlier this year the Saudi authorities announced plans to purge the kingdom of illegal migrants. In July, King Abdullah extended the deadline for them to "regularize their residency andemployment status [from 3 rd July] to November 4th. Obtain the correct visa documentation, or risk arrest, imprisonment and/or repatriation. On 6th November, Inter Press Service (IPS) reports, Saudi police, "rounded up more than 4,000 illegal foreign workers at the start of a nationwide crackdown," undertaken in an attempt (the authorities say), to reduce the12% unemployment rate "creating more jobs for locals". Leading up to the"crackdown" many visa-less migrants left the country: nearly a million Bangladeshis, Indians, Filipinos, Nepalis, Pakistanis and Yemenis are estimated to have left the country in the past three months. More than 30,000 Yemenis have reportedly crossed to their home country in the pasttwo weeks," and around 23,000 Ethiopian men and women have "surrendered to Saudi authorities" [BBC].

The police and civilian vigilante gangs are victimizing Ethiopian migrants, residing with and without visas; the “crackdown” has provided the police and certain sectors of the civilian population with an excuse to attack Ethiopians. Press TV reports that “Saudi police killed three Ethiopian migrant workers in the impoverished neighborhood of Manfuhah in the capital, Riyadh, where thousands of African workers, mostly Ethiopians, were waiting for buses to take them to deportation centers.” Hundreds have been arrested and report being tortured: “we are kept in a concentration camp, we do not get enough food and drink, when we defend our sisters from being raped, they beat and kill us,” a migrant named Kedir, told ESAT TV. Women seeking refuge within the Ethiopian consulate tell of being abducted from the building by Saudi men and raped. ESAT, reports that several thousand migrants have been transported by trucks to unknown destinations outside the cities. Whilst the repatriation of illegal migrants is lawful, the Saudi authorities do not have the right to act violently; beating, torturing and raping vulnerable, frightened people: people, who wish simply to work in order to support their families. The abuse that has overflowed from the homes where domestic workers are employed onto the streets of the capital reflects thewide-ranging abuse suffered by migrant workers of all nationalities in Saudi Arabia and throughout the Gulf States.

Trail of Abuse: This explosion of state sponsored violence against Ethiopians highlights the plight of thousands of migrant workers in Saudi Arabia. They tell of physical, sexual and psychological abuse at the hands of employers, agents and family members. The draconian Kafala sponsorship system, (which grants ownership of migrants to their sponsor), together with poor or non-existent labour laws, endemic racism and gender prejudice, creates an environment in which extreme mistreatment has become commonplace in the oil-rich kingdom. There areover nine million migrant workers in Saudi Arabia, that’s 30% of the population. They come from poor backgrounds in Sri Lanka, the Philippines, Indonesia and Ethiopia and make up “more than half the workforce. The country would grind to an embarrassing stand still without theirdaily toil. “Many suffer multiple abuses and labor exploitation [including withholding of wages, excessive working hours and confinement], sometimes amounting to slavery-like conditions”, Human Rights Watch (HRW) states. The level of abuse of domestic workers is hard to judge: their isolation combined with total control exerted by employers, together with government indifference, means the vast majority of cases go unreported. Until August this year there was no law covering domestic abuse. Legislation has been passed: however, the authorities, HRW reports “are yet to make clear which agencies will police the new law…without effective mechanisms to punish domestic abuse, this law is merely ink on paper.” All pressure needs to be exerted on the rulers of Saudi Arabia to ensure the law is implemented and enforced so victims of domestic violence feel it is safe to come forward.

Ethiopian Governments Negligence: Whilst thousands of its nationals are detained, beaten, killed and raped, the Ethiopian government hangs its negligent head in silence in Addis Ababa, does not act to protect or swiftlyrepatriate their nationals, and criminalises those protesting in Addis Ababaagainst the Saudi actions. Although freedom to protest is enshrined withinthe Ethiopian constitution (a liberal minded, largely ignored document written by the incumbent party), dissent and public demonstrations, if notpublicly outlawed, are actively discouraged by the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) regime. In response to the brutaltreatment meted out by the Saudi police and gangs of vigilantes in Riyadhand Jeddah, outraged civilians in Addis Ababa staged a protest outside theSaudi Embassy, only to be confronted by their own police force, wielding batons and beating demonstrators. Al Jazeera reports that police "arresteddozens of people outside the Saudi embassy [in Addis Ababa] in a crackdown on demonstrators protesting against targeted attacks on Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia." A senior member of The Blue Party, Getaneh Balcha was one of over 100 people arrested for peacefully protesting. The government's justification, rolled out to defend yet another suppressive response to a democratic display, was to assert that the protest "was an illegal demonstration, they had not got a permit from the appropriate office": petty bureaucratic nonsense, hiding the undemocratic truth that the government does not want public protests of any kind on the streets of its cities: effectively, freedom of assembly is banned in Ethiopia. The protestors, he said, "were fomenting anti-Arab sentiments here among Ethiopians." Given the brutal treatment of Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia, anger and anti-Saudi sentiment (not anti Arab) is, one would imagine understandable, and should be shared by the Ethiopian government. The people of Ethiopia are living under a duplicitous highly repressive regime.

The EPRDF consistently demonstrates it's total indifference to the needs and human rights of the people. Freedom of expression, political dissent and public assembly is denied by a regime that is committing a plethora f human rights violations in various parts of the country, atrocities constituting in certain regions crimes against humanity. In fact, accordingto Genocide Watch, the Ethiopian government is committing genocide in the Somali region, as well as on the "Anuak, Oromo and Omo" ethnic groups (or tribes).Freedom of expression, political dissent and public assembly is denied by a regime that is committing a plethora f human rights violations in various parts of the country, atrocities constituting in certain regions crimes against humanity. The recent appalling events in Saudi Arabia have brought thousands of impassioned Ethiopians living inside the country and overseas onto the streets. This powerful worldwideaction presents a tremendous opportunity for the people to unite, to demand their rights through peaceful demonstrations and to call with onevoice for change within their beloved country. The time to act is now, as awise man has rightly said, "nothing happens by itself, man must act and implement his will".

Ethiopia repatriates over 16,000 citizens from Saudi Arabia'

ST ADDIS ABABA (November 23, 2013)- Ethiopia on Saturday said it has stepped up the repatriation operation to thousands of Ethiopians who hadbeen working illegally in Saudi Arabia. Officials at the Ethiopian Foreign Affairs Ministry told Sudan Tribune that so far 16,248 Ethiopians have been brought back from Saudi Arabia since the government began repatriating citizens last week. The Ethiopian government says the safe return of its citizens is its current top priority. Three Ethiopians were allegedly killed by Saudi police in a clash after a clampdown against tens of thousands of undocumented Ethiopian migrants. Dozens of other Ethiopians were also injured during the crackdown which was condemnedby the Ethiopian government and many international right groups. Addis Ababa has urged Saudi authorities to probe the killings of the three Ethiopians. Ethiopians in different parts of the globe have been protesting against the targeted atrocities on Ethiopians living in the Gulf kingdom.

Following the crackdown, some 23,000 Ethiopians surrendered to Saudiauthorities to voluntarily return home after arrangements were made between Ethiopian embassy in Riyadh and the Saudi government. There are an estimated 40,000 Ethiopians illegally working in the wealthy oil-rich nation. Officials said today that the flights between Addis Ababa and to Saudi Arabia have been doubles to 12 flights a day to speed up therepatriation. A national task force has been established to help the returnees reunite with their families. Ethiopia's regional governments havepledged to create job opportunities for the returnees. The government hasallocated some $2.6 million for programmes to assist with the rehabilitation of the returnees. There are some nine million migrant workers in Saudi Arabia among whom an estimated five million do not have work permits. Saudi authorities launched the clampdown on illegal migrants earlier this month in the hope that it will create job opportunitiesfor native citizens. Unemployment rate among native Saudis stands at 12%. The Ethiopia recently imposed a ban on workers travelling abroad until a firm legal structure that ensures the rights and safety of citizens is secured with foreign nations, particularly Arab countries.

Opposition politics – Ethiopian Peoples Revolutionary Party (EPRP)Celebrates Birthday'

History of Rival Opposition, Clandestine political activity, andIndoctrination in Ethiopia'

Two documents revealed from interrogations confessed by Berhane- Mesquel Reda of EPRP, and Haile Fida of AESM (MEISON) by the infamousDuerg Investigation Dept."

Revealed Document: Two confession documents have been revealed fromthe interrogation department of the notorious Duerg Military regime on Berhane-Mesquel Reda, one of the co-founders of Ethiopian RevolutionaryPeoples Party (EPRP), and its armed wing Ethiopian Revolutionary PeoplesArmy (EPRA), and Haile Fida also another co-founder of All Ethiopian Socialist Movement (AESM "MEISON"). The two documents indicated that it is directly extracted confessions from Berhane-Mesquel Reda and Haile Fida that they had deeply involved in Ethiopian opposition political activities pre and during the February, 1974 Revolution period. Also it's revealed that both the above mentioned leaders went underground in different circumstances but caught gave the confession. Ultimately they were charged by the Duerg regime on several "criminal counts."

Berhane-Mesquel's confession to the Duerg Investigation Department Atthe Grand Palace prison cell as followed:

Age 35, occupation unemployed, and no permanent address. He was known as one of the Haile Selassie I University radical student preaching subversive doctrines to fellow students against Haile Selassie's monarchical regime. As the result, he was suspended and finally led to hisdismissal from the University. Thereafter, with other friends as indicated on his confession, they highjack an airplane to the Sudan, then they took refuge in Algeria where they formed a political group. During their stay in Algeria they had interacted with Ethiopian Student Movement at home andin the Diaspora, also with the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) in political desire to overthrow the imperial government. As one might expect, the fronts provided vital assistance in guerrilla fighting training, and facilitated in the establishmentof EPRA in Tigrai province at a location known as Assimba, and then continued his confession with detail activities for 98 pages.

Haile Fida's confession to the Duerg Investigation Department at theGrand Palace prison cell:

Haile Fida's confession starts, age 38, employed, educated in Ethiopia andEurope, and lived in Addis Ababa. He is a son of carpenter and grew up inWollega province. He completed his elementary and junior highschool in Wollega, continued his highschool in General Wingate high school in AddisAbaba. After he completed high school education he was hired as instructor in then Harrarghe province of Deder city for a year and back to Addis to continue his University education, and studied Geology and Physics at then Haile Selassie I University. After his graduation, he taughtthese subjects for a year in the University. Then continued on his background profile in stating that he was awarded a scholarship to continue a higher education in France where he studied Geology, Physic and Sociology. Due his active involvement as a leader in Ethiopian Student Movement in Europe his scholarship program was cancelled and his Ethiopian Passport revoked as reprisal by Haile Selassie's regime. He stayed in France and Germany in teaching on those fields. During his stayhe established his clandestine organization structure called All Ethiopian Socialist Movement (AESM), known as usually MEISON with his eighteen friends in 1968 E.C... and continued the details of his story over 70 pages.

As university students both founders had some similar common ground. They were enthusiasm for political reform. They spoke in terms of revolutionary change in Ethiopia. Berhane-Mesquel at home and Haile Fidain Europe had organized and led the Ethiopian Student Union Movement.

The Student union became a Movement with leftist political ideology that challenged the imperialregime policies. They were voicing for political reforms, such as 'land to the tiller', 'civil rights and liberties for Ethiopia's oppressed people'. Unexpectedly, the Student movement emerged into contending major two political forces, i.e. Ethiopian Peoples RevolutionaryParty (EPRP) and All Ethiopian Socialist Movement (AESM), where the twolater to become famously co-founders of their respective parties.

According to the confession document, Halie Fida travelled to Algeria to meet the Algeria based group led by Berhane-Mesquel Reda to discuss thepolitical and organizational matters. During this meeting, one of the agenda they couldn't agree was "how to resolve the question of Ethiopian nations and nationalities question". The difference of the two political forces was theoretical in nature but became quite a sharp difference. This difference is eventually leading in sowing the seed of discord and dissension between the two political groups. However, they were continued to organize and functioned their organizations around a Marxist-Leninist ideology until they disintegrated within themselves into squabbling factions, constantly intriguing and brought to deadly consequences for all.

As we all know, as Ethiopian February, 1974 Popular Revolution started, the Duerg took over state and government control by toppling the Haile Selassie Government, and consolidated their power through dictatorship rule. During this period EPRP declared its existence and have started operating in clandestine structure. In the contrary, AESM was operating with the Duerg regime as critical supporter. Its rationale was providing support is essential to stabilize the country until the condition for free anddemocratic process established. Both groups organized the students, and the labor unions, etc., under their party umbrella to be in forefront of the movement. Both groups are multi-ethnic. Their exact ethnic composition and size are unknown. It is true that EPRP had effective mass mobilizationtechniques, including infiltration to senior Duerg and government officials,and succeeded inspiring the vast majority of students, trade unions, including peasant farmers. If you are appearing to be unsympathetic to them you will be harassed, intimidated, and in some instance harsh method was used. The success of the EPRP in Addis Ababa city was short lived due to bubbling internal crisis and a daily preoccupation fighting with the Duerg and its supporters, the MEISON. Also, the party's ability to maintain internal cohesion becomes impossible due to nature of clandestine structure. As result of this crisis Berhane-Mesquel and otherswere expelled from the party due to new strategic policies of the party.

Berhane-Mesquel left the city to begin rural armed struggle in westernWollo of Wara-Illou later to be captured by Duerg plainclothes to laterprovid this confession.

At such hot political All Ethiopian Socialist Movement (ASEM) leader Haile Fida was aligning his party's with Duerg. It was widespread believe that he was one of the architects of Duerg's several proclamations including the nationalisation of rural land, excessive urban houses, followed by radio announcement that Marxist-Leninism had become Ethiopia's official ideology. According to Haile's confession, in 1968 GC ASEM under Civilian Political Bureau made an effort in disseminating revolutionary propaganda work by publishing bi-weekly magazines called "Revolutionary Ethiopia", and other publications in variety of topics to upgrade the level of the people's political consciousness, and also in establishing political association such as like Youth Associations, and Women Associations. He said that during this effort one the main objective was to expose the rival EPRP which he terms it as "anti-Revolutionary deeds" from mass organizations. He claimed that in September 1977 GC, EPRP responded in kind to assassinate Fiqure Merid of MEISON and other Civilian Political Bureau members. Thereafter, number of ugly incidents happen in attempting to liquidated EPRP member and supporters under the Duerg's infamous 'Red Terror campaign'. It was a barbaric bloody campaign to anyone. MESION itself also became the next target by Duerg Red Terror campaign. Haile Fide and a group of his followers attempted to flee the capital, through northern Addis Ababa but all were caught by security plainclothes to give this 70 pages plus confession.

EPRP & the challenges of clandestine political opposition:

The political rumors that originated within the clandestine opposition werethe most heart breaking. According to Berhane-Mesquel Reda's confessiondocument the party's inner circle, (he termed them as 'clique') were muchless interested in resolving differences in open discussion and genuine debates. Outspoken criticism or dissent was not tolerated by the central command of the party. Any critical argument forwarded by dissent member considers weakening the foundation of the organization. The story in this document makes it clear that democratic process was ignoredby one group, instead the secretive process used to silence their opponents. Apparently, large numbers of supporters were inexperienced, idealistic, and have not understood well how a party structured and operate. In addition most members were reluctant to oppose any directives coming from Central Committee due to complete trust on the party's operation or afraid being branded as traitors. Thus, the operation can be considered as two-edged sword unless handled properly. This testimonial document is a perfect example when clandestine operations become a fallacy. It brought unanticipated consequences because it essentially gave a blanket power for one group. It reasonable to say that Berhane-Mesquel's action against his party could be seen as survival instinct, and left without option except to fight or flight the situation until he caught by the regime security forces. As of to day, very limited books are published on history of this generation militancy. It is sad to witness after almost forty years the responsible political organizations (i.e. EPRP or AESM) that has historical knowledge neglected in documenting why the February, 1974 Revolution fail to achieve. We have already seen the country lost too many innocent peoples and the best and the brightest young Ethiopians were vanished. It is no surprise, the current ethno-centric TPLF's group that used intimidation, harassment often force to organize the Tigrean rural population found the power vacuum and has become as substitute. As consequence, the saga of popular February, 1974 Revolution has made a sharp u turn to the past "Ye Mesafent Zemen", where ethnicity seen first, and alienated large section of society that has readily embraced nationalism since King Tewodros II rule. Full accounts of historical analysis remain to be done by scholars and historians on the tragedy and failure of the clandestine movement in Ethiopia. It is a prevailing views that Berhane-Mesquel Reda for EPRP andHaile Feda for ASEM and many others were main players in advancing their organization's objectives by adopting Marxism and Leninism philosophical theories as a standard guide in their respective organization.Both men were important in their respective organization. Sadly, the common crossroads to work through conflict and differences of "ideological" opinion between the two organizations were thrown out of the window. The clandestine political struggles outcome in Ethiopia is one of the main causes of failure of the February, 1974 Revolution, and in the process it has destroyed the livelihoods and lives of many of its citizens.

The Duerg Military regime in known for their's ruthlessness and irrationalacts after taking the confessions from both men, ordered their execution.Although on their testimony I haven't noticed any political intrigue or other serious faults against the Duerg. They were executed regardless oftheir attitude toward the regime. These confessions as documents shouldderserve to be seen by all responsible Ethiopians.

Baro River Flooding ruined Karuturi's farm in Gambella, western Ethiopia'

Gleaming Deere & Co. (DE) (November 25, 2013) tractors and harvesters are sitting idle five years after Karuturi Global Ltd. (KARG) opened a farm in Ethiopia that was hailed as the poster child of the country's plan to triple food exports by 2015. Eighty percent of the Bangalore-based company's land in the southwestern Gambella region is on a flood plain, meaning its 100,000-hectare (247,100-acre) concession is inundated by the Baro River for as much as seven months of the year, according to Managing Director Ramakrishna Karuturi. The company was unaware of the extent of the flooding when it leased the land, he said. "Karuturi, like many other large-scale investors, underestimated the complexity of opening land for large-scale commercial agriculture," Philipp Baumgartner, a researcher at the Bonn, Germany-based Center for Development Research who wrote a doctoral thesis on agriculture in Gambella, said in aNov. 20 response to e-mailed questions. “The land leased out wasn’t properly assessed by either of the contracting parties.” Karuturi, the world’s biggest rose grower, was one of the first companies to take advantage of a government plan to lease 3.3 million hectares (8.2 million acres) of farmland to private investors. Growing food on the unutilized land would help the Horn of Africa country address shortages that forces itto seek aid from international donors every year, former Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said at the time. Agriculture investors are targeting African countries such as Ethiopia to meet growing global food requirements. The world’s population will increase to 9 billion people by 2050, and agricultural production will need to increase 70 percent by then to feed everyone, according to the World Bank.

Chaotic Fashion: The Ethiopian program has got off to a poor start because of transportation and electricity problems, a lack of security and ashortage of funds and farming expertise, said James Keeley, a consultant for the International Institute for Environment and Development. The plots are located mainly in sparsely populated, heavily forested areas suchas the western states of Gambella and Benishangul-Gumuz that border South Sudan and Sudan. “Land investment in Ethiopia proceeded initially in a chaotic fashion,” Keeley said. Leases in some regions were awarded without checks on investors, environmental-impact assessments or performance-monitoring plans, he said. Ethiopia is Africa’s biggest coffee producer and second-biggest exporter of the beans. The country is also sub-Saharan Africa’s largest wheat consumer and third-biggest corn consumer.

$1 Hectare: The government in Addis Ababa began leasing land for as little as $1 per hectare annually in 2008. The state owns all land in a nation dominated by subsistence smallholders who mostly farm on less than a hectare. At the time, the government projected that within five years, commercial farmers would be producing food on about 900,000 hectares of land, according to Bizualem Bekele, an official at the government’s Agricultural Investment Land Administration Agency. As of last month, only about 10,000 hectares of land have been developed, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn said on Oct. 20. “We’ve given morethan 400,000 hectares of land to the private sector to engage in this agricultural production, but up to now the progress is very slow,” Hailemariam said. Karuturi isn’t the only company struggling. Saudi Star Agricultural Development Plc, owned by Ethiopian-born Saudi billionaire Mohamed al-Amoudi, is growing rice on 350 hectares of a 10,000-hectarelease as it completes an irrigation canal started by Ethiopia’s socialist military regime more than two decades ago that will allow it to ramp up cultivation.

Intensive Funding: The company is searching for “intensive funding” for the project and hopes the main canal will be finished before the rainy season in June, Saudi Star Chief Executive Officer Fikru Desalegn said in aphone interview on Nov. 18. Shapoorji Pallonji and Co., a unit of Mumbai, India-based Tata Group, plans to grow the biofuel-plant pongamia on 50,000 hectares in Benishangul-Gumuz. After signing the lease “several years” ago, it’s farming on 2,500 hectares, said Keeley, who is preparing areport on the land program for the International Institute for Environment and Development based on research done for the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation. Ruchi Agri Plc, also based in Mumbai, obtained 25,000 hectares in Gambella. After three years, its growing soybeans on 1,000 hectares and has cleared another 2,000 hectares of scrub at a cost of $1,500 a hectare, Technical Manager Rameshsingh Pardesi said in aninterview. If all goes to plan, the operation may become profitable by2020, he said.
China Project: Other major investors such as Hunan Dafengyuan from China, which took a lease to grow sugarcane on 25,000 hectares in Gambella, have had their lease canceled, according to Keeley. In November 2010, Karuturi said it would have “developed” the 100,000 hectares by June. In the final quarter of last year, it harvested its maiden corn crop from about 4 percent of the concession. Karuturi’s stock has slumped to 1.55 Indian rupees on the National Stock Exchange of Mumbaifrom a peak of 36.30 rupees on Nov. 9, 2010. Plans announced in the past18 months to raise funds from development banks and sovereign wealth funds have yet to materialize, according to Karuturi. Most of Karuturi’s farm that runs either side of one of Gambella’s main roads for about 100 kilometers (62 miles) is still covered in a thick scrubland of bushes and trees. A plaque to commemorate its opening now lies in land taken back by the government after confusion over exactly where the company’s lease was.
Renting Tractors: The company was given 300,000 hectares of land by theregional government before officials in Addis Ababa reduced the plot size by two-thirds in 2010. There is a plan to rent out the idle tractors, harvesters and crop-spraying machines to other farmers, Karuturi said. Toencourage faster development of large farms, the government plans to use a “carrot and stick” approach to investors. Companies will be given government support and licenses may be withdrawn from those that fail to develop fast enough, Agriculture Minister Tefera Deribew said in an interview. “If the failure is their failure then we will be obliged to take the measure,” he said. The government is now targeting production on all 3.3 million hectares of land by 2016, Tefera said. “At that time we will definitely have significant production.”
Crop Exports: Ethiopia planned to earn $6.58 billion a year from agriculture exports in 2015, according to a five-year economic plan published in 2010, when total exports were about a third of that amount.

In the 12 months through July 7, the end of the Ethiopian fiscal year, shipments fell 2 percent to $3.08 billion from a year earlier. The land- leasing program has also been beset by criticism from advocacy groupsincludingHuman Rights Watch, based in New York, that residents have been displaced in a relocation program to make way for the farms.

Karuturi rejects the allegations for the same reason that the farm project has failed to take off: flooding. “We have been trying to convince people who’ve been making these allegations that these are floodplains where nobody stays, where nobody can reside or graze their cattle because mostof the time they are under four or five feet of water,” Karuturi said.

Eritreans flee en masse their poor and isolated nation – Reuters’

REUTERS: (November 27, 2013) Ten years ago, Eritrean migrant Habtu hunkered down on the vomit-stained deck of a creaking trawler on the Mediterranean Sea, making the final stage of his perilous bid to reach Europe. It is a trip thousands of Eritreans attempt each year, fleeing one of Africa's poorest and most isolated nations, a place where army conscription with pitiful pay can last years. Many die on the trek. Probably all of the more than 360 migrants who drowned in a shipwreck off Italy's coast of Lampeduza in October were Eritreans, though many are still unidentified. So the computer science graduate felt fortunate when his journey across a quarter of Africa via the scorching Sahara brought him toMalta - even if he had hoped to reach Italy, a former colonial power in the Horn of Africa. But his luck ran out when his asylum request was rejected and he was sent home. Now 32, Habtu remains undeterred and wants to make the treacherous trip again, rejoining the flow of often well-educated Africans dreaming of a new life in Europe. "Your only choice is to fight, and one way to fight is to make such journeys," Habtu told Reuters in Mai-Aini, one of six refugee camps in Ethiopia housing 79,000 Eritreans. "You can't continue this way."

Officials say about 40 or 50 Eritreans cross into Ethiopia a day, using camps as way stations on their longer journey north. Camp officials askedthat only first names of refugees be used to protect families back in Eritrea, where rights groups say freedoms are trampled on by the state.

Asmara denies this. Yet, even if Habtu makes it on his second attempt, hemay still face disappointment in Europe. Activists there say those who survive the dangerous trek often end up in badly paid and illegal work, scraping by as house helps or hawking on streets. For some, it can be worse than back home. "Europe is a mirage," said Kossi Komla-Ebri, 59, adoctor who immigrated to Italy from Togo in the 1970s and who now works with the Afro-Italian community. "People are drawn to Europe with a positive image in their heads. It's a fatal attraction. They don't realize they will be eating scraps under the table," he said. But Habtu's case highlights the difficulty in stopping the illegal migrants, even when they have first hand experience of the dangers. Others have also not been deterred, even as news of the October shipwreck off Italy's Lampedusaisland filters back.

Saudi Arabia should withdraw from UN Human Rights Council –Activists'

News analysis: (November 27, 2013) - As reported from Saudi Arabia, atleast ten Ethiopians have been killed and over a dozen raped since the state began the round up in early November. The fact that many of the raids that turned lethal occurred in the middle of the night, together withthe closed nature of the Kingdom generally, precludes ascertaining the precise numbers of victims. This harsh crackdown bears the hallmarks ofSaudi religious and racial bigotry. Based on local interviews, the Wall Street Journal reported, "Saudi security forces had come to the neighborhood the night before to declare that all illegal African migrants had to leave . . . immediately. Pakistani laborers began trying to help police by catching African workers, and clashes began." In the riots that accompanied the crackdown in Riyadh's desperately poor Manfuhah district, home to many migrants, at least five people were reportedly killed , including Ethiopian and Sudanese migrants and several Saudi nationals.

Ethiopian diplomatic sources reported that three Ethiopian citizens had been killed. It appears that the state's crackdown was not only directed atimmigrants, who lacked documentation, but a video posted on YouTube shows graphic violence indiscriminately directed against a group of peoplebecause of their national origin. In it, mobs brutally attack Ethiopian immigrants, several of whom are then pictured dead and injured. At the very moment that the U.N. General Assembly was voting to elect Saudi Arabia to the Human Rights Council earlier this month, Saudi police officers, assisted by vigilante mobs, launched an iron-fisted effort to roundup and deport millions of undocumented foreign workers. The campaign reportedly entailed imprisoning, killing, and raping African and Asian migrants within its borders and provoked a violent protest by some migrants in the capital.

In its May 2013 report on Saudi Arabia, entitled "Unfulfilled Promises" in reference to Saudi pledges to reform made to another U.N. human-rightsbody, Amnesty International describes human-rights violations faced by migrants: Typical abuses include long working hours, non-payment of salaries, refusal of permission to return home after completing contracts,refusal to transfer sponsorship and withholding of passports. Domestic workers who flee their employers can be arrested and charged with absconding. Some migrant workers experience physical abuse by their employers, but face enormous challenges in seeking legal remedies.

Migrant workers who are able to take their employers to court findthemselves embroiled in court cases that can last for years.

The Amnesty International report: In 2011, L P Ariyawathie, a Sri Lankanemployed as a domestic worker, was found to have 24 nails and a needledriven into her hands, leg and forehead when she returned to Sri Lanka. She said that the injuries had been inflicted by her employer when she complained about her heavy workload. It is unclear whether the Saudi Arabian authorities investigated the matter. Countless other egregious human-rights violations are occurring simultaneously in Saudi Arabia, of course, including against its large foreign-worker population. The Saudi government is infamous as a gross violator of human rights across the board. This will not, however, prevent the Saudi government, over the next three years, to sit in judgment of the human-rights record of the United States and the rest of the world.

Ethiopia & Marathon Athletics - Ethiopia is to marathon what Brazil is tofootball'

THE TIMES OF INDIA: PUNE (December 1, 2013): Ethiopia is to marathonwhat Brazil is to football, said the Ethiopian country coordinator Aberu Zewde as the athletes from the African nation ran away with all the top places at the 28th Pune International Marathon, here today. Citing the country's topography as the main reason behind producing top-class longdistance runners, he said: "Our runners are gifted. It's something like Brazilians when it comes to football." "Running becomes natural for an Ethiopian because of the high altitudes. "On an average we live on 3,000 metres altitudes. We have some ranges at a peak of well over 4000m," Zewde told PTI giving example of Mt. Batu that sits at a peak of 4307m. "The boys and girls automatically develop high stamina and endurance.

We are proud to be a country of marathoners," he said basking in the glory of the Ethiopian contingent that returned with three gold, one silver and three bronze medals from three events here. Belachew Endale Abayneh clinched the 28th Pune International Marathon title for his maiden crown while Habtamu Arga and Aberu Zewde Tesema won the men's and women's half marathon titles respectively, making it three goldmedals out of three. However, he was not happy with the timing they produced. Blaming it on the weather and traffic mismanagement, he said:"Yesterday the weather was calm as we trained. But it was energy- sapping in the morning and the traffic chaos added to the woes." Asked about the Kenyan fight, he said: "Yes they were challenging but till the midway course. Thereafter, it was all Ethiopians. We like to dominate the race."

Ethiopia - Saudi Arabia Labor Crackdown Violence - Ethiopian Workers Allege Attacks, Poor Detention Conditions - Ethiopian migrants victims ofphysical assaults in Saudi Arabia -HRW'

HRW (Washington, DC, Beirut, December 1, 2013) – Ethiopian migrantworkers have been the victims of physical assaults, some of them fatal,in Saudi Arabia following a government crackdown on foreign workers,

Human Rights Watch said today. Many workers seeking to return home are being held in makeshift detention centers without adequate food or shelter. Human Rights Watch spoke to five Ethiopian migrant workers in Saudi Arabia. Four Ethiopians in Riyadh told Human Rights Watch that the attacks began after November 4, 2013, when authorities resumed a campaign to arrest foreign workers who they claim are violating labor laws. Security forces have arrested or deported tens of thousands of workers. Saudi officials and state-controlled media have said that migrant workers have also been responsible for violence, including attacks on Saudi citizens, in the wake of the crackdown. “Saudi authorities have spent months branding foreign workers as criminals in the media, and stirring up anti-migrant sentiment to justify the labor crackdown,” said JoeStork, deputy Middle East director at Human Rights Watch. “Now the Saudi government needs to rein in Saudi citizens who are attacking foreign workers.” Saudi authorities should immediately investigate assaults on Ethiopian and other migrant workers by security forces and Saudi citizens, and hold those responsible for violent crimes to account, Human Rights Watch said. Saudi and Ethiopian authorities shouldwork to speedily repatriate undocumented foreign workers waiting in makeshift holding centers, if they have no fear of returning home, and ensure that they get adequate food, shelter, and medical care. The most violent attacks occurred on the evening of November 9 in areas around the Manfouha neighborhood of southern Riyadh, where Ethiopian residentsmake up a majority of residents, according to local activists. Two Ethiopian migrant workers told Human Rights Watch that they saw groupsof people they assumed to be Saudi citizens armed with sticks, swords, machetes, and firearms, attack foreign workers.

Ethiopia: Saudi Arabia Labor Crackdown Violence – KSA deports tens of thousands of foreign workers’

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia UPI (December 1, 2013) -- A crackdown on foreign labor in Saudi Arabia has resulted in the deportation of tens of thousands of economic migrants, mostly Ethiopians,officials say. The crackdown began in March after years of complaints by Saudis that foreign labor skewed the country's economy and made it difficult for young Saudis to get into the labor work force, The Guardian reported. One million Bangladeshis, Indians, Filipinos, Nepalis, Pakistanis and Yemenis have left Saudi Arabia since March, and 2 million immigrantsare expected to leave Saudi Arabia by 2014. Ethiopia said this week 50,000 of its nationals had been deported to Addis Ababa since March, with the total expected to rise to 80,000. Experts say the "Saudisation" program, which establishes quotas for employing Saudis in certain sectors, may be hard to implement, because most of the jobs that would be filled by foreign workers are menial work that Saudis refuse to do.

"Saudisation can only succeed if a company really wants to do it," arguedAbdelrahman al-Mutlak, a businessman. "It can't be done by regulation. Too many Saudis still think it's a lot more prestigious to hire a foreigner even if there is perfectly good Saudi candidate available." Economists saywith fewer foreign workers sending remittances home, more money will stay in the country and boost consumer spending. "It is the right thing todo," said Fawziya al-Bakr, a lecturer. "We've reached the point where people were trading in these workers and women were running away to become prostitutes. This is a problem that has built up over 40 years. It can't just be swept up in nine months. But it has to be done. When everything is legalized it will be easier to control."

Saudi Arabia's foreign labour crackdown drives out 2m migrants’

Guardian (December 1, 2013) Ethiopian workers face hostility amid 'Saudisation' campaign to control foreign labour and get more Saudi citizens into work. Under the watchful eyes of Saudi policemen slouched intheir squad cars along a rundown street, little knots of Ethiopian men sit chatting on doorsteps and sprawl on threadbare grass at one of Riyadh's busiest junctions. These are tense, wary times in Manfouha, a few minutes' drive from the capital's glittering towers and swanky shopping malls. Manfouha is the bleak frontline in Saudi Arabia's campaign to get rid of its illegal foreign workers, control the legal ones and help get more of its own citizens into work. This month two or three Ethiopians were killed here after a raid erupted into full-scale rioting. Keeping their distance from the officers parked every few hundred metres, the Ethiopians look shifty and sound nervous. "Of course I have an iqama [residence permit]," insisted Ali, a gaunt twentysomething man in cheap leather jacket and jeans. "I wouldn't be standing here if I hadn't."

But he didn't have the document on him. And his story, in broken Arabic, kept changing: he was in the process of applying for one; actually, no, hiskafeel (sponsor) had it. It didn't sound as if it would convince the police orpassport inspection teams prowling the neighbourhood. Until recently, of the kingdom's 30 million residents, more than nine million were non- Saudis. Since the labour crackdown started in March, one million Bangladeshis, Indians, Filipinos, Nepalis, Pakistanis and Yemenis have left.And the campaign has moved into higher gear after the final deadline expired on 4 November, with dozens of repatriation flights now taking place every day. By next year, two million migrants will have gone.

No one is being singled out, the authorities say. Illegal workers of 14 nationalities have been detained and are awaiting deportation. But the Ethiopians, many of whom originally crossed into Saudi Arabia from Yemen, are widely portrayed as criminals who are said to be mixed up with alcohol and prostitution. "They'd rather sit here and do nothing thango home because maybe they will get some kind of work," sneered Adel,one of the few Saudis to brave Manfouha's mean streets. "In Ethiopia there is nothing for them." The Ethiopian government said this week that50,000 of its nationals had already been sent home, with the total expected to rise to 80,000. Every day hundreds more trudge through the gates of the heavily guarded campus of Riyadh's Princess Noora University, awaiting a coach ride to the airport, fingerprinting, a final exitvisa and their one-way flight to Addis Ababa.

Ethiopian migrants in Saudi block the Mecca-Jeddah Motorway’

Arab News: (December 1, 2013) Security forces arrested 20 Ethiopian rioters on the Makkah-Jeddah Expressway on Friday for throwing stones that damaged 14 cars and injured four Saudis. An eyewitness said police officers fired shots into the air to disperse the rioters and soon brought the situation under control. The Ethiopians were apparently rioting because they could not gain entry into the Shumaisi detention center, he said. “A large number of Ethiopians, who arrived in buses, moved onto thehighway and tried to stop speeding cars. However, the highway security patrol closed the expressway at a safe distance from the detention center to prevent the situation from escalating. The troublemakers were confronted and taken into custody," a security source said. “The rioting started when a group of Ethiopians hurled stones at passing motorists andthe security forces. The police opened fire into the air to bring the situation under control,” the eyewitness said. He said the Ethiopians went on the rampage when they could not enter the detention center. The center only takes in those expatriates arrested by the security forces for violating labor and residence regulations. It does not accept those who surrender voluntarily. The highway patrol teams diverted oncoming traffic via Bahrah overpass. The rioters were isolated, arrested and then taken tothe detention center.

Major-General Ali Al-Ghamdi, director of Makkah Police, and Brig. Hassan Al-Shablan, director of the road security special forces, were present to oversee the operation, according to police sources. Various social networking sites carried a number of postings showing the incident. SomeEthiopians resorted to similar unruly behavior in front of the center last week, said Col. Badr Al-Saud, director of public relations at the Makkah police department. Until Wednesday, 38,000 illegal workers were detainedat the Shumaisi center, including 25,200 men and 12,800 women and children. Most of them were from Ethiopia and Indonesia, and others fromSomalia, Niger and Chad. The source said 9,870 illegal workers were deported from the center since the launch of the labor correction campaign on Nov. 4. In another development, 200 Ethiopians are continuing their sit-in protest at the gate of their consulate in Jeddah. They want travel documents to go home. Teachable Moments for the Ethiopian Diaspora?

Stop the violence against Ethiopian migrant workers in Saudi Arabia now!

EM Commentary By Alemayehu G Mariam (December 2, 2013) The ongoing human rights abuses of Ethiopian migrant workers in Saudi Arabia have triggered massive expressions of outrage against the regimes in Riyadh and Addis Ababa and unprecedented outpouring of concern and support in Diaspora Ethiopian communities. Over the past several weeks, enraged and brokenhearted by the shocking video clips of dehumanizationof Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia, tens of thousands of Diaspora Ethiopians from Australia to the United States faced off cowering Saudi embassy andconsular officials. An estimated 6-7 thousand Ethiopians peacefully marched on the Saudi Embassy in Washington, D.C. to demand an immediate stop to the violence and abuse and to show their support and solidarity with their compatriots in Saudi Arabia. Tens of thousands ralliedfrom Atlanta to Seattle. Thousands more marched throughout Europe. Everywhere they carried banners and shouted, "Shame, shame, shame onyou, Saudi Arabia!"

The evidence of abuse and mistreatment of Ethiopian migrant workers in Saudi Arabia is incontrovertible. In its December 1, 2013 report, Human Rights Watch stated, "Ethiopian migrant workers have been the victims of physical assaults, some of them fatal, in Saudi Arabia following a government crackdown on foreign workers. Many workers seeking to return home are being held in makeshift detention centers without adequate food or shelter."Three factors explain the worldwide explosion ofanger and outrage by Diaspora Ethiopians: 1) the unspeakable barbarity and ruthlessness of Saudi street and police thugs and vigilantes who literally yanked out Ethiopian migrant workers from their homes to beat, rob and jail them; 2) the depraved indifference and silent complicity of theSaudi regime in the face of the unmitigated police and mob violence and

3) the bottomless incompetence and obsequiousness of the regime inEthiopia to their Saudi benefactors.

The reactions of Diaspora Ethiopians and the regime in Ethiopia over the abuse and mistreatment of the migrant workers were in sharp contrast. AsDiaspora Ethiopians stood up for their compatriots in Saudi Arabia, the regime in Addis Ababa was backpedalling, bending over backwards and falling head over heels to bootlick and apologize to the Saudis. It was nauseating! I believe the Saudi abuse and persecution of Ethiopian migrant workers and the callous indifference of the regime in Ethiopia present exceptional teachable moments for all Ethiopians, particularly those in the Diaspora. I define a "teachable moment" as a unique occurrence in history that has extraordinary instructive value for mass education, mobilization and individual engagement. In identifying the following few teachable and learnable lessons in allegorical form, my basicmessage is that crisis reaction is not a winning formula for the attainment of freedom, democracy and human rights in Ethiopia. We should reflect calmly on the things we did right to achieve such extraordinary global unity, solidarity and mobilization in responding to the Saudi crisis. We should use the mobilization "magic" in the Saudi crisis over and over again. We should be in a permanent state of human rights advocacy and mobilization in the Ethiopian Diaspora!

EPRDF's call to Ginbot-7 to negotiate'

ESAT News (December 2, 2013) According to insiders, the government ofthe Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) made thecalls for 'negotiation' with the opposition Ginbot-7 Movement for Justice, Freedom and Democracy (Ginbot-7) for a third time in two months.

Ginbot-7, in its written response, admitted to ESAT that it has received the calls for "negotiation"; however, it said "the call is made, as it has been the custom of the Woyane, in an attempt to soften the tensions". The Movement said, what Ginbot-7 and the people of Ethiopia want to seeis democratic change that comes through peaceful struggle and roundtable discussions, however, Ginbot-7 said, it has been forced to enter into "an all inclusive struggle" due to "Woyane's refusal and chauvinism". In its statement, Ginbot-7 said that its doors are always open for negotiations but that it is only if the negotiation process is not conducted for the sake of it but if it can only lead to the needed freedom through little sacrifice. This does not mean or include any negotiation of accepting or changing the efforts of making Ethiopia a truly democratic country, noted the press statement. As soon as the Movement received the requests for negotiation, it has widely discussed it and came to conclusion that the issue is not solely the concern of the Movement but ofthe Ethiopian people at large.

Ginbot-7 also said that it would not allow the ruling Front, as it has alwaysbeen doing, to use the "negotiation" request for the purpose of softening the tensions that it is finding itself in, for false propaganda, to garner temporary political benefit or to demobilise and dampen the spirits of the democratic fighters. The Movement affirmed that before any negotiation the government should take "trust building" measures to show that it has taken the issue seriously such as unconditionally releasing all political prisoners, journalists, human rights defenders and prisoners detained in publicly known and secret prisons and torture centres, immediately stop harassing and mistreating Ethiopians and particularly opposition forces, respect the human and citizenship rights of Ethiopians, invalidate all politically motivated court decisions, discontinue all ongoing politically motivated court charges, eliminate all repressive laws that are aimed at keeping the people in fear and unease, hold the negotiations in the presence of independent third parties where all the negotiations are recorded via audio-video and kept with independent parties, and the placeof negotiation is in a place where the negotiating parties agree and can transparently let the public know about it. Without having the commitment to take these measures, Ginbot-7 says, it does not absolutelybelieve that the government would seriously take part in negotiations geared towards the establishment of a true democratic system.

In the mean time, until the government takes these "trust building" gestures and the conditions are set and actionable agreements that confirm the existence of strong guarantees that do not give a chance to any form of cheating and sliding are reached, the Movement urged Ginbot-7 and other forces fighting for the establishment of a democraticsystem to intensify and continue their struggle. The press release also asserted that the outcome of the negotiation should be the immediate establishment of a democratic system that makes the Ethiopian people theholders of power however when there is no such commitment from the people in power to reach this goal, Ginbot-7 will not take part in any form of negotiation. Separately asking parties to "negotiate" is a temporary political calculation instead of showing that the government has an interest to permanently make the country a truly democratic nation. Thus,Ginbot-7 states, as there is no democratic system that singularly benefits one organisation, such negotiations should include and be held in an agreement with different political and civic forces. The negotiation is not for power sharing or about who should come to power; it should be a legalone that confirms the power sovereignty of the people and a starting process on how to assume political power on a fair and just manner, Ginbot-7 added.

"…it was not easy for a non-Tigrean PM to assert his role as PM - MEP AnaGomez'
ADDIS STANDARD (December 3, 2013) - Ana Gomes is coordinator and spokesperson of the foreign affairs committee for her political group, the Social-Democrat. With 200 members the Social-Democrat is the second largest group within the European Parliament. For Ethiopia and Ethiopiansthough Ana Gomes is best remembered for her role as the leader of the EU election observers' team during the 2005 crisis-induced general election in Ethiopia. She has had a troubled relationship with Ethiopia's late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who she still calls "a dictator," after shepublished her report in which wrote the election was massively rigged.
Eight years later, Ana Gomes came to Ethiopia to participate in the just concluded 26th ACP-EU parliamentary meeting. Her arrival in Addis Ababacaught many, who thought she would never be allowed to set foot in Ethiopia, by a surprise.
During her brief stay in Addis, she had an exclusive interview with the local journal Addis Standard at the 26th ACP-EU parliamentary meeting. Regarding terrorist charges against detained journalists and politicians, she emphasises "charges are not credible, so I appeal for their liberation in the spirit of openness. You have now a sort of dual register. In public itsaid one thing in private it acknowledges that Ethiopia must change. Or Ethiopia needs support to change. In that context, indeed bold decisions should be taken to liberate these people, because some of these people are icons of the younger generation. Very educated, qualified generation which Ethiopia needs to develop itself. I receive a mail, a standard letter everyday from an Ethiopian who manages to flee the country and who is somewhere in Kenya, Uganda ….Nigeria asking me to write a letter to theUNHCR saying they need political asylum. So I know Ethiopia looses the best, most qualified generation not only because of lack of jobs but because there is politically closed environment with which these young qualified people cannot live. I know Ethiopia faces serious terrorist threatas we all do, Ethiopia in particular because of the neighborhood and the tension that has been built up by Meles Zenawi between Muslims and Christians inside Ethiopia which was not an issue in 2005 but in the meantime became a big source of concern. If the government continues the old ways repressing this bright, younger people who are now connected to the world in a way the regime cannot control them via the twitter, and facebook, and so on. Obviously many of these young people will be driven into the hands of radicals and extremists. Even to be recruited by terrorists. It is what we see happening in other countries in the region. So, it is very important to open up democratically for the security of the country"

There are 2,700 millionaires in Ethiopia – new study reveals'

NWW Oxford, England: Ethiopia, a country with close to 90 million people,has only 2,700 millionaires, according to New World Wealth, a research group based in Oxford, England. Out of these 2,700 millionaires, it is safe to assume that over 90 percent of them are believed to be members of the ruling party, Tigrean People's Liberation Front (TPLF). Read the full text of the report here. Fastest growing African countries for millionaires, 2007 – 2013 Ethiopia has seen the fastest growth in terms of new millionaires in Africa, at 108% over the past six years followed by Angola, Tanzania, Zambia and Ghana. This is according to new data by New WorldWealth, an Oxford based wealth consultancy which has conducted an in- depth analysis of the African high net worth community. South Africa remains the top African country for millionaires with 48,700 of these individuals in 2013, followed by Egypt with 22,800 and Nigeria with 15,700. In terms of growth rate forecasts to 2030, Ivory Coast comes out on top, followed by Zambia, Ghana and then Ethiopia. By2030, South Africa is set to remain on top as the African country with the most millionaires, however, Nigeria will leap ahead of Egypt into second place.

Ethiopian mom and baby killed in Joburg'

Johannesburg (December 4, 2013) – A bullet to the head while she lay in the arms of her mother ended the life of a baby named Happy. The 16- month-old infant was resting on her mother's chest when they were both shot and killed in what is believed to be an attack on foreign nationals in Ekurhuleni townships. The incident happened on Sunday night when Wangore Kebede took his family to Everest in Springs to collect a shipping container from which he operated his shop. “He wanted to find a new place for it because people were complaining,” said Ramadan Ibro, interpreting for him. His wife Tigist Chufamo, baby daughter Happy and Tigist’s brother had left a church in Dunnottar, Springs, with Wangore in the afternoon to fetch the container. Around 9pm, while the family was atthe container, shots were fired at Wangore and his wife’s brother. 16- month-old baby Happy Kebede and her mother, Tigist Chufamo, were killed at Everest in Springs on Sunday after they were shot while in their car.

The Star: “It was dark and they could not see who was there, so they ran away,” said Ibro. Once out of sight, the shooters turned to the bakkie thatwas parked on the other side of the container. “His wife and child were sitting in the vehicle when they were gunned down,” said Ibro. Tigist was shot in the chest and Happy in the head. When Wangore returned to the bakkie, he rushed his family to hospital. Happy died on the way, while Tigist was declared dead on arrival. On Sunday, friends and family gathered at a relative’s house in Dunnottar to mourn their loss. Wangore Kebede Tigist’s husband and Happy’s father mourns their deaths after they were shot in what is believed to be an incident of xenophobia.

The Star: The family are now trying to raise money to send the bodies back to Ethiopia for a proper burial. Kebede’s family believe the murders were related to recent attacks on foreign nationals in Ekurhuleni. “We all used to stay in Duduza and tried to make ends meet. What will happen tous after this?” asked Yonnas Solomon, one of the foreign businessmen who had been targeted. The Ethiopians have been living in Dunnottar for four months after being displaced from Duduza. In August, a teenager was shot by a Somali businessman, resulting in attacks on all foreign- owned businesses in Duduza. In October, the Johannesburg High Court ordered the Ekurhuleni municipality to address the plight of victims of xenophobic violence after Somali, Bangladeshi and Ethiopian communitiesin Duduza and surrounding townships suffered attacks between August and October. The attacks resulted in around 200 shops being looted and 800 foreigners displaced. Ayob Mungalee, of the People Seeking Justice Action Group, said they would be moving the foreign nationals back to Duduza in a week’s time. “They are not aliens, they have documents and live peacefully,” he said. Mungalee believes the attack is part of an ethniccleansing where specific foreigners are targeted. “We will not hesitate to protect their lives and properties,” he said. Springs police spokesman Captain Paul Ntsane said a murder docket had been opened and investigations were continuing. No arrests had been made.

Ethiopia: The Statue of Sayid Mohamed Abdulle (MadMullah) in Jigjiga andthe Silent Occupation’

SomalilandSun (December 5, 2013) - The Ethiopian ruling party favors theold-aged policy based on divide-and-rule that so often dominates not only the politics of Ethiopian highlanders but the Somalia politics as well. But Since Ethiopian dictator Meles Zenawi passed away the ruling party found itself in an uncomfortable position when it comes to shifting a new direction to the regional politics -and modern politics. Such a vision introduced so many problems that made the entire map and ethnic groupsto distrust each other because of the the ruling party's decision. Ethiopianauthority built the Statue of Somali warrior namely Mohammed Abdulle Hassan or nicknamed 'MadMullah' in Jigjiga, is it a joke?

No, It is not a joke, but why? The pressing question on the minds of manySomali historians is, does Ethiopia want to see the same man that resistedits occupation of the Somali soil of Ogaden Region be honored in Jigjiga which is still under its authority? The same Somali hero that constantly waged a war against Abyssinian, highlanders? We somalis say,"La jiifiyaana banaan" which roughly translated two-way street. Ethiopian politicians do not want the school children in Jigjiga to study the history ofthe pious Mohammed Abdulle Hassan and to memories the poems that refer how evil are the Abyssinian highlanders, as the Somali politicians don't like to learn the history of 'Menelik, the Conqueror'. All that is understandable, Ethiopia is going to say that the great Somali hero, patriot Sayid Mohammed Abdulle Hassan was an Ethiopian nationalist thatfought against European Colony mainly great Britain and Italy, a term which may our young generations that don't read their history will easily accept without consideration.

The Puppet Regional administration is helping Ethiopia to loot the statue of Sayid Mohammed Abdulle Hassan without the consent of the Somali people merely for the benefit of their certain interests. I'd like to inform them that history differentiate the bad ones from good ones, Somalis say,"Waan baahanahay loo ma bakhti cuno" which roughly translated. Do not eat the body (corpse) because you are hungry. When Menelik II was asked where the border of his nation by the Europeans-which Abyssinia itself was part of colonists-said vigorously, "The Indian sea" meant Somalia Sea and when further asked, what about Somalis, he said boastfully,"They (Somalis) are my livestock herders". Till today, Menelik II's vision is revived ten times a day in Ethiopian political life. That's why Ethiopia always attempts to influence Somalia's political affairs or Somali internal politics.

As it is the case now, Somalia will never ever stand its feet as long as Ethiopia's silence occupations exists inside Somalia. Ethiopia invaded Somalia in 2006 militarily with the help of United States but was dragged in the streets and defeated in the hands of Somali resistances. There wasrumors that former Duerg President, Mingistu Haile Mariam congratulatedMeles Zenawi that he did impossible mission for walking the streets of Mogadisho, with his army. Ethiopia has always been a big bad neighbor ofSomalia and will always be as long as Ogaden region is under Ethiopian colony. To avoid a bomb that can explode anytime in the near future the people of the Ogaden region must be allowed to decide their own fate byholding a UN-backed Referendum.

Tax collection and corruption disgruntle people'

ESAT NEWS: (December 5, 2013) In a recent public meeting held in the town of Debre Markos, Northern Ethiopia, several business people have expressed their disgruntlement with the taxation system. One of the attendants of the meeting, Simegne Mekuria, said “We respected the government and started paying VAT and now pay up to 73 thousand birr tax per month for a small kiosk. We are disgruntled by the amounts of birrwe are taxed”. He also said that the government had forced them to stop their businesses and sit back which showed that the government had no interest in them developing their country. Another businessman, Mola Bishaw, said on his part “although we filed our complaints, nobody listened to us. Nobody responds. We are in a deep problem due to the lack of good governance and unfair taxation”. Mola said the government had levied one million birr in tax on him and wondered if the taxation was for the City’s budget.

The government does not levy tax fairly, it does not approach us and discuss about it and especially since the past four years everything has become a walk in the darkness, he said. Many other business people engaged in the construction business have also spoken about the extremecorruption observed in the sector. Getachew Mengistu, the City’s Head of Finance and Economic Bureau, admitted that there was a financial loss within the administration. The Mayor of the City, Dereje Denekew, on his own part mentioned that the main causes for the migration of investors were incapacities within the administration, the government’s unscientific estimation based taxation system, and the mistrust between the government and investors. He said, if investors did not hide their incomes,the problems would not have happened.

Nelson Mandela In Ethiopia: A Peacemaker's Beginnings As GuerrillaFighter'

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia By Jacey Fortin (December 6, 2013) - Flags are flying at half-staff outside the African Union headquarters on Friday in honor of Nelson Mandela, whose death Thursday has the entire continent,and the world, in mourning. The activist, politician, scholar, husband, father and Nobel Peace Prize laureate fought against apartheid, a system of formalized segregation that saw black South Africans treated as third- class citizens, and helped to heal a fractured nation in the aftermath of minority rule.

“Nelson Mandela will be remembered as a symbol for wisdom, for the ability to change and the power of reconciliation,” AU Deputy Chairman Erasmus Mwencha told reporters here in Ethiopia's capital city on Friday morning. “His life and legacy is the biggest lesson, motivation, inspiration and commitment any African can give to Africa.” But Madiba, as Mandela was affectionately known, was not always a man of peace. Before he capped his career as South Africa's first black president in 1994, before hespent 27 years imprisoned for his anti-apartheid activism, Mandela came to believe that violence was sometimes necessary in the fight for freedom.And it was in Ethiopia that the young Mandela received his first formal training in the art of guerrilla warfare. At that time, Ethiopia was ruled by Emperor Haile Selassie, who had gained a reputation as a defender of African sovereignty. Mandela was a member of the African National Congress, a then-illegal organization that opposed apartheid in South Africa and is now the country's ruling political party. He had founded the group Umkhonto we Sizwe (Spear of the Nation), which would operate as the military wing of the ANC, in 1961. Mandela first traveled to Addis Ababa in 1962 to attend a pan-African summit as a representative of the ANC.

“Ethiopia has always held a special place in my own imagination, and the prospect of visiting Ethiopia attracted me more strongly than a trip to France, England, and America combined,” Mandela later wrote in his 1994autobiography "Long Walk to Freedom." “I felt I would be visiting my owngenesis, unearthing the roots of what made me an African. Meeting His Highness, Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia, would be like shaking handswith history.” On his Ethiopian Airlines flight to Addis Ababa, Mandela was surprised to find a black pilot in the cockpit, the first he had ever seen.

Mandela went on to visit a host of African countries and meet with leadingofficials, but at the end of his international tour he returned to Ethiopia formilitary training. It didn't last long; the young revolutionary was soon called back to South Africa, and in August 1962 he was arrested and thrown into a Johannesburg prison. He would spend the next 27 years behind bars at several different facilities until his final release in 1990.

Mandela's visit to Ethiopia was a pivotal moment for many Ethiopians, including Merera Gudina, who now chairs the major political opposition coalition Medrek and still draws on South Africa's anti-apartheid strugglefor inspiration.

“Mandela was hosted by one of our best known heroes, Gen. Tadesse Beru, who was at that time the commander of the Ethiopian special forces,” said Merera. “Even during the time of the emperor, people were supporting the cause of South Africans. South Africa was a part of the larger African anti-colonialist struggle.” Mandela spent only a couple of months training with Tadesse, but he didn't leave empty-handed. There isone artifact that still connects South Africa to Ethiopia, a relic of history whose mysterious disappearance has baffled historians for years. During his time in Ethiopia, the young freedom fighter received a gift from the general to symbolize his struggle: a semi-automatic Soviet-made Makarov pistol. He brought it back with him to the headquarters of Umkhonto we Sizwe in South Africa, a place called Liliesleaf Farm outside Johannesburg,and buried it for safekeeping lest authorities raid the premises. That was right before his arrest, and five decades later, the gun has yet to be found, despite Mandela's later assertions that it was buried just 20 paces away from where the Liliesleaf kitchen used to be. (The property has beenrebuilt and divided up, though the Liliesleaf Trust, as it is now called in it new role as a historical site, remains at its former location.) Like that elusive weapon, much of Mandela's military history remains underground;his legacy is built on peace, not war. But in Ethiopia and all across Africa, there are some who still think of Mandela not just as an ambassador of peace, but as a man who knew when something was worth fighting for.

Merera says his own opposition efforts owe much to Mandela's struggles. “In fact, our political party took its first name, Oromo National Congress [it is now known as the Oromo Federalist Congress], from the South African National Congress to symbolize the fact that major groups should not fight for secession, but for more equality,” he said. “We are in many ways connected to Mandela and South Africa.” Jacey Fortin is the IBTimesAfrica Correspondent based in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. The Saudi Anti-migrant Workers Campaign Background’

Saudi Arabia’s Nitaqat Law, and the Ethiopian Migrant Domestic Workers(MDWs)

News updates: (December 6, 2013) Over nine million migrant workers inSaudi Arabia – more than half the work force – fill manual, clerical, and service jobs. Many suffer multiple abuses and labor exploitation, sometimes amounting to forced labor, Human Rights Watch said.

In June 2011, the Saudi Ministry of Labor announced Ministerial ResolutionNo 4040 AS as part of a drive to ensure private employment for Saudis byreserving at least 10% of local jobs in any company for native citizens.

Nitaqat provisions also define the rights of MDWs and their employers. Worker protections include monthly pay, sick leave, paid vacation and nine hours of free time per-day. Since Nitaqat’s announcement in 2011, upto four million expatriate workers regularised their work documents andabout 1.5 heir work permits.

The violence between Saudis and Ethiopians follows months of local pressreports blaming Ethiopian female domestic workers for brutal attacks against Saudi employers. In July, Saudi officials claimed that over 200 Ethiopian women had been detained in two months for “psychological problems,” leading the labor ministry to temporarily ban the recruitment of Ethiopian workers to the country.

In October, 2013: the Ethiopian Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in turn, stopped processing applications for Ethiopians to travel to Saudi Arabia, citing concerns over poor labor conditions for Ethiopian migrants, but inturn ignores to provide precautionary measures for Ethiopian migrant workers in Saudi.

On November 4, 2013: according to Saudi local media outlets, authoritieshave arrested and deported thousands of workers since then.

Saudi officials say that the ongoing labor crackdown against foreign workers, which includes road checkpoints and raids on businesses, is part of Saudi Arabia's effort to combat high levels of unemployment among Saudi citizens by opening jobs previously filled by undocumented workers.Those targeted include workers who do not have the proper residency or work permits, and workers who are caught working for an employer who is not their legal sponsor.

On November 9th , 2013: violence broke out in Riyadh's southern district of Manfouha among Ethiopian MDWs angered by the Kingdom's campaignagainst expatriate workers.

On November 23rd, 2013: the deadline of Nitaqat has been extended forthe third time and has given undocumented expatriate workers time till December 4, 2013 to have their status corrected.

The Saudi Ministry of Labor extended the grace period of Nitaqat's implementation to November 3rd , 2013. During this time, all foreign workers including many Ethiopians either had to obtain proper docs or willingly leave the Kingdom.

Human Rights Watch (HRW) has repeatedly called on the Saudi government to abolish aspects of the kafala visa or "sponsorship system"that create conditions for abuse, including rules requiring a worker to obtain permission from his or her employer to change jobs or leave the country. These rules leave foreign workers with little option for redress incases of abuse or labor violations and force them into under-the-table work.

"Saudi authorities say they are carrying out a crackdown on migrant workers humanely, but keeping thousands of people in makeshift centerswithout adequate food, shelter, or medical attention could lead to humanitarian disaster," rights groups say, "Saudi officials should release the detainees or send them home immediately."

Gov't actions re: Saudi returnees sharply criticised'

ESAT News Analysis: (December 6, 2013) The number of Ethiopian migrants being returned from Saudi Arabia due to issues related to 'illegalresidence' is tremendously increasing, which has worried the Ethiopian government. Insiders say that the fact that the government has not budgeted sufficient funds for the rehabilitation of the returnees is a national dishonour. It is to be recalled that the government had said that the number of returnees was not going to be more than 23, 000 and that it has allocated 50 million birr for the whole process. Although the government later said the number was 50 to 80 thousand, according to State media reports the number of the returnees until December 4, 2013 has been gone over 100,000. Although it has declared that it has allocated50million birr, sources say the government has not done anything tangiblefor the returnees other than temporarily sheltering them inside the Civil Service University before dispersing them to regions of their origin promising them that they will be given a job there.

Observers said that most of the returnees have come home having their wealth confiscated by the Saudi authorities, and sending these people intotheir families empty-handed was “Saddening”. Some residents of Addis Ababa that our reporter spoke to said that in a country where over 3.2 billion birr goes unaccounted for, as in the case of the Ministry of Defensetwo years ago, it is indefensible that the country was unable to even give little help to our returning citizens and uses its little effort for political gains. The government’s will to increase the amount of money for the rehabilitation and reintegration of returning Ethiopian migrants has been minimal. In a related report, Ethiopians residing in Switzerland have protested opposing the mistreatment of Ethiopian migrant workers in Saudi Arabia for a second time. Engineer Yilkal Getnet, Chairman of Semayawi (Blue) Party, who is on a mission of promoting his Party in the Diaspora, also took part in the protest held in Genèva city. One of the protest organisers, activist Petros Ashenafi said that they will tirelessly continue to voice their concerns to the international community until theircries are heard. Engineer Yilkal, who spoke to the crowd, said that he wasstunned to take part in a protest outside his country when he was denied doing so in his own land.

LEGACY - African Leaders Must Follow in Mandela’s Footsteps, saidactivists'

ST Addis Ababa (December 6, 2013) — As the world mourns the passing of former South African president, Nelson Mandela, political activists in Ethiopia have stressed the need for African politicians to emulate the anti-Apartheid hero. Reacting to reports of Mandela’s death, activists and ordinary Ethiopians in several interviews with Sudan Tribune said the former South Africa president’s passing should serve as a wakeup call for African leaders to “begin implementing best political practices.” “African leaders must learn from Mandela on how to leave a better place to the continent and to the world at large” Solomon Negassi, an Ethiopian politician told Sudan Tribune. Negassi said African leaders are failing in working towards building unity, national reconciliation, Justice and humanrights in their respective countries. Separately, Genet Yohannes, an economist, says unless African leaders follow a positive political path like Mandela achieving African unity will be difficult.

Mandela, who died on Thursday at the age of 95, became the first South African Black president in 1994 after he spent 27 years in prison under thethen Apartheid regime. After serving one term as a president, Mandela handed over power to Thabo Mbeki in 1999, something uncommon amongAfrican leaders. An Ethiopian opposition official who sought anonymity toldSudan Tribune that African leaders particularly the despotic must learn from Mandela and limit their stay in office. “African leaders must learn to limit their grip on power” the opposition official said adding “I don’t think African leaders are yet ready to make such a decision” Once he gained power, Nelson Mandela, winner of the 1993 Nobel Peace Prize didn’t seek reprisal against those – under the white minority rule – that threw him in prison to serve a long jail term. A memorial service will be held in Johannesburg on December 10 and his funeral will take place on 15 December.

ETHIOPIA PAYS TRIBUTE:

In a statement released on Friday, Hailemariam Dessalegn, the Ethiopian prime minister and African Union (AU) chairperson expressed sympathy with the family of Mandela and the South African people. “President Mandela did not only lead his country’s struggle against Apartheid but hasalso been the torch bearer in the quest for Africa’s freedom” said a statement by the ministry of foreign Affairs. Mandela inspired generationsof world leaders to stand for justice, human dignity and freedom. The Anti-Apartheid icon was in Ethiopia during his exile in the 1960s while he was leading the struggle for freedom. “Indeed, President Mandela leaves behind a great vision from which all of us Africans should draw inspiration”said the Ethiopian premier. The statement added the Ethiopia governmentwill continue to value the principles of democracy, freedom, justice, tolerance and reconciliation for which President Mandela dedicated his life.

Nelson Mandela's unwavering courage, forgiveness and hope touched andinspired people all around the world. He showed that the dream of a just society is possible and he challenged our generation to lead the way towards it. As Mandela said in his extraordinary 2005 speech in London's Trafalgar Square, 'Like slavery and apartheid, poverty is not natural. It is man-made and it can be overcome and eradicated by the actions of human beings.' And he ended his speech with a call that moves us still. 'Sometimes,' Mandela said, 'it falls upon a generation to be great. You canbe that great generation. Let your greatness blossom.' One way to honourNelson Mandela's memory is to share those words to prove every day thatthis generation can be the great one that ends extreme poverty.

Top News: (December 7, 2013) Mohammed Amin, a journalist based inKhartoum, reports Ethiopia and Eritrea are in 'secret talks' mediated by

Ethiopia approved over 361 investment projects to KSA’

ARAB NEWS analysis, JEDDAH: (December 7, 2013) - Ethiopian ambassador Mohammad Kabeera said his country has approved more than 361 investment projects to Saudi Arabia mainly in the agricultural sector. The envoy said that Saudi Arabia comes at the forefront of the GCC countries investing in Ethiopia, one among several African nations that have been targeted by Custodian of the Two Holy Mosques Program for Agricultural Investment Abroad. “We have issued licenses for 361 Saudi investment projects in Ethiopia, 125 of which have begun operations. These projects have created job opportunities for around 35,000 Ethiopians,” he said. Kabeera said that Ethiopia had formed a national committee responsible for receiving Ethiopians returning from theKingdom after the crackdown on illegal workers, take them back to their villages and help them find stable jobs mainly in the agriculture sector. Headded that his government had prioritized women and children when issuing travel documents and arranged for their journey home on its expense and through his country’s national airlines. Anwar Eshki, director of the Middle East Center for Strategic and Legal Studies, said the Kingdom had done everything to help expatriates correct their status, butsome had failed to do so either because of administrative hassles or otherreasons. “The Kingdom initiated the residency-status correction process because it wishes to legalize all its residents,” he said, adding that the Kingdom also wants to create job opportunities for its nationals through the correction process. As a result of the Nitaqat program many young Saudis have been able to find jobs in the private sector. Saudi Arabia has recently made investments worth SR16 billion in Ethiopia. Ishqi said that these investments will create thousands of jobs and provide food security for Ethiopians.

Mandela’s Ethiopia Connection’

Former Imperial Minister of Defense Ato Ayalew Mandefro Remembers

Police Captain Dinqua Guta’s Interview on how he saved the life ofMandela from South African Assassins. “What were Ethiopia’s contributions to Nelson Mandela's anti-apartheid struggle?", a couple of individuals responded with what they know, heard or read somewhere –most of it in the public realm.

Side note: It was Ato Ayalew Mandefro as a person who had met Nelson Mandela in official capacity, I assumed as Ethiopia's minister of Defence under Emperor Haile Selassie. It was refreshing reading the e-mail, which I received when the former defense minister responded to the original question. It came to me as testimony from history. More importantly, it found me with a very low mood, because, when other Africans states werementioned with their remarks and role on the BBC and their contributions, immediately after news of his passing, one prominent name in Africa's anti-apartheid struggle was missing – Ethiopia's. That is why this e-mail reproduced here, gave me some comfort and I am grateful to Ato Ayalew Mandefro for that reason. Since the e-mail was public information and in public forum, I have taken the liberty of reproducing it hereunder, as a piece of our history to benefit many other Ethiopians and foreigners alike:

"When Mandela was apprehended by the Apartheid Police and guided toprison for life at Robin Island, two small photos and a small pistol with ivory handle was found in his Kaki coat pockets. One of the photo was that of His Majesty the emperor and the other was of Ato Ketema Yifru,then Foreign minister. Needless to add, during his long and valiant struggle against Racist South African Government of the time, Mandela and his comrade in arms received consistently from the Imperial Government huge moral and financial support as well as crucial armed training in various military institutions. I feel specially sad by Mandela'sdeath as I keep indelible memory of my meeting with him in person during one of his rare visits of the Ethiopian Foreign Office in the early sixties. May God Bless his Soul!", Ato Ayalew mentioned .

We apologize for forgetting to mention early on in this piece that the role Ethiopia played in the anti-apartheid struggle is not limited to training andenhancing combat capabilities of the ANC fighters. Ethiopia, is also amongst the main actors to international actions to bring the apartheid regime's isolation within the international system.

Ethiopia strongly believed that not only that this racist and segregationistpolicy would have ramifications on its capacity to administer South West Africa (now Namibia), under the League of Nations mandate entrusted toSouth Africa.

For that, after the Sharpeville Massacre of March 21, 1960, Ethiopia, alongwith Liberia, on November 4, 1960 took the apartheid regime to the International Court of Justice (ICJ) for its apartheid policy. The two countries, "acting in the capacity of States which were members of the former League of Nations, put forward various allegations of contraventions of the League of Nations Mandate for South West Africa bythe Republic of South Africa."

In that context, the arguments of the duo before the Court was, accordingto ICJ document, South West Africa (Ethiopia v. South Africa) rested on clear answers WHETHER:
South Africa's League of Nations mandate for South West Africa was stillin force;
The Mandatory's obligation to furnish annual reports on its administrationto the Council of the League of Nations had become transformed into an obligation so to report to the General Assembly of the United Nations;
The Respondent had, in accordance with the Mandate, promoted to theutmost the material and moral wellbeing and the social progress of theinhabitants of the territory;
The Mandatory had contravened the prohibition in the Mandate of the "military training of the natives" and the establishment of military or navalbases or the erection of fortifications in the territory; and South Africa hadcontravened the provision in the Mandate that it (the Mandate) can only be modified with the consent of the Council of the League of Nations, by attempting to modify the Mandate without the consent of the United Nations General Assembly, which, it was contended by the Applicants, hadreplaced the Council of the League for this and other purposes.
The Court rejected the appeal. But building bloc by bloc, the anti- apartheid forces prevailed within the United Nations system. Because of that, on December 2, 1968 the General Assembly adopted a resolution requesting all states and organizations "to suspend cultural, educational,sporting and other exchanges with the racist regime and with organisations or institutions in South Africa which practice apartheid."
By 1973: The General Assembly of the UN has adopted its landmarkresolution sanctioning apartheid as a crime.
By July 18, 1976 : The convention of the UN General Assembly came intoforce.
Facts about Nelson Mandela's Ethiopia connection; Ato Ayalew Mandefrobears testimony'
Nelson Mandela wrote in his autobiography, "Ethiopia always has a specialplace in my imagination and the prospect of visiting Ethiopia attracted me more strongly than a trip to France, England, and America combined. I feltI would be visiting my own genesis, unearthing the roots of what made me an African."

During his period in exile, Nelson Mandela spent time in Ethiopia in 1962,where he received military training and where he addressed the Organization of African Unity. It was shortly after leaving Ethiopia to South Africa that he was arrested, and served 27 years in prison.

Would you like to stay in the same room where Nelson Mandela once sleptin? Travel no further than the Ras Hotel in downtown Addis Ababa.

During his stay in Ethiopia, Nelson Mandela received an Ethiopian passportunder the alias name 'David Motsamayi.'

Nelson Mandela has received a Bulgarian-made handgun from the Ethiopian Brig. General Tadesse Birru in 1962. It was reportedly buried inSouth Africa and much effort is being made to find it. If found, it could beworth over USD two million.

According to an interview with Time Magazine editor Richard Stengel, Nelson Mandela met and spoke to Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie I. On one occasion Mandela was quoted saying, "I explained to him very brieflywhat was happening in South Africa…He was seated on his chair, listeninglike a log…not nodding, just immovable, you know, like a statue…"

Following his release in February 1990, Nelson Mandela returned to Ethiopia in July 1990, as part of his worldwide tour, timed for the openingof the OAU summit. The Washington TIMES reported that, "the Organization of African Unity opened its annual summit here yesterday bygiving anti-apartheid leader Nelson Mandela a hero's reception."

Nelson Mandela often associates the significance of Ethiopia and Ethiopianism as the inspiration for the formation of his political party the African National Congress(ANC). In December 1992 at the Free Ethiopian Church of South Africa, he was quoted saying, "Fundamental tenets of theEthiopian Movement were self-worth, self-reliance and freedom. These tenets drew the advocates of Ethiopianism, like a magnet, to the growing political movement. That political movement was to culminate in the formation of the ANC in 1912. It is in this sense that we in the ANC trace the seeds of the formation of our organization to the Ethiopian Movement of the 1890s."

It was noted that during the second annual International Nelson MandelaDay in 2011, 2,300 trees were planted around Addis Ababa in Mandela's honor, according to Ms. Clara Keisuetter, Charge de Affair of the South Africa Embassy in Ethiopia.

The legacy of Nelson Mandela will continue to remain in Ethiopia. Today inAddis Ababa, there is a distance education college named after Mandela,acenter in Addis Ababa University in his honour and a school in Arba Minchnamed after him.

ETHIOPIA - Saudi investors leave Ethiopia’

(December 9, 2013) Saudi agricultural investor has warned on about thefailure of Saudi agricultural investments in Ethiopia and the liquidation ofbusinesses due to the conditions set by the [Saudi] Agricultural Development Fund (ADF) to support and lend to investors in Ethiopia.

Summary: Following a recent crisis between Riyadh and Addis Ababa regarding the former’s crackdown on undocumented Ethiopian workers,many Saudi investors are pulling out of Ethiopia.

This is not to mention the negative impact of such conditions on the process of correcting the situation of foreign workers in Saudi Arabia, including many Ethiopians. He revealed that some Saudi investors in Ethiopia have begun to sell their investments due to the impossible conditions set by the ADF for loans, in addition to the lack of facilities toexport their produce to Saudi Arabia.

The head of the Saudi Agriculture Investors Association in Ethiopia, Mohammed bin Abdul Rahman Al Shahri, told Al-Hayat that Saudi investors in Ethiopia have filed complaints to the Saudi king about the ADFconditions, which are in direct conflict with King Abdullah's Initiative for Agricultural Investment Abroad.

He also said that there are more than 400 Saudi businessmen in Ethiopia investing in the cultivation of a variety of crops, namely wheat, rice and barley. He added that the association was established to introduce investors … and show them the best places for agriculture, where water isabundant. The association also provides translation services, investment management and communicates with the competent authorities in Ethiopia. When it was first established, the association had 10 members, whose number increased to reach 60 agricultural investors.

Shahri also said that Saudi investors in Ethiopia began work in 2008, following the king’s Initiative for Agricultural Investment Abroad. The sizeof Saudi investments in the agricultural sector in Ethiopia is currently estimated at 13 billion riyals [$3.47 billion].

Moreover, he stated that the investment environment inside Ethiopia differs from one place to another, as some areas are very weak in terms of infrastructure. In certain places, investors contributed to building roads,transportation means and bridges for farmers, since the country is riddledwith rivers. He confirmed that investing in Ethiopia helped the Ethiopian people, as it created job opportunities. Ethiopian workers in some smallfarms number more than 1,500 for a season. Ethiopians have also received training to use modern equipment, machinery and techniques relating to the agricultural sector.

He confirmed that Saudi Arabia is one of the largest investors in Ethiopia,especially in terms of the number of workers. He said that Saudis face competition from Pakistan, India and China.

Shahri stressed that the ADF has not supported Saudi projects from the beginning according to the king's initiative. "We are still waiting for support, as per the mechanism set forth in the initiative. However, two weeks ago we were surprised by the ADF conditions, which are impossibleto meet on the part of large agricultural companies, let alone small investors," he said. He pointed out that investors have sought over the past few years to move the initiative from the Commerce Ministry to the Agriculture Ministry.

"The ADF commissioned a local consultancy office to study the support provided for agricultural investors abroad, which unfortunately resulted inthese conditions," he said. He added that the ADF conditions cannot be met by states, as the fund requested investors to provide guarantees of the political security in the country where they invest. "How can this be done?" he asked.

He said that investors were looking forward to ADF support during the meeting that was held in Riyadh between overseas investors and ADF representatives. "Unfortunately, the ADF informed us of its impossible conditions, which it made without consulting any of the investors. This violates the foundations of the initiative, leading to its failure," he said.

He revealed that a number of Saudi companies investing in Ethiopia havebegun to sell and liquidate their farms and said, "A number of Saudi investors asserted that they were intending to sell their investments especially since they had waited more than five years without receiving any support or achieving the terms of King Abdullah's Initiative for Agricultural Investment Abroad."

Shahri continued, "Adjusting the situation of the Ethiopian labor force in Saudi Arabia has doubled the despair of many investors, fearing for theirinvestments in Ethiopia. We, as investors, were surprised with the adjustment process. Many Ethiopians in Saudi Arabia were deported."

"We should admit that mistakes have been committed by both sides. Theillegal entrance of Ethiopians is unacceptable. In addition, the Ministry ofLabor has dealt with them without knowing their exact number and the way to deport them," said Shahri, affirming that "what is happening withEthiopians in Saudi Arabia will affect our investments in their country on the popular level."

In regard to the stance of the Ethiopian government toward Saudi projects, Shahri said, “The government of Addis Ababa has not announcedanything. It preserves Saudi investors, and we are following up the situation from Saudi Arabia. Many investors preferred to stay in Saudi Arabia until the dust settles there, even though it is the harvest season.”

Shahri called on the governments of both countries to settle the issue assoon as possible, especially with opposition tabloids in Ethiopia taking advantage of the situation. He noted that investors are not facing particular problems since the Ethiopian government is keen to protect Saudi investors as well as investments.

Nelson Mandela’s Ethiopia Connection’

Colonel Fekadu Wakene - The man who taught Mandela to be a soldier’

BBC Africa, Addis Ababa (December 9, 2013) Last updated - In July 1962,Col Fekadu Wakene taught South African political activist Nelson Mandela the tricks of guerrilla warfare - including how to plant explosives before slipping quietly away into the night. Mr Mandela was in Ethiopia, learning how to be the commander-in-chief of Umkhonto we Sizwe - the armed wing of the African National Congress (ANC). The group had announced itsarrival at the end of 1961 by blowing-up electricity pylons in various places in South Africa. Then on 11 January 1962, Mr Mandela had secretly, and illegally, slipped out of South Africa. His mission was to meetas many African political leaders as possible and garner assistance for the ANC, including money and training for its military wing. And to be moulded into a soldier himself. During this trip, he visited Ethiopia twice and left a deep impression on those who met him during his stay in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa.

Made others laugh: "Nelson Mandela was a very strong and resilient student, and he took instruction well and was really very likeable," ColonelFekadu said. "You couldn't help but love him."

Colonel Fekadu said “Mr Mandela was a good student” - Col Fekadu was a corporal when he trained Mr Mandela. He was a member of a specialist police force - the riot battalion - based in the suburbs of Kolfe, in barrackswhich are still used today. He remembers a "happy, cheerful person" who "concentrated on the task in hand". "He was polite, always happy and younever saw him lose his temper," he said. "He laughed easily and made others laugh as well." Col Fekadu says he was responsible for training Mr Mandela in sabotage and demolitions and how to stage hit-and-run attacks. The day's theory lessons were put into practice during night-time exercises. Mr Mandela was a good student, hardworking and physically strong - but sometimes too robust and too enthusiastic for his own good, the colonel recalls. "Physically he was very strong and well-built. But sometimes during the training he would get ahead of himself. "And while his intentions were good, that could also be dangerous, and sometimes we had to restrain him a bit for safety reasons." Col Fekadu had been told to train Mr Mandela by his commanding officer, General Tadesse Birru, the assistant police commissioner who had played a key role in crushing an attempt at the end of 1960 to overthrow Emperor Haile Selassie. He was later executed by the Duerg regime of Mengistu Haile Mariam. Back in 1962, Col Fekadu did not realise the significance of the South African politician he had been instructed to turn into a soldier. "All we knew was that he was our guest from abroad and that he would spend some time with us," he said. "Everything was kept very secret. We were kept in the dark." Mr Mandela was in Ethiopia at the invitation of the emperor, an ardent supporter of Africa's decolonisation process and the African unity. At the time, Ethiopia had one of the strongest armed forces on the continent. Its troops were part of the UN peacekeeping operation during the Congo crisis in 1960 and a decade earlier Ethiopian soldiers had fought in the Korean war. And the emperor had invited many other Africanliberation struggle fighters to be trained on Ethiopian soil. As well as learning how to commit acts of sabotage, Mr Mandela's military training also included briefings on military science, how to run an army and how touse a gun. He was also taken on long treks carrying his knapsack, rifle and ammunition. This was one of Mr Mandela's favourite activities during his military training, and he writes about it with affection in his Long Walk to Freedom autobiography: "During these marches I got a sense of the landscape, which was very beautiful... people used wooden ploughs and lived on a very simple diet supplemented by home-brewed beer. Their existence was similar to the life in rural South Africa."

Talkative: Mr Mandela's presence in Addis Ababa was supposed to be top secret. But physically he stood out. He was much taller and broader than most of the police cadets. And, as well as going on fatigue marches through the countryside, he would exercise out in the open in the groundsof the barracks. One person who took a particular interest in the tall stranger in his midst was Tesfaye Abebe, who was working in Kolfe as the head of the battalion's music and drama department. He recalls Mr Mandela running around a big field in the compound - which today doublesup as a running track and a parade ground. "He would do squats and jumping jacks. He followed that exercise routine religiously every morning." A curious Mr Tesfaye snatched conversations with Mr Mandela when he and his trainer came into the canteen for lunch. "Security was quite tight and we weren't really allowed to approach him." But, he says, Mr Mandela was "very friendly and talkative" and explained apartheid to him and how the ANC intended to fight it with guerrilla warfare and political activism. On a couple of occasions, the police band - in which Mr Tesfaye was the pianist - played for Mr Mandela in the officer's club. "He really enjoyed that. He was really happy when we played for him." Nelson Mandela later wrote in his 1994 autobiography entitled ‘Long Walk to Freedom’ “Ethiopia has always held a special place in my own imagination,and the prospect of visiting Ethiopia attracted me more strongly than a trip to France, England, and America combined,” “I felt I would be visiting my own genesis, unearthing the roots of what made me an African. Meeting His Royal Highness, Emperor Haile Selassie I of Ethiopia, would be like shaking hands with history.” Writing in his autobiography, Mandelaspeaks fondly about Ethiopia as a country that inspired him to continue his struggle against apartheid. He quoted as saying, "here, for the first time in my life, I was witnessing black soldiers commanded by black generals applauded by black leaders who were all guests of black head of state. It was a heady moment. I only hoped it was a vision of what lay in future formy own country..." Ethiopia’s Police Brig. General Taddesse Birru reportedly gave Mandela the famous Bulgarian-made pistol that remains buried at a secret location in South Africa. Ethiopia is always remembered for it’s pivotal role in the life of the African National Congress (ANC) and it’s leaders that nurtured and led that organization, and in the decolonization process of Africa as a whole. Ethiopians should deservingly be proud that their forefathers were able to set an example and show the world that black people are capable of running their country’s own affairs.

Nelson Mandela also visited Tanzania right after: Staying with the late minister Nsilo Swai, whose wife, Vicky Nsilo Swai, told the BBC about his left behind luggage. "On the day Mandela was leaving, he had to leave behind a suitcase because he had too much luggage. In the suitcase was apair of brown, leather boots. My husband and I ended up keeping them for33 years. After my husband retired from politics, we moved from Dar es Salaam to Moshi, near to Kilimanjaro - and the boots came with us. Then, my husband got a job with the United Nations so the boots lived in New York for 15 years. I kept them in our bedroom in a cupboard. I never polished them, I never cleaned them but I put newspaper in them to keep them firm. The boots are very strong and the leather is excellent - and when I took them back to Mr Mandela in 1995 they were really like new.

The boots still fitted Mr Mandela and he joked that 'these boots have travelled more than myself'. A lot of people are surprised why I kept the boots for so long. But I really wanted a man who I saw so dedicated to hiscountry to have a memory of these boots." Today people across the worldare mourning the death of a man who fought ceaselessly for the emancipation of South Africa and became the country's first black president. Throughout his 95 years he has spoken words that ring true formany – about creating change, about equality, about compassion, about reconciliation and tolerance. The great Nelsen Mandela leaves a legacy of equality, democracy and education. It is incredibly important that all of ustake his passing not as an end of an age, but as a renewed determination to carry on his work every day.

Ogaden, a region of Defence officials’ affluence: Sources'

Report: (December 10, 2013) Top placed sources within the Somali Regional State Administration of Ethiopia in Jijiga have told our reporter that when top officials of the Ethiopian Defense Forces come to the Region, they engage in a large scale wealth accrual together with the officials of the Regional State. Currently, one of the richest people in the region and based in Jijiga, Miss Hawa, is the second wife of Major GeneralYohannes Gebremeskel, a top official of the Ethiopian Defense Force, and the mother of his child. Credit goes to her lover Yohannes; the lady has been able to change from being an ordinary Khat trader to amassing hundreds of millions in wealth, the sources added. General Yohannes came to know Miss Hawa when he was a Colonel as the Head the WesternGode Zone. Yohnnes had helped Hawa amass over 100million birr by letting her company subcontract the Canal Cleaning bid that the National Defense Force was made to win: As the love affair between the General and Hawa grew, she even went to the extent of harassing and threatening the Region's tax officers and clearing herself from taxation. Hawa has built two big buildings in Jijiga with her lover, General Yohannes. In addition to this, she has been allowed to handle other projects in the Region that are worth hundreds of millions. Some of the projects include the Kabri Dehar Water Provision, Degehabur Water Provision, Jijiga Teachers Training Expansion, Regional Education Bureau Project, Modern Meeting Hall, and other expensive buildings. Although Hawa is at the forefront of managing the wealth, sources say, it is GeneralYohannes who controls the construction of the region's projects. General Yohannes has built a very modern apartment building in Bole Medhanealem area in Addis Abeba. In a related report, a drinking water project in the birthplace of the Region's President has reportedly failed after a colonel of the Ethiopian Defense forces, also a member of the TPLF, signed a 120 million birr contract and started the project. Sources said the Colonel was paid 22 million birr from the Regional Administration's account. Staff members of the Regional Administration also said that people that have direct connection to the Regional Administration have been the main profiteers during the recent the 8th Ethiopian Nations, Nationalities and Peoples' Day celebrated last week in Jigjiga winning most of the contracts. Our efforts to get the responses of the Regional President, Abdi Mohammed, have been unsuccessful.

Human Rights Congress confirms rights abuses in Benishangul-Gumuz'

ESAT News: (December 11, 2013) The Human Rights Congress (HRC) of Ethiopia has confirmed that human rights and physical abuses have been committed against thousands of Ethiopians who have been evicted from different zones of the Benishangul-Gumuz region for belonging to the "Amhara ethnic origin". HRC also stated that around 10, 000 citizens residing in the region have been told that they were not "natives of the region" and were forcefully evicted from the region as of April 23, 2013. The Congress has also stated that it has confirmed from the complaints and testimonies of the representatives of the evictees that children and women, females and the helpless have been going through enormous predicament due to lack of adequate food and drink. It also stated that it had been able to investigate the scale of the problem and the general situation of the evictees. The report states that the evictees are currently in a difficult situation and for example in some areas such as the KamasheZone; the properties of the returnees have been confiscated making it impossible for the returnees to restart their life. HRC's investigators have been able to confirm from the words of the victims that their ethnic origin has been mentioned as a reason and they have been refused and discriminated access to credits, seeds and fertilisers.

The number of evictees from the Baruda Kebele and its environs of the Bulen Woreda in Metekel Zone were around 5000 that were later spread out in Chagni town of the Amhara region. During their investigation, HRC'sresearchers have found that there were over 500 people who were dispersed in different areas of the town. The victims also told the Human Rights organisation that they have harassed, threatened and arrested for telling the abuses and hardships they have sustained during the eviction. An application letter signed by over 140 evictees and other documents sent to the Congress reveal that they have went through a lot of suffering,abuse and discrimination at the hands of regional officials and local populace. Evictees from Baruda Kebele have told the Congress that their properties have not yet been returned to them, they are being attacked, have got no support, are denied access to agricultural inputs for originating from "that ethnic group". ESAT's reporter has also confirmed that although Ethiopians of the Amhara ethnic origin that have been evicted from the Benishangul-Gumuz region have been returned back to the region last year, they still have not received any form of help from thegovernment and are even facing different forms of administrative abuses.

Massive deportation of Ethiopians underway in Saudi Arabia'

The Arab world's biggest economy has taken action against illegal workersas it pushes to create more jobs for Saudi citizens and stave off the unrestthat has toppled leaders across the Middle East since 2011. At least 115,465 Ethiopians have been repatriated, according to the International Organization for Migration (IOM). Hundreds of thousands of Asian migrants are also being deported from the oil-producing nation, which washome to about 9 million foreign workers in a population of 29.9 million, according to Saudi government statistics. Ethiopia's government said three nationals were killed in clashes with police in Riyadh that started Nov. 9. Ejected workers say rioting occurred after Ethiopians were angered by the rape of Ethiopian women at apartments in the Manfouha district.

History: Remembering the glorious, the unifier, and the soldifier emperorof Ethiopia'

EM: Today December 12, 2013 is the 100th anniversary of the death of Emperor Menelik II, who's largely credited for introducing the country to modernization. As a tribute to the great Emperor who led his forces to victory over Italian colonial invaders at the 1896 Battle of Adwa, here's abrief history: Emperor Menelik II of Ethiopia is a member of an elite minority group, standing alongside the likes of the great Chief Sitting Bullof the Lakota Sioux and King Cetshwayo of the Zulu as one of the native leaders whose forces won a great victory over a modern European army. His importance to the survival and emergence of the Empire of Ethiopia would be hard to overstate. He was born Sahle Maryam on August 17, 1844 to King Haile Melekot of Shewa. His father made him heirto his throne but after the death of Haile Melekot he was taken prisoner byEmperor Tewodros II when he conquered the Kingdom of Shewa. Prince Sahle Maryam was well treated until a rebellion flared up in Shewa and after a great deal of fighting in Shewa between various factions Prince Sahle Maryam escaped and claimed the throne of his father. The peoplerallied to his side and he proclaimed himself King Menelik of Shewa andeven asserted a claim on the imperial title though he took no action to press it. He had plenty of more immediate concerns with a number of rebellions and intrigues to deal with, which was not uncommon for the time and place.

When Yohannes IV became Emperor he recognized Menelik as rightful King of Shewa after Menelik formally submitted to him as emperor on March 20, 1878. This proved to be the right decision as Emperor YohannesIV lavished gifts on Menelik, including modern European weaponry which greatly helped secure his own position. When the Emperor was killed at the battle of Gallabat on March 10, 1889 he named his son as his heir justbefore his death but Menelik himself claimed the imperial title, arguing that his own descent from the sacred bloodline of King Solomon of Israel and the Queen of Sheba was in the male line whereas that of Yohannes IV(and thus his son) had been in the female line. Menelik won out with mostof the nobility going over to his side and on November 3, 1889 at the Church of Mary on Mount Entoto the Bishop of Shewa formally crowned him Menelik II, “King of kings” of Ethiopia. He did not have long to wait before confronting the biggest crisis of his reign and it related to an earlierissue many have since seen as an error on his part.

On March 2, 1889 Menelik, while still fighting for his throne, had signed the treaty of Wuchale with the Kingdom of Italy acknowledging Eritrea as an Italian colony. A problem in translation, however, led to a dispute over part of the treaty. Menelik II had understood that the Italians have offeredhim their assistance should he ever need to call on them. The Italians, on the other hand, had written this in a more authoritative way, claiming Ethiopia as a protectorate. When this was made clear to Emperor Menelik II he quickly disavowed the treaty saying that he never had any intention,nor did he at the time have the uncontested right, to make Ethiopia a protectorate of Italy. At this time the liberal nationalists in control of the newly unified Kingdom of Italy were anxious to assert their status as a major power and join the club of colonial nations. Menelik II disavowing the treaty was all the reason Rome needed to declare war and an invasionforce was quickly organized in Eritrea to begin a campaign to bring Ethiopia firmly under Italian rule.

The Italians won a number of early victories which caused their confidenceto soar and this overconfidence prompted them to make a number of costly mistakes. Emperor Menelik was disturbed by the Italian successes and called upon the French for help, however, they were content to let Italy have a free hand in Ethiopia in return for French control of Tunisia.

Oddly enough the only European power to sympathize with Ethiopia was the Russian Empire. Determined to fight on alone the Emperor took great care in securing the allegiance of the powerful nobles of Ethiopia and he had long been working to arm as much of his army with the most modernweapons possible. The Italians expected many of the nobles to join them out of self-interest but this did not happen. The Emperor had taken care that these men were loyal to him and neutralized those whose loyalty wassuspect. Furthermore, the Italians were not expecting the Ethiopians to beso well armed or organized as they were.

Emperor Menelik II rallied a massive army and Ethiopian forces surprised the world by inflicting some minor defeats on the Italians which promptedthe government of Francesco Crispi to order a final, climactic confrontation. The result was the battle of Adowa fought on March 1, 1896. The Emperor brought roughly 100,000 warriors to the field to meetan Italian army of some 17,800. The Italians were much better armed butthe odds against them proved insurmountable. While the Ethiopians fought tenaciously the Italian commander lost his nerve and by mid-day the Italian army was in full retreat. Emperor Menelik II and the country ofEthiopia was suddenly thrust into international fame by their astounding feat. People across the world who had never heard of Ethiopia were suddenly aware that these overlooked African people, led by their Emperor, had defeated a modern European army. In the aftermath Ethiopian independence was recognized and Britain and France both paid their respects and established diplomatic relations with Menelik II.

This whole episode taught the Emperor a valuable lesson and though he was eager to establish friendly relations with neighboring powers, he was always very guarded about his sovereignty and the rights of his country. This, at times, hindered his genuine desire to provide the benefits of modernity to his people but after all he had been through, the Emperor onoccasion considered the risks too great. He was a very inspiration leader to his people, particularly in times of crisis, be it war or famine, and he took the first steps toward establishing a modern administration for the country by forming an advisory cabinet to assist him in governing. MenelikII was married and divorced twice before marrying his final wife Taytu Betul who saw him through his declining years, holding power on his behalf when he became unable to do so. Emperor Menelik II died on December 12, 1913 revered by his people and respected around the world. Much of the credit for the creation of modern Ethiopia and the preservation of their independence is due to him. (Text ends)

Gov’t agencies have words on electric blackout’

ESAT News (December 12, 2013) The Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation(EEPCo) and other government agencies have been criticised for not communicating and working on the electric blackout that is regularly occurring in most areas of Addis Abeba and places in Northern Ethiopia.

The Public Relations Head of EPPCo told ESAT that 40 percent of theelectric blackout was caused due to artificial causes and said due to inability to communicate and work with the Addis Abeba Road and Transport Authority; a resource worth over 120 million birr has been lost within the past four months alone. The Head also said that due to irresponsible land digging by the Addis Abeba Road Works Organisation, anewly built 33 Kilo Volt transformer and similar materials have been totally obliterated, incurring the State a loss of materials worth over 450 thousand birr. The Official said, due to problems caused by the Addis Abeba Road and Transport Authority, it has not been possible to satisfy the needs of customers and thus the Corporation's customers have been complaining. In a related report, power has been cut in the towns of Dangela and Pawe substations after seven electric towers in the rural district of Yinese, located five kilometres away from Bahir Dar, have beenstolen. Miseker Negash said parts of Western Gojjam, Merawi, Bikolo, Durbete,Yismala, Liben, Kunzela, Dinkara, Shawera and its environs in North Gondar, Dangela of Awi Zone, Tilili, Enjebara Addis Kdam, Gimja Bet, Metekel, Sekela, the whole of Metekel Zone in Benishangul Gumz have been in darkness. Although the Corporation has stated that it has been working to solve the problem, the blackouts still persists.

Over 150,000 Ethiopians expected to return from Saudi Arabia'

The saga in Saudi Arabia still continues. Others estimated over 150,000 Ethiopian migrants in Jedda, Saudi Arabia may be in danger. Many are worried that what happened in Riyadh may be repeated in the port city ofJedda. –Editor

AFP News Addis Ababa: Analysis By Jenny Vaughan (December 12, 2013)

− When Ethiopia started repatriating its citizens living illegally in Saudi Arabia last month, 30,000 people were expected to return. Today, four times that amount have been repatriated — with numbers still swelling daily — straining agencies to support one of the largest human airlift operations in recent history.

"We really need support. It's a very big challenge returning over 120,000 people in less than a month… It's an emergency," said Sharon Dimanche of the International Organization for Migration (IOM), which is assisting the government-led repatriation programme. "We have to save people's lives," she added.

IOM said $13.1 million (9.5 million euros) is currently required to support returnees. Ethiopia expects 150,000 to return, but has been repeatedly forced to scale up its predictions as the returnees continue to flood back. Thousands

─ some pregnant, traumatised or sick — continue to land daily, manywith tales of abuse and mistreatment. "To live in Saudi is to cry everyday," said Kamer Hajji, 36, who worked as a carpenter in the oil-rich kingdom for the previous four years.

"We are trying to keep ourselves together, but that's not how it really is, we are broken inside," he said, speaking near a bustling airport warehouse where thousands were searching for their luggage. "They took our money, they took our belongings and there are people who have died," he said. Ethiopia started repatriating its citizens in November aftera seven-month amnesty period for undocumented immigrants expired.

Ethiopia said three of its citizens were killed in clashes with police as migrants prepared to be sent home. Large numbers of Ethiopians move tothe Middle East each year seeking work as domestic servants or menial labourers to earn money to send home. But many face harsh working conditions, physical and mental abuse, low pay and discrimination, according to the International Labour Organization (ILO).

Ganzeb Tefera, 30, said she went to Saudi Arabia ten months ago to make some fast money to send to her child in Ethiopia, but instead said she waited seven months to be paid. "I was expecting a very good life, I thought I would get a decent job and would get paid well and would come back to Ethiopiawith money and support my family," she said, sitting in a health clinic at the arrivals centre, surrounded by pregnant women and nursing mothers. Instead, Ganzeb said she was thrown on the street when she complained of her workload, and was soon after picked up by police. "At the jail, I sawpeople who were there for five months or a year, some committed suicide,some went crazy. The treatment was really harsh," she said.

Ganzeb is among many fleeing harsh economic conditions back home.

Unemployment in Ethiopian cities is 20 percent, according to the ILO, andmost of the country's 91 million people earn less than two dollars a day.

Lure of a better life: Overseas employment agencies — many illegal — arerampant in the Horn of Africa country. "There are challenges with poverty,people are poor, but that is not the only reason why people are moving, we have traffickers, we have smugglers, who are taking advantage of these poor people," the IOM's Dimanche said. Ethiopia has said it is committed to addressing the root cause of mass migration — poverty — with ambitious plans to boost employment. Illegal migration has long plagued the Horn of Africa, with tens of thousands risking their lives each year to move abroad. The lure of earning lavish salaries overseas draws most people abroad, but the reality on the ground is often different.

Toyeba Yassin, 25, returned after working as a housemaid in Saudi Arabiafor nearly two years. Her employer made her clean several houses and cook, but when she complained, her salary was docked. "They took my money, they didn?t even give me food to eat. I didn?t get enough sleep because I used to work at many places," she said, speaking after leaving the plane. "Thank God I am here now." Ethiopia now faces the task of absorbing returnees, many of whom are empty-handed, having had their savings and belongings confiscated. "We anticipate that there will be quitea number that will remain in Addis Ababa or the major cities in Ethiopia because they can?t go home," said David Murphy, Ethiopia chief of the International Rescue Committee. But despite the harsh treatment many faced, some say they would move abroad again since employment opportunities at home are still scant. "I have not finished paying the money I borrowed," said Ganzeb, referring to a loan she took to pay her way to Saudi Arabia. "If I don?t get a job here I would like to go back… topay back my loan and support my child."

Emperor Menelik II’s legacy lives on!

'EMF (December 12, 2013) – On December 12, at the crack of dawn whenthe bell of St. Bhata Mariam Monstary first struck, the 100- year death commemoration of Emperor Menelik and the annual celebration of St.

Batta Mariam Monastery coincided to herald an event through out Addis Ababa. The dual celebration was attended by a sea of people gathered from the four corners of the city. His Holiness Abuna Mathias, Patriarch of the Ethiopia Orthodox Church led the ceremony inside the church, where the body of Menelik was laid, beginning from midnight to 9 a.m. After this,a procession guided by his Holiness moved three times around the church,and stood in front of the main door of the church. Tall deacons stood holding the procession crosses, and shading with large decorated umbrellas the Holy Tabots (Arks), the Patriarch, Archbishops, and Bishops.Behind them two Giant pictures of St. Mariam, and Emperor Menelik were displayed side by side to demonstrate the mood of the gathering.

The ceremony continued with several hymns, speeches, poems, praising St. Mariam and Emperor Menelik II, for his contribution to his Ethiopia, Africa, and the world at large. Through out the ceremony, he was remembered as Emeye Menelik(meaning dear mother, to express his generosity and kindness to the nation, which is comparable to that of a dear mother) He is also remembered as the Lion of Adwa, which inspired the Black people in Africa and elsewhere to rise up for their freedom and to turn a new page into Pan-Africanism. Moreover, he is also rememberedas the great innovator, the unifier, and protector of Greater Ethiopia, as the first and only African nation that stood with out the intervention of European powers. It was unfortunate that the government did not observethe 100-years commemoration of Emperor Menelik II, as a national event.However, this did not detract from the Grandness of the occasion. The peoples’ belief in Menelik is deep-rooted and embodied in their minds.

Emperor Menelik II’s legacy lives on!

Court ruled out core leaders of the Muslim community to defend’

Top News (December 13, 2013) Main leaders of the Dimtsachen Yisema (Let Our Voices Be Heard) that were charged with terrorism have yesterday been told by the court in Ethiopia to defend themselv. Twelve detainees have been acquitted and released. “Terrorism” charges against Abubaker Ahmed and others have been dropped and changed to “inciting terror”. Murad Shekur Jemal, Nuru Turki Nuru, Sheikh Baheru Umar Shekur and journalist Yusuf Getachew have been ordered to defend the charges of “supporting terror”. The defendants have been ordered to present their defences between the dates of January 30 to February 4, 2014. The solicitor of the defendants, Temam Ababulgou, said although the article that they were asked to defend reduces the punishment, he stillthinks they should be acquitted fully. He said the government’s charge on article 3 which charged that “terror attacks have been committed”, has been annulled. Temam said when the decisions were read out the defendants did not show any emotions. He said “my clients are religious teachers who know why they have been detained and teach us endurance”.

Remembering the massacre of 424 disarmed Anuaks in Gambella’

EM (December 13, 2013) Let us take this day of sorrow and make it a dayof healing among all peace-loving Ethiopians marks the ten-year anniversary of the brutal massacre of 424 disarmed Anuak in Gambella, Ethiopia by Ethiopian National Defense Forces armed with guns and militiagroups armed with machetes. Not just the families of the victims, but all Anuak, will forever remember that dark day that brought so many pains, tears and suffering. Even after ten years, some widows, some fathers, some mothers and children are still waiting to bury their loved ones properly. Some day their bodies, which were buried in mass graves, will be exhumed and buried with proper respect by their families and loved ones.Some day a memorial of remembrance may be erected in Gambella in their honor, to remind people that behind every name on that memorial, is a human life, given as a precious gift from God, our Creator. Such memorials may be erected all over Ethiopia where innocent lives of Ethiopians have been taken. Some day, a large monument—a wall of shame—could be erected in Addis Ababa with the names of the Anuak andthe names of all other people throughout Ethiopia who have lost their livesat the hands of the EPRDF regime that devalues human life.

Ethiopia’s War on Homosexuals’

In many countries, it’s getting better for the LGBT community. In Ethiopia,it’s getting worse’

Newsweek (December 13, 2013) In a bleak little apartment on the outskirts of Addis Ababa, nearly a dozen men in their 20s take turns tryingon a pair of black skinny jeans and watching Project Runwayepisodes downloaded off YouTube. There’s no plumbing, Internet or furniture, but because the space is private, it’s paradise. When friends enter, they’re greeted with chirpy Hiiiiis – an homage to RuPaul’s Drag Race – before joining the jumble of cute boys sitting on the floor, drinking tea, eating spaghetti, and sharing photos from a recent “glamping” (glam camping) trip. Boche ruffles his boyfriend’s hair – they share this apartment with a friend – as he tells me how they met. Victor shows me the cursive tattoo over his heart: B.T.W., which stands for Lady Gaga’s acceptance anthem Born This Way. Like most of his friends, Victor still lives with his parents, so he’ll be staying the night, as he does most weekends. A cold tile floor and threadbare cots have never seemed so cozy.

If these giggling, affectionate men acted this way – unabashedly, stereotypically gay – on the streets of Ethiopia’s capital, they could be expelled, beaten up, fired, disowned, or jailed. This is the reality of what itmeans to be gay in Ethiopia. Seventy-six countries criminalize sexual activity by lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender people, and 38 of them, including Ethiopia, are in Africa. According to the 2007 Pew Global Attitudes Project, 97 percent of Ethiopians think homosexuality should be outlawed. Unlike Mauritania, Sudan, and Northern Nigeria, Ethiopia doesn't mandate the death penalty for same-sex sexual acts, but thanks to draconian laws that forbid activism while allowing Western evangelicalsto promote homophobia, Ethiopia is on track to join their ranks. In many countries, it's getting better for the LGBT community. In Ethiopia, it's getting worse.

Roundtable Discussion proposed on Ethiopian Migrant Workers in MiddleEast and Gulf States '

Washington DC: (December 14, 2013) Highlighting the recent tragedy of the loss of lives during Saudi Arabia's crackdown on migrants, this roundtable discussion brings together panelists and experts on the statusof Ethiopian workers in the Middle East. The roundtable will include discussion of long-term solutions to alleviate the plight of migrants in gulfstates and enhance their safety and human rights. It is estimated that in Lebanon alone, there are over 80,000 female Ethiopian domestic workersand over 50% of them are residing illegally. A year and half ago, the plight of an Ethiopian migrant Alem Dechasa, who committed suicide, brought public outrage after a video depicting her abuse went viral on theInternet. Recent cases of beatings and killings of Ethiopian migrants in Saudia Arabia has also shed light and raised awareness of the festering crisis. We believe that it is timely to organize a proactive dialogue between activists, scholars, and NGOs focused on migrant rights in the Middle East to help develop long-term solutions and lasting international legal measures that will enhance the security of migrant workers in the Middle East.

Panelists at the roundtable include individuals who are leaders of Ethiopianwomen organizations, representatives of international human rights agencies, members of newly formed global alliance initiatives focused on Ethiopian migrant rights, and those who have diligently tracked incidents and developed data visualizations to expose abuse of migrant workers.

The panel will also includes social media activists who utilized Facebook and Twitter to organize worldwide vigils and share information seeking tostop the rampant abuse of Ethiopian migrant workers.

Primarily this roundtable aims to serve in two ways: to inform the public about the status of Ethiopian migrant workers in the Middle East using data and research collected by individuals and human rights agencies, and to re- channel the energy around this subject into a more fruitful dialogue on long-term solutions.

The Scourge of Corruption: TI published the 2013 Corruption PerceptionsIndex'

TI (December 14, 2013) The TI, the global corruption watchdog which ranks countries and territories based on how corrupt their public sector isperceived to be. Ethiopia's score on the index is 33, which is the same as2012 and ranks it 111th out of 177 countries surveyed. The index yet again categorizes Ethiopia as a highly corrupt country. The periodic reports of the Federal Auditor General regarding its investigation into the books of the federal government's various institutions are further proof ofthe level of corruption in Ethiopia. The measures the government are merely the tip of the iceberg. The Auditor General's reports have shown time and again that numerous government institutions are guilty of grossfinancial and property mismanagement. These reports have not resulted in the slew of indictments that should have been instituted by now. That they have not is a failure which needs to be addressed promptly. In any democratic nation, voters elect their government to serve them to the best of their ability. Accordingly, the government has to ensure that the sole yardstick it uses to appoint officials to positions of responsibility is merit. After all, a country must not be governed by officials who are appointed for the sake of taking a stab at ruling. Hence, government officials or employees who mismanage public monies and property shouldnot be just moved laterally; they have to be held accountable on corruption charges for their misdeeds if the country is not to be derailed from its journey on the path to development.

Horse Fossils Found In Ethiopia Backdates 4.4 Million Years'

LiveScience: (December 16, 2013) Scientists poking around Ethiopia's fossil-rich badlands say they have discovered the first pieces of an extinctspecies of horse that was about the size of a small zebra and lived about 4.4 million years ago. The specimens were found in what is now an arid desert. But at the time this grass-eating horse roamed the planet, the region would have been covered in grasslands and shrubby woods — richgrounds for grazing. Fossilized traces of the horse, which was named Eurygnathohippus woldegabrieli, were uncovered in the archaeologically rich sites of Aramis and Gona in Ethiopia's Middle Awash valley. The region is famed for bearing the world's longest and most continuous record of human evolution. The extinct horse in this study would have actually been alive at the same time the 4.4-million-year-old human ancestor Ardipithecus ramidus, or "Ardi," walked the region.

"Among the many fossils we found are the two ends of the foreleg bone —the canon — brilliant white and well preserved in the red-tinted earth," study researcher Scott Simpson, of Case Western Reserve's School of Medicine, said of the horse discovery. The leg bone bits indicate this horsehad longer legs than its ancestors. The shape and size of the leg suggest the beast was a fast runner, a skill that may have helped it flee predators like lions, sabre-tooth cats, Simpson and colleagues say. The horse's teethshow signs of another departure from more ancient species: With crowns worn flatter than the teeth found on its ancestors, it seems this creature became adapted to a life of grazing. An analysis of the enamel on the fossilized teeth provided further evidence that it subsisted on grass like today's zebras, wildebeests and white rhinoceroses, the scientists say.

Top of Form Bottom of Form: "Grasses are like sandpaper," Simpson explained in a statement. "They wear the teeth down and leave a characteristic signature of pits and scratches on the teeth so we can reliably reconstruct their ancient diets." The animal belonged to a group ofancient horses called Hipparionines, which had three-toed hooves and arose in North America about 16 million years ago before spreading into Eurasia, presumably over a land bridge that once existed between Alaska and Siberia. The researchers say this discovery helps fill in a blank spot in the evolution of horses, before the animals became even better suited for a life in the grasslands, growing taller and developing longer snouts, for example. "This horse is one piece of a very complex puzzle that has many,many pieces," Simpson said in a statement. The research was detailed online in the Journal of Vertebrate Paleontology.

Time to Bring Eritrea in From the Cold'

Commentary BY HERMN HANK COHEN: (December 16, 2013) After being part of Ethiopia for forty years, the people of Eritrea held a referendum inApril 1993 and decided to establish an independent state. The referendumtook place in the aftermath of a thirty-year insurgency against two successive Ethiopian regimes waged by the Eritrean Peoples Liberation Front (EPLF). At the same time, an allied insurgent group, the Tigrean Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF), took over power in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, after the military collapse of the Soviet-supported regime headed by President Mengistu Haile Mariam. Between 1993 and 1998, thetwo “brother” governments of Eritrea and Ethiopia, headed by the EPLF and TPLF, enjoyed excellent relations. They maintained a common economic system that allowed landlocked Ethiopia full access to the Eritrean Red Sea ports of Assab and Masawa, including control of their own handling facilities for the transit of cargo. The relationship started to cool in 1997 when the Eritreans created their own currency, the Nakfa.

They did this without arranging to establish a system of daily settlements for cross border trade between their currency and the Ethiopian Birrh. Thiscould have been done through a facility provided by the International Monetary Fund. Without such a facility in place, the Ethiopian Governmentannounced that all cross border trade had to be settled in US Dollars. Thisresulted in a financial setback for Eritrea because of its limited access to hard currencies.

In 1998, the Eritrean Government complained that Ethiopian governmentrepresentatives, including police, were beginning to encroach on Eritrean territory near the border town of Badme in southwest Eritrea. According toEritrean sources, four of their police officers who went to Badme to investigate turned up dead. Again, the Eritreans said that they had no choice but to retaliate with military force against the alleged Ethiopian encroachments and murder of their policemen. The Ethiopian Governmentdenied all of the Eritrean allegations about encroachments and the killing of Eritrean policemen, claiming that the Eritrean military attack was totallyunjustified. Instead of negotiations, the Eritrean action triggered a massive Ethiopian armed response, unleashing a major bilateral war that lasted two years, and that caused approximately 100,000 dead and wounded on both sides.

Under Algerian Government mediation, a cease-fire was accomplished in 2000. In view of the border as the ostensible main issue in contention, theAlgerians established the Ethiopia-Eritrea Border Commission (EEBC) to arbitrate the exact boundary line. While the EEBC was doing its work, the long border remained heavily armed on both sides. The results of the EEBC arbitration upheld Eritrea's main claims on the border delineation.

The Ethiopian Government made a public statement agreeing to the arbitration result, but insisted that it would not proceed to delineate the final border settlement until they could have bilateral discussions with Eritrea. The Government of Eritrea declared that it was open to discussions without any preconditions, but insisted that Ethiopia first had to delineate the border pursuant to the arbitration decision. This total stalemate in the bilateral relationship has continued until the present, withboth governments holding to their inflexible positions.

Because of the stalemate, the border has remained heavily armed on bothsides. This situation has caused particular hardship to Eritrea. Because of the country's small population, young men conscripted into the armed forces to patrol the long border have had to serve for indefinite periods without knowing when they would be demobilized and returned to their families. As a result, over the past decade thousands of young Eritrean have 'illegally' left their country to seek asylum in the other countries, including Ethiopia, Egypt, Israel, the Emirates and southern Europe. In addition to the expensive armed camps on both sides of the border, the situation of 'no peace – no war' has resulted in a total stoppage of cross border trade, and the loss to Ethiopia of Eritrea's convenient nearby ports for Ethiopia's exports and imports. Ethiopia's only access to the ocean since the war began has been via the 900 mile antiquated railway from Addis Abeba to the port of the neighboring country of Djibouti at the entrance to the Indian Ocean from the Red Sea. In addition to the long distance between Djibouti and Addis Abeba, port fees in Djibouti are excessively high. To make matters worse, both Ethiopia and Eritrea have become ensnarled in the chaos of Somalia since that government collapsed in 1991. The rise of the Islamist group Al Shabab, with abundant assistance from al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula caused Ethiopia to sendtroops to Somalia at various points from 2006 to the present day.

Between 2006 and 2010, the security crisis in Somalia has caused relations between Eritrea and the United States to deteriorate badly. In 2008, the George W. Bush Administration declared Eritrea to be a "state sponsor of terrorism", thereby triggering US trade, investment, and travelsanctions against Eritrea and its leaders.

The reason was the identification of Somali Islamist extremists attending aSomali political dialogue meeting in Eritrea. Indeed, this caused the US Government to become so enraged that the American Assistant Secretary of State for Africa expressed to desire to reopen the EEBC arbitration decision in order to favor the Ethiopian border claims. This request was not adopted. The Obama administration accused the Eritrean Government of allowing the transit of arms to Al-Shabab – the reason for this alleged support being that Eritrea wanted to help an enemy of Ethiopia, thereby putting pressure on its neighbour to implement the arbitration decision. In2009, Senior Etritrean officials met in Rome with the American PermanentRepresentative to the UN, Susan Rice, and the US Assistant Secretary of State for Africa, Ambassador Johnny Carson. The American delegation wasapparently not satisfied with the Eritrean rebuttal of the allegations about their allowing the transit of arms to al Shabab. There were also accusations of Eritrean support to insurgents opposing the Ethiopian regime from within. As a result, Ambassador Susan Rice introduced a resolution in the UN Security Council calling for sanctions against Eritrea.

The resolution, UNSC 1907, was enacted in a watered down version of theoriginal harsh US draft, but nevertheless caused Eritrea to become something of an international pariah. This situation continues. However, as far as external support for Shabaab is concerned, all available intelligence indicates that Eritrea has not had any contact since 2009.

Earlier intelligence reports, denied by Eritrea as fabricated, indicated Eritrean facilitating the transfer of funds to Shabaab – nothing of that sorthas been reported since 2009 by any source. Those of us who know Eritrea well understand that the Eritrean leadership fears Islamic militancyas much as any other country in the Horn of Africa region. In recent months, positive signals have been coming from both countries. Eritrean President Isaias Afewerke has been quoted as saying that Eritrea cannot fulfill its destiny without Ethiopia. The Prime Minister of Ethiopia, Hailemariam Desalegn, has said that he is willing to go to Eritrea to engage in dialogue. In short, the wartime tensions of 1998-2000 no longer have a logical basis for continuing to exist. Normalization of Ethiopian-Eritrean relations promises a win-win future for both nations. Inview of the absence of any intelligence, real or fabricated, linking Eritrea with Shabaab for over four years, the UN Security Council should terminate sanctions imposed in 2009 by UNSC resolution 1907.

Since European Union governments have maintained normal relations withEritrea since the country's independence, one of the European members ofthe UN Security Council should propose a resolution to end the sanctions.

The US should agree to abstain rather than veto such a resolution. To break the stalemate between Eritrea and Ethiopia over the implementationof the EEBC boundary decision, there needs to be a mutually face-saving solution. I propose that Ethiopia offer to accept a symbolic initial takeover by Eritrea of territory awarded by the EEBC, followed by the same day opening of dialogue with a totally open agenda. This dialogue could have the benefit of a neutral mediator, or not, depending on the wishes of the two governments. Here again, one of the neutral Europeans should have the ability to inspire confidence in both sides. A normalization of relations,following the end of UN sanctions against Eritrea, would have immediate benefits for both countries. A resumption of Ethiopian use of Eritrean portswould provide economic benefits to both countries with trade resuming in both directions. Both sides would also be able to demobilise the border with important cost savings. Both countries, of course, continue to have important human rights issues. Normalization of bilateral relations would make it easier for the US and the international community to encourage political and governance reforms. Finally, the normalization of relations between the United States and Eritrea would open the door to military-to-military cooperation of the type that would enlist Eritrea in the war againstIslamic terrorism in the Horn coming from across the Red Sea. Yes, the time has come to bring Eritrea in from the cold. Herman J. Hank Cohen is Former Assistant Secretary of State for Africa.

Herman Cohen over the Ethiopia-Eritrea stand-off, early pieces’

Political Speculation & Analysis: It’s well known that the Ethiopian authorities are currently adamant about the normalisation of relations andeconomic integration of the two nations. In May 1991, when the Duerg regime on the fall, the US peace mediator Herman Cohen reportedly favored that Eritrea should keep Massawa while the Port of Assab remainswith the much larger neighbor, Ethiopia. The arch enemy to Cohen's proposal was the late Meles Zenawi himself, an Eritrean blooded from Adwa. Meles is known for his largely credited with turning his TPLF comrades turning to enemy soldiers that would fight against their own country. When war broke out in May, 1998, which was largely the makingof Mr. Zenawi's "appeasement policy" toward his country and Eritrea, the Tigreans couldn't find the gut to remove the enemy who had misruled Ethiopia for nearly eight years.

TPLF officials said they didn't want to show "division" to the enemy (in thiscase, Eritrea) and sought "unity" that kept Meles in power. Actually, they were scared to remove Meles from power, eventhough they were aware that he would no doubt help Eritrea win the war over Ethiopia; eventhough they were aware that the entire population of Ethiopia would erupt with joy and celebration that finally the enemy within is caught and brought down to justice. Calls from Tigrians in North America (who were members of the now-defunct TigraiNet forum] for the removal of Meles Zenawi fell on to deaf ears. Meles kept a low profile and helped win over Badme (a battle) as a confidence-building measure before he gets time and strike back his rivals without mercy. He waited for another more year,and aborted a victory-laden final offensive (killed the war) that was sending Eritrean soldiers in disarray over the border to the Sudan.

The BBC, and the Reuters asked Herman Cohen what would be the next step of the 'triumphant Ethiopians.' Cohen said the Ethiopians will right the wrong, and reclaim the all-important Port of Assab, a sharp remark which deprived Meles a good night's sleep. Right the next morning, Mr Meles Zenawi called for a press conference in Addis Ababa, and without quoting Cohen, dismissed Cohen's claims as baseless. "Ethiopia will never take an inch of Eritrean territory [let alone Assab Port]," he asserted. AfterMeles sabotaged a clear Ethiopian military victory, TPLF officials half- heartedly tried to accuse their boss of "national treason." With one strike, Meles turned them to dust, and emerged as an undisputed strongman.

In August 2012, Meles was taken care of by a divine power, but to this day, failed-state Ethiopia remains in the hands of his disciples, masked mercenaries who deceptively call themselves 'Woyane', and call Meles the politically outsmart person. Though Meles has died, the TPLF officials, are skeptical that Meles has really died, because no one is daring to write the true history how a generation of Tigreans were reduced to foot soldiers, and fought a war that made their country landlocked.

The Definition of Legacy & Legacies of African Leaders – What’s reallyLegacy up to?’

As per the perspective of the Editor of HandbookAfrica (December 16,2013)

The late Dr. Osagiefo Kwame N'krumah of Ghana:

Mr. Kwame Nkrumah was the leader of Ghana and it's predecessor state the Gold coast commencing from 1952 to January, 1966, he fully engagedhimself in the anti-colonial struggle to help attain Ghana’s independence from Britain—more appropriately, home rule at the time. Nkrumah thought he would do better in realizing the goal of independence and his life long ambition of African unity, more appropriately, Pan Africanism, which he not only practiced as politics but also lived with as profound personal conviction his sincere support for the establishment of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) significant, who he was actively engaged in it’s formation.

He wrote in his classic work "Africa must unite" he states "the three basic aims of Ghana's foreign policy are, African independence, African Unity, and the maintenance of world peace through a policy of positive neutralityand non-allignment. The first two aims, according to him were inextricablybound together, since untill Africa was free from foreign domination, the continent could not be completely united. Yet, to him, united action was essential if the Africans were to achieve full independence. As the initiator of the pan-Africanist movement in Africa, he even endeavored to realize his dream of African Unity, making Ghana's external policy an instrument toward that and by experimenting sort of loose union he had tried with Guinea in 1959 and Mali in 1960. But equally difficult was to bring Africa together that had been divided linguistically by the colonial masters after attaining independence and before the May, 1963 Summit in Addis Ababa.

Dr. N'Krumah to his surprise and dismay, not long after he realized that Africa was getting increasingly divided regionally and in other ideological groupings. In fact, the more he tried on unity the more it became nearly impossible for him to see light of his nirvana in African Unity on account ofthe fact that Africa the division was getting deeper. At the same time, witheconomic factors and the clash of ambitions and intrigues within Ghana itself worked against him. Ghana's first president and pan-African hero, Kwame Nkrumah, was deposed in a military coup, while he was on a statevisit to North Vietnam and China: heralding years of mostly-military rule in Ghana: Then he lived the rest of his life in exile as guest of the neigbouring Country, Guinea: was one of the most respected leaders in Africa, he has been an exemplary leader to both the old and the young, and also perhaps best known politically for his strong commitment, dedication, patriotism and promotion of Pan-Africanism, he read, lectured,wrote number of books & speeches.

He has made a remarkable achievements during his tenure as president, education was revolutionised and schools, colleges and vocational institutions shot-up, Ghana was only second in the world in per-capita expenditure on education. Despite being rich in mineral resources, and endowed with a good education system and efficient civil service, the infrastructure of economic development, transportation, communication facilities, hospitals, rural health centres, and the training of personnel in various fields, lifted Ghana to the heights. People had a unique sense of belonging and participation in the affairs of the country. Education expanded the empire of human reason and helped to broaden political orientation, those were investments which will continue to yield positive dividends among the present generation of Ghanaians. That was Nkrumahthe visionary, and what exactly to say about Legacy …

The late emperor Haile Selassie who struggles to modernize Ethiopia: Emperor HaileSelassie struggled to modernize the nation of Ethiopia: - Emperor Haile Selassie, in addition to the modern education system, hecreated protective elites also and a national army undermining the traditional military structure of separate armies headed by former warlords, Rases and provincial governors.

The Emperor had a hugely positive sides. He was known for avoiding slavery by a legislation shortly after his coronation in November, 1930. Hetruely sought to modernize feudal Ethiopia. Emperor Haile-Selassie I, founder and commander in-chief of the Ethiopian Armed Forces, inaddition to that, had been the front runner to promote education as himself was in-charge of the education in the imperial cabinet, prioritised free education, first founded the University College of Addis Ababa, which later renamed Haile Selassie I University (HSIU) has been the honorary Chancellor of theUniversity even if hardliners within his government such as Ras Kassa Haile and Ras Seyoum Mengesha Yohannes, and Ras Abebe Aregay Bechire sternly objecting the emperor's move on to promote education and modernization in present Ethiopia. Emperor Haile Selassie, the defining figure in the Ethiopian and African history as once quoted as saying, "that education which ignores man's intrinsic nature, and neglects his intellect and reasoning power can not be considered a true education"

In a diplomatic maneouvre, he determines the 1600-years old Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church (EOTC) got it's autonomy to choosing it's ownPatriarchate without the Alexandria based Egyptian Coptic Church as patron the EOTC, the emperor also known to be in the process of innovating a total of over 3,000 churches and nunneries, 2000 schools, i.e. 655 elementary schools, 277 junior highschools 67 secondary schools,2 Universities, 10 professional and training colleges. Regarding primary healthcare, about 79 hospitals, 113 banking and financial sectors, about 136 factories, 267 manufacturings plants -

He has introduced Marine transport with 2 Commercial Shipping lanes (ex-ports of Assab & Massawa in formerly Eritrea province federated with Ethiopia), and the aviation transport, the Ethiopian Airlines with over 41 landing terminals allocated for estimated 238 airplanes through out the country, Agri-institutes and research centres, and construction of several thousand kms rural and urban road links through the famous "Awra- Godana", now the Rural Roads Authority (RRA) etc., were parts of the welldone jobs in his reign. Then leading pan-African news magazine, AFRICA praised him after his mysteriously death in August, 1975 as "the spotlight of Africa, a man whos history is more kinder to him than the present generation of Ethiopia".

Haile Selassie I has significantly played a role in bringing Africa together under one roof, and hence Addis Ababa as the venue of the former Organization of African Unity (OAU), which it's successor for the present African Union Commission (AUC), still based in Addis Ababa. Emperor Haile-selassie was the last emperor of the Solomonic order who ruled thenation for centuries. Emperor Haile Selassie I and the long standing Ethiopian monarch is deposed by the crippling coup masters of the military co-ordination council known this time as the 'Duerg'. The emperor is dethroned (some say he abdicates) by low ranking army officers and non-Commissioned officers in a very slow process of a coup known as 'the crippled coup of Ethiopia'

The fall of Emperor Haile Selassie I and the Solomoic dynasty of theEthiopian monarchy, which resulted by the Ethiopian Revolution of February (Yekatit), 1974 ended their monarchial rule on September 12, 1974. King Haile Selassie during his reign played an influential role that advocates for the independence and freedom of Africa and Africans on theworld stage. He was also the last monarch of Ethiopia who defeated the Italian Fascist Invasion that existed from 1935 to 1941. He was voted 'Man of the Year' and featured on the front cover in the Time Magazine issue in 1930, King Haile Selassie's contributions to African unity, independence, peace and collective security are unmatched by any other African or world leader.

King Haile Selassie played a formative and leading role in the establishment of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in May, 1963, now known as the African Union (AU), through his tireless efforts, full dedication and commitment to the cause of African independence, freedom, peace and unity. Shortly after meeting with Nelson Mandela providing him with military training, an Ethiopian passport and a hand- held gun given him to liberate South Africans from Apartheid rule in 1962,King Haile Selassie convened the first conference comprised of 31 Independent African nation states that led to the establishment of the Organization of African Unity on May 25, 1963 in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

His Majesty the emperor also constructed the building that would house the first meeting of African leaders at the sole expense of the Imperial Ethiopian government. He provided the guidance, oversight, and visionaryleadership that led to the ratification of the OAU's Charter in May, 1963 aswell. King Haile Selassie was elected as the first and fifth Chairman to preside over the African nations that comprised the OAU. King Haile Selassie is the only African leader to have served as Chairman of the OAUmore than once. As Chairman, King Haile Selassie, successfully mediated along with president Modibo Keita of Mali the 'Bamako Peace Accord', which resolved the border conflict between Morocco and Algeria in 1964.

In 1964, he also initiated the concept of a United States of Africa. Hesuccessfully negotiated the Biafran civil war of Nigeria in June, 1967.

In February, 1972, Haile Selassie also resolved then southern Sudan crises under the 'Addis Ababa Peace Agreement' between the central government of Sudan and the Anya-Anya, the southern rebel group, becomes a self-governing region under a unified Sudan. Despite the factof his outstanding effort in the modernization of Ethiopia, he contributedinadvertently to the political turmoil that caused his downfall and the overthrow of the aristocracy and the atrocities that followed in Ethiopia today, according to critics. But one thing is real, history is neutral, impartial, and forever, and continues to tell his lasting legacies ……

The late Julius Kambarage Nyerere (Mwalimu) of Tanzania: Mwalimu Nyerere was an outstanding politician, as president of Tanganyika AfricanNational Union (TANU), has travelled within and outside of Tanzania advocating peaceful changes, social equalities and racial harmonies. His oratorical skills and political savvy earned him distinction as Tanganyika's pre-eminent nationalist spokesman, and is well known for his philosophy of African socialism and self-reliance. He chose the term Ujamaa (familyhood) to describe his program, which emphasised a blend of economic cooperative societies, racial and tribal harmony and moralistic self-sacrifice, while his policies were a failure from an economic perspective, he gained widespread respect for his idealism, for his successin reshaping a society which was politically stable and notably free of tribal rivalries. Mr. Julius Kambarage Nyerere nicknamed "Mwalimu" Kiswahili meaning for "teacher", his profession prior to politics admired byhis countrymen "Baba Wa Taifa" meaning for "Father of the nation", is oneof Africa's most renowned statesmen, educated in Makkrere University (Uganda) and Edinburgh (Scotland).

Nyerere found fame primarily through his policy of "Ujama" meaning for "Familyhood" by outlining his policy of collectivization in the country's agricultural system in 1967, an outlined concept that came to dominate his agricultural policies, farmers to modernise farming methods in order toincrease agricultural outputs in cooperative farms and lead the country to self-sufficiency. But he later admitted officially failure for his policies, he held the premiership and the headship from independence until his retirement in November, 1985, the date, he also resigned from government position as union president, and remained as chairman of theruling Chama-Cha-Mapenduzi-CCM (party of the Revolution), which merged by the Afro-shirazi party of Zanzibar, and the mainland's Tanganyika African National Union (TANU) until 1990 when Ali Hassan Mwinyi a party colleague tookover duties, to replace him with only two terms in office. The late President Julius Nyerere: for he has acquired no private wealth and owns no private companies - he was an old style African nationalist of the likes of Kwame N'krumah of Ghana and David Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia who sincerely believes that power is about service not personal wealth. The ex-president Julius Nyerere passed awayin a blood sickness called Lukhemia on the 14th of October, 1999 while hewas under further treatment in London, United Kingdom, and his funeral was held at an ordinary occasion in his birthtown of Butiama, just west of Lake-Victoria.

The late Leopold Sedar Senghor of Senegal: The present Senegal becomesan autonomous republic in 1958 merging with the French Sudan (formerlyMali) and becomes part of the Mali Federation of French-West Africa.

Senegal granted independence as part of the Mali-Federation in April, 1960 (the union broke-up after only few months). On independence inApril, 1960, Mr. Leopold Sedar Senghor becomes the country’s first President.

In November 1973: It has to be remembered that during the coronation ofthe Ethiopian emperor the Senegalese president nominated to attend at a ceremony of the Haile Sellassie I Foundation (HSIF) Prize to be awarded as the first winner for his immense contribution to African Literature in Addis Ababa. The citiation described the Senegalese President Leopold Sedar Seghor as a “best African who wrote a number of books, essays andpoems”. And a prize sum of then Eth. Dollar 70, 000 was awarded for his outstanding contribution to the African Literature. But the Senegalese president has swiftly acts to send back the awarded sum of money and items when news of severe drought in the near north province of Wollo surfaced. It was understood such act at the time seriously embarrassed the Imperial Government of Ethiopia

The founder-president Mr. Leopold Sedar Senghor was famous for his intellectual and literary achievements, his rule was peaceful and largely benevolent, although the country was a one party state from 1966 until a multiparty democracy was introduced in 1974. In 1980 Mr. Sedar Senghorretired, handing the presidency to his Prime Minister Abdou Diouf, who subsequently confirmed his position by winning presidential elections in 1983 and again in 1988. The founder president Leopold Sedar Senghor voluntarily resigned from power on the 31st of December, 1980. On the 20th of December, 2001, the self-exiled former president Leopold Sedar Senghor passed away at age of 91 in Paris, France. The late Mr. Leopold Sedar Senghor is known to have written number of books, essays and poems, that have earned him an established literary prestige.

Living statesman Dr. Kenneth David Kaunda of Zambia: The present Zambia was formerly known as Northern Rhodesia until it’s independencefrom Great Britain in August, 1964. It’s founder president Mr Kenneth David Kaunda whose Zambians affectionately called him "Father of the nation", others called him "the white waving KK", as usually waves a handheld white kerchief. The living statesman was known for his surprising and unexpected appearance among ordinary Zambians. As head of Zambia, the apartheid era frontline state, Dr. Kenneth David Kaunda was well known for his sharp anti-apartheid regime remarks and criticisms as well as pro-peace initiatives and efforts to end the racist apartheid era in former South Africa.

Eventually, however, economic troubles and increasing international pressures to bring more democracy to Africa forced KK to change the rulesthat kept him for over quarter a century on power, his close friend ex- Tanzanian president Julius Nyerere had stepped down from the republican presidency in Tanzania in November, 1985 and he was quietly encouraging him to follow suit, pressures for return to multi-party politics increased and Mr. Kenneth Kaunda voluntarily yielded and called for a multi-party elections in October, 1991 in which a Trade unionist, by profession a city bus driver in the name of Frederick Titus Chiluba of the opposition Movement for Multi-party Democracy (MMD) won.

KK, has left office in his honour with the inauguration of the Movement forMulti-party Democracy (MMD) leader, Mr. Frederick Titus Chiluba, sworn in as second president of Zambia on the 2nd of November, 1991. KK wasthe second mainland African head of state to allow free elections, conceding defeat to relinquish power when he lost. The legacy, Mr. Kenneth Kaunda has left always remembered among Africans, and heretired as a statesman from politics and public life in 1997.

The late Nelson Mandela (Madiba) of the Rainbow nation (RSA): Over 100 heads of states including the US president Barack Obama and Raul Castro of Cuba were present for Mandela's funeral service, while a handful of African leaders like Paul Kagame of Rwanda, Umer Hassan Al-Bashir of theSudan, Yoweri Kaguta Museveni of Uganda were present for Meles' funeralin Addis. Mandela state funeral appeared more genuine, spontaneous, full of love and celebration unlike that of the Ethiopian which was shrouded with secrecy (which cause of his death still unknown) and appeared orchestrated and staged managed by the ruling party. Mandelastands out in many ways. While Mandela fought to end, Bastustanizationand oppression in South Africa, Zenawi on the other hand was the architect of Banstustanization in Ethiopia driving schism and wedges among Ethiopians. Mandela gave up power peacefully, while Zenawi did everything in his power to keep it including voiding election, jailing opposition leaders, and killing peaceful demonstrators against rigged election. Mandela brought very diverse people together, while Zenawi broke the long standing unity and nationalism that made Ethiopia uniqueand that withstood Western colonialism into a breaking point.

Nelson Mandela is known for his struggles against the racist apartheid regime of South Africa in saying "No to injustice" to liberate his people in the 20th century setting sterling example to African leaders of the 21st century to fight back neo-colonialism. Mandela stood for the principle of no group should oppress any other groups as expressed in his famous vowwritten in these enduring words: "I have fought against white domination and I have fought against black domination. I've cherished the ideal of a democratic and free society in which all persons live together in harmony and [with] equal opportunities. It is an ideal which I hope to live for and to achieve. But if needs be, it is an ideal for which I am prepared to die." Mandela was crowned with the accolade of one of the greatest leaders of the 20th century in our own time by standing on the shoulders of giants political leaders like Menilik II of Ethiopia - the root of his genesis as framed in his immortal words: "Ethiopia has always held a special place inmy own imagination and the prospect of visiting attracted me more strongly than a trip to France, England and America combined. I felt I would be visiting my own genesis, unearthing the roots of what made me an African. Meeting the Emperor himself would be like shaking hands with history." Mandela was buried at his birth place of his ancestors having been a victim of man's inhumanity to man and leaving a colossus legacy of truth-peace-reconciliation as a Founder and first black President of the inclusive Rainbow Nation that is exemplary to the world.

The late Meles Zenawi Asresahegn Tessema of Ethiopia: As a writer for TV-Aljazeera expresses him, ”Meles Zenawi practically reduced Ethiopia into a landlocked, bantustanized, and impoverished country thanks to hisStalinist organization in the name of TPLF.“ Given these facts, Zenawi should be remembered just as another dictator, except he was exceptionally good in hoodwinking the world to the contrary. In the meantime, he left Ethiopia totally unprepared and desperately behind thecurve in access to technology, human and economic development. In theend Meles Zenawi was just a tyrant beyond comparison who employed voodoo economics to exaggerate his economic achievement, denied Ethiopians their basic freedom, rigged elections, and humiliated and desecrated their religion, history, identity and humanity. All said and done, the West has to bear some responsibility for piling praises on a dictator without unveiling his dark secret, genocide in Gambella, cyber jamming, and the strangulation and evisceration of the Ethiopian media, intellectuals, as well as monopolizing the economy by his Tigrean clan. Atthe end, the world may find out that Zenawi may have hoodwinked the West, eviscerated the Ethiopian economy, it’s nationalism, and its institutions. If all this is true, unlike Mandela, Meles Zenawi will eventuallybe remembered as nothing but a person who claims to have skills or knowledge that they do not really have.

Ex-Ethiopian Police officer recalls the guerilla combat training offered toNelson Mandela'

ADDIS ABABA — By Elissa Jobson, BDLive (December 16, 2013)

"He was extremely tough, extremely vigilant, intelligent and loveable. So loveable," says Col Fekade Wakene of the late Nelson Mandela — the student he schooled in guerrilla combat in July 1962. "The training was so rigorous and he never complained, every time smiling. Other soldiers I trained would get so angry, but Mandela was always charming." Police Colonel Fekade Wakene, now aged 77, sits quietly and solemnly in the front room of his modest home in Addis Ababa’s Little Mogadishu area. He straightens his scarf which is striped red, gold, white, blue, green and black — the colours of the South African flag. It was a gift from South Africa’s minister of arts and culture, he says. "Every time I think about South Africa, about Mandela, I always want to wear this scarf," Col Fekadeexplains. In 1962, he was a sub-lieutenant in the Fetno Derash, a special battalion of the Imperial Ethiopian Police. He had received special commando training in Israel and Germany and had the skills Mandela, as commander-in-chief of Umkhonto-we-Sizwe, the armed wing of the African National Congress, was seeking.

"The training lasted 28 days, both day and night. It was very intensive,"Col Fekade says. "We started with individual field training and completedall that was relevant to become a company commander, including proficiency in armoury, rifle shooting, defence, (engaging) enemy combatants, and battlefield combat." Mandela was a first-rate student. "He learnt very, very quickly. He excelled in everything that we gave him.His stamina and his strength were much greater than his instructors'.

Sometimes we would get tired during training, but he was so keen to learn. You could tell he was going to be a great leader." When they first met, Col Fekade was convinced that Mr Mandela had had previous militaryexperience. "He looked like he had already had some training." But exceptfor some time spent in boxing school, Mr Mandela, in his autobiography, Long Walk to Freedom, admitted to having had little exposure to combat. "I felt myself being moulded into a soldier and began to think as a soldier thinks — a far cry from the way a politician thinks," Mr Mandela wrote of his time in Ethiopia, and Col Fekade agrees that the training had a huge effect on the political activist. "There was definitely a change. We could see it in him. It was so exhausting for Mandela, so taxing for him, but he graciously took it all and he came out a different person." Before his training was completed, Mandela was called back to South Africa — he was supposed to remain in Ethiopia for six months but stayed for only eight weeks. The armed struggle against apartheid was intensifying and he was needed back home.

Col Fekade recalls that he was summoned to the office of Col Tadesse Biru, assistant commissioner of police. "I didn't know why I had been called in by this big, towering commander." "The colonel said: 'We have a big man here who has come from South Africa, a respected guest. He will be spending some days with you. You have to start preparing military training.' Mandela was there and I was introduced to him. But the name he gave wasn't Mandela." It was obvious that the "respected guest" was very special indeed — the order to train Mandela had come directly from Emperor Haile Selassie himself. But this was a highly confidential mission and Col Fekade was instructed not to inquire about the man or his being in Ethiopia. "During the training everything was veiled in secrecy. It was onlythrough time that I came to know that it was Mandela I had trained," Col Fekade admits. "News didn't travel fast like these days and when I heard his name I was surprised. I feel honoured today to have been able to traina man like Nelson Mandela." Col Fekade is clearly moved by his death. "I have not switched on my TV. I have not seen any reports of his death. I just didn't want to watch. My heart is broken."

Mandela's secretly travel to Ethiopia'

Captain Guta Dinqua, the man who was paid to kill Mandela - Dinqualooked after Madiba in Ethiopia than paid to kill him!

SBC Interviews: (December 16, 2013) In 1962 Former President Nelson Mandela secretly travelled to Ethiopia for military political and spiritual training under the name of David Motsamai. Haile Selassie's Ethiopian army, on the orders of the emperor himself first trained and armed NelsonMandela in his struggle against apartheid South Africa. On the personal orders of his Majesty, the Ethiopian Colonel in charge of Mandela's militarytraining gave him a gun with which he was to bring down the ignoble and unhappy apartheid regime still thriving at that time in South Africa.

Mandela went back to South Africa to continue his struggle. The rest is history. One of the things that Madiba recently learned is that while he was in Ethiopia, the aparheid government knew where he was and had paid his menders to kill him. The SBC joined by ex-Ethiopian Police officerCaptain Guta Dinqua who not only looked after Madiba while he was in Ethiopia but was ordered to kill Madiba tells the story. He is with ProfessorMamo Muchie who will do the translation for us.

"438 Days" in Ethiopian custody – a book by Swedish Journalists'

Somalilandsun – (December 16, 2013) The Authors of "438 DAGAR" Martin Schibbye, and Johan Persson, which is a book detailing their "438 Days" in Ethiopian custody and related experiences have now turned to exposing the ills they perceive to be ongoing in the Ogaden Region. In an exclusive interview with journalist Mohamed Farah of Ogadentoday Press the two Swedish scribes say their motivation to pursue information on theregion some refer to as "Ethiopia's Darfur" or "Africa's Palestine" by the burning desire to bring to light inhuman activities that were known but craftily what hidden from the International Community. Describing their arrest by Ethiopian Counterinsurgency forces operating in the Ogaden region against the Ogaden National Liberation Front-ONLF that led to the 438 Days" in Custody Journalist Schibbye said that 150 soldiers who had been pursuing them for some time opened sporadic gunfire injuring him on the shoulder while colleague Johan got hit in the arm Though the two faced extreme torture especially lack of medical attention, the counter insurgency forces viewed them as hostile elements geared towards disruption of national security since they, the Swede journalists undertooktheir coverage under guidance of and accompanied by members of ONLF, an armed group the Ethiopian government considers rebellious thence outlawed.

Speculation: Former premier Tamrat Layne talks politics again'

Tamrat Layne's confession: (December 18, 2013) Many think that his apology and regrets are too late and do not mean much because a nationhas already been destroyed by the actions and policies of a regime he once was a leader and which still is in power. Others suspect that genuineor not, Tamrat Layne's claim of a spiritual journey from being a fervent atheist to become a submissive follower of the Lord is nothing but an attempt to rationalize his mind. He is just trying to escape his guilty conscience resulted from his appalling past, they claim. Worse still, there are those who see his whole 'conversion narrative' as part of a larger effort to win hearts and minds of unsuspecting Ethiopians for his ulterior motive: his plan to comeback to politics.

Fall from grace: Tamrat Layne was Prime Minister of Ethiopia when rebel forces unseated the military regime in 1991. Initially the post of the PM didn't matter at all. Then with the ratification of the 1995 Constitution, Tamrat was pushed to the deputy premiership as the ever shrewd Meles took his position. After his relegation to irrelevance, the last time we heard from him was when in an emergency session Meles briefed the Parliament about the “repetitive ethical misconduct” his deputy committedwhile in office. “My Party decided that I am not capable of discharging myduties and responsibilities. In open discussions I held with fellow party comrades, I came to realize the mistakes I made while in leadership was unbecoming of me,” Tamrat told s stunned nation.

“I fully comply with the measures taken and I support the Party’s decisions and I want this House to allow me to resign my position.” The House cheerfully fulfilled his wish. That opened the next chapter of his life which lasted longer than his stint in the mountains of northern Ethiopia.

By confessing his sins right there and then, he might have thought of saving some skin. That was never meant to be! Tamrat is obviously a different person now. Seems to have found solace or a hideout (dependingon how you look at it) in religion. Ever since his “redemption”, he devotes his time to the family he missed so much in the dozen years he was away from them. The father of two is currently living in the United States.

Coming back to the hour long interview, it is safe to say there was nothinggroundbreaking. The talk of writing books serves to show his importance than the significance of the content of his work. After all, ANDM was a mere pawn in the TPLF politics and as such has no life of their own.

Talking legacy: As if we are not tired of the talk of legacy, now Tamrat hashis own. One might think the legacy he left behind in the five uninspiring years may be as impressive as that of the last President of the country, Girma Wolde Giorgis. Nope! He is not ready to settle for less. “For the firsttime in (Ethiopian) history religious equality was granted under EPRDF rule on my watch. I signed the document,” he declared. When the radio host challenged his assertion, Tamrat reiterated: “Under Dergue there wasno religious equality. For example, Protestant religion was outlawed.

Protestants used to be persecuted, imprisoned, banished, killed. Everybody knows that.” It is not clear whether he had foreseen his own conversion to that church. Tamrat might have presented himself as the champion of religious freedom in Ethiopia by telling the story to the laityof the U.S. mega churches where he makes occasional appearances.

To give the devil his due, the Dergue regime soon after the overthrow of the Imperial regime, not only declared the separation of Church and Statebut subsequently made the three Muslim holidays public holidays. As Mengistu Hailemariam claims not to have killed a single individual to thesedays in the face 2of scores of evidences, Tamrat insists that he has not stashed away public money. He wants the public to believe the stories of the millions of dollars he was accused of embezzling were mere fabrications. Tamrat told the interviewer that the Government tried in vainto recover them.This begs the question: what was the “ethical misconduct” for which Tamrat himself confessed in public? On a positive note, Tamrat deserves respect for apologizing to the former Dergue officials. In the days when he was flying high he said: “These people were not supposed to be alive by now.” Now they are all free. While the apologycould have served its purpose if delivered in person, entertaining the idea by itself is no mean feat. He should also consider himself lucky to have made it thus far in the treacherous politics of Ethiopia where he miserably failed to make a mark. From the verbatim excerpts of Robele Ababya's piece 'Tamrat talks politics again; should we trust him?'

Speculation: Why the regime is not allowing even the dead to rest inpeace?

ER Commentary: (December 18, 2013) We are currently receiving reportsthat families of those who are buried at St. Joseph and Holy Trinity churches in Addis Ababa are ordered to remove the remains of their lovedones within a specific date or else they will be dumped in mass graves.

Distraught and desperate, families from the Diaspora are rushing back home to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars to the regime to transfer the remains of their deceased families, many of whom have been buried at those two cemeteries for several years, and a significant number of them are patriotic Ethiopians who fought against Fascist Italy and other foreign invaders. There is no land shortage in Ethiopia. Why would the regime forces families to dig the graves of their loved ones? The answer is: 1) The regime assumes that those who are buried at St. Joseph and Holy Trinity cemeteries belong to middle-class and affluent Ethiopians whoare willing to pay any thing for their departed parents and other close relatives to have proper burial. It is a big profit-making scheme for the ravenous TPLF. 2) The two cemeteries are burial sites for what the TPLF- led regime describes as the Amhara nobility. There is nothing that makes the TPLF thugs more happy than humiliating the Amhara people. If such adespicable act occurs in any other country, there would be a massive riot,any rational politician would not dare destroy historic grave sites, according to commentators.

The Banking & Financial Sector In Ehiopia'

Speculation & Debates: Next to Ethiopian Telecom, the banking sector inEthiopia is the next pathetic industry. Unlike the Ethiopian Telecom that enjoyed zero competition, the banking sector seemingly flourished for a while until the regime’s interference begun. There are several private banking institutions in Ethiopia today. Awash, Wegagen, Dashen, Abyssinia .... Initially, most of them were founded based on ethnicity andthat is the case till this date. The only difference being that the ruling party influences existing board members and putting yes men who sold out their souls. The road to richness and entrepreneurship for a Tigrean man/woman who is affiliated with the ruling party is very simple: He/she goes to the bank and request 25 million birr without showing any collateral. If the bank refuses, the bank will get a phone call from senior party members or another filthy officials who can make life difficult to the bank or the person who has authority on accepting and denying the order.A couple of individuals who were in such position and refused such loan requests only to find themselves loosing their livelihood and time in jail with false accusations by false witnesses. Most of the Tigrayans who borrow such amount of money return it in 2-5 years with a handful of them failing, in which case the bank cannot do nothing about it except eatthe loss. The success is due to the fact that if one has 25 million birr, there is a high possibility to double it in a year or so due to the fact that the ruling junta is very favorable to its cadres and families. There have been seen many hotels, super markets and Bars owned by people who suddenly become filthy rich all of a sudden.

Whom do you think they were up to?'

Menelik II, Haile Selassie I, Mengistu Haile Mariam, Meles ZenawiPERSONAL VIEWS (December 18, 2013)

Menelik II, "Conquerer of The Battle of Adwa" - In the 19th century (March, 1896) Menilik II won the victory of the Battle of Adwa that put Ethiopia on the world map as an independent country. The victory shocked European powers, which had no choice but recognize Ethiopia asa free and independent country and establish or bolster their diplomatic missions in Addis Ababa. This was an epic achievement by Menilik II thatsubsequently paved the way for stalwart liberation fighters like Jomo Kenyatta, Kwame Nkrumah, Nelson Mandela et al in the 20th century.

Ethiopia under Emperor Haile Selassie, co-founder of OAU, played a leading role in the fight for the liberation of the African continent. This would have not been impossible without Menilik's victory in the Battle of Adwa. Menilik II earned the epic accolade of "Emmye" (Mother) for His magnanimity and exceptional ability to work with His former rivals and foes promoting them to top key positions in his kingdom, irrespective of their ethnic background. As several prolific Ethiopian writers and prominent scholars have recorded the exceptional qualities of the Monarch, will only add that he will be remembered as the first to lay downthe inspiring foundation in the struggle for the liberation of black people ofAfrican origin, and Promotes forgiveness, and reconciliation as well.

Emperor Menelik II has acquired no private wealth and owns no private assets (Bete-Irst) in his name or his family throughout his life as king of Ethiopia. Menilik II at his capacity believes that he was not a perfect, divine, and a leader or an emperor without committing any fault like otherones, all these personalities earned him affection.

Haile Selassie I: The modernizer of post-Italian occupation Ethiopia: The fall of Emperor Haile Selassie I and the Solomoic dynasty of the Ethiopianmonarchy, which resulted by the Ethiopian Revolution of February (Yekatit), 1974 ended his monarchial rule on September 12, 1974. King Haile Selassie during his reign played an influential role that advocates forthe independence and freedom of Africa and Africans on the world stage. He was also the last monarch of Ethiopia who defeated the Italian Fascist Invasion that existed from 1935 to 1941. He was voted 'Man of the Year' and featured on the front cover of the Time Magazine issue in 1930, King Haile Selassie's contributions to African unity, independence, peace and collective security are unmatched by any other African or world leader.

King Haile Selassie played a formative and key, leading role in the establishment of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in May, 1963, now known as the African Union (AU), through his tireless efforts, full dedication and commitment to the cause of African independence, freedom, peace and unity. Shortly after meeting with Nelson Mandela providing him with military training, an Ethiopian passport and a hand- held gun given him to liberate South Africans from Apartheid rule in 1962,King Haile Selassie convened the first conference comprised of 31 Independent African nation states that led to the establishment of the Organization of African Unity on May 25, 1963 in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

King Haile Selassie also constructed the building that would house the firstmeeting of African leaders at the sole expense of the Imperial Ethiopian government. He provided the guidance, oversight, and visionary leadership that led to the ratification of the OAU's Charter in May, 1963 aswell. King Haile Selassie was elected as the first and fifth Chairman to preside over the African nations that comprised the OAU. King Haile Selassie is the only African leader to have served as Chairman of the OAU more than once. As Chairman, King Haile Selassie, successfully mediated along with president Modibo Keita of Mali the 'Bamako Peace Accord', which resolved the border conflict between Morocco and Algeria in 1964.

In 1964, he also initiated the concept of a United States of Africa. He successfully negotiated the Biafran civil war of Nigeria in 1967. In February, 1972, Haile Selassie also resolved then southern Sudan crises under the 'Addis Ababa Peace Agreement' between the central government of Sudan and the Anya-Anya, the southern rebel group, to become a self-governing region under a unified Sudan.

Mengistu Haile Mariam, nicknamed Graziano – Mengistu hijacked and turned the peaceful change of the Ethiopian February, 1974 Revolution into a bloody civil war. He got his deputy Atnafu Abate executed in cold blood for genuinely advocating a policy of mixed economy, free media anddemocracy considered a timely quest for the nation; this criminal act shocked even the ex-USSR which was supportive of broad-based and inclusive struggle for change as well as normalization of relations with theWestern powers; he and most of his accomplices in the Duerg dubbed theex-USSR as revisionist. Mengistu enticed the nobilities and dignitaries of the Imperial regime by extending an olive branch of "Ethiopia Tikdem Yale Menim Dem" (Ethiopia First without any Bloodshed) and then put them inprison subsequently massacring them in cold blood without trial.

He failed stop the state-sponsored Red Terror inspite of the objection of the Kremlin to that effect. He got Lt. General Aman Andom, which recklessaction worked to the advantage of the Shaebia. He got Brigadier General Tefferi Benti for advocating in public peace and reconciliation with opposition entities, with the Revolutionary EPRP in particular. Both Generals aforementioned were Chairman of the Duerg under which Mengistu served as their deputy, but in fact as a de-facto leader in power.Siad Barre of Somalia took advantage of the massacre of about 18 highly experienced senior military officials of the Imperial regime including the irreplaceable Prime Minister, and former diplomat Aklilu Habtewold, Lt. General Assefa Ayene and others to invade our country, Mengistu overturned his own land proclamation of private land of 10 hectares to each peasant and introduced the State and cooperative farming systems, which were on the verge of dying in the ex- USSR. It was under MengistuHathat an Haile Mariam the Institute of Nations and Nationalities was established and that the structure of government reflected divisiveness along ethnic lines – a bad omen of things to come which many of his ownofficials feared. Mengistu failed miserably to read the writings on the wall demanding reform; for example: he ordered the killing of capable senior military officers in the aftermath of May, 1989 coup; he reneged on his publicly declared decision to adopt a mixed-economic policy. Finally, the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces Mengistu fled the country leaving behind in disarray a huge army equipped with advanced weapons

- thus allowing the brutal TPLF regime, which inflicted untold crimes and colossal damages to our national resources in the past 23 years. His sudden flee gave the golden chance to Shaebia and theTPLF to loot the military equipment and for the latter to explode large munitions depot in Addis Ababa causing civilian casualties; the latter (Shaebia) used the stolen weapons and munitions in the Ethiopia-Eritrea war of 1998 - 2000.

Meles Zenawi, nicknamed the Stalinist - However, Meles downsized the history of Ethiopia to the time of Menilik II deliberately ignoring the glorious history of the Axumite Kingdom. Meles desecrated the Green- Yellow-Red Ethiopian flag and encouraged the removal of the statute of the Great Victor of Adwa, Menilik II; he deliberately undermines or shunned the achievements of glorious past leaders including Emperors Kaleb, Theodros II, Yohannes IV, and war heroes such as Ras Alula Aba Nega all but the second in the list hailing from the Tigray region of the present day. The tyrant finally died leaving us with the legacy of: sellout of Ethiopia's vital national interests such as active support for the separation of Eritrea; grisly heinous crimes including genocide, victims oftorture, incarceration of peaceful protesters en masse; extra judiciary execution of peaceful protesters, the wailing of mothers, the agony of bereaved families, filthy jails in which hundreds of political prisoners are cruelly kept, toiling peasants in serfdom, inter-ethnic hatred, daylight robbery of votes, pervasive corrupt practices, culture of pathological lies, muzzled media, government monopoly of all pillars of democracy, blockedfreedom of expression, poor educational standard, forbidden academic freedom in tertiary institutions, a land-locked country, fertile farmland ceded to the Sudan; leasing large chunks of fertile farmlands to unscrupulous foreign investors at tiny prices; massive unemployment largely affecting the youth; demoralized youth addicted to psycho-thermaldrugs; abject poverty; promoted corruption and embezzlement practices, looting national treasures and diverting donor fund to overseas banks; rampant breach of the constitution; regional instability et-al. ETHIOPIA: TRADITION - A say on 'Evil Eye', commonly known as 'Buda' How Wikipedia describes about the traditionally labeled 'Buda' (Evil eye).

Evil eyes locally known as 'Budas' and their ability to change themselves to a hyena at nights. A) Buda (or bouda), in Ethiopian folk religion, is thepower of the evil eye and the ability to change into a hyena. Buda is generally believed to be a power held and wielded by those in a different social group, for example among the Beta-Israel or metalworkers. B) Thebelief is also present in Sudan, Tanzania, and among the Berber people inMorocco. C) A belief in the evil eyes, or Buda, is widespread in Ethiopia.
D) The Beta-Israels, i.e. Ethiopian Jews, are often characterized by others as being possesed as 'Buda' . E) Other castes such as metalworkers are often labeled as bearing the Buda. F) In fact, the word for manual worker,tibeb (handcraftsmen), are also used to denote "ones with evil eyes." G) The alleged evil power of the tabib (handcraftsmen) is believed to be at a level similar to that of witches. H) Buda's alleged prevalence among outsiders correlates with the traditional belief that evil eyes curses themselves are rooted in envy. As such, those allegedly possessing the power of 'Buda' might do so because of malevolent spirits. One study specifies that they are believed to be "empowered by evil spirit". I) Niall Finneran describes how "the idea of magical creation underpins the perception of artisans in Ethiopia and in the wider African context. In many cases these skills have been acquired originally from an elemental source of evil via the paternal lineage, rather like a Faustian pact." J) The power of the evil eyes allows its bearer to change into a hyena, allowing him or her to attack another person while concealing his or her human identity. K) Some Ethiopian Christians carry an amulet or talisman, knownas a 'kitab', which will invoke God's name (to be labeled at necks or arms), toward off the ill effects of 'Buda'. L) A Dabtara, who is either an unordained priest or educated layperson, will create these protective amulets or talismans. M) Ethiopian Orthodox priests continue to intervene and perform exorcisms on behalf of those believed to be afflicted by demons or 'Buda'. Such persons are brought to a church or prayer sessions. M) Amsalu Geleta, in a modern case study, relates elements that are common to Ethiopian Christian exorcisms: It includes singing praise and victory songs, reading from the Scripture, prayer and confronting the spirit in the name of Jesus. N) Dialogue with the spirit is another important part of the exorcism ceremony. It helps the counselor (exorcist)to know how the spirit was operating in the life of the demoniac. The signsand events mentioned by the spirit are affirmed by the victim after deliverance. O) The exorcism is not always successful, and Geleta notes another instance in which the usual methods were unsuccessful, and the demons apparently left the subject at a later time. In any event, "in all cases the spirit is commanded in no other name than the name of Jesus.

Factors that explain the Ethiopian outmigration'EM Commentary (December 20, 2013)

Editor's note! Pushing the government's decade-long, two-digit annual economic growth rhetoric to the side, two distinguished Ethiopian scholarsnamely Professors Seid Hassan and Minga Negash a must-read piece that'abject poverty and bad governance' are, among others, the key factors for the Ethiopian exodus into the Middle East and beyond. Here below excerpt from "Explaining the Ethiopian outmigration: Incentives or Constraints?"

In particular, we observe that the existence of an organized crime, whosemain purpose is reaping the benefits from smuggling and human trafficking. This highly organized criminal activity enjoys an interlocking relationship with the strength of the institutions of governance and the political effort to delegitimize the Ethiopian State, ironically connected to the history of the ruling regime itself. Furthermore, the breakdown of lawand order is in part explained by the GoE's increasingly repressive methods of resolving dissent. Our observations indicate that criminal syndicates pertaining to human trafficking have become powerful; often connected to either the law enforcement agencies or the various armed groups that claim to have political grievances. We also observe that the majority of migrants are coming from rural areas; they are poor, uneducated and unskilled and hence unable to legitimize their immigration. We therefore predict that the Saudi mass expulsion of Ethiopians will not be the last we would observe. Nor would we see Ethiopians stopping emigrating unless the root causes of the exodus and the mediating factors are recognized, and appropriate mitigation policies are put in place. Here, we list a few of the inter-related push factors that explain the Ethiopian outmigration below,

As one of the current authors illustrated earlier, the repeatedly devalued birr (conducted without addressing the economic fundamentals of the country) which in turn was created by politically driven monetary and fiscal policy measures, raised prices sharply leading to a rise in the cost ofliving and a massive fall in living stands. Worse, the regime unwisely adopted price caps measures, despite warnings of its damaging effects. Allthe price caps measure did was create shortages without reducing prices. It is refreshing to see Feil! Hyperkoblingsreferansen er ugyldig., one of the country's local newspapers in its November 27, 2013 edition rather boldly articulating the rising cost of living as one of the drivers of the Ethiopian outmigration.

Land policy: Gebru and Beyene document that landlessness is one of the key factors for outmigration in Ethiopia. This fact is buttressed by the significant portion of Ethiopian migrants to the Middle East being from rural areas where about 80% of the population depends on farming and nomadic cattle raising for its livelihood. The abject rural poverty that peasants are facing cannot be separated from the government's landholding policies (Gebresellasie, 2006). Unfortunately and as Gebreselassie noted (P.4), the GoE's "insertion of the issue of land in the Ethiopian constitution [has made] rural land increasingly [to] become a political affair". By inserting the land policy in the constitution, the GoE has effectively eliminated the possibility of flexible application of policy, extended its control over the population and made free and fair election only a dream. Worse, it has eliminated all meaningful debates about efficient utilization of land (Nega and Degefe, 2000). The net effect is thatinstead of curbing migration, the landholding policy is used to disown andevict peasants from their ancestral lands.

The evictions are made in part to give way for the government's sugar plantations and facilitate for international agri-business which ironically come from Saudi Arabia and Asian countries. Furthermore, the lack of productivity in the agricultural sector is also connected to the GoE's land policy. According to a report published by the Ethiopian Economic Association (p.2), the government's bad land-holding policy has led to "declining farm size, tenure insecurity, and subsistence farming practices".

Rapid Population Growth and Weak Industrial Sector: Poor family planningand population policy when coupled with problematic land policy makes the situation explosive. As noted earlier more than 80% of the population lives in rural areas and depends on subsistence farming. The population growth rate hovers around 3%. The rapid growth in population has reduced the land that is held by each farmer, making it uneconomical for the small farmer to stay in rural Ethiopia. The effect of the land shortage is to create an influx into urban centers, which themselves are under extreme pressure. The manufacturing and the service sectors of the economy were supposed to absorb the rising population. This however is not the case as government itself admitted its disappointments about the industry sector of the economy. The fact that population growth has been outstripping food production, which is associated with increased land scarcity and environmental degradation, has been proved by the last and current regimes' attempts of repeated land redistribution schemes.

Remittances not invested: According to some estimates the annual revenues from remittances is close of three billion US dollars, a figure thatis much higher than the country's revenue from exports of goods and official development assistance (ODA). The bulk of the remittance is coming from the Middle East countries. The remittances are spent for repayment of debts (often borrowed from family, friends or loan sharks) and fees for recruitment agencies. Most of the financial flow is outside of the banking system and involves the money laundering networks.

Anecdotal evidence indicates that income generated by migrants is rarely invested in productive assets. The leftovers from debt and fee repayment are used to support and alleviate family constraints and hardships. The few that is remaining is invested in real estate, an investment sector withno multiplier effects. Most Ethiopian migrants to the Middle East are poor,women, uneducated and unskilled: Economic and migration theory indicate that relatively highly skilled workers are mobile, flexible and havea better chance of negotiating and enforcing employment contracts.

Contrary to this fact, most Ethiopians who are migrating to the Middle East are relatively unskilled, less educated and destitute which makes them to be vulnerable for abuse. *Dawit Wolde Giorgis and David Weinberg*connected the labor brokerage system in the oil rich Kingdom to a form ofmodern day slavery. On the other hand the poorest households would have greater incentives to send their children in order to benefit from the accrued remittances. The poor households however would not have the financial wherewithal to afford sending their household members abroad to pay for the journey and the human smuggler or recruiter ((Taylor, 2006)). Even though the country exports both skilled and unskilled labor, the mass migration of unskilled manpower of the country is peculiar to thecountry. To make matters worse, there was no meaningful effort on the part of the GoE to equip the migrants even with basic household management skills such as the operation of washing machines and stoves.The GoE did not and probably still does not have labor counselors in its embassies.

Unemployment is the main driver of the outmigration: According to Serneels of Oxford University, Ethiopia has "one of the highest unemployment rates worldwide, around 50% of the urban men between age 15 and 30 are unemployed." The official statistics for unemployment however is much smaller than what is indicated above. Widespread poverty, lack of jobs and hopelessness, particularly among the youth, disadvantageous economic and social position of women (see also Endeshaw et al/IOM) are the driving force of Ethiopian migration. The great majority of the deportees from Saudi Arabia and the new arrivals in Yemen and Southern Africa are young people who are desperate about their future. They are by and large in the 20-30 years of age. This fact further indicates the inability of the local economy to absorb the younger and more productive portion of the labor force. This also should negativelyaffect productivity and Ethiopia's growth capabilities. The massification of higher education and the 10+2 education policy have not helped to mitigate the problem, which in turn has resulted in an alarming level of poor education quality and high dropout rates, as reported by Hassan andAhmed: 2010); Dyson:2012; Tekeste Negash:2006). This puts the country in a vicious circle. Drought and climate change are major problems. The country has been frequently hard hit by drought which exacerbates the financial constraints of households and increasing food insecurity. The country has not been self-sufficient in food and about 20%of the population is in donor-supported social safety net program. The massive environmental degradation of the few virgin lands by commercialfarmers when coupled with the eviction of peasants exacerbates both the despair and the outmigration.

Labor exporting policy to mitigate shortage of foreign currency: Exporting people is considered by the GoE as one of the best sources of foreign currency. Unlike in other countries, the government encourages its citizens to migrate. The GoE's encouragement comes in two forms. The first is political while the second is economic. The immigration of political opponents is seen by the ruling party as a sign of relief. With regard to the economic reasons, Kebede notes that the government encourages andhas instituted migration policies, to the extent of being "active in facilitating the recruitment of workers for employment abroad (p. 22) but without adequately informing migrants about the dangers they would facein host countries, and without negotiating with host countries on labor conditions. The diaspora did not disappoint when it comes to the latter, asit helped finance the ruling party's mega projects by buying diaspora bonds, participating in government housing construction (condominium) schemes, building houses and increasing own family consumption expenditures. Both the government and families of emigrants view remittance flows as an important source of finance. No reverse brain drainis observed. Countries such as China, India and Korea were able to attracttheir skilled members of the diaspora to help them develop their economies because as their economies grew, the diaspora was pulled backinto these countries. The fact that Ethiopia is unable to do this suggests that the so-called growing economy either does not exist or is incapable ofabsorbing the skilled part of the Ethiopian diaspora, in part due to lack of opportunities (Fransen and Kuschminder (2009:23). The political tensions exacerbate the problems of brain drain.

Voice and accountability problems. Ethiopia is ranked very low in most of the international and regional governance indicators. It is also in the list of the world's 20 failed states. Interestingly, the alleged economic expansion started to occur immediately after the 2005 election crisis. However, outmigration accelerated right after the 2005 election. This may indicate two factors playing a big role. One is the political difficulties the regime has faced since the 2005 election debacle. The second bolstering the claim made about the nonexistence of the much trumpeted growth of GDP and/or not reaching the majority of the people. Indication are that both maybe working together as Nobel Laureate Amartya Sen shows that in countries where governments are accountable, human misery is low.

The controlling nature of the ruling party is documented: by Arriola: 2005,Abbink: 2006, Helen Epstein: 2010, Human Right Watch: 2010 and others. In conclusion we surmise that Ethiopia's outmigration is largely explained by several interconnected push factors. According to one of the aforementioned researchers, 71% of the migration from Gojam and SSNPR is "related to push factors in places of origin, and 29% to pull factors in places of destination." The pull factors are largely out of the control of the GoE and it may only have limited influence. The TPLF/EPRDFhad 22 years to originate and implement policy, a job that Endeshaw et al(IOM), the U.S. State Department, Kebede, Teshome and others have indicated that the GoE has failed to do. In other words the present crisis isyet another evidence of government ineffectiveness. Furthermore, it is hard to imagine that such a highly lucrative business involving huge network of migration facilitators, local brokers and recruiters and human trafficking networks, to the extent of making the country the hub of human trafficking, would exist this long without being sanctioned by the regime, particularly in a system which controls each individual citizen withthe notorious 1-to-5 bonding scheme. Ethiopia: Amharaland President Ayalew Gobeze Heads To Turkey, andSinquenesh Ijigu to Brazil'

Addis Fortune: (December 22, 2013) A president of a regional state and ahigh ranking minister in Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn cabinet, have been reassigned to overseas missions. They were relieved of their respective office to be appointed as ambassadors toTurkey and Brazil, respectively. Ayalew Gobeze, president of the Amhara Regional State, andSinqenesh Ejigu, minister of Mines, have been appointed as ambassadors toTurkey and Brazil, respectively. This comes after the Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM) held its congress in Bahir Dar, the seat of theAmhara Regional State where the party is governing. It has not been clear what prompted this change. But senior leaders in the party say it is part of the succession plan the party has been carrying out in recent years. "The party's leadership wants them to serve in other assignments which it deems are crucial," said a senior leader of ANDM, dispelling rumors that the two officials were reassigned due to poor performance or a result of an inter-party squabble. Both Ayalew and Sinqenesh have served in their respective positions for close to eight years. Ayalew, a humble personality well liked by many in the Amhara region, has been serving the regional state as president since 2008, where he began his debut as a senior official of the regional cabinet in 2005, under Addisu Legesse. He has also been a member of the House of Federation, since 2005. However, his ascendance in the ruling party began in 2006, when he was first elected as an executive committee member of the ANDM, during the sixth congress of the party.

A teacher when EPRDF insurgents advanced toward Addis Abeba in the early 1990s, Ayalew represents a generation of EPRDFites that have joined the party after the fall of the military government, in May 1991. Heis the peer of Demeke Mekonnen, now chairman of the ANDM and deputyprime minister, and Gegu Andargachew, his deputy. The latter began his ascendancy in 2005, after he was appointed to be member the Budget Subsidy & Revenues Affairs Standing Committee of the House of Federation. Chaired by Ayalew, the 10-member committee had comprisedpoliticians such as Shiferaw Shigute, now minister of Education, Redwan Hussien, now director general of Government Communications Affairs Office, Abadula Gemeda, speaker of Parliament, and Abay Woldu, president of theTigray Regional State. Gedu has been appointed as president of the Amhara Regional State, although the assembly of the regional administration's council has yet to endorse his new role. He became an executive committee member of the ANDM in the same year as Ayalew, although both have been members of the party's central committee since 1999. Ayalew is soon to travel to Ankara, Turkey, to serve as Ethiopia's ambassador, filling the vacant position there, followingthe departure of Mulatu Teshome, now president of the Republic.

President Mulatu is credited for enhancing, substantially, not only the bilateral trade between the two countries, but also attracting foreign directinvestment fromTurkey's investors, particularly in the textile industry.

Close to 115 Turkish companies have invested 1.2 billion dollars in Ethiopia since 2003, while its contractors have managed 21 projects witha total projected cost of 2.4 billion dollars.

During Mulatu's tour of duty,Turkey became the ninth largest trading partner for Ethiopia, with a bilateral trade volume of a little less than half a billion dollars, in 2012. Largely exporting iron and steel toEthiopiabut also industrial machineries, the trade balance remains in favour ofTurkey, with a trade surplus of nearly 350 million dollars.Ethiopia exported in the same year toTurkey close to 47 million dollars worth of primary agricultural goods such as oilseeds, fruits, cereals and industrial outputs including textile, yarn, fabrics and apparels. Another emerging economy where Ethiopian officials are keen to establish stronger ties is Brazil, a country of nearly 200 million people with an economy that has 2.2 trillion dollars in gross domestic product (GDP). It is the sixth largest economy inthe world. Prime Minister Hailemariam has appointed Sinqenesh, a minister of Mines up until last week, to serve as Ethiopia's first ambassadoress to Brazil. Both countries opened embassies in their respective capitals in recent years, although they have a history of brief relationship back in the late 1960s. It was during Emperor Haile Sellasie's visit to the country to visit how its leaders changed the capital from Brasilia to Rio de Janeiro that he had suffered a failed military coup back home. The Emperor was keen to move Ethiopia's capital from Addis Abebato Bahir Dar.

The two countries did not see it fit to continue such high level diplomatic representation, thus closed them soon after;Ethiopiaclosed its Embassy in the same year it had opened its Embassy in 1968, andBrazilin 1970. It took another 45 years before Brazil took the initiative to reopen its Embassy in Addis Abeba. The same ambassador is also accredited to the Africa Union (AU). Ethiopia reciprocated this move in reopening its embassy in 2011. The late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi was the second leader of Ethiopia to visit Rio de Janeiro in 2011, and President, Dilma V. Rousseff visited Ethiopia this year, the first for Brazil's leaders. Sinqenesh is the second senior government official who is also an executive committee member of the OPDO to leave office on Thursday, December 18, 2013. She leaves behind a ministry where she has been serving since 2001. She was first a state minister for Mines under Mohammed Dirir, nowEthiopia's ambassador to Egypt, and a minister since 2010. Her ministerialposition is filled by her deputy, Tollosa Shiga, sources disclosed.

Teddy Afro the emerging global star ? – CCTV'

Ethiopia's superstar singer who is recovering from imprisonment of a hit-and-run charges by City Traffic police, Tewodros Kassahun nicknamed "aka Teddy-Afro" had been convicted of the manslaughter of a homelessman killed in a hit-and-run incident in Addis Ababa in 2006. The singer was found guilty of running the man down in his car and driving away without reporting the incident to a traffic police on duty. Ethiopia's best- known pop star was also convicted of driving without a licence. Probably he could have to face between five and 15 years in prison when sentenced. Teddy Afro's musical song becomes an anthem for oppositionprotests in May-2005. Many of his fans believe the charges against him were politically motivated. The legend singer is highly praised by the Chinese Central Television recently.

December 23, 2013: ETHIOPIA - Prison Census 211 journalists jailedworldwide-CPJ'

Saleh Idris Gama, Eri-TV, Tesfalidet Kidane Tesfazghi, Eri-TV Imprisoned:December 2006

Tesfalidet, a producer for Eritrea's state broadcaster Eri-TV, and Saleh, acameraman, were arrested in late 2006 on the Kenya-Somalia border during Ethiopia's invasion of southern Somalia.

The Ethiopian Foreign Ministry first disclosed the detention of the journalists in April 2007, and presented them on state television as part ofa group of 41 captured terrorism suspects, according to CPJ research. Though Eritrea often conscripted journalists into military service, the videodid not present any evidence linking the journalists to military activity.

The Ethiopian ministry pledged to subject some of the suspects to militarytrials but did not identify them by name. In a September 2011 press conference with exiled Eritrean journalists in Addis Ababa, the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said Saleh and Tesfalidet would be freed if investigations determined they were not involved in espionage, according to news reports and journalists who participated in the press conference.

But Tesfalidet and Saleh had not been tried by late 2013, and authorities disclosed no information about legal proceedings against them, accordingto local journalists. Authorities also did not disclose any information abouttheir health or whereabouts.

Woubshet Taye, “Awramba Times” Imprisoned: June 19, 2011Police arrested Woubshet, deputy editor of the independent weekly Awramba Times, after raiding his home in the capital, Addis Ababa, and confiscating documents, cameras, CDs, and selected copies ofthe newspaper, according to local journalists. The outlet's top editor, CPJ International Press Freedom Awardee Dawit Kebede, fled the country in November 2011 in fear of being arrested; the *newspaper*is published online from exile.

Government spokesman Shimelis Kemal said Woubshet was among several people accused of planning terroristattacks on infrastructure, telecommunications, and power lines with the support of an unnamed international terrorist group and Ethiopia's neighbor, Eritrea, accordingto news reports. In January 2012, a court in Addis Ababa sentenced Woubshet to 14 years in prison news reports said. CPJ believes Woubshet's conviction was in reprisal for Awramba Times' criticalcoverage of the government. Prior to his arrest, Woubshet had written a column criticizing what he saw as the ruling party's tactics of weakening and dividing the media and the opposition, Dawit told CPJ. Woubshet hadbeen targeted in the past. He was detained for a week in November 2005during the government's crackdown on news coverage of unrest that followed disputed elections.

In April 2013, authorities transferred Woubshet from Kilinto Prison, outside Addis Ababa, to a detention facility in the town of Ziway, about 83miles southeast of the capital, according to local journalists and the Awramba Times. Ziway, one Ethiopia's largest prisons, is a maximum-security jail designed for those convicted of serious offenses, according tolocal journalists. The authorities did not provide a reason for the transfer. In November, Woubshet was transferred back to Kality prison because hewas in poor health, according to local journalists.

Woubshet did not appeal his conviction and applied for a pardon, according to local journalists. In August 2013, the Ethiopian Ministry of Justice rejected the request for a pardon, the Awramba Times reported.

In October 2013, Woubshet was honored with the Free Press Africa Awardat the CNN MultiChoice African Journalist Awards in Cape Town, South Africa.

Reeyot Alemu, freelancer - Imprisoned: June 21, 2011

Ethiopian security forces arrested Reeyot, a prominent, critical columnistfor the leading independent weekly Feteh, at an Addis Ababa high schoolwhere she taught English. Authorities raided her home and seized documents and other materials before taking her into custody at the Maekelawi federal detention center.

Ethiopian government spokesman Shimelis Kemal said Reeyot was amongseveral people accused of planning terrorist attacks on infrastructure, telecommunications, and power lines in the country with the support of anunnamed international terrorist group and Ethiopia's neighbor, Eritrea, according to news reports. Authorities filed terrorism charges against Reeyot in September 2011, according to local journalists.

The High Court sentenced Reeyot in January 2012 to 14 years in prisonfor planning a terrorist act; possessing property for a terrorist act; and promoting a terrorist act. The conviction was based on emails she had received from pro-opposition discussion groups; reports she had sent tothe U.S.-based opposition news site Ethiopian Review; and transfers from her bank account, according to court documentsreviewed by CPJ.

CPJ believes Reeyot's conviction is due to columns she wrote that accusedauthorities of governing by coercion, by (for example) allowing access to economic and educational opportunities only to those who were membersof the ruling party, according to CPJ's review of the translations in 2013. In the last column published before her arrest, she wrote that the ruling party had deluded itself in believing it held the legitimacy of popular support in the way of late Libyan leader Muammar Qaddafi, according to local journalists.

In August 2012, the Supreme Court overturned Reeyot's conviction on theplanning and possession charges, but upheld the charge of promoting terrorism. The court*reduced*her sentence to five years.

In January 2013:The Ethiopian Court of Cassation, the last resort for legalappeals in Ethiopia, rejected Reeyot's appeal, according to news reports. She is being held at*Kality Prison* in Addis Ababa.

In March 2013, prison authorities threatened to place Reeyot in solitary confinement for saying she would publicize the abuse of her rights, according to her lawyer and family members. The same month, the United Nations special rapporteur on torture and other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment issued a report that determined Reeyot's rightsunder the U.N. Convention Against Torture had been violated by the government's failure to respond to allegations of her ill treatment.

Reeyot's health had deteriorated while she was held in pretrial detention,reports said.

In April 2013, Reeyot won the 2013 UNESCO-Guillermo Cano World PressFreedom Prize in recognition of her courage and commitment to freedom of expression.

In September 2013, prison officials *limited*Reeyot's visitors to her parents,denying visits from her fiancé, relatives, and friends. The journalist wageda four-day hunger strike in protest. Kemal said that Reeyot was being disciplined for violating prison laws, but did not elaborate, according to news reports.

Eskinder Nega, freelancer Imprisoned: September 14, 2011

Ethiopian security forces arrested Eskinder, a prominent online columnistand former publisher and editor of now-shuttered newspapers, on vagueaccusations of involvement in a terrorism plot. The arrest came five daysafter Eskinder published a*column* on the U.S.-based news website EthioMedia that criticized the government for misusing the country's sweeping anti-terrorism law to jail prominent journalists anddissident intellectuals.

Shortly after Eskinder's arrest, state television portrayed the journalist as a spy for "foreign forces" and accused him of having links with the bannedopposition movement Ginbot 7, which the Ethiopian government designated a terrorist entity. In an interview with Agence France-Presse, government spokesman Shimelis Kemal accused the detainee of plotting "a series of terrorist acts that would likely wreak havoc." Eskinder consistently proclaimed his innocence, but was convicted on the basis of a video of a public town hallmeeting in which he discussed the possibility of a popular uprising in Ethiopia if the ruling party did not deliver democratic reform, according toreports.

In July 2012, a federal high court judge in Addis Ababa sentenced Eskinder to an 18-year prison sentence, according to local journalists and news reports. Five exiled journalists were convicted inabsentia at the same time. Also in 2012, a U.N. panel found that Eskinder's imprisonment came as "a result of his peaceful exercise of the right to freedom of expression," according to a report*published* in April 2013.

In May 2013, Ethiopia's Supreme Court rejected an appeal and upheld thesentence. CPJ believes the charges are part of a pattern of government persecution of Eskinder in reprisal for his coverage. In 2011, police detained Eskinder and threatened him in connection with his onlinecolumns that drew comparisons between the Egyptian uprising and Ethiopia's 2005 pro-democracy protests, according to news reports. His coverage of the Ethiopian government's repression of the 2005 protests landed him in jail for 17 months on anti-state charges at the time. After his release in 2007, authorities banned his newspapers and denied him licenses to start INCLUDEPICTURE "http://cdncache- a.akamaihd.net/items/it/img/arrow-10x10.png" * MERGEFORMATINET new ones. He was first arrested in September 1993 in connection with his articles in the Amharic weekly Ethiopis, one of the country's first independent newspapers, about the government's crackdown on dissent inWestern Ethiopia, according to CPJ research. Eskinder was being held at Kality Prison in Addis Ababa, with restricted visitation rights, in late2013.

Yusuf Getachew,"Ye Muslimoch Guday" Imprisoned: July 20, 2012

Police officers raided the Addis Ababa home of Yusuf, editor of the now-defunct Ye Muslimoch Guday (Muslim Affairs), as part of a broad crackdown on journalists and news outlets reporting on protests staged by Ethiopian Muslims. the protesters to Islamist extremists and tried to suppress coverage by arresting several local and international journalists and forcing publications to close down, according to local journalists and news reports.

After Yusuf's arrest, other Ye Muslimoch Guday journalists went into hiding, and the publication ceased operations, local journalists told CPJ. Yusuf spent weeks in pre-trial custody at the Maekelawi federal detentioncenter without access to his family and limited contact with his lawyer, according to local journalists.

In October 2012, he was formally charged under the 2009 Anti-TerrorismLaw with plotting acts of "terrorism [and] intending to advance a political,religious, or ideological cause," according to local journalists. Yusuf told the court he had been beaten in custody, local journalists told CPJ.

Prosecutors accused Yusuf of inciting violence in columns in Ye MuslimochGudayby alleging that the government-appointed Supreme Council for Muslim Affairs was corrupt and lacked legitimacy, according to local journalists and court documents obtained by CPJ. The prosecution also used as evidence Yusuf's CDs with Islamic teachings even though these were widely available in markets according to local journalists. The editor is being held at Kality Prison in Addis Ababa. The trial was ongoing in late2013.

Solomon Kebede, “Ye Muslimoch Guday” Imprisoned: January 17, 2013:

An opportunity for EPRDF to right the wrong - For Ethiopia to reclaim its legal and historic rights'

REPORT: (December 23, 2013) - On December 6,2013, a number of media reports including Aljazeera and Africa Review have all indicated that the ruling party in Ethiopia (TPLF/EPRDF) and the Isayas led EPLF in Eritrea are currently negotiating through a mediator, Omar Al Bashir of the Sudan. On December 16, 2013, in an opinion that appeared on the online publication African Argument: Herman Cohen, the former Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, also alluded to the same rapprochement stating that “in recent months, positive signals havebeen coming from both countries.“

In principle, this writer is not against the idea of resolving conflict and differences through peaceful negotiation. However, I believe, a meaningfulconflict resolution requires addressing the unspoken but true concerns of the Ethiopian people. In my opinion, any attempt to move forward withoutaddressing these outstanding issues will only aggravate the sense of injustice thereby sawing the seed for continued conflict. I am an Ethiopiantherefore; first and foremost my focus is safeguarding the current and future interest of Ethiopia. First and foremost, any attempt to resolve this outstanding issue should weigh-in the fact that Ethiopians have been betrayed by the ruling TPLF/EPRDF regime when it comes to some of the cardinal decisions made about the unity and territorial integrity of their country. Here are some of the highlights: The “referendums” of 1993 was conducted in a way that did not represent the interest of Ethiopians.

Ethiopians were completely excluded from having a say in that highly important decision. Such a decision of monumental consequence was made in a closed door away from the people of Ethiopia. At the time, thegovernment was only transitional and with no such mandate whatsoeverfrom the general public.

Ethiopia's historical and legal rights were completely ignored. Instead, ill- conceived political calculation and ideological gimmick dictated the ruling group's extremely short sighted decisions. Thanks largely to Mr. Zenawi's and his small circle's decision, Ethiopia's right of access to the sea was completely denied. It is noteworthy to mention here that even the so- called outside negotiators like Herman Cohen were baffled by Meles's disregard of this distinct and less controversial possibility. Following the 1998-2000 war that killed over 70 thousand people, once again, the rulinggroup in Addis failed to protect the best interests of the Ethiopian people. The possibility for a military solution was sabotaged by the order of none other than the PM Meles Zenawi .

The so called "Algers agreement "basically does not take into account, thehistorical, legal and strategic interests of Ethiopia. The Algers agreement hands Badme over to Eritrea and does not even contemplate providing Ethiopia with access to its historic and legal port of Assab. As a number ofprominent legal scholars have documented, the Algers agreement was a tragic miscarriage of justice. The "lawyers" representing Ethiopia were arguing in favour of Eritrea, not Ethiopia (see Asseb Yeman Nat, by Dr Yakob H.Mariam , 2004 Et Calendar). As Leo Tolstoy, once wrote "Wrong does not cease to be wrong because the majority share in it." — Leo Tolstoy, A Confession . The unfairness of using colonial references to disadvantage Ethiopia was wrong and should not have been accepted as alegal base to settle such disputes. Assab and Bademe have and should always belong to Ethiopia. Anything less would be a betrayal of the inhabitants of these regions.

Many of the then key decision makers within the TPLF/EPRDF now acknowledge that these were historical wrongs of the ruling TPLF/ EPRDF when it comes to issues related to Eritrea. Chief among those who have publicly declared their positions are the then President Negasso Gidada, PM Tamrat Layne, Defence Minsiter Seye Abraha, and Mr Gebru Asrat (then Governor of Kilil One -Tigray Region). Even today, issues related to Eritrea are not yet fully settled. At this point, the ruling TPLF/ EPRDF has an opportunity to right some of the wrongs of the past. Hence, It should stand firm and demonstrate that it stands for the best interests of Ethiopia. The interest of 97 million people should not be in any way compromised. The involved world knows how misguided and lopsided bothEritrean referendum of 1993 and the Algiers Agreement of post war 1998-2000 have been. There is nothing wrong to take measures to address the injustice done to Ethiopia.

Action matters: The current leaders of TPLF/EPRDF have to understand that they cannot and should not continue to disadvantage and disregard their own country. The government of PM Hailemariam Desalegn should learn from the bad and fatalistic practices of the past and conduct business by being loyal to the will and desire of Ethiopians and Ethiopia's own sovereign interest – not to the will of some foreign power. This government should not surrender the right of Ethiopia to have full access to the sea port. Ethiopia cannot continue to pay tens of millions of dollars to others to use their port and put our national interest in jeopardy. Until such time that EPRDF/TPLF shows its commitment to Ethiopian Unity, it will continue to pay dearly and suffer from lack of trust by Ethiopians. Onecan not buy trust with money, by intimidation or through misleading propaganda. It has to be earned by traveling through painstaking process.As the saying goes, show clearly that you love the people and the people will in turn love you and/or at least respect you. Clearly, everyone understands that there is no easy way to right all the wrongs committed in the last several years. However, now is the time for the ruling group in Ethiopia to do the right thing and set the country in the right direction.

Ethiopia cannot afford to miss yet another opportunity to reclaim its legaland historical rights and assert itself. Action matters. There is no justification whatsoever to continue on the path that has disadvantaged Ethiopia and relegated her to a dependent country on states like Djibouti.

What needs to be done now? The government: a) To start with, the rulingparty should stop being obsessed about the opposition and holding to power forever. It should stop the desire to accommodate Issayas to cajolehim in order to stop supporting the opposition. The government should trust the Ethiopian public not Issayas. Issayas is not trust worthy and there is no way one can satisfy his insatiable appetite for domination. b) The government should commit itself to find a way to right the wrong of the past 22 years when it comes to Issayas. Clearly, this should inform allactivities of the government moving forward. c) The right of the Afar, the Erob etc people to remain Ethiopians and Ethiopia's historical as well as legal right to Assab should be fully asserted. The government has to be committed to act on the best interests of Ethiopia not the interest of any foreign power. d) The border issue should be resolved without splitting Ethiopians in Tigray, Saho, the people of Erob and Afar into different countries. The government must protect the right of those who rightly claim their Ethiopianness. Badme belongs to Ethiopia as does Assab. e) Herman Cohens recommendation that "Ethiopia offer to accept a symbolicinitial takeover by Eritrea of territory awarded by the EEBC, followed by the same day opening of dialogue with a totally open agenda". Should be fully rejected. Ethiopia cannot be tricked twice. f)The government should work with the opposition in order to develop a strong "Ethiopian position" for any negotiation or eventuality with Esayiyas Afewerki and his regime.

g) The government should use this opportunity to develop a nationaldialogue and to build national consensus among all Ethiopian political forces. This opportunity should be used to bring lasting peace through national dialogue and by building national consensus and reconciliation.

The opposition: a) Just like the ruling party, everyone in the Ethiopian opposition should also clarify its position when it comes to the issue of Eritrea. Saying nothing on such important matter is tantamount to endorsing the status quo. And the status quo is not in the best interest ofEthiopia. b) Engage EPRDF/TPLF in order to develop a strong Ethiopian position vis-à-vis the Isayas/Shabia position. c) Use this opportunity to develop trust for national dialogue and to build national consensus and reconciliation among all Ethiopian stakeholders. d) Discharge its/their responsibility to the public faithfully by providing timely and accurate information about the status of any "negotiation" or rapprochement with Isayas and Shabiya.

The Ethiopian public: a) Be vigilant and follow diligently any action relatedto negotiation/ dialogue with Issays / Shabiya. An informed public is an empowered public. b) Speak to the politicians both within the governmentand the opposition to pressure them to stand up for a strong Ethiopian interest and to redress past mistakes. An engaged public is the key to influencing political decisions and the future of our collective destiny. c) Use this opportunity to pursue a national dialogue and to build national consensus among all Ethiopians. Our future is intertwined and we cannot afford to leave any one behind or exclude any Ethiopian. d) Members of the Ethiopian media, both diaspora based and locally, should also discharge their professional obligation by reporting without any biases andby holding politicians accountable. Media biases have become the centre of our political life and that has to change. e)Ethiopia is bigger than the political ambition of any single politician or political party. The interstate ofEthiopia goes beyond the interest of one party. Ethiopia has room for all ofits citizens. The party that reflects the interest of Ethiopia will always be the winner of the hearts and minds of the Ethiopian people during electiontimes. f) Now Ethiopians have an opportunity to reclaim our collective destiny and to jump start our bright future through a national consensus. TPLF/EPRDF too has yet another opportunity to demonstrate that it has learnt from its mistakes. Let us not spoil this opportunity. g) Ethiopia doesnot have to be bound by the defective Algers Agreement and the decisionsof the Ethiopia-Eritrea Border Commission (EEBC). The new leadership in Addis should not be bound by the meaningless Algers Agreement and simplistic and outdated ideological gimmick. Just like the treaty of Wuchale that favored Italy's interest over Ethiopia, we should reject the Algers agreement; because the Algers agreement too is unfair to Ethiopia.Anything less will be unacceptable to Ethiopians everywhere. h) It is important to note that foreign governments (weak or strong) have their own interest. And when they recommend solutions, it is first and foremostto protect their own national interests. i) Ethiopia has no one but its sons and daughters to protect it. The sons and daughters include the politicianswithin the ruling party as well as in the opposition. Better late than never, the politicians in the ruling party and its supporters need to stand up for Ethiopians interest now. I urge the public to engage actively on this issue,make your voices heard by writing, discussing in all pal talk rooms, radio programs etc. Not doing so could have a colossal consequence for our beloved country both today and in the future too. May God bless Ethiopia!

South Sudan: Envoys to Travel to South Sudan for Negotiations'

DW, AP, AFP, Reuters, dpa (December 25, 2013) Both the European Unionand East African nations have said they plan to hold negotiations in South Sudan soon. International leaders worry that the continued clashes will plunge the young country into civil war. The European Union and East African nations indicated late on Wednesday intentions of sending envoys to South Sudan as soon as possible. Special EU envoy Alexander Rondos would arrive in South Sudan on Thursday, according to the European Commission. A South Sudan government official also said that Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn and Kenya President Uhuru Kenyatta would arrive in the capital city Juba on the same day, according to Reuters news agency. It was not immediately clear whether the country's president, Salva Kiir, or his rival, former Vice President Riek Machar, intended to participate in negotiations. Both had signalled this week their willingness to bring the two-week conflict to an end. However, Machar has demanded Kiir resign as a precondition to negotiations. The United Nations said on Wednesday it believed "thousands" have died in the fighting, which began two weeks ago. Tensions escalated in South Sudan on December 15 when Machar allegedly attempted to stage a coup.The former vice president has denied responsibility. The duo are long-timerivals, with Kiir having ousted Machar from his post in July. The two are also split along ethnic lines. Kiir belongs to the Dinka group, while Machar is Nuer.

Calls for peace: While fighting raged on in Malakal - one of the county's top oil-producing cities - on Wednesday, United Nations Secretary GeneralBan Ki-moon issued a radio and television Christmas address to the SouthSudanese people caught in the clashes. "South Sudan is under threat - but South Sudan is not alone," Ban said. "We are strengthening the UnitedNations presence and will do our best to stop the violence and help you build a better future for all," Ban said, adding that the UN would hold all culprits accountable for the "grave violation of human rights" currently wracking the country. Meanwhile, President Kiir denounced the ethnically- motivated killings. Innocent people have been wantonly killed. There are now people who are targeting others because of their tribal affiliation," Kiirsaid on Wednesday. He called on citizens to "cease immediately," adding that further violence would plunge the young nation into chaos. The UN Security Council voted to temporarily raise the number of peacekeepers deployed to South Sudan from the current 7,000 to 12,500. The resolution, which was adopted unanimously at a meeting at UN headquarters in New York on Tuesday, will also increase the number of international police officers in the country to just over 1,300 from the current 900. The additional troops and police officers are to be drawn at least in part from UN missions in the Democratic Republic of Congo, IvoryCoast, Abyei and Liberia.

The aim of the seminar was how to educate the youths, how to be united, work together and launch campaigns against those committing war crimes and crimes against humanity in Ethiopian Occupied-Ogaden Region. The Youth vowedto bring to justice those who that believe that they will never be made accountable and brought in front of Justices.

The South Africa-based Ogaden Youth and Students Union in collaborationwith Ogaden Community in South Africa has launched the three-days awareness Seminar on preventing Ethiopian human rights abuses.

Representatives and officials from Ogaden Community in South Africa, College Students, educators, Intellectuals, politicians and Eastern Africa Regional commentators participated in the seminar. Thousands Left Homeless After Authorities Demolish Slums in Ethiopia’scapital'

EAN: (December 26, 2013) Sitting amongst the rubble that used to be hishome. His old, small eyes are locked in the distance, but as soon as anyone comes near him, he looks up with a stare on his weathered face that belies his hope of solving his eminent problem, homelessness.Ato Ayalew Mitiku*, who is in the twilight of his 60′s, used to have a home– however shabby and small it was. He and his family used to live in the area behind Bole MedhaneAlem Church in Addis Ababa town, a place called Yechereqaw Kuasmeda.

There, around 2,000 people were estimated to have lived in one of the worst slum areas in Addis Ababa in small, shanty, illegally constructed houses. All the residents of that place form part of the lowest income earning section of Addis Ababa’s society. Four days ago, according to Sisay Kassie*, one of the two young men who showed reporters around,lots of police men surrounded the area, telling them to evacuate their homes immediately.

“They did not even [allow] us enough time for [the] evacuation” Sisay toldme, with sorrow in his eyes and extreme fatigue on his face. “They immediately started to plow down all the houses with bulldozers for no consideration. All the houses turned into dust and rubble right there in front of our eyes. The place we used to call home was no more, a barren land in its place.”

I enquired if they were given prior notice of the demolition. Their heartfeltand emotional answer was “They had told us that this place was going to be removed and plowed down three or four months ago. But there was nolegal notice. It was just word of the mouth. And we were always asking for places to be given to us. And the people at the concerned offices always said that at one time one of the officials wasn’t around to decide orat another time the map for the place was not prepared. And now they aretelling us to wait for our answers living outside. What kind of justice is that? There is no where we can apply to to get justice. The Sub city administration will not do anything for us and we have been trying to ask the Red Cross for help but its all bureaucratic.”

Many people are scared that kids may be buried under the rubble, since the demolition exercise was forcefully and hurriedly done. I met some whoclaimed to have been bruised and hurt in the debacle– although the injuries are minor. In front of the demolished houses are villas and apartments that are so beautifully made with nicely kept gardens watered constantly by the gardeners hired for that sole purpose. Ato Ayalew and Sisay told me that the place in front of where they used to live was given to the Ethiopian Sports Commission who are building an international- standard stadium. But it wasn’t even near them, they claim, ”they could have given us more time, they say. The place we were occupying would have been a road, so they could have given us time until the stadium wasfinished. Now we have nowhere to go…with our economical status, wherewould we go? what are we going to do? As I left the place, that was my question as well. Attempts to contact the relevant governmental bodies has been to no avail.

Ethiopia swamped by wave of returned migrants'

News & Commentary: (December 27, 2013)

More than 120,000 undocumented migrants were forced out of Saudi Arabia and face an uncertain future at home. Many returning migrants suffered physical and sexual abuse in Saudi Arabia. Addis Ababa, Ethiopia - The return of 120,000 young undocumented migrant workers from Saudi Arabia to Ethiopia has sparked fears that the influx will worsenthe country's high youth unemployment and put pressure on access to increasingly scarce land. As a result, a growing number of young Ethiopians are choosing to migrate to Sudan to circumvent an indefinite travel ban slapped by the Ethiopian government last month on Ethiopian workers traveling to Middle Eastern countries. In the last two months, there have been many people returning from Saudi Arabia. This makes things worse for people who cannot find work, according to commentators. 2013 has not been a good year so far. It is coming a new year and it is always nice to take stock of the damage after another year of trials and tribulations that is testing our endurance as a nation. Our children are still migrating out of the homeland in every direction.

One can never forget the Lampedusa shipwreck that resulted in over 360 dead. The recent shame and humiliation of our young people in the kingdom of Saudi Arabia will not be forgotten easily. The forced exodus was painful to watch let alone experience. Today there are thousands that are held in chattel slavery all over the Middle East and thousands in Yemen abandoned in the desert and with no place to go to. At present there are our citizens jailed in Kenya, Tanzania, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe for travelling without valid paper. There are Ethiopians in the Sinai of Egypt, in Libyan deserts, stranded, running or hiding in their hundreds if not thousands. It is upto anybody's guess. Diaspora Ethiopiansare scattered throughout the world numbered in millions. Saudis continue to brutalize and kill migrant workers. Yet, Ethiopia's rulers are going out oftheir way to reassure the Saudis that business continues as usual. They are now offering Saudis more farmlands and other investment opportunities. How much lower can this once proud nation sink? For all those who make it to a safe destination there are plenty that have perished in silence. May they rest in peace!.

Ethiopians in South Sudan in seeking help'

VoA News: (December 28, 2013) - Ethiopian emigrants that reside in the Unity State of South Sudan are stating that they are found in war zone and are at risk. Six Ethiopians working in the State's main road construction said they have been hiding inside heavy machineries for the past two days. They said two Ethiopians have been killed while three werewounded. Although the total number of Ethiopians that have been killed so far is unknown, according to the Voice of America (VoA) Amharic service, 30 Ethiopians have been killed until the December 26, 2013. The Ethiopian migrants have told VoA that their government has not reached out to them so far. They said they are puzzled that when the government of Kenya and Uganda have evacuated their citizens from South Sudan, theEthiopian government did not do.

Four Ethiopian women who have been raped in the Jonglei State of South Sudan have received medical treatment in the United Nations Hospital in Juba. Meanwhile, according to the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development (IGAD), spearheaded by leaders of seven East African countries, South Sudanese President Salva Kiir Myardit expressed his commitment to cease fire in the recently war-ravaged country. Uhuru Kenyatta, the Kenyan President, said, “Let it be known we in the IGAD willnot accept the unconstitutional overthrow of a duly and democratically elected government in South Sudan.” More than 1,000 people have been killed in fighting between the government and rebels since 15 December when violent clashes began in the capital, Juba.

Anti-Tewodros Kassahun ‘aka Teddy Afro’ campaign catches fire on socialmedia’

OPride (December 28, 2013) - A hyperactive social media campaign to boycott Bedele Brewery’s exclusive sponsorship of controversial Ethiopiansinger Tewodros Kassahun has garnered more than 13,000 supporters in less than 24 hours. Bedele Brewery, a local subsidiary of the Dutch beer maker Heineken NV, announced its agreement with Kassahun for a year long national tour at a press conference in Addis Ababa last week.

Kassahun, better known by nickname Teddy Afro, is a polarizing pop starin Ethiopia. His fans admire his musical talent while critics despise his unapologetic hero-worship of past Ethiopian rulers. Teddy has songs idolizing both emperors Haile Selassie and Menelik II.

The viral campaign, which goes with a hashtag #BoycottBedele, is askingbeer drinkers in Ethiopia to ditch Bedele products and also pressure regional officers to withdraw the sponsorship. It has reportedly been featured on the state-run Oromia radio, which broadcasts in Oromo language to millions of listeners in the populous state.

Not everyone is happy with the campaign. Several Ethiopian activists havecharacterized the campaign as ‘emotive’ and questioned the motives behind the campaign. The backlash against Teddy is in part heightened bya comment the singer made in an interview with local magazine, in which he reportedly said, Menelik’s war of conquest in southern Ethiopia amounted to ‘a holy war.’ Others cautioned that Teddy’s crusade gaffe was ‘unconfirmed’.

However, the organizers insist that, while the comment might have giventhem a renewed impetus, Teddy’s tour would have been boycotted even without the comment. “Teddy’s glorification of the 19th century monarch,who committed ethnic cleansing against various nations and nationalities in southern Ethiopia, is not new," reads their press statement. Othersworry that the campaign amplifies an already tense ethnic relations.

However, as with all discussions on Ethiopian politics, the lack of acknowledgement for past injustices and nuance is self-evident from responses to the campaign. Many Ethiopian activists denounced the campaign without acknowledging the idea that "one man's hero is anotherman's genocider." Ethiopia has a contested history. But almost all historians agree that Menelik's ambitious greater Abyssinia campaign wasbrutal. "Wherever he faced fierce resistance, Menelik responded with the most barbaric and horrific forms of violence sometimes cutting off hands of male adults and breasts of women," wrote the Boycott Bedele campaign. "Menelik's soldiers settled on the land they conquered, continuing with their brutality as they expropriated land and turned the indigenous population into serfs."

This remains one of the most contentious events in modern Ethiopian history. Menelik's statue stands erect near Addis Ababa City Administration not far from where his army massacred Oromo peasants atthe battle of Gulale. The Oromia Regional Government has recently erected statues in Anole and Calanqo – where such heinous crimes as mutilation and mass killing took place – in remembrance of those who perished under the barrel of Menelik's guns. In essence, Ethiopia's historyis fraught with painful episodes many of which are rarely, if ever, acknowledged. The campaign organizers say the next step is distributing brochures across Oromia, especially in Jimma, Dire Dawa and Adama towns where Teddy is expected to hold concerts. They are asking locals tostay home and more importantly use civil disobedience to obstruct the concert.

The Crisis in South Sudan and Its Implications for Ethiopia'

The Reporter, Addis Ababa (December 28, 2013) - Since 15 December 2013, soldiers loyal to the deposed Vice President, Dr. Riek Machar, havefought against President Salva Kiir's loyalists in Juba in the vicinity of thePresidential palace. Emboldened by the rebels' success in controlling Bor,the capital of Jonglei State under General Peter Gatdet, Dr. Riek Machar announced his wish to be the next leader of South Sudan after deposing the incumbent President; a move that further increased tensions in the country. As the conflict continued between the warring forces, it was reported that thousands of civilians had been killed and that hundreds ofthousands had been displaced. The international community and regional organizations, including the United Nations (UN), the European Union (EU), the African Union (AU), the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) and other concerned authorities, have been calling on the warring factions to show restraint and come to the negotiation table.

Shortly after the conflict broke out on 19 December 2013, an IGAD ministerial delegation led by Ethiopia visited South Sudan to seek an end to the fighting. Signifying the grave nature of the crisis and possibly due to the challenges the ministerial mediation effort has faced, on December 26, 2013, the Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn and the President of Kenya Uhuru Kenyatta traveled to Juba. The delegation of theministers and heads of states met President Salva Kiir and urged both sides to engage in a dialogue. On 24 December 2013, Reuters reported that Dr Machar had requested President Kiir to release his 'comrades' whowere under detention so that they could be evacuated to Addis Ababa as aprecondition. Dr. Machar added that if the President met his demand they could begin their dialogue straight away. Rejecting the proposal for a meeting in Addis Ababa, the Juba government immediately insisted that dialogue needed to take place in Juba. President Kiir has been encouraging and sometimes demanding the Republic Sudan to hold dialogue in Addis Ababa with the rebels fighting Khartoum.

It is not clear why President Kiir would reject the same process being commenced in Addis Ababa. This seems to be the first challenge for IGAD and Ethiopia as chair of IGAD. The request by Dr Macher for the transfer of detainees in order to commence dialogue in Addis Ababa and the precondition by President Kiir for the renunciation of revolt by his opposition should serve as a basis to defuse the tension. Despite Entebbe's initiative; Addis Ababa should be the most acceptable venue forthe dialogue as Ethiopia is the current chair of IGAD and AU. But to avoid unnecessary tension and perceptions, Nairobi could also become an alternative venue. IGAD heads of state and government summit is scheduled on 27 December 2013. Ethiopia's active mediation role in the current crisis is commendable and justified. While IGAD under the leadership of Ethiopia provides the best vehicle for dialogue, Ethiopia has a very high stake in this crisis due to a number of factors. A peaceful region, the two Sudans at peace with each other and at peace within themselves would benefit Ethiopia's peace and development efforts enormously. First there is the issue related to the refugee flow from SouthSudan to the bordering Ethiopian regions of Gambella and Benshangul- Gumuz. Currently close to 40,000 refugees are registered in Ethiopia whilethere are more than 50,000 internally displaced persons.

Apart from Ethiopia's humanitarian responsibility to grant asylum to so many refugees, insurgent rebel groups may use the resultant instability todestabilize the border regions. The spillover effect of the crisis may also extend beyond refugee flows to the destabilization of Ethiopia's peripheralareas where kin communities such as the Nuer reside. With the vulnerability of porous borders, and the natural mobility of the Nuer in gaining access to the neighboring regions of Ethiopia, the consequences the crisis will not be limited to South Sudan. The long-term effect on Ethiopia's federal structures that rely on a delicate balance between numbers and power could be significant given previous historical experiences. In 2003, refugee camps in Ethiopia were at the centre of violent conflict due to the impact of large-scale migration on the regionalstate of Gambella with a population of about 160, 000. In Ethiopia's federal system, regional administrative power is allocated in direct proportion to the population of the country's ethno-cultural communities.The relative numerical superiority of a certain ethno-cultural community would therefore entitle it to more seats than the other.

With a region that is known for cross-border migration (of the pastoral Nuer as well as refugees fleeing the conflict in South Sudan) where the national identity of the inhabitants of bordering areas is very fluid, the balance in terms of power sharing between ethno-linguistic communities in neighboring regions could easily become destabilized. Prior to 2003 changes in Gambella, an outcome of such demographic change due to influx from South Sudan has been the creation of what has been termed by one of the writers the 'minority in power but majority in number' situation. An influx of tens of thousands of refugees could create similar imbalance in the regional states bordering South Sudan again. Composedof entirely Ethiopian troops numbering slightly more than 4000, the mission of the United Nations Interim Security Force for Abyei (UNISFA) could be easily affected by the spread of the current conflict in Unity and Warap and the encirclement of Abyei. Facilitated by former South AfricanPresident Thabo Mbeki, chief of the AU-High-level Implementation Panel (HIP), the Addis Ababa Agreement on Abyei was signed by the SPLM forces and the Government of Sudan (GoS) on 20 June, 2011.

The main objective of the Addis Agreement on Abyei is to ensure that this border area remains demilitarized until proper demarcation is undertaken.The same agreement provided for the deployment of the United Nations (UN) peacekeeping mission from Ethiopia. The UN Security Council Resolution 1990 authorized a UNISFA under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. In response to the current crisis, the UNSC has approved the appropriate transfer of troops, force enables and multipliers from other UNMission including those in the UN Organization Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo (MONUSCO), African Union-United Nations Hybrid Operation in Darfur (UNAMID), United Nations Interim Security Force for Abyei (UNISFA), United Nations Operation in Côte d'Ivoire (UNOCI) and the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL). Nevertheless, Ethiopia may need be wary of any redeployment of UNISFA troops inside South Sudan as that could lead to a dreadful confrontational situation thatrequires siding with one of the factions. This will certainly affect its relations with both South Sudan and the Republic of Sudan, seriously undermining the mediation efforts between the two. Another diplomatic burden for Ethiopia is to keep UNISFA from implicatingin the South Sudanese internal crisis. Deployed to help the mediation andprevent a border war between the Khartoum and Juba, UNISFA needs to enjoy the full support of the two states. If implicated in the internal crisis of South Sudan, the negative impact of a civil war between within South Sudan will not be limited to the Ethiopia but also to the mediation effort by President Mbeki. Thus, Ethiopia has to tread carefully to ensure its fair-handed role of peacemaker and mediator. Moreover, Ethiopia as the current chair of IGAD and the AU has to discharge its mandate effectively on behalf of the region and Africa. Thus, an additional diplomatic burden for Ethiopia remains the usual balancing role it plays within IGAD and the divergent interests of its member states, particularly Sudan and Uganda, who might lend support to different factions in this crisis. Here close assistance by the AU and the UN will be critical to ensure unison of messages to the warring factions, and their external supporters.

The long-term interest of Ethiopia in the region will only be ensured through democratic states that are peaceful within themselves and with their region. Support and encouragement for internal democratic reform ofSPLM and SPLA is the best place to start with. But above all, IGAD, AU and the UN need to note that at the heart of the current crisis lays SPLM; the current ruling body of South Sudan, which was formed as a liberation movement, is unfit to offer an effective leadership to transform a new war-torn country into a democratic state that could make use its resources for the wellbeing of its population. Thus, solving the current crisis in South Sudan requires resources, a concerted effort and sustained pressure on the political leadership of SPLM and the military leadership of SPLA to kick-start a genuine transformation from a liberation movement and fighters to a Democratic Party and state army respectively. ETHIOPIA/SUDAN: FM officially announces that the ruling regimes in Ethiopia and the Sudan have ended their border disagreement' The ruling regimes in Ethiopia and the Sudan have ended their border disagreement "have ended their border disagreement on 'Fashaga' area" and "agreed toresolve all their border demarcation disputes, according to Sudanes foreign minister Ali Karti ." Karti said the leaders of the two regimes have "signed a historical document putting the final demarcation lines." Sudan'sforeign ministry rejected any suggestion of "border disputes" between Ethiopia and the Sudan indicating only that there were minor disagreements on "limited points at the border". The public relations strategy of the regime in Ethiopia over the past weeks has been to been to underplay the "border demarcation issue" and overplay the "enormous significance" of the "strategic framework agreement" which allegedly includes "cooperation agreements on security, economic, agricultural, educational and cultural levels."

ETHIOPIA - Contract slavery'

The Real News By Vijay Prashad (December 29, 2013) - With its economydependent on remittance payments from the Gulf region, Ethiopia has remained mute to the vicious mistreatment of its citizens in Saudi Arabia, which is cynically targeting migrant labourers in order to quell growing unrest among its poor citizens. Between mid-November and mid- December, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia (KSA) deported 120,000 Ethiopians. International and Ethiopian agencies received the deportees atAddis Ababa's Bole International Airport. "People are arriving exhausted, but also emotionally traumatised by the ordeal of having to leave Saudi Arabia," said Frehiwot Worku, Secretary General of the Ethiopian Red Cross. "Many of them are arriving with very little. Some have had to leaveall of their belongings behind." Red Cross workers report that some of the migrants get off the night flights disoriented, some without shoes.

Amongst the deportees are over 200 unaccompanied children. These children had, like many of the adults, travelled overland from Ethiopia to Saudi Arabia via one of the world's most treacherous routes—through Djibouti, Puntland, Somaliland, the Gulf of Aden, and Yemen. Sharon Dimanche of the International Organisation for Migration told me: "Traffickers and/or smugglers do influence the children and lure them intoirregular migration by promising them better opportunities in the KSA." The situation is not much more different for the adults, many of whom areonly a few years older than the children. They go to Saudi Arabia with the hope that its oil wealth will drip down into their pockets. Difficult work conditions matched with an unfair labour system drive many of the workers into desperation. The deportations, which have slowed from 7,000 a day to 2,000 a day, are a sign that something is not right with the relationship between the Saudi employers as well as the KSA and the Ethiopian workers.

Saudi Arabia's nine million migrant workers make up a third of the kingdom's population, but they have none of the rights of the King's subjects. Every few years, when economic crises strike the King's subjects, the KSA resorts to its nitaqat, or Saudisation, programme—with the government deporting migrant workers with the empty plea that the private sector will now hire Saudi subjects to replace them. Rather than go after all the migrant workers—which would lead to the collapse of the Saudi economy—King Abdullah's government targets the undocumented workers, many of whom came to the kingdom with paperwork (iqama) butlost it when they changed employers. Over the course of the past six months, the Saudi government has removed nearly two million migrant workers from the kingdom—mostly from Bangladesh, Nepal, India, Pakistan, the Philippines and Yemen ("Work Woes", Frontline, June 28, 2013). But nothing has been as vicious as the attack against Ethiopian workers.

Kafala system: The Saudi kingdom sits on the second largest oil reserves in the world. That is, as the businessman Turki Faisal al-Rasheed put it, not the whole picture. Over three million rural-based Saudi subjects live below the poverty line. "Three million is a lot," he points out. The numbers are similar in urban areas. One estimate suggests that 22 per cent of the Saudi King's subjects live in poverty. During the Arab Spring, the King opened his coffers to forestall any uprising in the country and refurbished the Hafiz system, which allows indigent Saudi subjects to get paid for theirnationality. Saudi economists complain that these political payments undermine the incentive for Saudi subjects to do the kind of jobs that are then outsourced to migrant workers.

Migrant workers come under a system—kafala—that the scholars Ray Jureidini and Nayla Moukarbel call "contract slavery". Workers are bound to employers, who hold their passports and control their mobility. This is asystem rife with abuse, as the employer has all the power and the workershave none at all.

The 2008 Human Rights Watch report As If I Am Not Human: Abuses Against Asian Domestic Workers in Saudi Arabia details the kind of abuse that flows from this system. Criticism from human rights groups and unrest inside the kingdom led the Shura Council of Saudi Arabia to pass a Bill in July 2009 to set limits to the kafala programme. The new Bill "wouldrequire employers to give domestic workers at least nine hours of rest every day, suitable accommodation, and rest breaks". But there remainedworry that the law did not produce a mechanism to monitor the homes forabuse. The 2009 law also says that workers have a "duty to obey employers' orders" and that workers cannot break the kafala contract without a "legitimate reason".

The strictures of the kafala orders drive many legal migrant workers into the shadow labour market. Halima (a pseudonym) went to Saudi Arabia from her home in Wegdi, a small village in northern Ethiopia. She worked in Haferbatir, near Kuwait, for a very large family, and because of the enormous workload she left her job. Relatives in Jeddah allowed Halima tofind work there, but because she had to work outside the procedures of kafala she entered the illegal economy. Halima's illegality is a function of the draconian kafala system. People like Halima get deported while the system is preserved.

The Nitaqat: The periodic deportation of migrant workers from Saudi Arabia comes with a great deal of tension and turmoil. Wild rumours aboutthe migrant workers stalk the country—with the most frequent canard being that Ethiopian maids are particularly rough with their charges.

Videos of brutality by Saudi employers against their Ethiopian employees can be seen on YouTube, although the authenticity of these is always hardto determine. Complaints against employer abuse are met with stonewalled silence from the authorities. When employers complain aboutworker infractions, the state acts swiftly, report human rights activists in Saudi Arabia. Earlier this year, 24-year-old Rizana Nafeek was beheaded when a child in her care died. The Sri Lankan worker said that the child had accidentally choked, but the courts did not accept her view. Sri Lanka and Indonesia have warned their nationals against going to work in SaudiArabia.

On November 12, in Manfuhah (Riyadh), as Ethiopian migrant workers waited to board buses to take them to the Shumaisi detention centre, a fracas broke out. The Saudi police ended up killing at least three Ethiopianmigrant workers, according to human rights activists (and YouTube videos). In one video, a police officer is beating an Ethiopian man while a dead man lies on the street with a bullet wound in his chest. Sixty-eight people were injured in this violence. Saudi Arabia makes it virtually impossible for journalists to enter the country, which is why it is hard to verify independently some of the claims of human rights organisations, who for security reasons do not want to go public with their names.

Over the course of November, as buses with deportees arrived at the Shumaisi centre, groups of frustrated and angry Ethiopians tried to protest(on November 29, a number of them threw rocks at cars on the Mecca- Jeddah expressway). Activists told me that the security services have violently cracked down on any protest at the centre. Colonel Badr al-Saud,director of public relations at the Mecca Police Department, confirmed thatsuch protests had taken place but denied that the police used excessive force. At the gate of the Ethiopian consulate in Jeddah, a few hundred Ethiopians remain, at the time of writing, on a sit-in protest.

Reaction from Addis Ababa: Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn imposed a six-month ban on emigration to Saudi Arabia. His government condemned the killing of “innocent civilians”; strong words coming from a country hesitant to be critical of Saudi Arabia. Ethiopia’s weak economy is reliant upon remittance payments; the legal and hawalaremittance money put together is more than three times the foreign directinvestment in Ethiopia. The reaction from Addis Ababa to previous incidents of violence in other Arab countries has also been shockingly muted. In 2012, 33-year-old Alem Dechasa fled her kafala employer to the Ethiopian embassy in Beirut, Lebanon. Her employer found her and beat her in public outside the doors of the embassy, which could not protect her. In hospital, Alem Dechasa is alleged to have committed suicide. The response from Ethiopia was tepid. Part of the problem is the remittance payments, but there are other entanglements that make a break very difficult.

Saudi Arabia is also one of the main investors in Ethiopia, largely through the offices of the kingdom’s second wealthiest man, Mohammed al- Amoudi. Al-Amoudi’s mother is Ethiopian and he considers himself a native son despite his Saudi subject-hood. His firm, Derba Group, is in agribusiness and also manufactures cement, petrochemicals and pharmaceuticals. Al-Amoudi’s relations with the Ethiopian government aresaid to have suffered when Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, his ally, died lastyear. Saudi-Ethiopian relations rested on the al-Amoudi-Zenawi alliance.

This has not stopped al-Amoudi's investments, including in new cement plants and an expansion of his agribusiness venture, Saudi Star. From 2009, Saudi investment in Ethiopian agriculture expanded with the King Abdullah Initiative for Agricultural Investment Abroad. Ethiopia was to beSaudi Arabia's bread basket, to grow maize, teff, white sorghum and white wheat for the Saudi market.

As the conflict over Ethiopian workers grew in Saudi Arabia, Saudi investors grew skittish. Some pulled out their money, either to pressure Ethiopia not to act to defend its nationals or fearful of the political outcome of this deportation. "We should admit that mistakes have been committed by both sides," said Mohammed Bin Abdul Rahman al-Shahri, head of the Saudi Agricultural Investors Association in Ethiopia, to the Arab daily Al-Hayat. "The illegal entrance of Ethiopians is unacceptable. The Ministry of Labour has dealt with them without knowing their exact number and the way to deport them. What is happening with Ethiopians inSaudi Arabia will affect our investments in their country on the popular level." Ethiopia's government has been quick to crack down on any protestin front of the Saudi embassy in Addis Ababa. The police arrested GetanehBalcha, head of the organisational affairs of the opposition Semayawi (Blue) Party. After his release from prison, Balcha disappeared on December 7. His whereabouts are unknown.

Overhaul: In April, the International Labour Organisation (ILO) published an important report, Tricked and Trapped: Human Trafficking in the MiddleEast. The report shows that the kafala system is "inherently problematic" since it extracts "forced labour" and "reinforces underlying vulnerabilities of migrant workers". These are strong words from a United Nations agency. The ILO makes several recommendations that are likely to be ignored—reform the kafala system, bring all workers under the protection of domestic labour laws, increase the power of labour inspectorates for worksite monitoring, and build up worker organisations. The ILO notes that "trade unions are ideally placed to raise awareness, as they are mass membership organisations with direct access to the workplace". This is precisely what migrant workers around the world clamour for—not an abolishment of their right to work but the creation of more just systems that leave them less vulnerable as they work. This is clearly brought out ina new report, Claiming Rights: Domestic Workers' Movements and Global Advances for Labour Reform (Human Rights Watch, October 28, 2013).

On September 5, the ILO's Convention Concerning Decent Work for Domestic Workers went into legal force. It is a broad-minded and powerfulconvention that lays out the legal basis for domestic worker organisations—the kind of force that would countervail the terrible conditions faced by Ethiopian workers in Saudi Arabia. What is most ironicabout the convention is that the states of the Arabian peninsula, including Saudi Arabia, voted enthusiastically for it.

Mass Grave Discovered in Addis Ababa"

(Report) A mass grave has been discovered in Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia, containing at least 6 bodies of young men, who may have been executed in the past few years. The identities of the bodies are still remained unclear. The grave was accidentally found in the area called Ferensay-legasion, inside the barracks of the third army battalion, by roadconstruction workers, who was digging the ground with excavator for roadconstruction. Witnesses said that the excavator first pulled out two bodieswrapped in blankets and again another four bodies each wrapped in blankets of identical colors. According to witnesses, two of the bodies were still in hand-cuffs and one other had his hands tied behind his back. So far, authorities have said nothing. But, many are pointing their figures at the EPRDF, the ruling party in Ethiopia. Witnesses say that the blanketsdid not lose their original colors and labels and that also indicates the executions were not carried out that long ago.

“It is not doubtful they are victims of the current regime”, a journalist witnessed the event said. “Look! The grave was found in the barracks of the army; on the top of that the blankets didn’t get old; even some of thebodies were in a good condition—they were not totally decomposed.” he explained. Reports indicate that the grave area was immediately fenced off by the army, and the bodies were taken by the federal police. Ethiopia is one of the nations which are under brutal dictatorial regimes. The rulingparty, EPRDF, has frequently been accused by human right organization ofmass killings. It is known for arresting, torturing, and killing its opponents. “It is a grim reminders of the Meles Zenawi era”, A political analyst in Addis Ababa told the Horn Times, East African Website.

“How many more mass graves are we going to uncover in the coming years in this city purged by the regime with unparalleled audacity? It would be the biggest flagrant miscarriage of justice if the ICC chief prosecutor Madam Fatou B let the panicking EPRDF warlords off the hook.It is incumbent up on her to send a team of investigators to Addis Ababa without any delay. “This blood curdling discovery has exposed the nation’sfestering wounds and further complicated the dreadful ethnic fault line created by the ruling party in May 1991. I personally know that then federal police boss; the snarling evil Workeneh Gebeyhu used the third infantry battalion compound as the headquarters of operations in 2005.

He quit the post last year and where is he today? The nation is crying for justice.” he explained. “EPRDF warlords thought they found a safe spot tostore remains of the barbarically executed non-combatant, peaceful protesters. Mass grave right under the nose of the international community and the people of Ethiopia. This crime scene is full of the telltale fingerprints of the dead former ruler Meles Zenawi….” he added.

Economy – The State Minister Mekonnen Manyazewal & The WTO, et-al ’

Addis Fortune, Addis Ababa (December 29, 2013) - The state of Djibouti presents a test to the wisdom and negotiating ability of a non-EPRDFite minister in the administration of Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, gossip observed. A capable technocrat since his early career in a central planning commission under the government of Mengistu Hailemariam (Col), Mekonnen Manyazewal assumed the responsibilities of negotiating trade terms with other countries a couple of years ago. And he owes it largely to the trust and confidence the late Meles Zenawi put on him, despite his reluctance to join the ruling party, claims gossip. Mekonnen isthe only official of his stature without party membership left in the government, and is now chief of the national planning commission, underthe rank of a minister. It is a natural place for him, gossip observed. Thisis true, particularly when compared to his recent debut at the Ministry of Industry (MoI), where his absence from the rank and file of the ruling party constrained his power to command regional industry bureau chiefs and directors at the ministry. This is as many of them are card carrying members, claims gossip.

Yet, his technocratic credentials appear to have made Hailemariam comfortable with letting him hold the role of a senior trade negotiator withbilateral and multilateral parties, including Ethiopia's accession to the World Trade Organisation (WTO), according to gossip. It is a role Mekonnen inherited from Girma Birru - a senior party member and another able technocrat, who now serves as Ethiopia's ambassador to the United States- gossip claims. Even then, it was unusual when the late Meles moved the trade negotiation dossier from its historical custodian of the Ministry of Trade (MoT), and entrusted it to one he had appointed as aminister of Industry, claims gossip. There must have been a degree of trust in Meles with the abilities of Mekonnen to negotiate better terms onEthiopia's behalf, gossip said. The time to display this ability might havearrived now, claims gossip. Djibouti will, next week, test his skills at manoeuvring diplomatic niceties to play tough or compromise on an issue that may lead to a serious imbalance in Ethiopia's macro economic climate, according to gossip. He will lead an army of Ethiopian officials, including Worqneh Gebeyehu of the Ministry of Transport and Communicaton (MoTaC) and Mekonnen Abera, director general of the Ethiopian Maritime Affairs Authority, to settle an evolving dispute that has angered Ethiopian businesses, gossip disclosed.

Ethiopian importers are infuriated over the circular the Djibouti Ports & Free Zones Authority, under Aboubaker O. Hadi, issued in last week of November 2013, ordering that "no container will be invoiced" at ports in Djibouti and Doraleh without completing all documentation. In addition tothe many documents freight forwarders used to submit to ensure cargo clearance, they will have to present a "bank transfer letter in hard currency" with a list of names of importers and freight forwarders, as wellas bill of lading and plate numbers for trucks. The deadline to enforce thishas been postponed from December 7 to January 15, 2014. The Catch-22 for Ethiopia is that its freight forwarders cannot access foreign currency from the commercial banks here before they submit original receipts proving that fees for port handling and commissions to freight forwardersin Djibouti have been paid. Mekonnen and his team will argue that a bilateral deal Ethiopia signed with Djibouti in 2003, under Girma Birru, allows a two-week period whereby Ethiopian freight forwarders are invoiced. This, Djiboutian officials argue, has led to a huge amount beingowed in arrears from Ethiopia's side. Ironically, many in the gossip corridor are convinced that what Djibouti has done is for the purpose of arm twisting to intimidate Ethiopia for arresting one of its citizens who used to work as a middle level official in the Port Authority. The last timeDjibouti officials acted erratically was in 2008, when they attempted to jack up port fees unilaterally. Girma Birru and Seyoum Mesfin, the then minister of Foreign Affairs, flew to Djibouti and put a stop to it. How Mekonnen and his team are prepared to respond to such perceived bullying is to be seen next week. But they are already viewed at the gossip corridors as being soft on the issue.

Discovery of mass grave shocked Ethiopians, rocked warlords, - The HornTimes Newsletter'

Compiled by Getahun Bekele, South Africa

(Analitic Report updates) Number of exhumed remains rising … On Tuesday morning 31 December 2013, mortified Army chief-of-staff General Samora Yonus and DPM Demeke Mekonnen were spotted leavingthe third battalion barrack, TPLF's secret execution site for many years.

Despite the regime's massive cover up campaign, intimidation and open threat of secondary mass grave for the accidentally exhumed corpses in order to avoid investigation or to conceal evidence of the mass murder; Ethiopians winced in terror when the news of the discovery of mass grave in Addis Ababa travelled across the vast nation exposing the savagery; atrocities and duplicity of the current ruling minority junta, – largely of Tigre coterie. The gruesome discovery was made on Friday 27 December and Saturday 28 December 2013, between Sidist- Kilo and Ferensay- legasion areas at Jan-Meda, inside the barracks of the third army battalionwhen an excavator working for road expansion project pulled out two corpses wrapped in same color blankets and again another four corpses each wrapped in blankets of identical colors.

Eyewitnesses who got to the area and took the photos before the federal police cordoned off the vicinity told reporters that two of the corpses werestill in hand-cuffs and one of the victims had his hands tied behind his back. "I jumped into the ditch driven by emotion and although the remains were dismembered and co-mingled, I have counted four corpses on Saturday, all shot to the base of the skull. That is, as we all know a Bolshevik style execution practiced by the Stalinist TPLF warlords for years. These remains are undoubtedly victims of 22 years of TPLF repression and terror. The blankets, manufactured by the Debre Birhan blanket factory did not lose their original colors and labels. That indicates the executions were not carried out that long ago. ” A retired medical doctor living in Jan-Meda area of Addis Ababa told reporters, sobbing silently. When contacted by an undercover reporter on January 1, 2014, the Debre Birhan blanket factory’s sales and customer service manager who gave his first name as Negasi, admitted supplying the correctional service authority of Ethiopia with more than 200,000 blankets similar bothin color and design to those found in the mass grave in 2005, 2006 and 2007 financial years.

According to Negassi, the factory did so after legally won tenders. The sales clerk’s admission is a damning proof beyond any reasonable doubt to journalists that the dead tyrant Meles Zenawi’s homicide squad known as the Agazi executed detainees and committed the war crime during the May-2005 nation-wide anti TPLF insurrection. “Well, grim reminders of theMeles Zenawi era, but how many more mass graves are we going to uncover in the coming years in this city purged by Tigre People Liberation Front with unparalleled audacity? It would be the biggest flagrant miscarriage of justice if the ICC chief prosecutor Fatou Bensouda let the panicking TPLF warlords off the hook. It is incumbent up on her to send a team of investigators to Addis Ababa without any delay. “ This blood curdling discovery has exposed the nation’s festering wounds and further complicated the dreadful ethnic fault line created by the ruling Tigre People Liberation Front/TPLF in May 1991. I personally know that then federal police boss; the snarling evil Workeneh Gebeyhu used the third infantry battalion compound as the headquarters of operations in 2005.

He quit the post last year and where is he today? The nation is crying forjustice.” A political analyst who is following events for the Horn Times from Addis Ababa explained.

“TPLF warlords thought they found a safe spot to store remains of the barbarically executed non-combatant, peaceful protesters. Mass grave right under the nose of the international community and the people of Ethiopia. This crime scene is full of the telltale fingerprints of the dead former ruler Meles Zenawi….” The political analyst added. In addition, after getting fresh reports about the exhumation of more skeletons on Monday 30 December 2013, the Horn Times’ attempt to get comment from the junta’s top spin-doctor Shimeles Kemal regrettably proved unsuccessful. Moreover, as it is a norm in a totalitarian regime where the flow of information is government controlled, dreading being indicted for war crimes and extermination, not even ordinary federal police officials were willing to comment on this very sensitive matter with far- reaching consequences. Currently, the army, using corrugated sheet has fenced offthe killing spot. The public no longer observes the exhumation; hence, noone knows the exact numbers of corpuses recovered up to so far.

According to a journalist the Horn times spoke to minutes before postingthis piece, the Jan-Meda neighborhood remains tense with heavily armedfederal police and the military manning several roadblocks in the area.

Shell-shocked residents nonetheless, are unanimous in their call on the ICC, the International Criminal Court to investigate the senseless genocide, a result of two decades of tempestuous minority junta rule in Ethiopia. “Members of IAGS, International Association of Genocide Scholars, must rush to the crime scene to help with recovery and identification of the remains of possibly the 2005 election massacre victims, a dark chapter in our history.” Another resident of the area told the Horn Times reporter asking not to be mentioned his name for securityreasons. Democracy has been a conglomeration of violence and brutal repression to the long-suffering people of Ethiopia. According to the opinions of several prominent Ethiopians, for the nation to move forward,western powers must disown the genocidal minority group now and let justice take its course.

SPECULATION: Abune Mathias is being investigated for corruption; hismovements restricted’

His Holiness Abune Mathias, the pro-regime patriarch has been briefly placed under house arrest and was released after being interrogated for nearly 72 hours by the National Security Adviser to the PM and other security officials according to sources in Addis Ababa. Leaders of the TPLFare apparently upset with statements that have been uttered by Abune Mathias over the past 3 weeks that were critical of the regime. In one particular meeting, Abune Mathias was heard saying that much of the problems facing the church are caused by the ruling party. The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church’s administration in Addis Ababa is currently paralysed by a growing leadership crisis. Many church leaders are in an open refusal to take orders from the Holy Synod.

Meantime, Abune Mathias, the regime installed patriarch of the OrthodoxTewahdo Church in Ethiopia, has been informed that he is being investigated for corruption, according to reliable sources in the Church. Investigating is perceived against the Abune and such move would be a standard mode of attacking to silence opposition . It is also reported thatthe Abune was instructed by Tsegay Berhe, the National Security Adviserto the Prime Minister, to limit his travel to certain areas. The fallout between the ruling party and Abune Mathias ensued after an accusation by the Abune at a recent meeting that the government is responsible forthe crisis that has engulfed the Orthodox Church’s leadership. Abune Mathias was installed as patriarch because the regime had assumed thatthe ethnic-Tigrean Abune would ensure them loyalty.

Ethiopia: Dark side of Oromo expansions and Menelik conquests’

(Analysis) By Abera Tola – Through out history; people have migrated andexpanded seeking greener pastures and more land. Globally, most countries have endured and were created thru expansions, wars, assimilation, migration; slavery etc. Even the most developed countries in the world today have dark pasts. For example; millions of Native Americans were exterminated or removed from their homelands while millions more African-Americans underwent the most cruel slavery in world history before the great democracy; the USA; was born. If not for the gradual improvement of human rights in America and its military superiority triggering an economic powerhouse; United States would have been just another poor country facing fragmentation and internal division due to its dark history of conquest and slavery. While Ethiopia did not have as much a bloody history as America; it did experience some conflicts and small level of slavery. Considering how extremely diverse Ethiopia is ethnically, linguistically, politically and religiously, Ethiopia still has been a relatively peaceful country. And that has been one reason why, despite all its problems, its citizens are proud. Case in point: how many poor countries with over ninety native languages and a near 50/50 Islam/Christian population have managed to co-exist or live in relative peace for over thousand years? Not many. But still, Ethiopia has had its share of problems as well. As an Oromo; the two most violent and most important events that impacted my people are the Oromo expansion in the 1500s and the Shewan Menelik expansion of the 1880s. These two events represent the two stages of Ethiopia's ethnolinguistic evolution.

Stage one: Oromo expansion: After the 1540s; the ethnolinguistic and political shape of the horn of Africa changed forever when the Oromo expanded north into territories dominated by the Amharic speaking peopleof Abyssinia/Ethiopia as well as the Sidama and the Adal kingdoms.

Historians credit our unique Gadaa system for being suitable for warfare and for the successful conquest of present day central; west and eastern Ethiopia by the Oromo. According to Oromo oral accounts and historical records; the Oromo expansion into Abyssinia was disorganized but Oromo raids and attacks of the neighboring people lasted for many decades; leading to the killing of tens of thousands of Amharic speaking people. Thepowerful Oromo benefitted from its large population and better developed battle strategy. The Oromo expansions were also similar to that of the Ottoman Empire expansion because they both did not always change the religion of their new subjects. With the only exception of the Yejju Oromo imposing Afan Oromo on Amharas in Gondar; the Oromos also never enforced their language on other people. Nonetheless; many Somali, Amharic and Sidama speaking peoples became "tax-paying serfs" for the new Oromo rulers. And having already been weakened by the Adal/Somaliconquest of southern Abyssinia; the Amharic & Tigrayan speaking population of Abyssinia lost more lands to the Oromo; including the Shawaand Dawaro regions (Arsi area) that have been Abyssinian territories sincethe days of their ancient Aksum empire. Today; the descendants of these Oromo settlers makeup the dominant population in Shewa and Arsi. Not only the eastern and southern edges of the Abyssinian highlands but; gradually; even some northern pockets of Abyssinia got conquered by Oromo warlords: which explains why small Oromo communities can stillbe found as far north as Tigray even today. Thus; in the late 1500s; having lost substantial territories to the Oromo; the Solomonic Dynasty/Abyssinia declined in power for decades. But that century also started the transformation of Abyssinia into a more multi-ethnic entity:one that was forced to incorporate Oromo as one of its citizens.

Stage Two: Menelik/Shewan expansion: Another significant event that greatly impacted the ethnic and political situation in Ethiopia and the region was the Shewan/Abyssinian expansion led by Emperor Menelik II during the late 1800s. Just like the Oromo expansion; the Abyssinian expansion was disorganized since many parts of Abyssinia were in conflictamongst each other. The Shewan part of Abyssinia have been in various small battles against Gondar and Gojjam parts. However; using relatively modern weapons purchased from European countries; the Shewan Abyssinians defeated other Abyssinian regions and then they continued onto re-conquer Oromo territories that were settled by the Oromos since the1500s. Proportionally; about the same percentage of people might have perished during the Shewan expansion (stage 2) compared to the Oromo expansion (stage 1). However; seen in raw figures; many thousands morewere killed during the bloody conquests by Menelik's Shewan army. As thesign of the times, not many international laws of war exists to stop the atrocities during these wars, or for that matter during any wars around the globe. Yet one undeniable key fact of this war was that the Shewan army was ethnically diverse, even if Amharas were the militarily dominantgroup in it. Because Oromos settled in Shewa since their 1500s expansion; Shewa was already a melting pot of Amhara and Oromo by thelate 1800s. Therefore; the multi-ethnic Shewan army of Emperor Menelik was able to easily defeat various Oromo and southern areas of present day Ethiopia. Both of these historical events of the 1500s and the 1800s shaped the ethno-linguistic identity of the new Ethiopia.

Conclusion: The most glaring difference between the two events is that one happened in a recent memory and thus it influences the current politics of the region more powerfully. Otherwise; both events are dark and equally violent parts of our history. De-emphasizing or ignoring one event over the other only creates confusion and bitterness among the newgeneration. An Oromo should not ignore "stage one" and only talk about "stage two." Similarly; an Amhara should not ignore "stage two" and only talk about "stage one." The blame game by bringing a biased version of the past only poisons the present. No one side should play the victim game or live in the past, instead of working for a better future; otherwise everyone will fall together.

Campaign of Defamation against Emperor Menelik II is orchestrated bythe ruling party'

Ordinary Oromos have nothing to do with it'

(News Analysis) Former TPLF defense minister Seye Abraha said Ethiopia'sprisons today speak Oromiffa after he was released from jail. It means that under the TPLF junta, Ethiopian prisons are packed with Oromos where they are being brutalized, tortured, and murdered. Indeed Oromos have no worse enemy than TPLF, as testified by one of their own. Before Meles Zenawi threw his former colleague Seye Abraha in Kality prison, both were masterminds of a campaign of dehumanizing and brutalizing people from the Amhara ethnic group. They used OLF to carry out the Bedeno massacre in which thousands of Amhara men, women and children were slaughtered right after TPLF came to power in early 1990s. The Bedeno massacre was a brainchild of Meles Zenawi, Kinfe Gebremedhin and the entire TPLF top leadership. It was part of their divide and conquer policy of turning the Oromo and Amhara ethnic groups against each other.

TPLF propagandists have also went back over 100 years to fabricate atrocities and use it to defame one of the greatest leaders Ethiopia has ever had, Menelik II. Defaming Emperor Menelik has been a central part of TPLF's anti-Ethiopia agenda. When Teddy Afro recently released a songnamed Tikur Saw that praised Menelik II, it has become an instant big hitamong all Ethiopians from all ethnic backgrounds. This one song by TeddyAfro has dismantled TPLF's 30-year campaign of defamation against Menelik. A few weeks ago, Teddy Afro announced his plan to do a tour through out Ethiopia to sing Tikur Saw and his other popular songs. The TPLF junta would not let that to happen. So they have unleashed their sleeper-cells such as Jawar Mohammed and other fake Oromos to campaign against the tour.

Menelik II was not the enemy of the Oromo people. He was loved and admired by Oromos and all other patriotic Ethiopians. Menelik's most trusted advisers, generals and administrators were Oromos, including Dej.Balcha (the hero of the Battle of Adwa), Fit. Habtegiorgis, and Ras Gobena, to mention just a few of them. When Menelik II, Dejazmatch Balcha and others were fighting against Italian colonialists at Adwa, MelesZenawi's grandfather Shumbash Asresahegn was helping the Italians.

Let's not fall into TPLF's trap. Instead, let's make this fabricated controversy backfire on TPLF by promoting peace and harmony among allEthiopian ethnic and religious groups.

Ethiopia: Top Minister Pledges No Job Losses in EEPCo Breakup'

Addis Fortune, Addis Ababa (January 5, 2013) It has even been noted thatthe two new companies will require additional labour force. Subsequent tothe breakup of the state-owned power utility monopoly, the Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation (EEPCo), there will be no layoffs from the thousands of employees, according to a high ranking minister.

Debretsion Guebremichael, minister of Communications & Information Technology and responsible for economic and finance affairs with in a Deputy prime minister portfolio, has assured labour leaders in Addis Abeba that no employees of the now defunct EEPCo should worry about job losses after its breakup into two. The Administration of Prime MinisterHailemariam Desalegn decided, in early December 2013, to split the 62- year-old firm into two.

The company's infrastructure arm, which sees the construction of power generating assets and distribution lines, would be carried out instead by Ethiopian Electric Power (EEP). It is a restructured entity to be run by Eng.Azeb Asnaque, an engineer who has been key to the Gilgel Gibe III hydropower project. She is now responsible for overseeing an annual investment of two billion dollars in building dams, including the Great Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, (GERD) with a generating capacity of 6,000Mw electric power.

Another firm emerged from the breakup too. The Ethiopian Electric Services (EES) is tasked with the operation of power distributions and sales. The company's management has been outsourced to a consortium of three Indian companies-Power Grid Corporation of India, Bombay Suburban Electric Supply and National Hydroelectric Power Corporation-fora two-year management contract worth 21 million dollars.The new company is responsible for serving close to two million subscribers in 5,163 towns and covering 41pc of the nation's geography. It is the largestrestructuring undertaken since the company was reformed in 1997, when the government decided to separate its regulatory function from its corporate operation.

The EEPCo used to run an interconnect system with 11 hydropower generators and a self contained system, under which it operates one geothermal and 15 diesel generated plants. Combined, these sources ofenergy generate 2,022Mw power, of which 91pc of power is generated from the hydroelectric dams. Power generated from these is transmittedthrough 10,884.23Km of transmission lines.

The EEPCo has had close to 13,000 employees on its payroll, who are nowsplit between the two companies. "There will not be any layoffs," Debretsion pledged in response to the concern raised by a labour leader during a consultation with senior government officials, held on Saturday, January 4, 2014, at the Prime Minister's Office. "When deployment comesto an end within one month and half, evaluation will be held to determine the integrity and fairness of the process." In fact, both of the newly restructured companies need additional labour of close to 4,000 workers, Debretsion disclosed.

Ethiopia: Shiferaw Jarso, Director General of State owned Ethiopia's Sugar

Adds Fortune, Addis Ababa (January 5, 201) The whisper in the gossip corridors is not a pleasant one. Shiferaw Jarso, director general of Ethiopia's Sugar Corporation, under a ministerial portfolio, is in the army hospital recovering from serious injuries obtained in a car accident, gossipdisclosed. One of his security details is in a worrisome situation, accordingto gossip. Two weeks ago, Shiferaw travelled to the south to inspect the progress of sugar mills under construction in South Omo. He was one of several groups from the federal government, including the Prime Minister,who was visiting the many public infrastructure projects contracted to theMetal & Engineering Corporation (MeTEC), claims gossip. Somewhere in the Wolaita area, his four-wheel drive vehicle suffered an accident, causing it to roll close to five times, claims gossip. Lucky to survive, he and others injured were immediately evacuated by a helicopter and admitted to the army hospital in Addis Abeba, where he is still hospitalised, up until our press time, gossip disclosed. That leaves the Sugar Corporation, which is tasked with overseeing the completion of 10 sugar mills before the end of the GTP, under the direct supervision of Asfaw Dingamo. Once a Minister of Water, Energy and Mines, Asfaw has been keeping a low profile since the debacle with his party, the SPRDP, back in 2010. He was relegated from the highest echelon of the SPRDP - one of the four coalition members of the ruling EPRDF, chaired by Hailemariam Desalegn -for daring to nominate Brehanu Adello for central committee membership. The latter, now chief of the federal Intellectual Property Office, was under a turf war with Hailemariam when he was chief of the Prime Minister's Office under the late Meles Zenawi, gossip recalled. Neither Brehanu nor Asfaw made it to the elite group of the central committee of their party then. Almost four years after his debut serving as the deputy director of the Corporation - first under Abay Tseyahe and now Shiferaw - the coin is to get flipped once more, this time luck smiles on him, claims gossip. The Prime Minister appears to be determined to rehabilitate a technocratic politician he once relegated to a prominent and potentially high profile position - leading a state owned corporation under formation, gossip disclosed. Asfaw may soon be appointed as director general of the Ethiopian Oil & Gas Corporation - a would be new but powerful corporation, with geopolitical energy significance, should the nation's ambition to discover oil and exploit its already discovered gas resources be realised, gossip disclosed.

Currently, the nation's energy potential is limited to a source that comes from hydropower. Never mind the six megawatt power generated from thestill experimental geothermal source near Lake Langano - although the Americans have pledged to invest close to four billion dollars to develop this source into a full blown industry, gossip observed. It is an industry regulated by Alemayehu Tegenu's Ministry of Water & Energy. Alemayehu also saw, last week, the appointment of Miheret Debebe, former head of the state owned utility monopoly, the EEPCo, as his advisor for energy affairs and foreign relations, gossip disclosed. Ironically, the two have an uptight relationship, obvious to all those around them, and thus created a fuss in the gossip corridors around the wisdom of the Prime Minister to make such a decision, claims gossip.

But it is a delicate compromise, which Hailemariam and his deputy, Demeke Mekonnen, have made after pushing the idea to appoint Miheret rather as a state minister, gossip disclosed. However, Debretsion Gebremichael (PhD), a minister in charge of economic sectors under a deputy prime minister portfolio, had pre-empted them, making a public statement saying that Miheret had been removed from his position due toa performance issue, to which the Prime Minister had agreed to in an earlier meeting, gossip revealed. His was a position supported by Muktar Kedir, another minister with a deputy prime minister portfolio, but responsible for government reform and the bureaucracy, claims gossip.

The two have been allied in their argument on how it is difficult for the administration to sell to the public the idea that a person they deposed of,questioning his performance, could be promoted to a state minister level, gossip disclosed.

People think Ayalew Gobeze resigned due to reasons related to Borderissue, Gov’t study finds'

ESAT (January 7, 2014) - A new study conducted by the Public Opinion Information Section of the Government Communication Affairs Office hasfound that the resignation of Ayalew Gobeze, the ex-president of the Amhara Regional State, is a strategy by the government to better carry out the border demarcation between Tigray and Amhara regions. AyalewGobeze resigned from his post last month and was succeeded by his Deputy Degu Andargachew in what the government called a ‘power succession’. According to the information collected Degu Andargachew isnot well received by the populace. Many believe that he is only there to execute the plans and demands of the Tigrean People’s Liberation Front (TPLF).

Similarly, Ahmed Abetew, former Deputy Administrator and currently Ethiopia’s Trade Minister, and Alemnew Mekonen, Head of the Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM) Secretariat are both labelled as loyal to the TPLF. Insiders told ESAT that the two officials have been discovered possessing two Eurotracker vehicles; they have not been removed from their positions due to their loyalty to the TPLF. During a cabinet evaluation, the two officials had said that the two vehicles were given to them by Chinese Companies in consideration of their ‘leadershipqualities’. According to the Office there was no opinion given ‘benignly’. The opinions will presented to the Government’s Information Section andthe Cabinet will discuss on it.

Telecom Deal by China's ZTE, Huawei in Ethiopia Faces Criticism - TheWall Street Journal'

For Ethiopians, a Chinese Telecom Project Changes Lives but DrawsScrutiny

By MATTHEW DALTON LAKE WENCHI, Ethiopia (January 8, 2014) —In thegreen highlands here southwest of Addis Ababa, farmers like Darara Baysa are proud owners of cellphones that run on a network built by China's ZTE Corp. The trouble is, they have to walk several miles to get agood signal. "The network doesn't work well," says Mr. Baysa, a former army sergeant, stopping on the unpaved road near his home to show his hot-pink smartphone. Among other troubles: Ethiopian government officials have in recent years complained to ZTE that the company's contract for building the network requires Ethiopia to pay too much, say people familiar with the discussions.

The Ethiopian network's glitches underline the broader troubles that sometimes face poorer nations as they borrow heavily to invest in telecommunications, roads, utilities and other infrastructure to help lift them out of poverty. China's financial firepower helps its firms win manyof these contracts. But in agreeing to such deals, some governments appear to have flouted rules meant to foster sound public investment. When countries sidestep such rules, say experts at institutions such as theWorld Bank, big projects often cost more and are more likely to be poorly executed.

Editor's note: Poor mobile connection, slow Internet or in some cases almost no service and wrong messages are a typical behavior of ETC; inwhich, all sbscribers of ETC witnessing. ZTE may be a capable company,for sure, but is not doing so great in Ethiopia. The corrupt regime, as always are more worried about the number of mobile phone users not about its accurate function. It is becoming millions may carry mobile butmost will not use it effectively.

He also could not clarify where in the building the artifacts were kept. DIPLOMACY: Experts seek improved ties between Nigeria, Ethiopia'

The Guardian: Written by By Bola Olajuwon (January 8, 2014) - DIPLOMATS and experts in international relations from Nigeria and Ethiopia have jointly called for expanding of frontiers of cooperation between the governments, agencies and peoples of the two countries. Underscoring the need for improved relations between the two countries,speakers during the signing of Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) between Nigerian Institute of International Affairs (NIIA) and Ethiopian International Institute for Peace and Development (EIIPD) in Lagos on Tuesday called for strengthening of diplomatic cooperation to include economy, trade and investment, research and education, military as wellas abolition of visa fees.

Speaking at the ceremony, Ambassador of Ethiopia to Nigeria, Ali Abdo, noted that the relations between Nigeria and his country are strategic andmutual since both countries enjoyed shared experience running into manydecades. Ali claimed that both countries are the two most populous nations in Africa with many ethnic nationalities and Federal system of government. He also traced relations between the two nations to formation of Organisation of African Union (OAU), decolonisation of the continent, promotion of peace and security. He said more Nigerians are investing in Ethiopian economy while others are visiting in search of investment opportunities. The envoy said he was equally looking forward to improved economic, investment and other relations between the two countries.

Criticizing Herman Cohen's Proposal and Recommendations for the Ethio-Eritrea stand off'

PERSPECTIVE (January 7, 2014) - I've read with great interest Herman Cohen's 'Time to Bring Eritrea in From the Cold'. Given his previous directinvolvement in the removal of Mengistu Haile Mariam from power, the ascendance to power of Meles Zenawi and the separation of Eritrea, I suspect that his article is an attempt to push a specific agenda with major implication for Ethiopia. It is no wonder that is exactly what he did.In theusual high-handed approach and in the name of proposal for change, he attempts to push an agenda that hurts Ethiopia once again.

I do not think Mr. Cohen is recommending such ideas simply because hehates Ethiopian. I think it is because he found the current Ethiopian leaders more susceptible to external pressure and to accept his recommendations than does Issayas of Eritrea. Hence, he pushes wherehe feels his agenda will get him more traction.

Clearly, Mr Cohen underestimates the determination of Ethiopians todefend the integrity of their nation's history and its territories. This Ibelieve is a very serious misjudgement .

There is no question that the then Meles-led TPLF/EPRDF has done so many damages that undermined the unity and territorial integrity of Ethiopia. But to assume that the same will continue with no resistance is amisreading of the current reality on the ground.

We all know that Herman Cohen was the person who looked into the Camera in 1991 and said, "No democracy, no aid". In other words, he wasthe person who promised Ethiopians that if the TPLF/EPRDF did not practice Democracy, the US would not provide any assistance.

At the time, Mr. Cohen as well as the US government knew very well thata Stalinist Meles and Issayas would not allow democracy to take hold in their "respective countries". But Mr. Cohen had to say those words in order to appease the Ethiopianists who were completely left out of the decision making process about their own country. And he meant to provide a "face saving promise" so that any possible resistance to the TPLF would be minimized, if not diminished.

22 years after he uttered those lofty words, there is still no democracy, nohuman rights, no justice, and no representative governance. Thousands are killed, jailed, disappeared, tortured and exiled. However, all along, theaid originating from the US government continues to pour to the TPLF/EPRDF regime. Throughout this time, Mt Cohan has not, even once, reflected and even recommended that his country suspend aid to the Ruling TPLF EPRDF as he promised in 1991. So, what does this say about Mr. Cohen's own integrity? One can simply say that when it comes to Ethiopia, one can never take his words at face value for they failed the test of time and credibility.

22 years ago, Mr. Cohen mediated the surrender and disbanding of the Ethiopian army, the exclusion of any unity force from the political processand the formation of a regime of Ethno-centrists (TPLF, EPLF and OLF) who were determined to keep Ethiopia weak and divided. Every thing thathappened then had the blessing of Mr. Cohen. As the top US diplomat on Africa, he knew that the exclusion of all pro Ethiopian forces was not in any way going to help Ethiopians' long term interest. However, he also knew that it was not going to affect his interest. So he supported it without any regard about the negative effect of such decision on Ethiopiafor generations to come. Clearly, this too shows that Mr Cohen is there toprotect other interests and not that of Ethiopia.

These facts show that Ethiopians, not Mr. Cohen or the country he represented, are responsible to protect Ethiopian rights and to stand forour own best interests. No one else but we are responsible for our own destiny. This applies on a personal as well as a national psych level.

In fact, the more we look for others' support to protect our rights as individuals and as a nation, the more they feel that we do not have astrong self-esteem and sense of self and they push us around in the direction of their choosing.

Therefore, the issue now is less about what Mr. Cohen and more aboutwhat we the Ethiopian public, the rulers in Addis and the political opposition would do.

Mr. Cohen's current proposal revolves around the following key issues:-

1. Bringing TPLF/EPRDF and the EPLF to the pre 1998 situation. For Mr Cohen this is acceptable. But for Ethiopians, including many within the ruling TPLF/EPRDF regime, it is not. Every one know that pre 1998, Issayswas dominating the Ethiopian political scene. Also he was direct beneficiary of all of the resources of Ethiopia. No Ethiopian is willing to seethat happen again.
2. Mr Cohen, in a passive remark, acknowledges that both regimes were involved in the repression of rights. However, as far as he is concerned that is a secondary issue. The key is just bringing about "peace" betweenthe two rulers. In a way, the interest of the people, the idea of human rights and democracy are again secondary as far as he is concerned.

This too is ill conceived, short sighted and against the long term interest of Ethiopia. For Ethiopia to have a long lasting stability, the country needsto move more in the direction of respecting Human and Democratic Rights, inclusiveness and creating national consensus. Therefore, deferring the issue of rights will only perpetuate unnecessary conflict among Ethiopians and complicate the already existing contradictions. Thiswill work against Ethiopia's interest both in the short and long term.

3. Mr Cohen's recommendation is to accept the Algiers Agreement as is. Avery one clearly knows that the Algers agreement gives Bademe to Issayas and never considers allowing Ethiopia to regain its historical and legal rights including the full right to Assab. It is interesting to note that Mr Cohan himself has said in the past that Ethiopia had both the legal andhistorical rights to Assab. The people of Affars are Ethiopians forcefully pushed out by Meles. The residents of Badme never consideredthemselves anything but Ethiopians. Again, it is disappointing that Mr Cohan disregards Ethiopias interest although he knows how unfair his own recommendation is. For what everreason, all he wants is “peace “between the two even at the permanent cost of Ethiopia.

4. One of the most disappointing points in Mr Cohen’s proposal is his recommendation that reads “To break the stalemate between Eritrea and Ethiopia over the implementation of the EEBC boundary decision, there needs to be a mutually face-saving solution. I propose that Ethiopia offer to accept a symbolic initial takeover by Eritrea of territory awarded by theEEBC, followed by the same day opening of dialogue with a totally open agenda”

In my opinion, this is the most insulting part of Mr Cohen’s proposal. How is this proposal different from what Issayas has been saying ever since theso called EEBC decision? Why would Ethiopia give up its own territory just to get to talk to the EPLF? Is it not EPLF, if any that should concede in order to get Ethiopia to the discussion table? What is there to be gained, why would one give such a huge concession just to sit and start conversation with EPLF?

In any negotiation, give and take or a win-win situation is a common andacceptable phenomenon. This happens in proportionality without harmingone and benefitting another. One does not concede its own territory, its historical and legal rights for no thing. This is not “give- and- take” but surrender.

Mr Cohan’s recommendation that “Ethiopia offer to accept a symbolic initial takeover by Eritrea of territory awarded by the EEBC, followed by the same day opening of dialogue with a totally open agenda” is a major trap that will completely disarm Ethiopia for good. Clearly there will be noreturn once Ethiopia surrenders the contested territory to Eritrea.

“What does England mean by destroying Hewett's treaty and allowing the Italians to take my country from me? …Did I not relieve the Egyptian garrison in the Bogos country? Did I not fight at Cassala when it was too late? Have I not done everything I could? You English used us to do what you wanted and then left us[8], Ras Allula Aba Nega. (In the Hewett Treaty,concluded in 1884, the United Kingdom recognized Bogos and Massawa aspossessions of Ethiopia).

To summarise, Ethiopia is not just a piece of real-estate. For others, thereare no historical, psychological, social, and emotional factors involved in throwing away a national territory and disintegrating a nation. For them, itmay be as simple as selling property and exchanging ownership certificate. Over all, Mr Cohen's proposal is a non-starter. This proposalshould be rejected outright and without delay.

I urge all Ethiopians to put the maximum pressure on the ruling party inEthiopia to stand for Ethiopia's historical and legal rights and regain Ethiopian full rights in every way.

The struggle of the late PM Aklilu Habtewold to safeguard the rights ofEthiopia, especially in relation to Eritrea, has lots to teach us in this regard.

If our great leaders Ras Allula Aba Nega and Bitweded Ali Mirah Hanferewere alive today, they would have felt insulted by Mr Cohen's so called "recommendation" and would have told him to stay out of Ethiopian affairs.

"Even our camels know how to follow the Green Yellow and Red flag ... Even our camels salute the Ethiopian flag." There is no question that Afaris Ethiopia as is Assab. Bitwoded Alimirah Hanfare, a great Ethiopian patriot leader and sultan of Aussa, which includes Assab.

To conclude, I would like to challenge my fellow Ethiopians if you are ready to give up part of Tigray (which is again the integral part of Ethiopia) to Issayas? Are you ready to make Ethiopia landlocked forever? Is this in the best interest of Ethiopia including Tigray, the Erob, the Afar or the rest of Ethiopia? How would you like to be judged by history? As defender of Ethiopia's interests including its territorial integrity or as a realestate dealer who saw benefits in selling the land piecemeal?

WIKILEAKS: Dr. Al Mariam writes, citing wikileaks'

(Africa Confidential January edition) "Former TPLF Central Committee member and former Defense Minister Seeye Abraha told" American embassy officials in Addis Ababa that in a move to deal with "on-going tensions between Ethiopia and Sudan", Meles had turned over land to theSudan "which has cost the Amhara region a large chunk of territory" and that Meles' regime had tried to "sweep the issue under the rug."

It is unlikely that the views and efforts of the people of Ethiopia will eversee the daylight vis-à-vis the border agreements that Meles Zenawi or Hailemariam Desalegn signed or concluded since there is no question onthe legitimacy of their positions by the international community.

International agreements they signed will undoubtedly stand.

In response to those concerns Hailemariam responded, "The historical border agreement between the two nations dates back to the time of Emperor Menelik II when the Sudan was under the protectorate of the British Empire. There should not be any confusion on the issue since theagreement that was signed then was evaluated and accepted by successive regimes that came after Menelik's. The border agreements hasbeen accepted and endorsed by the regimes and that there could not be any new matter that his administration has to deal with. "All that is left isto implement the already demarcated and delimited border agreement.

So, there are no issues with the agreement: it is binding; the only thingleft is to put posts on these borders."
Hailemariam claims that Ethiopia is committed to regional peace. Why then is his regime illegally occupying internationally delimitated border with Eritrea? Why the doublespeak? The inconsistencies however are notlimited to the border issues. Hailemariam's positions and actions in Somalia and his view of Uganda's role on the current conflict on SS are contradictory and dangerous for regional stability and progress. When headdressed Ugandan forces in SS, citing that the problem is political, Hailemariam said, "We believe that all forces that were "invited" by different forces in thatcountry have to withdraw phase by phase."
The irony, on the same press conference, while addressing Somalia, Hailemariam claiming to have bilateral agreement with the government inSomalia tried to legitimize the presence of Ethiopian forces in Somalia. Hesaid Ethiopia is in Somalia as AMISOM "based on the "request" of the Somali government." Ugandan forces are in S. Sudan based on the "invitation" of the legitimategovernment of S. Sudan. Why then is Hailemariam seeking or talking political solution for the civil war in South Sudan while interfering in Somalia militarily? Why not political solution in Somalia? Assuming that the government in Somalia is independent and free to request assistance freely as a nation, why deny the same right to the government in South Sudan? Hardly anyone believes that Ethiopian forces are welcome by the people of Somalia. AMISOM or not, Ethiopian forces are not welcome. To the contrary Ethiopia's incursion into Somalia was not received well.
On a recent interview with the VOA, former U.S. Ambassador to EthiopiaDavid Shinn said that it is a "mistake" for Ethiopian troops to join the AMISOM force in Somalia.
Peace, security, terrorism and Al Shabab are justifications for Hailemariamto return into Somalia. The reality, however, Ethiopia's incursions into Somalia is impediment to peace and source of great instability. Ambassador Shinn continued, Ethiopian move could allow al-Shabab touse it as a "rallying cry to recruit new members."
Moreover, Hailmariam's positions are contradictory and self-serving as it regards to IGAD's role on the current conflicts in the region. Hailemariamevoked IGAD and AU to make a case against the presence of Ugandan troops in South Sudan and ignored the role of IGAD in Somalia. Uganda isin South Sudan based on the request of the sitting government of Salva Kiir Miardet, just like Ethiopia is in Somalia based on claims of a request. Why then Hailemariam undermining IGAD's role in Somalia?

Hailemariam Desalegn's Compromised Stature: by all standards Hailemariam Desalegn is on a tenuous position on many levels for manyreasons.

Firstly, he is not from the region of the minority clique ruling the country.Many consider Hailemariam as a figurehead. On the 17 Feb, The Telegraph's reporter David Blair on his report, "Ethiopian Airlines hijacking: Why co-pilot might have taken extreme steps to leave" wrote,

"Two key "push factors" lie behind this outflow: repression and poverty. Ethiopia is a de facto one-party state, dominated by small autocratic elite.Under the previous Prime Minister, Meles Zenawi, elections were shamelessly rigged and the opposition simply closed down. Many Ethiopians believed that Meles favored his own Tigray-Tigrinya ethnic group, who comprise less than seven per cent of the population, for the most powerful and privileged positions in the land."

Hence, PM Haileriam Desalegn is considered a transitional figurehead untilthe election of 2015 and likely to be replaced by another member of the TPLF to pursue Zenawi's agendas.

Secondly, Hailemariam inherited a country with a diminished regional and international influence for many reasons: A) The US has accomplished much of what it intended in Somalia hence the role required from Ethiopiais diminished. B) George Bush's Somalia war on terror agenda, which the minority regime exploited extensively seems to have shifted slightly as thegovernment in Somalia is recognized by the international community.

Thirdly, the countries in the region have opposing positions and interests on many areas as recent developments in S. Sudan exposed. Additionally,these countries have demonstrated ability to compete with Ethiopia on many fronts denying Ethiopia the anchor-state-status it enjoyed unchallenged for a while thus minimized Ethiopia's exclusive role in that regard.

Fourth, International actors such as China and Russia are playing significant roles to influence events and outcomes to favor their geostrategic interests. To be effective, China and Russia need to includeall and play a balanced hand with all the nations in the region further diluting Ethiopia's once dominant role.

Hailemariam's Diminished Regional Roles: one of the strongest suits of Meles Zenawi was the fact that he managed to co-opt influence from the regional actors using any means necessary. That level of influence diedwith Meles for many reasons:

The power transition took a long time to materialize. Between the timesMeles was rumored sick, his death and the time it took to complete thetransition creating vacuum.
The transition was manipulated to appease US interests while the realpower remained on the hands of few Tigrayans led by the then Information Minister Bereket Simon who is considered the power controlling Hailemariam.
The regional actors are focusing on their own interests. One good exampleof this is the current conflict in S. Sudan and how it will likely affect the dynamics of the relations between South Sudan, Uganda and Ethiopia regarding the Nile. Hailemariam is forced to wager Ethiopia's interests regarding the Nile in order to pursue US agendas in South Sudan. No consensus on South Sudan could lead to lack of consensus on issues of mutual importance including the Nile. Meles Zenawi was able to garner consensus and support for Ethiopia's positions on the Nile which is hard for Hailemariam to replicate.
Furthermore, Uganda, Kenya, South Sudan, Rwanda have mutual interests independent from Ethiopia because all these countries depend onport of Mombasa in Kenya for their imports. This gives Kenya leverage and importance that Hailameariam cannot match.
Moreover, initially, with the help of the US, the regime was able to createalliances with countries in the region specifically to encircle and suffocateEritrea to submission. At this stage, while Hailemariam desperately tries to pretend that Eritrea is isolated; the reality is Eritrea has turned the table. Eritrea has relations with Uganda, Sudan, Kenya, South Sudan andEgypt. At the current stage Hailemariam has no relation with Eritrea, Egypt, opposing positions with Uganda and South Sudan and Kenya has more interest independent from Ethiopia. In effect, Ethiopia is encircled further diminishing Hailmariam's roles.
In "Ethiopia: Revelation of Zenawi's vision for Tigray," Robele Ababya wrote, Shifting US foreign policy. Recent statements by former US diplomats regarding Eritrea stirred frantic reaction. The TPLF went on afull-fledged PR campaign to attack the issues and the personalities demonstrating fear the minority regime has of losing its status that it depends on for its very survival. On a piece about Zenawi's legacy
"When asked, in the aftermath of the 2005 election, what legal authorityhe had to by-pass the Parliament and declare a state of emergency, Zenawi responded by saying that, after all, the donors did not object to the action he took. His response is solid proof, among others, that the monstrous killer was subservient to the interests of the donors at theexpense of the vital interests of poor Ethiopia."

Without US support the regime cannot survive. Hence fighting to maintainthe "special-relation" status with the US is a question of survival. That however is beyond the control of the US as more African nations are looking for partnership with China, Russia, India, Brazil and other countries that are more focused on economic issues that Africa desperately need. This diminished US control of African agendas further diminishing Hailemariam's role in the region that the late Zenawi enjoyed unchallenged.

Hailemariam Desalegn Lame Duck Personified: in the US, a president is generally considered a lame duck at the end of his tenure or when a successor is elected. What that generally means is, during that phase, if the president is not popular his/her influence could not translate into furthering his/her agendas and naturally no coattails. In reality, however,the president's power is intact to the point that he/she can even wage wars. In Hailemariam's case, however, he is a lame duck in the truest sense because in Ethiopia, power is on the hands of the few repressive Tigrayans that are vying for time until the next election. "Ethiopia is a de facto one-party state, dominated by a small autocratic elite" controlling Hailmariam's actions and public statements. In addition, Hailemariam hasno constituency inside Ethiopia or the Diaspora. Support for Hailemariam is virtually nonexistent.

Conclusion: the situation in Ethiopia is unsustainable. Ethiopia is under extreme internal and external pressures that will ultimately explode abruptly. As demonstrated above, to further the interests of the super powers, the regime suppressed the people and took unnecessary antagonistic positions by becoming a pseudo-hegemon of the region. Whatthe press conference demonstrated is that PM Hailemariam Desalegn triedto address concerns of many stakeholders and failed. He tried to address the concerns of the people of Tigray, US interests, Somalia and regional actors. He tried to address Eritrea in a manner that satisfied TPLF and all Ethiopians and failed. Ethiopia is on a holding pattern bracing for change on the upcoming election. The questions are many. There exists no political party to challenge the TPLF. What does the US want in this transition? Can the TPLF bring a successor from Tigray and continue the "legacy" of Meles? How would the US react to that? In the absence of clearleadership direction these questions take on a new meaning enlarging the gap between all the publics. That means PM Hailemariam Desalegn will have to await his fate to be decided by the TPLF as the rest of Ethiopia.

Saudi Arabia's treatment of Ethiopians has been shameful'

News Analysis by Semahegn G. Abebe Special to the Gazette (January 8,2014)

The Saudi government certainty didn’t waste any time. As soon as the seven-month warning period for expatriate workers expired in November, officials rounded up tens of thousands of illegal immigrants, many of themfacing violence, rape and torture at the hands of police and vigilante groups throughout the crackdown.

Images circulated on social media that showed Saudi citizens lending support to their police force, participating in vigilantism, or simply cheering and watching the drama unfold from a distance. Ethiopian migrants were mercilessly beaten, tortured and raped by Saudi police andcivilians during the crackdown. At least three Ethiopians were brutally killed and hundreds more beaten by Saudi security forces. Tens of thousands of workers, including children, were held in detention centres without adequate food, shelter or medical care, before being sent home.

By the beginning of this year, almost 150, 000 Ethiopians had been expelled from Saudi Arabia. This is economically catastrophic not only forthe workers, but for the extended families that had been supported by their remittances.

The pretext of the Saudi government for the barbaric crackdown against foreign workers is to combat high levels of unemployment among Saudi citizens by opening jobs previously filled by undocumented workers. Thosetargeted include people without the proper residency or work permits, andthose caught working for an employer who is not their legal sponsor. The crackdown hit Ethiopians particularly hard, as they had stayed behind as nationals of many other countries had been helped to leave Saudi Arabia by their own governments during the warning period.

The accounts of the victims are extremely distressing. A 26-year-old undocumented day labourer told Human Rights Watch that he was among a group of 23 Ethiopians in a private home when a group of 20 young menarmed with machetes and pistols broke down the door and attacked the people inside. He and five other Ethiopians escaped by climbing to the roof, but he does not know what happened to the other 17 men.

Despite it all, the Ethiopian government has paid precious little attentionto the suffering of Ethiopian immigrants in the Middle East, and the response of the international community and western media to the crisisin Saudi Arabia has been inadequate. The silence of powerful governments, multilateral organizations and major media outlets perpetuates the message that it is acceptable for Saudi authorities to continue the violent treatment of foreign workers.

Tens of thousands of Ethiopians flee their country every year because of worsening living conditions and the repressive regime. According to Ethiopia’s Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, approximately 200,000 women sought employment abroad in 2012, the vast majority of them inthe Middle East. The real figure could be more than double that, considering that most of the illegal immigrants cross the borders without passing through any documentation process. For years, the Ethiopian government has completely failed to take such steps as creating jobs andensuring good governance in the country, which would curb the surge in emigration.

The suffering of Ethiopian immigrants at the hands of Saudi authorities was made worse by the failure of Ethiopian diplomatic offices to provideeffective protection. Not only has the Ethiopian government failed to denounce the violent crackdown in the strongest terms, but police arrested dozens of demonstrators outside the Saudi embassy in the capital Addis Ababa as they protested against attacks on Ethiopian immigrants in Saudi Arabia.
It is time for the international community to urge Saudi authorities to treat immigrant workers in accordance with international human rights standards. Saudi authorities should cease all forms of violence against immigrant workers, investigate assaults on Ethiopian and other migrantworkers, and bring perpetrators to justice.
The international community should condemn this barbaric act in the strongest possible terms and pressure the Saudi government to improve the way in which immigrant workers are treated in the country. In addition, international organizations and the donor community should respond urgently to appeals by humanitarian organizations for financial assistance to help resettle and rehabilitate returnees. Ethiopians returned from Saudi Arabia in an adverse condition'
News updates: Although the government has stated that it will relocateEthiopian migrant workers returned from Saudi Arabia to regions and organise them and create jobs under the Small and Medium Enterprises scheme, it has been learnt that the returnees were faced with multiple problems when they returned to their localities. The total number of the returnees is 150, 000. According to an observer who follows the situation of the returnees closely, there many people who returned to the NorthernShewa part of the Country and although they were promised that they willbe organised under the Small and Medium Enterprises scheme, it has not come to reality so far putting them in difficulty. Ethiopian Migrants Expelled by Saudis Remain in Limbo Back Home -NewYork Times'

Ethiopian returnees from Saudi Arabia exceeded at 151,000

GENEVA, Switzerland, African Press Organization (APO) (January 10, 2014) – (News updates) Two months after the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia (KSA) started its crackdown on irregular migration, the operation to repatriate Ethiopian irregular migrants from the Kingdom continues, withover 151,000 already returned home.

Ethiopia is key to Democracy in South Sudan and Africa'

Comment by Dula Abdu: Ethiopia besides being the seat of the Africanunion, cradle of mankind, carries great historical symbol for people of African origin. Ethiopia earned this position as one of the longest independent nations, and for repulsing Western colonial occupation.

Despite this legacy, Ethiopians have never enjoyed rule of law or fair andfree election.

Representative of warring factions from South Sudan are in Ethiopia to hammer out their differences and to form democratic union where all different groups can live in peace. Unfortunately, Ethiopia is not a place toteach such lessons. The Ethiopian regime pretended for long for things that it is not in order to earn respect and foreign aid.

In Ethiopia the government perfected the Machiavellian system where ethnic groups are pitted one against another, embraced the bantustanization of Ethiopia, resources are controlled like in North Korea and Cuba by the state, where the state owns land, access to Internet, telecommunication, banking and all other vital means of production causing many Ethiopian to live a precarious often miserable economic andpolitical existence. Freedom of the press, free assembly, civil societies, and political parties are barley existent or survive at the whims of the regime.

In 2005, the late Meles Zenawi allowed unfettered debate among candidates believing that he was assured of victory, but when the polls started coming, he realized that he was losing in all major cities and in most of the country side except in Tigray, Silte, Harrari regions, so he stopped the countdown and declared victory. When protest erupted he used deadly force killing over 190 peaceful protesters and arrested hundreds of thousands. The U.S. government and African leaders looked the other way because the sway Ethiopia holds in Africa. After Meles emerged unscathed except condemnation by a few representatives in Europe and the U.S., leaders in Kenya, Uganda, Rwanda, Sudan realized that if Melese can get away by stealing an election, they can do it too. TheKenyan attempt was bloody, others were less bloody, but the pattern for dynasties or one party apparatus were set in motion. Now some elections in Africa are ceremonial because the winner is predetermined.

Ethiopia holds the key to democracy in Africa. So in order to restore democracy in Africa, Ethiopia as the seat of the OAU has to uphold the rule of law, respect free and fair election, then the rest of Africa will followsuit. Ethiopia plays a significant leadership role and that role has to include in promoting democracy in the continent. African leaders come to Ethiopia in a regular basis at least once a year and see Ethiopia’s oppressive system year after year surviving and the West giving a blind eye. So goes the rest of Africa.

Ethiopia will hold its true place in history not as the physical capital of Africa, or as the cradle of man kind, only when it upholds the rule of law and becomes a pride for the rest of the oppressed African masses, as it did during pre-colonial Africa. The Obama administration has tremendouspower on Ethiopia, a country landlocked and far dependent on aid ill can afford to alienate the West.

All Africans from Eritrea, Ethiopia and others are yearning for democracyand for American leadership. Unfortunately, leadership has been reactionary only willing to put out fires instead of building a roadmap fordemocracy for the continent.

Some countries like Ethiopia are exempt from respecting the rule of lawdespite their repeated defiance. Many African leaders are aspiring to anoint themselves and their children for life whether it is good for the country or whether the people support it or not. The West especially Washington is eager to acquiesce in the name of stability, which in this case is a mirage, because there is no stability without respect for rule oflaw.

Billions of souls from Third World nations are potential terrorists, unlesswe end their extreme poverty, oppression and suffering. For Africa, thefirst place to start is Ethiopia.

Unless other African countries including Ethiopia pledge to hold free and fair election, respect the rule of law and respect the rights of their citizensregardless of their tribe or religion, the leaders of South Sudan may not want to be an exception to the norm. In the long run, for Africa to enjoy peace, stability and economic growth, ethnic and/or one party dictatorshiphas to be forbidden. Eyewitness account: About 40 top EPRP rebels were executed, buried nearTana Beles in 1991’

ADDIS ABABA, ETHIOPIA – (January 11, 2014) - Timely eyewitness account of the various atrocities perpetrated by past and present government security forces have been reveled in various corners of the country. About 40 EPRP combatants who were captured in 1991 after the EPRDF forces were seized the regions of Gojjam and Gondar were routed, and later summarily executed and buried in a mass grave near the Tana Beles Project, an anonymous source has told EM. A bulldozer of the Tana Beles Project was used to make up the mass grave, and once the executions were carried out, the man who operated the bulldozer was alsoshot to death so that the information wouldn't leak out to the public, the source told. The execution was ordered by the late Meles Zenawi and Sebhat Nega, but senior TPLF/EPRDF leaders were undoubtedly aware of the killings, the source told. At about the same time, eight top EPRP veterans were summarily executed by the notorious TPLF Intelligence Unit known as "06" (Bado-shidishte), and the group included EPRP leaders Tsegaye Debteraw, Hagos Berhe, Yishak Debretsion and others. The source couldn't verify whether the killings took place in Tigrai, Gondar, orGojjam area. Attempts to get further details were left unanswered.

Ethiopia: New Report Calls On Ethiopia to Reform It’s Repressive Anti-Terror Law’

Addis Standard (January 14, 2014) Ethiopia's use of sweeping anti- terrorism law to imprison journalists and other legislative restrictions arehindering the development of free and independent media in Africa's second largest country, according to a report published today by the International Press Institute (IPI). Dozens of journalists and political activists have been arrested or sentenced under the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation of 2009, including five journalists who are serving prison sentences and who at times have been denied access to visitors and legal counsel. The report, "Press Freedom in Ethiopia", is based on a mission to the country carried out in November byIPI and the World Association of Newspapers and News Publishers (WAN- IFRA).

"Despite a strong constitutional basis for press freedom and freedom of information, the Ethiopian government has systematically used the anti- terrorism law to prosecute and frighten journalists, which has put a straight-jacket on the media," IPI Executive Director Alison Bethel McKenzie said. "Our joint mission also found a disturbing pattern of usingother measures to control the press and restrict independent journalism,including restrictions on foreign media ownership and the absence of an independent public broadcaster."

The report urges the Ethiopian government to free journalists convicted under the sedition provisions of the 2009 measure. These journalists include Solomon Kebede, Wubset Taye, Reyot Alemu, Eskinder Nega andYusuf Getachew. Mission delegates were barred access to the journalists,who are being held at Kaliti Prison near the capital Addis Ababa.

The report urges the 547-member lower house of parliament to revampthe anti-terror law to ensure that it does not trample on the rights of freedom of speech and assembly provided under Article 29 of the Ethiopian Constitution and further guaranteed under the African Charteron Human and People's Rights and the U.N. Human Rights Covenant, which Ethiopia has ratified.

In addition,the report:

Recommends that Ethiopian lawmakers review laws that bar foreigninvestment in media, measures that inhibit the development of an economically viable and diversified market.

Urges the courts to ensure that rulings restrict press freedom only in cases of intentional incitement or clear participation in acts of terrorism,and that judges act independently to protect the public's right to be informed about political dissent and acts of terrorism.

Urges Ethiopia's journalists and media owners to step up cooperation to improve professionalism and independence, and to form a unified front todefend press freedom.

The joint IPI/WAN-IFRA mission was carried from Nov. 3 to 6, just aheadof the African Media Leaders Forum (AMLF) in Addis Ababa. The organizations' representatives met with more than 30 editors, journalists,lawyers, politicians and bloggers, as well as associates of the imprisoned journalists. The delegation also held meetings with the ambassadors of Austria and the United States, a senior African Union official, an Ethiopianlawmaker and government spokesman Redwan Hussien.

The organizations urged Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn to free theimprisoned journalists, some of whom are suffering from deteriorating health. In a joint statement issued immediately following the mission, IPIand WAN-IFRA also expressed their commitment to helping improve the professionalism, quality and independence of journalism in Ethiopia.

While the report highlights a long history of press freedom violations inEthiopia, including a crackdown on journalists and opposition politiciansfollowing the country's 2005 national elections, it notes that the 2009 anti-terrorism law has given the government expansive powers.

"The 2009 anti-terrorism law gave new powers to the government to arrest those deemed seditious, including journalists who step beyond the bounds of politically acceptable reporting or commentary," the report says. "Armed with statutory authority, the government has not shied fromusing the laws to bludgeon opposition figures and journalists. Dozens of journalists have been imprisoned or accused of sedition or fomenting unrest, forcing many to flee the country."

The report notes other forms of pressure by the government. Independentjournalists recalled being the target of smear campaigns by state-run media, while editors recounted that managers of the government-run printing press refused to print editions of newspapers containing controversial articles.

The report does note positive developments, such as the growth in advertising and readership for some of the country's leading independent newspapers. Journalists and newspaper publishers also expressed a desireto improve professionalism, quality and solidarity; although they added that government pressure and laws continue to create hurdles to self- regulation and cooperation.

"We came away from Ethiopia recognizing the tremendous potential for a highly competitive, professional and successful media market in Ethiopia,"Bethel McKenzie said. "But to make this happen, the Ethiopian government must remove the roadblocks, starting with the release of imprisoned journalists and then conduct a thorough review of the laws to ensure that reporting on legitimate criticism or dissent is not grounds for prosecution."

Demonizing Ethiopian History: Propaganda Campaign Against EmperorMenelik'

By Prof. Al Mariam - The regime in power in Ethiopia today is orchestrating a full-court press demonization and vilification campaign against Atse Menelik II, the Nineteenth Century Ethiopian emperor whose centennial is being celebrated this year (Ethiopian calendar). The campaign is conducted largely through regime lackey-proxies, stooges andpuppets. Through its minions, the regime has used the most loathsome words, inflammatory rhetoric and repugnant imagery to describe Menelik'salleged brutality in his quest for territorial conquest. The regime's servile drones have been all over social media parroting historical lies, distortions, fabrications, disinformation and falsehoods. The agitators havetried to whip up a propaganda frenzy in an attempt to caricature, demean and demonize the great Ethiopian leader. One hundred years after his death, they have tried to resurrect him as the devil incarnate. Barely two years after Meles Zenawi's death they want to resurrect him as the savior of Ethiopia. One need not be surprised by the volume or vehemence of thepropaganda attack on Atse Menelik or the regime's methodical and organized campaign to incite hatred and ill-will by trotting out Menelik's Ghost. The fact of the matter is that the real issue is not about the demonization (making a devil) of Menelik but about the canonization (making a saint) of the regime's late capo di tutti capi(boss of all bosses) Meles Zenawi.

Message to those in power in Ethiopia today: My message to the hate mongers in power in Ethiopia is simple. The hate you propagate today will boomerang back to you. Today you smile and snicker at the statute dedicated to show Menelik as a breast lopping brute. Those who are told to hate Menelik today will be told to hate Meles tomorrow. The day is not long when your great visionary leader Meles will be commemorated in stone and marble as the Second Coming of Marshal Rodolfo Graziani in theOgaden, Gambella, Addis Ababa and elsewhere. Those you hold as friends today will be your mortal enemies tomorrow. Those you demonize as yourenemies today will be your friends tomorrow when the chips are down andyou are on the receiving end. That is the dialectics of history. Learn from history.

Atse Menelik II was neither saint nor demon; he was neither divine nor ademigod. He was an African king who tried to unite and modernize Ethiopia when the rest of Africa was on the chopping block of European imperialism being sliced, diced, spiced, spliced, priced and sacrificed. Let Menelik II be judged by only one measure: The Truth. Historians should tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth about Menelik. Inhis centenary commemoration, I submit the testimony of the Belgian explorer, Baron de Jarlsburg, given to the New York Times in 1909 as part, and only part, of the historical evidence to be used in pronouncing judgment on Atse Menelik II:

Menelik has since accession to the throne, twenty years ago, transformed Abyssinia from a semi-barbarous power to a State modeled on the lines ofa European constitutional monarchy… The sovereign, who styles himself somewhat pompously, Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Juda, Elect of the Saviour, King of Kings of Ethiopia, shattered Italy's colonial ambitions by his victories at Amba-Garima… When Menelik was crowned Emperor of Ethiopia on Nov. 4, 1889, after King Johanne's death, he was far from being the accepted ruler of all the States which constitute the Abyssinian empire. It was only after much hard fighting that Menelik finally succeeded in subjugating those rebellious chieftains who did not recognizehim… Since then, Menelik's one aim has been to introduce European civilization into his country. The Emperor, after abolishing the feudal laws still extant in the empire, and emancipating the slaves, established compulsory free education throughout his dominions. As a result in another generation education will be as widespread in Abyssinia as in several European countries.

Menelik is himself an altogether unique figure among African potentates. As a diplomat, as a financier, and as a soldier, he can hold his own with the most up-to-date of his brother sovereigns. As a soldier and a diplomat, he showed his worth at the time of Italy's defeat by the Abyssinians. In late years, however, it is particularly as a financier that Menelik has distinguished himself. He had a natural bent for finance, even as a young man, before his accession to the throne, and at that time wentfor stock speculation on the Paris Bourse to a considerable extent. These youthful speculations proved successful, and were only interrupted by theevents which followed Menelik's accession… The Abyssinian ruler has extended the range of his financial operations to the United States, and isheavy investor in American railroads. With his American securities and hisFrench and Belgian mining investments, Menelik has a private fortune estimated at no less than twenty-five million dollars.

The most striking fact about Abyssinia's dusky ruler is his versatility. Anaccomplished linguist, he speaks French, English, and Italian fluently.

Notwithstanding all the time he is compelled to devote to state affairs, hestill finds the opportunity to keep up in current European literature, and israrely at a loss when a new author is mentioned. At Adissaba Palace – to give him the title by which he is known to his subjects — he takes particular pride in his library of ten thousand volumes, collected by himself. Menelik's chief hobby in the way of books are works dealing withthe ancient civilizations of Africa and Asia.

Bereket Simon says 'however we mistreat them, farmers won't rise up toresist'

ESAT News: (January 16, 20134) The former Minister of Communications and now the advisor of Prime Minister Hailemariam Dessalegn, Bereket Simon, said at a recent meeting and evaluation with ministers and top leadership of the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) "because farmers are happy with the works we have done for them so far, they will come to any demonstration if we call them, sleep if we order them and bear anything this government does". As 30% of our expenses is covered by foreign aid, to be clear from external dependency we have to get an income that covers our expenses, said Bereket admitting that just after the 2005 general election was held, foreign powers had stopped giving us aid because we had arrested the opposition.He also recollected that during the drought that occurred in 1992, the Head of the American aid organisation had said that they would not give them an aid unless they changed their land policy. EPRDF is giving training to all its members from the top to the bottom brass on how they could win the upcoming general election in 2015. The Front as well as Bereket are fully confident that they will win the election. Cadres of EPRDFare also reportedly engaged in the organisation of farmers through a one-to-five system of organisation and distributing pieces of land to disgruntled youth in rural areas.

A Misplaced Assault on Menelik II by TPLF propagandists'

Hatemongers and TPLF propagandists portray Menelik II as a villain who did everything for sordid motives. They implicates him in the assassinationof Emperor Yohannes and charges him for trading Bahr Midir (Eritrea) in exchange for arms. It is dangerously easy to look for and discover links between otherwise isolated incidents and one's own figments of hostile imagination if one is struggling to establish or support a theory in which one has more than a passing interest. Should haters of Minilik, with the advantage of hindsight attack Menelik for crimes of treason, it is merely a misplaced assault that rather befits the Tigrean king, Yohannes. Was it notYohannes who found it expedient to serve the enemy flag for gadgets and gold when Britain invaded Ethiopia and breached the nation's sovereignty for the first time? Was it not his venality and humiliating servility that prompted him to spearhead the British invasion? Did he not give the British his blessings when they looted Ethiopia's invaluable relics and emptied the national treasury? Above all, did he not facilitate the untimelydemise of Tewodros, the valorous emperor who chose to defiantly turn hisgun on himself rather than surrender to the enemy?

Menelik was a magnanimous monarch who led a consensus government.His cabinet included gallant men such as Balcha, Gobena, Habte-Giorgis,Mekonnen, Mulugeta, and his wife Taitu, to name but a few of the proudand patriotic mortals who could not be accused of treason. Wheeling anddealing is rather in character with the Tigrian Woyannes, at least judgingby their own description of themselves. Without sounding irreverent to Tigrinya-speakers, the literal meaning of the word "Tigre" is after all "trader."

Casting Aspersions: However much Woyanne and their puppets dislike him, it was Menelik who having trounced Italian aggressors and their Tigre-speaking mercenaries at the battle of Adwa, that guaranteed Tigrai'sfreedom. In falsely accusing Menelik of treason, Woyannes are enviously casting aspersions on Shoans perhaps to redeem the contemptible mercenaries of the North.

On the other hand, Yohannes, an ex-bandit who had emerged as emperorby brute force, was disposed to fits of jealousy and suspicion. He had never, for instance, entrusted a single non-Tigrean to high office. He saw potential enemies even among the rank and file of his own long-serving army. A case in point is the fear Alula's victory at Dogali evoked.

Yohannes replaced the legendary commander with his own cousin. Yet, eager to test a solo triumph and outdo Alula, he marched towards the remaining Italian forces. But the sheer size and force of the Italian force prompted the Emperor's unceremonious retreat. Thus, Italy occupied thecoastal province unchallenged.

Instead, he set out to harass his loyal subjects whom he conveniently accused of "defiance". Emboldened by the arms he received from the British for his errand duties, Yohannes unleashed terror by plundering andburning Begemdir, Gojam and Wollo in 1888. He personally tortured and blinded Wollo's king by plunging a red-hot knife in his eyes. "Pious", Yohannes was. But for no other reasons than his unrelenting prayers evenwhile he was in his killing fields and the missionary zeal with which he aspired to convert the "infidels", the Muslims, whom he rendered landlessby decree:

He then moved southwards to also lay Shoa waste. But his advances werehalted by the forces of Beshah Aboye, Menelik's rather junior army officer.Against the better judgment of his brilliant advisers (Mekonnen, Habte Giorgis, and Balcha) who had opted to rudely rebuff the challenge, Menelikwent along with the Archbishop's intervention to arbitrate. The negotiated settlement between Menelik and the bullying Yohannes hence averted a bloody civil war.

Without any domestic excuses available to him now, Yohannes could no longer defer the external challenges he had hitherto evaded. Abandoning the hope of driving the Italians out, he accepted their incursions in Eritreaas fait accompli. Instead, he sought victory against the Mahdists whom hehad considered an easy prey. As fate would have it, he was made to take his last breath in the hands of the Dervish, the "infidels" that he had hoped to beat.

Menelik Inherited Occupied Eritrea: So, Menelik in effect had the misfortune of inheriting an occupied Eritrea which Yohannes had relinquished to Italy lacking the nerve to pursue Alula's victory at Dogali.At Adwa, Menelik competently performed the homework his predecessor had not even dared to venture. He devastated the Italian army and its Tigrean Shumbash and Buluqbash contingent (well over 300,000 strong),frustrating the enemy's grand design of colonizing the rest of Ethiopia.

A man of noble character, Menelik was devoid of the nepotistic and ethnocentric dispositions of the `pious' emperor. Most of Menelik's illustriously brave commanders, Balcha, Gebeyehu, Gobenna, Habte, and Mekonnen, all came to the highest positions on merit. Not only were they not related to him, but they were men from three linguistic groups. Adwa endeared Menelik in both liberated Tigrai and occupied Eritrea. The high frequency of his name among the for-bearers of the generation that todayvilifies him, certainly could not have been a reflection of a hostile sentiment.

If the ungrateful lot lampoon Menelik for not having purged Eritrea of its white masters, the allegation is unfounded. For not only did Britain and France threaten to attack Menelik if he did not stop at Adwa, but they hadalready made incursions on Ethiopia's southern regions. Replenishing the supply of food in arid Tigrai and combating epidemics which had already left the army enfeebled, were the other formidable problems which stood in Menelik's way to reclaim the occupied coastal province.

The fact that the region that had the dubious distinction of producingAfrica's most ruthless mercenaries also bred Alula Aba Nega, LorenzoTaezaz, and Zerai Deres, to mention only a few patriots who died defending Ethiopia, proves the point.

The flirtation of the OLF with the TPLF is profoundly humiliating for thoseEthiopians who by blood and nurture consider Oromo culture their own.

The people of Balcha and Abdisa Aga have never been known to betraytheir country.

Today, the Tigrean oligarchy calling itself EPRDF to elude the gullible Westerners and appease its foreign pay-masters, is waging a relentless campaign of malice to divide Ethiopians along ethnic lines. A third of the nation's population, the Amharas, are objects of media insults. Not surprisingly, the majority of Ethiopians have rejected the call for ethnic strife. True, as a result of EPRDF-incited anti- Amhara propaganda many unarmed peasants have been killed and violently evicted from their ancestral homes in the South. Glory be to all brave Ethiopians who transcend vile ethnocentrism and fight it tooth and nail, despite its dignified status as an official ideology of the EPRDF, more correctly the TPLF. Playing one group against another is perfectly within the scheme ofthings of the foreign-sponsored EPRDF.

Ethiopians and Ethio-Americans Celebrate Menelik II and the Victory atBattle of Adwa'

Washington, DC (January 19, 2014) – One-hundred and eighteen years ago, a well-organized army under the command and leadership of Emperor Menelik II and Empress Taytu, decimated the Italian force that was seeking to colonize one of Africa's most ancient nations – Ethiopia. Asa leader beyond his time, Emperor Menelik II was able to organize and structure an army within a short period of time to confront the Italians at Adwa. With his swift victory over the Italians, Menelik II solidified Ethiopia's independence by putting Ethiopia among the very few states in the world that have never been colonized. The Ethiopian Heritage Society of North America (EHSNA) will be celebrating the leadership of King Menelik and Empress Taytu in their struggle for independence. Last monthmarks the 100th anniversary of Menelik's death, nearly 18 years after defeating the Italian colonial force. The commemoration of Menelik and Taytu, and the victory at Adwa, will take place on Sunday, March 2, 2014 at the Silver Spring Civic Building at Veterans Plaza in Silver Spring, Maryland. The general public is encouraged to attend and commemorate the victory at Adwa, as well as King Menelik's accomplishments in restructuring Ethiopia.

The significance of Adwa to African-Americans and Africans in General:

Black Unity: King Menelik's victory at Adwa raised the status of Ethiopia toa degree that Ethiopia, then known as Abyssinia, became a symbol for Africa's great potential. It shattered the centuries old, negative portrayals of Africans as being, "savages." The victory produced and strengthened a new phase of Pan-Africanism that planted the seed of unity and cooperation of blacks throughout the world to break the yoke of colonialism in unison. In Africa, many nations viewed Ethiopia as a role model, and took the Ethiopian flag colors (Green, Yellow, and Red) to construct their own flag in recognition of Ethiopia's struggle and victory over colonialism. In the Americas, the African-American community adopted the words "Ethiopia" and "Abyssinia" in their church names to further push the idea of black unity. Langston Hughes, in his poem entitled Call For Ethiopia, writes: "Ethiopia is free! Be like me all of Africa, arise and be Free! All of you black peoples, be Free, be Free!"

The dynamic leadership of Menelik II and his contribution to restructuringand ushering Ethiopia's modernity: Besides saving his country from slavery, Minilik can also claim victory in the development sphere. With great zeal, he led Ethiopia into the 20th century. A 1909 New York Timesarticle describes Menelik: "The Emperor, after abolishing the feudal laws still extant in the empire, and emancipating the slaves, established compulsory free education throughout his dominions. As a result in another generation education will be as widespread in Abyssinia as in several European countries." Emperor Menelik II introduced a plethora ofmodern institutions and infrastructure that Ethiopia sorely needed. From the first railway, to the first bank and telephone systems, from electricityto the first sewer system, Emperor Menelik II was determined to move Ethiopia into a new era. Before he died, it is alleged that he was thinkingabout reforming the government into a constitutional monarchy.

A Battle for Emperor Minilik II and the Truth: Recently, an organized campaign to degrade and belittle the image and legacy of Menelik II has been taking place. This deliberate and hateful campaign has attempted to target and belittle one of the fundamental cores of Ethiopian identity – thevictory at Adwa. Despite the diversity of language, culture, and religion among them, Ethiopians united to defeat their common enemy colonialism. The victory helped foment a nationalist renaissance that focused on an Ethiopian identity that includes diligence and courage. This smear campaign not only attempts to belittle and degrade the history of Ethiopia, but also to rob the historical symbolism and pride of blacks around the world. By portraying a vicious image of King Menelik and his victories, it attempts to define black identity as a people conquered by colonialists, while the triumphant victory proves otherwise. Since their defeat at Adwa, the colonialists have searched for ways to degrade the victory of Adwa and Menelik, because it reminds them of their defeat.

Using Colonialist Policies: The present regime in Ethiopia is adopting the techniques of those past colonial powers. It seems to be attempting to colonize Ethiopia a second time. The regime is attempting to rewrite history by ignoring the victory at Adwa and besmirching the image of Menelik. The regime attempted to pull down a historic statue of Menelik, but the people of Ethiopia reacted negatively and the statue still stands in Saint George Circle in Addis Ababa. The ongoing campaign of demonizing Menelik can be deemed as a colonialist agenda. This colonialist agenda includes policies to belittle, desecrate, and degrade Ethiopia's historical victories as well as its historical artifacts. This colonialist policy became evident when the current regime refused to commemorate the centennial anniversary of Minilik's death and vowed to punish with arrest any attempts to do so. Common knowledge indicates that the regime has financed this smear campaign against Menelik and the victory at Adwa. Itsultimate goal is to deconstruct the shared history of the nation using a divide-and-conquer technique, pitting citizen against citizen. The victory atAdwa and the leadership of Menelik and Taytu are synonymous with Ethiopian freedom. They define what the Ethiopian people can accomplish as a united front.

ETHIOPIA/ERITREA: DEBATES - Cold or warm, keep Eritrea at bay'

EM Commentary By Haile Mikael (January 20, 2014) - Recently, I came across commentaries on Ethiomedia.com by former diplomats Herman Cohen and David Shinn and, as an Ethiopian, I wish to share my reflectionby commenting on the matter as it concerns all Ethiopians at present and the generations in the future, As the case might be with all diplomats, Ambassadors Cohen and Shinn's proposals emanate from their interest which may not be in the interest of Ethiopia. We Ethiopians must model our journey more by what is useful to us and less by smart outside tips.

General diplomatic talks like “normalized relations would provide economicbenefits for both” can be dangerously misleading.

A closer look at the state of things in Ethiopia and Eritrea will show that Ethiopia will sustain perils to its wellbeing in the event of restored relations with “independent Eritrea”. Eritrea is different from Djibouti or even from Somalia in that the state of mind of many Eritreans who are in a position to sway is contention inspired. It is no secret that hostility driven contest against Ethiopians is the soul of the independence quest and it has become even more apparent now that all other excuses that were raised by the Eritrean elite have melted away in Ethiopia in the course of time. Included is the nullifying of the argument that Ethiopia was behind Eritrea for modernity by the facts on the ground now that many cities and places of Ethiopia are more advanced than even Asmara. Yet, Eritreans are still in antagonistic mood towards Ethiopians. An Ethiopian can make a few visits to awate.com or dehai as a sampler and he or she will have a lasting depression. Why do we need to pick up depression when we can leave it where it is? It must be clear to Ethiopiansthat it is highly likely that an Eritrean will use any occasion, including the type of relationship the 1991- 1998 period saw, to inflict damage on Ethiopia. I know there are some Eritreans who are not bad but a few dolphins are little solace in a sea of sharks.

In the event of a relationship between Ethiopia and independent Eritrea, Ethiopia will lose in many fronts. Top among them is the economic front. In such event, the northern border of Ethiopia will become porous and Ethiopia will start spilling its collections through these porosity and it will incur unimaginable loss which it can not tabulate on accounting balance sheets. The other catastrophe Ethiopia will confront in such event is what I call, “the tesfaye gebreab plague.” Since most Eritreans are indistinguishable from any other Ethiopian, given their propensity to do harm, they will use it to the maximum extent possible since they will havebeen empowered with both knowledge of Ethiopia’s weakest links and thedisposition to snap them.

The foreign adversaries of Ethiopia who had been assailing her using proxies since long time ago will also be empowered by the same “restoredrelations” deal. This deal will provide them with the perfect opportunity togo covert. Eritrea will oblige since it will be a beneficiary of covert operations against Ethiopia and its rewards for engaging in such operations will be greater because it has now more access to Ethiopia and will be a much sought entity by the adversaries. Only Ethiopia will stand to lose in such event. It has to be remembered that disconnect from Eritrea has made it possible for Ethiopia to see its historical enemies in theopen. Getting to know one's enemies is the first step to deal with them effectively.

Besides economic adversities, the harmful repercussions of "restored relations" with independent Eritrea will be deeper and wider especially inthe social sphere. Since the Eritrean antagonism towards Ethiopia has crystallized more for its religious component, its hostile reflection will beparticularly injurious to the otherwise harmonious Ethiopian inner cohesion.

I have seen some activities by Ethiopians and Eritreans to foster relations in recent years. It is courageous to do so but ill advised in substance, especially on the part of the Ethiopians. I have read the dialogue between the two groups over two choices: "federation" vs. "confederation". It is notproductive for Ethiopians to engage in such discussion since both options are non-starters for most Ethiopians and especially for Ethiopia as a nation. It also excites Eritreans with false hopes. Ethiopia can not entertain options that it can not afford to provide to its own citizens. The motivation for the Eritreans to engage in such efforts is clear; however, there are no grounds that encourage Ethiopians to stretch this far. It mustbe understood that there is zero material benefit to Ethiopia in any relationship with Eritrea including in total unity. In fact, federation, confederation and what Ambassadors Cohen and Shinn called "normalization" with Eritrea will hurt Ethiopia seriously. If warring Eritrea was bad in unity to warrant separation, then what followed immediately after it was worse. It is economically cheaper for Ethiopia to keep Eritrea at a good distance and spend on security than to enter into a relationship which will eventuate in colossal economic costs. I am not opposed to unitybut only for historical reasons. The current Eritrean craving for relationship is material driven. Clearly, the Eritrean desire for economic gains will only come from Ethiopian losses. Those who claim that both will benefit citing port use are in error. For one thing, the value of port did notrise to significance by those in authority when Eritrea seceded. Neither didit play any since 1996. For another, accessing a port for fee should not be considered a benefit that comes on par with economic risks. Not to be forgotten is the fact that any intent in "restored relations" with Eritrea will encourage a fiery of port diplomacy between Eritrea and Ethiopia's other options, which will be eternally damaging to Ethiopia. Since the part played by port in national wellbeing was downplayed at the time of the secession of Eritrea, the government will surely find itself in a logical dilemma if this time around it attaches such significance to port use as to settle for desperate deals. If they do so, they will be the embodiment of the famous adage: "A fool barters away his chicken for a bird and dies chasing in empty belly." I am sure they are not that stupid as to resort to deals of loss unless they perceived the letters of Ambassadors Cohen andShinn as some kind of coercion from the big powers.

I was concerned by the matter and by the unwelcome proposals of these two foreigners and spoke with Ethiopians in my area. I spoke with about seventy five Ethiopians of varying persuasions and background. Some of them oppose the government and some of them support the government.Some are neutral. I tried to reach diverse ethnic and religious backgrounds. I made a tally of their responses to my questions and the following is what I collected.

For my question of whether simple "normalization with Eritrea" as proposed by Ambassador Cohen would be acceptable to them, all of them rejected the proposal. For my question of whether "confederation with Eritrea" would be acceptable to them, zero percent accepted the alternative. For my question of whether "federation with Eritrea" would be acceptable to them, twenty percent accepted the alternative. For my question of whether "total union with Eritrea" would be acceptable to them, forty eight percent of them rejected the alternative. The fifty two percent that accepted were not all enthusiastic about it. The degree of passion for it varies. Historical kinship was the main reason given by manyof those who accepted the union alternative. I was limited by time and resources to go beyond seventy five people and I understand that more data needs to be gathered for a clearer picture, but the sample is a good indicator that the majority of Ethiopians reject any relationships with Eritrea with the exception of total union. It will be a shame if the desire and right of Ethiopians is once more violated by powerful outside forces with ulterior motives.

BOOK CRITIC: The Reappearance of Derg's Villain as Book writer - Halfstory is spin!

By Ewnetu Sime (January 20, 2014)

A former military junta (better known as the Derg) official Prime Minister (PM) Fikre Selassie Wogderess wrote a book in Amharic entitled "Igna-enaAbyoitu" meaning: "Us (we) and The Revolution". The author wrote his version of story of Derg's history from the day it was formed to the end.

During this period our beloved country plunged almost two decades of oppressive and repressive dictatorship. It seems obvious the seed of the problem has different basis but the main one is not only Mengistu's but the Derg itself desire to maintain a monopoly of state power by brutal force. Ethiopians were governed by absolute tyranny and terror. The arguments or information presented in the book blame EPRP for all the aspects of political, social and economic failures. While the regime that was in power never accept responsibility or had no regret for their actions.It contains full of excuses for all their failures. When you are reading the book you lose the purpose of writing a book if the book never tells you atleast some of the known truths. This book failed to offer new lesson.

The author try to tell us in slow and deliberate process there is no despotic government during his period. The extreme ruthlessness of his government including random killing around every corner of the cities in late 70's committed murder is to defend a revolution. The story he composed does not shield him from fact that the country was lived for almost two decade under the horrors of the dictatorships rule, in which the author was part of it. He was one of the mindless herds in Derg without regard for human life except cheering Mengistu Haile Mariam throughout the book for his short term survival. As Mengistu's power grewthe author was quietly working with him as others seemingly reasonable men are filtered out of the system, and PM Fikre Selassie has been promoted. We knew Fikre Selassie's superior Mengistu was a modern monster like Stalin or Pol Pot solely on the whims of himself that answers to no one. Under Mengistu's command, Derg always acted without conscience and had massacred a generation in his tyranny rule. He is nether willing to establish all inclusive democratic system, nor able to endthe civil war. What he left was the destruction of economic infrastructure and followed by ethnic based ruthless regime. This book justifies brutality as a means for "saving revolution". Furthermore, due to number of human rights violations including, detentions, extra-judicial killings, summary executions, maladministration and wrong policy, Derg lost in battle field the peasant army. The country became vulnerable, poverty wide spread, ethnic division increased, all those bad events happened because of Derg misguided "saving the revolution" idea. Below are comments limited to couple of author's stories, a) History of the farmers struggle, b) the revoltof the landowners in their own localities.

The History of the farmers struggle: Interestingly the author started beinga high priesthood of academia. On page 15 the author stated no peasants/farmers movement existed prior the revolution. The Bale's province farmer movement was done by outside conspirators and the Gojjam farmer's movements were insignificant. He further stated that the resistance of the farmers were exaggerated and used by individual they call themselves progressive. One can observe he did not bother to research it, he prefers to undermine and demonize the farmers protest. It is well known fact in both provinces as Emperor imposed new tax reform in 1967. Small or large farmers, ordinary peasant farmers alike rebelled tothe new tax reform. Due to these rebellion movements the Emperor was forced to halt the tax reform. Documented studies by researches under Africa Studies Series publication (Ethiopia: Power and Protest, By Dr. G.Tareke) with great detail evidence readily available confirming that peasants resistance exist prior 1974 EC revolution. It is understandable that none of the peasant's movement was capable of changing the feudal system. This is due to the movements were isolated and they lack of organizational skill to be as insurgent force. However, it is widely believed that the peasant movements contribute as one of the factor to eruption of1974 EC revolution.

The Revolt of the Landowners in their localities: The author claims armed rebellious in several localities against Derg was raised due to the new landreform proclamations. This is not really quite true statement. The case of patriot Dejazmatch Kebede Bizunehs ‘ s, that mentioned on page 197, could be an example to illustrate that his revolt is not related to land reform proclamation. Derg never bother to sort out or give credit to Ethiopian patriotic those fought against Italian invasion. Post liberation from Italian occupation some of patriots lived in exile in their own countryby the Emperor order due to opposition to his rule. They lived under constant threat by Emperor’s security force. It is widely known that after seeing the atrocious deed of the Italians, Dejazmatch Kebede is one of thepatriots fought the invasion to liberate Ethiopia. He has been recognized as war heroes since then. He was a religious person, and had no illusion as to the communist rule real intention and what mean to him and his fellow citizens. It is unreasonably to think when you are not allowed to practice religion, not allowed to have funeral to religious place, not havingfreedom of movement and other many others oppressive rules used undercommunist rules, it will trigger anger. Of course, Dejazmatch Kebede hadn’t benefited from Emperor Rule or given a large amount of land for his role against Italian invasion, due to his opposition to the Emperor repressive rule. So, he was not one of the large landowner, as book described him. He might have small land, but he resisted against a communist rule. Derg ordered their soldiers armed with heavy weapons, believing would bring this patriotic man to his knees. As you may guess aspatriotic lifestyle he never believed in surrender to his enemy. After fierce fight with Derg’s soldiers he killed himself. Interestingly he was sheltered and protected more than five years by his poor farmers he lived in.
Dejazmatch Kebede’s greatness will live on in history book.
The author has an attempt to legitimize Derg dictatorial rule. The search of solutions to root of all internal political conflicts, social, economic breakdown etc. were not dealt with democracy principle. It was dealt by brutal force. They continued to rule through sheer terror. As result, a period of relative peace and stability become a dream for all Ethiopians. The civil war consumed too many lives until Mengistu disgracefully surrender the country to a toxic single ethnic-based TPLF rule, and fled toZimbabwe with unspecified amount of Ethiopian people’s money.
In very few areas of the book, the author’s statements might possible fill agap of Derg’s history’s. But for those who passed through Red Terror and went through unbearable pain deserve an honest story, not story of spin. The author was castrated for 20 years for his involvement of the Derg’s crimes. A Prison term supposed to help the convicts to be rehabilitated and be truthful as they return to the society. Unfortunately, in my opinion his book has not reflected that. Fikre Selassie didn’t feel morally responsible for unspeakable violence done to countless displaced or killed people under Derg's rule. The country they left behind is in much vulnerable state that they have received. At least at this aged stage he is expected to show some remorse. Ethiopia political scene since Derg overthrow the Emperor, has brought the country nothing but miseries, and provided a path for repression and violation of human rights by ethnicblinded zealot.

ETHIOPIA/ERITREA: DEBATE - A bad day for a career diplomat'By Amare Lucas (January 21, 2014)

At first glance, I was inclined to ignore Mr. Shinn's article, posted on Ethiomedia on January 14th 2014 and throw it in a rubbish bin where itbelongs, as I did to Cohen's article. But, out of respect for the good Ambassador, I opted to challenge his article as I understand it.

However you slice it, the Ambassador's writing can be summarized as follows: A) Eritrean tyrant, Isayas Afewerki, is on the verge of his demise. He must be saved. B) Badme must be handed to Eritrea. As a "reward", Ethiopia gets access to Asab for a fee. C) America wants to mend its relation with Eritrea and have an Ambassador in Asmara. There is a hint there that David Shinn is a candidate for the post. D) Tigrigna speaking Eritreans are highly educated whereas Tigrigna speaking Tigryans in Ethiopia are uneducated and believed that they are looked down by the Eritreans. These four are the obvious ones. Later on, I will come to the notso obvious one, which the good Ambassador is trying to communicate with the Ethiopian people at large.

Now, let me start presenting my views on the four obvious ones:

A. If the Ambassador feels burdened and has the will and the means to save Isayas, all I can say is good luck. Obviously, the good Ambassador ismaking a 911 call on behalf of the Eritrean leader.

B. When it comes to Badme, the good Ambassador got it wrong. Mr. Ambassador, with all due respect, may I take the privilege to bring to yourattention, that the Algiers Agreement and the arbitration that followed it have been abrogated by Isayas and they are now null and void. Why? Because Isayas unilaterally dismantled, confiscated their heavy armaments and kicked out the UN peace keepers from their assigned post. Isayas also took back the 25 kilometers that was agreed upon to be a demilitarized zone. So, Mr. Ambassador, the arbitration that you and Cohen are singing is no more binding. Sir, you also suggested that Ethiopia be allowed to use Asab for a fee. How generous? Mr. Ambassador! Seriously, how naive can we be to be told that Country A pays the fee and Country B allows its ports? Isn't this a normal and customary thing that is practiced everywhere in the world? I suspect the good Ambassador is throwing this idea to divert us from the main issue.

Sir, like it or not, Assab is an Ethiopian port and it belongs to its true owner. The bloodshed will stop only and only when Ethiopia gets unfettered access to its port of Asab. Of course, I like to underline that my preference would be getting Asab through understanding, compromise, negotiation, and applying an international maritime law.

C. As far as American and Eritrean relation is concerned, it is the businessof the two countries. To achieve that, I don't think the good Ambassador needs to communicate via Ethiomedia. I believe American policy makers are a walk or a phone call away from Mr. Shinn. In short, if America has the urge to tango with Eritrea, I've no qualm with that, and, I might add, many Ethiopians could care less about it. But don't count on us that we will be a participating band to the melody. America's marriage and divorcewith Eritrea is none of our (Ethiopian) business.

D. This section is very interesting. Because I've never witnessed a career diplomat making such offensive, unwarranted, and undiplomatic statement as the Ambassador did. Mr. Ambassador, there is an Eritrean inyou that is manipulating your thoughts, if not out rightly commanding you. I don't need an MRI to see through you. It is very clear to anyone forno career Ambassador will inject himself and parrot the same exact wordsthat shaebia supporters frequently use. The question to you, Mr. Ambassador is: Why did you allow it and put your dignity on the line? By the way, we have seen a similar movie before. These same shabites have led the world to believe that Eritrean forces will annihilate the Ethiopian force and dine in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa at the end of the first day battle. And we all remember how that movie ended. Mr. Ambassador, your assertion of colonial contribution to the education of Eritreans doesn'thold water for the simple reason that the highest grade they were allowedwas grade 4. Besides, their 21 years history as a nation doesn't support the argument of a highly educated society. Mr. Ambassador, you felt at liberty to tell the world about the uneducated Tigryans in Ethiopia. Well, Mr. Ambassador, you and I need a brief question-and-answer session. How much have you read as opposed to being told about Tigray? Have you been to Aksum, Yeha, Gerealta, and other parts of Tigray? Have you ever read about the genius Aksumite, St. Yared? Our session won't end today. So, let me make it short. Looking at the monuments, underground palaces of King Kaleb, Gebremeskel, Ezana, Queen Sheba, the rock-cut churches all over Tigray----Would someone in his right mind dare to say what you said about the Tigryans? Mr. Ambassador, Christianity and Islamgot their footing in Tigray. The Ethiopian alphabet, literature, music, art, governance, and the first money in coins were all introduced in the then capital of Ethiopia, Aksum, which happens to be in Tigray. Simply put, Tigray is the beginning of Ethiopia and its civilization. Sir, I can present a long list of the many wonders and miraculous architects like Fasil in Gonder, the unparalleled rock-cut church of Lalibela in Wollo, and many more Ethiopian prides and early civilization testaments. But you chose to disparage the Tigryans and my focus for now will be Tigray. Mr.

Ambassador, why you chose to pick a fight with the children of Alula (truehistorians refer to him as the great general of Africa) is a mystery to me. To my understanding, your first name, David doesn't suggest to be that ofthose who were crushed by Alula at different battle fields. Blame me not! Sir, for I'm at loss to find your motivation. While I'm at it, let me say one thing about the Great Alula. Had his advice been heeded, the word Eritreawouldn't have made it to the English vocabulary, let alone evolve into a nation. Going forward, allow me to dissect the unobvious, but is more harmful and poisonous message that the good Ambassador wants to relay to the Ethiopian people. In plain- and- simple English language, he is telling us that there is great enmity between the highly educated Tigrigna speaking Eritreans and the uneducated Tigrigna speaking Ethiopians. These uneducated Tigryans are also at the helm of the Ethiopian state. So, the war is between the two and not between Ethiopia and Eritrea. After all, Badme is in Tigray. Why shed a blood for a Tigryan land? Let the Eritreanshave it. Nice try, Mr. Ambassador. It ain't going to work. Time and again, many Ethiopian enemies have tried the same crusade to no avail. Trust me, Mr. Ambassador; I am not in any way shape or form inferring that you are one of them. But, it is imperative, that once and for all, to make itabundantly clear that Tigray is the nucleus of Ethiopia. Tigray was, is, andwill be forever an Ethiopian. No ifs. No buts.

Mr. Ambassador, despite the unnecessary war of 1998 initiated by non- other than Isayas, and notwithstanding the emergence of an Eritrean state, those two Tigrigna speaking people are very much blood related. DoI need to prove that? For starters, Isayas is 75% from Tigryan parents, if not 100%. Most of his trusted aides and advisors are from 100 % Tigryan parents, and some are 50%. In case of Ethiopia, the late PM, Meles is 50% Eritrean. In his recent trip to the US, Sebhat Nega, one of the founders of the TPLF and its first chairman, (I suspect you two have probably met) had an interview with a radio-host in Washington, DC. Answering a question to the host, Sebhat unequivocally declared that he in fact has an Eritrean blood. He also confirmed that there are high government officials in Ethiopia, whose parents are fully of Eritrean origin,and there are some who are 50% Eritrean. It is simply an open book that even at the top of both governments, there are a lot of them that are the product of Tigryan and Eritrean origin. I'm not protesting or condoning it. I'm only telling it as it is. And, no one should be surprised by these seemingly confusing facts. Because, the fact of the matter is, Eritreans, especially the high-landers were part of Tigray before the Italian occupation. Mr. Ambassador, had it not been for the short-sighted, self-centered, and ego-driven leaders on both ends, these two Tigrigna speaking people are brethren that should never go to war. When I see millions of Americans parading and celebrating their Irish ancestry, that is,going back to a quarter million of years, it is not a tale-tale-story when I mentioned the brotherhood of these neighbors. Let me assure you that this isn't a display of nostalgia, but putting things in perspective. Be that as it may, what it is, what is on the ground. Thus, I accept the Eritrean's wish to have a state. What I won't accept is the mantra that Eritrea is for Eritreans only while Ethiopia is for Ethiopians and Eritreans. I admit I'm drifting from my main subject of today. So, let me get back to the subjectmatter at hand, and make my closing remark.

Mr. Ambassador, taking the initiative to tackle the lingering problem of two warring neighbors is a noble cause that is welcomed by all stake- holders. But I can't tell a career diplomat that neutrality, fairness, relevantinternational laws, and long sought solutions, among others, are the musthave tools to begin the journey. Rewarding a repeat offender isn't the wayto start that journey.

Having said that, Sir, inadvertently or not, you have become a willing partner of a mission to harm Ethiopia that, at least, to my knowledge washatched by Ambassador Cohen. The two of you are asking Ethiopia to endure the unendurable. My unsolicited advice to you, Mr. Ambassador, isto come clean and be the Ambassador, you are; be the professor, you are; be the gentleman, you are; be the dignified you are. You must not succumb to the endless and horny lies and tricks and allow yourself to be used as an appaloosa by Shabia operatives.

ETHIOPIA - Intel officers ask about 'answerability'

ESAT News: (January 21, 2014) - After the government held an evaluation regarding the leakage of information, disarray in information keeping and cyber intelligence, members of the intelligence have asked towhom they were answerable to. ESAT obtained audio supported evidence regarding the query from sources in the Intel office. High government officials and appointees also attended the meeting. The question was posed by Intel officers working under the Federal government and graduates of the Mekele Institute of Technology (MIT), an institute founded under the cover of MekeleUniversity during the period in office ofthe late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi.

"Is our responsibility protecting the security of the Nation or the political regime?" asked the officers. A senior government official responded saying"there is no Intel officer who also does not have political duties. From the outset, intelligence is a work of sustaining a regime in power and this is done by professionals. It requires one to trust the regime. One who believes in Ginbot 7 Movement's outlook and thinks that the regime should be removed through force, would disintegrate the system even if he is remarked for having the skills of Tesfaye Woldeselassie or was trained by Mossad for 20 years."

It was also discussed during the evaluation that there is a difference andfall out within the chain of commands of the Nationality and ImmigrationDepartment, Defense Intelligence, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Federal Police, Anti-Terrorism Taskforce and Information Network Security Agency (INSA). Some government officials have said that secrets of the government have been passed to third parties to the extent that it has become impossible to protect secrets. Intel officials that came from Oromia and Southern regions complained why there was a dominance ofone ethnic group within the Defense Intelligence. The official responded saying that balancing the Force was a long-term work.

Responding to the question that there is a rumour that Meles Zenawi waskilled by foreign forces, the official said Meles died due to “huge workloadand his inability to put up with the medical treatment”. In the mean time,five members of the Ethiopian National Intelligence and Security Service have been detained suspected of working and passing information with and to Ethiopian Satellite Television (ESAT). Mebrate Tamrat, Jemal Awol,Dejene Admas, Hailu Cherkos, Capitan Assefa Abraha have been detained by securities. Similarly, students and intelligence heads found in the 28 universities of the Country have started an evaluation meeting. It has been decided during the evaluation that Aksum, Debre Tabor and Debre Birhan Universities have witnessed huge protests thus should be under stringent Intel surveillance.

Japanese prime minister Abe meets Ethiopian running heroes'

AFP News - Japan's prime minister Shinzo Abe has kicked off a visit to Ethiopia by meeting the country's running stars. The Japanese premier received a gift from the son of late barefoot marathon legend Abebe Bikila, winner of the Tokyo Olympic marathon 50 years ago. "My name isAbe, but everybody teased me at school, calling me Abebe," Mr Abe said."Many Japanese marathon runners would actually collapse after the race but when I saw Mr. Abebe actually stretching afterwards, it was such a surprise, even for a 10-year-old."

The prime minister was presented with a photo of Bikila winning Olympic gold in Tokyo, a gift from the late legend's son, Yetnayet Abebe. "Today I had the opportunity to meet famous athletes from Ethiopia as well as the son of Mr. Abebe, as well as wonderful children boys and girls who will oneday be gold medalists, or who will one day be winners at the 2020 Tokyo Olympics and Paralympics," Mr Abe said. Abebe Bikila died in 1973 from complications caused by a road accident four years before, and remains one of the great icons of running, especially in Japan. The Japanese prime minister also met with Ethiopianfemale road and track stars Meseret Defar, Tiki Gelana, Derartu Tulu andIbrahim Jeilan. Mr Abe is on the final stop of a tour of Africa, including Ivory Coast and Mozambique, hoping to boost ties and business relationson a continent that has become a key trading partner with China.

ETHIOPIA/SUDAN: Border demarcation controversy with Sudan has nolegal backing – official'

ESAT NEWS: (January 22, 2014) - An Ethiopian government official said the border demarcation controversy between Ethiopian and Sudan has nolegal backing but moral and social questions. The official said this during an evaluation and meeting of Intel officers and high government officials.The official said the demarcation process started in 1965 between the then Ethiopian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr. Minase Haile and his Sudanese counterpart Jaafar al-Nimeiri and has been lingering since.

He said based on the complaints received that the Sudanese have passed the Ethiopian border line of Guwi, a committee had been formed which has not yet conducted any form of border demarcation. The official said ona recent high level meeting Sudanese officials came up with a new suggestion. The Sudanese said "you can still hold the land. We will protectthe rights of your citizens. But at least in terms of principle, accept and confirm that the land belongs to us."

The Ethiopian official told the officers that if one checks out his mobile apparatus near the borders of Ethiopia and Sudan such as Berehet in Tigray or Armachiho near Gonder it shows you that you are in the Sudan. So you may fake politics but not the science, he added. He also said that recent reports that Armachiho has been given to Sudan is wrong but someSudanese police officers do at times sneak in to the border towns of Ethiopia start havoc but our militias do not hold down rather they do not even consider the Sudanese soldiers as 'soldiers'.

He said it does not mean that we can take hold of anything that our eyes see in fact if we want to do so we can even capture Khartoum. The officialasserted that the border demarcation has not at all started so far. The online news source, Sudan Tribune, had reported quoting the region's administrator in 2007 that a large chunk of land had been given to the Sudan.

Mandela's Long Walk to Ethiopia'

BY JOSEPH HAMMOND, ((JANUARY 23, 2014)

As a founder of the ANC's armed wing, Mandela was deeply drawn to Ethiopia. His time there tells us a lot about the young leader. The death ofNelson Mandela last month elicited tributes from around the globe as the life of the man who negotiated with South Africa's apartheid rulers to bring about majority rule. But despite the commemorations focusing on his capacity for forgiveness in the 1990s, and his ability to make peace with the regime that had imprisoned him, the Mandela of the early 1960s was a very different man. He was a guerrilla, not a peacemaker, and in 1961 had co-founded the armed-wing of the African National Congress (ANC), the Umkhonto we Sizwe (MK) or 'Spear of the Nation'.

To truly understand Mandela, we must understand this earlier part of hislife. And to understand this earlier part of his life, we must examine his attraction to Ethiopia where he spent time as a revolutionary. Numerous references to Ethiopia appear in his various memoirs, and a new film willbe based around his time there. Since Mandela's passing, a degree of controversy around his time in Ethiopia has also emerged, coming from an unlikely source. Shortly after his death, a story in the Israeli newspaper Haaretz reported that Israel's secret intelligence agency Mossad had clandestinely trained Mandela. As evidence, Haaretz quoted part of a letter by a member of Israeli embassystaff that describes Mandela. "He greeted our men with 'Shalom', was familiar with the problems of Jewry and of Israel and gave the impressionof being an intellectual. The staff tried to make him into a Zionist," it reads.

While the Nelson Mandela Foundation has questioned the authenticity of the letter, there is no doubt Mandela was indeed familiar with Jewish and Israeli issues. In his autobiography Long Walk to Freedom, Mandela wrotethat he "read The Revolt by Menachem Begin and was encouraged by thefact that the Israeli leader had led a guerrilla force in a country with neither mountains nor forests, a situation similar to our own."

However, while the exact role of Israel and Mossad in Mandela's life remains under scrutiny, there is no doubt that Ethiopia – the African kingdom that successfully resisted colonialism, save for a brief Italian occupation from 1936 to 1941 – held a particular allure for Nelson Mandela and many African nationalists of the period. Until he was eclipsedby Mandela, it could be argued that Emperor Haile Selassie was Africa's most famous politician of the 20th century. Even in the US, African American publications frequently covered Haile Selassie, and he later became the living god of the Rastafarian religion, though history has not been kind to the emperor, partly thanks to Ryszard Kapuściński's famous The Emperor: Downfall of an Autocrat, with many now remembering him as the ruler who spent his time feeding the pride of lions he kept in his palace, indifferent to domestic affairs.

Meeting the Ras: Nevertheless it should not be forgotten the Selassie of the 1960s was an ardent Pan-Africanist, and it was in Addis Ababa that the Pan-African Freedom Movement for East, Central and Southern Africa(PAFMECSA) was hosted in 1962. PAFMECSA was the forerunner of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU), which was in turn the forerunner of today's African Union.

In Long Walk to Freedom, Mandela recalls his excitement on visiting Ethiopia. He notes that the prospect of seeing Ethiopia always intriguedhim more than visiting Europe or America, writing that "Ethiopia has always held a special place in my own imagination… I felt I would be visiting my own genesis, unearthing the roots of what made me an African."

Mandela, 43 at the time, experienced a cultural shock when he boarded the Ethiopian Airlines flight from Khartoum to Addis Ababa to find an Ethiopian pilot at the controls. “How could a black man fly an airplane? But a moment later I caught myself: I had fallen into the apartheid mind- set, thinking Africans were inferior and that flying was a white man’s job. Isat back in my seat, and chided myself for such thoughts. Once we were in the air, I lost my nervousness and studied the geography of Ethiopia, thinking how guerrilla forces hid in these very forests to fight the Italian imperialists.”

Entering Addis Ababa, which he calls the Imperial City, in February 1962, Mandela’s vision of Ethiopia was, for the moment, shattered: “a few tarredstreets, and more goats and sheep than cars. Apart from the Imperial Palace, the university, and the Ras Hotel, where we stayed, there were few structures that could compare with even the least impressive buildingsof Johannesburg,” he writes.

Today, most roads are paved and covered in cars, especially the city’s ubiquitous shared taxis, though the city’s skyline is still somewhat spartanwhen compared to the skyscrapers of Johannesburg. Time though has been less kind to the Ras Hotel: in one corner stands a haggard stuffed lion while women of the night cast around the lobby for potential customers. Outside, the revolving door, touts and beggars wait to pounceon tourists under a portico next to the neighbouring book-vendor selling Amharic and a few English books including a knockoff copy of Kapuściński’s The Emperor. The Ethiopian ‘national cuisine’ served in the downstairs restaurant is, however, as good as any in the city.

Another change from when Mandela first visited the city is that a room onthe Third Floor has since been turned into a veritable shrine to the man himself, albeit one that is available for hire, while the third floor is now The Mandela Floor. A larger than life image of a grey-haired Mandela greets visitors from the top of the stairs followed by a photo of Robben Island on the door to the Mandela room. The three-chambered suite is modest by today’s standards but would have seemed lavish in the early 1960s, the heyday of the hotel when it was graced by many notables.

Mandela met many of these at the 1962 PAFMECSA conference, but it wasEmperor Selassie – whom Mandela asked for help raising funds, a crucial part of the ANC’s revolutionary cause – who made one of the biggest impressions. As he later recalled in Conversations with Myself: “That was an impressive fellow, man, very impressive. It was my first time to watch… a head of state going through the formalities… the motions of formality. This chap came wearing a uniform and he then came and bowed. But it was a bow which was not a bow – he stood erect, you see, but just brought down his head.”

He later observed Selassie at a military parade. At the time, Ethiopia wasa US ally, and US military advisors at the occasion paid their respects to the emperor, leading Mandela to note: “to see whites going to a black monarch emperor and bowing was also very interesting.” The US was oneof just six countries to never recognise the Italian occupation of Ethiopia and the two states were enjoying warm relations at the time of Mandela’svisit. In 1957, then US Vice President Richard Nixon visited Ethiopia and hailed the kingdom as “one of the United States’ most stalwart and consistent allies.”

Arming up: After the conference, Mandela left Ethiopia to continue his wide-ranging fundraising tour, visiting Egypt, Mali, Tunisia, Guinea, Sierra Leone, Liberia, Senegal and the UK. Habib Bourguiba of Tunisia was a particularly strong supporter, donating £5,000 (which is around $150,000 in today’s money) to Umkhonto we Sizwe for arms. En route, Mandela alsoreceived some training in guerrilla warfare from Algerian rebels in Morocco.

However, as agreed, Mandela soon returned to Ethiopia for military training. The ANC had offices in Cairo and Accra, but neither Nasser’s Egypt nor Nkrumah’s Ghana had a military versed in guerrilla warfare. However, in deciding to train in Ethiopia rather than a Warsaw Pact country or China, Mandela was openly branding the armed portion of theANC struggle as African and moving the ANC’s position away from the Soviet Union, a policy that might have influenced him to meet with the Israelis.

Ethiopia, whose military had multiple veterans of the guerrilla war againstthe Italian occupation, also possibly presented Mandela with the best opportunity to learn the military skills necessary to lead Umkhonto we Sizwe. He planned to spend half a year receiving training on weaponry, tactics and leadership. ANC’s armed wing had already launched a series ofsabotage attacks in South Africa so instruction on mines, sabotage and explosives was also given. Mandela’s training included live fire exercises with both Eastern bloc and American made weapons. And Mandela’s instructors were Colonel Biru Tadesse, Colonel G.E. Bekele and LieutenantBefikadu Wondomu; Wondomu, a former fighter, led the physical training while Tadesse lectured Mandela in the philosophy of guerrilla warfare. Therecently-emerged Israeli government letter implies Mandela was trained by someone referred to as “the Ethiopian”, which could mean some of Mandela’s instructors were linked to the Israelis.

Indeed, Israel was keen to cultivate good relations with the non-Arab countries in Africa at the time, though later, as African liberation movements came to be dominated by communist elements, this policy shifted slowly to an awkward security relationship with the apartheid South African government.

Biniyam Mengistu, a tour guide and local historian in the southern Ethiopian city of Harrar, believes Mandela received some of his instructionin Harrar. If this is true, it was perhaps Tadesse who invited him to visit this important city in Ethiopian east. The region's main inhabitants, the Oromo people, are Ethiopia's largest ethnic group, and Tadesse eventuallylaunched his own guerrilla war against the state four years later in the name of Oromo nationalism. In 1975, he was executed having been arrested by the Duerg government.

To this day, the time Tadesse spent with Mandela is source of pride for Oromo nationalists. A grainy photo of him in uniform standing next to Mandela can be found on many Oromo nationalist websites and the OromoNational Congress (now the Oromo Federalist Congress) originally named itself after Mandela's African National Congress.

The way of the gun: In the end, Mandela's time in Ethiopia only lasted a few short weeks before it was decided that he was needed in South Africa.On the orders of Haile Selassie, Tadesse gave Mandela a Bulgarian-made Makarov pistol and 200 rounds of ammunition before his trip home. He was also issued an Ethiopian passport under the name David Motsamay ("the walker").

After arrival in South Africa, Mandela was smuggled to the Liliesleaf Farmin north Johannesburg, an important ANC safe house. But as the noose around the fugitive tightened, he decided to bury the pistol. Digging a 1.5metre pit not far from the farm's kitchen, he wrapped the weapon and itsammunition in foil and placed the stash, along with his military uniform, under a tin plate. Arrested days later, he never returned for the weapon.

However, Mandela did return to Ethiopia decades later in 1990 to addressthe OAU in Addis Ababa. This meant meeting Mariam Mengistu, Ethiopia'sbrutal dictator who had ruled Ethiopia directly or indirectly since 1974.

During Mengistu's rule, more than 2 million Ethiopians were murdered ordied of starvation, and with the Soviet Union on the verge of collapse, Mengistu beseeched Mandela to visit and provide him with a small propaganda victory.

Perhaps reluctantly, Mandela agreed to the short visit whilst already on a trip to Tanzania. Coarse footage from the period shows the veteran Mengistu beaming as he honours Mandela, yet it is Mandela who appears the statelier figure. When Mengistu was overthrown the next year, he fledto Zimbabwe and even briefly visited South Africa in 1999 to receive medical treatment. Mandela's government flirted with turning him over tointernational authorities but Mengistu soon returned to Zimbabwe where he has kept a low profile ever since.

Old friends: Mandela's time in Ethiopia provides insight into the man andhelps place the ANC struggle in its broader African context. It further illuminates his commitment to armed struggle, making his later role as peacemaker all the more revealing. In recognition of the importance of this period in Mandela's life, a new major film slated for release this year will focus on his African travels and guerrilla training in Ethiopia. Directed by John Irvin, the film, called Mandela's Gun, will see Tumisho Masha playMandela – making him the first South African to play Mandela in a major film.

Ethiopia has never forgotten its links to Nelson Mandela, and in 2011, for example, 2,300 trees were planted around Addis Ababa in his honour on the Second Annual International Nelson Mandela Day. The pistol that Mandela received in Ethiopia meanwhile has never been found. Mandela provided further information about its probable location on a visit to the farm in 2003, and in 2011 excavations began on the site to locate the lostpistol, but it has remained elusive Reesonable Chances of dialogue with Ethiopia will improve Eritrea GDP forecast: The Economist'
Editor's Note: Recent reports of President Omar Al-Bashir's offer to mediate Eritrea and Ethiopia over their border dispute has been received very well by many. That also followed by several open letters written by prominent members of the US foreign policy establishments calling for animproved relation between Eritrea and the United States. The Economist Intelligence Unit (EIU) in its executive summary on Eritrea (see below) states that there is a reasonable chance over the forecast period that Eritrea and Ethiopia will start discussion over their strained relation and that will factor into an improved GDP forecasts for Eritrea.

January 24, 2014: STAPLE "TEFF GRAIN":
An Ethiopian Staple is set to be the World's Next Super Food
Teff grows predominantly in Ethiopia, as well as Eritrea, and has been oneof the basic staple food for people of these nations for thousands of years.Teff is a small grain, about the size of a poppy seed, it comes in a variety of colors, from white and red to dark brown.

The name Teff is derived from the Amhraic word "Teffa", which means "lost", highlighting the minute size of the grain. Teff generally thrives in waterlogged soils, making it a dependable staple wherever it is grown. Nomatter what the weather, teff will likely survive, and is also relatively freeof plant diseases compared to other cereal crops.

In Ethiopia, one of the main uses of teff is to make "injera", which lookslike flat bread. But, after some years of studying teff, scientists say this tiny seeds are the world's next "big super food."

According to reports, the grain can substitute for wheat flour in anythingfrom bread and pasta to waffles and pizza bases. Like the Andean grain,quinoa, teff's superb nutritional profile offers the promise of new and lucrative markets in the west. Teff has an excellent balance of amino acids, it is also gluten free and high in protein, calcium, and iron.

The rapid rate of immigration from Ethiopia and Eritrea is considered oneof the main factors that has led to the introduction of teff to the western world. Most people have described the need for injera among Ethiopian and Eritreans as an addiction, therefore as the number of these immigrants have grown in the western world, so has the supply of teff.

Royco International is one of the main distributors of teff in North and South America, as well as in Australia, New Zealand and some parts ofAsia. The company introduces teff as an exciting alternative to flour in pancakes, snacks, breads, cereals and many other products, especiallythose created for the gluten-free market.

Although the demand for teff in the international market is currentlybooming, exporting teff is banned by the Ethiopian government.

According to United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization's 2013 report, the export market is currently very small (less than 0.5 percent ofproduction) and this is mainly due to the ban on teff export. But many observers say this grain may be the next top earning export for Ethiopia and Eritrea in the coming years.

General Electric plans to establish an assembly plant in Ethiopia'
The Reporter, Addis Ababa, Ethiopia - (January 25, 2014) - The US-basedmanufacturing giant, General Electric (GE), is planning to establish a medical equipment assembly plant in Ethiopia. Reliable sources told The Reporter that the US multinational company is planning to assemble various medical equipment and machines in Ethiopia and distribute them to African markets. "They are contemplating to build a light assembly plant in Addis Ababa and export them to different African countries. Theywant to use the extensive cargo flight network of Ethiopian Airlines," sources told The Reporter.
The amount of the investment and specific list of items the company wants to assemble here are not yet known. GE's chairman and CEO, Jeffrey Immelt, is scheduled to visit Addis Ababa next week. During his one-day visit Immelt is expected to sign an investment agreement with the Ethiopian government for the assembly plant. The CEO will meet Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, Debretsion Gebremichael(Ph.D.), Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Information Technology and Communications, Tedros Adhanom (Ph.D.), minister of foreign affairsand other senior government officials.
In addition to the medical equipment assembly plant project, GE's chief will discuss the possibility that the company could engage in power and transport infrastructure development projects. Sources said GE is known for human resource development. “There are a number of CEOs working in different successful multinational companies who once were trained andemployed by GE,” sources said. Senior vice president for human resources, Susan P. Peters, will accompany the CEO to Addis Ababa. Susan Peters, will give a two-hour lecture at the Addis Ababa University,Faculty of Business and Economics. Susan Peters leads GE's human resource department responsible for 300,000 employees worldwide.

Jeffrey Immelt, as part of his Africa tour, will visit Ethiopia, Kenya, Mozambique and Nigeria. The CEO will start his visit in Addis Ababa wherehe will stay only one night.

Executives of GE have been negotiating with the Ethiopian Electric PowerCorporation (EEPCo) to secure a contract on the electro-mechanical workon the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) project. GoE also has akeen interest to engage in the railway development project in Ethiopia.

Particularly, the company focuses on the electrical part of the railway projects. General Electric has a strong partnership with Ethiopian Airlines and has been supplying aircraft engines to Ethiopian. Ethiopian Boeing B787-8 Dreamliner and B777 aircraft are powered by GE engines. During his stay in Addis Ababa, Jeffrey Immelt will visit the headquarters of Ethiopian. The company has different wings including energy, health, home and business solutions, transportation and finance and is known for manufacturing aircraft engine, home appliances, locomotives and crude oilextracting machines.

Professor Paulos Milkias - Open Letter to former US Ambassador DavidShinn'

On proposal to give Badme to Eritrea and for Ethiopia to use Assab

ETHIOMEDIA (January 25, 2014) Ambassador Shinn's proposal to solve the Ethiopian –Eritrean conflict that led to a war between the two in 1998-2000 – a war which consumed the lives of over 70,000 people and displaced close to a million people boils down to one thing: Eritrea gets everything; Ethiopia gets nothing.

On the practical side, let us get the facts straight. The decision to boycott the use of the port of Assab was in the first place Ethiopian. Meles at that time said "If Ethiopia does not use the port of Assab, the port of Assab willnot be a port; it will be a watering hole for camels!" The bitter truth is thatEritrea has been bankrupted more than it already was by Ethiopia's refusalto use Assab.

Ethiopia was hurt not because it stopped using the port of Assab. Ethiopiawas hurt when the TPLF/EPRDF handed over Assab which was administered as a region of Wollo province during the Haile Selassie period and an autonomous region during the time of the Derg to its EPLF ally. In hindsight, one should not forget that both former U.S. President Jimmy Carter and former U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, Herman Jay Cohen had testified later that their warning that Ethiopia should keep an outlet to the Sea was rejected out of hand by the

TPLF/EPRDF Hence, Ethiopia lost its seacoast and went on the GuinnessBook of Records as the “largest land-locked country” on the planet!’

The other side we need to look at is International Law. After all, as Ambassador David Shinn who has been in the foreign service for so long and has taught political science at a well-known American university for years knows, with respect to the legitimate use of a port, the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea accords Ethiopia the right of access and the freedom of transit not only through Assab but also throughall the ports of Eritrea including Massawa.

Article 125 of the Convention states:

Landlocked states shall have the right of access to and from the sea for the purpose of exercising the rights provided for in this Convention including those relating to the freedom of the high seas and the common heritage of mankind. To this end, landlocked states shall enjoy freedom oftransit though the territory of transit states by all means of transport.

United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, of 10 December 1982

Ethiopia was hurt a second time when in 1998, Eritrea invaded Ethiopian territory (the U.N. had determined that) and Ethiopia which won the war and was only 10 miles away from Assab failed to take over the port because the late Prime Minister, Mr. Meles Zenawi ordered the Ethiopian army not to advance and occupy it. Had that been done and the Afars empowered to decide by a referendum whether they wanted their territoryto be part of Eritrea or part of Ethiopia, as anybody can guess, the outcome would have been clear. The Afars would have chosen their motherland, Ethiopia.

In the absence of a settlement, Ethiopia would have continued the occupation and Eritrea could not have done much. For this, we do not even need to mention the six day war and its aftermath in the Middle East. It is to be remembered that the TPLF/EPRDF, also caved in and accepted the Algiers’ agreement. This treasonous act made Ethiopia whichbecame the victor (thanks to the undaunted valour of its martyrs,) act likea loser, and receive a skewed verdict. But Meles and his group insisted onoccupying Badme all the same, pending further negotiations and there wasn’t much Isaias could do other than arming various opposition groups and Al-Shabab to ruffle the feathers of the EPRDF. There should be no surprise about the TPLF/EPRDF decision. Badme, which they hedged on handing over happens to be part of Tigray in contrast to lands in Western Ethiopia that are slated to be ceded to the Sudan as recent reports have indicated.

Isaias, as a survivalist smart cookie knows another adventure would behis ultimate demise. Even the TPLF friends would not have mercy uponhim a second time around. So, in brief, I urge Mr. Shinn to be even handed in proposing a solution if he is really interested to see peace between the Habeshas who inhabit both countries and are currently “officially divorced but going through an excruciating experience to separate” as the Eritrean scholar Prof. Dr. Tesfatsion Medhanie of BremenUniversity puts it in his monograph Towards Confederation in the Horn of Africa, 2007.

RESEARCH: Like Quinoa, the Andean grain, Ethiopia’s Teff poised to benext big super grain’

UK Guardian: Mounds of teff dry in fields in Ethiopia. The gluten-free grainis used to make flour for injera, the national dish. Photograph: Julio Etchart/Alamy. At Addis Ababa airport, visitors are greeted by pictures of golden grains, minute ochre-red seeds and a group of men gathered around a giant pancake. Billboards boast: “Teff: the ultimate gluten-free crop!”

Ethiopia is one of the world’s poorest countries, well-known for its precarious *food*security situation. But it is also the native home of teff, a highly nutritious ancient grain increasingly finding its way into health-foodshops and supermarkets in Europe and America.

Teff‘s tiny seeds – the size of poppy seeds – are high in calcium, iron and protein, and boast an impressive set of amino acids. Naturally gluten-free,the grain can substitute for wheat flour in anything from bread and pasta to waffles and pizza bases. Like quinoa, the Andean grain, teff’s superb nutritional profile offers the promise of new and lucrative markets in the west.

In Ethiopia, teff is a national obsession. Grown by an estimated 6.3 millionfarmers, fields of the crop cover more than 20% of all land under cultivation. Ground into flour and used to make injera, the spongy fermented flatbread that is basic to Ethiopian cuisine, the grain is central to many religious and cultural ceremonies. Across the country, and in neighbouring Eritrea, diners gather around large pieces of injera, which doubles as cutlery, scooping up stews and feeding one another as a sign of loyalty or friendship – a tradition known as gursha.

Outside diaspora communities in the west, teff has flown under the radarfor decades. But growing appetite for traditional crops and booming health-food and gluten-free markets are breathing new life into the grain,increasingly touted as Ethiopia’s “second gift to the world”, after coffee.

Sophie Kebede, a London-based entrepreneur who, with her husband, owns Tobia Teff, a UK company specialising in the grain, says she was “flabbergasted” when she discovered its nutritional value. “I didn’t know itwas so sought after … I am of Ethiopian origin; I’ve been eating injera all my life.”

The gluten-free market is the backbone of Kebede's business. Today, Planet Organic shops in London stock 1kg bags of Tobia Teff flour (£7 each), while 300g packets of its teff breakfast cereal sit alongside milledflaxseed and organic, sugar-free Swiss muesli, and cost £5.44 The company also sells readymade, gluten-free teff bread with raisin, onion,sunflower and other varieties. (Teff is available at*other UK stockists*).

As western consumers acquire a taste for teff, how to ensure that Ethiopiaand its farmers benefit from new global markets is a critical question.

Growing demand for so-called ancient grains has not always been a straightforward win for poor communities. In Bolivia and Peru, reports of rising incomes owing to the now-global quinoa trade have come alongsidethose of malnutrition and conflicts over land as farmers sell their entire crop to meet western demand.

Ethiopia's growing middle class is also pushing up demand for teff, and rising domestic prices over the past decade have put the grainout of reach of the poorest. Today, most small farmers sell the bulk of what they grow to consumers in the city.

This may have helped boost incomes in some rural areas but it has had nutritional consequences, says the government, as teff is the most nutritionally valuable grain in the country. Estimates suggest that while those in urban areas eat up to 61kg of teff a year, in rural areas, the figure is 20kg. The type consumed differs too: the wealthy almost exclusively eat the more expensive magna and white teff varieties; less well-off consumers tend to eat less-valuable red and mixed teff, and morethan half combine it with cheaper cereals such as sorghum and maize.

The Ethiopian government wants to double teff production by 2015. Its strategy, published in 2013, argues that the grain could play an importantrole in school meals and emergency aid programmes, and help reduce malnutrition – particularly among children and adolescents.

It notes that teff is also gluten-free, so it is well suited to address growingglobal gluten-free demand, and calls on companies to start testing, promoting and mass manufacturing teff-based products such as cakes andbiscuits.

Though Ethiopia has a fast-growing economy, it remains on the UN's listof least-developed countries. An estimated 20% of under-fives are malnourished or suffer stunted growth, and the UN's World Food Programme estimates the costs of chronic malnutrition could be worth 16.5% of GDP.

The government's agricultural transformation agency aims to boost yieldsby developing improved varieties of the grain, along with new planting techniques and tools to reduce post-harvest losses.

The Syngenta Foundation, the non-profit arm of the Swiss seeds andpesticides company, has also joined the quest for increased teff production.

Government restrictions, instituted in 2006, forbid the export of raw teff grain, only allowing shipments of injera and other processed products. Butthis could change: the goal is to produce enough teff for domestic consumption and a strong export market, according to the government's strategy.

In Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital, dozens of women painstakingly siftand mill teff at the factories of Mama Fresh Injera, one of the few domestic companies that exports teff products.

Fresh factory in Addis Ababa. The family firm has set its sights on thegluten-free market in the west. Photograph: Elissa Jobson

Mama Fresh is a family firm that has been selling injera to top restaurantsand hotels in the Ethiopian capital for years. It also ships the flatbread to Finland, Germany, Sweden and the US, primarily for consumption by diaspora communities. But the company has its eye on the gluten-free market. It aims to double exports to America in 2014, and will soon start producing teff-based pizzas, bread and cookies.

David Hallam, trade and markets director at the UN's Food and AgricultureOrganisation, says while there is money to be made from new global markets for traditional crops, governments have to support small-scale producers to ensure they share the benefits of increased trade.

"Typically, these products are going to go through many hands before they reach the shelves of Sainsbury's or wherever. There are [profit] margins at every step, and small farmers are not necessarily well placed to bargain with the bigger traders," says Hallam, who sees quinoa's popularity as a cautionary tale of how export opportunities can be a mixedblessing for poor countries.

Regassa Feyissa, an Ethiopian agricultural scientist and former head of thenational Institute for Biodiversity, warns that without careful planning, increased teff production for export may displace other important crops for farmers. And efforts to boost production could benefit business interests at the expense of small farmers.

With little Ethiopian teff on the international market, farmers in the UShave started planting the crop. Farmers in Europe, Israel and Australiahave also experimented with it.

Kebede says she gets her grain from farms in southern Europe, thoughshe would prefer to source it from Ethiopia. "Teff is second nature to anEthiopian; so who better to supply it? We have this sought after grain being grown in the country, so why can't an Ethiopian farmer benefit fromthis?"

Professor Minga Negash – "A reply to Ambassador Herman Hank Cohen's 'Time to bring back Eritrea from the cold' EM Commentary (January 26, 2014) - Many observers agree that recent unfortunate developments in the Middle East can easily spillover to the Greater Horn of Africa region. There are groups that are fanning ideologies advanced by the various actors in Middle East's sectarian conflict. In the light of the new developments in the region, it makes sense for the United States to review its relationship with Eritrea and Ethiopia and rebalance its portfolio.The interesting question for Eritrea and Ethiopia is therefore how to respond to the apparent shift in superpower policy towards the region. In this rejoinder I review the recent articles that were written by two former Ambassadors, examine the difficult areas in the relationship between Eritrea and Ethiopia, and outline the options that are available for Ethiopia.

On December 16, 2013 Ambassador Hank Cohen, the Former Assistant Secretary of State for Africa wrote an important article, "time to bring back Eritrea from the cold". Between 1989 and 1993 Ambassador Cohen drove the United States' policy towards Africa. He not only witnessed the birth of new states in Europe after the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 but also in the Horn of Africa. The birth of the State of Eritrea was a concomitant event that took place with the takeover of the rest of Ethiopiaby the rebel forces of the Tigrean People Liberation Front (TPLF). On January 13 2014 Ambassador David Shinn, the Former United States' Ambassador to Ethiopia also wrote a commentary supporting Ambassador Cohen's piece. Ambassador Shinn drove United States' policy towards Ethiopia during the 1996-1999 period. His term of office was also characterized by another historical episode. Despite the radical change in Ethiopia that was supported by Eritreans and the United States, the conflict between Eritrea and Ethiopia resurfaced again and consumed closeto 80 000 people. Ambassador Princeton Lyman, the Former United States' ambassador to Nigeria and South Africa also supported Ambassador Cohen's piece and enumerated his effort to bring back Eritreaout of the cold. The articles have sparked intense debate. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Ethiopia has also responded . In short, the authors of the pieces are witnesses and have the institutional memories of the events that were unfolding in the Horn of Africa. The series of articles thatcame out in a short period of time suggests that Washington might be rethinking its policy towards the region and the lobby industry is at work. Notwithstanding these, their continued engagement on the Horn of Africa will also help to reflect on the achievements and failures of the past, and more importantly help in charting the roadmap for sustainable peace and development in the region.

Ambassador Cohen’s article contains two central issues. His first point isthat the sanction against Eritrea must be lifted because there is no evidence which incriminates the country to be "a state sponsor of terrorism". As flabbergasting as it may sound, as Professor Jack Derridanotes “a text is not a text unless it hides from the first comer, from the first glance, the law of its composition and the rules of its game”. Derrida’s analogy is similar to the Eritrean-Ethiopian q’ene, a form ofphilosophical enquiry commonly referred to as the wax and the gold.

Ambassador Cohen has been successful in hiding the gold in the wax. Thetask of critical enquiry is to find the gold. At face value, in the wax, the article is just an addition to the chorus for the removal of the sanctions which have seriously undermined development efforts in Eritrea.

Ambassador Cohen’s second key message relates to the relationship between Eritrea and Ethiopia. Here there are many tricky issues which theHonorable Ambassador appears to have either hidden them in his wax or totally missed them. What is hidden in his piece is his call for the continued landlocked-ness of close to 90 million people in the Horn of Africa. Many agree that the TPLF/EPRDF has made a bad mistake on threeoccasions:- (i) during the time of the war for the separation of Eritrea, (ii)during the 1991-93 period, and (iii) at the end of the 1998- 2000 war.

Even today the TPLF dominated Government of Ethiopia is still proud of itsmistakes. The recent statement of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Ethiopia did not raise the problem of Ethiopia’s landlocked-ness. Evidentlythis policy can change at any time. Except those that are dependent on the Government of Eritrea, Ethiopians including the new breed of TPLF/EPRDF are unlikely to condone a policy that has created the largest landlocked country in the world. Ambassador Cohen neither separated thegovernment of the day from the country nor did he identify the incentivesfor Ethiopia for accepting the decision of the Eritrea-Ethiopia Boundary Commission (EEBC) nor did he outline how Ethiopia’s landlocked-ness is going to be resolved.

The “free port” offer by Eritrea which is also echoed by Ambassadors Cohen and Shinn does not adequately address Ethiopia’s economic, geopolitical and security interests. In other words the interest of the United States and the interest of Ethiopia are not necessarily the same. Most commentators on the issue consider the “free port” offer as one of the diplomatic gamesmanships which were played in the 1991-1993 period. Visionary diplomats and scholars of substance must be able to observe beyond what ordinary politicians see. The fact that the Government of Ethiopia has not yet put the landlocked-ness issue on thetable shows the policy error of the government of the day, but cannot beconstrued that Ethiopia has permanently abandoned its right over Assab.In this respect, Ambassador Cohen wrote the following;-

“To break the stalemate between Eritrea and Ethiopia over the implementation of the EEBC decision, there needs to be a mutually face-saving solution. I propose that Ethiopia offer to accept a symbolic initialtakeover by Eritrea of territory awarded by the EEBC, followed by the same day opening of dialogue with a totally open agenda".

It is important to note that the EEBC was established based on the AlgiersAgreement, and Ambassador Cohen exonerates Ambassador Anthony Lake (National Security Advisor, 1993- 97), who was one of the architectsof the Algiers Agreement. Ambassador Cohen wrote the following:-

"They [EPLF and TPLF/EPRDF] maintained a common economic system that allowed landlocked Ethiopia full access to the Eritrean Red Sea portsof Asab and Masawa, including control of their own handling facilities for the transit of cargo…Under Algerian Government mediation, a cease-fire was accomplished in 2000. In view of the border as the ostensible main issue in contention, the Algerians established the Ethiopia-Eritrea BorderCommission (EEBC) to arbitrate the exact boundary line. While the EEBCwas doing its work, the long border remained heavily armed on both sides".

Ambassador David Shinn's article echoed Ambassador Cohen's statement.In fact Ambassador Shinn's piece narrated already known events and did not address the thorny issue of landlocked-ness. Hence, like Ambassador Cohen's piece Ambassador Shinn's rejoinder has created a rare situation of irritation on both the pro TPLF/EPRDF and anti TPLF/EPRDF. camps.

II) To understand the issues better, it is important to take a step back andexamine the foundations on which the EEBC was created. It is also important to note that in practical-institutional terms the Algiers Agreement has been rejected. For instance in a letter that was written on April 2, 2002 about 289 Ethiopian scholars and professionals sent petition to Ambassador Kofi Annan, the Former Secretary General of the United Nations. Countless demonstrations and political gatherings were held in the major cities of the world. It was and more than likely to remain an election issue in Ethiopia. Scholars objected Article 4(1) and Article 15 of the Algiers Agreement. The problematic articles in the Algiers Agreement read as follows:-

Article 4 (1):-

Consistent with the provisions of the Framework Agreement and the Agreement on Cessation of Hostilities, the parties reaffirm the principle ofrespect for the borders existing at independence as stated in resolution AHG/Res. 16(1) adopted by the OAU Summit in Cairo in 1964, and, in thisregard, that they shall be determined on the basis of pertinent colonial treaties and applicable international law.

Article 15:-

The parties agree that the delimitation and demarcation determinations ofthe Commission shall be final and binding. Each party shall respect the border so determined, as well as territorial integrity and sovereignty of theother party.

For the petitioners of the April 2, 2002 letter the outcome of the EEBC wasas expected. Irrelevant and non-existent colonial treaties drawn from the archives of colonizers were used to support Eritrea's claims. The context on which the OAU agreed to the colonial boundaries was not examined.

Furthermore, the Government of Ethiopia presented its case poorly. Even within the frameworks of colonial treaties, the August 2, 1928 Italo- Ethiopian Treaty also known as the Italo–Ethiopian Treaty of Friendship and Arbitration, and the new pan African thinking, such as the Nile Basin Cooperative Framework Agreement, which openly rejects colonial treaties,were not considered. Hence, the central question now is whether Ethiopia should be forced into honoring a verdict that was founded on a faulty instrument and continue to remain landlocked? While Ethiopians may blame their naïve leaders for failing to observe the traps in the above technical agreement, the country's silence cannot be construed as an ipso facto acceptance of landlocked-ness.

Despite the absence of clarity in the latest statement of the Government of Ethiopia, there are a number of justifications for nullifying the Algiers Agreement. First, as a sovereign country, international agreements do notnormally become law unless they are ratified by the national parliament.

Eritrea did not and still does not have a parliament that is worthy of its name. In Ethiopia the situation is different. However defective it might be,there has been a parliament that routinely ratifies international treaties. Itis also interesting to note that the House of Peoples Representatives did not formally ratify the Algiers Agreement. In fact what the House of Peoples Representatives did is exactly the opposite. Though it accepted the EEBC's decision "in principle" perhaps a face saving mechanism, the house put five point peace-plan which effectively killed the implementationof the EEBC's decision. Hence, one does not need to be a constitutional expert to observe that the Algiers Agreement is dead, and there is no wayof resuscitating it.

The political cost of Article 4(1) and Article 15 for the TPLF dominated government has been incalculable. Soon after the petition by Ethiopian scholars, the TPLF had a major split, leading to the eventual sacking of theMinister of Defense, the Governor of Tigray, the Chief of Staff of the Army and the Commander of the Air Force. Fourteen years after the end of hostilities, the port issue is simmering within TPLF/EPRDF file and the broader political landscape. In other words, landlocked-ness is accepted only by the TPLF elite and its old guard. Sources within TPLF/EPRDF indicate that what has not been agreed is how to "bring back" Assab/Eritrea and not whether Ethiopia/Tigrai should continue to remain landlocked.

First, the disputed areas are inland territories. Second, the EEBC's ruling was not based on the analysis of social, cultural and political constructs. Itdid not consider the right of the people in the contested areas to express their wishes through a referendum. Though not recognized by the international community the referendum in the oil rich region of Abeye (disputed region between Sudan and South Sudan) provides a good example of how border demarcation is not just a colonial legacy and cartographic problem. Third, it did not learn from the colonial history that shaped the map of the rest of Africa (See for example the map of West Africa where several countries are designed in such a way that they have access to the sea through their own coastlines.) Fourth, Figure 1 also shows that the port of Assab is just about 70 kilometers (43 miles) from Ethiopia's border town of Bure. In other words the arbitration commissiondid not consider the economic, political and security consequences of its decision. Therefore, its decision can never be a source of sustainable peace. In this respect, in a document entitled approaches to solving territorial conflicts, the Carter Center notes that:-

"..Territorial disputes are notoriously difficult to resolve peacefully and enduringly. The outcome of adjudication on border issues is unpredictable,and political leaders are often unwilling to accept the risks of losing territory. Arbitration or mediation (nonbinding arbitration) provides a more flexible and balanced way to reach a satisfactory outcome, but their finality also makes politicians nervous."

Furthermore, a closer examination of the geopolitical map of the region and the ethnic map of Eritrea reveal additional information. It is interesting to note that the Dankalia region in which both ports are located is inhabited by an ethnic group which shares the same values withthe people in the Afar State of Ethiopia and the second largest population group in Djibouti. There is also strong historical and religious tie between the inhabitants of low land Eritrea and the Middle East. Similarly the Tigregna speaking people in Eritrea share similar cultural and religious values with the people in the Tigrai State of Ethiopia. In terms of the areathat is occupied by each ethnic group in Eritrea, Tigre'e and Afar peoples occupy the bulk of the country while Tigrigna speakers though live in the smaller and densely populated highland areas they are the majority. The ramifications of these similarities and differences for peace, regional stability, cooperation and governance require a separate work.

III) As noted earlier the balance of power in the Middle East is changing and this change has a potential to spillover to the Greater Horn of Africa (including Yemen and the Red Sea region). Hence, in considering new relationships in the Horn of Africa, one has to examine factors that are beyond colonial treaties and cartographic lines. One needs to focus on realissues. As far as the importance of Assab to Ethiopia is concerned, a number of articles, books, statements have been written especially after the separation of Eritrea. For a more comprehensive analysis of the economic implications see “Landlocked-ness as an Impediment to Economic Development in Ethiopia: A Framework for a Durable Solution” by Getachew Begashaw, Ethiopian E Journal for Innovation and Research Foresight, Volume 5 No.1. For a perspective from international law and diplomacy, see the book by Yacob Haile Mariam, in Amarigna, Asseb Ye Man Nat? YeEthiopia YeBahir Ber Tiyaqie, Atafzer Press. Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 2011. For a perspective about the United Nations decision to federate Eritrea with Ethiopia, and an eye-witness account of the events between1941-1963 see Ye-ertra guday, in Amarigna, by Zewde Retta, Central Printing Press Addis Ababa 1992 EC. For an Eritrean perspective tothe relationship between Eritrea and Ethiopia, see the works of Tesfatsion Medhane, Aleme Eshete, Tekeste Negash, Bereket Habte Selassie, the EPLF’s version of the struggle for independence ("Gedli") and Yosef Gebre Hiwot.

Notwithstanding the debate in each country, one important point that is yet to happen is that independent and honest scholars of substance from both countries need to find a way of replacing the Algiers Agreement with a visionary document. At present the debates are polarized and when theyoccur they appear to be more of publicity works. The Eritrea-Ethiopia friendship networks in the diaspora might be genuine efforts to heal the wounds on both sides but are unlikely to resolve the problems of landlocked-ness as many of the networks lack capacity and independence.The quest for an innovative solution that is forward looking needs to be supported by the governments of Eritrea and Ethiopia. Below I outline the action spaces that appear to be available to the Government of Ethiopia.

The options are not mutually exclusive. Which one of the options will be selected depends on the situation, and sounds a good setting for game theory based negotiation models. A similar analysis for Eritrea enables theformulation of the set of feasible solutions.

Option #1: Accept the EEBC’s decision

In a short response to Ambassador Shinn’s article Professor Paulos Milkiascorrectly indicated that this option “boils down to one thing: Eritrea gets everything; Ethiopia gets nothing”. In practical institutional terms the Cohen-Shinn proposal means going back to the situation before the 1998-2000 war, with few rearrangements of the “disputed” border with Ethiopiagiving back Badema and the other “occupied territories” in exchange for a“free port”.13 This option would not be acceptable for a number of reasons including but not limited to the fact that Every landlocked country in the world has access to the sea through a “free port” arrangement. Hence, Eritrea will not be making any substantive concession. In fact as Professor Paulos Milkias reminded his readers Article 125 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, of 10 December 1982 already gives Ethiopia the right to use theports in the region, including the ports in Eritrea.

Comparison of the military, economy, governance and educational variables indicate that the two countries are not very different from oneanother, but most indicators marginally favor Ethiopia. These variables influence the outcomes of negotiations.

Though more expensive than Assab, there are a number of competingports (including dry ports) in the region, and Ethiopia has managed tosurvive landlocked-ness in spite of higher than normal transportation costs.

Accepting this option legitimizes the landlocked-ness of 90 million peoplepermanently;

The proposal ignores the changing security and geopolitical situation inthe region.

There are a number of arguments that work against Eritrea's claim of sovereignty over Assab and almost the entire sea coast is inhabited by Afars who appear to have grievances against the Government of Eritrea;

The free port option creates jobs and investments for Eritreans and makesmarginal reduction in transport cost for Ethiopia, and hence the economic benefits from this arrangement largely accrues to Eritrea;

In the event of a crisis within Eritrea Ethiopia's military will be forced toenter into Eritrea to protect the "free port"

Throws the ruling party in Ethiopia into deeper political difficulty.

Therefore the proposal suggested by Ambassador Cohen and supported byAmbassador Shinn has a number of difficulties which makes it a non- starter for Ethiopia.

Option #2:-Continue the current policy

The "no war no peace" situation is a de facto rejection of the EEBC's decision, apparently by both sides as Eritrea too has expelled the UN peace keeping force. Implicit in this policy is that both parties are waiting for change of policy or leadership/regime change in the rival country. Thispolicy has forced Eritrea (i) to put its entire population on a war footing, the impact of which is serious; and (ii) harboring/arming a variety of dissident groups from Ethiopia. The "no war no peace" policy has also forced Ethiopia to move its core army to the front lines, reciprocate by supporting dissident groups from Eritrea and providing shelters to Eritreanrefugees. The continuation of this policy evidently hurts both Eritrea and Ethiopia but the severity of the hurt is being felt more in Eritrea than inEthiopia.

Option #3:-Support regional nationalisms

Eritrea is openly supporting ethno-nationalist movements that are againstthe Government of Ethiopia. It is also supporting groups that have grievances about the 2005 failed election. In the context of Eritrea two regional nationalisms are known to exist. The first is the Tigrai-Tigrignu political construct. The second is the Afar movement; which has relevanceto the problems of Ethiopia's landlocked-ness. If the Government of Ethiopia pursues a policy of supporting Afar movements in Eritrea, the policy has the potential to break up present day Eritrea into highland and lowland on one hand, and resuscitates the politics of the 1950s and the 1980s. If the people of Afar elect to have their own independent state, since Afars control the over 1000 kilometers long of seacoast, Ethiopia could recognize that and negotiate closer association with the new Afar State.

However, this option requires careful thinking as(i) Eritrea is also reciprocating and the conflicts are essentially proxy wars; (ii) the behaviorof the new state of Afar towards Ethiopia can be worse than the behavior of the Government of the day in Eritrea; (iii) the break-up of Eritrea is notnecessarily in the interest of Ethiopia; (iv) the region can be another fertile ground for those who fan the Middle East conflict in the Horn of Africa; and (v) the success of the policy would be very much dependent on how China, Russia, Britain, France and the United States take the emergence of yet another new country in the Horn of Africa.

Option #4: Start afresh and try to make a new comprehensive treaty withEritrea

If a referendum was the solution to the type of relationship that Eritrea and Ethiopia should have we have tried it twice and it has not worked. Thetwo decisions of the United Nations (December 1950 and April 1993) did not lead to peace and stability. The Algiers Agreement and the decision of the EEBC have not worked. Hence, the ideal form of association between the two countries is yet to be found. In this respect, the scope of the Italo-Ethiopian Treaty of 1928, also known as the Italo–Ethiopian Treaty of Friendship and Arbitration, a key agreement not considered by the EEBC and the United Nation, can be a starting point. Wikipedia states that "the treaty declared a 20-year friendship between the two nations, access to the sea for Ethiopia, a road for Italy, and an agreement to settle future disagreements through the League of Nations." More specifically the treaty"provided a concession to Ethiopia at the Red Sea port of Asseb in the Italian colony of Eritrea, called for the two nations to co-operate in building a road between Asseb and Dessie, stated that the border betweenItalian Somaliland and Ethiopia was twenty- one leagues parallel to the Benadir coast (approximately 73.5 miles)".A friend who has read the document told me that the agreement involved a small tract of land at theport, and at a price of one "dollar".

Expanding the scope of the 1928 agreement, Eritrea and Ethiopia can enter into a long term irrevocable contract that has duration of say 100 years, at a token price. Evidently the negotiation will have to take cognizance of present day realities and future trends. President Isayas does not have the military might of Benito Mussolini of Italy to dominate or intimidate and eventually capture Ethiopia. Here if there is the political will on the part of the TPLF/EPRDF, Ethiopia might have the strength to demand the full control of a sizeable portion of the coast as this gives the country the opportunity to secure the port areas. This type of agreement though is rooted in colonial time, it can be modernized. The advantage forEthiopia is that it resolves the problems of landlocked-ness and eliminatesthe risk emerging from instability in Eritrea or the foreign occupation/intervention of the region.

For Eritrea the long term irrevocable contract provides peace. It is a start of several confidence building measures for a renewed association between the two countries. It is also a face saving mechanism for the political leadership. Eritrea will not be threatened by successive Ethiopian regimes. The country can be a conduit for trade and tourism. Places of worships can be interconnected once again and social-cultural relationshipcan once again have their golden days. The country does not have to spend on defense and security as it is doing now. Furthermore, Eritreans nationalists will be able to understand the problems of landlocked-ness, and also learn from other historical incidences:- Namibia and South Africaover the Walvis Bay, and United States and Panama over the Panama Canal are examples. It can share revenues from joint activities, and may negotiate to get arable land in the interior region. In other words the opportunities for cooperation are infinite. If the relationship changes for the better, at the end of the agreement period, Eritreans may want to have another referendum to form a union with Ethiopia. Starting afresh with a comprehensive agreement paves the way for the normalization of relations.

This option however is more than likely to face resistance from military strategists in Ethiopia as they might see it as a weak strategy to resolve Ethiopia's landlocked-ness. It must also be examined against the backdropof Ethiopia's rejection of Somaliland's proposal for closer form of association between the two countries so that Ethiopian can upgrade and use the Ports in Somaliland. Added to the list of port options is the proposal of building a dedicated port for Ethiopia at Tajura (Djibouti).

Option #5 Find a military solution to the problem of Ethiopia's landlocked-ness

Invading the Dankalia region of Eritrea, where the ports are located, remains an option for Ethiopia's military strategists. The international reaction to Ethiopia's effort to reverse its landlocked-ness is untested and the Government of Ethiopia has not yet indicated interest in the port of Assab. Notwithstanding this, analysts agree that unlike the year 1998 the Ethiopian military is in a much better shape now. Furthermore, it does notdepend on the United States for its supplies. The top brass of the army is Tigrean dominated and is familiar with the topography of Eritrea. The military's combat readiness however needs to be guided by political will onthe part of the TPLF/EPRDF and diplomatic support from China, Russia so that the United States and France's interests in the region are balanced with Ethiopia's interests. However, this option is not without problems:- (i) it raises Eritrean nationalism; (ii) the invasion is more than likely to bring in third parties (example Egypt, Iran, Palestine, Saudi Arabia, etc.) into the conflict; (iii) the United States (with its drones in the region) and France are unlikely toopenly support this move; (iv) even if the Ethiopian Defense Forces succeed in the capturing of Dankalia or indeed the entire country, pacifying the region and making it economically active will not be easy.

Military expedition of some sort however may make more sense in theunlikely event of a major civil war in Eritrea or the country allows its territory to be used by countries that are hostile to Ethiopia.

IV) In conclusion, there are a number of options that are available to theGovernment of Ethiopia. Identification of the options that are available tothe Government of Eritrea requires a separate work. For Ethiopia, the least attractive is the option #1, the option supported by Ambassadors Cohen and Shinn. Option #2 is the current situation, which is better for Ethiopian than option #1. A win-win situation can be found around option#4 if Eritrea offers a better deal than Djibouti, Somaliland, Somalia, Kenya and the Sudan. That suggests that Eritrea needs to consider the voluntary loss of sovereignty over Assab. Option #3 has the potential to break up Eritrea and taking cue from the experiences of Somalia and South Sudan it is undesirable. Option #5 involves force and depends on how the military wants to settle the matter. Finally one might like to ask what the international community and the United States can or cannot do. What are the roles of China and Russia inthe geopolitics of the region? Is it too difficult to convince the powers thatthe Algiers Agreement and the EEBC decision were not fair to Ethiopia andits 90 million people? What are the lessons from the inactions and mistakes of the past, and how can one undo the damages are important conversations that are waiting to happen.

Credit Suisse approves $1.4 billion loan for Ethiopian Railway project'

The Reporter Addis Ababa, Ethiopia - (January 26, 2014) - The Harro market railway project secured a loan facility in the past week for USD 1.4billion from Credit Suisse, a Switzerland-based financial group. The line stretches from Awash to Weldia, both in the Amhara Regional State, and is part of the national railway project that extends from Mekele, the capital of the Tigray Regional State, to Djibouti, via Semera, in the Afar Regional State.

The loan agreement will be signed on Wednesday (29) by officials from Credit Suisse and the Ministry of Finance and Economic Development (MoFED), sources told The Reporter. Nine delegates from Credit Suisse recently met with professionals from the ministry to discuss the possibilityof accessing a loan, with the two sides also deliberating on interest rates and the best way to service the deal. According to sources the board of directors at Credit Suisse has already approved the loan facility ahead of the signing ceremony this week.

The loan will be used for the line that stretches through Awash to Weldia (Harro Market), part of the larger railway project that runs from Mekele via Weldia and Semera, to Port Tajura in Djibouti. Turkish company Yapi Merkezi secured the contract for the construction of the 389kms Awash toWeldia section, estimated to have cost USD 1.7 billion. Credit Suisse will provide USD 1.4 billion, with sources indicating the Ethiopian governmentwill cover the difference of USD 300 million. This is the first time that Credit Suisse has financed a project in Ethiopia, but sources revealed the Swiss multinational will actively participate in funding American and European corporations if they commit to undertake large developments inEthiopia. It was reported that the China Communication and ConstructionCorporation (CCCC) has secured construction for the Mekele to Weldia part of the rail line.

This project, estimated to cost some USD 1.5 billion, is financed by the Chinese EXIM bank and covers some 260kms. The section that stretchesfrom Mekele to Port Tajura, Djibouti, covers a total distance of 675kms, and is expected to link the northern part of the country to the central, inaddition to neighboring markets such as South Sudan.

PRESS: Ethiopia legalise Gay marriage in bid to end drought'

N*ewsbiscuit* ByJamesM0316 - In a drastic attempt to exploit a religious loophole, Ethiopian President Mulatu Teshome yesterday announced plansto fast track a change in legislation which would legalise gay marriage in the predominantly Christian country, in a last ditch attempt to end drought. The decision was made following talks with UKIP councillor DavidSilvester, who recently blamed the UK’s winter floods on the government’sdecision to legalise gay marriage.

In a statement made last night, a spokesman for Mr Teshome said; ‘when Mr Silvester of UKIP confirmed that the recent floods in Henley-on-Thames were a punishment from the Lord, we realised we'd been doing it all wrong for all these years. We've been praying for water as reward for following the religious doctrines, but now it makes sense to use the wrathof the Almighty to our advantage and give gay marriage the green light'

ETHIOPIA: US Congress Takes a Historic Stance Against Land Grabs-Related Forced Evictions'

የአሜሪካ ህግ አውጪአካል (US Congress)የነባር ዜጎችን ከመሬታቸው በማፈናቀል በልማት ስም የኢትዮጵያመንግስት የሚፈፅመውን ሰብዓዊ መብት ረገጣ በመቃወምአሜሪካ ለዚህ ስራ የሚውል እርዳታ እንደታቆም ወሰነ ።

." ምን ፍጭ Oakland Institute, Oakland, CA (January 27, 2014) - In a historic move, the US Congress has taken a stance on land grabs-related human rights abuses in Ethiopia. The 2014 Omnibus Appropriations Bill contains provisions that ensure that US development funds are not used to supportforced evictions in Ethiopia. The bill prevents US assistance from being used to support activities that directly or indirectly involve forced displacement in the Lower Omo and Gambella regions. It further requires US assistance in these areas be used to support local community initiatives aimed at improving livelihoods and be subject to prior consultation with affected populations. The bill goes further and even instructs the directors of international financial institutions to oppose financing for any activities that directly or indirectly involve forced evictions in Ethiopia.

According to Anuradha Mittal, Executive Director of the Oakland Institute,"We welcome this move as it aims to address one major flaw of US assistance to Ethiopia. The step taken by the US Congress is very significant, as it signals to both the Ethiopian government and the US administration that turning a blind eye to human rights abuses in the name of development is no longer an option."

Several reports from the Oakland Institute have raised alarm about the scale, rate, and negative impacts of large-scale land acquisitions in Ethiopia that would result in the forced displacement of over 1.5 million people. This relocation process through the government's villagization scheme is destroying the livelihoods of small-scale farmers and pastoralistcommunities. Ethiopian security forces have beaten, arrested, and intimidated individuals who have refused to relocate and free the lands forlarge-scale agricultural plantations.

Ethiopia's so-called development programs cannot be carried out without the support of international donors, primarily the US, one of its main donors. Oakland Institute's on-the-ground research has documented the high toll paid by local people as well as the role of donor countries such asthe US in supporting the Ethiopian policy.

With this bill, USAID, the State Department, as well as the World Bank,will have to reconsider the terms and modalities of the support they provide to the Ethiopian government. According to Frederic Mousseau,

Oakland Institute's Policy Director, "This is a light of hope for the millionsof indigenous people in Ethiopia who have sought international support from the international community to recognize their very destruction as communities and people."

CUSO International - Out of the 3,700 Ethiopian Doctors, 3000 Have FledThe Country'

Global Voices: Stemming the African brain drain

TIMES COLONIST Analysis: (January 28, 2014) CI - Last year the Canadian health-care system managed to save $400 million — by poaching trained doctors from the poorest and most vulnerable communities in the world. A recent study by the University of Ottawa indicates that even as Canadian aid programs help Africa to build better health-care systems, our health-care system is taking away their doctors.

According to Canada-based CUSO International, between 1990 and 2006,Ethiopia trained 3,700 doctors. Only 700 of them stayed to work there.

Africa's health-care system isn't the only sector hemorrhaging skilled workers — there are more African-born engineers and scientists living inCanada and the U.S. than in all of Africa.

It's called brain drain. In 2000, there was a panic in Canada when reportssuggested we were losing as many as 65,000 of our citizens every year tothe U.S. It turned out that, for the most part, Canada was gaining as many professionals as it lost.

Africa has not been so lucky. The International Organization for Migrationestimates that Africa has lost more than 460,000 educated professionals since 1990.

When the African Union marked its 50th anniversary, stemming theAfrican brain drain was identified a top priority.

African leaders hope to mitigate the brain drain by recruiting expatriateAfrican professionals to return home for a visit and lend their skills as short-term volunteers on development projects. CUSO International is working with the African Union on such a project.

Endashaw Inoldie, an Ethiopian-Canadian and recent CUSO volunteer, explained that using expatriate volunteers can be cheaper and more hassle-free than using Canadian-born volunteers because they can hit theground running.

US seeks Ethiopian accountability to secure it's aid –SMNE'

SMNE (January 28, 2014) Is United States policy towards Ethiopiashifting?

Washington, DC - For years Ethiopians, social justice groups, human rights organizations and civic groups have been calling on donor countriesto demand greater accountability from the Government of Ethiopia for funds received, citing the lack of political space, endemic injustice, the repression of basic freedoms and widespread human rights crimes; however, now, the people of Ethiopia have reason to expect that the climate of impunity is changing.

The United States House Appropriations Committee has included stringentnew requirements of accountability from the Government of Ethiopia in a section of the new 2014 bill that directly addresses Ethiopia. (Please referto the sub-section of the bill below.) It links the release of U.S. funds designated for Ethiopian military and police forces to Ethiopia's implementation of corrective policies that would address the declining state of human and democratic rights in the country, including in the Somali Region of Ethiopia where access to the area must be given to human rights and humanitarian organizations. New steps are also to be required that would document actions taken by the government "to investigate and prosecute members of the Ethiopian military and police who have been credibly alleged to have violated human rights." This is commendable because it is the accountability we have been calling for since the investigations following the Gambella massacre. The names are there but what has always been missing is the impartial judicial system.

The law also prohibits funds appropriated to Ethiopia under the headings, "Development Assistance" and "Economic Support Fund" that are available for the lower Omo Valley and the Gambella region to be useddirectly or indirectly in the forced evictions of the people. Rather, it is to be used to "support initiatives of local communities to improve their livelihoods" and requires that these initiatives "be subject to prior consultation with affected communities."

Additionally, it requires the Secretary of the Treasury "to instruct the United States executive director of each international financial institution,like USAID (United States Agency for International Development), the World Bank and the IMF (International Monetary Fund), to oppose financing for any activities that directly or indirectly involve forced evictions in Ethiopia." This means in any area of the country. Finally the people of Ethiopia have been heard. The United States' decision, as the largest donor to Ethiopia, will make a difference; hopefully, other donor countries will follow.

If this had been a jury hearing, the burden of proof would have been established. We want to thank those on the House Appropriations Committee for including this in the bill. We also want to thank those in the House and Senate who are responsible for passing this section of the bill, finally pressuring the Government of Ethiopia to be more accountable for its use of U.S. taxpayer funds and more accountable to its own citizens.

Others within the U.S. House, like Congressman Christopher Smith, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Africa, should also be lauded for his continued work which is still in process. Reportedly, that bill will call for democratic reforms in Ethiopia and is a result of the House Sub-committeehearing on Ethiopia last June.

We also want to recognize the work of many different organizations and individuals who have contributed to this outcome through advocacy, research, investigation, documentation, appeals, legal actions, organizingand networking. Such efforts take commitment, resources, perseverance and time, but eventually these efforts can become the leverage necessaryfor meaningful changes in Ethiopia, like have been accomplished after years of work in countries like South Africa, Chile, and Ghana.

This should encourage Ethiopians and those fighting for reforms in Ethiopia to do more and to not give up. Even with this new law in place,individuals, communities and organizations—both Ethiopian and non-Ethiopian—are critically needed to monitor the situation on the ground; otherwise, compliance may only be rhetoric or on paper. We are hopefulother countries will follow suit.

We know donor countries have a history of aligning with Ethiopia, despiteits democratic failings, because it has been the most stable country in a neighborhood of failing and failed states; however, overlooking its deficiencies has weakened its prospects for sustainable stability, increasing the risk that simmering tensions and ethnic divisions within thecountry could erupt into ethnic violence that could destabilize the entire region. On the other hand, due to Ethiopia's strategic position in the Hornof Africa and its central importance to Africa, a more democratic Ethiopia could offer much to the continent as well as to global partners. Internal corrections will move the country in the right direction.

Over the coming year or more leading up to the next election in Ethiopia, Ethiopians must be working hard to press for the opening up of greater political space, the implementation of meaningful reforms and engaging inmore dialogue across lines of isolation and alienation. This means that reconciliation efforts must come to the forefront. It is a time for truth- tellers, reconcilers and agents of change. This cannot be left in the hands of a few. Yes, Ethiopians should be grateful to those supporting the passage of this bill and for those advocates of freedom, justice and humanrights in the world who have helped us and continue to do so;

however, ultimately, with God's help, we Ethiopians must free ourselves.

For those within the TPLF/EPRDF- led government who may not initially bepleased with this new bill or the one being advanced by the House, we encourage you to think forward to an Ethiopia that has a place for both "our children" and "your children" only because meaningful reforms were implemented. Come to your senses. Let us implement it with genuine diligence. We the people will do our share. We urge you to do the same.

The freedom we envision in a New Ethiopia is not only for those living under oppression, but it is also for those who are doing the oppressing for“no one is free until all are free.” If meaningful reforms are to happen, wemust start talking with each other rather than about each other, even if we disagree. Let us start the discussions with the following critical issues which have kept our country in shackles:

- Release political prisoners and journalists
- Repeal the Anti-terrorism law
- Repeal the Societies and Charities Proclamation
- Open up political space and restore basic freedoms such as ofexpression, association and religion.
- Re-establish an independent media and judiciary

No society is at peace until the basic rights of all of the people are observed; not given to only a few based on someone’s favored ethnicity, gender, political viewpoint, religion or other distinction, but given equally because we are all human beings, given life, dignity and value by our Creator God. The New Ethiopia has to start in the hearts, souls and mindsof the people, not only of the oppressed, but also of the oppressor. This new bill requiring more justice for all people in Ethiopia is a gift to all of us! Let us use this God-given opportunity for the common good of the Ethiopian people of today and tomorrow!

SMNE Washington DC: A copy of the sub-section of the House Appropriations Bill of US 2014: AFRICA (p. 1294) SEC. 7042’ News updates - The recent bill of the US sub-section of the House Appropriations on Ethiopia has pleased many other pan-Ethiopians. Thiswill be an additional driving force for diaspora Ethiopians to push their host countries to follow the US foot steps, as it has been already said.

Though, every one have to push other countries follow the steps taken byUS, say lead activists.

ECONOMY: World Bank Sponsored Study Uncovers Rife Petty Corruption inEthiopia'

Addis Fortune (January 29, 2014) - The first draft of the World Bank sponsored corruption study comes out pointing fingers at petty corruptionin various government institutions, while playing down the impact of grand corruption. The power, tax, investment and transport sectors have been identified as having the highest level of corruption, according to a draft finding by a study under the Federal Ethics & Anti-Corruption Commission (FEACC).

Employees of the Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation (EEPCo) have beenidentified by the study as being front-runners in asking for unofficial payments, with an average of 10 bribe requests for a single respondent inthe study. The EEPCo is also the organisation with the highest average number of foreign companies seeking its services. Traffic police, on the other hand, have asked more of the respondents for bribes than any ofthe entities surveyed, according to the report.

The draft report, which included the responses of 350 foreign investors, took two and half months to produce. The final report is expected to be released a month after the World Bank approves its finalisation, accordingto the guidelines. “Around 16.6pc of the respondents reported a total count of 370 requests with an average of six bribe demands per respondent,” said the draft study released on Thursday, January 25, 2014,at the Hilton Hotel, under the title “Perception of the Level of Corruption by Foreign Investors in Ethiopia”.

Six percent of the respondents also reported that employees of the Ethiopian Revenues & Customs Authority (ERCA) had asked them for money- a total count of 54 times for customs licenses and 49 times for taxinspection. The findings of the draft study, nevertheless, indicated that grand corruption is not a threat to Ethiopia, as none of the respondents reported confronting it.

“Petty corruptions exist in almost every office,” said Ameha Diana, director general of Selam Development Consultants Plc, which conducted the survey. “With only some institutions standing out in level of corruption, Ethiopia is freer than several other countries as far as corruption is concerned.” Judges and court officials, employees of standards and safety offices, those in the water and sewerage agency and the state telecommunications company, Ethio telecom, have also been identified as asking for bribes.

Employees involved with customs and trade licenses, land acquisition, licensing authorities and tax agencies, as well as government procurementhave not been immune to allegations of bribery. The results reveal that employees in these agencies are collecting bribe money ranging from 5,000 to 7,000 Br.

“These employees can get paid a maximum bribe of 20,000 to 50,000 Br,” the draft study said “The Commission’s strategic focus areas are taxation and revenue collection, the justice sector, procurement in major infrastructural projects, land administration and financial management,” Wedo Atto, the deputy Commissioner, said in his opening remark at the launching of the draft study.

Back in 2012, the second nationwide corruption survey, which was commissioned by the Commission and conducted by a Tanzanian-based US company, Kilimanjaro International Corporation (KIC), disclosed that aconsiderable number of the public had to make extra payments in the form of gratification to public institutions. The judiciary, law enforcement community, municipalities and the ERCA were identified as the places most people perceived as being prone to corruption and inefficient public service delivery, according to that survey.

The Commission, nevertheless, wants more than one research to point tosimilar problems before it takes any measures, says Berhanu Assefa, Director of Ethics Education & Communication Affairs. The World Bank (WB), Department for International Development (DFID), Embassy of theKingdom of the Netherlands and the Canadian International DevelopmentAgency (CIDA) collaborated with the FEACC in conducting the latest survey.

“An Ethiopian-Canadian can share their experience in the field and have no problem with language or cultural shock,” he told us. Inoldie fled political upheaval in Ethiopia in 2001 to study sociology at the University of Western Ontario in London. He became a career adviser in Edmonton and Fort McMurray, Alta., before volunteering with CUSO and returning in2011 to Ethiopia. There, he helped build a database to connect Ethiopian hospitals and universities with skilled diaspora volunteers from North America.

Inoldie was better equipped to handle work on the ground than his roommate, a Canadian aid worker with no Ethiopian roots, volunteering atthe Ethiopian department of education in the capital of Addis Ababa. The roommate had to inform Ethiopians in communities around the capital about a new English language program, but between his rudimentary Amharic, Canadian accent and inability speak any local dialects, few couldunderstand him.

Inoldie received a desperate phone call from his roommate, who asked forhis help as a translator.

Members of the African diaspora who can’t afford to take time off to volunteer can still share their skills with their homelandwithout leaving the comfort of their adopted western home. Tech companyHewlett-Packard and the United Nations agency UNESCO have partnered on a project called the Brain Gain Initiative that uses cloud computing technology to link researchers at African universities with expatriate scientists abroad.

As an example: using remote sensors and Internet technology, Cameroonian expat Christophe Bobda, an engineering professor at the University of Arkansas, works with Emmanuel Tonye at Yaoundé University, in Cameroon’s capital, to study air pollution in African cities. Helping African nations use the talents of their diaspora populations for development mitigates the impact of the African brain drain. But this is not a long-term solution. To prosper, Africa must keep her brilliant children home. And developed nations like Canada have a role to play here, too. For a start, we must address the issues in our own health-care system that requires us to draw so many health professionals from developing countries where they are needed more.

UNESCO suggests that building African centres of academic excellence —such as the African Institute for Mathematical Sciences, which we wrote about last fall — will create opportunities that entice Africa's brightest minds to stay home. African nations, for their part, must improve wages and living conditions so home becomes the land of opportunity for native-born doctors, engineers and scientists. For donor countries like Canada, applying some of our aid dollars to support professional retention programs in developing countries would be a wise investment in the long-term progress of Africa.

ETHIOPIA/SUDAN – Ethiopian lady raped by a gang of six Sudanesedetained'

ESAT News: (January 29, 2014) - ESAT has managed to obtain a video clip that shows an Ethiopian lady named Kedria Endris being sadistically raped by a gang of six Sudanese youth; the lady is under police custody inSudan. Arega, the Head of Diaspora Section at the Ethiopian Embassy in Sudan, has admitted that the lady has been 'raped' but he said higher officials need to give him permission in order to give much information.

The lady had contacted the youth in October last year looking for a place to rent. The youth, promising to find her a place took her to a room wherethey sadistically raped her, fooled around her naked body and also video recorded their acts. Embassy insiders told ESAT that the Sudanese government that has been worried of its own images has detained Kedria in Morgan Police Station; the Embassy official said the lady is in a good condition. The Sudanese Court is attempting to protect the State from being responsible by blaming the victim of not reporting the incident whenit happened. Kedria says she did not immediately report the assault because the perpetrators had warned her that they would kill her if she reported it.

ESAT could not speak to Kedria as she has been barred from speaking to anyone. Those who want to speak to Kedria in prison are required to bringa special letter from the Ethiopian Embassy; some human rights groups that had wanted to visit her in prison have been unable to do so as they could not obtain the letter from the Embassy. Some of the perpetrators have been detained while many are still not yet apprehended. Although the Ethiopian Embassy in Sudan has been saying that it is following the issue closely; it has not so far been able to get the lady freed from detention. ESAT has learnt that Kedria is currently pregnant. It is not known if her pregnancy was as a result of the 'rape act'

ETHIOPIA - Privacy International finds evidences that GoE spies onDiaspora oppositions' PCs'

ESAT News (January 30, 2014) - Established in 1990 to defend the right to privacy across the world, and to fight surveillance and other intrusions into private life by governments and corporations, the London based Privacy International (PI), had called the HM Revenue and Customs Officeof the British government to investigate the potentially illegal exports to non EU countries by the British company Gamma International, which hasbeen exporting surveillance products without a license to repressive regimes with dismal human rights records.

In the letter, PI said that the surveillance virus had been found by the Munk School of Global Affairs of Toronto University on the Personal Computers (PC) of Dr. Tadesse Biru, senior leadership member of the opposition Ginbot 7 Movement. The system has been sold to 36 countries that breach human rights and has been used to spy on political opponentsin Ethiopia, Vietnam and Malaysia. The same software has been found on the PC of another Bahraini Human Rights activist, PI said. Dr. Tadesse, whose PC has been under surveillance by the FinFisher system, said he had given a testimony to the solicitors of PI. Dr. Tadesse said PI plans to take Gamma International to court.
Ethiopia – Land for Sale -Al Jazeera'
Aljazeera TV – ‘People and Power’ (January 30, 2014) - As the economythrives, we examine the plight of Ethiopians forced from their land to make way for foreign investors. Just a few decades ago, Ethiopia was a country defined by its famines, particularly between 1983-1985 when inexcess of half a million people starved to death as a consequence of drought, crop failure and a brutal civil war.
Against this backdrop, it is impressive that in recent years, Ethiopia has been experiencing stellar economic growth. The headline statistics are certainly remarkable: the country is creating millionaires faster than anyother in Africa; output from farming, Ethiopia’s dominant industry, has tripled in a decade; the capital Addis Ababa is experiencing a massive construction boom; and the last six years have seen the nation’s GDP grow by a staggering 108 percent.
But it is not all positive news, because for all the good figures there arestill plenty of bad ones.
Around 90 percent of the population of 87 million still suffers from numerous deprivations, ranging from insufficient access to education toinadequate health care; average incomes are still well below $1500 a year; and more than 30 million people still face chronic food shortages.
And while there are a number of positive and genuine reasons for the growth spurt – business and legislative reforms, more professional governance, the achievements of a thriving service sector – many critics say that the growth seen in agriculture, which accounts for almost half ofEthiopia’s economic activity and a great deal of its recent success, is actually being driven by an out of control ‘land grab’, as multinational companies and private speculators vie to lease millions of acres of the country’s most fertile territory from the government at bargain basementprices.

At the ministry of agriculture in Addis Ababa, this land-lease programme isoften described as a “win-win” because it brings in new technologies and employment and, supposedly, makes it easier to improve health care, education and other services in rural areas. “Ethiopia needs to develop to fight poverty, increase food supplies and improve livelihoods and is doing so in a sustainable way,” said one official.

But according to a host of NGO’s and policy advocates, including Oxfam, Human Rights Watch and the Oakland Institute, the true consequences ofthe land grabs are almost all negative. They say that in order to make such huge areas available for foreign investors to grow foodstuffs and bio-fuels for export – and in direct contravention of Ethiopia’s obligations under international law – the authorities are displacing hundreds of thousands of indigenous peoples, abusing their human rights, destroying their traditions, trashing the environment, and making them more dependent on food aid than ever before.

“The benefits for the local populations are very little,” said renowned Ethiopian sociologist Dessalegn Rahmato. “They’ve taken away their land.They’ve taken away their natural resource, because these investors are clearing the land, destroying the forest, cutting down the trees. The government claims that one of the aims of this investment was to enable local areas to benefit by investing in infrastructure, social services … but these benefits are not included in the contract. It’s only left up to the magnanimity of the investor.”

And those investors, he continued, are simply not interested in anything other than serving their own needs: “They can grow any crop they want, when they want it, they can sell in any market they want, whether it’s a global market or a local market. In fact most of them are not interested inthe local markets.”

He cited as an example a massive Saudi-owned plantation in the fertile Gambella region of south west Ethiopia, a prime target area for investors:“They have 10,000 hectares and they are producing rice. This rice is goingto be exported to the Middle East, to Saudi Arabia and other places. The local people in that area don’t eat rice.”

But the most controversial element of the government’s programme is known as ‘villagisation’ – the displacement of people from land they haveoccupied for generations and their subsequent resettlement in artificial communities.

In Gambella, where two ethnic groups, the Anuaks and the Nuers, predominate, it has meant tens of thousands of people have been forcedto abandon a traditional way of life. One such is Moot, an Anuak farmer who now lives in a government village far from his home.

“When investors showed up, we were told to pack up our things and to goto the village. If we had decided not to go, they would have destroyed ourcrops, our houses and our belongings. We couldn’t even claim compensation because the government decided that those lands belongedto the investors. We were scared … if you get upset and say that someonestole your land, you are put in prison. If you complain about being arrested, they will kill you. It’s not our land anymore; we have been deprived of our rights.”
Despite growing internal opposition and international criticism, the Ethiopian government shows no sign of scaling the programme back. According to the Oakland Institute, since 2008, an area the size of France has already been handed over to foreign corporations. Over the next few years an area twice that size is thought to be earmarked for leasing to investors. So what does all this mean for the people on the ground? In Ethiopia – Land for Sale, filmmakers Veronique Mauduy and Romain Pelleray try and find out.
WEMEZEKIR: Former PDRE premier speaks on Army Lt. General AmanAndom and 61 former imperial officials’ By Michael Wossen (PhD) (February 1, 2014)
This article is a retelling of the Amharic narrative presented by former PDRE prime minister Fikre Selassie Wegderes. It is merely retold in English here. The point of this exercise is not to translate the exact wordsof the former PM (author), but to promote a thoughtful reflection of the narrative he presents. How credible is his recollection? In this recently published book “We and the Revolution” the author recounts what he sawand heard as a member of the monstrous Duerg military council in 1974 or 1966 Ethiopian calendar. What interests me most in the book is declared in the title: the fate of Aman and the execution of the “60” former imperial officials. There is barely any analytic or reflective value inthis work, yet this is a story straight from the proverbial horse’s mouth.
This is the voice of the Duerg’s nomenclature. The author served singularly at the pleasure of Major Mengistu and ended up with a long jailsentence. Some argue “not long enough,” but that is not at issue here.
Nevertheless, the former PM’s remembrances of these two events demandour attention, if only for their long range historical significance on Ethiopia. The discourse of sociology focuses on seeking discernible patterns in human inter-relationships. In this case, the explosive social dynamics leading up to the monstrous act can be sketched. The author’s main contention is that Aman Mikael Andom’s hubris, self-love, out right contempt for the Duerg’s soldiers/leaders and insatiable lust for power had driven him to conspire against the Duerg that earned hm respect greatly. The man’s forceful and intransigent personality and his conspiratorial actions against the Duerg caused the execution of the 59 imprisoned imperial officials. There is cause -effect causation suggestedby the author here.

The Return of Majour-General Aman Mikael Andom: Ethiopia was in turmoil. The ELF rebels were engaged in a rural-based armed struggle in Eritrea and the Eritrean-led Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Party or EPRPis beginning to wage urban armed struggle against the Duerg in Addis Ababa. The demand for a people's government was being voiced. The 120 Duerg (Military Steering Committee) members decided they needed a strong, well-known, incorruptible and capable senior officer to head them through the turbulent times they had encountered at that moment. The emerging strong man and chairman of the Duerg military council Majour Mengistu Haile Mariam, suggested that Lt. General Aman Andom was the right man to act as chief of the army. He was an upright man and has earned his respect nationally for thoroughly defeating the previous Somali aggression, when he led the Third Lions Division in the present Ogaden region in April, 1964.

Moreover, he had earned the respect and trust of the Ethiopian armed troops. On these regard, a group of soldiers led by Majour Nadew Zacharias was selected to head a group of officers go to the palace, and ask the emperor to approve the appointment of the well-respected seniorofficer. At the time, transitional military policies were made to look as if the emperor still ruled and had willed them. Upon entering the emperor'soffice, they saw a saddened and angry Emperor who had sensed thefast changing times for his monarchy. He welcomed them, saying something like "ok, what is it that you want?" Majour Nadew Zacharia pulled out a paper and started reading the demands of the soldiers. Firstly, secondly and so on, but when he came to the issue of Majour-General Aman's proposed appointment in the rank of Lt. General and chief of staff of the army "enough, stop right here" said the emperor and asked pointedly "who gave you guys the authority to appoint and demote people anyway,what kind of audacity is this…by the way, do you exactly know who AmanAndom is?" This was a prescient question indeed, as we shall see. The Emperor looked intensely at the soldiers, and a few of them started nervously sweating. "Ok continue reading" he ordered Nadew Zacharias, who had begun to be hopelessly tongue-tied by now.

At this point, Majour Tesfaye GuebreKidan who did not like what he saw, takes over and pleads with a clearer and louder voice the main demands of the soldiers. He said that corrupt generals have compromised the national security and defense of the country, and thereby rendered the army weak and leaderless. Soon, Majour Endale Tessema continued to remind the emperor how His Majesty himself, as he is popularly known, had salvaged the famed and brave senior officer from parliament and made him head of the Third Lion's Division. He recalled how the nation had witnessed a shining victory over the Somali invading troops, all underAman's command. Today too, we are merely demanding the appointment of this capable officer, he added. “That is all we ask, we are not claiming to appoint or demote anybody” just requesting that Majour-General Amanbe appointed in the rank of Lieutenant General to lead us, said the low rank officer Majour Endale, assuring the dignity and authority of the emperor. This demand was amplified by Lij Endakachew Makonnen then premier standing nearby. He pleaded with the emperor saying “Janhoy” along the lines: “What the “kids” really want is for you to appoint this accomplished army chief to lead the army. The soldiers control the communication channels anyway, so it is better for the Emperor to decide on this issue now.” After a moment of silence, the officers continued their demands that all political prisoners be freed. This was presented as one oftheir key demands. The emperor interrupted and inquired “who are the political prisoners?” Officer Tesfaye GuebreKidan responded by saying thatthis was a general demand addressing all political prisoners, whoever theymay be. The Emperor shook his head sadly and thought “You have failed to understand.” Here the author (the former PM) agrees with the emperor.Namely, the soldiers had simply repeated the blanket demands of students with special interests. They were really pleading for the likes of Italian Banda criminals like Haile Selassie Gugsa (HSG) to be wrongly and popularly viewed as a “political prisoners.” Such vicious traitors of the nation now released and celebrated as heroes! This was tragic, for HSG was nothing but a notorious traitor and Banda in the pay of the Italian “conquistadores” between1936-41.

Significantly weakened in strength and power, the aging emperor continued listening to all the soldier’s demands and said “indeed, when soldiers we order to go and die demand that an army chief be assigned, it is difficult to deny this request. Hence we’ll look at your demand carefully and provide responses, now go.” Captain Kassaye Aragaw interjected that the Army is awaiting a response from your majesty, what do we take backto our inmates? The emperor got up and left the room, telling them to discuss their issues with Lij Endalkachew, the premier at this time. In the end, the emperor approved that Aman Mikael Andom lead the army with the title of Lieutenant General. This was regarded as a heart- warming victory by the Duerg council. Immediately, Lt. General Aman proceeded toplace his trusted officers in key positions, ostensibly to strengthen his authority over the army and to strengthen the frayed command structures. Working closely with Majour Mengistu Haile Mariam, the de- facto leader of the Duerg, the general tried hard to re-instill discipline into the badly fractured army. He was now functioning as symbolic chairman ofthe Duerg and minister of Defense, with Majours Mengistu and Atnafu acting as first and second vice chairmen respectively. The Duerg had denied Lt Gen. Aman the position of the prime minister, causing him considerable apprehension from the start. He thought proudly “how could junior officers criticize him and deny him this crucial position he sought?

To the international press, Majour Mengistu was already known in theinternational press as “the man behind Aman.”

From day one, the army general had misgivings about how, hidden from the public, the Duerg deliberates and operates in secret. He thought, a bunch of people with unequal knowledge, schooling, intellectual experience and cultural capital cannot seat in a hall and argue about all things pertinent to the state, and arrive at sound decisions. This kind of deliberation could not result in effective policies. He voiced this concern openly, much to the dismay of senior Duerg members. In effect, the armygeneral did not enjoy being a powerless leader and voiced his consternation to Majour Mengistu. That is, he had found it impossible to work harmoniously with dim-witted soldiers and suggested that a fourteen-man Military Ruling Council should be established under his direct command. In his view, seven educated officers should be invited tojoin the seven Duerg members he had already chosen. This was clearly a direct threat to the revolution and its increasingly powerful Duerg leader himself. Majour Mengistu Haile Mariam explained patiently that the Duerg's strength resided in its diversity and that they cannot suddenly start dismissing elected Duerg members to fulfill the general's objectives.Clearly, in his thirst for more power the general had forgotten how he hadreturned to power and had shown his utter contempt for Duerg members to the chairman of this cabal.

Soon the issue of Eritrea came up for discussion. Here the army general was in his elements as a man of Eritrean heritage, born in Tseaa-Zega of Hamassien locality in former Eritrea province. He suggested that the Eritrean people had trust in him, and that he could propose a peaceful solution to such long-standing conflict in the northern province. Despite the suspicion that some Duerg members harbored against the degree of Eritreaness of the general, he was dispatched to Eritrea to seek peaceful solutions. His visit was triumphant, to put it mildly. He discussed with elders. He told them there was no need to separate or secede Eritrea fromEthiopia, and that they can all enjoy unity with Ethiopia as Eritreans. The following day there was a jubilant welcome for him at Queen Saba Stadium in Asmara. The general has made a speech for the crowd in Tigrigna and Arabic, and expressed his abiding love to the people, much to the delight of assembled Eritreans. Soon peace will come to Eritrea, andthe soldiers will no longer have to fight all over the place. In fact, he ordered the Ethiopian soldiers to abandon their strategic locations, to cease fighting the rebels and return to their camps. This particular decision created more suspicion and anger among certain members of the Duerg, including the ever suspicious Majour Mengistu Haile Mariam. What is the general's real agenda? On orders of the latter, Lt. Colonel Tesfaye Wolde-Selassie was dispatched to Asmara to study and clarify the issues surrounding the general's activities. After visiting certain military camps and interviewing various individuals etc., the Colonel returned to Addis Ababa within a week, and delivered his field report in a meeting where thegeneral was present.

Colonel Tesfaye did not mince his words. He reported that the sceccionistrebels are stronger than ever and its units have taken over the strategic areas vacated by the Ethiopian armed troops on General Aman's orders. In fact, there is fear that the rebels are ready to capture Asmara soon.

Moreover, the soldiers are complaining that the Duerg appears to be readyto have them all eliminated in their camps. The Eritrean civilian populationis worried too. Their members are demanding to be removed to safer places as well. In fact, unless policy corrections are undertaken immediately, the province will fall out of our control soon. The army general could hardly control his rage at what he is hearing, and at the endof the report he exploded "Liar, dissimulator, you are concocting tales you did not see." Yes, the general had given orders to soldiers to go to camp in the interest of peace, but the notion that the rebels had "occupied" the vacated strategic areas is an utter fraud! With these words, the general angrily walked out of the Duerg's meeting. In fact, he never returned to a Duerg meeting again. When Majour Mengistu called him the following day to inquire about his wellbeing, the general told him that he was "sick" witha cold, and assured him that he will return to duty as soon as he feels well. The seething contradiction between the two had been ratcheted up significantly. The group's systolic pressure was rising.

Sensing his growing strength Majour Mengistu had started visiting militarycamps and giving agitation-laden speeches to army soldiers. The media reported his appearances and speeches as the general watched and listened to the media at his home. The army general was obviously incensed and phoned Mengistu Haile Mariam, clearly the emerging strongman of the Duerg. The general wanted to know why Majour Mengistu is making visits and speeches to troops without conferring with the Defense Minister, himself. Majour Mengistu answered that he merely wanted to create unity of purpose among the armed troops. If that has offended the general, he offers his apology. The incensed general said he does not comprehend what the major is talking about. In any case, he was not one to be toyed with, and the general abruptly hung up the phone. Majour Mengistu began to be seriously worried about what to do with the stubborn and haughty general. The last decision was made to go to the general's home, explain the visits/speeches to him and apologize again that it was done without the general's knowledge. It will not happenagain. Moreover, to stem the public rumors that the general was at odds with Majour Mengistu and under house arrest, the two should make a jointappearance at a function on Hidar 8. The general reluctantly agreed and seemed to have pardoned the infraction.

On the day of the planned joint appearance, the military radio program announced that Majour Mengistu Haile Mariam had made yet another speech to soldiers. Enraged to the extreme, the general questioned how this can happen, especially after their recent agreement with Major Mengistu. His disdain for the Duerg boiled over and the general decided that beyond this point it was no longer possible to work with these people.

He promptly cancelled the planned joint appearance with Majour Mengistu.The seething contradiction between the general's position and that of the Duerg's senior leadership resurfaced again. The following day the Duerg council met to discuss the problematic case of the army general Aman Andom, who had effectively removed himself from the Duerg now. It was still decided to somehow convince the general to return to his daily duties,and a high ranking group of officers led by Majour General Gizaw Belayneh was dispatched to mediate with him. The general was inconsolable and assured the delegates that that he can under no circumstances play a puppet's role like the symbolic "Egyptian General Naguib" while the Duerg consolidated power.

The Duerg was clearly worried about the general's obduracy and decided to send the honorable Ras Imru Haile Selassie to interfere. Despite the latter's best efforts, the general insisted that he would not work under theleadership his very juniors whom he had raised them, particularly under officers in- charge of a weapon's warehouse. This was a clear reference toMajour Mengistu. If they want me to work with them, they will have to dismiss the assembled soldiers in the name of Duerg and appoint the people of my choice to the military ruling council, he thought. If they agree with this idea, let me know, and he promptly dismissed the delegation. Ras Imru explained the general's position to Majour Mengistu who then transmitted it to the Duerg's senior members. The Duerg's members were unable to entertain the general's perilous idea, and rejected his proposal. Meanwhile the general started agitating against the Duerg, particularly among soldiers of the Third Lion's Division that trustedon him. Phoning the commanders he falsely alleged that the Duerg had dismissed him and that he can no longer work with them. For instance, the army's Geladin unit in the Ogaden became insurrectional and started imprisoning its leaders. The general also prepared a telegram urging all units to rebel against the Duerg, but before it was dispatched the proposed telegram fell in the hands of Major Mengistu. Soon, a group of officers (Lt. Colonel Kassa Guebre-Mariam and Lt. Colonel Aytenew Belay)came to Addis' Fourth Division (Duerg's headquarters) without official permission. When asked about their presence, they informed the Duerg that the army general had ordered them to appear in Addis Ababa. At thispoint, the conspiratorial intentions of general Aman had become crystal clear to Majour Mengistu and others.

The Decisive Meeting of November 23, 1974 (Hidar 13, 1967 EC) on the fate of former Imperial officials: On this fateful day, an urgent meeting ofthe Duerg was called. The compound was teeming with activity. Soldiers with heavy and light weapons were everywhere. Officers and soldiers hitherto unseen were on location and crowding into the meeting hall.

Seating positions were filled with delegates and soldiers standing against the wall. The meeting hall was overcrowded and all the delegates were apprehensive of what the agenda might be. In a little while, Majours Mengistu and Atnafu walked into the meeting and assumed their seats on the podium. Mengistu was seated on the right side and Atnafu on the left. The usual middle chair of the army General Aman was absent this time, testifying to the end of the general's future political life, the author tells us. Majour Mengistu informed the invited members and delegates that today "we will be discussing some crucial issues" and this is why we have invited all members and "Neus-Duerg meaning for Sub-Duerg members" dignitaries from the regions to give us their voices. Saddened and angeredat the same time and gesturing passionately with his hands, Majour Mengistu said "gobez" matters are taking a turn for the worst. The man we had trusted and decided should lead us, has stopped coming to his office duties claiming his sickness. Soon we discovered that, rather than sickness, his position was borne of anger at us. Despite the various emissaries of peace we have sent to him, he adamantly refused to work with us. In fact, he started agitating against us (the Duerg) with certain elements in the army. The details of his conspiracy have fallen onto our hands. Today's urgent meeting is about how we are going to deal with thistroublesome matter and solve it once and for all.

Most of the Duerg members in the hall had limited knowledge that the contradiction between the army general and Majour Mengistu had reachedto this point and decided to keep quite. Others decided that a peaceful solution must be sought to avoid the impending danger. Yet others thought that the general must be imprisoned and his conspiratorial activities exposed to the public. Still, a lot of the "Sub-Duerg" members did not accept Mengistu's allegations about the general's treachery and proposed to go to the general's house and talk to him once again. At this point Mengistu was infuriated, his lips and cheeks started quivering in fury. I do not know why you doubt and fail to believe what we just reported? He wanted to know. "Everything is backed up by concrete evidence and we can present to you the detailed information if necessary."Majour Mengistu was confident in his demeanor and utterances. Now, Colonel Tesfaye Wolde-Selassie has something to present to you, so listencarefully and form your own opinions on the issue. Tesfaye moved to the podium carrying his tape recorder and the incriminating information. Whatyou are going to listen to is the phone conversation between generals Aman Andom and Gizaw Belayneh. Since we have other incriminating communications like this, with other generals and military commanders, we will present them in due course if necessary.

On tape reveals, General Gizaw makes a phone call to General Aman and after the necessary greetings, Gizaw pleads with him to change his mind and return to his duty. Who am I going to work with? Inquired Aman. Howcan we lead a country with ordinary soldiers and Sergeants? He continued.Since there is an idea I have proposed, unless they accept it (a 14 man ruling junta led by himself), I am not willing to work with them, Aman thought. When asked more about this idea, the general elaborates on the idea of dismissing the whole Duerg and creating a military Council (junta) of more educated and capable military leaders under his direct command.

General Gizaw explains the impossibility of Aman's ideas for the wellbeingof the movement according to Majour Mengistu. Anyway, General Gizaw advises him to return to duty and to try improving the current situation under his leadership. The angered general Aman rejoins "you guys have failed to listen to what I am telling you. Henceforth I am no longer able towork with these rabbles that have "not wiped their asses!" yet. At this point Colonel Tesfaye stopped the tape and returned to his seat. The silence in the hall erupted into angry murmurs and the Duerg members were visibly livid at the general's insulting remarks, writes the author.

Majour Atnafu was biting his lips in anger and Mengistu was surveying themembers' reaction. He had successfully stalked their violent instincts nowself-evident throughout the hall. The notion of "not wiping their asses" exemplifies the level of contempt he held for Duerg members. This phraseinfuriated all present members in the hall. In Caesar's language, "the die was cast" henceforth.

The Final Solution: Majour Mengistu appeared both saddened and angeredby the feelings stirred in the hall and preceded to building his case againstthe general. "The general's plan is rather far-reaching and dangerous." Majour Mengistu told the gathered members about the 14 man "junta" thegeneral had shared with him. He underscored his refusal to accept this notion. Failing to convince him, the general had begun conspiring to hatcha coup d'état with other high-ranking officers. His seditious plan was to release the detained imperial officials and bring them back to power. All this after our people had suffered and sacrificed for centuries to get rid of them. We have the evidence in our hands and we can present it to you, bellowed the outraged Mengistu. Again the somberness in the hall eruptedin rage and surprise at what they had just heard. Fear, anxiety and alarm began to invade everybody's mind. Feeling the fuming mood of the soldiers, Majour Mengistu made his pitch "we are in a treacherous state ofaffairs in any case; the members are forever complaining that we are merely feeding the jailed imperial ministers..."

Now assured, certain Duerg members started making speeches abouteliminating those who have forever oppressed the Ethiopian people.

Another voice added that if we don't strike now, they will finish us off. Weneed to take decisive action to curtail this dangerous movement against us. The decision was leaning towards needing to take decisive action against the imprisoned imperial ministers. The author thinks that Majour Mengistu could have told the anxious members that this issue is not in ouragenda today, and that we will certainly discuss it at an appropriate time in the near future. Instead, he moved towards soliciting opinions in favor of the final solution, as it were. He suggested that we (the Duerg) can tackle this rising and imminent danger against us only by taking fast and decisive action against the culprits. Therefore we must unleash the final solution against some of these imprisoned former officials by a simple majority vote suggested Majour Mengistu. Fearful, nobody objected this deadly motion, except for Majour Berhanu Bayeh who counseled that that the matter should better be resolved by legal means. No one supportedMajour Birhanu Bayeh (then head of the Duerg's legal standing committee)! The soldiers were ordered not to leave the compound to go home, and the meeting was adjourned for lunch. All members were immersed in fear and foreboding. The Duerg's membership had surrendered to Majour Mengistu's will and the gates of hell were openedwide open.

Now, it was time to take stock. Those of you supporting the death of certain members of the imperial order, raise your hands, demanded Majour Mengistu. Noticing that the "punishable by death" sentiment wasin the majority, Majour Mengistu ordered Majour Getachew Shibeshi to bring the list of the prisoners. At this moment, he announced that Lt.

General Aman had failed to surrender and that his house is surrounded.He quickly ordered Colonel Daniel Asfaw to see to Aman's possible surrender or dismissal-elimination. It was decided that each prisoner's fate would be decided after that day's lunch.

After lunch, Mengistu came to the hall with his thick file of the prisoners. He said, continuing on the pre-lunch decision, we will now go through their names and known crimes and decide by a simple majority. First was the name of former premier Aklilu Habte Wold, and the endless number of"crimes" he had allegedly committed. Those who want him dead raise your hands and Majour Mengistu remarks him to death beside his name.

17 of those sentenced to death in this way were senior army generals in rank. In this mode, over 250 names were read and out of these 53 were sentenced to death, including some members of the rebellious "Neus- Duergs." Before the death sentences were handed down, Colonel Daniel Asfaw walked in to announce the suicide commitment of Lt. General Amanto a smiling Mengistu. The latter announced that the army general had started resisting arrest and that his house was crushed by a tank and the general had committed suicide. On this note, the soldiers were dismissed for a break until 10:00 PM. Upon return to the hall four army division commanders were called in to bear witness the Duerg's decisive actions. They were namely generals Jagamma Kello, Gizaw Belayneh, TadesseGabre, Worku Makonnen. They leave the meeting.

At midnight, Majour Getachew Shibeshi came into the meeting hall to explain how effectively the summary executions of former imperial officials had been carried out. With this diabolical execution, the imperial order was disintegrating. The meeting of this long night lasted until 1:00 AM. A statement of the execution was prepared to be read the following day, accompanied by a song entitled as "Yefiyel Wotette!" The confused, exhausted and morally bloodied soldiers were ordered to monitor public opinion the following day and dismissed for the night. That fateful decisionreverberates into post Duerg times.

The author former prime minister Fikre Selassie Wogderes further alleges that even though there might have been some Duerg officials that may have wanted the execution of former officials, 80% of the Duerg would not have voted in favor of this dreadful decision, especially had it been presented formally and debated soberly, as it were. In other words, all these junior officers and NCO's were controlled by irrational circumstancesand acted in a climate of fear, haste and anxiety. The "60" imperial officials were massively executed by a simple majority vote given by, for the most part, outraged and anxious NCO's.
It is clear that all Duerg members are legally and morally liable for this criminal summary execution of imprisoned former imperial officials; they all partook in it, as grand jury and judge. To some extent, they were all participants in this atrocious act and must accept common accountability for the consequences their decisions have wrought. For one, this criminal action cemented the violent power base of Majour Mengistu Haile Mariam,both within and outside the Duerg council, and initiated the process of mendacity, barbarity and arbitrariness in the use and abuse of state power in modern Ethiopia. The arbitrary use of repressive/deadly state power in resolving troublesome affairs of the state had become normalized, so to speak. This deliberate and ideologically buttressed extra-judicial bloodletting was the inauguration of the Duerg 17 years dictatorship and many more crimes to follow.

Ethiopia Confirmed the Abduction of the two-Key ONLF negotiators'

By Ahmed Abdi (February 1, 2014) Five days later after the Kenyan Policesays that it was investigating the Ethiopian Security agent's abduction of two key Ogaden National Liberation's negotiators, who were abducted from outside a popular restaurant in Upper Hill, Nairobi, reliable sources confirmed that those involved in facilitating with the mission are at Kenyan Police's hand but Ethiopian masterminders confirmed that Mr, Sulub Abdi Ahmed and Ali Ahmed Hussein are at their hands.
Speaking with Harun Maruf's VoA Somali service, Ethiopian regional adviser, Abdinur confirmed that the two-key negotiators are at their handsbut failed to identify the exact place they are being held and when they asusual by gunpoint be forced to speak without their consent to the media, however, it is obvious now that the action was intended to jeopardize the international backed peace-talks between the government and ONLF. It's likely to be that the Ogaden puppet administration of Abdi iley and Ethiopian generals stationed at Ogaden are behind this critical and unethical incident that violated the essential international norm and violated the Kenyan sovereignty.
It has been reporting that the Ethiopian ethnic Tigre generals at Ogadenand the Ogaden puppet administration were unhappy and opposing any peace-talks aiming to solve the long-standing Ogaden Conflict by means of political solution. Somali diaspora from Ogaden Region reacted angrily and condemned the Ethiopian security agents' abduction of the senior ONLF-negotiators. Analysts say that this move may affect diplomatic negotiations between ONLF and Ethiopia brokered by the Kenyan Government on 2012. ONLF is a separatist rebel group fighting to make the Somali region of illegal Ethiopian Occupied-Ogaden in eastern Ethiopiaan independent state. ONLF, established in 1984, demands for the autonomy of this region which is a home to about 8-10 million Somali Muslims.

ETHIOPIA/ERITREA: 8 Business opportunities of Resuming EconomicRelations b/n the two'

African Arguments (February 1, 2014) - By Tony Carol - Ethiopia and Eritrea ceased business relations upon the commencement of the border war in 1998. While a small amount of barter trade still exists, it is fair to say that trade relations between the two countries are non-existent - this is very much to the detriment of the private sectors in both countries (andacross the region).

Since the closure of the border, the economic fortunes of Ethiopia and Eritrea could hardly have been more divergent. While both remain poor countries in terms of per capita wealth, Ethiopia has been among the fastest and growing countries in the world averaging a steady 10% per annum growth for the past nine years. Conversely, as per the chart below,Eritrea has suffered vast fluctuations in its economic growth from a low of

- 9% in 2008 to the 2012 level of + 7.5%.

Ethiopia has also been a leader in Africa in terms of infrastructure development, especially in the construction of roads, power infrastructureand water supply. Eritrea has endeavoured to rebuild its transportation infrastructure after the border war but progress has been slowed by inaccessibility of finance. In terms of education, Ethiopia has built dozensof institutions of higher education in the past 10 years and has begun to develop a work force that is increasingly in demand by manufacturers from Turkey, China and India. Despite promising signs of self reliance immediately after Independence, Eritrea continues to find its work force diminished due to emigration and military service.

Last, Ethiopia is rapidly modernizing its domestic and export agriculturewhereas as Eritrea still relies on subsistence methods of production - albeit while eschewing food aid.

As a business consultant who has worked on investment in both countries,I am confident that a comprehensive settlement of disputes that underlie the 1998-2000 border war and normalization of economic relations will create myriad benefits, including:

Increase in road, rail and port infrastructure in Eritrea. With assistance from the Chinese, Ethiopia has expended billions on building its transportation corridor to Djibouti. However, for many regions in Ethiopia,Eritrean ports are closer.

Increase in power infrastructure and opening of export markets. By combining their respective sources of power, hydroelectric, wind and geothermal, Eritrean and Ethiopian consumers would benefit from lower costs and greater reliability of supply.

Reduced power and transport costs would increase manufacturing investment in both Ethiopia and Eritrea. Although Ethiopia remains one ofthe world's most expensive countries in terms of road transportation costs, there have been a swath of new manufacturing ventures in textiles,apparel and leather goods, driven by low labour costs and increased skill training.

With its port access, Eritrea could also become a manufacturing hub, perhaps even adding strategic value to raw or semi-processed materialscoming from Ethiopia.

Renewed access to the US market under the Africa Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA). In 2004, Eritrea was deemed ineligible for market access benefits offered and while the impact was minimal at the time, Ethiopia has been able to substantially grow its exports to the US inthe past five years. The normalization of political and economic relations with its neighbour would not in itself restore AGOA eligibility, but it wouldddemonstrate progress toward that end.

Increased convertibility of currencies. Normalization of economic relationswould allow the establishment of banking relations, now non-existent between the two countries. The Nakfa is among the world's least convertible currencies and an open and transparent exchange with the Ethiopian birr could lower transaction costs for all businesses and consumers.

Return of the commercial sector. As a result of the border war, Ethiopianbusinesses were expelled from Eritrea and vice versa. This bar has constrained companies from both countries to achieve scale. Moreover, among the most dynamic business communities in Ethiopia for generations were those of Eritrean origin.

Fostering regional integration. Africa is striving to integrate its markets and Ethiopia has been leading in this process by establishing agreements with its neighbours for power and transportation corridors. There has beenspeculation that Ethiopia seeks membership of the East Africa Community.EAC membership would also provide benefits to Eritrea.

As reported by my friends Ambassadors Cohen, Shinn and Lyman, this appears to be a moment of inflection in the relationship between Eritreaand Ethiopia. Certainly the implementation of the border agreement andthe resumption of commercial relations will not be an easy process.

However, the economic benefits that would accrue to both countries could be substantial and should motivate leadership in both to expedite the process. Tony Carroll is Vice President of Manchester Trade and Director ofAcorus Capital.

ETHIOPIA - Smelling Another Round of Assaults'

Analysis By Wowocagroup (February 3, 2014) About 2 decades ago thefirst round of assault was officially launched on Ethiopia by an invading anti-Ethiopia organization called TPLF. The assault was planned and executed with the help of foreign powers, primarily the US and UK, whohave been salivating to use Ethiopia as a political and economic cow.

The preparation for achieving the first assault took many years and involved many steps, the major ones of which included the following:

The systematic dismantling of the Derg regime, including making asylumarrangements for its leader, Mengistu, in Zimbabwe, during critical time.

The weakening or elimination of popular patriotic Ethiopian organizations,like the EPRP (for example, the killing of 40 top EPRP leaders by TPLF in Gonder in 1991, as reported recently on Ethiomedia).

Supporting and strengthening narrow ethnic-based anti-Ethiopiaorganizations, like the TPLF, EPLF, and OLF, by foreign entities.

Creating an atmosphere of hopelessness, fear and mistrust among theEthiopian population to cause instability.

After the TPLF took power in 1991, the plan was executed to accomplishthe goal set by TPLF and its foreign backers. These included:

Seceding Eretria from Ethiopia mischievously and illegally.Making Ethiopian landlocked mischievously and illegally.

Creating further division, mistrust and conflict among the Ethiopianpopulation along ethnic and religious lines.

Conducting relentless assault on Ethiopian nationalism, including on thenational flag, and the heroes/heroines of the country and its proud history.

Selling large areas of fertile lands of the country to foreign investors by displacing the locals who own the lands and who depend on them for theirlivelihood.

Owning most of the wealth of the country by TPLF elites and theircollaborators, impoverishing the rest of the population.
Allowing the take-over of many of the country's other precious resourcesby foreigners in the name of investment and economic development.
Suppressing democracy and freedom, and instituting absolute dictatorshipand the reign of terror in the entire country.
Promoting the proliferation of corruption, immoral practices anddistractive behaviors in every level of the Ethiopian society.
Unemployment, economic hardship and the associated effects on themajority of the population.
While all of these mean-spirited deeds were carried out under the disgraceful leadership of the late Meles Zenawi, Ato Dessalegn H. Mariam,as a successor, has also made his own share of contribution. We have been told that Ato Dessalegn would continue the work of Zenawi to fulfill his unfinished so called vision, and, unfortunately, that is exactly what AtoDessalegn has been doing since he took office. The appointment of Ato Dessalegn as a care taker was a decision made by TPLF and its foreign backers. This way, the original plan of transforming Ethiopia into a "colonial" state is assured to be maintained.
Driving Ethiopia into a sad state of disarray and debilitation and still having control of the political machinery, presently, TPLF and its foreign backers seem to be prepared to execute a second round of assaults on Ethiopia. These assaults are designed to impact Ethiopia negatively fromthe exterior.
Preparation is in process by the TPLF regime to give away part of westernEthiopia to the Sudan. Aside Ethiopia owning these lands, the decision to cede them was made secretly without informing the Ethiopian people.
Representatives of the foreign governments who played major roles in putting TPLF in power in 1991, are now asking that Ethiopia and Eretria should start a relationship to work together to start business and improvetheir economies, knowing that such a relationship will only benefit Eretriawhile further harming Ethiopia.
Along with the issue of establishing a relationship with Eretria, a discussion has also been initiated regarding the formation of some sort ofconfederation among East African countries, including Eretria. This topic was also discussed in some depth by US and Ethiopian politicians and scholars sometime before in the 1009s after the take-over of power by TPLF, but due to the lack of positive atmosphere for further consideration,the discussion was abandoned. The promoters of the idea now appear to believe that it is time for it to be revisited. Coincidental or not, recently, there was a piece of news from another source suggesting a renewed interest in confederation among the East African countries/states, but the proposal treats Ethiopia as an agglomeration of several independent states while leaving the other countries to participate in their present intact forms. Therefore, here too, sticking to the original plan set by TPLF and its backers more than 2 decades ago, the trend seems to promote thebreakdown Ethiopia into pieces, behind the back of its owners, the Ethiopian people.

Because of its human and natural resource potentials for development, and the glamorous history and culture of its people, Ethiopia has been theenvy of the world. Consequently, it has encountered numerous attacks byexternal forces to snatch away what belongs to her. The present so calledrulers of the country are nothing else but implanted facilitators of the motives of the external forces. Any decision made on behalf of Ethiopia bythe present regime cannot, therefore, be good for Ethiopia and the Ethiopian people should not accept it by any means. To have a free, democratic and prosperous country and move forward with the civilized world, it is essential that Ethiopians should get rid of the TPLF regime.
That is where focus should be given and hard work should be sought at this very moment. The consideration of time factor is important here andit is vital to carry out what is necessary before it becomes too late and regrettable. A lot of time has already been wasted unnecessarily and a lesson should be drawn from that experience to do better. I ask you to think about it. God bless Ethiopia and its beautiful people! ETHIOPOLITICS - An Ethiopian land is not a Blanket - a belated reply'
Analysis By Busha Taa (PhD) (February 3, 2014) - In his article, Time to Bring Back Eritrea from the Cold, Ambassador Herman Cohen initiated animportant discourse ensued by voluminous reactions from fellow Ethiopians outlining their serious concerns and proposing alternative solutions to the one advanced by Cohen. With admiration and greatest respect to all discussants, I will throw in few points to the interactively splendid dialogue already enriched by substantive arguments. Should anyof my suggestions make this vivid conversation redundant, I shall readilyask for forgiveness.
With the above considerations in mind, the recent reappearance of Herman Cohen, David Shinn and Princeton Lyman as saints of peace in the horn of Africa and the suggestions they offered have been treated as flawed to the best and skewed to the worst. By literally instructing Ethiopia to give its lands away without any possibility of getting somethingin return, they seriously injured the principal foundation of negotiation as giving and taking. It is too cumbersome to predict whether the worst criminal – hand cuffed and living behind bar - deserves such one sided and yet unsolicited verdict. It should be clear to everyone that the Ethiopian land is not a no-man's land to be awarded as a placebo to those who are shivering in cold rooms. Moreover, the Ethiopian land must not beconsidered as blanket to redress coldness – the coldness that emanated from political immaturity. Any attempt to pull Shabia out of cold via an offer of Ethiopian land is tantamount to pushing Ethiopia into that chilly room; thus Ethiopia must instantly reject Cohen's projection – and – reject it forever. Cohen, Shinn and Lyman as experienced diplomats know that keeping discourteous politicians in cold is the major incapacitating panacea in international relations. Hence, bully politicians deserve staying out aloof until they upgrade their behaviors to the level of acceptable international and regional standards.

The core argument presented by Cohen and sponsored by Shinn and Lyman was that there is no hard evidence currently to indict EPLF for supporting Shabab. However, their supposition is not garnished even by aslice of evidence – showing that EPLF is not providing support to extremists. The presumption that there is no solid evidence now should not lead to a conclusion that there is no evidence at all. The practice of supplying Al Shabab with materials might have become sophisticated, invisible or gone underground. There might be a third party involvement and both EPLF and Shabab may not shake hands to exchange materials asbefore. Therefore, the prescription to reward EPLF with Badime for its misbehaving is completely unwarranted and probably ill conceived. More precisely, Ethiopians do not need foreigners to manipulate them as artist moulds clay. Also, Ethiopians do not need a neighbor whose pure career and constant preoccupation is to dismantle their country.

In principle, the rule of international relations conferred obligation upon diplomats to be makers of judicious arguments, takers of reasons at timesand speakers of truths at all times. As guardians of relationships, they should not risk their reputation and credibility in the eyes of contending parties. As well, diplomats should not recline on rigid pride or in the promotion of self importance. In sharp contrast, they have to act as gluesto bond differences in an impartial fashion. Whatever the merits of argument of these diplomats, the reasons they generated this contention at this specific moment is also a conundrum one – truly escaping honest analysis. I assume that these diplomats chose to incite this discussion for the following reasons.

At present, Ethiopia nationalism is resurging, revitalizing and reinvigorating and hence the leadership of EPLF has interpreted it as a threat to its survival. Those statements coming from these diplomats arethe product of Shabia's advocacy project recently commenced out of despair.

There is a complete misreading about the lack of cohesion in the leadership of EPRDF. The rumors that there is a prevalence lack of unity within the EPRDF has led to the conclusion that it is a high time to convince at least one part – and then the convinced one would take on the rest. Such on surface deliberation had already dealt a devastating below to EPLF in the war of 1998-2000. In 2000, Shabia was relaxing on the belief that Ethiopia was suffering from drought and famine let alone pushing the Shabian army out of Badime. However, when the Ethiopian heroes not only kicked them out of Badime but also instantly captured Barantu and threatened the whole existence of EPLF, the leadership of EPLF scrambled to reckon with the brevity of the Ethiopian wave. So, equating national capability with palace politics is not always the smartestmove or the fittest and surest measure. In fact, the current Ethiopian capability is far more superior to that of the 2000 one.

Few sergeants of "liberation movements" might have given the wrong impression that ethnic feeling is more salient than contemporary national feeling in Ethiopia. In terms of nationalism, the reality on the ground is much more complex than cyber politicking and Ethiopians have strong national feeling for Ethiopia – they have frequently sacrificed their lives to defend their country. Nonetheless, it must be also clear to the leaders of the so-called liberators that all ethnic groups in Ethiopia encounter comparable problems, face analogous challenges and share similar fate. Infact, no reasoner can deny the non existence of democracy in the country since time immemorial. Nonetheless, the lack of democracy cannot be solved without trusting each other and working hand in hand within the bound of Ethiopian sovereignty. Concurrently, the wider diplomatic community should not take its marching orders from ethnic demagogues who took oath of allegiance from EPLF to dismember Ethiopia.

Although stipulated by sage diplomats and business consultants to commence relationship with EPLF, Ethiopia would fare better without anycommunication with EPLF because: EPLF has commandingly supported Egypt and has continued to provide support for Egypt on the Ethio- Egyptian squabble over Abay.

EPLF is constantly organizing, mobilizing and leading the so called liberation movements who challenge the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Ethiopia. And, it will not stop any time soon as witnessed bythe recent meeting held in Frankfurt by "liberators"- who could not liberate themselves from the yoke of narrow mindedness.

The EPLF is endeavoring day and night to relocate the African Union to one of its crony regimes by vacating Addis Ababa. Shabia has become information thirsty about Ethiopia and it is urgently striving to penetrate deep into Ethiopia in order to take over the Ethiopian economic and social structures. Bringing Shabia back to Ethiopia means volunteering to lose anincredible amount of foreign currency.

In case, EPRDF insanely engage in any talk with EPLF, however, the rightof the Kunama, Afar and other people who darely struggle to remain Ethiopian citizens should also be on the table. The issue of ports must not be singularly seen as mercantile politics of shipping and receiving but rather has to be treated as a core of Ethiopian sovereignty and the protection of the rights of Ethiopian citizens. In particular reference to Asseb, Professor MInga Negash has offered us very good suggestions on which I will base my very minor proposition. In earnest, accepting any treaty signed with Italy has a fatal consequence – including the creation ofhazardous wave of precedence. The treaty between Ethiopia and Italy in 1928 was not negotiated in good faith; it was concluded under the guise of mutual distrust between the two parties. Prior to thinking to accept/apply this particular treaty, one has to earnestly revisit the following mundane and yet troublesome factors.

First, Ras Teferi (Emperor Haile Sellasie) saw the provision that alluded tothe construction of road from Asseb to Dessie as creating the high way of invasion- volunteering to be conquered and colonized. Second, Italians were buying time and measuring the Ethiopian force rather than engagingin mutually constructive negotiation. Italians engaged in conciliation to collect information about the size and the morale of the army as well as the types of armaments Ethiopians used. Third, Italians were very suspicious of Ras Teferi from1924 onward - the year he visited Italy and asked Mussolini to give Asseb back to its true owner, Ethiopia. Therefore, the 1928 treaty was not signed in the true spirit of a treaty but as stage management. If EPRDF fatalistically signs on this treaty behind the veil ofignorance, Ethiopia is going to abdicate her sovereignty over Asseb. As a result, we are also going to devolve the current solution chasing problem to the future generation. As well, signing any treaty with EPLF now is a simple abandonment of our obligation to the people of Afar and Kunama who have vowed to fight in order to retain their Ethiopian citizenships.

More importantly, the treaty under question was nullified at the time whenItaly crossed the Ethiopian boarder in an apparent adventure of colonial gamble in 1934. Since it did not serve the purpose of its day, this treaty should not be given the kiss of life.

Intended or unintended, the EPRDF committed colossal mistakes regarding the Ethiopian territorial integrity from its dark days in forest to its high-time in palace. For example, the 1900 treaty delineated Tsrona and Fort Cardona to the province of Tigrai. However, the EPRDF did not initially claim them during Algiers agreement and the Ethiopia-Eritrea Boundary Commission awarded both Tserona and Forte Cardona to Eritrea. Few of the negligence of duty discerned on the part of EPRDF during Algiers agreement are: First, by submitting an Italian made map asa source of legal reference, EPRDF intentionally murdered the truth of the Ethiopian case in a broad day light. Second, after paying 9,000,000 dollarsfor law firm to prepare a submission, the government transferred documents to the boundary commission without thorough reading and revising the materials. After the commission framed its mind against Ethiopia, they resubmitted another request for interpretation, correction and consultation on towns and villages such as Tserona, Zaleanbessa, Bure, Fort Cardona and the environs in May 2002. In an instant response,however, the EEBC rejected the document as inadmissible on June 24, 2002. The reasoning of the decision was that Ethiopia's request was basedon the misapprehension of article 28/29 of the commission's rule of procedure. Ethiopian delegates became unhappy and blamed the commission for focusing on procedure than substances. And, Ethiopia started to request EEBC to reconsider not only about Badime but the entire boundary covering 912 km in length. In a complete reversal of its position, however, the EPRDF declared that it accepted the EEBC decision in 2004. Once again the pressure to bring both together is mounting – EPRDF should not irresponsibly engage in third round land give away.

Fortunately, what is consoling to Ethiopians is that most treaties have no permanence. The Vienna Convention of the law of treaties on succession of state , 1978 article 8 (1) states: "The obligation or rights of a predecessor state under treaties in force in respect to a territory at the date of a succession of a state do not become the obligation and rights ofa successor state". This article suggests that political treaties are not perpetual; they can be revoked, adjusted, rearranged or totally nullified. Thus, the treaty of peace or war signed by the current regime can be readily revoked by incoming regime at any time in point. All successor states have prerogative to scrap treaties signed by their predecessors after giving reasonable notice to concerned parties. Finally, I would like toaugment few propositions for discussion to collectively curve and shape the future of Ethiopia by Ethiopians.

Proposition I: The people living under the iron fist of Isays Afewiorki are Ethiopians; we are not only bonded culturally, economically and socially but we also share ancestry and kinship. Our relationship is not only backed by politics but it is engraved by blood – like it or not – we are the same people. Many people from Eritrea sacrificed their lives fighting against Italy alongside Ethiopians. In recent times, the architect and the commander of the separation, Isays Afework has stated that Eritrea cannot realize its dream without a proper support from Ethiopia. On the closing years of his leadership, he suddenly came to realize that his vision for Eritrea is the distorted one as his management is summiting to a dead-end. Additionally, Bereket Habte Sellasie who intellectually gambled to separate Eritrea from Ethiopia has loudly and largely cried to see an instant reunion. For this reason, the political language of the day should be rapprochements from below – people to people relationships with the objective of forcing negative politicians to float. Brotherly and sisterly engagement between people would help close the gaps, forge new relationships and create inter/ intra community confidence. Here, caution is very necessary as everything comes in package. We must also be cognizant of the fact that this process may get messy when the shabia cadres involve. Nevertheless, Ethiopians must play the role of peace making as senior partners but never at the expense of Ethiopian unity andterritorial integrity.

Proposition II: It is paramount that all Ethiopians engage in diplomatic activities regarding the unwarranted landlockedness of Ethiopia in order tocement a fertile international ground. In the era of globalization, access tothe sea port is not an option but rather it is one of the highly sought after survival kits. As actor and obedient to international law, Ethiopia has already signed the United Nations' convention of the law of the sea part xithat came to force in 1994 which is not signed by Eritrea. Hence, Ethiopia has better morale clout than the one who did not recognize the rule of thesea game. All Ethiopians have to register their opposition to the decision that made their country portless. We also urge the EPRDF to train and empower competent diplomats who can visibly and unambiguously fight for Ethiopia, rather than for EPRDF. Assigning loyal cadre for diplomacy has already put the EPRDF on the collision course with the Ethiopian national interests. Governing a nation state and voluntarily giving up the right to access a port is a flagrant violation of the national sovereignty.

Such practice contravenes with the fundamental principles of statecustodianship.

Proposition III: This version was brilliantly discussed by both Professors Minga Negash and Paulos Milikias. In the event that the current misunderstanding between Egypt and Ethiopia escalates and should the EPLF ventures to host Egyptians to wage a war on Ethiopia that incidencealone must license the Ethiopian army to go north and take both out.

However, the army must be well prepared to avoid collateral damagesthat can have international and national repercussions. Should this episode surfaced, the army must avoid civilian causalities to its best.

Proposition IV: Ethiopian intellectuals in the diaspora must engage in duediligence with diplomats and/or state functionaries who frequently ally with anti Ethiopian forces. Distancing ourselves from those who hurt Ethiopia is a disservice to that country. We must realize that it is our disengagement that emboldened those who want to dismember and belittle Ethiopia. As there can be no diplomacy without finance, all Ethiopians have to voluntarily contribute to this cause. An amateurish, clumsy and care free politicking on the part of Ethiopian intellectual must cease and cease now. Hence, we must project a change in the minds of diplomats who support anti-Ethiopian movements and we must be able topenetrate into their minds and souls.

In conclusion, Ethiopians must take back their past, reinterpret their history, regain their glory and reconstruct their future without any paternalistic external interference. All Ethiopians must do away with negligence and procrastination. The duty of retaking the ownership of thatcounty is a mandatory one to every Ethiopian. (Text ends)

Ethiopia is one of worrying countries most likely to have a military coup in2014'

WASHINGTON DC: The Asian state Pakistan has been included in the listof 40 countries having risks of coup in 2014 and residing on the 14th position released by Jay Ulfelder, a famous political scientist who also blogs. A famous political scientist, Jay Ulfelder's mathematical model which forecasted about expected 'coups' across the World in 2014, whilethe Max Fisher has posted the list in Washington Posts on January 28.

Pakistan has been placed on the 14th position in the list while itsneighbouring country Afghanistan is on 12th.

Jay Ulfelder's have maintained the coups' lists since last three years stated that 40 countries are on the list 10 were more prone to risk mostlybelong to sub Saharan Africa except Thailand. Ranking has been finalised on basis of country's political history, present political, social and economic situation prevailing in the countries. There were two coups seenin last year including Mali and Guinea-Bissau, the two West African countries that Ulfelder had rated as particularly high-risk, whereas, his model for 2013 hadn't even included Eritrea in the top 30 most endangered.

As a responsible African I have already done what I expected to do. From here on the readers of Handbook Africa, every sect of the society and anyindividual in particular should think about it and act accordingly. We have to pause and think seriously. It is not all about money, material or wealth,it's about a generation to come.

ETHIOPIA: Israel to Finance Wolkayit Sugar Project'

The Reporter (Addis Ababa) - An Israel construction company, Natifa, secured a loan to be used to finance the Wolkayit Sugar development project from an Israeli bank. Reliable sources told The Reporter that Natifahas been negotiating with Israeli banks that could finance the Wolkayit Sugar factory that the Ethiopian Government planned to build in the TigraiRegional State. Sources said that Natifa secured more than 100 million dollars loan for the project from an Israeli bank. Natifa is working with a local construction company, Yemane Girmay Construction. The public relations department of the Ethiopian Sugar Corporation said it is not aware of the said loan agreement. However, sources said that a loan agreement will be signed by the governments of Israel and Ethiopia in thenear future.

Located at Tigray Regional State 1,350 km from Addis Ababa, Western Zone, Wolkayit Woreda, the Wolkayit Sugar project is one of the ten new sugar factories that the Ethiopian Sugar Corporation is building in differentparts of the country. According to the Ethiopian Sugar Corporation, the Wolkayit Sugar project will have one sugar factory with a cane crushing capacity of 24,000 tons a day that enables it to produce 484,000 tons of sugar and 20,827 cubic meter ethanol per annum.

It will have 45,000 hectares of sugarcane plantation field getting its watersupply from Zarriema River over which a dam known by the name "May- Day Dam" will be built. The construction work of the dam is currently being carried out by a domestic private company - Sur Construction Private Limited Company. The dam upon completion will have 840 meter width and 135.5 meter height. The dam will have a capacity of holding 3,497,000,000 cubic meter of water. The sugar cane plantation is projected to produce 140 tons of sugarcane per hectare.

ASSESMENT: Why Ethiopia Needs to Privatize Land?By Daniel Tefera (PhD) (February 4, 2014)

One of the factors, essential for economic development, is a successful and thorough transformation of subsistence agriculture into commercial farming. This is not just a technical transformation. It is also a social transformation. It requires changing existing property relation through land reform that can privatize land and create owner farmers who will produce for market. In the eighteenth century, United Kingdom achieved agricultural breakthrough by breaking up communal land into private farms so that major technical and biological advances could be introducedinto agriculture. Private ownership of land allowed enterprising individualsmore scope and opportunities for permanent farming and independent experiments. Land began to be used more efficiently; by rotating crops, all the fields could be cultivated, rather than some land lying fallow as hadbeen the practice for several centuries.

In the 1870s, the Dutch were the first to lead in productivity, with the British and Americans soon catching up, because many Dutch farmers owned their land, the feudal nobility was small and weak, and the potential power was in the hands of entrepreneurs. There was greater freedom to produce and sell agricultural products and manufactured goods. Firms could ship their products to markets and hire workers without political restrictions. The United States of America showed a remarkable increase in agricultural productivity thanks in part to the Homestead Act of 1862, which created numerous privately owned family-farm units from large landed estates and reserves of unused land. The government made land purchase feasible by making credit sources available. The Homestead Act of 1862 was a strong democratizing measure.

Realizing that improved agriculture lay at the foundation of a strong nation, Japan carried out a land reform that abolished landlordism and created owner farmers. Under Japan’s 1946 land reform, wealthy landlords were given a reasonable price to sell their land to the government. The government then sold the land on credit to the peasantsat the same price, giving the priority to tenants who had been farming the land. The peasants were given sufficient time to pay their mortgage and no interest was charged. The American Occupation at the time was helpfulfor the success of the reform. The Occupation used its power to enforce a law, which was against the interest of wealthy and powerful landlords.

The Japanese land reform was later emulated in Southeast Asia, especiallyin South Korea and Taiwan. In South Korea's tenant-purchase program, the price of each plot was set at three times its average annual yield. The farmer was given up to fifteen years to pay and no interest was charged.

The farmers embraced the program because they believed that paying forthe land would make their ownership more secure. There have been land reforms in Ethiopian history, but they have always been done for a political purpose to consolidate power of the rulers. Land reform was considered, for the first time, a necessary factor for agricultural transformation and economic development in Ethiopia only after the 1960Coup. In 1961, a separate ministry of land reform was created to study the various land tenure systems of the country. But nothing was implemented because of the formidable opposition by the powerful land- owning class of the royal family, the nobility, the Orthodox Church and high ranking officials.

In 1975, the Stalinist Regime of Mengistu Hailemariam abolished private ownership of land and commercial farms without compensation, making the state the sole proprietor of all land. Peasants were allowed use right only, living as tenants of the state. By controlling all land and keeping it out of the free market, the state prohibited the gainful use of landed property. Worse still, in 1991, the Regime of Meles Zenawi introduced a lease system instead of returning land over to the peasantry. State ownership of land did not produce a property relationship that is significantly different from the imperial system. The state replaced the land-owning class. Peasants still worked the land they didn't own, lackingthe security and pride of an owner.

A genuine land reform that can end state monopoly and privatize land is long overdue in Ethiopia. However, there has to be first a permanent consensus on the rationale for a genuine land reform that can create private ownership, enforced by law. There may be those who believe thatland privatization will bring back the old disparity in land ownership.

Others may say that the peasants will sell their land and move en masse to urban centers to look for jobs, thereby increasing the number of the unemployed. Still others may argue that foreign capitalists will buy all theland, impoverish the people further and threaten the country's sovereignty. Some may even believe that land reform is a non-issue, arguing that China is growing rapidly without it.

Peasants in Ethiopia were opposed to disparity, but not to privatization.Historically, they depended on their holdings as a source of economic security, political power and social justice. Therefore, they had always favored the idea of equal distribution of land and getting their private holdings registered under their names in government tax books. During the reign of Mengistu Hailemariam, peasants preferred private farms to collectivization. The argument that privatization will encourage the peasants to sell their holdings and flee to the urban centers is based on afalse assumption that peasants are irrational people. A recent study by Abeje Berhanu and Ezana Amdework about peasant entrepreneurship debunks this mythology.

The study affirms that in Ethiopia entrepreneurship is a widespread phenomenon among the peasantry, "characterized by a strong orientationto improvement and change, creativity and innovation, new ways of generating income and making profit, pro-activeness and willingness to take risk, far-sightedness and forward planning." Peasant entrepreneurship is essential for consolidating farm sizes and improving productivity. In Ethiopia, because of population pressure in the rural areas, plot sizes have continuously diminished and become uneconomicalto farm. The average size of a cultivated holding is less than one hectare per peasant household.

The argument that privatization of land will flood Ethiopia with foreigninvestors is based on an irrational fear and hatred of the free market system. Investment capital is a scarce resource; and consequently, it moves mainly to places of high return and safety, such as the United States of America or South Africa. The Ethiopian market is not one of these places. In the United States of America, foreigners buy real and financial assets and the inflow of funds has benefited the American economy.

How about the argument that land reform is a non-issue for Ethiopia giventhe Chinese experience? This is just another excuse to postpone the necessary reform. Land is actually owned by the state in China. The so- called "collective ownership of rural land" by the people is an empty promise. The Chinese peasants do not own the land; they cannot sell or mortgage their holdings. On the other hand, the government can expropriate land from the peasants and lease it out to generate revenue.

All this justifies the urgent need for a land reform that can create private ownership in Ethiopia. Land privatization will enable peasants to own (through an affordable land-purchase program) the land they work and have the security and pride of an owner. They will have an incentive to work harder, improve their incomes and be able to save and invest in agricultural improvements. As a wise observer once said, "Give a man thesecure possession of a bleak rock, and he will turn it into a garden; give him a nine year lease of a garden and he will convert it into a desert."

Private ownership of land will compel herders in Ethiopia to show interestin scientific stock breeding and range management practices. The communal range land system has kept the herding communities in Ethiopia in poverty by depriving them of the initiative to be resource- conscious and devise efficient ways of raising cattle. Herders in Ethiopia consider natural resources as free and limitless. As a result, they seek to increase their livestock beyond the carrying capacity of their surroundings.This practice presses harder on the food-feed supply while adding relatively little to consumable meat supplies or productive work-animal capacity.

Private ownership of land will encourage both domestic and foreign entrepreneurs to invest in agriculture. Prior to 1975, there were many successful commercial farms and plantations in Ethiopia, which were owned by domestic and foreign entrepreneurs. They grew industrial cropsand food staples. Productivity per acre of commercial farms was more than five times higher than that of peasant farms. The commercial farms and plantations helped increase the supply of grains and raw materials and enabled the country to be self-sufficient in sugar and cotton production in a short period of time. They provided employment opportunity and contributed to state revenue and foreign exchange earnings. They brought modern technology to the countryside. Private ownership of land in Ethiopia has to be enforced by law and the private farms and agribusinesses that were confiscated by the state have to be returned to their previous owners or a fair compensation has to be paid. Urban land has to be privatized. Private homes and plots that were confiscated by the state have to be returned to their original owners or a fair compensation has to be paid. This will restore faith in the new systemand reassure potential investors.

Government has to get out of the real estate industry and a free market for urban land and housing has to be restored. This will help economize housing and provide potential investors an incentive to increase supply. Instead of a low-rent accommodation policy, government can subsidize home purchases by the low income. This will promote capital accumulationand widen the middle class. The now industrialized countries transformed their economies in a fundamental way by changing their property relationship and uplifting their peasants first. By freeing land and their peasants, they laid the foundation for a democratic, middle class society.

Thus, the question of freedom and democratic development in Ethiopia cannot be resolved without implementing a land reform that can end statemonopoly and transfer land into private hands. The writer, Daniel Teferra,is Professor of Economics, Emeritus

ETHIO-KENYA – 2 Kenyan Cops due in court for abduction of ONLFnegotiators’

(AP) NAIROBI, KENYA (February 4, 2014) Two Kenyan police officers willbe charged in court with the kidnapping of two officials of the Ethiopian rebel group, the Ogaden National Liberation Front, a Kenyan official saidMonday.

Nairobi Criminal Investigations chief Nicholas Kamwende said witnesses identified the two Kenyan officers as having allegedly abducted of Sulub Abdi Ahmed and Ali Ahmed Hussein on Jan. 26 outside a restaurant in thecapital, Nairobi.

The two police officers were brought to court on Monday but the readingof their charges was postponed until Thursday.

Court documents show that Kenyan police believe that after their abduction Ahmed and Hussein were taken to Ethiopia. The rebels want anindependent state for Ethiopia's Ogaden region, which is mostly inhabitedby ethnic Somalis.

Ahmed and Hussein were part of Ogaden rebel team in Kenya for negotiations with the Ethiopian government, said Abdi Rahman Mahdi, thechief negotiator for rebels told AP from London in a telephone interview.

Mahdi said on the day they were abducted, Ahmed, a negotiator, and Hussein, a member of the negotiation team's secretariat, were invited forlunch by an unknown person.

When the two walked out of the restaurant after lunch, six men came outof two cars and attempted to grab them but they resisted causing a melee, Mahdi said reconstructing event from witnesses and accounts given to him by the Kenya police.

Mahdi said Ahmed and Hussein were subdued when one of the abductors pulled out a police identification card and shouted for help from the crowd gathering around to see the commotion claiming that he was arresting twoterrorists "who were planning to bomb the country."

He said with help from some people from the crowd the abductors forcedAhmed and Hussein into the cars using blows and kicks. Mahdi said the two were driven to Moyale, at the Kenyan-Ethiopia border where they were picked up by helicopters

"We fear for their lives and their well-being," he said. Mahdi said he did not think the Kenyan government knew about the abduction and claimedit was solely the work of the Ethiopian military commander in charge of Eastern Command under which the Ogaden region falls.

Shimelis Kemal, an Ethiopian government spokesman, said he has no information about the alleged kidnapping of Ogaden officials in Nairobi.

Mahdi said without the unconditional release of the two rebel membersnegotiations with Ethiopia will not resume and Kenya will no longer be safe as a venue to hold the talks. He said Kenya has been working to revive the talks.

"If they're not returned safely it will be very hard for us to face anotherround of talks with Ethiopia let alone coming to Kenya," he said.

Negotiation between the Ethiopian government and Ogaden rebels brokedown in Oct 2012 after the Ethiopian government side walked out of thetalks. Mahdi claimed the Ethiopian government made demands for the talks to begin which the rebels refused because both parties had agreed there should be no pre-conditions for the talks to be held.

The Ogaden rebels are blamed for the 2007 attack on a Chinese-run oilfield in the region in which scores died. (Text ends)

“Officials are asking why the government has spent such huge money in foreign currency. The money is too much both for the regional and Federalgovernment,” said sources in anonymity.

“The government is telling us that it is fighting corruption. Ato Alemayehu Atomsa’s office refused to give details about his medical bill. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA/KENYA : Kenyan Police officers deny abducting Ethiopian ONLFrebels’

BBC (February 6, 2014) Two Kenyan police officers have pleaded not guilty to kidnapping two Ethiopian rebels in the capital, Nairobi. Painito Bera Ng'ang'ai and James Ngaparini are alleged to have driven to the Ethiopian border and handed them over to Ethiopian officials. The men arefrom a splinter group of the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), fighting for independence for the Somali-speaking Ogaden region. They were in Kenya to facilitate peace talks with the Ethiopian government.

Correspondents say their alleged abduction on 26 January is threatening to scupper the next round of talks. Sulub Abdi Ahmed and Ali Ahmed Hussein are senior negotiators for the ONLF in the talks being brokered bythe Kenyan government.

The ONLF told the BBC Somali Service that it believed the Ethiopian government was behind their kidnapping. But Abdinur Abdullahi Farah, a security adviser to the president of the Somali region, as the Ogaden is officially known, told US VOA radio that the men had given themselves upvoluntarily. Rebels in the Ogaden region have been fighting for independence since the 1970s and the ONLF has been at the forefront of the fight since it was founded in 1984. The Ogaden is an ethnic Somali part of Ethiopia. One ONLF faction has signed a peace deal with the government, but another has continued to fight the army.

ETHIOPIA - EFF sack Soccer Coach'

BBC Sport, Addis Ababa (February 6, 2014) - The Ethiopia Football Federation has sacked head coach Sewnet Bishaw after a disastrous performance at the recent African Nations Championship in South Africa.

Ethiopia lost all three of their group games at the tournament for locally-based players and failed to score a single goal.

The EFF president Juniedin Basha told BBC Sport that the national team'srecent results do not match the nation's current image.

"Sewnet is a hero for our football; he brought us back to the internationalscene, we recognise his success in the last two years but things must continue to grow," he said.

"They don't need to stay stuck somewhere."

Bishaw led Ethiopia to a first Africa Cup of Nations in 31 years when theyqualified for the finals in South Africa last year.

Under his guidance the team also did well in the 2014 World Cup qualifiersas they reached the play-offs, losing 4-1 on aggregate to Nigeria for a place in Brazil.

But results in recent months have cost Bishaw his job.

“We lost both of the World Cup play-off mathces, we didn’t do well at theregional Cecafa Cup and the CHAN results were less of our expectations,they don’t fit a nation of 90 million people, ” Basha added.
The EFF are yet to name a replacement for Bishaw but there is a chancethey could look at hiring a foreign coach for the Walya Antelopes.
“We’ll be looking for a good coach that can push us up to the next level and that could mean a foreign coach taking the post but local coaches arealso being considered – what we need is some-one who can improve us,”Basha insisted.

A HERO TO WOMEN: Childbirth injury gets focus thanks to Dr Hamlin'swork'

By Nicholas D. Kristof (February 8, 2014)

Reproductive healthcare in poor countries is a human rights catastrophe

WE in journalism tend to cover airplane crashes, corrupt officials and loathsome criminals with gusto, but let's take a break and applaud a hero.Dr Catherine Hamlin, an Australian gynaecologist who has spent most of her life in Ethiopia, is a 21st-century Mother Teresa. She has revolutionised care of a childbirth injury called obstetric fistula, which occurs when the baby gets stuck in the birth canal and there is no doctor to perform a Caesarean section. As many as two million women (and oftenyoung teenage girls) worldwide suffer from fistulas. The babies die and the women are left incontinent with urine and sometimes faeces trickling through her vagina. She is stigmatised. She smells. She is ashamed.

Dr Hamlin and her late husband, Reg, set up a fistula hospital in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, and their work proves that it is possible to repair the injuries cheaply. This hospital trained generations of doctors to repair fistulas and provided a model that has been replicated in other countries.At a 90th birthday party for Dr Hamlin last month, former patients cheered as she blew out 90 candles on a cake. Her son Richard, referringto the patients she has helped, declared: "Catherine has one son and 35,000 daughters. Dr Hamlin gave the crowd a pep talk about the need for a big push to improve the world's maternal care.

"We have to eradicate Ethiopia of this awful thing that's happening to women: suffering, untold suffering, in the countryside," she said. "I leave this with you to do in the future, to carry on." Ethiopia this month nominated Dr Cathrine Hamlin for the Nobel Peace Prize, and she deservesit. I hope she gets it along with other extraordinary leaders in women's health such as Dr Denis Mukwege of Congo, Dr Hawa Abdi of Somalia, andEdna Adan of Somaliland. One of the most striking features of Dr Hamlin'swork is the way she empowers recovering fistula patients to help in the treatment of others. (Text ends)

ETHIOPOLITICS: A Glimpse of the Creeping Famine in Ethiopia'

Behold the rider of the Black Horse (famine) eyeing Ethiopia once again'

NBC (February 9, 2014) - NBC News aired an investigative report by Martin Geissler on the creeping famine in Ethiopia. [Ethiopia] is the face ofthe world food crises. In a village in Southern Ethiopia, mothers cue with their malnourished children for emergency rations of food. They can't afford to feed their babies and now it seems neither can the outside world.The distended stomachs, a symptom of the hunger so many here are suffering after two poor harvests in a row, and there are more new cases everyday… They were given food rations ten days ago… The government reserves ran out long ago, and now the U.N. supply is thinning too. They were given food rations 10 days ago… These people get a monthly handout; July's [2013] was cut by a third. The rising price of grain worldwide means an extra one hundred million pounds need to be raised just to keep this up… 400 miles north near the Somali border, we found a changed landscape but the same crises and the rains are late here too andhalf the population needs food aid… They have been given a stark option [by regime representative Omar Abdi] 'I have two options for them: to dieor do the land.' But across this country just now outside help is keeping millions alive. Malnutrition figures continue to rise and show no signs of slowing. This global food crises may be raising food bills in the West but the people here [in Ethiopia] are paying a far higher price.
DIARIES: Ethiopia's Bekoji town of the Champions 16 Olympic medals in20 years'
By Nick Ashdown (February 9, 2014) The village of Bekoji, in the highlands of Ethiopia, has produced long-distance runners who've won 16Olympic medals in 20 years. What explains this remarkable success? "Running is in my blood," says Tolo Debele, feeding his 3-month-old boy Dawit in his gated compound in the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa. "It'schanged everything in my life."
The long-legged 32-year-old is wearing a pair of bright-blue running shoeswith shock absorbers on the heels, provided by his sponsor, Nike. A competitive marathon runner, he's raced in Asia, Europe, and America.
But his wife Askale Tafa has him beat: Their massive dark-wood cabinet inthe living room is packed with sparkling trophies, mostly hers. Fifth place,Boston; third place, Dubai; second place, Berlin.
A few years ago, Tolo and Askale were living a very different life: herdingcattle and farming in Bekoji, the pastoral, grain-producing town in centralEthiopia, several hours south of Addis, where they grew up. They moved to the capital to join a large urban running club, but they've maintained their ties to Bekoji, capitalizing on their athletic success by opening a hotel back home.
Editor's note: Bekoji is one of my favourite places in Ethiopia. Great Ethiopian Athlets have originated from this small town. Political leaders are needed like the athlets that are not limited by their ethnic identity to make all Ethiopians proud by flying the green, yellow and red flag high oninternational fora. Some stupid bunch of people want to downgrade the Oromo people to ethnic level so that they will be limited in their own village, speaking only one language only but it’s impossible to prevent thefree spirited citizens from winning both nationally and internationally.

Ethiopia denies Land give aways to the Sudan, says ready to normalizerelation with Eritrea'

ESAT News (February 10, 2014) - By Staff Reporter Washington DC (USA). Ethiopia denied on Monday giving land to Sudan government, which has been sparked anger for the past several months. While briefingjournalist today about the country’s political situation, Ethiopian PM Hailemariam Desalegne told journalists that Ethiopia didn’t give , “a pieceof land to Sudan” as it was reported in various medias in the past few month. However, admits the agreement reached between his country andSudan to demarcate the border, without giving additional information. Desalegne refused to give details how the agreement beimplemented.

“The government never and ever gives any piece of land to Sudan. There has been negotiation for this since the last three decades. Nothing happenat this stage,” said Desalegne who claims to sign the border demarcation agreement in Sudan a few months back. It was to be recalled that Ethiopian opposition parties and scholars as well as the diaspora communities have been expressing their anger over the agreement sayingthat the agreement aims at giving land to Sudan. Ethiopian authorities hasbeen quite to give details about the agreement with Sudan, and it was thefirst time in months when Ethiopian government break their silence on thematter. PMHD also expressed his county’s determination to normalize relation with neighboring Eritrea, according to reporters in Addis Ababa. Itwas not the first time that Desalegne is inviting Eritrea for such dialogue though there is no reaction from Eritrea.

ETHIOPIA: The village where half the people are at risk of blindness’

SOCIAL NEWS (February 10, 2014) In the village school of Kuyu, in the heartland of Ethiopia's Oromia region, more than 20 children put up their hands when asked if anyone in their family has eye problems. "My motherhas lost vision in one eye and the other is causing her big problems," saysone boy. "She can't see where she's going." Another child says her grandmother is blind in both eyes and is forever pulling out her eyelashes."She rubs and rubs them," explains the nine-year-old girl. "They give her terrible pain." No hands are raised when the children are asked if they themselves have vision problems. Yet, when an ophthalmologist examinesthe children's eyes, more than half of them are discovered to have infectious trachoma, a bacterial infection which is the world's leading cause of preventable blindness. The disease starts in childhood. If untreated, the bacteria causes inflammation that leads to scar tissuebuilding up under the eyelid.

Infectious trachoma:
Causes roughening of the inner surface of the eyelids
After years of repeated infection, scarring on the inside of the eyelid may cause it to turn inward. This leads to the eyelashes rubbing on the eyeball,scarring the front of it Untreated this can lead to sight problems, and eventual blindness The scarring eventually makes the eyelid turn inwards, causing the eyelashes to scratch against the cornea. It is excruciatingly painful and if left untreated leads to irreversible blindness. "The dangerous thing abouttrachoma is that there are very few symptoms for children," says Dr Wondu Alemayehu, one of the leading eye specialists in Ethiopia, and technical adviser for the Fred Hollows Foundation, which is leading a campaign in Ethiopia to tackle the scourge of trachoma. "A child with trachoma would have a little bit of discomfort but not that much. "It's what they pass on to their mothers that can become dangerous." A boy with bandage over one eye Half the children in the village had trachoma. The World Health Organization estimates that 21 million peopleare affected by trachoma, of whom about 2.2 million are visually impairedand 1.2 million blind. The Oromia region in southern Ethiopia is home to more than 30 millionpeople and has the highest prevalence of trachoma in the country at around 42%. The disease prevails in hot dusty areas where people oftenlack access to sanitation. Some three miles (5km) from the school, at a clinic set up to screen for trachoma, 60-year-old Sharage Feyine waits patiently to be examined. She rubs her eyes incessantly and says her vision problems - pain in both eyes and terrible itching - began a year ago. "I used to be able to cook for my family. Now I have become dependent," she says.
Relief to thousands: "The pain and the devastation of trachoma can be stopped by 10 minutes of surgery," says Dr Alemayehu. Dr Alemayehu has trained a team of local health workers to perform trichiasis surgery intheir community. The surgery is designed to rotate the eyelid outwards, directing the eyelashes away from the eyeball. Man pointing to large eye diagram on wall while children listen Health workers educate children about trachoma and the eye Without the correction, the pain and scarringcontinues, eventually causing blindness. Going from village to village, theteam is taking treatment directly to those suffering from the disease.
Within Oromia alone, 200,000 people are at risk of going blind unless they have surgery. Women are twice as likely as men to develop the disease asa result of caring for children who have active trachoma.

Mapping the problem: "Trachoma is a disease of poverty," says Simon Bush, director of the Neglected Tropical Disease programme at Sightsavers. "It is endemic in areas which have poor access to water and sanitation." The British charity is leading a coalition of NGOs with the ambitious aim of ridding the world of trachoma by 2020. The first step is to map the prevalence of the disease - a global survey to examine four million people in more than 30 countries by March 2015. masked surgicalstaff operating on a patient's eye Health workers are trained to carry outthe surgery

The Global Trachoma Mapping Project, funded by the UK Government's Department for International Development, will identify where people are living at risk of the disease and where treatment programmes are needed.Key to the mapping process are specially trained ophthalmic nurses who visit each household in the survey area. Using an app installed on a mobile device, results are instantly uploaded to a site which charts the mapping process.

Monitors also provide antibiotics to anyone showing signs of the infection, and refer those who cannot be treated in this way for surgery. Two days after surgery, Misiak , a woman in her 40s, returns to the clinic with sometrepidation to have her bandages removed. She admits to having had a sleepless night, worrying about the outcome. Dr Wondu Alemayehu watches proudly as two members of his surgical team remove Misiak's bandages before applying ointment to both eyes. Sitting up, Misiak is initially dazed, but as she begins to realise she can see again, a huge smile lights up her face. "You are all beautiful!" she exclaims, reaching outto touch Dr Alemayehu's hand. "My goodness, it's like I have been given another chance at life." Source : www.bbc.co.uk

ETHIOPOLITICS - TPLF and the unsettled question of identity in Ethiopia'

OPride By Israel Fayisa (February 11, 2014) – Political philosopher Thomas Hobbes argued the desire for fulfillment of human needs leads people to fight over material interests such as food, drink, shelter and above all the preservation of their own bodies. Humans have fought over desires for the fulfillment of these material needs since antiquity. Imperialexpansion and colonialism was inspired by a vision to as much resource aspossible. A closer analysis of Ethiopian history shows a similar pattern at work.

But not unlike in other parts of the world, in addition to the quest for economy and political power, conflicts in Ethiopia typically take an ethnic dimension. In the scramble for scarce resource, successive Ethiopian rulers used ethnic identity as a mobilizing force. Wealth enables the groupthat accumulates more of it, allowing them to control and sustain political power. The interplay between identity, economy and politics is at the coreof the current regime in Ethiopia. Destitute individuals – with good connections to power or from a favored ethnic background – have becomemillionaires overnight while others are seeing their millions evaporate at the same speed. Prominent conflict analyst William Zartmanargues that without identity element, distributional inequality is unfocused and cannot be a mobilizingforce. In the past, resource scarcity forced Abyssinian rulers to invade adjourning kingdoms inhabited by different identity groups. Subsequent accumulation of capital helped them sustain dominance over the rest of the people – for a long period of time. Ethiopia's current rulers enhancedthis formula by giving some semblance of recognition to different identitygroups while still maintaining a tight lid over economy and politics.

In theory, the acknowledgment of ethnicity dovetails what Hegel calls man's innate desire to be recognized as a human being with a certain worth or dignity with the quest fulfillment of material needs. Identity andrecognition exists in a comparative relationship. Our humanity is interrelated in a way that our psychology desires recognition from others.A group's identity does not become an issue until it is denied recognition or undermined by others. Wherever there is recognition for equal rights and opportunity, there is less identity related friction among groups.

In the 1960s, land ownership (economic) and ethno-national claims (identity) were the twin burning questions in Ethiopia. It fuelled an already debilitating economic situation and led to the demise of Haile Selassie, Ethiopia's last monarch. His successor, Mengistu Hailemariam ruled the country for 17 years by promptly addressing the land issue. His communist and militant approaches to the identity question shortened hisDergue regime's days. Ethno-national rebels including the Tigrean PeoplesLiberation Front (TPLF), Ethiopia's current rulers, and the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) fled to the mountains to fight for the recognition oftheir respective groups by the ruling Amhara elite. In 1990, they ultimately orchestrated the Dergue's demise by using group identity as the primary mobilizing force.

With Duerg's downfall, for the first time in that country's history, identitywas championed as fundamental for organizing national politics in Ethiopia. Two decades after the adoption of ethnic-based federal structure, identity questions remain unsettled in Ethiopia.

What went wrong? After Duerg, following a brief transitional period, theTPLF transformed itself into a new band of oppressors denying other ethnic groups the same freedoms they fought to win for their Tigrean constituency. They maliciously organized satellite organizations and individuals to control rival ethnic groups, especially the Oromo.

During the transition, the OLF and rebels from other ethnic groups joined the new political framework with the assumption that all identity groups inthe country will have an equal voice on the fate of the nation. Soon, Tigrean elites unleashed their hidden Machiavellian agenda – concentrating political power in the hands of few and forming state- affiliated extractive economic powerhouses.

Once their material and political interests were fulfilled, the Tigrean elitesbegan denying the existence of similar demands by other identity groups.To justify the ethnic hegemony of Tigreans, they noted 60,000 ethnic Tigreans died in the struggle against the Dergue.

Conscious men prefer death to slavery. That is why rebel forces such as the OLF and Ogaden National Liberation Front returned to armed struggleto challenge TPLF's supremacy.

TPLF's misguided policy relies on satellite organizations and captive military officials to control other people's desire for equal worth and dignity. They installed captives and POWs from the war with Dergue whohave serious rehabilitation issues. When the inefficiency of these officers became apparent, the TPLF turned to brainwashing other vulnerable members of the society. So far, these only served to incite further struggle against the regime. The political pursuit beyond recognition as equal is not only unsustainable but it also has an inherent natural fallacy.For its own sake, TPLF should remain loyal to its original cause – freeing Tigray or free all people of Ethiopia.

The current system has shattered the natural balance of equal relationshipamong men. The fight against such system will continue until subordination ends. Slowly but surely, non-Tigrean civil and military officials will continue to defect from the system. The next escapee could well be the prime minister himself.

Today Ethiopia is replete with intergroup conflicts because the identity question is over sensitized without getting proper recognition. Differencesare promoted and exploited in ways it benefits the incumbent party. The Oromo maybe recognized as an Oromo but not as equal with the atse of the day. In essence, TPLF substituted systematic discrimination with Amhara's patrimonial political tradition. Regional officials are equal amongthemselves. But when they work with TPLF personalities, they need to waggle their tails – some more than others. Mistrust among regional satellite organizations is rampant. As a result, resentment is deepening every day as a result of such denigrating relationship between Tigrean juntas and other elites. The Amhara ruling class used assimilation policiesto undermine identity questions. The current regime manipulates intergroup relationships to maintain its grip on power.

TPLF's laws are also creating insecurity around the country. A draconianterrorism law is instituted to silence any dissent against the regime.

Pseudo regional officials send thousands of innocent citizens to jail in the name of security with a single clandestine order from a TPLF intelligence agent. They are putting innocent victims on trial based on invented terror charges. Legitimate questions of right are changed to questions of security. Absent an independent judicial mechanism, the regime maintainsa status that is above the law. There are plethora of cases and evidence whereby officials refused to release prisoners sent free by the courts.

People now seek refuge in TPLF officials' armpits to avoid the wrath of their terror. TPLF is determined to rule by any means irrespective of the lack of consent from the ruled. TPLF leaders proved their disrespect to thepeople of Ethiopia multiples of times. First, they invented satellite organizations instead of peacefully settling differences with genuine leaders of the people. Secondly, they resorted to rigging votes when the people showed their disapproval through ballot box since 1992. Ballot boxes are smuggled in daylight like their contraband businesses.

TPLF's shrewd political goals contaminated the egalitarian Oromo democratic tradition to unparalleled degree. It trained Oromo individuals to become mediocre and give up dignity for limited and temporary gains. They robbed Oromo businesses, humiliated elders, ridiculed the educated,raped girls, tortured the brave, and persecuted and killed the wise so thatno strong leadership could emerge to challenge their rule. TPLF tried to destroy independent thinking and independent economy among the Oromo without which freedom is unattainable.

This generation must not settle for a subservient status. TPLF should notbe allowed to torture and kill those who seek equal recognition of everyone. In Ethiopia, political pursuit of equality is intractably linked to the question of identity. This should give those who seek to reverse eventhis limited recognition a pause. Democracy will only work if the rights ofall identity groups are equally recognized. That is the road to permanentpeace in Ethiopia – a road far too less travelled in this multiethnic nation. Israel Fayisa is a former Oromia Supreme Court judge currently living in exile. (Text ends)

ETHIOPOLITICS: EAF pilot defects, joins Ethiopian Patriots FrontIn Eritrea'

ESAT News: By Staff Reporter , Washington DC (February 11, 2014) - An Ethiopian pilot defects on Monday from the Ethiopian air force, and joins the increasingly popular Ethiopian patriots' Front, officials of the Front toldESAT on Tuesday. "I can confirm you that the pilot, Major Daniel Yeshiwase, abandoned on Monday the Ethiopian regime and joined our Front. He told us that the rampant tribal based discrimination within the Air Force system was the main reason behind his defection," said Nur Jeba, spokesperson of the front. He indicated that the pilot, for L-39 squadron fighter jet, has been detained for being suspected to support opposition parties.

“The pilot has been under a follow up by the Ethiopian security agents. Finally, he succeeded to escape and join our Front. He is in a good condition and decided to join our struggle for a better Ethiopia,” added Nur Jeba. He indicated that the pilot will soon disclose to the public his experience and challenges while serving in the Air Force. It was to be recalled that a few months ago, four Ethiopian pilots have been defected and joined Ginbot 7 Popular Force, which is militarily active in Northern part of Ethiopia, bordering Eritrea. Both the Ethiopian patriots Front and Ginbot 7 popular Force are militarily active in the Northern part of Ethiopia “The rising number of pilots defection shows how bad is the political situation in Ethiopia under the ruling party,” added Nur Jeba. TheEthiopian government didn’t react to the latest defection of the pilot.

USAID’s cover-up of Ethiopia abuses overruled by Congress'

ER (February 12, 2014) The United States Congress has acted to preventits aid to Ethiopia being used to fund forced evictions of tribal peoples in the south west of the country. The provisions in the Omnibus Appropriations Bill for 2014 represent a slap in the face for USAID, whichlast month said that ‘there are no reports of widespread or systematic human rights abuses’ in the region.

In fact, tribes of the Lower Omo Valley are being violently evicted from their villages by the government to make way for lucrative cotton, palm oil, and sugarcane plantations whose irrigation will be made possible by the controversial Gibe III dam. Transferred to designated resettlement areas, the once self-sufficient tribes will be left with no access to their livestock or lands and, consequently, will be unable to sustain themselves.Intimidation tactics, such as rape and beatings, have reportedly been usedagainst those who resist resettlement.

One Mursi man told Survival International, ‘We are waiting to die. We are crying. When the government collects people into one village there will beno place for crops, and my children will be hungry and have no food.’ The Ethiopian government has not consulted any indigenous communities overits aggressive plantation plans in the Omo Valley, and very few were consulted over the construction of the Gibe III dam.

The region’s top human rights body, the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights, has written to the Ethiopian government asking it tohalt the forced resettlement of the Lower Omo tribes while it investigatesSurvival’s submission regarding human rights violations in the area. Ethiopia is one of the biggest recipients of American and Britishaid through the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) and the UK Department for International Development (DFID). Although the provisions in the recent spending bill will force USAID to reevaluate the funding given to Ethiopia, it will ultimatelybe the responsibility of Congress to guarantee that the terms are upheld.

Survival International Director Stephen Corry said today, ‘This bill is a huge step in the right direction, and shows that USAID’s shameful denialsof the human rights abuses being committed in the Lower Omo simply haven’t been believed. ‘American taxpayers want to be sure that their money isn’t going toward the destruction of tribal peoples’ lives. Hopefullythe historic provisions in this year’s spending bill will ensure that’s the case. It is now high time that British parliamentarians follow suit and ensure that DFID does not use UK taxpayers’ money to fund human rightsviolations in the Lower Omo.’ (Text ends)

Former Mayor of Addis now board chair of Railway Corporation’

Local News: The veteran Tigrai Peoples’ Liberation Front (TPLF) fighter, Arkebe Ouqubai has been assigned as Board Chair of the Ethiopian Railway Corporation (ERC) replacing the mayor of the Addis Ababa City Administration Diriba Kuma. Arkebe was assigned in a letter written by PMHailemariam Desalegn as the board chairman of the railway corporation three weeks back.

Arkebe was working as an advisor of the Prime Minister with a ministerial portfolio on construction related issues. Arkebe Ouqubai also got his PhD from the School of Oriental and African Studies in London. The former ERCboard chairman, Diriba Kuma, mayor of the Addis Ababa City Administration, has led the corporation, which undertakes the multibillion dollar projects throughout the country for over one year. The current PM Hailemariam had also led the corporation for many years. Sources said that Arkebe is responsible for the corporation because there are a lot of decisions to make and it needs a lot of guidance right now and the mayor’s responsibilities at the city did not allow him to follow the corporation’s activities in a proper manner. “This is the main reason for the replacement,” a source who is close to the matter told Capital.

Before the 2005 election Arkebe led Addis Ababa and also served as StateMinister of Urban Development. His achievement and leadership capacity in the Addis Ababa city Administration has made Arkebe popular in the country. His close friends describe Arekbe as a workaholic and are confident that he will make remarkable achievements in constructing the railway system that stretches all over the country. Diriba is currently board chairman of the state monopoly ethio telecom.

ETHIOPOLITICS: ANALYSIS - Giant Ethiopia at the Mercy of tiny Djibouti’

“No country is free if remains landlocked”: former PDRE senior official

Ethiomedia (February 12, 2014) WASHINGTON, DC - Landlocked Ethiopia cannot say it is a free country because it is dictated by the tiny port state of Djibouti, a former top leader of the military regime told an internationalradio recently. Captain Fikre Selassie Wogderess, who had served as prime minister for a few years during the military dictatorship between 1987 and 1989, told SBS Radio Australia that Ethiopia is chained to obeythe demands of Djibouti as it doesn't have any other choice. "If not, its existence would be in danger," Fikreselassie said with a tone of resentment.

Fikre Selassie, who was released in October 2011 after 20 years of imprisonment, said any country that doesn't have its own port is not considered a free, self-reliant and independent country. "It's very disturbing to any Ethiopian who has witnessed the downfall of the country to the state of landlocked. Future Ethiopian governments should never stop of addressing the landlocked issue." Fikreselassie also warned againstthe perils of the politics of ethnicity, the mainstay of TPLF's divisive policy,and he said it was for Ethiopians to work together to save their country from the death-trap in store.

The Duerg was toppled in 1991 when rebels of the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF), fully controlled by ultra Eritrean mercenary nationalists led by the late Meles Zenawi, took over the reigns of state power in Addis Ababa, and forcefully campaigned for the recognition by UN of Eritrea as the sovereign power over the entire stretch of the Red Sea up to Djibouti, thus leaving the second most populous nation in Africalandlocked. Many, including top Eritrean officials, if not officially but privately admit that turning Ethiopia into a landlocked nation was solely the work of Meles Zenawi, the man who even deceived US officials to consider his solution to anchor "lasting peace in the region."

For instance, when former US President Jimmy Carter met rebel-leader Meles Zenawi in 1989 in Sudan and elsewhere in European cities, and sawthe future map of Ethiopia as a landlocked nation, a startled Carter asked Meles: "Where is Ethiopia's Red Sea Port?" Carter went on warning Meles that he shouldn't punish future generations of Ethiopia by turning 'his country' into the largest landlocked nation on earth. Meles posed as an Ethiopian and told Carter, "Ethiopia had never had its own port. The Eritreans fought against us for 30 years because we had annexed what belonged to them." Meles Zenawi died in August, 2012 but his toxic legacyremains largely intact as Ethiopians still drag their feet from forging a common stand to remove the regime. (Text ends)

Ethiopian Ministry of Culture and Tourism: Mismanagement and Failure'

Ethiomedia (February 12, 2014) Excerpts from a research paper “The Culture and Tourism Ministry”: Mismanagement and Failure” By Mengesha

R. Endalew.

STORY HIGHLIGHTS

The four branches of the ministry –

The Ethiopian Wildlife Conservation Authority (EWCA), Ethiopian CulturalCenter, Ethiopian National Archives and Library Agency (ENALA)

The National Theatre which are weakened by the regime and in turncontribute least for the record of the Ministry.

ASSESMENT: I) Administrative Setbacks: to begin with, people hired in this Ministry are poorly paid; poorly treated and poorly managed. The majority of ministers, authority directors and department managers are the most wrecked ones even in comparison to other sectors in the country. All of these lead to have the weakest of all ministries of the country where it depends on other sectors like an endoparasite which livesinside the body of the host.

The fundamental problem begins from the heads of the Ministry. The Ethiopian government appointed H.E Mr. Amin Abdulkadir who doesn't understand even the very meaning of Culture and Tourism. It is more than just a shame to hear him reading a prepared English speech in international academic conferences where he stumbles to identify one letter from the other being unable to understand its context. He stammerslike a grade nine lazy student asked by his teacher to read a paragraph from his English text book. The problem is not merely with the language but also his miniature ideas and bad networking system with directors andmanagers who are highly damaging the institution.

The two best examples with regard to his bad networking in the ministry would be that he appointed his corrupted friend whom he regards like a brother, Mr. Yonas Desta, as the director general of the Authority for Research and Conservation of Cultural Heritage (ARCCH). Though there isno proof at all, Mr. Yonas is said to be a graduate of Industrial Engineering. Imagine the role of an Industrial Engineer in the research and development of heritage! The most hurting act against ARCCH is not just his unmatching profession but also his never ending and tiring wordswithout deeds. Professionals are now so tired that they preferred to leavethe institution and find another means to survive though their professionsand experiences are directly related and more relevant to ARCCH. The main activities of ARCCH are inventory, research, nomination file and management plan preparation, conserving and preserving tangible and intangible cultural heritage resources as well as laboratory work. But the notorious Yonashas weakened each activity one by one over time.

I have been working in an Inventory, Inspection and Standardization directorate and planned to carry out inventory on prioritized heritage resources of the country. A team was organized by the respected directorate so as to accomplish the planned tasks. Subsequently, a team of four people that I led conducted its first inventory work on Addis Ababamonuments. The task was accomplished in a successful manner filing not less than 50 pages of study with the main content of inventory. However, when the team summoned to conduct meetings with the concerned stakeholders, the selfish Yonas banned the team not to go beyond the paper work. We were upset and wondered why he said so. But we later discovered that it was an envy and fear of losing his position since we were about to communicate with the public. Dear readers! Please look around the city of Addis Ababa and visit the statues. Everywhere you openyour eyes at each statue, you see sheets, pees but you find no interpretation panel telling you when and how the statue was erected and what it deals about. Besides, no heritage development activities are carried out for economic benefit through tourism. One might raise a question why this task is not the responsibility of the Addis Ababa Tourismand Culture Bureau. The answer is simply ARCCH claims to carry out inventory on country representative statues where these should be under the responsibility of ARCCH. Indeed, it has the total mandate on all the heritage aspects of the country. In any case, our plan of conducting inventory from Addis Ababa monuments to the whole heritage resources of the country became paralyzed by the selfish Yonas.

II) Research Politics and Corruption: - As far as research is concerned, theincompetent Yonas has made all his efforts to weaken, especially, domestic researchers. He succeeded making the domestic research on heritage shows zero result, and tried to align him to one of the international research groups – the Hadar research project team which is known for discovering the famous Lucy. Indeed, Lucy was said to be discovered and studied by the famous physical anthropologist of this planet, Professor Tim White, who was a young researcher in the Hadar Research project team in the middle of the 1970s. Nevertheless, White didnot live long with the Hadar. Because he founded the Middle Awash Research Project with his Ethiopian colleagues and referenced scientists, namely Dr. BerhaneAsfaw and Dr. Gedey Woldegebriel in 1981. Today, the two projects are found to be rivals of one another. Exploiting the differences between the two projects, the rudimentary Amin and the talkative Yonas are getting bribes from theHadar Research Project led by professor Johanson in different forms. For example, when Lucy went to USA for a five year visit, it was said to earn 6 million dollars. But the two corrupt people told us, without justification, that Lucy brought only 1500 dollars. Formal auditing has not yet been conducted even with the little money that the two brazens disclosed on media.

The other major scandal of the two corrupts is the embezzlement of the 10% fee from each research project. There are more than 30 research projects which are being carried out in Ethiopia. Each project is required to show a verification of an average of 50, 000 dollars and more to carry out their researches, and need to pay 10% of the total amount as a permit fee. This 10% fee has been accumulated for several years. Imaginehow much it can be from more than 30 research projects for decades! Thismoney is not properly audited for the simple reason that it is out of the government audit and the money is supposed to be used for short and long term training of professionals who work in ARCCH including the National Museum. It is also supposed to be used for the encouragement ofdomestic researchers. But there is no even a single professional who has been benefiting from the 10% fee. Now, the scandalous Amin and Yonas are dividing it between themselves through different means. Sometimes, they take this money as a per diem when they travel abroad. For example, Yonas has travelled abroad for more than 15 times just in a single year, and his costs were covered by the host organizations.

However, most of the time he takes the 10% permit fee money as adouble per diem every time he goes abroad.

Mr. Amin, totally incompetent and unprofessional, yet the Minister, has somany embarrassing activities. Let me add one more account to let the audience understand better how the Ministry of Culture and Tourism is becoming a place where you find bad boys appearing to be bosses. A person of low intelligence and known by the name Desalegn Abebaw announced himself that he used to teach at a junior school in the Afar region for several years calculating a sort of benefit from the poor mind Amin (by the way Amin's thesis from a University in England was written by someone else, but so shame that Amin didn't understand what his MA thesis was talking about. Luckily, he found a helping brain – almost the same way he had in his undergrad that did all parts of the thesis and eventually make him show a "degree", like so many other TPLF/EPRDF appointees). Desalegn met his objective that Amin promoted and appointed him as a Director of Research Directorate in ARCCH, ousting Dr.Yonas Beyene. Dr.Beyene is both a French and American educated scholarin the field of Archaeology and Heritage with long years of research and teaching experiences. However, Amin shamelessly replaced this resourceful person with no reason and excuse, other than nepotism and personal biases, by Desalegn who is a little better than a domesticated ruminant.

Desalegn presided himself as a sole actor in the ARCCH followed by the loquacious Yonas Desta referring the name Amin who was his friend, andthus no one touched him in the Ministry. He intimidated all people from janitor to senior professionals and even his counterpart directors.

Desalegn is a holder of diploma in history and BA degree in political science from night shift class at Kotebe Teachers Training Institute and Addis Ababa University respectively. With the support of Amin, he commenced to study an MA degree at Addis Ababa University, but failedto understand the lessons in class. He then hired three professionals unlawfully namely, Chernet, Abebe Mengistu and Habtamu whom they became his clicks voluntarily.

However, they turned against him when they understood he was a real idiot in many ways. These three professionals were doing all the term papers and the final thesis of his MA study. As a reciprocal, he has beenappointing them as focal persons/antiquity officers for the foreign research projects I mentioned above almost in all research seasons of theyear. Two advantages were acquired being an antiquity officer. Firstly, theforeign researchers who work in Ethiopia are famous scientists, and thus the professionals learn a lot from them. Secondly, the per diem during thelong season stay in the field was economically supportive because an officer had to get a net of 25 dollar per day exclusive of any other expenses such as food and bed.

Desalegn was also appointing other poor professionals as antiquity officersand got commission after they came back from fieldwork. One of the professionals who approached me confirmed that he once made an agreement with Desalegn and paid him 10% of the total amount of his perdiem during a thirty days research field season. It means that 10% of $25x30 days which amounts to $75. This is just from one person, but the total will be an average of $75x30 antiquity officers which again equates to $2,250 per year. This is the real evidence of rent seeking where everybody in ARCCH chats and rumors. Actually, it was not only confined under rumor but some brave professionals were exposing his corrupt acts.Sadly, the regime's anti-corruption commission preferred silence. The severe damage is not the corruption act but the way that Desalegn excludes trained and experienced professionals and uses the weak ones who have no care for their conscience. That is why today you see several conservation problems in the huge and unique obelisks of Aksum, Tiya, and Gondar as well as the astonishing rock hewn churches of Lalibela and many other heritage sites in the country.

III) Incapacity and Corruption in the Tourism Sector: Though Ethiopia hasimmense tourism potential resources that could make it to be one of the best niche markets in Africa, it is found to be feeble to capture a large share of the tourism market in the region, and unable to transform its cultural and natural resources into economically productive assets. The major reason of my assessment of the sector is the least focus of the Ethiopian government towards the sector.

The officials who are appointed in the sector and the Ministry in general are not based on their knowledge, capacity and experience. In the Ministry one can find a higher official who could have to fit a janitor position only, and a director who equals to an ordinary thief and charlatan. It is rather a showcase of representations of the nation and nationalities principle. It is plausible from the fact of the status quo that the Ethiopian government deliberately appoints miniature officials like the frivolous Amin Abdulkadir to the Ministry of Culture and Tourism under theguise of ethnic representation. There has been so many other Afar scholars with better competence and can lead the institution much better than the incapacitated Amin if the government wants to stick with its principle of representation, neglecting the right administration based on capacity. The root of the problem with Amin's feeble administration is his foolish networking leadership where contemptible managers are created in every department of the institution though this is not out of public sarcasm. It is really lamenting and even embarrassing for the brutal regime who allows these miniatures to do whatever they want to in this historically very old and vast country.

H.E. Mrs. Tadelech Dalecho, as a female leader, had some track records. She had an effort of gathering professionals from different angles but withsuspicion of losing her position, and fearing to take any risk contrary to leadership principle. Since I am exposing why the tourism sector is paralyzed, all I am mentioning here is her weakest contributions towards the tourism sector. Not to slack her position and get support from other ministers, she appointed Theodros Derbew only with zero year experience.He began his job as a director of Standardization and Accreditation directorate being this very young guy was a brother of Tefera Derbew, Minister of Agricultural Ministry. Standardization and Accreditation directorate was expected to run affairs related to hotels, motels, lodges, tour operations and other tourism investment activities. This was beyond the capacity of the young Thewodros. No standardization and accreditation have been given at least to the hotels in and outside Addis Ababa for several years. As a result the hoteliers were so tired of the Ministry and they were forced to give different standards nominating levels of stars to their hotels by themselves with no approval from any legal entity. Hoteliers, lodge owners, tour company owners and other people who involve in the Ethiopian tourism business consider the tourismsector just as an obstacle, not as a facilitator for which it had expected to do.

On the other wing of the tourism sector, Tadelech appointed a corrupt guywhom she considered another right hand man from her origin SNNP, Girma Timer as a direoundedctor of Tourism Development and Marketing directorate, replacing a well deserved and experienced professional Ayele Gelaneh. The rent seeker, but so perceived by Tadelech as a right hand man, was looking for any means to go abroad under the pretext of tourism promotion, and embezzled some amount of money by making fraud. He vends Ethiopian maps and other promotional materials which are legally declared to be disseminated for free, and use the money for hisown consumption. He did this even during my presence in Milan, Italy.

The shameless corrupt, Girma Timer, doesn’t give any care for a regular activity so long as he gets a clue for bribe from tourism business people. Sometimes he did call all professionals including me in the department and let us be idle from dawn to dusk while every one of us had some kindof business at office. We have been wasting two to three days in a week summoned by him for a meeting but without sitting in chairs. We were told by him to walk corridor after corridor till he finished his rent seeking chats with tourism business people. Many practical projects have been failed due to his hindrance where he awaited the projects not to be implemented for a while till he got some bargain from each project. As a reciprocal I have been challenging him and informed to officials that he was misusing his authority. But no official, Tadelech included, had ears tohear this malpractices. The only thing they say is ‘let’s fight rent seekers and through time there will be improvement’ while the real rent seekers are still at the managerial position and continuing their embezzlement. I later understood that this is the nature of the incumbent regime which is sacking the country’s resources. (Text ends)

Northern Ethiopia is hardly known for its forests. Less than 5 percent of what once stood here remains, and what’s left is under constant threat . As in so many developing countries, much of Ethiopia’s natural landscapehas been cleared for agriculture, and for harvesting timber and firewood.Fortunately, there are still hundreds of notable exceptions: bright green patches of forest surrounding the country’s churches. Protected as sacredsanctuaries, some of these forests are over fifteen hundred years old.

They range in size from just five acres to more than 1,000. A direct resultof the Orthodox Church’s mission to retain a green necklace around the place of worship—a veritable “home for all God’s creatures”—these forestshave become the centerpiece in the struggle to conserve what remains of northern Ethiopia’s biodiversity.

The threats to Ethiopia’s church forests are many. Villagers harvest timber, cattle invade and eat seedlings, and farmers till around the forest edges—often pushing across the perimeter and chipping away at the whole. In a country where resources are extremely scarce, few funds existto buy fences to safeguard these biological treasure-troves…

CYBER ATTACKS: Regime use spyware against journalists, even in U.S’By Craig Timberg, Washington Post (February 13, 2014)

ESAT’s Mesay Mekonnen was at his desk, at a news service based in Northern Virginia, when gibberish suddenly exploded across his computer screen one day in December last year. A sophisticated cyberattack was underway. But this wasn’t the Chinese army or the Russian mafia at work.Instead, a nonprofit research lab has fingered government hackers in a much less technically advanced nation, Ethiopia, as the likely culprits, saying they apparently bought commercial spyware, essentially off the shelf. This burgeoning industry is making surveillance capabilities that once were the exclusive province of the most elite spy agencies, such as National Security Agency, widely available to governments worldwide.

The targets of such attacks often are political activists, human rights workers and journalists, who have learned that the Internet allows authoritarian governments to surveil and intimidate them even after they have fled to supposed safety. That includes the United States, where laws prohibit unauthorized hacking but rarely succeed in stopping intrusions.The trade in spyware itself is almost entirely unregulated, to the great frustration of critics.

“We’re finding this in repressive countries, and we’re finding that it’s beingabused,” said Bill Marczak, a research fellow for Citizen Lab at the University of Toronto’s Munk School of Global Affairs, which released a report Wednesday. “This spyware has proliferated around the world .?.?. without any debate.”

Citizen Lab says the spyware used against Mekonnen and one other Ethio-pian journalist appears to have been made by Hacking Team, an Italian company with a regional sales office in Annapolis. Its products are capableof stealing documents from hard drives, snooping on video chats, reading e-mails, snatching contact lists, and remotely flipping on cameras and microphones so that they can quietly spy on a computer’s unwitting user.

Some of the targets of recent cyberattacks are U.S. citizens, say officialsat Ethiopian Satellite Television’s office in Alexandria, where Mekonnen works. Others have lived in the United States or other Western countriesfor years.

“To invade the privacy of American citizens and legal residents, violatingthe sovereignty of the United States and European countries, is mind- boggling,” said Neamin Zeleke, managing director for the news service, which beams reports to Ethiopia, providing a rare alternative to official information sources there.

Citizen Lab researchers say they have found evidence of Hacking Teamsoftware, which the company says it sells only to governments, being used in a dozen countries, including Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Sudan, Saudi Arabia and Azerbaijan. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA: What next for over 150, 000 repatriates from Saudi Arabia'

It has to be recalled that over 100,000 Ethiopian migrants were rapidlyrepatriated last year when the Saudi kingdom decided to expel them unceremoniously.

ASSESMENT: On a hot afternoon in January, hundreds of young Ethiopians filed out of a parked Saudia airplane and streamed into the international terminal of Addis Ababa’s Bole International Airport, many clutching young children and oversized luggage. We are also happy to take our citizens, who should be treated with dignity while they are there.They are but a handful of the estimated 150,000 Ethiopians who are beingrepatriated from Saudi Arabia after the government announced a crackdown on undocumented foreign workers in early 2013, which is part of an attempt to ease the country’s 12% unemployment rate. When a seven-month grace period for undocumented workers to leave the country expired, Saudi security forces began carrying out visa raids in Manfouha, alow-income neighbourhood known to house many foreign workers in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia's capital, with some Ethiopians reportedly killed in the offensives. The Saudi government launched the Nitaqat programme toincrease the participation of Saudis in the workforce, leading to regularisations throughout 2013 and the expulsions of late 2013 into January 2014.

Ethiopia's foreign affairs minister Tedros Adhanom told Reuters that the raids were unacceptable. "We call on the Saudi government to investigatethis issue seriously," he said. "We are also happy to take our citizens, whoshould be treated with dignity while they are there." In the first week of the crackdown, more than 20,000 Ethiopians surrendered to Saudi authorities as anti-African sentiment, fuelled by months of media campaign, reached a fervour, and armed gangs comprised of security forces and ordinary citizens intimidated migrants. "Saudi authorities have spent months branding foreign workers as criminals in the media and stirring up anti-migrant sentiment to justify the labour crack-down," said Joe Stork, Human Rights Watch's deputy Middle East director.

No work for returnees: Two weeks after the crackdown began in November 2013, Tedros said that Ethiopia was doing "everything possibleto repatriate citizens from Saudi Arabia within 14 to 25 days". The International Organisation for Migration (IOM) assumed responsibility for repatriating Ethiopians and appealed for emergency transportation funding, but it faces a $12m shortfall. Addis Ababa initially expected to receive 30,000 citizens and allocated just $5m in funding for the repatriation process, but the number soon swelled to nearly 150,000.

Ethiopia is already grappling with a 17.5% urban unemployment rate, according to the United Nations Development Programme, so returnees are likely to face trouble finding work. A recent crackdown on migrants inIsrael – a popular destination for Ethiopians – means that Ethiopia's masses of unemployed youth have fewer options. (Text ends)

Ethiopian mushrooms hold antioxidant potential, researchers say'

ASSESMENT (February 13, 2014) Ethiopian mushrooms hold antioxidant potential, with wild mushrooms proving stronger than cultivated, according to the first research looking at country's edible offerings. The researchers from Addis Ababa University and Pennsylvanian State University collected the samples from the Addis Ababa, Kaffa zone and Benishangul Gumuz region of Ethiopia. They were obtained personally by the researchers or from local people or markets. Mycological experts were recruited in order to help identify the wild mushrooms. The samples were then dried in a drying oven until they had a consistent weight, then milled to fine powder. The researchers employed a methanolic solution to test the radical scavenging of each powdered mushroom. The solution starts asa deep purple colour and fades when an antioxidant is present. A similar method was used to track the presence of reductants (antioxidants), witha ferricyanide solution (Fe2+) turning from a yellow colour to shades of green and blue depending on the reducing power of each compound.

ETHIOPIA/SUDAN: Is Border Demarcation a priortized issue?Greediest Nature of the Sudanese Government

ASSESMENT By Netsanet Zeleke - Should I say few words to slightly describe who I am? If I should, this is I in brief; I am a citizen of the disfigured or deformed Ethiopia, of the 21st century, temporarily living in Addis Ababa hiding myself from the direct scorch of TPLF, the mercenary junta hired by our torrential sins to severely punish us. I believe in a God;that God being the God of truth and light. I most certainly believe that theGod I believe in has His own time to do, redo, or undo what He thinks is best to His subjects based on His own schedule. I believe in all His modusoperandi. I believe He is the Alpha and Omega, the first and the last Who decides the fate of not an individual but also that of a nation. Creed is personal. Take it and live it or leave it and get relieved from it. Now to theSudan.

I wonder how the leaders of this large country, maybe as large as more than three or four fold of that of the size of Ethiopia, have become inexplicably foolish to crave a piece of land, leave alone the alleged 1000+kms x 60+kms of huge territory, from the land of lions! Ethiopians are lions in the time of theirs; not actually in such times of temporary submission to and strategic retreat from organized international conspiracy, a conspiracy to eliminate one national and Pan-African pride which may vie the megalomaniacal political and economic interests of theBig Brother(s). [We know that the primary source of our chronic political problem has to do something with the global monster which has always been responsible for the grotesque shape of our planet; the horn of this monster, the offspring of the serpent, is in Ethiopia while its tail is abroad.] It is surprising that the Sudanese leadership is qualitatively so low that it aspires to grab territorial lands from consciously sleeping lions and tigers miscalculating the future risk. It is really wonderful to see suchignorant bargainers in this age of common sense. In terms of responsible statesmanship, they are mentally crippled to the extent of not recognizingthe negative consequences of dealing with an illegal organization such as TPLF that is known for its nihilistic and destructive nature. [The world knows the nature of TPLF that it can happily arrange an auction sale to sell even the whole Ethiopia if there is any volunteer to buy.] I wonder how many foolish and gluttonous people are collaborating with the historical enemy of Ethiopia, TPLF, to dismantle this land of shrines. I wonder how the people of the Sudan, especially around the borders, havebecome supportive of the mad leaders of Khartoum while their counterparts, the people of Ethiopia, are in jeopardy, and in a dumbfounding silence due to the incredible experience they are forced to pass through. To my knowledge, the Sudan has always been unpredictable. Behaviorally, it is our common understanding that the government of [the] Sudan has most often been known for its consistent inconsistence in any of the relations it has had with neighboring states orbeyond.

Understandably, the Sudanese, both the leaders and the leadee, seem to be lost in a capricious or illusory state of mind; following their natural bent, perhaps. Despite the fact that they have an uncontrollably enormousmass of land, they dream to have some more land from Ethiopia, a country temporarily without her own children as leaders, rather, a countrybeing mistreated and sentenced by butchers, butchers who had usurped the palace some years back, to being apportioned to anyone who claims any size of land. By the way, even the farthest countries such as Honoluluor Haiti can claim and secure any size of land from Ethiopia as long as TPLF is in power; this happens because; 1. TPLF is in dire need of money to run its business empires and fill the coffers of its bottomless pits, the corrupt idiot officials. 2. TPLF is an alien to Ethiopia and literally it is Un- Ethiopian; therefore, this junta has no any sense or feeling of national sentiment. 3. TPLF wants to destroy what Ethiopia is known for, be it cultural, religious, or social heritage and/or territorial integrity. TPLF simply wants temporary political power that enables it to demolish the nation and accumulate wealth. Period! And hence, any entity that negotiates and signs any agreement with respect to the interest of the Ethiopian people is by default the enemy of Ethiopians and the agreement(s) will automatically be invalid when our own government comes into being. It is against the interest of all sane Ethiopians if any country reaches at any agreement with TPLF; that agreement may even stoke up devastating wars between Ethiopia and the country in question.

It is due to this that the Sudan must think twice before negotiating withTPLF. TPLF will surely go to its historical grave soon but the country andthe people are there eternally. Whose interest should be respected? It isup to the Sudan to differentiate what is profiting and what is not.

Anyway, please listen to me, Ms. Sudan. Know that Ethiopia has been slumbering especially for the last 23 years. She has been deprived of all her rights as a country and her people as a people. The astonishing silence of nearly 90 million people of the nation doesn’t mean the countryshould be something MONEY CAN BUY. No! No! No! Such an ill-fated disposition can happen to any country. There is a time of hibernation as there is a time of aestivation; there is a time of grace as there is a time ofdisgrace. Probably, Ethiopia and Ethiopians are currently paying off their debt of some historical curses imposed by certain national karmatic occurrences in the past; it is the same to Syria or Iraq or Afghanistan et al. Don’t get surprised, others will follow suit maybe soon. No country, or no people if you will, has immunity from karma cleansing, dear guys! Andhence, mark my words, when Ethiopia rises from the dead, everyone should know that no force can stop her people from attaining their rights.

No weapon can set them back from conquering their enemies in time of justified wars, albeit, to my conviction, wars shouldn't seek any form of justification. Go to historical galleries and check it by yourselves. Besidesour historical achievements in science and technology, like in architecturead fine arts, such as the obelisks and the rock-hewn churches we have, ifwe have something to be proud of, it is "making wars" and become triumphant. Led by genuine Ethiopians, regardless of ethnicity, we are there at the tower of almost any war we engage. Time will prove us everything if I am telling a lie.

Leave alone the Sudan, this country of yesterday, this country of fragility,this country of [all what we know], other accomplices all together will get their due reward when Ethiopia rises again and begins to torch the beaconof independence and human liberty as before.

I personally don't get that much surprised by what I observe here and there worldwide to destroy this otherwise beautiful country, Ethiopia. I don't get that much upset when I see people craving to get their share in a situation like Ethiopia where there is a chance to ransack and loot the resources, resources that have no proper owners, instead, in a situation where there is favorable condition created by TPLF to sell out anything Ethiopian; it might be unnaturally natural to voraciously devour upon the available scavenge among scavengers. But I prettily understand that every action has an equivalent retribution from above or from below, or perhaps from both in a synchronized manner. This is what has to be feared. Many people in this world, including the Sudan-TPLF syndicate, arepitifully myopic. They don't want to learn from history. They are regrettably adamant and are the causes of avoidable destruction upon their nations as well as their loved ones. They think everything stays permanently stable; they are absolutely wrong. I think money and other secular possessions blind people

Thanks to TPLF, the Sudan may annex a big amount of land from Ethiopia;it is fine and good luck guys there. But, alas for the future relationship of this country of moron leaders with the future generation of Ethiopia; a hard time that the Sudan will never challenge will surface in the Horn of Africa if what we hear is true. Sudan should know that TPLF is just an iota of black spot when compared with the entire history of Ethiopia. Now, it is a time allotted to the Judas. Now, it is the time of traitors. Now, it is a time of stupidity and self-denial. But it doesn't mean this ugliest Ethiopian scenario stays forever. Never! It will change soon. When it changes, we will go up to Khartoum and will do whatever the situation demands by then. I am warning, not intimidating and my source of confidence is the God of truth. He is impatient to take revenge upon the outlaw scoundrels, such as TPLF and its collaborators, wherever they might be dwelling now or in the later times of the ultimate judgment upon the crooked. We have been witnessing this inevitable divine intervention since time immemorial. Today, everything seems conducive to harass Ethiopians and do anything harmful against them, wherever they might be living, in or out of country.Thanks to God, the golden time of this historic country is coming soon. Bythen, alas for those who have been the reasons for the suffering of Ethiopians; understandably, these miskin Ethiopians, these poverini, haveby no means been the causes of atrocity to anyone, especially nowadays.Though some might not be as good as they are expected to be so to eachother on individual basis, they are nice and congenial to live with the people of other countries in the world. They are hard working. They show earnest efforts to grow through hard work. They are not menaces to any citizen on the planet. These days, their major problem is lack of a countryof their own; due to this, they may show some restlessness and may become victims of hopelessness. That affects many citizens a lot and maydisturb their life. But this doesn't mean they will remain in this mode of life forever.

I don't have any intention to tell the Sudanese to quit this land grab (border-grab?), from ownerless Ethiopia; on the other hand, I don't want to say 'Sudan, keep it up this vulgarism'; these things are things to be leftfor their discretion.
Moreover, I don't have any interest to say the same to TPLF gangsters because I perfectly understand that they are simply hellish instruments topunish us. They themselves are prisoners of evilness, i.e, the negative energy; they have little chance to abandon the satanic deeds they are committing and get freedom. If they could, they would; but they are predestined for such a ruinous act of national atonement.

DIARIES - Ras Taffarians at their Promised Land'VANITY FAIR Tom Freston (February 14, 2014)
Drive 155 miles south from Addis Ababa, Ethiopia's capital, and you'll findyourself in a little patch of Jamaica, where dreadlocked Rasta settlers, many born in the Caribbean, have now made their home. Welcome to thecommunity of Shashemane—Ethiopia's version of "Amish country."
You do not have to look far in Africa to see the influence of reggae music. Once I met a Tuareg tribesman in the Sahara Desert who proudly played me a Bob Marley ringtone on his cell phone. Reggae music swept 'round the world in the 1970s, then receded a bit in most places. It still lives large in Africa. There is great reverence for the Jamaican classics, but there are also many lively local scenes. Reggae is music for the dispossessed, and Africa itself plays a leading role in reggae's narrative. Inreggae mythology, Africa is the Promised Land, the destined homeland where the African diaspora will someday be repatriated. Africa—and Ethiopia in particular—is the "Land of Zion" sung about in so many reggae songs.

Reggae has its own code and language, infused largely with the ideology of the Rastafarians—followers of a spiritual system that arose in the 1930sin Jamaica. A big influence on the Rastafarians was Marcus Garvey, a Jamaican political leader in the 1920s who led a Back to Africa movement among descendants of slaves throughout the Americas. Rastafarians regard Garvey as a prophet who predicted that one day a black man would be crowned king in Africa and would bring deliverance to dark- skinned people everywhere.

"Follow, follow, follow, follow Marcus Garvey's footsteps," sang reggae singer Burning Spear. And where exactly was Garvey going? "We're leaving Babylon, we're going to our father's land," Bob Marley told us in "Exodus." Not Babylon, Long Island, mind you, but the metaphorical one where, as Marley sang, "the system is the vampire"—the wicked place that embodies all of what's wrong with Western culture. Babylon, as SteelPulse said, "makes the rules . . . where my people suffer."

When Haile Selassie I was declared emperor of Ethiopia, in 1930, the followers of Garvey believed Garvey's prophecy had been fulfilled. They declared His Imperial Majesty to be the Messiah, or "Jah." Selassie's pre-coronation name, Ras Tafari Makonnen, was adopted to name their movement.

Last November, I had some business in Ethiopia, but I went a couple of days early. We know much about the influence of Ethiopia on the Rastafarians. I was curious to see the impact of the Rastafarian movement on Ethiopia. Rastafarians encourage their followers to pick up and head to Ethiopia, to repatriate. Underneath reggae's cool backbeat rhythms are endless messages to get thee back to Zion. Billions of dollars worth of thatmessage have been repeated over and over, all around the planet, for the past 40 years. With more than a million Rastafarians in the world now, shouldn't Ethiopia be teeming with Rastas?

Well, "teeming" isn't quite the word, but there is a thriving community. In1948, Haile Selassie made a substantial land grant to accommodate, for free, any Caribbean of African descent who wanted to "come home." A wave of Rastafarian settlers in the late 60s made that community come alive. The land grant was in a village called Shashemane, deep in the beautiful Rift Valley, a six-hour drive south from Addis Ababa, the capital.I got a car and headed down.

Ethiopia these days is very much a country on the move. Once synonymous with famine (think Live Aid), it now has one of the fastest- growing economies in Africa. People in the capital told me that the Rasta settlement in Shashemane was today a bit of a tourist attraction for middle-class Ethiopians. Ethiopia has been through a lot of changes in thelast 40 years. Haile Selassie and the monarchy were overthrown in a violent communist coup in 1974. That new regime, called the Derg, fell to rebels, in 1991, and then a new federal republic was declared in 1994. Anything connected to Selassie fell out of favor, and Shashemane enduredsome tough decades. Much of the land grant was reclaimed. Still, hardcore settlers hung on, and although the number of new arrivals diminished, immigration continued. I wondered if this Jamaican outpost had now become some sort of dreadlocked attraction for day-tripping sightseers—the African equivalent of Amish country.

The road south out of Addis was initially rough and congested with belching Chinese dump trucks, but it soon opened up to a clear new highway. Traffic thinned to mostly just donkey carts, the occasional cattle herd, and the constant stream of pedestrians you see on African roads. Itwas a stunning drive and got better as we went along. The sky was clear blue, expansive, and dotted with striking cumulus-cloud formations. We drove on past beautiful lakes. The scenery got progressively more verdant, almost tropical. A few miles outside of Shashemane, I saw a signwith Bob Marley's image and the red, yellow, and green Rasta colors.

Shashemane's main drag is a major highway lined on both sides with rickety wooden stalls selling Rasta gear and drinks. Scooter taxis, with dreadlocked drivers, were parked at all angles. There is a small museum, signs for lodges and juice restaurants, and various temples for worship. A few aggressive hawkers aside, it seemed to be a friendly and happy place.People smiled, warmly greeting "brothers and sisters" with back-and-forthsalutations in the unmistakable Jamaican patois. There were no throngs of Rastas or tourists, though. The vibe was very quiet, very small town. The real action seemed to be on the many dirt lanes that run off into the jungle.

I had arranged to meet some of the community's "elders" and also with a reggae musician, Sydney Salmon. "Like the fish," he says," but they call me Solomon here." Born in Jamaica, he migrated to New York, studied music, played with many notable reggae artists, including Beres Hammond, became a Rasta, and then, in 2000, released a single, "Shashemane on My Mind." It must indeed have been on his mind, because he soon packed up and moved here, marrying an Ethiopian woman, and forming the Imperial Majestic Band. He has become a bit of astar in Ethiopia. Thirteen years on, "a newcomer," he does not see himselfgoing back.

I met one of the Shashemane's latter-day pioneers, Maurice Lee, in a localjuice bar. (Rastas to not drink alcohol, and, for the most part, are also vegetarian.) Lee is a burly 62-year-old man with gray dreads tucked under a knit Rasta cap. He had arrived from Jamaica, in 1976, with a "brother." Many of the original settlers had left by then, and building out the community was difficult. But he said that these had been "the best 37 years" of his life. To survive as a Rasta in Shashemane, one must live withgreat ingenuity. Ras Hailu Tefari, a gentle, handsome 60-something Rasta from St. Vincent, runs the Banana Art Gallery. It is surrounded by a lush tropical garden, and sells remarkable pieces made by gluing together banana leaves of different colors—“the world’s only banana-leaf art gallery,” according to Tefari. Alex and Sandrine, a Rasta couple, new arrivals via Paris and Martinique, opened the Zion Train Lodge with 16 colorful bamboo huts for the growing tourist trade. Its brochure invites you to “return to the source, and come and share the positive vibration.” Alex, a kindly man with a perfectly dreadlocked beard, pointed out a blissful lineup of Japanese Rasta guests sitting silently on the lobby porch.Shashemane, he said, had become an iconic place of “pilgrimage” and curiosity for Rastas everywhere, but admitted that most of his customers are Ethiopians.

It was evident that the Exodus, the “movement of Jah people,” as Bob Marley put it, never really came to pass in Zion, despite all that singing and proselytizing. Best estimates put the Rasta settler population in the 400 to 700 range, down from a peak of more than 1,000 before 1974, andthere are few new arrivals. Reasons for this run the gamut, from the fear that “lions are eating people there” to cost, but the main problem is the Ethiopian government. No “repatriates” have ever been granted citizenship or even an identity card. You can sense a feeling among the settlers that they did not get the welcome home they thought they deserved. They came, however, to create a perfect spiritual community, not to fit into Ethiopian society. Therein lies the rub. They have never really assimilated, and have a complex relationship with the “outside,” made more complex by religious and language differences. In that regard, the Amish parallel holds up.

For all the difficulties, though, the Rastas who came and stayed seem happy with their choice. They have built a very tight-knit, peaceful, and spiritual community, albeit with a few rough touts trying to peddle ganja. Their land is rich, they live in natural beauty, and the people look healthy and satisfied. They have a school and even a Web site shashamane.org Asfor ganja, that Rastafarian staple, although it is illegal in Ethiopia, it seems to be quietly tolerated in Shashemane. One Rasta told me, “It’s a holy sacrament. We use ganja instead of wine, but we are not arrogant about it and do not want to provoke the system.”

For all the drum-beating and religious and musical encouragextement—forall the exhortations about Marcus Garvey and Haile Selassie—the Back to Africa movement never really happened. If they are going anywhere, mostdescendants of African slaves are not “going home.” Even Bob Marley, themost famous Rastafarian of all, did not do it, though he visited Shashemane in 1978. (His wife, Rita, wanted to transfer his body to Ethiopia, his fatherland, but his grave remains in Jamaica.) More than a million people have emigrated to the United States from the Caribbean, in contrast to the few thousand that ever made it to Ethiopia. But the settlers of Shashemane seem to have few regrets. Desmond Martin, an old-timer Rastafarian who came in 1975 from Kingston, told me, “I escaped from Babylon. It was difficult, but I’m never going back.” (Textends)

ETHIOPIA POLITICS: Ethiopians Don’t Trust the ruling party’What is the imminent danger?

EM By Aklog Birara, PhD (February 14, 2014) - Listen to what Egyptian generals, political leaders and intellectuals and their backers are saying and make conclusions for yourself. One general made the unbelievable remark that Egypt “has legitimate claim to one-third of Ethiopia.” How did he come to this conclusion? Who has he coopted to do Egypt’s dirty proxy-wars? Is there a secret deal in the same way as the TPLF deal with the Sudanese to cede Ethiopian territory? What we know is that the sieve through which this strategy to weaken and dismantle Ethiopia is the ideology of ethnic elite divide and capture that angers millions of Ethiopians left out from the benefits of growth. For this reason alone, ethnic politics must be replaced by national or Ethiopian politics and institutions fast. Eroding Ethiopian values is a recipe for disaster. Egypt and others are using ethnic elite divisions and political elite aspirants to weaken and dismantle what is left of Ethiopia. The current government leadership and equally the opposition would be wise to set aside differences to save Ethiopia and the Ethiopian people from misery and man-made destruction.

In addition to the repression by the governing party on which much has been said, continued divisions, petty rivalry, jealousy, individualism and in-fighting among Ethiopian opposition, civic, faith, political and intellectual groups is eroding what is left of Ethiopia’s proud culture of patriotism, bravery, sense of community and ability to stand up and fightfor the greater good rather than for self, group and other narrow interests. The diminution of core Ethiopian values, for example, undeterred commitment to Ethiopia’s unity and territorial integrity, the country’s right to use its national resources to improve Ethiopian lives, thecapacity and willingness to defend human rights and freedoms of citizens at home and abroad without any distinction, etc. diminish our collective will and strengths as a society. I find this to be a more compelling weakness in Ethiopia’s resiliency to withstand external threat than any other variable. Just think of this simple preposition. The ruling party did not have the wisdom from the start to anticipate that ethnic divisions and ethnic elite political and economic capture will ultimately cost. Simply put,the TPLF core and its allies implanted an intolerant political, social and religious society. One cannot expect a different outcome through hate, arrogance, dismissive and accusatory thinking. It is therefore not farfetched to see danger in this construction of governance that fails to serve an enduring national purpose. Ethiopia’s traditional enemies thrive on this. Remember, this is how the TPLF took power. Ethiopia’s enemies have always relied on proxies within to achieve their goals. The secession of Eritrea and the rise of ethnic elites to power is illustrative. Go to any social or political or even religious meeting in the diaspora. Division is everywhere and people think and assume that it is healthy. I am not talking about diversity and diverse thinking; both are healthy. We live in adiverse America. India is diverse and tolerant. Our divisions are scary anddamaging to the fabric of Ethiopian society and endanger the very existence of the country. They are antagonistic. What is tragic is that suchdivisive world views are not limited to the governing party. The culture of division is widespread. The Diaspora is a prime example. Can anyone come up with a reason why Ethiopians with advanced education and who live in Western democracies are incapable to sit together around a conference table, debate ideas and come-up with viable options for their country? Why are opposition groups that reject the TPLF/EPRDF incapableof setting aside non-strategic differences and offer the Ethiopian people a better alternative? Why are civil society groups unable to learn from Armenians? The Irish? The Palestinians? The Jewish community etc. in forming formidable multiethnic civic, human rights and political groups?

We cannot attribute the phenomenon solely to the TPLF/EPRDF. The vasthuman capital of Ethiopians in the Diaspora has done little to nothing to bridge differences and to promote healthy conversations and offer policyalternatives. It has sunk to the status of being self-serving.

We are our own worst enemies: Back to the Egyptian example. I realized in my discussions with many Egyptian experts (in Doha, the GCC and Egypt) that, unlike Ethiopians, Egyptian society is united and speaks with one voice concerning Egyptian hegemony over the Nile. Egyptians seem tounderstand that Ethiopian society is polarized by political elites and non- caring intellectuals. Egyptians and Saudis are exploiting this division to maximum advantage by financing various groups. In short, Egyptians have a national purpose. On the other hand, the Ethiopian ruling party is more preoccupied with suffocating all forms of dissent using all kinds of pretexts and prolonging its power than in serving Ethiopia's national interests and the welfare of its diverse population. For example, 23 years after it took power, it has done nothing to allow let alone create an empowering political, social, economic and religious environment that strengthen a sense of Ethiopian community that transcends ethnic and religious affiliation. It has not set in motion the critical conditions that will create national cohesion as Ethiopians. In my estimation, it is such national cohesion and shared prosperity that will serve as buffers against any foreign aggression whether Egyptian or other. Adwa is a prime example. It was a victory of all Ethiopians regardless of wealth, religion orethnicity. Unfortunately for Ethiopia and its 94 million people, this cohesion won't occur under current governance. Why? The governing party is incapable of reforming itself. It is afraid of any form of peaceful dissent. I say this for a reason. The danger is all out there for us to see.

This phenomenon is much aggravated by a divided civil society and opposition and by a dysfunctional ruling party that does not read the dangers on the horizon and continues suffocating all forms of human rights and freedom. The ruling party’s singular and blind preoccupation with sheer political power and economic capture by the few for the few isa recipe for an impending crisis for which everyone will pay a price.

ETHIOPIA/ERITREA: Outlook Bleak for Rapprochement’

NEAMIN aSHENAfI (fEBRUARY 15, 2014) After Eritrea seceded from Ethiopia in the early 1990s, the regime in Asmara has consistently turned out to be the major rogue in the already fragile Horn of Africa region. Withthe situation in Somalia being far from stable and the current crisis in South Sudan showing little sign of easing, a lasting solution is sought by neighboring countries and the international community.

Regarding Eritrea, the major quagmire revolves round the cyclic border demarcation issues which have become a nuisance to neighboring countries including Ethiopia, Sudan, Djibouti and Yemen. On top of that, the regime has been constantly linked to Al-Qaeda's East African operative, the Somalia-based Al-Shabaab. These actions and allegations indue course led to the UN Security Council reaching the decision of imposing sanctions on the Eritrean regime that had recently stumbled upon vast gold reserves. And then a panel of experts and monitoring Group on Somalia and Eritrea was established by the UN. The panel, which monitors compliance with the embargoes on the delivery of weapons and military equipment to Somalia and Eritrea also investigates any seaport operations in Somalia that could generate revenue for the Islamist militant group known as Al-Shabaab that controls some Somali territory.

The unexpected issue in the last few weeks on both the mainstream and social media has been about the normalization process between Ethiopia and Eritrea, and the start of negotiations to solve the boundary problems.

Aside from the media, diplomats acquainted with both the issues and region are suggesting their own possible scenarios, including the formerUS ambassador to Ethiopia, David Sheen, and the former veteran diplomat Herman Cohen.

It has been reported that Sudan's President Omar Hassan al-Basher hasstarted the process, delivering a letter from the Eritrean president IsaiasAfewerki to Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn. Yet despite the rumors, both men deny any reconciliation talks.

In an interview with local media last week, President Isaias became irritated when quizzed on the matter during an interview on the statebroadcaster EriTV. "There is no such negotiation," he retorted.

He added that the whole story had been fabricated by the Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) government, and as long as they stay in power the issue will continue to surface, largely as a public relations exercise. Similarly, at a press conference with local journalists in his office on Monday, Prime Minister Hailemariam stated thatthere are no such negotiations. "The Eritrean issue is not only between Ethiopia and Eritrea," he said, "it has an international dimension, thereforethe Eritrean government should engage with the international community first."

Yet many remain intent on brokering a deal, including the former Ethiopian president Girma Woldegiorgies, who said in an interview with Ethiopian Television and Radio Agency (ERTA) and Sheger Radio that hismain ambition after leaving his post is to establish negotiations. Before the announcements from both leaders, Kjetil Tronvoll and Goitom Gebreleul in a joint OP-ED they wrote on Al Jazeera argued that the situation had eased after the death of Meles Zenawi, becoming not only more normalized, but also more institutionalized. "In Addis Ababa, the discourse on Eritrea has evolved from initially being considered a significant military threat next door to that of concerns over state collapse, civil war and its security implications," they wrote.

They further argued by saying that, in a significant turn of developments,Eritrea underwent a process of rapid economic, political and humanitariandecline - a clear indicator of which is its emergence as one of the top refugees producing countries in the world.

In the article that was published on Al Jazeera's website last year they presumed that the situation in Eritrea might lead to a change of power in the country, although this is yet to materialize. However, Ethiopia's stancedid appear to alter, highlighted by Prime Minister Hailemariam telling the network back in December 2012 that he was willing to discuss the issue.

In the interview he said: "If you ask me, 'Do you want to go to Asmaraand sit down and negotiate with Isaias Afewerki?' Then I will say 'yes'."Yet nothing appears to have changed. The future looks bleak, and questions remain as to whether the two countries will ever accept the mediators' requests to sit down and negotiate, bringing about the long-awaited peace for both the citizens and the region in general.

GOSSIP - One of Three Individuals Close to the late Meles Zenawi’

LOCAL PRESS (February 16, 2014) - One of three individuals close to the late Meles Zenawi during his last days, in August 2012, was Kassu Illala (PhD). The other two were his widow, Azeb Mesfin, and his long time closeconfidante, Brehane G. Kirstos, gossip disclosed. Whilst serving as Ethiopia's ambassador to the EU in Brussels, Kassu had hosted the late Prime Minister in his residence, at a time when Meles's whereabouts was avery confidential matter, gossip recalls. Kassu was also one of the few leaders and officials of the federal government to whom Meles reportedly had a soft heart, claims gossip. He was one of the few former student activists, who survived the slaughter of the military junta and went into exile in the late 1970s. This was along with others, including Dawit Yohannes, who partook in the founding congress of the EPRDF in the early1990s. An accomplished scholar by then, Kassu travelled to the rebel held territory of Hagere Selam, Tigray Regional State, in January 1991, to join the EPDM (now ANDM). Here, he and Dawit were elected to the 53-personhigh council of the newly formed party that was about to change the nation's political dynamics forever. He was the first to be appointed as economic advisor to Meles, when he was a president during the transitional government in the early 1990s, while also serving the ruling coalition as chairman of the SEPDM. This was after Abate Kisho was deposed in the early 2000s, gossip recalls. He was subsequently appointedas Deputy Prime Minister, following the formation of the new government in 1995, and head of economic affairs at the Prime Minister's office. In 2005, he was appointed as minister of Works & Urban Development, and served as a minister of Infrastructure prior to 2010. It was during his debut as chairman of the southern coalition of the ruling party, in 2001, that Kassu is believed to have mentored Hailemarima Desalegn, who took over the SEPDM's chairmanship from him in 2002. Then there was the talkof a power succession in 2010, where veterans of the party were to be compelled to leave their positions in the federal government and sent to overseas missions. Girma Birru was seen off to Washington, Seyoum Mesfin to Beijing, Mulugeta Alemseged to Rome and Kassu to Brussels, replacing Brehane. However, his diplomatic stint has not lasted long.

Following the death of Meles, he was recalled back home in 2013, by an administration run by a person who was once his successor, gossip says. Although he was installed as one of the four-strong strategic policy advisory team to Hailemariam, his recent appointment has brought him back to something relative to Meles. Kassu has been appointed as the firstdirector general of the Meles Zenawi Foundation - an organisation established to preserve the legacy of Ethiopia's former Prime Minister, gossip disclosed. The Foundation, whose office is on D.A.R Sahara St in front of the Mrs Ford Memorial Elementary School (former Zenebework school), in the Kasanchis area, has recently gone through a complete makeover, with its board of directors being presided over by his widow, gossip disclosed. Kassa Teklebrehan, president of the House of Federation(the House), was elected as deputy chairman of the Foundation when it was launched in the Africa Union (AU) hall, back in March 2013, in the presence of regional leaders from Djibouti, Sudan and Uganda, gossip recalls. Kassu now reigns over a Foundation whose start was oiled with cash, amounting to four million dollars, pledged by these regional leaders,according to gossip. (Text ends)

ATHLETICS: Genzebe Dibaba sets world record in Bermingham, her thirdin 15 days'

The Guardian (February 16, 2014) – Ethiopian female athlete Genzebe Dibaba shatters two-mile time at indoor grand prix. Scotland’s Laura Muir happy after Birmingham 1500m win. Dibaba's astonishing indoor season continued as she smashed her third world record in 15 days at the indoorgrand prix here.

A fortnight ago, in Karlsruhe, the 23-year-old Ethiopian snipped three seconds off the 1500m record. Last week in Stockholm she took apart thewomen's indoor 3,000m by nearly seven seconds. She leaves Birminghamwith another record and a $15,000 (£9,000) bonus after obliterating Meseret Defar's two-mile world record by nearly six seconds after winningin 9min 00.48sec. It might have even been a second or two quicker if shehad not been forced to veer around athletes she was lapping.

Dibaba admitted that halfway round she felt "a bit weak and tired". Try telling that to decent British athletes like Helen Clitheroe, the 2011 European indoor champion, and Stephanie Twell, a 1500m CommonwealthGames bronze medallist, who were both lapped – yet still set personal bests.

Dibaba said: "In the middle of the race I felt a bit weak and tired but withthe help of the crowd and all the buzzing I was able to gain momentum and get the record. Now I'm hoping to win a gold at the world indoors."

On this evidence Dibaba will also have outdoor records in her sights too. Genzebe's elder sister Tirunesh, the Olympic and world 10,000m champion and world record holder in the 5,000m, will be looking over hershoulder – or even into the distance – in the months ahead. Another record was taken apart in the women's 1500m as Laura Muir ran 4:05.32to break the Scottish record by four seconds but it was the manner of thevictory that was really startling.

Against experienced athletes, the 20-year-old decided to strike for the front with a lap to go and just about held off Sifan Hassan for victory. Muir, who studies veterinary science at Glasgow University, said: "I'm sohappy. I was feeling really good with one lap to go so I just went for it and managed to hold them off."

She added: "I didn't know I could run that fast. The likes of Hassan are world-class athletes so it gives me a lot of confidence. I think I'll run 800m for the world but it would be hard to say which is better for me at the moment."

Holly Bleasdale was another British women's winner, leaping 4.71m in the pole vault. She was not entirely satisfied, admitting: "It wasn't a great daytoday; I felt a bit rusty and things were a little bit stiff but if I can jump 4.71m on a bad day then I know the 4.80s and 4.90s will come."

The biggest showdown of the day, in the women's 60m, was won by the Ivory Coast sprinter Murielle Ahouré who beat two-times Olympic Games

100m champion Shelly-Ann Fraser-Pryce by a vest’s width. Ahouré justgot the nod with Britain’s Asha Philip third. (Text ends)

Ethiopian Airlines co-pilot hijacks Plane to seek Geneva asylum'

BBC's Frank Gardner: (February 17, 2014) 'It's a great relief that this isnot... a terrorist act in the classic sense'

The co-pilot of an Ethiopian Airlines plane flying from Addis Ababa toRome has hijacked the aircraft and landed in Geneva, Swiss police say. The hijacker - who has been arrested - waited for the pilot to go to the toilet to lock himself in the cockpit. He was unarmed. He has requested asylum in Switzerland. The airline said in a statement that all 202 passengers and crew were safe. Geneva airport, which was closed fora time, has now reopened. An Ethiopian man born in 1983, the co-pilot has sought asylum due to fear of persecution in Ethiopia, police said at a news conference. After locking himself in the cockpit, he asked to refuel atGeneva, landed the plane, climbed down from the cockpit window using a rope (available in the cockpit), and gave himself up to police. He was unarmed and there was no risk at any time to crew or passengers, police said. The situation inside the plane remained calm throughout. The co- pilot himself alerted the authorities to the plane's hijacking, officials added

- and passengers on the plane were unaware it had been hijacked. Editor’sNote: ".....While rare, a pilot hijacking an airline is not unheard of. In 1998, an Air China captain, reportedly disgruntled with life in China, hijacked his passenger jet plane to Taiwan".

DIARIES: EAL co-pilot who hijacked his own airliner is identifed asHailemedhin Abera Tegegn’

EAN – Updates: An Ethiopian Airline co-pilot on Monday hijacked a Boeing767 fight destined for Rome and landed it in an airport in Geneva before handing himself over to authorities. The Ethiopian man named Hailemedehin Abera Tegegn, believed to be 31 years old, reportedly confessed to Swiss officials that he was “threatened in his country and wants to seek asylum.” Reports indicate that all 202 passengers of the flight, who had been unaware of the situation in the cockpit, escaped the episode unharmed and are currently in custody.

Robert Deillon, a Geneva airport executive, told reporters that two Italian fighter jets were dispatched to intercept the Ethiopian Airline plane after itdiverted its course over Sicily. Reports indicate that the co-pilot, who had locked himself in the cockpit, contacted the Geneva airline traffic control center with a request to land because “he had a problem with his plane…needed to land to fill the tank with kerosene…and that he had technical problems with the engine.” It is currently unclear why the pilot wanted asylum so desperately. However, pundits speculate that he may be trying to escape government repression in Ethiopia.

Several organizations have criticized the Ethiopian government for purported human right abuses of dissidents, many of whom have been forced to seek asylum to escape facing time in the country's deplorable prisons. Swiss police officials say the co-pilot will be charged for hijackingthe flight and faces the possibility of being slapped with up to 20 years inprison. Ethiopian Airlines has recorded several hijackings of its planes since it was founded in 1945.

In November 1996, the carrier recorded its most high profile attack when three Ethiopians hijacked a Boeing 767 flight destined for Nairobi. The hijackers reportedly intended to guide the flight to Australia, where they had planned to seek asylum. However, the plane ran out of fuel and crash landed into the Indian Ocean, near the Comoros Island – killing more thanabout 125 passengers. Commentators say, if a pilot working for the Ethiopian Airlines, a privileged institution, seeks asylum in such a dramaticmanner, who then remains in the country and not felt upset and threatened by the current lawless regime of Ethiopia. If one is vigilantenough, it is not hard to find out that every move of the regime in that country is destructive. Such incident is a sign of showing the regime is in severe discomfort. It has to be recalled that Flight ET702 departed the Ethiopian capital Addis Ababa on Sunday evening and was bound for Rome, Italy. The plane was hijacked at about 0330 GMT while over northern Italy, it landed at Geneva at 6:02 a.m. (0502 GMT). The co-pilot,an Ethiopian born in 1983, locked the flight deck door when the pilot wentto the rest room. He then asked to refuel at Geneva, landed the plane, climbed down on an emergency exit rope from a cockpit window, and gave himself up. (Text ends)

Investigations underway to find the reasons for the hijack of EAL plane'

ESAT News (February 18, 2014) ET702 flight that was heading to Rome, Italy, was made to land in Geneva by its own crew member on February 17, 2014. The co-pilot surrendered to police. Redwan Hussien, Minister ofthe Government for Communication Affairs, told Reuters the flight had made a scheduled stop in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum, where he saidthe hijacker or hijackers might have boarded the flight, Switzerland policesaid the "haijacker was the co-pilot and he sought asylum stating that he feels insecure in his own country." This unusual form of hijacking is believed to have "political underpinnings."

The co-pilot left the plane through the window using a rope. He was not armed. No passenger was hurt too. ESAT's correspondent in Geneva saidthe passengers did not fly to Rome until 3pm Ethiopian time in the afternoon and the plane was then moved for maintenance. Attempts to speak to the co-pilot have been unsuccessful due to strict police securityEmployees of the Ethiopian Airlines often complain about maladministration within the national flag carrier. International media institutions are also covering the incident assessing it based on the humanrights situation in Ethiopia. Some observers in Geneva say if the intention of the co-pilot had simplybeen seeking asylum, he could have landed in Rome and sought asylumthere. Despite the chances he had and the legal consequences of hijacking, they argue, the co-pilot must have had some serious reasons for “hijacking” the plane. Ethiopian lawyers residing in Switzerland have said to ESAT that they want to meet the co-pilot and hire a solicitor for him. A young lady who was in the plane said to ESAT, the plane was hijacked when it was flying from Rome to Milan. She said it landed in Rome and boarded more passengers there. Redwan, on his part, said the plane did not at all land inRome and flew to Geneva directly. She said the pilot was slightly dark skinned tall man and he looked unstable when he removed his luggage in Rome.

SOCIO-ECONOMY: ETHIOPIA #2 - The 10 Poorest Countries in The World’

MPI (February 19, 2014) - You probably heard that Ethiopia has been a fast growing economy in the content recording very high growth rate notjust in Africa but the world as well. Yet the new measurement known as the Multidimensional Poverty Index, or MPI, that will replace the Human Poverty index in the United Nations’ annual Human Development Report says that Ethiopia has the second highest percentage of people who are MPI poor in the world, with only the west African nation of Niger fairing worse. This comes as more international analysts have also began to question the accuracy of the Meles government’s double digit economic growth claims and similar disputed government statistics referred by institutions like the IMF. Niger, Ethiopia, Mali, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Somalia, Central African Republic, Liberia, Guinea, Sierra Leone

What is the MPI?

People living in poverty are affected by more than just income. The Multidimensional Poverty Index (MPI) complements a traditional focus on income to reflect the deprivations that a poor person faces all at once withrespect to education, health and living standard. It assesses poverty at the individual level, with poor persons being those who are multiply deprived, and the extent of their poverty being measured by the range of their deprivations.

The MPI can be used to create a vivid picture of people living in poverty, both across countries, regions and the world and within countries by ethnic group, urban/rural location, or other key household characteristics.It is the first international measure of its kind, and offers an essential complement to income poverty measures because it measures deprivations directly. The MPI can be used as an analytical tool to identify the most vulnerable people, show aspects in which they are deprived andhelp to reveal the interconnections among deprivations.

Why is the MPI useful?

According to the UNDP report, the MPI is a high resolution lens on poverty

− it shows the nature of poverty better than income alone. Knowing not just who is poor but how they are poor is essential for effective human development programs and policies. This straightforward yet rigorous index allows governments and other policymakers to understand the various sources of poverty for a region, population group, or nation and target their human development plans accordingly. The index can also beused to show shifts in the composition of poverty over time so that progress, or the lack of it, can be monitored.

The MPI goes beyond previous international measures of poverty to: Showall the deprivations that impact someone's life at the same time – so it can inform a holistic response. Identify the poorest people. Such information is vital to target people living in poverty so they benefit from key interventions. Show which deprivations are most common in different regions and among different groups, so that resources can be allocated and policies designed to address their particular needs. Reflect the results of effective policy interventions quickly. Because the MPI measures outcomes directly, it will immediately reflect changes such as school enrollment, whereas it can take time for this to affect income. (Text ends)

EAL co-pilot Hailemedhin's actions dominate the international media'

ESAT News (February 19, 2014) - International media outlets are offering different comments and analyses about Co-pilot Hailemedhin Aberra, who is under police custody in Switzerland suspected of 'hijacking' an EthiopianAirlines plane, he was flying to Rome from Addis Abeba on February 17, 2014. Hailemedhin has not been so far given the chance to speak his own version of what has happened. Some say that the pilot had been forced tohijack his own plane disgruntled by the appalling political repression in Ethiopia while others criticize that he committed a big mistake if he had soto seek asylum.

Sources who claim to know the copilot and his families say Hailemedhin was born and brought up in a relatively rich family. They state he was an excellent student and a hard worker. One of the sources said Hailemedhinused to often complain about the bureaucracy and the institutional racismwithin the Ethiopian Airlines. Tinsae Aberra, who claims to be Hailemedhin's younger sister, says "Let alone endangering the lives of human beings, he never dared to even harm animals. He also had no intention of living outside Ethiopia." She said "since recent times, Hailemedhin led an unhappy life. When we asked what happened to him, we learned that he believed he has got enemies who want to attack him.

He believes his phone was tapped. He also does not open his laptop without covering his webcam. He also had installed a surveillance camerain his room fearing that"they" would search it when he was away."
Tinsae says he had been in massive depression and he never fully sharedhis new problem with his family. Some of Hailemedhin's friends on the other hand, state that he entered into severe mental depression after hisscientist uncle, Dr. Emiru Seyoum, was killed by unknown people last month in Addis Abeba. Dr. Emiru was found killed inside a taxi as he returned from work. Some people link his death with political causes.
Addis Abeba University described the death of Emiru as "very much shocking and incomprehensible" on its Website. A colleague of the copilot,who met him last month soon after the death of his uncle, said to ESAT that Hailemedhin had also feared that he might be in the same danger as his late uncle and was being followed by government cadres instituted in the Airlines.
ETHICS: A US citizen sues the regime in Ethiopia for using computer spyware against him' Washington Post By Craig Timberg (February 19,2014)
A Washington area man with ties to Ethiopia's political opposition sued that country's government in federal court Tuesday, alleging that agentshad used powerful spyware to hack into his computer and snoop on his private communications for more than four months.
The suit says that forensics experts found more than 2,000 files related toa spyware program called FinSpy, including evidence that it had accessed the plaintiff's Skype calls, e-mails and Web-browsing history in violation of U.S. wiretapping laws.
The case is the latest sign that the government of Ethiopia, an American ally with a history of repressing political opponents, journalists and humanrights activists, has used sophisticated Internet technology to monitor its perceived enemies, even when they are in other countries.
"The Ethiopian government appears to be doing everything it can to spyon members of the diaspora, especially those in contact with oppositiongroups," said Nate Cardozo, a staff attorney for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a civil liberties group based in San Francisco that prepared the suit.
Tuesday's suit, filed in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, takes the unusual step of not naming the plaintiff, who says in an affidavitthat revealing his identity would endanger him, his children and membersof his family still in Ethiopia.
The man came to the United States 22 years ago, won political asylum and now is a U.S. citizen living in Silver Spring, Md. He provides "technical and administrative support” to an Ethiopian opposition group, Ginbot 7, but is not a formal member of that group, the affidavit says. In the suit,the plaintiff uses a pseudonym, “Kidane,” a common name in Ethiopia. Ajudge must decide whether the pseudonym will be allowed in the suit. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA - Army voices readiness to 'protect' the country's Hydro-powerdam project’

World Bulletn/News Desk: A host of Ethiopian army commanders have voiced their readiness to protect the country's multibillion-dollar hydroelectric dam project, currently at the heart of a major row with Cairodue to Egyptian fears the dam could threaten its traditional share of Nile water. State-run television reported that military commanders had visitedthe project site, during which they had voiced their readiness to "pay the price" to protect the dam, which they described as a "national project."

According to state television, the visit – the first by military commandersto the site – came as part of activities marking Ethiopia's Army

Day. Relations between Egypt and Ethiopia soured last year over a plan bythe latter to build its Grand Renaissance Dam on the upper reaches of the Nile River – which has historically represented Egypt's main source of water. The controversial project raised alarm bells in Egypt, the Arab world's most populous country, which fears a reduction of its traditional share of Nile water.

Water distribution among Nile Basin states has long been regulated by a colonial-era agreement granting Egypt and Sudan the lion's share of the river's water. Ethiopia, for its part, is determined to build a series of damsin order to generate electricity, both for local consumption and export.

Addis Ababa insists the new dam will benefit downstream states Sudan and Egypt, which will be invited to purchase the electricity thus generated. Last week, Egyptian Water Resources and Irrigation Minister Mohamed Abdel-Muttalib said that Egypt was leaving "all options are open" in dealing with the project.

"Ethiopian decision-makers must bring asolution to the table that won't compromise Egypt's share of water,"

Abdel-Muttalib had told Anadolu Agency.

Local Egyptian media recently quoted Irrigation Ministry spokesman KhalidWasif as saying that Egypt would take its complaints against the Ethiopiandam project to the "international" level. In response, Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn said his country would "win politically" if Egypt insisted on international arbitration.

On the EOTC Holy water locally known as ‘Tsebel’ RELIGION: washes away sins at Ethiopia's Timket festival'

STORY HIGHLIGHTS

Timket is an Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church holy festival that re-enacts the baptism of Jesus

Historical bath is filled with holy water for the festival, pilgrims jump in toThousands of visitors flock to Gondar for the event

Priests parade replicas of the Ark of the Covenant

Gondar, Ethiopia (CNN) (February 19, 2014) -- France has Lourdes, India has the Ganges. Ethiopia, meanwhile, has Gondar. Situated about 450 miles north of Addis Ababa, encapsulated by hills and tall trees, and dotted with 17th-century relics from the city's glory days (when it was thecountry's capital), Gondar today can seem somewhat remote. During the religious festival of "Timket," however, the city is inundated with pilgrims who come to re-enact the baptism of Jesus in the River Jordan, and take adip in the holy waters at the historical Fasilides Bat

Nearly two thirds of Ethiopia's 94 million population is Christian, and the majority of those belong to the Orthodox church. For them, Timket -- celebrating the Epiphany -- is among the most important occasions of the year. It's is a two-day affair that begins with a procession of "tabots," holyreplicas of the Ark of the Covenant -- the sacred chests described in the Book of Exodus as carrying the stone tablets on which the 10 Commandments were written. The tabots are wrapped in cloth and placedon the heads of Ethiopian Orthodox Christian priests, who parade the streets en route to the bath. The priests, clad in ceremonial robes, are escorted by drums and by the clapping and singing of worshipers, who hold an overnight vigil until dawn.

There are services the following morning which culminate in the priests blessing the waters of the historic bath, while onlookers crowd every nooksurrounding the bath -- some getting a pristine view from nearby trees. When the priests are done, the mood turns jubilant, and the spectators rush to jump into the pool.

"The water is blessed in the name of the Holy Trinity ... in the name of God. The water is now sacred, and the sick shall be cured," explains Ezra Adis, the head priest at the local Medhanelem Church. "That is why the young people who jump in first getexcited; it is a spiritual love," he adds. The plunge is so swift that some participants get battered in the process -- though most are unperturbed by a few scratches. "I jumped from high above," boasts one man who dived into the waters from one of the nearby trees.

"I was apprehensive," he adds. "The branches could give way and you could fall on the rock edge of the pool, and there was a possibility I couldhave lost my life, but at this moment, I am doing what I feel good about,and that possibility of death doesn't scare me. The Timket festival dates back to the 16th century, but it was marked only in churches until the baptismal ceremonies were introduced, explains Bantalem Tadesse Tedla, a historian at the University of Gondar. The baptisms, usually held on January 19, are celebrated differently in other parts of the country. "Thereare three options for Timket," says Tedla. "To be immersed, to collect water from three pipes and pour it on people, or to collect water and sprinkle it -- it depends on the availability of water.

"In Gondar, the first is implemented, because of the existence of this veryimportant building," he adds, referring to the stone bath -- a UNESCO world heritage site built in 1632 for King Fasil (Fasiledes). As the afternoon winds down, people begin to leave the pool and head back to the streets, but the festivities aren't quite over. Each tabot is now paradedback to its respective church with crowds of onlookers eager to get one last look at them. Back at the churches, it's a different, quieter scene.

Congregants fill the church grounds to listen in on a final service, and after a closing prayer it's time to send the tabot back inside the church toits resting place. The locals will eventually return to their homes for a special feast, but in the meantime, the celebrations on the streets of Gondar continue -- a chance for orthodox Christians to celebrate and come together for one of the most sacred and festive days of the year. The "EAL co-pilot hijacked plane to expose brutal rule in Ethiopia" -Cousin'

Ethiomedia – Updates (February 20, 2014) SEATTLE - Amid a flurry of government propaganda to label the hijacker of an Ethiopian Airlines plane a mental patient, a family member of the co-pilot says her cousinwas an activist who has been resentful of the brutal rule in Ethiopia.

Speaking to the Ethiopian Satellite TV (ESAT) by phone on Wednesday, a female cousin of co-pilot Hailemedhin Abera Tegegn, who landed the passenger airliner in Geneva early on Monday and sought asylum there, said the act was politically motivated, and nothing else. "He was living a comfortable life, and was a frequent traveler to the US and Europe. If he had the desire to live in the West, he had plenty of chances. But he was an activist who very much resented the gross human rights violations thatthe government is committing in the country," she said. Swiss police said on Monday all 202 passengers and crew were safe as the "act was motivated by the fact that he feels threatened in his country," and wanted asylum. The woman, who didn't reveal her identity for fear of political retribution, said 31-year-old Hailemedhin Abera Tegegn and she would call each other frequently, and the co-pilot was very much opposed to thegovernment because of lack of freedom, including harassing airlines employees to be members of the ruling party or lose their jobs.

"Many of his friends have been fired because they failed to toe party lines," she said, adding he was also resentful of the brutal measures theruling party was taking against the Amhara in particular and the entire Ethiopian people in general. Asked whether she is in contact with family members in Addis, she said the phone lines were blocked with all family members but one. "My uncle is virtually under house arrest as others are under surveillance. We have also learned that Airlines officials have come under fire, being threatened to reveal how come they kept dissidents in the business." Though in police custody in Geneva, the woman said several calls to her cousin were never answered. The government in Addiswill definitely push the Swiss government to extradite my cousin. If they succeed, there is no doubt that they will cut him to pieces as he would expose their crimes if left free, she said. "All Ethiopians should rally to block any extradition attempts." The pro-democracy Ethiopian Diaspora isconsidering to hire lawyers to defend the rights of the co-pilot, who is nowhailed as a human rights champion among Ethiopian activists both at home and abroad. Following is a list of major accidents and incidents involving Ethiopian Airlines aircraft. It includes hijackings, events involving fatalities and/or events causing severe damage beyond repair to the relevant aircraft. Butlet us see below the major hijackings and fatalities took place in it's 67 years history as a national symbol of pride for ordinary Ethiopians.

In April 1969: Hijackers belonging to the rebel secessionist Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) led by Ali Said Abdalla who was also known to be the proactive co-hijacker of the Ethiopian Airlines DC passenger plane … en-route to Beirut headway the plane to Karachi where later to blew up atthe airport. Ali Said Abdalla, the latter Eritrean government high profile official who suddenly passed away of a heart attack in his sleep at his home, but gossips say perhaps in political fallout among the ruling-PFDJ inAsmara, the Eritrea's capital in August 28, 2005. The aircraft was then en-route a scheduled flight from Addis Ababa’s Haile Selassie I Airport to Beirut, Lebanon. The hijackers were sought to headway the passenger

In November, 1996: The airline's most infamous and deadliest accident occurred when a hijacked Boeing 767-200ER (Flight 961) the plane ran out of fuel, both engines failed and crashed into the Indian Ocean, off thecoast of the Comoros Islands, killing 125 of the 175 passengers and crewon board died, along with the hijackers; the rest of the people on board survived with injuries.

Updates: Flight 961 was hijacked by three hijackers while en route the second leg of a Bombay–Addis Ababa–Nairobi–Brazzaville–Lagos–Abidjan route. The hijackers instructed the pilot to fly to Australia. Instead, the pilots headed the aircraft southwards and flew it along the shore. Fuel eventually ran out and one of the engines stopped. A landing into shallow waters 500 yd (460 m) away from the shore, close to the Galawa Beach, near Moroni, was attempted. The water landing failed when the aircraft hitan unseen coral reef. Many passengers died because they inflated their lifevests before leaving the flooded cabin. Among the dead was the Kenyan photojournalist Mohamed Amin, besides all of the hijackers. It serves a network of 80 passenger destinations 16 of them domestic and17 freighter ones. Ethiopian flies to more destinations in Africa than any other carrier. It is one of the fastest-growing companies in the industry.

EAL is among the largest on the African continent. It is also one of the fewprofitable airlines in the Sub-Saharan region.

The Airlines is average by any international standard yet Ethiopians are very proud of its success. The success of the airlines is open to discussionas its numbers and financial reporting in never audited independently according to reports.

February 17, 2014: Ethiopian Airlines Flight 702 flying from Addis Ababato Rome and onwards to Milan was forced to land at Geneva airport afterbeing hijacked while flying north over Sudan. The aircraft circled Genevaairport several times while pilots communicated with air traffic control toinquire about possibility of hijackers receiving asylum in Switzerland.

Flight 702 landed with one engine and less than 10 minutes of fuel remaining. No passengers or crew were harmed and the hijacker wasarrested.

Updates: Flight ET702 passenger jet plane a Boeing 767 fight was departed the Ethiopian capital Addis Ababa on Sunday evening and was bound for Rome, Italy. The co-pilot has diverted the jet plane after lockingthe flight deck door when the pilot went to a rest room at about 0330 GMTwhile over northern Italy. The diverted passenger jet plane destined for Rome asked to refuel at Geneva airport, and landed the plane safely at Geneva airport at 6:02 a.m. (0502 GMT) before handing himself over to authorities, climbed down on an emergency exit rope from a cockpit window, and gave himself up.

The co-pilot named Hailemedehin Abera Tegegn, believed to be at early 30s born in Bahir Dar in 1983. Reportedly upon arrival at Geneva airport in Switzerland, he confessed to Swiss authorities that he was “threatened in his country and wants to seek asylum.” The allegation filed against him is that “he took control of the passenger plane while the main pilot was in the washroom and instead of flying it to its original destination, he diverted the plane to Genevieve Mortona airport.” Instead, co-pilot Hailemedhin was arrested and now faces a possible prison term of 20 years accordingly. Reports indicate that all 202 passengers of the flight, who had been unaware of the situation in the cockpit, escaped the episode unharmed and currently in custody.

A young lady who was onboard the plane destined for Rome airport witnessed to ESAT, the plane was hijacked when it was flying from Rometo Milan. She said it landed in Rome and boarded with more passengers there. She told ESAT the pilot was slightly dark skinned tall man and he looked unstable when he removed his luggage in Rome.

Ethiopian Government Communication Affairs Minister Redwan Hussein, on his part, said the plane did not at all land in Rome and diverted directlyto Geneva.

Ethiopia quickly requested for his return claiming he has mental issues. That was retracted as criticism mounted why such a person was flying a plane. His sister attempted to explain however her Facebook account washijacked by the government and as she opened yet another account to explain her brother’s misgivings, she was imprisoned instead.

However, he had mysteriously lost a beloved uncle in recent weeks who was politically and eloquently against the government. In Ethiopia – where public demonstration or opposition to the government is seen as treason,he was a surpassed voice of millions not able to speak freely – an almostprisoner citizen.

His aunt who resides in the United States told, Hailemedhin Abera comesfrom a well to do prosperous middle class family with strict academic discipline and a job he seemed to enjoy.

According to the family – he wanted to show the world the horrible situation in Ethiopia for Ethiopians. Beyond the dotted minor advancementof constructions, mansions, restaurants , nude night clubs– Ethiopia's advancement has very little regards to human rights and security.

Hailemedhin felt he was a victim of it all even as he was passed overpromotions at work because he was an Amhara and saw his Tigrean parallel colleagues prosper..

Ethiopians in various corner of the world held demonstration to demand the governments grant asylum to the Ethiopian Airlines co-pilot Hailemedehin Abera who took the Ethiopian Airlines plane Boeing 767 to Switzerland and landed safely. Diaspora Ethiopians now speaking out for Hailemedhin Abera perhaps his alleged action is a desperate attempt to pass a message to the entire world that something is indeed wrong withinEthiopia. All demanding "Hailemedehin Need Protection!"

Mrs. Jeanette Balmer, spokeswoman of the Federal Prosecutor's Office of Switzerland, said Switzerland is known for protecting human rights and the human rights of co-pilot Hailemedhin Abera, the suspected hijacker of Ethiopian airlines plane, will be protected according to the law, but refusedto give any detail regarding his case before the investigation was completed. Hailemedhin has been offered a solicitor and is under investigation by Swiss police. Asked if it was possible to follow Hailemedhin's court proceedings, Balmer said although it is not possible tospeak about the court at this time, normally, court proceedings in Switzerland are often open. Asked if Hailemedhin's next court appointment was known, she said "we have not yet reached that stage." The Spokeswoman said the Swiss justice system instructs that informationis kept secret thus no information can be given regarding that.

As of January 2014, the Aviation Safety Network records 60 accidents/incidents for Ethiopian Airlines that total 322 fatalities since 1965.

Following the crisis, Capt. Desta Zeru, VP and head of Flight Operations ofthe Ethiopian Airlines has resigned. The reason behind the resignation is still unclear but speculations are in high gear that it is related to the recent events caused by co-pilot Hailemedhin Abera. Credible sources inside the airline are also revealing that there are a handful of pilots that have been grounded and their licenses were suspended.

EAL was empowered by effective native management and maintenance team since it’s foundation as Share company in 1965: Thanks to its founder management team led by Aviation expert Simret Medhane to itslast professional management team led by CEO Girma Waque.

In a related news Michael Melaku, a former Safety Security Department officer of the Ethiopian Airlines had exposed the internal maladministration, corruption and nepotism within the Ethiopian Airlines. Michael said the Airlines is now dominated by people who hail from the ethnic group of the Tigrean Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF). He said all ofthe 18 anti-hijackers (T-4) of the Airlines hail from the same ethnic group − Tigre. He said especially after Girma Wake, the ex CEO of the Airlines left and the current CEO Tewolde Guebremariam, who also hails from the TPLF, took power shows the Airlines becomes a “hell”. As example He toldthe main problem within the ET is racism and nepotism. There is a deep rooted maladministration. There is no single trade union as it has been divided by the regime into three.

Editor’s note: Ethiopian Airlines is a successful global pan-African carrier currently serving nearly 80 international destinations across 5 continents with over 200 daily flights and using the latest technology aircraft such asthe B777s and B787s. While rare, a pilot hijacking an airliner in such a dramatic fashion is unheard of, in 1998, an Air China Pilot reportedly disgruntled with life in China, accompanied by his fiance hijacked the airliner’s passenger jet plane to land in Taiwan.

UN’s Definition of “Terrorism”: In 2004, United Nations Security Council (UNSC) Resolution #1566 condemns terrorist acts as: "criminal acts, including against civilians, committed with the intent to cause death or serious bodily injury, or taking of hostages, with the purpose to provoke astate of terror in the general public or in a group of persons or particular persons, intimidate a population or compel a government or an international organization to do or to abstain from doing any act, which constitute offences within the scope of and as defined in the international conventions and protocols relating to terrorism, are under no circumstances justifiable by considerations of a political, philosophical, ideological, racial, ethnic, religious or other similar nature" (Text ends)

In Ethiopia’s Context: Journey of Apartheid from South Africa to Ethiopia’

ASSESMENT EMF (February 21, 2014) - Ethiopia is a multi-ethnic state located in the horn of Africa. She is estimated to have about 90 millions ofpeople with a diversity of religions and cultures. But all these people havemany things in common as Ethiopians; they share communal ethical and moral values, they used to live under the same flag and national anthem, they have the same color and similar psychological makeup, etc. This has been true especially up until 1991 before the apartheid system was in place in May, 1991. The apartheid we have is something to be cited as the first of its kind which has never been observed in any country in theworld.

In 1990, the Apartheid System was chased out of South Africa. That apartheid was officially declared in 1948 to segregate the black majority from the benefits of South Africa. Following that declaration, the white minorities were situated on top of every privilege in that country while onthe other hand the majority of the black population was doomed to everysort of suffering and poverty. In this great historical event of removing apartheid, at least from serving as state machinery, two world class citizens are always in our mind: Nelson R. Mandela and F.W. de klerk.
These selfless individuals will remain alive in history. But on the regretful contrary, that apartheid was immigrated to Ethiopia and made the policy of the ethnocentric junta which seized the political power immediately after the central dictatorial government was toppled by popular uprising mainly led by EPLF and TPLF in 1991. The very fact that the apartheid which was driven out of the country of Nelson Mandela was accepted as a state policy in Ethiopia remains to be an irony of history. This is so because Nelson Mandela was here in Ethiopia for some assistance by the then government and he used to love this country for her successful anti colonial movement; as a matter of historic enigma, the fugitive apartheid run out of Mandela's country and freely entered Ethiopia, perhaps the onlycountry which staunchly fought it and served as sanctuary to ANC members in the time of the struggle. This reality is what makes this case astoundingly peculiar in the history of mankind. To your surprise, there is no apartheid now on earth other than Ethiopia. As of the time apartheid was happily entertained by the ethnic junta of TPLF (By the way, this junta has a baptismal fake name known as 'EPRDF'.), Ethiopia and the majority of non-Tigrian Ethiopians have been under the tyranny of this apartheid which was applied amongst people of same color and some other basic common backgrounds, such as religion and culture.
Ethiopia has over 80 languages; amongst these Amharic, Oromifa, and Tigrigna are the most prominent ones. Amharic has been and still is theworking language of the so called federal government of Ethiopia [N.B. The TPLF's 'federation' and 'democracy' are absolutely fictitious anda make-believe to deceive donors and creditors. To whichever "regional state" you may go, the key statespersons who decide not only of the fateof the regional budget but also that of the job description of the so called regional officials are TPLFites. Regional officials have almost nothing to dowith respect to the people they claim to represent more than playing the role of toothless dogs to bark at their subjects and the opposition when they are ordered; they are simple guards who are there to only protect the overall well being of their masters. They are illiterates most of whose educational qualification is not higher than junior secondary.]
As of 1991, Ethiopia has been led by TPLF (Tigrian People's Liberation Front), which is a distraction of a nationality whose population is only 6%;

due to the regime's discriminatory intervention in the current demography, this percentage might be influenced and may be a little bit higher than 6% now. [For example and to your surprise, TPLF allots a big sum of budget and arranges various facilities to Tigray to have more children while on the other hand, aside from punishing the region with deep-rooted poverty and substandard education, TPLF's ethnocentric junta'budgets' injections of deadly viruses such as HIV and other killing agents in areas of the Amharas to minimize or if possible to gradually wipe out the population. According to its former members and its political program as well, TPLF had long ago labeled the Amharas as enemies of its core diabolic values, which are intrinsically anti-Ethiopian.] It is this narrow- minded distraction of the Tigray region that millions of Ethiopians are accusing it of the destruction of the entire nation. Followed by a significantnumber of greed and hatred laden emotional Tigrians, this TPLF is absolutely destabilizing Ethiopia and as a result the country along with hercitizens is being changed into nothingness in all aspects. These people, the TPLFites, know nothing about law and rule. As usual, they always apply jungle law; they are people of revenge. Just one example:- they have vowed to eliminate one of Ethiopia's nationalities, namely, the Amhara, from the surface of the earth and they use everything to implement this agenda, as mentioned a bit earlier in this letter. To implement this motive, they go to the extent of man slaughtering even liberal Tigrians with whom or about whom they foughtthe previous regime, which used to bestow upon us an equal right to dieor get imprisoned irrespective of who we were ethnically or otherwise. Hailemariam Desalegn's Confused Statements

By Amanuel Biedemariam (February 22, 2014)

(Africa Confidential January Edition) On February 10, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn of Ethiopia gave reporters access and conducted apress conference. The statements of Hailemariam are fraught with inconsistencies and telling that there is a serious leadership vacuum and lack of direction in Ethiopia. The statements lack principle, direction and strategy. The messages are inconsistent and contradictory to previous statements.

On an interview with Africa Confidential January edition, when asked what's your Eritrea policy? PM Hailemariam Desalegn said, "Our Eritrea policy is very clear. These two peoples are very friendly; the normalizing of relations, also with the governments, should come as soonas possible. We have accepted unconditionally the rulings [on the border]and so this has to implemented but with a discussion because the implementation process needs something on the ground since it is a colonial rather than a people's boundary." Emphasis added.

For a while, Ethiopians have been expressing anger and concern about theborder issue between Ethiopia and Sudan claiming that the minority TPLF regime has unlawfully ceded huge chunks of Ethiopian territories to Sudan. The tenet of their argument is that the signatures of Meles Zenawiand Hailemariam Desaleng are unlawful, null and void based on Article 55(12) of Ethiopian constitution which demands accountability andratification by parliament. On a recent article, "Save Ethiopia From Chopping Block", Dr.Alemayehu G. Mariam wrote, "It is important to understand and underscore the fact that the "agreement" Meles and Bashir "signed", by Meles' own description andadmission, has nothing to do with the so-called Gwen line of 1902 ("Anglo-Ethiopian Treaty of 1902" setting the "frontier between the Sudanand Ethiopia"). It also has nothing to do with any other agreements drafted or concluded by the imperial government prior to 1974, or the Derg regime between 1975 and 1991 for border demarcation or settlement. Meles' "agreement", by his own admission, deals exclusively with border matters and related issues beginning in 1996, when presumably the occupation of Sudanese land by Ethiopians took place under Meles' personal watch."
Citing Wikileaks, Dr. Al Mariam writes: "Former TPLF Central Committee member and former Defense Minister Seeye Abraha told" American embassy officials in Addis Ababa that in a move to deal with "on-going tensions between Ethiopia and Sudan", Meles had turned over land to theSudan "which has cost the Amhara region a large chunk of territory" and that Meles' regime had tried to "sweep the issue under the rug."
It is unlikely that the views and efforts of the people of Ethiopia will eversee the daylight vis-à-vis the border agreements that Meles Zenawi or Hailemariam Desalegn signed or concluded since there is no question onthe legitimacy of their positions by the international community.
International agreements they signed will undoubtedly stand.
In response to those concerns Hailemariam responded, "The historical border agreement between the two nations dates back to the time of Emperor Menelik II when the Sudan was under the protectorate of the British Empire. There should not be any confusion on the issue since the agreement that was signed then was evaluated and accepted by successive regimes that came after Menelik's. The border agreements has been accepted and endorsed by the regimes and that there could not be any new matter that his administration has to deal with. "All that is left isto implement the already demarcated and delimited border agreement.
So, there are no issues with the agreement: it is binding; the only thingleft is to put posts on these borders."
Hailemariam claims that Ethiopia is committed to regional peace. Whythen is his regime illegally occupying internationally delimitated border with Eritrea? Why the doublespeak? The inconsistencies however are notlimited to the border issues. Hailemariam's positions and actions in Somalia and his view of Uganda's role on the current conflict on SS are contradictory and dangerous for regional stability and progress. When headdressed Ugandan forces in SS, citing that the problem is political, Hailemariam said,

"We believe that all forces that were "invited" by different forces in thatcountry have to withdraw phase by phase."

The irony, on the same press conference, while addressing Somalia, Hailemariam claiming to have bilateral agreement with the government inSomalia tried to legitimize the presence of Ethiopian forces in Somalia. Hesaid Ethiopia is in Somalia as AMISOM "based on the "request" of the Somali government." Ugandan forces are in S. Sudan based on the "invitation" of the legitimategovernment of S. Sudan. Why then is Hailemariam seeking or talking political solution for the civil war in South Sudan while interfering in Somalia militarily? Why not political solution in Somalia? Assuming that the government in Somalia is independent and free to request assistance freely as a nation, why deny the same right to the government in South Sudan? Hardly anyone believes that Ethiopian forces are welcome by the people of Somalia. AMISOM or not, Ethiopian forces are not welcome. To the contrary Ethiopia's incursion into Somalia was not received well.

On a recent interview with the VOA, former U.S. Ambassador to EthiopiaDavid Shinn said that it is a "mistake" for Ethiopian troops to join the AMISOM force in Somalia.

Peace, security, terrorism and Al Shabab are justifications for Hailemariamto return into Somalia. The reality, however, Ethiopia's incursions into Somalia is impediment to peace and source of great instability. Ambassador Shinn continued, Ethiopian move could allow al-Shabab touse it as a "rallying cry to recruit new members."

Moreover, Hailmariam's positions are contradictory and self-serving as it regards to IGAD's role on the current conflicts in the region. Hailemariam evoked IGAD and AU to make a case against the presence of Ugandan troops in South Sudan and ignored the role of IGAD in Somalia. Uganda isin South Sudan based on the request of the sitting government of Salva Kiir Miardet, just like Ethiopia is in Somalia based on claims of a request. Why then Hailemariam undermining IGAD's role in Somalia?

Hailemariam Desalegn's Compromised Stature: By all standards Hailemariam Desalegn is on a tenuous position on many levels for manyreasons.

Firstly, he is not from the region of the minority clique ruling the country.Many consider Hailemariam as a figurehead. On the 17 Feb, The Telegraph's reporter David Blair on his report, "Ethiopian Airlines hijacking: Why co-pilot might have taken extreme steps to leave" wrote,

"Two key "push factors" lie behind this outflow: repression and poverty. Ethiopia is a de facto one-party state, dominated by small autocratic elite.Under the previous Prime Minister, Meles Zenawi, elections were shamelessly rigged and the opposition simply closed down. Many Ethiopians believed that Meles favored his own Tigray-Tigrinya ethnic group, who comprise less than seven per cent of the population, for the most powerful and privileged positions in the land."

Hence, PM Haileriam Desalegn is considered a transitional figurehead untilthe election of 2015 and likely to be replaced by another member of the TPLF to pursue Zenawi's agendas.

Secondly, Hailemariam inherited a country with a diminished regional and international influence for many reasons: A) The US has accomplished much of what it intended in Somalia hence the role required from Ethiopiais diminished. B) George Bush's Somalia war on terror agenda, which the minority regime exploited extensively seems to have shifted slightly as thegovernment in Somalia is recognized by the international community.

Thirdly, the countries in the region have opposing positions and interests on many areas as recent developments in S. Sudan exposed. Additionally,these countries have demonstrated ability to compete with Ethiopia on many fronts denying Ethiopia the anchor-state-status it enjoyed unchallenged for a while thus minimized Ethiopia's exclusive role in that regard.

Fourth, International actors such as China and Russia are playing significant roles to influence events and outcomes to favor their geostrategic interests. To be effective, China and Russia need to includeall and play a balanced hand with all the nations in the region further diluting Ethiopia's once dominant role.

Hailemariam's Diminished Regional Roles: One of the strongest suits of Meles Zenawi was the fact that he managed to co-opt influence from theregional actors using any means necessary. That level of influence died with Meles for many reasons:

The power transition took a long time to materialize. Between the timesMeles was rumored sick, his death and the time it took to complete thetransition creating vacuum.

The transition was manipulated to appease US interests while the realpower remained on the hands of few Tigrayans led by the then Information Minister Bereket Simon who is considered the powercontrolling Hailemariam.

The regional actors are focusing on their own interests. One good exampleof this is the current conflict in S. Sudan and how it will likely affect the dynamics of the relations between South Sudan, Uganda and Ethiopia regarding the Nile. Hailemariam is forced to wager Ethiopia's interests regarding the Nile in order to pursue US agendas in South Sudan. No consensus on South Sudan could lead to lack of consensus on issues of mutual importance including the Nile. Meles Zenawi was able to garner consensus and support for Ethiopia's positions on the Nile which is hard for Hailemariam to replicate.
Furthermore, Uganda, Kenya, South Sudan, Rwanda have mutual interests independent from Ethiopia because all these countries depend onport of Mombasa in Kenya for their imports. This gives Kenya leverage and importance that Hailameariam cannot match.
Moreover, initially, with the help of the US, the regime was able to createalliances with countries in the region specifically to encircle and suffocateEritrea to submission. At this stage, while Hailemariam desperately tries to pretend that Eritrea is isolated; the reality is Eritrea has turned the table. Eritrea has relations with Uganda, Sudan, Kenya, South Sudan andEgypt. At the current stage Hailemariam has no relation with Eritrea, Egypt, opposing positions with Uganda and South Sudan and Kenya has more interest independent from Ethiopia. In effect, Ethiopia is encircled further diminishing Hailmariam's roles.
Shifting US foreign policy. Recent statements by former US diplomats regarding Eritrea stirred frantic reaction. The TPLF went on a full-fledged PR campaign to attack the issues and the personalities demonstrating fearthe minority regime has of losing its status that it depends on for its very survival. On a piece about Zenawi's legacy "Ethiopia: Revelation of Zenawi's vision for Tigray," Robele Ababya wrote, "When asked, in the aftermath of the 2005 election, what legal authorityhe had to by-pass the Parliament and declare a state of emergency, Zenawi responded by saying that, after all, the donors did not object to the action he took. His response is solid proof, among others, that the monstrous killer was subservient to the interests of the donors at the expense of the vital interests of poor Ethiopia."
Without US support the regime cannot survive. Hence fighting to maintainthe "special-relation" status with the US is a question of survival. That however is beyond the control of the US as more African nations are looking for partnership with China, Russia, India, Brazil and other countries that are more focused on economic issues that Africa desperately need. This diminished US control of African agendas further diminishing Hailemariam's role in the region that the late Zenawi enjoyedunchallenged.

Hailemariam Desalegn Lame Duck Personified: In the US, a president is generally considered a lame duck at the end of his tenure or when a successor is elected. What that generally means is, during that phase, if the president is not popular his/her influence could not translate into furthering his/her agendas and naturally no coattails. In reality, however,the president's power is intact to the point that he/she can even wage wars.
In Hailemariam's case, however, he is a lame duck in the truest sense because in Ethiopia, power is on the hands of the few repressive Tigrayansthat are vying for time until the next election. "Ethiopia is a de facto one- party state, dominated by a small autocratic elite" controlling Hailmariam's actions and public statements. In addition, Hailemariam has no constituency inside Ethiopia or the Diaspora. Support for Hailemariam is virtually nonexistent.
Conclusion: The situation in Ethiopia is unsustainable. Ethiopia is under extreme internal and external pressures that will ultimately explode abruptly. As demonstrated above, to further the interests of the super powers, the regime suppressed the people and took unnecessary antagonistic positions by becoming a pseudo-hegemon of the region. Whatthe press conference demonstrated is that PM Hailemariam Desalegn triedto address concerns of many stakeholders and failed. He tried to address the concerns of the people of Tigray, US interests, Somalia and regional actors. He tried to address Eritrea in a manner that satisfied TPLF and all Ethiopians and failed.
Ethiopia is on a holding pattern bracing for change on the upcoming election. The questions are many. There exists no political party to challenge the TPLF. What does the US want in this transition? Can the TPLF bring a successor from Tigray and continue the "legacy" of Meles? How would the US react to that? In the absence of clear leadership direction these questions take on a new meaning enlarging the gap between all the publics. That means PM Hailemariam Desalegn will have toawait his fate to be decided by the TPLF as the rest of Ethiopia. (Text ends)
OgadenToday: Ethiopia's New Strategy towards Somalia a moral story divide and rule Policy' VIEW POINT By Ahmed Abdi (February 9, 2014) Somalia was one of the best powerful nations of the African continent eversince it gained its full-Independence from European Colonialists and right after its Independence many African countries gained their Independence with the help of Somalia.
During the Cold War Somalia and Ethiopia went a war over Ogaden territory and Somali National Army defeated the largest Army of Africa at the time, Ethiopian National Defense Forces or (ENDF) that forced the former Ethiopian Derge Regime of Mengistu Haile Merriam to seek assistance from the Soviet Union and Cuban troops including South Yemen, but unfortunately when the warlords toppled the former Somalia dictator, Mohammed Siad Barre regime they did not come up in an advance a plan with them to control the entire country and that led a naked foreign interference from Somalia's big, bad neighbor of Ethiopia, which has been meddling in Somalia's domestic affairs over the last two decades to create chaos. And Somali people that known to their pride andvictory loving had their politicians bowed down in front of their former arch-enemy of Abyssinia's face. Ethiopia which is more divided than ever before is controlling Somalia's politics directly and indirectly at will.

Somalia's Federal government sent its former minister of Information, Posts and Telecommunication, Abdullahi Elmoge Hersi, to participate inEthiopia's Nations, Nationalities and People's day but he gained neitherattention nor respect from Ethiopian government that behaved as if hewas not exist at all.

Somali Defense Minister Gen. Mohammed Sheikh Hassan that hails from Mirifle tribe who openly expressed his opposition towards the Jubbe Administration had signed a treaty with the Ethiopian government that indicates the Ethiopian Security agents can freely operate inside Somalia and can kill or abduct any person that is suspected of being an ONLF- Sympathizer a treaty, which made people of Somalis upset, moreover theminister signed the treaty with the absence of the Somalia flag while Ethiopian flags are every corner of the Somali defense minister, what kindof diplomacy do you call this?

Since ONLF is limited beyond its borders, what is behind this decision isunderstandable, both Ethiopia and Somali Federal government want to play the card of ONLF in order to fight against Ahmed Madobe's administration and the Ogadeni tribes in Jubaland. (Text ends)

ETHIOPOLITICS: Rotten to the core, regime makes country's future bleak'VIEW POINT By Aklog Birar (PhD) (February 22, 2014)

The fundamental premise of this commentary is that only genuine commitment to FREEDOM and human rights of all citizens would assure Ethiopians sustainable and equitable growth and improvements in their lives. In turn, it is the institutionalization of these norms through free and fair elections that will establish a firm foundation for lasting peace and national reconciliation--singularly the most critical governance gaps in Ethiopia. Sadly, evolution toward this people-centered governance that I believe is essential for all Ethiopians is nowhere in sight if left to the governing party. The core group of this party believes that it can do no wrong. Instead of reform, the ruling party has gone haywire strengtheningits spy network using the latest Internet technology to suppress any form of dissent and challenge. Revelations in the Washington Post that individuals in the US and the UK have filed suits against the Ethiopian government's breach of domestic and international laws by spying and snooping on American, UK citizens and other citizens of Ethiopian origin says it all. Simply put, each member of the Diaspora is subjected to violation of her/his rights regardless of ethnicity, religion, age, gender andsocial status.

This extension is an affront to civilized behavior and to our humanity. Thepost Meles TPLF/EPRDF is unable to reform itself willingly. This is becausethe rest of us are divided, fractured and spend as much time demeaning one another as we do blasting the ruling party. Why is this so important? In this century, we see everywhere that durable peace and stability can only be imposed from the top down by force only temporarily. Elections can be manipulated and bought as was the case in 2007 only temporarily.The people of Syria are paying a huge price, including their lives and livelihood because they want freedom and democracy. The people of Ukraine are fighting their own government for the same thing. Stifling peaceful dissent for justice is universal and has no boundaries no matter how harsh people are treated.

We know that repressive governance has not bought the TPLF/EPRDF public confidence and or trust. In fact, it has alienated it from the vast majority totally. "Double digit" growth can occur but the benefits rarely trickle down; the beneficiaries are few. It is primarily those who run the state and or are aligned to the state. The governing party recruits members literally by paying them. It has no assurance that the 5 million members will sell their hearts and souls in the event a better alternative appears in the political theater. This was the case in 2005. Ordinary Ethiopians know all of these and more. They live with a dysfunctional government each and every day and are paying a huge price for it. This puts the burden of genuine democratic reform on the opposition and on civil society. Simply put, the opposition must stop a political tradition of brinkmanship, bickering and hair splitting. It must close ranks, set aside minor differences and agree on a unity of purpose to unseat the governingparty and save the country from an impending social and political catastrophe. The next election is around the corner but work has not been done. What makes me think that conditions are ripe? The indicators are everywhere for anyone to see. But, this takes courage and commitment from civic, religious and political leaders whether at home or abroad.

Creating an organization today and collapsing it the next day is not the answer. Worshipping one's organization above country and above the Ethiopian people and demeaning others is not the answer. Seeking political power without a country or without the backing of the population is not the answer. The acid test of wise leadership and democratic-leaningchange is the capacity to subordinate one's private interest, ego and ambition to the common good. A country of 94 million people deserves wise and people-centered political, civic and religious leaders. Opposing the ruling party by itself is not enough. Offering a promising alternative iswhat the Ethiopian people are demanding.

I decided to write this commentary instead of the more academic and seemingly mundane continuation on the Dynamics of Conflict connected tothe Doha Conference for a reason. Each of us who care about the country and the dire situation Ethiopians face today must speak up and encourageopposition groups and civil society including those in the Diaspora to showcourage and change now not tomorrow. They need to agree on a unity of purpose or they will remain irrelevant regardless of how often and how fast they talk.

All indicators are on their side. The Ethiopian state is rottingunder the weight of a single party bureaucracy that is self- serving, repressive, exploitative, divisive, corrupt and immune to any form of criticism and reform. Fortunately for the vast majority of Ethiopians who have not benefitted from "double digit growth for a decade," and for the divided and inept opposition, 2014 has not started as a good year for the governing party. I have absolutely no doubt in my mind that, given the high level of public appetite for representative and accountable government, a strong national opposition or opposition parties and civil society with substantially better and all inclusive organization, wise leadership and more promising policy alternatives will win in a landslide.

The objective conditions are ripe for change. Below are a sample ofglobally recognized reasons.

Country Risk for Investors: The Economist's Intelligence Survey on country risks identified Ethiopia as one of the riskiest in the world, with a rating of 3 out of 4. It means that the country suffers from poor fiscal andmonetary policies…heavy borrowing and deficit financing, massive credit allocation with insignificant or no collateral, low taxes and domestic saving, an unbelievable level of illicit capital outflow. As a recent article byAl-Jazeera showed, Ethiopia demonstrates a semblance of glitzy growth without equitable and fair distribution of incomes and wealth and without a foundation of sustainability.

Staples are out of rich for ordinary Ethiopians. Close to "90 percent of the population is poor" and most are destitute. Employment opportunities for youth and females have not kept pace with the workforce. Ethiopia needs to generate at least two million jobs a year for several decades. Otherwise, the educated will continue to leave in droves depriving the country of productive and creative human capital. The value or purchasing power of the Birr has been reduced several times. An anonymous article in Amharic says it all.

Here is the bottom line. Ethiopia is one of the poorest and least developedcountries on the planet, with a per capita income of $390 per annum. I have argued in previous articles that it is development outlier. Yet, it has a few millionaires whose wealth is morally and ethically questionable.

Income inequality is alarming. The rich and superrich should know thatthey live in glass houses. Growth is basically narrow with high incomesand wealth for a few. One observer notes that "Apart from a few tax havens, there is no country in Africa that has attained a high standard of living on the basis of services (commodity exports, my addition) alone." This is true for Ethiopia where the rich and super rich consume what they do not produce and call this miraculous growth. Investors cannot invest their capital in productive areas unless and until nationals are in a positionto buy and consume. A policy bias in favor of exporting commodities without an assurance of food security does not change the structure of theeconomy no matter how fast and how high the "growth story" is propagated. The country won't achieve food security no matter how muchland is taken away from indigenous people to make room for state and foreign owned sugar plantations. Smallholders including indigenous communities must be empowered to be owners and producers. The current growth model shows that, whether foreign or domestic, investors focus on speculative and quick return areas rather than on sectors and sub-sectors that strengthen domestic productive capacities, national ownership of assets, job creation and sustainable boost of the Ethiopian middle class. Food Insecurity The ruling party has failed in making Ethiopia food self-sufficient. The country is more food insecure today thanat any time after the current regime took power or comparatively speaking before. The UN Food Program states that 14 million Ethiopians continue to depend on international food aid. Oxfam and a special broadcast by a major American television network showed emaciated children and mothers emanating in the Ogaden afflicted by a hidden famine that the governing party denies. There are ominous signs that famine will spread to other parts of the country. This recurring phenomenon has been contained and or eliminated in many countries including India and China. Wolfgang Fengler a leading specialist at the World Bank, put the policy issue clearly. "This famine crisis in Ethiopia is man-made" and should have been addressed by the ruling-party within itsAgriculture Development-led Industrialization framework. It has essentially abandoned this strategy in favor FDI in large-scale commercialagriculture. This latest strategy has created social, political and environmental havoc.

Bribery and corruption: no matter how one looks at it, the vast majority ofEthiopians are sickened by a state that is rotten to the core. State institutions are corrupt. The World Bank funded two studies, the latest in collaboration with DIFID of Britain, CIDA of Canada and the Netherlands; and another last year conducted by Kilimanjaro International. Both studiesreveal the depth and breadth of unprecedented state condoned and at best ignored bribery, kickbacks and corruption. This institutional culture isbleeding Ethiopians. Three hundred fifty foreign investors were surveyed and reported that almost all state institutions: revenue and customs, water, sewage, telecommunication, electric power, licensing and procurement, judges, courts, police, foreign exchange authorities, municipalities, land and building licensing agencies, infrastructure construction suppliers and contractors etc. etc. are involved in corruption. You ask a simple question and offer an answer. Who is above board and above blame? None in government. Who then provides basic services toEthiopians whether they live in urban or rural areas? It is hard to find anofficial above reproach. Who has integrity and ethnical value that goes beyond serving oneself, families, friends and those who cater to the governing party? It is each for herself of himself. What is the cost of all this to the society? It is not only billions of Birr; it is also moral decay.

How can ordinary people afford to live under a state as rotten to the coreas this? The vast majority are unable to eat three meals a day.

The latest World Bank draft report on corruption notes, “These employeesca get paid a maximum bribe of 20 to 30,000 Birr per incident.” It notes further that “Petty corruptions exist in every office” and ranges from “5,000 to 7,000 Birr” per transaction. This investigative report reveals what Ethiopians know from their life experience and have been complaining about for two decades. The fact that foreign investors complained has forced donors to conduct studies. They could have as easily and cost effectively surveyed Ethiopians who pay bribes to acquire basic services such as water, sewage, electricity and telecommunications.Government employees do not accept the fundamental administrative principle that they are paid salaries to serve the public. They do not have a model at the top of government of the decision-making who abides by the rule of law. Services are erratic and depend on power, connections, wealth and the capacity to pay bribes. This is why I suggest that the system is rotten to the core and cannot be cured without radical reform and accountable government.

Personal safety and insecurity: whatever reasons drove us out of Ethiopia,there is one inescapable fact, we are all refugees either by choice or forced by those who rule the country. The statistics are staggering. Between 1990 and 2006, out of 3,700 Ethiopia-trained medical doctors, 3,000 left the country by choice. These are largely economic refugees asare all migrants to the Middle East, North Africa, Sudan and the rest.

Others leave because of political, religious and other triggers. All journalists and many human rights advocates, academics, former government officials, spiritual leaders etc. left because of their independent views or because they did not subscribe to the dictates of theruling party. Whatever the cause, Ethiopian society has lost and is losing fundamental assets, values, traditions, history, mores and experiences that distinguish the country from the rest of the world. One cannot buy or restore these critical assets and values once they are gone. The overarching reason for this continuing exodus or Brain-Drain is repressive governance and the stifling of freedom. People must have freedom to debate, to vote and to negotiate. Cruel and repressive governance teachesus that enduring peace emanates solely from a just, inclusive and participatory government and state. The acid test in Ethiopia’s case today is whether or not the government is confident and bold enough to open-upsocial, economic, political and cultural space for everyone. I say this because the TPLF/EPRDF has outlived its value and legitimacy to govern the second most populous country in Africa and potentially one of the most prosperous. Ultimately, muzzling the entire society and stifling peaceful dissent is hugely risky for the country. In its 2014 assessment offreedom, the Committee to Protect Journalists says, “A year after the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, Prime Minister Hailemariam Dessalegn succeeded in preserving the repressive climate in Ethiopia. Thecountry faced international condemnation over imprisonment of award- winning journalists Eskinder Nega, Reeyot Alemu and Woubshet Taye, who were serving heavy terms on vague terrorism charges. Authorities continued to crack down on online press by increasing “technological capacity to filter, block, and monitor Internet and Mobile communication.”Similarly, Freedom House has repeatedly noted that Ethiopia is one of the“unfreest or least free countries” in the world, in terms of personal safetyand security and in terms of private ownership of assets.

On the surface, Ethiopia has the appearance of peace and stability. However, social, religious and political fissures are everywhere to see. Theruling party uses diversity as a wedge rather than as an asset. Evidence shows that government has not tapped fully into the country’s immense diversity, natural resources, strategic location as a hub of the African continent and as a bridge to North Africa and the Middle East. It has not offered its youthful population—64 percent under 24—employment opportunity. It has not harnessed modern information technology that is transforming poor societies to tackle poverty, boosting the middle class and increasing incomes (Bangladesh, Kenya) etc. etc. The Ethiopian government is one of the few anywhere in the world to retain state controlof the telecommunication sector, a cash cow that generates $300 million per year. “The absence of competition has seen a country of 94 million lagbadly behind the rest of the continent in an industry that has generally burgeoned alongside economic growth…with mobile phone penetration of 70 percent in SSA compared to a paltry 2.5 percent in Ethiopia; internet access of 40 percent in Kenya.” 4/

Modern IT opens windows for private enterprise and employment. It enhances freedom and facilitates knowledge transfer. It serves as an essential tool for youth to better themselves. It is at the heart of the questfor choice and freedom from poverty and oppression. Government unwillingness to give space, be all inclusive and unleash the creative potential of the country’s youth and harness the peace, gender (females) and information technology dividend, including freedom of expression, have diminished national social cohesion and deterred productivity and theemergence of a robust national private sector.

Africa Business quotes Guang Z Chen, World Bank Country Director, Ethiopia, who asked the Ethiopian government “to allow the private sectorto play a bigger role in the economy.” Chen says, “For the country to continue to grow I strongly I believe industry has to take a much bigger role because there is no other country that I am aware of, aside from resource-rich countries, that can grow to middle income status with still 50 percent of GDP on agriculture." Those with talent and experience leavethe country in droves. The ruling party substitutes Ethiopians by inviting foreign investors, technical and professional staff and by staffing key postswith political cadres. The private sector suffers from lack of access to credit, foreign exchange, land, licenses and permits. Procurement of goods and services is not transparent or competitive. "Making credit available for the private sector is certainly one area the government can do more. The trend that worries us is that while the public investment (thebiggest source of bribery, favoritism and corruption) as a share of GDP is increasing, the private sector as a share of GDP is decreasing" as are savings. Illicit outflow of scarce capital continues unabated, reducing capital resources. 5/

By all measurements, the government fails to empower and unleash Ethiopia's productive potential. It counters national cohesion and integration by pitying ethnic, political and religious groups against one another. This is the opposite of global trends. For example, Ghana outlawed ethnic political formation. Most Ghanaians trust their government officials; and have freedom to change their leaders throughfree and fair elections. Ethiopians do not trust their government. A 2010Gallop Poll shows that trust in government and its institutions is among the lowest in Sub-Saharan Africa. Those with wealth are leaving the country in droves and voting against the government by not investing intheir homeland. Only faith institutions such as Christianity and Islam garner trust and confidence. The governing party has tried to politicize them; both faiths are under constant harassment and threat.

Change must come from within: Ethiopia is one of the few countries in theworld where social change has always come from within. The 1974 Revolution was a result of the Ethiopian Student's Movement that galvanized the entire society. It was national and not ethnic or religious. Itwas transformative but not well designed, planned or executed. In this sense, the country has gone backwards: from a national to that of an ethnic political and social order. This entails risks and unintended consequences. Observers within and outside Ethiopia agree that the Socialist Military Dictatorship that toppled the Haile Selassie government in 1974 and ruled the country with an iron-fist for 17 years was among the most oppressive. Its leaders, leftist groups with different ideologies and motives, foreign sponsors, ethnic-based liberation movements, supporters of the defunct Imperial system and others turned the country into a blood bath. Most of those killed were patriots, social democrats, leftists and other change agents. Hundreds of thousands of young people were murdered; and hundreds of thousands fled. This period triggered thefirst wave of human capital flight at a massive scale. A trend was established. Before then, Ethiopians sent overseas for further education returned home. Today, an estimated 5.5 million Ethiopians— almost all with high school education and 1/3rd with college education--live and work in the two Sudans, Saudi Arabia, the Gulf, Western Europe, North America, Australia, New Zealand and numerous Sub-Saharan African countries. Ninety one percent of domestic workers in the GCC are Ethiopian females aged 20-30. In 2009, 42,000 Ethiopians, most of themyoung, left through Yemen; 80 percent of Ethiopia-trained physicians leave the country each year, etc.

Shouldn't donors care for the rule of law or representative government? While donors praise Ethiopia's remarkable growth, albeit from a low base, human rights groups and unattached development experts question socialbenefits. "Meles engineered one party rule in effect for the TPLF and his Tigray inner circle, with complicity of other ethnic elites that were cooptedinto the ruling alliance….Ethiopia's much praised economic development isnot as robust or cost-free ….as the international community believes…The system was entirely dependent on central authority or command and control." It will be impossible to receive aid without showing some growth.Education opportunities have expanded. The number of colleges and universities has increased. Roads, bridges, hydroelectric dams, etc. have been built. Equally, it will be unthinkable to siphon-off capital unless thereis something to siphon. 6/

Sharp criticism of "Ethiopia's renaissance" is buffeted by others. Followingthe death of Prime Meles in August 2012, Halvorssen and Gladstein of Forbes critiqued donors and the Ethiopian government's Anti-Terrorist Law. "Those in the West heaping praise on Zenawi—all living in societies that suffered so much to achieve individual liberty are engaging in dramatic hypocrisy." In a 2009 UK Department of International Development sponsored study of Ethiopia's growth Stefan Dercon and Ruth Vargas suggested that "The magnitude of this growth and the fact that it has been achieved with little change in input use suggests something is not right with the data on agriculture." In 2012, the IMF questioned Ethiopia's growth sustainability. "The sustainability of Ethiopia's growth model over the medium term is uncertain, given the constraints on private sector development, the absence of savings incentives, lack of financial reform, etc." Despite these policy and structural limitations, the government argues that export-driven growth ispossible without a robust domestic private sector. Critics argue that megaprojects (hydro) to export and generate foreign exchange do not respond to the real need of improving smallholder agricultural productivity, domestic agriculture-based industrialization and employment generation. The counter view is that such state and party-led growth cannot create sustainability without competition and participation.

If we accept the thesis that Ethiopia's development story is not "as robustand cost free" as the government and donors claim, what is root cause ofthe flawed policy? It is lack of freedom and predictability that private property is protected by law and cannot be affected by political decisions.Private sector development is virtually impossible without a favorable investment regulatory system that levels the playing field. The rule of lawand the judicial system must be above the party, sacrosanct and predictable. In 2013, the country ranked “49.4 percent, making its economy the 146th, among the least free in the world. It has gone down by 2.6 %; lower in 6 of 10 indices: trade, workers’ rights, financial movement, investment, etc.” It ranks 32nd out of 46 African countries. “Regulatory efficiency remains weak, creating an unfavorable climate for entreprunial activity…The foundations of economic freedom are quite fragile, particularly because of pervasive corruption and a deficient judicialsystem…Corruption further undermines the foundation of economic freedom” for the Ethiopian private sector. It goes without saying that suchan environment operates in the “dark” and limits productivity and efficiency severely. Both the country and consumers suffer. 7/

Human Rights Watch has done more than any human rights organization to show the flaws in the nexus between of massive aid inflow on the one hand, discrimination, nepotism, corruption and repression on the other. “Development aid flows through, and supports a virtual one-party state with a deplorable human rights record. Government practices include jailing and silencing critics and media, enacting laws to undermine humanrights activity, and hobbling the political system. Aid is routinely used to punish opponents and reward supporters. Massive amounts of money is siphoned-off for private gain. The effect of this on the population is substantial. “The Ethiopian population pays a heavy price for this approach in development.” The 2005 elections that the opposition won and then lost through a political decision is a prime example. Similarly, in2010, “the EPRDF won 99.6 percent of parliamentary seats,” making a mockery of the electoral process. Competition was not allowed. 8/
TPLF/EPRDF Members Need to Air their Voices: hope among Ethiopians that the ruling party would be open to reform has evaporated. “Ethiopian authorities have subjected political detainees to torture and other ill- treatment at the main detention center in Addis Ababa.” In a 70 page report, Human Rights Watch “documents serious human rights abuses, unlawful interrogation tactics…beatings, torture and coerced confessions.”The court system caters to the party alone. “Ethiopia’s courts are politicized and lack independence.” Their role is to serve the ruling party and not to administer justice. “Beatings, torture and coerced confession are no way to deal with journalists or the political opposition---Ethiopia’s Constitution and international legal commitments require officials to protect all detainees from mistreatment….Real change demands action from the highest levels of government against those responsible to root out the underlying culture of impunity.” This impunity is expansive.
Bribery, ethnic-based nepotism, high corruption and illicit outflow of fundsstem from the system itself. High officials and top military officers operateabove the law and all are vested in the system that enriches them. 9/

Top officials of the governing party do not see anything wrong with their manipulation of the Constitution and with violation of human rights contained in international agreements. Following the aftermath of the 2005 elections in which 200 young and innocent Ethiopians were massacred, Ana Gomes, member of the European Parliament and Head of the EU Election Team to Ethiopia saw the danger of impunity as a political culture. She concluded, “As long as the Meles regime is in power, I will never believe in an election in Ethiopia.” Meles is gone but his legacy remains intact. Measured in terms of freedom, human rights, transparency, fair and open political and economic competition and rampant and systemic corruption, the country is worse off than it was in 2005 and 2010. To his credit, Prime Minister Hailemariam Dessalegn is fully cognizant of the dangers the country faces in one area of poor-governance, namely, corruption. A few high officials have been arrested. However, corruption is systemic. Those at the top of the corruption cultureare protected by a system that feeds their wealth. The development strategy of relentless public investment offers a window of opportunity fortheft, graft, kickbacks, corruption and illicit outflow through procurement, customs etc. The system is infected from the top down. It will not stop until and unless the system is overhauled radically.

Radical reform means political reform; a modern monitoring system; and the establishment of an independent oversight consisting of civil society and prominent individuals with impeccable integrity. Transparency International, UNDP and Global Financial Integrity provided documentary evidence showing systemic corruption that requires real commitment to hold corrupt officials at the top and private individuals accountable, including freezing their assets. “The people of Ethiopia are being bled dry.No matter how hard they try to fight their way out of absolute destitutionand poverty, they will be swimming against the current of illicit capital leakage.” 10/

Ethiopia faces intractable vulnerabilities and risks: The hurdle Ethiopia faces on the economic front is equally prevalent on the human rights front. “Rather than working to build a development strategy grounded in human rights, the Ethiopian government is attempting to hoodwink its human rights record, leaving unmentioned its Villagization Program and the Anti-Terrorist Proclamation—both used by the government as significant justification for forced resettlement, arbitrary detention, and politically motivated arrests. Tools used in implementing projects reinforceviolation of human rights and the uprooting of indigenous people from their lands,” all in the name of development “without freedom.” The lack of people-centered development contributes directly to the prevailing phenomenon of growth for the few and gaping inequity that will feed into and cause social unrest similar to Tunisia, Libya, Yemen, Egypt, Syria and rest. Here is the good news, Ethiopian society has overcome its veil of fearimposed by the system. Opposition groups, spiritual leaders and others are openly critical of the government. Peaceful protests are common.

Some of the party's hard core supporters are critical of corruption and open favoritism in hiring and licensing. On February 8, 2014, Binyam Kebede, an ardent interlocutor of the ruling party offered blunt critique ofthe disaster the party and society are facing. In "..... .... " His central argument is that the ruling party has literally stopped serving the public. On the contrary, the party has "imposed a burdensome and crushing bureaucracy on citizens extracting rent, demanding bribes and not providing basic services….It has morphed and does not listen to its own electorate….There is a dark and ominous distance between the ruling party and the public." This cadre is saying what dissidents and oppositionparties have been saying for years.

Think tanks such as Human Rights Watch and Oakland Institute do not see sustainable development unless human rights and freedoms are protected by law and enforced by the government. The genie of corruptionand fear is out of the box and the quest for freedom is unstoppable. The option is not more repression. It is opening-up political and social space sooner than later. In sum, "No Human Rights=No Development and no stability." (Text ends)

DEBATES: Ethiopia Anew: The 10 Theses'

By Zelalem Eshete (PhD) (February 23, 2014)

Much has been said about ethnic tensions in Ethiopia. Are we planning to move beyond that and actually start healing and building each other towards a new Ethiopia that exhibits exemplary unity in diversity any timesoon? I hope we quit the rat race madness by surrendering our respectivepolarized stance, and meet on middle ground in order to actualize a new unity today. The scope of this paper is targeted to reinventing a new identity that unites us all as one. To that end, I propose 10 Theses for public discussion. I do my best to put forth the truth as an independent voice with lots of love in my heart for all. I attempt to discuss concisely and to the point.

Thesis 1: We have a Problem - We are Prisoners of our History: real and grave damage was done in the past. It seems we don't know what to do about it collectively. We talk at each other, each from his/her perspective

− but there is no listening to each other. We all are talking and nobody is listening. We are reactive at best and engage in denial mode for the most part. We are stuck in the past. We are frozen in time with no apparent progress upward concerning racial harmony. The state of our identity is anarrested one.

Thesis 2: First thing First – Reconciliation Now: we are at a loss concerning the foundational work of healing the past. When we can't resolve such important issue, we charge on forward with other topics. We can't put life on hold, of course. So it goes: we demand democracy. We struggle to make politics work in Ethiopia. We search for political solutions left and right. Listening is too much work for us to be an option, so we shout at each other even more. Thus creating a new history of our own inthe process that aggravates our unattended wounds of the past. There needs to be realization of national reconciliation that addresses our past and defines our new identity for the present.

Thesis 3: History Shouldn't Dictate – Only Teach: we have a long history: good and bad, as it is with every thing. But since we are not dealing with our past reality, our history is doing us more harm than good. Whenever we reach out to our history to define our identity, we end up with more confusion than clarity. Unless we abandon using history to define our identity, it will continue to sabotage our chance to be a symbol of unity onthe face of the earth. We only need to use our history to make us wise about reformulating our new identity together. It is time for history to stop dictating what should be our identity one way or another. When we let go what we think is the old good/bad memory of Ethiopia, we will be surprised by the possibilities of the new Ethiopia that is awaiting us. We need to let go of the attempt to hold onto the identity passed to us (interpreted as good or bad) and define a new identity for ourselves altogether.

Thesis 4: Let go "Ethiopia first" Mentality: those of us who like to think of our identity as "Ethiopia first" need a big dose of reality check. We need toget out of our school of thought and get to understand others who are notthinking in the same manner. Instead of being outraged by those who choose to put their ethnicity first, we need to hear their hearts' cry and validate their hurts that put them in this position in the first place.

Otherwise, just giving them a deaf ear and shouting out for a glorious united Ethiopia makes things worse for all of us. Because, struggling for aunited Ethiopia while dismissing others that make up Ethiopia is an oxymoron. If we truly want Ethiopia fist, then put those people who protest to put "Ethiopia first" – first. After all, Ethiopia is not an idea – it ispeople.

Thesis 5: Let go "My ethnicity first" Mentality: we didn't have a healing discussion about our hurtful past yet. Such healing comes when we are listening and understanding each other. For the most part we are at war,always interpreting the reality through our own lenses only. When we dolisten, we want to rush and gloss over in an effort to make our saga go away sooner than later. In light of this, it is understandable those of us who are hurt to abandon "Ethiopia first" and root for our own ethnicity asa matter of survival. In doing so, though, we are missing the big picture.We make the biggest mistake of all by being reactive to the mistake of others against us. Such reaction doesn't cause us to be victor, but victimof our own decision this time around. We need to rewrite the ills of the past, by embracing our destiny to lead the healing process by setting a proactive approach.

Thesis 6: Discover – To Be Known As We Truly Are: now that we release history from dictating our identity, the present becomes devoid of disturbances thereby bringing to light the new Ethiopia as we truly are by shining our best attributes as a people. In addition to embracing the discovered identity at the present, we also go forward and ask what kind of Ethiopia would we want for our children? The adventure begins and thepossibilities are endless. We have witnessed the United States build a newcountry in the time frame of couple of centuries that is the envy of the world. The world is waiting for another miracle so to speak: to see the people of Ethiopia spotlight the other face of Ethiopia as never before.

Thesis 7: The Hero is the People: Israel has Moses, India has Gandhi, South Africa has Mandela, and USA has George Washington. Ethiopia hasgreat leaders, but we have no one we all agree to idolize as our savior.

That is okay. Ethiopia doesn't need to have one in the future either, for that is not our path. It is meant to be this way. It is in the hands of the people. The fate of Ethiopia doesn't hinge on a single person. Ours is a different kind of success story. For us, the hero is the people. It was the people and it will be the people. The throne is reserved for the Ethiopian People. That is why there is a need to stop bickering and start to have reallistening among us. The order of the day should be this: let's talk to each other with the intent to listen. Then only we see that the people have what it takes to get us moving in the right direction. Let us listen the people speak – and treasure the decency and beauty that is hidden from sight and shadowed by everyday commotion.

Thesis 8: No Exclusion Allowed: all the people need to be in this boat together. A political or religious divide is not acceptable to define our boundary. Attempting to work for Ethiopia by excluding the opposition doesn't fly in this journey. Trying to fight for Ethiopia by considering the government as an enemy has no place here. True, the government and opposition disagree big time on their respective political agendas – but that is not the scope of this journey. Here we want to focus on healing ourpast and discovering our new identity as a people. Remember that we can't get this insight by looking to our history. We don't learn this by looking to the history of the world either. We need to write a new script for us to live by on our own. For that, all must be in. Therefore, we ask the political machineries on both sides of the spectrum (government and opposition) to give us space by coming together to deal with the healing process of the past in unison. Such would be a breath of fresh air that produces dividends for both of them at the end. Such healing brings positive energy into the political dialogue thereby enhancing the democratization journey for the better.

Thesis 9: Our Choice Today – The Real Issue: we can point fingers to the past, but the players of the past are gone. We are here. This time, we getto decide. We have two paths set before us into the future. We will eitherbecome a beacon of hope for the world, or a case study of mediocrity in history books. We either keep fighting each other until we destroy each other in the process, or learn to work together for a bright future for all ofus. We will either write a new script for our future history or be handicapped by our past history forever. One thing is clear; we have the potential to arrive at either one. We have what it takes to get us to the higher ground or the lower pit. Our fate is not decided by our ability or inability, but by the choices we make today.

Thesis 10: Embrace the Creator Factor - Disclaimer. This is not about religion. The marriage of religion and state brings only trouble. Religion isbeautiful on a personal level – the way the Creator wanted it to be – for each person is given a free choice. The role of the state is to maintain freedom of religion that has been given to all people by their Creator. It isabout reaching to our spirituality – the highest and noblest attribute of humanity that more importantly sets us apart from animals. It is about believing that our Creator is looking upon us to rise up as a people. Let usnot just copy the success of other nations, but pave unchartered territoryunheard and unseen before. For that – we need the Almighty. We need tolook up to the One who is greater than ourselves if we are to make the impossible possible in our land. “One Nation Under God” has been taken by the United States. “One Family Under Our Creator” awaits us for the taking. This refers not only the creation in the past, but also the creation of the New Ethiopia in time now. Let us invite Him to help us to be knownas one big family that is connected with each other in sisterhood/brotherhood to dream together the unthinkable.

In conclusion: Do we hope that our best is yet to come and the people ofEthiopia worth our dedication and devotion in joining the journey towardsa New Ethiopia.

Do we believe that anything is possible if we all put our mind in rewriting our own history to the amazement of the world? If so, are we prepared toshow our faith in action?

Do we wake up from despair and complacency to contribute our good willwith passion and excellence?

Do we display maturity by speaking our point of view in love, and moreimportantly listen to a different point of view with intent to understand?

Do we display greatness by letting go of our ego/pride and humblyconsidering others better than ourselves in a spirit of sisterhood/brotherhood?

Do we have the courage to think as if there is no box and dare to explorenew frontiers?

If we all put forth the best part in us, this may initiate collective discussionin our homes and neighborhoods in Ethiopia and around the world by allowing the people to set the agenda for the healing process and modelconstructive reconciliation in action. (Text ends)

CYBER ATTACK: Regime in Ethiopia conducting computer espionageagainst American residents'

By WND (February 23, 2014) - Poverty-stricken Ethiopia is rich in computer espionage. Amid all the reports of spying on Americans by the U.S. government, through the National Security Agency, FBI and others, the complaint filed by the Electronic Frontier Foundation on behalf of a man identified only by the pseudonym of Mr. Kidane takes allegations to awhole new level.

The complaint filed in the U.S. District Court in Washington alleges the Ethiopian government infected his computer so that it could wiretap his private Skype calls and monitor his family's every use of the computer formonths on end.

"We have clear evidence of a foreign government secretly infiltrating anAmerican's computer in America, listening to his calls, and obtaining access to a wide swath of his private life," said EFF Staff Attorney Nate Cardozo.

"The current Ethiopian government has a well-documented history of human rights violations against anyone it sees as political opponents. Here, it wiretapped a United States citizen on United States soil in an apparent attempt to obtain information about members of the Ethiopiandiaspora who have been critical of their former government. U.S. laws protect Americans from this type of unauthorized electronic spying, regardless of who is responsible."

The EFF said a forensic examination of the computer revealed the spyware, which is made and sold to governments by the Gamma Group ofCompanies, was installed when Kidane opened a Microsoft Word document.

There was an attachment with a program called FinSpy, and that programover months recorded his activities on the computer. It was discovered because the spyware left traces of the files it copied and surreptitiously sent to a secret control server located in Ethiopia and controlled by that government, the claim alleges.

"The problem of governments violating the privacy of their political opponents through digital surveillance is not isolated – it's already big andgrowing bigger," Cindy Cohn, the EFF legal director, said. "Yet despite theinternational intrigue and genuine danger involved in his lawsuit, at bottom it's a straightforward case. An American citizen was wiretapped athis home in Maryland, and he's asking for his day in court under longstanding American laws."

Officials with the EFF said the attack apparently is part of a systematicprogram by the Ethiopian government to spy on perceived political opponents in the Ethiopian diaspora around the world.
They said human rights agencies and news outlets elsewhere have maderelated claims.
And they said Ethiopia is not alone. They said CitizenLab, a team of University of Toronto researchers, has discovered evidence that governments around the world are using FinSpy and other technologies tospy on human rights and democracy advocates.
EFF reports, “Essentially, the malware took over our client’s computer andsecretly sent copies of his activities, including Skype calls, web searches and indications of websites visited [and] other activity, to the Ethiopian government.”
“This case is important because it demonstrates that state-sponsored malware infections and can indeed are occurring in the U.S. against U.S.citizens. It seeks to demonstrate that warrantless wiretapping is illegal and can be the basis of a lawsuit in the United States, regardless of whoengages in it,” EFF said.
The complaint explains FinSpy can record Internet telephone calls, text messages, and file transfers transmitted through Skype, record every keystroke on the computer, and take a picture of the contents displayedon a computer’s screen. It can even covertly record audio from a computer’s microphone even when no Skype calls are taking place. The complaint said the Internet Protocol to which the spyware sent data wasinside Ethiopia, and was under control of the state-owned Ethio Telecomcommunications company. (Text ends)
HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN : ‘Humanitarian Crisis’ for Ogaden Living NearEthiopia’s Oil Fields'
By Ed McKenna (IPS) ADDIS ABABA (February 23, 2014)
New allegations of scorched earth evictions of the Ogaden people have raised concerns that a lack of benefit sharing could escalate instability inthe region and reinforce separatist tensions as foreign energy companiesprepare to extract oil and gas from troubled southeastern Ethiopia.
“The resources in this region will make Ethiopia rich but will keep us impoverished. A settlement is all we can hope for to protect our claim tosome of the economic advantages of our natural resources,” Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) founder Abdirahman Mahdi told IPS.
The demise of Ethiopian dictator Hailemariam Mengistu in 1994 triggereda two-decade conflict between the government of Ethiopia and the ONLF.

The ONLF has been fighting for self-determination of the eight to 10 million Somali ethnic population living in the Ogaden basin within theSomali National Regional State (SNRS).

The government's heavy paramilitary response to the insurgency has created "a humanitarian crisis throughout the Ogaden [basin] where halfof the population live through famine," said Mahdi.

Reports of forced evictions and human rights abuses in the vicinity of oiland gas fields is creating a new wave of grievances against the government in local communities.

"The army came to our community and burnt our homes and our crops. Our situation is getting worse as the military want many villages removedbecause of the search for gas.

"Many people in this area have been arrested. We don't know where theyare or if they are alive. Our situation is very bad," one Ogaden man, whoasked to remain anonymous, told IPS.

The confirmation of huge oil and gas reserves in the Ogaden basin is setto spike Ethiopia's wealth as investment starts to pour in from foreign energy companies.

Gas deposits in the Ogaden basin are estimated at 2.7 trillion cubic feetover an area of 350,000 square kilometres.

Currently there are three oil companies finalising exploration in the area:Africa Oil (Canada), South Western Energy (Hong Kong) and GCL Poly Petroleum Investment (China).

Ethiopia has been Africa's fastest-growing economy in recent years and could soon be an oil-producing economy. However, a government embargo on the Ogaden has severely isolated the region's predominantlypastoralist population from Ethiopia's development gains. Any prospect ofconsultation over resource extraction at this stage look slim, says Ogadenexpert Professor Tobias Hagmann from the Roskilde University in Denmark.

"It is very unlikely that the local population will be consulted about local projects. They are not allowed to voice political dissent. How can they beallowed to participate in local decision-making related to development plans," he told IPS.

Government spokesperson Shimeles Kemal told IPS that oil and gas riches"will contribute to the development of the SNRS including the Ogaden region."

The Ethiopian government has been criticised by rights organisations forpreventing NGOs from providing humanitarian aid to one of the poorest regions of Ethiopia and creating an exodus of thousands of refugees.

Amnesty International's researcher on Ethiopia Claire Beston told IPS thatthe Ethiopian government's clampdown on the Ogaden Somali population"has severely restricted access to and within the region, including that of humanitarian agencies, and has also placed major restrictions on information coming out of the region about the true state of the humanitarian and human rights situation there."

In December 2013 the Ogaden European Diaspora Association sent a letter to the European Union requesting that aid to Ethiopia be withheld aslong as human rights abuses continue against the Ogaden.

"We are living under political and economic embargo. We demand that NGOs move freelyas the humanitarian situation is critical," Mahdi said.

Chinese oil company, GCL Poly Petroleum Investment, signed a deal withEthiopia in November 2013 to develop gas reserves at Calub and Hilala inthe Ogaden region. A month later, the ONLF accused government militia,the Liyu police, of burning swathes of pasture belonging to communities close to Calub and Hilala gas fields.

A military clampdown in the region has made verifying such reports impossible. However, Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported in 2012 that the Liyu police had been responsible for extra-judicial killings as a form ofcollective punishment.

"The Liyu police had summarily executed 10 men during a three-day rampage on a series of villages. These attacks, as previous abuses that get carried out by the Ethiopian government as part of its counter-insurgency campaign, take place in a context of complete impunity," HRWresearcher Laetitia Bader told IPS.

Much needed dialogue seems to be the only way to reduce feelings of disaffection in the major Ogaden clan, the Darod, which accounts for closeto half of the Somali population in Ethiopia and constitutes the backbone of the ONLF.

However, faltering peace talks between the ONLF and the Ethiopian government broke down in Kenya in September 2012 and the resumptionof talks could be further delayed since the abduction of two ONLF negotiators in January by Ethiopian security in Nairobi.

"The ONLF has a valid claim about the lack of accountability of international oil companies operating in the Ogaden. Further, the majorclan family in the region is very much frustrated by continuous harassment and an absence of political and civic rights," said Hagmann.

“They support the ONLF because it is the only organised opposition. It’s not the best choice since many Ogaden don’t support the ONLF but it’s theonly choice for those marginalised by government policies.” (Text end)

A Sudanese Court Convicts Ethiopian teenage of ‘Indecent Acts’

PRESS (February 25, 2014) An 18-year-old Ethiopian migrant woman in Sudan was gang-raped – and now faces prison and a hefty fine for comingforward. By Alice Dahle Amnesty USA’s Women’s Human Rights Coordination Group

An 18-year-old Ethiopian migrant woman in Khartoum, Sudan was out looking for housing, when she was lured into an empty property and gang-raped by seven men. A police officer found her after the attack and took her to the police station. However, since it was a public holiday, a formal complaint was not filed. The perpetrators of the rapes filmed the attack and distributed the video through social media six months later. Asa result, everyone involved was arrested. Of the seven men put on trial, three were convicted of adultery and sentenced to 100 lashes. Two more were convicted of indecent acts and sentenced to 40 lashes and fines.

Another man was convicted of distributing indecent material and sentenced to 40 lashes and a heavy fine. The seventh individual was released on grounds of insufficient evidence against him. Those sentencedto lashing had their sentences carried out immediately after the trial in a closed court. But that’s not where the story ends.

The young woman, who is now nine months pregnant, was first charged with adultery, which carries a possible sentence of death by stoning in Sudan. For any married person, sex outside the marriage is considered a capital offense under the Sudanese legal code. However, the court eventually dropped the charge after recognizing that the woman is divorced and therefore not subject to being charged as a married person for adultery. When she tried to file a formal complaint of the rapes, the Attorney General did not allow her to do so because she was under investigation for a criminal offense. During the trial, she was found guilty of committing “Indecent Acts,” sentenced to a month in prison, which hasbeen suspended, and fined 5,000 Sudanese Pounds (about $961.00). Shehas also been threatened with “punishment for illegal entry” under Sudan’s immigration law and faces a prison sentence of 1 to 2 years and/or a fine, followed by expulsion.

Guilty verdicts and immigration charges against survivors of sexual violence only discourage individuals who experience such violations fromspeaking up and seeking help, reinforcing a culture of impunity for the perpetrators. Governments around the world must protect the human rights and safety of people living within their borders and hold those whoviolate those rights accountable. We can help break the cycle of violenceagainst women and girls globally by urging the U.S. Congress to pass legislation making this a diplomatic priority. The International Violence Against Women Act (I-VAWA), currently under consideration as H.R. 3571in the House of Representatives and soon to be reintroduced in the Senate, would do just that. (Text ends)

ETHIOPOLITICS: City of Bahir Dar echoed the call of Ethiopians forchange'

ESAT News (February 25, 2014) - Mulat, 28, a resident of Meshenti, BahirDar, says he attended Sunday's protest in Bahir Dar "irritated by the regime". Asked why, Mulat said "what is there not to be angry of? There isnothing improving. As if this was not enough, they (the government) disparage us." A large number of angry protesters joined the opposition demonstration that was held on Sunday February 23, 2014 called by the opposition Unity for Democracy and Justice (UDJ) and All Ethiopian Unity Party (AEUP) principally opposing the demeaning public speech against Amhara people by Alemnew Mekonen, the Deputy President of Amhara region.

Some of the slogans included, "You cannot demean and rule the people. ANDM EPRDF does not have the moral magnanimity to administer the Amhara people. Stop evicting people from their land. It is better to have abare foot rather than a bare mind. A country that has no freedom is in darkness. The farmer should not be an expatriate on its land." Mamush, a resident of Kebele 07, Bahir Dar city, who was also promoting the demonstration said, "I feel so happy today. My prayers have been answered." He said the people of Bahir Dar attended the protest despite threats by the government and without being given per dime. He fears theregime may organise another demo to condemn this protest.

People were happy and have been talking about the successful demonstration afterwards, said another participant. The discipline of the demonstrators has also been appreciated. According to him, although Alemnew Mekonen's speech was taken as a pretext for the demonstration,the main questions of the demo were democracy, freedom, and economy "although the ruling Front bites everyone on its way like a vicious dog, I do not think the struggle would ever be go down." He added.

LGBT RIGHTS: Ethiopian Minister Slams Uganda for Passing Anti-Gay Law'

Ethiopia's Minister of Women, Children and Youth Affairs about the controversial "pro-gay" message on her twitter criticizing the passing in tolaw of Uganda's anti-gay bill.

By Dan Littauer, Huffington Post (February 26, 2014) Addis Ababa,Ethiopia

Zenebu Tadesse, Ethiopia's Minister of Women, Children and Youth Affairshas taken to twitter criticizing the passing of Uganda's anti-gay law, on Monday. Tadesse tweeted: "There is no place for hate, discrimination in my beloved Africa. It's not Governments' business to make dress code oranti-gay laws #Uganda." The tweet came shortly after Ugandan PresidentYoweri Museveni signed a harsh anti-gay law that punishes gay sex with up to life in prison. Tadesse's African voice joins a worldwide condemnation of Uganda's new anti-gay law.

On Sunday, the former Archbishop of Cape Town, Nobel Peace Prize winning Desmond Tutu has compared Uganda's new anti-gay law to Nazi and Apartheid discrimination. Reacting to the news, Ugandan LGBT rightsadvocate, Frank Mugisha, told me that he very much welcomed Tadesse'sstatement. He said: "this will help. We need as many possible African voices speaking against this law."

While activist Melanie Nathan, a native of South African commented: "Thisis hugely significant statement coming from an accomplished and respected African Minister. "I believe that many more Africans of noble esteem probably believe that which she has had the courage to speak," asking others to show equal courage and follow her lead. Nathan added that she is "especially disappointed that we have yet to hear officially fromSouth Africa's President Zuma, from the only country in Africa where thereis a fully equal constitution." She said he should follow Nelson Mandela's legacy and Tadesse's lead. Ethiopia has already a harsh anti-gay law which punish same-sex acts with up to 15 years imprisonment.

In addition, under its anti-terrorism law anyone who states what the government deems terrorism (which can include human rights criticism) can be imprisoned for 20 years, without a warrant. Ethiopia's anti-advocacy law bars charities and nongovernmental organizations that receive more than 10 percent of their funding from abroad from participating in activities that advance human rights and the promotion of equality. Essentially these three laws taken in total make it impossible forany health-services, charity, advocacy or even clubs or bars to openly support or cater for Ethiopia's LGBT population.

Like in Uganda a strong Evangelical lobby along with other religious leaders have been campaigning for an even tougher capital punishment against LGBT Ethiopians. Mercy (pseudonym to protect his identity), director of the underground Rainbow Ethiopia, a health and support groupfor Ethiopian LGBT people, told me he welcomed Tadesse's statement, which he called "progressive." He also stated: "But I'd like to ask her thought about the draconian anti-homosexuality law, the lack/denial of health and social services and harassment/torture of LGBT Human rights defenders in Ethiopia."

Court spokeswoman says “Co-pilot’s human rights will be respected”

ESAT News (February 26, 2014) Jeanette Balmer, spokeswoman of the Federal Prosecutor’s Office of Switzerland, said Switzerland is known for protecting human rights and the human rights of co-pilot Hailemedhin Abera, the suspected hijacker of Ethiopian airlines plane, will be protectedbut refused to give any detail regarding his case before the investigation was completed. Hailemedhin has been offered a solicitor and is under investigation by Swiss police. Asked if it was possible to follow Hailemedhin's court proceedings, Balmer said although it is not possible tospeak about the court at this time, normally, court proceedings in Switzerland are often open. Asked if Hailemedhin's next court appointment was known, she said "we have not yet reached that stage." The Spokeswoman said the Swiss justice system instructs that information is kept secret thus no informationcan be given regarding that. Meanwhile, the Swiss Support Committee of the Democratic Change in Ethiopia (DCE) has announced that there will bea demonstration on February 28, 2014 in Bern, Switzerland, calling Switzerland to give a political asylum to co-pilot Hailemedhin Abera.

FARMING: Ethiopian natural resources at risk'

World Bulletin/News Desk (February 26, 2014): Shiferraw has been ringing the alarm for months, calling for due attention to protect Ethiopia'sunique flora and make good use of its genetic resources. A long drawn outpatent row between Ethiopia and the Netherlands concerning Teff – a highly nutritious ancient grain variety – has made headlines in Ethiopia, but a local official is worried that not only Teff is in danger of being "looted." "A great many genetic resources of Ethiopia are in perpetual danger of being looted," Aweke Shiferraw, communication director at the Ethiopian Intellectual Property Office, told Anadolu Agency in an exclusive interview.

Shiferraw has been ringing the alarm for months, calling for due attention to protect Ethiopia's unique flora and make good use of its genetic resources. Teff is indigenous to Ethiopia, where it accounts for one quarterof total cereal production. It is believed that teff originated in Ethiopia between 4000 BC and 1000 BC. Eragrostis is the scientific name of one variety of teff, a staple food in Ethiopia that has been on Ethiopian tables for thousands of years. Eros is the Greek name for love, and Grostis is Greek for grass. It is therefore also known outside Ethiopia as "lovegrass."But ironically, some in Ethiopia believe Teff is derived from "Teffa," an Amharic word for "lost." The grain, known to be highly nutritional and highin calcium, is made into flour, fermented and baked into sourdough flat bread and eaten with various kinds of wot (stew) and sauces.

In 2005, the Ethiopian Institute of Biodiversity Conservation (IBC) and a Dutch company, Health and Performance Food International (HPFI), sealed an agreement that provides for access and benefit-sharing of Teff.But the deal was terminated in 2009 when the Dutch company went bankrupt. "In the years prior to the bankruptcy, [the Dutch company's] directors had established other companies and transferred values to thesecompanies, which continued to produce and sell Teff flour and teff products, and to expand their activities to other countries and continents,"according to a relevant legal government document. "Since it was the now-bankrupt HPFI that had been party to the agreement, these other firms – even though operating under the same directors and partly the same owners – could continue selling Teff flour and Teff products with noobligations towards Ethiopia," the document read.

Always Ethiopian: Shiferraw said that he always wondered why people spoke about the teff patent case while overlooking the bigger picture. "The awareness of the people in Ethiopia about the benefits of genetic resources is almost nil," he said. The benefits of genetic resources shouldbe addressed and the necessary legal, institutional and operational frameworks should be put in place, Aweke urged.

Asked if teff was still considered Ethiopian, Awoke asserted: "Teff has always been, and always will be, Ethiopian." However, he pointed out thatno naturally available resource could be patented. Only the practices, knowledge and special property associated with it could be patented, he explained. "However, it's not only teff that is in danger of being snatched away with no benefit to the country of origin – which is Ethiopia," he said.(Text ends)

CYBER ATTACK: Mapping Hacking Team's "Untraceable" Spyware'

WASHINGTON DC (February 26, 2014) Hacking Team and the Targeting ofEthiopian Journalists. Focus on the global proliferation and use of Hacking Team's RCS spyware, sold exclusively to repressive governments.

Summary

Ethiopian Satellite Television Service[1] (ESAT) is an independent satellite television, radio, and online news media outlet run by members of the Ethiopian diaspora. The service has operations in Alexandria, Virginia, as well as several other countries.[2] ESAT's broadcasts are frequently critical of the Ethiopian Government. Available in Ethiopia and around the world, ESAT has been subjected to jamming from within Ethiopia several times inthe past few years.[3] A recent documentary shown on Ethiopian state media warned opposition parties against participating in ESAT programming.[4] In the space of two hours on 20 December 2013, an attacker made three separate attempts to target two ESAT employees with sophisticated computer spyware, designed to steal files and passwords, and intercept Skype calls and instant messages.

The spyware communicated with an IP address belonging to Ariave Satcom, a satellite provider that services Africa, Europe, and Asia.[5] In each case, the spyware appeared to be Remote Control System (RCS), sold exclusively to governments by Milan-based Hacking Team.[6] Hacking

Team states that they do not sell RCS to “repressive regimes”,[7] and that RCS is not sold through “independent agents”.[8] Hacking Team also says that all sales are reviewed by a board that includes outside engineers and lawyers. The board has veto power over any sale.[9] Before authorizing a sale, the company states that it considers “credible government or non- government reports reflecting that a potential customer could use surveillance technologies to facilitate human rights abuses,” as well as “due process requirements” for surveillance.[10] The Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) reports that Ethiopia jails more journalists than any otherAfrican country besides Eritrea, and says that the Ethiopian government has shut down more than seventy-five media outlets since 1993.[11]

CPJ statistics also show that seventy-nine journalists have been forced toflee Ethiopia due to threats and intimidation over the past decade, more than any other country in the world.[12] A 2013 Human Rights Watch (HRW) report detailed ongoing torture at Ethiopia’s Maekelawi detention center, the first stop for arrested journalists and protests organizers.

Former detainees described how they were “repeatedly slapped, kicked,punched, and beaten,” and hung from the ceiling by their wrists.

Information extracted in confession has been used to obtain conviction attrial, and to compel former detainees to work with the government.[13] HRW also indicated abuses committed by the army, including the use of torture and rape to compel information from villagers near the site of an attack on a farm.[14] HRW noted “insufficient respect for

… due process” in Ethiopia.[15]

Background: Hacking Team and Remote Control System (RCS) - HackingTeam, also known as HT S.r.l., is a Milan-based purveyor of “offensive technology” to governments around the world. One of their products, known as Remote Control System (RCS), is a trojan that is sold exclusively to intelligence and law enforcement agencies worldwide.

Hacking Team’s website describes the product as “the solution” to monitortargets that are increasingly using encryption, or those located outside theborders of the government that wants to monitor them.16

Description of RCS in a 2011 official brochure.[17] RCS infects a target’s computer or mobile phone to intercept data before it is encrypted for transmission, andcan also intercept data that is never transmitted. For example, it can copyfiles from a computer’s hard disk, and can also record Skype calls, e- mails, instant messages, and passwords typed into a Web browser.[18] Furthermore, RCS can turn on a device’s webcam andmicrophone to spy on the user.[19]

While Hacking Team claims to potential clients that RCS can be used for mass surveillance of “hundreds of thousands of targets,”[20] public statements by Hacking Team emphasize RCS’s potential use as a targetedtool for fighting crime and terrorism.[21] Hacking Team was first thrust intothe public spotlight in 2012 when RCS was used against award-winning Moroccan media outlet Mamfakinch,[22] and United Arab Emirates (UAE) human rights activist Ahmed Mansoor, who was pardoned[23] after servingseven months in prison for signing an online pro-democracy petition.[24] Mansoor was infected, his Gmail password was stolen, and hise-mails were downloaded.[25] At the same time, RCS is apparently being used by foreign governments to target individuals on US soil.[26,27]

Evidence of the use of RCS against journalists and activists led Reporters Without Borders to name Hacking Team as one of the five "Corporate Enemies of the Internet."[28] Hacking Team Senior Counsel Eric Rabe responded with a defense of his company's sales practices, in which he stated that Hacking Team does not provide its products to "repressive" regimes.[29] "Repressive" is a subjective term that may be difficult to define. We instead look to a selection of publications that rank countries based on freedom and democracy using a methodology. For example, TheEconomist publishes a Democracy Index,[30] which rates governments around the world on a spectrum from "full democracies" to "authoritarian regimes." Reporters Without Borders also publishes a yearly Press Freedom Index, which ranks countries' press freedom situations from "good" to "very serious."[31]

First Targeting Attempt: First, the ESAT STUDIO Skype account was targeted with spyware. This account is used by ESAT for on-air interviews.The individual operating the ESATSTUDIO account at the time was an ESAT employee in Belgium, responsible for managing ESAT's satellite broadcasts. An individual identified as "Yalfalkenu Meches" (Skype: yalfalkenu1) sent a file to ESATSTUDIO entitled "An Article for ESAT.rar." We use Skype logs provided by the targets to illustrate the attacks.

Epilogue: After the first two targeting attempts, ESAT was alerted that Yalfalkenu Meches was trying to target them with spyware. On the thirdattempt,the targeted user confronted Yalfalkenu, who again professed that he had received the file from a friend.

In Conclusion: In this report, we identified three instances where Ethiopian journalist group ESAT was targeted with spyware in the space oftwo hours by a single attacker. In each case the spyware appeared to be RCS (Remote Control System), programmed and sold exclusively to governments by Milan-based Hacking Team. While Hacking Team and other "lawful intercept" spyware vendors purport to practice effective self-regulation, this case seems to be part of a broader pattern of governmentabuse of such spyware. "Lawful intercept" spyware has also apparently been abused to target Bahraini activists, Moroccan journalists, critics of the Turkish Government, and Emirati human rights activists. (Text ends)

Sudan: Khartoum, Ethiopia Agree On Establishing Joint Border Force'

(February 27, 2014) Khartoum — Ethiopia and Sudan have agreed to forma joint force along the borders between the two countries at the conclusion of the military technical committee meetings in the presence ofboth sides' defense ministers. The Sudanese Defense Minister Abdul-Rahim Mohammed Hussein announced that the two countries will start forming the joint units that willpatrol the borders. Hussein said that regular meetings between the leaderships in the two countries have created a great deal of mutual trust,pointing out that the cooperation moved to the stage of joint formation and training of border forces.

The Ethiopian minister of defence Siraj Fegessa, arrived in Khartoum on Wednesday to participate in the work of committee. Fegessa and Hussein both signed the minutes of the meetings which included the agreement onthe exchange of information and control outlawed elements, the establishment of joint forces , as well as peacekeeping issues .

The controversial resignation of Oromia president'

ESAT News (February 28, 2014) - A high placed source within the Oromo People's Democratic Organisation (OPDO), a member party of the EPRDF, said the recent reports that the ex- Oromia region president and Chairmanof the OPDO, Alemayehu Atomsa did 'resign himself' as was 'false'.

Alemayehu had reportedly held a full day evaluation on February the 17th,2014 regarding the corruption, lack of good administration and nepotism in the Oromia region.

Most members of the Organisation and others who served as senior officials during the times of the former chairman of the Organisation, Abadula Gemeda, now Speaker of the Parliament, have been arguing withAlemayehu. He was even being forced to speak louder than he would when he was in such a precarious health status.

When the row between the Central Committee members was being tensioned, Alemayehu was later in the evening forced to close the meeting. When most members of the Council left the building and the meeting, Aster Mamo, OPDO's Head of Organisational Affairs and considered by many as the loyal representative of the TPLF within OPDO,stayed back in her office.

Aster asked Alemayehu why he was not leaving and minutes later she called an ambulance to take him to a hospital near Gerji. The next dayAlemayehu was flown abroad per the referral of the hospital for further treatment.

When the Central Committee learnt that Alemayehu's illness was life threatening, it met the next day and wrote a letter stating that AlemayehuAtomsa has officially resigned from his post. Alemayehu had entered no letter of resignation. After some competition for the post, Muktar Kedir, considered by many as pro-Abadula Gemeda, has taken over thechairmanship.

It is to be recalled that ESAT, quoting some officials of the OPDO, had reported that Alemayehu Atomsa was ‘poisoned’ after consuming a food two years ago. Alemayehu’s bodyguard has been also suffering from a similar disease since then. He is also now being treated at a hospital nearGerji in Addis Abeba. Alemayhu had started a new movement of clearing the Oromia region from corruption days after he became the region’s president. Insiders say Muktar Kedir’s election is a big relief to TPLF.

ETHIOPIA: Labour migrants return home to a bleak future’

More than 150,000 Ethiopians have been deported from Saudi Arabia inrecent months -Aljazeera

Aljazeera (February 28, 2014) - Ethiopian women and girls, often recruited by employment agencies as domestic workers, fly to Saudi Arabia and are legally bound to their employers, who withhold their passports. If the workers break their contract - willingly or forced - theirstatus becomes illegal. A similar system of employee "sponsorship", known as kafala, exists across many of the Gulf states. But many more Ethiopian migrants in Saudi Arabia are smuggled in, furtherincreasing their vulnerability for exploitation.

Because of widespread abuse, the Ethiopian government has issued a temporary travel ban on domestic workers while it works on a protectionlaw. Critics say this could encourage more illegal migration.

Last November, the kingdom's authorities enforced strict labour laws governing foreign workers after a seven-month reprieve, spurred partly bythe potential security threat of thousands of unemployed Saudi youth. AndSaudi Arabian vigilante groups in Riyadh, armed with clubs and machetes,brutally attacked Ethiopian migrants in November, prompting tens of thousands of the workers to turn themselves in to the kingdom's authorities out of fear.

Unskilled labourers from neighbouring Yemen, the Horn of Africa and southeast Asia have been particularly hard-hit by the deportations, whichthe Saudi Arabian interior ministry claims have reached around a quarterof a million. Adam Coogle, a Middle East researcher with Human Rights Watch, suspects the number is much higher. "I think workers from different nationalities are taking a wait-and-see approach to what is happening in Saudi Arabia," Coogle said. "They will want to see if this is alabour crackdown that is sustained, or if it is just to scare them, and will end up being business as usual."

IOM in Addis Ababa estimates that nearly 160,000 Ethiopians have been detained and deported from Saudi Arabia because of their irregular status.

The peak was in November, when 9,000 deportees arrived on planes to the Ethiopian capital every day. These days, the numbers have dwindled to around 300 a day. At nearly 92 million, Ethiopia has Africa's second- largest population after Nigeria. Agriculture is the country's leading economic sector, but drought, poor cultivation practices, land-grabs and mass displacement of rural populations have garnered headlines recently.The youth unemployment rate is high. Many choose to seek work abroad and send remittances home.

ETHIOPIAN HISTORY: On the 118th Anniversary of Ethiopia'sVictory at Adwa'

TADIAS MAGAZINE (March 1st, 2014)

The wise Leader Menilik has done before the war repaid the loans providedby the treaty,and afterwards allowed the Italians safe passage out of ETHIOPIA.

In the context of world history, "the Battle of Adwa marked the largest military triumph of an African state over a European army in the nineteenth century and helped Ethiopia retain its independence during Europe's Scramble for Africa," writes Stanford University Historical Education Group. Ethiopia's retention of its independence paved the way for global anti-colonial movements. Paul Henze describes it best when hestates "the defeat at the Battle of Adwa as the beginning of the decline ofEurope at the center of world politics.

When historians recorded major world events of 1896 they included several headlines about the Battle of Adwa such as 'Abyssinia (Ethiopia) Defeats Invading Italians'; '80,000 Ethiopians Destroy 20,000 Italians at the Battle of Adwa'; 'Italian Premier Crispi Resigns'; and 'Abyssinia and Italy Sign Peace Treaty.' In other words, Adwa was placed on the world map and remained a historic story because of Ethiopia's decisive victory against the Italian army on March 1st 1896 (Yekatit 23, 1888 according tothe Ethiopian calendar).

Adwa has generated a significant amount of discourse and prose from writers across the globe. To Raymond Jonas, Adwa is "the story of a worldturned upside down." As he further aptly puts it, "Ethiopia stunned the world." Many writers made note of the fact that an African army defeated a European army. Donald Levine, the great Ethiopianist scholar, marked the historical event by highlighting its racial implications in reverse order: "a non-white nation has defeated a European power." Levine's perspective makes a whole lot of sense when one notices that it was also in 1896 thatthe US Supreme Court by seven-to-one majority vote affirmed racial segregation. And it took 58 years to overturn racial segregation in the United States.

Encyclopedia Britannica narrated the following about the event of Adwa for posterity: “ The decisive Ethiopian victory checked Italy’s attempt to build an empire in Africa.” British Prime Minister Sir Winston Churchill penned the event in these words: “On the 1st of March 1896, the Battle ofAdwa was fought and Italy, at the hands of Abyssinia, sustained a crushing defeat. Two results followed which affected other nations. First, agreat blow had been struck at European prestige in north [east] Africa. Second, the value of Italy as a factor in European politics wasdepreciated.”

In the context of world history, “the Battle of Adwa marked the largest military triumph of an African state over a European army in the nineteenth century and helped Ethiopia retain its independence during Europe’s Scramble for Africa,” writes Stanford University Historical Education Group. Ethiopia’s retention of its independence paved the way for global anti-colonial movements. Paul Henze describes it best when hestates “the defeat at the Battle of Adwa as the beginning of the decline ofEurope at the center of world politics.”

Film Director and Producer Haile Gerima, framed the event as follows: “The victory ignited a lasting flame of hope, of freedom and of independence in the hearts of Africans throughout the world.” Bahru Zewde, a distinguished historian, understood Adwa’s global historical significance, for it “brought Ethiopia to the attention of the world.” The leading Afrocentrist, Molefi Kete Asante, further reiterates: “After the victory over Italy in 1896, Ethiopia acquired a special importance in the eyes of Africans as the only surviving African state. After Adwa, Ethiopia became emblematic of African valor and resistance, the bastion of prestigeand hope to thousands of Africans who were experiencing the full shock of European conquest and were beginning to search for an answer to the myth of African inferiority.”

In fact, in 1896, outside of Adwa, there was no good news from the continent of Africa. European colonizers were almost on the verge completing their colonial agenda everywhere. In 1896, France dismissedQueen Ranvalona and later annexed Madagascar to its vast colonial empire. British troops defeated Zanzibar in a 38-minute war — A battle that started at 9:02am and ended at 9:40am, the record shows. It is equally important to note the resistance against colonialism in 1896 as evidenced by the uprising of the Matebeles in what is now the nation of Zimbabwe.

When Adwa is studied and understood in the context of world history, we find Adwa as one of the most significant beacons of hope for all oppressedand colonized people of the world. It is a victory that shattered the myth of European supremacy. It is a global historic moment that should be remembered and its bigger story should be shared by young and old in the world. Adwa, we call again, for its inclusion in the World Heritage List.(Text ends)

ETHIOPIA News: Muktar Kedir Becomes New OPDO Chairman’

The Reporter (March 1, 2014) People's Democratic Organization's (OPDO) central committee, one of the four member parties of the ruling party Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), elected Muktar Kedir as its next president, previously the deputy chairperson of the party. Muktar has now become the fourth chairman of the OPDO. Previous, leaders of the party were Kuma Demeksa, Abadula Gemeda and Alemayehu Atomsa.

The Battle of Adwa (Battaglia di Adua) changed Ethiopia and the world’

Historic Analysis By Abebe Hailu, Special to the The Washington Informer(March 1, 2014)

“The battle of Adwa, a battle with significant national and international consequences, occupies a unique place in Ethiopian and African historiography. The background and the events leading to the battle have been explained mainly from the perspectives of diplomatic and political history.” Literal meaning for Italian script: “La battaglia di Adua o Abba Garima, momento culminante e decisivo della guerra di Abyssinia.”

Ethiopia has a significant history reaching over 3,000 years into the past. The word "Ethiopia" has become a term for the idea of African solidarity and freedom, not just the name of a nation or a region. The ancient Greek historian Herodotus noted the region of Ethiopia as home to "people with burnt faces." During the Greek and Roman eras, everything south of the Sahara Desert in Africa was generally referred to as Ethiopia or Abysinnia.

Biblical references also label Ethiopia as Cush, Kesh, Ekosh and Shewa (Sheba) in the Hebrew language. These were the names used in Solomon's courts when he received a visit from the Ethiopian Queen of Sheba. The biblical "Song of Solomon" praises her physical beauty. In modern times, especially since the battle of Adwa, Ethiopia has been seenas a de facto model of freedom for all black cultures sand societies world-wide.

This held true up until the time the current political regime came to power. At least this is a homegrown terror and not a conquering white European army. This renegade regime has been busy throwing fellow citizens off of their ancestral lands and leasing them to international corporations. Freedom of the press is nonexistent and journalists are jailed regularly. The current corrupt politicians have even set about the process of changing history by denying the importance of the Battle of Adwa, and mocking the reign of Menelik and Taytu.

Commemorating the Victory at Adwa: In an effort to head off the rewritingof history, Ethiopian-Americans and other members of the African diaspora will commemorate the Victory at Adwa at Veterans Plaza in the Silver Spring Civic Building in Maryland. Historians will be on hand to offertheir take on the importance of the battle – and its global impact – at the gathering that will take place on Sunday, March 2, 2014. All citizens of the D.C. Metro area are encouraged to attend.

European Might is Turned Back at Adwa: King Menelik exposed the treachery and would have none of the treaty. The Italians, claiming that Menelik knew what he was signing, decided to use military power to force compliance. The Italians had about 18,000 men armed with around 56 pieces of artillery. King Menelik II was able to organize and structure an army within a very short period of time. Though the Ethiopian forces out- numbered the invaders, they lacked the technological advantage held by the Italians. Command of the Ethiopian forces was split between Menelik, the Empress Taytu, and a number of other leaders. These forces positioned themselves on the hills overlooking the Italian-occupied Adwa Valley. By noon on March 1, 1896, the Italian army was in full retreat witha considerable number of casualties. The Italians left most of their militaryequipment while they fled and this allowed the forces of Menelik and Taytuto increase their armories considerably.

Taytu, Empress at War and a Wily Politician: Before the battle, the Empress Taytu had held a hard line against the Italians at the Ethiopian Imperial Court. When talks over the spurious treaty broke down, Italy assembled a force to invade Ethiopia. Empress Taytu joined her husband.

Among Taytu's army was a force of cannoneers that rained fire down ontothe Italians in the valley of Adwa. After their kingdom was secured, duringtheir reign the king played the good and beloved king. The empress played the strict monarch. This good cop/bad cop division of duties and politics helped ensure their long reign.

Adwa Affects America: The unexpected victory at Adwa spurred the birthof a Pan-African solidarity that was evident in America. The African- American Dr. W.E.B. Du Bois was a major spokesman for freedom for Black Africans. He also edited the "Crisis" magazine, the voice for the NAACP. He devoted a whole chapter of his book, "The World and Africa," to a history of Ethiopia as a state, while promulgating Ethiopia as an ideaof global African unity.

In 1936 there were some so-called black riots in Harlem. These were really just demonstrations against the treatment of Ethiopia by the Western powers. No property damage or casualties were declared. John Hope Franklin wrote a book, "From Slavery to Freedom," that helped BlackAmericans to become more worldly in their politics. African-American communities adopted the words "Ethiopia" or "Abyssinia" to rename their churches to push the idea of black global unity.

“Ethiopia shall stretch forth her hands: These words are from the biblical Psalm 68:31 and seem to reflect the modern global rise of a Pan-African vision of freedom. After the success of Ethiopia against colonial rule, somebegan to think of forming a United States of Africa. Others broadened their political views to include black societies throughout the world, as wellas members of the African diaspora. A racial Pan-Africanism began to grow around the globe.

Ethiopia, as an idea of black solidarity, did indeed stretch forth her hands.Pan-African conferences were called in America and England during the early 1900s. Ethiopia grew in esteem among the global community upon her admittance to the League of Nations in 1923. This also thwarted any future movement by Europeans to colonize the nation, and shattered the centuries old negative myths that Africans were no better than "savages."

The victory at Adwa helped produce a new phase of Pan-Africanism. It planted the seed of unity and cooperation of blacks throughout the world. It helped to break the yoke of colonialism in a united way. The African- American abolitionist, Frederick Douglas, summed up the forces unleashedby the victory at Adwa, and could have used his famous quote to fit the Ethiopian struggle: "It's better to die free, than live as a slave." Ethio-Italian Relations post-Adwa: No hard feelings’

Analysis (March 1, 2010) One hundred and fourteen years have passedsince Italian forces were beaten at Adwa in their attempt to colonize

Ethiopia. In the 1930/40s- Mussolini's Fascist regime tried again through abloody occupation of Ethiopia. But unlike many other countries who have suffered bloody invasions and conquests, Ethiopia has embraced many cultural traditions from its former foe.

Looking for Italian influences in Ethiopia anno 2010, one does not have to scratch far under the surface. Start by having coffee: a macchiato, meaning "mix" in Italian, which is drunk for breakfast, after lunch and for evening-meetings with friends by almost everybody in urban-Ethiopia. Themachines pouring out the mixture of coffee and steamed milk are all coming from Italy.

Then proceed to the menu: Pasta! Pasta, pizza, calzones and related Italian dishes are included on almost all menus wherever you go in Ethiopia. Go shopping for food at some of the supermarkets in Addis, and you will find a large number of delicious Italian "prosciutto" in various counters. Salami can also be bought, but it will be referred to by Ethiopians as "mortodella".

Then take a look at one of Ethiopia's official languages: Amharic. A richand comprehensive language- but not without words borrowed from-forexample: Italian. A car in Amharic is called "machina". And many of thecars are indeed Italian. Fiats are seen in many places, and many of thetransport trucks are Calabrese trailers imported from Italy.

Other tastes of Italy in Ethiopian everyday life. When Ethiopians stay overnight at a pension, they will talk about staying in a "penzione". Whenhaving health-problems requiring medical attention, they might have to undergo an "operazione". When putting on a track suit for training at a gym, they will talk about putting on a "tutta".

When travelling in the Northern part of Ethiopia close to the border of former Italian colony Eritrea, the use of Italian words becomes more frequent. The small charcoal stoves Ethiopians use for roasting coffee willin these parts of the country be referred to as a "furnello". When eating with a fork, one eats with a "forquetta". When an Ethiopian from the province of Tigray wants to approach a white foreigner, he or she might do so by approaching the foreigner with a polite : "Scusa, Signore/Signora".

One of the results of the Italian occupation from 1935 until 1941 was a number of child-births were the father was Italian, and mother Ethiopian.These children are today an integrated part of Ethiopian society. Few if any of them have experienced different treatment because of their Italianbackground. Many Italians also stayed on after the occupation, and madea comfortable life for themselves running business in Ethiopia. Despite a history filled with conflict between the two countries, their cultural and strategic bonds are tight. Maybe the Ethiopian experience can be something other countries can learn from?

LGBT: Minister Zenebu Tadesse denies pro-Gay tweet was hers’

Ethiomedia: An Ethiopian minister who was widely reported to have condemned Uganda for adopting a harsh anti-gay law, has said she neversaid anything for or against gay laws. Zenebu Tadesse, Ethiopian ministerof women, children and youth affairs, told EthiopiaFirst editor, Ben Kebede, that the tweeted stuff was neither hers nor the government's.

Zenebu was quoted as tweeting: "There is no place for hate, discrimination in my beloved Africa. It's not Governments' business to make dress code or anti-gay laws #Uganda." The tweet came shortly after Uganda signed a harsh anti-gay law that punishes gay sex with up to life in prison, according to an AFP report.

I was in the countryside where there was no Internet access when the incident occurred. As a government minister, I could say it is not my standnor the policy of the government to do so, Zenebu said. Asked if her tweeter account was hacked, the minister said she believed so and an investigation was underway to know what went wrong. "I feel really sad such a thing has happened, and it is a matter of time before the Ethiopian people learned the truth," Zenebu said. Homosexuality is strongly condmned in the deeply religious and conservative Ethiopian society.

GOSSIP: Power Reshuffle Within the High Brass of the OPDO’

Addis Fortune, Addis Ababa (March 2, 2014) - A power reshuffle within thehigh brass of the Oromo Peoples' Democratic Organisation (OPDO), has resulted in a lofty position in the federal government being occupied by a female for the first time, gossip disclosed. A series of rearrangements have taken place in the top leadership of the OPDO and the Oromia Regional State, subsequent to the resignation of Alemayehu Atomsa, two weeks ago.

Alemayehu had been chairman of the OPDO and president of the largest region in the republic since 2010, but has been a long term absentee fromboth offices due to illness and treatment abroad. His deputy in the regional administration, Abdulaziz Mehamed, has been running the affairs of the region, one of the four coalition member of the ruling EPRDF.

The politbureau of the OPDO met last week and voted into office Muktar Kadir, as chairman of the Party, and Aster Mamo, as deputy chairperson,gossip disclosed. She was preferred to Worqney Gebeyehu, minister of Transport, by a marginal three votes, gossip revealed.

A native of Jimma, a small town 346Km west of Addis Abeba, Muktar is a contemporary of Alemayehu's, joining the OPDO immediately after the fallof the military regime back in the early 1990s. He served the Party as a mid-rank level cadre during much of the 1990s and was promoted in the rank and file after 2005, when he succeeded Hailemariam Desalegn as head of public organisation and mobilisation within the Prime Minister'sOffice, under the rank of a minister.

He was an administrator of the Jimma Aba Jiffar Zone before being promoted to head of the region's capacity building bureau, in the 1990s. His ascendance on the ladder of power began when he was first elected asa central committee member of the OPDO during its second congress, in the late 1990s. He was elected to serve as deputy chief of the regional state under Abadula Gemeda, now speaker of Parliament, gossip says.

In 2010, Muktar was appointed by the late Meles Zenawi to run the affairsof the Prime Minister's Office and serve as secretary of Cabinet Affairs - a very powerful position, previously held by Brehanu Adelo, according to gossip. It was during his debut as chief of both of these offices that he also joined the most powerful and secretive National Security Council, comprising of the Prime Minister, Minister of Defence, Chief of the NationalIntelligence, Chief of Staffs of the Army and the National Security Advisor to the Prime Minister.

The unexpected passing of Meles and the subsequent departure of JunadinSado, a high ranking official of the OPDO and former minister of the Civil Service, led the administration of Prime Minister Hailemariam to move Muktar onto this ministry, which is housed in a private building on Africa Avenue (Bole Road), neighbouring country offices of the World Bank Group and the IMF.

The post-Meles EPRDF government was designed to have a deputy primeminister and two additional ministers with the rank of deputy prime minister, last year - an arrangement that elevated the positions of Debretsion G. Michael (PhD), from the TPLF, and Muktar, from the OPDO,within the cabinet, gossip recalled. Muktar was given the mammoth task of carrying through the civil service reform program - one of the six signature reform agendas the EPRDF government has been struggling to accomplish for over a decade now, claims gossip.

With mixed results, such a task has now been given to Aster, another senior OPDO leader who rose to prominence during the same time, when she was elected as a central committee member of the party. Elected to the House of Federation as early as 2000, she served as a secretary to theBudget Subsidy and Revenues Affairs Standing Committee under Ayalew Gobezie, before being appointed to serve as the Minister of Youth & Sports, in 2005. She served as government chief whip in the federal Parliament from 2010, replacing Hailemariam, prior to handing over the seat to Roman H. Sellasie, from the TPLF.

Recent changes and power realignment show that the veterans within theOPDO - Abadula, Kuma, Girma - are having less influence in the party.

They continue to have a considerable hold, however, through the younger generation of politicians who have been mentored by each one of them,gossip claims.

March 2, 2014: DIARIES: ETHIOPIA - President loses his head of protocol'

President Mulatu Teshome will have to find a new chief of protocol, since the previous incumbent Belay Girma has resigned. Ceremonial President Mulatu Teshome will have to find a new chief of protocol, since the previous incumbent Belay Girmai has resigned. After acting as head of protocol for many years, serving Presidents Negasso Gidada and Girma Wolde-Giorgis, as well as Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, Belay Girmai will not do likewise for the new president, Mulatu Teshome Wirtu, elected justa few... months ago. This Tigrean, a civil servant in the foreign affairs ministry, resigned his post recently. Belay Girmai is married to the ERTA news caster Birtukan Haregewein who frequently accompanied the late Meles Zenawi in in his foreign trips and interviewed him many times.

Belay Girmai's departure would seem to comfort VPM Debretsion Guebremichael just fine. Guebremichael considered Belay Girmai a supporter of the rival faction within the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), the ruling coalition led by Bereket Simon and Meles Zenawi's widow Azeb Mesfin. Debretsion Guebremichael would seemto have an increasing hold on the regime's ministers and high profile government officials whose every movement of them is able to be tracked, even in their homes and their telephone constellations, since he is Minister of Information Technology whose monitors the notorious e- Security diviision, the Information Network Security Agency (INSA).

HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: U.S. Department of State pans Ethiopia'sHuman Rights record'

ESAT News analysis: (March 2, 2014) The U.S. Department of State's2013 report has revealed the human rights violations in Ethiopia. Thereports states that one of the major violations in Ethiopia has been on"Freedom of Speech and Assembly."

The report said the human rights violations included arbitrary killings; allegations of torture, beating, abuse, and mistreatment of detainees by security forces; reports of harsh and, at times, life-threatening prison conditions; arbitrary arrest and detention; detention without charge and lengthy pretrial detention; a weak, overburdened judiciary subject to political influence; infringement on citizens' privacy rights, including illegalsearches and many others.

It also found although the civil courts operated with a large degree of independence, the criminal courts remained weak, overburdened, and subject to political influence. Similarly, beatings, stress positions, the hanging of detainees by their wrists from the ceiling, prolonged handcuffing, and the pouring of water over detainees, verbal threats, andsolitary confinement have been described. In Somali Region of Ethiopia, there continued to be reports of abuses, including killings, by the SomaliRegion Special Police.

The Report noted that as of September 2012 there were 70,000-80,000 persons in prison, of whom approximately 2,500 were women and nearly600 were children incarcerated with their mothers and there also were many unofficial detention centers throughout the country, including in Dedessa, Bir Sheleko, Tolay, Hormat, Blate, Tatek, Jijiga, Holeta, and Senkele. Most were located at military camps.
For example, on August 8, security forces in Addis Ababa detained more than one thousand Muslims participating in Eid al-Fitr celebrations some ofwhom have died in prison, it added.
Recalling that on January 17, authorities arrested Solomon Kebede, columnist and managing editor of Muslim Affairs. They charged him alongwith 27 other Muslims in April under the antiterrorism proclamation, the Report also detailed the human rights violations against incarcerated journalists and politicians such Eskinder Nega, Reeyot Alemu, Andualem Arage, Olbana Lelisa, Bekele Gerba and many others. The human rights abuses on women and children, minorities were also included in the Report.
Last month The United States House Appropriations Committee has included stringent new requirements of accountability from the Government of Ethiopia in a section of the new 2014 bill in relation to the release of U.S. funds designated for Ethiopian military and police forces toEthiopia's implementation of corrective policies that would address the declining state of human and democratic rights in the country, including inthe Somali Region of Ethiopia where access to the area must be given to human rights and humanitarian organizations. The law also prohibits funds appropriated to Ethiopia under the headings, "Development Assistance" and "Economic Support Fund" that are available for the lower Omo Valley and the Gambella region to be used directly or indirectly in theforced evictions of the people. The Ethiopian government has not yet responded regarding the new law as of yet. (Text ends)
DEBATES: The not so cheap talk of Alemnew Mekonnen et al'
EM By Hindessa Abdul (March 4, 2014) - Amid the drama and conspiracytheories surrounding a co-pilot who had hijacked a plane, two local politicians were hitting the headlines in their own ways.
Zenebu Tadesse is Ethiopian Minister of Women, Children and Youth Affairs. Last week she allegedly tweeted: "There is no place for hate, discrimination in my beloved Africa. It's not Governments' business to make dress code or anti-gay laws." The tweet was a reaction to an anti-gay bill that was signed into law by Ugandan President Yoweri Musevini.Zenebu's comment quickly drew controversy both at home and abroad.

However, the tweet was a short-lived one: deleted. The Minister laterdenied posting it.
In an interview with the ruling party owned Radio Fana, Zenebu said whileshe actively uses Tweeter to promote some of the activities of her Ministry, she denied posting the tweet. “I was out of town when I heard about the tweet. I was saddened to hear that. I didn’t even have access tonetwork… I am not an IT expert to comment on how it was posted. We are conducting an investigation.”
Probably the most important issue here is not the content of the tweet. Itis to what extent the officials are free to speak their mind. Was the Minister forced to retract her comment? Would she be as blunt to comment on such controversial matter without expecting a backlash? Is the level of IT sophistication that high to easily hack on to her account?
Why didn’t the hackers go after more prominent politicians that are knownto use Tweeter? Whatever the answer to those questions, officials will be intimidated to say what they think; making their online life as boring as the officialdom they are caged in.
Making Alemnew famous: Alemnew Mekonnen is deputy head of the Amhara Regional State and the second in command of the Party that is imposed on the Region. Alemnew - according to his own explanation - was“training” the local media staff on issues of good governance and democracy, put simply - he was engaged in political indoctrination. A leaked audio from the “training” shows what ruling party functionaries arecapable of saying behind closed doors. Alemnew scorned the Amhara - Ethiopia’s second largest ethnic group considered to be 30 million strong -labeling them “ultra-chauvinists” and “barefoot pedestrians.” He added: “The Amhara walks barefoot but what they say is utterly poisonous.”
Those remarks aired by Ethiopian Satellite Television and later spiraled onto other social networking sites brought about disgust and indignation.While the state media was mute about it, some government affiliated “private” papers talked about the incident without delving into the content. All sorts of discussion and condemnation ensued. Opposition party members staged mass protest in the regional capital Bahir Dar.
Scores of them actually took off their shoes to make a point on the “barefoot” remark. The deputy chief convened a press conference of handpicked journalists who read questions from a script. The caption that run on the TV screen didn’t even identify him as deputy regional administrator - a move taken by the spin doctors to distance the administration from the comment - only vaguely mentioning his position inthe Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM).
Alemnew took an hour to basically say two things: First, he denied makingthe remark. “How can I say that?” he threw the question back to the reporters. “I didn’t say any of the comments that have been attributed to me by the opposition. I have respect for the people. Who am I to make such disparaging comment against my own ethnic group? (The whole thing) was doctored by computer techniques. It is the work of the opposition politicians to alienate the ANDM leadership from the people." Second, he blamed the participants of the training for their chauvinistic outlook. He insisted that he was mainly trying to address issues of ethnicpolitics that the trainees lacked tremendously.

For whom the bell tolls: Remarks by officials that single out specific ethnicgroups, particularly the Amhara, are not uncommon. To start with, the pages of the Tigray Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF) manifesto handwrittenin February 1974 are packed with references to the "oppressing Amhara ethnic group." That's where small time ethnic ideologues get their cue from. Former chief of Southern Region, who has since become Minister of Education, Shiferaw Shigute issued a letter akin to ethnic cleansing when he ordered the eviction of Amhara settlers from the Gura Ferda locality in southern Ethiopia. His counterpart in the Somali Regional State, Abdi Mohammed Oumer, was shown in a video advising his "brethren" which ethnic group they should embrace if they happen to go to the Capital, Addis Ababa. Such ethnic disparaging languages should not be tolerated where ever they come from. At the end of the day no body chose where they come from. An attack on one is an attack on all. "… never send to know for whom the bells tolls; it tolls for thee." (Text ends)

Ethiopian Airlines Replaces Former Vice-President of Flight Operations'

DIARIES (March 4, 2014) Ethiopian Airlines has appointed Captain Yohannes Hailemariam as Vice-President Flight Operations effective 3 March 2014. Captain Yohannes is replacing Captain Desta Zeru (Vice President and head of Flight Operations), who left the position of Vice- President for a reasons which is not clear, but speculations are in high gear that it is related to the recent events caused by co-pilot HailemedhinAbera. Sources inside the airline are also revealing many pilots have beengrounded and their licenses were suspended.

Michael Melaku, a former Safety Security Department officer of the Ethiopian Airlines had exposed the internal maladministration, corruption and nepotism within the Ethiopian Airlines. Michael said the Airlines is nowdominated by people who hail from the ethnic group of the Tigrean Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF). He said all of the 18 anti-hijackers (T-4) of the Airlines hail from the same ethnic group – Tigre. He said especially after Girma Wake, the ex CEO of the Airlines left and the current CEO Tewolde Gebremariam, who also hails from the TPLF, took power the Airlines became a "hell". He said the main problem within the ET is racismand nepotism. There is a deep rooted maladministration. There is no single trade union as it has been divided into three.

In the Name of Democracy: Land Grabbing and Genocide in Ethiopia'

SMNE Public Meeting In Oslo, Norway (March 6, 2014)

HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: Solidarity Movement for the New Ethiopia(SMNE) briefed leaders and officials at the United Nations, the European Parliament, the US Department of State, the US Senate, the USHouse of Representatives, the World Bank and the Council for Foreign Relations, amongst others.

Obang Metho of SMNE is a renowned human rights activist who has tirelessly advocated for human rights, justice, freedom and environment, enhanced accountability in politics and peace on the Horn of Africa for over 10 years. SMNE Public Meeting In Oslo, Norway: Updates - On 6th March 2014 Frontline club Oslo organized an event in collaboration with NEW FRONTIERS entitled "In the Name of Democracy: Land Grabbing and Genocide in Ethiopia" at Filmen Hus Oslo. As it is known Norway is the only Western country that has signed a bilateral agreement with the Ethiopian intelligence service facilitating forced return of refugees, even ifthe Ethiopian dictatorial government always receives strong internationalcriticism for its gross human rights violations. In the event, four differentindividuals from similar and different point of view about Ethiopia and Ethiopians have been invited to present their standpoint about the currentEthiopian regime.

Abdullahi Hussein was the president's adviser and head of the Ogaden TV channel Cakaara News. He had responded to the abuses and atrocities against civilians and for a few years he copied the president's secret videofiles. Files included the internal meetings where individual officers and soldiers in the regional militia testify arbitrary arrests, torture, murder, extortion and rape. He presented unique video documentation revealing the dictatorship's harsh treatment of its opposition, which he has smuggled out of the government and is taking to the International Criminal Court in The Hague. In general he has presented about the horrific circumstances in the Ogaden region, the handling of the evidence,and the process towards the International Criminal Court in The Hague.
The other presenter was Mr Obang Metho. He is a human rights activist who has tirelessly advocated for human rights, justice, freedom and environment, enhanced accountability in politics and peace in Africa for over 10 years. He has briefed leaders and officials at United Nations, the European Parliament, the US Department of State, the US Senate, the USHouse of Representatives, the World Bank and the Council for Foreign Relations, amongst others.
From Norway, Artist Solveig Syversen, who works with Ethiopian refugee status in Norway, has presented her work-in-progress documentary aboutthe Norwegian-Ethiopian agreement of returning refugees. The fourth person who presented his opinion about the current Ethiopian regime was,One Norwegian researcher from Bergen. His presentation was different from the other three in many ways and he seems to have a close relationship with the current Ethiopian regime. He presented verbal presentation in favor of the current Ethiopian regime specifically about thedevelopment of Ethiopia by referring the regime's problems presented by Mr. Hussien and Mr. Metho as an "Exception". His whole presentation has created great deal of disappointment in the audiences. He left at the middle of the event by avoiding questions from audiences. (Text ends)
ETHIOPIA/ERITREA: The Lingering Risks of the Ethio-Eritrean Conflict'
By Aklilu Wondaferew (March 6, 2014) - Over the last two months, a number of prominent former US officials have put forward ideas and recommendations to solve the not-yet-resolved "Ethio-Eritrean conflict". Foremost among them are Ambassador Herman Cohan who was quoted writing "Time to Bring Eritrea in from the Cold", Ambassador David Shinn who wrote: "Time to Bring Eritrea in from the Cold; but It's Harder than itSounds) and Ambassador Princeton Lyman, who observed with a hope: "Previous attempts to 'bring Eritrea in from the cold' have proved difficult,but we should still try" as noted in (African Arguments) journal.

It is not clear whether the open engagement of the three diplomats suggests a renewed interest by the US government or whether the interest is initiated by Asmara, European capitals or any other source. Regardless of its origin, however, this issue has now attracted the interestof many stakeholders ranging from the rulers in Addis Ababa and Asmara to Ethiopian scholars, the opposition and concerned citizens at home and in the Diaspora. In this article, leaving the legal, economic and political arguments to the experts in their respective fields, I will raise few issues related to the psychological and social dimension of the conflict which, I believe, requires serious attention in order to minimize (or bring to an end) current or future conflict in the region.

Political alienation, elite appeasement and conflict: A quick look at the situation surrounding the Ethio-Eritrean war in 1998 to 2000 may suggests a conflict that arose as a result of economic issues and a sudden incursion of the EPLF's army into Tigray. However, a closer examination reveals another deep rooted dimension. One of those factors in this regardis the alienation of the Ethiopian public as well as many of the then key stake holders from participating meaningfully in the very process that gave today's Eritrea to Issayas Afewerki and his party EPLF. Alienations inthis regard is defined as the exclusion from the rightful exercise of decision making process and political power.

This alienation was at the basis of anger and resentment which was expressed in different forms. The anger of the public was expressed through protest rally both within Ethiopia and in Diaspora. The repressedsense of anger in particulate within the TPLF leadership which manifestedin many different forms reached its climax when the EPLF army occupiedBadme and asked for concession.

For the Meles Zenawi led TPLF/EPRDF and EPLF, Eritrea was an Ethiopian colony. Because of this erroneous belief imposed as constitution, the Ethiopian public was completely excluded from the process of determining the fate of an Ethiopian province – Eritrea! The voices of citizens outside of Eritrea were not heard - period! An, overwhelming number of the opposition had clearly contested the legitimacy of the referendum process.At the time, opinion makers including religious leaders, community elders and many others had spoken against the process as well as the result of the said referendum. Regardless of the public protest and public outcry, allthe secret dealings and decision making process was confined to a selected few within the TPLF/EPRDF and the EPLF.

Under a true democratic system, such an issue of major consequence as creating a separate country would have been an issue for voters to decide.This would also have been an issue to invoke a vote of confidence on the ruling TPLF/EPRDF regime. However, given the absence of democracy in the country, no such opportunity was available then nor it is available today for the Ethiopian public to exercise.

At the time, the western powers that came with a huge influence on the rebel forces chose to follow a policy of appeasement literally going along with the desire of Meles and Issayas with very little consideration for the consequence of their earth shattering change of policy. They also failed toconsider alternative policy proposals put forward by members of the thenmajor opposition coalition COEDF on peaceful resolution of the conflict in Eritrea.

In the last few years, a number of former high ranking officials includingthe former PM Tamrat Layne have publicly stated that they too were notpart of the decision making process when it came to the secession of Eritrea. According to PM Tamrat, the late PM Meles Zenawi, without any mandate, prior consultation of or assent to by others within his party (TPLF) and members of the coalition (EPRDF), was the sole decision maker on-behalf of Ethiopia.

The above confirms the fact that the decision process alienated not only the public and the opposition, but also many within the ranks of the rulingTPLF/EPRDF. The former defense Minister Seye Abraha and the former president Dr Negaso Gidada have expressed their regret for being part of a process that endorsed the secession of Eritrea from Ethiopia. The abovesuggests a sense of guilt and resentment brewing in the minds of these former officials.

In his book “Liberty and the dispensation of justice in Ethiopia” ነጻነት እና ዳኝነትበኢትዮጵያ “ Seye Abraha a defense minister at the time of the Ethio- Eritrean war expressed this deeply held anger and the desire to redress the guilt ofabandoning responsibility in relation to Eritrea as follows “The Eritreans were clearly the dominant military power in the Horn. “They were vying for political, economic and diplomatic concessions from their neighbors,” observes Seye. The imperative to regain Ethiopia’s military preeminence, a dominant heritage of the region, was quickly agreed upon by all the leaders of the TPLF -- save one. “Only Meles took exception” (“Liberty andthe dispensation of justice in Ethiopia” ነጻነት እና ዳኝነት በኢትዮጵያ “ Seye Abraha).

What happened in 1993 was not conducted through the participation of the Ethiopian public. It was not done through competition of ideas or compromise as would be the case in similar situations elsewhere. Decisionin this case was made by a non-representative tiny elite within TPLF and EPLF supported and/or facilitated by foreign powers. This is very similar tothe decision-making process of the colonial era which was concerned with the appeasement of few on the top of the political hierarchy.

As a result, in my opinion, this process is seen as illegitimate by vast majority of the Ethiopian people including, an increasing number within the ruling TPLF/EPRDF. Hence, both the process and the end result of the“Eritrean independence” are rejected by a very significant number of Ethiopians as well as Ethiopian political parties.

From the perspective of the Ethiopian public therefore, the basis of the Ethio-Eritrean conflict originates in the illegitimate process that gave today's Eritrea to Issayas Afewerki and the EPLF. Therefore, any conflict resolution effort that does not take such facts into account or that shies away from confronting this reality will fail to address one of the root causes of the conflict. A negotiation process that pushes Ethiopia to acceptan already constructed "solution", as variously suggested by Mr. Cohen, will also continue to suffer lack of acceptability by the Ethiopian public.

A meaningful conflict resolution must adopt a people centered approach focusing on engaging the public, the opposition political parties, civic society groups, religious groups and the elders in a meaningful way. Any"negotiation or agreement" that continues to alienate stake holders will undoubtedly fail to gain meaningful respect therefore creating a fertile ground for a protracted conflict.

Respect for identity and the choice of the inhabitants of the land: In a conflict such as the Ethio-Eritrean war, the issue of identity is a major collective psychological need that cannot be just wished and pushed away; or just put aside. As variously argued by many social psychologists,doing so, will almost always result in a strong and often violent social reaction (Kelman 2008, Psychology& Society 20111, Vol. 4, P76).

In this regard, key among the many issues within the context of the Ethio-Eritrean conflict are the history, identity as well as the desire of the inhabitants such as the Afar, the people of Irob and possibly others who see themselves as Ethiopians, not Eritreans. As the highly distinguished Ethiopian elder and religious leader Bitwoded Ali Mirah Hanfare once said, "Even our camels know how to follow the Green, Yellow and Red flag ...

Even our camels salute the Ethiopian flag".

The same can be said about and is true for the inhabitants of the territories and settlements around Zalanbessa and Badme. As reported bythe Amharic weekly - Ethiopian Reporter, the People of Irob have and continue to say: "We will not accept the decision of the Border Commission. We will die in our land, unless we all perish, our land will notbe given away" (The Irob people, The Ethiopian Reporter (Amharic) June 23, 2003, as quoted by and excerpted from one of Dr Gelawdios Araya's article".

The uniqueness surrounding this specific issue is the fact that, while the residents of the contested regions feel that they are Ethiopians, the rest ofEthiopia also believes that they are indeed fully Ethiopians deserving and calling for an Ethiopian sovereign protection. Such an alignment of solidarity, common identity, common destiny and the sense of oneness and belongingness to the land will continue to be the source fire and resilient resistance against the breakup from Ethiopia and the imposition of new identity.

Historically, the relationship between EPLF and the Afar, Kunama, Irob, and other ethnic groups is characterized by enmity, fear, distrust and persistent tension. This reality has continued after EPLF took full control ofEritrea. This has increased the sense of insecurity among the population. Today there is organized armed resistance against the government in Asmara. This absence of fundamental harmony is a major contributing factor for an ongoing conflict. In this context, meaningful conflict resolution looks at how unjust and oppressive leadership (of Meles and Issaya) caused the inception and escalation of conflict and what could be done to address this source of the conflict from perpetrating Trans-Generational conflict.

Given this fact, one cannot move forward into a durable peace without addressing and resolving such legitimate claims and aspirations mentionedabove. Any "normalization" that starts by re affirming what Meles and Issayas agreed upon disregarding the desire and identity of residents of the contested regions will add to the feeling of injustice and continue to risk extending the conflict. Conflict resolution that truly seeks durable solution would underline the need to consider the historical, cultural, political, economic, socio and psychological factors and respect the identity and the wish of the inhabitants of the contested territories.

National humiliation leads to the desire for revenge: A number of psychological and social studies show that Emotions are among the centraldynamics contributing to intractable conflict at an individual, communal, national and international level. A psychologist Evelyn Lindnre defines humility as follows: "Humility is an enforced lowering of a person or a group, a process of subjugation that damage or strips away their pride, honor or dignity. To be humiliated is to be placed against your will often ina deeply hurtful way. In a situation that is greatly inferior to what you feelyou should expect. Humiliation entails demeaning treatment that transgresses established expectation. The victim is forced in to passive, acted upon and/or made helpless".

Ethiopians are very proud people. Our victorious history in the battles of Adwa, Dogale, Maychew, Walwal etc, show how Ethiopians feel about theirnational identity and sovereignty. A much similar pride and strong nationalfeeling was also demonstrated during the Somali invasion in the 1960's and in the mid-1970's.

Emperor Tewdros was said to have asked his foreign visitors, and this should remain one of the sources of pride in our past patriotic rulers, towash their shoes at the border ostensibly before they left Ethiopia. This meant he did not want them to leave the country not even with a miniscule amount of Ethiopian soil.

When it comes to the separation of Eritrea from Ethiopia, despite what the dominant group within the rulingelite want us to believe, Ethiopians feel humiliated and their dignity andnational pride robbed and thrashed.

This sense of collective degradation felt by Ethiopians in relation to the issue of Ethio-Eritrea is not just a function of perception but a result of tangible events. Let's visit some of these objective facts or tangible events. The present generation of Ethiopians feel humiliated because this is the first generation in our history to "voluntarily" give up territory for which their ancestors fought so hard. Ethiopians feel even confused and angry that it was an "Ethiopian" government which facilitated the separation by asking the world body (the UN) to legitimatize this historicalbetrayal and injustice against Ethiopia.

Ethiopians feel that the 1993 referendum and that saw an independent Eritrea lop-sided for it miserably failed to reflect the interests of Ethiopia.Ethiopians feel this way rightly so as their interest was not fairly represented by any one at the "negotiation table. Meles Zenawi who exclusively engineered, managed and facilitated the separation process, was seen as advocate of Eritrea than a protector of Ethiopians interest. From the very beginning, Ethiopians were silenced from expressing theirthoughts and feelings about the issue of Eritrea's separation. Those whoattempted to express their thoughts (example: students of Addis AbebeUniversity) were gunned down and silenced.

Hence, whenever the issue of Eritrea is raised, Ethiopians feel that they have been robbed of their national pride. This has left a serious sense ofhurt, betrayal and anguish in the mind of an overwhelming majority of Ethiopians.

To add insult to injury shortly after EPLF established its political power in Asmara, Ethiopians were forced to send delegates to Asmara to "apologize" for all the "wrongs" Ethiopia had done against Eritrea. This was a highly offensive and humiliating experience for Ethiopians collectively. I have no doubt that even those who support the ruling EPRDF/TPLF feel humiliated when they remember that their country was subjected to such a depth of humiliation. This feeling of humiliation is nowcommonly shared by a large number of Ethiopians.

Over all, there was no reciprocal recognition of Ethiopians as humans withemotion who deserve to be treated with dignity. In the eyes of the EPLF and its champion Meles, the rest of Ethiopians were seen as "unreasonableoppressors" and subjected to a barrage of action full of contempt and relentless ridicule. There is ample evidence that can be cited in history which shows the deepconnection between shame and humiliation, on one side, and the continuation of conflict, on the other. A number of studies on Somalia, Rwanda, Serbia, Palestine and Israel show the connection between humiliation, desire to revenge and the ongoing violence. The examples of Palestine, Ireland etc show that where humiliation and sense of unfairness has taken place, future generations become more aggressive and violentto restore their real and/or perceived national pride.

In the case of Ethiopia too, the psychological trauma, shame and humiliation the Ethiopian people are subjected to, sows the seed for the Trans Generational conflict to continue. In my opinion, any lasting peace in the Ethiopia-Eritrea conflict requires addressing this psychological wound inflicted on Ethiopians. No matter who is in power, a settlement that does not address these all- encompassing humiliation and deep senseof betrayal cannot secure a lasting peace.

This involves accepting the fact that there a number of issues that were imposed disregarding the wishes and aspirations of the Ethiopian people,validating and acknowledging the basic legal and historical claims of Ethiopians and showing the willingness to address these issues in a mutually amicable way. Until such time that meaningful practical actions are taken to restore issues related to the dignity of Ethiopians, the deep rooted collective shame and desire for revenge will continue and manifestitself in many ways.

Conclusion: To summarize, an agreement between the rulers on both sides of the Mereb River, which does not take into account the historical, legal rights, social and psychological aspects may bring a very short reliefbut the fundamentals for an ongoing conflict will prevail. This will perpetuate the sense of injustice, anger and desire for revenge both by the current and future generations.

Breaking the cycles of violence requires a framework and vision for a moremeaningful and comprehensive resolution by raising many of the difficult questions and addressing them with the full engagement of key stakeholders. Doing so requires acknowledgement that the focus of conflict resolution should move from imposition of illegitimate, unjust decisions to fairness, inclusiveness and the desire to listen to the wish of the people.

Understanding the social and psychological dimensions of conflict providesa window in to the complex condition that gives birth to and sustains conflicts. Such insight will also provide an opportunity for decision makersto develop strategy in order to decrease the likelihood of violent Trans- Generational conflict.

In my opinion, history is once again providing opportunity to right the wrong and to save the people and the region from a costly continued conflict. Whether the powers to be use this moment to engender collectivegreatness and lasting peace or squander it once again remains to be seen.

AVIATION: Ethiopian Airlines fires flight operations VP over hijacked plane'

Ethiomedia (March 6, 2014) ADDIS ABABA - Ethiopian Airlines has fired itsFlight Operations VP, Captain Desta Zeru, a veteran pilot who flew the first 787 Dreamliner from Boeing in the US to the Ethiopian capital in August 2012. Captain Desta is believed to have been fired over the hijacking of a passenger aircraft in February by a co-pilot who landed the plane in Geneva and sought asylum there. Airlines CEO Tewolde Gebremariam has now appointed Captain Yohannes Hailemariam, a 30-year flight veteran. "Captain Yohannes is replacing Captain Desta Zeru, who left/resign/ the position of Vice-President for personal reasons but remains a line pilot with the airline," the Airlines saidin its press release. Flight ET702 was hijacked on February 17 by co-pilot Hailemedhin Abera, 31, who pleaded with Swiss officials to grant him an asylum for fear of political persecution in his country.

The co-pilot, who is hailed as hero by Ethiopians for bringing to global attention the brutal rule in Ethiopia, is still in police custody in Geneva andhasn't been offered a chance to make any public statements. The government, which at first tried to portray the pilot as 'insane', has made it clear that it will work for his extradition. CEO Tewolde is a ruling party member with vast powers, and is feared than respected for acting alone and often without mercy like his idol, the late Meles Zenawi. Highly qualified professionals such as Marketing DGMs like Anteneh Mekonnen and Gobena Michael Emiru, a few among those who helped build the Airlines to what it is today, were made to 'resign voluntarily' and disappear than face the wrath of Tewolde, an Ethiopian Airlines source told EM.

TROPICAL MEDICINE: Scientists prove link between climate change andmalaria’

IRISH TIMES (March 7, 2014) - An international team of scientists has proven there is a direct link between climate change and the incidence of malaria. It shows that tens of millions of people living in highlands in EastAfrica and South America are at risk of the disease as global temperatureswarm.

The idea that warmer air would allow the parasite to survive at higher altitudes along with the mosquitoes that transmits it between humans hasbeen around for two decades said Dr Menno Bouma.

“It was never proven. A lot of research came out but it couldn’t make theconnection and so the link between climate and malaria was lost. Global warming was a non-issue for malaria,” said Dr Bouma who is based in Ireland but is honorary senior lecturer at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine.

Common sense however continued to argue in favour of the theory. It held that malaria would creep to higher altitudes during warmer years and then shift to lower elevations in cooler years. This is because both the Plasmodium parasites that cause it and the Anopheles mosquitoes thatspread it both thrive in warmer air, Dr Bouma said.

Researchers at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine whichbegan the work 20 years ago persisted however and joined up with researchers at the University of Michigan.

They examined malaria case records from western Colombia recorded between 1990 and 2005 and others from the Debre Zeit area of central Ethiopia from 1993 to 2005. Dr Bouma and colleagues were looking at thespatial distribution of malaria cases that seemed linked with temperature variations in highland regions. This finally delivered a clear signal, with cases showing a strong connection to temperature changes. They publish their findings thismorning in the journal Science .

This now raises difficult issues, Dr Bouma said. Global warming “will creepup the mountains and spread to new high-altitude areas”, he said. “And because these populations lack protective immunity they will be particularly vulnerable for severe morbidity and mortality.”

The Debre Zeit region alone has about 3.7 million people living in rural areas at risk of a wider spread of malaria due to warming. Previous workestimated that one degree temperature increase could result in an additional three million malaria cases each year in Ethiopian children.

“This is indisputable evidence of a climate effect,” said Dr Mercedes Pascual from the University of Michigan. It meant that sustained effortswere needed to try and control the spread of the disease.

Mixed views over the death of Ex-Oromia President’

ESAT News Amsterdam (March 7, 2014) - The Ex-President of the OromiaRegional State of Ethiopia, Alemayehu Atomsa, 45, died yesterday in Bangkok Hospital, Thailand, after attending treatments for the past two years on and off hospital beds. Members of the Oromo People’s Democratic Organization (OPDO) and residents of the Oromia region are airing their views regarding the secrets behind his death. Most of them believe that Alemayehu was poisoned and killed by his opponents and want the cause to be investigated.

Members of the OPDO are also discussing the issue and are suggesting about issuing press statement to prevent division among the members. The private bodyguard of Alemayehu is suffering from a similar illness andthis has reportedly opened the door for more suspicions. The fact that OPDO issued a statement of self resignation in the name of Alemayheu last month without his knowledge is also the second point of debate. As soon as Alemayehu's death was announced, the Addis Abeba City Administration has instructed all governmental offices, members and supporters of the OPDO and EPRDF to attend the arrival ceremony of thebody from Bangkok.

Employees of the Administration argue that unnecessary resources; time,vehicles and petrol are lost due to such decisions and ceremonies.

Alemayehu is survived by his wife and three children. The Oromia Administration has also indefinitely extended its meeting to approve the election of its new President. Muktar Kedir, Abdulaziz Mohammed and Aster Mamo have been presented as candidates to fill Alemayehu's position and assume the regional presidency. The Addis Abeba based weekly English has reported that Aster Mamo has been elected as the nextPresident of the region. ESAT could not independently confirm the report.

GOSSIP: Meles Zenawi protégé elected to head the OPDO in Ethiopia'

ADDIS FORTUNE (March 8, 2014) - The president of the Oromo Democratic People Organisation (OPDO, a faction in the ruling EPRDF), who has also been the president of Oromia Regional State since September 2013, Alemayehu Atomsa, has just died at age 45 of an illnessthat was being treated in Thailand. He was replaced at the head of the OPDO by the public service minister Muktar Kedir. A native of Jimma, a small town 346 km west of Addis Ababa, Kedir is about the same age as Alemyehu Atomsa and joined the OPDO just after the EPRDF took power in the early 1990s. A good part of Muktar Kedir's career rise is in fact due to ...the influence of the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. After serving for a decade as an OPDO middle manager, he entered the organisation's central committee at the end of the 1990s. But it was only after the highlycontroversial general election in 2005 that Meles Zenawi noticed him and nominated him to succeed Hailemariam Desalegn (now the prime minister) head of public organisation and mobilisation in his prime minister's office, with the rank of minister. Meles Zenawi was very happy with him and promoted him in 2010, putting him in charge of his private office and had him attend meetings of the National Security Council.

South Sudan new battleground for Ethiopia and Eritrea?

News Analysis By Martin Plaut (March 8, 2014) - The conflict between Ethiopia and Eritrea, that can be traced back at least as far as their unresolved border war of May 1998 to June 2000, has taken many forms.In the past Somalia was the battleground in which this was played out. Isthe civil war now underway between the forces of President Salva Kiir Myardit and Riek Machar the latest site of this deadly contest? There isno definitive answer to this question, but here is the evidence.

Somalia: It is clear that Eritrea gave succor to the Islamic Courts Union(ICU) after they were forced to flee from the Somali capital, Mogadishu,by Ethiopian forces in January 2007. Some of the ICU established themselves in Asmara. Others decided to remain in Somalia – becoming the backbone of al-Shabaab and later an affiliate of al-Qaeda. The United Nations imposed sanctions on Eritrea in 2009 because of its support for al-Shabaab. UN Security Council Resolution 1907 accused Eritrea of: "…providing support to the armed groups engaged in destabilization activities in Somalia…"

Reports from UN Monitors have documented over a number of years how Eritrea provided weapons and other assistance to al-Shabaab. In its latestreport (S 2013/440 of 25 July 2013) the Monitors noted Eritrea's attemptsto improve relations with Somali President Hassan Sheikh Mohamud. The report went on: "However, Eritrea's strengthening of relations with Mogadishu seems to be driven by tactical decisions in Asmara that continue to contribute to regional destabilization. In particular, the Government of Eritrea maintains close links to a network of warlords and other spoilers in Somalia, which includes at least two leaders of Al- Shabaab."

It is worth noting that the same UN report talked of Eritrean involvement in South Sudan and Uganda: "The Monitoring Group has obtained information about Eritrean military intelligence and financial operations inKampala and Juba. Eritrean and intelligence sources in both Kampala andJuba confirm that Eritrea's ruling PFDJ party have fronted a number of business operations, from restaurants and hotels in Kampala and Juba, towater distribution and food and beverage imports in Juba, often working closely with Ugandan and South Sudanese businessmen as silent partners."

South Sudan: Allegations of Eritrean involvement: Is the conflict betweenKiir and Machar that erupted on the evening of 15 December 2013 the latest stage for Eritrea – Ethiopian rivalry? John Prendergast of the US lobby group Enough clearly thinks this is possible. On the 26th of February he gave evidence before the US Congress's Sub-committee on Africa.

This is what he said: "South Sudan's eruption has threatened to regionalize the war in ways not seen since the 1990s. On the one hand, Uganda has overtly intervened militarily in support of Juba's government.On the other hand, allegations are increasing that both Eritrea and Sudanare covertly providing support to the South Sudanese opposition forces, though firm evidence has yet to emerge. Sudan's history of supporting some of the ringleaders of South Sudan's armed opposition is deep, and South Sudan supported Sudanese rebels are alleged to be siding militarilywith Juba's forces in areas near the border of the two countries. Both countries still remain deeply interconnected and in many ways interdependent, and neither can be at peace if its neighbor is at war.

Ethiopia has strongly warned Uganda to pull out its forces, with anunknown "or else" attached."

Prendergast went on to describe the possibility of a regional conflict as a “nightmare scenario.” He concluded: “Currently, Eritrea is covered by sanctions for its support for armed elements inside Somalia. A credible investigation should be initiated to determine whether Eritrea is providingresupply support to South Sudanese rebels as has been alleged. If evidence corroborates these reports, those sanctions should be expandedfrom Somalia to South Sudan. Such an investigation should also attempt to determine if Sudan is providing similar support as has been alleged.”

The context: As Prendergast states, these are allegations and not evidence of Eritrean involvement. He does not disclose why he believes the allegations are worth investigating or where they came from. So whatis the context?

Sudan (also allegedly backing their former ally Riek Machar) held talks with Eritrea in January this year. President Omer Al-Bashir and his Eritrean counterpart Issaias Affewerki met on the 25th of January in Asmara. The visit is reported to have been much more than a swift trip: itlasted three days. The two presidents are reported to have offered their support to South Sudan and President Salva Kiir, but did they also discusscovert support for Machar and his rebels? There is no way of knowing, butat least for the present Asmara and Khartoum appear to be on the same wavelength as far as South Sudan is concerned. Salva Kiir despatched an envoy to Eritrea this week, and apparently received assurances of President Afewerki’s support.

There has been growing pressure from some senior American ex- diplomats for sanctions against Eritrea to be relaxed, as a way of bringingthe country back from the cold and ending the Eritrea-Ethiopia dispute. Among them is the former US Former Assistant Secretary of State for Africa, Hank Cohen. Cohen argued recently that the time had come to actand that this was in Washington’s best interests: “…the normalization of relations between the United States and Eritrea would open the door to military-to-military cooperation of the type that would enlist Eritrea in thewar against Islamic terrorism in the Horn coming from across the Red Sea. Yes, the time has come to bring Eritrea in from the cold.” This argument was supported by another former US diplomat Ambassador David Shinn.

Ethiopia has strongly resisted lifting sanctions against Eritrea. It has argued that: “…recent talk of mending Ethio-Eritrean relations, the subjectof discussion by some sympathizers of Eritrea, also seems detached from reality. It is based on false assumptions about the regime in Asmara which, in reality, has repeatedly made it very clear it is opposed to any form of dialogue. The call for the lifting of sanctions is out of synchronization with any reality on the ground…All the evidence shows that Eritrea is continuing to negate regional peace efforts, consistently making alliances with spoiler groups in Somalia and elsewhere.”

At the same time, a report appeared on a website accusing Eritrea of continuing to ship arms to Somalia. “the Ethiopian military in Central Somalia intercepted an Eritrean attempt to smuggle powerful rockets to the Southern Somalia as well as Somali territory in Ethiopia on a Yemenicommercial small boat off the coast of Puntland and Galmudug regional States of Somalia.” The source of this report was said to be Ethiopian military intelligence.

Conclusion: So is Eritrea arming Riek Machar and taking its fight against Ethiopia into South Sudan? The answer would appear to be inconclusive. John Prendergast has yet to provide evidence for his allegation before Congress. Eritrea clearly has “form” – having armed Al-Shabaab as well asrebel groups active inside Ethiopia. The Ethiopians – for their part – are clearly deeply concerned that Eritrea might escape the UN sanctions net, as suggested by Cohen and Shinn. Ethiopian military intelligence is stepping up the pressure by providing reports of continued arms shipments to Somalia. At the same time President Isaias Affewerki is co- ordinating his Sudan strategy with Khartoum – something that is of sufficient concern for Salva Kiir to send an envoy to Asmara with an unknown message. Perhaps all one can say for sure is that it is a murky old world: Ethiopian and Eritrean involvement in South Sudan will need careful scrutiny.

DIARIES: Police and civilians clash in Harrar town of eastern Ethiopia'

Eritrea vs Ethiopia, Northern Sudan vs Uganda proxy wars in SouthSudan: Analysts’

By Hannah McNeish, AFP (March 8, 2014)

As ongoing fighting in South Sudan shatters any pretence of a ceasefirebetween government troops and rebels, analysts fear the conflict could engulf the region, as former foes fight old wars in a new country. Thereare tensions between South Sudan's northern neighbour and old enemy

Sudan and its new ally Uganda, while chief mediator Ethiopia is likely alarmed by allegations that its arch-enemy Eritrea is funnelling weaponsfrom ally Khartoum to South Sudan's rebels.

One Western diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that theworst case-scenario currently being discussed is that "you've got Ugandafighting Sudan inside South Sudan, with Eritrea fighting Ethiopia inside South Sudan and a complete law and order vacuum."

"As far as the regionalisation of the conflict goes, the question is not if,but when", said Casie Copeland, South Sudan analyst for the Brussels-based International Crisis Group think tank.

What started as a power struggle between South Sudan's President SalvaKiir and his former deputy Riek Machar in late December quickly split thearmy and exacerbated ethnic feelings in a nation born less than three years ago, after five decades of war with Khartoum.

A feud between Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni and his Sudanese counterpart Omar al-Bashir is rooted in Uganda's rescue of a then southern guerrilla army battling Khartoum forces in the last stages of thecivil war that ended with a 2005 peace deal and South Sudan's independence six years later.

Uganda has long accused Khartoum of funding rebel groups such as theLord's Resistance Army on its territory.

With Ugandan troops now openly backing Kiir and pushing north, and as rebels retake territory near oil fields whose produce flows north for export,Sudan could soon go on the offensive.

"We do worry about the regionalisation of this. The Ugandans andSudanese hate each other," the diplomat said.

Proxy armies: Rebels from Sudan's troubled Darfur region, who have beenbattling Khartoum for a decade, are also reported to be fighting alongside South Sudan in oil-rich Unity state, and ethnic militia from other parts of the south are also pitching in, further straining north-south relations.

There are real fears that Sudan could revert to old tactics of fundingproxies or arming the opposition as calls for Uganda to withdraw gounheeded and oil assets are threatened.

A row in early 2012 over how much South Sudan should pay to export itsoil through northern pipelines to port led to an 18-month halt in production that brought both economies to their knees.

Kiir and Bashir eventually signed deals on oil and security that included apromise to stop funding one another's enemies to ensure their co- dependent stability.

The current conflict has called this and also the future of South Sudan's oilrevenues into question, with many seeing newly oil-rich Uganda's military support as a bargaining chip for oil.

South Sudan's defence minister recently admitted that Ugandan troopswere on the payroll, contradicting his colleagues' claims there were no foreign forces in country.

But speculation is rife over what else South Sudan's government -- stillreeling from the shutdown -- has offered to secure its position.

"I heard one of the oil blocks, or so much (oil) per day", said the diplomat.

South Sudan's decision to build an alternative pipeline to Kenya or Djibouti further unnerved Khartoum and raised Uganda's hopes it mightlink up to an East African pipeline and build its own refinery.

With French oil giant Total owning concessions in Ethiopia, Uganda andSouth Sudan, "the pieces are there for big play", says Copeland.

Risk of bankruptcy: But for now, cash-strapped South Sudan is embroiledin a war that has displaced almost a million people, with many wonderinghow long the baby nation can last. "International financial experts are suggesting that the government might be bankrupt in 2-3 months," said one analyst on condition of anonymity. South Sudan's biggest oil-backer China has played a role in supporting the government financially with development projects and loans, and is now increasingly wading into internal politics.

But its weight is unlikely to cut through strained regional relations as paranoia over history repeating itself with regards to oil, guns and bordersgrows. "A nightmare scenario is unfolding in this region", said John Prendergast in a recent report for the anti-genocide Enough project.

He has called for a proper investigation into whether Eritrea is providing arms through Sudan and for an extension of sanctions already incurred byAsmara for supplying weapons to Somali groups. Until there is no "visible presence" of Ugandan forces in South Sudan, he doubts that peace talks in Ethiopia's capital Addis Ababa that the host and Sudan have backed willever start in earnest.

But even without confused regional backers, half-hearted international pressure or China's economic carrot, left alone, South Sudan's war couldrumble on for years, funded solely by the spoils of corruption and determination of former guerrilla leaders.

In addition to this, there are prisons and detention centers connected to police stations and on the woreda and kebele administrative levels. No independent or international organization has access to Ethiopia's prisons. That makes it difficult to know how manypeople who are detained. In 2010 it was estimated that 86,000 were imprisoned, but the figure is very uncertain. Usually women and men have separate prison facilities. BOOKS: JIGJIGA: What Is It? Where Is It and Why Should You KnowAbout It?

By Julia Blake (March 11, 2014) - Not many have heard of Jijiga, the capital of the Somali Regional State of Ethiopia, or even, perhaps, have learned much about Ethiopia and the cities therein it, but Jijiga: The History of a Strategic Town in the Horn of Africa can enlighten readers intothis town's fundamental contribution to Ethiopia and the surrounding states. Jijiga tells the story of growth from a once under-developed area in the Ogaden to, now, a thriving model city in the Horn of Africa that perfectly epitomizes Ethiopian culture of diversity and development. In February, Tsehai Publishers and Distributors released this book by Tibebe Eshete, Ph.D., recipient of the Compton Peace Fellowship Award.

In this short, but enlightening book that captures the journey of Jijiga, Dr.Tibebe Eshete has successfully shed light into a very limited field of urbanstudies in relation to Ethiopia, and in whole, the Horn of Africa. As Dr.

Tibebe states in his book, "Jijiga provides an interesting venture into whatmight be called 'frontier history.'" Because of Jijiga's quintessential location on the Ethio-Somali borders and its predominately Somali population, Jijiga, as a model, "offers a distinct opportunity to further contribute to the study of center periphery relations in Ethiopian history."

In this “highly informative and often insightful, monograph,” writes Dr. Gebru Tareke author of The Ethiopian Revolution: War in the Horn of Africa, “Tibebe has offered a vivid portrait of Jijiga’s evolution from a dusty garrison village to today’s modern capital city of the Somali State(Zone Five)…. This pioneering work in urbanization/urbanism sheds considerable light on the social and political history of Ethiopia.” In an interview with Tsehai Publications, Dr. Tibebe Eshete elaborates on the back story of his book as well as the significance of Jijiga itself. ETHIOPIA: South Sudan Should Not be Another Failed State’By Marthe van der Wolf

VoA News/Africa ADDIS ABABA (March 12, 2014) — Ethiopia’s prime minister believes a fast deployment of regional troops to South Sudan is important, so that South Sudan does not turn into another failed state. South Sudan and regional stability were the main points discussed Tuesday as Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta began his first state visit toEthiopia.

Ethiopia’s Prime Minister Hailemariam Deslagen says deployment of a regional stability and protection force to South Sudan should not be delayed. “It will be very bad to have a failed state again in our region,” said Hailemariam. “So we urge the international community to respond asquickly as possible to our requests so that we rescue this country.”

Several East African countries, such as Kenya, Ethiopia, Rwanda, Djibouti and Burundi, have indicated they are ready to send troops to South Sudan. Nearly three months of fighting has left thousands dead and closeto a million displaced from their homes. The East African bloc IGAD is mediating peace negotiations between the government and rebel forces inAddis Ababa. Despite the signing of a cessation of hostilities agreement inJanuary, fighting continues and the talks are making little progress.

Heads of state from East Africa will meet Thursday in Addis to discuss thedetails of the proposed stabilization and protection force. Kenya and Ethiopia are also discussing the issue of 11 "political detainees" arrested by South Sudan's government in mid-December. Rebels want the 11 menreleased. Seven were turned over to the Kenyan president's custody last month but four remain imprisoned, and will have to appear in a South Sudanese court. Kenyan President Kenyatta says the issue of the four detainees is key to resolving the crisis.

“As part of our own IGAD framework, we had indicated that we would want to see ourselves work towards the release of the four to join the seven and everybody else in finding a political solution to the crisis, andthat is a process we are continuing with Juba,” said Uhuru. President Kenyatta is scheduled to remain in Ethiopia through the IGAD summit onThursday.

LGBT - Gay Ethiopian faces uncertainty, peril if deported – Boston Globe'By Maria Sacchetti GLOBE STAFF (March 12, 2014)

Federal immigration officials in Boston are seeking to deport a man — whohas posted online that he is gay — to a nation where same-sex relationships are illegal, just days after President Obama criticized a harshnew antigay law in Uganda. Officials arrested the 19-year-old man from Ethiopia in January, shortly after he lost his student visa, and brought himbefore an immigration judge twice last month for deportation. It is unclearif his judge or jailers know that the man has posted to a public forum thathe is gay. He also told at least two people who confirmed it to the Globe, saying they fear for his safety if he is deported. "This is a very serious deal," said the student's uncle, who spoke on condition of anonymity fromCanada. "Back in his country, it will be like death."

Advocates for immigrants said the case illustrates the perils of the US immigration system, where immigrants are not assigned public defendersand are often forced to defend themselves in court. Federal officials say immigration officers ask detainees if they are afraid to go home, which could clear the way for them to apply for asylum, but lawyers say many foreigners are reluctant to confide in their jailers.
Ethiopia is among dozens of nations — 77 at last count — where it is a crime to be gay or lesbian, according to the United Nations. Almost halfthe nations that outlaw same-sex relationships are in Africa, where Amnesty International says penalties include prison time or even death.
In February, Uganda imposed up to life in prison for same-sex conduct, drawing rebuke from President Obama, who called the law “an affront anda danger to the gay community.” Weeks earlier, Nigeria also toughened itsantigay laws. Afterward, according to media reports, a mob in Nigeria’s capital attacked men perceived as gay, and on Thursday an Islamic court in the north had four men publicly whipped for being gay.
In Ethiopia, according to the State Department, gay people have been jailed, interrogated, and allegedly abused, and many reported anxiety, depression, and suicide attempts. Amnesty International said gay peopleface up to 15 years in prison in that country for aggravated offenses.
The Globe spotted the man from Ethiopia in Boston immigration court lastmonth, and is not identifying him because he could not be interviewed. USImmigration and Customs Enforcement denied requests for an interview with the man, pending a mental health review requested by an immigration judge.
Immigration and customs spokesman Daniel Modricker declined to comment on the case, except to say that the man is being held without bail. “An immigration judge will determine whether he is eligible to stay here or not,” Modricker said. According to friends and his uncle, the slim19-year-old arrived in the United States last September to study at a college in New Hampshire with hopes of going on to medical school.
Eritreans in South Sudan threatened as locals accuse Asmara of backingthe rebels'
News updates: (March 12, 2014) Shops allegedly torched by rebels arepictured in Bor, capial of Jonglei state, on January 19, 2014 (Photo AFP /Waakhe Simon Wudu) On Monday an Ethiopian trader, who has been operating in Jonglei state since 2011, told Sudan Tribune said that 300,000 South Sudanese pounds (around $103,000) was stolen from his shop on 30 December 2013, just two weeks after fighting begin in the capital Juba. Daniel Merhawi Debesay, who is Eritrean by birth but holds an Ethiopian passport, says he also lost produce, including beer and soft drinks worth, around 668,000 SSP ($229,370). The drinks seller said that he had felt at home in South Sudan but now fears that his shop may havebeen targeted because of his nationality.

Many South Sudanese in Bor believe rumours that Eritrea may be backing the rebel movement led by South Sudan’s former Vice President Riek Machar. When fighting began between members of the South Sudanese armed forced on 15 December last year, the government accused Machar and many others who had become increasingly opposed to President SalvaKiir of attempting to stage a coup. Machar denies this but has assumed control of a loose coalition of defected soldiers and armed civilians who have control of much of Jonglei and Upper Nile as well as parts of Unity state. Debesay ran to the United Nations Mission in South Sudan (UNMISS) compound in Bor with his wife and brother when the war reached its peak in Bor, leaving behind everything in his shop. The state capital has changed hands four times since the conflict, which has killed an estimated 10,000 people and displaced hundreds of thousands, began.

"They came running, shooting people. I saw a lot of people killed here, I ran to UNMISS. It was on that day that they looted my shop, took all the crates I had in stock. They took the money also, 300,000 [South Sudanese] pounds", Debesay told Sudan Tribune. It was the saddest moment in his life, he said, and had a serious psychological affect on his brother, who sheltered in the UN compound with him until the town was retaken by the South Sudanese army (SPLA). "He became sick, complaining of headache and after few days, he became like a mad man. He is now under treatment in Uganda, Kampala", he said. Friends had helped him by paying for his medication in Uganda. Debesay has now received a loan of 15,000 pounds from the Ethiopian and Eritrean businesscommunity in South Sudan’s capital Juba to restart his drinks business.

The trader, who spent two months in the UN compound said he saw manyof the items looted from Bor market being exchanged between displaced people in the camp, including mattresses, phones, soft drinks and water.

THREATENED IN BOR: Debesay, who is an Eritrean by origin says that he and his wife have been threatened over the last week by local people in Bor who claim Eritrea is aiding Machar’s rebels by providing them with arms and ammunition. Claudio Gramizzi, an independent researcher with extensive knowledge of arms trafficking in the region said he was not aware of any evidence that Eritrea was providing weapons to the SPLM/A in Opposition, despite the rumours that have circulated over the past two weeks. The lack of evidence has not stopped people taking their anger outon expatriates like Debesay.

"I came to Bor again because other places are not good for business because of congestion and the distance factors. But now the people who knew me as an Eritrean threatened me. I will inform the police about so that I can get help immediately", Debesay said. Throughout much the civilwar against Khartoum that lasted for over two decades the SPLA - then a rebel group rather than a national army for independent South Sudan -had quite good connections with Asmara.

Gramizzi, told Sudan Tribune in an email: "This goes back into history, butsome networks survive in time even when the major political frameworks evolve. Eritreans are in Juba (they own a couple of hotels and some businessmen operating in South Sudan are quite well connected with the regime in their home country), but I never heard about them being involved in supporting armed actors."

Over the last five years Khartoum and Asmara have improved their relationship and stopped backing rebels in the others territory. This is a marked changed since before the 2005 Comprehensive Peace Agreement,when the Eritrean capital was home to several armed groups operating inSudan, including Darfuri rebels. From a geopolitical perspective Eritrea arming the South Sudanese rebels would not make much sense, Gramizzisaid, but added that it was not impossible.

"If there is some support – it is small volume and channelled through personal connections and they don't really reflect a governmental position." The Eritrean government do not have many reasons to put the Sudanese government in Khartoum in a difficult position by supporting Machar, according to Gramizzi, adding they also have no real reasons to oppose Salva Kiir's government. "Sometimes, however, [the Eritrean government's] geopolitical stand simply emerge[s] from their willingnessto annoy Ethiopia" Gramizzi notes. So far the conflict has, publicly at least, brought Khartoum and Juba closer together as they both need to keep South Sudan's oil exports flowing through the north to fuel their ailing economies. However, the presence of Ugandan troops, deployed by Kampala initiallyto help secure Juba and the evacuation of their nationals but now openlyfighting the rebels alongside the SPLA, has angered Sudan and their continued presence could raise tensions especially considering their proximity to the oil fields in Unity and Upper Nile. "Stop sending aid to dictators in Ethiopia and other countries" – saidWilliam Easterly'

DIARIES (March 13, 2014) Traditional foreign aid often props up dictatorsmore than it helps the poor. It's time for a new model. Too much of America's foreign aid funds what I call authoritarian development. That's when the international community–experts from the U.N. and other bodies–swoop into third-world countries and offer purely technical assistance to dictatorships like Uganda or Ethiopia on how to solve poverty. Unfortunately, dictators' sole motivation is to stay in power. So the development experts may get some roads built, but they are not maintained. Experts may sink boreholes for clean water, but the wells break down. Individuals do not have the political rights to protest disastrous public services, so they never improve. Meanwhile, dictatorsare left with cash and services to prop themselves up–while punishing their enemies.

But there is another model: free development, in which poor individuals, asserting their political and economic rights, motivate government and private actors to solve their problems or to give them the means to solvetheir own problems. Compare free development in Botswana with authoritarian development in Ethiopia. In Ethiopia in 2010, Human RightsWatch documented how the autocrat Meles Zenawi selectively withheld aid-financed famine relief from everyone except ruling-party members. Meanwhile democratic Botswana, although drought-prone like Ethiopia, has enjoyed decades of success in preventing famine. Government reliefdirected by local activists goes wherever drought strikes.

In the postwar period, countries such as Chile, Japan, South Korea and Taiwan have successfully followed the path of free development–often in spite of international aid, not because of it. While foreign policy concerns have often led America to prop up dictatorial regimes, we need a new rule: no democracy, no aid. If we truly want to help the poor, we can't accept the dictators' false bargain: ignore our rights abuses, and meet thematerial needs of those we oppress. Instead, we must advocate that the poor have the same rights as the rich everywhere, so they can aid themselves. William Easterly is professor of economics at New York University, and the co-director of New York University's Development Research Institute and author of The Tyranny of Experts: Economists, Dictators, and the Forgotten Rights of the Poor.

Violence feared after Shops burn by Arson fire in Harrar town, residentswarn'

DIARIES: (March 13, 2014) There is a scary scene in Harrar city, Eastern Ethiopia after the fire accident this week deliberately setted fire on to commercial properties, residents of Harrar told. The fact that the City Adminisatrtion has not given any moral or financial support to the victims of the accident, has angered the people. The City Administrators are beingcriticised for allegedly starting the fire that has damaged prpoerities worthmillions of birr.

"Unless the Adminisatrtion gives a compensation to the victims,the accumulated grivenaces of the people could lead to an unwanted conflict and violence"the residents warn. Other commenters also warn that the current power structure and organisation could raise "quetions of identity"then lead to conflict. Following the fire break out, at least 40 youth suspects of 'protest' have been detained. The President of Harrari Region admitted the arrests but did not reveal the number of the detainees.

DIARIES: Families suspected of relations with bandits suffer in prison'

ESAT News (March 14, 2014) At least 20 families that reside in the Western Armacheho area, near the Ethio-Sudan border and suspected of kinship with bandits are suffering in detention. The families are detained to make them either convince the bandits to give up and surrender to thegovernment or kill them. As most of the bandits have refused to surrender, the suffering of their civilian relatives has increased. Some of the detained families include Melkamu Azanaw, Melkamu Mengistu, Berhane Demelew, Mrs. Areke Melash, Dagnu Kassa, Gebre Adane and Hunachew. Many other have beensleeping in the bush fearing government persecution. An elderly lady known as Areke Melash, whose son had recently derelicted refusing to liveunder this regime, has been told that she will remain incarcerated until her son surrenders. The families of Abera Gobaw, who defected five yearsago, are also facing the brunt of government reprisal. Abera is reportedly being joined by a number of youth from the region.

Abay Zewdu, Public Relations Head of the UDJ Party, confirmed to ESAT that they confirmed the arrest and abuse of relatives of suspected bandits.He said most of the youth moved to banditry enraged by the regime.

Similarly, hundreds of youth in Western Armacho are asking the government to give them a farm land as it is giving away land to the Sudan and foreign investors. The youth have no received any response sofar. Over fifty youth have also travelled to Regional City, Bahir Dar, to present their questions.

Residents also say conflicts are occurring between the Ethio-Sudanese border due to the land given to Sudan from Gonder. They state that especially following the killing of Abdul, a Sudanese investor, the Sudanese have retaliated by killing a resident of Abraha Jira area known as Michael. It is to be recalled that Ethiopia and Sudan have recently signed an agreement to jointly protect their borders by soldiers from bothcountries.

DEBATE: Ethiopia Anew: A Call to Amhara Ethnic People REALLY?A response to Dr Zelalem Eshete's article'

By Andualem Tefera (March 14, 2014) In present-day Ethiopia there are two political schools of thought. These schools lead to the political struggleand the actions taking place on our land today. They are diametrically opposed to each other. The first one states that all problems that existed and still exists in Ethiopia emanate from the rulers oppressing Ethiopians at large. This leads to the struggle of Ethiopians to have a say in the political sphere of the country. The oppression of the rulers of the country has many forms and shape but it is all the rulers against the ruled. There is one ruling group and then there is the rest. The rulers own power through the state apparatus and the means of production.

The other school of thought states that what went on in Ethiopia and still goes on today is the oppression of other nations and nationalities by one nation in Ethiopia – stated Amhara. It is the Amharas who rules, it is the Amharas that oppressed, it is the Amharas as a unit that are the problemsand the causes of all problems in Ethiopia.

These two schools of thought correspond to the political organizations thatexist in Ethiopia today. Those in power in Ethiopia today come from the second school of thought. Those that formed their own liberation fronts and are struggling to "decolonize themselves" from Ethiopia or "secede from Ethiopia" belong to this second school of thought.

On the other hand those that are in the countrywide political organizationsand want to get rid of those in power today belong to the first school of thought. Let me make one thing very clear.

If we are serious to change the political system in Ethiopia, we must have an explicitly different vision from the rulers on the land. If we do not have this, then we better stop being dishonest to ourselves and to all Ethiopiansat large. There should be a clear distinction between the two political philosophies. This is where I come from. No matter who rules and no matter where the rulers count their ancestral heritage from, it has been the rulers against the ruled. Here I want to add that, no matter how bad TPLF is today, I cannot blame all Tigrayans wherever they are for the action of TPLF. It is the ruling group of TPLF that is responsible for the ills of Ethiopia today. Tigrayans are not ruling us today. It is TPLF and TPLF alone that is ruling us. Now let me focus on why I wrote this article.

Where Is Dr. Zelalem Eshete (PhD) Going With this?

Rulers were not Ethiopians but Amharas? What was perpetuated on the other ethnic groups was done by the ethnic Amharas and not by the rulingclass? Were all the ethnic Amharas privileged lot? Are you saying there was no class struggle but ethnic dominance? Here, I am trying to read Dr Zelalem Eshete.

A political thinking has objective. The objective lends the thinking philosophy to the political mind. There is a reason behind each and everypolitical move, every political proposal and every political action. When TPLF blamed the Amhara for all things wrong under the SUN, they have apolitical agenda of disuniting Ethiopians. And thanks to people like Alemnew Mekonnen and Dr. Zelalem Eshete, even those from Amhara origins are dancing to the tune of TPLF.

It was Alemnew Mekonnen who lectures that the Amharas are poison. Andnow what is Dr. Zelalem Eshete telling us? Dr. Zelalem Eshete wrote on March 10, 2014 and posted on a number of Ethiopian websites an article: Ethiopia Anew: A Call to Amhara Ethnic People. I read it and reread it.

Understanding the fact that this kind of article is draped with a political agenda sent our way. Some may ignore it and give it no attention. Some may call it rubbish and not deal with it. This is a reference for future propaganda work and I felt I need to respond to it. I observed Dr. ZelalemEshete has written other articles and posted them too.

On this particular article, Dr. Zelalem Eshete calls on the Amharas ". . . tobe accountable to the ills of our forefathers." Does he know what our forefathers did? In short, does he know Ethiopian history?

He started with: "This is a call to Amhara ethnic people from an Amhara ethnic individual." OK, I have no problem with that but, I would like to make a remark that you do not have to be an Amhara to state what is wrong and what is right, unless you have an objective behind stating that.In reference to the non-Russian Stalin's extravagant exercise of power of the central government against a minor nation, Lenin stated that if you scratch some communists you will find Great Russian chauvinists. It may not be word for word but it is close and the message is clear. This is to say that you do not have to be from a certain nation to be a mouth piece and a chauvinist of that nation for good or bad.

The good doctor prescribes three-pronged solutions:

A) Confession: deal with the past

Here he meant the Amhara have a unique responsibility of dealing with the past per his description. The Amhara have responsibility for what the rulers of the past have done, be it good or bad. The past is not Ethiopia but Amhara. This emanates from the fact that the Amhara, not the rulers have done terrible things to others and thus need to look back and confess. WOW! I understand someone from the second school of thought promoting this. That is logical since it is the bases for their political philosophy and administrative policy. I can also accept if the good doctor is coming on behalf of that school of thought. Where does his past start and where does his past end? Does the good doctor know the condition ofthe Amhara right now? Are they still responsible for what is going on in Ethiopia today? Do they still hold the power and need to learn how to behave so everything will be fine? What is the purpose of this confession where the good doctor wants the ARSOADER from MERHABETIE goes to Prime Minister HAILEMARIAM DESALEGN and confesses about what his forefathers did to his forefathers? Does this make sense?

B) Repentance: deal with the present

Unless my understanding of morality lets me down, you repent for what you did and promise not to do it again. The Amhara are not responsible for what Atse Theodros, Atse Yohannes, Atse Minilik, Atse Haile Sellassie or Dictator Mengistu Hailemariam did. On the contrary, those who lived inMegezez, in Wereylu, in Motta, in Beyeda suffered in those years, under those rulers equally or more than people in the rest of the country. Does the good doctor know the condition of the Amhara right now? Are they stillresponsible for what is going on in Ethiopia today? Do they still hold the power and need to learn how to behave so everything will be fine? What isthe purpose of this repentance? The good doctor wants the Amhara to give back to others what the Amha owes them. The reality is the Amhara are driven away from the land they cultivated for decades and are being killed there. Do you want them to repent for believing they are Ethiopians who can live anywhere in Ethiopia?

C) Discover: deal with the future

Last I checked TPLF is making sure that there will not be an Amhara alive by the end of its term. What future is there for the Amhara? Do you still fear that the Amhara are going to make the future very bad for the others? I cannot say the Amhara think like this or do like this, or behave like this or something like that. The Amhara like any other ethnic in Ethiopia are all over the political space. Some are close to our good doctor − like Alemnew Mekonnen, who has something to gain by promoting the political philosophy of TPLF. This is his ticket to survive. For others like me, it is a reality where Ethiopians that are thrown under the bus. Many are thrown over cliffs. Many are dismembered. Many are displaced. Many have lost all they owned. This is not hair splitting practice of academicians. It is the life of millions of people, be it in the "Amara Zone" or the rest of Ethiopia. You want the Amhara to deal with the future wheretheir future is in the hands of TPLF. Show your true self!

Dr. Zelalem Eshete has this to say at the end of his article: "When we right the wrongs of the past through confession and repentance, then onlywe are free from the shackle of the past to envision the future together asa family of one. . . In conclusion, fulfilling our responsibility would pave the way for the healing process to begin."

This in a nutshell is the central message of the article. It is the Amhara's refusal to fulfill our responsibility by not righting the wrong of the past that our country is in its present predicament. The path to move forward is hampered by the Amhara not accepting its fault. TPLF do not worry, youare not at fault. The good doctor has testified on your behalf, like your paid agent Alemnew Mekonnen.

SPECULATION & DEBATE: Was that a hate speech or inferiorization of theAmharas?

Was that use of vulgar language, a passable joke or a sign of inferioritycomplex?

By definition hate speech consists of verbal and nonverbal expression thatis used to demean, oppress, or promote violence against someone on the basis of their membership in a social or ethnic group. Such speech involves more than simply an indication of a dislike for someone or a group and is different than simple teasing or ridiculing of someone, or throwing an ugly word at a moment of anger or frustration. There is no doubt that Ato Alemneh's characterization of Amharas and inferiorizing them as, "drooling/ slobbering/frothing", by any measure or standard meets all the criteria of hate speech. It is no less offensive than the racial and other ethnic slurs demeaning terminology that have been found so offensive that the UN and other international bodies and governments have legislations to limit their use as they interfere with the human rights of groups of people and have historically set the stage for human right violation up to genocide. The case against him is even stronger because ofhis position as a highly placed government official whose speeches can be taken as government policy. Ato Alemneh did not directly incite violence against Amharas, but what seems to be clear from his talk is that he is vicariously attempting to justify the violence that has been perpetrated against the Amharas as having been provoked by their superciliousness ina type of "blame the victim" approach used by perpetrators as a justification for sexual assaults and attacks. Believed Alemneh Makonnen will pay a price overtime for his tongue used for speaking nonsense..

Ethnic-tribe Amhara: The phrase Amhara may refer to: Amhara people, anethnic group of people usually known as Amharas. Amhara is an ethnic group of Ethiopia, and It's language Amharic is an Afro-Asiatic tongue spoken by the Amhara people. It's meaning derived from Hebrew words 'Ham' meaning people and 'Hara' meaning for 'highland' to say 'people inhabited on the mountains. The "h" in the Amharic has been long used before any European came to the region in Ethiopia. For example "Bete- Amhara" was used to call the current Wollo area; Amhara or Amharay is also used in Geez and Tigrigna, and Amharaw in Amharic itself, but these are only ancestors of the same people and language, thus shall not be taken as "others" calling Amharas.

The Language: Amharic (አማርኛ), is a Semitic language spoken in Ethiopia.It is the second-most spoken Semitic language in the world, after Arabic, and the official working language of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia. Thus, it has official status and is used nationwide. It has been the working language of government, the military, and the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church throughout medieval and modern times. It is written using Amharic Fidel, ፊደል, which grew out of the Ge'ez abugida— called, in Ethiopian Semitic languages, ፊደል fidel ("alphabet", "letter", or "character") and አቡጊዳ abugida (from the first four Ethiopic letters, which gave rise to the modern linguistic term abugida). Other language groups like the Harrari some times known as 'Haderes' and Somali call the Amharas as "Ahmera" making the "h" in front of "m". The "Hymiyarites" ofYemen are mentioned by historians to relate it to migrations to the "Horn"as present "Hamassien" or "Amhariya" , making a correlations mainly using this "h" sound. (Text ends)

NILE DIPLOMACY: Egyptian Government Bonds Cover 26.3% of the GERD'

Ahram Online News (March 14, 2014)

Ethiopian Great Renaissance Dam (GERD) Project construction site at Gumba Woreda just 40 kilometers from the border with Sudan. The damwill provide an economic boost to the region., ill provide an economic boost to the region. The Grand Renaissance Dam is currently under construction in Ethiopia

The under-construction Ethiopian Grand Renaissance Dam has receivedmore than 26.3 percent of its construction costs in the form of government bonds purchased by Ethiopians, MENA reported.

The Egyptian state news agency, quoting Ethiopian Walta news, said the Ethiopian National Council for the Coordination of Public Participation on the Construction of the Grand Renaissance Dam “appreciated the remarkable contribution of the Ethiopian people.” The $4.2 billion hydroelectric dam on the Blue Nile, one of the main tributaries of the Nile,has become a source of concern to Egypt. Officials say the dam may restrict the amount of water reaching Egypt, which is downstream from Ethiopia.

The Nile is Egypt's main source of potable water.

Ethiopians are so keen on the construction of the dam that they are backing it not only in finance but also in diplomacy, the council added. Thecouncil said that Ethiopians, both inside and outside Ethiopia, have played significant roles in fighting negative attitudes in connection to the construction of the dam.

According to the council, March will witness celebrations in Ethiopia and other parts of the world to mark the third anniversary of the beginning of the construction of the dam. Earlier this month, a spokesman of the government-owned Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation, which is constructing the dam, said 32 percent of the construction has been completed.

Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan formed a tripartite technical committee to study the possible effects of the dam and try to generate consensus on the project. Ethiopia maintains that Egypt's water share will not be negatively affected by the successful completion of the dam. In recent meetings in Khartoum, the tripartite committee was scheduled to draft adocument that entails "confidence building measures" between the countries, and also to form a special international conflict resolution committee. DEBATE on ETHNIC POLITICS: The Amahara: Not responsible for past orpresent wrongs'

By Alemayehu Behulu (March 14, 2014) - In recent days, my cousin, Dr. Zelalam Eshete has been writing articles about our beloved motherland, Ethiopia. I am so happy to see an educated young Ethiopian like him participating in socio-political debates. I encourage him and the likes of him to continue working towards the betterment of Ethiopia. Speaking of education, Dr. Zelalem never knew grades "B" and below, since he was anA, A+ on all exams he took, in high school or universities. So, it puts me in disadvantage to respond to my beloved brother. As far as education goes, the only little communality we have is that we are both engineers indifferent fields, and of course at different education level. However, Ethiopia is a mother to all educated or not, the haves and or the have nots, so I decided to respond to his article regarding our common Ethiopia. Of all his articles, the one which prompts me to respond to is the one posted on one of my favorite sites - Ethiomedia - and is titled.

To begin with, I do not think it is a good idea to judge our 18th, 19th, even 20th century leaders with today's, 21st century book. Secondly, Ethiopia has her share of good and bad as any nation came before and after her. So, blaming one ethnic for all bad deeds which took place in Ethiopia may not serve well for our future. Of course, we should evaluate our past and correct the wrongs, even if it requires asking for forgiveness,we should do so and move on. However, the forgiveness should be two- way highway. But, Dr. Zelalem hands the responsibility of all wrongs donein the county only to one ethnic group. Here's an excerpt:

"We, Amahra of today, need to take the responsibility on our own initiative and stand in the gap to be accountable to the ills of our forefathers. The brokenness of the marginalized, abused and neglected people begets that they are the soul of Ethiopia. This is because the newunity of Ethiopia is championed and realized first by those who are marginalized and abused".

I argue to the contrary based on the following three points: First, whatever wrong done in Ethiopia is not only Amhara's responsibility. Rather, the responsibility is the government at the time. Even if we take our recent leaders, whatever Atse Yohanis had done doesn't represent theTigray people, other than his administration, so is whatever Atse Tewodros had done doesn't reflect the Gonder or the Amhara people, and the same goes for Atse Haile Selassie and Mengistu. By the way, there are conflicting reports which ethnic the later two leaders belong. Some say they both have Amhara and Oromo blood. Even, yes, even the current regime of Ethiopia which constitution is based on ethnic and led by Tigray elites, whose late leader Zenawi public statements indicated hatred for one ethnic, doesn't represent the entire Tigray people, but his/current administration. Based on this facts, I argue the statement Amhara is responsible is invalid. Second, Amhara has done more than its fair share. If people from Amhara ethnic are monster as some political organizations try to portray today, the 60's Ethiopian revolution wouldn't have seen the day light. Those youngsters, including those from well to do family, in spite of being fed Nech Teff and Mikut, stood for poor and oppressed Ethiopians. They knew they will lose their luxury life, but they fought and die for the freedom of fellow oppressed citizens. Most of the leaders of that time were Amahars. One typical example which even frequently beingquoted by Dr. Biyan of OLF was Wallelgne. Here is the quote from the wellknown Wallelgne's paper:

"What are the Ethiopian peoples composed of? I stress on the word peoples because sociologically speaking at this stage Ethiopia is not really one nation. It is made up of a dozen nationalities with their own languages, ways of dressing, history, social organization and territorial entity. And what else is a nation? It is not made of a people with a particular tongue, particular ways of dressing, particular history, particularsocial and economic organization? Then may I conclude that in Ethiopia there is the Oromo Nation, the Tigrai Nation, the Amhara Nation, the Gurage Nation, the Sidama Nation, the Wellamo [Wolayta] Nation, the Adere [Harari] Nation, and however much you may not like it the Somali Nation. This is the true picture of Ethiopia. There is of course the fake EthiopianNationalism advanced by the ruling class and unwillingly accepted and even propagated by innocent fellow travellers.

What is this fake Nationalism? Is it not simply Amhara and to a certain extent Amhara-Tigre supremacy? Ask anybody what Ethiopian culture is? Ask anybody what Ethiopian language is? Ask anybody what Ethiopian music is? Ask anybody what the "national dress" is? It is either Amhara orAmhara-Tigre!!" Dr. Zelalem, I will send you the full version Walelelgne's paper. The point is that Wallelgne was seeing world from the point of so called socialism where oppressed people will be freed. He wasn't seeing himself as Amhara. From his writings, he sees himself from the angle of "alem yewzaderch tihonlech", loose interpretation, world will be led by proletariat. He was going as far as standing against his own Ethnic thoughthe idea was a blind folded Socialist thought. On this topic, I suggest you to call our uncle who resides in the same county with you. Our uncle fought for the oppressed and paid the price, jailed, and tortured as a member of the then EPRP. I spoke with him in length on various occasions. This is what he said, I will paraphrase it. "had I thought our struggle would cause the destruction of Ethiopia as I see today, had I thought it would cause animosity between me and my precious friends, I wouldn't have done it. It was a short sited struggle". So, the ethnic peopleof Amhara should not be apologetics. The appeasing politics should be over. Amharans have done more than their fair share for the betterment of their countrymen and women regardless of ethnic background. They shouldn't be responsible for neglecting other ethnics as you put it.

Actually, the Amharas should have been praised for love of all Ethiopians.For additional information on the 60's Student Movement, please visit yatwlid website, get books written by Professor Mesay and many others.

Third, if we dig back not only Amharas are responsible for wars and destruction. I will give you using the examples of the two ethnics which we both are well acquainted with, Oromo and Amhara. There are many books and articles out there. In the 15th century, originating from South,Oromo warriors reached as far as Tigray. On their way, they were not feeding milk people of Semen Shoa, Gojjam, Wollo, Gonder up to Tigray.But, they were fighting and concurring. Let me give you typical example,in Gojjam and Gonder the name "Muche, which translates Lij in Amharic"is very common. Example of this is Professor Muche. This is not by accident. This is the result of those wars. There are still ancestors of Oromos residing in those areas. You and I are very familiar about Ormosin Shoa and the rest. Please ask Abiye, our grandfather; he will tell you. The same goes for the Amara in the 19th century, expanding to South.

Also, please check Abera Tola's Ethiopia: Dark side of Oromo expansionsand Menelik conquests.

In conclusion, I totally agree with you on reconciliation. However, not at the expense of one ethnic; reconciliation is a two-way street. The appeasing politics brought this misery of division to county of ours. The truth has to be told. The lie politics are becoming history. I will finish withwhat one Ethiopian Professor said during the celebration of Ethiopian Millinium at Howard University, Wahsington, DC "because of the appeasing politics of the 60's, we lost Eriteria and made our country landlocked". NILE DIPLOMACY: DIARIES: Ethiopia invites foreign media to RenaissanceGERD site'

ADDIS ABABA (March 15, 2014) – The Ethiopian government has invited foreign media correspondents to the construction site of the multibillion- dollar Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Hydroelectric Dam. "We decided to take the media to the very spot of construction in order to provide them with the opportunity to get first-hand information," the government's Communication Affairs Office wrote in the itinerary program. The Office isfacilitating the journey for crews representing 13 different channels. Two Anadolu Agency journalists are among the 22 media people travelling to Guba in the Benishangul Gumuz Regional State, some 970km west of the capital Addis Ababa. Launched in April 2, 2011, the dam project isapproaching its third anniversary.

DIARIES: Fixed Foreign Exchange Rate Forced Back’

Addis Fortune FINANCE (March 16, 2014) The decision to delay the application of the new directive came after complaints concerning the completion of existing transactions. The National Bank of Ethiopia (NBE) has postponed the application of the new Foreign Exchange Transaction Directive, prompted by complaints from exporters. In a circular distributedto all banks in the country on March 4, 2014, the state regulator disclosedthat the new directive will not now enter into force until April 15, 2014.

The Bank had distributed the directive to all banks earlier on February 27,2014.

Exporters, who already have transactions with foreign companies at the time of the Directive's issuance complained that they must be given moretime to complete the transactions. The Bank decided in their favour to consider the pending transactions, Alemayehu Kebede, Change Management & Communications Directorate director at the Bank, told Fortune. The NBE's new directive, which aims to create clear competition among banks by fixing a daily foreign exchange buying and selling rates for all banks, will overhaul the foreign exchange law of 1977 and 17 otherrelated directives and amendments issued since then to govern the foreign exchange regime of the country.

The Directive deals with the fixation and utilisation of the foreign exchange daily rate for both cash and transactions. The foreign exchangerate of the Bank, says the directive, shall be the NBE interbank foreign exchange market indicative buying rate of the day, with the margin between the buying and selling rate not exceeding the NBE's buying rate by more than two percent. Whereas exporters and recipients of inward remittances will continue to have the right to hold 10pc of their account balance for an indefinite period of time and 90pc of their account balancefor up to 29 days, the article in the Retention & Utilisation of Export Earnings and Inward Remittances Directive of 1998, which previously allowed them to sell all or part these balances within the time limits, has been repealed.

Another repealed article from the 1998 Directive is the one related to commercial banks being "free to intermediate between exporters and importers without prior transaction-by-transaction approval of the NBE". The Directive sets a fine of 10,000 Br for violation of any article or sub- article. The Bank, says the Directive, may take any measure it considers necessary, in line with the banking business proclamation, in addition to financial fines. The rationale behind the directive is to resolve unfair competition between banks due to the shortage of foreign currency in thecountry since 2008, says an official from the Commercial Bank of Ethiopia (CBE). Especially now, he says, major government projects, like the renaissance dam and the inner city railway, contribute to the shortage offoreign exchange.

"The directive protects the interests of banks," this official said. The foreign exchange scenario - including developments in exports, importsand the purchasing power of individuals to buy currency - has changed, according to a senior official at the NBE close to the issue. Some privatebanks approached by Fortune said they did not gain any advantage through buying foreign exchange at the selling rate of the day through negotiations, which were to the advantage of the exporters and the recipients of inward remittances. One of these, Birtukan Gebrezgi, vice president of Enat Bank, says the directive will be supportive of banks. According to an official at Bunna International Bank, the new foreign exchange directive will make the foreign exchange rate predictable. Headded that this will be supportive of the predictable buying and selling rate throughout the bank. The competition between the banks must bebased on service charge and the quality of the service, rather than theviolation of the rules of the national bank, says Alemayehu.

ETHIOPIA/ERITREA: Natives of Ethiopia and Eritrea unite in NYC EvangelicChurch‘

Somalilandsun (March 16, 2014) – This past Sunday the 9th of March, evangelical Christians from Ethiopia and Eritrea once again united in worship as a rare show of love between two people whose countries are inwar footing back home in Africa.

Located at the corner of West 105th Street and Amsterdam Avenue, thesmall Eritrean Bethlehem evangelical church in New York City welcomeddozens of Ethiopians from another evangelical church at 12st & 5th ave downtown.

This new project is bridging gaps and creating a foundation for peace between the people, said many congregants. Since last year, the two churches have been trading preachers, exchanging gospel materials and attending the church of one another every three months. Similar projectsare also starting in Addis Ababa, where a large Eritrean evangelical and pentecostal population has grown in recent years due to persecution backhome. Since independence, most evangelical churches have been bannedin Eritrea, forcing many to flee to Ethiopia.

While politics is rarely mentioned, some members quietly say such peaceprojects exemplify how easily the two countries can fix relations. If the two economies unite, small contested lands like Badme become insignificant, and wasted resources on military could be diverted toward development, churchgoers claim. Ethiopia could also get much cheaper use of Asab port and Eritrea could get port revenues and cheap electricityfrom Addis Ababa, some hope. One faithful from the Eritrean Bethel church wondered, “We are one people. But Wouldn’t it be nice to have twovoices in the UN that always support and back each other the same way like US and Canada or US and Britain do?”

But for now, they would have to settle with worshipping together thousands of miles away from their native countries. Using a healthy mixture of the two related languages during sermons (Amharic and Tigrinya) Pastor Mesfin and Pastor Girmay has brought the two churches together. With some hope and prayers, many believe these initiatives areearly signs of many good things to come for the two people.

CINEMA CRITIC: DARING “DIFRET” – A Film Review By ex-AmbassadorImru Zelleke’

(March 16, 2014) This is a serious movie that depicts in depth the traumatic times that the Ethiopian society is undergoing from an ever present past towards an inescapable future. It is a true portrayal of our contemporary national life, with all its contradictions, misconceptions, misunderstandings, of the struggle to survive a grueling existence amidsta violent social turmoil, of despair and hope. This is not an allegory of some past events, it is about present day Ethiopian society.

It mirrors the enormous disparity between the new urban moneyed class and the abject poverty of the ordinary people. The fear of the ominous bureaucracy and the indifference of the judicial system are glaringly visible throughout the movie. Particularly, the plight of women in a traditional society still anchored in some brutal practices, and the courageand integrity of the young female lawyer and her elder associate who defyeven the highest judicial authority, is a magnificent portrayal of the resilience and courage of Ethiopian womanhood.

The film was inspired by a true story and is shot in a genuine physical milieu in which it might have occurred. The subject was treated with candor and intellectual honesty, no frills, no special effects, no paraphernalia. Cinema wise I think that the film belongs to a category called “cinema verite”. However, unlike these kind of movies that are usually shot with hand held cameras, the use of professional gear has enhanced its visual quality. The exterior and interior scenes have been shot meticulously and convey most convincingly the mood and temper of the story. This is not an amusement movie but a profound comment abouta society in transformation.

The Director Ato Zeresenay Berhane and the producers Woyzero Dr. Mehret Mandefro have shown a keen understanding of Ethiopian social fabric, they represent the promising future generation. The heroines of thestory Hirut and the lawyer Meron as well as all the other actors have givena wonderful performance. Director Zeresenay deserves high credits for writing the script and for his delicate and skillful direction of non- professional actors into acting admirably in difficult and complex roles.

Compliments are also due to the team of producers, especially to AngelinaJolie for participating in this venture and adding to her illustrious work thisunique artistic achievement. This is a film to be seen more than once to seize fully its meaning and significance to our future social development.
We should look forward to other cinematic works by Director ZeresenayBerhane and producer Dr. Mehret Ayalew Mandefro, wishing them our highest congratulations.
Ethiopian Ambassador in Egypt doubts need for mediator between Egyptand Ethiopia'
The two countries did not reach a solution after talks in the Ethiopiancapital last month
Daily News Egypt: (March 18, 2014) Ethiopia's ambassador to Egypt said he doubted the need for mediation between Egypt and Ethiopia on the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, stressing the importance of constructive dialogue as the only alternative. Ambassador Mahamoud Dirirsaid in a statement published by the Ethiopian Foreign Ministry on Mondaythat it is "naïve" to consider that ties between the two countries should "solely be viewed through the prism of the Nile issue." Dirir denied reportsof third party mediation between the two Nile Basin countries and said, "there are only two, and only two, countries in the entire world which are well-placed to mediate between Egypt and Ethiopia; and these are, of course; Ethiopia and Egypt, themselves." He added that the role of Sudanas a partner has been pivotal to "ironing out" difficulties in the dialogue between Egypt and Ethiopia. Dirir said the countries have enough experience to ensure that the Nile is a source of cooperation between Nile Basin countries, not a source of conflict. On Monday, Prime Minister Ibrhaim Mehleb held talks with Egyptian Foreign Minister Nabil Fahmy in which they focused on relations with Nile Basin countries and the possibility for developing them. The cabinet said in a statement after the meeting that Egypt is currently dealing positively with all Nile Basin countries in order to preserve its strategic interests and out of recognitionof the ambitions of these countries for development. Ethiopia began diverting water from one of the Nile River's tributaries in May 2013, and iscurrently building the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, expected to be completed within three years. Egypt fears that the electricity-generating dam will have a detrimental effect on its lion's share of Nile water. The latest round of talks between Egypt and Ethiopia ended on 10 February without the two sides resolving "sticking points". The "sticking points" thatremain regard the formation of a committee to oversee the implementation of recommendations of a report detailing confidence- building measures concerning the dam and its effect on downstream nations. Ethiopia said the talks in February "made no progress" because ofa difference in opinion regarding the involvement of international experts. It said that while Egypt wants the involvement of foreign experts, Sudan and Ethiopia, do not see the need. Sudan, which is also an interested party and, like Egypt, is a downstream country, was part of a series of tripartite talks between the three countries in November, December andJanuary. However, they have not reached an agreement.

Second fire in Harrar Town; showdown between Admin and people'News updates (March 18, 2014)

After a second Arson fire broke out in another market place in Harrar city on March 15, 2014, Eastern Ethiopia in one week, the local population andthe Administration are trading accusations on each other. While the Administrators are accusing "groups with hidden political agendas", the people accuse the government of causing the fire.

At least 40 youth, who, last week, took to the streets to express their anger, are still detained by police. Government mass media have stated that the detained people were those who attempted to break-in shops using the fire as a window of opportunity. The residents on the other handstate that those who have been robbing were police officers "people have been watching the police officers in shame as they sacked mobile phone apparatuses from the shops."

Most residents of Harrar believe the Administrators of Harrar started the fire aiming to give the market place to selected few. The Harrari Region Communication Bureau on its part said that the main cause of the fire have been the "groups that have been attempting to pursue their hidden political agendas." It also declared to fight 'them' together with the government. Observers say the people of Harrar has been filled with "sadness and grudge" more than any other time in its history. They peopleare mystified on what they should be doing.

SPECULATION: Former US President George Bush Jr in Addis Ababa'

The former American President George Bush Jr recently went on a missionto Addis Ababa, arriving there on the 17th of March. He met Prime MinisterHailemariam Desalegn and the minister for foreign affairs, Tedros Adhanom. George Bush knows the latter well. During his meetings in Addis Ababa this week, George Bush discusses regional issues (such as the crisis in South Sudan, the relations between Ethiopia and Eritrea and the situation in Somalia) and take stock of his projects to fight the spreadof AIDS.

JUSTICE: Blue Party's executives and female members are being accusedof freedom of expression!' (March 18, 2014) - The case was of course presented 5 days earlier andended with denying a bail for the young activists and members of the party because they were believed to terrorize and as well suspected of disturbance on Women's Great Run which ended up peacefully. The scenario which is taking place even showed us a glimpse of the sacrificeswe must go through. One of the girls has two daughters; the others are very young and enthusiastically want to contribute their best to the country. All they did was exercising their freedom; they stood and voicedthe voice of million women who live in fear. The women of the Blue Partyon women's freedom day demanded FREEDOM, JUSTICE and EQUALITY exceptionally for all the women in Ethiopia and through that for their brothers and fathers as well. Where are they now? In prison! We demanded their freedom for they are freedom fighters.

Victims of Harrar Town Fire accuse Government of Complicity'

EAN News updates:: March 6th was a sad and disturbing day for residentsof Harrar town – a place known for its ancient walls and performers who do amazing stunts alongside hyenas. A fire at the Mebrat Hail Gebi MarketCenter on this fateful day led to the destruction of over 400 shops and an unascertained number of other valuable assets.

Reports indicate that residents of the town have taken to the streets to protest against what they have alleged to be arson by agents of the government. According to Addis Guday, clashes between the protesters and the town's police has resulted in many arrests and injuries. Residentsof Harrar told Addis Guday that a similar episode had transpired some three years ago on their original market center – just in front of the recently burnt area. "The government had forgot its promise and the same thing that happened to us three years ago has happened again," they said.

They further alleged that the recently damaged center was supposed to provide temporary housing to the traders until their permanent market would be ready, as promised by the government. Reports indicate that theburnt patch has been fenced and nothing has been done there since the fire was put out. Earlier last week, victims of the fire incident met with thePresident of The Harrari , Ato Murad Abdulahi, who offered the government's support in rebuilding everything that was destroyed.

He reportedly also disclosed that the government will see to it that loans with favorable terms are made available for the traders. However, he noted that the traders must stop protesting as a precondition. On Monday,March 10th, the communication head of the Harrari Administration, W/ro Hasenet Abubaker, told reporters that the protesters were not victims of the fire, but people living on the streets. It took over two hours and the collaboration of the Dire Dawa's Fire Control Station, Eastern Harrarghe Town Police, Civil Aviation, Haromaya University and many other volunteers to put the raging fire under control at the market square last week Sunday.

DIARIES: Testing the Waters Washington presses Ethiopia for Politicalreform'

The United States' State Department annual report this year has toughened its tone in condemning Ethiopia's record on rights, even Secretary of State John Kerry, grouped the country with Cuba, Belarus and China. This, former diplomats and experts say, is an indication that Washington will be testing the new leadership in Addis Ababa to see if it'swilling to embrace political reforms ahead of 2015 national polls.

Successfully staging the country's first ever peaceful power transfer, the ruling party has consolidated its control. There is however no sign that thegovernment of Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn is heeding Washington's calls for major reforms. A spokesperson for the PM earlier this week said any legislative or political reforms have to be "organic" andinitiated by the government's own assessments.

Significant shift: Annually compiled by American embassies across the globe, the State Department submits to the US Congress detailed reports of human rights conditions on all United Nations members while those receiving assistance from the US are particularly targeted. Ethiopia, receiving about one USD billion in annual aid from the US, and much morefrom multi-donor establishments such as the World Bank where Washington holds significant controls, falls among a list of nations which receive stronger scrutiny.

DIARIES: Kuwaiti Lawmakers Agree to Support Deportation of EthiopianHousemaids '

Kuwait HAN (March 18, 2014) – Arab Times reported that, Several lawmakers have expressed their anger over the killing of a Kuwaiti girl byan Ethiopian housemaid in Sulaibikhat on Sunday, calling on the Interior Ministry to immediately take the necessary action. According to the lawmakers, the ministry should not just stop the recruitment of Ethiopianmaids but also deport all those currently working in the country.

They expressed condolences to the family of the victim and urged all Kuwaiti families to terminate the services of their Ethiopian maids regardless of the cost. MP Talal Al-Jalala pointed out the people of Kuwaitwere shocked by the news on the brutal killing of the Kuwaiti girl who belonged to a prominent family. He asked the concerned authority to impose death penalty on the maid who admitted the crime, indicating themedia must be allowed to cover the implementation of the punishment toserve as a deterrent to others.

The lawmaker stressed the need to oblige housemaids to undergo tests regularly to ensure they are not suffering from any psychological illness. He said this is the responsibility of Social Affairs and Labor Minister Hind Al-Sabeeh, in coordination with the Ministry of Health. He also emphasizedthe need to conduct a study on domestic workers who commit crimes to look into patterns like nationality, age and other factors to help the State take a decision on stopping the recruitment of housemaids from a particular country based on the results of the study. He also suggested imposing tougher punishment on ‘killer’ maids and to open a special filefor maids in Kuwait. He clarified he has no intention to discriminate thehousemaids or downplay their role, because his aim is to guarantee thesafety of citizens and residents.

Commenting on the same issue, MP Humoud Al-Hamdan asserted the number of crimes involving foreign communities, particularly the Ethiopians; has been increasing at an alarming rate. He asked the government to take precautionary measures before allowing maids to enter the country; such as ensuring they have no mental or psychologicalproblem, and are free from infectious diseases. He also underscored the importance of organizing public awareness campaigns in different languages to familiarize the expatriate workers on the local culture and nature of the Kuwaiti society, as well as ways of dealing with people fromall walks of life.

Moreover, MP Abdullah Al- Tamimi holds the domestic worker offices accountable for the inappropriate procedures in hiring housemaids, especially those from Ethiopia. He underlined the need to lay down rulesand regulations in recruiting housemaids that must be followed by theseoffices. He said the security statistics he studied recently revealed that most expatriates accused of committing murder came from Ethiopia, especially the women.

He added the Interior Ministry must deport these housemaids as soon as possible to prevent such crimes. He also urged all Kuwaiti families to endcontracts with Ethiopian maids, if they have, in spite of the huge financiallosses; stressing the Interior Ministry should quickly take the necessary measures to repatriate Ethiopian domestic workers. He argued this is notthe first time that an Ethiopian is accused of murder as a number of suchcases had earlier been recorded.

MP Khalil Al-Saleh asked the government to stop the heinous act of the Ethiopian community and it should not be lenient towards them to preventrecurrence of killings. He added the murder of a young Kuwaiti girl on Sunday is a heinous crime which should not go unpunished, especially since this is the 11th time an Ethiopian is involved in a murder or attempted murder case. Al-Saleh disclosed more than 80,000 Ethiopians are currently living in Kuwait and most of them are domestic workers. He then applead to Deputy Premier and Minister of Interior Sheikh Sabah Al- Khalid Al-Sabah to stop domestic worker offices from hiring Ethiopian maids.

MP Saleh Ashour asserted this incident is not new to us and its repetition indicates failure in the government. He asked the Ministry of Interior whatsteps it has taken to curb the rising number of murder cases. MP Safa Al- Hashem sympathized with the young Kuwaiti girl’s family, asking the government why Indonesian laborers have been banned from entering Kuwait while members of a community implicated in several murders are allowed to stay in the country. She said the number of murders committedby Ethiopians totaled 11.

Banning: Majority of the MPs support the idea of banning Ethiopian housemaids from entering the country due to the number of murder casesinvolving members of the community – more than other nationalities. In another development, Al-Hashem said she is confused by the response of the minister of health to her queries about the High Council of Medical Specialists, complaints of doctors and the number of doctors. She said theminister's response was, "The concerned parties declared the unconstitutionality of the submitted query." The MP asserted the minister is digging a grave for his political career due to his answer. She threatened to submit an interpellation request if the minister does not answer properly by the end of March, asserting that her queries are constitutional. On another issue, Al-Hashem disclosed a report has revealed that the losses incurred by Kuwaiti Stock Exchange since its establishment reached KD 5 billion.

She said every time she submits queries to the minister of commerce andindustry regarding the issue, the standard answer she receives is, "My obligation towards the stock market is supervision only." Al-Hashem asserted the law gives the minister authority to ensure the stock market reaches its target, wondering if he is waiting for losses to reach KD10 billion. She added she has started taking the necessary steps in this regard and if the minister does not take proper action, she has no recourse but to present a grilling motion against him. Furthermore, the Legal and Legislative Committee on Sunday rejected request of the PublicProsecution to lift the immunity of MP Mohammed Tana.

Rapporteur of the Committee MP Abdul-Kareen Al-Kandari revealed the panel also discussed and approved several amendment bills; including civilservice, end of service, granting full salary leave to anyone who want to continue his studies and personal interview for job applicants. In the meantime, Al-Kandari confirmed his decision to defer the submission of a grilling request against Minister of Justice Naif Al-Ajmi as the latter has responded to his demand to lay down the executive bylaws for the Anti-Corruption Law passed by the Parliament several months ago. source: Arab Times

U.S., Ethiopia, PNG to join anti-corruption drive'

Reuters - (March 19, 2014) - Ethiopia, the United States and Papua New Guinea are on course to join the leading world initiative to combat corruption in the energy and mining industries. The Oslo-based ExtractiveIndustries Transparency Initiative (EITI) approved their applications on Wednesday, drawing swift criticism from human rights campaigners for admitting Ethiopia. The three now have three years comply with EITIstandards.

Ethiopia has no proven petroleum reserves and a small mining industry driven by potash producers. Rights activists accuse it of political repression. New York-based Human Rights Watch, which had asked the EITI board to reject the East African country's membership bid, said the EITI's reputation had been damaged. "The EITI's decision to admit Ethiopia without insisting on reforms is an affront to the local activists whohave been jailed or exiled for calling for a more transparent, accountable government," Lisa Misol, a senior researcher at HRW, said in a statement.
The Addis Ababa government did not comment on its successful bid. Commercial oil finds in neighboring Kenya have raised hopes of a strike inneighboring Ethiopia. International explorers in Ethiopia include London- listed Tullow Oil and Africa Oil which are drilling along the country's southern border with Kenya. Home to Sub-Saharan Africa's second largestpopulation, Ethiopia is among the continent's fastest growing economies. But the opposition and rights campaigners there accuse the government of stifling dissent and torturing political detainees, allegations the government strongly denies.
"In its discussions, the EITI Board stressed the importance of ensuring civil society engagement in Ethiopia's efforts to comply with the EITI Standard," the group said on its web site. An earlier effort by Ethiopia to join was rebuffed in 2010. At the Oslo meeting Yemen, an exporter of oil and gas and one of the poorest nations in the Middle East, was suspendedas an EITI member. It did not report in time its 2011 income from oil andgas, due to the turmoil of the Arab Spring, Clare Short, EITI chairwoman told Reuters. She said it was encouraged to keep trying to stay in the initiative and meet the rules.
UNITED STATES
United States membership commits its federal government to disclosing all the payments it receives for the exploitation of oil and minerals on federal lands, which would include the money it gets from offshore oil and gas exploration and production. "The U.S. have all sorts of different reporting in their system, which is quite complex. Some is reported at the federal level, some is at state level, and Native Americans ... have different systems," Clare Short, chairwoman of the EITI, told Reuters. "Getting an overview and getting some figures that people can look at andscrutinize ... will help people have better transparency and accountability."Currently energy firms active in the U.S. may break out profits and production by regions of activities, like the Gulf of Mexico.
But they do not break out profits made on federal land in earnings reportsor in filings to the Securities and Exchange Commission. Abroad, U.S.- registered companies are already required to disclose payments made to governments for access to resources. The EITI has stakeholders in the public and private sectors and requires resource companies to disclose payments made to governments and the latter to publish what payments they receive. EITI terms are not legally binding, but member countries that fall short of requirements can be suspended from the process, leadingto political embarrassment. Some 44 nations are EITI members.

Ogaden protesters slam Ethiopia outside Africa parliament in Joburg’

The Ogaden region is located inside Ethiopia but its people are ethnicSomalis and Muslim by religion.

World Bulletin/News Desk

More than 300 members of South Africa's Ogaden community on Tuesdayprotested outside the Pan-African Parliament in Johannesburg to demand that the Ethiopian government halt alleged human rights abuses against their people back home. "We decided to hold this protest outside the Pan-African Parliament because the Ethiopian prime minister is here and we want members of the Pan-African Parliament and heads of state to hear our voices," Mohamed Dahir Adan, chairman of South Africa's Ogaden community and protest organizer, told Anadolu Agency.

Ogaden region is located inside Ethiopia but its people are ethnic Somalisand Muslim by religion. For over 100 years, the region has remained a center of conflict, as Somalis there have fought to secede from Ethiopia and establish their own country. "We're tired of the Ethiopian occupation;we want freedom," one female protestor, who identified herself only as Hawa, told AA.

"The world should hear our cries and help us." The Ethiopian prime minister is currently attending closing ceremonies for the Pan-AfricanParliament's fourth ordinary session, which opened two weeks ago. Established in 2004, the Pan-African Parliament is the African Union's legislative organ, to which each member state contributes five MPs. It aims to ensure the full participation of the African people, along with grassroots organizations, in governance and economic integration. The continental assembly holds two annual plenary sessions – in May and October – while its permanent committees meet in March and August ofeach year.

Abuses: Protesters accused the Ethiopian military of abusing the Ogaden community. "Ethiopian troops frequently come to our area and commit mayhem," Ali Mahad, a member of South Africa's Ogaden community, toldAA. "They kill our people, rape our women and go scot-free. We want justice." Protestors, many carrying Ogaden's traditional flag, were kept some 200meters from the parliament building, but their voices could still be heard as they continued to chant through megaphones. "We want freedom," they shouted as police looked on. "Down, Down Ethiopia." It was not thefirst time for the Ogaden community to stage demonstrations during a visit to South Africa by a high-level Ethiopian official.

In 2012, they interrupted a visit by late Ethiopian prime minister Meles Zenawi by distributing pamphlets describing him as a "dictator." In a 2008report, Human Rights Watch documented "widespread Ethiopian military attacks on civilians and villages that amount to war crimes and crimes against humanity" in Ogaden. The rights watchdog went on to cite severalcommon abuses, including arbitrary detention and torture.

EITI Board members into voting to admit the ruling regime in Ethiopia intothe Club'

Updates (March 19, 2014) Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative (EITI) board review concerning Ethiopia's reapplication for membership in the EITI. The decision to admit the regime in Ethiopia into EITI was a complete fraud done with smoke and mirrors. When the regime's application was rejected in 2010, the reason given was that the board concluded that Ethiopia's 'Proclamation on Charities and Society' would prevent civil society groups from being sufficiently independent and meaningfully participate in the process. The board decided, in effect, not to admit Ethiopia 'until the Proclamation on Charities and Society is no longer in place.' This is the only such instance in the history of EITI wherea country has failed to be admitted and the grounds for this action was clearly rights-based. Was the "Proclamation on Charities and Society" changed to justify admitting Ethiopia now? Of course not. What has changed for civil society in Ethiopia since the year 2010? As a direct resultof the "Proclamation", in 2010, "the number of civil society organizations in Ethiopia was reduced from about 4600 to about 1400 in a period of three months in early 2010. Staff members were reduced by 90% or moreamong many of those organizations that survive. I would rather say the ruling regime in Ethiopia is a riddle wrapped in secrecy inside corruption.

It is comically ironic that the secrecy-obsessed regime recently sought membership in the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative (EITI), aninternational organization dedicated exclusively to promote openness, transparency and accountability in the global mining industry. It is like theproverbial Ethiopian wolf who sought membership among a flock of sheepby wrapping himself in sheep's wool to keep his identity secret," said international jurist prof. Al-Mariam.

Ethiopian maid tries to kill her employer's little daughter'

DIARIES (March 19, 2014) A Filipina housemaid suffered a hand injury after she tried to stop an Ethiopian maid working in the same house in Kuwait from trying to kill her employer's little daughter, newspapers in theGulf emirate reported on Tuesday. The Filipina jumped at the Ethiopian maid when she saw her running towards their employer's seven-year-olddaughter with a knife. Just before she tried to stab the girl, the Filipina reached the maid and pushed her away, prompting the Ethiopian to stabher in the hand.

Newspapers said the Ethiopian maid was arrested while the Filipina was taken to hospital. They gave no other details. An Ethiopian housemaid wascaught on camera smacking a little boy on his head with a wooden object at her employer's house. RURAL ETHIOPIA: Fertilizer debts pester farmers'

DIARIES (March 19, 2014) Opinion gathered from the public and regionalstates by the Ethiopian Government Communication Office revealed that farmers in Oromia, Southern and Amhara regions of Ethiopia have been harassed for not paying back the arrears for the fertilisers they took fromthe government.

"Aged farmers have been detained and abused. They snatch our cattle. Armed government securities and militia also attack and beat the farmers"said the farmers. The lives of five people was lost due to a scuffle betweengovernment security officers who came to snatch the oxen from a famer in Gojjam, Northern Ethiopian and the farmer's family, who refused to surrender their oxen. The farmer, Berihun Fenta, his wife and son along with the two government security officers have died to the fight.

According to the information, last year, to appease the farmers to be voteand be part of the election, the government did not ask farmers to pay fertilizers debts. At least 13 youth from the Oromia region, 57 from the Amhara region and 31 farmers from the Southern Region have respectively fled abandoning their land and cattle. If the situation continues like this, the government will get no votes from the farmers, said the report. Although the ruling EPRDF has began a new scheme of getting farmers to pay taxes, it has decided to suspend it until upcoming election, next year.

HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: State Control over Information andCommunications Technology'

HRW (March 19, 2014) Human Rights Watch is an independent global organization with a presence in more than 90 countries working to promote respect for and adherence to human rights obligations around the world. We have been asked to comment specifically on how surveillance practices under Section 702 affect the rights afforded non-USpersons under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) or any other legal authorities as well as how our analysis may translate into any policy recommendations. We therefore offer the following analysis, which focuses first on the extraterritoriality of USobligations under the ICCPR, then on the right to privacy under the Covenant, and finally on the application of international principles toSection 702.

The death in August 2012 of Ethiopia's powerful prime minister, Meles Zenawi, led to new leadership but seems unlikely to result in tangible human rights reforms. Ethiopian authorities continue to severely restrict freedom of expression, association, and assembly. Thirty journalists and opposition members have been convicted under the country's vague Anti- Terrorism Proclamation, and security forces responded to protests by Muslim communities with excessive force and arbitrary detentions. The Ethiopian government continues to forcibly resettle hundreds of thousandsof rural villagers, including indigenous peoples, as part of its "villagization"program, relocating them through violence and intimidation, and often without essential services.

RESEARCH: Dr. Segenet Kelemu receives L'Oréal-UNESCO For Women inScience Award'

ER (March 19, 2014) Ethiopian scientist is one of the five exceptional women honored for scientific excellence L'Oréal-UNESCO For Women in Science today. Each woman represents a unique career path combining exceptional talent, a deep commitment to her profession and remarkable courage in a field still largely dominated by men. Dr Segenet Kelemu is the Director General of International Center for Insect Physiology and Ecology (ICIPE), Nairobi, Kenya. The first women from her region to attend what was then Ethiopia's only university, Dr. Segenet is being honored for her research on how microorganisms living in symbiosis with forage grasses can improve their capacity to resist disease and adapt to environmental and climate change. Her work is providing new solutions forecologically responsible food crop production, especially by local, small- scale farmers. After having studied in the United States and worked in Colombia, she returned to Africa and is now at the heart of an impressive international scientific research network.

Ethiopians in Kuwait deeply worried'

ESAT News (March 20, 2014) Ethiopian migrant workers in Kuawit are deeply concerned about their safety after the country's lawmakers have supported the deportation of Ethiopian housemaids working in Kuwait after tensions rose following the alleged killing of a daughter of a Kuwaiti official last week by an Ethiopian housemaid. Although her main reason for allegedly committing the killing is not known; those who follow the issue closely say it is "revenge." Ethiopians residing in Kuwait say she committed the murder to revenge "a rape act committed on herself by theson of her employer.'' The deceased was reportedly a daughter of a senior Kuwaiti lawmaker. Although the Kuwaiti government has not officially saidanything so far, lawmakers and some officials are calling for the deportation of Ethiopians from their country. A lady, who claims to be theaunt of the deceased, has slaughtered one of her four Ethiopian housemaids to revenge the blood of her relative, according to a photograph supported information sent by Ethiopians residing there.

The Ethiopians residing in Kuwait said to ESAT that they are not able to leave their houses, and that they could be arrested or revenged if they goout of their residences. They have beseeched the Ethiopian government toimmediately intervene and help relax the current tension. They have called their Ethiopian compatriots in the Diaspora to follow the issue closely. ESAT's attempt to speak with Kuwaiti officials has not been successful.

ASSESMENT: Behind Addis Ababa's Construction Boom'By Daniel Teferra (March 20, 2014)

Up until the fall of the Imperial Regime of Haile Selassie in September, 1974, there was a free market for real estate in Addis Ababa that performed quite well. People were able to buy land and build their dream homes. They were able to own rental property and earn income. The low-income were able to sublet some of their rooms and supplement their meager resources. The supply of housing was fairly adequate and rental prices were reasonable. People maintained their property relatively well.

Homelessness was not widespread. The homeless did not have to sleep onsidewalks--a common practice nowadays--exposed to the brutal cold of the night. They were at least able to shelter themselves inside store verandas and places of worship. Upon taking state power, the Stalinist Regime of Mengistu Hailemariam abolished private property and expropriated all urban land and rental property without compensation.

Tenants were accorded possessory rights over the houses they currently rented without paying any compensation to the landlords. Each householdwas allowed a single dwelling house and a possessory right (not private property right) over land, not exceeding 500 square meters.

The government had the power to retract a possessory right if the land was not utilized for building a house within a specified time period. The government would give only in-kind compensation if it needed a particularland for its own use. The government collected rent on all rental property and use rights over land. Those who had already owned land or business units paid property taxes. The government took over the construction of all office buildings and apartments. The real estate industry became a government monopoly and a separate ministry was created to manage theindustry. A policy of low rent accommodation was put in place.

Soon demand for housing outstripped supply. A critical shortage of housing ensued. At the same time, inflation raised the cost of constructingnew housing and maintaining existing ones. The construction business alone took over 50 percent of the government's total capital outlay. The rental income, collected by the government, went mostly for the huge housing bureaucracy. There was no money left for maintenance and the rental property turned out to be run-down and hazardous as the government continued to consume both the rental income and the capital.Homelessness became a serious problem and urban decay consumed the city.

If there were a free market for housing, the imbalance between demandand supply would be reconciled. For example, as the increase in demandfor housing raises rental prices, existing tenants will economize housing and some tenants and owners will find it profitable to rent out rooms.

More importantly, potential entrepreneurs will have an incentive to invest in real estate and increase the supply of housing. Such increases in supplywill in turn force rental prices down until the shortage disappears.

In May, 1991, when the Regime of Meles Zenawi took state power, it did not privatize land nor did it take itself out of the real estate industry. It did not return the illegally expropriated property to their original owners nor did it pay appropriate compensation. Instead, it auctioned off shopping malls, increased rental prices on storeowners, imposed the valueadded tax (VAT) and introduced a land-lease policy. While all these generated much needed revenue for the government to pay its soldiers and the rest of the bureaucracy, it created a problem of its own.

Because of the government's growing appetite for revenue, entire neighborhoods are being cleared and use right over the land is being auctioned off. The government says that it is transforming Addis Ababa, but residents of the city are not given priority. Instead, they are moved tothe outskirts of the city. The government boasts about building condominiums for the displaced people, but the majority cannot afford them.

In Addis Ababa, there is an unprecedented demand for construction and the government is reaping the benefit of a booming lease market. At thesame time, the people are being displaced and forced into homelessness.This inequity is a direct result of a selfish land law that abolished private property and gave the government land monopoly. Winston Churchill, in one of his rare speeches once said, "Land is a necessity of human existence, which is the original source of all wealth. It differs from all other sources of property. Land monopoly is a perpetual monopoly. It is the mother of all other monopolies. Where land monopoly prevails, the greater is the injury to society the greater the reward to the monopolist. The State would be blameworthy if it were not to endeavor to reform the law and correct the practice." The writer, Daniel Teferra, is Professor ofEconomics, Emeritus

LGBT: Ethiopia proposes to make homosexual acts a non-pardonableoffense'

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (March 20, 2014) — Lawmakers in Ethiopia are expected to pass into law a bill that would make same-sex acts a non- pardonable offense. Ethiopia's Council of Ministers last week endorsed themeasure that would amend the country's Pardon and Amnesty Law that lists homosexuality along other offenses as a non-pardonable.

According to local sources, a vote will be called upon bill in parliament as early as next week, and normally bills endorsed by the Council are passed.The bill aims to curb the president's power to pardon prisoners who committed certain "crimes," including those imprisoned for homosexuality acts. Other offenses included in the list are corruption, human-trafficking, smuggling, rape and terrorism.

Ethiopia's Minister of State Getachew Bedane urged a quick vote. "The decision to include homosexuality in this bill is simply pure ignorance on the part of the government," said one Ethiopian gay rights activist and blogger. "The rest of the world is decriminalizing homosexuality … becauseit is now being realized that sexual orientation is a basic human right too. It's deeply troubling to see Ethiopia opting out of this global consciousness."

In Ethiopia, same-sex acts are illegal and punishable by up to 15 years inprison. Under its anti-advocacy law, charities and nongovernmental organizations that receive more than 10 percent of their funding from abroad are prohibited from participating in activities that advance human rights and the promotion of equality. Collectively, the laws create a dangerous environment for LGBT Ethiopians to be open about their sexualorientation or gender identity.

"Ethiopia has already very harsh anti-LGBT laws, including a 25 year imprisonment for anyone infecting another person with HIV during same-sex acts," said a spokesperson for the advocacy group Rainbow Ethiopia,who could not be identified for fear of his family's safety. "The situation, however, is getting worse as it seems the government is trying to its emulate Nigeria's and Uganda's anti-gay laws," he said.

Land grabbing in Ethiopia – foreign investors and famine'

DW (March 20, 2014) Although one in 10 Ethiopians is going hungry, thegovernment is leasing fertile land to foreign investors.

Deutsche Welle spoke with Essayas Kebede from the Ethiopian government about so-called land grabbing. Farmers cannot own land in Ethiopia, they must lease it. Countries in Asia and the Gulf – such as China, India and Saudi Arabia – have rushed to foreign countries to buy farmland to grow crops for their own people. Food price inflation in recentyears has highlighted the need for greater food security.

Africa has become a prime target, despite concerns about the impact onthe world's poorest people. Locals have nicknamed the practice "land grabbing." Essayas Kebede is the director of the Ethiopian government'sAgricultural Investment Agency and is responsible for the contractual agreements with foreign investors regarding Ethiopian farmland.

Deutsche Welle: Mr. Essayas, Ethiopia is experiencing a severe famine right now. Despite this, you have been tasked by the government to leasehuge swaths of land to foreign companies. Critics have called this irresponsible. Are you acting in bad faith?

Essayas Kebede: Agriculture is the backbone of the Ethiopian economy. Fifteen million hectares of land are being worked by farmers and another15 million are lying fallow. The Ethiopian government's five-year development plan aims to increase the productivity of subsistence farmers, which is why we've turned our attention to commercial agriculture operations that can help our farmers increase their revenues.

The Gambella farm is the size of Luxemburg

Of the 15 million hectares of fallow land that I mentioned, we identified

3.6 million that are suitable for commercial farming. But for that we need investors. They can come from Ethiopia or from abroad, it doesn't matter to us, but we urgently need capital and modern technology to increase ouragricultural sector output. That way we can boost our foreign currency stocks and create jobs.

Are you saying that this policy can help solve Ethiopia's hunger problems?

We have to increase productivity, but we also have to increase the buyingpower of our people. It's the only way they are going to be able to afford food. The sale of goods produced on large farms will bring in desperately needed foreign currency, with which we can introduce modern productionmethods.

Ethiopian farmers are not allowed to own land, rather they lease it. Wouldn't it be better to make life easier for them with microcredits, improved market access and roads than accommodating investors from India and China?

We are in the process now of regulating land ownership questions and have already granted the first land titles. Regarding infrastructure, the government has paved many kilometers of roads and built new ones. Wehave established government offices that support local farmers.

A full 85 percent of our population work as small farmers in rural areas and if we really want to stimulate the economy of our country, we have toimprove the conditions our farmers live and work under. The foreign companies bring technology that helps our own farmers. Investors build bridges, schools and hospitals, and people here benefit from those.

The Indian investors clear Ethiopian land, but who profits?

There are rumors that the Indian Karuturi Global company has leased theGambella farm in the west of the country, which has 300,000 hectares ofland, in order to push up its stock price on the Mumbai stock exchange.

However, most of the farm is still lying fallow. Where is the technology you were talking about, as well as the schools, hospitals and all the jobs?

We signed an agreement with Karuturi and they are working on it. Developing farmland doesn't happen overnight. We want to help investorshave successful relationships with us.

But the success doesn't seem to be happening. You have already threatened to take back 200,000 hectares if there is no significant progress within two years. Something has obviously gone wrong. Howmuch time does Karuturi have?

When the time comes, we will sit down together. The clearing of vegetation takes time and right now, we can't really judge Karuturi's performance. He has two years to cultivate the first 100,000 hectares andthen one year for an additional 50,000.

Karuturi spokesman Birinder Singh call the land deal a "win-win" situation

To increase the food supply in the country, at least part of the harvest hasto be sold on the local market. Was that a stipulation in the contracts withthe big multinationals?

It's not our task to take revenue away from investors. As I said, we wantto increase the purchasing power of our people so that they can afford tobuy corn from Karuturi. If the investors can get a good price here in this country, they will sell here.

Four decades after Ethiopia's first famine, your country is suffering again.Has the government done enough to try to break this vicious circle of hunger and poverty?

There are 1.2 billion people suffering from hunger around the world. It's agrowing, global problem and we are part of a globalized world. If it rains less in Europe, we feel it here. You see, in the 70s we had a population of25 million, today it's 80 million. So hunger is not as widespread as it was then and today our food reserves are higher. In the 70s, the government didn't have the situation under control. The current administration, however, knows what it's doing. In fact, the chances are good that Ethiopia will be able to contribute to the global food supply in the future.We have enough land. (Text ends)

Dispatches: Removing the Bar for Ethiopia'By Leslie Lefkow, HRW (March 21, 2014)

On March 19, the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative (EITI) decided to admit Ethiopia as a candidate country. With this move, the EITImay have added a member, but it lost its credibility as a good governanceinitiative.

Bringing together stakeholders from government, industry and civil society organizations, the EITI is supposed to provide incentives for governments to improve transparency in the oil, gas and mining sectors. One key criterion for membership in the group is that governments commit to meaningful participation for civil society on issues related to natural resources. The EITI Standard instructs that, "government must ensure there are no obstacles to civil society and company participation inthe process," including with regard to "relevant laws, regulations, and administrative rules as well as actual practice in implementation of the EITI."

The logic is simple: publishing data on natural resource issues can only lead to better government decisions if there's real public scrutiny and an opportunity for civic engagement. Ethiopia, however, is one of the most repressive countries in the world when it comes to the ability of independent civil society and media to function. Admitting Ethiopia to EITIisn't just lowering the bar on the need for civil society participation, it's removing the bar entirely.

The EITI decision is all the more disturbing because in 2010 the EITI Board rightly rejected Ethiopia's candidacy. It recognized that a draconian2009 civil society law fundamentally represses civil society in the country,and stated that it would reconsider Ethiopia's application only when the law was "no longer in place." The law prohibits nongovernmental organizations from working in human rights and good governance if they receive more than 10 percent of their funds from abroad. As a result, today there are few organizations working on these issues and those thatdo, self-censor and straddle a knife-edge, always concerned about a potential crackdown. The situation for media freedom is equally dire: Ethiopia has jailed and forced into exile more journalists than anywhere else in Africa, except Eritrea.

Yet, in a complete reversal from its 2010 stance and despite considerable and sometimes bitter debate at a session in Oslo, EITI endorsed Ethiopia'scandidacy.Troublingly, EITI Chair Clare Short claimed that the decision showed "the Board was convinced by the government's commitment to the EITI's principles." But without a change in Ethiopia's law, the EITItself has undermined those principles.

DIARIES: UDJ to call "Day of Vociferation" demo in Addis Ababa'

Local News (March 21, 2014) - The opposition Unity for Democracy and Justice (UDJ) party is to call a vociferation demonstration in Addis Ababa to oppose to the social service problems in Addis Ababa. The fact that roads constructed wityh a large amount money have broken few days after they were inaugurated, lack of alterative roads during construction, lack of public transport, stagnation of work in the city, the dysfunctional state of EthioTelecom, which the government calls a "cash cow", the constant power and water blackout and cuts that has forced children to godistant places to fetch water instead of attending schools are some of the reasons that necessitated the call for a "Day of Vociferation."

UDJ on its press release stated that EPRDF, which is administering the citynow, is responsible for the difficult life that city dwellers are leading and it is incapable of administering the City. The Addis Ababa Council of the Party has said that the "Day of Vociferation" will be held within one month. It has also called the residents of Addis Ababa to come out en masse and voice their opposition against the regime. Ethiopians often complain that they are grappling huge problems of power and water cuts, high cost of living, telecommunication service and network disruptions andsocial issues. The government of EPRDF claims that the economy has beengrowing at 11% pace every year.

Ethiopia bars top opposition leader from traveling to US'

Ethiomedia News (March 22, 2014) ADDIS ABABA - A leading Ethiopian opposition leader was on Friday prevented from traveling to the United States. Yilkal Getnet, chairperson of the rising opposition Semayawi Partywas on his way to attend a US-sponsored Young African Leaders Initiative(YALI) fellowship. Security officials kept Yilkal for more than three hours at the airport during which time he missed his flight.

"Yilkal was told to see a TPLF supervisor by airport crew right before boarding time where he was told he would not be flying. His luggage wasunloaded from the plane and he stayed at the airport for more than 3 hours, thereafter questioned by TPLF agents," a Semayawi Party source said. By 2:00 am, Yilkal, a civil engineer by training, had no option but togo back home.

US President Barack Obama launched YALI in 2010 to support young African leaders as "they spur growth and prosperity, strengthen democratic governance, and enhance peace and security across Africa." Semayawi Party stands out from the crowd for being overwhelmingly youthful. Most members are under 35 years of age, fearless in the face ofpolice brutality. On March 9, the BBC reported that some 100 members of Semayawi party were arrested and some badly beaten because of their protest at a 5k Women's Great Run event. The women, who took part inthe run, used the opportunity to denounce the regime for its high-handedness.

Some of the women were taken out at night for interrogation, and were threatened with guns pointed to their heads. In the absence of any wrongdoing, and the usual court drama, the defiant Semayawi Party members were released last Tuesday. With corruption and poverty rife inthe country, the ruling party remains overwhelmingly resented, and political change is only a matter of forging unity among the leading opposition parties like Andinet, AEUP and Semayawi.

Ethiopia bars top opposition leader from traveling to US - News updates: Semayawi Party Chairman, Eng Yilkal Getnet was prevented from boarding his flight to the United States on Friday, March 21, 2014 at AddisAbaba airport. He was scheduled to fly to the US to attend a Fellowship Program of the Young African Leaders Initiative of the United States State Department. However, Eng. Yilkal was stopped at the airport for questioning by two Tigrigna speaking security agents who took his passport in their hands. They asked him irrelevant questions if he had been in South Africa. He denied he had been there, but they insisted he was there. They kept talking to him and asking him several questions for a long time whilst another agent was searching his bag in a separate roomwithout his presence. They took several picture of him. A couple of hours had gone when an agent approached him after tearing up of a page from the passport. The agent claimed that the passport had a missing page andwas invalid as a travel document. Thus, his luggage was unloaded from the plane. The passport is relatively new, which was issued in November 2013.

HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: In Ethiopia better citizens languishing inprisons'

By Jonas Clinton (March 22, 2014)

As the most educated Ethiopian immigrants migrate to North America looking for economical opportunities, it has been suggested, and most willend up being stalwart of customer service jobs such as driving taxis and ultimately shutter an Ethiopian dream of being useful to their home countries. In Ethiopia, like in North America, where the most inspiring, patriotic and educated citizens are located is not in the important institutions of the country being part of the affairs of the country, but likein North America, in the wrong places, inside the brutal and deadly Kaliti prison.

Early this month, a milestone was reached in Kaliti prison, one of Africa’s worst prisons, as one of its celebrated political prisoners, Reeymot Alemu,marked her 1000th day of being a political prisoner. The award winning journalist of the prestigious UNESCO/Guillermo Cano World Press Prize and the Hellman/Hammett Press Freedom Prize, Reeymot is fast becomingthe face of Ethiopia and how wrong the country's progress and priority hasbeen.

The now 35 year old Alemu, was an English teacher and an occasional journalist when she was noticed by the Ethiopian government. She was one of Ethiopia's eloquent voices in the then rare independent print media

–Feteh – and wrote on government shortcomings and policies. In a country that still views constructive criticism as treason; the paper she wrote for was closed down by government officials and most of its journalists fled the country. Alemu stayed behind and in a bold and daringmove, started her own monthly publication – Change – and focused on long investigative reporting.

As she became a noted voice, the Ethiopian government closed her new publication and charged the young journalist with treason under Ethiopia's2009 Anti-Terrorism Proclamation. The Anti-Terror Proclamation was, according to Amnesty International, is intended to "restrict freedom of expression, peaceful assembly and the right to fair trial with serious implications".

She was tried and convicted in secret with no substantive evidence andwas sent to prison for 14 years and a monetary fine of $1500 – a hefty fine in Ethiopia. The government wanted to use her as an example to surpass other journalists, much like the respected Eskender Nega, and have them endorse government propaganda's instead. Since her arrest,She has been denied due medical care, been confined to darkness and been denied basic necessities of life in anticipation of her sharing information on her former journalist colleagues. She has refused as hersuffering has continued.

Ethiopia has continued to arrest and imprison journalists while embracing its reputation of being an oppressor of press freedom and dissent in Ethiopia. Alemu once reflected how she believes that she "must contributesomething to bring a better future (to Ethiopia)."Since there are a lot of injustices and oppressions in Ethiopia, I must reveal and oppose them in my articles," and that her "principles" is "to stand for the truth, whether itis risky or not." As Ethiopia refuses to acknowledge the brutal treatment of its better citizens such as Nega and Alemu and many other political prisoners – what is fast becoming is the reality that Ethiopia is still a broken system that rewards bad while punishes good as it transitions to a better country in name only.

MINING: Egyptian company discovers largest gold reserve in Ethiopia'

Ethiosports Addis Ababa, Ethiopia – (March 22, 2014) An Egyptian company, Ascom Precious Metals Mining, has discovered what is said to bethe largest gold ore reserve ever discovery in the history of gold exploration in Ethiopia. The discovery is made in the Benishangul Gumuz Regional State, in south- west Ethiopia. Ascom has been prospecting for gold and base metals in the Benishangul region since 2010. Two weeks ago Ascom made a presentation to senior officials of the Ministry of Minesabout the new discovery.

Tolossa Shagi Moti, Minister of Mines, told The Reporter that the ministrywas happy with the discovery. “This is the largest gold discovery ever made in the country,” Tolossa said. According to Tolossa, Ascom Mining will conduct a feasibility study and will start developing the mine. “We hope that the company will conduct the feasibility study and start production after one year,” the minister said. Tolossa said that the ministry will grant large-scale gold mining license to Ascom Mining after the company conducts the feasibility study. The ministry declined to disclose the reserve of gold ore discovered.

“We have been talking about 30 or 40 tons of gold discoveries so far. What Ascom discovered is much more than that,” Tolossa said. Ascom is expected to announce the discovery in the coming few weeks. Gold has become Ethiopia’s major foreign currency earner next to coffee. The country earns more than 600 million dollars from mineral exports and goldcontributes 90 percent of the earning. To date, MIDROC Gold is the only company engaged in large-scale mining. MIDROC annually exports four tons of gold, mainly to Switzerland. MIDROC Gold has discovered a new gold reserve in the Sakaro locality.

PERSONALITY -Who is Valerie Browning?

Valerie Browning is an Australian nurse who's dedicated her life to the Afaris, a tribe of nomads in the northeastern Ethiopian desert. Afaris are among the poorest people in the world, and life for them is a harsh and punishing experience. Valerie Browning, 64, left Sydney for Ethiopia 25 years ago and now runs a local pastoralist association that manages the Australian-run Barbara May Maternity Hospital Her Afari name is, "Malika,"means "Angel".

Valerie grew up in Armidale, NSW and moved to Sydney when she was 17to study nursing at the Royal Alexandra Hospital for Children. Valerie has supported “the underdog” in Ethiopia since the terrible drought and famine of 1973 when as a very young nurse she made a three month commitment, which has become a lifelong vocation. Why? The answer liesin a mixture of passion to right injustice, love of land and people, belief inthe providence of God, and commitment to serve. She has been married to Ishmael, an Afar tribesman, for over twenty years, blending in one family the strengths of Christianity and Islam without compromising either. They have two children Aisha and Rammid and together they live as an extended family with the Afar people in what is often described as the hottest and most inhospitable climate on earth.

That is not how Valerie sees it. She believes she is the privileged one, called to be living with the most hospitable of people, a people who make few demands, but who have suffered much at the hands of others and by the foibles of nature. Valerie lives out her Christianity by serving this nomadic Islamic community amongst whom she is known as Maalika which means ‘Queen’ or ‘Mother’. The initial programme of health and education which she and Ishmael established has now extended to includeenvironmental issues, the capture and storage of water, indeed it has become a holistic programme. Valerie’s philosophy is that one aspect of life cannot be improved without addressing its totality”.
Valerie was awarded an Order of Australia in 1999 for service to international humanitarian aid through promoting health and literacy programs in the horn of Africa. Valerie was also awarded Rotary International’s The One Award in 2012 which recognizes an individual whose extraordinary service activities exemplify the Rotary ideal of Service Above Self. Known as “Maalika” to the Ethiopian people, which means Queen or Mother, Valerie has written a book about her life called Maalika – My life among the Afar nomads of Africa which is available from*Anglican Overseas Aid*

TREASURY: Temples and tombs - in search of Queen of Sheba'
The Star (March 23, 2014) Exciting tales about the Queen of Sheba unfolded at the recent meeting of Gainsborough and District Decorativeand Fine Arts Society. Archaeologist and former British Museum curatorLouise Schofield was the guest speaker and her talk was entitled "Temples, Tombs and Treasurers:

In Search of the Queen of Sheba”.

Isle group member Jillian Horberry said: “Louise presented an exceptionallecture to a very full house of members of the Fine Arts society at the Trinity Centre this month on the legend of the Queen of Sheba.

“Louise works for six months of the year in the north of Ethiopia camping with herexcavating team far away from any infrastructure and she described how easy it was to imagine the Queen arriving on a camel, overseeing slaves and elephants dragging rocks from her mines of gold high on the Gheraltaplateau.

“Where she dug her riches is one of the greatest stories of the Old Testament. “Sheba was undoubtedly a powerful incense-trading kingdomthat prospered through trade with the Roman Empire.” She added: “Almost 3,000 years ago, the ruler of Sheba, which spanned modern-dayEthiopia and Yemen, each side of the Red Sea, arrived in Jerusalem with vast quantities of gold to give to King Solomon. “The Queen’s visit, immortalised in Qur’an and the Bible, is described “with a very great retinue, with camels bearing spices and very much gold and precious stones ... and she gave the king 120 talents of gold.
“Hers is said to be one of the world’s oldest love stories. Legend has it that he wooed her and that descendants of their child, Menelik - son of thewise - became the kings of Abyssinia.” Although little is known about her, the Queen’s image has inspired medieval Christian mystical works, as wellas Dutch, English, Persian, Turkish artists over the years, Handel’s oratorio Solomon and many Hollywood movies.
Mrs Horberry added: “The story told by Louise with her interesting slides is still heard across Africa and Arabia and whether fact or fiction is a veryinfectious one.” The next date for the society is on Thursday April 3 whenElizabeth Gordon will speak on The Viennese Secession - Klimt, Schiele and Otto Wagner, with music by Mahler and Schoenburg.
HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: "They Know Everything We Do" -e-Surveillance in Ethiopia’
Foreign Technology Used to Spy on Ethiopian Opposition inside Country,Abroad’
(AP) A rights group says that Ethiopia’s government regularly listens to and records the phone calls of opposition activists and journalists using equipment provided by foreign technology companies. Human Rights Watch said in a report Friday that the foreign equipment aids the Ethiopian government’s surveillance of perceived political opponents insideand outside the country. The group’s Arvind Ganesan said Ethiopia is using its government-controlled telecom system to silence dissenters. Thegroup says that recorded phone calls with family and friends are often played during abusive interrogations. Human Rights Watch said most of the monitoring technology is provided by the Chinese firm ZTE. Several European companies have also provided equipment, the group said, including from the U.K., Germany and Italy.
News Updates - The 137 page report details the technologies the Ethiopian government has acquired from several countries and uses to facilitate surveillance of perceived political opponents inside the country and among the diaspora. The government’s surveillance practices violate the rights to freedom of expression, association, and access to information. The government's monopoly over all mobile and Internet services through its sole, state-owned telecom operator, Ethio Telecom, facilitates abuse of surveillance powers.

A year ago, the world was rocked by revelations of massive spying by theUnited States National Security Agency. While few in the US worry that the surveillance will result in threats to their lives or their families, that's not true in Ethiopia.

Ethiopia – one of the world's most repressive countries – has virtually unlimited access to its citizens' phone records, thanks to China-made surveillance technology. A new Human Rights Watch report, "They Know Everything We Do': Telecom and Internet Surveillance in Ethiopia, based on more than 100 interviews with victims of abuse and former intelligenceofficials, shows how authorities use access to mobile data and call recordings to harass and arrest people they believe oppose the government. This knowledge is even more disturbing given that torture ofpolitical prisoners happens all too often in Ethiopia's prisons.

Recorded phone calls with family members and friends – particularly thosewith foreign phone numbers—are played during abusive interrogations in which people are often accused of belonging to banned organizations.

Phone networks have been shut down during peaceful protests and protesters' locations have been pinpointed using information from their mobile phones. Intercepted emails and phone calls have been submittedas evidence in trials under the country's flawed anti-terrorism law, although it seems no warrants were obtained to collect this information.(Text ends)

Lawmakers to pass bill that puts homosexuality on list of 'non-pardonable' crimes' Homo-sexuality spreading in Ethiopia in Alarming rate and it's plot

(AP News) ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (March 25, 2014) — Ethiopia's lawmakers are set to pass a bill that puts homosexuality on a list of offenses considered "non-pardonable" under the country's amnesty law, a measure that continues a trend of anti-gay legislation across Africa. The bill, endorsed last week by Ethiopia's Cabinet, is widely expected to pass when lawmakers put it to a vote next week.

Homosexuality is criminalized in 38 African countries, about 70 percent ofthe continent, according to Amnesty International. Uganda and Nigeria have recently strengthened criminal penalties against homosexuals. In Ethiopia, same-sex acts are illegal and punishable by up to 15 years in prison. A 25-year jail term is also prescribed for anyone convicted of infecting another person with HIV during same-sex acts. Ethiopia's president often pardons thousands of prisoners during the Ethiopian New Year. If the bill becomes law, the president will lose his power to pardon prisoners who faced charges ranging from homosexuality to terrorism. Tiruneh Zena, the head of the Ethiopian Human Rights Commission, said apresidential pardon is a privilege and not a right, the reason be believes the bill is not harmful to the lives of homosexuals. "I won't say the proposed law is not a cause of concern but I don't think the law will affect the LGBT community in a serious way," he said. Homosexuality is largely a taboo subject in Ethiopia, ignored even byknown rights groups, but the legislation under consideration suggests anti-gay sentiment may be spreading in this Horn of Africa nation. ZenebuTadesse, Ethiopia's minister for women, children, and youth affairs, was criticized on social media last month for a Twitter post that appeared to slam Uganda for enacting a severe anti-gay law. Shortly after the tweet was published, Zenebu's Twitter account was deleted. She later said the tweet was the work of unidentified hackers, and that she does not hold the views it expressed. An Ethiopian group, the Addis Ababa Administration Youth Forum, says it plans to hold a mass rally in protest against homosexuals in the capital, Addis Ababa. (Text ends)

HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: Ethiopia: Telecom Surveillance Chills Rights -HRW' Foreign Technology Used to Spy on Opposition inside Country, Abroad'

Stifling Freedom of The Press, Jailing Journalists, Jamming andSurveillance of Independent Media - Report compiled by Felix Horne, Ethiopia Researcher

Human Rights Watch (Berlin, March 25, 2014) - The Ethiopian governmentis using foreign technology to bolster its widespread telecom surveillance of opposition activists and journalists both in Ethiopia and abroad, Human Rights Watch said in a report released today. The 100-page report, "'They Know Everything We Do': Telecom and Internet Surveillance in Ethiopia," details the technologies the Ethiopian government has acquired from several countries and uses to facilitate surveillance of perceived political opponents inside the country and among the diaspora. The government's surveillance practices violate the rights to freedom of expression, association, and access to information. The government's monopoly over all mobile and Internet services through its sole, state-owned telecom operator, Ethio Telecom, facilitates abuse of surveillance powers. "The Ethiopian government is using control of its telecom system as a tool to silence dissenting voices," said Arvind Ganesan, business and human rights director at Human Rights Watch. "The foreign firms that are providing products and services that facilitate Ethiopia's illegal surveillanceare risking complicity in rights abuses."

The report draws on more than 100 interviews with victims of abuses andformer intelligence officials in Ethiopia and 10 other countries between September 2012 and February 2014. Because of the government's complete control over the telecom system, Ethiopian security officials have virtually unlimited access to the call records of all telephone users inEthiopia. They regularly and easily record phone calls without any legal process or oversight. Recorded phone calls with family members and friends – particularly those with foreign phone numbers – are often playedduring abusive interrogations in which people who have been arbitrarily detained are accused of belonging to banned organizations. Mobile networks have been shut down during peaceful protests and protesters' locations have been identified using information from their mobile phones.

A former opposition party member told Human Rights Watch: "One day they arrested me and they showed me everything. They showed me a listof all my phone calls and they played a conversation I had with my brother. They arrested me because we talked about politics on the phone.It was the first phone I ever owned, and I thought I could finally talk freely." The government has curtailed access to information by blocking websites that offer any independent or critical analysis of political events in Ethiopia. In-country testing that Human Rights Watch and Citizen Lab, a University of Toronto research center focusing on internet security and rights, carried out in 2013 showed that Ethiopia continues to block websites of opposition groups, media sites, and bloggers. In a country where there is little in the way of an independent media, access to such information is critical.

Ethiopian authorities using mobile surveillance have frequently targeted the ethnic Oromo population. Taped phone calls have been used to compelpeople in custody to confess to being part of banned groups, such as the Oromo Liberation Front, which seeks greater autonomy for the Oromo people, or to provide information about members of these groups.

Intercepted emails and phone calls have been submitted as evidence in trials under the country's flawed anti-terrorism law, without indication thatjudicial warrants were obtained. The authorities have also detained and interrogated people who received calls from phone numbers outside of Ethiopia that may not be in Ethio Telecom databases. As a result, many Ethiopians, particularly in rural areas, are afraid to call or receive phone calls from abroad, a particular problem for a country that has many nationals working in foreign countries.

Most of the technologies used to monitor telecom activity in Ethiopia havebeen provided by the Chinese telecom giant ZTE, which has been in the country since at least 2000 and was its exclusive supplier of telecom equipment from 2006 to 2009. ZTE is a major player in the African and global telecom industry, and continues to have a key role in the development of Ethiopia's fledgling telecom network. ZTE has not responded to Human Rights Watch inquiries about whether it is taking steps to address and prevent human rights abuses linked to unlawful mobile surveillance in Ethiopia.

Several European companies have also provided advanced surveillance technology to Ethiopia, which have been used to target members of the diaspora. Ethiopia appears to have acquired and used United Kingdom andGermany-based Gamma International's FinFisher and Italy-based HackingTeam's Remote Control System. These tools give security and intelligence agencies access to files, information, and activity on the infected target's computer. They can log keystrokes and passwords and turn on a device's webcam and microphone, effectively turning a computer into a listening device.

Ethiopians living in the UK, United States, Norway, and Switzerland are among those known to have been infected with this software, and cases have been brought in the US and UK alleging illegal wiretapping. One Skype conversation gleaned from the computers of infected Ethiopians hasappeared on pro-government websites. Gamma has not responded to Human Rights Watch inquiries as to whether it has any meaningful process in place to restrict the use or sale of these products to governments with poor human rights records. While Hacking Team appliescertain precautions to limit abuse of its products, it has not confirmed whether and how those precautions applied to sales to the Ethiopian government.

"Ethiopia's use of foreign technologies to target opposition members abroad is a deeply troubling example of this unregulated global trade, creating serious risks of abuse," Ganesan said.

"The makers of these tools should take immediate steps to address their misuse; including investigating the use of these tools to target the Ethiopian diaspora and addressing the human rights impact of their Ethiopia operations." Such powerful spyware remains virtually unregulatedat the global level and there are insufficient national controls or limits on their export, Human Rights Watch said. In 2013, rights groups filed a complaint at the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development alleging such technologies had been deployed to target activists in Bahrain, and Citizen Lab has found evidence of use of these tools in over 25 countries. The internationally protected rights to privacy, and freedom of expression, information, and association are enshrined in the Ethiopian constitution. However, Ethiopia either lacks or ignores judicial and legislative mechanisms to protect people from unlawful government surveillance. This danger is made worse by the widespread use of torture and other ill-treatment against political detainees in Ethiopian detention centers. The extent of Ethiopia's use of surveillance technologies may be limited by capacity issues and a lack of trust among key government ministries, Human Rights Watch said. But as capacity increases, Ethiopians may increasingly see far more pervasive unlawful use of mobile and email surveillance.

The government's actual control is exacerbated by the perception among many Ethiopians that government surveillance is omnipresent, resulting inconsiderable self-censorship, with Ethiopians refraining from openly communicating on a variety of topics across telecom networks. Self- censorship is especially common in rural Ethiopia, where mobile phone coverage and access to the Internet is very limited. The main mode of government control is through extensive networks of informants and a grassroots system of surveillance. This rural legacy means that many ruralEthiopians view mobile phones and other telecommunications technologiesas just another tool to monitor them, Human Rights Watch found. “As Ethiopia’s telecom system grows, there is an increasing need to ensure that proper legal protections are followed and that security officials don’t have unfettered access to people’s private communications,” Ganesan said. “Adoption of Internet and mobile technologies should support democracy, facilitating the spread of ideas and opinions and access to information, rather than being used to stifle people’s rights.” Editor’s note: Advanced Surveillance technologies extend the police powers of the state to all its nationals beyond its borders. Consequently, different spywares developed globally have been bought and used to target the computers of certain Ethiopians living abroad.

RAIL TRANSPORT: Train build aiming to pass over costs Ethiopia 6 blnmore'

ESAT News (March 25, 2014) Ethiopia has allocated 34 billion birr to construct the Mekelle – Woldia/Hara Gebeya – Semera-Tadjourah Port Railway Project; the railway line will cost Ethiopia 6 billion more birr ($300,000) in order to pass over the Assab region which is located on theborders of Ethiopia and Eritrea.The Railway Corporation has been forced to do so not to touch the Assab area which the railway line is supposed topass through. This railway project is mainly aimed at exporting the Potash mineral found in the Dallol area, Northern Ethiopia. Yapi Merkezi, a Turkish company, has signed an engineering, procurement and construction contract, with the Ethiopian Railway Corporation to complete the construction of the new line within 42 months. Although Ethiopia is still searching funds for the project, so far a Chinese and a Swiss Bank have promised to offer a loan.

RAIL TRANSPORTATION: Riding the rails in Ethiopia and Kenya'

THE AFRICA REPORT: (March 25, 2014) By Elissa Jobson in Addis Ababaand Marshall Van Valen

At Meskel Square, in the heart of Addis Ababa, traffic is even more chaoticthan usual as cars, buses and pedestrians weave around the 5.5m-high pillars now straddling an eight-lane highway. Confusion reigns too at Mexico Square to the west and Megenagna round-about to the east – evidence that work on the city's light rail transit (LRT) system is progressing at a phenomenal pace.

East Africa is home to a series of promising rail projects, from Kenya's standard gauge line to the railroad linking the Ethiopian capital to the portof Djibouti.

Ethiopia's projects are far more advanced – they benefit from the wholesale support of the government – while Kenya's are lagging behind.

The railway to link South Sudan to the port at Lamu lacks investment, andthe development of the new standard gauge line is bogged down in debates about how the contract was awarded.

In Ethiopia, two twin-track lines will bisect Addis Ababa north to south andeast to west, diving underground along certain sections and, as in Meskel Square, rising up high on elevated tracks.

Trains will run for up to 18 hours per day at intervals of three to six minutes at peak times and will be able to carry a maximum of 60,000passengers per hour.

With journey times from the periphery slashed by up to two-thirds, the LRT has the potential to revolutionise transportation in this fast-growingcity.

"Ground was broken on 31 January 2012 and the first trains are expectedto start running on 1 January 2015," says project manager Behailu Sintayehu, adding that 52% of the construction has been completed so far.

More than 3,000 Ethiopian labourers and engineers, overseen by the maincontractor China Railway Engineering Corporation (CREC), are working in shifts around the clock to meet the ambitious deadline.

Networking the country:

This first phase of the LRT scheme is expected to cost $475m, with 85%of the financing in the form of a loan from China Export-Import Bank.

The Ethiopian government is funding the remainder. A second phase, which will double the length of the track and reach further into the city'ssuburbs, is also planned.

Aside from the Addis Ababa mass transit system, the Ethiopian RailwaysCorporation (ERC) – the body charged with realising the government's bold rail strategy – has also begun construction of a 5,000km network that will criss-cross the country, stretching into almost every area of Ethiopia.

"The main purpose of the national network is to connect Ethiopia economically and increase access for imports and exports," explains Abebe Miheretu, head of information and public relations at the ERC.

The routes will link the country's main productive centres, allowing for theswifter transport of commodities such as sugar, charcoal, potash and coffee, he continues. They will also extend to the borders with Djibouti, Sudan, South Sudan and Kenya.

Henok Assefa, managing partner of Precise Consult International in AddisAbaba, is convinced of the economic benefits of the rail network.

"Part of the poverty that we have in Ethiopia is a direct consequence of the unintegrated nature of the country," he says. "Bringing in the resources from the rural areas for processing is a problem. Part of that istransportation costs being high."

The majority of goods entering and leaving this landlocked country travel by road to and from Djibouti. It is an expensive and time-consuming journey that, according to some manufacturers, can cost up to $4,000 percontainer.

"For a country that is looking to grow richer by light manufacturing, wheremargins are very low, you need to be doing volumes and railways becomea very handy instrument," says Henok.

Ethiopia thinks ahead:

As a result, the ERC's priority is the line from Addis Ababa to the port of Djibouti. The government awarded this contract to CREC and China Civil Engineering Construction Company, and so far around 25% of the project has been completed. The government is using the first phase of construction of both the LRT and the national rail network to build capacityfor domestic industries.

Contractors conduct training for local staff and the Institute of Technologyhas opened at Addis Ababa University specialising in engineering. The government is sending promising undergraduates to Russia, India and China to continue their education. The government hopes that the secondphases of the LRT and rail network projects will be carried out entirely by Ethiopian enterprises, says Abebe.

Amid two parliamentary investigations and a court case against the contract for the standard gauge line that will link Nairobi and Mombasa, Kenya's rail projects have been slow to develop. In November 2013, President Uhuru Kenyatta laid the first stone for the new line, which will compete with the colonial-era narrow gauge line managed by Rift Valley Railways. The company is doubling its number of locomotives this year, but the long-term viability of its concession is now in doubt. China Export-Import Bank has agreed in principle to provide 85% of the finance for the standard gauge line, which estimates put at a cost of $5.3bn.

However, transport principal secretary Nduva Muli told the Public Investments Committee in early February that the cost of the project had not been agreed and the finance deal had not been signed. The first phasewill cover 500km, while the second phase would link the line to the Ugandan capital of Kampala. Work is expected to begin in July of this yearand last four years.

The government started the process of buying up land along the railway'sproposed path in February. The Nairobi government says that the project will be beneficial because it will reduce freight costs from $0.20 per tn/kmto $0.08 per tn/km. In late January, Kenyatta said "the standard-gauge railway must and will go ahead for us to achieve our development agenda," and said that critics are sore losers who lost out on the contract.

China controversy:

The Chinese and Kenyan governments signed a state-to-state contract that includes a provision that China Road and Bridge Corporation (CRBC)will carry out the work. Groups opposed to the deal say that there are noprovisions in the constitution for single-sourced deals like this one and point to the fact that the World Bank banned the company from participating in its bids due to corruption involved with a contract in the Philippines.

Critics also argue that the deal allows CRBC to conduct the feasibility studies, so there is no independent oversight on costs, which they say areinflated and more expensive per kilometre than its Ethiopian counterpart. The authorities say the deal is structured like this becausethe previous government under President Mwai Kibaki had shopped around for financiers and found Beijing to be the only party interested. With China Merchants Holdings having signed a deal with the Tanzanian government in May 2013 to build a port, special economic zoneand railroad network at Bagamoyo, competition in East Africa's transportation and other sectors is heating up.

The Ugandan government has now agreed to build a pipeline through Kenya that could terminate at the new port under construction at Lamu, innorthern Kenya. Both the Kenyan and Ethiopian governments would like to serve as South Sudan's access route to the coast, so being the first across the finishing line is crucial for wooing the Juba government. The ports at Bagamoyo and Mombasa can both attract trade from Rwanda andthe Democratic Republic of Congo, providing East Africa with some of the continent's densest rail networks. (Text ends)

Ethiopian Lawmakers to pass bill that puts homosexuality on listof 'non-pardonable' crimes'

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP News updates) March 25, 2014 — Ethiopia'slawmakers are set to pass a bill that puts homosexuality on a list of

WEMEZEKIR: ETHIOPIA'S - Traffic Police in the 1950s'By Eduardo Byrono (March 25, 2014)

In the early days of Addis Ababa Art Kilo was the only busy road occupiedby cars running from all directions and where traffic officers manly dispatched. It seemed that a bunch of wealthy people who used owned automobiles have lived along that way. Traffic police officers of the 1950swere professionals and executed their duty according to the written law, they take no bribe from no one, so if you do any kind of unnecessary mistake by the road, there is no excuse at all, they will arrest you on the spot then carry you to the police station,but just in case if you try to escape,, remember that automobiles were not running as fast us today plus the traffic officers were fast runners so they will charge at you like a mad dog and hold of you. The traffic police officers of the 1950s were humble obedient, underpaid and barefooted. They lived together around Afencho Ber, they ate 4 times a day and had only one uniform but in theirrespected era, they too have left behind a priceless contribution in Ethiopian society and their story deserves to be told.

CONCERT: The In-Between Space of Meklit Hadero, the music legend -’

Ethiopian music, jazz, and Eighties radio hits find their way onto thesinger-songwriter's second solo album.

EastBay Express By Lee Hildebrand (March 26, 2014)

Meklit Hadero's singing voice has a fast-fluttering vibrato that's reminiscent of a cat's purr. Some have likened it to that of Eartha Kitt, theseductive 1950s chanteuse of "C'est Si Bon" and "Santa Baby" renown. Meklit (who recently stopped using her last name professionally) is flattered by the comparison, but she considers her tone to be more akin tothose of the Ethiopian singers she heard as a child growing up in Brooklyn."I bring an influence of Ethiopia into everything I sing, whether it's in Amharic or English," the 33-year-old Addis Ababa-born singer, guitarist, and songwriter said over a dinner of pizza and gnocchi at a cafe just downthe hill from her Bernal Heights home in San Francisco.

"Another thing is that I'm really interested in expressing multiple tones," she added, naming veteran East Bay jazz and blues singer Faye Carol as one of her "vocal heroes." "She blows my mind every time I see her — notjust her range sonically, but her capacity to express different tones is remarkable," Meklit said. "Another singer who is like that is Lila Downs.

You have to be able to express very different types of sounds, to capturea kind of wide breadth of what you sing about. That's a goal of mine."

Just a month ago, Meklit was performing in Uganda with The Nile Project, a multicultural ensemble of musicians from seven countries in the Nile River Basin. But she had to leave the group's month-long African tour after only two concerts in order to return to San Francisco to do photo andvideo shoots and rehearse with her three-man band for the release of her second solo album, We Are Alive, and a nine-city cross-country tour that stops at the Great American Music Hall on Wednesday.

Meklit's mostly original music — she wrote all but two of the thirteen songs on the new CD — is breathtakingly eclectic. It reflects the influenceof Ethiopian music — which she first heard on cassette after she and her physician parents moved to the United States when she was a year and a half — and Eighties radio favorites Michael Jackson, Prince, Tears for Fears, and U2, as well as early hip-hop, jazz, reggae, and various types ofworld music she was exposed to while studying political science at Yale.

Ethiopia Anti-Gay Bill Expected to Pass Next Week’

LGBT News (March 26, 2014) Ethiopia is joining an increasing number of African countries that are hardening anti-gay laws that affect their gay and lesbian citizens. Last week a bill was endorsed by Ethiopia's Council ofMinisters, making homosexual acts "unpardonable." This bill is expected tobe passed quickly when it is brought to a vote next week.

In Ethiopia, sexual same-gender acts are illegal and punishable with up to 15 years in prison. The jail term is 25 years if someone convicted of this felony also infects another person with HIV. A pardon is granted to thousands of prisoners every year on the Ethiopian New Year. However, if the new law is approved, the president will no longer have the power to carry out these pardons. Ostensibly to derail negative comments, the head of the Ethiopian Human Rights Commission, Mr. Tiruneh Zena, said that a pardon is a privilege, not a right. Therefore he says that passing thebill would not be harmful to gays and lesbians, and he stated that it should not affect the LGBT community in any significant way.

Thirty-eight countries in Africa criminalize homosexuality – approximately70 percent of the continent. Imprisonment for same-sex acts is currently the law in Morocco, Algeria, Libya, Egypt, Senegal, Guinea, Ghana, parts of Nigeria, Cameroon, South Sudan, Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, Zambia, Zimbabwe, and Namibia, as well as Ethiopia. The death penalty for gay acts is the law in Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Sudan, parts of Nigeria, Mauritania, and parts of Somalia. Only Mali, Burkina Faso, Central AfricanRepublic, and South Africa consider homosexual acts legal, and in South Africa, it is in fact legal to marry a same-sex spouse. The other African nations have contradictory laws, for example, in Angola there are laws against discrimination, but people are jailed for homosexual acts.

Anti-gay sentiment and legislation is becoming more prominent throughout Africa. In Ethiopia, homosexuality is not discussed openly – not even by human rights groups. Passing the new bill next week would make the topic more openly discussed and expectations would change in this country within the Horn of Africa. (The Horn of Africa is a peninsula inNorth East Africa that extends hundreds of miles into the Arabian Sea.)Ethiopia's minister for women, children and youth affairs, Zenebu Tadesse, received criticism on social media for a Twitter post attributed toher that denounced Uganda's recent harsh anti-gay law. She responded that her Twitter account had been hacked and the views were not her own. However, immediately after the Tweet was posted, her Twitter account was removed. Mr. Gay World featured two black African men for the first time ever; they were from Namibia and Ethiopia.

On the other side of the coin, just two years ago, Mr. Gay World featured two black African men for the first time ever; they were from Namibia andEthiopia. The purpose of the annual competition is both to champion gay rights and to empower homosexual men. The Ethiopian winner, 24-year- old Robel Hailu, has taken an enormous risk in participating in the South African event. In fact, his family found out about their son's sexual orientation through media reports and has subsequently cut him off completely. While Hailu expected negative reactions, he didn't expect that his family would disown him. He is a student in South Africa and now feelsthat he can never return home. He is fortified by the traumatic situation, however, saying that he now wants to speak out about how painful it is tobe gay in Ethiopia. Dr. Dagmawi Woubshet is Ethiopia's first openly gay Ethiopian professor. He made the list of the ten best professors at Cornell University in New York, where he teaches. His students claim what a fair professor he is, and that, while he gives them difficult questions to ponderin class and through homework, he is dedicated and one of the best professors they have ever had. The Foundation of International Human Rights Law is the human rights statement created through the aforementioned Ethiopian Human RightsCommission. The law speaks of the commitment to human rights in theform of principles, agreements, and domestic law, and includes guaranteed protection for all manner of human rights expressions.

The human rights law expressly states the importance of universal values and the inherent importance of human rights to the entire international community. The law includes fairness, universality, and non-discrimination, applied to everyone, everywhere and always. It speaks of how the entire community belongs to Ethiopia, including African women, men, children, youth, elderly; those living with HIV/AIDS and those with disabilities, both rural and city-dwellers. It continues that, even more thanever before, in a world that faces the threat of divides along racial, economic, and religious lines, these universal principles must be defended: equality, fairness, and justice for all people across all boundaries. It is unclear how the human rights law would work in tandem with the anti-gay bill that imprisons people for same-sex acts without any hope expected of pardon. After next week the country will see the results.(Text ends)

ASSESMENT: Some policy considerations regarding the Ethiopianoutmigration'

By Profs Seid Hassan and Minga Negash (March 27, 2014)

In our December 19, 2013 article entitled "Explaining the Ethiopian outmigration: incentives or constrains" we alerted readers and policy makers in Ethiopia about the push, pull and mediating factors of outmigration in general and outlined the factors as they relate to Ethiopia.In this short article we aim to discuss further the incompatibility between macroeconomic growth and outmigration and close the piece by outlining potential mitigation strategies.

By the end of 2013 and early 2014 the world witnessed yet another shame of Ethiopians. Voices of men, women and children in Saudi Arabia, Lebanon, Libya, Southern Europe and Southern Africa are instantly being transmitted across the globe through the use of advanced information technology. Saudi Arabia alone deported at least 165,000 Ethiopians within the span of few weeks. Demonstrations were held in Kuwait and Israel against African immigrants. The European Union has erected various forms of fences against immigrants from Africa. As Emnet Assefa of *Addis Standa*rd, a journalist in one of the local newspaper noted, "[o]ver the last few years, news of young Ethiopian men and women found dead inside jam-packed containers loaded on heavy duty trucks hasbecome a routine media exercise both locally and in many parts of the continent." Abuses, abductions, disappearances and killings of Ethiopians in the Middle East, North Africa, and Gulf States has become common. OnThursday March 20, 2014 the (U.S. based) National Public Radio (NPR) run a heart-wrenching story of an Ethiopian young woman who took unbelievable levels of risks and investments to reach the shores of the United States. While outmigration is the history of mankind, as indicated in the holy books, for example, modern day migration, particularly migration into the Middle East, is documented to be associated with calamities.

Detentions of Ethiopians for violating the immigration laws of other countries (such as in Kenya, Tanzania, Uganda, Zambia, Zimbabwe), deportations, refugee camps filled with Ethiopians, and sending the remains of Ethiopians who died in their search for better lives and liberty has become routine. Disturbed by the depressing news and the total failure of the Government of Ethiopia (GOE), the Ethiopian diaspora held noisy protest demonstrations in front of the Saudi Arabian and Ethiopian embassies, collected petitions, contributed and donated some funds to theInternational Organization for Migration (IOM) to aid returnees and painfully listened to the information provided by foreign based radios and websites. While these are normal reactions and laudable works, they are nonetheless temporary measures and will not serve as mitigation strategies unless one understands the causes, scale and depth of the problem, and consider a range of possible policy options.

The Horn of Africa has been and continues to be one of the hot spots of major human movements in the world. Civil wars, secessionist conflicts, tribal-clan warfare, famine, land scarcity and evictions, and poverty have been the causes of both internal displacements and cross border migration. At the time of writing this article, tens of thousands of Sudanese refugees are reportedly crossing the border and entering the Ethiopian territory in search of security. The civil wars in North and SouthSudan, tensions and skirmishes in the Eritrean-Ethiopian borders, sectarian and secessionist movements in Somalia and the Ogaden, ethnic,religious and clan tensions, land grabs and repression have been some of the culprits of the migration.

In addition to the instability and government failures in the region, it is important to note that globalization often manifests itself in the form of increased movement of capital, freer movement of goods and services, internationalization of production and investments, and information about labor demand. Hence, outmigration must also be examined in the context of the global trends in the import and export of labor. Immigration magnetcountries generally have labor shortages as in the Middle Eastern countries while exporting countries benefit from remittances. In other words, one might be tempted to ask whether the remittance that a country receives from the export of both skilled and unskilled labor drives a government's policy towards emigration. This question is pertinent to Ethiopia as the country exports both skilled and unskilled labor and its annual earnings from remittances is estimated at about 3 billion dollars, a figure that is more than the revenue it obtains from exporting products. Inaddition, the government has been trying to finance mega projects through the issuance of low interest and high risk diaspora bonds. However, consistent with theory, Ethiopians spend their remittance earnings on consumer goods and alleviating family hardships. Remittance expenditures on consumption goods, particularly imports, therefore, is believed to have played their own roles in exacerbating the high cost of living in the country and widening its trade deficit, in addition to raising the birr's real exchange rate and escalating real estate prices. Anecdotal evidence also shows that a good number of Ethiopian diaspora members are deeply involved in the real estate sector, particularly housing. Using its monopoly power on land, the government has been engaged in evictingentire neighborhoods, including the forced removal of the remains of the dead from grounds that traditionally belonged to the churches, and building roads and auctioning the confiscated lands at artificially inflated prices that are often set through insider trading of information. This is in addition to continuously raising rental prices. The use of remittances in real estate thus could only add fuel to the fire, thereby making housing unaffordable to residents. Anecdotal evidence also shows that remittanceshave played their own roles in fueling corruption and heightening rural and urban land speculation.

Notwithstanding the above, the GoE has been claiming that the country has been enjoying double-digit real economic growth for about one decade. The growth statistics however has been questioned by several economists and as of late even magazines that used to be known for echoing the government's line of story have started to question the validity of the government provided statistic. Secondly, the country is known to have achieved "stability" since 2000, while at the same time neighboring countries such as Sudan and Somalia found themselves embroiled in escalated internal conflicts and with their neighbors. These stories spark a number of important questions. First, given that the country is claimed to be at "peace" with itself and is also a peace-maker inthe Horn of Africa (such as contributing troops in Somalia, Sudan and beyond), and with a “federal multi-party system” in place, why would oneobserve documents and criticisms against the government? Why should the residents of a land with a growing economy and “federal democracy” choose to emigrate en mass? In other words, could outmigration and economic growth move in the same direction or move in different directions or have no association between themselves at all? To answer these questions in the context of Ethiopia, one needs to review the relevant literatu (Text ends)

Ethiopia lashes out at Eritrea, Egypt’

ADDIS ABABA – (March 27, 2014) An Ethiopian foreign ministry spokesman has lashed out at longstanding rival Eritrea, accusing the latterof destabilizing the East Africa region, while also blasting Egypt for the latter's "malicious" media campaign against Ethiopia's multibillion-dollar hydroelectric dam project. "Eritrea's involvement in regional conflicts has been the case for long now," Ambassador Dina Mufti told foreign journalists at a weekly press briefing on Thursday. According to Mufti, Eritrea has played a role in the ongoing conflict in South Sudan. "We havecircumstantial evidence of Eritrea's involvement [in the South Sudan crisis]," the spokesman said. Tensions between Addis Ababa and Asmara have persisted since a bloody two-year border war – in which tens of thousands were killed – ended in 2000.

As for the row with Egypt over the Nile dam, Mufti said Cairo had launcheda media campaign aimed at turning international opinion against the dam project. "The project is a regional project," he said. "The project will not hurt the interest of Egypt. Rather, it benefits Egypt and other countries of the region." Egypt's alleged media campaign, according to Mufti, "won't bein the interest of Egypt and [in the interest of] the people of Egypt." Egypt, he added, had walked out of a tripartite committee with Ethiopia and Sudan that had been formed to assess the dam's potential impact.

Subsequent efforts to bring Egypt back to the tripartite negotiations, saidMufti, had failed to bear fruit.

WITNESS: Ethiopia under TPLF/EPRDF rule & The price of masssurveillance’

SomalilandSun (March 28, 2014) - “Ethiopia’s government is deploying cutting-edge cyber and phone surveillance technologies from China and other nations to conduct widespread spying aimed at suppressing political dissent, according to a new report. Using modern technology from Chinesetelecom giant ZTE, Ethiopia’s state telecom company has spent the last five years meshing that gear with additional spy software from European suppliers to create government surveillance tools spanning social media, phone, and Internet communications,” reported the Christian Science Monitor, quoting the Human Right Watch report.

Recorded phone calls with family members and friends – particularly thosewith foreign phone numbers—are played during abusive interrogations in which people are often accused of belonging to banned organizations.

Phone networks have been shut down during peaceful protests and protesters' locations have been pinpointed using information from their mobile phones. Intercepted emails and phone calls have been submittedas evidence in trials under the country's flawed anti-terrorism law, although it seems no warrants were obtained to collect this information.

Spyware developed by British, German, and Italian companies has also been used to target Ethiopians living abroad. Once a person's computer isinfected by such spyware, security and intelligence agencies have nearly unfettered access to files, information, and activity on the target's computer. They can log keystrokes and passwords and turn on a device'swebcam and the microphone, effectively turning a computer into a listening device. This software, used to target Ethiopians living in the United Kingdom, the United States, Norway and Switzerland, has been used to capture Skype conversations that have appeared on pro- government websites.

This spyware can cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. Ethiopia is an impoverished country with chronic food shortages, and received over $4 billion in development assistance in 2013 alone. Efforts should be directedat improving the rights of its population, not at using the latest technologyto undermine those rights. Some one can afraid his/her call will be traced.The security officials had printed out the emails but couldn't read other languages like native Afan-Oromo language and what was written. The fact that the e-mails came from an Arab country might have been enough for the security personnels. The officials also used Facebook activity as evidence against anyone who had been caught posting any anti- government article about the Muslim protests in Ethiopia.

After two successive totalitarian regimes, starting in 1974 with the militaryjunta and then with the baton of repression and surveillance picked up by TPLF/EPRDF in 1991, the people of Ethiopia still continue to struggle toward their long-awaited freedom. The difference between the military regime and TPLF/EPRDF are cosmetic, not substantial. The notorious Makelawi prison and all prison dungeons used by the military regime are still used by this regime. In fact, the number of prisons in Ethiopia has considerably increased under this regime. Obviously, the military regime garnered support from USSR and Eastern Block to advance its repression and state violence. On the other hand, TPLF/EPRDF won the support of China and western powers who claim to stand for democracy and freedom. The support of the western nations to the TPLF/EPRDF regime has baffled the Ethiopian people, confirming their suspension about the hypocrisy and moral inconsistency of the western powers.

In the end, the structures of violence will be dismantled and the structuresof political and economic justice will be built. The question is not if, but when because freedom and justice has the last word. As history tells us, totalitarian regimes that demand their legitimacy by constituting security surveillance network to keep an eye on the public are brought down by the same public they thought they had a total control over. Fear has a shelf life because the people' yearning for freedom and justice overrides the wall of fear. We have witnessed in East Germany citizens breaking down the physical and psychological barrier to claim their freedom. More recently, people of the Arab world rose up to dismantle structures of oppression. This is indeed a testament to the unflinching desire to be free,which is more powerful than the structures of the security and surveillancestate. (Text ends)

RELIGION: EOTC to Open Church in West African state of Ghana'

GHANA WEB (March 28, 2014) - Ethiopia Orthodox Tewahedo Church (EOTC) will take firm roots in Ghana with the establishment of a branch ofthe church in Ghana after the acceptance of a fact-finding report that recommends that it is apt to have the church in the country. When approval is given, a priest and a monk will be sent to the country to take charge of the liturgy and spiritual needs of the community of a deacon, baptised and non-baptised members of the church.

In an interview with Public Agenda, KesTesfa Michael, a priest of the Ethiopia Tewahedo Orthodox Church who came to the country to undertake the fact-finding, said, barring any unforeseen circumstances, the report that he would submit to the Archbishop of the Continent of Africa, AbunaYacob, would lead to the setting up of the Ghana branch of the church. Kes Michael was sent to the country by Archbishop of the Diocese of England, Abuna Enthons. "The prospects look good for the formal establishment of the church in Ghana. There are many people who really need the church here," Kes Michael said, before departing to Londonon March 19, 2014 after a two-week stay in the country.

He said copies of his report would be given to the Secretary of the Arch- diocese of the Continent of Africa and it would be discussed at a meeting of the Holy Senate of the church before a final decision would be taken whether to set up or not to establish a branch of the church. He said whenit is approved that a branch be set up, the next step is for the Christian Council of Ghana and AmdeTsion, an elder of the church whose untiring efforts resulted in the fact-finding mission, to be contacted to prepare the grounds for the founding of a branch.

By then, a Mahiba, a group of members and potential members of the church which study the Bible and take care of their social needs, and an appropriate building for liturgical services would have been put in place fora priest and a monk to come and live in the country. During his visit, Kes

Michael conferred with Rev. DrKwabenaOpuniFrimpong, the Secretary- General of the Christian Council and other clergy; met with members ofthe Ethiopia World Federation and Rastafarians; and held services with members of the church. He also featured on several Accra-based radio stations to explain the theology, philosophy and doctrine of the church.

One of the few pre-colonial Christian churches in Sub-Saharan Africa, the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church has a membership of between 40 and 45 million people, the majority of whom live in Ethiopia. Thus, it is thelargest of all the Oriental Orthodox churches. The church is a founding member of the World Council of Churches. Tewahedo is a Ge'ez word which means'being made one' or 'unified.' The word refers to the Oriental Orthodox belief in the single unified Nature of Christos (Christ). That is the belief that a complete, natural union of the Divine and Human Natures of Christ into one is self-evident in order to accomplish the divine salvation of humankind. This tenet is opposed to the 'two Natures of Christ' belief (unmixed, but inseparable Divine and Human Natures, called the Hypostatic Union) which is held by the Roman Catholic Church and Eastern Orthodox churches. RELIGION: Nationwide Muslim Protests Continue’Ethiomedia ADDIS ABABA (March 28, 2014) Ethiopian Muslims held nationwide protests that they began when the government arrested noted Muslim leaders in 2012. Characterized by theirstrictly non-violent protests, the Muslims confined their call for justice to their mosques. One of the largest protests was also held at the Grand Answar Mosque in the Ethiopian capital.

As part of government intimidation and surveillance, a cameraman working for the state-owned ETV was video-recording the activities of thepeaceful protests from the rooftop of a building on the premises of the mosque. The dysfunctional regime of Hailemariam Desalegn thrives on a wide network of spies as well as arrests, beatings, arrests as well as extra-judical killings to remain in power.

In late 2011, Ethiopia’s government began interfering with the rights of the country’s Muslim minority by meddling in the activities of the SupremeCouncil of Islamic Affairs. In response, hundreds of thousands of Ethiopia’s Muslims, who make up about 40 to 45 percent of the population, took to the streets in protest.

WEMEZEKIR: Colonel John C. Robinson - Father of Ethiopian Airlines'

The Reporter (Addis Ababa) By Andrew Laurence (March 29, 2014)

But few would compare to the courageous and heroic deeds of the AfricanAmerican aviation pioneer Colonel John Charles Robinson, not to be confused with the other African American pilot in Ethiopia named Hubert Julian the "Black Eagle."

Recruited by Emperor Haileselassie I to lead his Royal Air Force in 1934 against an imminent fascist attack by Benito Mussolini, Col. Robinson, nick-named the "Brown Condor" stood up when the entire world failed totake action. He valiantly flew dangerous missions to transport men, supplies and the Emperor himself in the face of fierce resistance from Italian fighter pilots.

Invited back to Ethiopia after Italy was ousted, Robinson brought pilots and technicians from the US to help reorganize aviation in Ethiopia and train the pilots that would serve in the Imperial Ethiopian Air Force and future commercial airlines. He also later established the successful American Institute school for elementary and secondary students in AddisAbaba. Not only was John Robinson an Ethiopian war hero but he is also considered the "Father of the Tuskegee Airmen" of WWII fame.

Although the earliest planes and pilots in Ethiopia in the 1920's were fromEurope, led by the Frenchman Andre Maillet, by the dawn of the Italian invasion most had left never to return to Ethiopia. More publicly lauded than Robinson, was the much advertised Swedish pilot Count Gustav von Rosen, whose country supplied lots of money and resources to Ethiopia, though he only served as a captain under Col. Robinson.

Some people point to the management services provided by Trans World Airlines (TWA) as the origin for Ethiopian Airlines. Actually, it was Sultan Airways, Ltd. and later East African Airlines that Robinson formed in 1946,by royal appointment of Prince Makonnen Haileselassie, that became Ethiopian Airlines with the agreement of TWA. One of Robinson's early recruits, Major General Abera Woldemariam, would become chief of the modern Imperial Ethiopian Air Force.

It wasn't until 1957 that the first Ethiopian commercial aircraft commander, Alemayehu Abebe, made his solo flight as captain on DC-3/C-47 aircraft. Ethiopian Airlines would go on to become one of the world's most outstanding airlines held in high esteem as the pride of Ethiopia. Thanks to two well researched books that have recently comeout Col. John Robinson's place in Ethiopian and United States aviation history will finally receive the proper historical recognition it deserves.

Born in Carabelle, Florida in 1903, and growing up in racially segregated Gulfport Mississippi, the young John Robinson was intrigued one day whenhe saw his first airplane flying along the gulf coast. Any desire he had to ever be able to fly a plane would have been a fantasy at the time.

Even though aviation was in its infancy and certainly not available to African Americans, John Robinson never gave up his dream of flying. Aftergraduating from Tuskegee Institute in Alabama with an automotive engineering degree, he moved to Chicago and quickly set up an auto repair garage.

Rejected from the prestigious Curtiss-Wright Aeronautical School in Chicago because of his race, he decided to pick up valuable information while working there as a part-time janitor. In no time Robinson was able to build his own plane and was immediately admitted to the school that injust two years made him an instructor.

Not satisfied, Robinson established the first Black owned and operated Department of Commerce accredited airfield, located just outside Chicago.He would go on to create three aero clubs for blacks interested in aviationand eventually a non-segregated aeronautical school, among whose graduates where the first pilots of the Chinese Air Force.

With all that was going on in Chicago, Robinson traveled to Tuskegee Institute in hopes of establishing an aviation program at his alma mater.His trip ignited a spark that in just a few years Tuskegee was included inthe US Army's program to train pilots for World War II.

The famous Tuskegee Airmen would go on to extraordinary success providing air escort for US bombing missions over Germany, Italy and other Axis Powers. With all these activities, Robinson had no idea how hislife would turn upside down in the coming years.

It was Dr. Melaku Bayen, a relative of Emperor Haileselassie, a Howard University graduate and the first medical doctor trained in the US, who recruited John Robinson to head up an air force on orders from the Emperor. There was a strategic effort by the Emperor to limit the numberof Europeans in key positions.

It would be very difficult for John Robinson to leave his wife, forgo his teaching and business interests in Chicago, and head off to Ethiopia on animprobable mission. Robinson had been reading much about the threat offascism in the world and more recently Italy's plans for Ethiopia.

In a spirit of pan-Africanism, he accepted his assignment and after settlinghis affairs in Chicago, embarked for Ethiopia. Although many thousands ofAfrican Americans had signed up to fight for Ethiopia, only Robinson was able to evade the sanction against Americans fighting against a non- enemy of the US, by securing a business visa to sell airplanes.

Upon his arrival, and after accepting his commission from the Emperor ascolonel of the Royal Air Force, Robinson went about refurbishing the few existing planes that he would need to use against the impending Italian attack. His ability to build a plane from the ground up impressed the Ethiopian recruits as they learned from him in all areas of aviation.

In no time, Col. Robinson was called on to carry instructions, manpower,supplies and even the Emperor in hazardous conditions to front line commanders from Addis Ababa to Adwa. He was eye-witness to the numerous horrendous gas bombings carried out by the Italians on innocent civilians.

Constantly chased by the Italian war planes, he often managed to escape into the clouds where Italian pilots were afraid they may run into one of the many tall mountains in Ethiopia. Robinson was took enemy fire often and was injured but was never shot down. When Italy's overwhelming modern forces took Ethiopia's capital Addis Ababa, Robinson continued hisfight in the US spreading the word about the atrocities committed by Italyagainst Ethiopia.

After Italy was expelled from Ethiopia in 1941 with the assistance of British, African and Ethiopian troops, Col. Robinson returned to Ethiopia.He brought along with him other African American technicians and pilotsrecruited by then Ethiopian Minister of Finance Yima Deressa and set about building the infrastructure for the future Imperial Air Force.

At that time Mischa Babitchev, the half Russian, half Ethiopian director ofair transport for the Ethiopian government who had served in Robinson's air force would serve as Ambassador to Russia. With Emperor Haileselassie's appointment and blessings, Robinson would replace his oldfriend as head of the Imperial Ethiopian Air Force regaining his former commission and rank of colonel.

He proceeded to train some eighty pilots in the flight training school he opened with Prince Makonnen, many of which would go on to take positions in the civilian commercial sector. While most historical timelines for Ethiopian Airlines begin in 1947, when US aircrew and technicians fromTWA were hired to operate and manage the new airline, it was Col.

Robinson's training and leadership at East African Airlines that secured asolid foundation for the future of aviation in Ethiopia.

So forgotten is the legacy of John Robinson that even after spending adecade in Ethiopian aviation, and sadly dying in Ethiopia in a plane accident on a mission to deliver blood, the grave where he is buried in Gullele Cemetery can no longer be found, nor any monument or commemoration left in the country.

Emperor Haileselassie visited Robinson's death bed and thanked him for all he gave to Ethiopia. At his funeral, then lieutenant, and later, Director General of the Civil Aviation Board and President of Ethiopia, Girma Woldegiorgis gave a very moving eulogy in front of Prince Makonnen, theUS ambassador, numerous pilots and other dignitaries, but today there isnothing.

Why so little is ever mentioned about Robinson I will leave to the conscious of the historians. I humbly propose that a statue to Colonel John C. Robinson be commissioned and placed in a conspicuous location atthe Bole International Airport in Addis Ababa. That is the very least one can do as a fitting tribute for this Ethiopian war hero and African Americanaviation pioneer.

ETHIOPIA: Undeniable facts & stats (as of March-2014) Ethiopia is among the 10 poorest countries in the world in 2013

In elections in May-2010 won by the ruling party 547 out of 556 seats inthe National Assembly. EU observers criticized the election for not beingfair.

The regime is perceived as the most corrupt government with a very lowCorruption Perception Index of 33% (Transparency International, 2013)

Approximately every fourth Ethiopian has a cell phone, but only 1.5 to 2 per-cent of the population has access to internet ..The Economic Freedomrating for Ethiopia is 49.4% (Global Financial, 2013)

The country has one of the lowest Human Development Index (0.396)ranking 173rd in the world (UNDP, 2013)

88.6% of the population lives in poverty with the highest multidimensionalpoverty index (MPI) of 0.562 (Oxford Poverty & Human Development Initiative, 2011). The current ruling party has not only established a singleparty oligarchical dictatorship, but also has monopolized the economy. Themuch touted and distorted economic growth it is advertising to the donor world is benefiting only a small sector of the ruling elite and its cronies while impoverishing millions of Ethiopians. According to the 2012 report ofthe African Center for Economic Transformation (ACET), Ethiopia is in the rank of the last four countries in Africa (Rwanda, Burundi, Burkina Faso, and Niger) with the lowest production diversification, export competitiveness, productivity improvement, and human economic well- being. The government's land ownership and attending policies have created unparalleled rural destitution and environmental catastrophe. Ethiopia hasremained one of the poorest countries on the globe. It is a cruel joke, butsadly true, that Ethiopia has to pay the amount of more than four US dollars ($4.00) a day for every inhabitant of Djibouti for port use, while the majority of the close to one hundred million Ethiopians live on less than one dollar ($1.00) a day! WEALTH: Ethiopia is robbed by government and party officials throughcorruption'

GOEH (March, 2014) - Ethiopia has currently faced serious economical crises. At this time, economical activity of the country has been damaged heavily compared to the previous times. Instead, some of the officials have been prospered by wealth of the country. It was said that the economic growth of the country has reached 11% which was very far fromthe reality. This was due to the artificial data generated by false reports ofthe lower officials. Thanks to Tigrayan Peoples`Liberation Front(TPLF) /Ethiopian Peoples` Democratic Republic Front (EPRDF), Ethiopia remains one of the world`s poorest countries. Corruption has Played a huge role inhindering the development our country .Economy of Ethiopia will not develop until the corrupt and illegal practices of the current one-party regime`s monopoly end. There are studies conducted by different organizations as evidence for this problem. OXFAM was studying about nations`s food supplement for their people in the 125 countries; accourding to their study, Ethiopia stood 4th from the last. In addtion, a study done by a research institute called Economic Intelligence Unity revealed the 10 countries with the highest economic growth in the world. Ethiopia is of out the list of these countries; this study is in contrary to thereport of the ruling parties. At this time the fabricated and false data of the regime is exposed to the world with other evidences too. The invasive corrupt practices of many of the companies owned and operated by the TPLF that dominates the ruling coalition government of the EPRDF remainsbeing ignored knowingly or unknowingly by any of responsible bodies eveninternationally.

The Oakland Institute press release(July 17,2013) warned the international community on the dangers of ignorant in creating this illegalmonopoly of business that provides the Ethiopian regime development aid amounting to "an average of $3.5 billion a year, equivalent to 50 to 60% of Ethiopia`s national budget". Companies under the Endowment Fund forfor the Rehabilitation of Tigray, known as EFFORT, alone account for roughly half of the country`s modern economy", according to an IPS report titled "Examining the Depths of Ethiopia`s Corruption." A World Bank 2012 report on Ethiopia reinforces the same, saying that "High-levelcorruption is widespread within the construction sector, and that it is dominated by the ruling party affiliated companies." The UNDP commissioned Global Financial Integrity Report revealed that approximately US$197 billion flowed out of the 48 poorest developing countries and into mainly developed countries, on a net basis over the period 1990-2008. The report ranked Ethiopia among the top ten worst countries out of the forty-eight.

Surprisingly, there are high number of buildings in different capital cities of the country which are privately owned by members of the ruling party. Fertile lands of the farmers are sold with cheap price for Indian and Saudi Arabia investors after paying incentives for the higher officials. Most of thebudget of the country which is gained by credit is robbed by higher officials through corruption due to lack of transparence and accountability.The commercial activity of the country slowing down from time to time. Due to this, the country faces shortage of currency, as a result people have lost their trust in the banks especially in the private ones. The price of imported goods has increased with alarming rate and in unaffordable manner. progress of projects has decresed and some are forced to be stopped due to lack of budget. The higher officials become unresponsive for those questions which are forwarded by Investors. The main causes ofall these problems are involvement of members of the ruling party in to corruption and lack of accountability of each and every of the officials at each stage, flow of the dollars to abroad by black market and putting money at home due to lack of trust with the current situation. In general,the ruling party has misused its state power and expenditure of foreign aid to lead the market of the country through its companies. Illegal robbing of land and public resources, corruption, illicit capital leakage will put the next generation at high risk or other uncertain consequences. Oneof the pseudo-measures taken by the government includes implementing a law called an Assets and Property Registration Law in march 2010 as part of its anti-corruption efforts. The law requires that government officials and their relatives register their assests and properties and is aimed at reducing the prevalence of corruption in the country, but, they have done nothing yet. To make their mistake, TPLF has tried to arrest some high profile people including ministers and businessmen using the "anti-corruption law". In reality, this law is applied to jail and fine those individuals who have opposite ideology to the ruling party.

Due to lack of trust to the law of the country, all of the people especially those who are known merchants and learnt people are forced to leave thecountry unwillingly. All of these problems will result in poor economic development of the country, instability of the people and later on civil warwill happen between regions. As a solution, the current regime should deliver the power for those who have capacity to adminster the country.

In addition, the global business community as well as donors to Ethiopia can contribute by coming alongside Ethiopians in the push for meaningful reforms. Such reforms would include greater transparency and an openingup of economic space to the private sector, without which growth and development will never be realized. Strong measures should be taken from the international community, donors and international investors in confronting official corruption in Ethiopia to be able to establish economic growth, democracy and justice in Ethiopia, we Ethiopians should avoid TPLF either by peace or force. ETHIOPIA: GOSSIP - Fine Line: Political Leaders in Ethiopia'

Addis Fortune (Addis Ababa) - Political leaders in Ethiopia rarely have issues that spill over and involve personalities from the wider region, gossip claims. This appears to have changed, however, when it comes to aformer TPLF veteran fighter, gossip disclosed.

Mulugeta Guebrehiwot, aka Chaltu, is a tall and charismatic man, whose intelligence and reputation for getting things done is admired by those who knew him during his time in the field, and ever since, gossip observed. His last involvement with the government and the TPLF was with the Commission for the Reintegration of Ex-Servicemen, Veterans & War-Disabled Persons, which was in effect designed for the demobilisationof 300,000 former soldiers, gossip recalls.

Serving in this capacity for eight years, he resigned in 2002, following thepolitical crises and splits within the TPLF, recalls gossip. However, he wasin the league of Tsadikan G. Tensay (Lt. Gen), Yemane Kidane, aka Jamaica, and Abebe Teklehaimanot (Maj. Gen.), aka Jobie - all whom leftthe government without becoming part of the splinter group back in the early 2000s, according to gossip.

Like some of his comrades, Mulugeta went back to college and did his postgraduate studies in public administration at Harvard Kennedy School and an MBA at the Open University of London, gossip disclosed. He was hired first by Salim A. Salim and joined IGAD before he was hired by the Addis Abeba University, under the presidency of Andreas Eshetie (PhD), to serveas director of its newly established Institute for Peace & Security Studies (IPSS), according to gossip.

Yet, the IPSS proved to be the most high profile of the units under the University, financed solely by the European Union with close to eight million euros, gossip disclosed. Paying the Director 2,000 dollars a month

- an amount which sounds a lot by local standards, but not compared to what the UN pays its staff - IPSS has a nine-member advisory board chaired by Olusengun Obasanjo, former president of Nigeria, and includesother former heads of state, such as Thabo Mbeki of South Africa and Pierre Buyoya of Burundi, gossip disclosed.

The Institute has a flagship annual event - the "Tana High Level Forum" - a platform that helps heads of state, particularly from the region, congregate in Bahir Dar to discuss various elements affecting peace and security on the continent, gossip disclosed. With the strong links Mulugetahas established with the African Union (AU) since 2010, the last such Forum was conducted in April 2013, in the presence of Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, as well as presidents Omar Hassen Al-Bashir of Sudan, Paul Kagame of Rwanda and Hassan Sheikh Mohamud of Somalia.

In the run up to its third forum, scheduled for the last week of April this year, the University's President, Admasu Tsegaye (PhD), decided to shift gears, replacing Mulugeta with a much younger person, lacking in experience, gossip disclosed. Many at the gossip corridors smell politics inthe removal of Mulugeta from an institute he helped to establish, claims gossip.

First he received a call from Admasu, advising him of the decision to advertise the position and advising him to apply, claims gossip. Mulugetaturned the invitation down, but the incident created grumblings among influential members within the TPLF constituency, gossip disclosed.

Neither was there anyone who has applied for the position, gossip disclosed. Nonetheless, no one could have stopped his eventual removal,as it is clear there are powerful interests behind his sudden removal, claims gossip.

The field of studies on peace and security is a rather competitive sphere, as donors are generous in their support, gossip observed. There is the continent's highly regarded Peace and Security Studies - based in South Africa, but with an office in Addis; and the Ethiopian International Institutefor Peace & Development, under the directorship of Sebhat Nega, which has been around the corner for several years, gossip observed. An addition to the game is a new organisation established by Seyoum Mesfin,Ethiopia's ambassador to China, whose outfit is generously supported by eight countries, including Norway and the very country that hosts him, China, gossip disclosed.

Among those displeased with Admasu's decision are Obasango and Mbeki,for they were not advised of the change of guard in an institute where they have attached their reputation, gossip disclosed. While Obasango voiced his disappointment to Hailemariam, the government is sure to hearagain from the former heads of state, and soon, claims gossip. (Text ends)

Ruling party in Ethiopia inaugurates the anti-Minilik Anole Statue’

DIARIES (March 30, 2014) - The ruling party in Ethiopia, prepares to inaugurate the controversial anti-Emperor Menelik statue in southern Ethiopia that depicts a cut-off woman breast. The gruesome statue wasbuilt at the cost of ETB 20 million.

The unveiling of a new statue in Oromia of the Arsi Zone, Hitosa Wereda named Anole Statue and Museum that came with the report the ugly contraption seems to be sitting in the middle of acacia forest and depicts acut off human hand with a cut off what we are told to be depiction of a female breast resting on the palm stretched to the sky. The Museum is there to explain the reason for the erection of such a strong and ugly visual in such a serene place. This incident is a TPLF victory. It is a hate message aimed at the Amhara and all of Ethiopia’s children. It is a sad day to be Amhara or Oromo. It is definitely a crazy and disturbed person that would come up with such diabolic idea. It is totally gullible and clueless individuals that would give life to such ugly thought.

Such attempt to separate Minilik from the Amhara is definitely out of thisworld logic. The issue here is more than history. It is about today. How could a party in charge resort to fanning the flames of hate and intolerance and solve the daily problems faced by our people? We are in the middle of a mass migration of our youth, there is talk of impending food shortage, the inflation is double digits, do the esteemed leaders of OPDO believe that putting up such an offensive statue that would injure many of their citizens a priority? How does one justify spending twenty million dollars to weave a fairy tale just to promote hate, says a commentator.

Oromo’s conquered Amhara, Amhara’s conquered Tigrai and Oromo, todaythe Tigrai’s are in the process of digesting conquered Amhara, Oromo and the rest of Ethiopia we always seem to forget about. Should every Kilil go out on a statue building binge with Amharas recounting the Oromos Conquer of Gondar, with Tigrais reliving Amhara domination, Christians lamenting the expansion of Muslims and burning of Churches and Monasteries and so on. Where does this lead us to?

Today thousands of our Oromo people are running from the hell created by TPLF as an architect and OPDO, ANDM, SEPDM and other opportunists as running dogs. There are thousands of Oromos in TPLF prisons, thousands are walking to all parts of Africa, thousands of our young girls are in servitude in the Middle East and the puppet OPDO true to its naturechoose to build a monument to create hate between children of the same mother. Does that sound to be the responsible and grown up thing to do? Does that add a spoonful of nutrition to our starving and destitute people?Asks the analyst.

OPDO: Waste Arguing About Menelik II To Spend Millions on Monument?

THE BLESSING AND THE CONDEMNING:: Anole Statue is a hand carryingmutilated breast based on a fictious story.

PERSPECTIVE: The politicization on to the erected Anole Statue has sunk to a new low lately. It has taken a dangerous, ugly turn in the building of a provocative, hate-mongering “statue” in Arsi by OPDO (Oromo) extremists. A likeness of a woman’s breast placed in a hand, the bizarre monument might be supposed to have been intended to memorialize imagined victims of atrocities involving the cutting off of women’s breasts,allegedly by soldiers of Emperor Menelik. There is no documentation of such events or victims, and the tasteless sculpture is really an attempt to score cheap propaganda points against the Emperor and all that he stood for as a great Ethiopian leader. More significantly, the weird statue is probably intended to promote hatred within the Oromo community towardEthiopian nationhood, of which the community is an inseparable central part. In erecting the grossly offensive structure, OPDO ethnocrats and cadres likely had the agreement, even encouragement, of their Woyane overlords, who are keenly interested in fabricating resentment, tension and conflict between Oromos and Amharas as part of their overall divide- and-rule scheme.

Prominent historian, and former FDRE president Dr. Gidada Solon once quoted as saying, “I do know that there are Oromo individuals who do say“ non-Oromos or those who do not speak Afan Oromo, have no rights.

They are second citizens.” I have expressed already that I am against such people. This brings me back to the OPDO “Gimgama” of 1989. OPDOwas then confronted with serious problems of human rights violation, corruption and anti-democratic Oromo nationalism. We evaluated the leadership, the cadres and members of OPDO under the motto “Clean OPDO from OLF attitude (anti-democratic/ narrow) and Naftagna (please note that Naftagna is not equal to Amhara) practices (violation of democratic and human rights including corruption). The result of the “Gimgama” was that thousands were found out to have anti-democratic attitudes and carried out Naftagna practices. 189 cadres were imprisonedso that they are brought to justice because of high corruption and serioushuman rights violationስ . Thousands were expelled because of their bad attitudes and bad practices. Only about 300 were kept after receiving warnings”

«Among these were Alemayehu Atomsa and Muktar Kadir. Anyway, whatwas going on then was really very sad. Non-Oromo Ethiopian investors and traders were not welcome. Documents for bids for land were leaked out to Oromos so that they could win against non Oromo (for example against the 7 rich Gurage in Jimma). Shops were closed down. Boards to guide people were written only [in] Qube (no Amharic and English translation). Appeal documents written in Amharic were rejected. Schoolsrefused to give lessons in Amharic. (With silly arguments “we were formally forced to learn in Amharic, now it is their turn to be forced to learn in Afan Oromo.) We will not pay money for Amharic teachers and books”). Unfortunately, I hear that the attitude and practice still lingers.»Dr. Negasso writes in his final analysis.

It has to be recalled that the Arsi Oromos resistance finally broke down bythe Menelik II armies during the last campaigns between September to December of 1886, and the region then fell on to the hands of Menelik armies led by Ras Dargie. In the final analysis it was the firearms of the invaders which won them the contest. It was only after considerable loss of life on both sides and then Arsi was finally annexed by the King Menelikarmies led by Ras Dargie whos deployed many thousands armied equipped with up-to-date firearms …. According to historians, in one battlealone (on 6 September, 1886) over 12, 000 warriors were killed on both sides.

HERITAGE: Fasiledes Bath Restoration to be completed before the end ofthe year’

(March 31, 2010) The restoration and rehabilitation of Fasiledes Bath located within the World Heritage site of the Fasil Gebi complex in the town of Gondar, located 770 km northwest of Addis Ababa is nearing completion with the financial assistance of Norway. The Norwegian Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) and the Government of the Republic of Ethiopia signed an agreement on 12th of December 2001 for the Rehabilitation and Restoration of the Bath with the objectives of the physical restoration of the structure to its authentic form, documentationof the heritage site’s history, restoration of records and drawings and theestablishment of a sustainable relationship between national and international professional institutions.

The structure includes a three storied bathing palace with battlemented walls and a square tower standing in a sunken bathing place (53mX28m)surrounded by a masonry wall that encompasses a considerable area. Assome outstanding work to accomplish the full restoration remained, the Embassy decided late last year to commit approximately 1.800,000.- birrfor the completion of the physical restoration of the Bath within October 2010..

Ashenafi Gizaw, Programme Officer visited the site 25-27 March and metregional officials of the Culture and Tourism Bureau and was able to observe that after the purchase of additional inputs, work on the finalisation of the restoration started two weeks ago and it is realistic to conclude that it will finish within the planned time. Mohamouda Ahmed Gaas State Minister for Culture and Tourism of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia was in Gondar during the same time for a workshopon cultural diversity and was given a tour of the restoration work. He expressed his pleasure with the progress and urged all involved to keep up the good work.

Ethiopian government figure says no worries about Eritrean oppositions ifEritrea forms'

ESAT News (April 2, 2014) - Getachew Reda, who was the Director General of the Public Diplomacy and Communications Directorate of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs before his current appointment as the Press andPublicity State Minister at the Office of the Prime Minister, said the Ethiopian government does not have any problem if the Eritrean government changes its positions and comes to peaceful deal with us as the Eritrean opposition are under our armpits and we have no worries.

He said if the Eritrean regime wants to form with us, we will have no chip on our shoulder against them. Getachew said armed Eritrean opposition forces are not taking actions because the Eritrean Defence Force is heavilyentrenched around the borders. Getachew said the reports that Ethiopia teaches 20,000 Eritrean refugees is an exaggeration, the number is not more than 1800. These students could not be a security risk as they have started their studies after proper vetting, he added.

The Minister said the hopeless Ethiopian youth is more risky to security than the Eritrean refugees and tracking these youth will clear the securityrisk, he said. Although the Ethiopian people have not prospered, we havecreated a zeal for prosperity which has succeeded in diverting its attention, Getachew said. Asked about the Djibouti port, Getachew said "as the families of the Djibouti's leaders share the rent money we pay forthe port, we have no fear that Djibouti will deny us access to the port."

E-espionage: How Ethiopia Spies on Its Diaspora Abroad? -Wall StreetJournal'

WSJ (April 2, 2014) - Inside Ethiopia, the ruling-EPRDF government abuses mobile and Internet networks to monitor opposition groups and journalists, and to silence dissenting voices. Using Chinese-made telecomequipment, the Ethiopian security agencies have nearly unfettered accessto civilians' phone records and recorded calls. Taped calls have been played back to people being interrogated by security officials and used against them in trials under the government's deeply flawed antiterrorismlaw.

For mobile or Internet users in Ethiopia, the violation of the right to privacy is not an abstract harm. Thousands of Ethiopians have fled threatsto their lives and security, and many have found asylum in Europe. Now Ethiopian spy agencies are trying to silence any independent criticism of government policy by extending their reach abroad, with the aid of advanced surveillance tools designed and sold by several European companies. These tools give intelligence officials access to files, emails and activity on a target's computer. They can log keystrokes and passwords and remotely turn on a device's webcam and microphone— effectively turning a computer into a listening device.

In December, 2014, the 41 member states participating in the WassenaarArrangement—a multilateral export-control regime for dual-use technologies—agreed to regulate the export of "intrusion software" and "IP network surveillance systems." This development signals growing consensus that the trade in powerful surveillance tools being used to violate rights should be reined in. But much more is needed. The European Commission should lead efforts to regulate the export of such technology to governments with poor human rights records, and to implement the new Wassenaar controls without delay. ETHIOPIA: GEO-POLITICS - Interesting facts and figures’

Ethiopia is a strategically important country playing major roles in the Northeast African region because of its location, its size, its resources, itshistorical position, and its basic political orientations.

It should be noted that the Horn of Africa (or Northeast Africa) is really as much a part of the Middle East as it is of Africa. Consequently, Ethiopia has been directly or indirectly connected with the crises that have long characterized the Middle East and the Mediterranean world for most part of its history. The Ethiopian highlands catch most of the rain fall -- earningthe country the label, “the Water Tower of Africa”. In fact, Ethiopia provides over 86 percent of the Nile waters. Further, it has half the population of the so-called Inter-Governmental Authority on Development (IGAD) countries, consisting of Djibouti, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia,South Sudan, Sudan and Uganda. Before the mid-70s, Ethiopia had playeda critical role in providing a base to the West for intelligence gathering, because of its location and topography, at the peak of the Cold War.

As documented by Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, and eventhe US State Department Country Reports over the last 15 years, Ethiopiaranks very low in terms freedom and respect for human rights of the people. Furthermore, Ethiopia under this ethnic-based minority government is characterized as one of the wretched poorest and the lowest in any meaningful measure of economic and human development.Few examples:

Sudan is happy after the regime handed parts of Gondar land: as the central component of the ruling EPRDF party since it took over power theTPLF has always been uneasy because of its anti-Ethiopian nature and rules by doubting. The only way for it to survive is by giving more concessions to outsiders that is detrimental to Ethiopia.

The fertile farm lands around the western border of Ethiopia are being ceded to the Sudan in exchange for cooperation between the two dictatorial regimes not to allow Ethiopian opposition forces to operate in and thru Sudan. Large swath of farm lands in South and Southwestern parts of Ethiopia are leased at dirt cheap fee to foreign agricultural conglomerates such as Saudi Star of Saudi Arabia and Karuturi from India.This is done with forceful and inhumane removal and displacement of localpeople who have lived on their ancestral lands for generations.

As economic hardship become intolerable in the country, food riots and other forms of spontaneous urban resistance are also likely to emerge. AsTerry Lyons warns, unexpected, impromptu uprisings are possible if grievances mount; and high rates of inflation that have made it difficult for the urban middle class to feed their families may provide this kind of aspark.

Despite being one of the oldest nations in the world that withstood many external threats, Ethiopia is threatened now by many latent challenges tosurvive as a nation and a country. These challenges are both internal andexternal, and they often reinforce each other. Today, Ethiopia is unable toestablish a state that safeguards the rights of its people and the sovereignty of the country, as well as a political system that the majority of the population considers legitimate, and hence supports and is willing to defend. Ethiopia to allow mass anti-gay protests to alert society to 'homosexualagenda'

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (April 2, 2014) — Addis Ababa's municipality on Tuesday approved a mass anti-gay protest to be held in Ethiopia's capitaland throughout the country later this month, according to the Ethiopian Reporter.

The Addis Ababa Youth Forum (AAYF), a group linked to the ruling party inEthiopia, in collaboration with Weyneye Abune Teklehaimanot (WAT), an Ethiopian Orthodox Church association, will hold a protest "Against Foreign Culture and Homosexuality" on the 26 April beginning from 8 to 11 am. The organizers stated that the aim of the protest is to alert the government and society to the "severity" of the "homosexual agenda" in the country, so that existing anti-gay laws can be tightened. Government officials would join the protests and carry similar demonstrations throughout the country, the report stated. Addis Ababa municipality officers are also planning to provide anti-LGBT seminars to youth across the capital to provide "awareness" on "the dangers posed tochildren by homosexuality."

The linkage of LGBT issues to pedophilia has recently been stepped up inEthiopia's press, which frequently publishes interviews with Evangelical anti-gay preacher, Dr. Antonious Seyoum. Daniel Berhane of the Horn Affairs blog says the recent anti-LGBT measures and "gay-bashing rhetoric" are in preparation to "the run up to the election next year." In Ethiopia, same-sex acts are illegal and punishable by up to 15 years in prison.

In addition, under its anti-terrorism law anyone who states what the government deems terrorism (which can include human rights criticism) can be imprisoned for 20 years, without a warrant. Lawmakers in Ethiopiaare expected to pass into law a bill that would make same-sex acts a non-pardonable offense. (Text ends)

ETHIOPOLITICS: Why does EPRDF negotiate with the rebel ONLF?

By Gorse Ismail (April 4, 2014) - In 1984, Ziad Barre formed Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) after the military man massacred 80 commanders of West Somali Liberation Front (WSLF). Zaid had taken the move to set up ONLF to expand its hegemony in Horn of Africa; however,it has not only dashed

Somali nationalism, but fomented lasting mistrust among Somalis in the republic of Somalia. This has been one of the reasons that Somalia would not have had a government in the last twentyyears.

The eleven higher executive members of ONLF were not born in Ethiopia, but in Somalia. The chairman of ONLF, Admiral Mohamed Osman was the head of Marine in Somalia under the leadership of dictator regime of Zaid Barre. He does not have a clue about Ethiopian politics. On the contrary, the only one who was a native of Ethiopian Origin, Dr. Dolal was killed twoyears ago when he questioned genuinely ONLF to be the sole representative of all Somalis in Somali Region.

Dr. Dolal argued that we, Ogadeni, are one clan and we had seen what the clan politics had inherited to the Somalis nation; why do we ignore themajority of Somali people in Somali Region and pressed to reform ONLF tobe morphed to WSLF. Ironically, he was captured in Somali Region while he was negotiating with WSLF. It was secretly the leaked information of ONLF to the current president of Somali Region that masterminded his killing which was against international law, to execute a captured leader of rebel without due process.

In 1977, WSLF had refused the regime of Mogadishu to intervene in their business where the front had liberated ninety percent of its lands from thesoldiers of Mengestu Haile Mariam who were killing left and right the innocent Somalis in Somali Region. The current Ambassador of Ethiopia inEgypt, Mohamud Dirrer, was the highest member of WSLF at the time.

In the summer of June 1977, the tanks and airplanes of the regime of Zaid Barre had violated the territorial integrity of Ethiopia so that he couldextrapolate its internal crisis and beating the drum of nationalism to elongate its power.

Additionally, the distorted rumor that EPRP had consented with WSLF to endorse the separation of Somali Region was fabricated by the two dictators that had been overthrown as result of demise of cold war. On thecontrary, EPRP and WSLF had agreed how to build democratic republic of Ethiopia whereby all Ethiopian regardless of its origin will be treated on anequal footing without the secessionist and settlers ideologies that were hovering on the country.

Further, EPRDF/TPLF has championed that all nations and nationalities should be given the right place when the organization made a contract social in 1991 that culminated with the classical constitution of 1994 that introduced such as article 39 that allows any nation to organize along the line of its culture, linguistics, historic and other social factors and would goits own way in case it decides its future.

Many scholars of Horn of Africa puzzled that EPRDF took this bold and brave move that was historically one of its kind in Africa, but why on earthdoes it negotiating with ONLF that was formed by a junta and represents one clan, ogadeni and neglects the majority of Somali in Somali Region such as Issa, Issaq, Gurgura, Hawiye, Gadabursi and the list will go on and on.

The simple answer is that EPRDF wants to stay in power without implementing the constitution genuinely and put the third largest population, Somalis in Ethiopia in Partner (Aggar) category that issurrogated misnomer to undermine Somalis, Gambelas, Afar and Benshugal.

To put in historical and ideological perspective, EPRDF/TPLF should know that the clan makes up of Somali politic. In other word, one has to comprehend that Somali identity is traditionally rooted in paternal descentmeticulously memorialized in genealogies that determine each individual'sexact place in society. At the apieces of this structure are the "clan- families" with their quasi-mythic lineages harkening back to the family of the Prophet Muhammad.

In modern times, the advent of instantaneous mass communications has,ironically, rendered these traditional divisions an even more significant factor in Somali national politics, as it has enabled both geographically separated members of the same groups, including those in the far-flungdiaspora, to interact with each other and organize themselves to pursuecommon political objectives. This is a result of the underlying power structures within Somali society.

The unity of the larger group, as well as the clans and sub-clans into which these relationships are divided, is founded not only on shared ancestry, but also a formal political contract, known as xeer, between its members. British anthropologist I.M. Lewis, arguably the foremost living authority on Somali history and culture, has observed that "the vital importance of this grouping, in an environment in which the pressure of population on sparse environmental resources are acute, and where fighting over access to water and pasture is common, can hardly be overemphasized" since it is upon his sub-group, and "potentially on widercircles of clansmen within his clan-family, that the individual ultimately depends for the security of his person and property."

EPRDF should address the issues of Somali Region while she would groundin its historical, political, economic and social context if it wants a lasting peace, prosperity and sustainable development that have been booming inother regions of Ethiopia. (Text ends)

CONFLICT: Clashes between Borana and Guji Communities'

Ethiomedia By Anonymous (April 5, 2014) - Though it was not expressed in violent nature, internal dispute has been currently rattling relationships between Borana and Guji Oromo clans in Guji zone of Oromia regional state. The level of disagreements has been intensified in 2014 which led toappeal and grievances Borana elders have presented to various authoritiesat federal and regional government including the incumbent prime minster, his Excellency Hailemariam Desalegn and the key figures from Oromia office of the president. Altogether Borana elders have been accusing the zonal administration of deteriorating poor governance, discriminatory practices, injustice, inequality and mistreatment against Borana community. On behalf of Borana community the elders have madetheir case around 4 major issues including the erasing of the original name of Negelle Borana town and conspiracy of replacing it with Nagelle obscuring Borana term, the tacit concession of Ogoba area that has been part and the parcel of Liben district to the newly formed Deka district through the muscle of the zonal administrator that became evident when Borana community living in Ogoba were forcefully kicked out of the emerging town while communities from Somali region were allowed to exclusively inhabit the area at the cost of the former without the recognition of the federal government, unfair representation and demotionof Borana community in zonal and Woreda level offices and key posts regardless of their qualification and experiences and the act of zonal administration for inciting the divide of the societal bond of Borana community by openly sponsoring the so called Oromo Wayyu movement.

The regional government has been sending different teams at least twice to Guji zone creating a platform for open discussion among Borana, Guji, Arsi and other ethnic groups living in Negelle Borana and adjacent districts. At the occasions all the ethnic groups have clearly stated their view points around the current status of governance system in the zone, ethnic relationships, and existing disputes and demanded the regional government to resolve the increasing tension before the outbreak of violent actions. However the pace of decision making process at regional government level has been extremely slow, unclear, lacked transparency and impetus of accountability and commitment. The people were desperate of inaction by the Oromia regional government. Despite the factthat the Oromia region made decision instructing the zonal administrator to reinstate the status quo including the naming of Nagelle Borana the latter was reportedly found reluctant to make any move just to appease his own clan groups against the vested interest of Borana community.

Overall it looks the game is between the ruling Guji elites and the ruled and politically powerless Borana community. Instead of calming down thetension the zonal administrator reshuffled the cabinets at zonal and district levels using the tactics of further undermining the representation of Borana community and disengaging them from key posts for strategic decision making. This has aggravated the resentment of Borana community.

Proximate cause of the conflict: The violent dispute between Borana and Guji Oromo clans started on March 25, 2014 after the members of Guji community beaten and tortured one individual belonging to Borana community while he was traveling to Ardoti PA, 11 kilometers North West of Negelle Borana town for routine private business. The victim was allegedly considered spying against the members of Guji community as the tension was escalating. The Borana community members made an effort to rescue the victim and tried to approach the members of the de facto ruling class and got aggressive response that led to small scale exchange of fires. On the 26th of March 2014 an all-out conflict broke out between the stated clan groups resulting into loss of lives, massive displacement of human and livestock population and burning of houses and other valuable assets belonging to both communities. The initial battles took place at two fronts including Lagagula and Daka kala peasant associations (PAs). According to local sources 28 people were dead in the first day of the fighting. In particular while the fighting was on-going at multiple and sporadic fronts the armed members of Guji community torched and enflamed huge number of deserted houses and valuable assets in Lagagula PA at the outskirts of Negelle Borana town. The smoky blaze was visible in surrounding areas of Negelle Borana town. The town residents have been surprisingly watching the scene and outraged at the reluctance of government to send out military forces to control the dispute at early stage. The 27th of March, 2014 has marked the 2nd day of the fierce fighting at multiple fronts without apparent government interventionthrough both political and military means. The sites of the clashes included Allu, Mugayo, Adadi Bokol and Ardoti. Virtually all the battles were confronted inside the territories inhabited by Borana community & other minority groups such as Garri and Arsi. Reportedly more than 35 people have lost their lives at the aforementioned battle fronts and dozensof wounded people were admitted into Negelle Borana hospital.

Specifically 4, 13, 8 and 10 bodies were recovered at Allu, Mugayo, AdadiBokola and Ardoti battle grounds respectively. The total number of the people who sustained wounds was difficult to establish. Any concerned person or institution can obtain the related information from Negelle Borana hospital and Harkello health center provided there is willingness oflocal government to disclose it.

Discriminatory practices Committed in handling the Victims and relatives'

While the victims belonging to Borana community were taken to the hospital by human labor that of Guji community were transported by 4 vehicles of which the ambulance of Liben district and the rest deployed byWadera and Goro Dola districts were among others. In the meantime the relatives who were attempting to drive out of Negelle Borana to collect thewounded people even using private motorbikes were strictly barred from doing so. Therefore the rescue effort made to save the lives of wounded individuals belonging to Borana & other minorities was aborted due to biased and discriminatory administrative actions. In responding to the conflict the zonal administration has misused government asset and health facilities to serve its own clan while the wounded Borana people admitted to the hospital were rapidly discharged before their normal recovery to create ample space for its own groups. Differential treatment demonstrated by the zonal administration between warring parties was commonplace as even the existing ambulances and government vehicles were deployed only to serve Guji clan members.. Worse to mention Borana and other urban dwellers who were trying to visit their beloved ones at the stated hospital were chased away without dignity and under worst scenarios were harshly beaten by security forces.

The Socio-economic Impact of the Conflict: This conflict erupted at the peak of the planting season locally referred to as ganna rainfall. Ganna rain contributes to more than 80 percent of annual crop production in semi-arid areas of Liben and Goro Dola districts. Thousands of people were displaced from conflict prone areas of the stated districts. With such massive displacement under on-going fighting the opportunities for crop cultivation is missing. Obviously the stated districts are characterized withfood insecurity and significant proportion of the population used to dependon relief handout. With such conflict-induced disorder led to massive displacement, loss of homes through retaliatory burning in the form of tit-for-tat, immediate return of the affected population to their original residences is significantly undermined. Around 80 houses in Lagagula PA were burnt up. Stock of seeds kept for cultivation, farm implements and other valuable assets were burnt as well. The general scene is agonizing with chilly weather amid the heavy showers especially for elderly, womenand children evicted. Provision of food, water, clothing medication and temporary shelter appears to be the top priority while peacemaking, reconciliation and rehabilitation programs can be identified as intermediate and long-term initiatives required.

Challenge of media based Conflict attribution trend: Without any doubt this conflict is attributed to lack of good governance, discriminatory practices and incapability of the zonal level officials who were appointed by the merits of ethnicity rather than by track records of individual achievement. To provide some highlight the recent mayors were recruitedand imported from Bore district the homeland of the zonal administrator to Negelle Borana regardless of their capability while the natives were sidelined to be considered for such post merely because of their blood ties. Disagreement on the access and utilization of grazing land and waterpoints is often cited as one of the key factors leading to violent conflicts inpastoral areas from the trend of government controlled mass media. No claims and counter claims of the grazing land and water points were madebetween the two stated hostile groups. Therefore it is quite important to defend the unfounded attribution of this particular conflict to pastureland and water. With the above stated facts, realities and viewpoints we want to call upon relevant government officials to identify the root and immediate causes of this conflict and take measures without partisanship.

ATHLETICS: Kenenisa Bekele wins Paris Marathon’

AFP PARIS (April 6, 2014) - Ethiopia's legendary runner Kenenisa Bekele notched up another impressive milestone in an already glittering career bywinning the Paris Marathon on Sunday, his first attempt at the gruelling event. The 31-year-old 5,000m and 10,000m world record crossed the line in an event record time of 2hr 5min 04secs after negotiating a sunbathed course of 42.195km (26.22 miles) through the streets of the French capital. The previous Paris record was held by Kenya's Stanley Wiwott who clocked 2hr 05:10 in 2012.

Fellow Ethiopian Limenih Getachew came home second at 2hr 06.49secs with Luka Kanda of Kenya, the 2012 Rome winner, claiming the final spot on the podium crossing the line in 2hr 08.02. "It was my first marathon and I didn't have much experience," said Bekele, the triple Olympic champion. "It was very tough but it was the time I expected. After 25km Ipushed alone but it was very tough." added "Now, I know the marathon, Ican run faster than that but I have to prepare even more. I'm sure I can run a better time than that. I still have time in my career to do better but I am satisfied." Bekele emulated his great compatriot Haile Gebrselassie who also made a successful step from the track to marathon and has the third fastest time in history. Bekele made his move with about 25km to run and opened up a lead that may have been even more significant hadhe not struggled with what appeared to be a hamstring problem. "The hamstring wasn't good after 25km. It was cramping but it's ok. I'll feel itmore in the morning," explained Bekele. He missed out on the world record which is held by Kenyan Wilson Kipsang who set a mark of 2hr 3min 23secs in 2013 at Berlin. "At 5km from the finish, my hamstring cramped up again and I couldn't accelerate. I think in the future, I'll do better but it's very positive."

"Yes, the world record is a possibility and a possibility if I can prepare fora longer time. For this marathon, I only had three months of training andthat is not enough. "After the 5000 and 10,000m, you have to train differently and longer to adapt to the change of rhythm. I am sure for mysecond marathon, I will do better and can perhaps attack the world record. "Now, Im going to return a bit to the track, the 10,000m, run a few times and after I will decide what I'm going to do. I think there's a good possibility that I'll run another marathon in the autumn.

In the women's race, Kenya's Flomena Cheyech dominated proceedings, winning in a time of 2hr 22:44secs as she turned in a confident showing with Ethiopia's Yebrgual Melese second at 2hr 26:21. A second Ethiopian,Ahmed Zemzem claimed third spot in 2hr 29.35. "I'm very happy, the course was good," said a delighted Cheyech. "I wasn't that fast but in themiddle of the race, I felt confident and just told myself to keep running," she added.

The victory for five-time world champion Bekele, who dominated the 5,000m and 10,000m for the best part of a decade, caps a stunning comeback from a debilitating calf injury which kept him out of competitionfor nearly three years. Last September, he defeated Gebrselassie and his track rival Mo Farah in his comeback race at the Great North run in England –- his half marathon debut -– outkicking Farah in a sprint for the line. Britain's Mo Farah, who emulated Bekele when he won Olympic 5,000m and 10,000m gold at the 2012 London Games, makes his own marathon debut in London next week, but Bekele has opted not to go head to head with him in the English capital. "Of course I'm going to watch the London marathon because I love to watch other races, marathon or not. I'm a marathon runner now," concluded Bekele.

Independent Magazine “Ebony” in Ethiopia Shut Down’

News Analysis (April 7, 2014) - One of the few independent Ethiopianmagazines, “Ebony”, has been shut down after 6 years of publishing, putting many full-time and part-time workers out of a job. Tessema Dessalgn, the shear holder and editor in chief of the magazine, told tojournalists today that they had closed the magazine because of exaggerated tax.

“We hadn’t other option but to shut down the magazine” Tessema told to journalists. “The tax was so exaggerated, and impossible to us to manage.We didn’t have even the half of the requested amount”, he explained.

Tessema said that the tax had come while they had already been in aserious financial fall caused by the alarmingly rising cost of paper andother printing materials.

Ebony was one of the magazines circulated at national level, and knownfor its political, social, and entertainment stories. It began operating 6 years ago focusing only on entertainment. It exclusively began coveringpolitical issues in 2012.

Different reports shows the magazine was targeted by authorities after itbegan to cover political issues. Frequently, the copies of the magazine were confiscated by the authorities. Moreover, it had faced several challenges from printing companies; they were not voluntary to print themagazine claiming that they had been informed by the regime’s securityagents not to print the magazine.

Journalists working for Ebony were also the main target of the authorities.They used to be subjected to harassment, humiliation, and other serious violence as a result of their job. For instance, the former Editor in Chief ofthe Magazine, Bisrat Woldemichael, was kidnapped and beaten by 4 armed intelligent and security agents on 28 August, 2013.

Exaggerated Taxation, the new Strategy - The cost of paper and other printing materials are sky rocket in Ethiopia, dramatically increasing the printing price. Printing companies and publishers blame government for the problem. They claim that the price is artificial, and has been blown upbecause of the exaggerated tariff the government impose on paper and other printing materials.

The exaggerated printing price is not the only challenge the independent publications are facing in Ethiopia. The government imposes exaggerated tax too on them. For instance, in a recent case, 143,000 ETB was imposedon a local newspaper, Ethio-Mihidar. The amount is equivalent to its annual gross revenue.

The alarmingly increasing printing price and exaggerated tax are seriouslysmashing the independent private publications in Ethiopia. It is paralysingthem causing them to serious economic crisis, and is forcing the weak ones to get out of the market.

"… Ethiopia shall stretch forth her hands … !"

Anonimous: (April 8, 2014) - These words are from the biblical Psalm 68:31 and seem to reflect the modern global rise of a Pan-African vision offreedom. After the success of Ethiopia against colonial rule, some began to think of forming a United States of Africa. Others broadened their political views to include black societies throughout the world, as well asmembers of the African diaspora. A racial Pan-Africanism began to growaround the globe.

Ethiopia, as an idea of black solidarity, did indeed stretch forth her hands.Pan-African conferences were called in America and England during the early 1900s. Ethiopia grew in esteem among the global community upon her admittance to the League of Nations in 1923. This also thwarted any future movement by Europeans to colonize the nation, and shattered the centuries old negative myths that Africans were no better than "savages."The victory at Adwa helped produce a new phase of Pan-Africanism. It planted the seed of unity and cooperation of blacks throughout the world.It helped to break the yoke of colonialism in a united way. The African- American abolitionist, Frederick Douglass, summed up the forces unleashed by the victory at Adwa, and could have used his famous quote to fit the Ethiopian struggle: "It's better to die free, than live as a slave."

Defiant Dessie Fired Up for Change’

Says No to EPRDF Dictatorship, Brutality, Corruption and Pestilence!

Ethiomedia ADDIS ABABA (April 8, 2014) - After a huge Bahrdar Protest Rally in October, opposition stronghold Dessie followed suit, and on April 6erupted in protest against EPRDF rule marked by brutality, poverty, corruption and social pestilence. The demonstrators chanted against the use of state ownership of land as a political weapon to silence the people and make them obedient to the ruling party.

The demonstrators, who often called for the release of all political prisoners and prisoners of conscience, mocked at the government's hollowclaim of a double-digit growth while poverty has gone wild and sordid under EPRDF's over two decades of misrule.Charismatic Andinet leaders such as Habtamu Ayalew inspired the protesters to stand up for what is right and just. "Freedom is earned, not begged!" Habtamu chanted as thehuge crowd repeated with thunderous echo. Defiant from the start way back in the early '90s, Dessie is an opposition stronghold that serves as a city of hope for a better Ethiopia!

DIET: The Mystery of Teff, Ethiopia’s Nutritious Grain’By Elaine Gordon, (April 8, 2014)

Washington Post (April 8, 2014) - Although teff has been a staple of traditional Ethiopian cooking for thousands of years, this gluten-free grainis quickly climbing to super-grain status in our country. Teff is a gluten- free whole grain that, despite its size (about the size of a poppy seed), is mineral-rich and high in protein. In fact, the Whole Grains Council estimates that Ethiopians get about two-thirds of their dietary protein from teff. And long-distance runners from Ethiopia have credited theirenergy and health to the grain.

One serving of dry teff (a quarter-cup) offers 7 grams of protein, 4 grams of dietary fiber, 25 percent of your daily recommended magnesium, 20 percent of your daily iron and 10 percent of your daily calcium, Vitamin B6and zinc. Teff has a mildly nutty flavor and is incredibly versatile. When cooked on a stovetop with water, it creates a creamy product similar to porridge or cream of wheat that would be a nice twist on the usual hot breakfast cereal options. It also works wonderfully in stews, adding both thickness and texture.
In Ethiopia, teff is ground into a flour and fermented to make injera, a spongy, sourdough flatbread that is soft, porous and thin like a pancake.Traditional Ethiopian restaurants serve injera with all meals as an edibleserving plate topped with meats, vegetables and sauces. As America embraces this ancient grain, teff can be found in gluten-freerecipes for pancakes, breads, crepes or waffles and is showing up in products such as cereal, snacks, wraps and more.
Nutrition facts: Nutrient-packed bran and germ make up the majority of the teff grain, which is why the nutrient content is so high compared withmore common grains. Teff offers the most calcium (1 cup of cooked teff offers 123 milligrams, which is equivalent to half a cup of cooked spinach). And most grains don't offer Vitamin C, but teff is an excellent source. Plus, according to the Whole Grains Council, teff is high in resistant starch, a newly discovered type of dietary fiber that can benefitblood-sugar management, weight control and colon health.
Recipe: Southwest teff burgers: This recipe is a spin on the standard veggie burger. Teff serves as a binding agent, and roasted sweet potatoes, black beans, oats, onions and scallions make up the rest of the dish. The burgers are loaded with Southwest flavor from fresh cilantro, lime juice, garlic, cumin, agave nectar and jalapeño pepper. They are baked (more healthful than pan-frying), making them slightly crisp on theoutside and slightly moist inside. Serve the burgers with whole-wheat or gluten-free buns and your favorite toppings. They're also great served ona salad or in a "lettuce sandwich." Or simply dip them in guacamole.
Ethiopian Football Federation cancels Barreto's appointment, choosesStevanovic'
EAN (April 8, 2014) The Ethiopian Football Federation (EFF) has announced the rescission of the appointment of Portuguese manager Mariano Barreto as head coach of the country's national men football team. Barreto, who was hired less than a week ago, is being replaced after investigations reportedly disclosed the fact that he is unsuitable forthe job. The President of EFF, Juneidin Basha, told SuperSport that the federation came to the decision after consulting the Ghanaian Football Association – where Barreto served between 2003 and 2004. He added that “The media was in a hurry to report on the appointment and yet wehad not made a decision as the federation.”

Reports indicate that Serbian coach Goran Stevanovic – who has also had a stint as head coach of the Ghanaian team – has been selected by the Ethiopian federation. Basha revealed that the federation has had problemscontacting Stevanovic. However, he told SuperSport that “We will send him an invitation today so that he can come to Ethiopia [and] we [can] discuss modalities of employment and also his salary.”

Many Ethiopian commentators online had condemned the appointment of Barreto to manage the Walya Antelopes, highlighting his relative inexperience. WhileStevanovic does not seem much more qualified than Barreto on paper, hedoes seem to repose more confidence in Ethiopian football fans.

Ethiopia pick Serbian Stevanovic as new coach’

(Reuters) ADDIS ABABA (April 8, 2014) - Ethiopia have picked SerbianGoran Stevanovic as the national side's new coach, pending contract negotiations, the head of the Ethiopian Football Federation said on Tuesday. Stevanovic, who previously coached Ghana and was assistantcoach of Serbia and Montenegro, will replace Sewnet Bishaw, who was sacked in February after a dismal run at this year's African Nations Championship (CHAN).

The 47-year old Serb is expected to arrive in Addis Ababa "soon" to discuss contract details with Ethiopian football's governing body, federation boss Junedin Beshah said. "We are looking for improvement. Otherwise, we would not have relieved of his duties a man who laid the foundations for our success," Junedin told Reuters. Sewnet was appointedas coach of the "Walyas" - named after an antelope endemic to the Horn of Africa country - in 2011 for his second spell in charge, and two years later clinched Ethiopia's first African Cup of Nations slot in three decades.

Ethiopia's fairytale run also saw them reach the final knockout round for a slot in Brazil in what would have been east Africa's first-ever spot at a World Cup finals, but they lost over two legs against regional heavyweights Nigeria. The Walyas' fortunes took a turn for the worse at January's CHAN - a competition for quasi-national teams made up of home-based players only - where they were eliminated without scoring a goal in three defeats. The draw for next year's African Cup of Nations will take place later this month. Ethiopia are amongst 21 countries that earneda bye to the group stages of the qualifiers. The Walyas won their maiden African Cup of Nations in 1962 but have not lifted the trophy since. They have now re-established themselves in the continental fold after decades of poor results saw them last qualify to the tournament in 1982.

Ethiopia’s Building of A Military Power Equivalent To Egypt’s’

AFRICANGLOBE – (April 8, 2014) The report from the Global Fire Index,an international organization that publishes annual report on the comparative military might of countries puts Ethiopia as the second militarily powerful state in Africa. From the African continent the organization lists the seven countries which are building the strongest military forces in Africa. The list puts Egypt at the first position and then Ethiopia, Nigeria, South Africa, Algeria, Libya and Kenya. GFI’s

2014 report said that though Ethiopian is a landlocked country, it is building one of the most power military forces in the continent and therate with which it is building its military might is astonishing. Concerning Egypt’s military it wrote that it has 500,000 soldiers, 10,000 tanks, 60,000 other vehicles and 900 fighter aircrafts. Brigadier General Kasaye Chemeda of the Ethiopian army was asked about the relative military powers of Ethiopia and Egypt, he responded that the small relative difference between the two countries military power is of no importance; “instead the most important is the fight moral of the militaryand Ethiopians are known worldwide for their bravery and an unwaveringattitude when it comes into defending their country” he said.

ETHIOPIA: The Seeds of Famine In Ethiopia: 2.7 Million People FacingHunger’

Why are Ethiopians starving Again? The answer rests on its successive autocratic rulers and tribalist leaders. Ethiopia today forced hundereds of thousands of Indigenous Peoples off their fertile farmlands to make way for foreign investors that came in to grow foodstuffs and bio-fuels for export. Having lost their land and their ability to produce their own food, the indigenous Peoples are being forced to become dependent on food aidhandouts.

Addis Fortune (April 8, 2014) - Ethiopia finds itself in critical need of food aid in order to feed 2.7 million people. This announcement comes not longafter its leaders were upbeat, reporting a bumper harvest of 231 million quintals of grain for the current fiscal year. When donors and Ethiopian authorities met on January 24, 2014, to agree on the projection of the volume of humanitarian aid needed for 2014, the resultant crucial document – the joint Government and Humanitarian partners’ Document –showed that 2.7 million of the 91 million people in the nation, according tothe latest estimate by the World Bank, are in need of humanitarian assistance.

The total food requirement is estimated at 388,635 metric tonnes (MT). This is broken down to 314,684 MT of cereals, 31,468 MT of pulses, 9,441MT of oil and 33,042 MT of blended or supplementary food. This comes against the government’s recent announcement that agricultural productivity in the nation is projected to grow in leaps and bounds.

Despite the normal and above normal 2013 ‘meher’ rains, which furtherimproved the food security situation in the country, humanitarian challenges will continue in 2014 in north eastern Amhara, Afar and the southern Tigray regions. These are all areas that receive inadequate seasonal rainfall. There is also a focus on other areas that could be affected by various hazards, like – floods, conflicts, crop pests and diseases, stated the report. Water shortages persist in the drought-proneareas in northeastern Afar, South Region, southeastern Tigray and the lowlands of the southern pastoralist areas.

The nation’s 12.27 million hectares of land was covered with cereals during the year 2012/13. This was a 1.52 pc increment compared to thatof the previous year. The government planned to produce 22,907,055 tons of cereal, but exceeded it by 310,555 tons. However, the amount was not able to feed the nation. In the 2013/14 fiscal year, Ethiopia is planning to exceed last year’s cereal production by 2,300,000 tons. The alarm for the Ethiopian government is clear despite the number of beneficiaries decreasing compared to that of the previous year.

Crop production, according to the document, will most likely be affected inthe major producing areas of Amhara and Tigray for the third consecutive year. This will worsen the food security situation in these areas. But the number of beneficiaries is particularly high in Oromia and the Somali regions, which account for 27 and 25 pc, respectively. Tigray and Amhara follow close behind with 19pc and 16pc, respectively. Oromia has 766,336people out of its population of 31 million (according to the CSA's estimate of 2012) in need of humanitarian assistance. In the Somali region, on the other hand, 691,978 people are projected to be in need of food assistanceout of a population of five million (according to the CSA's estimate of 2012).

The alarm for the government is going to remain intact if weather conditions do not improve, says Rahel Asfaw, a senior Resource Mobilization Expert at the Disaster Prevention Preparedness & Food Security Sectoral Office. "It all depends on whether or not there is timely rain," she said. In the remote Somali Region where the meher season wasrain-deficit, the number might even grow, she says. The total food requirement for 2014 amounts to 388 million dollars. This includes 314,684 tonnes of pulses, 9,441 tonnes of oil and 33,042 tonnes of blended food.

The problem for the government is that it only has 51.6 million dollars. This total represents just 12.8pc of what is required. While the remainder is expected from the international community, previous contribution trends show that a portion of the required amount is left to be filled by thegovernment itself. Last year the donors contributed only 68 pc of what was required. "The contribution from donors may not be any different from the previous year," says Rahel. For another food security expert, theinternational community's contribution might not even amount to 68pc.

He cites priorities elsewhere in the continent and the world. "This willworsen the situation," he fears.

OPDO: Anole Oromo monument and Ethiopia's history'

A waste Arguing about Menelik II and spend millions on anti-Menelik Anolemonument

VIEW POINT: By Admasu Belay (April 9, 2014)

EPRDF has a gift for Ethiopians and that to erect a monument that serves as a constant reminder not of love and unity but of hate and division. The shameful Anole (Aannolee) Oromo Monument built by the racist OPDO in the Arsi region of Oromia has angered many Ethiopians worldwide. The current regime says the monument was built to remember Oromo war prisoners allegedly mutilated by Menelik. But what we fail to understand isbeyond the emotional reaction, we have overlooked its historical impact.

Since the TPLF/OLF created the current ethnic federalism system in 1993, they have brainwashed many Ethiopians to see everything through narrowtribal lense. Therefore, many innocent oromos have become zombies to any tribal propaganda shoved at their throats. Otherwise, the monument has no historical base to support a single brick of its existence!

OPDO: Why is Anole monument a historical fallacy?There are three main issues with the monument

FIRST issue involves the makeup of Menelik's Shoan army which the OLF/OPDO want us to think are mostly Amharas. But this is completely false. All historical accounts show us that Shoa was a multiethnic region with a significant Oromo population. Even when menelik was imprisoned by the Gojjams, he was helped by the Shoa Oromo to be free and even his wife was mixed Oromo herself. Menelik's top Minister of Defense was the Oromo/Gurage Commander Habte Dinagde and all of Menelik's battle with the south was 100% coordinated by Oromo hero Ras Gobena Dacche.So OPDO/OLF/TPLF propaganda poison against Amara has no historical base.

SECOND issue is the custom of cutting hands or mutilation which is not practiced by the Orthodox majority in Shoa. There is no historical evidence that shows such practice in Shoa. The truth is such custom is widespread only in rural corners of our country, especially among the Somali and Afar. Even today the Somali/Afar pastoralists cut off penis of enemy to prove manhood. This is banned custom in shoa. There were some Wollo Oromos influenced by Afar/somali culture. In fact, after the Wollo Oromo calvary killed many Italians in the Battle of Adwa, they mutilated many Italian war captives. There were no rules regulating POWtreatment. But the past is past; we should think forward instead of criminalizing every incident in history. Most of all, the claim that widespread mutilation was done by the Shoans against Arsi is exaggerated and false. The THIRD issue involves the details of the battle in Arsi where atrocities were allegedly committed. For instance, all historical accounts show that Menelik's 1880s multiethnic military lost many battles to the Arsi military.He was defeated several times before his final victory. Meaning, similar atrocities were committed by the Arsi Oromo military who killed the Shoans and mutilated their war captives. This was afterall over 120 years ago when human rights laws did not dictate any conflict in the world. So should we remind ourselves how the Arsi Oromo killed and mutilated the Shoans? Should we build a statue or monument for the Shoans killed by the Arsi Oromo before another batch of Shoans avenged by killing the Arsi? Well, this would be ridiculous and childish! We will run out of stones to build monuments and Ethiopia will be filled with monuments in every corner of the country! We can't build millions of monuments for every event in history. Otherwise, why don't we build monument to remember victims of the 1500s Somali Imam Gragn Mohammed who massacred tensof thousands of innocent Orthodox Amharas?

Why don't we build monuments everywhere in Shoa and Wollo to remember the thousands of Amaras massacred during the 1500s/1600s Oromo expansion? These Oromos surely did not feed their amara subjectsmilk and honey when they subjucated them. Why don't we build monuments to the many Wollo people killed by Emperor Yohannes's crusades? Why don't we build monument for the Gondar and Gojjam people massacred by the mid 1700s Oromo rulers in Gonder? Why don't we build monuments to the thousands of Amharas in the south killed by OLF/OPDO oromos during the 1990s transition period? Actually, murder and massacre of Amaras in this day and age of high global human rights standards is more criminal than massacre of Oromoscenturies ago when such standards were nonexistent worldwide. Recent attrocities have more weight than atrocities over 100 years ago because the world has high standards and values today. So indeed Amhara peoplehave the moral high ground in Ethiopia as they are the most victimized people throughout recent and past history. But for the sake of peace and reconcilation, amaras are not revenge minded.

But the OPDO/OLF continue to spread hatred between amaras and our oromo brothers and sisters. Today out of the over 2 million population in Arsi zone, over 300,000 are Amharas. So why create hatred against this significant Amaras living in Arsi? Why create bitterness? Certainly, there are tens of thousands of mixed Ethiopians living in Arsi as well but the TPLF regime has outlawed mixed identity. So both amaras and mixed people in Arsi today are living in state of terror because of this OPDO/OLFfake monument of hate. It is our duty to inform our Oromo brothers and sisters not to fall to the traps being set by the OPDO/OLF/TPLF. This pornographic statue or monument of breast is an insult to the intelligenceof our oromo people in Arsi. But If they like their statue, well, let them keep it. If some arsi oromos feel satisfied with such hateful statue, we say, go ahead and enjoy. But we must ask our oromo brothers and sisters to watchout for the OPDO/TPLF tactic of divide and rule! We must tell every oromo we see that history does not support such statue. Amaras have and continue to suffer in Ethiopian history but we ask our Oromo brothers to first and foremost dedicate our time to remove the TPLF dictatorship and fight for democracy together as one people. Politicizing history, creating bitterness,revenge and hate are not the cornerstones of peaceful co-existence in Ethiopia.

INTELLIGENCE: Controversial Intel law implemented'

ESAT News (April 9, 2014) - Sources have told ESAT that the Ministry of the National Intelligence and Security Service (NISS), which was re- established last year under a new structure, has started implementing thenew proclamation enacted last year and forces citizens to give information.

First established as the Security, Immigration, and Refugees Affairs Authority in 1995, the Authority has been reorganised with a new draft law that was submitted to the parliament last year aiming to 'enable it toduly execute its missions'. The redraft was reportedly implemented in accordance with the changing regional, environmental, continental and international circumstances, which have an impact on Ethiopia's security.

Under the new proclamation, the Organization is also entitled to refuse to disclose its financial and other reports from the Federal Auditor and other bodies. However, its reports could be evaluated by an Internal Auditor andthe Prime Minister. The new proclamation will also allow the entry and sending of intelligence materials and instruments to overseas without being checked or inspected by the Customs and Revenue Authority. It alsoenacts that the wealth, assets and identity of the staff of the Ministry could be kept secret and their wealth could only be registered by the Ministry rather than the Federal Ethics and Anti Corruption Commission.

The Ministry is also given the powers of issuing national identity cards, leading the Aviation Security, issuing of qualification certificates to privatesecurity organizations. The proclamation states that the officers of the Ministry will not be impeached both by the criminal and civil laws for any of the actions they take during operations. They are also required to keepall the secrets they knew while they worked for the Ministry at all times and anybody interrogated or interviewed by the Ministry is also expected to keep the interview secret or risk criminal charges.

The Ministry is vying to now fully implement the proclamation across theboard. Especially as next year's general parliamentary election is fast approaching, many fear that citizens could be forced to provide information in the name of law enforcement or face harassment anddetention.

Ethiopian Airlines CEO target of Eritrea's security murder plot: Insiders'

Ethiomedia (April 10, 2014) ADDIS ABABA - Tewolde Gebremariam, the CEO of Ethiopian Airlines, was in 1994 a potential target of an Eritrean murder plot because he insisted that an Eritrean Cessna plane cannot leave the airport without bill of lading and proper inspection. Tewolde, who was a cargo manager at that time, had known that the Eritrean- owned plane was loaded with an estimated 70 million Birr (roughly about32 million US dollars at that time) and the Eritreans wanted to fly the plane to their country without inspection.

"The Eritreans were upset they wanted to eliminate him. They were running up and down the country in legal and illicit business schemes. They had the full blessing of Meles Zenawi, a president of the transition period at that time," according to an information from an insider of theairlines company.

The rush to eliminate Tewolde was deterred when, as a last resort, the Eritreans wanted to use Yared Tsegay, an Eritrean who was manager ofIntegrated Operational Control Center at Ethiopian Airlines, to persuadeTewolde to change his mind.

"The Eritreans privately met Yared, an Addis Ababa born Eritrean who hadno known links to Shabia, and warned him that his colleague, Tewolde, was almost risking his life for blocking the flight of their plane to Asmara."Yared took the warning to Tewolde, and shared the risks of turning down the requests of the Eritreans. "Beginning from Meles, Ethiopia is in the hands of Eritreans," Yared Tsegay warned Tewolde. "If they killed you, Meles would only tap them on their shoulder, and say good riddance!"

Tewolde caved in, and let the plane leave Addis for Asmara. Tewolde also joined the ruling TPLF group, thus securing safety, notwithstanding his rise to become CEO of a competitive airlines in Africa. The Eritrean regimehad an unbridled access to Ethiopian resources from 1991 on until war broke out in 1998 after TPLF officials in Tigrai region became a bone in thethroat of the Asmara regime.

At the start of war, calls were publicly made for TPLF officials to remove Eritrean mercenaries from power before engaging Eritrea in the battle field. But the TPLF officials who had no Eritrean lineage were scared of andnever acted against Meles, who was at his weakest point in his rule. They rather carried out the mass deportation of Eritreans for which Meles, Bereket and others had no option but to keep a low profile until the dust settles down for good. Settled indeed, and Meles, after aborting the war, vanquished his opponents in Addis in 2001, thus burying any Ethiopian threat to his rule once and for all. Though Meles died in August 2012, his Eritrean group remains firmly rooted in power. For instance, seven ofeight TPLF politburo officials are of Eritrean stock.

Britain funds human rights abusers in Ethiopia – PressTV’

PRESS TV (April 10, 2014) - The UK government is providing financial aidto human rights abusers in Ethiopia through funding training paramilitaries, who perpetrate summary killings, rape and torture in the impoverished African country, local media reported.

Through its foreign aid budget, the UK government provides financial support to an Ethiopian government security force known as the “specialpolice” as part of its “peace and development programme”, which would cost up to £15 million in five years, The Guardian reported. The Department for International Development warned in a leaked documentof the “reputational risks” of working with organizations that are “frequently cited in human rights violation allegations”, according to the report.

The Ethiopian government’s counter-insurgency campaign in Ogaden, a troubled region largely populated by ethnic Somalis is being enforced by the 14,000-strong special police. This is while police forces are repeatedly accused by Human Rights Watch of serious human rights abuses. Claire Beston, the Amnesty International’s Ethiopia researcher, said it was highlyconcerning that Britain was planning to work with the paramilitary force.

Africa's anti-gay movement spreads to Ethiopia’

AP ADDIS ABBA, Ethiopia (April 10, 2014) - Two groups in Ethiopia said Thursday that they will hold an anti-gay demonstration later this month, amove that puts Ethiopia in line to become the next African country to increase the public demonization of gays. Although gay sex is already outlawed in Ethiopia, the rally set for April 26 comes as the parliament considers making homosexual acts ineligible for presidential pardons. Newlegislation in Uganda and Nigeria this year has increased penalties for homosexual acts in those two countries, sending many gays underground or out of the country.

The government-affiliated Addis Ababa Youth Forum and a religious groupassociated with the Ethiopian Orthodox Church told a news conference that an increasing rate of homosexual acts in the country has reached an alarming rate. "Children are being raped by gay people in this country.

Just yesterday we have met a woman whose boy was raped by two othermen. All in all, gay acts are against health, the law, religion and our culture, so we should break the silence and create awareness about it," said Dereje Negash, chairman of the church group, the Weyiniye Abune Tekelehaimanot Association.

The bill was sponsored by the Ministry of Justice and could be put to a vote this month. In Ethiopia, same-sex acts are punishable by up to 15years in prison. A 25-year jail term is given to anyone convicted of infecting another person with HIV during same-sex acts. Though the organizers said that there is no specific reason for the timing of the planned demonstration, a prominent blogger and gay activist said that gay-bashing rhetoric is likely to increase in the run-up to elections for parliament next year. Ezana Solomon said the anti-gay movement is trying to invade personal privacy under the banner of child protection.

"I refuse to be labeled a rapist, molester or an abuser since I have nevercommitted those things ever. I think the logical or right thing to do is when I have committed those crimes, I should put to justice. This campaign is not justifiable under any circumstance," Ezana said. "If someone thinks my being gay is a sin, in my opinion the only thing you are allowed or should be allowed to do is to pray for me and your boundary ends there," Ezana said.

The demonstration organizers said the protest will be held under the theme "Keeping alien culture and homosexuality at bay." They said they hope to see thousands of residents and some senior government officialscome to the protest. "Gay practices are not our culture so we wanted thesociety to be aware of the danger and protect itself," said Tsegaye Gebretsadik, chairman of the Addis Ababa Youth Forum.

Is OPDO on the self-killing?'

THE INFORMER (April 10, 2014) - The former adviser to the late Meles Zenawi, the present minister for public service Muktar Kedir has replaced the recently deceased Alemayehu Atomsa as President of Oromia RegionalState and also Chairman of the Oromo People’s Democratic Organisation (OPDO, member of the ruling coalition EPRDF). This shake-up provided the opportunity for certain promotions ...as well as a few sackings. Aster Mamo, for example, was promoted Vice President of Oromia Regional State, while on the other hand the mayor of Oromia Special Zone Sebeta, Yemane Yigezu, was relieved of his functions, as was the head of Oromia Radio & TV, Mesfin Haile who was replaced by an OPDO official calledTemesgen Bayisa. More generally, the Oromia Regional State and the OPDO are going through recurrent internal crises - Muktar Kedir is its sixthpresident since it was created two decades ago. Even those who are considered extreme loyalists one day can easily be ousted the next. One such was the president of Oromia Regional State Supreme Court Teshale Abera, who while he was in his job condemned a great many Oromo dissidents, sometimes to the death penalty, but was nevertheless accused of being lax and relieved of his functions. After being unemployed for a while in Ethiopia, he went to the United Kingdom where he requested political asylum.

ETHIO-DJIBOUTI: Water trade in pipeline between Djibouti and Ethiopia'

The Informer (April 10, 2014) - The Djibouti council of ministers has approved a loan from the Chinese Exim Bank to the tune of $332 million. The loan will be used to fund infrastructure to carry water to Djibouti fromthe Shinile Zone in Ethiopia. It is for 20 years, with a 7 year grace period, at an annual interest rate of 2% plus two commissions (one for manage...ment and one for commitment) of 0.25% each. Under this project, Djibouti will pick up the whole tab for work which will also be of use to its Ethiopian neighbour. It involves building a water pipeline from Ethiopia, only 90km of which will be on Djibouti territory. According to oursources, Addis Ababa is making its neighbour pay top whack. Not only willDjibouti finance the pipeline's installation, operation and maintenance, it will also cover the maintenance of the drilling sites and the cost of securityfor the pipeline. After that, Ethiopia will bill Djibouti for the water.

Teachers arrested after a clash in Yererbare '

ESAT News (April 10, 2014) Following the administrative questions raisedby members of the Yerer clan in the Ethiopian Somali region, at least 16 students attending different schools have been arrested. ESAT previously had reported that the local special police force known as Leyu Force had killed at least 50 people from the clan and 19 other community elders thattravelled to Addis Abeba to ask the Prime Minister to take measures on the perpetrators have also been detained since.

People have said that they are unable to visit the prisoners as they are being switched from one prison to another. Most of them are aged between 60 to 85 years. Some members of the clan have reported to the Ethiopian Human Rights Congress and also to the Ethiopian Human RightsCommission which is funded by the government. The later had reportedlysent a team to the area to investigate the incident. The Congress is also said to start investigating the claimed murders and issue a statement. Ethiopia/Eritrea: Briefing the Final Report, Beyond the Impasse'Khartoum (HAN) By Jason Mosley (April 10, 2014)

Weekly Regional Security and Defence Update and Analysis'

Jason Mosley is briefing the final report about the assumptions underlyingmuch analysis about the conflict between Eritrea and Ethiopia, saying it was wrong to consider President Isaias acted irrationally or against the interests of the Eritrean state in relation to the findings of the Boundary Commission. Mr Mosley said his strategy might be poor, but not without logic. Mr Mosley said Eritrea's fear was that by entering into talks over theimplementation of the Commission's findings the country would put in jeopardy the ruling itself. Eritreans worry that if they negotiate with Ethiopia, as Addis Ababa requests, they will negate the Commission's ruling." This they would not do, which meant that Ethiopia would need to open discussions while guaranteeing the adjudication.

TRIBAL CLASH: 20 Bodi people feared to have died at the hands ofFederal Police: Party'

ESAT News (April 11, 2014) - Alemayehu Mekonen, Deputy Chairman of the Omo Peoples Democratic Unity (OPDU) and the Zonal Chairman, said in an interview with ESAT the measures taken by the Federal Police Force following the inter clan clash between the Bodi people and the Konso havetaken the lives of at least 29 people. The local people have given the reports to the Party. Alemayehu said they are collating the names of thosekilled and will publish them soon. He said during his hospital visits he was told by the injured that around six of them told him that they were hit by bullets fired by Federal Police. He said although at first the cause of the conflict seemed to be in relationto the Konso people that the government resettled, the main cause is in actually the fact that the Bodi people have been displaced from their landfor the sake of Sugarcane plantation. The Bodi people are pastoralist communities, they give special care for forests and thus when the agrarian Konoso started clearing the forest and the government began itsplantation programs, the conflict turned out deadly, Alemayeu said. The tension is still high despite interventions by the Federal Police. ESAT's efforts to speak to the officials of the region have failed due to mobile network problems in the area. "If Ethiopia insists on denying Egypt, its right to life, I will definitely strike it"

HUMAN RIGHTS: Staff of international human rights organ detained inEthiopia'

ARTICLE 19 (April 11, 2014) Ethiopian immigration officials detained a member of staff from ARTICLE 19's East Africa office on 3 April for 29 hours without any access to legal advice or consular support. Fortunately,Patrick Mutahi, a trainer in protection, reacted according to strict ARTICLE19 security protocols, notifying Ethiopian contacts of his detainment before his mobile phone was confiscated.

Following a rapid campaign for his release, Mutahi was deported back to Kenya on 4 April, and was warned that he would face jail if he returned. ARTICLE 19 is one of the last remaining international human rights organisations working in Ethiopia and providing independent information to the UN Human Rights Council, and we are therefore concerned that thesituation will only deteriorate further. We urge the government to publiclywithdraw their threat to jail Patrick Mutahi, and to respect fundamental human rights, including the right to freedom of expression.

We also call upon the UN to address increasing threats towards human rights defenders who provide a source of independent information withoutwhich the UN cannot fulfil their mandate, specifically by urgently establishing the mechanism agreed in Human Rights Council Resolution 24/24. “Patrick’s detention is a chilling indictment of the state of freedom of expression in Ethiopia. Over the past five years we’ve witnessed growing hostility towards journalists, civil society groups and political opposition. That hostility is now being extended to those that support these groups’ exercise of their right to freedom of expression,” said HenryMaina, Director of ARTICLE 19 Eastern Africa. “We have worked in Ethiopia to provide support to journalists, so that that they can continue to professionally conduct their important work to keep people informed and facilitate open debate about matters of public importance. Restrictingour work shows the utter contempt the Ethiopian authorities hold for free speech, press freedom and fundamental human rights.”

DENIAL OF ENTRY, DETENTION AND DEPORTATION

On 3 April 2014, Patrick Mutahi flew from Nairobi, Kenya to Addis Ababa,Ethiopia, where he was due to deliver a security and safety training for journalists and media workers. Upon landing in Addis Ababa’s Bole International Airport at 12pm, he was detained by immigration officials, who confiscated his passport and mobile telephone and told him that he would not be permitted to enter the country. Security officials stated thatARTICLE 19 had not sought permission from the Ethiopian government toconduct trainings of journalists.

Officials told Patrick that he was not allowed to speak to anyone and was refused legal advice. Mutahi had however already anticipated the potentialrisk and following ARTICLE 19 security protocol, had notified Ethiopian contacts that he was being held. During the period of detention, it becameapparent that the authorities were familiar with Patrick’s movements during previous trips to the country. Security officials made clear they knew details about who he had met with, as well as where and when those meetings had taken place.

At approximately 2pm on 4 April, 26 hours after being detained and as aresult of a global reaction for his release, Patrick was told he would be deported and warned that he would face jail if he returned. At 5pm the same day, Patrick’s passport was stamped “deported” and he was placedon a flight back to Kenya.

AN ATTEMPT TO UNDERMINE THE UNITED NATIONS

We are also concerned that this response by the Ethiopian government is an attempt to stop ARTICLE 19 from continuing to provide an independentsource of information about human rights violations in Ethiopia to the United Nations. As well as training journalists, Patrick was due to work with Ethiopian civil society to provide information to the UN's Universal Periodic Review, a four-yearly assessment of the human rights situation inevery country, conducted in front of all UN member states in Geneva.

ARTICLE 19 routinely works with civil society in countries worldwide to give detailed and independent information and recommendations aboutthe state of freedom of expression in countries under review. Unfortunately, there is a growing trend for governments to harass civil society to stop them passing information to the UN and its various mechanisms. The UN's Human Rights Council adopted a resolution recently in September 2013, committing states to prevent "intimidation orreprisals against individuals and groups who cooperate or have cooperatedwith the United Nations, its representatives and mechanisms in the field ofhuman rights." The resolution calls upon the UN Secretary General to create a senior focal point within the UN to coordinate an international response on the issues of reprisals, to increase protections for human rights defenders, and to ensure perpetrators of attacks against defenders are held accountable.

Ethiopia, a member of the Council, abstained in the resolution's September vote and in December, the African Group of States at the UN General Assembly voted to delay the appointment of the senior focal pointon reprisals. "Detaining Patrick, a human rights defender, obstructs civil society's ability to communicate human rights abuses to the UN and otherinternational bodies responsible for holding states accountable for their human rights violations, such as the Universal Periodic Review," added Maina. HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: UK Slams Ethiopia's Human Rights Record '

The Reporter (April 12, 2014) The 2013 Human Rights report of the government of (UK) severely criticized the government of Ethiopia for its application of its Anti-Terrorism Proclamation and the Charities and Societies Proclamation, which hampers the activity of the opposition campof the country. The report says that the UK is concerned about continuing restrictions on opposition and dissent in Ethiopia through use of the Anti- Terrorism Proclamation (ATP) and the Charities and Societies Proclamation(CSP) .

Those detained under the ATP include members of opposition groups, journalists, peaceful protesters, and others seeking to express their rightsto freedom of assembly and expression while the CSP has had a serious impact on Ethiopian civil society's ability to operate effectively, according to the report. Section 11 of the report, which covers and focuses on the issues related to Human Rights in countries of concern contains a review of the human rights situation in 28 countries where the UK Government has wide-ranging human rights concerns. This part of the report explores the concerns of the government of the UK. The report takes Bahrain, Bangladesh, Ethiopia, Nigeria, Rwanda and Egypt as case study countries.

In this regard, the report presents the condition of human rights abuse in Ethiopia as follows. The report chooses to highlight a number of reports ofmistreatment of prisoners in detention. In May, the Ethiopian Human Rights Commission (EHRC), whose mandate and powers are defined by Parliament, published a report, "Monitoring Report on Respect of Persons Held in Custody of Ethiopian Police Stations" which described generally poor detention conditions with some incidents of human rights abuses andunlawful interrogation tactics.

The report was based on the monitoring of 170 police stations and inspections were conducted without any prior notification. One institution,the Meakelawi Police Detention Facility, has drawn a high level of criticismfrom former detainees and international NGOs for alleged mistreatment ofits inmates. Allegations of abuse by the "Special Police" in the Somali Region are also a concern of the report despite the report saying the increased security presence in the region had brought some benefits including some development of basic services and infrastructure - albeit from a low base.

However, there have been many reports of mistreatment associated withthe special police including torture and execution of villagers accused of supporting the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) .

Moreover, the report said the UK government and the UN have pressed the Ethiopian government to articulate a reform plan for the Special Police, and the Ethiopian government has agreed this is needed.

So, according to the report, the UK government promises to encourage the government of Ethiopia to take action.

RELIGION: The Brotherhood of Islam and the orthodox christianity'

Harrar (HAN) By Pastor Sutton Turner (April 12, 2014) WHY I LOVE ETHIOPIA – "Go and stand in the temple and speak to the people all the words of this Life." Acts 5:20 In February, I had the privilege to go to Ethiopia. It was my twelfth trip to Africa in less than a decade. Each trip has had a different purpose—and each trip has had a different result in myheart and life. I'm so thankful for what Jesus has done and taught me through each visit to the other side of the world.

My first trip to Africa was back in 2005. I had previously been pretty antagonistic toward Christianity but had just begun going to church with my wife and family. I was intrigued by the preacher's teaching and went home to fill up my iPod with sermons for my upcoming African safari hunt.You can read my entire testimony if you'd like, but long story, short: Jesusused the convicting words of Scripture in a sermon to bring me to my knees right there in the hunting blind. Jesus drew me to himself and saved me right then and there. (My African guide probably thought I was crazy.) Africa was forever knitted to my heart at that precious moment.

In January 2010, I met Mike Stemm, the co-founder and president of NewCovenant Foundation. They are a church-planting organization in Ethiopia.I was immediately drawn to their work and mission. I began to feel the Lord pull me toward partnering with them and with my brothers and sisters in Ethiopia. But honestly, I just didn't know how that would look.

Was I supposed to start a non-profit? Was I supposed to go on staff withNCF? How was all this going to work?

Then in 2011, my wife, Marci, and I traveled to Ethiopia to adopt our sonJoseph. He is a ball of energy and life. My wife, two daughters, and I lovehim so much and can't imagine what life would be like without him. He's part of our forever family. Once again I found my heart being knit to the continent of Africa and the country of Ethiopia. I kept having the conversations with the Lord about what I was supposed to do to support or join his work there.

I came on staff at Mars Hill as the General Manager in April 2011 and hadthe opportunity to propose a partnership with New Covenant Foundation to the Executive Elders (I was not yet serving in that specific role). We began sponsoring 20 Ethiopian church planters that year! We have since increased our total church planters to 40 with hopes of adding 27 more infiscal year 2015.

So on this, my twelfth and most recent trip to Africa, I prayed for the twelve Mars Hill leaders who accompanied me to be greatly impacted by Jesus in Ethiopia. My prayer wasn't just for the short few days in the country, but additionally for the impact that it would have on their local churches. I prayed that God would use the inspiring faith of our brothersand sisters in Ethiopia to create a renewed vigor for Jesus' mission in ourpersonal lives and in the lives of the people in our churches.

I have asked the leaders who went on this trip with me to write about their experiences there and to cast vision for what they would like to see Mars Hill do in Ethiopia in the future. Our intention is that this blog series every Tuesday for the next several months will allow you to experience what we experienced. We pray that our words and stories will, "stir up oneanother to love and good works" (Heb. 10:24). We are so excited for these men to return to Ethiopia leading short-term mission teams from Mars Hill in the coming months and years. source: marshill.com

Editorial note from writings of His Eminence Metropolitan Issaiah ofDenver:

Allow me to make another point regarding the eleventh century: some writers of the Church. The Islamic faith is a combination of beliefs from the pre-Islamic period, practiced by the nomadic tribes of that time, as well as distorted references from both the Old and the New Testaments. For example, Muslims accept John the Baptist as a great prophet. They also accept the Lord Jesus Christ as a very great prophet who was born ofthe Virgin Mary. However, in the Muslim faith there is no affinity with the Christian faith, since Muhammed believed that he was the greatest of all prophets and that he had been sanctified by Allah to establish the faith which was true to the will of Allah. ATHLETICS:Tirunesh Dibaba Performs excellent in Virgin Money LondonMarathon debut' Virgin Money London Marathon: (April 13, 2014) - Three-time Olympic gold medallist and marathon debutante Tirunesh Dibaba clinched third in the women's, just 14 seconds behind the winner, according to IAAF reportbelow. This is an excellent performance, and it is a powerful indicator thatTirunesh will be a marathon champion as she becomes more experienced in the 26.4 mile race.

IAAF - It was another day of Kenyan dominance in the British capital on Sunday (13) as world record holder Wilson Kipsang broke the course record to regain the Virgin Money London Marathon men's title, while two-times world champion Edna Kiplagat finally claimed the women's crown after finishing runner-up for the last two years.

Making the most of perfect conditions, they both led Kenyan one-twos as Kipsang shrugged off Stanley Biwott in the last mile of the race to cross the line 26 seconds clear in 2:04:29, while Kiplagat won a duel against her namesake, Florence Kiplagat, to win by three seconds in 2:20:21. Thiswas the fourth time Kenya have won both titles in London, while their great east African rivals from Ethiopia had to be satisfied with two third places.

Defending men's champion Tsegaye Kebede took his fifth podium finish insix races here, while three-time Olympic gold medallist and marathon debutante Tirunesh Dibaba clinched third in the women's, just 14 secondsbehind the winner. By contrast, the much anticipated debut of Mo Farah ended in disappointment as the double world and Olympic champion trackchampion failed in his bid to break the long-standing British record, finishing tired and drained in eighth place, his time of 2:08:21 more than a minute outside his target. "I just had a bad day at the office," he said.

Farah started with a second, slightly slower group and never saw Kipsang from the moment they left the start line. When the Kenyan won his first title here in 2012, he crossed the line more than two minutes clear after dominating the race in the second half. This year, he bided his time, kicking away from a pack of eight after 30km with a burst that only Biwottcould match. The two ran shoulder-to-shoulder for 10km, past the Tower of London and on to the Embankment, before Kipsang made his move with just over two kilometres left.

It was now Dibaba against the Kenyans. With four of them in the group –and only three medals up for grabs – something had to give, and that, toeeveryone's surprise, turned out to be Jeptoo. Despite looking strong and running at the front, the reigning champion stopped suddenly after 17 miles and stepped off the course, leaving the two Kiplagats running side-by-side, with Dibaba a stride or two behind. However, the great track runner showed her marathon inexperience, dropping her drinks bottle at the 30km feeding station. She sensibly stopped to pick it up but the Kenyan pair sensed an opportunity to pull away and picked up the pace, putting in a 5:16 mile to open a 20-metre gap on their Ethiopian rival. TheKenyan duo continued to look relaxed and talked to each other as they went through 35km in 1:56:07, with Dibaba hanging on 12 seconds further back, neither closing the gap nor losing touch. At 22 miles, Florence K briefly made a move, but Edna was saving herself. They passed 40km in 2:13:02 before entering the final 200m in The Mall together. Florence took an inside line around the final corner to cut Edna off but as the course opened up again the two-time runner-up found another gear and sprinted away from her namesake. Dibaba followed Florence home in third, finishing in 2:20:35. Her fellow Ethiopian Tadesse finished strongly in fourth in 2:21:42, with Kebede fifth in 2:23:21. (Text ends)

ETHIOPOLITICS: Dictators' insatiable lust for power'

EM VIEW POINT (April 15, 2014) The ruling TPLF, aka woyane regime, in Ethiopia commits gross human rights violations in broad daylight on a daily basis, and this is a case well documented by Human Rights Watch (HRW), among others. Intimidation ,harrassement ,imprisonment torture and murder are the regime`s means of silencing political dissent and disorienting the public about its basic human rights. Ethiopians have beenvoicing against the agony inflicted upon them by the TPLF regime. There has never been even a brief moment of relative stability and safety since the unfortunate fall of Ethiopia under the brutality and savagery of the TPLF dictatorship. Ethiopia has literally become a nation of fear , hell on planet Earth for Ethiopians. Not surprisingly enough fear has overtaken the regime it self as they very well know that this disgruntled nation will some day turn around and stand against them. Tens of thousands of women, men young and old flee the country ever year seeking protectionand safety. For the sake of clarity let us have a look at the basic characterstic propertys of dictators and scrutinize TPLF accordingly.

1. Generally dictators have a natural trend of clinching to power for life: Apparently most dictators assume power through coup d etat ,war or as monarchial decendents. History tell us that people who ascend to power militarily or by some other illegal mode are seldom willing to transfer power to others or share with others. They usually become totalitarian andignorant of the grievances of the people they claim they rule.

Dictators never trust their subjects ,and the vicersa. The ultimate downfallof dictators is however inevitable . The popular Noth African and Middle Eastern uprisings are vivid examples of the demolition of dictators by mass uprisings . The dictators in Tunissia ,Egypt and Yemen were unwilling to transfer power until the last minute at which time they were forcibly and unceremoniously toppled from their thrones by popular mass uprisings.

The case of Ethiopia is even worse as compared to the situations in Tunisia or the others. The misery of Ethiopians by the brutal dictatorshipis compounded by the ultraracissm and ethinic apartheid by the TPLF gangs.

Leaders of the TPLF regime have no the slightest grain of shame whenthey publicly declare that they never have the intention of sharing or transferring power to a different party.Some members including the late Zenawi used to say that one who needs power got to go to the mountainsand earn it like they did it. The fact of the matter that the TPLFites fail to understand or struggle to accept is that an “Ethiopian “ popular uprsing isunavoidable,imminent and real,given the scale of poverty,corruption,and dictatorship in ethiopia.

2. Violence – dictators' hand tool: Dictators ,as stated earlier have no faithon their subjects. Neither do they have the will and institutional capability to cater for basic human right issues in a civic and democratic manner. Violence is the ultimate weapon dictators resort to. Fear,intimidation, harassment,terror, imprisonment,torture and murder of journalists ,activists,politicians and citzens in general are the cardinal modes ofquenching political dissent in Ethiopia.

Concequent to this a recent study by an independent international group shows that Ethiopia is one of few countries which is unstable and has riskof a coup d eta.

Another study by HRW indicates that the TPLF led government is deteroriating alarmingly in its capacity to act as a functioning body,that the regime has lost faith and confidence on them selves as a plausible force. The study also shows that TPLF is so desperate that they have started tapping private calls using modern spyware secured from westerncompanies and possibly china. International calls in particular are tappe and analysed by the regime`s security agents. International calls given especial emphasis ,suspecting they might be with individuals who are supposedly members of banned political orgs in the diaspora. Political parties,journalists,activists and any one or group who attempt tp address the rampant human right violations in ethiopia is categorically slammed as “terrorist” according to the infamous “anti-terrorism” law theyenacted in 2009. Eskindir Nega, Reeyot Alemu, Andualem Aragie, Bekele Gerba,and thousands of others languishing in the notorious prsion cells of Maekelawi,Kaliti,Zeway and other places are all victims of the ill-conceivedand infamous “anti-terrorism” law.

It is crystal clear that Ethiopians have much more excruciating grievancesto fight against than our Noth African and Middle Eastern counter parts. Itis therefore detrimental and mandatory that we embark upon the next and decisive phase of the struggle ,namely “Ethiopian” popular upsrising.,should we eliminate the ones and for all TPLF and free Ethiopians from bondage of racism ,poverty and dictatorship.

3.Dictators are extremely corrupted and lavishly extravagant: As stated above, this is probably best exemplified by TPLFites than any body else. The whole TPLF state apparatus is run by corrupted individuals at all levels. Global Financial Integrity recently revealed that about 11billion usdhas been illegally transferred out of Ethiopia to western and Asian banks.

It is to be remembered that the late Meles Zenawi had billions of dollars inhis personal and family accounts. As well. In summary extreme corruptionvis a vis extreme poverty,rampant gross human right abuses and poltical and economic discrimanations and disparitys shall unavoidably lead to thedemise of the TPLF tyranny. An “Ethiopian” popular uprising is thus a natural and dialectical culmination of the misery of all Ethiopians. (Text ends)

LGBT: Ethiopian government cancels anti-gay rally’

Homosexuality 'not a serious crime' says government official, in countrywhere gay sex punishable by 15 years in prison

AFP (April 18, 2014) A planned anti-gay rally in Ethiopia has been cancelled by the government, according to officials. In addition, a plan bythe legislature to add gay sex to a list of crimes ineligible for presidential pardons has been dropped, according to Redwan Hussein, an Ethiopian government spokesman. Gay Ethiopians face severe penalties for living inthe open. Same-sex acts are punishable by up to 15 years in prison and a25-year jail term is given to anyone convicted of infecting another person with HIV during same-sex acts.

But the government does not appear ready to further demonise homosexuals. Redwan said the anti-gay rally was on certain groups' agenda, but not the government's. "It is not a serious crime," he said. "Plus, [homosexuality] is not as widespread as some people suggest. It is already a crime and a certain amount of punishment is prescribed for it. The government thinks the current jail term is enough," said Redwan, who confirmed that gay crimes would not be added to the list of unpardonable crimes.

Hostility toward gays across Africa is high. Uganda and Nigeria increased penalties against homosexual acts this year. Gay people in other countriesface severe discrimination and harmful physical attacks. Two groups had been planning to hold the rally in Addis Ababa on 26 April. Dereje Negash,chairman of a religious group affiliated with the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, said the cancellation happened after the church had asked the government to prevent the rally. "Currently I'm being threatened by the gay community for organising the rally. Despite the threat, I will continue to pursue my struggle against the gay community. I believe I have been given a task by God to do this. I will do this even if it means life or death,"Dereje said.

Dereje said his group is not seeking the harassment of gay people, but hewants Ethiopian law to increase the punishment for gay sex. Dereje said that gay sex tourism is increasing in the country and he wants it stopped."We believe the gay people should be supported to get out of their bad life. We have helped hundreds of people to abandon gay acts so far," he said.

A Book authored by Oromo elderman released at landmark’

A new book entitled “Life: My Vision for the Oromos and Other Peoples of Ethiopia” My authored by the prominent Oromo elderman Obo Bulcha Demeksa , published by the Red Sea Press released at a landmark in April,2014. Obo Bulcha Demeksa’s book spans from his childhood to the growthand transformation plan of the incumbent EPRDF government. The honest narration about his upbringing and the strenuous scarcity of material wealth during his childhood was disarming. In 1938 (when Obo Bulcha was not even 10) his father, Demeksa Senbeto Gerba, who was “Qoro” (an Oromo title equivalent to a sub-district administrator) in Bodji Dermajiof former Wellega province was arrested by the Fascist Italian, and subsequently dies in the Italian prison. Thus, Bulcha’s upbringing was challenged by material wealth deprivation. Nevertheless, Bulcha was destined to be a shining star after hardly worked in great discipline. He came to Addis Ababa. The book recounts that during his childhood and as a student, Bulcha, was brilliant, sharp and great observer. His late father inspired and set a standard for him to be a great man; he toiled to educate himself at any cost. Obo Bulcha comments that his uncle Obo Gobu Senbeto was also an honorable man who committed to help him achieve his dream to get a modern education. The book sheds light how the incumbent ruling-EPRDF planned power distribution. Obo Bulcha had achance to briefly meet Issaias Affeworki, the rebel EPLF leader , during theJuly, 1991 transitional conference.“

He had and still has, as his book discloses, a passion to make Oromiffa asthe parallel official language in Ethiopia as in Switzerland. The book provides the reader with insight into institutional history. Obo Bulcha wasfortunate enough to have established the first private bank in Ethiopia, bea member of a new political party, and work in the ministry of finance during the Emperor’s time in the capacity of Vice Minister and therefore fully informed. He also held a senior position in the World Bank in Washington, DC and was the first African representative of UNDP and many other UN agencies in Nigeria, Gambia and Tanzania. He was ordained to be one of the first individuals to attend the July, 1991 charterconference to establish the transitional government after the fall of the infamous military regime to share power among different parties and nationalities. For these and many other reasons his book is very powerfuland valuable. He is remembered as an outspoken and eloquent parliamentarian in the Federal Parliament after the controversial 2005 national election.

ETHIOPIA: Fine Line - There Is Little As Magnificent ... ‘

ADDIS FORTUNE (April 20, 2014) There is little as magnificent, glaring and dedicatory in illustrating the energy and determination of the Revolutionary Democrats than the Addis-Adama Expressway, gossip observed. Sceptics of their rule might have felt that the late Meles Zenawi had his head in the clouds when inaugurating the construction of the six-lane super highway, thereby heralding his project on Ethiopia's renaissance, back in November 2010, gossip recalls.

He may have passed rather untimely before seeing his dream come true, yet his successor, Hailemariam Desalegn, and his entourage, had a debut on the toll road a couple of weeks ago, gossip disclosed. It won't be his last, claims gossip. He will have to accompany Chinese Prime Minister, Li Keqiang, whose government has provided nearly 800 million dollars in loans. He is due to visit Ethiopia for two days during the first week of May,beginning on the 4th, gossip disclosed. Among some of the projects companies from his country are building in this country, he is scheduled tovisit this expressway built by China Communications & Construction Co. (CCCC), which shortens the driving to Adama down to 45 minutes, gossip reveals. The two prime ministers will no doubt inaugurate the road and open it for public use subsequently, claims gossip.

Yet, the days of Chinese generosity in "no-condition attached" loans availed to Ethiopia - unlike development partners from the west - appearto be numbered, claims gossip. The signs that the Chinese government are holding onto loans have been felt for quite some time, according to gossip. Partly due to restructuring within the Chinese government and itsruling communist party, and influenced by growing concerns over Ethiopia's ability to sustain anymore debts, the Chinese are wary of handing out more cheques, gossip claims.

The administration's point man on the issue, Finance & Economic Development Minister, Sufian Ahmed, had a sojourn to Beijing a few weeks ago. Not only did he meet with his counterpart; he was also given an audience by big bosses of the Chinese EXIM and development banks, ina bid to persuade them to continue providing more loans for his country, with average interest rates of three percent on LIBOR, and a 12-year maturity period, gossip revealed.

He came back with little in the way of good news, claims gossip. The Chinese have stood their ground and have little reason to take any more risks when it comes to Ethiopia, according to gossip. Nonetheless, the door has not been totally slammed shut, gossip claims. They have pointedout to Sufian that should his government be prepared to offer guaranteedexport items and provide concessions on natural resources to their extractive industries, they may offer additional loans, gossip disclosed.

Unfortunately for him and his administration, the finance obtained in suchan arrangement may not exceed half a billion dollars a year and the interest rate could be a little higher and the maturity period shortened, claims gossip.

Subsequent to his return, senior staffs at his Ministry were seen busytrying to determine what sort of natural resources are available in the country to be handed out as a concession, in order to collateralise loans -quite a common practice of the Chinese elsewhere, according to gossip.

Thus, the visit of the Chinese Prime Minister to Ethiopia in May is seen, in the gossip corridors, as being beyond the simple ceremonial cutting of theribbon on the modern expressway, claims gossip.

Hailemairam and his macroeconomic team will have to use the opportunity to implore on Jiabaothat Ethiopia is indeed bankable, and with a historically positive reputationon its commitments to its creditors, whether they come from the west or the east, gossip claims.

Ethiopia's 'villagisation' scheme fails to bear fruit'By William Davison in Gambella (April 22, 2014)

In the village of Elay, people are defying the government and returninghome. Photograph: William Davison. The orderly village of Agulodiek in Ethiopia's western Gambella region stands in stark contrast to Elay, asettlement 5km west of Gambella town, where collapsed straw huts strewn with cracked clay pots lie among a tangle of bushes.

Agulodiek is a patch of land where families gradually gathered of their ownaccord, while Elay is part of the Ethiopian government's contentious "villagisation" scheme that ended last year. The plan in Gambella was to relocate almost the entire rural population of the state over three years.

Evidence from districts surrounding Gambella town suggest the policy is failing. Two years ago people from Agulodiek moved to Elay after officials enticed them with promises of land, livestock, clean water, a corn grinder,education and a health clinic. Instead they found dense vegetation they were unable to cultivate. After one year of selling firewood to survive, they walked back home.

"All the promises were empty," says Apwodho Omot, an ethnic Anuak, sitting in shade at Agulodiek. There is a donor-funded school at the villagewhose dirt paths are swept clear of debris, and the government built a hand pump in 2004 that still draws water from a borehole. Apwodho's community says they harvest corn twice a year from fertile land they havecleared. "We don't know why the government picked Elay," she says.

Gambella region's former president Omod Obang Olum reported last yearthat 35,000 households had voluntarily moved from a target of 45,000.

The official objective had been to cluster scattered households to make public service delivery more efficient. Critics such as Human Rights Watchsaid the underlying reason was to clear the way for agricultural investors,and that forced evictions overseen by soldiers involved rape and murder. The Ethiopian government refute the allegations.

Last month the London-based law firm Leigh Day & Co began proceedingsagainst the UK Department for International Development (DfID) at the high court after a man from Gambella alleged he suffered abuse when theagency supported the resettlement scheme. Since 2006, DfID and other donors have funded a multibillion-dollar programme in Ethiopia that paysthe salaries of key regional government workers such as teachers and nurses through the Protection of Basic Services scheme. A DfID spokesman said: “We will not comment on ongoing legal action, however,the UK has never funded Ethiopia’s resettlement programmes. Our support to the Protection of Basic Services Programme is only used to provide essential services like healthcare, schooling and clean water.”

Karmi, 10km from Gambella town, is a newly expanded community for those resettled along one of the few tarmac roads. Two teachers scrub clothes in plastic tubs on a sticky afternoon. A herd of goats nibble shrubs as purple and orange lizards edge up tree trunks. There is little activity in the village, which has bare pylons towering over it waiting for high-voltagecables to improve Gambella’s patchy electricity supply. The teachers work in an impressive school built in 2011 with funds from the UN refugee agency. It has a capacity of 245 students for grades one to five – yet the teachers have only a handful of pupils per class. “This is a new village but the people have left,” says Tigist Megersa.

Kolo Cham grows sorghum and corn near the Baro river, a 30-minute walkfrom his family home at Karmi. The area saw an influx of about 600 people at the height of villagisation, says Kolo, crouching on a tree stump,surrounded only by a group of children with a puppy. Families left when they got hungry and public services weren’t delivered. “They moved one by one so the government didn’t know the number was decreasing,” he says.

The Anuak at Karmi have reason to fear the authorities, particularly Ethiopia’s military. Several give accounts of beatings and arrests by soldiers as they searched for the perpetrators of a nearby March 2012*attack on a bus* that killed 19. The insecurity was a key factor in the exodus, according to residents. As well as the Anuak, who have tended crops near riverbanks in Gambella for more than 200 years, the region is home to cattle-herding Nuer residents, who began migrating from Sudan in the late 19th century. Thousands of settlers from northern Ethiopia alsoarrived in the 1980s when the highlands suffered a famine. The government blamed the bus attack on Anuak rebels who consider their homeland colonised.

David Pred is the managing director of Inclusive Development International. The charity is representing Gambella residents, who have*accused the World Bank* of violating its own policies by funding the resettlement programme. An involuntary, abusive, poorly planned and inadequately funded scheme was bound to fail, he says. “It requires immense resources, detailed planning and a process that is truly participatory in order for resettlement to lead to positive development outcomes,” he adds. Most of flood-prone Gambella, one of Ethiopia’s leastdeveloped states, is covered with scrub and grasslands. Inhospitable terrain makes it difficult for villagisation to take root in far-flung places such as Akobo, which borders South Sudan. Akobo is one of the three districts selected for resettlement, according to Kok Choul, who representsthe district in the regional council.

In 2009, planners earmarked Akobo for four new schools, clinics, vets, flourmills and water schemes, as well as 76km of road. But the communityof about 30,000 has seen no change, says 67-year-old Kok, who has 19 children from four wives. “There is no road to Gambella so there is no development,” he says. One well-placed civil servant explains that funds for services across the region were swallowed by items such as daily allowances for government workers. A senior regional official says the state ran low on funds for resettlement, leading to delivery failures and cost-cutting. For example, substandard corn grinders soon broke and havenot been repaired, he says. The government will continue to try to provideplanned services in three districts including Akobo this year and next, according to the official.

However, the programme has transformed lives, with some farmers harvesting three times a year, says Ethiopia’s ambassador to the UK, Berhanu Kebede. The government is addressing the “few cases that are not fully successful”, he says. Service provision is ongoing and being monitored and improved upon if required, according to Kebede. At Elay, Oman Nygwo, a wiry 40-year-old in cut-off jeans, gives a tour of desertedhuts and points to a line of mango trees that mark his old home on the banks of the Baro. He is scathing about the implementation of the schemebut remains in Elay as there is less risk of flooding. There was no violenceaccompanying these resettlements, Oman says, but “there would be problems if the government tried to move us again”. (Text ends)

PROTEST: Federal Police kill at least 8 in Afar region’

ESAT News (April 22, 2014) Local residents and human rights organisations say that Ethiopia’s Federal Police force has killed at least eight people in Kurkura area of Afar, Eastern Ethiopia following the inter-clan conflict between the Afar and the Somali people last week. The Afar People Party (APP) on its part says the number of people killed amounts totwelve.

The local people near Awash Sebat Kilo have blocked transportation to Djibouti port for 12 hours after the police took the actions. Although theofficials of Afar region travelled to the area to talk to the people, the people responded saying that they do not represent them. The blockadereportedly stopped after three officers of the Ethiopian Defense Forces promised the people that the problems will be solved within ten days.

A resident of the area told that she witnessed the killing of eight peopleincluding an eighty-five years old elderly. She said another pregnant woman who was crying for her killed son was severely beaten. She said although the government has gone to Somalia to do ‘peacekeeping’, it hascompletely forgotten its own citizens here.

Gaas Ahmed, Chairman of the Afar Human Rights Organisation, said he has got the list of the deceased. He said there is also a meeting now underway in Dire Dawa to demarcate the borders of the two regional states. Gaas said the Afar people have to fight for their rights. He asked all parties and international human rights organisations to stand with thepeople. Efforts to speak to government officials regarding the issues hasnot been successful.

ETHICS: Over ETB 800 million is unaudited: Office of the Federal Auditor-General'

ESAT News (April 23, 2014) – In its report of the past fiscal year to the Parliament, the Office of the Federal Auditor General of Ethiopia (OFAG) said that eight hundred eighty-seven million forty-five thousand two hundred sixty four Ethiopian birr has been unaccounted in over 77 governmental organisations. A financial management sample study conducted on five government organisations, a deficit of one million birr has also been found. It is to be recalled that last year, in a similar investigation a financial deficit amounting three billion bisrr was found inthe Ethiopian Ministry of Defense. Genetic code of bloodsucking tsetse fly cracked'

The major scientific breakthrough is expected to speed up research oncontrolling the tsetse fly, the bane of farmers in sub-Saharan Africa.

UN News VIENNA (April 25, 2014) - Scientists in a United Nations-backed collaborative have cracked the genetic code of the bloodsucking tsetse fly in a breakthrough that brings new hope to the fight against one of the most devastating livestock diseases spread by the insect. Tsetse flies are vectors for the single-cell parasites that cause trypanosomiasis, or nagana, an often-lethal disease that affects some 3 million animals in sub-Saharan Africa each year at massive costs to farmers' livelihoods and foodsecurity. The tsetse genome was sequenced and annotated during a 10- year global collaborative effort that involved the Insect Pest Control Laboratory run jointly by the Rome-based UN Food and Agriculture Organization FAO and the International Atomic Energy Agency IAEA in Vienna. Scientists will now be able to better study the fly's genes and functions, knowledge that should open the door for researching ways to control the insect, according to a news release issued by the two UN agencies. "Decoding the tsetse fly's DNA is a major scientific breakthrough that opens the way for more effective control of trypanosomiasis, which is good news for millions of herders and farmers in sub-Saharan Africa," saidKostas Bourtzis of the Joint FAO/IAEA Division of Nuclear Techniques in Food and Agriculture. "Detection and treatment of trypanosomiasis is currently expensive, difficult and dangerous for the livestock as it often involves toxic drugs, but this new knowledge will accelerate research on tsetse control methods and help scientists develop new and complementary strategies to reduce the use of costly drugs and insecticides," he said. Trypanosomiasis leads to a debilitating chronic condition that reduces fertility, weight gain, meat and milk production, and makes livestock too weak to be used for ploughing or transport, which in turn affects crop production. Humans bitten by carrier flies can develop African sleeping sickness, which can be fatal without treatment. No vaccine against the disease exists for livestock or humans because the parasite is able to evade mammalian immune systems, so control methods primarily involve targeting tsetse flies through trapping, pesticide treatments and sterile male release strategies. The Joint FAO/IAEA Division is currently supporting 14 African nations in their efforts to tackle the trypanosomiasisproblem by controlling tsetse fly populations by integrating the sterile insect technique with other control methods. A form of "insect birth control," according to the Division, the sterile insect technique involves releasing mass-bred male flies that have been sterilized by low doses of radiation into infested areas, where they mate with wild females. These donot produce offspring and, as a result, the technique can suppress and, if applied systematically on an area-wide basis, eventually eradicate populations of wild flies. Tsetse flies were successfully eradicated from theisland of Zanzibar using the sterile insect technique and are currently being suppressed in parts of southern Ethiopia. In January, Senegal reported that it was making significant progress in infested areas in the Niayes with the same method.

URGENT ACTION: Opposition leaders denied medical treatment -AI'

AI (April 25, 2014) – Olbana Lelisa and Bekele Gerba are being denied medical treatment. The two men, political opposition leaders and prisonersof conscience, are reported to be ill in Kaliti prison, Ethiopia. Olbana Lelisa's friends believe his condition may be life-threatening.

Several months ago Olbana Lelisa and Bekele Gerba were moved from Ziway prison south of Addis Ababa, to Kaliti prison on the outskirts of thecapital city, reportedly after a doctor in Ziway referred the two men for hospital treatment. However, since the transfer, the men have been denied access to a hospital. It is not clear what is wrong with the wo menas they have not access to a full diagnosis.

Olbana Lelisa and Bekele Gerba were arrested in August 2011, within daysof meeting with Amnesty International staff. They were charged with crimes against the state based on alleged support for the proscribed groupthe Oromo Liberation Front – a charge regularly used to silence members of ethnic Oromo political opposition parties. After a trial marred by irregularities, they were both convicted in November 2012. In a subsequent sentencing hearing Bekele Gerba was sentenced to 8 years' imprisonment and Olbana Lelisa was sentenced to 13 years' imprisonment.

Both sentences were later reduced on appeal to 3 years and 7 months, and 11 years respectively. Amnesty International considers the two menprisoners of conscience, imprisoned because of their legitimate and peaceful political activity, and should be immediately and unconditionallyreleased.

ETHIOPIA: Ethnic politics and the Addis Master Plan'By Tedla Asfaw (April 26, 2014)

Ethiopian students of our generation are known for being politically very active. We grew up chanting "Land to the Tiller, Merete LeArashu". Many died for that cause and it seems this generation of Ethiopians known fighting among ethnic lines in colleges and universities came up with theirslogan of keeping lands that "belong" to them to remain with them. They exchanged Land to the Tiller for " Land to My Tribe " !!! The Ambo University students on April 25, 2014 were heard chanting slogans, "Burayu is not for sale", "Sululta is not for sale", "Legetafo is not for sale"."Oromia for Oromos". They also cry Finfine/Addis Ababa is Oromia.

They claim that the new Master plan for Addis Ababa is going to be built by taking huge land from the surrounding Oromia. They said similar encroachment is underway in Diredawa, Melka Jeldu, Ambo, Bishoftu andother Oromia areas. Their fear is Oromia surface area is shrinking on its way denying them to build viable Oromo Republic. If the protest was in support of the farmers in the surrounding area why have we not seen such protest organized by students when foreign land buyers took huge amount of land by dislocating farmers. This protest was not about the farmers.

As one person truly put it on the discussion on the master plan it is about Identity. Oromo Land is only for Oromos. The students at Ambo Universitycould have brought other students if their demand was about the farmers.Who said that all the farmers surrounding Addis Ababa are only Oromos.

How comes we did not hear this voice when Amhara farmers were kickedout recently from Ambo area ??

For Ambo University protesters Addis Ababa is Finfine but they know very well that the residents of Addis Ababaare comprising Ethiopians from all ethnic groups. Was a referendum on the name ?

Addis Ababa is a city that has grown from 137.63 square km in 1991 to 527.06 square km in 2014 according the data released covering the protest. The population of Metro Addis Ababa is estimated 4.5 million according to recent census. Addis Ababa will not build fence to stop the flow of people who are coming to start life there. The Addis Ababa I was born and grew up has expanded in all directions without any plan in the last two decades. The Addis Master Plan is a plan modeled after Chinese development plan to accommodate the expansion of the city whose population has quadrupled in the last two decades. The "Development Government" can do whatever it wants. Public input is zero. It is given from top down and has to be implemented whether any one likes it or not.

The students protest should challenge the planning process executed without consulting the people. If the protest is about "identity" or keepingonce Kilil from " foreigners " it is not going to get huge support. Oromo Kilil like the rest of Kilils was not designed by consulting people. It was a political "map" of divide and rule. Kilil Identity is a time bomb and it is upto all of us diffusing this bomb. The interest of Ethiopia and Ethiopians should come first before Kilil Identity and interest. We need to build a "Renaissance Generation" on the foot step of "Land to the Tiller" patriotic Ethiopian generation of our student day, The Golden Generation !!! (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA: Poor Gambella! So Far from Addis Ababa, So Close to SouthSudan’

By William Davison (April 26, 2014)

GAMBELLA, Ethiopia - It’s a wild ride returning from rebel-held territory inSouth Sudan to the region of Gambella in western Ethiopia. Bush fires dotthe plains, with flames from the largest edging dangerously onto the road.A Nile crocodile scuttles between swamps. As our truck clatters towards them, families of antelope freeze before prancing into grasslands. These are white-eared kob, around half a million of which leave the Sudd wetlands of South Sudan and travel a hundred kilometers across open country to graze in Gambella before seasonal rains come in July. This year, alongside what is believed to be Africa's second-largest annual animal migration, humans are also moving east and en masse across these porous borders.

After over half a century of frequent war and displacement, a new conflict has broken out in recently independent South Sudan, leading to a further wave of migration of ethnic Nuer people to Ethiopia. So far, in four monthsof fighting between the government and the primarily Nuer rebels, over 90,000 people have sought refuge in Gambella at makeshift camps. More than 70,000 refugees were already present after fleeing violence duringSouth Sudan's war for independence and, more recently, ethnic strife inJonglei state.
For Gambella - part of Ethiopia's low-lying hinterland, historically, economically, and ethnically apart from the temperate highlands - the conflict and the influx look likely to prolong its stagnation. Due to the war,plans to construct highways, oil refineries and railways linking South Sudan and Ethiopia will be delayed, and with them Gambella's chances of becoming more closely integrated into the region's economy. Instead, as in decades past, the cross-border traffic will continue to be aid workers, essential goods, refugees, and rebels.
Support for Machar: The Nuer have been migrating to Gambella for over acentury, with the trend accelerated by civil war in southern Sudan. They are mostly members of the Jikany sub-group and have become the Gambella's most populous ethnic group. Most of the community seem to support the objective of South Sudan's former vice-president Riek Machar,a Nuer, whose rebel forces are currently at war with those of President Salva Kiir, a Dinka.
The two politicians have long been rivals and in December, a power struggle between the two spilled over into clashes between soldiers supporting one or the other. The conflict quickly spread and became deeply polarised as civilians were targeted based on their ethnicities. People in Gambella are furious with Kiir for the killings of Nuer in Juba, while many have relatives now sheltering in the UN's compounds in South Sudan.
"The government here is not happy with what happened in Juba," says one local close to security issues, referring to the Nuer officials who runGambella's regional administration. "They are on the side of the Nuer opposition, but they don't show it." The local politicians hide their viewsbecause it would put them at odds with Ethiopian government in Addis Ababa, which is striving to be an impartial mediator in the conflict. The reality, however, is that Gambella is an obvious meeting point for Nuer rebels.
Ties that bind: A journey to Nasir, a stronghold of the rebellion just over the border in South Sudan, involves a three-hour drive from Gambella town to the crossing point of Burbiey on the Baro river, which flows into the Sobat, a tributary of the White Nile. The only official that stops our vehicle is a tall, well-spoken Gambella National Park guard asking if our purpose is to view the migrating antelope and other wildlife. At the entrance to Burbiey, regional police, both Nuer, wave us through a checkpoint with a rope slumped across the road. Minutes after arriving atthe collection of huts and souks milling with migrants and traders, we shuffle down a steep muddy bank onto a boat that ferries us across the Baro into South Sudan. Armed men with looted pick-up trucks wait at thebank to take us to Nasir. There are no border officials in sight.

The existence of this passage is no secret. Machar's delegates at negotiations in Addis Ababa openly invite journalists to visit Nuer territoryin Upper Nile and Jonglei states, and friendly Gambella officials are informed to ensure journeys through the region go smoothly. However, reporters aren't the only ones travelling. On our way to Nasir, we were accompanied by a former gender officer in the Upper Nile government andan ex-administrator of Juba airport who are looking to take up civilian roles in rebel areas. Other Nuer with strong Ethiopian ties were already there. For example, flanking the commander of Nasir County's militia was Nhial Tuach Riek. Riek obtained a biology degree from Gondar University in northern Ethiopia yet returned home to fight for his people. A man whose previous job was in the agriculture office of Gambella's regional government assists the rebel acting commissioner of Nasir County.

History repeating, almost: Despite Gambella's tacit support for the currentcause, it is playing a less prominent part in the war across the border thanin the 1980s, when the south's Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA) was fighting a war against the Sudanese government in Khartoum. At thistime, Sudan was supporting Eritrean rebels who were fighting Ethiopian troops, and Ethiopia was helping arm the SPLA. Cold War proxy politics also featured: the Soviet Union allied with socialist Ethiopia, while the US, which had interests in Sudan after Chevron struck oil, backed Khartoum.

Part of Ethiopia's support for the SPLA was in allowing it to set up bases inGambella. Here, the Sudanese rebels recruited and trained tens of thousands of young men from refugee camps. The forces, including many Dinka, stole cattle, looted grain, and fought with Anuak and Nuer. And in Itang, 50 km west of Gambella town, people stopped growing food out of fear of the SPLA, according to Obang Ojud Ogera, a 70-year-old Anuak member of Gambella state council.

Given this past experience, officials more recently had to persuade locals that the new influx from South Sudan wouldn't pose a similar threat. "Theproblems caused by the SPLA were in their mind," says Ogera. Additionally, this time around, Ethiopia's neutrality in South Sudan's conflict and a beefy internal security apparatus make a re-run of Gambellaas a rebel base unthinkable, says the security officer who wished to remain anonymous.

Delayed development: Indeed, in the long-term, it seems the immediatesecurity implications of the conflict in South Sudan will not be as damaging as the effect on the region's already stunted development. Gambella, which had been home to the Anuak people for two centuries,became part of modern Ethiopia at the end of the 19th century. From 1902, the British ran the town as a bustling port for its colony in Sudan.

When Sudan achieved independence in 1956, Gambella returned to Ethiopian administration. In 1969, during the first Sudanese civil war (1955 to 1972), a group of separatists called the Anya-Anya formed withthe aiming of creating a nation out of all Nilotic people, including Anuak and Nuer from Gambella. But according to the historian Dereje Feyissa, there was no local political power over which to battle.
In the next decade, the SPLA dominated the region. Also significant was the arrival of tens of thousands of settlers, some trucked from the north where drought and civil war had led to famine. Many of these highlandersnow run restaurants, bars, hotels, taxis and garages in Gambella town to the almost total exclusion of Nuer and Anuak business owners. After alliedrebels overthrew a national socialist regime in 1991, a constitutional system of ethnic-based federalism emerged that protected minorities' culture and language. Yet, although it granted Anuak and Nuer local political power, the promise of the change remains unfulfilled.
Patching over problems: There are no barges full of coffee or ivory flowingto the Nile these days. But below the bridge spanning the Baro, near the remains of the port, aid agencies' Toyota Land Cruisers are bathed alongside locals. The town is humming as the centre of a major humanitarian operation for South Sudanese refugees. Hotels are block- booked for weeks by United Nations agencies. Street-side noticeboards are full of advertised positions at international NGOs, along with the usual government jobs. Additech, an electrical services firm, is the only private business advertising a vacancy. Emergency relief, now again dominating aid programmes in Gambella, is the least progressive type of assistance asthere is no attempt to tool people to help themselves, says one charity boss. Gambella, tied intimately to volatile South Sudan, is "often considered at a standstill in terms of development," he says.
The transient boost to the local economy comes as Addis Ababa's latest attempts to advance Gambella flounder. The region was promoted as a key part of a commercial farming push because its sparse population left masses of fertile bush to be developed. But the 5-year-old attempts of one high-profile Indian investor, Karuturi Global, to farm 100,000 hectaresare in disarray after the company discovered four-fifths of its plot was in afloodplain. A 10,000-hectare rice project backed by Ethiopia's largest foreign investor, billionaire Mohammed al-Amoudi, has also slowed. And while Saudi Star was given the right to water from the socialist-era dam on the Alwero river in years ago, it is cultivating on just 250 hectares as ithas not completed the irrigation canal begun by engineers from the SovietUnion. Attempts at social engineering appear similarly unsuccessful. In 2010, the government launched an attempt to cluster scattered settlements in Gambella, arguing that service provision would be more cost-efficient. While bureaucrats claim success in overseeing the voluntaryrelocation of almost the entire rural population, it seems to have largely failed as settlers returned to their original homes when promised schooland clinics weren't built.
Currently the influx of Nuer into Gambella is being treated as a humanitarian emergency, but it may have longer-term political ramifications for the area. For decades Anuak people have felt marginalised by the influx of Nuer and highlanders, says Feyissa. The current Nuer movement may renew tensions if Anuak believe they're hereto stay, further altering the area's demographics in their rival's favour, hesuggests.

"The refugee phenomenon has been a central part of regional politics since the 1960s, to the extent it has radically changed regional democracy," he says. "The Anuak think they're the main indigenous groupbut because of the continued influx of Nuer refuges it affects the power balance."
Integrated disaster: The masses of white-eared kob dodging our truck onthe road to South Sudan are an indicator of Gambella's rich potential.
Elephant and giraffe also live among vast stretches of savannah, forest and swamp, far from any of the state's few roads. Stability and political support for an integrated development plan could turn Gambella into a thriving region, experts believe. If done properly, local communities couldbenefit while the potential for tourism and farming is tapped without disrupting the ecosystem.
But the current instability is also a blow to big-ticket regional infrastructure schemes. At the time of South Sudan's independence in 2011, Harry Verhoeven, a researcher at Oxford University, described the potential for economic integration between the new nation and Ethiopia. He suggested that Gambella could soon be connected by road to South Sudan's three eastern states. "Over the long term, there is the potential for a deal with Ethiopia which could export cheap power to an electricity-starved South Sudan in exchange for continued oil supplies," he wrote.
However, the latest crisis is a "disaster" for this potential integration, Verhoeven now says. And Gambella's appeal to agricultural investors is also likely to wane. "The results so far are not great and the regional instability is certainly not going to lead to an increase of investment andinvestor attention in Gambella," he says. (Text ends)
URBAN LAND GRAB: Regime evicting residents of landmark Addisneighborhoods'
Residents of Kazanchis, American Gibi, Teklehaimanot, Kirkos, DejachWube Sefer, given just 3 weeks to evacuate; land sold to developers.
The Reporter (April 26, 2014) - The Addis Ababa City Administration urgedcity residents in some of the oldest neighborhoods in city, such as Kazanchis, American Gibi and Teklehaimanot, to relocate their residential quarters within 20 days from a total of 1,200 hectares of land, hithertoearmarked for the Local Redevelopment Program (LRDP).
Residents who received the urgent notice include residents in Kazanchis, Teklehaimanot areas and Lideta areas. In addition, the city administrationidentified a list of places such as American Gibi, Addis Ketema Sub city, places around the African Union, neighborhoods in Kirkos Sub city and thefamous Dejach Wube Sefer located in Arada Sub city, once well-known forbeing a red light district and disco street. The administration also disclosed that it is preparing to evict thousands of resident from places like Teklehaimanot and stretched up to Wabi Shebelle hotel.
According to information obtained from the administration, its plan was toclear over 1,200 hectares of land for the redevelopment program in 2013/14. It was also learnt that out of the stated area, some 40 hectareswill be up for leasing and investors immediately. Before the end of the budget year, 26 hectares of land around Kazanchis that covers the areas from Intercontinental to Yordanos Hotels extending to Bambis Supermarket to Saint Urael Church until taxi stops to Arat Kilo are selected for the redevelopment. Residents of this locality are among the people who have received their relocation orders this week.

Similarly, another 33 hectares is also under the same project that extendsfrom Teklehaimanot to Hotel D'Afrique, while 15 hectares is on the other list that covers the neighborhood behind the AU where AU is undertaking its expansion projects. However, Deputy head of the Addis Ababa City Administration Land Development and Urban Renewal Agency, Girma Birhanu, told The Reporter that furnishing relocated residents with condominium houses is the main existing challenges to implement the redevelopment process. It was also noted that the city administration is building some 16,000 condominium houses around Bole Bulbula area to be handed over to residents.

BILATERAL COOPERATION: Norway's Development Cooperation withEthiopia'

Background: Brief History of Norwegian support to Ethiopia through theEmbassy'

Norway officially opened its Embassy in Addis Ababa in 1992 and began toprovide Official Development Assistance the following year.

However, cooperation between Ethiopia and Norway backdates much earlier, in 1955 to 1965 the Royal Norwegian government helped to buildup a modern territorial naval coast guard and in the 1960s economic support was also given to infrastructural development.

Norwegian bilateral assistance is today primarily targeted to climate-related support and support for the promotion of human rights, democracy and good governance. Norway's climate commitment in Ethiopia is concentrated on renewable energy, climate adapted agriculture/food security and forest. Rights perspectives are integrated into the initiative and actively followed up, with a particular focus on women's rights and gender equality, strengthening the role and participation of civil society, consultations with affected populations and transparency. The Embassy in Addis Ababa has also been a pilot embassyfor the work on women's rights and equal opportunities. The Embassy hasparticularly supported efforts to combat female genital mutilation. It has for many years supported the University collaboration between the agricultural universities in Ethiopia and UMB. Gender issues are well integrated into the support of the agricultural universities.

Management Responsibility and Channel Selection - Most of Norway's bilateral assistance to Ethiopia (about 67% in 2013) is managed by the Royal Norwegian Embassy in Addis Ababa. Norad also manages funding toEthiopia (approximately 23% in 2013). The majority of the bilateral assistance is channeled through multilateral channels (the World Bank, UNDP, UNFPA, UNICEF, UN Women) and civil society (both the Norwegianand Ethiopian NGOs). The support that formally can be categorized as State-to-state aid is mainly related to support to the energy sector.

Human Rights, Democracy and Good Governance - Ethiopia has ratified a number of international human rights instruments. These include the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), InternationalCovenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR), the Convention on the Elimination of All forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) and the Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC).In 2013, Ethiopia became a member to the Human Rights Council.

Ethiopia was reviewed by the Human Rights Council (Universal PeriodicReview) in 2009 and is finalizing its 2nd round of submission (2014).

Ethiopia accepted the overwhelming majority of the recommendations (98out of 142). As a follow up to the recommendations, Ethiopia adopted its National Human Rights Action Plan (2013-2015). Norway supported this as part of its support to the Democratic Institutions Program (DIP). The Action Plan attempts to dwell on both civil and political and economic and social rights. There are concerns related to the narrowing space for the operation of civil societies in Ethiopia following the adoption of the Charities and Societies Proclamation and the accompanying directives.

ETHIOPIA: Security Forces Open Fire on Students’

CNN iReport (April 27, 2014) - There has been widespread protest by Oromo students in universities in Ethiopia against unpopular 'Addis Ababa-Finfinnee surrounding integrated master plan'. Oromo students in Haromaya, Jimma, Ambo and Wollega universities held protests.

Although officials in Oromia state and Addis Ababa city administration insist the plan only intends to develop Addis Ababa and its surrounding, Oromo students and the wider Oromo elites believe the plan is to displacefarmers in the outskirts and suburban areas of the city, meet the growingdemand for land, and weaken the Oromo identity. The Ethiopian constitution grants a special interest to the Oromia state regarding administrative, resource and other socio-economic matters in Addis Ababa, in its article 49 which never have been implemented. This has largely resulted in significant resistance within the ruling party, OPDO, in Oromia and a continues pressure to materialize the implementation.

The protest against the doomed to fail master plan is held in four universities sofar. Yesterday (26/04/2014) at Wollega University, the infamous and notorious Federal police opened fire at innocent Oromo students. Reports and eye witness indicate unknown number of students were hurt and some have fled to the bushes. The people of Nekemete town were prevented from joining the resistance. Even then some of the residents broke through line of federal police force and joined the protest.

At similar protest in Jimma university, the security forces picked more than 10 students and jailed them. Further 15 students in Ambo universitywere jailed.

The uproar against the plan is resonating across different segments of Oromo society. A singer by name Jafar Yusuf was jailed last week that isbelieved to be because he released a single condemning the plan. The diaspora is is voicing its concerns through the newly launched diaspora based Oromia Media

Network. The security forces in Ethiopia are dominated by the Tigrayan minority who have been in power since the downfall of Derg communist regime in 1991. The Oromos are the most prosecuted in Ethiopia. More than 40000 Oromos are in jail, although thecorrect figure is hard to know.

PRESS: Six Members of Blogging Collective Arrested in Ethiopia'

Globalvoices (April 27, 2014) - On April 25, six members of the Zone Nineblogging collective [am] were arrested in Ethiopia. Allies report that they are now being held at Maekelawi, a detention center in Addis Ababa, the nation's capital. News of the arrests first broke on Twitter, where fellow bloggers and social media users voiced support for those arrested and expressed their own fears about what may be to come. Formed in 2012, the Zone Nine group has leveraged significant critiques ofruling government policy and practice. We have managed to conduct online campaigns in an effort to raise awareness about political repression in the country. We are also dedicated to translating international news for local audiences — through our partnership with Global Voices, we launched Global Voices in Amharic two years ago.

We believe we have been a surveillance target of the Ethiopian government since the death of the Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. We have written critical articles about Zenawi's so-called economic development and other achievements. While he received favourable reports we haveshown his achievement is dubious

As of today, no charges had been issued to the members of our group who were arrested today.

Unfortunately, these arrests are not the first of their kind. In the suburbs of Addis Ababa, there is a large prison called Kality where many political prisoners are currently being held, among them journalists Eskinder Nega and Reeyot Alemu. The journalists have told us a lot about the prison and its appalling conditions. Kality is dividedinto eight different zones, the last of which — Zone Eight — is dedicated to journalists, human right activists and dissidents. When we came together, we decided to create a blog for the proverbial prison in which allEthiopians live: this is Zone Nine.

Editor's note: These prisoners of conscience, known as #Zone9 bloggers &journalists are imprisoned according to informants, because an evidence isobtained that indicates their secret collaboration with Article 19 which thatis working to create unrest public disorder whos head expelled from Ethiopia in earlier weeks. Mimi Sebhatu, the pro-regime journalist, on top of her blindely support to the regime further blames the bloggers and journalists have held serious of meetings in hotels along with the so called Article 19 to destabilize the nation. It was obvious that she would report everything that went on not as a reporter but as of the incumbent regime's interest.

Ethio-Americans to urge Kerry to be firm on human rights issues inEthiopia'

WASHINGTON, DC - Ethiopian Americans have a message for Secretary ofState John Kerry: Be firm on human rights violations in Ethiopia. The message will be conveyed when the activists protest beginning 10:00Am on Monday at State Department in the nation's capital. The tyrannical regime in Addis has launched fresh rounds of arrests that included key figures of the opposition Blue Party, dozens of Blue Party members as wellas seven bloggers known for their independent way of writing. The arrestswere made ahead of a planned protest rally on Sunday in Addis.

It is to be recalled that John Kerry had in his previous speech mentioned prominent Ethiopian journalist Eskinder Nega as evidence that human rights violations in Ethiopia are rampant and of serious concern to the USgovernment. Eskinder is serving 18 years in prison for being a blogger, yes, a blogger. "A year to go before the 'general elections,' the regime istightening the noose around freedom of speech, opinion and thought," Blue Party North America support group said in a statement, calling on fellow Ethiopians and their friends in Washington DC metro and surrounding areas to join the protest rally and express outrage at the TPLF-led government's ongoing human rights violations.

DIPLOMACY: U.S Potential Influence on policy making in Ethiopia’

Secretary Kerry to tell PMHD to respect the right of all Ethiopians not justhomosexuals’

EM (April 27, 2014) US Secretary of State John Kerry is leaving for Ethiopia and a few other African countries on Tuesday. The U.S. for decades supported the immoral racist regime or the Apartheid system (akin to Killel) in South Africa, until the pressure and the noise got too hotfor them to justify it. Of course, the U.S. knew for certain that Apartheid was wrong, but they justified it based on their own national interest. The same thing is going on in Ethiopia. Like its support for Apartheid regime, the U.S. will align with the regime until enough pressure comes. Of course, making phone calls is one of them, but have to align enough congressional and public support in the U.S. to expose their immoral and expedient nature at the expense of the Ethiopian people. Demonstration to demand Secretary Kerry raise Human Rights Violations during his upcoming trip to Ethiopia and to show solidarity for jailed Semayawi partyleaders and members, Zone 9 independent Journalists and all Political Prisoners - A protest demonstration has called for Monday April 28, 2014 in Washington, DC in front of the State Department ahead of Secretary John Kerry's scheduled visit to Ethiopia. The protest rally is planned to show solidarity with detained Semayawi Party members, recently arrested, independent journalists and bloggers from Zone 9 group and political prisoners and to urge Secretary Kerry to make human rights and freedom of expression as one of his main topics of discussion during his stay in Addis Ababa.

It's to be recalled that in the last few days, the TPLF led regime in Ethiopiahas arrested over 50 Semayawi (Blue) Party members ahead of their planned peaceful and legal protest rally on Sunday April the 27th. The regime is also tightening its grip on freedom of expression in a major crackdown with the arrest of numerous members from independent blogger and activist group (Zone 9). With still a year to go before the "general elections", the regime is tightening the screws on its iron curtain on freedom of speech, opinion and thought. We urge Ethiopians and friends of Ethiopians in Washington DC metro and surrounding areas to join us to express our outrage at EPRDF led government spiteful action against peaceful political party members, independent journalists and to demand the release of political prisoners and to urge Secretary Kerry to make human rights and freedom of expression as one of his main topics during his upcoming visit to Ethiopia.

Stop financing tyranny like in Ethiopia: Economist William Easterly’

PBS (April 28, 2014) - Meles was a tyrant who was not a promoter but ahurdle to development in Ethiopia. The late dictator killed demonstratorsin the streets after rigged election, put journalists like Eskinder Nega behind bars. We should stop financing tyranny and repression. This was the short message that William Easterly said during his interview with Tavis Smiley. Ethiopians know well Meles’ only interest is staying on power for so long. He will use aid money, sweet speeches, empty promises and so on, to accomplish his goal of staying on power. So far hehas succeeded. Nearly 22 years in power and he is trying hard to make itto 25 years. He is one of the longest running head of government in Africa. More Ethiopians believe that the only way to reduce poverty is by having a leader who is accountable to the constituency.

Ethiopia hailed as 'African lion' with fastest creation of millionaires’By David Smith, Guardian (April 28, 2014)

EM Editor's Note - The following piece is a poorly-researched, one-sided story that easily passes for one of the propaganda works of the government in Addis. Tip for reporter: Google the names Seid Hassan, Minga Negash, Getachew Begashaw, among others, and get the facts foryour own sake.

"Dawn. And as the sun breaks through the piercing chill of night on the plain outside Korem it lights up a biblical famine, now, in the 20th century. This place, say workers here, is the closest thing to hell on earth." That television news report by the BBC's Michael Buerk in 1984 framed Ethiopia for a generation as a place of famine and in need of salvation. Almost 30 years later the country is hailed by pundits as an "African lion" after a decade of stellar economic growth. Now further evidence of its turnaround has arrived with research showing that Ethiopiais creating millionaires at a faster rate than any other country on the continent.

The number of dollar millionaires in the east African nation rose from 1,300 in 2007 to 2,700 by September this year, according to New World Wealth, a consultancy based in the UK and South Africa. That figure puts the country well ahead of Angola, up by 68%, and Tanzania, which had a51% increase. Zambia and Ghana completed the top five. The study findsthat the rise in millionaires has been closely tied to GDP growth, in whichEthiopia has also fared best over the past six years achieving 93%, followed by Egypt (81%) and Angola (61%). The authors note, however, that Ethiopia started from a very low base, and its per capital wealth is still just $470 (£287), compared to $3,187 (£1,948) in Egypt and $7,508 (£4,588) in South Africa.

African Millionaires – Fastest Growing Countries (2007 to 2013)Growth in % & Millionaires

GHANA ---------- 50% 2, 400 Millionaires

KENYA ---------- 24% 8, 400 MillionairesSource: NW-WEALTH.COM

Andrew Amoils, a senior analyst at New World Wealth, said: "The economic and wealth growth in Ethiopia over the last five or six years hasbeen really strong. There has been a lot of privatisation and certain sectors are growing well. It's a huge upswing but it started from a low base." As in other parts of Africa, however, the growth is not necessarily shared. "The millionaires are growing at a faster rate than the middle class, which doesn't really exist in a lot of African countries, including Ethiopia," Amoils said. "Angola, for example, has had massive millionaire growth in the last 10 years but that hasn't spilled through to the average Angolan."

But whereas much of Africa's boom has been driven by mineral resources,leading sectors for millionaires in Ethiopia include agriculture, manufacturing and transport.

The richest Ethiopian is said to be the businessman Mohammed Hussein AlAmoudi , who divides his time between Ethiopia and Saudi Arabia, where he now has citizenship.

A construction boom is underway in the capital, Addis Ababa, but Amare Abebaw, a social entrepreneur, said the rest of the world does still did notappreciate the country's extraordinary transformation.

"When I go home and watch TV I still see the famine from the 80s and I wonder how do they still show this on the BBC when things have improvedhere? It is painful for us. We know it is part of our history but we want to focus on the present."

Nevertheless, while the number of millionaires is definitely increasing,they remain a fraction of the population.

"There are a few at the top but the majority of people are at the bottom,like in other countries," Abebaw said. "There are self-made millionaires and people are proud to know them. There are others where you don't know where they got the money from, and suspicions may arise from thepopulation."

South Africa is the top African country for millionaires with 48,700 in2013, followed by Egypt with 22,800 and Nigeria with 15,700.

Richard Dowden, director of the Royal African Society, said he had witnessed the rise of tower blocks, traffic jams and people now "walkingwith a purpose" in Addis Ababa.

He added: "You don't see many Ethiopians in flashy cars, like you do withLuanda or Lagos [citizens in their respective countries]. Flaunting your wealth is not part of the culture."

The Ethiopian government claims credit for the growth but is criticised asauthoritarian by human rights groups; there is only one opposition MP. Ina recent blog post, Dowden noted that the former prime minister Meles Zenawi once observed: "There is no connection between democracy and development."(Text ends)
Ethiopia: Arrests Upstage John Kerry Visit'
9 Bloggers, Journalists Held Before US Official Arrives
By HRW (Nairobi, April 28, 2014) – The Ethiopian authorities should immediately release six bloggers and three journalists arrested on April 25and 26, 2014, unless credible charges are promptly brought, Human Rights Watch said today.
United States Secretary of State John Kerry, who is scheduled to visit Ethiopia beginning April 29, should urge Ethiopian officials tounconditionally release all activists and journalists who have been arbitrarily detained or convicted in unfair trials, Human Rights Watch said.The arrests also came days before Ethiopia is scheduled to have its at theUnited Nations Human Rights Council's universal periodic review in Geneva on May 6.
"The nine arrests signal, once again, that anyone who criticizes the Ethiopian government will be silenced," said Leslie Lefkow, deputy Africa director at Human Rights Watch. "The timing of the arrests – just days before the US secretary of state's visit – speaks volumes about Ethiopia'sdisregard for free speech."
On the afternoon of April 25, police in uniform and civilian clothes conducted what appeared to be a coordinated operation of near- simultaneous arrests. Six members of a group known as the "Zone9" bloggers – Befekadu Hailu, Atnaf Berahane, Natnael Feleke, Mahlet Fantahun, Zelalem Kibret, and Abel Wabela – were arrested at their offices and in the streets. Tesfalem Weldeyes, a freelance journalist, was also arrested during the operation. Edom Kassaye, a second freelance journalist, was arrested on either April 25 or 26; the circumstances of herarrest are unclear but all eight individuals were apparently taken to Maekelawi Police Station, the federal detention center in Addis Ababa, thecapital.
The police searched the bloggers and journalists' offices and homes, reportedly with search warrants, and confiscated private laptops and literature. On April 26, another journalist, Asmamaw Hailegeorgis of AddisGuday newspaper, was also arrested and is reportedly detained in Maekelawi.
The detainees are currently being held incommunicado, Human Rights Watch said. On the morning of April 26, relatives were denied access tothe detainees by Maekelawi guards, and only allowed to deposit food.
Human Rights Watch released a report in October 2013 documenting serious human rights including torture and other ill-treatment, unlawful interrogation tactics, and poor detention conditions in Maekelawi against political detainees, including journalists. Detainees at Maekelawi are seldom granted access to legal counsel or their relatives during the initialinvestigation phase. (Text ends)

Ethiopian Journalists Charged With Inciting Public Violence ‘By Marthe van der Wolf, AFP (April 28, 2014)

ADDIS ABABA — Authorities in Ethiopia have arrested nine journalists andbloggers and charged them with working with a foreign organization to incite public violence. Six bloggers and three journalists were taken into police custody late last week after their houses were searched. They appeared in court Sunday morning and were informed of the charges against them: working with a foreign organization that claims to be a human rights group and agreeing to incite public violence through social media.

According to Lily Yekoye, a friend of one of the jailed journalists, friends and family are being denied access to their loved ones. “After we found out about his arrest Friday night, we went on Saturday morning to drop him breakfast and they told us that they are not allowed to have visitors,"she said. "We can only drop the meal at the gate. That was what was happening both Saturday and Sunday, we just dropped the meals.”

Journalist Tsion Girma, a neighbor of arrested journalist Tesfalem Weldeyes, was present when Tesfalem was taken away by nine men incivilian clothes and two in police uniforms. She said she was very surprised by the arrest. “He is not an activist, he is a professional journalist," she said, adding that she was surprised by the arrest. "Iknown him for the last 10 years, we worked together.”

The bloggers are from a collective called Zone 9, whose activities the journalists had suspended in recent months, citing harassment. Last weekthey announced plans to restart their online activities. The court case against the bloggers and journalists has been adjourned until May 7.

About 40 supporters of the opposition Blue Party were also arrested onThursday and Friday when preparing for a demonstration that was heldSunday.

Twelve have been released, including party chairman Yilkal Getnet, who says 28 party members are still in police custody for promoting the demonstration. “But when we tried to promote and distribute flyers for thedemonstration, the sub-city police denied us and restricted us by saying they don’t have any information whether this demonstration is legal or not,” he said. The Blue Party said it had sought government approval to hold the rally.

Human rights organizations such as Amnesty International have criticized the arrests, saying they "appear to be yet another alarming round-up of opposition or independent voices.” An adviser to Ethiopia's prime minister,Getachew Redda, says there is "no crackdown of any sort" but adds the arrested people are criminal suspects. He also stated that "simply becausesomeone says inflammatory remarks on Twitter or Facebook, doesn’t make them journalists" — but added that if journalists are involved in anycriminal activity, "they will be investigated and arrested." Ethiopia holds its next national elections in May 2015. About nine months before the 2010 elections there were also many arrests in a single week, including that of prominent blogger Eskinder Nega. It’s About The Staple Teff - What is teff and why do I need it?Q&A? By Washington Post , Herald-Tribune (Monday, April 28, 2014)Q: What is teff and why do I need it?

A: Although teff has been a staple of traditional Ethiopian cooking for thousands of years, this gluten-free grain is quickly climbing to super-grain status in our country. (Watch out, quinoa.

Teff is a gluten-free whole grain that, despite its size (about the size of apoppy seed), is mineral-rich and high in protein. Long-distance runners from Ethiopia have credited their energy and health to the grain. Traditional Ethiopian restaurants serve injera with all meals, as anedible serving plate topped with meats, vegetables and sauces. (Herald-Tribune archive)

Traditional Ethiopian restaurants serve injera with all meals, as an edible serving plate topped with meats, vegetables and sauces. (Herald-Tribunearchive. One serving of dry teff (a quarter-cup) offers 7 grams of protein,4 grams of dietary fiber, 25 percent of your daily recommended magnesium, 20 percent of your daily iron and 10 percent of your daily calcium, Vitamin B6 and zinc.

Teff has a mildly nutty flavor and is incredibly versatile. When cooked on astovetop with water, it creates a creamy product similar to porridge or cream of wheat. It also works wonderfully in stews, adding both thicknessand texture. In Ethiopia, teff is ground into a flour and fermented to makeinjera, a spongy, sourdough flatbread that is soft, porous and thin like a pancake. Traditional Ethiopian restaurants serve injera with all meals, as an edible serving plate topped with meats, vegetables and sauces. As America embraces this ancient grain, teff can be found in gluten-free recipes for pancakes, breads, crepes or waffles and is showing up in cereal, snacks, wraps and more. Teff is available at organic grocery stores. Be sure to buy whole-grain teff, not teff flour.

Norway Has To Stop financing tyranny like in Ethiopiy!

(April 29, 2014) The ruling party of Ethiopia the Ethiopian People Revolutionary Democratic Front, shortly known as EPRDF came to power in May 1991 through a rebel movement promising every Ethiopian to provide freedom, Justice, peace and democracy. However, once it came topower all these promises were just remained as a dream for the past 23 years. As the name EPRDF itself contradict with it because one government cannot be a democratic and a front at the same time. If thereis front it means there is war and democracy is very far away. EPRDF is one ethnic part group which is based on one of Ethiopia's ethnic group namely Tigray which has organized the party named TPLF which means Tigrayan Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF). Most government administrationposts including police, security, military and the judicial courts are monopolized by these people. The past 23 years TPLF, and the EPRDF as it's umbrella organ has abused human rights while their private and group capitals are growing substantially from time to time. They are beingfrom millionaire to multi-millionaire and from multi-millionaire to billionaire. And the source of their wealth being from western donors under the disguise of food security, climate, women and child etc….Whereas we can see that the poor are getting poorer and poorer when the rich gets more richer. According to international financial indexreport, the deceased prime ministers Meles Zenawi's wealth is estimatedat around USD 3 Billion and it stated the source of the income being onlypolitics.

http://www.therichest.com/search/Meles+Zenawi+Net+Worth

Different human right abuses have taken place in Ethiopia by the incumbent government itself. Such as forced eviction of people from theirhomeland, land grab, ignore the people who are in need of help, women raping, human trafficking, arbitrary detentions of innocents and educatedpeople, high unemployment and rampant corruption, ethnical bias, genocide, torturing, detaining dissents and journalists, hiring spy at the diasporas abroad and many more. The aften posten has published thecyber surveillance by the current government of Ethiopia (EPDRF/TPLF). http://www.aftenposten.no/nyheter/uriks/Totalovervaking-sprer-seg-i- Afrika-7511576.html#.U0EH2XD4K1j

As a result Ethiopians have said enough for this act of the government and organized in different political organizations which challenge the government in peaceful demonstration and electoral system. Hence othershave organized military group which are fighting in the jungle for freedom. However, the honored former South African president Nelson Mandela quoted as saying at his “A long walk to freedom”. This is becausethe ruling party of Ethiopia is receiving a lot of donations for different purpose from the western nations and it is empowering it's military capability, expanding prisons, recruiting spies and cyber-surveillance to it's opposition parties and every citizenss. Therefore, we find it crucial to address this matter for western countries such as Norway about thematter.

As it is well known Norway has a long history in Ethiopia both through politics, bilateral assistance and missionary works. Bilateral relations wereestablished in 1948. Despite long traditions, also through the Norwegian missionary organization, it was first in 1995 that Norway entered a bilateral cooperation agreement with Ethiopia. The bilateral agreement priorities are:

- Climate, environment and sustainable development
- Gender equality and women and children's right
- Economic development with emphasis on energy
- Good governance and human rights
- Public welfare services

The Norwegian bilateral assistance rate from the year 2007 to 2012 is approximately 206 million NoK http://www.norad.no/en/countries/africa/ethiopia--405886 Even though these donation money were meant to fulfill the priorities and agreementswhich are mentioned, the things that EPDRF or TPLF have been/ are witnessed doing were/are on contrary to the agreement. Therefore, we would like you to reconsider what you are assisting EPRDF for? For what purpose you fund your money?

- Is the money you are donating used for the purpose you are sending itto???
- Is it to save the people or to kill?
- Is it to promote human right or abuse?
- Is it for democracy or dictatorship?
- Is it to help the innocents or the corrupted minsters?

We Ethiopian living in Odda would like to recommend you to cross check the outcomes of the assistance, because the reality is far way out of the given propaganda. We have attached truth reveling international links so that you can access the information directly. Don't let the bad act get you!EPDRF-TPLF is a well-trained actor to get what it wants! HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN on ETHIOPIA- Human rights on the agenda of Kerry visit to Africa' EM (April 29, 2014) US Secretary of State John Kerrywill focus on human rights, crisis aid and economic cooperation on his six-day trip to three African countries. It was like a slap in the face for the US administration when, just days before the visit to Ethiopia by Secretary ofState John Kerry, Ethiopian police arrested six bloggers and three journalists. The reaction from Kerry's press spokesperson Jen Psaki was swift.

"We urge the government of Ethiopia to expeditiously review the cases ofthese detainees and promptly release them. We have raised these concerns on the ground directly with the government of Ethiopia. And we,of course, reiterate our longstanding concern about the abridgment of thefreedom of press and the freedom of expression in Ethiopia, and urge thegovernment of Ethiopia to fully adhere to its constitutional guarantees," Psaki said. It is a regular occurrence for the US to criticize human rights violations in the authoritarian state. Kerry is certainly going to raise the topic during his visit. However, it is not his main reason for going to Ethiopia.

Demonstration against Ethiopia's authoritarian government: For the US, Ethiopia is an important partner in the battle against the numerous crisesin neighboring countries like Somalia and South Sudan, says Alex Vines from London-based think tank Chatham House. Historically, it's a strong relationship, Vines told DW. "The US has invested heavily in terms of international development, but also in capacity building and institution building in Ethiopia."

Possible stopover in South Sudan: The ongoing conflict between the government and rebels in South Sudan is also on Kerry's agenda. He has indicated that he may make a brief stopover there. Ethiopia's capital AddisAbaba was the venue for so far unsuccessful peace talks held under the auspices of IGAD, the regional alliance on the Horn of Africa. Observers believe Kerry wants to kick start a new round of talks. Vines points out that the US played a major role in bringing about the 2011 referendum in which the people of South Sudan voted overwhelmingly for independence.

For Kenyan observer Barack Muluku, Kerry's trip to Africa underlines the growing rivalry between the west and burgeoning economic powers like China and Brazil who are also expanding their cooperation with Africa. "The influence of western states and America on Africa is decreasing," hetold DW.

The US and other western countries generally become involved when theirown interests are concerned, Muluku said, quoting the examples of South Sudan and Angola, two countries with large oil reserves. Angola will be thelast stop on Kerry's itinerary. Big US oil concerns are active there, such asChevron which last year joined a major oil extraction project off the Angolan coast.

Angola has rich oil reserves: Chatham House's Vines also believes economic interests come indeed into play, but says there is more to it."The visits to Angola and the DRC are about Eastern Congo and about conflict resolution there. Kerry is visiting Angola in particular to congratulate the Angolan President Jose Edouardo dos Santos on his roleas acting president of the Intergovernmental Conference for the Great Lakes and the positive role that the Angolans have been playing in tryingto push for solutions to the variety of crises that remain in Eastern Congo." In short, there will be some praise and many sensitive questionsto be raised during the Secretary of State's six-day trip. (Text ends)

The arrest of Ethiopian Bloggers and Journalists'

ALJAZEERA News updates (April 30, 2014) The Ethiopian government has arrested six independent bloggers and a journalist in what human rights group Amnesty International has called a "suffocating grip on freedom of expression". Six members of independent blogger and activist group 'Zone9' and a prominent Ethiopian journalist were arrested on Friday in the capital Addis Ababa. These arrests appear to be yet another alarming round up of opposition or independent voices – Claire Beston, Amnesty International All six bloggers were arrested at night by armed security forces and taken from their homes to the Federal Police Crime Investigation Sector 'Maikelawi', where political prisoners are alleged to be held in pre-trial, and sometimes arbitrary detention.

The Zone 9 group who are said to be very critical of government policy and have a strong following on social media had temporarily suspended their activities earlier this year after accusing the government of harassingtheir members. Journalist Tesfalem Waldyes who writes independent commentary on political issues for a Ethiopian newspaper was also arrested. According to Ethiopian journalist Simegnish Yekoye, Waldyes is being denied visitation by friends and family and it's unclear what prompted his arrest and what charges he is being held under. Simegnish Yekoye told Al Jazeera she was unaware of why the government had clamped down on journalists and their was growing fear on the future of afree press. "I am very scared, I don't know what's going to happen next," she said. Ranked 143 in the 2014 Reporters Without Borders press freedom index, media watchdogs say 49 journalists fled the country between 2007 and 2012 to evade government persecution.

Ethiopia: Journalism under anti-terrorism law:

Human rights group Amesty International criticised the arrests, saying "these arrests appear to be yet another alarming round up of opposition or independent voices". "The Ethiopian government is tightening its suffocating grip on freedom of expression in a major crackdown which hasseen the arrest of numerous independent, critical and opposition voices over the last two days", Claire Beston, Ethiopia researcher at Amnesty International, said. Al Jazeera's Mohammed Adow reporting from Bahir Dar said it was unclear what will happen to the detained journalists. "There are scores of journalists currently serving between 14 and 27 yearsin prison with some charged on terrorism offences."

Dozen killed as Ethiopia rocked by Oromo students protest'

OPride News (May 1, 2014) At least a dozen protesters have been killed and many others wounded as students in Ethiopia's populous Oromia region clashed with military forces on Wednesday. Student protests beganearlier this month in response to plans by Addis Ababa City Administrationwhich is expected to significantly expand the city's territorial jurisdiction.

Thousands of Oromo students at nine universities in Oromia have rallied inthe last ten days opposing the plan, which they say would displace Oromo farmers and undermine their state's constitutionally protected "special interests." Oromo students at Jimma, Haromaya, Ambo, Wollega, Bule Hora, Madawalabu, Metu, Adama and Dire Dawa universities have turned out in droves denouncing the plan. At least 10 students were killed in Ambo while three others were shot dead at Madawalabu University on Wednesday, according to eyewitnesses. Unknown number of wounded protesters were being treated at local hospitals. In Haromaya University, Eastern Ethiopia, at least two students those were watching football matchhave died due to a hand grenade thrown in the hall. Over 150 students were injured.

The Ethiopian capital falls within the Oromia state, the largest of Ethiopia'snine ethnic-based administrative regions, and also serves as its capital.

The country's constitution stipulates the state's special interest in the city — providing for utilization of resources, service provision and jointadministration matters. Protesters say the city's latest master planundermines these interests.

ETHIOPIA – Ambo City In A war Zone?

EM AMBO (May 2, 2014) - At least ten vehicles were on Tuesday parked infront of Abebech Gedera Hotel, a favorite tourist hangout. Before owners got the time to move their vehicles, they were burned down. It was a telling evidence Ambo was at the epicenter of an Oromo uprising against the regime in Addis Ababa. "The gunfire was unlike any other time," said along time resident of the city. "It was like the war in 1991 [when TPLF rebels clashed with Ethiopian soldiers on their way to toppling the Derg military regime in Addis Ababa]. Businesses were looted and and a bank ransacked. Scared of an ethnic conflict, non-Oromo residents took refuge in churches, mosques and the forest. No one targetted them for their ethnicity.

"The Amharas, Tigres, Gurages etc were scared for their lives but the conflict was purely politically motivated as none of them were targetted,"said the source, who sought anonymity due to fear of government retribution. "The destroyed businesses, for instance, belonged to Oromos,Amharas, Tigres and others. It shows the people were simply angry at government action, not at the indidivuals who live with them in peace." But the casualty was hard to comprehend in Ambo.

"Eleven were killed from Ambo while six were gunned down in nearby Guder town," The opposition Oromo Federalist Council (OFC) said in a statement, adding "Ambo Hospital was flooded with the dead and injured,signifying the death toll could be higher than original figures." Earlier reports say at least 30 were killed, and no one has disputed the figure.

OFC has accused the ruling EPRDF regime of attempts to spark conflict between the Oromo and Amhara. Oromo protests broke out against a CityMaster Plan of Addis Ababa, which has threatened to engulf about a dozenOromia towns and hamlets into the Ethiopian capital. Protesters claim the Master Plan disregards the rights of millions of Oromo. The government onThursday said with a stern warning that a public discussion was afoot to debate the pros and cons of the controversial Master Plan. The state- owned radio ETV blamed the ongoing crisis on "few extremists who seek to gain power through turmoil and upheaval."

Also on Thursday, Sidist Killo and Arat Killo University campuses were cordoned off by a huge presence of police and undercover agents. The fear was students may spark protests, and that may spoil the visit of USSecretary of State John Kerry to Addis. Critics have over the years accused the ruling party of using "ethnic tension" as a method to instill fear in the society and get a credit for itself as a "savior" in the run-up tocoming elections.

One killed, 70 Injured at Haromaya University: In the meantime, one student was killed and 70 others were injured when a hand grenade was hurled onto a crowd of Haromaya University students who were watchingsoccer games on TV, according to an ESAT report that quoted police as saying. Police said an investigation was launched to identify the culprit behind the bomb explosion. But the public sees the crime as the work of the government, an allegation supported by a WikiLeaks report: Recent bombings blamed on Oromos possibly the work of government."

ETHIOPIA'S AMBO PROTEST - A witness told BBC 47 were killed by thesecurity forces'

BBC News (May 2, 2014) - At least nine students have died during days ofprotests in Ethiopia's Oromia state, the government has said. However, a witness told the BBC that 47 were killed by the security forces. She said the protests in Ambo, 130km (about 80 miles) west of Addis Ababa beganlast Friday over plans to expand the capital into the Oromia state. The government did not say how most of the deaths had been caused but the Ambo resident said she had seen the army firing live ammunition "I saw more than 20 bodies on the streets," she said. "I am hiding in my house because I am scared." Ambo resident said that four students had been killed on Monday and another 43 in a huge security crackdown on Tuesday, after a huge demonstration including many non-students. Since then, the town's streets have been deserted, she said, with banks and shops closed and no transport. She said teaching had been suspended at Ambo University, where the protests began, and students prevented fromleaving.

In a statement, the government said eight people had died during violent protests led by "anti-peace forces" in the towns of Ambo and Tokeekutayu, as well as Meda Welabu University, also in Oromia state. It said one person had been killed "in a related development" when a hand grenade was thrown at students watching a football match. The statementblamed the protests on "baseless rumours" being spread about the "integrated development master plan" for the capital. BBC Ethiopia analystHewete Haileselassie says some ethnic Oromos feel the government is dominated by members of the Tigre and Amhara communities and they would be loath to see the size of "their" territory diminish with the expansion of Addis Ababa, which is claimed by both Oromos and Amharas.The student protestors are from Ethiopia's biggest ethnic group, the Oromo, numbering around 27 million people.

Oromia is the country's largest region, completely surrounding the capitalAddis Ababa, although the city is itself part of the Amhara region. Its people speak their own language - Oromifa - and see themselves as very different from the Amhara. The protesters believe they face losing their regional and cultural identity if plans to extend Addis Ababa's administrative control into parts of Oromia get the go-ahead. Some have also raised fears of the potential for land grabs. The so called "master- plan" for Addis Ababa is currently out for public consultation and the government says people are being given opportunities to raise their concerns. Officials say the plan has been well publicised and will bring cityservices to poor rural areas. The protestors claim they merely wanted to raise questions about the plan - but were answered with violence and intimidation. (Text ends)H

PRESS RELEASE: Massacre of Peaceful Demonstrators - Perpetual Habit ofTPLF Regime’

By Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) (May 2, 2014)

The Mass killing of the Oromo students who have peacefully protested against injustices in Ethiopia is only invigorate the Oromo people struggle for justice. Since the last twenty three years , the Tigray Liberation Front (the TPLF) controls the state power in Ethiopia, the TPLF regime has targeted Oromo people in general and Oromo students in particular. The TPLF has arrested, tortured and killed thousands Oromos in the past twenty three years. The current sense less mass killings of Oromo students in different universities, like Ambo, Wallaga, Dire Dawa, Robe, Adamaa,Haramaya,Jimma , Illu , etc is the heinous crime that shocked theconscious of humanity.

The OLF strongly condemns such barbaric and egregious killing of innocent Oromo university students who have peacefully demanded the regime to halt the displacement of Oromo farmers from their Ancestral land and the inclusion of Oromo cities and surrounding localities under Finfinnee (Addis Ababa) administration under the pretext of development.Instead of responding for their genuine demands, the barbaric TPLF regime opted to massacre the Oromo students in broad day lights in the eyes of international community which have watched the agony and senseless killing through social media.

The OLF calls upon the Oromo people both inside and outside the country,to realize that have been pushed to the limit. The only way out of this andto redeem the agony visited upon us for the past is to fight back in unison.” We specially call upon you in the Diaspora to act on behalf of your brethren, who are under siege, and urge the nations who host you todischarge their responsibility as government and a community of human beings towards the long suffering Oromo and other peoples under the criminal TPLF regime.” OLF urges again and again that the international community, human rights and organizations and governments for democracy to use their influence and do all they can to stop the ongoing atrocity against the Oromo people. Failure to act immediately will betantamount to condoning.

ETHIOPIA: In choosing security over democracy, U.S. will get neither'Excerpts from EthioMedia By Hassen Hussein (May 2, 2014)

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry arrived in Ethiopia's capital, Addis Ababa, Thursday in the first leg of his three-nation trip to Africa "to encourage democratic development. " He came to a country rocked by mounting student protests against the government and vicious military crackdowns that left scores dead and wounded, as well as the troubling imprisonment of dissident journalists and bloggers. To his credit, Kerry raised concerns about the tightening of press freedom in Ethiopia. "I madeclear to Ethiopian officials that they need to create greater opportunities for citizens to be able to engage with their fellow citizens and with their government by opening up more space for civil society," Kerry told reporters in Addis Ababa.

However, his discussions with Ethiopia's leaders were overshadowed by South Sudan's implosion — with continuing fragility in next-door Somalia,and souring Egypt-Ethiopia relations stirred by Ethiopia's construction of the Great Renaissance Dam over the Nile, in the background. This focus was unfortunate but hardly surprising. For over two decades, despite fleeting statements expressing "concern," Washington has shied away from seriously engaging Ethiopian authorities on the need for genuine democratization. Without the latter, the country's extended prosperity is in danger. "To support economic growth for the long term, the free marketplace of ideas matters just as much as free markets," Kerry noted in his remarks.
