Growing dissent: Reports of the number of dead vary, but in clashes with security forces over the last few days, locals say at least 20 protesters have been killed and many others wounded in Ambo and Robe towns. Thegovernment acknowledged 11 deaths, adding at least 70 students were wounded in a bomb blast at Haramaya University in Eastern Oromia.

Swedish and U.K. embassies in Addis Ababa updated travel warnings for their nationals urging those in Ethiopia to avoid visiting the area. Ethnic Oromo students are protesting against a new urban development plan unveiled in April by the Addis Ababa city administration. Protesters say thecity's master plan, devised by ruling party functionaries without public input, would allow the sprawling metropolis to swallow up surrounding Oromo towns and rural villages.

Protesters fear the new plan would facilitate the eviction of thousands of farmers from their ancestral lands without proper compensation — an unjust process that has been happening since the city's founding a century ago. Their land would be sold at dirt-cheap prices to foreign and domestic investors, exacerbating the country's growing income inequality and diluting the Oromo national identity. In addition, the plan would condemn the Oromo, Ethiopia's single largest ethnic group, to being an agrarian population in a fast-urbanizing country and balkanize their homeland into an eastern and western half — in a manner reminiscent ofoccupied Palestinian territories — leaving the state of Oromia with only nominal control.

The ongoing protests and crackdown on freedom of expression are the latest signs of growing discontent and Addis Ababa's increasing authoritarianism. The U.S. State Department's annual human rights report, released by Kerry on Feb. 27, details Ethiopia's worsening humanrights situation. In recent years, the country's adoption of a spate of draconian laws, including its Charities and Societies Proclamation and Anti-Terrorism Law, has given security and intelligence forces and the vengeful judiciary carte blanche to criminalize all forms of dissent and toarrest opposition leaders. While the student protests have so far been confined to college campuses, they echo a long-simmering popular grievance. The Oromo make up close to 40 percent of Ethiopia's population of 94 million, but are conspicuously marginalized in that country's political, economic and social life. The government's refusal to address their complaints is a major bottleneck on the country's democratization. (Text ends)

ILLICIT TRANSFER: Out of Africa: The great money migration'By ALJAZEERA (May 2, 2014)

Bahar Dar, Ethiopia - The figures are staggering: At least $1.8 trillion illicitly flowed out of Africa between 1970 and 2009. This is far more than the external aid the continent received over the same period, and almost five times its current external debt. According to researchers, the continent also loses at least $100bn a year in this financial haemorrhage. African leaders convened this week in the Ethiopian city of Bahar Dar to discuss illicit financial flows and what can be done to staunch them. A study commissioned by the Tana High Level Forum on African Security, which organised the conference, found that illicit flows from Africa grew atan average rate of 12.1 percent per year since 1970, and that capital flight from West and Central African countries accounted for most of the illicit flows from sub-Saharan Africa.

Illicit financial flows consist of money earned illegally and then transferredfor use elsewhere. The money is usually generated from criminal activities, corruption, tax evasion, bribes and smuggling. Yet the numberstell only part of the story - a story that exposes how these highly complexand deeply entrenched practises have flourished, with a devastating impact on Africans' efforts to extricate themselves from grinding poverty. This scourge eats into the gross domestic products of African countries, draining foreign exchange reserves, reducing tax collection and investment inflows and worsening poverty. "The costs of this financial haemorrhage have been significant for African countries. It has heightened income inequality and jeopardised employment prospects. Inthe majority of countries in the continent, unemployment rates have remained exceedingly high in the absence of investment and industrial expansion," said Kenya's Central Bank Governor Dr Njuguna Ndungu.

Worse than expected: And some believe that the estimates of illicit financial flows underestimate the problem. "These figures do not capture money lost through drug trafficking and the loss of Africa's marine resources through illegal fishing," said Abdiweli Mohammed Ali, the new president of Somalia's semi-autonomous Puntland region. "Somalia loses between $800m and $1bn through illegal fishing every year. This is money we cannot afford to lose. Something must be done about the illegalinternational fishing cartels looting our marine resources," said Abdiweli, who is also a former prime minister of Somalia. The study also found a significant link between increases in the price of oil and capital flight from Nigeria - Africa's largest oil producer, which also accounted for the highestamount of illicit outflows. "Some of the acceleration in illicit outflows was undoubtedly driven by oil price increases and increased opportunities to misprice trade that typically accompany increasing trading volumes due toglobalisation," the report noted.

For instance, Nigeria lost at least $250bn between 2000 and 2009. South Africa, which was the continent's biggest economy until it was recently overtaken by Nigeria, came second with a loss of at least $170bn over thesame period. Egypt, Algeria, Libya, Morocco, Angola, Sudan and Cameroon are also high on the list. Nuhu Ribadu, a former chairman of Nigeria's Economic and Financial Crimes Commission (EFCC), said: "It's shameful that Nigeria leads in such an unsavoury trend. But it must be pointed out that we are also leaders in trying to repatriate some of the stolen funds. We managed to recover billions that former military dictator Sani Abacha stashed in banks abroad." Ribadu said Africa needs honest and committed leaders who will set examples by eschewing corruption andclosing avenues of illicit financial flow. "It is the seriousness and commitment showed by African leaders that would convince foreign countries to work with them towards recovering looted monies stashed abroad."

Skewing income distribution: Experts say the enormity of the outflow explains why donor-driven efforts to spur economic development and reduce poverty have not achieved their full potential in Africa. Sustained illicit outflows have also turned the continent into a net creditor to the restof the world. "Policy measures must be taken to address the causes of illicit outflows and also to impress upon the international community the need for better transparency and tighter oversight of banks and offshore financial centres that absorb these flows," said former South African President Thabo Mbeki. Mbeki is also the chair of the Commission on Illicit Finances established by the UN Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA).As long as illicit capital continues to pour out of impoverished African countries at this pace, efforts to reduce poverty and boost economic growth will be thwarted, and income distribution will become more skewed, leading to economic and political instability. Yet there is a glimmer of hope, now that African leaders and governments are increasingly understanding - and coming to terms with - the dangers posed by illicit financial flows.

Scientist Dereje Agonafer receives award of IEEE’

UTA.edu (May 3, 2014) - Dereje Agonafer becomes the recipient of the2014 iTherm Achievement Award, awarded by the Institute of Electricaland Electronics Engineers (IEEE) at the Intersociety Conference on Thermal and Thermomechanical Phenomena in Electronic Systems.

Sponsored by the IEEE’s CPMT Society, ITherm 2014 is an internationalconference for scientific and engineering exploration of thermal, thermomechanical and emerging technology issues associated with electronic devices, packages and systems.

The ITherm Achievement Award, first instituted in 1996, is presented biennially in recognition of significant contributions made in thermal and thermomechanical management of electronics “Dr. Agonafer joins prestigious company of past awardees who are Fellows of various organizations and members of the National Academy of Engineering. Thisaward is an exceptional recognition for him and for the UTA College of Engineering,” said Mechanical and Aerospace Engineering Chair Erian Armanios. Agonafer will receive his award at a luncheon May 28, followedby his keynote address, “Thermal and Mechanical Challenges in Microelectronics: From Device to Data-Center-Room Level.”

GOSSIP: Ethiopia's prominent journo arrested’

CNN iReport (May 3, 2014) About this iReport Not vetted for CNN: The Ethiopian regime, run by the EPRDF, continued its assault on press freedom today. Reports from Addis Ababa disclosed that Ethiopia's prominent journo Zena Endelebu has been included into the list of arrested. Recently, several journalist and bloggers have been arrested bythe regime. The imprisonment of Zena Endelebu comes at a time when the media hero Eskinder Nega is languishing in the prisons of the barbaricregime which raised serious concerns from international rights organizations.

Several reports of US state department, statement by higher representative Catherine Ashton of EU external action service raised concern regrading "lack of clarity" on Ethiopia's vaguely defined Anti-terrorism proclamation- used to crack down dissent. The UK goverenmentalso recently issued a report expressing its concern on human right abuses in Ethiopia saying "the UK is concerned about continuing restrictions on opposition and dissent in Ethiopia, through use of the Anti- Terrorism Proclamation (ATP) and the Charities and Societies Proclamation(CSP)". The international community is urged to stop sending aid money to the brutal regime and pressure more to secure the release of Zena Endelebu and other innocent political prisoners in Ethiopia.

A Popular Call For Residents of Addis Ababa and Gidole’

To massively come out for public demonstration to be held on May 4 2006’

My name is Gizachew Shiferaw. I am the chairperson of one of the major opposition party in Ethiopia, the Unity for Democracy and Justice (UDJ). The UDJ is a legally registered and peaceful opposition party that operatesin all regions of Ethiopia. We are against no-one but for Ethiopia. Our goaland objective is to see a prosperous, democratic and united Ethiopia where all its children are equal under the law, regardless of their religion, gender, ethnicity and income. Our politics is the politics of ethiopiawinet, tolerance, love and inclusiveness. The lack of transparency, accountability,competency and good governance from the part of the government, the misguided land policy that led to the expulsion of Ethiopians from their homes and their farms, the ever growing human right abuses , the arrest of reporters, students, peaceful political activists, the economic hardship have become unbearable.

The people deserve more from their government. We believe the people atlarge must refuse to accept the status quo, demand change and hold accountable authorities. To provide platform for the people to make its voice heard, on May 4 2006, the UDJ has called massive demonstrations, already recognized by authorities, in the great city of Addis Ababa and theproud town of Derashe/Gidole, in the southern region. I call for all residents of Addis Ababa and Gidole to come out in full force and express their discontent. Freedom is not free. We cannot get freedom from others.Let us reclaim our freedom ourselves. Let us be counted on. Each one of us may be an ordinary person. However the millions of ordinary people will have a power that is unshakable. Let us be one of the millions. May God bless you!

Obang Metho: Open Letter to Political Leaders'

SMNE (May 3, 2014): A Viable Alternative to a New, Better and More Inclusive Ethiopia Will Not be Delivered by Foreigners like Humanitarian Aid! Are we Ethiopians ready to discard tribal politics and to embrace inclusion of all our diverse people, Putting humanity before ethnicity and caring about the wellbeing of those who are beyond our tribal groups, for No one is free until all are free? No nation can sustainably prosper when one tribe takes all, like has been happening in Ethiopia under the TPLF/ERPDF. As one group dominates over the majority, tensions have escalated. Outsiders in the international community are showing a greaterreadiness to abandon the TPLF/ERPDF, should there be a viable alternative. One may wonder the reasons behind this shift of support. We have heard through various connections in Europe and North America thatthe TPLF/ERPDF's increasingly repressive policies are catalysts for increasing discontent in Ethiopia that could lead to ethnic-based violence and chaos.

As TPLF/ERPDF policies are increasingly running counter to donor's interests of maintaining stability in the Horn, they are looking for a betteralternative. They can see for themselves that the tightening of political space and the crackdown on civil society through anti-terrorism laws and the Charities and Societies Proclamation have led to the arrest of increasing numbers of journalists, bloggers, activists, students and religious leaders. If there were a strongly supported, inclusive and well- organized Ethiopian alternative, capable of bringing greater stability to Ethiopia for the long-run, alliances may quickly change. Now they are asking the question, "Where is that viable alternative?" The warning signsare apparent and there is not that much time for inaction.

BREAKING NEWS: Blue (Semayawi) Party Members Tortured In AddisAbaba Prison'

ER News: (May 4, 2014) Political prisoners of the Blue Party; Emebet Girma (19), Eyerus Tesfaw, Yonas Kedir, Yeshiwas Assefa, Abera Hailemariam, and Abebe Mekete are severely harassed by the TPLF Security Guards at the Lazarist prison in Addis Ababa. The level of violence against these prisoners was so brutal that they complained abouttheir ill-treatment. The Blue Party opposition members are under hunger strike because of the injustice and the refusal of the police not to take their case to the Supreme Court. The young man and 3rd year engineering student at the Addis Ababa University, Yonas Kedir, has beenseverely beaten up today. He is suffering from wounds and swelling in hisbody after guards and intelligence officials beat him with batons. Yonas Kedir is unable to move due to the injuries.

Blue Party is the first political party in modern time to re-claim Ethiopianism which represents the dreams of the majority of Ethiopians. Blue Party's movement embodies the pride of strong and a united Ethiopia. The mystique of the term Ethiopianism derived from its occurrence in the ancient time (where Ethiopia is also referred to as Kush,or Cush) and was enhanced when the ancient independent Kingdom of Ethiopia defeated the Italians at Adwa in 1896. Several reports confirm that the TPLF government is nervous of the new Blue Party Pan- Ethiopianist Movement. The intelligence officials are particularly violent towards those individuals accused of having links with the young generation of the popular Blue Party.

BACKGROUNDER: Basic Facts About Ethio-China Relations - Xinhua'ShanghaiDaily BEIJING, (Xinhua) May 4, 2014

Chinese Premier Li Keqiang left Beijing on Sunday for Ethiopia, the firstleg of his four-country Africa tour. The following are some basic facts about Ethiopia:

Located in Eastern Africa, Ethiopia is bordered by Djibouti and Somalia tothe east, Sudan and South Sudan to the west, Kenya to the south and Eritrea to the north.

The landlocked country, with its capital in Addis Ababa, has a total area of1,103,600 sq km. Its climate type is predominantly tropical monsoon but it varies greatly depending on topography.

Some 91 million people from more than 80 ethnic groups live in Ethiopia.Most of its people are followers of Islam and Ethiopian Orthodox.

Its national language is Amharic and English is commonly used. Otherlocal languages include Oromo, Tigrinya, among others.

Ethiopia's poverty-stricken economy is based on agriculture, accountingfor roughly half of its gross domestic product (GDP).

The country has rich water resource, but less than five percent of it hasbeen effectively used. Ethiopia is abundant in minerals such as gold, platinum, nickel, copper, iron as well as coal, oil and natural gas.

The government has increased investment on agricultural production, andefforts have been made to shore up exports and attract foreign investments in recent years.

Since China and Ethiopia forged diplomatic ties on Nov. 24, 1970, the twocountries have maintained good relations. In recent years, bilateral ties have kept a momentum for sound and sustained development, with exchanges of high-level visits, political mutual trust and cooperation in various fields markedly increased. In 2013, trade between the two countries reached 2.18 billion U.S. dollars. (Text ends)

HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: Scholars at Risk calls for letters on behalf ofdetained Ethiopian scholars'

SAR PRESS RELEASE (May 5, 2014): Scholars At Risk is gravely concernedabout reports that Professor Zelalem Kibret, lecturer of law at Ambo University, and Befikadu Hailu, former lecturer and current staff member at St. Mary's University College, were arrested and detained last week.

SAR calls for letters, faxes and emails respectfully urging authorities to investigate the situation, to secure the scholars' immediate release or, pending their release, to explain publicly the circumstances of ProfessorKibret's and Mr. Hailu's arrest and the on-going detention.

Scholars at Risk understands that, on April 25-26, 2014, police took into custody six alleged members of bloggers' group "Zone9 forum", including scholars Professor Kibret and Mr. Hailu. Reports indicate that Professor Kibret was arrested while on campus at Ambo University. They also indicate that police searched the offices and homes of the scholars and bloggers, and that they seized computers and literature. It is believed thatthe arrests are a reaction to the bloggers' announcement, on April 23, thatthey would resume publishing after seven months of inactivity. Professor Kibret, Mr. Hailu and the bloggers are reportedly charged with inciting violence through social media and creating instability in the country. SAR understands that the detainees are being held incommunicado at Makelawi prison and that family members have not been permitted to visit.

Scholars at Risk (SAR) is an international network of over 330 universities and colleges in 35 countries dedicated to protecting the human rights of scholars around the world and to raising awareness, understanding of, andrespect for the principles of academic freedom and its constituent freedoms of expression, opinion, thought, association and travel. In cases like this, involving alleged infringement of these freedoms, Scholars at Risk investigates hoping to clarify and resolve matters favorably.

Ethiopia: Brutal Crackdown on Protests : Human Rights Watch'

Security Forces Fire On, Beat Students Protesting Plan to Expand CapitalBoundaries'

HRW , Nairobi (May 5, 2014) – Ethiopian security forces should cease using excessive force against students peacefully protesting plans to extend the boundaries of the capital, Addis Ababa, Human Rights Watchsaid today. The authorities should immediately release students and others arbitrarily arrested during the protests and investigate and hold accountable security officials who are responsible for abuses. On May 6, 2014, the government will appear before the United Nations Human Rights Council in Geneva for the country's Universal Periodic Review of its human rights record. "Students have concerns about the fateof farmers and others on land the government wants to move inside AddisAbaba," said Leslie Lefkow, deputy Africa director at Human Rights Watch."Rather than having its security forces attack peaceful protesters, the government should sit down and discuss the students' grievances."

Since April 25, students have demonstrated throughout Oromia Regional State to protest the government's plan to substantially expand the municipal boundaries of Addis Ababa, which the students feel would threaten communities currently under regional jurisdiction. Security forceshave responded by shooting at and beating peaceful protesters in Ambo, Nekemte, Jimma, and other towns with unconfirmed reports from witnesses of dozens of casualties.

Protests began at universities in Ambo and other large towns throughoutOromia, and spread to smaller communities throughout the region.

Witnesses said security forces fired live ammunition at peaceful protestersin Ambo on April 30. Official government statements put the number of dead in Ambo at eight, but various credible local sources put the death tollmuch higher. Since the events in Ambo, the security forces have allegedlyused excessive force against protesters throughout the region, resulting infurther casualties. Ethiopian authorities have said there has been widespread looting and destruction of property during the protests.

The protests erupted over the release in April of the proposed Addis AbabaIntegrated Development Master Plan, which outlines plans for Addis Ababa's municipal expansion. Under the proposed plan, Addis Ababa's municipal boundary would be expanded substantially to include more than15 communities in Oromia. This land would fall under the jurisdiction of the Addis Ababa City Administration and would no longer be managed by Oromia Regional State. Demonstrators have expressed concern about the displacement of Oromo farmers and residents on the affected land.

HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: U.S. Statement on Ethiopia at the UPR'

GENEVE, SWITZERLAND (May 6, 2014) The 19th Session of the UniversalPeriodic Review

U.S. Statement delivered by Chargé d'affaires Peter Mulrean. The UnitedStates commends Ethiopia for its commitment to economic and social development. We remain seriously concerned by restrictions on civil society activity, the arbitrary detention and harassment of human rights defenders, journalists, and opposition political figures, and the politicizedapplication of laws against opposition voices.

We are deeply concerned that the Charities and Societies Proclamation has severely restricted many local organizations' ability to conduct important democracy, governance, and human rights work. Easing restrictions will move Ethiopia toward an environment of inclusiveness andpolitical plurality in advance of the 2015 national elections.

We recommend that the Ethiopian government:

1. Conduct a full review of the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation, amending thelaw as necessary to ensure that it strengthens the rule of law and is applied apolitically and in full compliance with Ethiopia's international human rights obligations;
2. Repeal the Charities and Societies Proclamation in order to promote thedevelopment of an independent civil society able to operate freely;
3. Permit the UN Special Rapporteur on the Rights to Freedom of PeacefulAssembly and of Association to travel to Ethiopia to advise the government. Thank you Mr. President.

PETITION SIGN INS: Stop Helping Ethiopian Government!!

Stop helping Ethiopian Government who uses tax payers money to buy bullets to kill it's people! Over 50 Students were killed in one day in Oromia, Ethiopia. The killings are still underway, we ask the United Statesgovernment to urge the Ethiopian Government to restrain itself from its barbaric action.

Petition Background - Many non-governmental and human right organizations were reporting about the brutality of the Ethiopian government for the last 23 years. But still the Ethiopian government is one of the major recipients of not only of financial aid but also military training and hardware from the United States Government, which the regime does not hesitate to use against our people. The killings of thousands of Oromo students and civilians suspected of being supportersof opposition groups in the last two decades, genocide in Gambella and the Ogaden can witness this.

The financial aid given to this regime is not being used to construct schools and hospitals but to buy weapons, to construct prisons and buy technologies to spy on its own citizen at home and in the diaspora. In the last decade, millions of hectares of land were and are being snatched off poor peasants and sold to wealthy investors in the name of development. The farmers and their families are left for destitution and absolute povertywhile the ruling party officials and peoples arround them are building luxurious Villas with the aid money at the same spot were the farmers aredisplaced .

Opposing this land grab and injustice, millions of Oromo students and civilians are demonstrating peacefully. But the response from the government side is as usual so brutal that over 50 high school and University students were killed just in one day, and the killing is still underway. With this petition we would like to ask you: 1) To urge the Ethiopian government to stop killing unarmed Oromo civilians and students. 2) To stop giving both financial and military aid to the regime, who use your tax payers' money to buy weapons which end up killing ourpeople. VIEW: On Meles Zenawi's Concept of 'Developmental State'

Regarding equality and democracy under the developmental state, the late Meles Zenawi has wrote, "One of the defining characteristics of a developmental state is that it must be autonomous from the private sector. It must have the ability and will to reward and punish the privatesector depending on whether its activities are developmental or rent seeking. It cannot do so if the private sector is in the coalition."

Zenawi's developmental state (unlike Japan and its former colonies) sees the private sector in a subservient manner, consistent with Ethiopia's age old anti-business ideology. Historically, in Ethiopia, the private sector has notbeen accorded a social status commensurate with its economic strength. Jealous of rivalry by domestic entrepreneurs, the rulers of Ethiopia alwayshired their own commercial agents or left the private sector to foreign residents. In order to maintain its own interest, therefore, the private sector had to share portions of its profits with the rulers as bribes and gifts. Merchants and entrepreneurs have to contribute huge sums of money for so-called "development" projects or "charitable" causes. Otherwise, their licenses will be suspended, or their businesses will be confiscated. For instance, the current regime has ordered private banks topurchase government bonds equal to 27 percent of their annual loans.

Zenawi's developmental state fits Lenin's so-called democratic centralism,a one-party dictatorship, rather than a free market democracy. It was thefree market system that gave birth to democracy. Democracy is a universal concept. Therefore, democratic centralism or democratic developmental state is just an ideological label. Furthermore, Zenawi's developmental State is a discriminatory, tribal state. Ethiopia is currently divided into ethnic territories (kilils). In each territory, people are further divided into natives and settlers (so-called Amhara naftagnas). The latter are barred from possessing use right over land. They cannot work in the local bureaucracy. They cannot participate in the political process. Thus, they live as second class citizens in their own country in fear and humiliation. Ethnic discrimination is offensive to human dignity. It needs to be mentioned that it is important to be an Amhara, Oromo, Tigray or any other ethnic group, but it is more important to be human. Turning to the African experience, Zenawi concluded that the development models, followed by many African countries “have failed and failed disastrously,” and he said that this encourages people to look for alternative paradigms “as a means of national renaissance and survival.” Zenawi, however, did not supply any evidence to support his conclusion. The developmental state paradigm subscribes to the fundamental principles of socialism.

Under the developmental state model, the state owns most economic resources and makes most economic decisions. Thus, the developmentalstate paradigm is not a new idea. It is an old idea that has already been tried and failed. The developmental state paradigm is just a euphemism for socialism.

Egypt Security Forces Supported Oromo Protests in Cairo’

Cairo, Egypt (HAN) May 7, 2014: The Oromo diaspora community Protesters gather in front of Arab League in Cairo to call for internationalintervention in violent situation in Oromia state, Ethiopia. According to the Regional security Expert, in this case, Protest law in Egypt were not applied, but facilitated Oromo community protest in Cairo.

In the cases of political activist Ahmed Doma, media and Egyptian Journalists expressed their concerns after he was arrested on charges of“orchestrating illegal protests and assaulting police officers”

“A penal code cannot be put into force retroactively,” lawyer Walid al- Leithy told reporter. The protest law sparked anger among political activists and parties, who considered it a means to restrict the freedom of expression. Many parties, including the April 6 Youth Movement, have heldseveral protests against the law.

But, The Oromo community in Cairo organised a protest in front of theArab League in Cairo’s Tahrir Square on Wednesday to denounce the killing of Oromo protesters in Ethiopia last week.

Dozens of the Oromo protesters demanded the Arab League, AfricanUnion and the United Nations intervene in the situation in Ethiopia’sOromo state, where tens of ethnic Oromos were killed last week in protests over the expansion of the capital Addis Ababa.

Ethnic Oromo students have been protesting since April against the Ethiopian, who they accuse of intending to displace farmers from theirterritories in the capital of Addis Ababa through plans to develop and urbanize the city.

In egypt If there is one advantage in the protest law, although there arenot many, it is that anyone who organizes a peaceful protest without informing the authorities may pay the fine only,” he said.

Last Year, Refugees from Ethiopia’s Oromo community protest outside theoffice of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) in Cairo, Egypt against the construction of the Great Renaissance Dam.

Abdel-Kader Goumy, one of the protesters, told Al-Ahram’s Arabic language news website that the Renaissance Dam is intended to generateelectricity, and, as such, there is no reason it should be built on the Nile, rather than on Ethiopia's other rivers.

Oromo refugees in Egypt: "The tribe supports Egypt's right not to be adversely affected by the dam, Addis Ababa is not in need of water, ratherit aims to build the dam for political purposes," he added. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA: Three Egyptians caught in Gambella, accused of spying theGERD'

Upper Nile Times (May 7, 2014) - Ethiomedia News: GAMBELLA - The regional state government of Gambella caught today 3 Egyptian nationals who penetrated to the region via the war torn South Sudan in what the regional government of Ethiopia believed to be a spying mission to find information about the country's Renaissance Dam. The three men namedas Yusuf Haj, Ismail Azizi and Hassan Garai were caught in separate locations of the region.

Yusuf went to Abobo on a fake tourist pass to see the Abobo dam of the Abobo county (Woreda). The locals in Abobo worried about the suspicious activities he was making near the dam and that prompted his arrest by the local police. He was then transferred to the regional administration in Gambella for further investigation and detentions. The other two were caught at a bus station in Gambella trying to board a bus to Benshangul -Gumuz state without security passes. Benshangul-Gumuz near blue Nile iswhere the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) is located.

Egypt and Ethiopia have been at odds over the construction of GERD. Egyptian government threatened to bomb the dam as they feel that if thedam becomes operational, it would compromise their fair share of the Nilewater. Ethiopia however denied any impact the flow of water would do to Egypt. Moreover, South Sudan government recently signed a military agreement with Egyptian government. The agreement was received with too much skepticism by Addis Ababa who think that any deal by their neighbour with Egypt would invite an attack on the dam. Last week, the South Sudanese rebels claimed to have captured 12 Egyptians in Jonglei who fought alongside the government of South Sudan.

ASSESMENT: WJP ranked Ethiopia lowest on 2014 global & regional rule oflaw index'

Keffyalew Guebremedhin – The Ethiopia Observatory - The World JusticeProject (WJP) May 8, 2014: has published its fourth report – the 2014 Rule of Law Index.

This year, WJP's indices have paid attention to situations in 99 countries inall regions. Its founder and CEO William H. Neukom says, "The rule of law is the foundation for communities of opportunity and equity — it is the predicate for the eradication of poverty, violence, corruption, pandemics, and other threats to civil society."

WJP researchers claim that the project uses a working definition of therule of law, based on four universal principles. These are derived frominternationally accepted standards, the principles of which uphold:

The government and its officials are agents as well as individuals andprivate entities are accountable under the law.

The laws are clear, publicized, stable, and just; are applied evenly; and protect fundamental rights, including the security of persons and property.
The process by which the laws are enacted, administered, and enforced isaccessible, fair, and efficient Justice is delivered timely by competent, ethical, and independent representatives and neutrals who are of sufficient number and have adequate resources, and reflect the make-up of the communities theyserve.
Viewed through the prism of these four, nine aggregate indicators (factors) (listed below) and 47 specific standards, Ethiopia's performanceis very bad, ranking globally 88th out of 99 states.
This overall ranking in the rule of law is calculated by taking average ofthe eight factors listed below, with amplifications.
Surely, for Ethiopian citizens this would not come as a surprise or newssomething they have known in their daily lives. Above all, there is no better witness than national and individual experiences.
Similarly, among the 18 Sub-Saharan African states that are looked in thecurrent report, Ethiopia is ranked 17th of 18 the 18 states assessed from the region. While Botswana is graded top, Zimbabwe is placed at the bottom. List of the eight factors and their explanations is presented hereunder. The following few paragraphs discuss Ethiopia's performance along these eight factors.
How has Ethiopia survived assessment of government accountability?
What this assess is the effectiveness of the institutional checks on government power. A simple confirmation that this assessment of Ethiopiais valid is the fact that throughout the years, government in Ethiopia has been above the law.
For instance, if we simply take the financial and budgetary planning, implementation and management, the country's audit reports have clearlyshown, including this year, that the performance of those tasked with oversight, inspection and review of the functioning of state agencies worryingly is going from bad to worse.
Parliaments and courts have no power over the miscreants in power.Therefore, Ethiopia under the TPLF has been no man's land.
Moreover, in a country where non-governmental organizations are out ofexistence – save those the TPLF has established as its fronts. In addition,the country's media, better call it TPLF propaganda machine, not only is muzzled but also good journalists with every passing year are being sentto prison under long-term sentences.
The TPLF calculus has made sure that, with its abuses, civil society isterrorized with fear of prisons and the tortures and thus is kept mum.
In the light of this, it is reasonable to conclude that governmentaccountability is non-existent in Ethiopia.
Consequently, the TPLF regime – masquerading in the name of Ethiopia –has been ranked 91st on the metrics of constraints on government powers.
Incidentally, this factor is one of the two areas in which states from Sub-Saharan Africa have shown improved performance, except Ethiopia.

Absence of corruption: In the past several years, Ethiopia's image has been soiled – largely thanks to corrupt TPLF officials – civil and military. For them, Ethiopia has become a cow they should illegally milk, plunder its resources and siphon off its scarce financial resources to foreign banks.Therefore, in the eyes of the rest of the world, Ethiopia has increasingly come moved from the most prudent to one of the most corrupt countries. Accordingly, on this scale it has been ranked 56 out of 99 states.

To put it mildly, I must state here that there was inadequate energy exerted by WJP experts in examining the data, the records and the practices of the Ethiopian regime in this regard. At the same time, I notethat the experts have tried to justify their conclusions, with claim that they have only considered corruption as bribery, improper influence by public or private interests, and misappropriation of public funds or other resources (embezzlement).

Even if they have no way of considering that the regime in power is capable of selling the nation's sovereignty and its long-term interests, amore thorough assessment is in order, lest the current ranking misconstrued an over-estimation, possible distant sign of 'innocence' inthe regime.

Open government: While extremely secretive in national administration, which has made Ethiopia a nation where rules change in mid-stream to facilitate interests of those in power, the Ethiopian regime has been sizedup reasonably as 94th out of 99 states.

The open government factor assesses "the extent to which the society hasclear, publicized, accessible, and stable laws; whether administrative proceedings are open to public participation; and whether official information, including drafts of laws and regulations, is available to the public."

Interestingly, the WJP experts intimate that during the past few years,governments around the world have taken new steps to become moreopen, transparent and responsive and participatory.

That not being the case in Ethiopia, only last Sunday (May 5) Addis Abebans were in mass out in the streets in a protest rally, declaring theday "የ እሪታ ቀን" – literally a day of wailing to the gods and the world – toprotest the prevailing bad governance in the country and nepotism.

Fundamental rights: Ethiopia stands as the 94th country, lacking commitment to or respect for the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. In this assessment, WJP Rule of Law Index is looking to see how countriesuphold and protect the rights and freedoms of human beings that are firmly established under international law.

"These include the right to equal treatment and the absence of discrimination; the right to life and security of the person; due process oflaw and rights of the accused; freedom of opinion and expression; freedom of belief and religion; the absence of arbitrary interference with privacy; freedom of assembly and association; and the protection of fundamental labor rights."

A band of people in power in Ethiopia that give order to security forces to open fire on masses of university students in different parts of the countrybetween April 25 and May 1, instead of overpowering them and taking them to courts of law for possible offences they committed, is no responsible government under any law and standards, save the Third Reich or Mussolini's Fascist Party.

Order and security: The brutal Ethiopian regime is now made to look reasonable, ranking it as 73rd. Unfortunately, this is a mistaken assessment of order and security, which seems to justify what authoritarian regimes do – shoot to kill. What is the difference between North Korea and Ethiopia? Does any tourist or nation get troubled by theabsence of order and security in Pyongyang? I don't think so! The Kim IlSung dynasty has ensured that no North Korean would look up.

The WJP Rule of Law Index assessment, they say, only "measures the absence of three forms of violence: crime — particularly conventional crimes such as homicide, kidnapping, burglary, armed robbery, extortion,and fraud — political violence, including terrorism, armed conflict, and political unrest; and violence as a mean to redress personal grievances, which results from the loss of confidence in the police the criminal justicesystem.

Nevertheless, the security system of authoritarian leaders create is temporary, only lasting as long as the law of effect, as psychologistswould say.

In other words, a better order and security is where the people have stakeand are real participants – not forced observers that live with fear and insecurity like endangered animals.

Regulatory Enforcement: Ethiopia's regulatory environment and the nation's enforcement capacity is ranked 89th. The purpose of this factor isto assess effectiveness of regulatory enforcement practices of institutions and implementation of laws.

Civil justice: Ethiopia's civil justice system is ranked 85th. WJP offers an explanation, which is also true for Ethiopia. Here it goes: "All around the world, people's ability to use legal channels to resolve their disputes is often impeded by obstacles such as financial barriers, complexity of procedures, corruption of court personnel, influences of powerful parties injudicial decision making, or simply lack of knowledge, disempowerment, and exclusion. These problems, which are not restricted to developing countries, call for more work to ensure that all people have the opportunity to resolve their grievances effectively, impartially, and efficiently through the civil justice system."

Criminal justice: Interestingly, Ethiopia is ranked 46th in criminal justice system. However, inconsistently with the objectives WJP highlighted, the criminal justice system in Ethiopia is solely intended to intimidate and vindictive as means of protecting those in power or ensuring their continuity. At the same time, their relatives commit crimes and they walkaway free, as we have seen repeatedly.

What WJP tried to do is try to comparatively assess how systems around the world fulfill the goals of criminal justice. This is to stay how the different systems are adequately "investigating, prosecuting, adjudicating and punishing criminal offenses successfully, reliably and in a timely manner through a system that is impartial and non-discriminatory, as wellas free of corruption and improper government influence, all while ensuring that the rights of both the victims and the accused are effectivelyprotected."

This point is well taken, but the criminal justice system in Ethiopia isrotten, corrupt, subject to the influences of politics and ethnicity!

Therefore, the ranking given is not doing justice to the reputation of theIndex!

Conclusion: Ethiopia's performance regarding the rule of law was best described three years ago by JWP as dismal, which is very relevant today.In comparison with Sub-Saharan African countries, it observed: "Ethiopia,in comparison with other low-income nations is in the middle of the rankings when it comes to incorporating principles of the rule of law.

Accountability is very weak by regional standards (ranking 63rd globallyand second to last among low-income nations) and corruption remains.Property rights are weak (ranking 64th). The performance of regulatoryagencies and courts is poor, but comparable to other countries in the region. The country has a very poor record in the area of fundamental rights, ranking 65th globally and last in the region. Of greatest concern are restrictions limiting fundamental freedoms, such as the freedom of assembly and the freedom of speech, as well as illegal detentions and dueprocess violations." (Text ends)

RULE OF LAW: Ethiopian bloggers, journalists reportedly to be linked to "terrorism", and charged'

ESAT News (May 9, 2014) - Sources have indicated that detained members of the bloggers collective, Zone 9 and three other journalists that have appeared in court within the past couple of days are to be reportedly charged of forming a link with U.K. registeredpress freedom organisation, Article 19 and working to implement the missions of Egypt, the Eritrean government and the opposition Ginbot 7 Movement. The defendants have been given an appointment for May 17thand 18th, 2014. The sources added that the government is planning to charge them of having links with groups designated as terrorist organisations and taking money from abroad to ignite "colour revolution" in the Country.

Meanwhile, the final verdict of detained journalist Solomon Kebede, the Editor of YeMuslimoch Gudaye Magazine, has been postponed to July 3, 2014. According to the families and friends of Solomon, the date was reportedly postponed because there was "no judge." Solomon was giventhe same reason during his previous court appearance. Similarly, a number of Ethiopian Muslim worshipers, captured from Adama city, Ethiopia, were also told that there was no judge and had been sent to Kaliti and Kilinto prisons yesterday.

ETHIOPIA: TPLF worried about Tigray..... ION'

Indian Ocean Newsletter No 1379 (May 9, 2014) A delegation of former leaders of the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF, dominant faction of the EPRDF coalition ruling in Addis Ababa) went on a brief visit to the Tigray Regional State last week, to feel the pulse of their party's partisansin this region where criticism of federal government is on the rise. This delegation consisted of the former foreign affairs minister and Seyoum Mesfin, the TPLF ideologue A...bay Tsehaye and the former head of EFFORT (organisation of companies linked to the TPLF) Sebhat Nega, who were accompanied with the President of the Tigray Regional State, Abay Woldu. Their aim was to meet TPLF veterans, families of "martyrs" who died in combat and young TPLF officials. Everywhere they went they heardthe same barrage of questions and criticism of Addis Ababa. These went from the lack of retirement pensions and compensation for soldiers killed in the war against Eritrea, to accusations leveled against the TPLF leaders in Addis Ababa that they were corrupt and lived a life of luxury. Most of the time, Sebhat Nega said nothing in response to this criticism other thanto admit the truth of the grievances and promise things would change. Nodoubt he wanted to avoid the possibility of a setback in the 2015 general election in this region that is a TPLF stronghold.

ETHIOPIA: EPRDF Led Government Quietly Disintegrating'

(ION No 1379) May 9, 2014 - The general election looming ahead in 2015is already casting a shadow over the Ethiopian government, whose sole uniting bond would seem to be its praise for the memory of its late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. His portraits are on all the walls in Addis Ababa, which was not the case when he was alive, and in the Federal Assembly avideo projector plays his speeches with the aim of inspiring the new MPs. And yet, since Meles Zenawi died in August 2012, the federal governmenthas been rudderless, lacking a descendent. His successor as Prime Minister, Haile Mariam Desalegn, has neither the grip nor the political clout and has not managed to impose himself on the other political leaders. He frequently has to be content with merely dealing with everyday business. While it is true the Ethiopian State, whose tradition goes back a long way, has not fallen into decadence, the different factions and regionalist tendencies are making federal power increasingly fragmented.

Divisions produce inertia - Going beyond appearances, the ruling coalitionEthiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) is in an embryonic crisis state. Its central core, the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF), is deeply divided between the "provincial" faction led by Tigray Regional State President Abay Woldu, and the "modern nationalist"faction headed by Deputy Prime Minister Debretsion Guebremichael, not to forget the various other Tigrayan sub-factions such as those of the elderly Marxist Sebhat Nega and the Meles Zenawi’s widow Azeb Mesfin.

Facing this inter-Tigrayan squabble, the Amhara in the ANDM and the Oromo in the OPDO (two of the parties in the ruling coalition) are watching from the wings, biding their time before they go into the arena. This freezes the decision-making power, as each faction does not want tomake the wrong decision and yield an advantage to its rivals. In early April, speaking on a live TV debate (a rare event in itself), Amare Aregawithe editor of The Reporter asked the Prime Minister who is it that makes the decisions in his office and whether he is capable of making any himself. Much to the surprise of the viewers who are used to seeing decisiveness on their screens, Haile Mariam Desalegn mumbled an unconvincing response, confirming that the question had indeed struck home.

The economy and diplomacy are broken - Ethiopian diplomacy suffers from a lack of leadership at the top of country. Questions about the situation in Somalia are left to the head of the Ethiopian army which is intervening directly in its neighbour's territory. In the case of the IGAD mediation in the South Sudan crisis, the former foreign affairs minister Seyoum Mesfin was recalled from his post of ambassador to Beijing to lead the mediation. He nevertheless played a fairly effective role of mediator, which was largely taken over by the Ugandan President YoweriMuseveni even though Ethiopia did at the time hold the presidency of IGAD. Similar blockages have produced similar effects in the managementof the State-owned companies. The telephone network run by Ethio Telecom (formerly ETC) provides a very poor service, mainly because of frequent electricity outages which also affect the water distribution system when the electric pumps stop running. The cause is breakdowns of the aging transformers purchased second-hand from India by the Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation (EEPCO) several years ago. Today, EEPCO and ETC are squabbling over who should pay the cost of renovating the electricity system, a problem which Debretsion Guebremichael, the chairman of the EEPCO and ETC boards, has been unable to settle.

Regionalism becoming more intense - Since the end of April, the federal police have brutally repressed student protests against the Master Plan inseveral universities in the Oromia Regional State. This Master Plan involves the expansion of Addis Ababa whose mayor, Diriba Kuma, is alsoan Oromo. In the students' view, this project would eat into Oromo land and reduce the area their language is used. This regionalist exacerbation is illustrated by certain of the student slogans, proclaiming “Oromia for the Oromos“ and by the start of misdemeanours against Amhara farmers obliged to leave their land and take refuge in Addis Ababa. Certain TPLF officials have no qualms to explain that in their view, some ultra-regionalist elements of the ruling OPDO are discreetly fuelling this studentprotest movement against the Master Plan. Abebe Gellaw Made It Again!

Interrupted Barack Obama, Obama agrees with his call for freedom’

San Jose, California – (May 9, 2014) - U.S. President Barack Obama has agreed with journalist Abebe Gellaw’s demand to support freedom in Ethiopia and help free bloggers, journalists and political prisoners jailed bythe tyrannical regime. While Obama was wrapping up his speech last nightat a glitzy Democratic National Committee reception in San Jose’s Fairmont Hotel, journalist and activist Abebe Gellaw interrupted the president and called support for freedom in Ethiopia. The event jointly hosted by Yahoo CEO Marissa Mayer and and Y Combinator CEO Sam Altman was mainly attended by Silicon Valley business and political leaders.

Abebe began his message with a positive note. “Mr. Obama, we Ethiopianslove you. We demand freedom for Ethiopia,” he said. The President, who was talking about winning both Congress and the Senate from the Republicans in the next election, replied “I agree with you although why don’t I talk about it later because I am just about to finish. You and me will talk about it. I am going to be coming around.” But Abebe continued his message and loudly called for help to free jailed bloggers and journalists. “Stand with the people of Ethiopia, don’t support tyranny,” he said to which the president answered again, “I agree with you." "We have tyranny in Ethiopia," Abebe said and added, "We love you!" "I love you back," the present replied and noted that his speech was kind of screwedup. "That is okay. And we got free speech in this country," he said beforewrapping up his speech.

In a letter Abebe handed to the President at the end of the event, he noted that he wanted to take the rare opportunity to raise the voices of the oppressed people of Ethiopia. "Mr. President, as an exiled journalist and freedom activist trying to raise the voices of the oppressed people of Ethiopia, I can tell you that Ethiopians have genuine respect for this greatland of freedom and your inspirational leadership," he wrote. "But it painsand frustrates me and millions of Ethiopians to see that for over two decades the United States has overridden its core values and forged a questionable alliance with the Tigray People's Liberation Front, a terrorist group that has continued to oppress, massacre, jail, torture and displace defenseless Ethiopians."

According to Abebe, the rare opportunity was another unmissable chanceto demand our freedom and expose the tyrants at such a high profile platform of the most powerful decision makers in the world. "I am glad I took the chance though security was extremely tight. At the end of the day,we should consistently demand the U.S to the review its questionableforeign policy towards Ethiopia. That was also the heart of my demand," he said.

Ethiopia keen to improve relations with European Union -ION'

(ION) A delegation from the Ethiopian Investment Agency (EIA), led by itsdirector general Fitsum Arega, went to Brussels (Belgium) and The Netherlands in late April to meet members of the Chambre Belgique Luxembourg ACP and officials from the European Commission and the European Investment Bank (EIB). The EIA's purpose in this visit is to make the Europeans understand that the government in Addis Ababa is keen to diversify its... trading partners, of which China is currently the leader. They also want to discreetly appeal to European investors, particularly in the infrastructure, textiles and tourism sectors. There were around fifty people at the Brussels meeting on 30 April. Those present included Christophe Thibaut de Maisières, secretary general of the Unibra breweries group which last March acquired 60% of the Ethiopian Zebidar Brewery. The Lebanese bank Byblos Bank was also represented, as were the Belgian companies Agrotech Belgium and Finasucre.

Ethiopian Plane Hijacker May Finally Gets Asylum in Switzerland but Onlyafter 30-Year Prison Term'

ESAT News (May 13, 2014) The co-pilot of Ethiopian Airlines flight ET702 who had hijacked his plane and got it to Switzerland, in a bid to claim political asylum in the country, may finally have his wish granted, though not exactly as he might have planned. TheSwiss government recently denied the extradition request from Ethiopian authorities, stating that the 30 year old co-pilot Hailemedhin Abera Tegegn will have to face criminal charges in the Swiss court, and hence hewill be kept in the country.

"We have informed the Ethiopian authorities that criminal proceedings arecurrently open in Switzerland against the co-pilot. Therefore, the Federal Office of Justice refused the extradition request from the Ethiopians," Folco Galli, Head of Communications, Federal Office of Justice (FOJ) told French news source Le Matin. The report further stated that Tegegn wouldhave have to face trial first for hijacking, and may even get sentenced fora prison term of 30 years.

"His asylum seeking application will get processed only after 30 years andeven then, there are chances that he may not be granted a permanent asylum. But still since he has cited that he fears for his life in Ethiopia, hewill get to stay in Switzerland and will end up getting a refugee asylum," Michael Pfeiffer, lawyer for the Swiss Organization for Aid to Refugees said. In February, after bringing the hijacked plane to the Geneva airport,Tegegn jumped out of the cockpit window and scrambled down an emergency rope. He then rushed to the police and surrendered. The Ethiopian government has claimed that the co-pilot was mentally unstableand unfit. However, the government has still dubbed him as a traitor and,in his absence, has filed for a law suit.

Ethnic Cleansing of Amhras in Wollega, Western EthiopiaBy Dimetros Birku (May 13, 2014)

Clear early omens of ethnic cleansing are unfolding in Western Ethiopia. Gimbi, a small town west of Wellega, in what is now Oromia regional state, was a scene of attack on residents of the town who happened to beAmharic speakers.

A victim who was speaking to Ethiopian Satellite Television (ESAT) anonymously recounted his experience of harassment in Gimbi just for being Amharic speaker. Based on testimony of the victim, Amharic speakers who have been living in these areas for decades are even openlytold to leave the area as “they do not belong there.”

Indeed, recently young protestors in the region were ranting “Oromia for Oromos only” – a tone that more like the political creed of ethnic political elites – both within government structure and the young ethno-radical group based in the diaspora which appears to be doing all the mobilizationwork in a very subtle way. The mobilization work usually takes a pattern of struggle for freedom.

The context for mobilization is “historical grievance” which they trace backto Menelik II’s reunification campaign a little before engagement with Italian colonialists in over a century ago.

Omens of ethnic cleansing is not something unexpected. Although youngpeople who subscribe to the ideology of radical ethnic politics seem to manifest what appears to them “revolutionary rage” , the unfolding appetite to attack Amharic speaking Ethiopians is rather a product of evolutionary political process.

The core of the ruling coalition party’s , TPLF, political engineering was informed by sentiment to ethnicity as opposed to national political agenda

− which is evident in the current constitution of Ethiopia. TPLF wasinsidiously mobilizing against Amharic speaking Ethiopians since itsguerrilla times as witnessed by some of its former members.

The country is divided into ethnic based Federal states. While TPLF is know to have intervened in the affairs of Federal regional states, someregional states have taken their power to far so much so that they arearbitrarily evicting farming communities from their respective ethnic regions.

Events unfolding in states like Oromia makes it appear like it is already de-facto sovereign state and Ethiopians from other parts of Ethiopia are being treated like “illegal migrants” in another country. The Amharic andOromo speaking Ethiopians are the most intermingled Ethiopians. (Text ends)
ETHIOPIA: Addis Ababa under the invasion of locust -Locusts fly downAddis ababa EMF (May 14, 2014) — Swarms of locusts coming from Ogaden region fly down in Addis Ababa. According to EMF source; millions of locusts are flying in Addis Ababa sky and residences are panicked with the unusual occurrence of millions of locusts. Last week, The Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO) gave warning to East African countries, including Ethiopia. In its warning FAO stated; During April, adult groups moved intothe interior of Saudi Arabia where one generation of breeding is expected in May. Several swarms moved from northwest Somalia into eastern Ethiopia where, despite aerial and ground control operations,breeding is likely to occur and hopper bands could form this month.
So far in May, there have been new reports of more hatching in northeast Oman near Ibri where hoppers are forming small groups.
Hopper infestations persist in a few places on the northwest coast in Somalia. Control operations should continue in eastern Ethiopia againstswarms. The above FAO warning looks ignored by Ethiopian authorities; inthe result Crops are in risk and being destroyed by swarms of locusts in the coming weeks. Professionals also stated that controlling locusts are not an easy job. It needs coordinated efforts of the community, the government and international communities. Unless an appropriate control measures have been taken, locusts can damage the crops and other vegetation. Understanding correctly the biology and behavior of locusts is the first step for successful control. Communication among the survey teams, availability of vehicles, air strips and air craft, manually operated sprayers, pesticides and other logistics can facilitate the control measuresbefore locusts do damage to the existing crops and other vegetations. In addition, revising the lessons we learned from the 1993s migratory locustoutbreak can help us to be ready and start the job on the right time and place. (Text ends)
PMHD again at odds with TPLF on Oromos protests’
SP: (May 14, 2014) - Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn is once again at odds with the powerful TPLF branch of EPRDF ruling party, according to sources connected to his adminstration. This time the disputeis on government response to Oromo protests in Oromia region, accordingto a journalist of an English weekly paper who asked to remain anonymous for fear of reprisals.
Hailemariam, an ethnic Welayta native, does not have the military background and the political power that former Tigrayan Prime Minister Meles zenawi had. Meles was the executive head of the Tigrayan Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF) for over thirty years. Even though various ethnic groups are well represented inside the Ethiopian military, most of the top executive positions are held by Tigrayans. Some reports claim that around70 percent of the country's top generals and military leaders are still ethnic Tigrayan today, even though Tigrayans makeup only 6 percent of the Ethiopian population.

The Govt source said TPLF military chiefs wanted to stop the peacefulOromo student protest early before it turned into riots, but there was"lack of leadership and policy from Arat Kilo," (refering to the Menelik Palace were the PM resides.)

Despite their small numbers in the country, Hailemariam's ethnic Welaytasare said to have significant presence in the mid-level positions in the armyand federal force. However, TPLF's military heads complain that Hailemariam portrays a "soft leader" image and the police has been overstretched with nonstop demonstrations for months. They say the public is emboldened to take their angers to the streets since Meles died. Since 2013, millions of Muslim Ethiopians have been protesting in the cities while the "legal opposition" groups have also organized various protests, sometimes without permit. But the recent Oromo protests have irritated the TPLF military authorities the most, as some OPDO (another EPRDF branch) members have provided covert support.

The source said Hailemariam's chances of being re-elected to lead EPRDF ruling party are slim. Hailemariam has also been under American pressureto deliver a peace deal in South Sudan, though some TPLF army officials are suspicious of the Sudanese opposition. TPLF military chiefs claimed South Sudan peace deals signed in Addis Ababa are symbolic but meaningless on the ground because the rebel leader Riek Machar does nothave full control of opposition fighters. Ethiopia: Fine Line - In the Absence of a Revolutionary Change ...' ADDIS FORTUNE ANALYSIS, ADDIS ABABA (May 18, 2014) - In the absence of a revolutionary change in government, or a political shift due to the electoral defeat of an incumbent, successive leaders often prefer policy continuity.This is true of the current leaders of the Revolutionary Democrats, who swear by their commitment to pursue the policies of theirpredecessor. Indeed, none among them appear ready to face criticism over allegations of "revisionism" from the policy manuals of their "great leader", gossip observed.

This is not to mean, however, that individual leaders do not differ on theirleadership style and preferences, claims gossip. Look no further than Hailemariam Desalegn, whose leadership style is very different to Meles Zenawi's, who was a Napoleonic Prime Minister, gossip observed.

Hailemariam appears to prefer to lead through consensus, as in a cabinetadministration, whilst paying little attention to symbolic gestures which project power, according to gossip.

Although there are several ways to exercise such symbolism, one is to have large numbers of cabinet ministers line up at Bole International Airport to see off the leader to other countries and present in his honour whenever he arrives from overseas travels, claims gossip. Unlike his two predecessors, Hailemariam is not seen indulging himself in this culture. Hehas put a stop to having any of his ministers at the airport to see him leave or arrive back, gossip disclosed.

The cabinet ministers' failure to appear before the presence of the PrimeMinister is not limited to the airport, however. Gossip observed a changeof culture following the change of guard in the power corridor when it comes to the Prime Minister addressing international conferences, gossipobserved.

Unlike the days of Meles, whereby several ministers and high profile officials pack and decorate the front row seats of conference halls, competing to attract his attention, very few ministers are seen around when Hailemariam graces such venues, gossip observed. Take for instancelast week, where 600 delegates come from across the world to attend an international conference on food resilience and the Prime Minister made opening remarks. Very few ministers were present. There was just Tefera Deribew, minister of Agriculture, and Neway Gebreab, senior macroeconomic advisor to the Prime Minister, who were both enlisted as panellists to the conference, gossip observed.

Nonetheless, gossip has not been able to confirm whether there has beenan order from the unassuming Prime Minister not to let his ministers, whose presence is not justified by an event, to be visible at such venues.But he has some advisors under a ministerial portfolio he happens to seemore frequently, gossip learnt.

For instance, the intensity and frequency of his meetings with Bereket Simon, his advisor on strategic policy issues, has increased lately, gossipdisclosed. This trend is also seen with Abay Tsehaye, who is also an advisor on strategic policy matters, and whose influence on the Prime Minister is seen increasing, claims gossip.

Yet, gossip observes that Hailemariam is getting much closer and becoming hugely dependent on Arkebe Oqubay (PhD) in his desire to see things get done and his administration delivers on its pledges to effect development. A celebrated former mayor of Addis Abeba - a city which owes much of its public infrastructure goings of today to his tenure - Arkebe recently returned from his doctoral studies in industrial economics,at the University of London.

A veteran of the armed struggle against the military government, not even his ardent critics would deny his competence to deliver on his assignment, gossip observed. Little surprise then that he is a rising star in the administration of Hailemariam Desalegn, which is very performance- focused and sees its mission as delivering on the policies of its predecessor, claims gossip. Egypt's al-Sisi ready to visit Ethiopia for water talks’

World Bulletin/News Desk (May 18, 2014) - Egypt's presidential frontrunner Abdel-Fattah al-Sisi has said that he is ready to visit Ethiopiafor talks on resolving their Nile water dispute. "Dialogue and understanding are the best way to resolve the crisis," al-Sisi said in an interview with the state-run Al-Ahram daily on Saturday.

"This is better than going into a dispute or an enmity with anyone," he added. The former army chief, who led the army to unseat elected president Mohamed Morsi last July, said that he is ready to visit Ethiopia"if this serves Egypt's interests". "I will not hesitate in making any effortfor my country and its water rights, which is a life-or-death issue," he added.

Relations between Cairo and Addis Ababa soured last year over Ethiopia'splans to build a $6.4-billion hydroelectric dam on the Blue Nile, which represents Egypt's primary water source. The project has raised alarm bells in Egypt, which fears a reduction of its historical share of Nile water.Water distribution among Nile basin states has long been regulated by a colonial-era treaty giving Egypt and Sudan the lion's share of river water.Ethiopia, for its part, says it has never recognized the treaty.

LOCAL PRESS: Journalists Are Not Terrorists'

RWB (May 20, 2014) - Reporters Without Borders has learnt today that the court in Addis Ababa granted the police investigating the case againstthe 6 bloggers and three journalists, 28 more days for further investigations. The police notably claimed they were unable to access theFacebook and Twitter accounts of the detainees, which were reportedly disabled after the hearing on May 7th and 8th.

According to the Eastern Africa Journalists Association 's Secretary general, Alexis Niyungeko. "The request by the police for more time to conduct further investigations clearly shows that the three journalists andsix bloggers were arrested without sufficient evidence". Following today'shearing, the news providers are now being officially charged under the country's infamous anti-terrorism proclamation of 2009, which can carry imprisonments sentences from 5 to 10 years.

During today's hearing, a witness said that Zone9 blog member Atinaf Berhane complained of sever torture and interrogation throughout the night. The detainees were able to see their lawyers for the first time on May 14th and May 16th, according the defense lawyer Amha Mekonnen.The next hearing is scheduled for June 14th.

Many Saudi-deported Ethiopians 'caught trying to return'

In December of last year, Saudi deported more than 160,000 Ethiopiansworking in the kingdom on grounds that they lacked the necessary documentation.

World Bulletin/News Desk (May 20, 2014) - Ethiopian authorities have been alarmed by a surge in the number of people previously deported bySaudi Arabia who are trying to return to the oil-rich kingdom despite a government ban on traveling there for work. Over 1200 would-be migrants were arrested recently as they tried to cross the border into Somaliland, from which traffickers had promised to take them to Yemen by boat and from there to Saudi Arabia, Tassew Chalew, Harari regional state police commander, told Anadolu Agency. "They were caught in the 30 days since a day before," Chalew said. "Just three days ago, their number stood at 700."

According to Chalew, many of those arrested were previously deported bySaudi Arabia for illegal residence. "Most of them are the same ones who were deported recently from Saudi Arabia," Chalew, who is also responsible for external relations, told AA. Saudi Arabia has deported hundreds of thousands of foreign workers since the government introduced new regulations on undocumented workers in March

In December of last year, Saudi deported more than 160,000 Ethiopiansworking in the kingdom on grounds that they lacked the necessary documentation. And although the Ethiopian government claims to have created more than four million new jobs over the last three years, manyEthiopians still appear willing to make the perilous journey through Somalia and Yemen in hopes of finding employment in Saudi Arabia.

Chalew said the arrested immigrants had been returned to their respectivefamilies. “The Ethiopians [who were] prevented from crossing to Somaliland underwent a rehabilitation process offered by the government in collaboration with the U.N. refugee agency (UNHCR) and the International Organization for Migration (IOM),” Chalew said.

PRESS RELEASE: Oromo Liberation Front calls Ethiopians to stand withOromo students ‘

ESAT News (May 20, 2014) - The Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), which is led by General Kemal Gelchu, said as the protest of students of the Oromoethnic group is a protest against the unjust eviction of Oromo farmers, thepublic needs to stand with them and support them.

OLF in its press release stated that the ruling party in Ethiopia is workingto prolong its grip on power by causing inter-ethnic fights and this will hurt the Nation at the end of the day; thus, all political parties should leave their differences aside and struggle together.

It also noted that the demolition of the historic Waldeba Monastery, Northern Ethiopia for sugar development and the sale of lands in Gambellaare deplorable. The eviction of Oromo farmers is similarly aimed at selling the lands to investors, which should be opposed by all Ethiopians now.

OLF said Ethiopians without being divided along ethnic, place of origin andreligion should rise in unison and continue the protest against the new Addis Abeba Master Plan.

In a related development, Ethiopians in Munich, Germany have held a protest opposing the killing of students in Ambo and other towns of theOromia region in Ethiopia.

Also, the fact that some Ethiopians were selected to leave from a fund raising meeting recently held for the construction of the Great Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) in the city had sparked a row.

Although the participants that were kicked out by the cadres, had said that they were entitled to attend the meeting as they are Ethiopian citizens; the cadres ofthe ruling Front did not concur with the demands.

The evicted Ethiopians had voiced their opposition carrying pictures of students that have been recently killed by the government forces in Ethiopia and photographs of detained journalists, politicians and humanrights activists. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA: Study Reveals Ethiopian Customs & Revenue Authority (ECRA)Most Corrupt'
Addis Standard, Addis Ababa (MAY 22, 2014)
A new survey conducted by Selam Development Consultants, assisted byJGAM Donors in collaboration with the Federal Ethics and Anti Corruption Commission, revealed Ethiopia's Customs and Revenue Authority as the most corrupt government office followed by the construction permit and land administration offices. Entitled "Perception of the Level of Corruptionby Foreign Investors in Ethiopia", the study, which also aimed at identifying public sector institutions that are more prone to corruption according to foreign investors operating in Ethiopia, states corruption in Ethiopia has generally decreased. However, according to the survey, in institutions dealing with customs, import & export, foreign currency, taxes and tax collection, land acquisition for business purposes and other public utilities such as electricity and telecom corruption has shown an increase. "Even if there were no documented and study based focus areas so far in the commission, the findings of the survey are not new," Ali Suleman, Commissioner of the Federal Ethics and Anti-Corruption Commission toldAddis Standard. "Customs and Revenue, and public financial institutions have been the focus areas of the commission and will continue to be," headded.
The survey stated that government contracts still need to be further improved as some respondents perceived that at least half of the government contracts involve unofficial payment averaging 24% of the value of contracts. "This implies that the government still needs to work on the reform processes and reviewing the salary of civil servants," says the survey. The survey result also showed that lack of evidence, actions against those who commit corruption and clarity about corruption proceedings as the three top reasons why people would not report corruption to the relevant authorities. More than 400 foreign investors, who are currently investing in Ethiopia, were included in the survey. (Textends)
ETHIOPIAN HISTORY: Ras Mekonnen W/Mikael Gudissa, father of EmperorHaileselassie I.
WEMEZEKIR (May 23, 2014) A man of dignity Ras Mekonnen Wold MikaelGudissa of Shewa state was the first dark skin official to ever enter the highest office and speak before the parliament members of Italy in Romaaround the year 1899 just three years after the battle of Adwa. The barefooted royal figure has led a number of highly recognized Ethiopian delegates over several Europe nations for brief state visit in the said yearabove and if you recall that I have brought the story of this well polishedroyal officer to your attention a number of times because he is worth to recall time and again. Ras Mekonnen the biological father of Emperor HaileSelassie was fit to be a king himself, he was intelligent with a natural diplomatic personality but he suddenly past away in a brief illness in the year 1906 relatively as a young age of 53. The stunning army general RasMekonnen was the first Ethiopian ever to obtain a driver license from a french driving school in Paris around the same year of his European visit. He was also the first bankbook holder along with Emperor Menelik II and the second Ethiopian to drive a motorcar.
Former Ethiopian Guard Sentenced for Immigration Crimes in U.S. Prosecutors seek longer sentence, Associated Press, (May 24, 2014)

DENVER, COLORADO — A man identified as a brutal Ethiopian prison guard after a chance encounter at a suburban Denver restaurant could spend up to 22 years in a federal prison after his sentencing Friday for immigration fraud. Kefelgn Alemu Worku (kah-FEH'-lun ah-LEE'-moo WER'-koo) was convicted in October of assuming another man's identityand lying on U.S. immigration forms when he denied committing acts ofpolitical persecution.

At his trial, witnesses testified that Worku participated in beatings and torture at Higher 15, a detention center established during government- sponsored political violence in the late 1970s known as the Red Terror. Human Rights organizations, including Amnesty International, have said thousands were killed. Worku has not been charged in Denver with crimesrelated to the violence. But after he serves his U.S. sentence, he could face deportation to Ethiopia, where a high court in 2000 convicted him in absentia of genocide and sentenced him to death, U.S. prosecutors wrote in court documents.

The Ethiopian court found Worku "unjustly killed 101 . innocent individuals, and inflicted injury through torture," the documents say. Worku has acknowledged using a false name to get into the U.S. but denied the torture allegations. The U.S. Justice Department has used Worku's case to encourage refugees to report human rights abusers hidingin plain sight. The department's Human Rights and Special Prosecutions unit says it has secured convictions against a former Guatemalan officer who hid his role in a 1982 massacre, an ex-Salvadoran colonel who lied onimmigration forms about his actions during that country's civil war, and a Bosnian man who admitted concealing his affiliation in a military brigade that committed atrocities against Muslims.

Witnesses at Worku's immigration fraud trial spoke of being bound and beaten with cattle prods, electric wires, sticks and wood. One woman saidshe was sent to the prison as a 16-year-old high school student in 1977 and interrogated about her political affiliations. She said she saw Worku shoot and kill three people, including a teenage boy, then order other prisoners to drink blood that pooled up on the floor.

Worku, whom authorities believe is in his 60s, was a member of the communist Derg regime that came to power over the 1974 overthrow of Emperor Haile Selassie. Prosecutors say he eventually took another man'sidentity and came to the United States in 2004 from Kenya, where he wasliving as a refugee. Worku lived in Denver for eight years before a former Higher 15 prisoner recognized him in 2011 at an Ethiopian restaurant andalerted law enforcement. The man told authorities Worku was a "big fish" at Higher 15 and that he was "the most feared."

Worku's federal public defender, Matthew Golla, did not return calls seeking comment. Golla has questioned how witnesses could accurately identify Worku more than 30 years after the events at the Ethiopian prison. Although Worku was sentenced to death in Ethiopia, there is no record of that country having carried out executions of other former Dergmembers, prosecutors wrote. (Text ends)

Crisis In The Horn - The Seeds of Famine in Ethiopia'

Global Research (May 24, 2014) - More than 8 million people in Ethiopia –representing 15% of the country's population – had been locked into "famine zones". Urban wages have collapsed and unemployed seasonal farm workers and landless peasants have been driven into abysmal poverty. The international relief agencies concur without further examination that climatic factors are the sole and inevitable cause of crop failure and the ensuing humanitarian disaster. What the media tabloids fails to disclose is that – despite the drought and the border war with Eritrea – several million people in the most prosperous agricultural regionshave also been driven into starvation. Their predicament is not the consequence of grain shortages but of "free markets" and "bitter economicmedicine" imposed under the IMF-World Bank sponsored Structural Adjustment Programme (SAP).

Ethiopia produces more than 90% of its consumption needs. Yet at the height of the crisis, the nationwide food deficit for 2000 was estimated by the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) at 764,000 metric tons of grain representing a shortfall of 13 kilos per person per annum.1 In Amhara, grain production (1999-2000) was twenty percent in excess of consumption needs. Yet 2.8 million people in Amhara (representing 17% of the region's population) became locked into famine zones and are "at risk" according to the FAO. 2 Whereas Amhara's grain surpluses were in excess of 500,000 tons (1999-2000), its "relief food needs" had been tagged by the international community at close to 300,000 tons.3 A similar pattern prevailed in Oromiya, the country's most populated state where 1.6 million people were classified "at risk", despite the availability of more than 600,000 metric tons of surplus grain.4 In both these regions,which include more than 25% of the country's population, scarcity of food was clearly not the cause of hunger, poverty and social destitution. Yet no explanations are given by the panoply of international relief agencies andagricultural research institutes.

OPPOSITION: When enough is enough: Rise up people of Ethiopia'

REPORT (May 24, 2014) - World wide protest against the ethnic Tigrayan-led Ethiopian government following the violent cracked down on peaceful protesters, killing dozens of ethnic Oromo students and injuring or imprisoning hundreds more. Ethiopians took to the streets of Addis Ababato protest against the gross human rights violations being committed by the ruling party of EPRDF. Medrek opposition party organized the protest rally. The people of Ethiopia are beginning to organise themselves and stand up against the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) government, a brutal dictatorship, albeit one dressed in democratic western garb. After 23 years of suppression at the hands of the EPRDF, simmering discontent and anger appears to finally be spilling over onto the streets. Robbed of hope, the people have had enough, enough of the wide-ranging human rights abuses. The denial of constitutional rights, the arbitrary imprisonments and torture, regime violence, the displacement of people from ancestral land, the partisan distribution of aid, and the rising cost of living.

Victims of house demolition pleaded to the IOC'

ESAT News (May 25, 2014) - Since the demolition of houses has unexpectedly started by the government in Addis Abeba, many citizens have been left unsheltered and are also losing their belongings. An elderly man, who was sheltered in a temporary tent, has been partially munched by hyenas last Thursday night. Police lifted the man's body the following day, according to the local residents. ESAT's effort to get detailed information regarding the death of the man has been unsuccessful.

Police had struggled to keep the secrets from spilling by surrounding the area where the man has been attacked. Police also informed the occupiersto immediately 'disappear' from the tents. Many of the evictees have beenphoning ESAT and seeking help worried on how and where they should keep their children. In a letter they wrote to ESAT, those who had their houses demolished said the recent demolitions are aimed at facilitating the grounds for the construction of the Olympic Village, which is funded bythe International Olympic Committee (IOC). They have called the Committee to look at the sufferings of the people and delay its support.

They have also mentioned that the Ethiopian government and the Ethiopian Olympic Committee (EOC) would give them 2 million birr(102,472.04 USD).

"Although we have never been given any warning or notice prior to the demolition of our houses, the letter sent to us by the government statedthat we had been given several warning letters to immediately evict ourhouses and the area prior to the demolition" they added. The order to demolish the houses within three days came in order to confiscate the properties and belongings of the victims and share them among the localgovernment officials and the demolishers, they noted in their letter.

The official of the Woreda told the victims that the order came from the Sub City officials and he could do nothing; whereas the Administrator of the Sub City, Desta, got the appellants forced out of his office.

Fearing that the demolishers would confiscate their belongings some of the residents had put aside the roof and doors in the houses of their relativesas a result of which many including children and mothers had to endure the lashing rain and cold that left most of them sick. "The EPRDF regime has killed us alive and tossed our bodies in the street." The appellants say.

At the end of their letter, the victims said that although the IOC is an organisation that does not stand with programs that violate human rights,they have condemned that it is cooperating with the Ethiopian government which is known for its reckless human rights records. They have also called for the funds coming from the Committee to be stopped and pleaded those that have connections with the Committee to forward their appeals. ESAT has learnt from the telephone conversation it conducted with the victims that the letter was written two weeks ago however they preferred not to release it fearing government reprisals.

Ethiopian Migrants Held in Yemen at 'Torture Camps'Human Rights Watch (May 25, 2014)

(Sanaa) – Traffickers in Yemen hold African migrants in detention camps,torturing them to extort payment from their families, with the complicity of local officials, Human Rights Watch said in a report released today.

Sometimes the torture ends in death. The Yemeni government should vigorously investigate and prosecute human traffickers and members ofthe security forces involved in the abuses.

The 82-page report, ‘Yemen’s Torture Camps’: Abuse of Migrants by Human Traffickers in a Climate of Impunity,” documents harms suffered by migrants, most from the Horn of Africa, who try to travel through Yemen on their way to Saudi Arabia for work. Human Rights Watch foundthat various Yemeni security agencies in the border town of Haradh, where dozens of camps exist, and at checkpoints, allow the human trafficking industry to flourish with little government interference.

“Traffickers are holding African migrants in ‘torture camps’ to squeeze money out of their painfully poor families,” said Eric Goldstein, deputy Middle East and North Africa director at Human Rights Watch. “When yousee traffickers openly loading people into trucks in the center of Haradh, you know that the authorities are looking the other way.”

The legalization of political repression in Ethiopia’

EMF VIEW POINT (May 27, 2014) - It has been one month since the latestround of repression against government critics in Ethiopia began. Last weekend, the Zone9 bloggers and three journalists who were arrested in late April appeared in court. To date, very little information has been given about the crimes the bloggers and journalists are accused of committing or the reasons why they are being held practically incommunicado. Rather than indicting the prisoners during the recent court appearance, the presiding judge gave police an additional 28 days toinvestigate the case, sending the nine bloggers and journalists back to jailwithout officially charging them. It was the second time since their arrest that the court has delayed the process, and knowing Ethiopia’s dodgy lawsaround “crimes against the state,” it probably will not be the last time.

The tactic of detaining and delaying is not uncommon in Ethiopian politicaltrials. The recent Anti-Terrorism Proclamation gives the court broad liberties on detention and remand, allowing the accused to be held up to aperiod of four months while investigations are underway. Four months without knowing what one is charged with, without the possibility of bail (as in this case) and without sufficient access to legal representation or time with family and friends. The longer the bloggers and journalists lingerin jail, government may hope that media attention and the initial outcry against the crackdown will wane. But, the move is more than just a ploy to diffuse interest in the situation. More importantly, it buys time for the state to build a legal case against the accused because in Ethiopia the façade of legalism has become an indispensable gloss on political repression.

As ludicrous as the accusations of terrorism or subversion by bloggers andjournalists is the ritual of political trials and court proceedings used to affirm such crimes. If a state seeks to silence criticism and repress freedom of expression, why go through the trouble of a trial? In the past, regimes that sought to clamp down on opposition did so more candidly, without any pretexts or deliberations. Yet, in recent years, few states— liberal or illiberal—have attached as much significance to legalism as the Ethiopian government when it comes to resolving political disputes. On the surface, this is a welcomed change—since it would be foolish to argue that anyone would prefer the barrel of a gun to a trial—but the reliance onlaws hides a deeper problem at the core of the political system in Ethiopiaand other states that have adopted liberalism without fully buying into it. (Text ended)

GEOGRAPHY: Volcano In Blue: Ethiopia's blue volcano burns deadlysulphuric gas'

New Scientist Environment (May 27, 2014) - IT'S a volcano, but not as weknow it. This cerulean eruption takes place in the Danakil Depression, a low-lying plain in Ethiopia. The volcano's lava is the usual orange-red –the blue comes from flames produced when escaping sulphuric gases burn.

French photographer Olivier Grunewald creates such images without usingcolour filters or digital enhancement, which is no simple task. To get this shot he had to wait until dusk, when the electric blue flames were visible, but before all the daylight had ebbed away. Then the wind had to be blowing away from him so he could get close enough. Photographing the similarly sulphurous Kawah Ijen volcano in Indonesia, where he worked inside the crater, was even more treacherous. "We have to take care when the winds push the flames close to us," he says. "In Danakil it is easier to escape as the land is flat."

Grunewald works in a gas mask to avoid breathing in the deadly fumes –but photographing Kawah Ijen still left him with peeling skin and clothes smelling of rotten eggs for weeks afterwards. Another drawback of Grunewald's subject matter is that the acidic gases don't agree with his cameras. But it's worth it, he says. "The phenomenon is so uncommon –we really feel like we are on another planet.

Ethiopia holds editor-in-chief without charge –CPJ'

New York (May 28, 2014) –The Committee to Protect Journalists condemns the detention of a journalist without charge since Monday andcalls on Ethiopian authorities to release him immediately. An Ethiopian court on Tuesday extended by 14 days the pre-trial detention of Elias Gebru, according to news reports. Ethiopia's federal police in the capital,Addis Ababa, summoned Elias, editor-in-chief of the independent news magazine Enku, for questioning in connection with a column published inhis paper, according to news reports.

The Awramba Times reported that the column discussed a monument recently erected outside the capital in honor of ethnic Oromos massacred in the 19th century by Emperor Menelik's forces.

The monument has ignited divisions between some Oromos and supporters of the emperor's legacy. Local journalists said authorities wereattempting to link the paper's publication to the deadly clashes between Oromo student protesters and security forces last month. Ethiopian authorities claimed eight protesters were killed in the violence, while newsoutlets and human rights groups cited witnesses as saying that security forces killed more than a dozen protesters. At least 17 other journalists are in jail in Ethiopia in connection with their journalistic work, according to CPJ research. Only Eritrea holds more journalists behind bars in Africa, CPJ research shows.

"The detention without charge of Elias Gebru is the latest move by the Ethiopian government to tighten the noose on the country's independentpress," said CPJ Africa Advocacy Coordinator Mohamed Keita. "We call on authorities to release Elias immediately and to stop arresting journalists as a means to quell information and debate." Elias is being held at the Maekelawi detention center, according to local journalists. In 2008, thousands of copies of Enku magazine were seized by Ethiopian authorities in connection with the paper's independent coverage of the trial of a pop singer who had been critical of the government, according tonews reports. The copies were later returned. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA - South Sudan Conflict Destabilizes Ethiopia's Regional Strategy'

World Politics Review Briefing By Harry Verhoeven (May 29, 2014) - If thepast century's dominant image of Ethiopia was that of an impoverished, war-torn state, epitomized by the horrendous 1984-1985 famine in Tigrayand Wollo provinces, the early 21st-century picture of the country is surely exemplified by the construction of the biggest infrastructure projectanywhere in Africa: Mere miles from Ethiopia's border with Sudan, nearly 8,000 workers and engineers are laboring seven days a week, 24 hours a day as part of a round-the-clock construction schedule to erect the nearly 560-foot-tall Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD). Africa's second- most populous nation is betting that the multibillion-dollar GERD will dramatically modernize Ethiopia's domestic political economy through mass electrification and have a positive influence on regional relations through the export of surplus power to North and East Africa and its hinterland. Late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi's dream was for Ethiopia to emerge as a regional hegemon through energy diplomacy. His successor, Hailemariam Desalegn, has judiciously stuck to this mission and has givenhis dam builders all the resources and political backing required to complete the biggest hydro-infrastructure project on the Nile since the Aswan High Dam. ...

OBITUARY: Austrian actor and Ethiopia aid group leader Karlheinz Boehmdies at 86'

LOCAL PRESS (May 29, 2014) - Karlheinz Böhm (born 16 March 1928 Darmstadt, Germany – died 29 May 2014 Grödig, Austria), sometimes referred to as Carl Boehm or Karl Boehm, dual national of Austria and Germany & honorary citizen of Ethiopia, founder of "Menschen für Menschen" (Men for Men), a life dedicated to helping the people in need inEthiopia. A more than life size statue was erected in his honor for his larger than life dedication to humanity, and a square named after him in Addis abeba. A friend in need is a friend indeed, & RIP Karl Boehm, the truest friend of Ethiopia!

Karlheinz Boehm, an Austrian actor and human rights activist who founded an aid group dedicated to helping people in Ethiopia, has died. Hewas 86. Boehm's group, Menschen fuer Menschen ("People for People") said he died at his home near Salzburg on Thursday. It didn't give a causeof death. In the 1950s, the German-born Boehm starred alongside Romy Schneider in the television series "Sissi," playing Emperor Franz Joseph ofAustria. He later appeared in Michael Powell's 1960 thriller "Peeping Tom" and in movies directed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder. In 1981, angered at the indifference of people in rich countries to poverty in Africa, he foundedMenschen fuer Menschen. Its projects in Ethiopia have included efforts to build schools and hospitals. The group is now led by Boehm's wife, Almaz.

The Ethiopian Minister of Foreign Affairs Tedros Adhanom commented onsocial media that “Ethiopia is deeply saddened by the death of our dear brother Karlheinz Bohm. A selfless man & true friend of Ethiopia who contributed massively to our development efforts. Our profound condolences to Almaz Bohm & the whole family. We would like you to know that we are sharing in your sorrow with love, friendship and support.”

SCOURFIELD, TRAVEL EDITOR The West Australian (May 30, 2014)

Susan Aitchison had left her native Glasgow, in Scotland, and come to Ethiopia for three years to help a friend set up a school. She lived in Lalibela, 35km from the remote school site, as the village has no water orelectricity. A local man got the contract to drive her there and back. And when it came close to leaving, she says: “I was going back to Scotland to be an old age pensioner. All I could see ahead was daytime television andmy knees eventually packing up”. The driver, Habtamu Bayu, had told herthat his dream was to open a small, simple restaurant in Lalibela, so rather than go back to Scotland, she suggested they go into the restaurant … though it turned out not to be small and simple.

Ben Abeba is big and spectacular. Lalibela is the world famous site ofrock-hewn churches carved into the mountains, designed as the new Jerusalem. Ethiopia accepted Christianity as its national religion in 340AD.They eventually found a spectacular spot on the end of a high promontory, leased it from the government, and got two young Ethiopian architects to design Ben Abeba restaurant – somewhere between a cooking pot and a bouquet of flowers, with big, open dining areas taking the most advantage of the view.

They now employ and train some 40 young locals. Susan says the oldest is 28. The restaurant opened two and a half years ago – about the same time as The Four Sisters. Susan says that when Ben Abeba opened it was rated Ethiopia’s best restaurant on the world’s biggest rating website, withThe Four Sisters number two. “Then we went to number two and they went to number one.” It’s a friendly rivalry, the two restaurants complimenting one another, and showing the quality Ethiopian dining can achieve. “We both do it very well, but differently,” says Susan. OBITUARY: Berihun Kebede, historian & ex-parliamentarian dies at age of90'

Ethiomedia News (June 1, 2014) Mr Berihun Kebede, author of books on the history of Ethiopia, including the acclaimed "Emperor Haile Selassie", "The History of the Waldeba Monastery," and an unpublished work on the history of the Ethiopian patriots, died yesterday at age 90. Mr Berihun hasserved his country in various capacities and his last office title was President of the Imperial High Court until he was forcefully retired by the Military Government (Duerg) of Ethiopia at the age of 53 in July, 1976. Since his retirement, he has served as an active volunteer leader in various welfare organizations that were engaged in building schools and churches. He is also known as co-founders of Emperor Haile Selassie Foundation, and a member of Ethiopian Patriots Association. In both organizations, he had held high offices for a number of years. Many scholars consider Berihun's voluminous work, the 1300-page Ye Atse HaileSelassie Tarik, as an authoritative book enriched with details of the achievements and drawbacks that led to the downfall of Ethiopia's last emperor.

Born in a small town called Dibbahir in Semien Awraja, Gondar province, on November 1, 1923, the young Berihun attended church school at the age of 7 and intensively learned Ge'ez and church education for 14 years. He was fluent in Ge'ez language. After attending the then Haile Selassie I University Law School Extension Program for 6 years, he received Advance Diploma in Law from Emperor Haile Selassie, while serving as a parliamentarian in the Imperial Parliament. Many scholars consider Berihun's voluminous work, the 1300-page Ye Atse Haile Selassie Tarik, asan authoritative book enriched with details of the achievements and drawbacks that led to the downfall of Ethiopia's last emperor.

The judge also wrote The History of the Waldeba Monastery, and donated all the proceeds from the sale of the book to the monastery. He was also founder, executive committee member and deputy chairman of the Emperor Haile Selassie I Foundation. The great historian and law maker Berihun Kebede is survived by his wife, four sons and three daughters. Hiseldest son, Seleshi Berihun Kebede, a great nationalist, founder and executive committee member of the Ethiopian Border Affairs Committee, resides in Columbus, Ohio, USA. (Text ends)

Religious institutions ordered to fund ANDM's Office'

ESAT News (June 1, 2014) – Orthodox Churches found in the Kewet Woreda, Shewarobit, North Central Ethiopia, have been ordered to pay1500 birr each for the construction of the office of the Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM), a member party of the EPRDF. The administrators have also told ESAT that they have already lodged the money. Although religious institutions are legally independent from politics, what is being practically seen in reality is the opposite of this, theunnamed administrators said. They said they have given the money to thegovernment fearing retributions. Some civil servants in the town also saidthat they have been forced to contribute finance towards the building of the Office. Similarly, some residents of the region are also being ordered to pay 50 birr each towards the construction of the Meles Foundation, being built in the name of the late Premier, Meles Zenawi. Farmers are also being chastised to pay for the Foundation whenever they go to pay taxes to the local authorities. It is to be recalled that delaying the fertiliserpayment deadline of farmers' has been mentioned as one of the election winning strategies of the ruling Front in the next May-2015 general election.

TERROR: US warns of possible terror attack in Ethiopia'

June 1, 2014 (ST) ADDIS ABABA – The US Embassy in Addis Ababa urgedAmerican citizens residing or traveling to Ethiopia to exercise caution overa possible attack by a Somali terrorist group. The safety advisory the embassy said was issued due to threat from Al-Shabaab against Ethiopia and western interests in Ethiopia. Citing to multiple and ongoing credible threats, the US embassy urged its citizens to take the highest precautionsto maintain their personal safety and security.

“The Embassy continues to receive credible threat reports of Al-Shabaab’sintent and capability to attack Ethiopia and western interests in Ethiopia” it said in a statement Sudan Tribune received on Sunday. The embassy said that there have been a number of incursions along the Ethiopian- Somali border in recent weeks urging its citizens to maintain a high level of vigilance and to take appropriate steps to enhance personal security.

“While there is no known specific information regarding the timing or location of an attack, we would like to remind U.S. citizens to be especiallyvigilant in areas where large numbers of US and western citizens congregate, including restaurants, hotels, bars, places of worship, supermarkets, and shopping malls” the statement said.

The embassy highly recommended for Americans living in Ethiopia and those travelling to Ethiopia to enrol in the Department of State’s Smart Traveler Enrollment Program (STEP). “The STEP enrollment gives you the latest security updates, and makes it easier for the U.S. embassy or nearest U.S. consulate to contact you in an emergency. If you don’t have Internet access, enrol directly with the nearest U.S. embassy or consulate” it added. Ethiopia, which is a regional security partner of the United States government, has a deployed forces in war torn Somalia to help the weak government battle the Al-Qaeda-allied Al-Shabaab group. In the past Al-Shabaab has repeatedly warned to carryout massive attacksin Ethiopia in retaliation for its military intervention and Addis Ababa takessuch threats seriously. However government officials often disclose that the country’s defence force and intelligence are capable enough to thwart Shabaab’s terror plotsand to defend the country from any external enemy. Addis Ababa says it will remain determined to keep its troops in Somalia till order, peace and security is fully restored in Somalia. However Ethiopian opposition politicians on the contrary call on government for immediate pull-out arguing keeping the troops longer will increase the risk of retaliation attacks against the horn of Africa’s nation. Cairo and Khartoum caught in the winds of the Ethiopian dam

Yasser Al-Hussain Middle East Monitor [Article translated from Arabic Al-Jazeera net June 2, 2014]

Egyptian-Sudanese relations have yet to address any of the major points that are being discussed between the two countries today and this is primarily due to the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam. Sudan is greatly concerned that Egyptian officials believe that it is within the best interestsof their country’s national security to prevent any dams from being built outside of their national borders. Meanwhile for Sudan, any agricultural development is directly tied to building more dams, particularly outside the Sudanese borders.

Water storage facilities in Sudan are not capable of housing the amountsof water resources that are needed to irrigate the vast amounts of agricultural planes in the country. Even when it comes to the question of Halayeb, an area of disputed land between the Egyptian and Sudanese border which is currently under Egyptian control much to the fear of the Sudanese, it is likely that Egypt will use this territory as a playing card with which it will place pressure on Sudan to give up some of its most basic water rights.

On the other hand, Egypt is worried about the possibility that Sudan willlater affect its ability to control the Nile's waters through a series of proposed dams both inside and outside Sudan. Sudanese officials are accusing Egypt of using this mentality against the Sudanese people as a means to control them in a way that completely ignores the possibility ofreconciliation and only works in Egypt's favour. In fact, if Sudan were to demand its share of the Nile's water (approximately 10 billion cubic metres according to the Nile Waters Agreement signed in 1929) Egypt would view this as an act of aggression.
The Sudanese claim that the whereabouts of the original copy of this agreement is unknown. They also point to the fact that they signed this agreement while they were under a bilateral (British-Egyptian) occupation.
They believe that the original copy of the agreement includes moreSudanese rights, which the Egyptians would like to keep hidden.
At the time that Sudan preferred not to participate in the Entebbe Convention, Egypt also expressed its reluctance to abide by the 1929 Nile Water agreement to the letter, despite the fact that abiding by this agreement would grant Sudan its full water rights. Moreover, the biggest danger of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam is that it sets a precedentfor other countries to go against Egypt's will when it comes to controlling the Nile. Cairo has expressed its anger towards Ethiopia for not asking for their permission before beginning their vast project.
NILE WATERS: Facts and figures
85 per cent of the Nile's water supply comes from the Blue Nile over a four-month period each year. The issue lies with the fact that most of the water supply does not come from Lake Tana in Ethiopia, which constitutesonly seven per cent of the overall water supply collected from 40 tributaries.
Lake Tana is located approximately 1,890 metres above sea level in the Ethiopian plateau, giving it the advantage of generating electricity. The question of generating electricity affects the Nile more so in terms of regression as opposed to water supply. In fact, Sudan currently buys 100megawatts of electricity from Ethiopia and is looking to buy more as morethan 70 per cent of electricity in Sudan is generated through water supplies. Overall electricity production in Ethiopia exceeds 30,000 megawatts.
The overall decline in the Nile's water supply greatly affects the amount ofsilt that is found in the water and Ethiopia's overall control of water from the Blue Nile is limited because of this. One must keep in mind that the Renaissance Dam's water capacity is a mere 74 billion cubic metres when compared to the Aswan dam's 162 billion metres cubed. This means that approximately 14 billion cubic meters of water from the Renaissance Damare customised to accommodate quantities of silt.
The depth of the Blue Nile in Ethiopia is approximately 1,400 metres, which means there is large potential to store water in Ethiopian not for agricultural irrigation purposes but for generating electricity because the plane is located in an area that experiences a lot of rainfall. Yet, the decline of the plateau makes it impossible to accommodate agricultural projects that are vast enough to accommodate the large amounts of waterstored. It is expected that Ethiopia will consume a mere 1.5 billion metrescubed from the Blue Nile within 25 years and approximately 3.1 billion metres cubed in a hundred years.

Egypt initiated storing water supplies outside of its borders in Uganda andin Sudan in an area south of Khartoum. The Egyptian minister of irrigation recently announced Egypt's intention to build a new dam in South Sudanfor storage purposes. He also expressed Egypt's intention to undergo a series of hydrological and hydraulic studies as well as the creation of survey maps of the lake and dam site. This was made possible thanks togeological, environmental and structural research, all of which Egypt intends to present at a workshop dedicated to their overall research on this matter.

Egypt has recently announced its initiative to plant more than 2.2 million acres of rice, which shows that the majority of Egypt's projects focus on transferring the Nile's waters outside the range of the Nile Basin (to Sinai). All of this affects the ecological balance in that it does not allocate enough drinking water but mostly focuses the water supply on agriculturalprojects that greatly affect the amount of water that is being exploited (byEgypt).

More than 123 billion metres cubed of water are stored in the High Dam, in Aswan, which far exceeds Egypt's share. Yet, the truth of the matter is that about 10.5 billion cubed metres of water are wasted at the High Damand the Renaissance Dam is the only facility capable of storing water rightnow.

It is important to note that the Renaissance Dam would help prevent flooding in Sudan, particularly in Khartoum's flat plane. The Renaissance Dam can help control the amount of water flow that occurs throughout theautumn. Moreover, when Sudan signed the Nile Water agreement on November 8, 1959, the goal behind it was to control the flow of the Nile ina way that would be most beneficial. This gave Egypt the opportunity to build the High Dam in Aswan, which later resulted in the creation of an artificial lake that would extend 600 kilometres passed the Sudanese borders. Its waters flooded Wadi Halfa and other neighbouring villages.

Eventually, water levels dropped leaving about 140,000 acres of land inSudan suitable for agriculture due to the high deposits of silt on them.

Egypt and the Nile countries: There have always been increasing calls for countries in the Nile Basin to reconsider past water agreements. Countriessuch as Tanzania, Kenya and Ethiopia have threatened to build dams thatwould reduce the amount of water flowing into Egypt unless it agreed to revise and amend water agreements to suit today's needs.

Fortunately, none of these threats have been carried out for the most partand this is due to Cairo's attempts to calm the situation through artistic, technical and economic cooperation that provided assistance to these countries. However, 11 of the Nile Basin's countries, with the exception ofSudan and Egypt, have signed the Entebbe Agreement, which is seen as the "equitable and reasonable" alternative to the Nile Basin Initiative because it would redistribute water in fair quotas.

Apparently, Egypt is not only fighting its battle over the Renaissance Dam through Ethiopia and Sudan exclusively, but it has also attempted to win over other African countries. These efforts have been in effect since the beginning of Hosni Mubarak's rule. Further investigation on the matter revealed that the Egyptian government has issued more than $4 million inbribes to three African presidents in an effort to convince them to sway their governments' positions on the Renaissance Dam. Since the file was listed under matters of national security, the identities of the three leaderswere not revealed.

In the state of South Sudan a group of rebels associated with the former Vice President Riek Machar accused the Egyptian government of supporting former President Salva Kiir in the civil war that took place in Juba. It is said that the military support given to Kiir came in exchange forhis support for Cairo's position regarding the dam in Ethiopia and plans even point to Kiir's intention to divert water to Egypt from the Upper Nile.

It is important to note that Juba has already demanded its share of waterfrom the Nile that was allocated to Sudan. This is estimated at 18.5 million cubic metres as per the Nile Basin Initiative agreements that were signed in 1929 and 1959. However, after the separation of South and North Sudan, Juba was not given a specified share of water from the Nile.

A source of Egypt's concern is that the Entebbe Agreement replaces the Nile Basin Initiative and it outlines each country's share in loose terms andsupposedly divides water supplies depending on each state's individual concerns and needs. Yet, the agreement will distribute water in a way thatremains "fair and equitable" and this is the very thing that Egypt considersto be a threat because it currently enjoys more than its fair share of the Nile's resources due to the current agreement. Thus, Egypt has taken a clear and firm decision not to sign the new agreement unless "it is guaranteed its full share of water from the Nile", the former Minister of Irrigation said.

Solution and salvation on the horizon: Whether it is in regard to the Millennium Dam or the Entebbe Convention, it is not in Sudan or Egypt's best interest to remain as they are, in a position that counters the rest ofthe African countries with which they share the Nile's tributaries and basin. Their current position is somewhat controversial.

As of now, six out of the nine Nile basin countries have signed the agreement and they are: Ethiopia, Uganda, Rwanda, Tanzania, Kenya andSouth Sudan. The critical question here is: can Egypt afford to engage in an active war that not only confronts all of these countries but also threatens its water security? At the end of the day, the question of water supply is a life or death issue that would place Egypt's wellbeing in jeopardy. This potential war is considered by many to be a strategic mistake on many fronts.

In my opinion, the Entebbe Convention is the first solution to calming thissituation and on the other front the Ethiopian Renaissance Dam is neededfor the time being.

It is Egypt's responsibility to avoid threatening other countries with military force for every year since the Khedive's rule, they have devised anew military strategy to intervene should their interests in the Nile and itswaters be threatened or jeopardised. At the end of the day, Egypt does not want to enter into any conflicts, whether technical or economic, with the African countries of the Nile Basin because this war will undoubtedly go beyond the African dimension.

The Sudanese government has often criticised Egypt for its position concerning the Ethiopian Renaissance Dam and they have expressed thatit is not an issue for Khartoum. The Sudanese government has also expressed their desire to remove this issue from its technical and governmental framework and has warned the Egyptian government that,should the relationship between Khartoum and Cairo be jeopardised overthis matter, it will only open the door to bigger and more serious disagreements.

As for Ethiopia, it has stated that the Grand Renaissance Dam is 32 per cent complete and that they are ready for any confrontation from the Egyptian government. According to Ethiopian Prime Minister HailemariamDesalegn his country is ready "to face all options and possibilities". The only reasonable solution in this scenario would be to come up with an agreement between Cairo, Khartoum and Addis Ababa that would be signed by a tripartite committee dedicated to solving this matter. Ethiopian maid kept as "slave" for nearly 15 years'Stricter laws urged after maid's ordeal kept in a state of "modern-day slavery" for more than a decade highlightsthe need for stricter domestic worker employment laws, according to rights activists. The story of Ethiopian Seble Abebe Tessm, who was paid less than 18 months' salary for almost 15 years' work, was retold yesterday at a Migrant Workers Protection Society (MWPS) Press conference in Adliya. Ms Tessm first arrived in Bahrain in September 1999at the age of 20 and was promised a salary of BD40 a month by her sponsor – a BDF employee. Made to sign receipts for payments she never received, the former maid – who is now 35 – did attempt to escape her employer once during her first few months of employment, but was swiftlyreturned to him by the police. "When we asked Seble why she hadn't run away from the sponsor, she said she was afraid," said MWPS action committee head Eskedar Girmay. "Her family did not receive any money and thought she must have been married and living peacefully inBahrain."

By SANDEEP SINGH GREWAL (June 2, 2014) - A HOUSEMAID who was

The case only came to light when a woman named Sameera, who lives inQatar and is a friend of Ms Tessm's family, visited Bahrain last month outof concern for her fellow Ethiopian and saw the conditions she was working in. Ms Sameera then contacted the MWPS, which reported the case to the General Directorate of Criminal Investigation's anti-traffickingunit, whose officers brought the former housemaid to their offices in a matter of hours. Ms Tessm said yesterday that she was too scared to report her former employer because of his position in the armed forces and had almost resigned herself to her fate.

“Since I left home, I think my friends must have gotten married and havechildren now,” she said. “When I think of how my life has ended up, I justwant to cry.” MWPS general secretary Beverley Hamadeh told the GDN that Ms Tessm’s family received less than BD600 for her almost 15 years of work, when according to their estimates she should have received around BD7,000. “This includes the money for seven air tickets and we are now following the case to ensure she gets the money she deserves,” said Ms Hamadeh.

“Depriving people of their freedom like this is modern-day slavery and a form of human trafficking.” MWPS patron Mona Almoayyed added that strict action should be taken against Bahraini sponsors who are not payingworkers, as this is not an isolated case. “We continue to insist that salaries of domestic workers should be transferred to their bank accounts rather than by signing some receipts,” said Ms Almoayyed.

Demand: “It is also important for embassies to play a bigger role in protecting the rights of their nationals in Bahrain,” she added. The MWPSis also calling for proper job descriptions to be laid out in domestic workers’ contract – including a note making it clear that because of the nature of the work, the maid will often be confined to the house. In addition, the society has called upon officials to not brand housemaids who approach police stations as “runaways” and to further increase the monthly salary bracket that is required for families to get a housemaid visa (Text ends)

ARENA TIGRAY: Tigrean Opposition to the TPLF’Prof. Messay Kebede (June 3, 2014)

(ANALYSIS) Despite the TPLF’s view of itself as the model of representation of ethnic interests and well-being, the growth of disenchantment is perceptible in Tigray. The proof is that non-violent Tigrean opposition to the TPLF is no longer negligible. Despite a tight control and continuous harassments, the movement known as ARENA isstepping up its criticisms of the regime and its attempt to organize and mobilize a credible popular opposition. Though the movement is ethnic- based, it is ideologically quite distinct from the TPLF, since its program includes not only the achievement of genuine democracy, but also the “restoration of Ethiopian Sovereignty.” The latter goal indicates a movement that counters the TPLF’s vision of Ethiopia as a mere collectionof sovereign nations and nationalities.

Another countering movement is the TPDM (Tigray People’s Democratic Movement), considered by many observers as one of the strongest—if notthe strongest—armed groups fighting to topple the EPRDF government.

Even though I personally do not have any information about the actual strength of the movement other than what I read online, I note that their political program describes a vision of Ethiopia that it is antithetical to thatof the TPLF. Indeed, the program denounces the TPLF system because it is“narrowly based on clan and family orientations.” It adds that the system “has endangered the collaborative culture and the historic unity of the people of Ethiopia . . in the name of self-determination.” Unsurprisingly, the program says, the TPLF policy has created a barrier of “hatred” between the people of Tigray and the people of the rest of Ethiopia, a situation obviously fraught with ominous consequences for Tigreans as well as for Ethiopia.

The importance of these movements comes from the fact that they correctan anomaly, the very one that changed Tigray, the birthplace and the constant supplier of the guardians of Ethiopiawinet, into an initiator and proponent of ethnonationalism and secessionist movements. While the marginalization of Tigray under previous regimes by the hegemony of Amhara elite has understandably created resentment, the espousal of ethnonationalism and secessionism to the point of making Ethiopia landlocked directly contradicted the historic vocation of Tigray. The new path amounted to nothing less than the loss of its very soul. It is because many people were still counting on Tigray's legacy of guardianship of Ethiopian unity that they welcomed the TPLF with open arms subsequent to the routing of the Derg's army. The same reliance on Tigray's traditional commitment to Ethiopian unity explains why the Derg was unable to convince people, despite repeated warnings, of the danger of a military victory of the TPLF.

We know when the turning point occurred: it was in the 60s and early 70swhen a majority of Ethiopian educated elites turned against their own legacy and cultural identity through the instigation of the ideology of Marxism–Leninism. In one of my books, I describe the derailment as a "cultural dislocation," one of its impacts being the measurement of revolutionary zeal by how far one is ready to deconstruct Ethiopia. When you add resentment against Amhara elite to the revolutionary zeal, you have a combination liable to produce estranged groups, the prototype of which is the late Meles Zenawi.

If people's identity matters, then we should expect a retraction of the typethat both renews and brings back the suppressed Tigrean commitment to Ethiopian unity. Is the opposition to the TPLF strong enough to change into a large movement of protest? It is hard to tell for the simple reason that many Tigreans, even though they are aware of TPLF's derailment andits pernicious effects, are still apprehensive as to the future that awaits them if the TPLF is dislodged from power. The propaganda of the TPLF andits politics of fear have no doubt gotten into the head of many Tigrean elites, not to mention those supporting the TPLF out of greed or political ambition.

Still, the existence of an opposition, however small it may be, that is willing to confront the TPLF on the issue of Ethiopian sovereignty forebodes a change of heart that can further expand provided that favorable conditions upholds it. All the more reason for expecting the expansion of opposition is, as pointed out by Professor Mesfin in a recentarticle, the realization by ordinary Tigreans that the promise of rapid andall-out economic development of Tigray is far from being fulfilled. The realization contains the understanding that justice and freedom are indivisible, that you cannot have them in one place and not in others. If the system is just and democratic, it is so for everybody; if it excludes other ethnic groups, you can be damn sure that Tigreans too will becomevictims. Once you erect the wall of special privileges, you have a system that serves the few to the detriment of the many, regardless of ethnic groups. (Text ends)

Arabsat threatens Ethiopia with legal action over jamming'

MEDIA (June 3, 2014) Television transmissions from channels carried byArabsat have suffered intentional signal interference from international jammers based in Ethiopia, according to the regional satellite operator. The Saudi-based organisation says it resents the "illegal act" and expressed surprise at this "vandalism", given there are no Ethiopian or Eritrean channels among the direct-to-home (DTH) satellite bouquets broadcast via Arabsat. "This jamming may be aimed at some opponents'channels for one of the two countries' channels that are broadcast on board satellites near Arabsat 26 East neighbourhood or on board other satellites which Arabsat has no relation with," a statement said. Qatar's first satellite Es'hail 1 operates from the 25.5 degree East orbital location and, among other channels, carries news network Al Jazeera, which has been subject to intentional signal interference in previous years.The International Telecommunication Union and Arab League have both been informed of the satellite jamming, and Arabsat says it will not hesitate to take legal action against the culprits. Pinpointing the source of intentional jamming: Eutelsat Blames Ethiopia asJamming Incidents Triple' Space News (June 7, 2014) - PARIS — Satellite fleet operator Eutelsat alleges that a high-powered ground antenna located on Ethiopian territoryhas repeatedly jammed programming Eutelsat satellites. Arabsat of Saudi Arabia has made similar allegations, also pinpointing Ethiopia. To geolocate jamming sources, satellite operators compare variations in jamming signals between the two nearby satellites to hone in on the source. The graphic on the left shows the results of Eutelsat's work, whichclearly locates the jamming within Ethiopian territory. Satellite fleet operator Eutelsat said intentional interference, which accounted for just 5 percent of the disruptions to its fleet in 2010, was responsible for 15 percent of the signal disruptions in 2013. The tripling of intentional interference events, tied in part to the expansion of Eutelsat’s fleet serving Middle Eastern and African television audiences, is unlikely to dropin 2014 with the latest round of jamming by an unidentified source in Ethiopia. Eutelsat said the jamming, which has affected Riyadh, Saudi Arabia-based Arabsat’s satellites as well as at least two Eutelsat spacecraft, has been geolocated in northeast Ethiopia. The way the jamming is conducted has resulted to interference not only on the presumed target broadcaster but to all broadcasters sharing the affected satellite transponders

Ras Abebe Aregay Bechere and the fate of other noblemen in local calendar Tahesas 1953’ ARCHIEVE (June 9, 2014) – It was yesterday, the Alliance of WWII celebrated the 70th anniversary of the victory day of Normandy in France. On this occasion, it is essential to remember the greatest general, Ras Abebe, the leading figure in the trying time of 1936-41, who fought against the fascist regime in Ethiopia. Abebe was the offspring of two distinguished families. His mother, Aaskal Gobena was thedaughter of Ras Gobena Dache, the legendary general of Emperor Menelik

II. Abebe’s father, Aregai Bechere, was Afenugus (Mouth of the King- Honor Judge) and later held the most coveted title of Nibured (High Priest)of Axum. As a young man, Abebe was one of the first modern military trainees in Ethiopia, and upon graduation was promoted to be the commander of the Municipal Military officers of Addis Ababa with the rank of Balambaras (the first rank in administrative hierarchy). In 1936, when Emperor Haile Selassie marched to the battle of Mychew toengage the invading Italian army, Abebe remained in Addis Ababa on duty. After the war was over and the Emperor departed to England,the Fascist army advanced to the city of Addis Ababa. Abebe and his 17 friends were among the first men to form guerrilla fighting. Within a year,his group reached to more than 10 thousand and later to more than 20 thousand patriots which enabled him to control the entire lowlands of Northern Shoa province. During the struggle, he rose up to the rank of Ras, which made him the only Ethiopian to earn this title while the Nation was still under fascist occupation. In the territory under his control, he showed his capacity as a great soldier, like his grandfather, Ras Gobena, and as a wise administrator, in the footsteps of his Nibured father, which enabled him to work with all engaged to liberate Ethiopia.

Throughout the five years as a guerilla leader, he was in close contact with the Emperor, usually through hermits, who crossed the wild desert with his messages. Aba Wold Tensaye, Aba Agaest, Aba Yerdaw, Aba WoldMaryam, and Aba Tesfa- Tsion were a few outstanding among the many.

Out of the five hermits, the first three were known for travelling to Jerusalem by foot, before the fascists occupied Ethiopia. Another young messenger, Mr. Demisae Wold Amanuel, who is still alive, travelled for forty five days along with two deacons to Kenya to meet Mr. Lorenzo Ta-izaz, who delivered the Emperor's message in French at the League of Nations.

In 1937, Ras Abebe had taken part in an attempt to retake the capital cityof Addis Ababa, and his army had almost reached the Imperial Palace before being stopped by two heavy battalions. The story of Ras, who maintained the patriotic resistance within a radius of fifty miles of Addis Ababa, was always a headline on "The Voice of Ethiopia" newspaper in New York and on "New Times and Ethiopian News", in London and in otherparts of the world newspapers. After five years of struggle, and when the Emperor's army advanced from the East, Ras met him at Feche, and they marched together to the Capital triumphantly. During the march, Ras flewthe flag that never ceased to fly throughout the five years of struggle.

After the fall of the Axis powers in Europe, his name and picture were widely spread in the mainstream media of Europe. In fact, there was ahigh expectation to see him lead the delegate of Ethiopia in Europe. When the Emperor's administration was restored, Ras was appointed first as a provisional provincial Governor of Tigray, the Minister of Interior, andthe Minister of Defense. Tekalign Gedamu, a former vice president of The African Development Bank, in his great book, Republican on the Throne, described him: " Abebe had a sharp intellect, was endowed with a remarkable capacity to unravel knotty issue, possessed a keen sense of justice, an ability to delineate the seminal from the peripheral, and the knack to pull together the essential strands of complex issues into an intelligible summary which often led to solution. Above all, he had led issues without fear or favor."

In 2011, three Italians by the name of Carmelo, Stephens, and Matthias, the sons of Fascist soldiers who were stationed in the Northern Shoa during the war, came to Ethiopia to pay their tribute to Ras Abebe. When they arrived in Addis Ababa, they met Daniel Getachew, the grandson of Dejazmach Afework, the great hero of Korahea(Somali region). The three Italians told Daniel that they wanted to repent for their late fathers' sins by praying at Ras Abebe's tomb in Debre Lebanos. They said they were brought up and fed with the history of Ras Abebe, and their fathers were among a special force that was always dispatched to hunt down Ras. They said when their fathers met on occasions, he was the center of the discussion. Their fathers articulated how he managed to make his escapewhen he was nearly surrounded. He was also clever and bought time by luring them.

The three Italians' childhood memories that always lingered in their mindwas when their fathers finished the discussion and said goodbye, the numbers of empty bottles of wine and cigarette butts left on the table. Carmelo's father even had an intention to come to Ethiopia and personallycongratulate Ras Abebe on his promotion to the Minster of Defense; however, Ras was killed by the coup d'état of 1960, before Carmelo's father realized his plan. The three Italians, in order to fulfill their mission, traveled to Debr Lebanos and upon arrival, they had difficulty meeting someone who knew Ras Abebe and who could show them the whereabouts of his tomb. When at last they found it, to their greatest dismay, the tomb was unattended and dirty, beyond their imagination. It took them almost a day to clean it up. Finally, they knelt down and made a special prayer for the soul of Ras, and the forgiveness of their fathers' sins, and for the good relationship between the people of Ethiopia and Italy.

It is unfortunate that while his former enemies' sons admired Ras Abebe and traveled this length to pay tribute to such a heroic figure, not much issaid about him in his own country. On the contrary, during a ceremony held at Addis Ababa University to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the coup d'état of General Mengestu Neway, the act of the murdering of Ras Abebe and 16 other high ranking officials was highly praised. To make things worse, Professor Endreas Eshete, the president of the university, said that General Mengistu's act was to modernize Ethiopia. So long as there is this kind of justification, the heroic deeds of Ras Abebe and otherswould not be considered in the right perspective. It is not by accident thattoday the nation is running out of common hero. The irony is while Ras Abebe had been fighting for five years to liberate Ethiopia; General Mengistu was living in Djibouti in peace.

Evidently, all the assassinated were the elites who could help modernize Ethiopia. For instance, General Mulugeta Bule and Captain Derge Hailmariam were well proven highly trained military officers while Mekonnen Haptold was a dedicated and well rounded manager who encouraged Ethiopians to compete in business which was monopolized byArabs, Greeks, Armenians and Indians. Abdulahe Mome was also highly educated and was one of the first Muslim ministers in the financial sector.These are some of the rare Ethiopians who were killed randomly along with Ras Abebe.

The act of General Mengestu and the coup d'état of 1960 is the birth of anti- Ethiopianism that blended with a foreign ideology. Aba Koronchos, ahermit who marched to the Korean War as the confessor of the famous

Ethiopian Army, once said “The fascist’s spirit is reincarnated through our children in the year 1960 to revenge against our heroes and our history.” It is high time for the new generation to rise up against the mindset of thesixties generation and give the Ethiopian patriots their due rights. Ras Abebe, one of the greatest patriots of the tryingtime of 1936-41, deservesrecognition. The least we can do is to give him a dignified resting place. (Text ends)

Association for International Broadcasting denounces Ethiopia’s intentionalsignal jam’

ALJAZEERA (June 10, 2014) - Deutsche Welle, BBC, France 24 and Voice of America are amongst numerous members of the Association for International Broadcasting (AIB) who are angered by Ethiopian authorities’intentional jam of satellite programs, and claim the action is a violation of international agreements. This also prevents audiences from being able tofreely access the media and violates the internationally recognized freedom of speech and freedom of the press rights as per Article 19 of the United Nation’s Declaration of Human Rights. AIB is responding by lodgingprotests with the Ethiopian Foreign Ministry and its Missions in London, Berlin, Paris, Riyadh and Washington DC.

Simon Spanswick, Chief Executive of the AIB stated, “AIB and its members call for the immediate and complete cessation of this unwarranted interference by Ethiopia in the region’s telecommunicationsand broadcasting services. Significant, harmful interference has been directed at satellites in the Arabsat and Eutelsat fleets, and consequentlyto the broadcasts of a wide range of TV and radio channels.

“This deliberate interference is illegal and contravenes international law. Itdeprives viewers and listeners across the region of access to news, information and entertainment. The interference also adversely impacts the important operational role that Arabsat and Eutelsat have in distributing content. It also harms their businesses. Extensive technical research has confirmed that the jamming originates within the territory ofEthiopia. AIB reminds the authorities in Ethiopia that causing interference is in direct contravention to the agreements that the Ethiopian government is party to at the International Telecommunication Union. “

Liliane Landor, acting Director of the BBC World Service Group, added, “The BBC calls upon the Ethiopian authorities to end this interference. They are disrupting international news broadcasts for no apparent reason.This is a deliberate act of vandalism that tarnishes their reputation.”

Eutelsat reports increase in jamming from Ethiopia: French satellite provider Eutelsat has said its satellite fleet has experienced a drastic risein interference originating from Ethiopia, according to a report. NexTV reports the company’s disruptions in its satellite service from the region have increased from 5 per cent in 2010 to 15 per cent last year.

HumanIPO reported last week the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) and numerous other international broadcasters had claimed television andradio broadcasts on the Arabsat satellites had been intentionally jammed by the Ethiopian authorities.

“The BBC calls upon the Ethiopian authorities to end this interference. They are disrupting international news broadcasts for no apparent reason.This is a deliberate act of vandalism that tarnishes their reputation,” said Liliane Landor, acting director of the BBC World Service Group. According to Eutelsat, its provision of signal to Saudi Arabia has also been disrupted by the jamming programme. It said the antennae are located in the northeast of the country and serve to disrupt programming on its satellitesat 7 degrees West and 21 degrees East. The company said it would be reporting the disruptions to the French National Frequencies Agency (ANF), the International Telecommunication Union (ITU) and the Ethiopiangovernment. Additionally, the Ethiopian government has been accused of implementing surveillance programmes targeting those in the country andits refugees being housed by foreign states. According to Human Rights Watch (HRW) the country hasbeen using foreign technology to boost its widespread telecoms surveillance of opposition activists and journalists in Ethiopia and abroad. Privacy Internationallodged a criminal complaint with the United Kingdom’s (UK) National Cyber Crime Unit (NCCU) of the National Crime Agency for the allegedly unlawful interception of personal communications of an Ethiopianpolitical refugee living in the UK. The privacy groups said that the UK-based company Gamma International played a role in the development of commercial surveillance software Finspy, which has been used by the Ethiopian government to target dissenters. ETHIOPIAN HISTORY: The 1875-76 battle with Egypt for control of theNile basin’

The Diaries of Col. Henry Clay Derrick (June 10, 2014)

Ismael Pasha, the Khedive of Egypt and Sudan from 1863 to 1879, soughtto conquer the entire Nile basin and put it under Egyptian rule. He sent military expeditions to Ethiopia as far south as Lake Victoria. In 1875 Egyptian troops, led by European and American officers, advanced into themountainous regions around Adwa. There, Ethiopian forces led by Emperor Yohannes (Kassa Mercha) soundly defeated the Egyptians at the Battle of Gundet.

Angered by the defeat of his army, the Khedive sent another, larger military expedition under the command of Prince Ratib Pasha into Ethiopia. The invading army was composed of Egyptian soldiers and a mixture of commanders including veterans of the American Civil War, European mercenaries, and high-ranking Egyptians. With the help of the Ethiopian governor of Hamasein (a province where present day Asmara is located), who switched sides to fight for the Egyptians, the Khedive’s troops advanced to Goura 40 miles to the south and built a fort. On March7, 1876, Emperor Yohannes’ forces en-gaged the Egyptians in battle for three days. In the end, Ethiopian forces stormed the fort killing many andtaking large numbers of prisoners. That defeat ended the Khedive’s ambition to invade Ethiopia. A young Ethiopian warrior, Alula Engida, displayed such val-or in the battles at Gundet and Goura that he was given the title Ras (General). Ras Alula later would be an acclaimed hero at the Battle of Adwa.

The diary of Lt. Colonel Henry Clay Derrick: a former Confederate Armyofficer during the American Civil War who later served as an engineer inthe Egyptian Army, describes the battle that started at the Kayakhor encampment and ended with the storming of Fort Goura. (G. Adugna/T.Vestal)
Tuesday March 7th, 1876: I was ordered to place a Battalion on the hill tohold a point on our line. I went ahead towards Kiya-Khor, and the fight soon opened with artillery. The right gave way and the men fell back, firing as they went. Soon the retreat towards the Fort became general, and though the men were several times partially rallied and formed, they were as often broken again by the mad rush of the Cavalry to the rear.
Finding it hopeless to strive anymore against the rout, I joined the retreating columns and made my way with others to the Fort. Our loss is unknown: many of the wounded have been coming in all evening. A blackday for the Egyptian Army; but if the men will only stand firm they can hold this Fort."
The following entry has no date but is believed to have been written later in March, 1876: "In vain our shells and rockets ploughed through their dense masses, making frightful carcasses of what were before lithe and active savages; twice or thrice repulsed by the withering fire on their frontthey again press on. The wild hordes drove back the brave men who held the right and victory and entering by the rear butchered the cannoneers at the guns. Pursued by the horde of elated savages, the retreat soon became a rout and then a butchery..."

"Wednesday, March 8th: A good many Ethiopians came to our old desertedcamp to plunder and steal tents; but I must confess that they displayed great bravery and coolness under fire. Several sorties were made on them, which drove them off. Heard from K. Khor by signal that the enemymade two attacks there today and were repulsed each time: also heard from wounded men who came in, that several Battalions had gone to the mountains instead of coming to the Fort, and forming square fought until their ammunition was expended when they surrendered. In this way we must have lost of the men who are missing –say 5000. A shameful termination to what might have been so easily been rendered a glorious victory by an ordinary amount of firmness and discipline in the troops and efficiency in the officers and Commander. If the troops from K.K. had come last night we might this morning, by attacking the King's camp atdaybreak have redeemed the honor of the Army lost on yesterday."

"Thursday, March 9th: The enemy only fired 5 or 6 shots with his cannontoday and none since. Why? Is he saving his artillery ammunition for thedefense of Adwa? ..."

Friday, March 10th: We went to the old camp of King John to see if we could find any of our missing friends. The sight there were dreadful beyond the power of language to describe. The whole plain was covered with the dead and dying victim of Kassa's brutality, stripped and violated with every conceivable indignity; their bodies burned with fire, and stonedand clubbed and hacked with swords and pierced with lances. The supplicating cries of the wounded for water and for succor were enough toappall the stoutest heart."

Friday, March 17th: My opinions upon the consequences resulting from thelate engagement and the course to be pursued in the future. I think it is impossible to continue the campaign aggressively because we have lost heavily in men, ammunition, arms, guns, and means of transportation; and our troops are thoroughly demoralized. Having allowed the enemy to escape, what remains for us to do? To hold our ground, let the frontier line be selected, making Goura to Kiya-Khor one point; therein immediately erect strong forts and hold the country they embrace. The Ethiopians cannot take them if defended; and behind the walls of a good fort our soldiers will fight if anywhere. Source: Derrick, Henry C. Diary.

Ethiopia's regime causes havoc for satellite companies Arabsat andEutelsat'

AT By Chris Forrester: (June 10, 2014)

A week ago it was Arabsat that was very publicly naming Ethiopia as the source of multiple jamming sessions to its broadcast channels. Now Eutelsat is piling on the pressure, also naming that Ethiopia is guilty of deliberate jamming, and of ramping up the signal jamming so that in 2013it accounted for some 15 per cent of the operator's problems. Eutelsat said the jamming is coming from northeast Ethiopia. Eutelsat says it is taking its complaints, via the French National Frequencies Agency, to the International Telecommunications Union, and to the Ethiopian government.

The jamming is especially damaging in that it focuses not just on this orthat channel – which would be bad enough – but on the entire transponder, and this affects dozens of perfectly innocent channels.

Eutelsat officials strongly hint that the Ethiopean government is behindthe problem, and that the interference is targeting the Oromia Media Network, of Minneapolis, USA, which provides a channel for the Oromia region of the country. Eutelsat says the jammers are using sophisticatedhigh-powered antennas to disrupt programming on its satellites at 7 degrees West and 21 degrees East.

ETHIOPIA: Egypt's Mubarek regime tried to assassinate me three times'The late Meles Zenawi told Egyptian veteran journalist'

Translated from Arabic to English using Google Translator.

SODERE TIMES (June 10, 2014) – The deposed Egyptian former presidentMohammed Hosni Mubarak tried to assassinate Prime Minister of Ethiopia with the crisis of the Renaissance Dam. Journalist and writer, MohammedHassanein Heikal talks about policy adopted by the late President Gamal Abdel Nasser, toward Africa, saying: «Egypt contributed to reign in support of African liberation movements, and has set up an organization of African unity», adding that Abdel Nasser was well aware of the value of Africa, therefore resorted to the establishment of good relations with Ethiopia, he said.

The structure in statements to the «Egypt where? .. And Egypt to where?», Which displays on the TV «CBC», on Thursday, that Egypt's relations with African countries deteriorated , starting from the era of thelate President Anwar Sadat, because of his fight against communism Africa, in order to draw closer to the United States, saying: «Egypt's cooperation with Africa in the era of Mubarak gets worse», as he put it.

The assassination attempt on Mubarak in Ethiopia, deteriorated relationsbetween Egypt and Africa in general, and the Egyptian-Ethiopian in particular, saying: «the late Ethiopia's prime minister earlier, Meles Zenawi assured me that Mubarak tried to avenge him because of the assassination attempt in Addis Abeba. So Mubarak regime tried to assassinate him three times, which was confirmed to me Zenawi himself

He also criticized the structure of the way the former president of Mercy, with the crisis of bridging the Renaissance, which harmed the Egyptian position significantly, he said «The way Mursi treated the crisis was to broadcast the dialogue and talk about hitting the dam, all this was a majordisaster », as described.

He called attention to the necessity of the state structure in African countries, particularly Ethiopia. (Text ends)

International Telecommunication Union (ITU) condemns satellite jamming'AT By Chris Forrester: (June 11, 2014)

(GENEVA) Middle East satellite jamming has reached what one local broadcaster has described as "catastrophic" proportions. While Eutelsat and Intelsat have legitimately removed troublesome Iranian (IRIB) channels from their satellites, the jamming from within Iran and affectingincoming satellite feeds continues. The BBC, France 24, Deutsche Welle and the Voice of America are just some of the recently affected channels.

Recent satellite jamming has also occurred from Bahrain, Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, again each targeting the signals of channels which localauthorities find offensive, or which are transmitting information or programming deemed controversial by one or other Ministry. The International Telecommunications Union (ITU) on Friday issued a strong condemnation of all "harmful interference".

The ITU, in a statement, said any transmission "which has the intent to cause harmful interference ….isan infringement of the ITU Constitution."

The ITU's statement "appeals to all its 193 Member States to exercise theutmost goodwill" in solving and minimising any "harmful interference".

Iran and Syria are full members of the ITU. The problem with the ITU andits dedicated Radio Regulations Board is that there are no penalties or sanctions that it can apply for transgressions. The United Nations and theEuropean Union both have their own sanctions in place against countries such as Iran. The EBU on October 22nd also issued its own statement "deploring" jamming. (Text ends)

DailyStar Analysis Addis Ababa, Ethiopia (June 11, 2014)) - South Sudan'spresident and rebel chief met

Tuesday in a bid to end six months of civil war, agreeing to forge a transitional government within a 60-day deadline,Ethiopia's prime minster said. "They agreed to complete the dialogue process within the coming 60 days on what how, when and who… (for) theformation of the transitional government," Ethiopia's Hailemariam Desalegn said, after the rare meeting between President Salva Kiir and rebel chief Riek Machar alongside regional leaders.

A ceasefire deal signed by Kiir and Machar on May 9 has been repeatedly violated, deepening the crisis in the young nation which has already killedthousands and forced more than 1.3 million people from their homes. It was the first encounter of the enemies in a month, and only the second since the civil war began in mid-December. Kiir and Machar met on the sidelines of a regional leaders' summit in Addis Ababa organised by the East African IGAD bloc, which is brokering slow-moving negotiations between both sides.

Hailemariam, speaking at the opening of the summit, slammed both sidesin South Sudan for violating a ceasefire agreement signed on May 9. "There has been a growing tendency to continue with the war," Hailemariam said, but adding both Kiir and Machar had recommitted to the peace deal. Previous rounds of peace talks have made little progress and been repeatedly delayed. Delegates for Kiir and Machar have been meeting in luxury hotels in the Ethiopian capital since January, with bothsides bickering over the agenda and even the venue of discussions.

Earlier, mediators issued a stinging rebuke of the rivals, accusing them ofseeking military victory rather than a negotiated end to the civil war.

Mahboub Maalim, IGAD executive secretary, said both Kiir and Machar were "stupid" if they thought they could win on the battlefield. "If we wantto apportion blame, it's theirs. I think sometimes they thought they could win on the ground militarily, something which is very stupid," Maalim said.(Text ends)

Mail & Guardian Africa (June 11, 2014)

Ge'ez: is the only original African script taught and used widely in everyday interaction - in Ethiopia and Eritrea. It is also the most successful. Last weekend, a Kenyan made the news by announcing he had developed an indigenous script for the Luo language. In no time, #WritingLuo was the top trending topic in Kenya on Twitter. The developer, Kefa Ombewa, said he was out to "de-Latinise" the Luo language, arguing that African languages needed indigenous symbols to express their nuances that the Roman alphabet simply cannot capture.

Reception on social media so far has largely treated the development of the script as just another flamboyant curiosity, but could Ombewa be on to something? The desire to express African languages in locally developed symbols has been strong through the decades. Written language embodies historical identity and cultural power—thus when Israel became a state in 1948, it revived the Hebrew language from near-oblivion, not just as a tool of unifying modern Jews, but also as a politicalsymbol of their claim of a connection to ancient Israel. Today, most African languages are written in the Latin or Arabic alphabets. However, Latin and Arabic themselves developed from ancient Egyptian hieroglyphics. Despite the modern diversity of writing systems, historiansbelieve that ancient writing developed independently in only four places—Egypt, Iran/Iraq, China, and Mesoamerica (the cultural area in the Americas, extending approximately from central Mexico to Belize, Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and northern Costa Rica).

Ge'ez in the mix: All other scripts are derivatives or influences of these four: For example, Arabic is derived from ancient writing in Iran/Iraq; Japanese and Korean and derived from Chinese, and Latin alphabet is derived from ancient Greek, which adopted its alphabet from Egyptian hieroglyphics. Thus it could be argued that European languages today arewritten in script derived from Africa—not the other way around. AlthoughAfrica is known for its oral traditions, there have also been several indigenous African writing systems, some of which are still in use today.

Used in Ethiopia and Eritrea, Ge'ez is the only native African script taught in school today used widely in everyday interactions. Dating back to the 9th century BC, Ge'ez itself is an extinct language, much like Latin, only used in the liturgy of the Ethiopian and Eritrean Orthodox churches. But the Ge'ez script is used to write Amharic, Tigrinya, Tigre and most other languages of Ethiopia and Eritrea. And with a population of over 90 millionresiding in those two countries, Ge'ez is the most successful native African script today. Ge'ez probably developed over the course of several centuries. But another native African script, Vai in Liberia and Sierra Leone, is credited to one man, who invented the Vai writing system in the 1830s, a Liberian named Momolu Duwalu Bukele. It is said the script was revealed to him in a dream, though it is more likely that the Cherokee syllabary in North America provided a model for the design of Vai writing. At the time, many Cherokee had migrated to Liberia in the early 1830s, just at the time when Cherokee itself was developing its written script.

Cameroon's Bamum: Another script developed in modern times is the Bamum script, invented by King Ibrahim Njoya, the 17th king of the Bamum of West Cameroon in 1896. The script, also named A-ka-u-ku after its first four letters, is rarely used today, but a fair amount of material written in this script still exists. But King Njoya's grandson and current sultan of Bamum, Ibrahim Mbombo Njoya, has since transformed his palace into a school to re-teach the Bamum script, initiating The Bamum Scripts and Archives Project in 2005 to bring it back from the brink of extinction. Further south in Malawi is the Mwangwego alphabet developed in 1977 for Malawian languages by Nolence Mwangwego. But itis not used widely in everyday interactions. Other African scripts, such as Nubian and Meroitic, have fallen into disuse and are considered extinct.

But most African languages today, particularly south of the Sahara, are written using the Latin alphabet. This presents many difficulties in expressing some sounds that are not found in European languages. In the 1960s and 1970s, UNESCO hosted several “expert meetings” on the subject, including a seminal meeting in Bamako in 1966, and one in Niamey in 1978, where a standard African alphabet—using Latin letters but incorporating many other non-Latin sounds—was proposed. But it is yet to be widely adopted. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIAN HISTORY: Battle of Metema fought b/n Mahdist Sudanese &Abyssinyan forces.’

ARCHIEVES (June 13, 2014) - The Battle of Metemma (also called the Battle of Gallabat) was fought 9–10 March 1889 between the Mahdist Sudanese and Ethiopian forces. It is a critical event in Ethiopian history because Nəgusä Nägäst (Emperor) Yohannes IV was killed in this battle.The fighting occurred at the site of the twin settlements of Gallabat (in modern Sudan) and Metemma (in modern Ethiopia), so both names arecommonly used and either can be argued to be correct. When the Mahdists rebelled against the Egyptians, many Egyptian garrisons found themselves isolated in Sudan. As a result the British, who had taken overthe government of Egypt, negotiated the Treaty of Adwa with Emperor Yohannes IV of Ethiopia on 3 June 1884 whereby the Egyptian garrisons were allowed to evacuate to Massawa through Ethiopian territory. After that, the Mahdist Khalifa, Abdallahi ibn Muhammad considered the Ethiopians as his enemies and sent his forces to attack them. The twin communities of Gallabat and Metemma were located on the trade route from the Nile to Gonder, the old Imperial capital; the Mahdists used these communities as their base for attacks on Ethiopia. These raids led to a Mahdist defeat by Ras Alula on 23 September 1885 at Kufit.

Sack of Gondar: A few years later, the negus of Gojjam, TekleHaimanot (avassal of Emperor Yohannes) attacked the Mahdists at Metemma in January 1887, and sacked the town. In response, that next year the Mahdists under Abu Anga campaigned out of Metemma into Ethiopia; theirobjective was the town of Gondar. TekleHaymanot confronted him at Sar Weha on 18 January 1888, but was badly defeated. The Mahdists proceeded to Gondar, and set about ransacking the town. Churches were pillaged and burnt, and many inhabitants were carried away into slavery.

Despite this damage to the historic capital, Emperor Yohannes held back from a counterattack due to his suspicions of Menelik II, then only the ruler of Shewa. He wanted to campaign against Menelik, but the clergy and his senior officers pressed him to handle the Mahdist threat first. TheAbyssinians under Ras Gobena Dacche did defeat the Mahdists in the Battle of Guté Dili in the province of Wellega on 14 October 1888.

Following this victory the Emperor accepted the advice of his people, andaccording to Aleqa Lemlem, concluded: "if I come back I can fight Shoa later on when I return. And if I die at Matemma in the hands of the heathens I shall go to heaven."

Battle: In late January 1889, Yohannes mustered a huge army of 130,000infantry and 20,000 cavalry in Dembiya. The Sudanese gathered an armyof 85,000 and fortified themselves in Gallabat, surrounding the town witha huge zariba, a barrier made of entwined thorn bushes, replicating the effect of barbed wire.

On 8 March 1889 the Ethiopian army arrived within sight of Gallabat, andthe attack began in earnest the next day. The wings were commanded bythe Emperor's nephews, Ras Haile Maryam Gugsa over the left wing and Ras Mengesha the right. The Ethiopians managed to set the zariba alight,and, by concentrating their attack against one part of the defense managed to break through the Mahdist lines into the town. The defenderssuffered heavy losses and were about to break down completely, when the battle turned unexpectedly in their favour.

The Emperor Yohannes, who led his army from the front, had shrugged offone bullet wound to his hand, but a second lodged in his chest, fatally wounding him. He was carried back to his tent, where he died that night; before he died, Yohannes commanded his nobles to recognize his natural son, Ras Mengesha, as his successor. The Ethiopians, demoralized by the death of their ruler, began to melt away, leaving the field—and victory—tothe Mahdists.

According to David L. Lewis, the Mahdists were unaware of the Emperor'sdeath until "stench from the rapidly decaying imperial corpse alerted a spy, and the nearly beaten Sudanese thundered out of their zariba to scatter the downcast Ethiopians like starlings." A few days later (12 March) the forces of the Mahdist commander, Zeki Tummal, overtook Rasses Mangasha and Alula and their remaining followers near the AtbaraRiver, who were escorting the Emperor's body to safety. The Mahdists inflicted heavy losses upon the Ethiopians and captured the body of the dead Emperor, whose head they cut off and sent back to Omdurman as atrophy.

Aftermath: The death of the Emperor caused a period of political turmoil in Ethiopia. Although Yohannes on his deathbed named his son Ras Mengesha as his heir, and begged Ras Alula and his other nobles to support him, within a matter of weeks Menelik II was recognized throughout Ethiopia as the new emperor. For the Mahdists the consequences were severe, as many of their best soldiers had perished inthe battle, seriously weakening their military strength. The Khalifa prudently decided to stop offensive actions against Ethiopia and the conflict dwindled to small-scale cross-border raiding. Notes. Source: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Battle_of_Gallabat

ETHIOPOLITICS: The post-Meles universe takes shape’

By Elissa Jobson in Addis Ababa, The Africa Report (June 14, 2014)

Prime Minister Hailemariam is developing a style of consensual politics, but some politicans and businessmen are having difficulty adjusting. The passing of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi in August 2012 has shaken up thebusiness and political elite. Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn does notfavour the top-down and snap decision-making practised by his predecessor, preferring instead to consult more widely. While this leads toa slower governmental machine, it protects the administration from the odd rash decision. This more collegiate style of governance has opened upthe space for a cadre of influential top advisers.

Old political hands Bereket Simon, who before Meles’s death had been slated to leave office in the next generational purge, and Abay Tsehaye are key members of a brain trust intended to replace the phenomenal intellect of the former Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) leader.

Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus (1) has eased into his newrole as foreign minister. He had spearheaded the country's remarkable health reforms and now has room to make a name for himself on the global stage. Unlike Meles, Hailemariam does not seem to crave the international spotlight. Tedros's popular Twitter feed – he has nearly24,700 followers – and his strong statements on Africa and the International Criminal Court while chairman of the African Union's executive council, have given him increased visibility.
Hailemariam's appointment, soon after taking office, of two additional deputy prime ministers has given further clout to Debretsion Gebremichael (2), deputy chairman of the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF), one of the constituent parties of the EPRDF. Aside from his dual portfolio as deputy prime minister for the finance and economic cluster and minister of communication and information technology – the latter of which sees him in control of the Ethiopian Telecommunications Corporation (ETC) – he is also chairman of two newly created companies,Ethiopian Electric Power and Ethiopian Electric Services. Arguably, this makes him one of the most influential men in government.
Azeb Mesfin, Meles's once powerful widow, has suffered mixed fortunes since his death. Despite her failure to win the election for mayor of AddisAbaba, losing to former transport minister Diriba Kuma in July 2013, sheremains a member of the political bureau of the TPLF, the EPRDF's executive committee and the Endowment Fund For The Rehabilitation of Tigray (EFFORT).
Public and private: The business world was rocked by the arrest in May 2013 of more than 30 suspects – including Melaku Fenta, director generalof the Ethiopian Revenues and Customs Authority – on charges including tax evasion and receiving bribes. But Ethiopia remains a land of opportunity, if one goes by the number of private equity companies passing through Addis Ababa. The big state businesses like the Sugar Corporation and ETC remain unchallenged by private sector rivals.
Brigadier General Kinfe Dagnew continues to look untouchable as he sitsatop the Metals and Engineering Corporation (METEC).
A state-owned industrial company consisting of close to 70 engineering enterprises and military hardware manufacturing entities, METEC is theonly local contractor involved in the flagship $4.3bn Grand RenaissanceDam project. Another survivor of the Meles era, managing director of Ernst & Young Ethiopia Zemedeneh Negatu, is making a push into technology companies in his private capacity. In a well timed move intomobile banking and IT training, Zemedeneh is poised to reap dividends.
Although he was powerful under Meles, Mohammed Hussein Al Amoudi (3)'s star is no longer shining so brightly. Work on the Saudi Arabian andEthiopian businessman's enormous five-star hotel, situated on the compound of the African Union's headquarters, stalled for several monthslast year. His company Saudi Star's rice farm is not yielding results, and Pakistani company MCG Consulting, which had been working on theproject, pulled out at the end of last year. (Text ends)

RANKING: Ethiopia ranks second poorest country in the world – OxfordUniversity Study'

Imensional Poverty Index (MPI), published by Oxford University, Ethiopia ranks the second poorest country in the world just ahead of Niger. The study is based on analysis of acute poverty in 108 developing countries around the world. Despite making progress at reducing the percentage of destitute people, Ethiopia is still home to more than 76 million poor people, the fifth largest number in the world after India, China, Bangladesh and Pakistan. India has the world's largest number of poor people at more than 647 million. 87.3% of Ethiopians are classified as MPIpoor, while 58.1% are considered destitute. A person is identified as multidimensionally poor (or 'MPI poor') if they are deprived in at least onethird of the weighted MPI indicators. The destitute are deprived in at leastone-third of the same weighted indicators, The Global MPI uses 10 indicators to measure poverty in three dimensions: education, health and living standards. In rural Ethiopia 96.3% are poor while in the urban area the percentage of poverty is 46.4%. Comparing the poverty rate by regions, Somali region has the highest poverty rate at 93% followed by Oromiya (91.2%) and Afar (90.9%). Amhara region has 90.1% poverty rate while Tigray has 85.4%. Addis Ababa has the smallest percentage of poverty at 20% followed by Dire Dawa at 54.9% and Harar (57.9%).

COMMERCE: Doing business in Addis remains harder'

Reported in nine months about 14,000 businesses handed back tradelicenses

Capital Ethiopia (June 16, 2014) - Increasing house rent, taxes and loss ofincome are the main reasons for the 13,993 people that have canceled their names from the Addis Ababa Trade and Industry Bureau Register Book and returned licenses in the last nine months of the current fiscal year. The number of those canceling them has risen compared to the previous year when 12,687 canceled. And additional 3,450 trade licenses have also been suspended temporarily until they find better working conditions.

A claim officer for the Bureau, Meteke Engeda told Capital that 31,964 people obtained business licenses during the last nine months of this current fiscal year. She says people need to conduct thorough feasibilitystudies and business plans when they start to set up a business. "Just because one person succeeds in selling mobile phones doesn't mean theother person will be successful without a proper business plan'' she stressed. The Bureau says there are currently 217,000 business people actively working in Addis Ababa. This fiscal year it expects to hand out 49,000 trade licenses.

According to a World Bank report, Ethiopia was ranked 125th out of 189 countries for ease of doing business. Another issue is the expense of cash register machines. Yonas Girmay a new business person said "my friend and I began an electric installation business but after only operating for three months we were told to purchase a cash register machine and we couldn't afford it, we asked for more time but that request was not approved so we had to close our shop." There was a six month tax holidayfor new businesses but that is no longer the case which is another factor that makes starting a new business a challenging task.

The Doing Business report measures the number of procedures, time andcost for a small and medium-size limited liability company to start up andformally operate. To make the data comparable across 189 economies, Doing Business uses a standardized business that is 100 percent domestically owned, has start-up capital equivalent to 10 times income per capita, engages in general industrial or commercial activities and employs between 10 and 50 people within the first month of operations. BUSINESS: Half of Turkey's African investment is in Ethiopia'

Capital Ethiopia (June 16, 2014) - Ethiopia is now Turkey's biggest Africaninvestment, Aykut Kumbaroglu who works with African Countries for Turkey's Ministry of Foreign Affairs said. There are currently over 350 Turkish companies investing USD three billion in Ethiopia. This is half of the USD six billion the nation invests in sub-Saharan Africa. Turkish officials say this has come as a result of their encouragement to invest in Ethiopia. Aykut pointed out that the leaders of both nations have made reciprocal visits and their relationship is strong.

Ethiopia reopened its embassy in Ankara in 2006 and different Turkish offices have based their regional office in Addis Ababa including Turkey's Anadolu News Agency. Top diplomats in the Ethiopian Embassy at Ankara,told Capital that Turkish companies are now focusing on Africa. "Ethiopia is a gateway for their vision," the diplomat explained. The Ethiopian diplomat said that Turkey is now changing and they are transferring to theservice sector from industry and because of this they are growing in Ethiopia. "Our embassy and the government in Addis Ababa are aggressively lobbying Turkish companies to come to Ethiopia and this combined with the current Turkish investment in Ethiopia is creating a push, pull effect to enhance the already blossoming trade between the twonations," the diplomat explained.

Ayalew Gobeze, Ethiopia's Ambassador to Turkey, said even though economics is one of the main aspects of the two nation's relationship thereare other aspects as well. Ayalew said that the number of Turkish investors asking to invest in Ethiopia is rapidly growing. "We are also working strongly to expand the number of Turkish investors in Ethiopia, because they will come into Ethiopia with benefits including new technology and knowledge," the recently appointed ambassador and oneof the top ruling party officials added. "But when we encouraged the Turkish investment in the country we have to be responsible to facilitatethe smooth bureaucratic process to expand the FDI," he explained. The interest of Ethiopian investors is also growing to work with the Turkish business community.

According to the 2013 data, the trade between the two countries has reached USD 420 million from USD 27 million in 2000. Ethiopia is the first sub-Saharan Africa country to begin modern diplomatic relations with Turkey at the start of the 20th century when Turkey opened its consulate in Harrar. Turkish officials say the two countries are working in many sectors including education, health and security. Turkey has been training the Ethiopian Federal Police and several Ethiopian police officers are takingtraining in Turkey.

HOUSING: Addis Abeba City to Transfer 40 Thousand Condos in June,August'

SR News (June 11, 2014) Addis Ababa City administration is to transfer 20,000 condominium houses of 20/80 scheme this month to those formerly registered and to be winners in a lottery system, said mayor Driba Kuma. According to the mayor the houses to be transferred are thecompleted ones out of the planned 95 houses to be built in 10 different sites of Addis Ababa in the 20/80 scheme for low income citizens.

It has also been decided to transfer the other 20,000 condos until August.The plan has been set to complete the construction of 40,000 and transferring them this month. But as the sewerage system of the houses has not been finished, it requires postponing the transfer of the other 20 thousand condos to August out of the planned for this month, he said. Theother 50,000 condos to be built next will be transferred after completing the infrastructure as has been do for these ones, he added.

E-Security: Trojan found on Star N9500 by G-Data'

Heise (June 17, 2014) - Anti virus software maker GData has reported recently that they have found a trojan on Chinese phones, most of them being the Star N9500 Galaxy S4 clone. According to GData this trojan is called Uupay.D and can access the whole phone. The trojan is able to access data, record phone calls, access the microphone at any given time and according to them can even crack the mTAN mechanism which is usedby a lot of banks these days. The trojan hides itself behind a fake Google Play Services apk file and is integrated deeply into the firmware of the phone, so it is hard to remove it. GData even suggests to throw this phone away immediately. In our opinion, one should take this trojan serious, as it can access pretty mich everything. However we certainly doubt some claims made by GData. First of all we think that it will not be possible to hack bank accounts, except maybe is doing it all on the phone. Also we highly doubt GData's claim, that the Star N9500 is just so cheap to catch innocent victims and to earn money through selling their private data. GData was not able to provide any data on how many phones were infected which they did test, nor were they able to tell where they got the tested phones from. We believe that the trojan got installed on the device either from some worker in the software department of the factory, or by one of the Chinese distributors. Now it will be interesting to see if there will be more phones discovered running the Uupay.D trojan. We will update you in casewe hear anything new about that.

Egyptian journalist hangs up phone on Ethiopian ambassador during livetv interview'

The conversation is in Arabic here below the article is translated fromArabic to English using Google Translator.

SR (June 18, 2014) Egyptian journalist Rania Badawi hang up the phone in the face of the Ethiopian Ambassador in Cairo, after an argument aboutthe management of dams. The Ethiopian Ambassador in Cairo Mahmoud Direer Gedi told "Rania Badawi", she "lacks understanding of dams". Afterthat he she respond to by saying," You exceeded your limits and not havethe right to comment on the way the questions or characterization of the question according to your policies and that protocols and norms of international law does not give you the right only to respond to the question or not to comment, “and then shut down the phone on the ambassador and did not give him an opportunity to comment. Here belowthe points those were discussed by Ambassador Mohammed Direer Gedi during the phone interview with journalist Rania Badawi in Cairo.

1. GERD has no impact
2. GERD is int’l accepted designed. zero risk.3.We build to devt,electricity.

4.GERD is one soluion to solve ethiopia’s and nile basin electrical scarcity.5.we still wait tripartit negotiation to continue

Then SHE asked him, can egypt manage the GERD?

Mr.Ambassador told her that is only ethiopian concern not egypt.He toldher GERD management is sole and only Ethiopian. Then she get angry.

He told her GERD is keeping on building, then he said you even didn’t know about dam, as you can’t generallize things by making up lies. Thenshe ended the interview without giving him a chance to respond. A lot ofEgyptian media reacts to this news.

ETHIOPOLITICS: Regime misleads Eritrean origins in Ethiopia into providing their serves to the ruling elite at the risk of antagonising themselves with most Ethiopians’ Eritrea is an independent country and officially Eritreans are foreigners in Ethiopia nowadays. Even though technically they are treated as friendly people the fact that they are foreigners is set to remain until any possible future change comes into effect to affect that in any way. Mutual cooperation as people to people and sense of togetherness can only last when we bear and display respectfor eachother which we would not do in any other better way than makingconscious efforts to stay away from involving in each other’s affairs, politically. Future friendliness and cooperation among the two people in any capacity hinges very much on the good will of the two people towardseachother. That is what we have to guard jealously lest we will risk remaining apart looking at each other suspiciously which none of us reallywish for.

Among the more than 70 thousand Eritreans deported from Ethiopia at theheight of the war in 1998 - 2000, until the Algiers Accord signed between the two sides. I listened with shock and pain when she narrated to me how she and three others had to walk for 11 days (yes eleven days) on foot back to Ethiopia along the shores of the Red Sea via Djibouti immediately after their deportation. Among the four poor souls who set out including her, only two (herself and another one) made to Ethiopia while two others perished on the way - one blown off by the explosives herun on, the other simply collapsed to his death unable to stand the ordealsof the trek in the near boiling temperature along the Sea. Even their body could not have a decent burial as the ones who remained alive had neitherthe energy nor the means to give a treat of burial to their friends’ bodies.

After the bloody war of the 1998-2000 between the two countries that claimed the lives of tens of thousands of young people from both sides and remained technically unfinished, hardly any one would expect Eritreans to turn to Ethiopia as a place of refuge. But they do so with confidence in the enduring friendliness between the two people. We all remember how Ethiopians were seen secretly handing water and food or anything they could to Eritreans at the time they were declared persona non grata who were meant to be hunted down for deportation to Eritrea during the war. I have my concern as do many Ethiopians that this good will and unconditional love between the two people is set to suffer if Eritreans fail to stay away from taking sides in Ethiopian politics in any way while they are on the ground there. Nothing lasts forever especially ifsubjected to misuse and abuse.

Yet, one may say such verbal slights count for nothing compared to how our people get humiliated in the Middle East, perish in high seas far from home, held and tortured in the Sinai Desert for ransom or subjected to gruesome mutilations in the bid to harvest their body organs. You offer your help to the devil with every risk to your soul. Given how TPLF/EPDRFis known for deceiving, misleading and using people towards achieving their own selfish political goals at any cost, it would not come as a surprise if Eritrean refugees come handy to be used this time round. No one can deny that unitary Eritreans themselves have done their part to reunify Eritrea with it's motherland, Ethiopia in the early fifties. Ethiopia isa very vast country, of course, Ethiopians are proud to share the immenseresource and potential they have for the Eritrean brothers whos were partof our territory in yesteryears in times of need as in the past. AGRO BUSINESS: The British ex-pat who has opened a farm in Ethiopia'By James Jeffrey, BBC Addis Ababa, Ethiopia (June 18, 2014)

Beside the small town of Adiguden a group of cows prance and buck whenreleased from their shed into a paddock beneath the piercing sunshine of the midday sun in northern Ethiopia. They are owned by a British entrepreneur and his Ethiopian partners, who have created a new dairy company called AJGG Dairy Products, based in Ethiopia's Tigray region bordering Eritrea.

It is early days for the business, which still has to use a horse-drawn cart for the daily milk run from the 2.5 hectare (6.2 acre) farm to the local busstation, from where its product is then driven 35km (22 miles) to be sold in Makelle, Tigray's capital.

Hence you might ask John Crisp, the Brit behind the joint venture: why onearth open a dairy farm in Ethiopia? "It is a little complicated," says the 57-year-old. Mr Crisp originally met his four AJGG partners through an organisation working with the mentally ill in Mekelle. This led to the idea of how a dairy farm could offer occupational therapy to patients recovering from mental health problems.

Twenty cows later and Mr Crisp has an 80% stake in an operational smallbusiness, with last month's move into new facilities an important step toward establishing the first dairy processing facility in northern Ethiopia.The creation of the company comes as milk is increasingly popular in Ethiopia, especially as the country's middle class grows, people's disposable incomes increase, and more homes purchase refrigerators.

Shared strengths: Girmay Kahsay, one of Mr Crisp's partners, says that establishing the dairy as a joint venture has provided a number of advantages. "Locals understand the culture and have communication skillsto deal with bureaucracy, while a foreigner often has better access to capital and technology," he says.

And it is not just the business' management which is benefiting from mixing Ethiopian and foreign inputs. The herd is a hybrid breed, bred fromEuropean Holsteins and local cows. The European genes provide the high milk production, while the Ethiopian ones give more disease resistance.

Currently AJGG sells raw milk locally, but once processing and packaging equipment is installed it will produce pasteurised milk, butter, cheese andyoghurt.

"This will require much more milk than the herd can produce, so we will take milk from small local dairy farmers," says Micheale Abrha, a fellow partner and AJGG general manager. Good news for farmers, Mr Micheale says, especially as the local dairy market collapses for months during religious fasting, when Ethiopian Orthodox Christians do not consume animal products. In addition to the processed dairy products adding valueand being storable for sale after fasting periods, their transportability willopen up new markets to further offset fasting-related slumps.

No easy solutions: Yet much needs to be done if AJGG is to expand andreach supermarket shelves in Addis Ababa 720km to the south. The all important processing equipment still needs to be imported, most likely from Israel. The plan is to install it in late August when the rainy seasonends.

The company's horse-drawn cart being prepared for the daily milk run. Difficulties with importing a van has meant transporting the milk the old- fashioned way "That gives us a couple of months to get processing activities running, and iron out glitches, before the Advent fast begins," MrCrisp notes.

Another problem is accessing groundwater needed for irrigation to grow animal feed. A geological survey indicated ample water accessible at 80m (262 ft). But a neighbouring dairy farmer sunk a bore hole to 115m that produced little water.

As a result, AJGG may need to apply for a new lot of land in which to sinka bore hole from where it can pipe water to the farm. Beyond natural challenges are those man-made at governmental level. For a foreigner togain an investment licence for a joint venture in Ethiopia, a minimum initial investment of $150,000 (£93,750) is required. This is less than the $200,000 required from a foreigner going it alone, but still a lot of money.

The business currently only sells milk, but the aim is to expand to otherdairy products

Previously this could be paid gradually during the course of establishing a company. But when AJGG tried to renew its investment licence in March, itfound the government had decided the whole amount must be transferredbefore granting or renewing licences.

"This was symptomatic of the difficulties of doing business here," Mr Crispsays. "The rules change constantly." Mr Crisp, in another instance, was told he could import a vehicle free of customs duty, which can reach 300% of the value of the item imported. But the rule changed to apply only to companies investing in excess of 10m birr ($526,315; £310,000),Mr Crisp says. This left AJGG without a vehicle and unable to get its product to market – hence the horse-drawn cart to the bus station while management considers its options.

Free market? Changes in regulation is a common complaint among foreigninvestors in Ethiopia, with the government appearing to beckon private investment while at the same time remaining concerned about any possible negative impact on domestic businesses. "[It is] concerned that ifforeign investors are allowed in certain sectors, local businesses might notbe able to compete," says Manaye Ewunetu, managing director of London-based ME Consulting Engineers, which specialises in Africa and the Middle East.
Meles Abadi, 17. a farm worker, encouraging one of the cows to eat. Thecows have been bred both to produce a good quality of milk and to be resistant to local diseases. He adds: "I think there is a safety net mechanism to control exploitations experienced in the past." In addition,since the overthrow of Emperor Haile Selassie in 1974, many policies of Ethiopia's leaders and governments have had a strong socialist hue – which has left a mark.
"The public sector dominates investment," says Dani Rodrik, an economistwith US-based Institute for Advanced Study. "Private investment in modern industries… remains too low to sustain structural transformation."However, Mr Rodrik does note encouraging signs for manufacturing investment.
And Nick Woodall-Mason, operations manager in Ethiopia for the UK's Tullow Oil, says that the Ethiopian government is more often happy to seeforeign investment in business areas which are not seen as strategic, suchas telecoms and banking. He adds: "It provides very good tax breaks to Ethiopian or foreigner alike to start a business."
Despite any lingering reservations the Ethiopian government may still have about the private sector, there is one advantage to an entrepreneurial endeavour that includes calf-bearing cows. "The businessliterally grows naturally," Mr Crisp says.

ETHIOPIA: South Sudan's president writes protest letter to PMHD'
(ST) JUBA (June 19, 2014) - South Sudanese president Salva Kiir has written to the East African regional bloc (IGAD) demanding an apology over remarks allegedly made by one of its officials. The letter, foreign affairs minister Benjamin Marial said, was delivered by a government minister to Ethiopia's prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, who is the current IGAD chairperson. IGAD's executive secretary Mahboub Maalim allegedly described president Kiir and rebel leader Riek Machar as "stupid"for pursuing military means instead of peace talks the ongoing conflict.

Marial said statements attributed to Mahboub was "unfortunate", given the regional body's mediation role. "The government, specially our president, has sent an envoy to with a letter to prime minister of Ethipia with regards to the unfortunate statement which was said by executive secretary of the IGAD in the press," Marial told reporters in Juba Tuesday.

He declined to further reveal the content of the letter or what the government expected in response. The presidential spokesperson, Ateny Wek Ateny, however, said that the government needed an apology. "It is clear that [IGAD Executive Secretary] Mahboub has insulted the Head of State and what we wan is an apology," Ateny told Sudan Tribune Tuesday.The peace talks between government and opposition led by Machar has been postponed as government delegation demanded response from IGAD. South Sudan's information minister, Michael Makuei told the SSTV on Monday the IGAD official's comment was "inappropriate" and put to question the mediators' abilities to over see the talks. Meanwhile, cabinet affairs minister, Elias Lomoro said Mahboub visited Juba on Monday, but was denied access to meet president Kiir over comment he allegedly uttered.

Former first lady Azeb Mesfin's influence on the wane'

ION (June 20, 2014): Azeb Mesfin's influence has been on the wane sincethe death of her husband, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. She will now jettison some of her political mandates. As was disclosed in The Indian Ocean Newsletter last December (ION 1369), Azeb Mesfin, the widow of former Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, is distancing herself from the TigrayPeople's Liberation Front (TPLF, mainstay of the ruling EPRDF coalition).

To be sure, the political faction she led in the party together with SimonBereket is very clearly on the way out and Azeb Mesfin's dream of becoming mayor of Addis Ababa is further away than ever. She has recently asked to be relieved of her functions in the TPLF leadership, where she had been appointed by her husband, and is now considering resigning from the party altogether so she can have more time to run theMeles Zenawi Foundation. In doing so, she would not have to declare herassets, which the main TPLF leaders could be obliged to do. In addition, Azeb Mesfin could also relinquish her role of number 2 in the EFFORT consortium of companies close to the TPLF.

TRIBAL CLASHES: The Afars & Issa-Somalis Bordering The Awash River'

EM VIEW POINT: Events had been followed with alert and concern the unrest and convulsion on the banks of the Awash River and Addis -Djiboutiroad and the ensuing war of words among the Issa-Somali communities inDiaspora and Afar Diaspora about the ownership of the three territories, namely; Adaytu, Undda-Foo and Gadamaytu in the Afar Region and with itthe attendant plight of the Afar people and their struggle for survival in that vital area of the country.

For those of you who are not familiar with the background history and chain of this conflict that has developed from traditional inter-tribal dispute between Afars and Issa-Somalis over water resources, grazing rights and cattle raiding campaigns and counter campaigns into a regionalconflict between states in the region for control of strategic roads, sea outlets and establish borders along the much-coveted the Awash River

Of course, the independence of Somali Republic in 1st July, 1960 after theunification of then British Somaliland with the southern Italian protectorate of Somalia in the same year and idea of unifying the five flanks of Somalia in an expansionist policy known as “Somaliwein” (Greater Somalia), a scheme of unifying these territories as a single Somali nation-state which that led to two major wars: April, 1964 and July, 1977 to 78 between Ethiopia and the Somali republic at the time

The Territory of Afars & Issas later Djibouti, after its independence in June, 1977, adopted the same agenda, under the Gouled & Guelleh Mamassan clan the Issa-Somali, by arming and supporting the Issa-Somali tribes in Ethiopia against the Afar people to realize the old dream of Greater Somalia bordering the Awash River. The Issa-Somali bandit expansionists took not only Afar areas but also vast parts from some districts of the Oromia Regional State, such as Ma'eso, Bordode and Babilein the East and Borana and Guji in South of Oromia.

The latest decision of the Ethiopian federal authorities either for the Issa- Somali communities to integrate in the Afar Region or go back to where they immigrated from into the Region Five (Somali Killil). The Ethiopian federal government to put into action the decision to hand over to Afar Killil (Region), demands that Ethiopian government must demarcate the boundary between the Afar and the Somali Region 1947 demarcation line based 120 kilometres from today's border the Erer River, and demands the government of Ethiopia respect the geographical integrity, cultural andhistorical rights of the Afar region, by dismantling all illegally constructed settlements by the Somali settlers immediately and unconditionally and tofacilitate the return of those inhabitants who have fled the areas since theoutbreak of hostilities.

ENERGY: French Energy Group Alstom is in a GERD tender offer’

Alstom International is pulling out all the stops to confirm its presence on the Ethiopian electricity market. After winning the market to supply eight turbo-alternators to the tune of €250 million for the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD), via its subsidiary Alstom Power, the French energy group with the same name has other electricity distribution projects under its belt, also for the Ethiopian Electric Power Corp. (EEPCo).So it is that Alstom Grid on the one hand is about to complete its contract to supply and refurbish eleven electricity distribution sub-stations funded by the African Development Bank (ADB) and on the other hand is about torespond to forthcoming calls for tender to supply the five regional electricity control sectors funded by the French development agency Agence française de développement (AFD). Ethiopia has the ambition to become the leading exporter of electricity in East Africa. Thierry de Margerie, Vice President for the Africa region of Alstom International, is impatiently waiting for the outcome of another call for tenders that his group has bid for: a DC 500,000V interconnection between Ethiopia and Kenya. Alstom was pre-qualified last year, as were its competitors, the Swiss-Swedish group ABB and the German Siemens. The Ethiopian authorities are expected to award the contract by the end of the year 2014..

OPPOSITION: Regional opposition ‘Arena Tigray’ is in quarrel with some ofits members'

ION (June 20, 2014) Gebru Asrat contested in the Tigray scene in Ethiopia. The former president of the Tigray Regional State (from 1991 until 2001) Gebru Asrat has come up against strong revolt in the opposition party he created, Arena Tigray for Democracy and Sovereignty.Some members of the party’s central committee have openly criticised him, accusing him of being too individualist in his decisions and too conciliatory with the government. They have called for a convention to be held, but Gebru Asrat and his partisans have ignored the request.

DEFENCE: Chief-of-Staff Samora Yunis fires four of his junior - ION ION (June 20, 2014) The Indian Ocean Newsletter has recently learned that four generals were recently sanctioned by the Ethiopian chief of staff,General Samora Yunis for “plotting” against him in denouncing a certain degree of favoritism in his decisions. Two of them have been retired and the other two have been demoted. The four generals are: Saere Mekonen(Northern Command), Abebaw Tadesse (Central Command), Tadesse Werede (Peace Keeping Forces) and Mola Haile Mariam (aviation).

Tadesse Werede was recalled to Addis Ababa and arrested as soon as he stepped out of the aeroplane. His home was searched and he has been placed under house arrest. Abebaw Tadesse was also recalled to Addis Ababa and replaced in his functions by General Yohannes Gebre Meskel who is a loyal supporter of the Tigray People’s Liberation Front (TPLF), themainstay of the ruling coalition. Executive summary for emergency food aid needed for year 2014,January to December’

DPPC (June 23, 2014) The food security situation in most parts of the country following normal to above norm 2013 kiremt/deyr/hagaya expect,in pocket areas that received insufficient rains and areas affected by various hazards. The food security situation is particularly concerning in the northeastern parts of the country, following three to four consecutive inadequate seasonal rains.

The requirements identified in this document are based on the 2013 meher assessment, a five year historical sector and weather trend analysis, and the National Meterological Services Agency (NMSA) preliminary forecast for January to December, 2014 belg/gu/sugum/gannaraiins.

The total gross emergency food and non-food requirement for year 2014 amounts to USD 403 million. Considering available resources amounting to USD 51.6, the net total requirement stands at USD 351 million. The netfood and TSF requirement totals to 389.589 MT, estimated to cost aroundUSD 282. 4 million. In addition a total of net USD 68.8 million is required to respond to the non-food needs of identified beneficiaries in the health and nutrition, WASH, agriculture and education sectors.

RELIEF: Humanitarian Aid Hits Record Globally $22 bln In 2013'

Ethiopia, Afghanistan, Somalia and Sudan in the top 10 list of aidrecipients (Thomson Reuters Foundation) LONDON (June 23, 2014) - Humanitarian aid rose to a record $22 billion in 2013, in response to Typhoon Haiyan in the Philippines and major conflict-related crises in Syria and Central African Republic – but more than a third of needs were still left unmet, new data showed on Tuesday. The increase in the international humanitarian response - from around $18 billion in 2012 when there wereno big new disasters - comes from growing contributions by both government donors and private funding sources, according to research from the Global Humanitarian Assistance (GHA) programme of the UK- based think tank Development Initiatives.

Humanitarian needs are continuing to expand, with U.N.-coordinated appeals requesting a record $16.9 billion already this year, as the Syria emergency worsens. "It's great that we are seeing record levels of response, but we need to see that sustained," said Dan Coppard, GHA'sdirector for research and analysis. The figures are a preview of key findings from the programme's annual report on humanitarian aid, to bereleased in September.

Nine of the 10 largest government donors in 2013 increased their funding from the previous year, with state money accounting for three quarters ofthe total international response. The United States, Britain, Turkey, Japan,Germany, Sweden, Canada, Norway and France all gave more, while only the Netherlands did not. Contributions from private sources – individuals, trusts, foundations and businesses – are calculated to have risen by 35 percent.

Governments outside the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development's (OECD) committee of traditional donors are also giving more, GHA said. These newer donor states contributed $2.3 billion in humanitarian assistance in 2013, with their share of government aid doubling since 2011. More countries are "recognising they have an international responsibility", Coppard said, something he said gives reason for optimism relief aid could keep up with growing need.

Despite public and private donors digging deeper, U.N.-backed aid appealsin 2013 - which aimed to assist 78 million people and called for $13.2 billion - were only 65 percent funded. The crisis in Syria, which has displaced some 9.5 million people, received 37 percent ($3.1 billion) of the money that did come in for those appeals.

DISPARITIES: The data pointed to disparities in the geographical distribution and timeliness of humanitarian response, GHA said. "The timetaken for donors to respond at scale to acute crises triggered by sudden natural hazards can vary enormously in the first weeks and months," it pointed out. For example, the response to Typhoon Haiyan in the first month afterwards was half that of the Indian Ocean tsunami appeal in 2005, measured by the proportion of needs met. And the response to conflict-related emergencies is even slower, the data showed. Appeals forSouth Sudan, Syria, Central African Republic and Yemen remained more than 50 percent unfunded six months after they were launched.

Meanwhile, donors tend to cherry pick crises. Afghanistan, Somalia, Sudan, Ethiopia and the Palestinian territories have consistently appeared in the top 10 list of aid recipients over the five years to 2012, while other countries including Nepal, Myanmar and Algeria continue to be a low priority, GHA noted.
Protracted crises in places where millions live in long-term poverty are still capturing the bulk of official humanitarian assistance − around two-thirds of funding from OECD donors in 2012. While acknowledging greater efforts on the part of both humanitarian and development agencies to build resilience to disasters, Coppard called for a more preventative approach – especially when faced with the growingimpacts of climate change for which "we're not particularly prepared".(Text ends)
Norway pledges Ethiopia USD 60m for implementation of “green growthstrategy”
ADDIS ABABA (June 24, 2014) – Ethiopia, a country highly vulnerable to land degradation, deforestation and food insecurity is stepping up its efforts to fight climate change and promote sustainable rural developmentand build resilience. Today the Norwegian Minster of Climate and Environment Mrs Tine Sundtoft promised additional funding to support Ethiopia’s green growth strategy and forest protection in the country. The pledge consists of a support package including USD 10 million (NOK 60 million) of which USD 5 million will be disbursed for results achieved in 2013 and USD 5 million to be paid if results are achieved in 2014. The Norwegian Minister also announced that up to USD 50 million shall be provided in multi annual support for the implementation of the Oromia REDD+ pilot. Ethiopia launched in 2011 a green national development plan (Climate Resilient Green Economy - CRGE) with the goal of reaching middle income status by 2025 without increasing the national emissions from 2010 level. The emphasis is on strategic green investments in key sectors such as agriculture, forestry, energy and transportation. Norway and the United Kingdom entered into a climate partnership with Ethiopia during the COP meeting in Durban in December 2011. Norway has announced support for the implementation of the CRGE strategy for the sectors of clean energy, agriculture and forest. Norway and Ethiopia have signed a bilateral results-based, three-phased REDD + partnership agreement for the years 2013-2020. In addition, it has entered into supplementary agreements with the World Bank, the Global Green Growth Institute, UK’s Department for International Development (DFID), civil society organizations and academia to support the authorities’ REDD+ Readiness work. "You have developed your Climate Resilient Green Economy Strategy as a relevant response to climate change; and you have invited partners to the table to work with you to implement it.
Norway as a donor and long time development partner for Ethiopia has answered the call.We believe that you can ensure,that your economic growth continues,-that soil, water and forests resources are managed wellto the benefit of the Ethiopian people. And that you can do this without net increase of emissions.

Achieving your national goals means a lot in thefight against global climate change. It means a lot for the people depending on Ethiopia's forest- and land resources", said H.E Tine Sundtoft, the Minister of Climate and Environment. Ethiopia's CRGE strategy could give reductions at the scale of 4-5 times Norway's total annual greenhouse gas emissions. This is a significant contribution to fightglobal warming. At the same time the strategy will help to protect large natural areas with significant biodiversity and of great importance to national food security."Ethiopia also has the equally important goal of securing economic growth. We do believe Ethiopia can combine landscapemanagement and forest protection with continued solid economic growth.Our government is a strong advocate for rewarding results. We will increase our focus on rewarding countries that can document emission reductions. Very simple: you deliver, we pay". A true partnership, said Tine Sundtoft, Minister of Climate and Environment.

The REDD+ cooperation with Ethiopia is important for Norway. Norway is encouraged by the progress and results so far. Ethiopia has met the expectations of both countries for 2013. Norway has therefore decided that the results payment for 2013 shall be set at NOK 30 million (approximately USD 5 million). Another 5 million USD will be paid if Ethiopia in 2014 delivers the results both countries have agreed. Norway supports plans for a large landscape pilot REDD in Oromia. This will be a significant contribution to reducing emissions from deforestation and protect important remaining forests. These efforts will also rehabilitate important natural areas, enhance food security and contribute to carbon sequestration. Norway has decided to invest up to USD 50 million in this pilot, channeled through the World Bank BioCarbon fund and based on verified emissions reductions. The Minister was accompanied by high leveladvisors from the Ministry of Climate and Environment Mr. Jens Frølich Holte, Political Advisor; Mr. Jon Berg, communication Director and Mr.

Øyvind Dahl, Senior Advisor. (Text ends)

OPPOSITION POLITICS: Main opposition leader Detained in Yemen'

ER (June 24, 2014) Yemen detained Andargachew Tsige, Ginbot 7 Secretary, ESAT reported in a breaking news coverage. Citing official statement issued by Ginbot 7, ESAT indicated that Andargachew was detained by Yemen Security on June 23,2014. Effort by Ginbot 7 to securethe release of Andargachew Tsige was not a success. Also, the report indicated that Ato Andargachew was on transit to a third country,unnamed, via Yemen. Ginbot 7 asserted that there is no legal basis for Yemen authorities to detain Andargachew and has requested Yemen not to handover Andargachew Tsige to Ethiopian government.

Ginbot 7 Movement for Justice, Democracy and Freedom was formed in 2008, following the release of opposition party leaders from many monthsof imprisonment after government crackdown on registered opposition parties in Ethiopia. The ruling party in Ethiopia legislated law to outlaw *themovement*and the movement is considered as a "terrorist" organization. ifYemen hands over Andargachew to Ethiopian government, there is no question that Andargachew's life would be in danger. There are indicationsthat security operations overseas. And it is possible that it might have corrupted Yemen security forces for this particular arrest. A few months ago Ethiopian government apparently employed some members of Kenyansecurity forces to kidnap two members of delegation of ONLF who were in Nairobi to negotiate with Ethiopian government delegates with theinvitation of Kenyan government.

Over 700m Eth. Birr worth water project fails to finalise in Harrar'

ESAT News (June 26, 2014) - Information obtained from the Harrari Region's Water Development Office, several water projects worth 747, 175, 000 birr have failed forcing the local population to live water desperate. A magazine prepared for the launching of the Haseliso Line, "Safe water in rotation has been left back (Weha Befereka Dero Kere)", onits July 2012 issue had stated that states that most of the local areas and countries of the region are availing water services 24 hours a day following the completion of the water boreholes. The magazine also attests that from now on, the issue of water shortage would no more serve to be a canvassing issues for 'anti-peace elements'. The Haseliso Water project was expected to feed over 350,000 people for 30 years.

However, the failure of this same project led Harar to be water scarce cityagain. Seven other water projects are held up due to border conflicts.

Insiders believe the projects failed and stopped due to "corruption." Chinese, Holland, French and Indian companies were involved in the project. Following the completion of the project, the Regional Water and Sanitation Authority had increased the water tariff by 100 percent.

Residents are buying 20 litters of water for 10 birr. Another project worth800 million birr has also been stopped due to conflict over 'sharing'. The cost of Haseliso water boreholes was fully covered by the Harrari region but since the Dire Dawa and Oromia regions insisted that they will not allow the digging unless shared, they had been given share of the water.(Text ends)

CHARITY: Marcus Samuelsson to host charity event'By Jahsh Durrant (June 27, 2014)

INTELLIGENCE: Ruling EPRDF Is In Panic Of Islamist Attacks’ (June 28, 2014) - Since Al Shabaab’s attack in Djibouti on 24 May,

Western embassies and the local authorities have tightened security measures to protect against it happening again. On 12 June 2014, the UKForeign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) warned that there is a high threat from terrorism. The Ethiopian government is worried as the holy month of Ramadan Major hotels the Sheraton will still have their regular clientele, but stringent protection measu...res such as searching cars, scanning people and private guards. Security has also been stepped up atthe airport and the banks. The Ethiopian authorities, for their part, do notwant to give in to panic but have nevertheless stepped up security in public places, such as administrations, hotels and shopping malls. The western embassies, for their part, consider the risk of an attack is high.

The French consular services in Addis Ababa issued a warning to theircitizens on 12 June to “be vigilant in public places, particularly where World Cup football matches are screened”.

Misled Eritreans into providing their serves to the regime - At he risk of antagonising themselves with Ethiopians’ (VIEW POINT) Eritrea is an independent country after it separated in de-jure from Ethiopia in April, 1993 and Eritreans considered as foreigners in Ethiopia. Even though technically they are treated as friendly people the fact that they termed asforeigners is set to remain until any possible future change comes into effect to affect that in any way. Our cooperation as people-to-people andsense of togetherness can only last when we bear and display respect foreach other which we would not do in any other better way than making conscious efforts to stay away from involving in each other's affairs, politically. Our future friendliness and cooperation in any capacity hingesvery much on the good will between our people towards each other. Thatis what we have to guard jealously lest we will risk remaining apart looking at each other suspiciously which none of us really wish for.

Among the more than 70 thousand Eritreans deported from Ethiopia at theheight of the war in 1998. I listened with shock and pain when she narrated to me how she and three others had to walk for 11 days (yes eleven days) on foot back to Ethiopia along the shores of the Red Sea via Djibouti immediately after their deportation. Among the four poor souls who set out including her, only two (herself and another one) made to Ethiopia while two others perished on the way - one blown off by the explosives he run on, the other simply collapsed to his death unable to stand the ordeals of the trek in the near boiling temperature along the Sea. Even their body could not have a decent burial as the ones who remained alive had neither the energy nor the means to give a treat of burial to their friends' bodies.

After the bloody war of the 1998-2000 between the two countries that claimed the lives of tens of thousands of young people from both sides and remained technically unfinished, hardly any one would expect Eritreans to turn to Ethiopia as a place of refuge. But they do so with confidence in the enduring friendliness between the two people. We all remember how Ethiopians were seen secretly handing water and food or anything they could to Eritreans at the time they were declared persona non grata who were meant to be hunted down for deportation to Eritrea during the war. I have my concern as do many Ethiopians that this good will and unconditional love between the two people is set to suffer if Eritreans fail to stay away from taking sides in Ethiopian politics in any way while they are on the ground there. Nothing lasts forever especially ifsubjected to misuse and abuse.

Yet, one may say such verbal slights count for nothing compared to how our people get humiliated in the Middle East, perish in high seas far from home, held and tortured in the Sinai Desert for ransom or subjected to gruesome mutilations in the bid to harvest their body organs. You offer your help to the devil with every risk to your soul. Given how TPLF/EPDRFis known for deceiving, misleading and using people towards achieving their own selfish political goals at any cost, it would not come as a surprise if Eritrean refugees come handy to be used this time round. No one can deny that unitary Eritreans themselves have done their part to reunify Eritrea with it's motherland, Ethiopia in the early fifties.

Ethiopia isa very vast country, of course, Ethiopians are proud to share the immense resource and potential they have for the Eritrean brothers whos were partof our territory in yesteryears in times of need as in the past. (Text ends)

POLITICS: Ethiopia, Eypt agree on ‘new chapter’ in ties’By Ramadan Al Sherbini, Gulf News (June 28, 2014)

Egypt President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi talks to Ethiopia's Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn as both arrived to attend the 23rd African UnionSummit (AUS) in Malabo, Equatorial Guinea.

CAIRO - Addis Ababa has pledged to Egypt that Ethiopia’s construction ofa controversial dam, which has strained ties between the two African countries, will not “harm Egyptian water interests”, the official news agency (Mena) reported Friday. The pledge came at landmark talks held Thursday between Egyptian President Abdul Fattah Al Sissi and EthiopianPrime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn on the sidelines of an African summit due in Equatorial Guinea. The two leaders agreed on opening a “new chapter” in both countries’ ties based on “frankness, joint understanding and cooperation”, MENA said, quoting Egyptian Foreign Minister Sameh Shoukri. Shoukri and his Ethiopian counterpart Tedros Adhanom announced Friday in Malabo, the capital of Equatorial Guinea, that Egypt has pledged to pursue “constructive dialogue” with Ethiopia that heeds the later’s development needs, according to the agency. Al-Sissi and Desalegn also agreed to co-chair a bilateral cooperation commission to address all aspects of Egyptian-Ethiopian links, in a fresh sign of defusing tensions that have marred the two countries’ relations formore than a year. Earlier this month, Al Sissi said in an inaugural speech that he would not allow the dispute over Ethiopia’s hydraulic dam being constructed on the Nile to “cause a crisis” between both countries or affectinter-African cooperation. The Cairo-Addis Ababa ties deteriorated last year when Egypt’s then Islamist president Mohammad Mursi and other politicians threatened in a meeting, broadcast live on air, to bomb Ethiopiaover its building of the $6.4 billion Renaissance Dam. Last July, Al Sissi led the army’s ouster of Mursi following enormous street protests against his troubled one-year rule.

The Ethiopian dam has triggered wide fears in Egypt, which heavily relieson the Nile to cover water needs of its population of 85 million people.

Egypt’s annual quota of the Nile waters is estimated at 55.5 billion cubic metres. Water sharing among the 10 Nile Basin countries is regulated under a colonial-era treaty. Some Nile Basin countries have said the treatyis unfair. Ethiopia has been urging the riparian countries to ratify the Comprehensive Framework Agreement to replace the 1959 treaty that gives Egypt and Sudan the share’s lion of the Nile waters. Six countries have already signed the 2010 pact amid Egyptian protests. Al Sissi was Friday due to make a short visit Sudan, another Nile country that shares border with Egypt, state television reported. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA: Harar The city of beer and mosques’

(BBC) Ethiopia’s historic city of Harar is one of Islam’s holiest centres – but in recent times it has built up another tradition and is now also knownfor its brewery. As holy cities go, Harar is a colourful one. Inside the wallsof the old town I find buildings in greens, purples and yellows – its womenseem to take this as a challenge, dressing in veils and robes of shocking pink and the brightest orange. Harar lies far in the east of Ethiopia, with aroad that rises out of the town in the direction of Somaliland. The mighty Muslim leader Ahmed The Left-Handed led some fierce campaigns from here in the 16th Century.

On its narrow streets I meet goats, old men collapsed from chewing the narcotic khat and a young boy who stops to knock a football back and forth with me for a few minutes. Off the main square, tailors sit in front offabric shops ready to run up alterations. Binyam, slotted behind his sewing machine, does a small tailoring job for me, recounting his Greek ancestry and the provenance of his sewing machine – a gift, he says proudly, which would cost you thousands in the local currency. He warns me off sellers of bad bananas and nearby thieves.

I’ve come to find the city’s brewery, which is what it’s known for – beyondits holy credentials. For three decades now it’s turned out Harar beer, its bottles carrying a label that depicts the old city’s famous gates. Outside these gates a tuk tuk taxi driver knows where to find the birra fabrica – the beer factory – and we set off, away from the old city, putt-putting slowly up a hill. The brewery entrance is flanked on one side by a sign prohibiting firearms and, on the other, by an enormous beer bottle – perhaps meant to remind you why you can’t bring in your gun: here be alcohol.

The giant bottle is four times the height of a man. I know this because there’s a man in front of it, a security guard who’s delighted to have a visitor. He’s not quite standing to attention, but the huge beer bottle doesloom behind him a little like the guardhouse of one of the Queen’s Guardsin London. Inside the grounds, green beer crates frame the horizon, with a green mosque in the distance. Underfoot there are disused rail tracks.

The net on a tennis court looks like it’s in working order though and in a rusty-looking playground a man is watching his young boy on a swing. The sleepy air around the grounds is deceptive. This brewery was sold offto the Heineken group by the government three years ago. The company says it plans to invest in the plant, wants to improve the manufacturing processes, bring in its know-how and start sourcing more material locally,either inside Ethiopia or in the region.

It’s taken over another brewery at Bedele farther west, and is building athird close to the capital. Many foreign companies point to cheap labourand helpful export tariffs as reasons for investing and the country’s just been given a grade by the credit rating agencies for the first time. Industrial parks have popped into view whenever I've travelled out on thearteries away from the capital, Addis Ababa. Unilever, General Electric, GlaxoSmithKline, H&M, Tesco, Walmart, Samsung – they're all either in Ethiopia or thinking about it. The Chinese are here too, turning out thousands of shoes daily for example, just south of the capital, for major international brands.

For Heineken, one of the motivations is a national market, beyond the grounds of the brewery, which can get a lot bigger – beer consumption in Ethiopia, it says, is only a third of what it is in neighbouring Kenya. In theinterests of research I stop in the brewery's clubhouse and order a beer. The women in the kitchen are amused at my intrusion. It's a public holiday and quiet, although people are moving tables and chairs and I suspect things might get going later on. There's a healthy-looking trophy cabinet beside my table, filled perhaps with trophies won by the brewery'sfootball team.

It competes in Ethiopia's premier league although it's sitting near the bottom of the table when I visit, with relegation threatening. Back at the walls of the holy city, people in the market are oblivious to the brewery and to big business. For them the only drug worth trading is khat. Outsidemy window two formidable-looking women have spread out their bags of khat leaves. A beggar, badly crippled, hauls himself over to them.

Moments ago they were screaming venom at a young man – a drug dealof sorts had gone bad it seems. Now however they slip some leaves discreetly to the beggar, their way of giving alms, on the edge of the sacred town. (Text ends)

Yemen detained Ethiopian Opposition Ginbot-7 Secretary'Daniel Berhane, HornAffairs (June 30, 2014) (News Analysis) - Second-in-command of Ginbot 7 (designated as terroristgroup by Ethiopian government), is in detention in Yemen. The group threatened to retaliate "in any way and at any place". Ginbot-7 has been described as a group aiming at a violent regime-change in Ethiopia by the US state department. It is designated as terrorist by Addis Ababa and the regional inter-governmental body, IGAD. Andargachew Tsegie, second-in- command of the organization, is in detention in Yemen, according to the statement on the organization's official website. Yemeni security officials detained Andaregachew Tsegie on Monday June 23 when his flightarrived at Sana'a international airport on transit. It was not immediately clear where Andargachew Tsegie was heading. The group's statement indicated that Andargachew Tsigie was travelling by Yemenia Airways, butdidn't disclose the origin or destination of the flight.

In a recording of Ginbot 7′s internal meeting, leaked last June 2013, thegroup's leader Berhanu Nega was heard speaking of a half a million US dollar financial aid he received from the Eritrean government. Some speculate that the source of that money was Qatar, which is one of the few remaining allies of the Eritrean regime and also infamous for financingspoilers in the mid-east and Africa. And, that Andargachew Tsigie might have been en route from Asmara, the Eritrean capital, to Doha, Qatar.

However, others dismissed it, citing the recent rapprochement betweenAddis Ababa and Doha. It is not clear whether Ethiopia and Yemen havean extradition treaty.

However, the two nations signed, last May, “a number of agreements andprotocols of bilateral cooperation in trade, investment, higher education and standards and specifications”, according to media reports. The event was taken as a signal of a resumption of the long-standing bonds established by Ethiopia’s late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi and Yemeni former President Salah. Yemeni officials also hope to import electricity from Ethiopia. Ginbot 7 disclosed that its week-long effort to get Andargachew Tsegie released bore no fruit. The group’s statement also threatened that there will be consequences if Yemen extradites Andargchew Tsegie to Ethiopia. The group said: “We will retaliate in any way and at anyplace for any harm on the body, sprit and life of Andargachew Tsigie”.

ETHIOPIAN FOOD: History of traditional foods & beverages In Ethiopia’

The word letenachin means, the Amharic equivalent “to our health,” or“Cheers”

(July 1, 2014) The ancient people of pre-Aksumite, pre-Christian cultureslike Punt and D'MT left no records of what they ate, and what we know ofthese cultures comes mostly from the writings of the more advanced cultures that encountered them.

By the first or second millennium B.C., they ate sorghum, wheat, barley and possibly teff, along with many other grains, vegetables and pulses (lentils, peas, fava beans, chick peas and more). But the scholars disagreeon when Ethiopians began to cultivate each of these crops and, in some cases, how they got to Ethiopia.

Some argue that ancient Ethiopians discovered agriculture on their own;others say they learned it through contact with Egypt and the Arabian peninsula. All we know for sure is that Ethiopians have long cultivated certain things - teff, enset, gesho - that no other culture has cultivated, which strongly points to Ethiopian origins. Whether they did it without help, or learned to farm from others, may never finally be known.

The people of ancient Ethiopia certainly grew things collectively and ate them. The question is what they grew, when they started growing it, andthe form in which they ate what they grew. Did these early Ethiopians leave behind any traces of their first recipe books?

Ethiopians have a few traditional alcohol drinks that go back thousands ofyears, and different cultures across Ethiopia use fermented honey and grains in different ways to create the diverse culture's potent potables.

There's also a thriving commercial alcohol industry that makes andexports beer, wine and liquor.

The drink most widely known around the world is t'ej, the ancient mead,and perhaps the most ubiquitous drink in Ethiopia itself is t'alla, a traditional beer. Most people make these at home, but a few wineries in Ethiopia.

Let's take a look at some of the most common homemade alcoholic drinksin Ethiopia, followed by a look at commercially made wines, beers and liquors. Many of these beverages have been widely studied by Ethiopian scientists, and these notes merely offer an introduction.

T'ej. Nobody can document for certain when Ethiopians began to make t'ej. We know that gesho, the species of buckthorn that provokes fermentation and adds flavor, is native to Ethiopia, and that excavations at Aksum – the ancient culture of northern Ethiopia and southern Eritrea –have found remnants of gesho and writing that mentions honey wine in the third century A.D. This confirms that t'ej is at least nearly 2,000 years old. This earliest written record of t'ej was found in 1962 by the Dutch archaeologist A.J. Drewes when he translated some writing in stone, whichhe dates to the middle of the third century A.D.

Accounts from as early as the 16th Century, when European exploration ofEthiopia began in earnest, copiously document the presence of this specialhoney wine. These historic chronicles offer many sweet tidbits about t'ej: its production and consumption, and its place in Ethiopian society. Once a drink of emperors and kings, it's now enjoyed by anyone who can afford the honey and gesho to make it. Some cultures in Ethiopia even use t'ej as a sort of sacramental wine in their religious practices, with the task of making it falling on a young man in the community.

T'ej is easy to make at home, and I've created a tutorial about how to doit. I've also created a separate website with a lot more information aboutt'ej. In Ethiopia, you'll often drink t'ej at a t'ej bet ("house"), a bar that specializes in the popular drink.

Ethiopians drink t'ej from a berele, a flask-like vessel with a round bottomand a long neck with a hole at the top. This allows you to put your thumb over the hole when you're not drinking to keep insects from getting into your sweet liquid. The berele seems to be only several hundred years old in the culture, and before that, Ethiopians drank from cow horns. Some isolated cultures in Ethiopia still do this today.

And by the way, "honey wine" has many different names in the 90 or so languages spoken across Ethiopia. T'ej is merely the name in Amharic: It's mes in Tigrinya and daadii in Afaan Oromo. Many of these meads are made the same way, but from culture to culture, you may find gesho replaced by different fermenting and flavoring agents. For example, theMajangir people call their honey wine ogool and use the bark of the mange tree rather than gesho.

T'alla. This is the Amharic name for homemade local beer, called 'farsoo'in Afaan Oromiffa oand sewa (or suwa) in Tigrigna. But it's not like any beer you're likely to find in America, even the stuff you might make in your basement.
A 'local t'alla bet' in Ethiopia: You make t'alla by blending water with barley flour, wheat "berries" (whole wheat kernels), and gesho leaves or powder, as opposed to the gesho sticks and branches used for t'ej. You put the gesho into water for several days, put the wheat berries into a different container of water for several days and let them sprout, bake thesprouting berries until they get a bit crispy, add the wheat berries to the water with the gesho, turn the barley flour into a batter, bake it until it begins to dry a little, crumble it up, add it to the other stuff in the liquid, and then, hope it ferments and turns into beer.
In his 1991 study of t'alla, the Ethiopian researcher Samuel Sahla says that "every housewife has her own version of the recipe." Women will clean the fermentation vats with the leaves of the grawa plant (Vernonia amygdalina) and smoke the vats with weira (the wood of olive trees, Ofeeeuropaea). Fermentation happens in several stages, Samuel found, takinga new direction each time you add more ingredients, and finally reaching an alcohol content of between 2 and 8 percent. "The color of t'alla is determined by the housewife preparing it," he writes, and the process takes between five and 15 days.
Making t'alla is almost exclusively the responsibility of women in Ethiopianhomes and villages. An Ethiopian woman can sometimes make income from selling her t'alla and even own and operate a t'alla bet (just like the t'ej bet, only for t'alla). A pole with a can or other object on top indicates the presence of such a place. Kerari is a milder type of t'alla, made by adding water at the end of the fermentation process. Ethiopians might let their children drink kerari before they're old enough for the stronger stuff.
"t'alla & Katikala alcoholic drinks were previously prepared for home- based drinks and to colorfully celebrate cultural holidays," he writes, "but the current economic hardship together with other factors forced women to use it as a commercial item. Most of the operators are in the productiveage groups, illiterate, migrants and were housewives." They go into this line of work, he found, because of economic need, divorce, lack of education and widowhood.
The different cultures of Ethiopia all have their own names for their fermented beer-like beverages, many of which resemble t'alla with their thick, foamy, beer-like qualities. The alcohol content of these drinks is often very low, sometimes only fermenting overnight, and some culturesuse them as food because of the grains that go into making them. Borde, for example, is “an opaque, effervescent, whitish-grey to brown- colored beverage with a thick consistency and sweet-sour taste,” writes the researcher Kebede Abegaz, describing what sounds a lot like t’alla, asdoes his recipe, which includes a variety of grains, as well as grawa and weira.

Shameta, too, begins with roasted barley, some linseed oil, a few spicesand water. The people of the Begemder region call their beer-like drink korefe.

Katikala: You might call this the Ethiopian vodka: It’s clear, and it goes well with a mixer – although Ethiopians will happily drink it straight up. It’s made with largely the same ingredients as t’alla: water, gesho, germinated barley or wheat berries, and a meal or batter of some type ofgrain. But unlike t’alla, this is distilled, so it’s essentially a grain alcohol.

“In the villages,” wrote the scholar Ruth Selinus in 1971, “distillation is carried out with primitive equipment made of gourds and wood. Katikala isbrewed in rural and semi-urban areas and is used by more commonly by farmers and semi-urban dwellers than by people who live in the cities. In cities, those who drink katikala are predominantly lower-class people or those who have become dependent upon alcohol and cannot afford to buy industrially produced alcohol.”

Endalew Addis wrote a 2007 dissertation on katikala in Ethiopia, finding that “katikala production and consumption has both benefits and problems. Some of the benefits are income generating and employmentcreation. On the other hand, katikala production has problems such as health problems mainly due to indoor air pollution, and poor educationalperformance of students or school drop out because of time competitionand high labor demand. It was also found that katikala consumption hasbenefits to colorfully celebrate cultural festivals, and problems such as poverty, unemployment, family disorganization, and crimes and accidents.”

Other studies have found that distilling katikala in traditional ways, using wood-fueled stoves, exposes both people and the environment to harmfulbyproducts. Using wood to make katikala also contributes to the ongoing depletion of Ethiopian forests.

Commercial distilleries in Ethiopia don’t make katikala, so good luck finding any outside of Ethiopia – unless you live in Germany. WilhelmineStordiau of Frankfurt makes three varieties of Begena Tedj, which she sells in Europe and Canada, and she recently brought a katikala to market, the first such product I can find in the western world. Her katilakais 42 percent alcohol, thus 84 proof.

Araqe. Once again we have an alcohol made with water, grains and gesholeaf or powder (just like the gesho in t'alla). But with araqe, you add various flavoring agents, and you end up with, more or less, an Ethiopianouzo. In fact, most Ethiopians will use the name katikala and araqe interchangeable. The difference is the flavoring – and also the fact that several distilleries bottle araqe for commercial sale. With katikala, it's always homebrew. Put another way: All araqe is katikala, but not all katikala is araqe.

The scholar Jon Abbink, in the Encyclopaedia Aethiopica, says that "thedistillation process, yielding strong liquors like areqe, is a recent innovation, probably imported from abroad, or copied from resident Greeks or Armenians, during Menilek II's reign." That put it around thelate 19th and early 20th centuries.

Yeraswork Admassie and Yezana Amdework confirm this, and much more,in their 2010 book "The Aräqe Dilemma", which explores the production, marketing and consumption of traditional distilled alcohol in Ethiopia. Theysay that araqe "is a ubiquitous feature of present-day Ethiopian society" and "more than the alcoholic drink of choice for people living in rural and small towns of Ethiopia [because] its popularity is on the rise even in the big towns and cities."

Fresh from the home distillery, araqe is "pure spirit with a neutral taste and clear, colorless appearance," the authors say. "Only when laced withflavoring and coloring compounds such as gibt'o, kosso flower and honey − before, during or after distillation – does it acquire a variety of positivetastes." Gibt'o is the Amharic word for a flowering plant we call the whitelupin, and kosso is a leaf that Ethiopians chew to kill out tapeworms.

Ethiopians roast the gibt'o seeds to remove the bitterness and then use them to flavor their araqe. They also might roast the gibt'o and eat themas a snack with alcoholic drinks, and some cultures even use gibt'o to make shiro. At restaurants where they serve araqe, you might find it flavored with coffee, milk, mint or lemon, among other things.

The alcohol content of araqe differs, of course, based upon who makes itand how long the maker lets it ferment and distill. It's often around 30 percent, but some people will distill their araqe a second time, producingdagim araqe. It has a higher alcohol content, sometimes as high as 50 percent or more.

Although Ethiopians make araqe in traditional ways at home, some commercial distilleries have brought it to market. Pictured above, on the right, is a bottle of a brand from the Ethiopian liquor manufacturer National: In English, the bottle calls it "Double Ouzo," but the Amharic above that says "double araqe." The liquor has the aroma of anise, which is used to flavor traditional ouzo, but the bottle doesn't list the liquor's flavoring agents. It's 43 percent alcohol, thus 86 proof. You can click the image of the bottle to get a closer look: The label pictures two moose, andin Ethiopia, this araqe is nicknamed enat ena lij – that is, "mother and child." National makes about a dozen kinds of alcohol – including gin, brandy, and flavored liquors – and recently expanded its nearly century- old Addis Ababa facility.

Breweries, all very competitive these days, dominate the beer market: St.George (4.5 percent alcohol by volume), Castel (5 percent abv) and Bati (4.5 percent abv) brands (all under BGI Ethiopia), so it can trace its origins (before many corporate mergers) back to 1922, when St. George appeared.

Meta Abo Brewery, founded in 1963, and now owned by the British company Diageo (which makes Johnnie Walker and Captain Morgan), produces the well-established Meta (5 percent abv), on the market since1967.

Harar Brewery, launched in 1984, and now owned by Heineken, makesHarar (4.25 percent abv), Hakim Stout (5.8 percent abv), and the non-alcoholic Harar Sofi.

Bedele Brewery has made Bedele and Bedele Special (4.25 to 4.5 percentabv) since its founding in 1993.

Dashen Brewery (4.5 percent abv) The country's youngest beer, arrived in2000, and it's made in Gondar, the country's capital for more than 200 years until the mid-19th Century.

BGI and its products hold 42 percent of the market share, according to a recent sector report, with the newest brewer, Dashen, coming in second at 21 percent. "Despite a sharp increase in recent years," the report says,"per capita beer consumption in Ethiopia is still only a fraction of the levelseen in neighboring African countries." The average is four liters per person, compared with 59 liters per person in South Africa. This is no doubt because Ethiopians have such a long tradition of making and drinking homemade beverages like t'ej and t'alla. Still, the growth of the Ethiopian beer industry has been good for barley farmers, who have seenprices rise for their harvests.

Alcoholic Liquors made by National, an Ethiopian company: The Ethiopiancommercial wine industry is – at least for now – pretty much all in the hands of Awash Wineries, a company founded in 1943 and owned by the government for many years until it went private in 2013. The new ownersare two companies: Blue Nile, which is Ethiopian, and 8 Miles, a private European investment firm that focuses on helping Africa and whose chairman of the board is the charitable musician Bob Geldof. Awash makes most of the Ethiopian wines you'll find in restaurants around the U.S.: the dry red wine Gouder, probably the best bet for American palates; the semi-dry (or semi-sweet) reds, Dukam and Axumit; and twowhite wines, the dry Awash Crystal and the medium dry Kemila. They're all around 11.5 percent alcohol.

In 2008, the French company Castel bought some land south of Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital, imported vines from Bordeaux, and began aninitiative to produce some new brands of Ethiopian-made wines. The company uses Merlot, Cabernet Sauvignon and Syrah grapes for its red wines and Chardonnay for white wines. Castel began marketing two lines of wine this year: Rift Valley Cuvee and Acacia Cuvee Prestige. The Rift Valley line will offer a Syrah, a Merlot, a Cabernet Sauvignon and a Chardonnay. The Acacia line will offer a dry red, a medium sweet red and a medium sweet white. The company plans to export about half of its product and to sell the rest domestically.

At least two brands of commercial t'ej exist today in Ethiopia: Nigest ("Queen") Honey Wine, made by Awash Winery; and Tizeta ("Memory")Tej, produced by an Ethiopian man who lived in Canada and returned home to begin his winemaking enterprise. (Text ends) migrant-rights.org (July 1, 2014) - Kuwait's low-income migrants enduredaily discrimination but local media and authorities tend to particularly criminalize Ethiopian domestic workers. The March 2014 murder of a Kuwaiti woman by an Ethiopian domestic worker most recently inflamed rhetoric against Ethiopian migrants and incited national panic against domestic workers; state officials and local media fueled racist hysteria inthe aftermath of the murder, a response typical to any kind of crime committed by Ethiopians and domestic workers. The same race-based 'explanations,' of violence are recycled following every incident, conveniently shifting accountability away from recruitment practices or employment conditions. Instead, fictitious cultural practices or inherent characteristics and behaviors are cited to justify expanding control over workers and minimizing their rights. A number of fear-mongering tropesprevalent in Kuwaiti media and elite narratives, particularly following crimes committed by Ethiopian domestic workers, include:

"Sorcerers for Virgin Women!": Shortly after the murder of his daughter, Kuwaiti official Humood Flatih spoke to a conference organized by the al- Awqaf ministry entitled "The National Project to Spread Awareness amongNewly-Arrived Domestic Workers." Flatih mentioned that his daughter waskind to the worker and "had bought her a phone card the day before the incident to help her call her family." He claimed she was killed because thedomestic worker held "abnormal religious beliefs that demand her to sacrifice a virgin woman on a certain day." He requested the government mandate psychological evaluations for domestic workers prior torecruitment.

Though it's impossible to speculate about the specific circumstances of this case, it's necessary to highlight the strong *influence of working conditions on the behavior or actions of domestic workers.*Kuwaitis oftenexpress concern about the mental wellbeing of workers prior to recruitment, refusing to acknowledge the psychological harm that occursbecause of distance from family members, constrained communication with family, general isolation in the employers' house, as well as actual psychological or physical abuse. Displacing accountability for the treatment of domestic workers is detrimental to both workers and employers.

In a panel organized by al-Anba'a newspaper, Major General Mustafa Juma'a called on Kuwaiti households to respect their housemaids by paying them on time and treating them well. He also suggested mandatory pre-employment training programs. But Juma'a then advised Kuwaiti families to install cameras in their houses to monitor the behaviour of domestic workers at home, unnecessarily stoking employers'anxieties and inviting invasions of workers' right to privacy. He furthermore argued that deportation procedures need to be rushed to penalize workers and serve as a warning Juma'a and other panel participants exemplify the elite voices who fuel the ongoing national-panicagainst domestic workers.

"Criminals in the Home": In a typical attempt to externalize societal ills, Kuwait university professor and head of the Family Center for Counseling Amthal al-Huwaila claimed crimes in Kuwait are "as old as the migrant population." Al-Huwaila blamed all crimes on a "cultural crisis happening inside the family" after the arrival of a foreign worker to the household. Al-Huwaila furthermore argued the cause of domestic workers' crimes canbe "genetic, temporary, or caused by the surrounding environment," in addition to "feelings of hate and envy" towards Kuwaitis' wealth and comfort. The professor of psychology suggested the creation of shared database between GCC countries to help fight migrant crimes, "as some leave a country, change their passports, and head to another GCC country." Al-Huwaila warned Kuwaiti mothers as she had witnessed "casesof Kuwaiti kids mumbling words in a foreign language and it turned out the kid was imitating their Filipina housemaid. There are also cases of Kuwaiti men who refuse marrying other than Filipina women because theywere raised by Filipina housemaids."

Al-Huwaila's claims reflect the tendency to blame migrant workers for their mere existence, for filling demands in Kuwait's economy. Authoritiesalso scapegoat migrants to absolve themselves of accountability for crimeand employment rates, maneuvering this propaganda to justify mass detentions and deportations.

“Ban and Deport the Psychopaths!”: At the same panel, parliament member Mohammed Tana blamed domestic worker crimes on recruitment agencies that “are run by Asian expats.” Tana demanded that Kuwaitis take over these agencies because the position requires “a patriotic sense of responsibility.” Popular narratives hold that absconded workers conspirewith agencies to fleece employers of their investments. These accusations fail to acknowledge that agencies are more likely to swindle migrant workers, who have fewer legal protections and much less access to redress than Kuwaiti employers. The politician also demanded that migrant workers take mental and physical tests on a regular basis; he cited the case of 400 Ethiopians in Kuwait’s Psychological Medicine Hospital whom “the state takes care of until their sponsors deport them or sell them to other sponsors.“ It’s important to recognize the popularityof regularly psychological evaluations for workers, whilst the notion of regular monitoring of workers conditions, even through meetings with embassy representatives, is widely ridiculed. Tana added “[he] heard thatsome Ethiopian tribes kill virgin women as a sacrifice, so we need to ban Ethiopians to completely solve this problem.”
“Hang them all!”: Lawyer and feminist activist Kawthar al-Joa’an claimed these workers “come from poor and far villages, from ignorant societies, to an opened-up society.” She also blamed Kuwaiti embassies for failing toreport on the ‘kind’ of workers brought to Kuwait. Similarly, young Kuwaiti columnist Abdulaziz al-Essa held in his article “Killers in our Homes” that domestic workers are mostly well-treated by Kuwaiti families and that workers who committed murders “would be hung in Naif Square, instead of leaving them eating in Kuwaiti jails.”
A TV interview widely circulated in Kuwait featured an Ethiopian-Kuwaiti woman who spoke against Ethiopian domestic workers. The naturalized woman called “Um Muhammad” is married to a Kuwaiti man. She warned Kuwaitis from recruiting Ethiopians domestic workers because they are notobedient and practice witchcraft. Seeming to have internalized myths of Arab superiority, Um Muhammad claimed Ethiopian domestic workers are tempered and that she herself learned from Kuwaitis how to control her temper.
These narratives also reflect the state’s wider approach to migrant workers, which regularly fails to individually adjudicate migrant cases,instead arbitrarily detaining or summarily deporting migrants en-masse; In March, Kuwait banned the recruitment of all Ethiopian workersand deported more than 13,000 domestic workers within few days.
Several politicians also called for a boycott of Ethiopian domestic workers,and many workers were consequently ‘returned’ to recruitment agencies; an unnamed official from Kuwait’s Interior ministry stated “the popular campaign against these housemaids aims to get the ministry to get rid of these workers by deporting them and not renewing their residencies.”

Counter-Narratives: Although positive voices are often marginalized, thereare a number of Kuwaitis working to counter racist narratives on migrantsand crimes. Hassan al-Mousawi of al-Jarida newspaper challenged the logic of those demanding severe, blanket punishments. In a recent article,he wrote “there are many families who mistreat and torture their housemaids but no one demanded a collective punishment against citizens.”

Echoing these criticisms, columnist Ahmad al-Sarraf urged Kuwait should not follow in the steps of authoritarian regimes who posit collectivepunishments as legitimate solutions. He also demanded that all responsibilities pertaining to domestic workers be transferred from the ministry of interior affairs to the ministry of labor.

Head of Kuwait Psychological Medicine Hospital Adel al-Zayid also disputedallegations that depict Ethiopian domestic workers as psychologically- troubled; he held that the number of Ethiopian domestic workers serviced at the hospital is proportionate with other nationalities and added “there isno connection between crimes happening and psychological disorders. In fact, nothing proves that those who committed crimes have had psychological problems.” (Text ends)

POLITICS: Eritrea threatened to suspend Yemen Airways Flights to andfrom its territory’

ER News (July 2, 2014) Eritrean government threatened to cancel the right of Yemeni airlines to land in Eritrea unless it can issue assurances forthe safety of passengers destined to Eritrea. If Yemeni airlines can not issue positive response for this request, it will suffer from loss of revenue as a result of suspension of services to Eritrea. Yemeni airlines has been earning substantial business from Eritrean diaspora after the cancellation of services by Lufthansa. The action of Yemeni security organs in abducting an Ethiopian opposition figure holding British citizenship is also believed that it might put strains on Eritrea- Yemeni relations unless Yemeni authorities reverse their intent to extradite the abducted Ethiopianopposition figure to Ethiopia.The issue will have far reaching ramification as the abducted person is a british citizen. Have Yemeni security agents acquired a green light from British Inteligence Service(SIS) to carry out the abduction? The Ethiopian opposition figure who was using his british passport to travel to and from Eritrea is immune from any Yemeni- Ethiopian bi-lateral security agreement! According to Eritrean regime opponents, can Eritrea the land of migrant labourors of Arab states that owns no single transport airplane of its own suspend the Yemeni Airways. But Yemen has nothing to lose because the route to Asmara is not profitable. The number of Eritreans who visit Asmara has been long since dwindled even during the Summer holiday season. No one wants to visit Eritrea anymore where there is no tap water for shower nor electric power to watch descent TV program or light a mere 40 watt flashbulb. (Textends)

HISTORY: How Addis Ababa's Neighbourhoods Got Their Names?ETHIOPIA OBSERVER (July 02 2014)

Continuing our discovery of Addis Ababa through photos and stories, here is an article by Zewdu Temtime Asrat on the city's various neighbourhoodsand how some of them got their names. The article first appeared by the Addis Ababa Millennium Secretariat publication's 'Addis Ababa in the Past and its prospects in the new Millennium' (2007).

Addis Ababa boasts scores of neighbourhoods of diverse make up. The formation of its neighbourhoods commenced in 1900, more than a hundred years ago, after the construction of the Arat Kilo Gibi, the then Menelik Palace. A number of reasons and coincidences are tied with the naming of the neighbourhoods. The naming can be categorized according to chronological order and other criteria. Most of the neighbourhoods derive their names from the names of nobles who were granted plots around the palace. In this regard, Ras Mekonnen, Ras Tessema, Ras Birru,Ras Seyoum, Fitawarari Hebetegiorgis, Dejazmach Wube, Negadras Hailegorgis, Dejazmach Zewedu Abba koran and Shegole (named after Assosa's Chief Shiek Hojela) are some among others.

Dejach Wube is one of the neighbourhoods of Addis where prostitutes were highly concentrated during the Italian invasion. And as such a number of tales and poems about it abound. The poems and tales glorifyDejach Wube neighbourhood as a place of romance.

The second category of neighbourhoods includes those that are named after nations and nationalities of the country that settled in the city, coming from different corners of the country. Adere, Gofa, Wollo, Worji, Menze, and Sumale Tera may be mentioned in this regard. The founders of Worji Sefer were believed to be engaged in making leather and traditional Bernos (overcoat) while the Sumale Tera people are believed tohave opened up tea shops. Professionals and servants serving in the palace also established their own neighbourhoods and the names reflect the professional background of the founders. The names of the neighbourhoods are followed by the Amharic word 'sefer'. The following are some of them: Serategna (workers'/servants'), Zebegna (guards), Siga Bet (butchery), Kubanya (company), Tebenja Yaž (army), Gedam (monastery), Gebba (tenants), Seregela (chariot drawers) Sabi, and Weha Sinku (non-salaried infantry) are some. For instance, those people who were engaged in handicrafts and woodworks around Menelik's palace are said to have established Serategna Sefer. The main vocation of the founders of this sefer was metalwork. They used to produce house utensils, agricultural implements, and also repaired artillery. Some of the expatriates in the city are believed to have lived here, of whom the Armenian architect, Muse Minas Herbegin was one and whose wood-builtresidence still stands. Zebegna Sefer hosted guards of the palace, whereas Gebbar Sefer was formed by those taxpayers coming to the city from different regions with their honey, cereals, cattle and the like to pay taxes but finally stayed on. On the other hand, Wuha Sinku sefer founders were those members of thearmy who were not salaried. On the other hand, a significant proportion ofthe neighbourhoods of Addis were given names due to different occasions.

On the other hand, a significant proportion of the neighbourhoods of Addiswere given names due to different occasions, phenomena and historical events. Sebara Babur, Erri Bekentu, Doro Manekya, Afencho Ber, Arat Kilo, Sidist Kilo, Amest Kilo, Talian Sefer, Haya Hulet Mazoria, Shiro Meda and Nefas Silk are some of them. Sebara Babure sefer, for instance, was named after a steam roller that the Armenian Sarkis Terzian once broughtinto the country, but broke down at that spot in the neighbourhood and failed to function for many years. In contrast, Talian (Italian) sefer derivedits name after the Italian captives were settled in the area following the Ethio Italian war. The Arat Kilo village was also named due to its location at the junction of four roads.

Many neighbourhoods retained the names given by the native Oromo settlers. Gullele, Guar-dome, Kebena, Kotebe, Yeka, Gerji, Lafto and Legadadi are some of the many such neighbourhoods. Conversely, some neighbourhoods of Addis were named after the Italian invasion and duringtheir five year occupation of the country. Merkato, Piazza, Kazanchis, Popolare and Kambolojo are included here. Kazanchis was named after the acronym of an Italian construction company, KazabI.N.C.E.S. Kazanchis was reserved for higher Italian officers while Popolare was for lower officers. Cambolojo derived its name from the Italian phrase CampoAllogio Opera, worker's camp.

There are also neighbourhoods named after churches of the area. AradaGiorgis, Yoseph, Kidane Mehret, Keranyo Medhane Alem, and Kechene Medhane Alem derived their names from the nearby churches. In particular, Arada was the arena of business and culture and a number of songs and literary works were produced in its praise. After the Battle of Adowa (1896) and the Treaty of Addis Ababa later in the same year, manycountries including Italy, the major European powers and the US established diplomatic relations with Ethiopia, recognizing its sovereignty. Many countries opened up embassies in the city following in the footsteps of the above-mentioned countries. Undoubtedly, many neighbourhoods of Addis Ababa derive their names from these embassies and legations.

Locally named Ferensay Legacion (French Legation) and Rwanda Embassyare worth mentioning here.

Some neighbourhoods of Addis Ababa are also named after prominent foreign citizens. Benin village got its name from a prominent Israeli businessman, whereas Teret Sefer assumed its name from the owner of Hotel De France, the French Monsieur Teras. (Text ends)

July 8, 2014: The month of July marks 2nd anniversary of Meles Zenawi'sdeath'

This month marks the second year of Meles Zenawi's death and the attempted blatant cover up by the ruling party. When reported about his terminal illness in May and June of 2012, and his death a few weeks later,the ruling party had lied to the general public that the tyrant was on vacation and that he will return to work after the Ethiopian new year. Theruling party elites were hurling insults against others for reporting the truth. Instead of admitting the truth, are still there and continue to fabricate lies on a daily basis.

The State owned Commercial Bank of Ethiopia (CBE) to open branches inDC, UAE, South Africa and Djibouti' (AddisFortune News July 9, 2014) - The Commercial Bank of Ethiopia (CBE) is in the final stages of research into foreign markets, with the potential of opening branches in Washington DC, Dubai, South Africa and Djibouti.,As part of its vision 2025 to become a world class banker, the representatives of the bank traveled to Washington and South Africa in September, the Middle East inDecember and Djibouti three months ago, in partnership with the Ethiopian consulate offices in those countries. During this time, they helddiscussions with the Ethiopian Diaspora there, according to Ephrem Mekuriya, communications manager of the bank.

Washington, South Africa and Dubai have been selected by officials of thebank based on the large number of Ethiopians residing there. Djibouti, where the bank had its first international branch, was selected due to thescale of business transactions with the country as the major gateway to Ethiopia's international trade corridor. Its oldest international branch in Djibouti opened in the 1950s, was closed in 2004 due to the increasing amount of non-performing loans. After the closure of Djibouti branch, theCBE has managed to open and run five branches in two major cities, Jubaand Malakal – both in South Sudan – since June 2009. Now, however, thebank only has two branches in Juba, closing the others because of conflictin the new country.

According to a World Bank report, 37.5pc of Ethiopia's Diaspora live in theMiddle East and Asia, 30.7pc in North America, 21.4pc in Europe and 8.6pc in Africa. The bank's intended expansion to these regions follows rapid expansion at home, where it now has 820 branches. Its total assets have reached a little more than a quarter of a trillion Birr during the last nine months of 2013/14. This illustrates an increase of close to 30 billion Br from the same period last year. It has managed to mobilise total savings of 182 billion Br from its 7.6 million clients. The bank's clientsnumbered six million in 2012/13. The State owned Bank which has 50 Forex ATMs in operation, secured a profit before tax of 7.7 billion Br in the same nine month period. Reaching customers through its ever increasing domestic branches. The bank staff has reached 18,159 employees this year, in addition to the 410 fully operating Automated Teller Machines (ATM). It is also currently processingthe installation of an additional 200 ATMs and is currently purchasing that amount of the machines, each costing half a million Birr, including installation, according to Ephrem. (MELES ZENAWI ASRESU-TIMELINE)

(July 9, 2012) Dictator Meles Zenawi receives treatment for blood cancer'

Ethiopia's dictator Meles Zenawi has been diagnosed with blood cancer and is receiving treatment at a Belgium hospital, according to sources. Berhane Gebrekiristos and Teodros Adhanom, both close confidants of Meles Zenawi and senior members of the ruling party are currently functioning as acting prime-ministers. ESAT has reported that Meles Zenawi's appearance in the parliament has been pushed by one week, adding credibility to the report about the dictator's declining health. WhenMeles appeared at the G-20 meeting in Mexico last month he looked terribly sick and seemed to have lost a lot of weight.

(July 17, 2012) Treatment takes its toll on Meles Zenawi's body'

Sources reported that Ethiopia's dictator Meles Zenawi is too weak to receive further medical treatment. Sources said he is in Belgium, but mayreturn to Ethiopia any time. Several of his bodyguards have been observed at the hospital on Monday.

Western diplomats today have confirmed the death report that Meles is atSt. Luc Hospital in Belgium. However, they denied that he is dead, according to the UK Telegraph.

Meles Zenawi's cause of illness is said to be blood cancer, but there is a growing talk among the ruling party members and supporters that he mayhave been poisoned. The aggressive treatment he has been receiving has degraded his body and that he is in an almost vegetative condition.

Meanwhile, the dictator's much disliked wife, Azeb Mesfin, has received anItalian visa today, according to sources at Italian embassy. However, she may not be able to leave the country because of a travel ban imposed on her by security plainclothes

This afternoon, the ruling party officials told VoA that the regime will givea press conference regarding Meles Zenawi's health condition.

(July 19, 2012) Meles Zenawi is said to be dead – multiple sources'

An Ethiopian Airlines employee, who wants to remain anonymous, informed this afternoon that Ethiopia's dictator Meles Zenawi has died 4 days ago. But according to sources, his bodyguards are still at St. Luc Hospital in Belgium. If Meles is dead, what are they doing in Belgium? Is ita diversionary tactic?

When he's asked how he found out the information, the EAL employee said that he overheard it by accident on Monday from senior airline officials who are members of the ruling party. He added that he receives e-mail updates regularly and decided to contact media groups with this information after hearing Bereket Simon's interview this morning and wasoffended by what he heard.

Coupled with similar information received since Sunday from severalcredible sources, the story about the dictator's death is gaining morecredence by the day.

State propaganda chief Bereket Simon's press conference this morning raised more concerns than answers. Observers speculate that the regime could be keeping the dictator's death secret because there is a growing dissatisfaction with Meles Zenawi's choice of Birhane Guebre Kristos as hissuccessor.

(July 31, 2012) Meles Zenawi's 21-year tyrannical rule comes to ascreeching halt –Abebe Gellaw'

ESAT's decision to report that Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is dead, according to reliable sources, has never been easy. It was two weeks agothat we received the news from highly credible sources in Brussels, Belgium. Sources need to remain anonymous as they were not authorizedto speak to the media on this sensitive matter told that the International Crisis Group (ICG) concluded that Mr. Zenawi was deceased. Headquartered in Brussels, with offices around the world, ICG is the leading independent think tank on conflict prevention and resolution around the world. It was hard to ignore information from such a highly reputable international organization.

As a responsible sole diaspora media outlet, ESAT tried to investigate and verify the tip meticulously before it decided to broadcast the news. To be fair to the facts, we have also scrutinized the conflicting and contradictoryinformation coming out from the ruling clique. We have examined not onlythe statements and stories put out for public consumption by the ruling, but also their conducts that tell their own stories.

As Meles Zenawi's 21-year tyrannical rule has surely come to a screechinghalt, the TPLF proved to be a heap of mess without its chieftain. Ethiopia appeared to be leaderless and cheerless. In the absence of its head, the regime appeared to be decapitated, incapacitated, incoherent, disunited, disorganized and disoriented. This is typical of a one-man regime unlike institutionally sound democratic systems (like Ghana et-al) that cannot beeasily shaken by the death or absence of one man. Like an untrained shipcrew with no captain in sight, the ruling elite seem to be at a loss for direction in the face of a gathering storm.

Look no further than the contradictory statements being issued by the high priests of the ethnic front on the well-being and whereabouts of Mr. Meles Zenawi. While rumors are abounding on the death of the dictator, none of the officials has come out with a convincing explanation where thebig man is.

"He is resting from exhaustion… He will be back in ten days…. He is in hospital….No, he is on holiday…. He is in town…No, he is in Europe… No, no, no…he is relaxing in America…," TPLF officials confused the public in the past two weeks. But Zenawi is nowhere to be seen. He was neither in the palace nor in his rubber-stamp parliament making and unmaking laws.And yet, TPLF's creative stories change within hours and each weird story adds more fuel to wild speculations and rumors.

After the May 18th incident that became a turning-point in the tyrannical life of Mr. Zenawi, he was not seen in public for four weeks. On June 18th,he finally surfaced in Mexico City where he flew to attend a G20 meeting. Instead of quashing rumors about his well-being, the PR stunt unwittingly started a more serious discussion. He significantly lost weight and looked more like a ghost than the charismatic dictator he once seemed. The Chinese state tv, the CCTV, broadcasted his emaciated image, which was recorded during his meeting with Chinese president Hu Jintao, proved the suspicion of so many people. That was followed by a photo opportunity with Mexican president Felipe Calderon. It was another flop. He looked haggard, tired and gravely ill. The effort led by Berhane Guebrekirstos turned out to be a PR disaster.

On July 15th the newly-formed Ethiopian National Transitional Council (ENTC) issued a press release declaring the passing away of Mr. Zenawi.The news was received suspiciously. Some people questioned the motiveof ENTC to declare the death of Zenawi. In fact, those in the news mediaalso felt that ENTC should have passed the information to the media for further investigation. In any case, ENTC attracted more attention on the mysteries surrounding Zenawi's puzzling health and final destiny spurredheated debate among Ethiopians across the world.

On June 14, 2012 Meles Zenawi reportedly passed away after suffering a few weeks of agony and pains at St-Luke University Hospital in Brussels, Belgium. The news was received with mixed emotions. While most Ethiopians welcomed the departure of the brutal tyrant that has caused somuch pain and suffering on to millions of Ethiopians, the news upset the TPLF camp. “Liars! Liars! Liars!..,” cried out camp TPLF without producingany evidence to disprove the overwhelming news.

For few days, the ruling party chose to be quite. Finally, it broke its silence via the Voice of America. On July 18, Sebhat Nega, the TPLF veteran appeared on VoA Amharic service and told the apprehensive public that Meles Zenawi only suffered a minor illness. He said he was somewhere in Europe getting medical care. According to Sebhat, who waswidely believed to be the mentor of the former premier, in the absence ofZenawi the “democratic institutions” were working effectively. Until new chief of government comes back, according to him, the “deputy prime minister” is in charge. As usual, the old guard’s answers were deliberatelyvague. They raised some more questions than providing any serious answers.

Crisis communication management needs skills and some touch of professionalism. So TPLF felt the need to bring out its topmost communication expert. Unfortunately, the “expert” is the least trusted andone of the most detested members of the ruling elite. It was unwise of TPLF to send out the minister of mis-communication to convince the publicthat Zenawi is still alive and kicking.

After cancelling his appointments with journalists a couple of times, Bereket Simon, came on July 19th to meet and greet local and foreignjournalists. He was flanked by none other than Shimelis Kemal, who insisted all along that news on the grave illness of Mr. Zenawi was fabricated by the Diaspora tv ESAT. Mr. Simon said that Zenawi was exhausted after working restlessly for over twenty years. So an unnamed doctor refered him to go on to rest. Hedismissed reports that he was gravely ill. According to Mr. Simon, the big boss suffered no serious illness but exhaustion that needed a break. He assured us that he would soon be in office after enjoying his holiday. He also contradicted Mr. Sebhat Nega by saying that Zenawi is in charge of running the nation once again.. It appeared that the deputy was not the task of ruling the nation even if the boss is exhausted and took a rest.

Mr. Simon was also asked why the Prime Minister’s health and whereabouts have been shrouded in secrecy. According to the communication expert, this is something to do with the culture and the tradition of the ruling party. He explained that the ruling party since its days in the jungle, the ethnic front does not dwell on such matters. He gave little weight to rights of the public to know about the health or deathof a ruler. Mr. Simon, who was visibly nervous and sipping a glass of water quite frequently, gave inconclusive and bizarre statements that failed to convince us that Zenawi was indeed enjoying his holiday in an unknown touristic resort.

Addis Fortune is a newspaper close to the ruling elite. It is an open secret that the publisher, Tamrat Guebre-Giorgis, is a close associate of the minister of mis-communication and other officials. On June 22, it published a front page interview with a screaming headline: “Meles back in town.” The story, which the paper run as breaking news claimed: “A day after the Ethiopian government officially announced his ailment, PrimeMinster Meles Zenawi came back to Addis Abeba, according to a credible source. The Premier came back to town on Friday evening, July 20, 2012, and he is recovering well, the source revealed to Fortune.”

Fortune’s publisher also told everyone that Zenawi is expected to surprisethe public by appearing at a press conference. Apparently, the credible source feeding false information is none other than Bereket Simon, who probably thought that disinformation may work to manipulate public opinion. But the widely expected press conference where Meles Zenawi would take center stage never materialized.

Former TPLF propaganda chief and publisher of Ethiopian Reporter, AmareAregawi, is also very close to the ruling elite. He is widely believed to be aprivy to TPLF’s top guns including security chief Getachew Assefa. He too had breaking news for us. Contradicting Addis Fortune’s “big story”, he had a differed the headline: “Meles on vacation abroad”.

The story dated 25th July declared: “Following the prescribed sick leave, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi is currently on vacation outside Ethiopia, TheReporter learnt. Sources told The Reporter that Meles is enjoying the sickleave after he was ordered to take time outside office to recover from his illness resulted from “over workloads for more than three decades.” Whatwas even bizarre was the fact that Reporter told us that Zenawi was enjoying his “holiday” in the United States.

That was not the end of the story coming from officials sources. On July 28, Addis Admas, another paper whos owner and editor-in-chief was the late Assefa Gossaye linked to the ruling elite published an interview with none other than the famous TPLF veteran, Sebhat Nega. The stories keepon changing. But this time, it came to a full circle. He told the paper that Zenawi is having a speedy recovery. “Where is the Prime Minister,” askedthe journalist.

“He is in Europe,” he answered. “Where exactly in Europe?” queried thejournalist.

“I don’t know exactly ,” says Sebhat Nega, whos supposed to haveknowledge of it.

Tyrants are supposed to be seen in full control. How is it that the most visible and domineering man in the last 21 year vanishes into thin air? He is Europe, he is back in town…No, no, no…he is on holiday in the U.S. Who should the public trust? This must be one of the worst disappearancecases ever known in the history of the nation

As a journalist who tried to sift fiction from facts, Meles Zenawi is not backin town, nor is he on holiday in America. As far as concerned, sources at the ICG are more credible. Admitingly speaking that no one have not personally seen a death certificate or the dead body of Ethiopia's former dictator.

Based on the credible information we have received from Brussels, I am convinced that Meles Zenawi is dead. I do not believe that such reputable think tanks like ICG will get this wrong. For the record, ESAT never quotedICG. It quoted anonymous but credible sources working at ICG in Brussels. We are aware of ICG's Tweet.

Unlike Aigaforum and Tigraionline's claim's ICG statement does not disprove the story that Zenawi is gone. The Twit in question reads: "CrisisGroup is not in a position to speculate about the fate of PM Meles Zenawi, nor have we commented on it to date." ESAT never relied on a speculationor comment from ICG. We only had a privileged to confidential information held by ICG that conclusively claimed Zenawi was dead.

I personally challenge the TPLF high command to disprove this fact instead of fabricating conflicting and contradictory stories to convince us that he was alive and kicking. Though some TPLF officials may believe thatZenawi is a superman who can be in Addis Ababa, Europe and America at the same time most Ethiopians do no buy such a fantasy.

The Ethiopian public has a right to know the whereabouts of its ruler. Thiswill help the people of Ethiopia to make critical decisions on the future of the country. Bring Meles Zenawi out alive or in a coffin for a final farewell.Then we will stand corrected.

Whatever the case, Meles Zenawi's grip on power is over. The political dynamics has changed permanently with his long absence and the rise of competing forces for power and control. A vicious power struggle has already begun in earnest within the TPLF clique and its affiliated parties. Itis fair to say good riddance to a brutal tyrant that has tortured our peoplefor over two decades.

(August 18, 2012) Day 58 since Ethiopia's dictator Meles Zenawidisappeared'

Today it's Day 58 since Ethiopia's dictator Meles Zenawi has disappeared.

During Meles Zenawi's disappearance: The ruling party first denied the report that he is sick, but later admitted that he is getting medical treatment for exhaustion. The regime's propaganda chief Bereket Simon said Meles Zenawi will return to work before Ethiopian New Year,September 11, 2012.

Meles Zenawi's wife Azeb Mesfin, the mother of corruption, has disappeared from public view for the past 28 days since her husband isunder intensive care unit (ICU) as Birhane Guebre Kristos at his bed to date.
The TPLF nominated in un canonical way a new patriarch of the EthiopianOrthodox Church instead of Aba Guebremedhin (formerly Abune Paulos) who died from heart attack this past Wednesday.
The military chief of staff Lt. General Samora Yonus is rumored gravely ill.
The ruling party is unable to reach an agreement on who should replace Meles Zenawi, but during the past few days the U.S. is pressuring them toappoint Hailemariam Desallegn as prime minister, and that the U.S. left them with no choice if they want to receive financial support to save the regime from financial collapse.
It is expected that the Central Bank of Ethiopia will run out of foreigncurrency within the next 3 – 4 weeks.
(August 20, 2012) Day 60 of Ethiopia's Meles Zenawi's disappearance:
It's now been full 2 months since Ethiopia's dictator Meles Zenawi disappeared. It has also been 30 days since his wife Azeb Mesfin, themother of corruption, has disappeared.
The EPRDF led government is currently facing a critical shortage of foreignexchange reserve. According to sources, the regime will completely run out of hard currency within the next 3 – 4 weeks, unless it is bailed out byits masters.
Foreign exchange crisis is the main reason that the EPRDF has reportedlyagreed to the U.S. demand to appoint Hailemariam Dessalegn as Meles Zenawi's successor until the next election in May 2015.
The U.S., along with the World Band and IMF, is currently working on a multibillion-dollar foreign exchange bailout package to save the regime from crumbling, according to sources. This is a sad development since the U.S. officials know that the regime is running out of hard currency because of the massive looting of Ethiopia's resources that is mainlyunderway by the high-ranking party and government officials.
(August 21, 2014) Ethiopia's dictator Meles Zenawi is dead – ETV'
The state-controlled Ethiopian Television (ETV) has reported thatEthiopia's dictator Meles Zenawi has died at the age of 57.

After announcing Meles Zenawi’s death, the ETV started showing variousportraits of Meles Zenawi with music on the bacground.

The TPLF junta has been claiming that Meles was recovering for a minor illness and that he would return to his job before September 11, EthiopianNew Year. However, multiple sources have been informing the media thatMeles has died several weeks ago. Finally, the regime has admitted this morning (Ethiopian local time) that he is dead.

Obviously, it has been a while since Meles has died. It took this long forthe ruling party to announce his death because his associates couldn’t agree on his replacement.

Toward the end of last week, as reported the U.S. Africa Command led byFour Star General Carter F. Ham persuaded the minority regime to appoint Hailemariam Dessalegn as acting prime minister. (Text ends)

ETHIO-POLITICS: Yemen extradites abducted opposition figure to Ethiopia’Ethiomedia News (July 4, 2014)

WASHINGTON, DC - Yemen has extradited a top opposition figure toEthiopia where in 2009 he was sentenced to death in absentia.

Andargachew Tsege, secretary general of Ginbot 7 for justice, freedom and democracy, was abducted from Sana'a Airport on June 23 by Yemenisecurity officials when the opposition leader was in transit from Dubai to the Eritrean capital, Asmara. "Yemen has inflicted on Ethiopians a woundtime wouldn't heal," a strongly-worded Ginbot 7 statement warned on Friday, vowing a punitive measure that"would match Yemen's crime."

On Thursday, Ana Gomes, member of the European Parliament, expressedanger at the silence of the British government over the abduction of Andargachew Tsege, who is a British national. "I'm shocked with this blatant violation of the principle of non-refoulement by Yemeni authoritiesand seriously disappointed with the lack of visible action on the part of theBritish authorities, to secure the protection of Mr. Tsege," Gomes said in aletter addressed to William Hague, secretary of State of Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs of the United Kingdom.

The EU lawmaker said she was informed that Andargachew was already extradited to Ethiopia, where "his life and physical integrity are in great danger and that he will be wrongfully accused of crimes he didn't commit." The abduction of the opposition figure has sparked outrage among Ethiopians around the world, with calls ranging from protest ralliesat all Yemeni embassies around the world to vowing unspecified retaliatory measures against the officials in Addis.

OPPOSITION POLITICS: Ginbot 7 leader facing death penalty, extraditedfrom Yemen'

BBC AFRICA (July 4, 2014) An Ethiopian opposition leader, who was sentenced to death while in exile for plotting a coup, has been extradited from Yemen to Ethiopia, his group says. Andargachew Tsege, who is also a British national, is secretary-general of the banned Ginbot 7 movement. The Ethiopian government allegedly requested his extradition after he wasarrested in Yemen last month. European MEP Ana Gomes told the BBC theUK needed to use its political leverage to ensure his release. The Ethiopian government has not commented on the alleged extradition.

'Deep concerns' US-based Ginbot 7 spokesman Ephrem Madebo told the BBC's Focus on Africa radio programme that Mr Andargachew had been onhis way from the United Arab Emirates to Eritrea when he was detained during a stopover at Sanaa airport. Mr Ephrem said that he had spoken toMr Andargachew's family who had been contacted by the UK Foreign and Commonwealth Office on Thursday. British officials told the family that theYemeni ambassador to the UK had informed them that Mr Andargachew had been handed over to Ethiopia, Mr Ephrem said.

In a statement the UK Foreign Office said it was aware that Mr Andargachew had been missing in Yemen since 24 June. "Since then UK officials have pressed the Yemeni authorities at senior levels to establish his whereabouts, including meeting with the Yemeni ambassador in London this week," a Foreign Office spokesman said in a statement. "We are aware of reports that he may now be in Ethiopia and we are urgently seeking confirmation from the relevant authorities given our deep concerns about the case. We are continuing to provide consular assistanceto his family."

'Major donor': Ms Gomes, who led the European Union observer mission toEthiopia during the 2005 elections, said she had written to UK Foreign Secretary William Hague about the case. "If the British government is not complicit with this kidnapping and this rendition of Mr Andargachew Tsigue to the Ethiopian regime - [which] will obviously torture him, accusehim of all sorts of things and eventually kill him - then the British government has to get immediately the release of Mr Andargachew," she told BBC Focus on Africa.

"If there is a country that is extremely influential in Ethiopia, it is Britain - it's a major donor and it's a major political backer of the regime in Ethiopia." Mr Ephrem said that the UK government should have intervenedin the case earlier. "The UK government looks like a collaborator because the UK government never acted," he said, adding that it was ridiculous to consider Mr Andergachew a terrorist. "To the Ethiopian government even bloggers are terrorists [and] journalists are terrorists," he said.

Ginbot 7 (15 May) was named after the date of the 2005 elections, which were marred by protests over alleged fraud that led to the deaths of about200 people. In 2009, the year before the last elections, Mr Andergachew was among a group of Ginbot 7 leaders sentenced to death in absentia forplanning to assassinate government officials; they denied the charges. (Text ends)

Up to 129% salary increase: details of gov't employees salary increase'

(Capital Ethiopia (July 16, 2014) The government has significantly raisedthe salaries of civil servants and the topic has excited the nation, even though the amount of the increases has not officially been disclosed. However, according to a document Capital obtained, the salary of government employees is doubled. Workers at the bottom of the pay scalewill see their salary grow by 129 percent, while others with higher salarieshave also gotten about a 76 percent raise. Civil servants have secured a very impressive and unprecedented salary increment. Three weeks ago Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn disclosed that the government will increase salaries of state employees as of this month (the beginning of thebudget year). The exact sum has not officially been confirmed. Sources close to the issue told Capital that the amount the government added is significant and as high as 129 percent.

According to the new salary rate, the minimum starting salary has been raised to 1,031 birr from 450 birr and the ceiling amount has reached 11,713 birr, for professionals. Experts indicated that the minimum salary for sub professionals' that previously stood at 450 birr, has now grown to 1,031 birr, which is a 129 percent increase. The starting salary for professionals and scientific or fresh graduates that was 1,499 birr has nowrisen to 2,649 birr, which is about a 76 percent increase. The previous maximum basic salary for professional and scientific recruits was 4,343 birr and now it has been raised to 7, 815 birr, which is also about a 76 percent rise.

According to the new salary scale that Capital obtained the minimum salary increase is not lower than 76 percent, even though the percentagesvary on different levels. Civil servants, who were earning the lower amounts, have secured the biggest raise. Experts said that the percentageof the new pay raise is much higher than in the past. Four years ago the government raised salaries for civil servants and then after that it also increased pay for teachers. When the PM announced the salary hike during the Civil Service Day Celebration held at the African Union Conference Hall on June 23, he said that the government decided to increase its employees' pay starting from the first month of the budget year (July 8, 2014) aiming to inspire them to engage in the nation's development. "It is intended to improve the working atmosphere as well as the living conditions of civil servants," Hailemariam said.

"The increase will be made with consideration to the government's financial capacity, in a way that avoids awakening inflation or disturbingthe stability of the economy," Hailemariam added. He said that the increase was approved about a year ago, but the government suspended it with the intention of seeing the trend of the inflation remain in single digits. Even though there are not accurate statistics, the number of civil servants in the country is believed to be about 1.3 million. Since the government disclosed the salary increase three weeks ago price hikes andnew tariffs are being observed in some market places. Some experts say that the inflation may return, but the government is dismissing fears of price hikes. It also stated that price hikes and inflation would not be seen in relation with the salary increase.

Some of the government bodies also stated they would take legal action against traders who impose artificial price hikes on the public. Early this week the Trade Competition and Consumers' Protection Authority announced that consumers are informing the authority about price increases related to the pay raise of civil servants. In a statement that theauthority sent to Capital it reiterated that it will take legal measures against the traders who apply price hikes without any economic reason.

The authority also advised the public to inform them by calling a 8478 toll free line when they perceive that price hikes are occurring. Due to fears ofartificial price hikes the newly organized wholesale public enterprise, ALLE,has disclosed that it will terminate the contract of retail traders if they sellconsumer products at high rates.

Andargachew Tsige Was Forcibly Returned To Ethiopia the Same Day'URGENT ACTION ETHIOPIAN ACTIVIST AT RISK OF TORTURE

Amnesty International (July 4, 2014) - Andargachew Tsige, an Ethiopian political activist in exile, appears to have been arrested in transit in Yemenon 24 June and forcibly returned to Ethiopia. He is at risk of torture and other ill-treatment. Andargachew Tsige is a British national of Ethiopian origin and Secretary-General of Ginbot 7, an outlawed Ethiopian opposition group. He disappeared on 24 June at Sana'a airport in Yemen, while in transit between the United Arab Emirates and Eritrea. Although no official statements have been released by the Yemeni or Ethiopian authorities about his current whereabouts, human rights activists in Yemen told Amnesty International that he was forcibly returned to Ethiopia the same day he landed after being detained at the Sana'a airport. He is at high risk of torture and other ill-treatment in Ethiopia, where political detainees are frequently tortured in order to extract information and confessions. His incommunicado detention in an unknownlocation increases this risk.

Side note: Andargachew Tsige is a former member of the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) party and was Deputy Mayor of Addis Ababa from 1991 to 1994, when he resigned on account ofdifferences with the government. Ginbot 7 is one of five organisations proscribed as terrorist organisations by the Ethiopian parliament in 2011.

In 2012, Andargachew Tsige was prosecuted in absentia on terrorism charges (alongside journalist and prisoner of conscience Eskinder Nega, and others) and sentenced to life imprisonment. Previously, in 2009, he was convicted in absentia on charges related to an aborted coup attempt and was sentenced to death. He was also tried in absentia in the 2005- 2007 trial of political opposition members, journalists, activists and others. In recent years, many Ethiopians wanted by the authorities on thegrounds of their political activities have been kidnapped in neighbouring countries and forcibly returned to Ethiopia. This has often involved the collaboration of security forces in those countries. Another of the defendants in the 2012 trial had been kidnapped and forcibly returned from Sudan. All those returned are at risk of arbitrary detention, torture and unfair trial.

(Updates) Urgent action is needed Ethiopian Activist At Risk of Torture:

Based in the UK, he travelled to Ethiopia shortly before the 2005 electionsto support the opposition party Coalition for Unity and Democracy (CUD). On 8 June 2005, in the wake of the controversial election results, he was detained in Ethiopia and held at Ziway army camp. He was released on bail in July of that year. Like many detainees, Andargachew was accused of organizing the demonstrations, seeking to subvert the Constitution and other offences, which he denied, but he was not formally charged with any offence. After he was released he returned to the UK, but was subsequently named, tried and convicted in absentia in a major political trial of the leadership of the CUD, journalists, human rights activists and others, on charges including high treason, in 2005-2007. At the time he was the CUD representative in the UK. After the CUD trial, fellow defendant Berhanu Nega founded the 'Ginbot 7 Movement for Justice, Freedom and Democracy' from exile in the US, of which Andargachew Tsige became Secretary General. Berhanu Nega was also tried in absentia in the 2009 and 2012 trials.

ETHIOPIA : A Leadership In Disarray'

VIEW POINT By René Lefort, Open Democracy (July 5, 2014)

"Can you tell me who is in charge in the government?", asks Tamrat Gebregiorgis, publisher of the reference weekly Addis Fortune, at the latest of the regular press conferences held by Prime Minister HailmariamDessalegn. He replies by first underlining the efforts being made to remedy a few small defects like corruption, then rounds off with a joke: the answer is probably in your "gossip columns". The effrontery of the question was staggering. It would have been inconceivable during the reign of previous Prime Minister Meles Zenawi,who died in August 2012. It would also have been groundless: he held sole sway at the summit of the Party/State pyramid. On the tier below,the key figures of the TPLF (Tigrean People's Liberation Front) were in command, including the immense public and semi-public sector of the “modern” economy. The other three components of the de facto single party, the EPRDF (Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front), were largely satellites of the Front. Finally, with its six million members,the tentacles of the EPRDF extended right down to the basic five-personhousehold unit.

While the colossal body of the pyramid is more or less intact and still performs its main functions, its single apex has exploded into multiple centres of power, of unequal weight, none of which has achieved critical mass. While it would be an overstatement to speak of paralysis, the party’s pinnacle is at least “in a disarray”[i]. Or rather the country is in the grip of a threefold transition. The first, unexpected unforeseen transition,is Meles’ succession. Meles decided and launched the second: the “veterans” passing the reins to the next generation. The third will be inescapable: the state economy is no longer adequate for driving growth;the private sector needs the scope to take up the slack.

Leadership: The first transition is manifest in Ethiopia’s “collective leadership”. Prime Minister Hailemariam Dessalegn’s legitimacy is largely indirect – due to his selection as number two by Meles – since his personallegitimacy is deeply flawed. He hails from Woleyta, one of the southern marches of the old Abyssinian empire, peopled by those formerly called “barria”, a term which means both Black and slave, and his political base is here, and therefore narrow. He is not a Copt, like all his predecessors, but belongs to a small offshoot of Pentecostalism considered heretical even by other Pentecostals.[ii] Aware of these handicaps, Hailemariam, “a frontman without teeth”[iii], restricts himself to seeking consensus.

By contrast with Meles’ ukases, there has been a return to collective decision-making, one of the main markers of the TPLF in its heroic era. The debates can be heated, their echoes sometimes overflowing even intothe public sphere. They begin in the top echelons of the EPRDF’s four parties, and are then taken up in one of the multiple committees that Hailemariam has formed around him. In the absence of consensus, decisions are postponed indefinitely. If consensus is reached, it is supposed to apply to everyone, in accordance with the immutable principle of “democratic centralism” and the society’s legendary sense of hierarchy. However, depending on the degree of adherence, decisions may either be implemented right down to the smallest administrative echelon, be partially implemented, or sink without trace beneath the weight of specific antagonisms.

This decision-making process, inevitably lengthy, often messy or incomplete, must also remain within strict boundaries: the so-called “Meles legacy”. As the single common referent, it is the cement that holds this collective leadership together. However, while it has enabled it to remain – relatively – functional, it has also frozen it: no one quits the roadmap designed by Meles, despite the generated need for movementbrought about by fast-changing conditions.

In addition, in traditional Abyssinian culture, a decision must be long- considered. Having always acted in accordance with their position on a particular rung of the ladder of power, most of the leaders find themselvesfloundering in a horizontal decision-making process. They have to learn efficiently how to make a collective leadership work. Last but not least, noone wants to put their head above the parapet. None of the leaders feels strong enough to veer off the roadmap for fear of all the others joining forces to put him out of the game. Finally, while the power struggle has not yet been overtly launched, everyone is jostling for position, either as aplayer contender or as a member of the winner's camp. The state is like a ship that has lost its captain, with no one in the crew able or willing yet totake his place, which continues to advance but with an increasingly stuttering engine, and along an unchanging course. This cannot last.

This multipolarity at the top leads to contradictory behaviours. On the onehand, key actors can obtain a degree of autonomy, if not more. An embryonic pluralism is emerging. This is particularly true of local executives in the federal system's eleven entities, who have achieved genuine elbow room; of certain MPs in the quasi de facto single party (theParliament has one opposition member amongst its 547 members) who goso far as to lambast key members of the government [iv]; of certain ministers, journalists, and even of the opposition who, for the first time in nine years, has sometimes obtained the right to demonstrate. Finally, never before has the rate of infrastructure development been so high, even at a local level, as if the authorities were trying to outbid Meles: to prove that they can achieve even more than under his rule.

At the same time, however, the regime continues to tighten its grip, as if to belie any hesitancy at the top. Leaders and activists in the opposition movements are regularly imprisoned. Three journalists and six bloggers were arrested a few days before John Kerry's recent visit, then accused oflinks with "terrorist" organisations [v]. The six were very marginal in the blogosphere and had been inactive for months. Above all, the crushing of the demonstrations by Oromo students, often joined by a section of the population, has demonstrated that brute force remains a common tool of government. It was the harshest crackdown since the contested electionsof 2005.[vi] The protesters were initially demanding the withdrawal of the "Master Plan" for Addis Ababa – one of the Federation's eleven entities – which would expand the city twentyfold, encroaching on Oromya territory.[vii]

Their claims subsequently grew to encompass the permanent grievancesof the majority of Oromos. Demonstrations turned into riots. The police opened fire and instituted a manhunt, killing dozens and wounding hundreds.[viii] In both cases, the possibility that the security services were acting autonomously is very credible. Finally, controls over the basic administrative unit, the municipality (kebele), have been further ratchetedup. At least in the Tigray and Amhara regions, a member of the executivecabinet of the next level up – the district (woreda) – is now permanently assigned to the kebele to monitor and report on the activities of local authorities. He is now the "boss" of the kebele.

These contradictions also suggest, according to one observer, that the government continues to oscillate between arrogance and panic.[xi] The pursuit of large and impressive infrastructure projects, including the GreatEthiopian Renaissance Dam, set to be Africa's biggest dam; the mounting investment – 5 billion dollars, around 12% of GDP – in the sugar industry;the development of Chinese, Indian and Turkish investment, especially in clothing; the existence of strong – though declining – growth; Ethiopia's depiction by the international media as the future "African Lion"[x]; the central role that the international community ascribes to Addis Ababa in regional conflicts - these are all sources of pride to the leadership. However, as the urban population complains, "you can't eat roads or rails,and you can't sleep on them". By general agreement, discontent in the cities have never been so high. Inflation has slashed by at least one third the purchasing power of the most numerous salaried workers, i.e. state employees and employees of public and semipublic companies, who represent two thirds of the modern economy (excluding traditional agriculture)[xi]. Systematic day-to-day corruption has become a brutal reality.

The country is also experiencing rising ethnic tensions and a growing focuson ethnic identity. More than two thirds of the population – those below the age of 25 – have grown up in a federal system which identifies them as Oromo, Amhara… first. This federalism is perverted by the imbalance ofpower of all kinds in favour of leaders from Tigray (6% of the population). It is a groundswell with no apparent end. For example, tens of thousands of Amharas, who have settled for decades in the southern and western lowlands, in particular Beni Shangul, have been violently expelled since 2012 [xii]. The opposition speaks of "ethnic cleansing". At least in Ambo, demonstrators have destroyed property belonging to Tigreans. Although open Muslim fever has subsided, the underlying question – the autonomy from government of organisations representing Islam – remains unchanged. When the political space is impermeable, the inevitable internal conflicts can only overflow into the ethnic and/or religious sphere.

Between two and two and a half million young people are coming onto thelabour market each year. The massive expansion of higher education – 30universities – accompanied by a dramatic drop in quality, has embittered many graduates deprived of professional openings. In the countryside, demographic growth is forcing young people either to leave in search of casual work in the city or, in most cases, to try to emigrate legally or illegally, primarily towards the Middle East. Young people, whether urbanor rural, are the only social group that the authorities, at all levels, are unable to bring under control. They fear them.

Veteran handover?: The second transition – the handover of the controls by the "veterans" to the next generation - is more formal than real. At thevery least, "the out-going are not really out, the in-coming are not really in".[xiii] It has happened in government, at the head of the four parties and the eleven regions. However, drawing on its experience and its reputationamong the militants, the old guard continues to hold the reins. Nine advisors in the Prime Minister's office also have the rank of minister and therefore take de facto precedence over their equivalents in government. All belong to the "old guard": Bereket Simon, Abay Tsehaye, Kassu Ilala and Kuma Demeksa for policy, Newaye Christos Gebreab (economy), Fassil Nahom (legal adviser), Tsegaye Berhe (security), Andras Eshete (diaspora), Arkebe Okubay (investment). Six are Tigrean speaking native of Tigray or Eritrea, Bereket Simon grew up in the Amhara region but is ofTigrean origine, Kassu Ilala is a Gurage Southerner, Kuma Demeksa is Oromo. Bereket Simon, Abay Tsehay, Tewodros Hagos, member of the politburo of the TPLF, and Hailemariam, would appear to form the leading foursome.

It is the very old guard of the TPLF that has caused the latest upheavals within the TPLF. Only scraps are known. Sebhat Nega, patriarch of the Front, gives a very watered-down version.[xiv] He made an eleven-day tourof Tigray, organised "by the Region and the Front" and accompanied, it would seem, by Seyoum Mesfin and Abbay Tsehaye, two of the seven founders of the TPLF, plus Tsegaye Berhe, a former chief of Tigray. They held "eight meetings with the population in the cities" and "several formaland informal meetings", including with cadres of the Front, the police, etc.The meetings apparently highlighted positive points: "expansion of the areas of irrigation, natural resources conservation, peace", but also "some weaknesses", such as in "governance" and "certain symptoms of corruption". The Front's cadres purportedly reached "more or less" the same assessments.

In fact, the rift became overt at one of the last high-level meetings, probably the Central Committee. A position paper drafted by the four vigourously attacked the leadership of the Front, notably highlighting the growing discontent of the population and the rise in youth unemployment.It demanded that these problems should be examined. This condemnationwas rejected, at least by the Front's regional wing led by its Chairman andthe regional President, Abay Woldu, who refused to follow up on a further investigation. In the end, the "veterans" only got their way by threateningto make their paper public. Tigreans are famed for their outspokenness, and the delegation's tour wassometimes marked by vigorous attacks. The main grievance: you have forgotten us, you are no longer interested in us, all you think about is getting rich. The four, who were also there, as an observer put it, “to measure their political capital”,[xv] sought to dissociate themselves from the current leadership. In vain: you are one, came the retort. Watch this space.

The TPLF has lost its supremacy within the EPRDF, the other three parties have gained autonomy, but it remains the keystone. Nonetheless, other tensions are appearing. In addition to the rift described above, there are institutionally antagonistic aims between its leaders in Tigray and in Addis:Debretsion Gebremichael and Tedros Adhanom, Minister of Foreign Affairs,a “cross-over figure” popular with the urban middle classes. The former wish to be lords in their own domain; for the latter, the route to power is further centralisation.

The ANDM (Amhara National Democratic Movement) seems the most united and disciplined group in the coalition. Demeke Mekonnen, a Muslimfrom Wollo, is its chairman and one of the three deputy prime ministers, but here too the veterans Bereket Simon and Addissu Leguesse have theirhands on the levers. The OPDO (Oromo People’s Democratic Organisation), though supposed to represent the largest ethnic group, is riddled with corruption and divisions, including the immemorial split between the Protestants of Wollega and the Muslims of Arsi. The SPDM (Southern People’s Democratic Movement), Hailemariam’s party, continues on its merry way but without much impact.

This waning of political power is also reflected in the growing autonomy ofthe army and security services.[xvi] They have become a state within the state, answerable only to themselves and linked with just a few lead figures in the TPLF.xvii The army in particular has built a military- industrial empire. It is the primary subcontractor for the construction of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam by the Italian firm Salini Costruttori. Finally, the army outweighs all other authorities in all matters in which it is involved, for example in Ogaden and Somalia.[xvii]i For the firsttime, politics has by and large lost control of the gun. The army seems willing to remain in the shadows, but could become the “kingmaker” if the leadership became bogged down in crisis. “A stone rolls down a hill under its own momentum as long as the road remains smooth”, observes a well placed source.xix But what could stop it?

Not the elections of May 2015 which, barring the unexpected, are set to be a formality, even if they panic the authorities. The society is so firmly locked down that it offers not the slightest crack through which the opposition could slip into the electoral game, especially as it is so small, sodivided, so inconsistent and lacking a figure capable of leading it into battle. The EPRDF has decided to reappoint Hailemariam prime minister after the elections, which suits his putative successors entirely. They gain time to refurbish their arms by giving way to a figure whom nobody,rightly or wrongly, sees as a serious contender.

« They are all the ingredients for a spontaneous upsurge: living conditionshave become unbearable in the towns », says a wise observer.xx This would be a much bigger deal. Falling purchasing power, especially in the cities, and rising unemployment, are generating acute discontent. It couldbe exacerbated by the "ethnicisation" of attitudes. The opposition parties lack the ability to capitalise on and therefore channel such a trend. The new middle class does not seem ready to adopt the same driving role as in the "Arab springs". It remains haunted by past violence and prefers to retain its modest gains rather than risk losing everything. The authorities would stop at nothing to nip this potential explosion in the bud. However, its repercussions could create strong tensions within the ruling power, andeven trigger a crisis.

In the short or medium term, it is relations with Eritrea that could open upthe widest breach, first within the TPLF, and then the EPRDF. Issayas Afeworki is in very poor health. Possible scenarios following his death range from the emergence of a new "failed state" in the Horn of Africa, with half a million kalashnikovs in the hands of six million inhabitants, to an army takeover.

Whatever happens, there would be new questions about relations with thecountry's northern neighbour-enemy. They remain a source of deep division within the TPLF. An "accommodationist" wing, dominated by leaders of Eritrean origin, would like to return to the coexistence that prevailed before the 1998-2000 war, with cooperation and each remainingmaster in its own country. A "hawkish" wing would like Ethiopia to go as far as establishing a foothold in Assab. In 2001, Meles imposed his views on a TPLF at the time more divided than ever,xxi but ultimately this schism has not been resolved. Eritrea, has been the source of every greatcrack in Ethiopian power for more than half a century…

The economy: The main obstacle to the third transition – a tangible economic shift, is that the leadership remains virtually unanimous in seeing no need for it. The chosen pathway – a "developmental state", i.e. overwhelmingly public investment, combined more recently with the cooptation of big foreign firms by the local oligarchies – is seen as in needof only a little tweaking. It is still persuaded this strategy will maintain a strong growth, the essential foundation of its legitimacy.

However, international experts predict that this model will run out of steam, and that future growth rates will come into line with the averagefor sub-Saharan Africa.xxii "The public investment rate of Ethiopia is thethird highest in the world, while the private investment rate is the sixth lowest."xxiii The private sector is being "crowded out", in particular by a"credit crunch" xxiv. The trade deficit stands at a fifth of GDP. Most important of all, the working age population is rising by 3.5% a year, oneof the highest rates in Africa. Only a structural transformation of the economy, driven by industry rather than agriculture, could absorb this influx of labour. The manufacturing sector in particular should play a key role, but it is currently capped at 4% of GDP. xxv

Yet these warnings continue to fall on deaf ears. The preliminary draft forthe next five-year plan for 2016-21 is practically identical to the current plan. Obsessed by the need to exercise control over the private sector, infatuated with what might be called the “cult of the tractor” which requires development to be big and at the cutting edge of technology, theauthorities continue to stifle small local private entrepreneurs, the only forces capable of creating a dense, labour-intensive network.

The history of the TPLF demonstrates that divergences and even divisions do not necessarily lead to crisis. It is legendary for its readiness to debate interminably until a consensus is finally carved out. Similarly, the mysterious alchemy whereby it reconciles its extreme ideological rigidity with a degree of pragmatism has often saved it from disaster, albeit at thelast moment with one foot already over the precipice.

However, it faces two possible scenarios, which could in fact be combined.In one, the multipolarity of power becomes formalised – the federal system takes real shape. Each region acquires very extensive autonomy, with possibly a strongman at its head. The first gains in this regard would in any case be difficult to put into reverse. The role of Addis Ababa would be reduced to bringing their regional representatives together within balanced structures to decide exclusively on supra-regional, i.e. national, issues.

Some compare this scenario with the regime of the “The era of the Princes”, at the turn of the 18th-19th century. However, this system is only sustainable if it is balanced, in other words all “nations, nationalities and peoples”, and particularly their elites, feel properly represented. But, neither OPDO, nor ANDM, the essentially single parties in the two largest nations, can lay claim to such representativeness, having in particular never been accepted by these elites. The TPLF remains convinced, rightly,that the latter retain considerable influence with the population.

Conversely, it may be that, in Ethiopia, 'history' is so powerful that the past permeates the present, and it repeats itself. In this case, what we see today is simply another interregnum between two powerful men. Theprevious ones were lengthy: a decade between Menelik and Ras Makonnen, the future Haile Selassie; some two decades between Meles Zenawi’s arrival in the top circle of the TPLF and his emergence as sole number one.

Interregnums ripen very slowly. Time must be left to do its work. Observers expect nothing before – at best – the next congress of the parties, probably next autumn, which could bring the very first clues to the outcome of this interregnum. To paraphrase a famous verse by VictorHugo,xxvi clever is he who discerns who could emerge as the Napoleon oftomorrow in the Bonaparte of today. (Text ends)

July 5, 2014: House unanimously endorses Djibouti water grant bill'

(The Reporter News) The House of Peoples' Representatives (HPR) on Thursday unanimously endorsed the bill recently presented to it grantingDjibouti full and exclusive rights to develop and transport up to 103,000cubic meters of ground water a day from Ethiopia at no fee. The House, which endorsed the bill, lauded Ethiopia's foreign policy that enabled thetiny neighboring nation to develop water from the Shinile Zone of the Ethiopian Somali region by referring to Djibouti as being "more than a neighbor." It was said that Djibouti would invest USD 390 million to develop the water after it secured the budget from global financial institutions with loans.

According to the bill that was presented to the House three weeks ago, Djibouti will import the water for 30 years based on the agreement signedbetween the two countries in January of 2013. Following the joint motion report of the Natural Resources Standing Committee and the Budget and Finance Affairs Standing Committee to which a draft bill was referred to last month, the bill was endorsed by all Members of Parliament (MPs) withno debate. In fact, while most of them were praising the government's proposal to tighten its relations with Djibouti, an MP questioned how the government considered the nature of the water resources that flow out.

"Naturally, water keeps flowing and we can take the case of Abay (Blue Nile). So what consideration has the government identified to manage or control the water that flows out of the country?" an MP asked.

The committee chairman told the House that it was able to get proof from various governmental institutions that supplemented study findings that there was a huge amount of ground water reservoirs in the proposed project areas that are sufficient enough for the area's development activities apart from providing water to Djibouti. The draft bill, which incorporates both governments' responsibilities as well as obligations regarding the water development, which makes Djibouti transport potablewater for at least 30 years, was signed by the two nations' ministers of finance and economy providing Djibouti access to partial water resources in the Shinile Zone. "Ethiopia agreed to supply water to Djibouti under this agreement free of any charge," says the agreement, as stated in the bill.

According to the endorsed agreement, Ethiopia shall designate 20 hectares of land in the Shinile area from which Djibouti shall supply waterto its territory in addition to the 400 hectares of land in the proposed ground water well field area. But the agreement stipulates that Djibouti shall pay compensations for residents of the area and for residents of some areas inside its territory that may be affected by the project.The government earlier reiterated that the agreement had been signed in consideration of the national interest such as the political and economic advantages it enjoys from Djibouti. Similarly, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MoFA) said last week that the water grant to Djibouti is “part of alarger strategic integration plan” aimed at unifying the two countries politically and economically. It was also the same explanation that was provided during the House’s regular session which later saw a unanimousendorsement. “For us Djibouti is not merely a neighbor. We see it as if it is part of our country,” an MP said.

Under the agreement, Djibouti will install a 70 km-long pipeline from the proposed project area with which to import water from the eastern part ofEthiopia. Last April a Swiss water company and a Kuwaiti delegation held talks with the Ethiopian government on the potentials of water development and transfer schemes. Various reports indicate that Djibouti has been suffering from deep-rooted and longstanding shortages of potable water. According to the latest document, Djibouti gets around 95 percent of its water from ground water. However it has major problems asit is highly salty. The Djibouti city has faced an impending challenge in its development efforts due to the shortage of water. What is more is that, as stipulated in the bill, Ethiopia has the commitment to ensure exemption from tax and duties goods and vehicles imported for the project. Ethiopia is also obliged to take measures that can make the project “sustainable, to avoid pollution in and around the project.” After the project is finalized,Djibouti may set up its own company to manage the operation of the water supply system in Ethiopia’s territory with the right of outsourcing it to a third party. FREEDOM OF WORSHIP: Ethiopian Muslims stage anti-governmentprotest’

Agence France Presse, ADDIS ABABA (July 5, 2014) - Hundreds of Muslims protesters demonstrated in Ethiopia Friday, demanding the release of 17 of their leaders jailed under terrorism charges last year. "What the government is doing doesn't solve the problem, rather it will worsen the situation," said protestor Mohammad Seman, speaking at thedemonstration following busy Friday prayers at a popular Addis Ababa mosque. The leaders were arrested last August, following months of protests by Muslims accusing the government of interfering in religious affairs. They are currently on trial for intending to "carry out acts of terrorism."

Protesters accuse the government of forcibly imposing the foreign Al- Ahbash branch of Islam, and appointing leaders, or majlis, of the SupremeCouncil on Islamic Affairs who are traditionally elected by members of the Muslim community. "We want our freedom, we want neutral majlis," said protester Noureddine Ali. The demonstrators carried banners reading "let our voices be heard," and "we will fight for our religion and rights" at the rally, before police arrested several protestors, according to an AFP reporter at the scene. Seman said that the government should release theleaders and urged talks with the Muslim community. "It is better to solve the problem with peaceful means," he said. The government did not return calls for comment Friday.

Human Rights Watch (HRW) has urged the government to free the jailed leaders, accusing it of a "brutal crackdown" on protests. Ethiopia has come under fire for its controversial anti-terrorism legislation, which rightsgroups have said is used to silence critics. Over 30 percent of Ethiopia's 91 million people are Muslim, while around 60 percent practice Orthodox Christianity, according to official figures.

Yemeni president had not been well informed about the abduction’

It was learnt that President Abed Rabbuh Mansur Hadi was not informed about the abduction of Andargachew Tsige, the Ethiopian opposition figure. It has to be recalled that on June 23, 2014, Yemeni officials were arrested Andargachew at El Rahaba Airport in Sanaa, Yemen while he wason a transit flight from Dubai (UAE) to Eritrea. Yemeni Secret agents did not permit him any consular access to the UK embassy in Yemen and hurriedly deported him to Ethiopia, credible reports told. Despite his beingat risk of mistreatment, an assistant to Yemeni President Abed Rabbuh Mansur Hadi privately told a British official based in Yemen, it was learnt that the Yemeni President was not informed about the abduction of the Ethiopian opposition leader Andargachew Tsige. The abduction was carriedout by senior Yemeni intelligence circle in Collaboration with their counterpart secret agents who were rumored paid up $1 million to kidnap Andargachew while he was in a transit flight through Yemen, according to sources.

When Andargachew arrived El Rahaba Airport in Sanaam on a Yemenia Airways flight number 858 on June 23, at least there were 7 regime agents, along with Yemeni secret police were waiting for him at the airport. He was then quickly flown to Addis Ababa on a military aircraftand detained in a nondescript house at the old airport area where "high profile" political prisoners are tortured and interrogated by the state Security, the report added.

kidnapped opposition leader held incommunicado at the old airportvicinity, NW of city’

ER News (July 5, 2014) - The kidnapped senior Ethiopian opposition leaderAndargachew Tsige is currently being held at a nondescript house in the Old Airport area of Addis Ababa, according to Ethiopian Review sources.

Ato Andargachew, who was traveling on a British passport, had been abducted by Yemeni secret police and Woyanne agents at Sana'a International Airport on June 22, 2014, while en route to Asmara. He was then taken to Ethiopia a couple of days later.

However, the Ethiopian prime minister's spokesperson Getachew Reda told VoA yesterday that Andargachew is not in Ethiopia, did not request his extradition, and claims does not know anything about his whereabouts, in an apparent attempt to avoid requests from the British government and the Red Cross to visit him. The British officials would discover that Andargachew has been savagely tortured by the secret service. Following Andargachew's abduction, for the next two days his Gmail and Skype were showing online, indicating that the regime agents were in control of his laptop and having access to his mailbox after he wasdetained.

ETHICS: The Moral Bankruptcy of Failed African States-

EM (July 7, 2014) - According to the latest Failed States Index, 6 out of the top 10 and 18 out of the top 25 "most failed states on earth" are found in Africa. This commentary is not about beating the dead hyena of the failed African "state". Nor is it about the failure of statecraft in much of Africa and the ineptitude of lame African governments and regimes to provide their citizens basic and essential services, maintain public safety, control widespread corruption and state-sponsored criminality, mitigate widespread violation of human rights and bridge the ever widening gap between the African haves and have-nots. I am concerned here about the immorality of failed African states and their lost moral compass(ion) to care for their most vulnerable and unquestionably most important members. Sub-Sahara Africa has the highest rates of Child abductions, Child soldiers, Child labor, Invisible children, Child malnutrition among children in the world. As example Child malnutrition & chronic malnutrition

. is the most severe in Ethiopia. According to a 2013 study jointly conducted by the African Union Commission, NEPAD Planning and Coordinating Agency, the Economic Commission for Africa and the UN World Food Programme, Chronic malnutrition, sometimes described as a"hidden hunger", "occurs when a child's intake of nutrients (fat, protein,vitamins and minerals, etc.) is insufficient to sustain the needs of the child's body." Chronically malnutritioned children suffer significant deficiencies in physical and mental growth and are prone to illnesses.

RELIGION: Abune Mathias toes the Tigray line'

PRESS (July 7, 2014) Although he had promised to be impartial, the patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church has appointed several Tigrayan priests to key posts in his Church. Teklemariam Asrat, alias Abune Mathias, leader of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church made undertakings to the ruling political powers during the recent Synod. He admitted that he had been elected to his post through the support of theTigrayan Abaye Tsehaye, a former national security adviser to Prime Minister Meles Zenawi and leading figure in the TPLF, mainstay of the ruling EPRDF coalition because he is a Tigrayan. He subsequently did nothesitate to go back on his initial promise to end ethnic favoritism in the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and offered certain key posts to Tigrayan priests, even though this ethnic group already has 16 of the 47 seats on the Synod. Abune Mathias has been on post for a little over a year. He hasno doubt learned his lesson after he was threatened with legal action last January after he denounced government interference in the Ethiopian Orthodox Church. Before that, his moves were restricted by the national security adviser Tsegaye Berhe.

PRESS: Djibouti put itself under Ethiopia - The new merging state'

The plan for economic integration devised by Djibouti and neighbouring Ethiopia could ultimately lead to a kind of political unification between thetwo countries. The plan for economic integration devised by Djibouti and neighboring Ethiopia could ultimately lead to a kind of political unificationbetween the two countries. During the last few weeks, certain Ethiopian dignitaries have hinted at it and one of them even went so far as to utter"a single country with two chiefs". Ethiopian desire to secure its Djibouti port outlet is nothing new and some people in Addis Ababa have been talking about "an obligatory merger" with Djibouti for years. So far this trend has been latent but is now coming into the fore, because President Ismaïl Omar Guelleh needs an Ethiopian umbrella in various sectors, including that of guaranteeing his immunity when he is no longer in power.

Weakened president - The Djibouti president was born in Dire Dawa, Ethiopia, and owns a house in Addis Ababa. He is beginning to show his age (he is 67 according to his official birth date) and his health is not whatit used to be. He is currently getting over an operation at the Val-de- Grace military hospital in Paris and he is losing his mobility. Moreover, thetraditional Independence Day garden party on 27 June was not held this year, the first time in decades. During the military parade, all measures were taken for him to make the least possible effort: Ismaïl Omar Guellehdid not even get up to return the salute of the commanders of the parading troops. Nor did he appear on 21 June at the Hotel Kempinski for the presentation of Djibouti Vision 2035, even though it is under his High Patronage. The government, and in particular finance minister Ilyas Moussa Dawaleh have been working on this project for many years. Finally, the cabinet meetings, which are normally held every week, aregetting further and further apart.

No successor in sight - Ismaïl Omar Guelleh has several times reiterated that he will not run in the 2016 election and his state of health suggests that this will indeed be the case. However, from 2006 to 2009 he had alsopromised that he would not amend the constitution so he could run for another mandate, which he did finally do. At present, he does not give theimpression of being particularly keen to prepare a successor. The best placed potential candidate for his succession, presidential secretary general, Ismaïl Tani, from the same Issa/Mamassan ethnic group as Ismaïl Omar Guelleh, is at the moment not in the good books of the highlyinfluential First Lady Kadra Mahamoud Haid. In the event of choosing a non-Mamassan, the most likely candidates would be Ilyas Moussa Dawaleh, former health minister Abdallah Abdillahi Miguil, and even the Afar Prime Minister Dileita Mohamed Dileita. But such a change would probably produce strong tension inside Ismaïl Omar Guelleh's party Rassemblement populaire pour le progrès (RPP) – an opportunity that the opposition coalition still lying in wait, Union pour le salut national (USN), would not fail to seize. Thus, whether Ismaïl Omar Guelleh stays in command or hands over the helm in 2016, a turbulent political time is in store and Ethiopian protection could be necessary for him. Furthermore, France and the other western powers present in Djibouti would not intervene militarily to support the regime, unless there is serious foreign aggression.

Economic merger - Many of the companies operating in Djibouti do not want to hear anything about a merger with Ethiopia, as they fear that Djibouti could move from its quite open economic system at present to the frequently more protectionist approach of Ethiopia. However, the current infrastructure projects (railways and roads, for example) favor increased economic integration and good political entente between the two countries. Ethiopia depends on its neighbor for its trade to transit andis extremely wary of Djibouti becoming destabilized by radical Islamists orEritrea. Djibouti, for its part, has become dependent on Ethiopia on several counts: importing electricity, attributing land in Serofta in the Oromia Regional State to cultivate cereals for the Djibouti market; another land concession near Shinile (eastern Ethiopia) to extract 100,000cubic meters of drinking water a day and the construction of a 70 km aqueduct to Djibouti. The firm MAI Resources International (Switzerland) AG chaired by the Swiss national of Kuwaiti extraction Rashad Shawa is working with the Djibouti authorities on this particular project. Djibouti could then sell the water from Ethiopia on to other countries in the Gulf ofAden. (Text ends)

Gov’t warned 'clock is on the countdown' for the British man at risk oftorture in Ethiopia’

AI (July 8, 2014) - Amnesty International has called on the UK Government to ensure the safety of British man who is at risk of torture after being forcibly returned to Ethiopia. Andargachew Tsige, a British national of Ethiopian origin and Secretary General of the outlawed Ethiopian opposition group Ginbot 7, disappeared at Sana’a airport in Yemen on 24 June while he was en route to Eritrea. He had previously been tried in absentia in Ethiopia and sentenced to death for involvementin an alleged coup attempt.

For the following week there were no official statements released by eitherthe Yemeni or Ethiopian authorities about Mr Tsige’s whereabouts.

However, human rights activists in Yemen told Amnesty that he was forcibly returned to Ethiopia the same day he landed, after being detainedat Sana'a airport, in violation of international law. Today a Foreign Office Spokesperson confirmed that Mr Tsige is in Ethiopia, though his specific location remains unknown.

Amnesty is concerned that Mr Tsige is at acute risk of torture, given that political detainees in Ethiopia are frequently tortured in order to extract information and confessions. Mr Tsige is being detained 'incommunicado' –in an unknown location with no access to legal or consular representativesor family members – which severely exacerbates this risk.

Amnesty is urgently appealing to the UK Government to ensure that all possible efforts are made to immediately identify the whereabouts of MrTsige and to gain consular access to him.

Amnesty International UK's Head of Policy and Government Affairs Allan Hogarth said: "Swift action to locate and ensure the safety of Andargachew Tsige must be a top priority for the UK Government. "Given that Mr Tsige is a political activist who has been tried and sentenced to death in his absence, and given the regularity with which political opponents are tortured, there is a real danger that Mr Tsige's life could beat risk.

"The longer he remains incommunicado, the more precarious his situation.The clock is ticking. "The Ethiopian authorities must immediately reveal MrTsige's whereabouts, and ensure he has access to British consulate staff, lawyers and relatives. "In addition to insisting on assurances that the death penalty will not be carried out, the UK Government should also seekimmediate guarantees that Mr Tsige will not be subject to torture."

In 2009, Mr Tsige was tried in absentia in Ethiopia and sentenced to deathfor involvement in an alleged coup attempt. In 2011 Ethiopia's Parliamentbanned Ginbot 7, deeming it a terrorist organisation. Following this, in 2012, the authorities again prosecuted Mr Tsige in absentia on terrorism charges, alongside a number of opposition members, journalists and others. He was sentenced to life imprisonment. Amnesty believes he is at serious risk of being imprisoned based on a conviction for charges againstwhich he was not able to present a defence.

Yemen's transfer of Mr Tsige to Ethiopia is in violation of international law.Under the international Convention against Torture, to which Yemen is a party, a state may not "expel, return ('refouler') or extradite a person to another state where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture." ETHIOPIA: Yemen to deport 44 Ethiopian migrants'

Khalid Al-Karimi (author) Unlike Somalis, Ethiopian migrants do notgenerally qualify for refugee status in Yemen.

SANA'A, (July 9, 2014) Forty-four Ethiopians who have been held since Monday in Taiz governorate are currently awaiting deportation and are notseeking refugee status. Coast Guard spokesperson Major Hussein Al- Harazi confirmed the arrest and said the 44 Ethiopians were taken to Mocha Security Department.

Colonel Saleh Alfani, the director of operations for the Coast Guard, told the Yemen Times that the 44 Ethiopians were arrested near the port of Mocha on a boat captained by an Ethiopian national. He added that Ethiopians are generally not treated as refugees in Yemen as there is no major conflict in Ethiopia."The Ethiopians have left their country and headed to Yemen for two reasons… they intend to secure jobs in Yemen oruse Yemen to transit to other Gulf countries," said Alfani.

Zaid Al-Alaya'a, a media assistant at the UN Refugee Agency, told the Yemen Times that all the arrested Ethiopians are economic migrants andtherefore not asylum seekers, adding that they are not seeking refugee status. Ethiopian migrants do not generally qualify for refugee status, unlike Somalis who are automatically granted such status on arrival.

Abdulla Al-Zurqa, the deportation manager at the Passport and Immigration Authority in Sana'a, said that as long as the Ethiopians arenot refugees and are not in the process of seeking asylum, they will be deported.

Yemen is the only country in the Arabian Peninsula that is a signatory to the 1951 Convention on the Status of Refugees and its 1967 Protocol, which determines who qualifies as a refugee, the rights of those granted asylum, and the legal obligations of states towards refugees. According tothe UN Refugee Agency, between January and November of 2013, 53,941Ethiopian migrants arrived in Yemen. In 2012 that figure stood at 84,376,while for the previous two years the numbers were 75,561 and 34,422 respectively. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA/UK: Missing British Man At Risk Of Torture'

(AI) News updates: Andargachew Tsige, a British national, disappeared on24 June at a Yemen airport. He has been taken to Ethiopia, where he is athigh risk of torture. Meantime, The kidnapping of Ethiopian opposition leader Andargachew Tsige at Sana'a international airport in Yemen was carried out entirely by the Tigray People Liberation Front (TPLF) and Yemeni intelligence service without the knowledge of any one else in Ethiopia, according to reliable sources. When Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn and his spokesperson told the press that they don'tknow where Ato Andargachew is, they were not lying.

Even though as the prime minister Hailemariam is officially the commander-in-chief of the state security and the armed forces as the lateMeles Zenawi did it, the TPLF secret police led by Getachew Assefa and Debretsion Gebremichael the man who oversees the Ethio-telecoms and Chairman of the Board of the Electric Power Corporation (EEPCo), the twosectors that have rarely managed so badly, he is also, amongst other party and government elites, whos VP of the coalition partner the TPLF, and one of the three DPM responsible for the “economics cluster”, as well as senior government official whos responsible for the e-security division led by his ministry the Information & Technology, did not bother to informPMHD about the abduction, because they undermine him as not their boss.

There is also a growing belief that the British intelligence is the one that had provided the regime secret police to Andargachew's itinerary. It is highly unlikely that Yemeni intelligence would kidnap a British passport holder at their international airport without the knowledge of the British Government. According to commentators, this is a sign of Neo colonialism.The regime in Addis Abeba circumvents the Vienna convention in the 21st century, why is that?

Ginbot 7's Andargachew Tsege: Ethiopia confirms arrest’

"We have made clear that we expect immediate consular access and requested reassurances that the death penalty imposed in absentia willnot be carried out" -UK Foreign Office

BBC News (July 9, 2014) Ethiopia has confirmed it has arrested oppositionleader Andargachew Tsege, who disappeared in Yemen last month. His

UK-based wife Yemi Hailemariam told the BBC she was shocked to see him paraded on state television. Ethiopian TV said Andargachew had beenarrested in Yemen and then extradited. It described him as the country's "most wanted person". He was sentenced to death in absentia in 2009 on charges of planning to assassinate government officials - which he denied.

Andargachew, a UK national, is secretary-general of Ethiopia's banned Ginbot 7 movement. Amnesty International last week warned he was at risk of being tortured while in Ethiopian custody.

Correspondents say Andargachew sounded hoarse and appeared to be incoherent during his appearance on TV. He said he had accepted his arrest as "a blessing in disguise". "I just want to rest because I was really, really exhausted," hesaid. Ms Yemi said it was difficult to see footage of her husband. "I switched it off quickly. I couldn't watch it," she said. Ms Yemi said the UKshould demand the immediate release of her husband.

"If they want to try him, they must go through the proper channels," she told the BBC. A British Foreign Office spokesman said it had raised its "deep concerns" with both Ethiopia and Yemen about the extradition. "Wehave made clear that we expect immediate consular access and requested reassurances that the death penalty imposed in absentia will not be carried out," the spokesman said. Ginbot 7 says Andargachew had been on his way from the United Arab Emirates to Eritrea when he was detainedat Sanaa airport on 24 June. Ginbot 7 (15 May) was named after the date of the 2005 elections, which were marred by protests over alleged fraud that led to the deaths of about 200 people. (Text ends)

TREASURES: Rock hewn churches of Lalibela, the Jerusalem of Ethiopia'

(Orthodox Christian News) Lalibela, Ethiopia CNN (July 11, 2014) — It's 4 o'clock on a Sunday morning when a trail of figures dressed in white emerges from the deep darkness. Quietly, the summoned crowd makes itsway down a cluster of ancient structures as the slow beat from traditional skin drums beckons. It's a common scene here in Lalibela, a small town innorthern Ethiopia that's home to 11 spectacular churches carved both inside and out from a single rock some 900 years ago. The chiseled creations have turned this mountain town into a place of pride and pilgrimage for worshipers of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, attracting 80,000 to 100,000 visitors every year. "It is one of the very important places for the Ethiopian Orthodox Church people," says local guide Fikru Woldegiorgis, who's lived here most of his life. "There is a belief that Lalibela pilgrims share the same blessing as pilgrims to Jerusalem," he explains. "They have to come at least once in a lifetime."

HISTORIC LALIBELA- The history behind the Rock churches of Ethiopia'

UPDATES: Carved straight from red volcanic stone, and actually from a single stone, Lalibela is the place of pilgrimage of thousands of christians every year, and is one of Ethiopia's holiest places. It was intended to be the New Jerusalem, in response to the capture of Jerusalem by Muslims. The architecture of Lalibela was revealed to King Gebrel Mesqel Lalibela one night in his dreams (he is said to have seen Jerusalem in his dreams)by God; he was instructed to build churches never seen before. Lalibela isactually made up of 11 medieval churches rock-hewn. Many of its names come from Jerusalem, like the Yordannos (Jordan) river, the church of Mary, etc.

The most well-known is the Church of Saint George (or Bete-Giyorgis in Amharic) which was probably the last one built around the 13th century and has the shape of a cross and has been referred by some as the 8th wonder of the world. It is about 30 m deep, and is simply stunningly beautiful! Talk about a church built on stone! Lalibela is now regarded asone of the greatest Ethiopian architectural wonders and is ranked the eighth most incredible historical site in the world by UNESCO. It entered the UNESCO world heritage in 1978. Ethiopians themselves love to tour their own country and treasures, and about 1/3 of the tourists at popularEthiopian sites are Ethiopians.

REPORT: The veteran Author key to the disappearance of the late novelistBa'alu Girma’

Ethiomedia (July 10, 2014) WASHINGTON, DC - Asfaw Damte, author andcritic widely known among the literary circles in Addis Ababa, has been implicated in the disappearance in March, 1984 of renowned journalist andnovelist Ba'alu Girma, a new report sheds light.

Authored by Abera Lemma, journalist, poet and novelist, the report quotesBa'alu's wife as saying: "Asfaw Damte was the person who set up an appointment and invited my husband for an outing on the night of March 2nd, 1984, from which ba'alu was never seen again." The words of Woizero Almaz Abera, the wife of Ba'alu, are also contained in a report submitted to a court in Addis about two decades ago.

Though 79-year-old Asfaw Damte has made guest apperances on nationalradio and TV, he has never been asked nor he talked about his link to Ba'alu's death. Ba'alu, who was also information minister at the time, wrote a much-talked-about book, Oromai, the possible cause for his deathduring the Mengistu era.

Oromai is a Tigrinya word meaning for "it is over, finished", and the bookwas a narration of Eritrea's war of secession from Ethiopia, which Ba'alu summed up as "Oromai" - the inference of which means "Eritrea is a lostcase for Ethiopia." The book, which was considered by the military junta as a blow to its war efforts to defeat the northern secessionists, was banned in the country but had for a long time remained a literary sensation underground.

Former military dictator Mengistu Hailemariam denied any link to the novelist's killing, counter to public belief that no one would have orderedthe murder of the nation's numero uno novelist except Mengistu.

But thefirst step into the murder begins with Asfaw Damte, a man who was a close friend of the Ba'alu family and cut off all ties after Ba'alu was killednearly 30 years ago in mysterious circumstances.

OIL EXPLORATION: TULLOW OIL TO PACK UP AND LEAVE’

Fourth exploration well in South Omo turns out dryReporter Ethiopia (July 12, 2014)

The British oil company that has been prospecting for oil in South Omo,Tullow Oil, recently drilled the fourth oil exploration well in South Omo named Gardim 1.

(The Reporter News Analysis) Reliable sources told The Reporter that thedrilling crew of Tullow drilled Gardim 1 with Exalo 205 rig to a total depthof 1,900 meters and reached the bottom. Sources said the drilling crew conducted well-testing on Gardim 1 two weeks ago adding that the well turned out dry. “They did not find oil in the well,” sources told The Reporter. Well-testing is conducted by sucking air out of an exploration well and creating a vacuum in the well. Due to the pressure difference in the well (the pressure in the well will be lower than the surrounding area)and if there is oil and gas accumulation in the area it will flow to the well.Petroleum geologists call the flow “oil or gas inflow”. If there is no oil andgas flow the well will be termed a dry well. Sadly, that is what happed at Gardim 1.

Previously Tullow Oil drilled three wells in South Omo and Chew Bahir. Thecompany noted some oil and gas show at the first well dubbed Sabisa1 drilled near Omorate town. Encouraged by the results of Sabisa 1 the company drilled the second well-Tultule 1 four km away from Sabisa 1.

Tultule 1 was abandoned as a dry well. The company then turned its face to Chew Bahir basin and drilled Shimela 1 well, which also turned out dry. Then the Exalo 250 rig was moved to Gardim 1 and supped the well in May. Sources told The Reporter Tullow spent more than 155 million dollarson the four exploration wells drilled in southern Ethiopia. The company spent 65 million dollars only on Sabisa 1 well, the most difficult well to drill. The drilling crew encountered well instability at Sabisa 1 and had difficulty to reach the targeted depth. Consequently, they were forced to stop drilling farther and started to drill horizontally.

Sources told The Reporter that executives of Tullow decided to suspend drilling operation in Ethiopia. “They will pull out their drilling crew out of Ethiopia. They will take out their core staff to other projects in other countries and lay off the rest of the staff in their Ethiopia office. They will only keep a skeleton office in Addis Ababa,” sources said. Sources at Tullow Oil told The Reporter that executives of Tullow Oil last Friday calleddifferent contractors that have been contracted by Tullow for a meeting and thanked them for working with them so far.

After buying a 50 percent stake on the South Omo block from Africa Oil, aCanadian oil firm, in 2010 Tullow embarked on oil exploration work in South Omo. Tullow contracted a Chinese firm that specializes in doing seismic survey, BGP Geoservices. BGP has a rich experience in undertaking seismic surveys in different countries, including Kenya and Uganda. BGP collected encouraging seismic data from South Omo and Chew Bahir basins. Petroleum experts of Tullow analyzed the seismic dataand selected four drilling locations based on the data. Seismic survey is conducted by sending waves to underground by using vibrator machines or explosives. When the waves bounce back and reach the surface of the earth they will be collected by gadgets dubbed geophones. Seismic data isinterpreted by geophysics. Seismic data helps to identify the undergroundstructures.

Tullow has a successful exploration history in Ghana, Uganda and Kenya. The fact that Tullow discovered huge crude oil reserves in the Albert basinof Uganda, Turkana and Lokichar basins of Kenya raised the hope of industry experts for the discovery oil in Ethiopia. As the South Omo and Chew Bahir basins were adjacent to the oil prone Turkana basin, many thought that Tullow Oil will strike oil in South Omo. Unfortunately, Tullow could not repeat its African success story in Ethiopia. After drilling four wild-cat wells in South Omo and Chew Bahir the company decided to suspend drilling operations in Ethiopia.

Sisay Zerihun, senior corporate affairs advisor with Tullow Oil said that thecompany will soon issue a press release. Sisay did not confirm or deny thenews. However, he said Tullow will not go out. Communication directoratedirector with the Ministry of Mines, Bacha Fuji, said that he was unable to reply as he was on an extended meeting. Petroleum experts say that oil exploration is a long process that takes a prolonged time. “Petroleum exploration is capital-intensive and risky. It is a tricky business,” an industry analyst said. The analyst went on to say that the fact that Tullow did not find oil in the four exploration wells does not mean that there is nooil in South Omo. “You need to drill more wells. But that relies on the decision of the management and financial resource of the company,” he said.

In a recent training workshop organized by the Ministry of Mines, Dr. Ketsela Tadesse, petroleum licensing and administration directorate director with the ministry of mines, said that in neighboring Kenya Tullowdiscovered oil after global oil giants like ExxonMobile, Amoco and British Petroleum pulled out of that country saying that there was no oil. Tullow Oil owns a 50 percent stake in the South Omo block while the Vancouver-based company, Africa Oil, and Marathon Oil, the Texas based energy company, own 30 percent and 20 percent stake respectively. Originally, the South Omo block belonged to White Nile, a UK oil firm in which the South Sudan government has a stake. A couple of years ago White Nile changed its name to Agriterra Ltd. (Text ends)

DIARIES: The History of British Relationship with Ethiopia’

Ethio-British bond goes back many years: Emperor Haile Selassie spent World War II in Britain, which then went on to help restore him to his throne. And more recently, the 1984-1985 famine in Ethiopia becomes acause célèbre in Britain, which raised 5 million pounds ($8.56 million) injust three days. Today, Britain gives Ethiopia 374 million pounds ($640 million) a year and has ignored past calls for aid to be curtailed due to authorities’ numerous human rights violations.

A case currently making its way through British courts alleges that aid money has paid for developments that have resulted in Ethiopians being driven from their lands. The case, on behalf of an anonymous farmer, “Mr.

O," is being brought by Leigh Day, a British legal firm with a long record of winning compensation for clients abroad. It arises from a 2012 report by Human Rights Watch that alleged that some 45,000 families have beenremoved from their lands in the western Ethiopian region of Gambella.

Lynne Featherstone, a British aid minister, happened to be in Addis Ababaat the time of Andargachew's extradition and raised his case with Prime Minister Hailemariam. Yet diplomatic engagement seems to be the only means of protest that is of any interest. There is no suggestion that Britishaid to Ethiopia will be halted or curtailed. There have been no statements from the U.S. government. The Prominent Ethiopian opposition politician Andargachew Tsigie's detention has drawn public protests in Britain and the United States. His member of Parliament has raised the case with the British government, as has an influential member of the European Parliament.

But more pressure will be required if the Ethiopian authorities are to dropthe charges against Andargachew. Threats to the multimillion-dollar aid budget might just do the trick. Otherwise, the Ethiopian government might silence one of its most prominent critics for good — through jail or worse. "They told [Featherstone] they would not carry out the death sentence," wife Yemi says quietly. "But I have no confidence in what theysay."

RULE OF LAW: The Crime of Extraordinary Rendition'

VIEW POINT: (July 13, 2014) - Last week, the regime in Ethiopia announced its abduction of Andaragatchew Tsgie, General Secretary of theEthiopian opposition group known as Ginbot 7 Movement for Justice, Freedom and Democracy, with smug delight. According to the regime, the "Ethiopian national security service coordinating with its Yemeni counterpart had detained and transferred to Ethiopia [Andaragatchew Tsgie] as he tried to enter Eritrea through Sanaa [Yemen]." Andargatchewis a British national of Ethiopian origin. Yemeni officials denied Adargatchew access to British consular officials, legal representation and contact with family members before subjecting him to extraordinary rendition to the regime in Ethiopia.State terrorism through the use of

"anti-terrorism law" and violation of the rule of international law

The hallmark of any failed state is the absence of the rule of law. The hallmark of the failed criminal state is the flagitious violation of the rule ofconstitutional and international law. I see little difference in principle between what Boko Haram did in Nigeria to abduct nearly 300 young women three months ago and what the regime in Ethiopia has done in theabduction of Andargatchew Tsgie. The regime argues that Andargatchew is a "terrorist" and has been sentenced to death in absentia under the so-called anti-terrorism law (Anti-Terrorism Proclamation No. 652/2009). AsI have demonstrated in dozens of commentaries since 2006, the prosecution of political opponents for “treason” and “terrorism” in Ethiopiais a legal persecution and lynching of political opponents in kangaroo court. As numerous annual U.S. State Department human rights reports have documented, Ethiopia’s anti-terrorism “law” is merely a convenient mechanism for “politically motivated trials and convictions of opposition figures, activists, journalists, and bloggers, as well as increased restrictions on print media.” A conviction and a sentence of death for those charged with “terrorism” is foreordained and a foregone conclusion.The fact of the matter is that a sentence of death on a person charged with “terrorism” in Ethiopia’s kangaroo courts is like a sentence of capital punishment on an antelope at a convention of hyenas. In a country that lacks judicial independence and where judges are instructed to make legaldeterminations, no conviction and imposition of the death penalty could stand fair and independent legal scrutiny.

It is a misnomer to call the regime’s “anti-terrorism” proclamation a “law”.Proclamation 652 is “law” of the bush, the jungle. As I have demonstratedin my commentary, “Ethiopia: Dictatorship is State Terrorism”, Proclamation 652 is an arbitrary and capricious diktat conceived and crafted by the late Meles Zenawi and approved by his rubberstamp parliament. That proclamation has been thoroughly condemned and criticized by all of the major international human rights organization. For instance, Human Rights Watch criticized that “law” for providing “an extremely broad and ambiguous definition of terrorism that could be used to criminalize non-violent political dissent and various other activities that should not be deemed as terrorism.” Even the U.S. State Department expressed its disapproval of the “extremely harsh and politicized use of Ethiopia’s anti-terrorism law” in persecuting political opponents. To add insult to injury, in every single suspected case of “terrorism”, Meles Zenawi and his spokesmen have made outrageous and prejudicial public comments and levelled angry and unsubstantiated accusations against “terrorism” suspects while trials are underway, violating the suspects’ constitutional right to the presumption of innocence and a fair trial. It is also a fact that all suspects accused of “terrorism” by the regime have been denied right to counsel and other constitutional rights during interrogations and subjected to physical and psychological torture. The regime has also exerted political pressure on the courts to make findings of guilt in “reason” and “terrorism” cases. Professor Alemayehu G. Mariam teaches political science at California State University, San Bernardino andis a practicing defense lawyer.

DIARIES: Who is The British Naturalized Andargachew Tsigie? Andargachew Tsige used to be EPRDF member and got British passport."You mess with my citizen, you mess with my sovereignty."

Andargachew’s entrance into politics came when he was a college studentin Addis Ababa in the early 1970s. He joined one of the left-wing parties that fell out with the regime. But soon, life became untenable: The Derg sent its security services door to door to crush its opponents. Bodies wereleft in the streets of the capital. Andargachew’s younger brother, Amha Tsige, was murdered for his involvement in left-wing politics.

Like many of his generation, Andargachew slipped out of the country and sought sanctuary in Britain in 1979. After being granted refugee status, hereturned to his studies in London. When the current government came to power in May 1991, Andargachew decided to return home and took up work with the Addis Ababa city council. Yet hopes that Ethiopia’s new government, led by Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, would put the country’s violent past behind them soon faded. A coalition government with the opposition fell apart, and renewed repression followed. Andargachew fell out with the authorities and left for Britain once more.

In 1998, during a trip to the United States, Andargachew and Yemi met through a friend. They started a relationship and a new life in Britain. But in 2005, with fresh elections and a renewed hope for democracy back home, Andargachew went back to Ethiopia to work with the charismatic opposition leader, Berhanu Nega, in the Coalition for Unity and Democracy(CUD).

In the elections, the CUD managed to take almost every seat in the capitaland may have even won a majority in the rest of the country. But the authorities were not prepared to accept the outcome. Amid allegations of vote rigging and widespread protests, Andargachew was arrested. “For 18 days, there was a blackout,” says Yemi. “They told us nothing.” Traveling from Britain, she finally managed to see him. He had been beaten in detention, his face badly bruised and his eye injured. “It still gives him problems,” Yemi explains. After a month, Andargachew was released on bail and slipped out of the country. With the election effectively annulled, some 60,000 people detained, and around 200 dead, the opposition decided there was little room left for democratic opposition. Meeting in Washington in 2008, Ginbot 7 was formed; the name, “May 15″ in Amharic, commemorates the day of the 2005 election. Andargachew became secretary-general.

Since the 2005 election, Ethiopia has proved to be a remarkable economicsuccess story. The World Bank recorded growth of 10.3 percent in 2013.

Analysts suggest this is skewed in favor of the ruling party and its associates, but there is no doubt that the economy has flourished. The political picture, by contrast, is bleak. The U.S. State Department 2013 report on human rights in Ethiopia documents “restrictions on freedom ofexpression and association, including through arrests; detention; politically motivated trials; harassment; and intimidation of opposition members and journalists, as well as continued restrictions on print media.” Opposition members have been arrested and had their phones aretapped, and exiled movements such as Ginbot 7 have had their websites blocked. Up until the fateful 2005 election, the Ethiopian regime’s target of repression focused only on dissidents living in Ethiopia. Except badmouthing Ethiopians living abroad, for their criticism of its divisive ethnic politics and tyranny in the name of democracy, the regime had never dared to harm Ethiopians living abroad.

That changed drastically and officially with the advent of trumped up charges leveled against Ethiopian/Americans working for Voice of Americaand some individuals who run critical websites from abroad. They were charged in absentia alongside Coalition for Unity and Democracy (CUD) opposition party leaders who won the 2005 election. The trumped up charge called for death penalty. The regime also found an opportune moment globally to extend its instrument of repression abroad with impunity. It did so by ingratiating itself with Washington and the entire West as an ally in the so-called war on terror. Its monopoly on the country’s natural resources and key economic sectors also enabled it to cut deals with regional greedy powers who do not hesitate to hand over Ethiopian asylum seekers and refugees in violation of the international law.Djibouti,Sudan,Yemen and Kenya are notorious in this.

In July 2005, the government of Djibouti handed over two Ethiopian Air force pilots named Behailu Gebre and Abiyot Mangudai.They defected withthe assault helicopter they were flying as conscientious objectors against the regime that uses lethal weapon on civilians. Last time I checked, theseasylum seekers who were unlawfully returned were kept incommunicado at the Air force Headquarter and had been subjected to torture that might have caused their death. Taking advantage of the rotten Police Force in Kenya, the Ethiopian regime has been using the Kenyan territory as its backyard to abduct and assassinate Ethiopian dissidents who sought asylum. Notable among the Ethiopian refugees who were arrested by Kenyan authorities and handed over to the Ethiopian regime around 2009 were two young Engineers named Mesfin Abebe Abdissa and Tesfahun Chemeda Gurmessa.At the time the duo sought asylum, they were sentenced by a Kangaroo court in absentia to life imprisonment and death. As a result of their forcible repatriation, they were subjected to severe torture which ultimately caused the death of Tesfahun while Mesfinis still languishing in death row. He was the one who had been sentenced to death.

In a bid to give unlawful repatriation of asylum seekers and refugees as well as extraordinary rendition of other individuals a legal cloak, these banana republics of Horn of Africa and Great Lakes region later signed asort of extradition treaty under the auspices of IGAD.Since the Ethiopianregime is almost the sole beneficiary of that extradition treaty, it was initiated by its diabolic architects of repression. The government alleges that Ginbot 7 engaged in active rebellion and that Andargachew has participated in terrorist activities, a claim that Yemi adamantly denies andthat many analysts find dubious. Groups such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch sternly condemned Andargachew's arrest. (Textends)

The History of Opposition Politics In Ethiopia'

Meles Zenawi used Somali Passport during the armed struggle' - Andargachew Tsige who used to be an EPRDF combatant why not getsBritish passport at a defect?

The Reporter Analysis (July 13, 2014) Andargachew Tsige had appeared on Ethiopian state television. He was shown on the news bulletin just for aminute. Yet, every word he uttered seems to need further investigation.

One hardly expects a person to be happy when falling at the hands of a government that passed a death penalty for his illegal activity, which thejudicially confirmed to be within the realm of terrorism. He said that he ishappy, that he is at peace with himself, that he feels settled, that he heldno grudge against those who got hold of him.

The government has announced that he was extradited to Ethiopia immediately after his capture by Yemeni security officials. This terminatedthe widely reported speculations on the whereabouts of the secretary- general of Ginbot 7, an opposition group that has been labeled by the Ethiopian parliament as a terrorist organization alongside the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), Al- Shabaab and Al-Qaeda. However, the extent of legal and political implications of Andargachew in the hands of Ethiopia still remains with so many unanswered questions. The role, status and future of the three countries involved in his case, Yemen, UK and Ethiopia, is far from clear. Some questioned if the act of Yemen is in conformity with international law. Considering the fact that Ginbot 7 is claiming to fight for the rights ofEthiopians and that its leader is having a UK passport, many ordinary Ethiopians are wondering on the implications of the latter on the former.

On the one hand, UK is accused of not involving itself the affairs of its citizen both with Yemen and Ethiopia. On the other hand, many accuse UKgranting a citizenship to Andargachew who is a leader of an organization working to forcefully overthrow the Ethiopian government, while extending assistance to the government to ensure peace and security in the Horn of Africa region. A few are also curious if the incident involving Ginbot 7 and Andargachew will affect the relatively good relationship between UK and Ethiopia.

Ginbot 7 was founded in 2008 by Berhanu Nega (Ph.D.) who was elected mayor of Addis Ababa in 2005 after his party, Coalition for Unity and Democracy (CUD), achieved a landslide victory in the general parliamentary election. Ginbot 7 (15 May) was named after the date of the2005 elections, which the ruling Ethiopan Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) won, but which the opposition said was rigged.Berhanu Nega and other top leaders of CUD were jailed following days of protest and clashes on the streets of the capital caused by the alleged election rigging by EPRDF. Ginbot 7 was founded immediately after Berhanu Nega was released.

The group says it is fighting for democracy in Ethiopia and calls for regimechange through any means including armed struggle. A year later, it was reported that the government aborted the attempted assassination of government officials under the leadership of Ginbot 7 as the group allegedly aspired to realize its establishment objective. In 2009, the Federal High Court confirmed this by sentencing five people to death and 33 others to life in prison for planning to assassinate government officials.Prosecutors had said the convicted were part of the Ginbot 7.

Andargachew Tsige was among those sentenced to death in absentia along with Berhanu Nega, also in absentia, and another opposition leaderMelaku Tefera.

According to reports, the death sentences were reserved for the political leaders of the plot, while those sentenced to life imprisonment were activeor former military officers. Andergachew Tsige was sentenced to death.

After the sentence, he told the BBC's Focus on Africa program that the ruling was not unexpected. "It is not surprising to us and probably to the people of Ethiopia," he said. "We know the price of freedom – the preservation of rights always forces us to pay sacrifice and if that sacrificemeans to be sentenced to death, so be it." Back then Andargachew was not shy to declare that armed struggle is a viable option for the group.

Andargachew said. "As long as they [the government] refuse to listen, wewill use any means possible to force them to listen or to force them out ofoffice." Eventually, Ginbot 7 was designated as a terrorist organization bythe parliament in June 2011.

In June 2012, Andargachew was convicted again in absentia, this time under the controversial 2009 anti-terrorism law, along with 23 journalists,activists, and opposition members. Again, he was sentenced to death.

Andargachew, who was second-in-command of Ginbot 7, was a member of the Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM), one of the members of the ruling coalition, the EPRDF. He returned back to Ethiopia from England in 1991 where he was living as an immigrant. He claims thatdifferent factors forced him to resign from membership of EPRDF and the Addis Ababa EPRDF Committee in 1993. Included among these are: the party ideology, Eritrean referendum, independence of the state-financed media, the practice of democratic centralism, lack of meritocracy in the selection and promotion of officials, pervasive practice of corruption and rent-seeking behavior of the top leadership, and the absence of the ruling party auditing.

Yemen’s controversial decision to extradite Andargachew to Ethiopia: TheEthiopian National Intelligence and Security Service (NISS) on Tuesday confirmed that Yemeni authorities have extradited Andargachew Tsige, secretary-general of Ginbot 7, to Addis Ababa. Andargachew Tsige, was arrested by Yemeni security forces on June 23 at Sanaa’s El Rahaba International Airport while in transit between the United Arab Emirates and Eritrea.

Yemen is accused of violating basic principles of international law when arresting Andargachew, and secretly handing him to Ethiopia. Yemen counters this accusation by explaining that the decision to hand over to Ethiopia is made under an extradition treaty signed in 1999 between the late Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi and Yemeni’s former presidentAli Abdela Salah, to enable exchange of wanted criminals.

According to the report in ‘The Economist’ magazine, there are concerns that Yemen’s government did not follow the correct procedures for extradition. It is believed that Andargachew was arrested and flown to Addis Ababa without British officials being formally alerted. According to Anand Doobay, an extradition expert at Peters & Peters, a law firm, underthe Vienna Convention on Consular Relations the British embassy should have been notified that one of its citizens was being detained and given the chance to visit him. “Sometimes there is no legal extradition process and then there is a risk that rendition can take place following informal contact between police forces,” he says.

Leslie Lefkow, deputy Africa director of the Human Rights Watch, also questioned the legality of the actions of both Ethiopia and Yemen. “Ethiopia needs to demonstrate that it is holding Andargachew in accordance with its international obligations, and he should be allowed immediate access to a lawyer, his family, and to British consular officials,”Lefkow said. She also accused Yemeni officials of not permitting him consular access to UK embassy officials and summarily deported him to Ethiopia

Under the Convention against Torture, which Yemen ratified in 1991, a government may not “expel, return or extradite a person to another statewhere there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.” Lefkow insists that these protections override any extradition treaty or other security arrangementthat may exist between Yemen and Ethiopia.

The UK Foreign and Commonwealth Office, in its statement, expressed itsdeep concerns on lack of responses for its consistent requests for information from the Yemeni authorities. It also suggests that the lack of any notification of his detention is in contravention of the Vienna convention. The Foreign Office reveals its concerns about the death penalty that Andargachew could face in Ethiopia. It added that the UK opposes the death penalty in all circumstances as a matter of principle.

An international law expert, who requested anonymity, told The Reporter that without detailed information on the domestic legal system of Yemen in relation to extradition and the extradition agreement between Ethiopia and Yemen, it is difficult to evaluate the legality of Yemen's decision to extradite Andargachew to Ethiopia. Some political commentators believe that Yemeni officials may have been eager to take a knock at the government of Eritrea, Andargachew's destination, because of the ongoingconflict between Yemen and Eritrea over the Hanish islands in the Red Sea.

Is really a British national fighting to overthrow a legitimate governmentin Ethiopia?

(VIEW POINT) Andargachew is Ethiopian-born with British citizenship. Following post-election protests in 2005 Andargachew had fled the countryand been granted asylum in Britain. NISS said the opposition figure has lived in Eritrea, Ethiopia's bitter rival, for five years where he had been collaborating with the regime in Asmara and other anti-peace elements to destabilize the nation. The intelligence agency further said Andargachew had been giving trainings to regional terrorists in the Red Sea nation.

What puzzled many Ethiopians is the fact that if Andargachew is a British national, why he is a leader of a guerrilla movement fighting to overthrowa government of another sovereign country, Ethiopia. Political commentators have a different view. In the absence of a passport from the country of origin particularly for political reasons, they point out that having a passport of another country for convenience and still fight for thecauses of the country of origin is common practice. They mention the fact that the late Prime Minister used to have a Somalia passport while leadinga guerrilla movement fighting to overthrow the Derg regime.

The expert prefers to treat the British passport of Andargachew in the context of statelessness. "I am sure before deciding on the application of asylum and giving him the passport to grant him refuge, Britain evaluatedhis situation. For example, if there were any piece of information suggesting that Andargachew committed universal crime like crimes against humanity, they would have excluded the grant. However, in the absence of such grounds, granting citizenship for an applicant who can establish a genuine connection to a specific country is encouraged as international law prohibits statelessness," explains the expert. The expert also argues that one can enforce his citizenship right in court if it is possible to prove that it is denied arbitrarily.

The expert notes that the UN Conventions on statelessness that is primarily aimed at reducing statelessness are not ratified by many countries. While indicating the fact that citizenship could be lost either with voluntary denouncement or involuntary revocation, the expert maintains that the later is more problematic than the former to establish genuine connection. Living abroad for a long period of time is one way to establish a genuine connection while at the same time it is also a ground for revocation of citizenship. Under Ethiopian law, dual citizenship is prohibited. The moment someone secures the citizenry of other country, his/her citizenship will be revoked. However, NISS said having dual citizenship won't prevent anyone from legal accountability. It is not clear ifthe statement implies that Andargachew had double citizenship.

The expert observes that the fact that Andargachew has been working with Eritrea, which is currently in a no-war, no-peace situation with Ethiopia, and the court decision pronouncing the death penalty on Andargachew will give Ethiopia a slender opportunity to justify its decisions. Andargachew was seized while traveling to Eritrea, a country that seceded from Ethiopia in 1993 and is since then known for destabilizing the Horn of Africa region. Even the UN officially reported thatEritrea has worked together with the Somalia-based terrorist organizationAl-Shabaab. Eritrea is host to some organizations attempting to overthrowthe Ethiopian government by force, including Ginbot 7.

UK's stand over the extradition of Andargachew: Many commentators, including journalist Martin Plaut, are surprised by the lack of concrete action from UK. The UK Foreign Office has been accused of failing to act toprevent the extradition to Ethiopia of Andargachew. Andargachew was charged by the Ethiopian authorities with terrorism and sentenced, in absentia, to death, at two separate trials in 2009 and 2012. Considering the death sentence, many are speculating that Andargachew may face a death sentence in Ethiopia.

Ephrem Madebo, a spokesman for Ginbot 7, Andargachew's UK-based wifeYemisrach Hailemariam, and Ana Gomez, a Portuguese member of the European parliament who led the EU Observation Mission to the 2005 Ethiopian elections, have complained that the UK government should haveintervened in the case to the extent of requesting his release. British diplomats say they are demanding access to Andargachew, so far without success.

The UK Foreign Office called in the Yemeni ambassador before two weeks,while the whereabouts of Andargachew was still in a limbo. It was also reported that it was urgently seeking confirmation if Andargachew was in Ethiopia. Fighting terrorism is one of the areas that Ethiopia and UK are working together. Accused of attempting to overthrow the Ethiopian government by force, Ginbot 7 was declared a terrorist organization.

Ginbot 7 has advocated the armed overthrow of the Ethiopian government. Discharging its international legal obligation is considered asa justification behind UK's decision to grant Andargachew a UK passport. However, in light of the good diplomatic relationship between Ethiopia and UK, some questioned if the decision is politically correct. Others evenexpect UK to revoke Andargachew's citizenship now.

The expert is of the opinion that it is not easy for the UK to revoke his citizenship. "The individual's political behavior, particularly if it is prejudicial against the citizen giver, is a good enough reason to revoke thenationality. The basic question that we have to ask in relation to Andargachew is how Ginbot 7 is perceived by UK. Citizenship is not only about benefits. It is also about responsibility and allegiance to the citizen giver. The national interest of the passport bearing country should not be compromised by the activities of the individual. For example, Andargachew is convicted with terrorism. It is a public knowledge that Ethiopia's definition of terrorism is way different from UK's. UK always criticizes Ethiopia's anti-terrorism proclamation for broadly interpreting terrorism. So I don't think the issue will harm their relationship," the expert concludes. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA: UK Aid Should Respect Rights Ruling Permits Review of Development Agency's Compliance' London (JULY 14, 2014) A UK High Court ruling allowing judicial review of the UK aid agency's compliance with its own human rights policies in Ethiopia is an important step towardgreater accountability in development assistance. In its decision of July 14, 2014, the High Court ruled that allegations that the UK Department for International Development (DFID) did not adequately assess evidenceof human rights violations in Ethiopia deserve a full judicial review.

"The UK high court ruling is just a first step, but it should be a wake-up call for the government and other donors that they need rigorous monitoring to make sure their development programs are upholding their commitments to human rights," said Leslie Lefkow, deputy Africa director."UK development aid to Ethiopia can help reduce poverty, but serious rights abuses should never be ignored." The case involves Mr. O (not his real name), a farmer from Gambella in western Ethiopia, who alleges that DFID violated its own human rights policy by failing to properly investigateand respond to human rights violations linked to an Ethiopian governmentresettlement program known as "villagization." Mr. O is now a refugee in aneighboring country. Human Rights Watch has documented serious humanrights violations in connection with the first year of the villagization program in Gambella in 2011 and in other regions of Ethiopia in recent years.

A January 2012 Human Rights Watch report based on more than 100 interviews with Gambella residents, including site visits to 16 villages, concluded that villagization had been marked by forced displacement, arbitrary detentions, mistreatment, and inadequate consultation, and thatvillagers had not been compensated for their losses in the relocation process.People resettled in new villages often found the land infertile and frequently had to clear the land and build their own huts under military supervision. Services they had been promised, such as schools, clinics, and water pumps, were not in place when they arrived. In many cases villagers had to abandon their crops, and pledges of food aid in the new villages never materialized. The UK, along with the World Bank and other donors, fund a nationwide development program in Ethiopia called the Promotion of Basic Services program (PBS). The program started after theUK and other donors cut direct budget support to Ethiopia after the country's controversial May-2005 elections. (Text ends)

Hard-talk : Quality of Higher Education in Ethiopia: A historical backlogEM VIEW POINT (July 14, 2014)

In education as much as it is with water and food, the right combination ofquantity and quality is very important. Water and food is what we drink and eat, education is what Ethiopia drinks and eats. If it is forced to take in a huge quantity of bad quality education it may have a sick economy and politics as much as we may have a sick belly as a result of huge quantity of bad quality water and food.Everyone in Ethiopia seems to be well aware of the benefits of high enough quality of education to run a healthy economy and political and social life. Highly placed politicians and ordinary people in the street alike air their frustrations about the poor quality education in Ethiopia. All kinds of institutional mechanisms have been put in place and budget earmarked for them. Are these mechanisms showing any progress? The answer is a big NO! How can they show any progress? Those that are assigned to those institutional positions are either victims of that bad quality education or political appointees who have little to do with the science of pedagogy or both. Appointing someone to any position, including this knowledge and skill-sensitive management of quality of education in Ethiopia is by and large based on ethnic, regional, zonal, even wereda affiliations and/or political or personalloyalties.

It is the chick of today that becomes the hen of the next month. It is the child of today that becomes an adult 30 years later. Unless the child is well nurtured and well-bred at all age levels it will be impossible to reverse the negative personality traits built into the human character for 30 years. The deterioration of the quality of education can be traced to asfar back as the student movement years during the last monarchy.

Teachers were all trained in the west and the curriculum was almost invariably American. These American trained PhDs in all fields or academicdepartments were replicating the curricula of the universities they got their degrees from instead of adapting them to the Ethiopian economic, technological, historical, social and cultural contexts. It was not only the American trained Ethiopians that were detached from the society that theywere meant to serve and simply lived cocooned in American realties insideEthiopia. There was also another front where particularly secondary students were drawn into American life while they still lived in Ethiopia.

The American peace-corps volunteers bred a generation of secondary school students who were able to list down all the 50 states of USA whilethey were not sure how many governorate generals Ethiopia had at that time.

Graduates from HSIU had little at their disposal to deliver the then 90 percent of poor subsistence farmers and pastoralists from the deep seatedpoverty they were in. Education was basically elitist with political science and law reigning supreme. The engineering, agricultural,and business fields were looked down upon as advanced extensions of the despised occupations of the “balej”, “afer-gefi”, and “mechangnanekash”.In addition to the bad attitudes to the developmental fields of knowledge most students were deeply engrossed in the efforts to end the monarchial rule and establish a republic in Ethiopia. A socialist republic to be more exact. Without trying to evaluate whether this was right or wrong, the student struggle waged towards this end was eating voraciously into the students’ time for the teaching and learning. More time was being spent for “fano-tesemara” mass rallies, dorm-corridor oratories, and class boycotts rather than for studying and research. As the economy deteriorated and social and political crisis brewed here and there; as the grip of the monarchial government loosened, a feeling of rebelliousness insome, hopelessness in others prevailed among university students. The abilities and interest of students to pursue their education, the interest of teachers to guide students was deteriorating beyond repair. The future became undoubtedly at stake. These feelings and attitudes of university students became so contagious to secondary school students throughout the Country, who looked upon the university students as leaders to a new political future. So, attentions were diverted from academic to politics withsevere repercussions to future university admissions of the secondary school students.

The “highjacked” popular revolution by a Military regime started the long episode of slow but sure demise of whatever quality existed in the education system. The best brains from Universities and secondary schools were either jailed and massacred or joined the armed-struggles and perished or exiled. Most of an entire generation of would be economic, technological, social and political leaders was lost or demoralized. Sent to the “development campaign” university and senior secondary school students were detached from academic life and exposedto the loss of talent and creativity. Their brains were overcrowded with political terminologies and factional doctrines. They became more trigger happy and homicidal towards those who differed; moods that are uncharacteristic to any university or secondary student.

There dawned the era of the mediocre and less. Later on, teacher recruitment was from what was available. That is, from among those thatdid not join the EPRP, MAESON, TPLF, OLF, ELF/EPLF, etc. The domain outof which to choose teachers for university teaching was very limited. An entire generation of brainy Ethiopians had already been lost to violent politics and brain drain. A flood of ill-trained graduates from the socialist countries with poor academic backgrounds swallowed the Nation. The Military government considered western education as imperialist and branded the scholars as petty bourgeoisie.As a result, those who went forhigher education to the western countries never returned. Now with theirgreat talents they are serving the host countries in Europe and America. The socialist ideology guided the contents of education where loyalty to Marxist-Leninist doctrines was taken as the key criterion for relevance of school and university curricula. Teachers were recruited in large numbersfrom the socialist countries such as Cuba, East Germany, and the Soviet Union.

In the second half of the seventies the Military government introduced thethree- year duration for university education. This brought the deterioration of the quality of higher education to a new hazardous level. The rush to finish in time was forcing teachers to skip chapters in courses.The disillusionment among students and teachers about the reduction of one year was taking its toll. Ill trained graduates were joining the labor force. Soon, the reduction of one year was abandoned and the four-year restored. However, the adverse effects of the three-year duration could not easily go away as graduate assistants were recruited for university teaching from the three-year batches, with inadequate training, starting a vicious cycle of poor training and poor performance; and recruitment of poor performing teachers from among the poor performing students.

On top of this, a tradition of recruiting graduate assistants for university teaching from among the supporters of the Military government became established irrespective of their performance. This was the beginning of nepotism in university teacher recruitment which paved the way for somerascals among the senior academic staff to facilitate for recruitment into their respective departments those graduates who share the same place of birth with them. After recruitment the new teachers employed without merit continued the “tradition” making many academic departments look like kinship communities. When such communities become more than one in one department rivalries and conflicts arise between them further harming the teaching and learning processes. Grading, scholarship and other opportunities followed the same criterionmarginalizing other students and staff who do not belong to the same “group”. In fact, this was only the beginning. PMHD Speaks on BBC about Andargachew Tsege’

(BBC) Ethiopia had a moral obligation to arrest the opposition leader who was controversially extradited from Yemen last month, Ethiopian leader Hailemariam Desalegn has told the BBC. “Andargachew Tsege is a Trojan horse for the Eritrean government to destabilise this country,” he said. Hewas sentenced to death in 2009 while in exile for plotting a coup. Foreign governments could express their concern, but the man would be dealt with according to the law, the PM told the BBC. Andargachew, a UK national, is secretary-general of Ethiopia's banned Ginbot 7 movement.The group says Andargachew was on his way from the United Arab Emirates to Eritrea when he was detained at Sanaa airport on 24 June. Ethiopia and Eritrea are long-time rivals and the neighbours fought a bitter border war between 1998 -2000, which left some 100,000 peopledead.

'Caught red-handed' Earlier this week, the British Foreign Office said it had raised its "deep concerns" with both Ethiopia and Yemen over Andargachew's extradition and had requested reassurances that the deathpenalty, imposed in absentia, would not be carried out. The prime ministerHailemariam rejected concerns about Andargachew's treatment. He quotes as saying, "If you have any connection with terrorists don't think that the Ethiopian government will let you [go] free"

He said his trial and that of several other Ginbot 7 leaders in 2009 – whowere charged with planning to assassinate government officials – was "fair". "His stooges were there, who were sent to destabilise and bomb this country – they were captured red-handed with their bombs and theirdetonating elements," he told the BBC's Focus on Africa programme.

Asked if the death penalty would be carried out now that Andargachewwas in custody, the prime minister replied: "I cannot say this now."

Mr Hailemariam said Ethiopia was a young democracy and opposition parties were allowed to operate, but terrorism would not be tolerated. "If you ask me to tolerate in the name of democracy those who are engaging[in] destabilising the country and acting as a terrorist and using guns to change government, then you are wrong," he said. The prime minister also denied that Ethiopia was heavy handed in applying anti-terror laws. The country has faced criticism from donors for jailing its critics – and most recently some of the country's leading bloggers.

Mr. Hailemariam, who became prime minister in September 2012 following the death of long-time leader Meles Zenawi, said no matter people's professions, those found to be linked to "terrorist groups" wouldbe dealt with. "If you have any connection with terrorists don't think thatthe Ethiopian government will let you [go] free," he said. Ginbot 7 (15 May) was named after the date of the May-2005 elections, which were marred by protests over alleged fraud that led to the deaths of about 200people.

U.A.E vs DJIBOUTI: Interesting similarities on recent extradition issues'Why U.A.E refused to extradite Abdourahman Boreh to Djibouti ?

The Gulf State of U.A.E Doing It Right: - Why Dubai refused to extraditeAbdourahman Boreh to Djibouti...The ruling by the Dubai court against Djibouti's request for the extradition of French-Djibouti businessman Abdourahman Boreh is a snub to President Ismail Omar Guelleh. The courtchaired by the female Judge Aissa Mohamed Sharif issued its ruling at the end of April. The court has really distanced itself from the rulings of the Djibouti tribunal that had condemned Abdourahman Boreh for terrorism.

The Dubai judge deemed that her country was not bound to execute the Djibouti court ruling, because it had "been made in absentia" and that "nothing contained in the documents submitted by the Djibouti government made it enforceable". According to the Dubai court, an arrestwarrant cannot be issued "because such a measure must come from an investigating magistrate before trial and condemnation in absentia".

The "deeply flawed" Anti-Terrorism Act, being the bluntest judicial weapon, is repeatedly employed to silence critical voices and imprison those who dare to speak out against the government. According to HumanRights Watch (HRW), since the act was adopted in January 2009 "the independent media have been decimated by politically motivated prosecutions… Blogs and internet pages critical of the government are regularly blocked," and an all-pervasive atmosphere of fear is created by the paranoid dictatorship that spies on opposition members and journalists using surveillance practices that "violate the rights to freedom of expression, association, and access to information", says HRW.

Captain Guta Dinka: The Man that Foiled Nelson Mandela's Assassination'

EHSNA (July 14, 2014) - The story of Captain Guta Dinka is a remarkable story that must be told for generations. His instrumental role in saving Nelson's Mandela's life from assassination is a striking story that every Ethiopian should be proud of, and should be etched in Ethiopia's history forever. As the tyrannical apartheid government became increasingly vicious in its crackdown against dissent, the young Nelson Mandela had secretly travelled to Ethiopia for military training. During his stay in Ethiopia, two men were covertly assigned to protect him. Of these two men assigned to protect him was 35 year old Captain Guta Dinka who wasselected out of 4000 police officers. Nelson Mandela was purposely made unaware of their assignment for security reasons, and during his training, the two assigned officers would keep an eye on him from afar looking for potential dangers.

Then one day, Captain Guta Dinka was approached by a couple of foreigners who attempted to bribe him into helping them assassinates Nelson Mandela. They offered $2000.00 and gave him detailed instructions. Captain Dinka patiently listened to their proposition, and reported them to his superior officer the next day, upon which the twoforeigners were immediately apprehended and deported from Ethiopia. Captain Guta Dinka's simple act of duty is exemplary. His actions reflect duty, integrity, and honor which has always been the ideal Ethiopian trait.

At a time where these traits have been largely forgotten in out society, itis imperative that we appreciate and honor a rare gem. So come and celebrate with us and hear his personal account of how the assassinationwas foiled. The EHSNA is honored to have him as our special guest at out4th Annual Summer Festival that will be held from July 25th to the 27th. Captain Guta Dinka will be our special guest along with our guests of honors for this year. Eritrea Issues Diplomatic Passport to Key Ethiopian Opposition Figures'

ER (July 15, 2014) - The illegal abduction of Andargachew Tsigie by Yemeni officials in Sana'a airport has triggered a grim situation for Ethiopian opposition figures holding American or other Western nation passport as they could be next victims during their travel -- specially passing through neighboring Arab and IGAD member countries.

The statement issued by British government after the abduction is a glaring indication that Andargachew was abducted with full knowledge of the British government operatives. How on earth would a country ask another country that abducted its citizen that you could detain him as longas you will not carry out the death penalty?

Here it has to be clear that at the time of his transit through Yemen, Mr. Andargachew Tsegie was a British citizen with good standing. The British government reaction to the abduction should have been stated "immediate and unconditional release" of its citizen and also threaten to take the issue to international court if Ethiopia didn't positively respond toits request. However, to the dismay of all, the British government just added insult to the injury by asking the Ethiopian government to do anything it pleases with him as long as it doesn't carry out the death penalty passed on him in abstentia.

Now due to the furious reaction from Ethiopians worldwide, the British government placed itself in scandalous and embarrassing situation as it ispart of the illegal abduction of its own citizen by Yemeni and Ethiopian security agencies!

Given the looming danger of further abductions, Eritrean government is issuing Eritrean diplomatic passports to principal Ethiopian opposition figures as abducting any one holding Eritrean diplomatic passport by Yemen, Sudan or Kenya would put those nations in direct diplomatic collision course with Eritrean government. The problem holding US and other Western passport is becoming less safe as US and Western nationsare giving a green light for the arrest of Africans and Middle Eastern origins holding their passports.

The UK and US governments have been getting away with those types actions mainly on Somalians and others with middle eastern origins who were accused of “terrorist” activities. However, this time they made a wrong move because they touched a loved Ethiopian opposition icon and now the Britons are regretting their irresponsible actions. If the Ethiopianskeep their demonstrations in tandem of waging formidable legal fight, theBritish government will shoulder all the responsibility of any harm inflictedon Andargachew Tsegie. Diaspora Ethiopians should continue their demonstrations with no let up! (Text ends)

OBITUARY: Her Royal Highness Princess Hirut Desta Damtew dies at age84’

Royal Cello (July 15, 2014) Princess Hirut Desta (also known as Princess Ruth Desta) was the daughter of Ras Desta Damtew and Princess Tenagnework Haile Selassie, and granddaughter of Emperor Haile Selassie

I. She was the widow of Lt. General Nega Tegegn, who was governor of the provinces of Begemder and Semien. She has been described by Nathaniel T. Kenney as a "trim, most democratic of princesses," who "wasnot above grabbing a tool from a workman, I suspect, and showing him how to use it." Princess Hirut was educated at the Bolitho School of St Clare, Penzance, Cornwall, and Clarendon School, Abergale, North Wales. She was imprisoned by the Dergue regime from 1974 until 1988. - Wikipedia

Princess Hirut has died in London aged 84. The cause of death wasn’t given, but Hirut had been in poor health for several years. Her funeral services was held on July 4 at the Holy Trinity Cathedral in Addis Ababa, next to her grandfather and other members of her family. The ceremony was attended by members of the royal family, religious leaders, including priests of the Lalibela churches and government officials. The Princess waswell educated and knowledgeable in a range of areas. She was described as being down to earth, enthusiastic, hardworking and respectful of traditions. While her role in the formation of the Committee for the restoration of the churches of Lalibela was her greatest legacy, she was involved in other successful ventures in culture, library and education, fields she enjoyed herself.

Born in the town of Jimma, south-west Ethiopia in 1930 to Princess Tenagnework Haile Selassie and Ras Desta Damtew, Hirut spent much of her early life on the move. Her father was a hero of Ethiopia’s resistance movement which fought Italian occupation. He was captured and executedby fascists in 1937. After his death, Princess Hirut and her siblings accompanied their mother into exile and lived with Emperor Haile Selassiein Bath. She was educated at the School of St Clare in Penzance, Cornwall. Kathleen M Seed who a boarder to Clarendon recalls her when she attended school in Penzance during the 1930s. “We were told that twograndchildren of a very important person were to arrive at the school that summer and be housed away from the main building. The two girls were Ruth (Hirut) and Seble Desta. Aida, their older sister, had gone to Newnham College, Cambridge. I happened to be one in a dormitory in thishouse and we were allowed to meet them. They did lessons with us and led a normal school life. We had a junior percussion band at the time withone or two musical instruments thrown in. In 1938, the annual prize giving was held in the Winter Gardens at Great Malvern and we were honoured to have the Emperor present the prizes," she wrote.

Hirut, the beautiful and talented princess, later enrolled at Sorbonne University in France and Colombia University in the United States, taking courses in history and management. Upon her return to Ethiopia, she became a teacher at the Empress Menen School, the all-girls school established by her grandmother, and went on to eventually become its director, working there for many years. She left a legacy as a visionary pioneer in education and she was an instrumental figure to the success ofthe school, becoming champion of the down-trodden.

In the 1960s when Rita Pankhurst was trying to organize the National Library of Ethiopia, she was faced with shortage of professional staff. Rita later recalled that she relied a great deal on the help of volunteers and one of her most productive volunteers was Princess Ruth. Rita described the Princess Ruth as being a modest and deeply religious woman – and a highly responsible library volunteer, who showed up when she said she would and was a superb example for other volunteers as well as to library staff. Princess Hirut had a special interest for Lalibela's rock-hewn churches and her motivation for becoming involved in preservation startedwhen she was in the United States for her study. One day, her professor would show her a fabulous photo of rock-hewn churches and asked her if she knew where it was found. And she replied that may be in Rome or Greek. The teacher chastised her for her ignorance of her own country's patrimony. Remorseful Ruth, called her grandfather, Emperor Haile Selassie and told him about it. And he promised to show it to her when she came back.

Visit, she did. She also decided to create the Committee for the Restoration of the Churches of Lalibela, and spent five years in the town working towards the preservation of the rock hewn churches there, and towards improving the lives of the town's people there. She is credited with having the town made more accessible by having a modern road connect to it, and is credited with introducing electricity and potable waterto the town. In 1967, she also commissioned the Seven Olives Hotel whichwas the first tourist hotel in the town, acting herself as hostess in the traditional manner, which helped make Lalibela a tourist attraction. After having finished the work of the hotel construction, she granted the hotel to the Saint Lalibela Monastery Diocese Office. The National Geographic reporter, Nathaniel T. Kenney who visited Lalibela at the time described her as a "trim, most democratic of princesses," who "was not above grabbing a tool from a workman, I suspect, and showing him how to useit."

Hirut accompanied her father to the United States on "royal visits" during which the royal family and she was hosted by President JFK and wife Mrs. Jackie Kennedy. In 1968, Hirut was married to Major-General Nega Tegegne, and upon her marriage was elevated by her grandfather to the title of Princess with the dignity of Her Highness. At the start of the Marxist Revolution, she moved to Gondar with her husband, who was nominated as a governor of the region. Barbara W. Olson in her Gondar, Ethiopia: 1971-1975 Guests in the Ethiopian Highlands and Children of Zemecha, she wrote about the new princess in Gondar. "Every day during the rains, Princesses Ruth has been seen driving to the track that leads the small, circular Debre Tsehai Church next to the ruins of the castle of Kusquam. People say she goes there, in this time of revolution and chaos,for solitude and prayer, to cry and to pray for family and friends who are threatened by revolutionary forces, hunted and imprisoned throughout theAmahra highlands," she wrote.

When Emperor Haile Selassie was deposed in September 1974, everythingstarted to crumble for the royal family. Hirut's brother, Eskinder, commander of the Imperial Ethiopian Navy, was shot dead by the Duerg NCOs in November 1974, together with 60 other notables. Her mother andher three sisters, Aida, Seble and Sofya, were sent without trial to Prison; their male cousins were put in the high-security wing, known by its Amharic name of Alem Bekagne – "I have had enough of the world". For 14 years until their release in 1988, Princess Hirut, her mother and her sisters lived in cramped, fetid cells, which they shared with rats and lice.

They were not allowed visitors, and were without lavatories, warm clothesand shoes. The Princess never had any children. (Text ends)

Ethiopian Ministry of Foreign Affairs says Andargachew cannot visited unless "officials permit" ESAT News (July 15, 2014) The Ethiopian Ministryof Foreign Affairs, in a letter it sent to the Head of the Africa Section of the United Kingdom (UK) Foreign and Commonwealth Office, said that Andargachew Tsige would only get legal and consular services when "relevant bodies give the permission". The Ministry did not name who the "relevant bodies" are. Sources, however, say the so called 'bodies' are the security officials.

The Ministry wrote the letter after the Head of the Africa Section at the British Ministry of Foreign Office wrote a letter asking for a permission to "visit Andargachew Tsige". The British Office has been saddened by the response and is waiting for further responses, it has been learnt. A family member of Andargachew Tsige said that Ethiopia's intelligence officials arerefusing Andargahcew from being visited so that they can record what he says due to excessive torture which they will later broadcast to the public with the aim of killing the spirits of the public. The family member said hehad also notified this to the Office.

ESAT has received information that in order to force him to utter what hedoes not want to say, Andargachew has been tortured and denied sleep. In a meeting held in the Prime Minister's office last weekend, the officials of the Ethiopian Anti Terror Taskforce have stated that the methods of torture so far used on Anadargachew Tsige did not yield muchthus it has been decided that they could execute additional torturing methods. The inability of the Ethiopian Prime Minister and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to respond to the visitation requests exposes that the Country is being ruled by few people in the backdoor, said the sources. Similarly, Ethiopians living in Japan have held protest ralliesoutside the British and Yemen Embassies today. (Text ends)

July 16, 2014: CPJ condemns closed court hearings for nine Ethiopian journalists & bloggers' (CPJ PR)

NAIROBI - The Ethiopian government should end its politicized prosecution of nine Ethiopian journalists arrestedin April. The journalists and their lawyers were shut out of court room hearings in recent days. In hearings at the Arada First Instance Court in the capital Addis Ababa on Saturday and Monday, police said that they had wrapped up their investigation into the nine journalists--who were arrested on April 25 and 26--and referred the case for trial to the Federal High Court, according to local journalists, who spoke to the detective leading the investigation. Neither the defendants nor their lawyers were present. Authorities have held the journalists without informing them of any charges for 80 days at Maekelawi Prison, and only recently allowed family to visit, local journalists told CPJ.

A public prosecutor originally accused the nine detainees--editor Asmamaw Hailegiorgis, freelancers Tesfalem Waldyes and Edom Kassaye, and bloggers Abel Wabella, Atnaf Berhane, Mahlet Fantahun, Natnail Feleke, Zelalem Kibret, and Befekadu Hailu--of working with foreign human rights organizations and using social media to create instability in the country, according to news reports. "Ethiopian authorities are trying tocreate the impression that this is a legal matter, when in fact it is retaliation and an attempt to silence government detractors," said CPJ East Africa Representative Tom Rhodes. "We call on the government to release the journalists immediately and end the practice of jailing its critics." Local journalists say the other three journalists--Asmamaw, senioreditor at the influential privately owned weekly magazine Addis Guday, and freelancers Tesfalem and Edom--may have been arrested on suspicionof being affiliated with the Zone 9 group. CPJ's repeated attempts to reachGovernment's Communication Office Minister Redwan Hussein were unsuccessful. (Text ends)

(CAPITAL ETHIOPIA July 16, 2014) Side note: The government has significantly raised the salaries of civil servants and the topic has excited the nation, even though the amount of the increases has not officially been disclosed. However, according to a document Capital obtained, the salary of government employees is doubled. Workers at the bottom of thepay scale will see their salary grow by 129 percent, while others with higher salaries have also gotten about a 76 percent raise. Civil servants have secured a very impressive and unprecedented salary increment.

Three weeks ago Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn disclosed that the government will increase salaries of state employees as of this month (thebeginning of the budget year). The exact sum has not officially been confirmed. Sources close to the issue told Capital that the amount the government added is significant and as high as 129 percent.

According to the new salary rate, the minimum starting salary has been raised to 1,031 birr from 450 birr and the ceiling amount has reached 11,713 birr, for professionals. Experts indicated that the minimum salary for sub professionals' that previously stood at 450 birr, has now grown to 1,031 birr, which is a 129 percent increase. The starting salary for professionals and scientific or fresh graduates that was 1,499 birr has nowrisen to 2,649 birr, which is about a 76 percent increase. The previous maximum basic salary for professional and scientific recruits was 4,343 birr and now it has been raised to 7, 815 birr, which is also about a 76 percent rise.

According to the new salary scale that Capital obtained the minimum salary increase is not lower than 76 percent, even though the percentagesvary on different levels. Civil servants, who were earning the lower amounts, have secured the biggest raise. Experts said that the percentageof the new pay raise is much higher than in the past. Four years ago the government raised salaries for civil servants and then after that it also increased pay for teachers. When the PM announced the salary hike during the Civil Service Day Celebration held at the African Union Conference Hall on June 23, he said that the government decided to increase its employees' pay starting from the first month of the budget year (July 8, 2014) aiming to inspire them to engage in the nation's development. "It is intended to improve the working atmosphere as well as the living conditions of civil servants," Hailemariam said.

"The increase will be made with consideration to the government's financial capacity, in a way that avoids awakening inflation or disturbing the stability of the economy," Hailemariam added. He said that the increase was approved about a year ago, but the government suspended it with the intention of seeing the trend of the inflation remain in single digits. Even though there are not accurate statistics, the number of civil servants in the country is believed to be about 1.3 million. Since the government disclosed the salary increase three weeks ago price hikes andnew tariffs are being observed in some market places. Some experts say that the inflation may return, but the government is dismissing fears of price hikes. It also stated that price hikes and inflation would not be seenin relation with the salary increase.

Some of the government bodies also stated they would take legal action against traders who impose artificial price hikes on the public. Early this week the Trade Competition and Consumers' Protection Authority announced that consumers are informing the authority about price increases related to the pay raise of civil servants. In a statement that theauthority sent to Capital it reiterated that it will take legal measures against the traders who apply price hikes without any economic reason.

The authority also advised the public to inform them by calling a 8478 toll free line when they perceive that price hikes are occurring. Due to fears ofartificial price hikes the newly organized wholesale public enterprise, ALLE,has disclosed that it will terminate the contract of retail traders if they sell consumer products at high rates. ETHIOPIA: UK Aid Should Respect Rights -HRW

HRW PR (July 16, 2014) - In its decision of July 14, 2014, the High Court ruled that allegations that the UK Department for International Development (DFID) did not adequately assess evidence of human rights violations in Ethiopia deserve a full judicial review. "The UK high court ruling is just a first step, but it should be a wake-up call for the government and other donors that they need rigorous monitoring to makesure their development programs are upholding their commitments to human rights," saidLeslie Lefkow, deputy Africa director. "UK developmentaid to Ethiopia can help reduce poverty, but serious rights abuses should never be ignored."

The case involves Mr. O (not his real name), a farmer from Gambella in western Ethiopia, who alleges that DFID violated its own human rights policy by failing to properly investigate and respond to human rights violations linked to an Ethiopian government resettlement program knownas "villagization." Mr. O is now a refugee in a neighboring country. HumanRights Watch has documentedserious human rights violations in connection with the first year of the villagization program in Gambella in 2011 and in other regions of Ethiopia in recent years.

A January 2012 Human Rights Watch report based on more than 100 interviews with Gambella residents, including site visits to 16 villages, concluded that villagization had been marked by forced displacement, arbitrary detentions, mistreatment, and inadequate consultation, and thatvillagers had not been compensated for their losses in the relocation process. People resettled in new villages often found the land infertile andfrequently had to clear the land and build their own huts under military supervision. Services they had been promised, such as schools, clinics, and water pumps, were not in place when they arrived. In many cases villagers had to abandon their crops, and pledges of food aid in the new villages never materialized. The UK, along with the World Bank and other donors, fund a nationwide development program in Ethiopia called the Promotion of Basic Services program (PBS). The program started after theUK and other donors cut direct budget support to Ethiopia after the country's controversial 2005 elections. (Text ends)

The unforgived punishment against innocent Oromo students'

COMMENTARY (July 16, 2014) Side note: Believed over 3,000 rounded up students in Addis Ababa (Fin Fine) and other parts of Oromia, shaved hair,recently sent to a concentration camps in Afar region. The regime claims that the 3000 shaved youngsters but according to sources, they are actually Oromo students who were rounded up during the protest from Addis Ababa University and other high schools following the recent protests against the Addis Ababa urbanization plan. Apparently, there are expansion plans for Addis Ababa, which would displace poor Oromo farmers and considerably shrink the size of the Oromia region. Justifiably, many Oromo people were upset. The number of Oromo students who have been rounded up from Ambo and various towns and currently detained in concentration camps exceeds 30,000, witnesses say.

Ze-HABESHA VIEW POINT: The current unforgiving punishment against enormous innocent Oromo students and others including torture, jailing and killing in connection with demand the right to stop the illegal displacement of poor farmers from their land shows that the obstinate plan of the TPLF ethno-apartheid rulers to destroy the people of Ethiopiagradually as their determination to rule the country with iron fist and using brute force to every kind of conflict is a verification to their belligerent attitude.

At the same route, the saddest part is that even today some self- proclaimed Oromo politicians and activists are still obsessedwith baseless history and blame Amhara, while their house is robbed by the TPLF gangs.Seemingly, they are unable to see the reality behind the curtain and identify the sheep in wolves clothing character of TPLF gangs.

Consequently, their core genuine freedom and justice demandhas been shaded. Apparently, these few confused individuals in Diaspora are drivenby emotion and falsified stories as they are using this consequence to advance their tiny hatred against innocent Ethiopians in particular Amharaand Christian that has nothing to do with the crime that is being committed by TPLF.I am sure; if these individuals were honest they wouldblame those (TPLF gangs) who forced Ethiopians to face endless misery and sufferingandwho are sucking their (Oromos) blood and eating their flesh, and forced them to wretched of poverty in the mid of plenty.

Anyhow, no wonder that this is neither the beginning nor end of the TPLFmethodical violence against innocent Ethiopians. It has been over two decades that deprived peasant farmers throughout the country have been forced to leave their land with gun point as the TPLF gangs are collecting million dollars every year by leasing those lands for foreign investors whilethe poor peasants pushed to the side without any hope and condemn to misery until the last breath. It wasn't long that thousands of Oromo students were rounded up and arrested, beaten, tortured, and some are even killed.Plus, massive reports reaching the international community confirms an increasing trend of new extra judicial killings, severe forms of torture and lootings of civilian property by the TPLF 144 militias throughout Ogden, Gonder, Benshanguel, Gambella, Wallegga and other parts of Ethiopia.

It's evident that the current suffering of Oromo students and other Ethiopians is a drop in the bucket Share compared to the large number ofEthiopians abused, killed and tortured by the TPLF gangs and having unspeakable suffering and agony every day. Hundreds and thousands of Ethiopians has been killed, tortured and jailed with fabricated and trumped-up charges of terrorism for the last few years and yet innocent individuals like Bekele Gerba, Eskinder Nega, Reyot Alemu, Andwalem Arage and others are still incarcerated behind bars and have been even refused to get basic access to families and medical care in connection to similar fabricated charges. So many of them killed without reason, raped in a daily bases throughout Ethiopia including the vast number of Oromo students who are now being tortured in various known and unknown TPLFprisons as well as the large number Ogden's who are being raped, burnedinside their houses and other enormous atrocities. Thousands of Amhara Ethiopians have been persuasively evacuated from their property.

Despite the ethno-apartheid rulers' false claim and fabricated evidence against the accused there is no any kind of relationship between the incarcerated Ethiopians and the undemocratic nature of TPLF. The TPLF gangs are responsible for such horror and the suffering of our people.Of course it is not accidental that all accused individuals are not a member ofthe ruling group, but it is well-designed and deliberate schemes prearranged by the TPLF rulers to use fabricated stories as a scapegoat inorder to annihilate the main brave, strong-minded and vigorous Ethiopians.

Indeed, targeting some strong and dedicated Ethiopians for their own incompetency and malicious behaviour is a common act of the TPLF ethno-apartheid rulers, but the good part is that their unscrupulous act isexposed and grasped by the majority of Ethiopians. Again, the problem inEthiopia is not these innocent students or other genuine oppositions that are shamelessly branded as terrorist, as the narrow TPLF elements alwaystrying to portray as if every problem Ethiopia encounter is caused by oppositions, nevertheless the problem is lack of democracy, justice and freedom in the country. The problem is the ethno-apartheid government deliberately alienated the poor Ethiopians form the economic sector and forced them to starve in the mid of plenty. The problem is the TPLF ethno-apartheid rulers using the state power to transfer the people's money to their pocket as well as their village, while million Ethiopians children are dying in malnutrition and preventable disease as well as unaffordable everincreasing cost of living. The problem is not the innocent people who haveusing nonviolent protest to demand their rights, but TPLF who reject pluralism and establish one ethnic hegemony and obvious ethno-apartheid government.

On the other hand, individuals like JawarMohammed and his naive blind followers from Diaspora who are living in fantasy world are deliberately inflicting hate among Ethiopian tribes in order to Email misinform citizens.They are making a loud and illogical noise against Amhara and Christians and have been creating more problems within the victim Oromo community. Because, they are screaming all over the planet to take advantage of this tragedy in order to advance their tiny-mini ethnocentricIslamic Oromia dream with the cost of innocent Oromo bloods.

Apparently, most of their gullible followers are misled by this hatred rhetoric and echoing unjustified falsified stories day in and day out. They are still unable to re -evaluate their detested six century type tribal dogmain order to know that the current Amhara and Christian Ethiopians' people are not responsible for what had happened hundred years ago. But what should matter it what is happening today (the brutal crime of Weyane against Ethiopians), which is of course has nothing to do with the issue as it simply damages the popular struggle and endanger the survival of Oromo tribe Ethiopians.

Anyhow, regardless of the complex problem the struggle for democracy and justice would flourish as well as getting stronger whenever the TPLF ethno-apartheid rulers use their brute force to suppress the voice of the people. Apparently, the TPLF gangs lie as well as divide and rule filthy game would never end, and of course they would dig every hole and climbevery mountain to undermine and blackmail any opposition groups as wellas individuals who are considered as a threat to the continuity of their racist agenda. The only way to stop such kind of malicious and cruel schema is having coordinated struggle. The different ethnic and oppositiongroups should be able to compromise for the sake of the common good, and aim toward the common enemy (TPLF) instead of spending time fighting unnecessary and useless war among each other.

Therefore, at this critical time genuine Ethiopians should be happy to see collaboration among different tribal and opposition groups, because such coordinated struggle shorten the life span of the TPLF gangs who are using divide and rule as the main political instrument. Therefore, freedomlover Ethiopians should focus on the big problem which makes us to bleedinside and destroy our identity and country.Undeniably, there is no any individuals or group who is not affected directly or indirectly by the TPLF ethno-fascist rulers' tribally prejudiced agenda, so instead of splitting words and spend our valuable energy to repair our minor difference it would be advisable to focus toward the common enemy which is killing usas well as destroying our country. Anyhow, the struggle should be focusedon the common enemy. Apparently, we have spent so many times degrading each other as ANTE AMAHRA…ANTE OROMO…ANTE TIGRE and other similar type childish tantrum. It would not important to continue as such, because if we do so the enemy would benefit more than anyone of us. (Text ends)

WEMEZEKIR: REMEMBERING THE GREAT WARRIOR'

Ras Makonnen Wolde Mikael Gudissa, father of Ras Taffari, king ofEthiopia'

(July 18, 2014) : Ras Mäkonnen Wolde Mikael Gudissa was born at DerefoMaryam near Ankober, and at the age of 14 his father took him to the court of Menelik Neguse-Shewa, the then ruler of Shoa, where he becamea special companion of Menelik king of Shewa. Ras Makonnen was a general and the governor of Harrarghe in Ethiopia, and the father of Taffari Mäkonnen, later known as Emperor Haile Selassie I. His father wasFitawrari Woldemikael Guddissa of a noble family of Oromo origin. Ras Makonnen was a grandson of Sahle Selassie king of Shoa through his mother, Leult Tenagnework Sahle Selassie Neguse Shoa. As such, he wasa first cousin of Menelik king of Shewa.

Ras Mekonnen Wolde Mikael Gudissa, is biological father of Ras Taffari Makonnen, the last Solomonic emperor of Ethiopia who reigns from November, 1930 to September, 1974. Ras Makonnen Wolde Mikael of Shewa was a man of dignity the first dark skin official to ever enter the highest office and speak before the parliament members of Italy in Romawhen he led a delegation to Italia to sign for 'Wutchalle Agreement 2' around the year 1889 just three years before the battle of Adwa.

The barefooted royal figure has led a number of highly recognized Ethiopian delegates over several European nations for brief state visit in the said year above and if it has to be recalled brought the story of this well polished royal officer to your attention a number of times because heis worth to recall time and again.

Ras Mekonnen the biological father of Emperor Haile Selassie was fit to bea king himself, he was intelligent with a natural diplomatic personality buthe suddenly passed away in a brief illness in the year 1906 relatively as ayoung age of 53. The stunning Ras Mekonnen was the first Ethiopian everto obtain a driver license from a french driving school in Paris around the same year of his European tours. He was also the first banknote holder along with the Emperor Menelik and the second Ethiopian to drive a motorcar.

ETHIOPIA: Politically Motivated Charges Show Misuse of Terrorism Law –HRW

Ethiopia: Drop Case Against Bloggers, Journalists

(Nairobi, July 19, 2014) – The Ethiopian government should immediatelydrop politically motivated charges brought against 10 bloggers and journalists on July 17, 2014, under the country's deeply flawed anti- terrorism law, Human Rights Watch said today.

The Ethiopian authorities arrested six of the bloggers and three journalistson April 25 and 26. They have been detained in Maekelawi, the Federal Police Crime Investigation Sector in Addis Ababa. The court charged the nine with having links to banned opposition groups and trying to violently overthrow the government, local media reported. A tenth blogger, who was not in Ethiopia at the time of the arrests, was charged in absentia.

"Ethiopia's courts are making a mockery of their own judicial system," said Leslie Lefkow, deputy Africa director at Human Rights Watch. "Hiding behind an abusive anti-terrorism law to prosecute bloggers and journalistsdoing their job is an affront to the constitution and international protectionfor free expression." The charges are part of an intensified crackdown in Ethiopia in recent months against perceived political opponents, Human Rights Watch said.

The six bloggers in custody are Atnaf Berahane, Befekadu Hailu, Abel Wabela, Mahlet Fantahun, Natnael Feleke, and Zelalem Kibret. Soliana Shimeles was charged in absentia. The three journalists are Tesfalem Waldyes, Edom Kassaye, and Asmamaw Hailegiorgis, an editor at weekly magazine Addis Guday. The bloggers are part of a blogging collective known as Zone 9, which provides commentary on current events in Ethiopia. Zone 9 is the section of Kaliti prison in Addis Ababa where manypolitical prisoners are held.

The Zone 9 group had stopped blogging in February after security officials harassed the group and questioned them about their work and alleged links to political opposition parties and human rights organizations. Zone 9 announced on Facebook on April 23 that they would resume blogging, and on April 25 and 26 the six bloggerswere arrested. They were detained for over 80 days without charge, and remain in custody. Their lawyer, Ameha Mekonnen, has had only sporadicaccess to them, and family members were not allowed to meet with themuntil July 9. The lawyer plans to bring a civil suit about irregularities in thelegal process, media reports said.

The bloggers and journalists are accused of connections to Ginbot 7 and the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), two of five organizations designated asterrorist organizations in 2011 by the House of Federation, the Ethiopian parliament. Human Rights Watch has not yet obtained the charge sheets,but credible media reports say that the bloggers and journalists are alleged to have taken directions from Ginbot 7 and OLF, planning and organizing terrorist acts, and agreeing to overthrow the government through force. Judge Tareke Alemayehu was reported in the media sayingthat the group “took training in how to make explosives and planned to train others,” accusing them of plotting “to destabilize the nation” and using blogging as a cover for “clandestine” activities.

TIMELINE - RAS MAKONNEN WOLDE MIKAEL GUDISSA et-al)

In 1887, Ras Makonnen was given the governorship of Harrar after it wasincorporated into the Ethiopian Empire by his cousin, Emperor Yohannes

IV. Other posts Ras Makonnen served included temporary governor of Tigray after the removal of the rebellious Ras Mangasha Yohannes, as an army general during various military campaigns including the First Italo– Ethiopian War, played a leading role at the Battle of Adwa where Ethiopianforces routed the Italians, and as a diplomat and de facto foreign minister.In October 1, 1889: Ras Makonnen Wolde Mikael Gudissa led a delegation to Italia to sign for 'Wutchalle Agreement 2'.

Couple of years later Emperor Menelik II expands his territorial holds sofar to the near south and the far-south and conquered the kingdom of Kullo and Kaffa. He also expanded southwest, and the southeast to decicively control, soldify, and enforce surrender all local kingdoms and chiefdoms of the time, by imposing the Orthodox faith as a state religion and Amharic as as conquering language. Menelik II, not only didhe wisely manage to forge the political unity and centrainty, but he also brought the imperial powerhouse to the center (Shewa). The factor of RasMakonnen Wolde Mikael Gudissa during the expansion period is well praised.

WEMEZEKIR: Emperor Haile Selassie I of Ethiopia – The spotlight of Africa'"Hisory is kinder to him than the present generation of Ethiopia"

9 Facts You May Not Have Known About Haile Selassie I(In memory of July 23, 2014, the 122nd birthday)

(THE ATLANTA BLACK STAR) Ras Taffari Makonnen lived from July 23, 1892, to August 27, 1975 until he passed away in a custody. The Rastaffari movement was born when political leader Marcus Garvey proclaimed: "Look to Africa for the crowning of a Black king." A few years later, in 1930, Ras Taffari Makonnen was crowned as emperor of Ethiopia and took the name Haile Selassie I. Abroad, he was worshiped as a divine figure. In Jamaica, he is still considered by Rastaffarians to be the spiritual leader of Black people worldwide.

His name, Haile Selassie, translates into "Power of the Trinity." His legitimacy as a ruler passes through a line of Ethiopian royalty chronicledin the Kebra Nagast (Book of Kings) that includes King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba.

The lyrics of Bob Marley's song War are from the English translation of aspeech emperor Haile Selassie delivered to the United Nations General Assembly in New York City in October 1963.

Haile Selassie proved to be a model student. He was intelligent, hardworking, had an excellent memory and paid attention to the smallestdetail. Recognizing his abilities, his father proclaimed him Dejazmach (commander) of a local militia in 1905 at the age of 13. At14, he had been governor of Gara-Mulatta, an administrative region of Harrarghe, and by 20, he was Dejazmach and governorof Sidamo province.
He was voted Man of the Year by the 'Time magazine' in 1936.
He took great pride in the suppression of slavery. When Italy invadedEthiopia in 1935, he personally led troops in the battle field.
In 1923, he led Ethiopia into the League of Nations (LoN). The followingyear, he traveled to Europe, becoming the first Ethiopian ruler to go abroad.
Two commemorative stamps have been issued for the emperor. These include a stamp for his regime installed before the Italian occupation in the period of 1930 to 1936, and the other one after the occupation during1942-1974.
Haile Selassie worked on various economic and social reforms for the progress of his people. However, his most significant work was creating a constitution in 1931 and helping to achieve a Re-Africanization of Ethiopia.
One day people recognize how important this emperor was, for humanityand the lost sheep. (Text ends)
SHOW: Crimes Commited Against The Amharas –Sahara TV online'
Nigerian popular commentator Adeola on anti-Amhara ethnic cleansingcampaign in Ethiopia'
This is a wonderful knowledgeable African commentator dedicated to truthin particular and humanity in general. This is the first time that I ever heard an African with a position to expose evils, has said about the atrocities of the EPRDF rulers in Ethiopia. The worst pain of burdens in Ethiopia, for the last 23 years had fallen on the Amharas. Systematically been eliminated and the women vaccinated for their ovaries not to fertilize. Their lands being sold to the foreigners and one tenth of its territories given to Sudan(one of the worst enemies of Ethiopia) as a gift. And the Amharas in the south and southwest, southeast are being murdered , thrown over cliffs alive, and recently being expelled from the lands their ancestors had settled for centuries. Thanks Adeola for the expose. I would advise you that you should not in any way cringe from the hate messages of the EPRDF paid cadres in Addis about this. My Thankyou to you is so great that I can practically call you the only AfricanChristian. One often hears people quoting the late Meles Zenawi who said allegedly that “a majority can be reduced to a minority and that a minoritycan be made to become a majority.” ..... which means, they can make Tigrie the majority and Oromos the minority through systematic eliminations and genocide such as polluting our Fresh water Resources and Land All Ethiopians own the God Given right to live anywhere in the country despite ethnic boundaries.

Ethiopia Becomes China’s China in Global Search for Cheap Labour’

By Bloomberg (July 23, 2014) As costs rise in Asia, once famine-plaguedEthiopia is emerging as a production center for labour-intensive productsfrom shoes to T-shirts to handbags.

(VIEW POINT) Ethiopian workers strolling through the parking lot of Huajian Shoes’ factory outside Addis Ababa last month chose the wrong day to leave their shirts untucked. Company President Zhang Huarong, just arrived on a visit from China, spotted them through the window, sprang up and ran outside. The former People’s Liberation Army soldier harangued them loudly in Chinese, tugging at one man’s aqua polo shirtand forcing another’s shirt into his pants. Nonplussed, the workers stoodsilently until the eruption subsided.

Shaping up a handful of employees is one small part of Zhang’s quest to profit from Huajian’s factory wages of about $40 a month -– less than 10percent the level in China. “Ethiopia is exactly like China 30 years ago,” said Zhang, 55, who quit the military in 1982 to make shoes from his home in Jiangxi province with three sewing machines and now supplies such brands as Nine West and Guess?. “The poor transportation infrastructure, lots of jobless people.”

Almost three years after Zhang began his Ethiopian adventure at the invitation of the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, he says he’s unhappywith profits at the Dongguan Huajian Shoes Industry Co. unit, frustratedby “widespread inefficiency” in the local bureaucracy and struggling to raise factory productivity from a level he says is about a third of China’s.

Four Tongues: Transportation and logistics that cost as much as four times those in China are prompting Huajian to set up its own trucking company. And the use of four languages in the plant — Ethiopia’s nationallanguage, Amharic; the local tongue, Oromo; English and Chinese — further complicates operations, Zhang says.

It takes two hours to drive 30 kilometers (18 miles) to the Huajian factoryfrom the capital along the country’s main artery, illustrating the challenges. Oil tankers and trucks scream along the bumpy, potholed and,at times, unpaved road. Goats, donkeys and cows wander along the roadside and occasionally into bumper-to-bumper traffic. Minibuses and dented taxis, mostly blue Ladas from the country’s past as a Soviet ally, weave through oncoming traffic coughing a smoggy exhaust.

Huajian is nonetheless becoming a case study of Ethiopia's emerging potential as a production center for labor-intensive products from shoes toT-shirts to handbags. In a country where 80 percent of the labor force is in agriculture, manufacturers don't have to worry about finding new workers. Its population of about 96 million is Africa's second-largest after Nigeria's.

Seeking Investment: A combination of cheap labor and electricity and a government striving to attract foreign investment makes Ethiopia more attractive than many other African nations, said Deborah Brautigam, author of "The Dragon's Gift: The Real Story of China in Africa" and a professor of international development and comparative politics at JohnsHopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies in Washington.

"They are trying to establish conditions for transformation," Brautigam said in a telephone interview. "It could become the China of Africa." Huajian's 3,500 workers in Ethiopia produced 2 million pairs of shoes last year. Located in one of the country's first government-supported industrialzones, the factory began operating in January 2012, only three months after Zhang decided to invest. It became profitable in its first year and now earns $100,000 to $200,000 a month, he said, calling it an insufficient return that will rise as workers become better trained.

Fleeing China: Under bright fluorescent lights, amid the drone of machines, workers cut, glue, stitch and sew Marc Fisher brown leather boots bound for the U.S. Meanwhile, supervisors monitor quotas on whiteboards, giving small cash rewards to winning teams and criticism tothose falling short.

China, Africa and global retailers all have stakes in whether Ethiopia andsuch countries as Tanzania, Rwanda and Senegal become viable production bases for labor-intensive products. Promoting trade, boostingemployment and spurring investment are among the topics that will be discussed on August 4-6 at the first White House U.S.-Africa Leaders Summit in Washington.

African nations have a compelling opportunity to seize a share of theabout 80 million jobs that China will export as its manufacturers losecompetitiveness, according to Justin Lin, a former World Bank chief economist who now is a professor of economics at Peking University.

'Manufacturing Powerhouse': Chinese Premier Li Keqiang and Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, who met on May 4, backed the move of Chinese industries to Ethiopia. China is "supporting Ethiopia's great vision to become Africa's manufacturing powerhouse," Hailemariamtold reporters at a joint press conference in Addis Ababa.

Weaker consumer spending in the U.S. and Europe after the financial crisis prompted global retailers to hasten their search for lower-cost producers, said Helen Hai, head of China Africa Consulting Ltd. in Addis Ababa. She ran Huajian's Ethiopia factory until July of last year. While China's inland regions offered manufacturers a cheaper alternative to theexport-linked coastal areas, rising costs and a limited pool of available workers now are undermining that appeal.

Average factory pay in Henan, about 800 kilometers from the coast, rose103 percent in the five years ended in September and 80 percent in Chongqing, 1,700 kilometers up the Yangtze River. In the same period, salaries rose 82.5 percent in Guangdong, where Huajian has its base in the city of Dongguan.

'Great Potential': Cost inflation in countries including China has promptedHennes & Mauritz AB, Europe's second-biggest clothing retailer, to work with three suppliers in Ethiopia. The nation has "great potential" for production, H&M head of sustainability Helma Helmersson said in an Aprilinterview.

China's average manufacturing wage is 3,469 yuan ($560) per month. Payat the Huajian factory ranges from the basic after-tax minimum of $30 a month to about twice that for supervisors. By contrast, average manufacturing wages in South Africa, Africa's biggest manufacturer, are about $1,200.

The duty-free and quota-free access that Sub-Saharan Africa enjoys forthe U.S. and EU markets gives additional savings thanks to the African Growth and Opportunity Act for the U.S. and the EU's Everything But Arms accord for the poorest countries. Import tariffs on shoes made in China range from 6 percent to as much as 36 percent, Zhang said.

Past-Future Business: A spokeswoman for Guess? Confirmed that a licensee has done business with the Huajian Ethiopia factory in the past and may do so in the future. A spokesman for Sycamore Partners, whichowns Nine West, declined to comment on its business relationships and whether it has a relationship with Dongguan Huajian Shoes Industry Co.Marc Fisher Footwear is making shoes in the Ethiopia factory, Jaclyn Weissman, a spokeswoman for the company, wrote in an e-mail.

Signs of Ethiopia's allure include factories outside Addis Ababa set up by leather goods maker Pittards Plc of the U.K. and Turkish textile manufacturer Ayka Tekstil. Foreign direct investment in the nation surgedalmost 250 percent to $953 million last year from the year before, according to estimates by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development.

Zhang spends about half his time in Ethiopia, he says. During the visit lastmonth, he spoke to about 200 uniformed Huajian supervisors, a mix of Ethiopians and Chinese, gathered in the parking lot. A giant plasma screenmirrored the crowd as Zhang hurried onto the stage.

Chant, March: He berated those assembled for a lack of efficiency, then praised them for their loyalty to Huajian, his words translated into Amharic and Oromo. He ordered them to march on the spot, to turn left and to turn right, all chanting together in Chinese. “One two one,” they chanted. “One two three four,” as they marched in step. Slogans followed:“Unite as one.” “Improvement together.” “Civilized and efficient.”

They sang the “Song of Huajian,” whose words urged “We Huajian people”to bravely move forward, to hold the banner of Huajian high and to “keep our business forever.” Chinese supervisors led the song, their Ethiopian colleagues stumbling over some words and struggling to keep up. Later, Zhang explained that he can’t be as tough on the staff as he would like.

“Here the management cannot be too strong as there will be a problem with the culture,” he said via a translator. “In China you can be strong, but not here. The conditions here mean we have to show respect. On onehand we have to have strict requirements; on the other hand we have to take care of them. They have their own dignity. They may be poor but wehave to respect their dignity.”

Labor Demands: About 200 of the workers rebelled in early 2013, goingon strike for two days after demanding a share of profits following a period in which Huajian’s orders surged, said Hai. The incident was resolved with the help of Ethiopian labor officials, she said.

Five workers interviewed at the factory on July 10 described a workplace of strict standards, with rewards for good results and penalties such as docked pay for ruined shoes. Taddelech Teshome, 24, said her day startsat 7:20 a.m. after her Chinese employers provide employees with a breakfast of bread and tea. When her morning shift ferrying shoes from the factory floor to the warehouse is over, she gets fed the national staple, sour bread, for lunch. After work, a Huajian bus takes her to nearby Debre Zeit, a town where she rents a room with her sister for $18a month.

Following Sister: She came to Huajian just over a year ago from her home165 kilometers away in Arsi region after her sister started at the factory. “The work is good because I pay my rent and I can look after myself,” shesaid, wearing an aqua Huajian polo shirt. “It’s transformed my life.” Taddelech said she wants to work for two more years at the plant and become a supervisor. She eventually aspires to build her own house. With inflation at 8 percent — down from 40 percent in July 2011 — saving cash is tough.

Mohammed al-Jaber, who earns $30 a month for gluing shoe linings eight hours a day six days a week, said he can add to his pay with perfect attendance each month — a $7.50 bonus — and overtime. Any extra gets sent home to his family in the Arsi region. Once famine-plagued Ethiopia, run by former rebels since they overthrew a socialist military junta in 1991, is seeking investment to support a growth rate that's expected to fall to 7.5 percent this year from 9.7 percent in 2013. The population is expanding annually by 2.9 percent, at a time when the urbanunemployment rate is 17.5 percent.

Economic Transformation: Ethiopia aims "to transform the economy" via industrialization by attracting foreign investors to zones where key public services will be concentrated, State Minister Of Finance Ahmed Shide said in an interview in Addis Ababa. One appeal for China: Ethiopia follows a similar tightly controlled, state-heavy economic model. Opposition parties won only one out of 547 parliamentary seats at the last election in 2010. Ties are strong between the Communist Party of China and the Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front: On July 10, Central Committee Political Bureau member Guo Jinlong visited Ethiopia and met with Prime Minister Hailemariam. The two pledged to enhance cooperation, the officialXinhua news agency said.

Key Bottlenecks: Ethiopia's heavy public investment in infrastructure usingcredit from Chinese state banks promises to relieve some key bottlenecks.The Export-Import Bank of China is funding a railway from Addis Ababa tolandlocked Ethiopia's main port in neighboring Djibouti. Ethiopia lost its coastline when Eritrea became independent in 1993. The Chinese and Ethiopian governments also are investing in hydroelectric plants — including what will be Africa's largest, the domestically funded Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam on the Blue Nile — that should increase Ethiopia's power supply five- fold by 2020. That may help overcome obstacles including the supply of electricity and cumbersome customs and tax procedures. In May, a World Bank team went to visit a textile factory in the Eastern Industrial Zone, where the Huajian plant is located, and found they are faced with daily power outages lasting for hours, Ethiopia country director Guang Zhe Chen said.

Sustainable Power: "There's a big issue if you can't ensure sustainable power supply for industrial zones," he said. While countries like Ethiopia have the potential to host Asian manufacturers, a "surge" hasn't occurred,in part because of trade logistics constraints. "Getting things in and out ofEthiopia is very expensive and time consuming." Ethiopia slipped one place to 125th in the World Bank's 2014 Doing Business rankings for 189 economies. It was behind China, at 96th, and ahead of competitor Bangladesh, which ranked 130th, the Washington-based lender said on itswebsite. It's easy to forget that China's infrastructure also was rudimentary at a similar stage of development, said Lin. He recalls that the first time he made the 96-mile trip between Shenzhen and Guangzhouin southern China in the early 1980s it took more than 12 hours, includinglong waits for ferries to cross rivers. The same trip now can be done in two hours. "There were no bridges," Lin said in an interview. Nor were workers accustomed to modern production techniques. When auto-parts maker Asimco Technologies Ltd. began manufacturing in China in the 1990s, workers weren't responsive to training, said Tim Clissold, formerpresident of the Beijing- based company and author of a memoir, "Mr. China."

Smiling Politely: "It was very difficult to deliver improvements at individual factories," he said. "You could do training, and everyone smilespolitely and then continues doing what they were doing before."

Now, rising Chinese wages that Zhang calls "an inevitable trend" are pushing Huajian to try to increase its workforce in Ethiopia to as many as 50,000 within eight years. A model of a planned new plant at the edge of Addis Ababa is displayed at the factory. The 126-hectare (341-acre) complex, partly financed by more than $300 million from Huajian, will include apartments for workers, a "forest resort" district and a technical university.

At the gathering in the parking lot, after supervisors sang Huajian's company song, Zhang dismissed the Ethiopian contingent. Then he continued haranguing the Chinese managers. To make his point that structure was needed to keep employees in focus, he thrust a broomstick toward them repeatedly, then toward the remote camera that was feedingto the plasma screen, the image blurring with each prod. Then he left the stage, laughing and raising a triumphant fist. (Text ends)

July 24, 2014: African Rights Groups Urge Ethiopia to Release Journalists'

(Bloomberg) More than 40 press freedom and human rights organizationssent a letter to Ethiopia's prime minister urging the release of journalists and bloggers imprisoned under anti-terrorism legislation, including 10 charged last week. Seven bloggers and three journalists were accused on July 18 under the 2009 law and the country's criminal code of working with a banned U.S.-based opposition group to plan attacks in Ethiopia andoverthrow the government. They deny the allegations.

Signatories to the letter, including 26 African organizations, said the prosecutions were incompatible with Ethiopia's commitments to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the African Charteron Human and Peoples' Rights.

"We therefore urge your government to fulfill its obligations under international law and release all individuals who have been arbitrarily detained in violation of their fundamental rights," the letter dated yesterday and e-mailed today by the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists said. "Such a practice violates international law and threatens to undermine the legitimacy of international security efforts inthe region."

Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn said July 18 that individuals prosecuted under the anti-terrorism law in Ethiopia were part of a regional network that begins in rival Eritrea and extends to Somalia, Kenya andSouth Sudan. “More than a dozen critical journalists” have been jailed under the statute, according to the CPJ.

The U.S. State Department is “deeply concerned” about the charges andpressed Ethiopia’s government to ensure the defendants receive a fair trial, it said in a July 18 statement on its website.

“Freedom of expression and freedom of the press are fundamental elections of a democratic society,” it said. “The arrest of journalists and bloggers, and their prosecution under terrorism laws, has a chilling effecton the media and all Ethiopians’ right to freedom of expression.” (Text ends)

ECONOMY: World Bank Urges Ethiopia to Devalue It's Birr to BoostExports'

Bloomberg (July 24, 2014) Ethiopia’s birr is overvalued and the country would benefit from a devaluation to boost export revenue and accelerateeconomic growth, the World Bank said.

Reducing the currency’s value by 10 percent in real terms may lead to a 5percent increase in stalled export earnings and a 2 percent increase in growth, Lars Moller, the bank’s chief economist in Ethiopia, told reporters today in the capital, Addis Ababa.

Ethiopia last devalued its currency by 17 percent against the dollar in September 2010. Since then, the birr has appreciated in real terms bymore than 50 percent, leading to a currency that’s overvalued by 31 percent, Moller said at a presentation of the lender’s third Ethiopia Economic Update.

After growing at a rate of about 20 percent in previous years, annual Ethiopian goods exports have remained steady at about $3 billion for the past two years, primarily because of falling international commodity prices. Foreign earnings from goods may have grown about 8 percent in the fiscal year that ended July 7 from $3.08 billion last year, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn said July 18 to reporters. The country usesthe Ethiopian calendar.

Although the exact effect of devaluing the currency is uncertain, there would be some benefit to the country, Moller said. ‘Insufficient Depreciation’ “The bottom line is that Ethiopia competes on prices and thereal exchange rate is overvalued,” he said.

A decision to adjust the exchange rate would be made on the basis of what its wider impact on the economy would be, State Minister of FinanceAhmed Shide said at the event. The birr is currently at 19.7495 per dollar.

Ethiopia, the world's most populous landlocked nation, may grow as muchas 8.5 percent this year and next, the International Monetary Fund said last month. The nation earns most foreign-exchange from state-owned Ethiopian Airlines, while coffee exports from Africa's largest producer of the beans are the highest grossing commodity.

To boost exports, the World Bank also recommended focusing on adding value to commodity exports by expanding processing and packaging, building industrial zones, opening access to credit for small- and medium-size enterprises, and improving costly and time-consuming trade logistics.

Ethiopia is investing to tackle infrastructure bottlenecks such as power and transport networks that have been a barrier to growth, which should help the business climate, Ahmed said. The World Bank estimates Ethiopiacould earn $1 billion a year from exporting electricity by 2023 if all of its hydro-electric projects are completed as planned, Moller said. (Text ends)

EDUCATION: PMHD humiliated as university withdraws honor'

A U.S. university cancels an event honoring the Ethiopian PM HailemariamDesalegn

AV (July 24, 2014) Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn faced astinging humiliation as Azusa Pacific University (APU), whose motto is "God First", has withdrawn an honor it had already bestowed on him. The university administration had to reverse its decision to honor Mr. Desalegnin light of gross human rights violations in Ethiopia being perpetrated by the regime he serves. The administration of the American evangelical university made the decision in an emergency meeting last Friday after this reporter raised a number of critical questions on whether honoring a human rights violator was consistent with APU's core values and motto.

The Global Alliance for the Rights of Ethiopians (GARE) also wrote a letterhighlighting gross human rights violations being perpetrated by Mr.

Desalegn and the TPLF-led regime he is serving.

The honoring ceremony, which was slated for July 31 at the university's Los Angeles campus, was expected to be attended by the PM and his family, foreign diplomats, the university faculty, senior U.S. and Ethiopiangovernment officials including Foreign Minister Tedros Adhanom and otherministers.

Rachel White, APU's Assistant Director of External Relations, confirmed exclusively to this reporter that the university has withdrawn the honor and cancelled the ceremony which was planned to honor him at APU's Los Angeles campus. "I can confirm that the event has been cancelled. The university evaluated current developments in Ethiopia including the latest U.S State Department Human Rights Report," she said. She also indicated that the recent high court decision to file terrorism charges against Zone9 bloggers and journalists was also one of the factors considered for the cancellation of the event to honor Mr.

Desalegn. "Nothing is as important as our motto God First. Any decisions we make have to be consistent with our motto and core values," White noted. She also pointed out that respect for human rights is very important for the university. It is now confirmed that he cancelled his trip to Los Angeles after the university communicated to him its decision to cancel the honoring ceremony. According to a university source, who spoke on condition of anonymity as he was not authorized to give a statement on behalf of the university, APU's administration unanimously agreed to withdraw the honor for Mr.Desalegn, whom it found to be an unsuitable honoree after evaluating not only the disturbing human rights situation in Ethiopia but also the potential negative publicity that the event was likely to generate. "It was awise and timely decision, as the university was likely to face backlash if it publicly honored a human rights violator," the source said. Exiled journalist Serkalem Fasil, who was forced to give birth in jail, commended the university for correcting its mistake in good time. "I think this university did not know who Hailemariam Desalegn was. They should haveknown that Ethiopian government officials like him do not deserve honor but facing justice for the crimes they are committing against humanity.

Serkalem said Azusa Pacific corrected its mistake in an exemplary manner. "I am glad the university listened to the truth and its God First motto," she said. Her husband, the award-winning journalist Eskinder Nega, is serving an 18-year sentence in Ethiopia after he and a number ofjournalists and activists were labelled "terrorists" by a Kangaroo court.

Abebe Belew, a Washington D.C.-based activist and community radio broadcaster, who was also convicted of "terrorism" offenses because of hiscritical views towards the repressive policies of the Ethiopian government,also praised the university for its decisive measure. "This university is a truly Christian university. It made a bad decision but realized soon enoughthat honoring an ungodly human rights violator contradicted its Christian values. I appreciate the university's administration for taking such a strong stand based on its God First motto," he said. "Hailemariam should also learn from the humiliating experience. He pretends to be a protestantChristian but what he is doing completely contradicts all the tenets of the bible. "As APU has clearly demonstrated, he doesn't deserve any honor as a human rights violator destroying the lives of so many people. I hope he and and members of this oppressive tyranny will face trial sooner rather than later. That is the kind of honor they really deserve," Abebe added. (Text ends)

RELIGION: Mariam Ibrahim, Ethiopian Sudanese woman sentenced todeath for her Christian faith, met with Catholic pope in Italy.

Adam Withnall, Independent (July 24, 2014) - Pope Francis has met Meriam Ibrahim, the Sudanese woman who was sentenced to death for converting to Christianity, just hours after she arrived in Rome following asuccessful appeal. Ms Ibrahim was convicted of "apostasy" and made to give birth with her legs chained together in jail before she was finally released last month in the wake of an international display of outrage. Sheand her family had been stuck inside the US embassy in Sudan for a month and were expected to travel at some point to America, where her husband has citizenship. But this morning TV footage showed the family arriving at Rome's Ciampino airport alongside the Italian deputy foreign minister, having fled Sudan in an Italian government jet. The Vatican said Pope Francis had wanted to call attention to the plight of someone who had been persecuted for her religious beliefs. This afternoon he held what a spokesperson described as "a very affectionate" meeting with Ms Ibrahim, her husband Daniel Wani and their two children. Reverend Federico Lombardi said the Pope "thanked her for her faith and courage, and she thanked him for his prayer and solidarity" during the half-hour meeting. Italy worked with the US to secure Ms Ibrahim's release, and theItalian Prime Minister, Matteo Renzi, mentioned her case in his speech to inaugurate Italy's six-month European Union presidency earlier this month.

Amare Aregawi (The Reporter): How to steal smart and get caught.

ETHIOPIA PRESS (July 24, 2014) With two decades of experience under its belt, The Reporter seems to have everything going for them. They publish in Amharic twice and in English once in a week. When others struggle to put together just a weekly, Reporter is the only one coming out three times in that time frame.They even had a monthly magazine back in the days. As the former Tigray Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF) fighter and the first post Derg head of the Ethiopian News Agency, the owner, Amare Aregawi is almost unrivaled in getting insider news from hissources in the security and intelligence. As a ruling party cheerleader, they get countless advertisements from leading public enterprises such asthe Ethiopian Airlines, The Commercial Bank, Ethio Telecom and scores ofothers, funneling millions into their coffer. As if that is not enough, even government ministries and the likes of Anti-corruption Commission patronize them by placing ads in the form of messages, all covered by taxpayer money. Reporter’s huge financial muscle prompted them to set up their own printing press a few years ago until the plan went up in smoke, but that is another article.

Norwagian authorities are ones again confronted with the invalidity the infamous "returavtale" Norwagian authorities are once again confronted with the invalidity of the infamous return agreement they agreed with the regime in Ethiopia. Wondering as to how Norwegian authorities decide to deliver Ethiopian oppositions in norway to a dictator who even dares to kidnap to imprison a "Norwegian/Ethiopian" in third country. So long as there is a regime in Ethiopia that views the strong sympathetic attention the country evokes among Westerners as a virtue; and promotes a cultureof self-pity among the population to satisfy its addiction to foreign aid, Ethiopia, despite abundance of its natural resources, will continue to remain the 2nd poorest country in the world, until self-respecting people emerge one day to lead the Ethiopian people to freedom and independence. Woyane Tigrays took a beautiful nation and turn into a divided trash and colorless mess. Now we have to sacrifice anothergeneration to put it back together.

California Congressman demands the release of Andargachew Tsige

WASHINGTON – (July 28, 2014) Rep. Dana Rohrabacher on Monday urgedEthiopia's prime minister to release Andargachew Tsige, a native-born opposition leader with British citizenship who last month was extradited tothe African nation from Yemen under questionable circumstances.

In a letter to Prime Minister Hailemarian Desalegn, the California Republican wrote: "Mr. Andargachew is a British citizen and a leader for political reform in Ethiopia. He should be released and allowed to return tohis family immediately. Any maltreatment or harm to him, or other prodemocracy activists, in your country only serves to widen the gap between our two countries."

Andargachew was traveling from Dubai to Eritrea on June 23 when, stopping over in Yemen, he was forcibly flown back to Ethiopia, which he fled in 2005 following protests of the nation's elections. He was granted asylum in Britain, where his wife currently lives. British officials have expressed concerns that his extradition was not properly handled. The activist was charged with terrorism and sentenced to death in absentia. Inhis letter to the Ethiopian prime minister, Rohrabacher added concerns from the United States. (Text ends)

IDEOLOGY: MARXIST LENINIST LEAGUE of TIGRAY- The final farewell;The end is here'

VIEWS (July 28, 2014) The Tigrayan revolution is in a total failure. The march from Dedebit to Dedebit had already began. Dedebit is the birthplace of the TPLF and certainly it would be its final resting place i.e. ifthe Tigrayans are kind enough to allow it.

Tigray is at a crossroads now. The dream of Abbay Tigray is dead and buried thanks to the wise, experienced and farsighted Eritrean leadership.The Enver Hoxha, Albanian communist dogma following political adolescents had to be brought back to the real world of modern politics kicking and screaming against their will.

After the Eritreans handed the keys to the Menelik Palace to the thanklessWeyannes, what followed next was an Ethiopian nightmare. Ethiopians had to endure the dignity of being ruled by a bunch of uncultured peasants - a minority of a minority Tribal Junta suffering from an inferiority complex laden mindset with no moral or ethical compass.

Ethiopia became a de facto a Tigrayan colony. Ethiopians became aliens intheir own homeland. Everything and anything in Ethiopia were put on the chopping block. Women and children were sold to the lowest bidder. Land was leased for US $ 1.38/hectare/year/century -a deal of the centuryindeed.

A claim of an economy at 12% annual growth per annum, on an auto pilotand on cloud nine turned out to be a voodoo economics existing only in the figment of their imaginations. The reality on the ground was the mushrooming of toxic condos, perennial shortage of water and electricity,National Bank full of fake gold and an Apparatchik on a looting spree of more than 12 billion dollars.

Ethnic Apartheid and Article 39 became the laws of the land. Ethiopia became Balkanized into ethnic enclaves and Bantu lands. The divide and rule policy of the colonizers were applied mercilessly in Ethiopia to weakenand squash dissent against the barbaric leadership by the Ethiopian people.

Ethnic conflicts were systematically encouraged, genocidal massacres became tactical acts of deterrence, mass resetlements became politicaltools, food aid and rape became weapons of war and hunting political opponents like wild animals became routine signiture actions.

The Ethiopians had made their choices clear in the 2005 elections. They voted en masse to throw the Tribal Junta out of power. 200 youngsters had to be slaughtered in the streets of Addis in a broad day light while theinternational media cameras were recording the events. Even, the US Humvees were used to terrorize the peaceful demonstrators.

50,000 young Ethiopians were imprisoned in the Dedesa concentration camp. They were shaved by contaminated blades purposely to infect themwith the deadly HIV virus and many were eaten by alligators. The deafening silence of the international community was astounding.

Oromo forests were torched and multi-nationals were given a free hand tooperate without environmental safety standards. Today, the environmental degradation of Oromia is a national emergency. The Oromia waters and springs are contaminated and people are getting sick.

The crimes against humanity rap sheet of the Tribal Junta is long. As if theGambella and Ogaden massacres weren't enough, the Ogaden camels were injected with toxic serum to destroy the fabric of the Somali society. Tigrayan prostitutes infected with the deadly HIV virus were sent to the "Mahel Ager" as a population control method.

War of aggression against Eritrea was declared to win some Ethiopian die hard nationalists and as a cover up to its atrocities and barbaric acts. It was a disaster that took the lives of hundreds of thousands of young recruits used as "Fenji regatches". The tragedy is that the coward peasantWeyanne commanders were shooting at the young recruits from behind and sending them to their early deaths.

The most cruel of them all is the feeding of all Ethiopian children born after the Border War with salt mined in Tigray without the proper international standards. These were meant to hurt the Eritrean economy.Eritrean salt mined from the sea has Iodine added to it as per the international standards. The Ethiopian Iodine deficiency epidemic is out ofcontrol now.

The government in Addis isn't an Ethiopian government but a surrogate, puppet and stooge of the powers that be. It has none of the Ethiopia's best interests at heart. It's ink on an intensive care pampered and taken care of by the foreign powers and special interest groups. When we find that the US ambassador to Ethiopia is the US Viceroy in Addis, it's doublytroubling.

Ethiopians are saying now enough is enough. Peaceful and armed struggles are engulfing the nation far and wide. The Ethiopian volcano isready to explode. The Tribal Junta had made enemies left and right - Ethiopians and neighboring nations alike. All are waiting for the most opportune time to settle their own scores. The final outcome of the gathering Ethiopian peoples discontent is difficult to predict.

Ethiopian democratic and progressive forces and all stakeholders in the future of Ethiopia need to unite and coordinate their activities and deviseand draw a road map. Without a unified pan of action and with the TribalJunta's poisonous political intrigues and machinations driving the nation into Armageddon the end game could be catastrophic. The ethnically cleansed military makes the outcome more precarious. Everybody knows that we are in a transition period. Change is coming andit could be violent or not violent depending on the wisdom and farsightedness of those that love Ethiopia. For the Tribal Junta losing power means the final nail in their coffin. Thus, the removal of this political cancer is of paramount importance by any means necessary. The people of Tigray have to decide and abandon the sinking Tribal Junta ship and join the silent Ethiopian majority. The TPDM is the answer to this noble call for action.

Fourth Ethiopian athlete missing found safe, American media payunusually high interest on the missing Ethiopian athletes'

REUTERS NEWS ANALYSIS (July 31, 2014)It is surprising to see Americanmedia pay unusually high interest in the missing Ethiopian athletes. Most reporters imply that the athletes may file for Asylum even though they have six months valid visa and didn’t indicate interest in asylum.Do the reporters want the athletes to stay in in America and run for

U.S.A.? SEATTLE (Reuters) – (Updates)The last of four Ethiopian athletes,who came to the United States for a track meet in Oregon and then failedto fly home with teammates, has been located and is safe after disappearing in a possible asylum bid, authorities said on Wednesday. Zeyituna Mohammed, 18, was found staying at the home of an acquaintance in neighboring Washington state, according to the University of Oregon Police Department. She was the last of four Ethiopianathletes to be located after slipping away from teammates on Saturday during the International Association of Athletics Federations World Junior Championships, hosted at the university in Eugene. The other three, two 18-year-old women and a 17-year-old boy, were found safe in Beaverton, Oregon, on Monday after they missed departing for their home country with the rest of the track team, said university police spokesman Kelly McIver.

"The four athletes reportedly had left the area by choice with an acquaintance, but police needed to positively confirm the athletes' safety,"McIver said. Investigators searching for the missing four have said they were considering the possibility the young adults were making a bid for asylum or seeking to otherwise stay in the country. Any possible application for asylum would be made with federal immigration services, said Andrew Munoz, a spokesman with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. He added that bids for asylum are not released to the publicand can only be disclosed with consent from the individual seeking to stayin the country. Ethiopia is one of the world's poorest countries and has been accused by rights campaigners and the political opposition of stifling dissent and torturing political detainees. The four Ethiopians still had validtravel visas, and once their safety was ensured, they were on their own topursue asylum or arrange travel home, university police said. (Text ends)

Ethiopia Says U.K. Review of Aid Is Based on Fabricated Claims'

Bloomberg (August 1, 2014) - A British court's decision to allow a judicial review of aid given to Ethiopia is based on "fabrications" about a resettlement program propagated by people outside the country, the Hornof Africa nation's Foreign Ministry said. The High Court in London on July 14 said a review could be conducted into whether the U.K.'s aid agency is adequately monitoring the human-rights record of Ethiopia's government.The ruling came after an Ethiopian citizen said his government had used aid to implement a resettlement program in the western Gambella region under which he suffered abuses. The program forcibly moved tens of thousands of people and involved "serious human rights violations," according to Human Rights Watch. The U.K.'s development agency said it didn't fund the program. Ethiopia is enacting a five-year economic growth plan in a bid to reduce poverty and develop industries beyond agriculture, which accounts for 80percent of employment, according to the United Nations. Ethiopia's Foreign Ministry said the Gambella resettlements were voluntary and successfully achieved their goal of improving public services in sparsely populated areas.

“One reason for these distorted views clearly lies in the failure to understand the objectives of the resettlement program,” it said in a statement e-mailed by Ethiopia’s Embassy in the U.K. yesterday. “This hasbeen further compounded by what can only be described as shoddy analysis of the programs on the basis of flimsy, politically motivated or even non-existent evidence.”

Basic Services: The U.K.’s Department for International Development, orDfID, is among donors funding the Promotion of Basic Services program,known as PBS, which provides grants to local governments in Ethiopia tofund the salaries of health, education, agriculture, water and road workers. The current, third phase of the plan that runs until 2018 has a budget of 510 million pounds ($864 million), according to a copy of the court’s ruling e-mailed by DfID.

The U.K. plans to offer 1.3 billion pounds in support to Ethiopia, Africa’ssecond-most populous nation, between 2010 and 2015. DfID denied it funded the resettlement program and said assistance is only used to provide “essential services like health care, schooling and clean water.”

The agency said July 15 it was unable to comment on ongoing legal proceedings. The PBS program has funded 38,000 health workers, 100,000 primary school teachers and 45,000 agricultural workers, according to Ethiopia’s Foreign Ministry. Programs such as PBS helped Ethiopia’s poverty rate fall to 29.6 percent in 2011 from 38.7 percent in2005, it said.

Important Step: The plan to resettle people in Gambella in 2011 involvedmistreatment and arbitrary detentions, New York-based Human Rights Watch said in a July 14 statement. The group called the court’s decision an “important step toward greater accountability” after DfID made an “inadequate and complacent” response to abuse claims.

It “should be a wake-up call for the government and other donors that they need rigorous monitoring to make sure their development programsare upholding their commitments to human rights,” Leslie Lefkow, deputyAfrica director at the organization, said in the statement.

The World Bank’s Inspection Panel, an independent complaints mechanism, is investigating similar claims that bank contributions to PBSwere used for the Gambella resettlement plan. (Text ends)

BREAKING NEWS: WAR AGAINST ERITREAN REGIME IS EMINENT’

(August 1, 2014) Addis Ababa applies pressure on Asmara...

Ethiopian military high command gathered a meeting of Eritrean opponents to push them into being more active against Eritrean PresidentIssayas Affeworki. General Mohamed-Nur Yunus known as Samora, the Ethiopian army general chief of staff and a member of the Tigrayan Muslim minority, convened a meeting of Eritrean opposition leaders atMekele (Tigray Regional State) on 18 July.

This is the first such meeting since 2005. It was led by retired General Mesfin Amare who heads both the Ethiopian foreign affairs ministry's Liaison office for Eritrean matters and the Sana'a Forum. According to sources, the meeting had a particularly important point on its agenda: ousting Eritrean President Issayas Affeworki. The Ethiopian officers reproached the Eritrean opponents for lacking coordination and they firmlyadvised them to devise a coherent and realistic strategy to overthrow the Eritrean government.

The Eritrean opposition's eight armed factions, which have been in fruitless negotiations since 2009 to form a joint military front against Afeworki, were represented at the meeting. Namely, the Red Sea Afar Democratic Organization (RSADO) which lost one of its leaders on 7 July, Abdul Karim Qadr, killed by Eritrean border guards, the Democratic Movement for the Liberation of the Eritrean Kunama (DMLEK), the Eritrean National Salvation Front (ENSF), Eslah, the Democratic Movementof Eritrean Saho (DMES), the Eritrean Movement for Democracy and Justice (EMDJ), the Eritrean Democratic Unity Front (EDUF) and the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF).

Tension is rising between Eritrea and Ethiopia, which is beefing up its military presence on its northern border. Media controlled by Ethiopia's ruling EPRDF are urging Addis Ababa to take action against Eritrea. The web sites Aigaforum and Tigrai Online, close to the Ethiopian regime, are publishing anti-Eritrea articles and columnists linked to the EPRDF have even called for decisive action against Eritrean President Issayas Afeworki.

EU says concerned over the detained bloggers, election'

The European Union (EU) August 2, 2014: the main development partner of the Ethiopian government expressed its concern over the detention of the bloggers and journalists. It also expressed that it is concerned with the political space over the upcoming general elections, scheduled for May2015.

A statement by the local European Union (EU) in agreement with the EU Heads of Mission in Ethiopia on the situation in Ethiopia reads, "the EU Delegation is deeply concerned about developments in the case of the tenbloggers and journalists charged under the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation on 18 July, as well as recent arrests of opposition members. It calls on theEthiopian authorities to ensure that proceedings are carried out according to the Ethiopian Constitution and respecting international and regional human rights standards, in particular granting access to legal counsel andfamily, as well as the right to apply for bail when applicable, and that the trial is transparent and free from political interference."

“The EU Delegation recalls the European External Action Service statement of 6 May 2014 which underlined the importance of enhancing the political space, particularly in view of the elections next year. It calls on the Ethiopian Government to ensure that the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation is not used to curb freedom of expression or association,” itadded. “The EU Delegation welcomed the additional commitments made by the government of Ethiopia to address areas of human rights concernin the recent Universal Periodic Review process in Geneva and called for early and continuing action to ensure implementation of all of the government’s human rights commitments.”

In a related development, citing the Foreign Ministry, the US based Bloomberg reported that the Ethiopian government rejected British court’sdecision to allow a judicial review of aid given to Ethiopia based on “fabrications” about a resettlement program propagated by people outsidethe country.

The High Court in London on July 14, said a review could be conducted into whether the UK’s aid agency is adequately monitoring the human- rights record of Ethiopia’s government. The ruling came after an Ethiopiancitizen said his government had used aid to implement a resettlement program in the western Gambella region under which he suffered abuses.The program forcibly moved tens of thousands of people and involved “serious human rights violations,” according to Human Rights Watch. Gebru Asrat's ARENA party in pieces (አረና ትግራይ እየፈረሰ ነው።)

(Local News) It's all gone wrong for Gebru Asrat's Arena (opposition) party. Some members of its central committee claim to have resigned, while the executive says they were sacked. Gebru Asrat, the former President of Tigray Regional State and founder of Arena Tigray for Democracy and Sovereignty, is now watching as his organisation shattered. And yet, he had already been warned last June by members ofthe party central committee that he ...should organize a convention. He iscriticized from the inside for his authoritarian style and his narrow nationalism. He, together with Arena's present president, Berhanu Berhe,had provoked the departure of four of the movement's leading figures: Tadesse Bitewlign, Samuel Gebru, Hishaye Azanaw and Asgede Gebreselassie, one of the founders of the ruling TPLF. These men claim they resigned and accuse the two leaders of being too conciliatory with the government. They also reproach them for refusing to form an alliancewith any Ethiopian opposition party that Asrat's partisans accuse of being in the pay of the Amharas.

UK Summons Ethiopian Diplomat Over Andargachew Tsgie Case'

Reuters News updates (August 4, 2014) Britain summoned Ethiopia's chargé d'affaires on Monday to raise its concerns about the arrest of a British national being held in Ethiopia who has been sentenced to death over his involvement with an opposition political group. Andargachew Tsige was sentenced to death in 2009 in absentia and another trial handedhim life behind bars three years later. He was arrested in Yemen earlier this year and extradited to Ethiopia.

On Monday, Britain summoned one of Ethiopia's top diplomats in London to meet Foreign Office minister Mark Simmonds, who expressed "deep concern" that Andargachew had not been granted access to the British consulate. "Mr Simmonds asked the chargé to urge his government to deliver on previous commitments to provide consular access without further delay, and to provide assurances that they do not intend to carry out the death penalty imposed in absentia," a statement from the ForeignOffice said.

Andargachew, secretary-general of the Ginbot 7 group, was among 20 opposition figures and journalists charged with conspiring withrebels, plotting attacks and attempting to topple the government.

Document sent to senior advisors reveals that officials of Amhara and Oromia regions are siding with Ginbot 7 and OLF' ESAT News (August 9,2014)

A document that was prepared by Addisu Legese, former Deputy PM and now top official and trainer within the ruling Front, EPRDF, for the advisorsof the Ethiopian Prime Minister, states that officials in the Amhara region are siding with the Ginbot 7 opposition Movement while officials of the OPDO, Oromo region, are aligning with the opposition Oromo LiberationFront (OLF).

The document also reveals that the Front is faced with a leadership crisis,the transformation process has not been successful, and that there is no loyal official in Gambella region.
The 39 pages document, titled “Capacity Building to Castrate EPRDF’s oppositions and the Transformation Journey”, was prepared at the end ofJuly and was sent to the PM’s advisors namely Bereket Simon, Kuma Demeksa and Destaw.
It states that in order to bring the country out of poverty and put it alongdeveloped countries, it requires a capable leadership, “which the Front isnow in trouble of”.
The document notes Melaku Fenta, the former Director of Ethiopian Revenue Commission, now imprisoned, and Oumd Obong, the former President of Gambella Region, who now has defected, as examples of thecrisis.
Despite the fact that the officials of the Amhara region and Oromia’s OPDO have been found siding with Ginbot 7 and OLF and were neglectful abuses on Amhara people, there is a leadership in Tigray, Benishangul Gumz, Afar, Somali and Harar regions that is capable of winning the election next year, it added. The report recommends that the Front shouldchange the way it recruits and trains its members for the success of the “transformation journey”.
As the interaction and relationship between the four member parties of the EPRDF is weak, members found between top and middle levels of leadership are being given trainings. The document finally notes that themajority of EPRDF’s members are farmers, which has caused the Front aproblem in creating a good number of political leaders, requiring it to focus on universities and urban areas to find new recruits.
Court grants police another month over activist Abraha Desta’
Ethiomedia (August 9, 2014) Ethiopian activist Abraha Desta told a court August 7 that he was beaten, held in solitary confinement for several days, and was forced to sign on a paper he had no idea what it was about.Police denied the charges but Abraha went on and said police had taken down forced confessions.
A Mekelle University political science instructor, the 31-year-old Abraharose to prominence through his FaceBook Page notes that both serve asnews reports and critical commentaries out of Tigray, a region TPLF hasheld in captivity since 1991. The prosecutor had asked the court to be granted 28 days to gather evidence against Abraha, and asked the courtagain for 28 more days as he appeared in court empty handed.

The court granted the prosecutor 28 more days, and the case has been adjourned for September 2, according to a report in Fnote Netsanet, a publication of the opposition Andenet. Abraha's lawyer, Temam Ababulgu,asked the court that the criminal investigator of Abraha Desta be known, for which police declined to make the name public. When walking across to the court, Abraha raised his handicuffed hands into the air in recognition of a crowd that applauded him for his courageous act for justice and democracy. In Ethiopia, court trials are deliberately stretched over a lengthy period oftime, constituting the first part of a cruel dosage of punitive measures, including several years of imprisoment. "The silence of the the people of Tigray is based on the naked truth that TPLF is more brutal than even theDerg military dictatorship," once wrote Abraha, "but their silence is often misconstrued as obedience. They are waiting to embrace an opposition party they would trust to the end." One of the leaders of Arena oppositiongroup, Abraha was once hailed by Dagnachew Biadglign, an acclaimed Ethiopian commentator, as "a lantern in the darkness of Tigrai." (Text ends)

WEMEZEKIR: The first Afaan Oromo dictionary and grammar compiled by Memhir Habte-Silassie in 1850’ This seems to be the first and earliest dictionary of the Oromo langauge. It was compiled by Memhir Habte- Silassie who studied the meaning and grammar of the neighboring Oromos of the Mecca tribe who lived to the south of the Abbay (Blue Nile) river inhabiting today's Western Shewa and Wollega regions. He Translated then compiled Mecca Oromo words into the Amharic. It was published much later in 1904 (European calander), when Italian scholar Conti Rosini came across the work. Rosini thought and explained that Habte-Silassie to be either a Shewan or Gojjam man. But he thought Habte-Silassie to be a Gojjam because the Amharic he translated the words into was of the Gojjam dialect. For example Habte Silassie used "ጸ " whereas if he was from Shewa he would've used "ጠ" in place of "ጸ ". Plus, if he was Shewan, he would most likely have studied the Tulama Oromo language who are closer to the Shewa Amharas than the Mecca Oromos. Interesting things to note in this historical document is that, Habte-silassiecalled the Oromigna langauge, Afan Orma, instead of Afan Oromo. Which suggests back then, the Meccas may have called themselves Ormas instead of Oromo based on the suggestion of Johann Krapf for the oromo to be named Orma and the area they inhabit Ormania.

WEMEZEKIR: The History of Banking Sector And Currency Devaluation InEthiopia & The Central Bank of Ethiopia, abbreviated as NBE’

DIARIES (August 10, 2014) Ethiopian legal tender currency was issued on23 July 1945, by defining the monetary unit as the Ethiopian Dollar (E$) with a value of 5.52 grains (equivalent to 0.355745 grams) of fine gold and replaced the Maria Theresa which had been circulating as legal tender. The linkage with fine gold was in accord with the monetary systemestablished by the Bretton Woods Agreement of 1944 and it automaticallyestablished the exchange rate between the national currency and other currencies with the same arrangement. Accordingly, the official exchange rate of Ethiopian currency with US dollar was created (with the official exchange rate of 2.48 Birr per US dollar) on July 23, 1945.

After almost two decades, that is, on 1 January1964, the Ethiopian Birrwas slightly devalued to 2.50 Birr per US dollar. Following the collapse of the Bretton WoodsSystem in 1971 and the floating of dollar and ceasing of its convertibility to gold, the Birr wasrevalued to 2.30 Birr per US dollar (i.e. by 8.75%) on 21 December1971. The subsequent10% devaluation of the US dollar had temporarily brought about under valuation of the Birr.To realign the Ethiopian Birr, it was again revalued to 2.07 Birr per US dollar in February1973. This fixed official exchange rate was left unaltered for two decades despite thefloating of the major world currencies including the US dollar (Befekadu, 1991; Derrese, 2001).

According to Haile Kibret (1994), Asmerom Kidane (1994), Equar Dasta(2001), Alem Abraha (1996)), as a result of fixation of exchange rate, Birr becameover-valued in terms of the US dollar as well as many other foreign currencies. Thisovervaluation had adverse effect on national economy such as misallocation of resources, loss ofinternational competitiveness, development of illicit parallel market for foreignexchange and illicit cross border trade. Cognizant of these facts, the massive devaluation of 1992took place. Following this devaluation, in an attempt to liberalize foreignexchange market, the National Bank has taken a number of initiatives. Accordingly, the fortnightly auction market for foreign exchange was introduced on May 1, 1993 with two rates, namelythe Dutch auction system (official rate) and marginal pricing auction system (marginal rate). These two rates were unified in July 1995.

In August 1996, the fortnightly auction market was changed to weekly toaccommodate the growing demand for foreign exchange and commercialbanks were allowed to also established foreign exchange Bureaus. In September1998, the retailauction system was replaced by wholesale system .In the same year, the inter- bank foreignexchange market was introduced and worked alongside the auction system until October25,2001 when the daily inter-bank has fully replaced wholesale auction system. In the presentday, the official exchange rate is determined in the daily inter-bank foreign exchange market as the weighted average exchange rate prevailing on the preceding day.››

Notable economists and even consultant groups such as Access Capital –believe the economy needed the devaluation, indicating that there are potential benefits from the measure. Using the devaluation paradigm as their guide,they argue that devaluation increases the goods and services that Ethiopiaexports, resulting in increased export volumes, all other things being equal.

Recommendations: Based on the empirical findings and the general structure of exports and imports as components of trade balance thefollowing policy recommendations are forwarded to help improve the persistent trade deficit.

Firstly, since the empirical results obtained indicate the existence of long run relationship between real exchange rate changes and trade balance, to make and keep Ethiopia competitive, keeping the track of internationalexchange rate adjustment is crucial.

Secondly, as a complimentary policy instrument to real exchange rate depreciation, compatible policies such as tight monetary and fiscal policiesshould be implemented (maintained if they prevail) timely and sequentially to avoid the possible depletion of the competitive advantage obtained by real exchange rate depreciation due to rise in domestic prices.

Thirdly, since the persistent trade deficit, is basically structural in nature, other supplementary policy options to real exchange rate depreciation aredeemed necessary to curb the problem. These are:

a) On export side :-The Diversification of export commodities throughidentification of new comparative advantages and development of new export products, improving the quality of the existing export products, increasing the productivity of export producers by training and providing price incentives

b) On import side:-The Production of quality substitutes should beencouraged and awareness creation in favor of the homeProducedsubstitutes should be made to help cut the large import bill.

"Therefore, the policy implications drawn from the study suggest that theEthiopian banking sector needs to be tuned to the following additional market-oriented reforms in order to benefit positively from the harmonization of financial intermediation with economic growth. These measures include:1) the privatization of the dominant state-owned Commercial Bank of Ethiopia;2) permitting entry of foreign banks; 3) allowing market forces to determine interest rates and the exchange rateof the ETB, and 4) upgrade the regulatory and supervisory ability of the National Bank of Ethiopia to restore the public's trust in the banking sector." On Students Uprising In Oromia Region'

By Mekuria Bulcha, PhD and Professor of Sociology (July 28, 2014)

VIEW POINT: The message in the slogans of the Oromo rallies at home and abroad, among other things, is against evictions caused by land grabbing. The Oromo are evicted from their land which is being leased or sold by the TPLF-led Ethiopian regime to foreign and domestic land grabbers. The so-called "Integrated Development Master Plan for Addis Ababa," which is generally known as the Addis Ababa Master Plan (AAMP),is part of the same scheme. Whether it is for urban expansion or commercial farming, the eviction of the indigenous landowners is conducted in the name of development. The TPLF regime is accusing the opponents of the AAMP as instruments used by "terrorist" organizations todisturb peace and oppose democracy (BBC, May 2, 2014). Although it is instigated by the AAMP, the present students uprising in Oromia is againstthe crimes which are being perpetrated by the TPLF regime in the name ofdevelopment. In addition to the defense of Oromia's territorial integrity and identity mentioned in the previous part of this article, the protest isagainst eviction and displacement inflicted upon the Oromo as well as about the environmental destruction caused by urban and rural "development" schemes of the present Ethiopian regime.

As correctly indicated by the Oakland Institute (OI, 2011), land lease or land grab is a "legal" transfer of ownership rights forever. What is being transferred is the right belonging to the indigenous peoples, such as the Oromo and the Anuak. Of the 3.6 million hectares (36,000 sq.km. or one and half times the size of the state of Djibouti) of land which the TPLF regime has transferred to domestic and foreign land grabbers (up to 2011), over 1.3 million hectares (13,000 sq.km.) are located in Oromia (OI, 2011). This does not include the thousands of hectares of land leasedto mining companies, such as the British company Nyota Minerals in western, and MIDROC in southern Oromia. It should be noted here that MIDROC's Laga Dambi gold and tantalum mines and Nyota's new concessions at Tullu Kapi (read Kaphii) cover thousands of hectares of forest and farm lands. The Addis Ababa Master Plan, which covers 1.1 million hectares of land, constitutes an additional transfer of Oromo ownership rights to others forever. It will, as the farming and mining companies have done, displace tens of thousands of Oromo households from their homes without proper compensation, which often means no compensation.

The commercial farmers and the miners are not only displacing the Oromofrom their lands, but are destroying the eco-system that nurtures human life. They destroy the future of the indigenous populations by cutting downforests and polluting rivers, lakes, and underground water. As expressed gleefully by Mr. Karmjeet Sekhon, the manager of the Indian company, Karuturi Global, the land lease program of the TPLF regime has opened anopportunity to foreign and domestic investors to make enormous profits.

But, as revealed by reporters (see, for example, John Vidal, "Ethiopia's land rush: Feeding the world", March 21, 2011, Video) it has brought disasters upon communities, such as the Oromo and Anuak, who were evicted from their homes as their farm and pasturelands are leased to foreign speculators. The environmental destruction being caused as the consequence of the policy is beyond estimation. Mr. Sekhon told John Vidal, the environment editor of the Guardian, that the destruction of the forests and trees that cover much of the 300,000 hectares of land (about 3,000 sq.km.), which his company is leasing for 50 years in Gambella, is inevitable. The owners of Karuturi Global will stay in Gambella as long as the farms bring profits. They will depart as soon as the profits start to decline leaving behind a desert-like landscape, contaminated soil, pollutedsources of water and a local population who are suffering from diseases asthe consequence of toxic chemicals they had dumped into the soil and sources of water to make quick profits from the farms.

The disastrous consequences of land grabbing for the Oromo are reflectedclearly in the rivers and lakes of the Rift Valley which are polluted by chemicals used in the flower farms and processing plants in central Oromia. Ethiopia is the second largest cut-flower exporter in Africa after Kenya. The availability of fertile land, cheap labor, free ground water and generous tax free holidays has brought hordes of land grabbers to Ethiopia starting the year 2000. In 2008, there were 814 flower plantations covering about 1,400 hectares of land, nearly all of which is located in Oromia in four clusters in the districts of Bishoftu, Sabbata, Managesha and Ziway. The first three clusters of farms are located within a distance of 30 to 50 km from Finfinnee while the Ziway cluster is about 100 km away from it. The implementation of the AAMP will evict the rest. Four in five (83%) of farmers leased land from the government and the rest rented it from private owners (Abiy Tamrat, Flower Industry Threatens Right to Water in Ethiopia, 2011). It is important to note, in connection, how land grabbing (eviction of the indigenous Oromo population) for commercial farming is overlapping with the AAMP here. A large section of the Oromo peasant households in Sabbata, Managasha and Bishoftu districts are already displaced by the flower farms. Moreover,if the AAMP is implemented, it wouldn't be long before the districts lose their Oromo culture and language.

The flower farmers are accused of intensive chemical and fertilizer application, criticized for lack of skills for waste management, and improper use of water. There is no proper inspection or monitoring by concerned authorities. Pollution is most evident in Lake Koka; and flower plantations are pointed out as its main cause. In February 2009 the Al Jazeera TV produced a documentary titled the Green Lake. The lake was once beautiful, and a source of clear and fresh water. Today, much of it is covered by green algae. A deadly variety of algae known as microcystis produce the green color. The algae release toxins that cause severe healthimpacts to human beings. Professor Brian Whitton of the Environmental Research Centre of the University of Durham who studied the case concluded that the high level of phosphates found in agricultural runoffs and factory effluents are the causes of the excessive growth of the deadly algae in Lake Koka. His study linked the phosphates to flower farms and factories which are located on the banks of the Awash, and its tributaries the Akaki (read Aqaaqii) and Mojo Rivers, which flow into Lake Koka. Morethan 17,000 people who live in the villages around the lake use it as source of water for drinking, cleaning, animal watering, recreation, irrigation and fishing. The consequences of the pollution to the human andlivestock population of the area have been terrible. The human tragedy is reflected in Amina's story (Al Jazeera, February 21, 2009) who said, "I gave birth to nine children. Six of them died: Makida, Hadiri, Tahir, Sultan, Kasim, Kalil. Three survived. My husband also died. I have lost seven members of my family. They were all vomiting and having diarrhea with blood in it. We visited a health center, but we were told the problem was associated with water. I feel sad about my dead children and husband. I wake at night thinking of them, and I now worry if my remaining children will survive. I don't even know if I will survive. Exceptfor God, we have no hope."

There are tens thousands of mothers who share Amina's tragedy throughout Oromia. Her grief and fear are shared by all mothers in Oromia and elsewhere who are victims of similar developments in theirrural communities. For the Oromo communities which depend on Lake Koka, the economic consequences of pollution are equally disastrous.

According to the Al Jazeera report, most of the fish in the lake are dead.The livestock are also dead. The toxic water not only kills humans, but also livestock. The government does not want to let environmental concerns to slow down its economic exploitation of Oromia. Flower farmers and factory owners are not held accountable for the pollution which their economic activities are causing.

The Al Jazeera report reveals the hopelessness felt by the affected inhabitants. A local farmer whose family drinks the contaminated water tells the reporter that his wife has died, and adds: "We are all internally ill". Another local resident says "It is better to die thirsty than to drink thiswater. We are drinking a disease. We told the local authorities that our cattle and goats died due to this polluted water, but nobody helped. We are just waiting to perish." A social worker who shares the agony of the local residents told the Al Jazeera reporter that: "The people here have great potential, but we are losing them, specially the children. I am very upset. If I have the ability to do something, I will do it. But I can't do anything."

The medical workers who serve the community say the same thing. They reported thousands of people are sick and that the cause is the polluted water they drink. But the concerned authorities have been criminally negligent. Consequently, the Oromo are left hopeless and helpless againstthe environmental destruction and water pollution caused by the commercial farms and industries owned mainly by outsiders. It is important to note here that it is not only those who use the contaminated waters of the Awash, Mojo, Akaki rivers and Lake Koka for drinking and washing that are affected by the flower farms in question. Since proper safeguards are not provided by owners of these businesses, workers who are employed on the farms and in the packing workshops are also victims of various diseases related to the chemicals used in the plantations. In addition, since the wage they earn is far below subsistence level, workers cannot afford the medical expenses for the job-related health problems they often experience. A worker is paid about one US dollar a day which isless than the cost of a single rose in Amsterdam or Stockholm. Yet flower farming is said to be the most profitable industry in Ethiopia. According tothe Ethiopian Horticulture Development Agency (EHDA, 2010), Ethiopia exported cut-flowers for US$250 million in 2010.

It is no exaggeration to state that, while the Tigrayan ruling elites and businessmen, and foreign land grabbers are getting rich, the majority of the Oromo people are becoming poorer and hungrier than ever before.Gold, Ethiopia's second largest export commodity after coffee fetched US$ 578.8 million in 2012-13 (William Davison, Bloomberg News:July 6, 2013). Following the recent discovery of large deposits of gold, particularly in western and southern Oromia, revenues from its export areexpected to triple soon. However, the realization of profits and revenues from the extraction of minerals and precious metals by investors and the Ethiopian government does not benefit the Oromo people. For them, the consequence of gold mining has been eviction from their land, irreversibleenvironmental damage and severe health problems so far. Consequently, the country's largest gold mine at Laga Dambi in southern Oromia has been a source of conflict between the local Oromo population, on the one hand, and MIDROC Company and the Ethiopian state, on the other since 2009. Many students and members of the local population who demandedenvironmental protection and compensation for the damages caused by the mining companies have been imprisoned and persecuted on several occasions during the last five years (see for example Environmental Allegations generate Protest, Mass Arrest" report by the US Embassy, Addis Ababa, February 22, 2010, released by Weakileaks, August 30, 2011; Gadaa-com, Sept 15, 2011).

In general, it is no exaggeration to state that the Tigrayan ruling elites and businessmen and foreign land grabbers are getting rich while the majority of the Oromo people are becoming poorer and hungrier than everbefore. As noted above, public health is deteriorating and Oromia is undergoing an irreversible ecological devastation. One often hears people quoting the late Meles Zenawi who said allegedly that "a majority can be reduced to a minority and that a minority can be made to become a majority." Whether what he meant was political influence or demographic size was not clear, but it is speculated by observers that his comment wasabout Oromo demography. In fact, given the intensity and multi- dimensionality of the ongoing persecutions, and the rate of displacement that is making Oromo livelihood difficult and almost impossible, the reduction of the Oromo to a minority is not surprising.A noted scholar has argued that masses of people may not be killed overnight, in a week, or ina month for genocide to occur. Small scale killings, repression, and violence that target a category of people, can develop into large scale killings and then into genocide (see Ervin Staub, The Roots of Evil: The Origins of Genocide and Other Group Violence, 1992). Human history is filled with cases where settler minorities have successfully reduced politically oppressed majorities to minorities. The white settlers in the Americas and Australia were for example settler minorities who overtime reduced indigenous majorities to insignificant minorities. In Ethiopia, the killings I have described in previous articles (see Mekuria Bulcha in Gadaa.com; or Ayyaantuu.com, May and July 2013) are signposts on the road to large scale killings unless we stop the present development in time. Genocide is committed, not only through physical destruction of a community, but also committed by imposing conditions that make the survival of its members impossible.The large scale sale of farm- and pasturelands to domestic and international farming and mining companieswhich are poisoning the rivers, lakes and ground waters in Oromia, and the disintegration of communities by displacing them from their ancestral homes are part of the ongoing process of destruction which the policy of the TPLF regime is inflicting on the Oromo people. The AAMP is part of thedisastrous process of destruction and genocide.

In 1993, John Markakis asked the late Meles Zenawi why the TPLF had abandoned the idea of an independent state of Tigray (which was its objectives in the beginning) and decided to capture political power in Addis Ababa. The TPLF leader's answer was, "When we reached the borders of Tigray, we looked back and saw nothing there" (Markakis, Ethiopia: The Last Frontier, 2011: 192). Meles was talking about the grinding poverty that had affected Tigrayans and the dearth of natural resources of his native province. The situation is quite different today. Tigray is in no desperate need. As indicated above, the Tigrayan middle which came into being during the last two decades is the most powerful and probably the most prosperous class in Ethiopia today. The experience of the Oromo people is the opposite. They are poorer than ever before andare grossly persecuted. They are pushed to the edges and are dehumanized. As I have indicated above, they are being killed in the manner mad dogs are killed in societies that do not have respect for animal life. The ongoing student protest is an uprising in defense of Oromo humanity. It is a struggle for life worthy of human beings.
A Crime with Multiple Dimensions – A Crime of the Century: Surprised by what he was told by Mr. Karmjeet Sekhon about the conditions under which his company Karuturi Global Ltd. could lease such a vast area of virgin fertile land in Gambella from the Ethiopian regime, John Vidal (The Guardian, March 21, 2011) exclaimed this is "the deal of the century!" In deed it is. Vidal was talking about not only the give-away price of £150 a week at which the Karuturi Universal Ltd. leased the 3000 sq.km of land for 50 years, but also the freedom the company was given to do what it wants with the land and water. The TPLF land deal is the cheapest in the world. Mr. Sekhon told Vidal that his company was given the land almost for free, and that they grabbed it. As described by Mr. Sai R. Karuturi, CEO of Karuturi Global Ltd., his company's contract with the Ethiopian government is "mouthwatering" in that it includes tax holidays, hassle- free entry into the industry at very low lease rates, tax holidays, and dutyfree. Mr. Karuturi, who is not only a shareholder in the vast Gambella farm mentioned above but also owner of 11,700 hectare farm in Bakko and 100 hectare flower plantation in Oromia, said that his firm has no commitment to build infrastructure or services that may benefit the local population. He maintains that "There is nothing in the contract that stipulates anything, but payment in cash. The Ethiopian governmentexpects us to pay in cash and we are doing that."

In other words, his entry into business is "hassle free" because: it includesno commitment to workers' safety or worry about environmental protection. In general, water for irrigation, whether it is drawn from underground sources, or the rivers, is free of charge. The terms of the contract signed by Karuturi Global Ltd. with the Ethiopian regime do not limit the amount of water the commercial farms can draw from the rivers and the underground water sources. Aditya Agarwal, director of the Emami Biotech company which has leased 30,000 hectares of land for oil seeds cultivation in Oromia says: "We have chosen Ethiopia for investment because of availability of cheap labour, contiguous land and congenial business environment" (OI, 2010:14).

Regrettably, the policy that makes business engagement "hassle free" or "congenial" for investors in Oromia and other places in Ethiopia has filled the life of the affected people such as the Oromo with untold tragedies. Aswe have seen above, it has brought death to thousands of families who fetch drinking water from Lake Koka. The same can also be said about thetens of thousands of families who depend on water from the Awash, Akakiand Mojo rivers for human and livestock consumption. Karuturi's flower farm, which is the biggest flower farm in Ethiopia, is one of the contributors to the pollution of Lake Koka. While the hassle-free and congenial policy of the TPLF regime enables domestic and foreign land grabbers to make huge profits, it denies thousands of families the basic human rights of access to food and clean water. The best fertile land on which Oromo farming communities of Ada'aa Bargaa, Akaki Basaqaa, Galaan, Shanoo, Bachoo, etc. produced food for themselves and for city dwellers in the past is leased by the TPLF regime to commercial farmers who produce cash crops, particularly flowers for export. Farmers who werefood producers twenty years ago are starving beggars in town- and city streets today. I am not blaming the lucky businessmen such as Mr.

Karuturi, but a regime that has betrayed the people it claims to represent.

There are observers who argue that a rapid "economic growth" is taking place in Ethiopia under the current regime. They admit that it may have some negative effects on some people. But they blame its critics for not seeing what they call the positive side of the ongoing economic development. They tell us not to focus on what might have gone wrong inthe process. The philosophy of the Ethiopian regime was summarized by Dr. Towldebirhan Gebregziabher, former head of the Ethiopian Environmental Protection, in an interview he gave to a BBC journalist in March 2009. He said "There is no human impact that is not felt by other species or other people. Even when you walk, you kill insects". He was commenting the criticism directed against the construction of the Gibe IIIDam by the Ethiopian regime. However, according to Terry Hathaway, director of the International Rivers' Africa Program, "Gibe III is the most destructive dam under construction in Africa. The project will condemn half a million of the region's most vulnerable people to hunger and conflict" (BBC March 26, 2009). My point is that the Ethiopian regime and its supporters will, as implied in Dr. Towldebirhan's comment, trivialize theconsequences of the Gibe III, as well as of commercial farming described above, for the indigenous populations as "normal". They have little concern, if at all, about the agony felt by mothers such as Amina (mentioned above) over the loss of their children and worries about the future of their families. They tend to see the predicament of Oromo or Anuak households who are evicted from their land as given and an unavoidable aspect of what they call "development". They do not recognize the helplessness of Oromo communities who are forced to drink water that is contaminated by toxic pollutants from the commercial farms run by land grabbers. Generally economists use Gross National Product (GNP) or the value of the final goods and services produced by a country per annum as a rough measure of economic growth, and not economic development in terms of the improvement of well-being enjoyed by ordinary men, women and children. Commercial crops that are produced for export and concrete high-rise buildings which stand amid shanty townsin a few of the cities constitute a significant part of the GDP growth reported by the media and are owned largely by the TPLF members and their supporters. It is true that Ethiopia is a veritable Eldorado for the leaders and agents of the TPLF regime and a goldmine for domestic and foreign investors such as the Karuturi Global Ltd. As aptly remarked by Mr. Karuturi, the fertile green stretches of land in Gambella and Oromia which are leased to investors is "green gold" (see, Planet for Sale – The New World Agricultural Order, Documentary produced by KAPA Presse TV,2011). The consequence of land grabbing is the opposite for the Oromo, the Anuak and other peoples. They are denied their property rights by theTigrayan ruling elites who have illegally made themselves the owners of all land in the non-Abyssinian regions of the Ethiopian state. It means deprivation, displacement, starvation and death. That is what the protest of the Oromo student movement is about.

In general, the land policy of the Ethiopian regime constitutes a crime of aspecial character. That is why the Oromo students took to the streets in mass everywhere in Oromia peacefully defying live bullets fired at them by the security forces of the regime. In the context of northeast Africa, and particularly Oromia, what John Vidal has called "the deal of the century" can been seen as "the crime of the century". What makes it sucha crime is the multi-dimensional harm it is causing and will continue to cause. It is harmful to human beings and nature. It is a crime against the environment and wildlife. As mentioned above most of the fish in Lake Koka are dead and the lake itself is dying. That will be the fate of the fish and marine life in Lake Ziway and of the lake itself soon. Lake Ziway, which is 420sq.m in area and is the only large body of freshwater in the Central Rift Valley, is already affected by fertilizers used on a cluster of flower farms in the area owned by domestic and foreign contractors. A high fish mortality which is associated with effluent discharge from a flower farm is reported. Growth of algae blooms similar to that in Lake Koka is observed in the lake (Tamrat, 2011). The sparkling life-giving waters of the Akaki and Mojo rivers of yesteryears are murky poisonous morass today. Let alone drinking from them, it is repulsive and at the same time painful to look at pictures that depict them. The waters of theAwash River which sustain life in the Afar desert will soon have the samequalities unless necessary measures are taken now.

As I have described elsewhere, one of the consequences of the TPLF regime's policy is the disintegration of the affected Oromo, Anuak and other communities. The process of social disintegration is eloquently articulated by Bekele Garba (Gadaa.com – June 9, 2012, who said that inmany places, land which was productive in the past is now fenced and looked after by watchmen until buildings will be erected on it. The guard often is a lonely individual, perhaps an evicted former owner of the land employed by the new owner – a land grabber. The land could be where the homestead of the watchman stood in the past. He is there alone because his family could have been disintegrated, as is often the case, byeviction. The community to which his family belonged does not exist anymore. There are tens of thousands of individuals who share the bitter experience of the dispossessed farmer depicted by Bekele Garba. The former English lecturer at the Addis Ababa University and former Deputy Chairperson of Oromo Federalist Democratic Movement (OFDM), Bekele Garba, was arrested in August 2011 and was sentenced to eight years of imprisonment for speaking the truth. He was charged of "provocation of crimes against the state and collaboration with the OLF." Today, the regime is killing Oromo students with unimaginable impunity for speakingthe same truth.

It should be noted here that the Ethiopian region and the regional state ofOromia in particular, is the "water tower" of the Horn of Africa. The Awashwhich sustains human and animal life in the Afar region, the Wabe Shabelle, the Ganale on which the Ogaden Somali and the inhabitants of Somalia depend for water, the Baro River which flows through Gambella and drains into the White Nile, and the Mugar, Gudar, Angar, Dhidheessa and Dabus rivers which flow into the Blue Nile contribute more than 70 percent of the water it carries down to Khartoum where it mingles with the White Nile are all from Oromia. In fact, more than 50 percent of Nile water that reaches Egypt comes from Oromia. This should compel us to conclude that the threat posed by the ongoing environmental destruction in Oromia is greater than the threat posed by the controversial Grand Dam.

In general, the extensive land grabbing in Oromia is a threat to the survival of the African peoples who depend on the rivers mentioned above. Therefore, it not an exaggeration to construe that the cause for which Oromo students are conducting peaceful protests all over Oromia, and for which many of them are suffering in Ethiopian prisons or are beingkilled by the Ethiopian security forces now, is also the cause of most of thepeoples of northeast Africa. Regrettably, however, the crime being committed against them by the Ethiopian regime has been treated with indifference by the governments of the countries of northeast Africa.

Needless to say that their silence, while the Oromo are being mercilesslymurdered en masse, is tantamount to betraying the future of their own citizens.

A Regime That Commits Crimes and Tells Lies Without any Sense of Guilt:The TPLF regime has many infamous methods to suppress the voice of thepeople against whom it commits crimes. Deception is its modus operandi. It uses lies as an instrument to create conflict between the Oromo and other peoples in Ethiopia and to advance its divide and strategy. It tells the international community blatant lies to frame the opposition as “terrorists” bent on disrupting peace and democratic development in Ethiopia. Its leaders lack a sense of guilt. They seem to have no feeling of shame in the ordinary sense of the word. They commit crimes and accuse others as the culprits. They displace people forcefully from their land and call it “voluntary eviction” (Vidal, the Guardian March 21, 2011 on Video). In addition, the regime forces the people to participate in public demonstrations that actually contradict their interests and moral values, For example, demonstrations are organized to condemn the victims of the regime’s crimes. Lack of participation in such a “required” demonstration has risks. Those who do not cooperate face strong negative consequences.For public servants it means dismissal from their jobs. For businessmen, itmeans loss of work permits. For farmers it means denial of seeds and fertilizers, the distributions of which is in the monopoly control of companies owned by the regime. For those who depend on international food aid, absence from such demonstrations means withdrawal of the handouts they need for survival. Having forced the people to participate infake demonstrations the regime tells the world that the people are supporting its policies and actions against “terrorists,” “criminals” and “secessionists,”

The regime’s notorious but futile strategy is already at work to discredit the Oromo students. It is reported that the very people who are to lose their land to the AAMP were forced to participate in a demonstration on May 17th in support of the AAMP condemning the Oromo students as “anti-peace elements.” According to the report, a similar demonstration was organized in Robe in Bale on the 16th of May. The people are forced to“support” their own destruction. Regrettably, the role of the OPDO should be mentioned here. It is pathetic to hear the same OPDO leaders who did not have courage to press their TPLF bosses to implement what Article 49 of the Ethiopian Constitution promises the Oromo during the last two decades are now coercing the Oromo to support their enemy, theTPLF regime, to implement its AAMP and to condemn their own children who oppose it. I should add here that there are elements in the Ethiopian diaspora who, in support of the TPLF regime, will label the current protestsof Oromo students as hostile against the other ethnic groups who live among them. However, the student uprising is for justice and, as such, benefits not only the Oromo but all the other peoples in Ethiopia. It exposes the lies on which the Ethiopian state is built and survives.

Courage for Survival and Human Dignity- Learning from Others: In Hindu philosophy the greatest gift for an individual or a nation is courage or the ability to defeat fear. Courage was what Mahatma Gandhi instilled in the psyche of the Indian population to resist the British. Martin Luther King did the same with the African Americans. He persuaded them to defy the pain caused by police batons and the fangs of police dogs and continue their march to freedom. He taught them to face the white police without showing signs of fear. Indeed, the determination of the marching masses he had mobilized did not waver. His inspiring words instilled courage in their hearts and pulled thousands of them to join the historical march on Washington where they listened to the famous speech, “I have a dream” on 28 August 1963. Nelson Mandela’s role in the liberation of South Africa from the evils of apartheid is similar. For 27 years he armed the South Africans with inexhaustible courage to continue with the liberation struggleeven from his prison cell on Robben Island.

While Oromo political leaders have much to learn from the great leaders mentioned above, Oromo religious leaders must follow the examples which were set by religious leaders such as Martin Luther King and Desmond Tutu and preach courage from the podia in the churches and mosques. Popular resistance cannot be conducted without courage and sacrifice irrespective of the form—armed or peaceful—in which it is to be conducted. Courage is also what our community leaders must instill in the Oromo everywhere. We need to muster moral and intellectual courage to defend our rights and humanity against the TPLF regime as the Indians, the African Americans and the South Africans were armed with courage tofight colonialism and racism. Gandhi’s peaceful method may not work for us, because the British and the Tigrayans are not the same. Although the British were not happy to give up their jewel colony, India, they did not revert to systematic terror to defend their hold on it. The TPLF are unlikelyto change their present position on the Oromo peacefully. The adoptabilityof Mandela’s approach to our situation is also doubtful for two main reasons. To start with, there were whites who fought against apartheid as members or supporters of the ANC. As bridge-builders, their contribution in making reconciliation between the white and black South Africans possible was not negligible. In the absence of their role Mandela could have not convinced his constituency to settle for a multi-racial democratic South Africa peacefully. He may have not even tried. Those type of bridgebuilders are not yet born in the Tigrayan-Amhara societies. Secondly, apartheid South Africa used terror to maintain white supremacy over the black population. But it was sensitive to the reaction of the world community. The TPLF leaders do not bother much about international opinion or about the human dignity of the people they oppress. Unfortunately, so far the UN and their foreign supporters do not seem bothered by their horrific human rights records. But that will not make us lose hope. In our present situation what we should adopt from both Gandhi and Mandela is their principled and consistent courage to continuewith the ongoing revolution to achieve national freedom from the grip of oppression. We should stand for the truth and for what we believe in. In other words, whatever approach we will use to achieve freedom, we mustbe equipped with courage that targets the oppressor, and cares about theinnocent bystander.

The Oromo Struggle Concerns Freedom from Fear: The Oromo will lead a life worthy of human beings. As the Burmese winner of the 1991 Nobel Peace Prize and ex-political prisoner, Aung San Suu Kyi, has stated, among the basic freedoms to which humans aspire to lead a full and unhampered life, freedom from fear stands out. The deadliest weapon which tyrannical regimes use against their subjects is fear; they create fear in the minds of those they oppress. Writing about apartheid and its laws Steve Bantu Biko, the murdered anti-apartheid activist and leader of Black Consciousness Movement (BCM) argued, "No average black man canever at any moment be absolutely sure that he is not breaking a law.

There are so many laws governing the lives and behaviour of black peoplethat sometimes one feels that the police only need to page at random their statute book to be able to get a law under which to charge a victim." In other words, the laws of apartheid spread among the black population afeeling of uncertainty, fear and powerlessness. The TPLF regime has been doing in Oromia during the last two decades what the apartheid regime did before its demise. The regime made the life of millions of Oromo worsethan the life of the black South Africans had been during the darkest days of apartheid. Every aspect of Oromo life is impacted by feelings of fear and uncertainty. The Oromo fear the agents of the Tigrayan rulers who can put them in prison without due process of law or make them "disappear" without trace. It is common knowledge that thousands of Oromos have "disappeared" since the TPLF took power in Finfinnee in 1991. They fear the Oromo underdogs who serve the Tigrayan rulers.

Through the system called "one to five" (one person spying on five others), the TPLF has planted its "antennae" in every community, every village and homestead throughout Oromia. For an Oromo, it is difficult to tell which head, among his neighbors, is the "antenna" tuned on him or which pair of eyes that are watching him. Hence no Oromo is sure when the ever-present terror of the TPLF regime will strike him or her.Ethiopia is a country of fitesha (endless search) that turns a person, particularly anOromo, into a perpetual suspect, a criminal by birth. An Oromo is made tofear his/her neighbours, friends, and even relatives because, forced by poverty, many honest people have joined the TPLF's pack of informers in order to survive. The sniffing dogs of the regime are everywhere, in streetcorners, in work places, in schools and university lecture halls, and above all in the kebeles— neighborhoods.

For an Oromo in the diaspora, Ethiopia is a country which he/she visits at the risk of causing danger to his/her relatives. It is a country where an innocent telephone call from a son or a daughter from abroad can send a father or mother to prison. It is a country which makes mothers, fathers, brothers and sisters dread to communicate with a family member who lives abroad. The Oromo struggle is about freedom from the climate of fear created by the Tigrayan regime. Oromo artist need freedom to exercise their profession. He/she needs an audience to develop his/her profession as the audience needs art that makes life enjoyable. Oromo artand scholarship must serve the progress and happiness of the Oromo people and humanity at large. Therefore, for those concerned with the development of Oromo art and culture their right place is within the battlebeing fought for freedom. Indeed, Oromo artists have taken the front lineand are making their contributions with courage. That is also what is expected from Oromo scholars: their studies should contribute to the development of the Oromo society.

The Oromo people need political independence to read what they want to read, and enjoy the music they relish without fear for being accused of narrow nationalism, terrorism or of being arrested put in jail, tortured, raped and killed. Ethiopia is a state in which the Oromo are made to fear to speak their mother tongue. They need political freedom to speak their language without fear or looking back on their shoulders fearing that someone is listening to their conversation and reporting them to the security organs of the regime just because they were “committing the crime” of talking in Afaan Oromoo. The right of speaking one’s mother tongue without worry and harassment is a human right. Needless to say here that it is not the case in Oromia even today. It may not happen at allbefore Oromia is free land. This may seem banal to pro-Ethiopia Oromos who will argue that this dilemma will be solved through the democratization of the Ethiopian state. In my view, those who would hopeto inoculate the Ethiopian state against the hegemonic passions of the Abyssinian ruling elites with a “democratic” constitution and empty talk about justice are fooling themselves.

A Revolution In Need of Coordination: The fact that the Oromo people have lived in fear for a long time is not a result of cowardice, but of a deep sense of powerlessness. Today, one can see that this feeling of powerlessness is rapidly changing into a simmering anger of the Oromo population and the readiness of tens of thousands of Oromo youth to sacrifice their lives for freedom. During the last twenty years, the Oromo have expressed their grievances in poetry and music. Above all Oromo music has been an expression of the popular grievance against injustice. The price paid by Oromo youth for waging the struggle has been mass expulsion from educational institutions, exile, torture and death. Many of them were beaten to death by the security agents of the TPLF as if the victims were not human beings. The list of Oromo artists who were jailed, tortured and murdered by the Tigrayan regime for their songs againstinjustice is very long.

In short, the Oromo have learnt from experience the need for solidarity todefy terror and powerlessness. They are learning that fear and the sense of powerlessness are defeated when they act together. They have witnessed what common action can do in the so-called Arab Spring.
Indeed, signs of common action among the Oromo have been increasing both at home and in the diaspora in recent years. The uprising which the AAMP has ignited is a revolutionary signpost of the trend described above.It is a revolution that needs coordination. The way it is coordinated and the goal it aims to achieve matter. The ability of the Oromo political organizations to use the currents which the uprising has set in motion, mobilize our people for a sustained struggle, and lead our nation to freedom is crucial.The uprising should be given the right direction to be effective and fruitful. It should give dividends which will benefit the Oromoas a nation. It is an opportunity that should not be wasted or misused. It should not be hijacked or exploited by political parties who are biding theirtime to ride back to Menelik's palace in Finfinnee. They have nothing against the "Addis Ababa Plan" of the TPLF regime. As we all know, they will implement it with great pleasure if they get the chance.Let no Oromo organization become their Trojan horse or another OPDO. If they are wiseenough, there is also an opportunity for the current members of the OPDOto abandon their subservient status under the TPLF, and join the national struggle for freedom not only to defend the right of the nation to which they belong, but even to regain the of respect of their countrymen and women. This is the time for every Oromo to get up and be counted on the side of justice and freedom. (Text ends)

DIARIES: Dr. Catherine Hamlin: A Mighty Girl'
Australian obstetrician/gynecologist Dr. Catherine Hamlin has spent muchof her life living in Ethiopia where she has revolutionized care for a childbirth injury called obstetric fistula. Dr. Hamlin, who celebrated her 90th birthday this year, has been nominated for the 2014 Nobel Peace Prize for her work building the world's only medical center dedicated to providing free repair surgery to poor w...omen suffering from this devastating condition -- one that affects more than two million young women around the world. When Dr. Hamlin first moved with her husband,Dr. Reginald Hamlin, to Ethiopia in 1959 to establish a midwifery school, they had never encountered an obstetric fistula as the condition is very rare in developed countries due to modern obstetric techniques such as Caesarean section. They soon learned that fistulas were common in Ethiopia and in much of the developing world. An obstetric fistula is a medical condition in which a hole or fistula develops in the birth canal areaafter a difficult or failed childbirth. Most often, the child dies and the fistula renders the woman incontinent. Due to the leaking which occurs and the resulting odor, women are frequently ostracized from their families and communities.

Recognizing the great need for fistula treatment, the Hamlins founded the Addis Ababa Fistula Hospital in 1974 to provide free fistula repair surgery to women in need. Since then, they have treated 35,000 women with a success rate of 95 percent. Dr. Hamlin has spent years building up local expertise in the surgical procedure and has since opened additional medical centers in other Ethiopian cities. Now established as the global center of expertise on fistula repair, surgeons come from around the worldto be trained by Dr. Hamlin and her associates. To help prevent more women from developing fistulas in the first place, Dr. Hamlin established the Hamlin College of Midwives in 2006. Globally, there are over 300,000 maternal deaths every year, 99 percent of which occur in poor countries, and for every death, at least 20 women suffer severe complications from childbirth. Complications in pregnancy and childbirth remain the leading cause of the death among adolescent girls in many developing countries.

In a country like Ethiopia which has fewer than 200 OB/GYNs for a population of nearly 100 million people, midwives offer the best hope ofproviding front-line maternal care to women, especially those in rural areas.

Dr. Hamlin's work put obstetric fistula on the global health agenda, and her work has been internationally recognized by governments and professional medical societies around the world. At Dr. Hamlin's 90th birthday party earlier this year, her son, Richard, declared that "Catherinehas one son and 35,000 daughters.” Dr. Hamlin, who lives in a cottage atthe hospital and continues to be active in its day-to-day work, has trainedmany to carry on her important mission. At her party, Dr. Hamlin told those who had gathered to celebrate the life of this remarkable woman: "We have to eradicate Ethiopia of this awful thing that’s happening to women: suffering, untold suffering, in the countryside. I leave this with you to do in the future, to carry on.” Dr. Hamlin's life-changing work is possible due to the support of donors from around the world through two charitable organizations -- to help support her work, visit the Australian- based Hamlin Fistula Ethiopia - Dr Catherine Hamlin

Making More Doctors: 85 per-cent of Ethiopians never see a doctor 'PRI by Anders Kelto (August 13, 2014)

The pediatrics wing of St. Paul's Hospital in Addis Ababa is a busy place. Nervous parents move in and out, waiting for their kids to be seen. There aren't a lot of doctors here, but there is one group of people that seems tobe everywhere: young, white-coated medical students. Until recently, Ethiopia had just one physician for every 100,000 people, but now the country is dramatically increasing the number of doctors it produces.

This year, the government opened 13 new medical schools, which more than doubled the number in the country. Ethiopia has also been increasingenrollment at existing schools.

"This year, for the first time, we enrolled 3,100 medical students, which isalmost tenfold compared to what we used to enroll five, six years ago," said Dr. Tedros Adhanom, Ethiopia's foreign minister, who until recently served as minister of health. Tedros says Ethiopia's severe physician shortage is one of the country's most pressing concerns.

Many doctors leave Ethiopia for higher-paying jobs overseas, and those who stay tend to work in the cities and in the private sector. That meansthe 85 percent of Ethiopians who live in rural villages may never see a doctor. Tedros says the government's solution is to deliberately overproduce doctors and flood the country with new physicians. "Even if you lose 100 or 200, everybody doesn't migrate," he said. But some saythis huge increase in the quantity of doctors is compromising quality.

Dame Endalew, a medical student at St. Paul's, says the sharp increase inenrollment has made it difficult to learn. "There's a scarcity of resources,"Endalew said. "We don't have books, computer labs, lecturers. Every timethe number of students increases, these things become worsened."

He says he often can't complete assignments because all of the books andcomputers are in use. He had to share a cadaver with 30 peers. And he often interviews patients who have already seen 10 or 15 other medical students. "When you try to work with them, they are really fed up with the students asking the same question again and again," he said. But perhaps the biggest problem at Ethiopian medical schools is a shortage ofinstructors.

There are very few incentives for senior doctors to teach at medical schools. That means young doctors like Daniel Hailemariam, a professor ofpublic health at the University of Addis Ababa, are asked to step in. "I justgraduated in July, and I'm currently enrolled as a faculty there," he said, though he has never worked in the public health sector.

At Ethiopia's 13 new medical schools there is also a shortage of professors, so recent graduates are often asked to teach. Some say thatcould cause big problems down the road.

One foreign doctor, who has worked in Ethiopia for more than 20 years, but asked not to be identified, said these new schools are producing a generation of doctors who don't know what they're doing, and they coulddo more harm than good.

Adhanom, Ethiopia's former minister of health, agrees that physician quality is a concern, but he insists that Ethiopian schools will meet a minimum standard for medical education. And he says that's good enoughfor now. "I don't think we will change this country by waiting until we get something perfect to start something," Tedros said. "It cannot be perfect. We have to start with what we have." Anders Kelto

ECONOMY: Eth. Birr devalued right after the collapse of the Duerg regimefrom its nominal level of 2.07 Birr per US dollar to 5.13 Birr per US dollar depreciation (by about 142 percent) in October, 1992' The Ethiopian birr was pegged to the United States dollar (USD) from its inception in 1945 until the early 1990s. The birr was valued at 2.50 per USD before the collapse of the Bretton Woods system in 1971, which forced an initial revaluation to 2.30 and then in 1973 to 2.07 per USD. The macroeconomic policies of the Duerg regime (1974-1991) contributed to a significant overvaluation of the birr. In 1992, the transitional governmentdevalued the birr to 5.13 per USD, and several (smaller) devaluations followed. A foreign exchange 'Dutch auction' system was introduced in 1993, mainly supported by foreign aid and, to some extent, by export earnings (Geda 2006:28). For two years the official and auction-based (marginal) rates co-existed in a dual exchange rate system before they were unified in 1995. In October 2001, a foreign exchange interbank market was established. The current exchange rate system is classified asa (de facto) crawling peg to the USD, i.e. a managed (or dirty) float.

The Likely Outcome of Eth. Birr Devaluation'

(September 1, 2014) The World Bank. at the presentation of its most recent recommendations for devaluation, the bank claimed that a 10% devaluation would increase Ethiopia's exports by 5% and add 2 percentage points to the economy's growth rate. It appears that the Ethiopian authorities are at seriously considering the World Bank's mostrecent advice to devalue the Birr.

Table 1 below reports the contributions of Ethiopia's major export commodities to total export revenues both in terms of US dollars and as a percent of total export revenues. The data is for FY 2012/2013 and is fromthe National Bank of Ethiopia website. During FY 2012/2013, these 13 product categories account for 97.6% of total exports by value for. The biggest of these (coffee) accounts for 21.3% and the smallest (meat -- excluding live animals) accounts for 2.1% of total exports growth, one needs to examine the structure of imports.

Ethiopian gov't to bring criminal charges against six weeklies’

Reporters Without Borders (August 12, 2014) Ethiopia’s justice ministry has announced that it is bringing criminal charges ranging from “dissemination of false rumours with the intent of overthrowing the government” to “undermining public trust in the government and attemptsat fostering ethnic and religious divisions” against six news weeklies. In a communiqué released on 5 August, the ministry accused the six weeklies − Lomi, Enqu, Fact, Jano, Addis Guday and Afro-Times – of “encouragingterrorism, endangering national security, repeated incitement of ethnic and religious hate, and smears against officials and public institutions.

Two of the weeklies, Addis Guday and Fact, are among Ethiopia’s leading privately-owned newspapers and have often covered events or published stories that have generated political controversy. One of Addis Guday’s journalists, Asmamaw Hailegiorgis, has been held on a terrorism charge since 25 April. The ministry said it had been “patient” with the six weekliesbut had finally decided to bring charges in response to public pressure for corrective action. It also warned that it was ready to bring charges against other publications engaging in similar “subversive” activity.

HEALTH SECTOR: Making More Doctors: 85 per-cent of Ethiopians neversee a doctor ‘

ETHIOPIA: Sudan and Ethiopia Set to Launch Joint Military Operation’
Sudan Tribune Addis Ababa (August 14, 2014) — Ethiopia's ministry of defence announced on Wednesday that it had reached an agreement withits Sudanese counterpart to establish a joint military force which would operate under the same command. An Egyptian farmer stands by his cowas it takes a drink from the Nile. Egypt fears a massive Ethiopian dam project will ultimately diminish its historic water rights (Photo: Reuters)
The military agreement was reached on Tuesday during the11th Ethiopia-Sudan joint defence ministerial meeting held in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa. Ethiopia's defence minister, Siraj Fegessa, told reporters that the joint force will be operational by the end of September. Forces will be deployed on eight fronts along the two countries' common border with the aim of ensuring border security, boosting economic cooperation and allowing the two countries to carry out joint development activities. Sudanese defence minister Abdul-Rahim Mohamed Hussein said that theformation of the joint force would further reinforce the existing security cooperation between the two countries.
Lt. Gen. Emad Al Din Mustafa, the chairman for the Sudanese side on the expert committee, said that Tuesday's agreement was based on a memorandum of understanding previously signed between the two neighbours. "The most important outcome of Tuesday's talks is the conclusion of an action plan for the Ethiopia-Sudan joint forces" he said. Ethiopia and Sudan share a long and porous borderline, which stretches around 800 kilometres. It's hoped the military agreement will help both countries to safeguard their common borders and defend themselves fromany external aggression or other cross-border attacks.
ATTACK ON THE NILE DAM
Ethiopians see the joint military agreement as a key defence strategy to avert any possible sabotage of a controversial dam project it is building onthe Nile, some 40km from the Sudanese border. Egypt fears the dam will eventually diminish its water share and insists its historical water rights must be maintained. During president Mohammed Mursi's leadership Egyptian politicians were caught live on TV in June proposing to sabotage the massive dam project, known as Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD). Some politicians suggested taking hostile action, including a direct air strike and backing Ethiopian rebels to destroy the $ 4.6 billionpower plant project.

Although Ethiopian officials say a direct attack from Egypt is unlikely, thecountry's army remains on high alert. Ethiopian rebels, Eritrea and Somalia's Al-shabaab, which is suspected of supplying mercenaries on Egypt's behalf, are all considered to be a potential threat to Ethiopia's national security. The military agreement between Sudan and Ethiopia isexpected to guard against any potential attacks from Sudanese soil.

Leaked files published by Wikileaks in 2012 alleged that Sudan had agreedto allow Egypt to use an airbase in Kursi in the west of Sudan's Darfur region to strike Ethiopia's dam, which will be Africa's largest hydro power facility upon completion. Sudan has dismissed the allegations. (Text ends)

August 17, 2014: In Celebration of The Great Emperor Menelik II's 180thBirthday.

Emperor Menelik II (Ge'ez ምኒ ልክ) (17 August 1844 – 12 December 1913),was Negus of Shewa (King) (1866–89), then Nəgusä Nägäst (Emperor) ofEthiopia from 1889 to his death. At the height of his internal power and external prestige, the process of territorial expansion and creation of the modern empire-state had been completed by 1898. Ethiopia was transformed under Nəgusä Nägäst Menelik: the major signposts of modernization were put in place. Externally, his victory over the Italian invaders had earned him great fame: following Adwa, recognition of Ethiopia’s independence by external powers was expressed in terms of diplomatic representation at the court of Menelik and delineation of Ethiopia’s boundaries with the adjacent colonies.

According to the Ethiopian archieves the 17th August 1844 is documentedas Emperor Menelik Haile Melekot 's date of birth, so that means today is his birthday and Happy birthday to his Majesty the emperor... Menelik II lighted up the first candle of modernization and led the undeveloped Ethiopian society to the sunrise...but unfortunately, there are some tribal freaks out there, who are trying hard to destroy his golden deeds out ... ofhate and undermine, however success has not been on their side. Because, beyond all the nonsense, the world continues to celebrate thelife and time of the emperor. In the year 1921 about 24 years after thebattle of Adwa, the terminally ill British war reporter Augusts Wylde acknowledged Menelik in the parliament and called him his best friend..Menelik was the only friend I ever had, ….the fragile war journalist emotionally told the house at the same time he waved at the world farewell, ‘Happy Birthday to his Majesty.’

Emperor menelik was the diligent Ethiopian of the era. He spoke many european languages and he made europeans fight against until he stockpiled enough weapons for the war against Italy. He also spoke afan oromo language and he was allied with wollo and shoa oromos against theGojjames and Gonderes. His nickname was "Gojam geday" because he defeated many gojjam army generals but in the longterm, he united Ethiopians from every corner Some northern gonderes and some tigres used to call menelik "baria" because he is an Amhara from menz and darkskin. But he outmanuevered everyone and allied himself strategically withthe Oromos.

It was the same when we come the renowned Oromo army general Ras Gobena Dacce who was born on May 5, 1821. Ras Gobena Dacee was known for ceasing the conflict between Oromo sub-clans and allied his forces with Menelik's nationalist army. Large number of ordinary citizensfirmly believe that their late emperor Emiye Menelik and one of his top army generals who died of natural sickness couple of months before theemperor dies, have left back the entire nation a ‘unifying legacy’. The present Ethiopia is what it is today because of Menelik and Ras Gobena Dacce who played a pivotal role during the expansion years had been horsenamed as ‘Gobena Aba Tigu’. Though, Ethiopian historians should have to stop ignoring the achievements and legacies of Ras Gobena Daccee. (Text ends)

DIARIES: The Practice of E-espionage In Ethiopia:

Illegal Wiretapping Is Illegal, Even for Governments -EFF to Ethiopia’

EFF (August 18, 2014) - Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) told the U.S.District Court for the District of Columbia that Ethiopia must be held accountable for its illegal wiretapping of an American citizen. Foreign governments simply do not have a get-out-of-court-free card when they commit serious felonies in America against Americans. This case is the centerpiece of our U.S. legal efforts to combat state sponsored malware

In February 2014, EFF filed suit against the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia on behalf of our client, Mr. Kidane, an Ethiopian by birth who has been a U.S. citizen over a decade. Mr. Kidane discovered traces of Gamma International's FinSpy, a sophisticated spyware product which its maker claims is sold exclusively to governments and law enforcement, on his laptop at his home in suburban Maryland. A forensic examination of hiscomputer showed that the Ethiopian government had been recording Mr.

Kidane’s Skype calls, as well as monitoring his web and email usage. The monitoring, which violates both the federal Wiretap Act and Maryland state law, was accomplished using spyware that captured his activities and then reported them back to a command and control server in Ethiopiacontrolled by the government. The infection was active from October 2012, through March 2013, and was stopped just days after researchers at the University of Toronto’s Citizen Lab released a report exposing Ethiopia's use of use of FinSpy. The report specifically referenced the very

IP address of the Ethiopian government server responsible for the command and control of the spyware on Mr. Kidane's laptop. (Text ends)

The Purpose of Privatization And Its Challenges In Ethiopia' EDITOR'S DIARIES (August 19, 2014) - In January 1994, Ethiopian to ensure an orderly implementation of the privatization program. As recently as December 2013, the EPA re-organized and became the Privatization & Public Enterprise Supervision Agency (PPESA). Currently, PPESA, which is chaired by Deputy Prime Minister Aster Mammo, intends to sell 11 more public companies to the highest bidders. PPESA has so far implemented asset sales for retail outlets and restaurants and mining enterprise, as well as implemented employment management buy-outs, joint venture, management contract, competitive sale and restrictive tender. The agency has earned up to USD 1 billion to date. The African Development Bank (AFDB) reports that during the first phase of privatization in Ethiopia the EPA privatized 176 small enterprises using in house expertise and government resources. For the implementation of thesecond phase of privatization for more complex government enterprises, In the case of Ethiopia the government has undertaken privatization programs at the risk of consolidating the state owned enterprises in the hand of few oligarchs.

According to a WikiLeaks US Embassy Cable on 01/11/2008 to the US Treasury, "While the vast majority of enterprises in terms of numbers-- 233 of 254 -- have been either sold to employees in a Management Employee Buyout (MEBO) arrangement or purchased by individual Ethiopians, these are mostly small shops and hotels. In dollar terms, nearly 60 percent of enterprises have been awarded to Al Amoudi-relatedcompanies." During the years1999-2001 Washington institutions have been pushing for the privatization of the banking sector in Ethiopia and opening of the financial sector to foreign banks, particularly interested in the sale or break up of the state owned Commercial Bank of Ethiopia (CBE).

University students challenge EPRDF officials'ESAT News (August 19, 2014)

Students in Gonder University taking part in the mandatory training whichcompels over 350 thousand new and existing university students to be trained in government's policy and strategy have posed several critical questions to the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) officials who are leading the training. The training directive statesthat students who do not hold the certificate of completion of this training cannot continue their studies. The meeting held amid a disorder, is reportedly aimed at preparing students for the upcoming election and recruiting new members. On the first day of the session held last Friday,students asked questions about rights, democracy, and economy.

The students have asked if there was really equality between ethnic groups in Ethiopia. They also stated that there is a domination of one ethnic group in the leadership positions of different organisations and the Amhara ethnic group is being insulted by people who even claim to represent the people. The students said that there was no democracy in the country, doubted if there was religious equality too. Although the current regime often critics the former regime, the students said the works of the current regime are not even better than the past and it is difficult to even differentiate them.Similarly, the students aired their criticisms on the economic front saying that road constructions are often not completed, there is no sugar in the market, and recent reports show that Ethiopia is still one of the poorest countries in the world even if thereare infrastructural developments which are built by Chinese money.

The students also asked about the border problems between Sudan and Ethiopia in the North West and why they force them to attend such training when elections arrive, the chairs were unable to answer the questions satisfactorily which annoyed most of the students. So far only students that have come from rural areas were given small amount of per dime. This has caused a fall out between the rest of the students and the officials of the ruling Front who organised the meeting. Students told ESATthat the interest of the students to participate in the training has been minimal and most of them who started attending the training have left in the middle. A document that was prepared by Addisu Legese, former Deputy PM and now top official and trainer within the ruling Front, EPRDF,for the advisors of the Ethiopian Prime Minister, recommended that the Front should change the way it recruits and trains its members for the success of the “transformation journey”. MIGRATION: Ethiopia overtakes Kenya as biggest refugee-hosting country‘

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, August 19 (UNHCR) – The UN refugee agency announced on Tuesday that Ethiopia has overtaken Kenya to become thelargest refugee-hosting country in Africa, sheltering 629,718 refugees asof the end of July. Kenya, in comparison, is host to 575,334 registered refugees and asylum-seekers.

The main factor in the increased numbers is the conflict in South Sudan, which erupted in mid-December last year and has sent 188,000 refugees into Ethiopia since the beginning of 2014. There are at present 247,000 South Sudanese refugees in the country, making them the largest refugeepopulation. They are followed by Somalis (245,000) and Eritreans (99,000). Over the last seven months, nearly 15,000 Eritreans and more than 3,000 Somalis also arrived in Ethiopia. "Together with the Ethiopian government and other partners, we are providing protection and humanitarian aid in 23 refugee camps and five transit sites around thecountry," UNHCR spokesman Adrian Edwards told reporters in Geneva.

Three of the camps and three transit sites are new – having been opened since the beginning of the year to handle the growing number of refugeesfleeing the fighting in South Sudan. All three camps are at capacity and UNHCR is developing two more. While refugees wait to be moved to the new camps, more than 18,000 are sheltered in three temporary sites in Pagak, Pamdong and Matar in the western region of Gambella. However, in recent weeks heavy rain has flooded these three low-lying sites, as wellas Leitchuor Camp, where the situation is most serious. Some 10,000 refugees – more than a fifth of Leitchuor's population of 47,600 – have been hit by flooding.
Many tents and shelters are under water and latrines have collapsed. Thisis a serious health concern and threatens to undermine gains made in preventing the outbreak of water-borne diseases. Refugees have pitched tents on higher camp roads. UNHCR's Edwards said that with the rainy season set to last until October, "We are working with our partners to drain the accumulated rainwater into a nearby small stream as quickly aspossible. We are also speeding up development of the new Nip Nip camp-some three kilometres from Leitchuor. It will be able to accommodate 20,000 refugees."
In the meantime, the refugee agency is moving affected refugees from the roadside to drier spots of the camp and sending relief items to the area to be distributed to refugees who have lost their meagre belongings in the floods. Most of the Gambella region is at a low elevation and flood- prone. UNHCR continues to work with the government at the federal and regional level to identify additional sites that are less susceptible to flooding. South Sudan's crisis has caused massive displacement internally and into neighbouring countries. As of mid-August, 1.861 million South Sudanese had been forcibly displaced, of whom almost 1.3 million are internally displaced and more than 575,000 were refugees in neighbouring countries. South Sudan is also continuing to host some 243,000 refugees,the majority from Sudan. (Text ends)
Interpol Plans To Open Office At the AU HQ In Addis Ababa’
INTERPOL: ADDIS ABABA (August 20, 2014) The International Police Organisation (Interpol) is planning to open a permanent office at the African Union (AU) headquarters in Addis Ababa, says the Ethiopian National Interpol Head, Police Commander Girmay Kahsay. He told the Ethiopiannews Agency here Tuesday that a representative of Interpol hadrecently held discussions with the concerned parties on how a permanentoffice could be opened at the AU headquarters.

The decision to open a permanent office here took into consideration Ethiopia's close collaboration with the organisation and its active role in the continent, according to Commander Girmay. Activities are currently underway to establish AFRIPOL, a continental organisation affiliated to theInterpol, he added. The International Police Organisation is strongly controlling criminal activities globally by expanding its structure, Commander Girmay said. Interpol, which has consolidated its efforts by establishing strong bonds among police forces and providing information and transmitting messages,has 703 permanent employees in 98 countries, it was learned.

Ruling Party says new strategy designed to fight “extremism”

ESAT News (August 21, 2014) The ruling Ethiopian People’s RevolutionaryDemocratic Front (EPRDF) has prepared a new document which states that the extremism within the Orthodox and Protestant Churches has become a threat to the regime. The new strategy will be implemented in the Oromia and Amhara regions as of the next Ethiopian year. Officials of the Amhara region, zone and Woreda officials that are suspected to be prone to extremism have discussed the document.

The audio and document evidences that some of the attending officials said to ESAT that the ruling Front is faced with problems that emanate from the groups that it dubbed “extremists”. Discussion was also held inthe presence of Sheikh Muhamed Hassen of the Amhara Region Islamic Affairs Council on the measures taken against “Muslim extremists”.

Muhamed said “we are losing our Mosques to the extremists”. Anotherofficial asked the government to strengthen and empower the Council.

The Administration Public Relations Advisor, Desalgne Asrage and Anti- Riot and Anti-Terror Task Force Assistant Commissioner Desye Dejene have responded to the queries of the respondents. The Commissioner saida lot must be done in campaign to counter the dangers that could come from the extremism in the next general election. He also said that the work of fighting them is not left for the Mejlis but the government is readyto organise the people through its one to five structure and other step by step measures.

The discussion took over three hours, ESAT will present the ideas raisedduring the meeting as needed in the future. The government has been saying that the Islamic Majlis election of 2005 has been held free from government influence and that it will not interfere in religious matters.

About the ethnic-Oromo branch of Harrarghe - on sub Divisions andCitizenship Modalities’

VIEW POINT: By Afendi Muteki (August 21, 2014) The three tribes of theHarar Oromo are divided to clans called ‘gosaa’. Many aspects of the family life and social activities of the people were influenced by clan basedinstitutions. Currently, this phenomenon is very strong in the countryside where people's tradition and customs are highly observed. The Ittu Oromo is divided to ten clans; Baabbo, Alga, Waayye, Wacaale, Addaayyo, Arroojjii, Baaye, Gaamo, Gaadullaa and Qaalluu. The Afran Qallo Oromo has four clans called Oborraa, Baabbile, Daga and Ala (It is wrong to count Nole and Jarso as two of the four clans that make up the Afran Qallo as many writers do; both of them are parts of the "Daga" clan). The Anniya Oromo has seven clans grouped under two confederacies, called Saddacha and Kudhelle. The Sadacha confederacy has three clans called Babbo, Malka and Dambi. The Khodholle confedarcyhas four clans called Bidu, Anna, Koyye and Macca. Each clan is divided to sub-clans called "ibidda". This "ibidda" inturn is divided to kinship groups called "warra". It is this "warra" that denotes common origin of peoples and usually, each "warra" is called by a personal name which is regarded as the name of the ancestor of the "warra". Most of the Oromos of Harerghe are able to count down their forefathers up to the man they consider as their bearing father (i.e. theancestor of "warra").

A person who belongs to the Oromo nation is called "lammii" (citizen). It is possible to be "lammii" in two ways: by birth and by adoption. Anyone who was born to the Oromo parents would be a "lammi" directly, and sucha person is usually called "ilma gudeedaa" ("a child from the womb").

Adoption was practiced in three ways.

1. "ilma guddisaa": indicates the children that lost their parents at a battlefield and adopted to the Oromo citizen. The person adopted in this way had full political and civil rights.
2. "ilma mixii": children who are thrown by their bearer on the road andpublic places and adopted to an Oromo citizen. 'Ilma mixii' also had full political and civil rights.
3. "ilma gosaa"/"ilma barcumaa": this indicates aged persons who becameOromo citizens due to their service to the society and their extra ordinary skills (the Ittu Oromo say "ilma gosaa", the Afran Qallo Oromo say "ilma barcumaa"). "Ilma gosaa" had no right to be elected in the state, but he can elect the leaders of the state and members of "caffee" assembly. A person who was adopted to an Oromo citizen must practice an Oromo culture; he should speak Afan Oromo and should had due respect for the society's norms and ethical codes.

It was also possible to live in the Oromo land without having a "lammii"status. In this regard, however, giving a pledge to the society and the state was a must. A person who was welcomed by the Oromos in this manner was called “amba” (non-citizen). The “amba” had no right of election, neither would he involve in the political and administrative affairs. He, however, he had no duty to give military service. The writer, Afendi Muteki, is a researcher and author of the ethnography and historyof the peoples of East Ethiopia.

The Need to Deconstruct the Personality Cult Built around Meles Zenawi’By Semahagn Gashu Abebe (PhD) (August 22, 2014)

(Ethiomedia) The Ethiopian regime and supports are commemorating the second year anniversary of the passing away of Ethiopia’s long time dictator Meles Zenawi. Although the late leader was responsible for making Ethiopia a land locked country and masterminded a repressive ideology that has made the Ethiopian political discourse divisive and unpredictable, his sudden departure had gripped the nation causing credible concern including to his detractors. This is mainly due to the fact that the country has not departed from its totalitarian past and political power has never been institutionalized in the country’s long history. In thepast, Ethiopian emperors had absolute legislative, judicial, and executive power. Though the 1974 revolution had terminated the legitimacy of imperial rule, the autocratic form of governance that grants absolute power to head of the state has not been altered. The trends of worshipingthe ‘legacies’ of Meles Zenawi is partly due to the continuity of the repressive culture. However, the level of adulation extended to the late leader is unprecedented and transformed into a dangerous precedent.

The most worrying developments related to the death of Meles Zenawi isthe attempts made by the regime to perpetuate a personality cult aroundthe deceased leader. The regime has been widely engaged in the adulation of the late leader as ‘the great leader’, the visionary leader’ through using media manipulation and propaganda. The climax of such unprecedented propaganda manifested when the regime erected Meles’s statue at the national museum on 20 August 2014. The legacy of Meles Zenawi has become now a revered issue that may not be freely debated by citizens. Due to the unprecedented level of propaganda exerted in thelast two years, many people have become to believe that Meles was indeed a visionary leader.

The personality cult attempted to portray by the ruling group has also brought about a huge psychological impact among the public similar to what happened after the death of Stalin during the former USSR. When Khrushchev delivered a speech on 25 February 1956 sharply criticising thereign of Joseph Stalin, it was reported that some of those present sufferedheart attacks and others later committed suicide. Similarly, the continued trend of cultism built around Meles Zenawi will have a lasting psychological impact on our aspiration to build a free and democratic nation. Particularly, the ban and repression of alternative perspectives about Meles Zenawi will significantly undermine the development of independent institutions and prospects of democratic transformation in thecountry.

Historically, personality cults built around political figures had destructive consequences. A cult of personality arises when a group uses mass media,propaganda, or other methods, to create an idealized, heroic, and at times, worshipful image, often through unquestioning flattery and praise. Personality cults are largely associated with totalitarian regimes where a single leader became associated with this revolutionary transformation, and came to be treated as a benevolent "guide" for the nation without whom the transformation to a better future could not occur. This has beengenerally the justification for personality cults that emerged in totalitarian regimes such as Adolf Hitler, Benito Mussolini and Joseph Stalin in the past

In a personality cult, the individual leader's image becomes associated with the new set of values or goals that are perceived by the public to be beneficial to the nation's well-being. In some cases, such beliefs are maintained even when the said values or goals have a negative effect on the society’s well being. Despite these potential negative effects, personality cults can often be maintained through glorification of the leaders to a benevolent or god-like status. In countries where personalitycult of leaders perpetuated such as in North Korea, Cuba, Russia, Libya, Syria and other regimes, break down of democracy, repression, civil strifeand instability have occurred.

Thus, this is the time for Ethiopia wholly departs from worshiping the legacy of the divisive political figure and shift towards institutionalizing political power. The central problem that has prevented the country from forming democratic institutions momentarily is the strategy of the ruling group to stay in power through applying different ideologically motivated policies including the adulation of the late leader. Absence of independent institutions has resulted in undermining prospects of democratic transition in the country. Lack of transparency is evident at every level of government in spite of the usual reference by the EPRDF leadership to democratic jargons. Lack of accountability has resulted in public distrust in the institutions and engineered sense of fear among the intellectuals, media and the public. Freedom of expression and the right to association has been severely restricted.

The regime applies different excuses to imprison religious leaders, journalists, opposition political leaders and human rights activists. All thecrackdowns coupled with the worsening of economic and social problemsare leading the country to the edge of major political chaos. Before it is too late, the regime needs to come to its senses and cease to use the ‘legacy’ of Meles Zenawi for sustaining the repressive and corruptive status quo. Rather, it needs to reverse the trend of building a cult of personality around the late Meles Zenawi and embrace democratic principles and the development of democratic institutions that ensuredemocratic transformation and political stability in the country.

Eritrean border guards shoot dead 10 civilians as they attempted to crossinto Ethiopia'

(ST) SHIRE, ETHIOPIA (August 22, 2014) Eritrean border guards have allegedly shot dead 10 Eritreans citizens as they attempted to cross in toEthiopia, a recent escapee told Sudan Tribune on Friday. The secretive regime in Asmara has led Eritrea to be dubbed the North Korea of Africa

Samuel Gedion said he was among a group of 18 Eritreans who were trying to flee to Ethiopia two weeks ago. "Ten of them were killed, while three of us made it to Ethiopia. I am not sure on the fate of the remainingfive," he said. He said border guards had opened fired on the group without any prior warning. One of those reportedly killed was a young woman who had recently finished 18 months of military service. Eritrea has a long-standing shoot-to-kill policy against those who attempt to flee the repressive nation, dubbed the North Korea of Africa.

Eritrean opposition groups in Addis Ababa told Sudan Tribune that hundreds of young Eritreans have been killed by border guards in the pasttwo years alone. The regime in Asmara considers citizens who attempt to flee as traitors. Those who are caught are often subject to indefinite prisonterms and serious human rights abuses. Many others are also punished bydeath, particularly if they are believed to have links to exiled Eritrean opposition groups.

Many young people, however, are still prepared to take the risk, fleeing toneighbouring countries in protest against indefinite military service, serious human rights abuses and bad governance. Last week, the A reportreleased last week by the International Crisis Group (ICG) entitled Eritrea:Ending the Exodus? calls on the Eritrean government to implement the long-delayed 1997 constitution The group underscored the need to address the country's growing internal crisis which is behind the ongoing exodus, as well as calling for greater engagement with Eritrea – potentially ending a decade of isolation that has been both self-imposed and externally generated.

It urged the leadership in Eritrea to work towards gradual demobilisation of the military and undertake a restructure of the country's economy in order to create wider job opportunities. "The youth exodus from Eritrea issymptomatic of social malaise and growing disaffection with the Asmara regime," said Cedric Barnes, the think tank's director for the Horn of Africa. "The state's demand for the sacrifice of individual ambition to the greater good of the Eritrean nation – resigning oneself to, in effect, indefinite national service – causes more and more Eritreans to leave thecountry, even if that means risking their lives," adds Barnes.

He called on Eritrea's government to end the policy of indefinite national service and to work with international partners to build an economy that will create jobs for its citizens. The secretive Red Sea nation currently hasup to ten thousand political prisoners languishing in the country's secret detention facilities, including in underground prisons and shipping containers.

Isayas Afeworki of Eritrea, the TPLF and Ethiopians'

VIEW POINT By Eyassu Lebenu (August 25, 2014) I must confess, before Idecided to write the article I had a little conversation with myself about why I should deal with this complex and elusive subject matter when too many people have too many opinions and perceptions, factual or otherwise. I also questioned myself if I really am entitled and rightful person to engage with this task. After contemplating the question for sometime I came to agreement with myself that as an Ethiopian I have every right to engage myself in any endeavor that concerns the nation. In so doing, based on my personal, educational and career experiences I will put forward the little I know to right the wrong, correct the incorrect and uncover the covert to create concrete evidence that would be the basis forrational decision and action. This article is forwarded with that in mind andwith no sense of authority but rather deepest humility for being able to share my insights and findings with my fellow citizens.

Some might find it improper to include the Eritrean leader in the matter ofEthiopian affairs since it is exclusively Ethiopians only. However, we have to realize that as much as internal dynamics and forces shape and direct the political reality in Ethiopia it is also relevant to understand the impact and role of other interest groups. Specially, a country that has been one part of the Ethiopian territory until as recently as two decades ago there are many issues that are still unsettled and unresolved. Besides, new oneshas also been created following the independence of Eritrea. So, addressing issues that relates to Eritrea would be pertinent in understanding the Ethiopian reality and the future of the region at large.

But, I would like to remind all that it is not the intention of this writer to give opinion or evaluation about the Eritrean leader and his domestic andinternational policies. I have neither the will nor the right to do so. My attempt is just looking the region holistically with an attempt to deal withthe realities in Ethiopia. This piece has no intention of lionizing one and demonizing others. What itattempts to address simply is the relationship and dynamics between the three entities so as to examine issues of friendship; cooperation; enmity; betrayal; deception and naivety with the hope of shedding light on the basic destructive and constructive underpinning factors. Why I put TPLF and Ethiopians as separate entities on the subject is due to my understanding of their difference of opinion on many issues and policies, including the difference on matters as big as what Ethiopian interest really is. That is what made it so difficult for me to put them in one category or regard them as the same entity. As much as there are differences of opinion between TPLF and Isayas Afeworki, there is the same level of differences between TPLF and Ethiopians despite they are in one politicallydefined area called Ethiopia. We are a rational being who should have the capabilities to decipher facts from fiction to make an informed decision based on reasoning and analysis. That is exactly why I took the liberty to address the subject that had in fact been inexplicable for me for a long time. As much as it is true that my point of view and explanations create positive reaction from someit is also expected to create some non-smiley faces in some quarters. No matter what the effect, however, the beauty of freedom of expression is all about saying what you believe is right and put it in the open for everybody to see and judge. This is a beautiful and healthy discourse thatno human being should be restricted from exercising anywhere, including Ethiopia and Eritrea. And for me personally, being able to speak loud whatI have inside with no fear of retribution from any authority means a lot.

And truly, that is my American Dream nothing more can substitute. Specially, when you know people are jailed, tortured and abused for exercising this right you feel more convinced of its importance and that drives you to do more.

This article underscores one fundamental principle, not all that we see andhear is what it is until we make our own investigation and careful observation that would help us reach the truth by refuting politically motivated and patronizing information of others. Specially, in politics where politicians are mostly concerned about how to achieve their goal while being less concerned what means they use it is imperative to find our own truth rather than being treated as buffoons who take all make believes than the facts on the ground. All sorts of tactics are put in place by politicians just so they accomplish their personal or group agenda disregarding moral, societal and even legal boundaries. What this article meant to achieve is one thing, to address the subject matter in a differentlight in an attempt to uncover the facts and erase the delusions created bypoliticians. In doing so, I attempt to investigate the dead past and explain the paralyzed present so as to breath life on the future by recommending some ideas and direction for actions that would hopefully be used to redeem the nation and the region.

The Ethiopians delusion; identifying the source: For a person like me whodid not pass the age of fourteen when TPLF became a government it is easy to be co-opted growing up with the lies and deceptions propagated through the two state controlled Medias, ETV and Ethiopian radio. On topof that, the entire time TPLF has been ruling the nation for the last twenty-three years it has also been effective in institutionalizing and wellorganizing the Communication Ministry. Under the propaganda Chief Bereket Simon the ministry has been tirelessly working like a beast deluding and deceiving Ethiopians in an attempt to protect TPLF's interest while betraying that of the nation. Bereket's repeated denial of Meles's death; his denial of the election 2005 loss; his denial of the crossing of theEthiopian troops in to Somalia; his adamant claim that Badme was awarded to Ethiopia in the Algiers peace agreement when the reality is otherwise are some of his many landmark accomplishments.

Being subject to such well-organized and institutionalized machinery of fabrication would obviously sway peoples' understanding to the wrong direction. The media institutions in Ethiopia that are obviously the mouthpiece of the ruling elite, are the kind of media that speak about 'a speck in others eyes when they have a log in their own' by demonizing those that pose a threat to absolute monopoly of power by TPLF. In the name of 'destroying the constitutional system', 'terrorism' and 'corruption'those who are regarded politically challenging have been thrown to jail through heinous well orchestrated media campaign that tirelessly charge them on phony accusations. This type of strategy conducted in media monopolized state by the government could ultimately make people believe it as true since that is the only thing they hear with no other options available. So, the negative and monster picture we have in mind about Isayas Afeworki as being anti-Ethiopia and warmonger could be themaking of politicians so as to hide their own guilt than being right. This is the scenario I believe has to be re-examined using a different glass other than the one prescribed by TPLF.

Earlier, I pointed out that politics involves more tricks and fabrication thantrue and honest means and strategies. However, when the frequency and longevity of deception and fabrication goes to the level of Mr. Bereket it really begs the question whether it is a matter of politics or character. I am obliged to believe the latter. How come a human being constantly engage in deliberate misinformation and lies until his old age? It is self- deprecating for a sane person to engage in such acts and it is disrespectful to all Ethiopians in general to whom all the lies were disseminated for as long as more than two decades. It is in fact true that respecting others begins from respecting oneself. Since Bereket has no self-respect his disrespect of the entire Ethiopian people would not mean anything at all. Because, after all that disrespect is a common trait of Tigray Liberators to Ethiopia and Ethiopians that I can substantiate with a thousand examples attesting to that very fact.

But, for now, allow me to mention just one. The obvious fact that the TPLFgovernment still has the name Tigray Liberation while it is a representative and government of other ethnic groups, disregarding the disguise name EPRDF, comes out of arrogance and disrespects to the nation nothing more can explain. At the time and day Eritrean People Liberation Front/EPLF/ has become Peoples' Front for Democracy and Justice /PFDJ/ the TPLF insistence to stick to its old agenda of liberation ofTigray ignites the question whether that is still a plan postponed but never abandoned. In Ethiopia other than the TPLF there are no parties with thetitle of liberation, either they are called Democratic Movements or Organizations.

The TPLF's determination of keeping their Dedebit name even after twenty-three years since they took over Menelik's palace cannot be explained in any other manner, except saying that the party still is not willing to live with other Ethiopian people being one of the many colors ofthe nation in unity, equality and mutual respect. It seems that Tigray Liberators who knows that their powers in Addis is hanging on a tiny thread, definitely plans and wishes to establish the Republic when their hegemony is no more assured. If that does not explain the why, nothing will.

When it comes to the perception of Ethiopians to the Eritrean regime thereis a sense of mistrust and negative perception that is rooted in the secession or independence of the one time Ethiopian territory and its associated effect of making Ethiopia a land locked nation. Besides, since the Badme incident the way the Eritrean leader Isayas Afeworki was/is portrayed in the Ethiopian media as evil and 'insane' who leaves no stone unturned to distract the 'development' and 'democracy' in Ethiopia, by that they mean to dispossess TPLF’s power, has strengthened that negative perception. It is not the attempt of this article to defend and argue in a favorable light about the Eritrean leader. But I very much hope every one to have an all rounded observation by having historical perceptive and equally making an inward looking mindset towards Tigray Liberators. Because, I deeply believe most of us are victims to the TPLF propaganda driven by the Che Bellew tactics, meant to create and drive people by emotions and excitement, while the facts are on the contrary. I have devoted the next part dealing with this broader subject matter. But before that, let me conclude this section by saying the following on Bereket Simon.

One time on face book I read about a man called Samuel Zemichael (is it even his name?) who claimed to be a Dr./ Engineer, when he is not, and he is world visionaries association founder, when there is no such thing at all, and Obama is his boss. He fooled everyone from high to low places in Ethiopia for a long time until he was finally exposed. Latter, I think he wasapprehended and taken to jail. That is good. But the question is why is it acrime when citizens commit such acts and it is politics for people like Bereket, who is committing similar but monumental level deceptive acts on the national level for the last twenty-three years? I know you would say to me, do not be naïve Mr. Lebenu you know exactly why. Sure I do, since in Ethiopia being in power gives immunity they are above the law and not only have they had a pass to delude but also steal, torture, kill and jail. Let me put it in this analogy, Samuel has stolen the egg and he deserve to face justice but paying salary to the one who steal the chicken alive by calling him a Minister while he is no better than Mr. Zemichael isnot only hypocrisy it is a sheer embarrassment.

Isayas Afeworki and TPLF: When I think about this subject matter I always find it puzzling to understand why, Isayas Afeworki is so much anti-TPLF while they have done and served to him like loyal dogs by sacrificing Ethiopian interest from the guerrilla years to independence. TPLF has helped Isayas sending its troops to save Nakfa in 1982 from the Ethiopian government/ Derg/ Red Star campaign and has killed Ethiopiansfor the Eritrean cause; after the fall of the Derg regime in 1991 Meles andhis cronies have facilitated the referendum of Eritrea and subsequent formation of the new nation and its immediate recognition even before other countries; TPLF has allowed Eritrea to have inviolable right over Asab with no regard to Ethiopian interest and disregarding the call of Ethiopian intellectuals for such action; why the Eritrean leader was aggressive enough to invade Ethiopian territory by violating international border while TPLF has been babysitting him for a long time by betraying Ethiopian interest. These were some of the services willingly provided to Isayas by TPLF and yet Isayas went to war and still is at war footing with TPLF. Based on all these scenarios I gave TPLF the benefit of the doubt that it was indeed the victim of the Eritrean belligerence and arrogance and I was supportive of TPLF when it comes to Isayas Afeworki. But not anymore.

Isayas Afeworki was the Godfather of TPLF. Or TPLF was the brainchild of Isayas Afeworki. Or you can even say he was worshiped by the TPLF as a God, since they got none as Marxists. He has been the one who initiated the creation of TPLF and logistically and politically enabling them to mobilize the Tigrean peasants in an effort to establish a joint force to withstand then Ethiopian regime/Derg. Throughout the armed struggle period TPLF had a hierarchical relationship with its ally in Eritrea and it had in fact continued in the post ‘liberation’ period until the Badme incident. Thatis due to the fact that the elites in TPLF were far more inferior to the Eritreans in terms of education as well as consciousness that is attributable to the fact that they had less experience in the struggle unlikeEPLF. The late Prime Minister Meles statement, ‘conversing with Isayas Afeworki for an hour is worth reading a thousand books’ speaks with a high tone about the general disparity that existed in terms of capacity between the two liberators, EPLF and TPLF.

The idea that suggests TPLF actions and decisions after the removal of theDerg were meant to help Eritrea/Isayas is a wrong understanding of the reality that I myself fell for. Rather all this TPLF moves were made with the intention in mind to protect TPLF power and its sole supreme existence in the Ethiopian polity that was considered a far-fetched reality to many. Since TPLF has always been subservient to Isayas and his smartelites it was not easy to extricate itself from the inferiority complex it has always embodied as an individual and party through the struggle era. So, enabling Eritrea gain its independence as soon and easily as possible was meant to push Isayas and his people in to their new nation and allow TPLFthe luxury of ruling a big nation as historic and grand as Ethiopia.

Because, with the presence of an international border between the twonations Isayas can have no right to be involved in what is happening inEthiopia. And neither can he challenge the exclusive TPLF power in Ethiopia by violating an international border.

So, establishing the new nation as urgently as possible and recognize its existence was meant to protect the interest of TPLF's sole heir status in the Ethiopian throne that even its masters in Eritrea were envious of. It ismy uncontested belief that following the removal of Mengistu had Isayas Afeworki abandoned his secession agenda and demanded accommodationunder a united Ethiopia, TPLF would be the first one opposed to the idea before anybody. The late PM of Ethiopia Meles Zenawi decision to write the book 'the Eritrean Struggle, from where to where' speaks all the intentions of TPLF when it comes to Eritrea that it will be an independent state even if Isayas Afeworki demanded accommodation in a united Ethiopia. Because, Tigray liberators knew it too well that an environment that involves Isayas and the Eritreans would not allow them to do what ever they like. Since Isayas's forces were technically advanced and well armed any hope of TPLF absolute power shall not be assured in the new Ethiopia had he been allowed to be involved.

In the conduct of the referendum TPLF not only rushed the process to bedone urgently, it did not even care to follow international procedure.

Because, their agenda was to create a clear legal division between them and their Godfather. Let us take South Sudan for example. Even if South Sudanese have fought for the independence of their region like the Eitreans, they were not allowed to immediately conduct referendum to decide on their fate. They were given five years time to taste the sense ofbeing separate in their section as a country to make a rational decision during the referendum. That was exactly what they did and ultimately decided on being a country than a region with in the Sudan. Such international procedure was not conducted to allow the Eritrean people have the feel of being separate and the pros and cons of their decision.

Since TPLF was hoping by crossing its fingers for Eritrea to go, such procedure did not bother them at all as a government of Ethiopia. Even today and as long as TPLF is in power in Ethiopia it will not allow any formof association with Eritrea. Because, that fear and sense of inferiority still pervades in their system.

It is imperative to understand one unavoidable general fact. No one is stupid and ignorant on everything. When one is bad at something he/shecould be brilliant on something else. So, although TPLF recognized its weakness in comparison to the Eritrean elites they are very good at knowing their limitation and devising ways by which they cope with Mr.

Afeworki. So, TPLF 's decision to make the referendum was not as a service to Eritrea. It was a tactical move meant to extricate itself from thesubservient position it had in the struggle period and to reduce and avoid the leverage and power of Isayas in the post Mengistu Ethiopia. Beyond enabling the unjust referendum process conducted and the subsequent recognition of the new nation its willingness to betray Ethiopia's legal rights of access to the sea were motivated not to safeguard Eritrean interest but its own.

The same calculation lies with the question of Assab and Ethiopia's access to the sea rights that TPLF failed to demand when Eritrea secede. As I pointed out, TPLF was not willing to engage in contradiction with the Eritrean regime that it had been able to keep in its own tiny nation while itenjoys the lucrative lands of the Amhara, Oromo, Sidama and so many others. So, protecting Ethiopian interest does not overweigh protecting TPLF's interest at all and that is all we see in terms of the TPLF actions with regards to Eritrea. When Mr. Herman Cohen, the former US AssistantSecretary for Africa, suggested that Ethiopia can claim access to the sea right during the Eritrean referendum it was not Isayas Afeworki who contested that demand. It is none other than the late PM and his cronies who still spin the nation in their liking than in the interest of the people.

The late prime minister's argument that ports are commodities that money can buy was just an ordinary statement that does not hold waterat all. And I am certain he knows better how much access to the sea is important to economic development and national sovereignty. I know Zenawi is not here to defend his words but I believe his cronies will, notfor me but to themselves.

The billions of dollars Ethiopia pays the tiny nation Djibouti every year could have been saved if we had our own outlet and the money could have been used to build thousands hospitals, thousands schools and colleges, thousands social services and so many more. Let me explain theimportance of access to the sea right in terms of national security or sovereignty. When the Italians invaded Ethiopia for the second time in 1935 the French who were colonials of the tiny nation of Djibouti agreed with Mussolini to restrict Ethiopian import of weapons from outside. Bare foot warriors who have all the courage and the will to fight in defense of the country were greatly weakened by the absence of ammunition as a result of the conspiracy and we all know the outcome of that reality.

That is the kind of environment any land locked nation faces when they have no right, access to the sea right. Keeping aside the late PM rhetoric ifwe rationally look at the matter there is no reason why history will not repeat itself in the 21st century. The fact that the Djibouti ports are managed and run by Arab companies from Dubai they could impose arbitrarily high rates for the service they give to Ethiopia just so they twistthe government's hand to do something. The Grand Renaissance Dam andthe altercation that it caused with Egypt will be seen how it is going to play out with respect to Ethiopia's use of a port service controlled by another Arab country. That is why I consider access to the sea right is more important than a mere argument of export-import benefits. It has somuch to do with national security and the sovereignty of the nation. Whileour future is in the hands of others it is really hard to comprehend how weshall be assured of sustainable peace and development in the country.

I would like to remind readers that I am not saying that TPLF should takeover Asab or anything that comes close to look like so. My attempt was tomake a point that relating the most vital and decisive issue like access to the sea simply as a channel of exporting flower and importing fertilizer is wrong. I am certain, when I say the following I am voicing the idea and thought of millions. It is not about the fact that Ethiopia is a landlocked nation in TPLF watch. It is about doing nothing about it when so many were calling for this same action. Had TPLF had tried that could have at least mean something to the satisfaction of so many people. However, to rationalize the betrayal of this kind of national interest with some elementary logic would not convince anybody unless we are obliged to accept it through coercion like the one we were obliged to dress up in black and pay our respect when he passed away.

Let me add the Badme conflict in the same line of argument as it is indeedsame old drama TPLF tirelessly engaged itself in. Although it is a fact that Isayas forces had invaded the area there is good enough explanation for that. As many people agree the war was not about the land. The war was a conflict of interest between the two liberators. The realization of the Eritrean that their interest and role in Ethiopia is no more assured and their economic benefits are not protected they resorted to invading the Badme region. The denial of the TPLF regime at that time about the invasion and its reluctance to go to war and its ultimate decision to give up the area in the Algiers agreement following thousands of young Ethiopians perished is a testimony of TPLF policy driven by conveneience and expediency.

Had it not been to the pressure and call for action by some TPLF members, Seye Abreha and Co., who were latter busted during the split ofthe party, the late Meles and his gang was not determined for action. Because, it is in interest of minority groups in any societies who have control of power to avoid war which otherwise creates militarization that isdanger to the minority rule and continuity of its hegemony. If badme was in Gondar the war might not even have taken place and Badme would have been another Asab for the sake of convenience. Nonetheless, the fact that the area is found in Tigray where the elites came from it was not easy to let Isayas get away with it. The ultimate decision to surrender the area in the Algiers peace agreement was not a result of Eritrean diplomatic effort. When the environment is created for the Meles faction tohave full absolute power following the removal of the Seye Abreha group they gave away the area as they have intended before the war and with no regard to the hundred of thousands lives and resources lost.

So, my cynicism and the cynicism of other fellow Ethiopians about Isayas as a person and the Eritrean forces as anti-Ethiopian has to be judged andevaluated on the basis of the aforementioned points so as to redress the situation. We could be deceived for sometime but to allow ourselves for more than twenty three years is too much. With our analysis and investigation in a rational way we have to be able to throw out the garbage dumped on us. It is only then we would have the truth and facts necessary to refute the misinformation and propagation disseminated by the TPLF regime and create an informed citizen that embodies a changed attitude and impassioned action that would be instrumental to bring the imminent revolution in minority dominated nation. Because, after all, revolutions are conceived with the realization of the truth and the need forrighteousness by obliterating corrupt and decayed political systems and their elements.

Let alone a revolution, TPLF does not want a single bullet shot in Ethiopia.That is not because TPLF believes in peace. Rather, TPLF perfectly understands whenever there is a social quest for freedom and liberty it assumes it would challenge its control of power. So, before people begin to stand for their rights blocking all the avenues that truth reach the public has been the policy of the Tigray liberators since a while back. The ‘anti-terrorism’ and the NGO and CSO laws are purely made with that onlyagenda in mind. The jailing of journalists, bloggers, peaceful oppositions, activists and others is the practical outcome of those laws made by TPLF. For a party that suffers from inferiority complex because of its minority status and the middle school level of its generals, security establishment and its cadres limiting and curbing of the exercise of peoples’ freedom of speech and the press that would create an informed and conscious citizenis taken as an effective preventive mechanism rather than dealing with the repercussions.

Let me conclude this section by adding this unrelated subject but clearly shows the inferiority complex TPLF elites embodies and its evil strategies that will not exempt to scarify whatever it takes to demonize and belittle others when it seems to contradict its policy and political views. In 2012 when the new African Union building was completed in Addis Ababa it wasneeded to erect a statue for the leading person who was instrumental to the creation of the predecessor of AU, Organization of African Unity/OAU.

As we all know the statue that was finally decided to be erected was Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana to the surprise of not only Ethiopians but evenother African leaders and observers, since the honor was expected to be for Emperor Hailesselassie I of Ethiopia. On this subject the late ChairmanMeles stated that 'it is only Nkrumah who is remembered whenever we talk about pan Africanism.' Imagine the level of betrayal TPLF commits that goes to the level of stripping the honor of one of its citizen and givesto someone else. I love and adore Mr. Nkrumah and his determined call for the United States of Africa can never be undermined by anyone.

However, the 'father of Africa' title has always been to Emperor Haillesselassie given by not Ethiopians but other African people and governments for his countless contributions that cannot be covered withthis article. If miraculously Mr. Nkrumah awakes from his eternal sleep and informed of this, I am sure he would be stunned with this insanity.

Before the light of independence came to Africa, at the time Africa was languishing in the darkness of colonialism Emperor Hailessellasie was a lone star shining in world forums demanding and calling for the independence and rights of Africans. He was the one and only person whobrought the Casablanca and Monrovia group to come to one table throughthe tiresome diplomatic effort of Ketema Yefru. Besides, the Emperors willingness to provide the building for the service of the newly formed organization and supporting decolonization and anti-Apartheid as well as mediating warring factions were some of his many Pan African achievements. That is a fact TPLF can deny but humanity will always remember, but the betrayal deliberately committed against fellow citizen on his own soil begs the question whether TPLF really considers itself Ethiopian. And the opinion of some people that suggests TPLF's actions and policies are anti-Ethiopian and therefore it is not Ethiopian should notbe undermined considering such betrayals.

To the TPLF mind, however, accepting such realities that testifies the great achievements of former Ethiopians is against its political orientation.It is only TPLF that have the power and anointment to make history but no one else and to recognize others is considered to diminish its own. Thisis a typical character of a person who feels inferior to others and this is a reflection of TPLF's inferiority complex that has been witnessed in many other settings and ways. To other Ethiopians executing such despicable agendas and policies of TPLF while knowing what it really meant to achieve is equally despicable. Unlike those genuine Ethiopians who exiled themselves than being associated with the government treasonous acts there are others guided by personal benefits and egocentrism who continue to serve and sustain the regime and its atrocities.

To see non-TPLF people who consider themselves 'educated' but engage themselves in the execution of such actions is more troubling than those who made the decision. Since I have dealt with this kind of people in my previous article I will not say too much. However, I found it relevant to mention one person with this kind of character in light with the subject matter, Haileselassie or Nkrumah. Ambassador Konjit Sinegiorgis, directorof African Affairs at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of TPLF, who has been in the institution for as long as the building itself is the one who implement and execute the dirty and heinous decisions of TPLF with no sense of self respect and guilty mind. Obviously, since the process of selecting the Father of Africa requires debate, discussion and lobbying sheis the one who was supposed to engage with the task. However, so as to please her TPLF masters who have no interest of making the emperor what he really deserves she kept her mouth shut and who knows may be she had given her voice to someone else to show her unambiguous loyaltyand allegiance to TPLF so as to make her last days on earth 'fulfilled and accomplished'.

The Outcomes of 'TPLF before Ethiopia' Policy: Some might not be well convinced with the betrayal and anti-Ethiopian action and decision taken by the TPLF government until they see the intended consequence and outcomes of these policies mentioned in the previous part. This really is an important part since it gives a holistic picture about who TPLF has beenand what it was the intended outcomes for pursuing a policy that centeredon the protection of its interest as a priority. It has been twenty- three years since TPLF became the real and uncontested power holder at the centre of Ethiopian political landscape. As a result, TPLF has been able to have the right to make whatever decision it likes in Ethiopia and on behalfof Ethiopia, anywhere and anytime. Let me put the outcomes of TPLF's systematic actions that isolated Isayas Afeworki by deluding Ethiopians tostand behind it and using them as a human shield for the Eritrean bullets so it can carry on its agenda.

Keeping aside EPRDF, which is like a Halloween disguise that fools nobodybut itself, we know the Ethiopian policy and strategies are the policy and strategies of TPLF rather than the common interest of all so called member parties. Let alone influencing and standing in the way of what TPLF wanted, their very existence lies at the mercy of TPLF. As a result ofthe Tigray Liberators ability to Isolate Eritrea to its internationally recognized boundaries they have been able to break its inferiority status in terms of capability, size, psychology and resource by using the blessings of autocracy they imposed on the Ethiopian people and the successful delusion.

The Tigray liberators have managed to be the 'invincible' by enablingthemselves to control more than ninety percent of the military establishment higher rank positions in Ethiopia. Than the Derg and Hailesselassie regime, TPLF clearly represents the superiority and preference of its own party members by excluding other Ethiopians.

Take a birds eye view of the general reality in Ethiopia by looking at the TPLF domination in one government organization, the Ethiopian Embassy in Yemen. there are ten diplomats including those security and military personnel. Here are the names and their party, Amb. Hassan Abdella - Afar, Kahsay Desta-TPLF, Col. Endalkchew Gebrekidan-TPLF, Col. Abreha Aregai-TPLF, Birhanemeskel Kehisen-TPLF, Techane Bekele-OPDO, SamuelTimotiwos- Sidama, Dinberu Alemu-Gurage, Abrar Muktar- Silte, Amdenichael Admasu-Amhara. You make the percentage and calculations how ethnic and party composition disparity is clearly visible making hard to even call it Ethiopian Embassy.

Lucrative institutions in Ethiopia are mostly controlled by people from theTPLF and those that have connection with them through family and ethnicaffiliation. The Ethiopian Airlines, Customs Authority, Ethiopian Embassiesabroad, Transportation companies and Construction sector are predominantly controlled by TPLF members and its network of people.

The Intelligence and Security service as well as the Immigration Authorities higher officials and rank and file are members of the TPLF. TheAnti-Hijackers in Ethiopia are hundred percent comprised of members of the Tigray Liberators.

In TPLF Ethiopia it does not matter what position a non-TPLF person holdshe/she shall be directly or indirectly under the order and supervision of the TPLF member working beneath him. A non-TPLF Minister is led by a TPLF vice minister or advisors, a non-TPLF Ambassador is virtually under the TPLF Counselor, a non-TPLF general (if there is one) is under the command of a TPLF member Colonel or Major. That is the out come of TPLF policy of party before country.

In the country where people have chronic housing problem you would not find a TPLF member who does not have at least one house. In most cases,they have two and more. Since they are the ones, who sustains and defends the regime with blind eyes and blind mind by jailing, detaining, killing Ethiopians and implementing the twisted agendas their lavish condition could be well deserve, for them. In addition, with the lucrative business activities they build another one on the land they obtain easy while the rest of the population is crying for years to get one. Public land that belongs to the people provided as a gift to the TPLF cadres for their role of sustaining autocracy. As a result, public land that would worth Billions of birr if it was legally transferred to the people and used to alleviate the housing, transportation and public services that are in a very dismal condition in the country is given for cadres for free and based on ethnic profiling.

As much as the policies and actions adopted and pursued by TPLF are a disregard and disrespect to the Ethiopian interest and people all its action and policies with regards to Eritrea emanates from this same agenda of protecting its own interest. That is why as long as there is a minority group that prioritize its interest before anything else there will not be peace at home and with our neighbor who have all the feel like home except a boundary line that politicians marked but absent in peoples mind.So, it is our decision to be or not to be! We have to be a people who would pursue the truth so as to form an informed opinion instrumental to a determined and concrete action. We are not dead, we are living creatures who should have the urge to say no to the shameless lies and blunders tirelessly dumped and spitted on us by the TPLF. To be able to annihilate the system that has long been unwilling to reform and rework its institution with the intention of creating all inclusive and just society we have to start by calling a spade is a spade and we have to have thecourage to call a friend is a friend.

Tigray people and the Tigray Liberators: Before I decided to put this section as part of the article I was thinking to put it as a side note. However, I felt the weight of the topic being equally relevant as much as the others in terms of history and current reality. It is a fact that the TPLFis created by people from Tigray with logistical and other support from Isayas Afeworki. Today, those one-time guerrilla fighters have become a government ruling a nation of eighty million people since the last twenty-three years. The members of TPLF have are the engines of the system running the military, security, economic, political and social policies through out Ethiopia. As much as the thanks for their good deeds goes tothem the blames and opposition should be theirs as well with no association with the Tigray people. Because, the people has nothing to dowith how TPLF is running the country and the blunders it committed in their name. Keeping aside the rhetoric that suggests all Tigrayans have benefited from the system it is relevant to realize and understand their situation with a fair and reasonable mind set. As much as it is wrong to the Tigray Liberators to categorically call the Amharas Neftegnas it will also be wrong for us to regard all Tigraways as TPLF in the same misguided, destructive and irresponsible accusations.
The Tigray people are double victims of TPLF political decisions and actions more than other Ethiopians are. One, they are oppressed like any Ethiopian and on top of that the Elites are using their name while conducting its atrocities at the national scale that led to a wrong categorical blame and at times hatred by other ethnic groups. In my personal travels to Tigray I have seen the lives of the ordinary people firsthand. Moreover, I have the opportunity to listen to their stories. As a fellow from Arat kilo I was stranger for certain things in the country. So, itwas there I saw two things for the first time in my life, Camels and Humans, humans who pull lorry like donkeys. I am not talking about the kind of lorry we know in Addis. I am talking about the kind of lorry that sometimes makes me feel for the animal because of its size and inconvenience. I have also been able to witness the relatively better condition of the people who have family with in the TPLF circles and the sad realities of those who do not have.
The lavish life of the TPLF elites and their connected family members andaccomplices should not lead us to the general categorized conclusion thatsuggests they are all beneficial and like-minded. That is not only wrong itcreates destruction to the change we aspire in the country and it strengthens the polarization of societies even more than ever. If we are willing to look the most organized and leading opposition to the TPLF today it is the Tigray Peoples' Democratic Movement/ TPDM/. Besides, it would be undermining the determination of people like Abreha Belay and so many others who would follow his footsteps calling for justice andfreedom like their fellow Ethiopian brothers and sisters.

We have to be reminded of one important reality with respect to this matter. As much as the Derg/Soldiers been able to hijack the revolution ofthe student movement and the civil society the sacrifice and death of countless sons and daughters of Tigray for the cause of freedom and justice has also been hijacked by the TPLF elites. Once TPLF has been ableto reach the helm of power on the blood of tens of thousands of Tegadalayand Tegadelti its promise of democracy, freedom of expression, justice, rule of law, peace and development has not only been unattained it has rather added other ills to societal norm and peaceful coexistence by planting the seed of ethnicism. While all that TPLF represent is the time ofthe Derg era its ethnic agenda makes it even worse than the former regime since its ethnic policies and politics make the nation susceptible to collapse and disintegration. So, the second hijacking of the Ethiopian revolution by some elites who put their agenda over the nation can only be said one thing 'old wine in a different bottle'. And the blame for that should not be transferred to the Tigray people whatsoever since most of its policies are contradictory to theirs as well as it is with other Ethiopians.

But the question we all ask and hope to find answer for is, why do the Tigrayan elite in TPLF to whom liberty and dignity so many Amharas, Oromos, Welaytas, Gurages and many others died and bled for in the Adwa battle against colonials work for the detriment of the nation? Why isit division over unity, hatred over brotherhood and sisterhood, enmity over love is preferred and engage in the game of undermining and belittling others being self promoting and conducting centered politics andpolicies? If there is anything in Ethiopia that endangers the peace and stability necessary to create a developed society, it would be none other than the divisive and misguided policies of TPLF itself.

TPLF has an opportunity to reform and redesign its policies and strategiesto own the future and to avoid the imminent social quest for change that potentially could cause a collateral damage on the nation beyond itself. Itis a lesson TPLF understands too well that oppressed and marginalized people by politics and from economics will definitely shall rise when the situation is ripe. The silence that seems peaceful will give birth to a movement unstoppable. However, before that movement grows legs and starts to kick allowing democratic and civil liberties in the nation would bea wise and ingenious decision that would redeem it from being a prisonerof its future. That is the plight and dream all Ethiopians has long been denied of, making it difficult to them to call their country home and leading them to look for it somewhere else. But, when the darkness is filled with the light those who fled free spirited Ethiopians shall return to propel the nation to be what it could be.

Healing the Past and Moving Forward: Isayas Afeworki and the Eritrean people have fought for the cause they believed in. Tens of thousands haveperished due to lack of tolerance and a room for peaceful resolution of differences. Since the early years of the Derg regime until the Badme war the then Ethiopians and today's Ethiopians and Eritreans have paid a big price, in lives and resources. As much as the Eritreans pay their respect for their martyrs allow me to pay mine to those Ethiopians who knows no politics but sacrificed their lives for one thing they know, Ethiopian unity and sovereignty. The blood they bled, the tears they shed and the life they paid was not for Colonel Mengistu Hailemariam. It was a price paid for an idea far bigger and far priceless than anything for any human, the defense of ones nation and sovereignty, that I will be honored to have myself. So, since those people have no respect by the TPLF government inEthiopia, who even took part in killing them, I personally pay them my deepest regard and respect for those who perished in the sands, bushes, rivers and deserts of Afabet to Kerkebet; Nakfa to Tselot; Keren to Massawa; Algena to Elabered and Akordat to Asmara.

Those Ethiopians who never get back to their Moms, Dads, wives, sons and daughters still have people who miss and remember them dearly. Theheinous regime, however, sitting in Addis Ababa to call them 'Derg soldiers' and celebrate Ginbot 20 with dance and laughter makes it sad to any rational being. In the United States, for example, the triumph of the Unionists over the Confederates, in the civil war, is not celebrated as a holiday. Doing so would mean an insult to the people of the south whose families had taken part in the war. Rather they have a Memorial Day by which all are given a proper respect. This is among the thousand reasons why TPLF will never be at peace with all Ethiopians. It is like a brother killing his own brother and dancing for being the lone owner of the house,how sad and condescending!

Ethiopia is among the very few states that have a holiday to celebrate the coming to power of its government. Most of them celebrate their day of decolonization, unification or the day they created a foundation for a better future. This pattern by which regimes regard themselves self- important by making the day they came to power a holiday while they arethe same as the previous dictator is just a drama. A drama whereby the new elites are the actors and the people are the audience while the palace, the media or parliament hall is used as a stage. Nothing more can really define it other than a Drama, it is not even comedy or romantic, it isa Tragedy. We have seen two so far, one titled Ethiopia Tikdem on Meskerem Hulet and the other is TPLF Tikdem on Ginbot haya. Some might say Mr. Lebenu what do you do when you or your party become a government, I would simply say, we already have enough to celebrate, the triumph over the European colonial, Adwa-1896, that no other black nation had ever been able to achieve!

I apologize I went a little off topic. So, the Eritrean Leader who took the people from guerrilla struggle until independence has been a victim of character assassination by the Tigray liberators. He is charged day and night as being war monger and working hard to destabilize Ethiopia with opposition like Ginbot 7; Tigray People Democratic Movement/TPDM/ and others. If I am not mistaken on the Ethiopian TV that I hardly watch I have seen news whereby TPLF government is organizing Eritrean opposition in Ethiopia to fight the Eritrean regime. I really could not graspthe logic behind such gimmicks. Or does it mean TPLF has the right to do so but not Isayas? How low grade politics is that. Ethiopians have every right to seek help from all sources in such a way it does not compromise the national interest of Ethiopia as TPLF does. And Isayas Afeworki's record should be measured in comparison to the crimes TPLF committed on Ethiopia from the guerrilla years until today. And the betrayal of Ethiopian national interests made ever since TPLF came to power were nota making of anyone but its own, for its own convenience, lust for power and the hegemony of minority.

Not today, since the guerrilla years there was a tendency by Isayas Afeworki side to negotiate and find common ground with the Mengistu regime so people can live together in peace. However, the latter's preference of fight over dialogue that golden opportunity passed and whatfollowed from there is nothing but the beginning of a wrong ride in a wrong direction with no end in sight to this very day. But one of the agenda of the failed 1989 coup leaders was addressing this issue. When Gen. Fanta Belay was asked before he was executed by Mengistu why he conducted the coup d'etat, he was bold enough to voice his concern saying 'this war has to end, the country is bleeding. there should be a chance for negotiation, they /Eritreans/ have agreed if we agree' (see, http://youtu.be/GDjRkfq-toM) On an interview on ESAT Major Dawit Woldegiorgis has also confirmed that same statement about the will of theEritreans for peaceful settlement of conflict and the need for working relationship that would satisfy both sides.

Ethiopia and Eritrea are meant to be together. Disregarding the superficialdifferences of politics that is really of personality of the politicians and their egocentric interest than anything else, the two people have no separate future individually. As much as Eritrea needs Ethiopia, the latter needs Eritrea as well. That is not because we speak the same language, eat same food, worship same God, have the same looks, use the same letters or dance to the same lyrics and melodies. Our geo-political environment will always push us to come to one direction to be that unique people who is the making of thousands of years rather than defined by colonial poison and the arbitrary and uninformed decisions of past and present leaders including Mengistu, Isayas and Meles/or his living cronies/.

It is indeed true the late PM Meles was right about Isayas Afeworki. He really got a brilliant mind, broad-minded mind and a mind that is not corrupted with ethnic philosophy and ethnic based lunacy. The Tigray liberators who have shown us that their minority interest of greed and lustfor power precedes that of the nation's interest will continue until the Ethiopian rage and sense of thirst for justice unleashes to obliterate TPLF, its blunders and betrayals. Yes, cooperation with Isayas would be the last best hope we have in the face of TPLF's unbearable oppression and disrespect that Ethiopians tolerated for too long. The rage instilled in the hearts of broad and far sighted Oromos, Amharas, Tigraways, Gurages, Welaytas and eighty more others shall unleash one day if there is no will for political reform and no room for accommodation of all as equal. A new day will break and sanity prevails, cooperation and peaceful co-existence between brothers at home and brothers across the Mereb River shall be assured. It is all about time until every Ethiopian differentiates the wolf from the sheep and the friend from the foe.

I conclude with the words of Bealu Girma from his book 'Oromay'. He said,through one of his characters, 'world history is the history of organized people'. It is not just true, it is very true. Organized people will not only have advantage and superiority over unorganized ones but that is the onlyway people anywhere will triumph over oppression, injustice and tyranny. So, the question every one should ask is not do I believe in or stand for justice and freedom. The question is what have I done for the realization of these rights by getting organized or by joining the organized. But, we all have to be aware and assured of this, one calf is disturbing the river making it hard for the herd to orderly and caringly drink. But, when the calf is taken off the herd for good then the river would be calm and silent and all the herd shall equally enjoy the river with no place for greed and with no need for mistrust. Libyan Rescuers Recovering bodies of migrants from Ethiopia and Eritrea from Shores. ROME (August 26, 2014) Libyan rescuers have recovered thebodies of around 170 people after a boat carrying illegal migrants from sub-Saharan Africa sank at sea last week, a coast guard official said Monday.

"We freed about 100 bodies trapped in the hold of the 16-metre (50-foot)wooden boat which foundered not far from the coast," Abdellatif Mohammed Ibrahim told AFP. Another 70 bodies were washed up by the tide, including five young children, he said. "It looks like the boat overturned suddenly, leaving the passengers no chance," he said as Red Cross rescuers pulled bodies from the water. Ibrahim said no leaks were found in the hull of the vessel, ship

In the absence of documentation, rescue workers have been unable to make a list of victims or establish their nationalities. But the few papers recovered showed the victims included migrants from Ethiopia and Eritrea.

On Friday, the coast guard said it had saved 16 people and recovered 15 bodies. He said on Monday that recovery of the remaining bodies was slowbecause the coast guard service has "a major shortage of resources." Libya, mired in unrest and political chaos, has been a launchpad for illegalmigrants seeking a better life in Europe but who turn to people smugglers to cross the Mediterranean. Since the end of July, dozens of people who have set off on rickety boats from the Libyan coast have died at sea, and dozens more have gone missing, presumed drowned.

Around 150 Syrians were arrested on Sunday in Algeria, where they were preparing to enter Libya illegally in the hope of crossing to Europe, an Algerian newspaper reported. Last Thursday, Tunisian fishermen rescued 75 migrants who had been drifting at sea for five days after leaving Libya aboard an inflatable in an attempt to reach Italy. Earlier this month, Tunisian coastguards intercepted 90 African migrants whose makeshift boat heading from Libya for the Italian island of Lampedusa broke down off Zarzis. The Italian government says about 80,000 illegal migrants havereached its territory so far this year, already well above the previous annual record of 63,000 in 2011 wrecked off the coast of Guarabouli district, 60 kilometres (40 miles) east of Tripoli. ETHIOPIA/ERITREA & The 'no war - no peace' situation

Does the Eritrean government perceives the latest threat as mere warmongering?

EDITOR’S DIARIES: According to social commentators 'coming events casttheir shadows'. Reliable sources in Keren and Asmara have told recently that the Eritrean military is on a mobilization of armaments to the border with Ethiopia. Sources say, large convoys of mili...tary vehicles have been observed in a mobilization to southern and western Eritrea over the past few weeks. Automatic rifles are also being distributed to ordinary citizens. Actually this started about two years ago, but now it is being done now with more urgency. Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn's threat and reaction of Eritreans on the social media: The Ethiopian Prime Minister quoted as saying “Our Strategy of No War No Peace with Eritrea has Changed "Removing Shaabia is the only solution to Ethiopia". The Prime Minister of Ethiopia said recently in an interview with pro- government radio station in Washington D.C., "If the Eritrea government tries once more to send its 'foot soldier' [Ginbot 7], we will remove the Eritrea government." He added the strategy has changed meaning the 'nowar no peace' strategy has expires. Ginbot-7 is an exiled pro-democracy party that the Ethiopian government labelled a terrorist group in 2011, under a vague and widely condemned proclamation. –Editor

Ethiopia's herbal ‘Khat’ high struggles after foreign ban’By Jenny Vaughan, AFP (August 27, 2014)

Awaday (Ethiopia) (AFP) - For a town seen as a key trading centre for khat, a drug that is banned in many countries, Ethiopia's Awaday can seem pretty drowsy and laid-back. As the sun sets on the small eastern town, farmers and brokers of the amphetamine shrub rouse from an afternoon slumber to cut deals in the bustling market, one of the busiest centres of international trade for the leaves. Khat, a multi-million dollar business for countries across the Horn of Africa and in Yemen, consists of the succulent purple-stemmed leaves and shoots of a bush whose scientific name is Catha edulis. Chewing it for hours produces a mild buzz.But Britain in June classified khat as an illegal drug, closing the last market in Europe in the wake of a similar ban by The Netherlands in January.

For the thousands of farmers and traders here in Awaday, 525 kilometres (325 miles) east of the Ethiopian capital, the ban has already had a severeimpact. Previously the plant was Ethiopia's fourth largest export, earning more than $270 million (205 million euros) in 2012-13. "All of the people, they are in big trouble, even the man who brings from the farm to the market, and the guy who buys from here to export," said exporter Mustafa Yuye. "For most of the people here, their living is by khat, they don't have other jobs," he added, speaking after an early morning shift at the manic market, where several tonnes of the herb change hands each day.

'In trouble without work' For first-time chewers, the bitter leaves -- stuffed in a squash ball-sized bulge in the cheek for several hours -- offer little more than a sour taste, a sore jaw and the sensation that one has drunk several pots of coffee.The UN World Health Organization says the plant causes irritability, insomnia and lethargy. More experienced chewersdescribe a meditative, almost trance-like state, where one's sense of timeslips away. The user may sit still for hours, yet remain alert to conversation or reading matter. While debates about khat's effects on health go on, around 20 million people across the Horn of Africa and the Arabian Peninsula chew the plant every day.

In Ethiopia, where khat is intertwined with ancient traditions -- Muslim clerics chewed it to help them study the Koran -- the shrub is legal. Cropsare now sold to neighbouring nations, especially Somalia and across the Red Sea to Yemen. Khat must be chewed fresh because its potency fadeswithin hours. After frantic trading, drivers pile bundles into airplanes or pickup trucks, dashing along dirt tracks at breakneck speeds for wider distribution. Before the ban, Mustafa sent more than three tonnes a month to the Horn of Africa diaspora in Britain, but he is now restricted tosupplying domestic and regional markets.

Prices have tumbled. "Our money is getting less," Mustafa said, and farmers in Kenya share similar concerns. Brokers like Mustafa can earn upto $30 (22 euros) per kilo (2.2 pounds) in the top markets, but as little as $5 (three euros) for the same quantity of low-grade khat in regional markets, according to local traders. Redundant khat broker Tofiq Mohammed said the whole town of Awaday will be hit by the ban. He used to sell two tonnes to Britain a month but has now stopped working. "Fromthe farmer to the traders, we are in trouble without work," he said.

'Social addiction' Some farmers had switched to khat from crops like coffee or maize, because khat can be harvested year-round and previouslyfetched stable prices at the market. Kadija Yusuf, surrounded by her chest-high bushes, says she preferred khat farming since it needs less water than coffee. "There was not enough water, so I started growing khat," Kadija said. "If they don't allow us to export... we will stop this andreturn to coffee." Her earnings were low -- about $38 (28 euros) in a goodmonth -- and she worries that her income will now drop further. With prices falling it is cheaper to chew, but critics say that for those hooked onthe leaves, the habit squanders their cash and time. "When you chew khatyou focus, you read a lot," said Adil Ahemmed, sitting on the floor surrounded by friends and piles of khat stalks, while coffee beans roasted over a flame. But he calls chewing a "social addiction", and admits it is draining his money. He spends about six euros a day on the plant, about 90 percent of his earnings as a computer technician. "Economically it damages us," Adil said, his cheek packed with leaves, swollen like a hamster. "That's the biggest problem, especially for youth.

ETHIO POLITICS: Three Ethiopian opposition groups head for a merger.

Ethiomedia News: SEATTLE (August 27, 2014) -- Three Ethiopian opposition groups said on Monday they were heading for a merger in a bidto expedite the end of the dictatorial regime which has been in power since 1991. Those who signed an agreement for a merger are the Ethiopian People Patriotic Front, Ginbot 7 Movement for Justice, Freedom and Democracy, as well as the Amhara Democratic Forces Movement.

Here is the full text of the press release:

"Many political parties and organizations lacking unity and common goalhave fought hard for decades to end dictatorship in Ethiopia. The ever increasing number of the political organizations and their failure to worktogether has enabled longevity for the minority dictatorial regime that would and should have been in the dustbin of history long time ago.

"We believe it's about time that all concerned individuals and groups thatunderstand and see the deep hole that our nation finds itself, must pauseand reflect on the backbreaking path we traveled and the critical juncturewe have reached.

"For years, the Ethiopian people have been demanding for a united political front, and we the various political forces that struggle to make thepeople the only source of power in Ethiopia have envisioned that a united political force and collective struggle is not an option, but an indispensiblenecessity.

"Today, the call of the Ethiopian people for a united political front has been answered with the first and initial step. Our long term vision and desire to create a broader united front that ultimately leads to a strong united Ethiopia has materialized with this initial step. With this initial step,the following three political entities have completed the preconditions to merge their organizations, and have vowed to pay all the necessary sacrifices that the struggle requires to make the Ethiopian people mastersof their destiny.

"We the three organizations that have reached an agreement towards themerger are:

The Ethiopian People Patriotic Front

Ginbot 7, Movement for Justice, Freedom and DemocracyAmhara Democratic Forces Movement

"We want to let the Ethiopian people and friends of Ethiopia know that wethe undersigned organizations have agreed to work together in all aspectsand facets of the struggle during the transition period." Unity is power!!

Swedish Int. Criminal Investigators given the charges of top governmentofficials'

ESAT News (August 28, 2014) A Task Force established to seek justice forthe martyrs and victims of the 2005 Ethiopian General election violence bythe government, has submitted a charge containing the names of 13 Ethiopian government and Defense Force officials to the Swedish International Criminal Tribune. The following officials namely; Arkebe Okubay, Bereket Simon, Abadula Gemeda, General Samora Yunus, Abaye Tsehaye, Getachew Assfea, Lieutenant General Tadese Worede, Hassen Shifa, Mulugeta Berhe, Nega Berhe, Workneh Gebeyehu, Commander Semre and one other official whose name has not been disclosed, were charged with ordering the killing, rape, arrest, dismissal, exile and the abduction of citizens. Mola Yigzaw, one of the coordinators and main organisers of the charges, said to ESAT that the Swedish International Criminal Investigation Police has been satisfied with the contents of the charges, the documentary and video evidences. The Police officer who is investigating the Ethiopian case is an experienced officer who also investigated the crimes committed in Yugoslavia and Rwanda. The officer told the Task Force that he has already started the investigation.

Asked what authority Sweden has to sue Ethiopian government officials, Mola said “the reason to file the charges in Sweden was the recent decision of the Swedish parliament that any military crime or human rights violation committed anywhere can be tried in a Swedish Court”. As soon as the Swedish police finish the investigation, it will pass the chargesto the prosecutor who will file the charges in the Swedish International Military Tribunal, Mola said. The current and future results of Police investigations would be submitted to the United Nations Security Council (UNSC). The Council will be asked to give an order for the charges to be presented in the International Criminal Court (ICC). The current charge focuses on individual officials but more charges will be brought up soon which include the Ethiopian government. Following that attempts will be made to freeze the money and assets of the Ethiopian government that is found abroad. Mola said that the charges will also soon include the heads of the 34 Defense Battalions that led the massacre and pleaded the publicto help in identifying their names and details. Mola also divulged that there is an ongoing effort via INTERPOL to pursue government officials who are suspected of involvements in the Ogaden region massacre. He also said that the name of the 13th person in the charge has been deliberately withheld.

ETHIOPIAN POLITICS: Crisis In The Ethiopian Somali Region’

The president of the Somali regional state of Ethiopia Mohammed Abdi Omar (Illey) is facing political pressure that can cause his position. A source has told Dalsan Radio that President Abdi Omar Illey is expected tolose his position during a special meeting of the coalition partner the ruling “Somali Peoples Democratic Party tomorrow.The source has confirmed that out of eleven committee members of the party eligible to vote tomorrow the seven have confirmed to vote against him which automatically kicks him out as president of the region. President Abdi Omar has found himself at the wrong side of Ethiopian politics for the pastfew months after he was alleged that he signed agreement with the rebel ONLF. He was in power for last five years and has implemented ambitiousdevelopment programs in the regional state.

WEMEZEKIR: Going back to Emperor Zar’a Ya’eqob (1434-68) time’

Over 600 years ago it was written in Mashafa Berhan (please see The Book of Light, EJ Brill,1973) from Emperor Zar’aYa’eqob (1434-68) time:“all the peoples of Ethiopia are thirsty for knowledge”. Going back to about 10,000 years, according to notable historians, all the peoples who inhabited in Ethiopia-Eritrea-The Horn of Africa as a whole today had onesingle common ancestry, and have common history. Several hundred years ago, one single nation or community of a single linguistic group existed in Ethiopia, Eritrea, and the Horn of Africa. That nation had one culture and one language. For lack of better terminology most scholars call that language Proto-Afroasiatic (PA.)Most, if not all the languages of Ethiopia today, definitely Ge'ez, Oromifa, Amharic, Tigrigna, Afar, Gurage,Hadiya, Kambaata,Somali, Sidamo, and all the other languages known as Semitic and Cushitic as well as Omotic that including Wolaytta,Hamar, Amuru, Boro, Anfillo,Ari,et.al. are branches of oneancient language spokenby one people.

SOCIAL: Poverty on the Streets of Addis Ababa, difficult to walk throughbeggar-filled Addis Ababa streets

USAID Intern Meredith Maulsby (September 1, 2014)

Poverty can easily be seen throughout the capital of Ethiopia, but nowhereis it more evident than when you pass a beggar on the street. Beggars areeverywhere in Addis Ababa, and they represent a vast range of demographics. There are men, women, children of all ages and conditions– some with their mothers, some without, and the severely disabled. Older children, rather than begging, try to sell you gum or clean your shoes, while the younger children walk in front of you asking for money or food, not leaving you until they spot another person to ask. Thewomen are often with young children, sometimes babies, and usually withmore than one. I was once walking down the street and a young child no older than 2 or 3 who was being held by his mother made the signal they all make to ask for food or money while calling me sister. I thought this child probably learned this signal before he even learned how to speak.

Women are often seen grilling corn on the sidewalk on a small grill to sellto people passing by.

I have been told the severely disabled have most likely suffered from stunting, polio or the war. I have seen men with disfigured legs so mangled that they can not walk but instead drag themselves down the sidewalk. Others are in wheelchairs and unable to walk. And this city is not easy for the disabled. The sidewalks, where they exist, are not alwaysflat and not always paved. There are also often giant holes in the middle of the sidewalk or loose concrete slabs covering gutters. On the main roads, near where I'm staying there are tarps and blankets off to the sideof the road where where the beggars must sleep or live. It is a very difficult scene to walk through. You want to help them all and give everyone a little bit of money or food. But there are so many it would be nearly impossible to give to them all. We have been told to not give to beggars because once you give to one you will be surrounded by others. When people do give money to beggars it is often very small bills or coinsthat will not go very far.

I have often wondered how much money they actually receive. Perhaps itwould be beneficial to do more in depth look at why these people becamebeggars and where they come from. After a cursory search for research and reports on beggars in Addis Ababa, I found very little. There is a study on the disabled beggars and a report focusing on children. There is a documentary that follows two women who come to the capital from a rural town and become beggars in order to raise money for their family when climate change creates a food shortage. Both the government of Ethiopia and large NGO's, like USAID and the UN, are working to stop the"cycle of poverty." There are major health and nutrition projects being implemented all over the country, but these are long-term projectsn thatdo not address the immediate needs of people on the streets. Short termsolutions such as creating shelters or centers for the disabled and homeless could allow beggars more opportunities for housing but could also generate income potential through workshops and other skill development programs. Students say recent gov't training had little impact'ESAT News (September 1, 2014)

Many students do not believe that the first round of the ongoing political training for Ethiopian university students being given by the officials of theruling Front of EPRDF has not brought much impact as the government planned, the students told ESAT. The political training courses being givenbefore the upcoming general election, have showed the misunderstanding between the students and the officials of the Front and also that the students do not trust the system. A student, who attended the first two weeks of the training held in Debre Markos University, said to ESAT that four main topics were raised in the training. The students denounced saying that the issues that the government raises about the histories of the Amhara and Oromo ethnic groups are aimed at making the Amhara ashamed of their own history. Many of the students also have not accepted the government's argument saying which said that it was "part of our history." The student said that there have also been debates about human rights violations, injustice, press freedom and economic problems in the country. He said around 90 percent of the students have expressed their opposition to the Front. Another student, who took part in the training in Araba Minch University, said that the comments of EPRDF official caused uproar. The official said "in a condition where there is no opposition that could take over, EPRDF will be persuaded to rule for the next 50 more years". The students said that many students that come from remote areas and had little awareness about national and political issues learnt a lot from the discussions and the questions of the students, they added.

Similarly students in Dire Dawa University have opposed the government'sethnic federalism which they called was "divisive". They also lambasted aneconomic growth orientated report saying that the accumulation of the money grants and aid that Ethiopia receives from other countries will finally threaten Ethiopia's security. Also students in Harar have raised questions about the "premeditated burning of businesses and markets in Harar city” and asked that the victims should be duly compensated. The students also said that although they were born and brought up in Harar, they have been denied employment for they “did not speak Harari language”. They have called on the officials of the Region, who were chairing the meeting, to resign as they have been incapable of administering Harar. The students then refused to let the chairs exit the hall until they give them an answer, the officials had finally been set free by the intervention of Federal police. The political training is also underway in Haromaya University; another round of training is planned forfirst year and newly entering students in the following days. (Text ends)Transitional process in-exile helps Ethiopia avoid Libya-like chaos, some say no similarity b/n Ethiopians and Libyans. ER VIEWS (September 2, 2014) Libya is currently engulfed in chaos as different factions fight for control of the government. The elected government was forced to flee the capital. Foreign embassies have evacuated. The airport is taken over by an anti-government militia. All this is happening because change came to Libya suddenly and the country did not have civil institutions to help with a smooth transition from Gaddafi's 40-year dictatorship. He ruled Libya bydividing the country along ethnic and tribal lines. In Ethiopia, TPLF has been doing the same thing for the past 20 years, and when change comes, it could bring chaos with it -- unless Ethiopians come together andfind a solution now. The solution is to create a transitional government in exile as soon as possible. Doing nothing is condemning Ethiopia to chaos and bloodshed. Political commentators say no similarity among Ethiopians and Libyans.

EPRDF members challenge officials with questions’September 3, 2014 (ESAT News)

The ruling Front, EPRDF, has started giving a training to its members by Plasma in schools and governmental institutions. The aim of the training isto prevent the spread of the critical questions that university students hadbeen asking during the training given to them on politics. However, as themembers themselves raised similar questions that the students raised, thechairs of the meeting had said that they would find out if non members had sneaked into the meeting halls. Tewolde W/Tsadik, an official in EPRDF Secretariat and the Mayor’s Special Advisor, who conducted the first day of the training, was faced with critical questions and criticisms such as; why do you only tell us the bad parts of our history, we prefer if the training was about EPRDF’s strengths and weaknesses, why do we remember Emperor Menelik II negatively while he did unite the country, you are trying to cause fight between Oromo and Amhara people, do you have the qualifications to train us, it is not Menelik II but you seceded Eritrea, Derg used to say ‘Ethiopia First’ now you say ‘Ethnicity First’, there is a domination of one ethnic group and many other points were raised.

The Chair did not give a direct answer to the questions but said that theseissues have not come from the Front but were only raised as ‘accusations’in magazines and newspapers and ordered that there should be rechecking of the participants identity. Some of the participants said as the training was tedious; most of the participants were sleeping, listening to music, using Facebook on their phones or playing games. During the afternoon session, some members of the Front asked why the Front was comforting and hosting Eritrean nationals and oppositions while it categorised Eritrea as an enemy. EPRDF says it has 144 thousand members in Addis Abeba. Similarly, the Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM), member party of the EPRDF in Amhara region, has started a five day conference in Bahir Dar for its members due to what was called “internal weaknesses”. Over 200 Woreda officials are attendingthe meeting. Similar meeting is being held in the Southern region of Ethiopia.

Is safe water becomes a luxury in the Ethiopian capital?

(September 5, 2014) While 52 percent of Ethiopia's people have access toimproved water, only 10 percent have water piped into their homes.

Thirty years after Ethiopia's devastating famine, water is still as inaccessible as it is precious. While 52 percent of the people have accessto improved water, only 10 percent have water piped into their homes. And in rural areas, this figure is as low as 1 percent. Only 24 percent haveadequate sanitation. The implications are extremely broad. In an agriculture-based country, water shortages largely affect not only the country’s economy, but also the basic life of people whose subsistence depends on each season’s crops. Often poor countries like Ethiopia, with high population growth, are the most vulnerable to water stress. Not to mention that on a continent currently affected by major diseases, controlling outbreaks is also a question of access to water and sanitation. Ethiopia shouldn't have had water problem, it is the home of Africa's lakesand rivers. It equally receives fair amount of rain apart from the east and parts of the north. But there are lots of factors contributing to the lack of access to water and sanitation, ranging from environmental degradation due to desertification and deforestation, natural disasters such as extreme drought and climate change resulting from global warming. Other factors include pollution, caused by massive congestions in urban areas. This has led to a vicious cycle: people are leaving rural areas due to poverty hopingto find better opportunities in the cities only to contribute to the depreciation of living conditions where they arrive by overpopulating the towns’ slums. The government has expanded its social service delivery programmes; NGOs projects are improving life in some communities, but it is a long process and on the larger scale, the infrastructure handling Ethiopia's water supply is still inadequate and the need for improved waterand sanitation is still severe.

Sanitation and waste water treatment in Addis Ababa: Due to unregulatedurban growth and a high fraction of informal set lements, it is difficult to quantify the sanitary conditions for the entire city. Findings from Worku and Adam (1999)may be considered as outdated, but sanitary development in the city has not gone fast, so their description of overall condition of poor sanitation and its environmental burden unfortunately still remains valid today. Less than 10 percent of the urban area is sewered while in the major part of the remaining area pit latrines are usedthat dispose their wastewater in the stormwater drainage network (AAWSSA, 2008). Addis has two sewage treatment plants. The first one, called Kality treatment plant, runs under its designed capacity of 7,600m3day or 200,000 population equivalents, while it treats on average 5,200 m3. The other treatment plant, called Kotebe treatment plant, receives only sludge from vacuum trucks that empty septic tanks, with an estimated annual volume of 85,000m3.

The History of Modern Music In Ethiopia - Mulatu Astatke & The Ethio jazz‘

ER (September 5, 2014) Everybody knows that Ethiopian jazz is the only kind worth listening to these days," a bored Roman socialite remarks during one of the many party scenes in Paolo Sorrentino's film The Great Beauty. It sounds like an epitaph. How could something so special, so original, survive the embrace of people so devoted to superficiality, so quick to move on to the next sensation? As a fashionable novelty, Ethiopian jazz may indeed have had its moment in the spotlight. As an evolving form, however, it demonstrates greater resilience. Its roots lie deep within the musical culture of a country that, with the exception of a brief period under Italian occupation between 1936 and 1941, has enjoyed 3,000 years of independence. The first to realise that its distinctive indigenous modes and textures could be blended with those of American jazz was Mulatu Astatke, the composer and bandleader whose early recordings began to attract a cult following 15 years ago, after being unearthed and reissued by an enthusiastic Frenchman.

Astatke, whose appearance in London on 13 September will be a highlight of the Southbank Centre's Africa Utopia festival, was supposed to devote his life to aeronautical engineering. Instead, he invented a musical genre and became the central figure in an enormously successful series of anthologies that dug deep into the origins of a fascinating but long-hiddenworld. The 16-year-old Astatke had arrived in Britain in 1959, sent from Addis Ababa to North Wales by his wealthy parents, first to Lindisfarne College and then to Bangor University. But music got in the way of those initial career plans, and his gifts took him to Trinity College of Music in London, where he studied piano, clarinet and harmony, and to the Eric Gilder School of Music in Twickenham, whose pupils included the Ghanaiansaxophonist Teddy Osei – later to found Osibisa, the pioneering Afro-rock group – and Labi Siffre, the singer-guitarist. He began playing vibraphone and piano in the clubs of Soho with expatriate African and Caribbean jazzmusicians, and in dance halls with the popular Edmundo Ros orchestra.

Leaving London in 1963, he enrolled as the first African student at the jazz-oriented Berklee College in Boston, whose alumni include the vibraphonist Gary Burton and the pianist Keith Jarrett. Moving to New York, he pursued his interests in jazz and Latin music. When he returned home in 1969 it was with the idea of creating a more ambitious musical fusion. In Addis Ababa he discovered an upsurge of activity in the world ofthe arts and entertainment, and a booming night-life scene that offered plenty of scope for experiment. He called his new music "Ethio jazz", and his recordings from the period show him using local musicians, steeped inthe four basic pentatonic modes with which they grew up, to impart a new flavour to the structures he had brought with him from America. "There's an obvious influence from people like Duke Ellington," says Alexander Hawkins, the 33-year-old English pianist who has been a member of Astatke's band for the last five years and is featured on his most recent album, Sketches of Ethiopia. "Duke is one of Mulatu's heroes. But it's all filtered through this African rhythmic sensibility – sixes against fours and threes against twos in the music on a deep level – and also the other elements of the Ethiopian sound, in particular the modal language, which is probably the thing that most conspicuously sets it apart from other African traditions. The Ethiopian modes have an almost Arabic feel to them, this strange harmonic minor twist with a flat sixth and a sharp seventh, which gives the music a very unusual tonality."

Astatke worked as an arranger for other artists as well as a bandleader, but the musical elements he imported from America – his own vibraphone; the electric keyboards and the wah-wah pedal for the electricguitar; the use of congas and bongos to articulate Latin rhythms – were only gradually assimilated, sometimes meeting outright resistance from those who resented what they saw as the imposition of alien sounds and techniques on traditional material. Nevertheless, his reputation grew, thanks in part to a partnership with Amha Eshete, an equally adventurousyoung man who had started the country's first independent record label. In 1973, Astatke was chosen to perform with Ellington when the American bandleader toured Ethiopia and Zambia, sponsored by the state department at a time when the US government saw jazz as a weapon in the propaganda war against communism. The two men became friends and played together – Ellington suffering from lung cancer and with only afew months to live – at a concert in Haile Selassie's presence.

The following year Selassie was deposed in a coup that led to 18 years of government by the Derg, a Soviet-backed military junta, a period of repression in which hundreds of thousands were murdered or deported, ordied during famines. A strict curfew put an end to Addis's nightlife and many musicians left the country, including several of Eshete's most important artists. Eshete himself opted for exile when he learned, while visiting New York to buy recording equipment, that the singer Tekle Tesfazghi had been imprisoned after expressing support for Eritrean separatists in one of his lyrics. Astatke, however, stayed put and earned a living teaching music. In the first year of the revolution he recorded Yekatit: Ethio Jazz, the first Ethiopian album to be planned as a single entity, rather than being compiled from a collection of singles. "Yekatit" isthe Ge'ez word corresponding to February, the month in which the revolution took place, suggesting Astatke's support for the regime. Takingadvantage of a warm relationship between the Derg and the Castro government, he visited Havana, deepening his knowledge of Latin music at first hand.

In 1991, following the collapse of the Soviet Union, the Derg disintegratedand the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front took power, establishing a parliamentary republic. Eshete returned, having already been contacted by Francis Falceto, a French record producer with plans tolicense the recordings made between 1968 and 1974 by Astatke and others. Knowing that his own enthusiasm for this music was matched by that of collectors who had been foraging for the original albums and singles, Falceto had become convinced that there would be a viable audience for a series of compilations. A deal was made, the master tapes were retrieved and Falceto embarked on the process of audio restoration. The initial disc in the Ethiopiques series, released on the Buda Musique label in 1998, was intended to be the first of 10. In 2005, however, the inclusion by the director Jim Jarmusch of half a dozen pieces by Astatke inthe soundtrack to his comedy-drama film Broken Flowers, starring Bill Murray, brought the music to a wider public, and the series is now up to 29 volumes.

Like a lot of "world music" picked up by western audiences in recent years, Ethio-jazz appeals because it is simultaneously familiar and foreign.Western instruments – trumpets and saxophones, electric keyboards and bass guitars – are played with a different accent, generated by tuning (some Ethiopian music also makes use of non-tempered scales) and timing. Astatke's early records often meander gently but seductively alongthe apparently endless path of a two-chord vamp, like a laid-back East African cousin of John Coltrane's jazz or James Brown's funk.

Astatke's travels had made him thoroughly familiar with the music of boththose giants of American music. But in the case of other Ethiopian musicians who did not receive western training, such as the extraordinary tenor saxophonist Getatchew Mekuria, the connection may be less explicit.Initial exposure to Mekuria's recordings (his classic 1970 album, Negus of African Sax, was reissued as Ethiopiques, Vol 14) invariably persuades western jazz fans they are listening to an improviser whose intense delivery and wild vibrato must have been influenced by such leaders of the 1960s free jazz movement as Coltrane and Albert Ayler. Yet Mekuria, who is now in his late 70s, denies the suggestion. His apprenticeship was served with Addis Ababa's municipality and police bands, after which he made his name with instrumental versions of traditional warriors' songs. In Hawkins's view, the undoubted similarity of the music of Mekuria and other Ethiopians to the sound of American musicians is a matter of "family resemblance" rather than direct influence.

Lke Astatke, Mekuria has taken advantage of the recent and unexpected interest of foreign audiences. He toured and recorded with the Ex, a Dutchpunk band, and with Boston's adventurous Either/Orchestra. In 2008, he and Astatke performed together with other Ethiopian musicians at Glastonbury. In 2009 Astatke recorded and toured with the Heliocentrics, the British funk band. The following year saw the release of an album called Mulatu Steps Ahead, on which Astatke used a combination of the Either/Orchestra and British-based musicians while adding Ethiopian instruments to the mix: a bamboo flute called the washint, a kind of lyre called the krar, and the single-string masinko, a relative of the West African n'goni. On Sketches of Ethiopia, recorded by his new band and released last year, those same instruments are integrated into a series of subtly hued arrangements showing the influence of Ellington and Gil Evans filtered through an Ethiopian sensibility.

"Mulatu has that thing the great composers have," Hawkins says, "of coming up with something that can be both really quite odd and completely inevitable. When Thelonious Monk plays a note, for instance,it's at once the sound of surprise and the only note it could ever have been. Mulatu's bassline for 'Yekatit' is deeply weird for all kinds of technical reasons, but it sits perfectly. There's a tune that I love called 'Kasalèfkut Hulu' where the horn line is so counterintuitive and yet feelsgood. With 'Netsanet', the bassline is in six and the drums are in four. Ifyou said that to the people dancing to it, they'd fall over – but if you don't, they're fine."

He describes the experience of playing with Astatke as a reminder of music's functional and spiritual dimensions. "For someone like me, a middle-class white guy from Oxford, music has never been part of a struggle or a ritual. But this is a first-hand reminder that there are placeswhere music isn't just a beautiful thing that you let happen to you." Astatke is 70 now, but his work is not yet done. According to Hawkins, hemakes regular visits to Harvard and MIT, where Unesco funding enables him to work on creating new versions of Ethiopian instruments, using modern materials and technology, expanding their range to encompass the western 12-tone scale. Purists might wince at the idea. But if anyone can make it work, it's probably him. (Text ends)

Europe wide protest for the release of Andargachew Tsige held'

ESAT News (September 5, 2014) News reports from London that this protest held in London city in the presence of Ethiopian protesters that have come from all over Europe was “dazzling". Since the Ethiopian government abducted Ethiopian-British citizen Andargachew Tsige, Secretary General of the Ginbot 7 Movement on June 23, 2014 from Sanaa Airport in Yemen, it has kept him detained incommunicado in an undisclosed location. Sources say Andargachew is being taken to differentplaces during the night and is being interrogated. Andargachew has been often saying that he had finished his jobs. ESAT had reported that the Ethiopian government had paid a hefty sum of money to Yemeni security officials to kidnap Andrgachew and extradite him to Ethiopia.

The Oromo branch of Harrarghe - On the Evolution of Urban Centers’

DIARIES (By Afendi Muteki) Most of the urban centres of Harrarghe are of short ages. Harar is the oldest one in the whole of East and Southern Ethiopia (In his book written 160 years ago, Sir Richard Burton also claimed that Harar is the only permanent settlement in East Africa) . It was the capital of Adal Sultanate up to 1577 and an independent city state(Emirate) from 1648-1887. Harar was the main market place for the Oromos as well as other peoples of East Ethiopa. Next comes Funyaan Biiraa (Gursum) which is said to be a remnant of a nearby town. ProfessorUlrich Braukemper says that it had been a capital of an old time Emirate.

Imam Ahmed ibn Ibrahim Al-Ghazi was born at a place called “Hubat”which was near to Funyan Biiraa (as recorded in Fat’hul Habasha, thechronicle of Imam Ahmed ibn Ibrahim Al-Ghazi)

With the exception of these two towns (Harar and Funyan Biiraa), no urban center is said to be an extant of the medieval age. However, there is a high speculation that the towns called with a prefix “Biyyoo” (such as”Biyyoo Kharaaba”) are old aged as the Oromos have been calling the long-lived Harar by a name “Biyyoo Adaree” meaning “the city of Adaree”(“biyyoo” is to mean “town” in Mahdi Hamid Muudee’s English-Oromo Dictionary and information I obtained from elderly people).

There is an oral tradition that the town of Balbalettii (in West Harrarghe,25 kms south of Gelemso) have also a long age. But I doubt this information is true because no old time documents mention about it. Rather than Balbaleettii, we can see the names like Gelemso and Hirna inthe books and travel accounts of many writers. As trading activities increased in the Harrarghe region, certain important religious and culturalcentres started to show some urban features. The spread of Islamic preachers among the Oromos also intensified the urbanization process because these preachers came with new house building and furnishing skills in addition to their religious knowledge Eventually important culturalplaces like Gelemso, Qunnii, Hirna, Watar, Babille etc changed to true urban centres.

The last quarter of the 19 century brought the most remarkable effect on the urbanization process in Harrarghe. This happened in two ways. First, when the army of emperor Minilik occupied Harrarghe in 1987, many garrisons was established for the administrative purposes and as a living places for the imperial army. With construction of living houses, churches,water wells etc, these garrisons were transformed to true urban centres. Girawa, Dadar, Komona, Anchar etc were founded in this way.

The construction of Ethio-Djibouti Railway Line was the other factor that fastened the urbanization process in Harrarghe. Dire Dawa, Errar, Mieso, Bikke, Afdam etc were the direct results of this process.

The urbanizationprocess in Harrarghe hasn't stopped. More urban centres are coming, andthe old ones are expanding in all direction. The urban centers in the Harrarghe have shown many changes in the 20th century; some of them grew continuously, others stayed in dwarfism. Few of them continue to play their historical role while a handful of them were totally forgotten.

This essay tries to assess the ups and downs of the towns of Harrarghe inthe 20th century.

In early 20th century, Dire Dawa was made the main terminal of the Franco-Ethiopian Railway Line. This has caused trade to boom in the areaand consequently, many people settled there permanently. European, Arabian and Indian traders also came to the area and introduced new transactions and building styles. Within a decade, the town replaced the centuries old Harar as the main commercial center of east Ethiopia (but Harar remained the administrative center).

In the same period, the land of Harerghe was divided to vast woredas (districts). The woreda's chief activity was gathering the tributes and taxes from the native Oromos who became tenants on their land. Due totheir strategic positions, some towns situated on the mountain tops like Qun'e (Qunnii) and Gurawa became seats of the newly created woredas.These towns were mostly inhabited by the imperial army and their families. The Oromos living around those woreda towns suffered greatly from the repeated looting undertaken by the army. For example, the people of Gara Mul'ata have a famous saying which reminds us of the situation of the time. It says "Gurawaa gad-yaatii, loon nu aati" meaning "They come out of Gurawa (town) and steal our cattle".

Ras Taffari Makonnen's ascendance to the Solomonic throne as Emperor Haile-Silasie I of Ethiopia brought another change on the urbanization process. Harrarghe was divided to "awraja"s (sub-provinces) and woredas(districts). In the eastern half of Harrarghe, towns like Dadar, Girawa andFunyan Biiraa became awraja centers along with Harar and Dire Dawa. Inthe western part, Afdam became the capital of Adal and Issa Awraja but Qun'ee (Qunnii) was replaced by the newly founded "Ciroo" town as the capital of "Carcar" awraja. (Ciroo was renamed "Asebe Taffari" in honor of the emperor but the Oromos continued to call it by its original nameCiroo).

The five year Italian occupation of the country (1936-1941) brought a newdynamism on the urbanization process in the Harrarghe. The occupiers constructed the all weather road that runs from Addis Ababa to Harar and then passes to Jijjiga. This had intensified trade and communication in thearea and more urban centers appeared on the Fugug Mountains. The Italian era also favored historical towns to resurrect. For example, Galamso was made the capital of “Carcar” awraja in that period and consequently, it expanded in all directions.

Another thing to note here was the Italian attempt to establish a new urbanized community of immigrants which were thought to be brought from southern Italy. The site selected to host those immigrants was a place called “Waccuu” in Carcar province (20kms east of Galamso). An intensive housing program was launched in the area and dozens of European style buildings were constructed. However, the program was interrupted when the Italians left the country in May 1941. Yet “Waacuu”became a typical town that represents the five years colonial era (the elderly people still call it “Kinteerii”- derived from the Italian “cantiere” which was to mean “construction site”).

The emperor’s return to the throne turned the development of many urban centers of Harrarghe in the other way; Afdam lost its status of awraja capital, Galamso was replaced by “Assebe Teferi” (Ciroo) as Carcarawraja capital, and Harar’s high expansion stopped. But Dire Dawa continued to play its role as the leading commercial center of the east; “Magaalaa” became the commercial quarter of the city and “Kazira” became the residential quarter.

In the 1950s, Christian missionary groups launched programs of evangelization in the Harrarghe. Their effort had little effect on the Oromos of Harrarghe yet they helped found new health facilities and education centers. For example, in 1957, an American Mennonite missionary group established Dadar Hospital which was the first one to beopened outside Harar and Dire Daawa.

The 1950s was also marked by a wide spread of European and Arabian merchants in Harrarghe. Due to the efforts made by these entrepreneurs,electric lighting system and tap water was introduced to many urban centers. However, apart from Harar and Dire Dawa, the imperial government gave low attention to improving the infrastructure and housing conditions in the towns of Harrarghe. For example, it was only inthe late 1960s and early 1970s that the banking and telephone services were introduced to the towns of Ciroo, Haramaya, Galamso and Dadar.

The coming of the Duerg regime to power highly favored the towns thathad awraja status and some woreda towns; many had got 24 hours electric power, health center, high school, city halls, stadiums etc.. However, trade had diminished due to the regime's central economic policies. As a result, contraband engulfed many towns of Harrarghe. The Ethio-Somali war of 1977-78 also caused serious damage to the areas of towns. This damage was very immense to the towns situated in the former Jijjiga and Gursum awrajas. For example, a town of Qoree (in Gursum awraja) was almost completely destroyed by the war. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA: Imprisoning, Killing, Spying – Suppression of the Innocent'By GRAHAM PEEBLES (September 5, 2014) Wrapped in dishonesty, arrogance and paranoia, Ethiopia's ruling regime is following a nationwide policy of violent suppression and constitutional vandalism.

(VIEW POINT) It was the 24th June – midsummer's day – in the adopted homeland of Andargachew Tsige, when he was detained by 'Yemeni officials' (State heavies in suits) whilst transiting through Sana'a to Eritrea. The British citizen and leading Ethiopian political activist was quickly and quietly extradited to Addis Ababa where he was imprisoned onspurious charges of treason or some such trumped up, paranoid twaddle. He had been unfairly tried in absentia in 2009, when Amnesty report he was "sentenced to death for an alleged coup attempt. He was prosecuted in absentia again in 2012 on terrorism charges, alongside other prisoners of conscience, and sentenced to life imprisonment."

Incarcerated he remains, hidden, abused and tortured by Ethiopian military thugs; his "detention in Ethiopia means that his life and physical integrity are in great danger…his incommunicado detention in an unknownlocation increases this risk." says MEP Anna Gomez in a letter to British Foreign Secretary, Philip Hammond. In keeping with Britain's consistent abdication of donor duty in the face of the Ethiopian government's unbridled abuse of its people, the new Secretary of State at the FCO and his lieutenants have done nothing of substance to support Andargachew.

The false arrest, imprisonment and mis-treatment of Andargachew Tsige is but the most high profile recent example of a strategic policy of control and suppression enforced by the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). A range of weapons are employed by the regime to stifle dissent and create an atmosphere of fear, including extrajudicial executions, arrest, imprisonment and torture. HRW state the government "regularly use abuse to gather information…. Ethiopian authorities have subjected political detainees to torture and other ill treatment at the main detention center [Maekelawi Police Station] in AddisAbaba." Journalists who challenge the government are intimidated (so tootheir families) and silenced. Many have been arrested, and as the Committee to Protect Journalists reports, "are languishing in Ethiopia's prisons on trumped-up terrorism charges for doing their jobs." In their thorough report "They Want A Confession", Human Rights Watch (HRW) documents “serious rights abuses, unlawful interrogation tactics, and poordetention conditions in Maekelawi since 2010. Those detained …include scores of opposition politicians, journalists, protest organizers, and allegedsupporters of ethnic insurgencies.” Public assembly, whilst not being outwardly criminalized is effectively banned, despite the fact that it is a right enshrined like all such liberal freedoms in the legally binding constitution. A dusty document which has no influence over the ruling party, or indeed the judiciary, which functions as a docile enforcer of government criminality.

The Guilty Trust Nobody: For a country beset with acute poverty, where itis conservatively estimated 30% of the population (World Bank figures) are living below the ‘official poverty line’ (that’s income of $2 a day), the government somehow manages to administer and fund (to the tune of $340 millions) the largest standing army in Sub-Saharan Africa. They boast 560 tanks, over 80 warplanes, and out of a population numbering 92 million, Global Fire Power reveals, 25 million are armed and ‘fit for service’, with a further 10 million standing by. The men in uniform are kept busy by their political masters – there is a whole nation to suppress and control, including the people of Oromia (who are calling for self-determination) and Amhara. There is the Ogaden region to occupy and forcibly govern, innocent men and women – who seek nothing more threatening than autonomy, their constitutional right – to murder, terrorise and rape. There is Gambella in the far south west and the LowerOmo Valley where women are raped by soldiers, men beaten, indigenouspeople (who have lived on ancestral land for generations) herded into government camps (the notorious Villagisation project – part funded by Britain and the World Bank) as vast tracts of lands are sold for pennies tointernational corporations. There is torture to be administered, assassinations to plan and execute, rapes to be performed and surveillance of dissenting voices to be carried out. And spying from villages to cyberspace to keep the EPRDF military men active night and day; duplicitous, disingenuous and corrupt, they trust nobody.

In their detailed study of government surveillance in Ethiopia, “They KnowEverything We Do”, HRW found the ruling party “is using foreign technology to bolster its widespread telecom surveillance of opposition activists and journalists both in Ethiopia and abroad,” and unsurprisingly there are no judicial or legislative mechanisms in place to protect privacy.The Chinese multinational ZTE is the primary supplier of telecommunication technology, but HRW discovered that Britain (a major donor, whose unfathomable support of the regime could be said to make Britain complicit in some of the regime’s wide-ranging human rights violations) and Germany have also provided surveillance software and know-how. The government owns the country’s sole telecommunication company (Ethio Telecommunication); awash with paranoia they control and monitor mobile phone use and Internet access (coverage of which, at around 0.5%is the second lowest in Sub-Saharan Africa) throughout the country. These“surveillance practices violate the rights to freedom of expression, association, and access to information,” HRW state. Security personnel have unfettered access to call records of all telephone users – particular attention is given to foreign numbers. Calls are recorded without legal process or oversight, and replayed “during abusive interrogations in whichpeople who have been arbitrarily detained are accused of belonging to banned organizations.” [Ibid] A former Oromo opposition party member told HRW, that “one day they arrested me and they showed me everything. They showed me a list of all my phone calls and they played aconversation I had with my brother.” He was arrested for the heinous act of discussing “politics on the phone,” – a criminal activity in this supposedly democratic African nation.

Access to websites that offer independent critical analysis of political events, including opposition party sites, media and bloggers is denied by government controls. The Ethiopian people, both inside the country and within the diaspora are extremely fearful; as a result a great deal of ‘self- censorship’ takes place. People are afraid to call or receive phone calls from abroad (where many have family working), they are reluctant to publicly criticize the government and refrain from discussing a variety of topics openly or during ‘private’ telephone calls. The “main mode of government control is through extensive networks of informants and a grassroots system of surveillance,” HRW report. And in a society where secrecy and mistrust of one another is common, silent suppression and distrust of others is fostered. And where unity is needed – for if there is tobe change within the country, the people must come together – community, ethnic and tribal divisions are strengthened. All of course by EPRDF design.

Legalizing Suppression: The legislative weapon of choice used to gag and imprison is the universally condemned 2009 Anti-Terrorism Proclamation (ATP), which when introduced HRW described as “a potent instrument to crack down on political dissent, including peaceful political demonstrationsand public criticisms of government policy”; it allows for “long-term imprisonment and even the death penalty for “crimes” that bear no resemblance, under any credible definition, to terrorism.” Since the ATP was written into law, “the independent media have been decimated by politically motivated prosecutions … The government has systematically thwarted attempts by journalists to establish new publications. Blogs and Internet pages critical of the government are regularly blocked, and in 2012 printing houses came under threat for printing publications that criticized the authorities.”

The EPRDF has used this and other repressive laws to decimate civil society organizations and independent media and target individuals withpolitically motivated prosecutions. It is a paranoid, cruel and violent regime that ignores human rights law, violates its own constitution and is causing extreme suffering amongst its people. And donor countries ¬– America, Britain and the European Union primarily, appear content to ignore wide ranging atrocities (some of which deep inside the Ogaden region for example constitute crimes against humanity), in exchange for what – for the illusion of stability in the centre of a region dominated by failed states and warring fanatics? There is not stability and harmony within Ethiopia, but cruel suppression, terror and simmering anger. Whilstthe responsibility for bringing lasting change rests firmly with the people acting in unity, there is no excuse for allowing indeed supporting a regimethat throws a dark dank shroud of fear over the country. Responsible allegiance entails holding regimes accountable and supporting the people of the nation state, not the state dictators, defending human rights, insisting on justice and the implementation of federal and international law.

The impunity and arrogance of the EPRDF was blatantly displayed in April this year when, just days before American Secretary of State John Kerry visited the country, “six bloggers for Zone 9, an Amharic-language website whose writers have criticized the government, and three freelancejournalists were arrested,” reported the New York Times.

In addition to donor indifference, the wide-ranging human rights violationstaking place daily within Ethiopia go virtually unreported. The Ethiopian people repeatedly ask why their plight is not reported, why do donors not act, or use what is assumed to be their considerable influence on the EPRDF leadership. Why, for example, isn’t British citizen Andergachew free? Is it because he is Black, poor, a migrant to Britain born in Ethiopia. They rightly ask why the state terrorism taking place within Oromia, Gambella, the beautiful Lower Omo Valley, and, perhaps worst of all, in the Ogaden region – where murder of the innocent is routine, where men and women are imprisoned without trial, tortured, the women violently mass raped – is allowed to go unchallenged. Legitimate questions passionately asked by a people violently suppressed, living in fear in a corner of Africa, suffering and desperate. Graham Peebles is director of the Create Trust. Ethiopia's Meles Zenawi: Legacies, memories, histories’

By Awol K Allo (September 6, 2014) Distorted rhetoric and commemorative acts seek to obfuscate the true dictatorial legacy ofEthiopia's late leader.

(VIEW POINT) August 20 marked the second anniversary of the death of Ethiopia's long-time leader, Meles Zenawi. Two years on, the Zenawi phenomenon is still as divisive as it is unsettling. For his supporters, Zenawi is a statesman and a visionary leader that represents not only thehopes and aspirations of "the new Ethiopia" but also "the African renaissance". For those who were excluded and marginalised under his rule, Zenawi is the symbolic personification of a tyrannical system that violently quashed their desire for freedom and justice. Still for others, heis a complex figure that condenses within himself the qualities of a political genius and a seasoned dictator. In the words of The Economist: "the man who tried to make dictatorship acceptable."

Two years on, the spectre of Zenawi hangs over the Ethiopian state. His name, his policies, and his visions still provide the cement that keeps together the ideological edifices of the Ethiopian state. His successors elevate him to a pure symbol, take pride in and identify with his legacies. The constant invocation of Zenawi by regime officials gives the impressionthat the entire social and political order of the state is predicated on the image and imagery of a single man. The "Meles Legacy" has become a grand memory work - an archive that condenses within it a great many different things for a great many different people.
Legacy and the politics of archives: Zenawi now belongs to the archives. But archives are pivotal - "great historical watchtowers" or "observation posts" from which we can access and observe the past. In archives, we see the random elements and the minute details of our identity. Archives are not just about remembering and understanding the past. In fact, at stake in every recounting of the past is not the past as such; it is the future. In his seminal essay, "Archive Fever", French philosopher Jacques Derrida observes , the question of the archive is "a question of the future, the question of the future itself, the question of a response, of a promise and of a responsibility for tomorrow. The archive: if we want to know whatthat will have meant, we will only know in times to come." To speak aboutZenawi's archives, then, is not to speak about the past: It is about the future.
But archives are contested spaces: They not only conserve but also produce and reproduce. Far from being neutral voids in which facts and events are placed, archives are active agents that participate in the production and reproduction of meaning. For every archive, there are counter-archives. For every narrative, there are counter-narratives. It isprecisely for this reason that Zenawi's legacy has become such an important site of political struggle in Ethiopia today.
Zenawi's archives: As a man who played the single most important role in Ethiopia's history of the last two decades, Zenawi is a giant in that archive. When asked by Al Jazeera's Andrew Simmons about the legacy heleaves behind, Zenawi said, "I would like to be remembered as someone who got Ethiopia off to a good track, democratic one, […] where Ethiopia'sproverbial poverty begins to be tackled in an effective way; I would like tobe remembered as someone who has started the process."

During his funeral ceremony two years ago, his successor, Hailemariam Desalegn called him a " visionary", an "intellectual", and a "technocrat" who has been " working for the renaissance Ethiopia and Africa". Jacob Zuma of South Africa called him " one of the greatest sons of the continent" while Paul Kagame of Rwanda recognised his unreserved support in the fight to end the Rwandan genocide and praised his "humble", "simple" but "meaningful life " . The most notable eulogy was delivered by then US Ambassador to the United Nations, Susan Rice, whodepicted a rather erudite and progressive image of Zenawi. Rice spoke of"his world-class mind" : " he wasn't just brilliant. He wasn't just a relentless negotiator and a formidable debater. He wasn't just a thirsty consumer of knowledge. He was uncommonly wise." In many ways, he has built international reputation for himself as "the voice of Africa", and the West's key ally on "the war on terror".

Whatever the truth of these eulogies, Zenawi's domestic credentials are absolutely dismal . For the last two decades, Ethiopia consistently rankedas one of the most repressive states in the world. Susan Rice's own StateDepartment chronicled a consistent pattern of grave violations of human rights including torture, arbitrary killings, restrictions on freedom of the press and expression, denial of religious freedoms, and the politicised useof its notorious anti-terrorism legislation. Contradicting her own government's documented practices of torture and other grave human rights violations, Rice's eulogies slips into an agonising denial that flies inthe face of the facts.

Rice exploits the grandeur of US power and its enunciating force to reworkthe history of repression and torture. This reworking, as the Philosopher Michel Foucault says , functions to "ensure that the greatness of the events or men of the past could guarantee the value of the present".

However, history cannot remain reworked. As Walter Benjamin's messianic but sublime insight reveals: " The past carries with it a temporalindex by which it is referred to redemption. There is a secret agreement between past generations and the present one. Our coming was expected on earth."

Zenawi's counter-archives: Zenawi was a paradoxical figure who embodied the traits of a brutal dictator and a politico-economic genius,both unified in one. Just before the 2010 election in which Zenawi won 99.6 percent of the seats, Andrew Simmons sought an explanation for these two faces: "There are . . . those who say that you have two faces, you have a face for Davos, charming, a progressive and you have anotherface, which is totalitarian and repressive; how do you respond to that?" Zenawi's answer was misleadingly simple: "As far as I am concerned, what you see is what you get. No two faces, just one." Those who are deprived of the means of narrative production by Zenawisee him as a man who used his omnipotent power and his knowledge of the politico-military complex to eliminate the very conditions under whichalternative ideas and competent political operators could emerge. It is notsimply that he built a system around himself, but deliberately establishedhimself as the only leader able to supply the cement necessary to hold together the nation's internal ruptures. He might have helped Ethiopia achieve rocketing economic progress but this progress came at a cost of two decades of terror and repression.

The relentless memorialisation of Zenawi's legacy conceals, misrecognises, misrepresents, de-historicises, and ultimately erases the fundamental relationships of domination and inequality instituted by the order minted by Zenawi. Theses obsessive commemorative practices , i.e.events, parks, monuments, and institutions built up to remember and commemorate Zenawi have the purpose and effect of transforming everything about Zenawi into "a dazzling action" that can be appropriatedby the order he founded and the sovereignty he left behind. It has the goal of transcribing his deeds into a discourse that ensures the sedimentation of these utterances into common-sense knowledge, into that which remains when everything is forgotten. This, then, is what is at stake in the struggle over the legacy of Meles Zenawi.

No doubt the darling of the West who outmanoeuvred his adversaries, Zenawi's domestic reputation is radically at odds with his international stature. In the eyes of his people, Zenawi was irredeemably authoritarian.Awol Kassim Allo is Fellow in Human Rights at the London School of Economics and Political Science.

Britain banned the import and use of the tropical plant’ Britain banned the import and use of the tropical plant Khat’

MORALE (September 8, 2014) Britain banned the import and use of the tropical plant khat in July, joining most other European nations and many in the Middle East. Even the UN has identified khat as a dangerous substance. This has brought joy to Somalia, where khat producers, havinglost a major export customer for khat exports have been selling a lot moreof it in Somalia and at bargain (at least 50 percent less) prices. While this is great for all the soldiers, militiamen and gangsters who spend a lot of time sitting around waiting for some action, these guys become more unpredictable when under the influence of khat. Moreover, men with gunsare the wrong people to turn into khat addicts. Khat is very addictive and an armed man with a desperate need for more khat will do crazy things toobtain the cash to buy more of the stuff. Wives complain that husbands will spend all their money on khat and ignore their starving children.

Khat is a plant that has grown in Yemen, Kenya and Ethiopia for thousands of years. When chewed the khat leaves give you more of a buzz than caffeine or nicotine, but less than stronger drugs. It is addictive and until the 1950s was grown by farmers for their own personal use as a stimulant. Khat was used like that long before anyone figured out how to use coffee beans to produce a stimulating liquid. One thing that kept khat local was the fact that the leaves quickly lost their potency a few days after being picked. In other words, Khat did not travel well while coffee beans and tea leaves did. That all changed after World War II when roads,trucks and air transport became widely available. Suddenly khat had an international market for those who could afford to pay for it and were not put off by the need to sit around for hours chewing the stuff.

Khat became a worldwide problem after World War II. Despite the fact that many nations outlawed khat because of its unfortunate side effects the stuff was very popular with those who grew up with it. As Arabian oilexports and the price of oil grew after World War II more Arabs could afford imported (via air) khat. Other Arabs learned of khat from the millions of Yemenis who went off to the nearby Arab oil States to work. Some got rich and nearly all sent money home. Because of these remittances many Yemenis had developed a taste for khat, and so had many Saudis, even though Khat was illegal in Saudi Arabia. Thus the demand for Yemeni khat increased, but mainly for export. Meanwhile theYemeni population kept growing and more land was being used to grow khat, which now accounts for about 40 percent of water used and is destroying the economy. About 90 percent of the water use is for agriculture, which is still the mainstay of the Yemeni economy but the demand for khat means ancient underground water resources are being used to the point of exhaustion. There is big money in khat, mainly because most of it is smuggled into Saudi Arabia and is not as labor intensive as food crops. Now the khat producers fly the fresh leaves to places as far away as North America and Europe where expatriate Arabs are willing to pay well for fresh khat flown in regularly.

Yemen was the one khat growing area that was close to khat consumers with lots of money; namely people in the Arab oil states of the Persian Gulf. The other area where khat grew easily was Ethiopia, which was deepin Africa surrounded by poverty and far from anyone able to pay for khat.Yemen was the only Arabian state without a lot of oil and had the largest population. Khat was suddenly a way to make a lot of money. Khat has created another problem; the importation of powerful and often forbidden insecticides, to facilitate the growing of more khat. Since the khat leaves are chewed, using too much, or too poisonous (to humans) insecticide makes the users sick. Many khat growers are more concerned with producing more khat than they are in keeping their customers healthy.

Just as Colombia and Afghanistan were thrown into chaos by major druggangs (producing cocaine and heroin, respectively) Yemen is being brought low by khat.

EPRDF says leadership secrets leaked, now in ‘risky hands’ESAT News (September 10, 2014)

The ruling Front, EPRDF's council meeting, unusually held for a third timein one month confirmed that the secrets of the leadership have "fallen in dangerous hands'' and the consequences could be very bad unless immediate measures are taken.

The 3rd emergency meeting stated that the Amhara National Democratic Movement (ANDM) and Southern Ethiopian Peoples' Democratic Movement(SPDM), both member parties of the EPRDF, are at their weakest point in time and notified the parties to immediately come out of this situation. In this meeting held in closed doors, the two parties have been given advise to eliminate the strong "public hate'' that is widely visible against them in their respective regions and prepare to win the general election next year.

The Council said "although there have been changes in the Country's political economy", the people in Amhara and Southern Ethiopian regionshave expressed their suffering, problems and their trials which has eventually "confounded the Front." During the evaluation held on "Changing the political economy of rent seeking with developmental political economy", the Front said the Beni Shangul, Harari, Somali, Gambella and Afar regions have not been able to break away from beingsupported.

In the past 13 years, although there have been gradual progresses in the developmental political economy, there remains a lot. The Council has alsostarted to look into the roles of the top leadership of the EPRDF and confirmed that the secrets of the top leadership have been seeped out to "dangerous groups" and unless immediate measures are taken the damages could be stern. Each region has also been given directive to conduct election assessments and send them back.

September 12, 2014: Ethiopia celebrates 2007 and 17 other facts aboutthis nation'

Today Ethiopia is ringing in the New Year, but in this case it's 2007. This isbecause Ethiopia follows the Julian calendar, roughly seven years behind the Gregorian, consisting of 12 months of 30 days each and a 13th monthof five or six days - the only country in the world with 13 months. This uniqueness is well-suited to this East African nation which is full of delightful, though sometimes disheartening, facts:

1. Coffee Homeland: Coffee, one of the world's most popular beverages,was discovered in Ethiopia, in the region of Kaffa - the province which gave coffee its name. Ethiopia today is Africa's top coffee producer and exporter.
2. Urban Hyenas: Addis Ababa is currently plagued by urban hyenas. These carnivores animals have moved into the city from the surroundinghills and taken up residence. It is estimated that there are now between300 and 1,000 of them living in the city.
3. Lots of cows: With approximately 52 million heads of cattle, Ethiopiahas the largest livestock population in Africa. South Africa's national commercial cattle herd is estimated at 13.5 million
4. 'Immune' to colonialism: Despite Italy's best and most ruthless efforts, Ethiopia was never colonised by a European power. It was only occupied for five years, between 1936 - 1941, by Mussolini's Italy but thecountry never surrendered.
5. Special baboons: Ethiopia is home to the Gelada Baboon. These fascinating animals are in fact, not a baboon, but an old world monkeyoften classified in its own genus. They are the last surviving species of ancient grazing primates that were once widespread.
6. World Heritage gem: Ethiopia is home to nine UNESCO World Heritagesites, more than any other country in Africa.
7. Unique script: Ethiopia is the only country in Africa with its own unique script - commonly called "Ethiopics" it is widely adopted throughout the country by almost all the languages and has more than 260 characters, 10numerals and several punctuation marks.
8. Rasta roots: The word "Rastafarian" actually comes from the name ofEthiopian Emperor Haile Selassie (Ras Tafari Makonnen) who is regardedby Rastafarians as the God of the Black race. Rastafarians regard 'Ethiopia' as their homeland and believe they will eventually return.
9. Landlocked giant: With a population of approximately 97 million, Ethiopia is the most populous landlocked country in the world.
10. High Addis: At an altitude of 2440m, Addis Ababa - one the fastestgrowing metropolis in the word – is Africa's "highest" city and the thirdhighest capital in the world.

11. Commodity exchange: Ethiopia is home to Africa's first commodityexchange. Established by Eleni Gabre-Madhin in 2008, the Ethiopia Commodity Exchange (ECX) created a reliable interface for buyers andsellers to meet

12. First gold: Derartu Tulu was the first woman from Africa to win an Olympic gold medal, doing so in the 10,000m event at the 1992 BarcelonaOlympics.

13. Biggest dam: Ethiopia is currently constructing the Grand RenaissanceDam - on the River Nile near the Sudan border - which is going to be the largest dam in Africa.

14. Worst famine: Claiming approximately one million lives, Ethiopia's1983-1985 famine was the worst in modern-Africa's history. This wasfollowed by the 2010-2012 famine in Somalia which claimed almost 260,000 lives

15. Super food: Ethiopian food is gaining popularity worldwide, with an Ethiopian restaurant found in almost every major city. But the real super-star in Ethiopian ingredients is the teff grain, now poised to be the world'snext "superfood". It is a nutritious, gluten-free alternative to wheat

Many die, flee attack in Gembella'ESAT News (September 12, 2014)

A new attack that was started by the Mezhenger communities in the Godere and Micha areas of Gambella has left many dead. Some of the dead bodies have not yet been collected. The clash that began following the campaigns that called for all other communities but Gambella to leavethe region has caused a lot of bloodshed and also forced over 1000 peopleto flee to Tepi city. According to those who follow the case closely, the main cause of the conflict is the land grab by retired Defense officials of the Tigrean Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF), who displaced the local residents.

The members of the Mezhenger community are indiscriminately attackingpeople. They have killed many and wounded evicted thousands in the lasttwo months alone, ESAT's sources in the area said.

The detention of the Region's Security Chief and the abduction and transfer of the former president of the regional state, Okelo Aquaye, fromSouth Sudan to Addis Abeba, has triggered the conflict. The Federal Policeofficers that have been sent to the Region have faced deadly attack from the armed groups. ESAT's effort to speak to the officials of the Region about the conflict that is still continuing has been unsuccessful. ESAT has reported in yesterday's Prime Time News that the number of dead people was 9 however recent indicate that the number could well above be that.

Ethiopians labor migrants no longer allowed to enter Kuwait'By Muna Al-Fuzai (September 14, 2014)

Kuwait is no more open to Ethiopians – male or female workers cannot enter the country. The Ministry of Interior suspended the entry of all maleand female Ethiopians workers since February because of the crime rate recorded among this nationality in terms of murder and theft. Such a decision is like labeling a nation with the mark of being killers and craziesthat need to be banned in order to keep Kuwait safe and secure from possible threats.

Personally, I think such a decision is unfair and cruel. For example, if someone claims that all Muslims are terrorists because ISIS and bin Ladenare Muslims or Jews are bad people because they are occupying Palestine and calling it the land of Israel, will that make sense to you? Because thenall Muslims and Jewish will be no better than the Ethiopians, who have been labeled with similar allegations because some of their people committed crimes here and there.

If a Western country took a decision to prevent all Muslims from enteringits land, wouldn't that seem like discrimination? If these general opinionsseem unbearable, then why do we treat others similarly? Most of these decisions are like undergoing surgery to avoid medications – a short cut but not necessarily the right one.

When an Ethiopian worker commits a crime, we treat this incident with fear and emotions. Yes, we feel sorry for the victims, but do not ponder ifthis is the whole story and on the truth behind this crime. No one seems to wonder if there was any kind of verbal abuse or maltreatment or harassment. Or if the accused person was given the opportunity to tell his/her side of the story.

When a crime occurs, most people tend to stand up like judges and makeopinions in favor of the victims without knowing the whole truth! When someone labels a nation with the mistakes of some of its people, it becomes hard for them to live normally. Verbal abuse is the worst here and widespread. Ethiopians are also humans. There is a cultural issue herebecause we bring maids from different cultures without realizing that it could be hard for them to accept the new culture easily.

I have lived long to believe that most new female workers are under pressure of homesickness, so an extra pressure – especially if it is a physical one – would surely turn them into a bomb ready to explode or make them fragile and desperate so they may harm others and kill themselves afterwards. Another issue here that may lead to depression among maids, especially females, is that they are not given the right tohave a day off or personal freedom to meet their friends. These mattersseem trivial but not to these workers. If Kuwait is not welcoming them, they will still get welcomed in other parts of the world. (Text ends)

UN experts urge Ethiopia to stop using anti-terrorism legislation No 652/2009 to curb human rights' UN News Release GENEVA (September 18, 2014) – A group of United Nations human rights experts* today urgedthe Government of Ethiopia to stop misusing anti-terrorism legislation to curb freedoms of expression and association in the country, amid reports that people continue to be detained arbitrarily. The experts' call comes on the eve of the consideration by Ethiopia of a series of recommendations made earlier this year by members of the Human Rights Council in a process known as the Universal Periodic Reviewwhich applies equally to all 193 UN Members States. These recommendations are aimed at improving the protection and promotion ofhuman rights in the country, including in the context of counter-terrorism measures. “Two years after we first raised the alarm, we are still receivingnumerous reports on how the anti-terrorism law is being used to target journalists, bloggers, human rights defenders and opposition politicians in Ethiopia,” the experts said. “Torture and inhuman treatment in detention are gross violations of fundamental human rights.” “Confronting terrorism is important, but it has to be done in adherence to international human rights to be effective,” the independent experts stressed. “Anti-terrorism provisions need to be clearly defined in Ethiopian criminal law, and they must not be abused.”

The experts have repeatedly highlighted issues such as unfair trials, with defendants often having no access to a lawyer. “The right to a fair trial, the right to freedom of opinion and expression, and the right to freedom of association continue to be violated by the application of the anti- terrorism law,” they warned. “We call upon the Government of Ethiopia tofree all persons detained arbitrarily under the pretext of countering terrorism,” the experts said. “Let journalists, human rights defenders, political opponents and religious leaders carry out their legitimate work without fear of intimidation and incarceration.”
The human rights experts reiterated their call on the Ethiopian authoritiesto respect individuals’ fundamental rights and to apply anti-terrorism legislation cautiously and in accordance with Ethiopia’s international human rights obligations. “We also urge the Government of Ethiopia to respond positively to the outstanding request to visit by the Special Rapporteurs on freedom of peaceful assembly and association, on tortureand other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment and on the situation of human rights defenders,” they concluded.
Special Procedures is the largest body of independent experts in the United Nations Human Rights system. Special Procedures is the general name of the independent fact-finding and monitoring mechanisms of theHuman Rights Council that address either specific country situations or thematic issues in all parts of the world. Currently, there are 38 thematicmandates and 14 mandates related to countries and territories, with 73 mandate holders. Special Procedures experts work on a voluntary basis; they are not UN staff and do not receive a salary for their work. They areindependent from any government or organization and serve in their individual capacity. (Text ends)
VoA admits report was incomplete and below standard’By Dawit Ashenafi (September 18, 2014)
(Addis Voice) - The Voice of America (VOA) has finally said that investigation into the contentious August 12 report by Henok Semaegzer Fente on the decision of Azusa Pacific University (APU) to cancel an honorsceremony for Hailemariam Desalegn found that it was incomplete and did not meet VOA’s standards of journalistic quality. Kevin Lynch, VOA’s Director of Public Relations, noted in a letter that VOA’s management had asked the Office of Performance Review (OPR), an office within the Broadcasting Board of Governors (BBG), to conduct a “thorough investigation” into the the controversial story aired on VOA Amharic.
In the letter Lynch wrote to journalist and activist Abebe Gellaw, who had lodged formal complaints about the distorted story, he said it was established that the reason given in the VOA report for the cancellation of the honors ceremony was incomplete as it “omitted a key detail that the university was monitoring the Prime Minister’s human rights record.” “Theomission did not meet VOA standards for journalistic quality but may havebeen inadvertent,” Lynch said quoting the BBG finding. The VOA PR chief also indicated that APU’s spokesperson, Rachel White, did not validate Fente’s report that the university cancelled the event just because he called to say that he could not attend the honors ceremony. Henok Fente had reported that the Prime Minister told the university that he had to return to Ethiopia despite the fact that he came to the U.S. on August 4th while the event was slated for July 31. Lynch further said that such a serious omission is “a reminder of the importance of abiding by strong editorial review of stories prior to air.” The story was allegedly aired without proper editorial review by the managing editor of the Amharic service, who exhibited poor editorial judgement by endorsing and defending the distorted story.

Responding to the findings, Abebe said he commends the investigation and welcomes the key findings that the story was not only incomplete butalso below VOA’s standards of journalistic quality. However, he underlinedthat the that the probe certainly lacked rigour. “The investigators did not address some of the key elements of the complaint. They did not also speak to the Global Alliance for the Rights of Ethiopians (GARE) or myself.Had they done so, VOA would have taken full responsibility for the blunders and taken corrective measures,” he said.

“On the positive side, VOA has in a way accepted that the story was distorted as it was incomplete and below VOA’s journalistic standard. Nonetheless, I find it hard to accept that the distortions were not deliberate after repeated efforts by the same person to discredit and undermine the important work I do as a journalist and an activist using VOA as a weapon, ” he said. “Fente’s biased and distorted reporting in stories that I was part of did not happen once. It happened three times. Ihad formally complained last year about the same tactic he employed to mislead VOA Amharic listeners about another sensitive story,” he said. “Itshould also be noted that the August 12 story contained not one but multiple inaccuracies and distortions that were not addressed by the probe. There is also the issue of a fabricated letter that I never wrote butFente quoted on air from “my letter” to APU, which was never written or sent,” he explained. Abebe says that VOA has so far failed to produce the said letter attributed to him and quoted in Fente’s story. “As far as I know, it was a totally irresponsible and dishonest fabrication,” he said. “Given the fact that therehave been multiple complaints from various sections of the Ethiopian Diaspora against Fente’s spins, distortions and biased reporting, I stronglybelieve that the distortions and omissions were not only deliberate but also malicious,” he said. Fente, whom credible sources say was a member of the ruling party while in Ethiopia, is openly a supporter of dictatorial regime.

FINANCE & ECONOMY: Ethiopia’s International Borrowing and ItsConsequences’

PERSPECTIVE (September 18, 2014)

Governments in rich as well as poor countries borrow money from domestic and international markets. In rich countries, government borrowing stimulates the private economy. It creates jobs, raises incomesand improves standard of living of the majority of the population.

However, in poor countries, government borrowing does not generally produce the same results. In Ethiopia, for example, the government enjoys a monopoly over domestic as well as international borrowing. But this has not stimulated the private economy as such. Between 2000 and 2012, Ethiopia's international public debt increased by 85% from US$5.339 billion to US$9.941 billion (see table below). The government isthe only borrower from international sources. International banks are not allowed to operate in the domestic financial market.

"There is growing concern about the extent to which the accumulated large stock of external debt and its repayments by The Least Developed Countries (LDCs) act as an impediment to therr economic growth and development. The debt crisis experienced by Sub-Saharan African countries which, it has been argued, resulted from a complex combination of elements, some of which are external to the individual debtor countries,while others are direct results of wrong policies, is used as a bench mark for studying the impact of external debt on economic growth in Ethiopia.Ethiopia's external debt is not simply unsustainable; even the most generous debt relief would not bring the country within reach of meeting its responsibility within the context of global poverty-reduction goals. In line with this, according to the World Bank classification of HighlyIndebted Economies, the country is one of the severely indebted low-income countries. Ethiopia's external debt has changed significantly in magnitude,structure and composition over the last quarter of the 20`h century. In 1975, it stood at about US$ 343.7 million, equivalent to 14% of the GDP, and US$ 9.1 billion (214% of GDP) in 1991. As at June 30, 1999 this figure had increased to an equivalent of US$ 10.2 billion and very recently, as at 29 April 2004, following the debt relief granted in accordance with development initiatives designed to benefit the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPCs), it had declined to US$ 3 billion. Therefore, the problem is how economic growth will be affected by the accumulated external debt stock and the repayment of debt in the longrun."

"In addition to the disagreement over how to treat foreign aid, I also became immediately entangled in another IMF- Ethiopia dispute over earlyloan repayment. Ethiopia had repaid an American bank loan early, using some of its reserves.The transaction made perfect economic sense. In spite of the quality of the collateral (an airplane), Ethiopia was payinga farhigher interest rate on its loan than it was receiving on its reserves. I, too,would have advised them to repay, particularly since in the event that funds would later be required, the government could presumably readily obtain funds using the plane as collateral. The United States and IMFobjected to the early repayment. They objected not to the logic of the strategy, but to the fact that Ethiopia had undertaken this course without IMF approval. But why should a sovereign country ask permission of the IMF for every action which it undertakes? One might have understood if ethiopia's action threatened its ability to repay what was owed the IMF; but quite the contrary, because it was a sensible financial decision, it enhanced the country's ability to repay what was due "Copyright 2002 by Joseph E.Stiglitz, Globalization and its discontents, page 30.

"Ethiopia has huge unsustainable internal and external debts strongly discourage opening up a business. It is unsettling to invest in a country that can not manage its finances, and has it's economic potential stifled bythe need to pay debts. …. As of 2012 Ethiopia's internal debt was 45.5 percent of GDP, it's external debt was 10 percent of it's GDP. "

In October 2011, the company announced an order for four Boeing 777Fsin a deal worth US$1.1 billion; the move positioned Ethiopian Airlines as the first African carrier in ordering the type.[157][158] These four aircraftwill join another two ones of the same type the airline will lease from GECAS. [159] Ethiopian received the first of these aircraft in mid September 2012.[160] Five Q400 NextGens were ordered in February 2012 for US$160 million at list prices,[161] whereas in July 2012, an additional Boeing 777-200LR was ordered in a deal worth US$276 million.[162][163][164][nb 3] In August 2012, the first Dreamliner was delivered to the company,[166][167] which became the first airline outside Japan in operating the type on scheduled flights,[168] after All Nippon Airways and Japan Airlines;[145] the second Dreamliner was handed over in October, and three more aircraft of the type are expected to join the fleet within the FY 2012/13.[169] Also in October 2012, the first Q400 NexGen was delivered,[170] and in November the same year the airline confirmed that three additional Dreamliners will be leased from ILFC, the first of them entering service in 2015.[171][172]In April 2013, Air Lease Corporation and Ethiopian Airlines announced the lease of two Boeing 777-300ERs, with deliveries in May and June 2015.[173][174] In early July the same year, it was informed that the Ex-Im Bank approved around US$130 million for Boeing in order for this aircraft manufacturer to support the development of GE90-equipped long-haul aircraft for Ethiopian Airlines.[175] The airline took delivery of its first Boeing 777-300ER in November 2013.[176] That month, during the Dubai Air Show, Palma Holding signed a letter of intent with Bombardier for eight Q400s to be leased to Ethiopian; the order was firmed up in February 2014.[177] InSeptember 2014 the carrier announced a firm order for 20 Boeing 737 MAX.

Meles Zenawi on the occasion lauded the Chinese government and the banks for their contribution towards success of Ethiopia's development endeavours. The Premier also said the relation between the two countriesis laid on firm foundation and expressed Ethiopian government's commitment to further work in collaboration with China. Zhu Hongjie on his part said the bank will further strengthen existing relation with Ethiopia as the country has registered sustainable growth during the last eight years. The bank has provided 11.4 billion USD loan for implementation of various development projects in Ethiopia, he said.

"External debt magnitudes of larger proportion have been very common inSub-Saharan Africa. Many countries in this region have been struggling with debt burdens that outweigh their export earnings, the growth rate and even level of their gross national products. The World Bank (World Debt Tables, 1987-88, p.xix) reveals that “the external indebtedness of African countries is an obstacle to the ‘restoration’ of the conditions needed for growth.” The huge debt burden acts as a threat to the economic performance given the wide spread poverty and structural rigidities in these countries. sub-Saharan Africa continue to suffer from unacceptable levels of poverty and heavy external debt burdens (IMF, 2001). Foreign debt burden is a symptom of serious problems in the economy. An acute foreign debt implies, inter alia that the country is unable to finance its impost, unable to garner its own savings, has exchange rate problems, and/or its productivity is low. As a result, somenations have attempted to turn the tide by restructuring their economiesthrough structural adjustment programs. Unfortu-nately, the structural adjustment pro-grams they followed have mostly faltered and countries are even more exposed to huge foreign debts than ever before.

Theoretical models on debt and growth have indicated a positive link between a reasonable amount of debt inflows and economic growth. The implication of these models is that capital scarce countries benefit in the wake of capital inflows. However, the literature also links larger inflows ofdebt leading with lower economic growth.” During the second regime (1976-91), imprudent economic policies led to inefficiencies in investments. As a consequence external debt increased by 13.21 percentand the debt service by 7.18 percent…The reform policies had the encouragement and financial support of both the World Bank and the Interna- tional Monetary Fund. During 1992 to 1998, the foreign debt of Ethiopia grew by 10.41 percent while the debt service dropped by 25.03 percent. Out of the total debt during this period, the long- term loan was 95.2 percent, the short-term debt was 4.23 percent and the IMF creditwas 0.56 percent.

It has become an established truism that countries’ GDP and foreign exchange earnings would need to grow at rates faster than the rates of growth of external debt if they are to avoid falling into the debt trap. RealGDP growth in excess of external debt means that the debt will be retired from the extra income generated by higher growth. An additional requirement for countries such as, whose currencies are inconvertible, is the need to convert the growing domestic goods and services to foreign exchange through increased export of goods and services to pay the debt.In Ethiopia’s recent history, these two requirements were consistently violated, and the result was the excruciating debt burden. As shown in table 3, long-term debt increased 11 times faster than real GDP growth, and 9 times faster than export growth, while per capita income fell by more than 1% per year during the tenure of the military regime. Among the factors that gave rise to such inordinate and symmetrical growth wereinappropriate policies and the wrong use of the resources so mobilized (Befekadu 1992).

Conclusion

This study presented the external debt scenario of Ethiopia over its three economic regimes with a special reference to its economic reform period.The study also confirmed the debt- growth linkage in Ethiopia. The trendsin foreign debt across various regimes indicate that Ethiopia has been a severely indebted country and continues to be so even after the economicreforms in the 1990s.

It has been experiencing a steady increase in its debt/GDP ratio, whichbecame more than its GDP since 1992.

The Debt /exports ratio rose to more than 100 percent in the 1980s andremained at a very high level in the 1990s.

This has pushed the country into severe debt service difficulties. Despite rescheduling and other policy measures, the country has not been able tomeet its debt service obligations. Debt arrears have increased thereby increasing Ethiopia's debt burden. The evidence supports debt over- hanghypothesis for Ethiopia as the country is on the wrong side of the debt Laffer curve. The model used by the study indicates negative and non- linear relation between debt and growth.

The evidence also shows that fiscal balance, investments, and openness have influenced economic growth negatively (the exception being agriculture). These results support the cases for more debt relief and fiscal consolidation and efficient investment utilizations for Ethiopia.

However, the evidence provided by the model needs to be strengthened by including other growth determining fundamentals such as political instability, policy framework, governance and on the external front, termsof trade, etc. This demands comparable and consistent long period data sets, which are a major problem in Ethiopia.

ETHIOPIA: Conflict in Gambella reignites'

ESAT News (September 21, 2014) The conflict that had calmed for a few days in the Gambella region of Ethiopia had reignited since September 18,2014, ESAT's sources reported from the Region. Gatluak Tut, the RegionalPresident, told Radio Fana, the voice of the ruling Front, that 13 people have been killed due to the “plot of rent seekers and land dealers, who tried to divide the people that lived together for centuries.” He also said similar clashes had broken out in other small districts of the region leadingto the deaths of an unknown number of people.

Gatluak gave no details of the “land dealers”; however ESAT had reportedthat the main cause of the conflict was the land grab by retired Defense officials of the Tigrean Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF), who displaced the local residents. Although the President said the conflict had diminished and displaced people have started returning to their homes, ESAT has learnt that the conflict has restarted in small districts and towns of the region; many people have also died. Two investors from Tepi area have reportedly been killed on September 18, 2014 and many people are still inhiding in forests.

The residents of the Region say the total number of the dead is over one hundred, ESAT has not verified the report from independent sources. The government had recently arrested the Region’s Security Head. Nyikaw Ochalla, Director of the Anywaa Survival Organization, said the government causes inter-ethnic conflicts whenever elections approach andhas blamed the government for instigating the conflict. The Director said the Ethiopian government’s land grab policy has also contributed to the conflict. The residents of the Region do not believe the conflict could be settled effortlessly.

Al-Amoudi to Spend $500 Million on Ethiopia Coffee, Horticulture’BLOOBERG News Analysis (September 22, 2014)

By William Davison - Horizon Plantations Ethiopia Plc, majority-owned by Saudi billionaire Mohamed al-Amoudi, plans to almost double annual revenue within three years by investing at least $500 million in coffee andorange projects. The agriculture company will train workers, improveroads and replace washing units at the Limmu and Bebeka coffee plantations, which together have over 18,000 hectares (44,479 acres) under coffee, General Operations Director Kemal Mohammed said in a Sept. 17 interview in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia’s capital. The development is part of a five-year program to invest in projects that also include Upper Awash Agro-Industry Enterprise, the country’s largest orange grower with1,200 hectares of citrus, he said. “We are sure because of the initiatives we have now, because of the inputs and techniques we’re applying, the productivity will increase to the maximum at the end of the five years,” Kemal said.

Ethiopia, Africa’s biggest coffee producer, may see earnings from shipments of Arabica coffee rise 25 percent to about $900 million in 2014-2015 as prices rise because of shortage caused by a drought in Brazil, an exporters’ association said last month. Horizon bought the two coffee farms for 1.6 billion birr ($80 million) last year from the Ethiopian government, which is seeking investment in projects that process agricultural products.

Horizon has a sales target of 500 million Ethiopian birr by 2017, Kemal said. The company also produces organic fruit and vegetables. Bebeka, in southwest Ethiopia, is the world’s biggest unfragmented coffee estate with10,030 hectares under plantation, according to the company’s website. It was established in 1975 when the former socialist government nationalized land and also produces black pepper, cinnamon, cardamom, ginger and turmeric. Limmu, 350 kilometers (218 miles) southwest of Addis Ababa in the Oromia region, has 8,000 hectares under coffee and produces 5,000 tons a year of the beans. Foreign Investor Al-Amoudi, born in Ethiopia in 1946 to an Ethiopian mother and Saudi father, is one ofthe country's largest foreign investors and operates its biggest cement factory and only large-scale gold mine. He also runs construction and oil operations in Saudi Arabia, Sweden and Morocco and is the 143rd richest person in the world with a net worth of $8.6 billion, according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index.

Investment in Limmu may help double production to about 1.5 tons a hectare by 2018, Kemal said. Bebeka Coffee Estate doubled production toabout 1.4 tons of coffee last year, according to Kemal. Around 90 percentof the company's coffee last year was directly sold to buyers in countries including the U.S., Germany, South Korea and Japan, Kemal said.

Horizon, which is part of al-Amoudi's Midroc group of companies, is looking for a foreign partner to invest in the Coffee Processing and Warehouse Enterprise on the outskirts of the capital. The plant was bought from the government last year for 228 million birr, Kemal said. Ethiopian Airlines Announces Order for 20 737 MAX 8s'

The order is the largest single Boeing order by number of airplanes froman African carrier.

AVIATION NEWS (September 23, 2014) WASHINGTON - Ethiopian Airlineshas agreed to buy 20 Boeing 737 aircraft in a deal worth $2.1 billion, the largest single order from the US aviation giant by an African carrier. A statement said the deal also includes options and purchase rights for a further 15 of the fuel-efficient 737 MAX 8s. Tewolde Gebremariam, CEO ofEthiopian Airlines said: "Today's order underlines our commitment to our 15-year strategic plan, 'Vision 2025', in which Ethiopian will strive to become the leading airline group in Africa carrying 18 million passengers per annum. The 737 MAX will form a key component of that strategic vision, enhancing our single-aisle fleet and keeping us at the forefront of African aviation." "This historic order for Boeing and our partner Ethiopianonce again positions the carrier at the heart of African aerospace innovation with the acquisition of the 737 MAX," said Van Rex Gallard, Boeing vice president of sales for Latin America, Africa and the Caribbean.The 737 MAX, the fourth generation of Boeing's popular 737, is expected to be 14 percent more fuel-efficient than its predecessors, the company said. Nearly 2,300 of the aircraft are are on order from 47 customers.

PROTEST: Admins row kills many in Gonder'

ESAT News (September 23, 2014) In a meeting held on the issues of land,development and good governance with senior officials of the Abraha Jira Woreda and residents in the Western Armachiho area of Gonder, North Western Ethiopia the residents were heard voicing their complaints and anger against the local administrators.

They said that the officials of the Woreda get many innocent people killed due to their own internal tiffs and have been accumulating wealth. They said all the officials at levels have now stopped caring and working for their country. The residents also explained the deep rooted nepotism in the districts. One of the participants of the meeting said the main reason that the people hate the ruling Front, EPRDF is that it has leaders that lackthe skills and are also people who believe in getting people convicted, arrested and killed. The residents have also stated that the lands of the town are being given away to investors through corrupt methods. Similarly, although there is alarge arable land in the area, the local officials ignore the over 400 peoplesuffering due to lack of land to farm as a result of which some people hadto turn to violence to the extent of hitting the vehicle of the Woreda administrator. The official of the Woreda admitted the problems and complaints raised were true and alleged that the main cause was “the actof rent seeking officials of the Woreda.” The residents say although the officials admit the problems, no measure has been taken so far. Egypt, Sudan, Ethiopian water ministers visit renaissance dam, the first byEgyptian official'

(Ahram Online September 24, 2014) Egypt’s irrigation minister has stressed that his visit to Ethiopia’s Grand Renaissance Dam doesn’t mean that Egypt agrees with the ongoing project, Al-Ahram’s Arabic news website reported. Hossam Moghazy had a tour with his Ethiopian and Sudanese counterparts at the site of the dam on Monday, the first by an Egyptian official since construction began in April 2011. The dam has beena source of concern for the Egyptian government, which fears the downstream project will affect its access to the Nile, its main source of potable water.

Meanwhile, Moghazy confirmed that Sudan, Ethiopia and Egypt have accepted the terms of an international consultancy team to conduct two studies on the dam’s potential impact. He confirmed that Ethiopia gave Egypt five previously requested studies on the dam. The next meeting for the tripartite committee will take place in Cairo on 21-22 October, he said.

High school students included in the political training’

ESAT News (September 25, 2014) - After the Ethiopian government trained Ethiopian university students on its political ideologies, Revolutionary Democracy, it has now started forcing secondary school students across the country to sign up for the same training. In some areas, students that had information about the planned training have already refused to sign up although local government officials are forcing teachers to entice the students. After the teachers’ training was completedwith no success, the number of students that showed up for the so called training on “peace and the educational system” was smaller than expected, a teacher told ESAT. Schools were set to open on August 25, 2014, however due to the political training, class has not yet begun.

Angered teachers are also leaving their jobs. Negere Ethiopia Newspaperreported yesterday that some students have been heard saying “We are under 18 years old, why do you keep on at us?”, “EPRDF will not be elected”; police was frightening them for “disturbing”. According to the plan by the Ministries of Education and Federal Affairs, all first year university students are to be given training from September 26, 2014 fortwo weeks before existing and senior students return to campus.

September 26, 2014: The president of the Ethiopian Football Federation (EFF) questions the impromptu decision by the Confederation of African Football to award Guinea hosting rights for the 2023 African Cup, seemingly without a proper bidding process. (AP) ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia

Side note: Junedin Basha told The Associated Press on Friday there was nothing on CAF's agenda for its executive committee meeting last weekend relating to choosing the host for 2023. "We don't know what CAF's consideration was when it selected a host nation for 2023," Junedin said. There was also no reason for making such a "swift decision. CAF President Issa Hayatou announced Guinea as host on Saturday withoutgiving details of the process, saying the spontaneous decision was a display of "solidarity" with the Ebola-hit West African nation.

CAF wasn't scheduled to choose the 2023 tournament host at the meeting — which was meant to decide only the 2019 and 2021 winning bids — andit wasn't clear if any other countries were considered for 2023.

"CAF wanted to show solidarity with the people of Guinea in this hard time," Hayatou said as an explanation. Ethiopia was bidding to host the 2017 African Cup after Libya pulled out citing security concerns, but wastargeting 2023 should its 2017 attempt fail.

Cameroon was announced as 2019 host and Ivory Coast the 2021 host atthe end of the two-day executive committee meeting. CAF is meant to award African Cup hosting rights through a vote of its executive committee.

Guinea has never staged the African Cup, and is currently banned fromhosting games because of the outbreak of the deadly Ebola virus, whichhas killed nearly 3,000 people in West Africa. Guinea is one of the hardest-hit countries. (Text ends)

Shots fired outside Ethiopian Embassy in DC’By Maureen Umeh, FOX 5 Reporter & Anchor

WASHINGTON - Updates (September 30, 2014) Gunshots were fired during a protest Monday afternoon at the Ethiopian Embassy in Northwest

D.C. Witnesses say they heard up to four gunshots, and while some of theprotesters ran for safety, others did not budge. Much of the chaotic scenewas captured on camera by ESAT, an Ethiopian television network.

On the video, a man is seen clearly holding up a gun. At times, he is pointing it at several people who can be heard shouting things. They are calling him a coward, a liar, and then a shot is fired. But it doesn't seem to stop the crowd. It turns out the man with the gun is an Ethiopian national and security guard at the embassy. He was trying to keep protestors at bay. The protesters were there demonstrating against the government's practices. It is a frequent occurrence, but on this day, someof the protesters came onto embassy grounds and tried to storm the building. Witnesses say they even took down the flag. The guard fired shots. No one was hit or injured, but one of the bullets did hit a woman'scar parked on the street. It shattered her front window.

Mesfin Bezu is an Ethiopian journalist who has covered the protests at theembassy in the past. He says while he does not condone the shooting, hebelieves some of the protesters crossed the line and provoked the guard. “This guy, I heard several times he received several threats from the same people, so maybe when they approached him, he was scared for hislife and probably that's why he fired the shots,” he said. “But still to be honest with you, I would refrain from doing that.” The guard was questioned and detained by Secret Service. The investigation continues, but we are told no one was arrested. (Text ends)

Ethiopian Embassy gunman in custody after shooting at protesters’By Abebe Gellaw (September 30, 2014) (Addis Voice updates) - Dozens of peaceful protesters who descended on the Ethiopian Embassy, located in North West Washington D.C., to protestrecent massacres in Ogaden and Gambela regions were met with gunshotsin the embassy compound. U.S. Secret Service announced earlier today that it had detained a man in connection with the shooting incident.

Embassy insiders named the shooter as Solomon “Wodi Weyni”, who is said to be a security chief at the Ethiopian embassy with diplomatic status. The man is said to be a member of the Tigray People’s LiberationFront, the core of the ruling ethnic junta.

While Shimelis Terefe, a D.C-based activist, was trying to hoist the widelypopular Ethiopian flag that does not bear the emblem of the TPLF regime,Wodi Weyni started shooting without any warning. When the protesters confronted him and demanded him to put down his gun, he fired more shots threatening to kill them. According to the protesters, at least three shots were fired and a car parked nearby was hit by a bullet. One of the protesters, Yohaness Gurmu, described the scene as chaotic when the unarmed protesters boldly confronted the security chief. “The man continued brandishing his gun and shooting towards us. But we did not disperse in fear even if he was threatening to kill us.”

Ambassador Girma Birru and a few embassy staff members reportedly came rushing and took the shooter inside the embassy building. But U.S. Secret Service agents and the police reportedly arrived on the scene within a few minutes. State Departent officials were also said to be on scene to investigate the incident. Inside the lobby, the activists, who wereholding pictures of jailed journalists and bloggers, repeatedly chanted “freedom!freedom!freedom.” U.S. Secret Service spokesman Brian Leary said in a statement emailed to reporters that the agency investigated a report of shots fired around 12:15 p.m. Monday. They detained a man believed to be the shooter,” he said. The embassy, which was temporarilysealed off by the police, did not answer repeated phone calls. (Text ends)

Ethiopia military power ranked 3rd in Africa, 40th in the world’

According to GlobalFirepower.com, Ethiopia military is ranked 3rd inAfrica, 40th in the world.

See below World Top 50 and Africa’s Top 15. In Africa Egypt is numberone.

Ethiopia’s Military in Numbers

The values showcased below are all considered for the final GFP ranking recognized as the “Power Index” (abbrv: “PwrIndx”). PwrIndx scores are judged on a perfect value of “0.0000” which is realistically unattainable due to the number of factors considered per country. Bonuses and penalties are added to each nation (as needed) while landlocked countries(ex: Austria) are not penalized for lack of a standing navy. A total of 106 countries make up the GFP ranked list.

Ethiopian Embassy gunman triggers diplomatic row'
By Abebe Gellaw (October 2, 2014) It emerged that the case of theEthiopian Embassy gunman, Solomon "Wedi Weyni", has caused a diplomatic row between the TPLF regime and the United States.
The U.S. Secret Service had announced on Monday that the embassy gunman was in custody. According to Ethiopian Embassy sources, embassy officials immediately complained that the gunman's diplomatic immunity, as per the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, was violated. The gunman was freed later in the day after facing grilling by U.S. Secret Service. Established in 1865, the federal agency is mandatedto protect the U.S. President, Vice President and visiting foreign leaders and dignitaries. The elite force also conducts criminal investigations.

In the aftermath of the shooting incident, Brian Leary, spokesman of U.S.Secret Service, issued the following statement to members of the media:
“At approximately 1215 pm today, U.S. Secret Service Uniformed Divisionreceived information of possible shots fired in the vicinity of the EthiopianEmbassy, 3506 International Drive NW, Washington, D.C.Secret Service Uniformed Division Officers immediately responded and detained an individual believed to be the shooter. There have been no reported injuries as a result of this incident.MPD, State Department, and USSS Uniformed Division are on scene.”
Nicole Mainor of the U.S. Secret Service told this reporter that further information on this matter should be obtained from the State Department.She referred any questions related to the case to the State Department and declined to give further details.
In a brief statement, State Department spokesperson, Jen Psaki, said thatthe Department of State took the incident involving the use of firearm very seriously. “The Department is in contact with the Embassy of Ethiopiaand the U.S. Secret Service," she noted.
The investigation into the criminal incident is ongoing. The State Department is in talks with the Ethiopian Embassy on the fate of Wedi Weyni, who is likely to face either prosecution or deportation because of the criminal nature of the incident. The department is expected to givefurther updates in the next few days.
Wodi Woyni, a member of the ruling ethnic junta, the Tigray People’s Liberation Front, was captured on video while dramatically brandishing agun and shooting at peaceful and unarmed protesters.
The protesters said that they went to the embassy to protest recent masskillings in the Ogaden and Gambella regions as well as the detention of a number of journalists, bloggers and activists who have faced trumped-upterrorism charges. (Text ends)
Magma Blob Beneath Afar Rift In Ethiopia Puzzles Scientists'New Sciences: By Becky Oskin – (Updated October 2, 2014)
The Afar Rift in eastern Ethiopia is marked by enormous gashes that signal the breakup of the African continent and the beginnings of a new ocean basin, scientists think. The fractures appear eerily similar to seafloor spreading centers, the volcanic ridges that mark the boundariesbetween two pieces of oceanic crust. Along the ridges, lava bubbles up and new crust is created, slowly widening the ocean basin.
But a look deep beneath the Afar Rift reveals the birth announcements may be premature. “It’s not as close to fully formed seafloor spreading aswe thought,” said Kathy Whaler, a geophysicist at the University of Edinburgh in Scotland. Whaler and her colleagues have spotted 120 cubicmiles (500 cubic kilometers) of magma sitting in the mantle under the Afar Rift. Hot liquids like magma like to rise, so the discovery is a conundrum. “We didn’t expect this, because magma wants to pop up like a cork in water; it’s too buoyant compared to the surrounding medium in the mantle,” Whaler told LiveScience’s OurAmazingPlanet

The Afar Rift in Ethiopia is marked by enormous gashes that signal the breakup of the African continent and the beginnings of a new ocean basin,scientists think. The fractures appear eerily similar to seafloor spreading centers, the volcanic ridges that mark the boundaries between two piecesof oceanic crust. Along the ridges, lava bubbles up and new crust is created, slowly widening the ocean basin. But a look deep beneath the Afar Rift reveals the birth announcements may be premature. "It's not as close to fully formed seafloor spreading as we thought," said Kathy Whaler, a geophysicist at the University of Edinburgh in Scotland. Whaler and her colleagues have spotted 120 cubic miles (500 cubic kilometers) ofmagma sitting in the mantle under the Afar Rift. Hot liquids like magma like to rise, so the discovery is a conundrum. "We didn't expect this, because magma wants to pop up like a cork in water; it's too buoyant compared to the surrounding medium in the mantle," Whaler told LiveScience's OurAmazingPlanet.

Models predict that at spreading ridges, magma should sit just under the rifts, in the crust. That's what geoscientists see in the oceans, at places like the Mid-Atlantic Ridge and the Juan de Fuca Ridge. But not only is thegiant pool at Afar extremely deep, but it is also mostly below the sleepingBadi volcano, many miles west of the scene of a 2005 series of underground magma intrusions, Whaler said. "You just wouldn't expect tohave a blob of magma still underneath this other area," Whaler said. "It's one of the things we're still having a lot of discussions about." The findings, published Sept. 5 in the journal Nature Geoscience, add a new twist to the Afar Rift puzzle. Thanks to intense international attention — from scientists intrigued by the 2005 intrusions — the region is one of thebest-studied spreading centers in the world. But a lively debate continuesover whether the Afar Rift is a unique case or a textbook example of a fracturing continent.

Triple threat

The Afar region sits at the junction of three tectonic plates, all of which are spreading apart. Here, Earth's brittle crust fractures as the plates tearaway from one another, but the mantle underneath adjusts by stretching like warm plastic. The mantle rocks rising beneath the thinning crust meltfrom lowered pressure, creating magma.

In 2005, a series of earthquakes in Dabbahu, Ethiopia, announced the arrival of new magma squeezing into the crust. Vertical fingers of molten rock shot into underground fractures, 14 in all. The longest intrusion was about 26 feet (8 meters) wide and spread through 37 miles (60 km) of crust in just 10 days. Whaler and her colleagues searched for the source of these vertical injections, called dikes, with instruments that measure changes in magnetic and electric fields in the Earth. Both are sensitive to underground liquids, which have a higher electrical conductivity than rock(meaning electrons have an easier time moving through them). The teamdiscovered the feeder for the magma intrusions: a shallow, small chamberdirectly under the dikes, about 4 miles (7 km) wide and 3 to 6 miles (5 to10 km) below the surface.

Rare reservoir

But in the mantle, the layer beneath Earth's crust, a huge 18-mile-wide (30 km) region of very high conductivity reaches down to a depth of 20 miles (35 km), well below the 12-mile-thick (20 km) crust. This giant magma zone isn't one big pool, but a series of interconnected pockets, scientists think. The findings were bolstered by research in geochemistry,rock composition and seismology from other teams, Whaler said. "The results from standard electrical conductivity get a huge range, so the additional information gives additional bounds. I suspect nobody would have believed us without some supporting evidence from other techniques." For example, a study published in the journal Nature on July 4 shows the mantle under the Afar region is about 212 degrees Fahrenheit(100 degrees Celsius) hotter than it should be. And although the crust is thinner than in other spots around the planet, it is actually thicker than models predict.

Questions remain

Taken together, the recent discoveries suggest researchers still don't understand how the final stages of breakup occur in continental crust, Whaler said. "Most people have said we can look at the Afar Rift and it's agood on-land analogue of midocean ridges," she said. "But what this result says is, there is still quite a distinct difference between the crust and upper mantle beneath a fully formed spreading ridge and the Afar Rift."

For Roger Buck, a geophysicist at Columbia University's Lamont-Doherty Earth Observatory who was not involved in the study, the discovery raisesquestions about what controls the timing of magmatic activity such as dike intrusions. "A commonly held view is that long, quiet periods occur because there is no magma available in the crust to trigger dike opening and volcanism at spreading centers," Buck wrote in an accompanying editorial published in Nature Geoscience. "However, the results ... bring into question this standard view. Instead, there may always be large quantities of magma available in the mantle and shallow crust at many spreading centers." Samora’s dauphin in the long grass -ION

(October 3, 2014) Army General Abebaw Tadesse will not take over fromSamora Yunus as general chief of staff of the Ethiopian army. He is sidelined and will soon leave the army.

After the May 2015 general election, a new general chief of staff should beappointed to head the Ethiopian army to replace General Mohamed-Nur Yunus, aka Samora, who is ailing and about to retire. Given his position inthe military hierarchy, General Abebaw Tadesse, one of the last Amhara senior officers still in place, looked the likely successor. However, Abebaw Tadesse is about to leave active service, which should open the door to the race for the successor of General Yunus. Abebaw Tadesse was promoted to his current rank in 2007, at the same time as Samora. He was recently appointed to the head of the Joint Operations Main Department in the defense ministry. However, his health problems and hisdisagreement with Samora Yunus have obliged him to play a less active role and he has exercised this function very little. For a while now, he has been preparing his future. He has even reportedly considered leaving the country after selling part of his assets, including the Alwaq Hotel at Bahar Dar.

Abebaw Tadesse began to lose his influence a few months ago, when Samora Yunus sacked him as the head of Central Command, at the sametime as three other high-ranking officers including General Tadesse Werede, Armed Forces Head of Training, who until his recent arrest was also a potential pretender for Samora's position. Consequently, General Yohannes Gebre Meskel, a loyal member of the Tigray People's LiberationFront (TPLF, ruling coalition) is the candidate who wins out from all this recent upheaval.

Ethiopia blames Eritrea for disturbance at embassy in US'

By Tesfa-Alem Tekle SUDAN TRIBUNE, ADDIS ABABA (October 3, 2014) –The Ethiopian government has pointed its finger at arch enemy Eritrea and Ethiopian opposition groups over a disturbance that took place at the Ethiopian embassy in Washington. Ethiopia's ambassador to the US, Girma Biru, said around 15 people had been involved in the incident, which occurred at the embassy on Monday. "They first went to the consular service office and rudely demanded to speak to the ambassador. And when the officer told them that they needed an appointment, they insulted him and went out and tried to take down the Ethiopian flag," he said.

US security forces subsequently took members of the group into custody after they refused to leave peacefully. The culprits were detained for an hour, with authorities recording their names and addresses, before they were released. According to the ambassador, no legal demonstration had been planned on the day in question and group members are known to USauthorities.

He further went onto saying that the culprits were mercenaries of Eritrea and Ethiopia opposition groups who are reportedly upset by the successfuloutcome of recent discussion between the leaders of Ethiopia and the United States on boosting cooperation in the areas of trade, peacekeepingand fighting terrorism.

"The individuals are lackeys of few political parties and Shaebia (Eritrea) who use cheap and nasty language to insult Ethiopian government officials that come to the country for business," he said. The ambassador said the attack was as a "desperate act" in responseto the growing relationship between the two countries.

South Sudan To Support Ethiopian Rebel Opposition'

Nyamilepedia (October 3, 2014) — An insider, from within the inner circle of South Sudan security organ, alleged that he, in a team supervised by Akol Koor, the Director of Internal Security Bureau, met Gen. Thokwaath Pal, the leader of the rebel group, Ethiopian Unity Patriotic Front (EUPF) inmid September 2014. The insider alleged that the main objective of the meeting was to seal a new deal that would strengthen the Ethiopian rebelsgroups to destabilize the SPLA rebels' main military training centers in Maiwut and Pagak at the eastern corridor of South Sudan – Ethiopia border. According to the insider, Gen.Thokwaath has been tasked to establish links with other rebel groups within Ethiopia to form a coalitionthat will fight for a regime change and destabilize South Sudan Peace Process in Bahir Dar.

According to the insider, director Akol Koor has issued One Million ($1,000,000) US Dollar to the Ethiopian Rebel groups to equip and set up their operation centers at South Sudan-Ethiopian border. The intelligence alleged that Juba has promised Gen. Thokwaath a sufficient financial and military supports. He said that military garrisons will be set up at the border to detach any military support from Ethiopian government to SouthSudan rebels. Gen. Thokwaath is also expected to cut any supply routs and recruitment from Gambela Refugees camps in Ethiopia to South Sudan. This would allegedly benefits the regime as it is expected to lure the Eastern Jikany to support South Sudan government. South Sudan government delegation, according to Michael Makuei Lueth's interview on BBC focus on Africa, has lost truth in TROIKA, Ethiopia and the Ethiopian Ambassador, Seyoum Mesfin, who leads South Sudan Peace Talks. Hon Makuei recently calls on IGAD to relocate the peace process to Kenya and change the chief mediator.

According to Michael Makuei Lueth, Ethiopia and TROIKA partners support regime change in South Sudan. Mr. Lueth fears that unless the mediation is relocated to Kenya and led by the Kenyan Envoy, General Lazarus Sumbeiyo, the peace process may never yield an agreement. Salva Kiir government allied with Ugandan and Sudanese rebels against the insurgents in Greater Upper Nile region. Four rebels' factions that are fighting for regime change in Sudan joined South Sudan civil war in December 2013. The Government of South Sudan signed military cooperation with Egypt amid allegations that Ethiopia support SPLA rebels,under the former vice president, Dr. Riek Machar Teny. The agreement has allegedly given Egypt a green light to set up a military base in South Sudan, a move that is expected to throw off Ethiopia's mega project, the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam. FACTS & STATS: TPLF's Ethnic Minority Monopoly of the ENDF in Ethiopia'
Total Domination of Ethnic-Tigrean officers in Ethiopian National DefenseForces (ENDF) as of October 6, 2014:
(A revisit after four years by Ginbot-7 Movement for Justice Freedom andDmocracy: best edited for "Alphabetic Africa"
The monopoly of key government decision making positions in Ethiopia byindividuals of one ethnic group, the TPLF led Tigrean elite, over the past twenty three years has never had precedence in Ethiopian history. This is even more an anomaly as the TPLF claims that it fought to champion ethnic equality in Ethiopia.
This monopoly of power is in staggering display particularly in the leadership of the armed forces of the country and the security agency. What is even more becoming increasingly disquieting is that even the small number of non Tigreans that were thrown in to show some semblance of ethnic mix is fast fading. Many Ethiopians today are not increasingly referring to the ruling political system in Ethiopia as an "ethnic apartheid" system without a good reason. When it comes to ethniccomposition, the only lookalikes in history to the Ethiopian military today are only the armies of colonial forces and states and organizations under systems of apartheid. With time, the TPLF has even stopped pretending that it is ruling over a multi ethnic country and continues to maintain an apartheid regime without even considering the serious consequences thatthis will bear on the country's future.
There is widespread discontent among the regular army as well as rank and file officers that is predominantly drawn from the large non Tigrean ethnicity some of whom are referring to themselves as becoming slaves toa Tigrean dominated system. For several years now there is widespread and simmering discontent with this domination but questions related to these issues are not normally raised or discussed in public. Routine evaluation sessions the TPLF refers to as the “gimgemma”, conducted at all levels periodically and supervised by Tigreans, are used to stamp out these criticisms of this dominance and monopoly. The TPLF would use oneof its several labels – such words as hate politician, terrorist, ethnic chauvinist, narrow nationalist etc., on any one who questions the system or as they often call it, “exhibits a tendency” to oppose the status quo.

Many have perished for raising these questions even in good faith. There have been several incidents of severe reprimands of individuals who raised these issues. Some members of the army who are now serving life in TPLF dungeons are those who raised such questions of the need to diversify the leadership. Many did raise the question in good faith and sensing the discontent in the rank and file. Some among the few high ranking non Tigrean officers have left the country and cited this slave like relations to even less qualified Tigreans superiors as their reasons for theirleaving. Desertions by members of the regular army for this same reason are numerous and often remain unreported. Those who get the chance to tell their stories often speak of the indignity they underwent while in the army.

During the first few years of their rule, TPLF officials, including Meles Zenawi, tried to justify this monopoly of power by the dominance in termsof number and organization of the TPLF fighting force during the fighting to topple the Military dictatorship of Mengistu Hailemariam. The promise they often made was that the force will be ethnically diversified with time.Now nearly a quarter of a century later, what we see is a more intensifiedand ethnically purified monopoly of power. Merit and competence are forgone in favor of ethnicity so much that a good number of those in leadership positions have limited formal or technical education as compared to many of their subordinates.

Throughout the social and economic system, including the economy and key operations of government, we are witnessing an increasing dominanceof the Tigrean elite. The existence of a government within the governmentthat is exclusively lead by ethnic Tigreans composed mostly of the leaders of the armed forces and the mafia like security gang is now an open secretamong Ethiopians. Even the very few non Tigreans that are in leadership positions complain that they have only become conduits though which decisions made by the TPLF cabal are announced and implemented. Theseinclude people like Hailemariam Desalegn, who holds the nominal position of Prime Minister. This staggering level of monopoly over national militarypower and intuitions is however displayed more blatantly in the composition of the leadership of the armed forces than probably elsewhere in the civilian administrative force. For Instance, Figure-1 shows that among the total of 64 highest military ranks in four departments and commands, 49 of them are Tigrians, two Agews and onefrom Mixed tribe, while the remaining number of Ormos, Amharas, and SNNPR are eight, four, and zero, respectively. Furthermore, the Military Affairs Team of Ginbot 7 has meticulously surveyed numerous divisions, regional commands, training academies and the defense headquarters in Addis Ababa and around the country; as a result it developed a detailed list of military leaders based on the most recent date gathered. (See Annex-1:Table-1 &2). According to this survey, the existing military governance system is highly skewed to one minority ethnic group, TPLF Tigrians. In general, the survey indicates that the system being followed by the current TPLF government is comparable to the old colonial and apartheid military organization systems, which now have become relics ofhistory. Gov’t will take appropriate measures against Eritrea, oppositions:President

ESAT News (October 6, 2014) During the opening session of the Ethiopianparliament and the House of Federation today in Addis Abeba, Ethiopian President Dr. Mulatu Teshome, has said that the “Ethiopian government will take an appropriate measure against any aggression from the Eritreangovernment like it did last year.” Mulatu said that the government had defended attacks by rebel groups that are armed by the Eritrean government such as Ginbot 7, ONLF and OLF. He said similar measures would also be taken this year. Observers say it is hypocritical that the government on the one hand states that Ethiopian oppositions are not strong enough while at the same time saying that it has defended attacks from oppositions and promises to take more actions in the New Year.

Mulatu said the government had repeatedly called on the Eritrean government for talks.Meanwhile, the Federal Supreme Court 14th CriminalBench had ordered three Ethiopians that have been accused of working forthe Eritrean regime to defend. Negasi Berhane Shumay, Tebeje Berhe andBlutse Gebretsadkan of the Gulemedi Woreda, Eastern Zone of Tigary have been charged with passing information to Eritrea about the Ethiopianforce stationed in the Zalanbesa Front. The individuals have been given training and money by the Eritrean government, the Court heard.

Ethiopia introduced new tax on Khat to discourage local consumption andboost export revenue’

(The Reporter Ethiopia) Khat gains more emphasis in Ethiopian export sector. The enforcement of the new excise tax proclamation on the widelyconsumed mild-narcotic, khat, is expected to discourage local consumption and boost export revenue from the commodity in this fiscal year. Part of the strategy to boost export of agricultural commodities for the budget year is following a different approach with khat which was never encouraged or discouraged in the past. But, the commodity has been incremental in fetching export revenue. For instance, last year Ethiopia raked USD 297 million from this commodity improving up on theUSD 271 million it brought the year before.

Following the failure of the major agricultural export commodity in Ethiopia – Coffee – last year and the year before that, which recorded USD 718 and 746 million in these two periods, this year the government’sstrategy seems to be shifting to look into commodities like khat and oil seeds. Oil seeds on its part is a big part of the new target set for agricultural commodities. Oil seeds is expected to improve to USD 724 million from USD 642 million it was able to bring in the last year.

Furthermore, the government has announced plans to improve tradingsystems in eastern khat growing regions of the country.

The promising stability in neighboring Somalia was seen as a positive condition for promoting khat in the current fiscal year. The strategic plan to expand khat in Somalia and other neighboring countries would also help the export become more competitive with potential suppliers in the region, the plan detailed. Khat is one of the widely used stimulants acrossEastern Africa often labeled as a “mild-narcotics”.

As the government seeks more foreign currency from agricultural producethe coming year commodities such as coffee, sesame, and oil seeds, khatare still dominant export commodities bringing in a significant amount of foreign currency to the country. Planning to get USD 2.5 billion from the agriculture products in the current fiscal year, the government looks to befirm on increasing quantity as well as quality of exports commodities thatEthiopia offers to the international market. As a result, coffee export is expected to jump to 235,950 metric ton and fetch USD 862.5 million in time under consideration.

Timber has also become a successful export item since some years back, and this year as well the export for timber is expected to be 20,383 metricton and earn USD 2.5 million. In addition, the government is also looking into live animal exports sector to which is expected to earn some USD

222.2 million in the period. It is to be remembered that, last year, the total expected revenue from the agricultural export sector was about USD

2.1 billion, part of which were not realized since coffee – the major agricultural export commodity in Ethiopia – was going through a toughtime. (Text ends)

DEBATE: Eritrea vs Crimea in Ethiopia-Russia term’RADIO SBS DISCUSSION (October 9, 2014)

Human rights activist Aklilu Wondaferew argues that parallels could be drawn between Eritrea and Crimea which in the case of the latter, havingstayed with Ukraine for decades, recently voted to return to its roots, Russia. Aklilu adds that Kunama, Afar, Akaleguzai, and even Hamassien have very strong sense of Ethiopianness. If given a chance, they may return back to their roots as Ethiopians. Aklilu says the 1993 referendum was a fake, hastily prepared one in favor of secession. Though some timehas elapsed since Eritrea broke away from Ethiopia, Aklilu adds, I believethe sense of Ethiopianness among Eritreans is strong, and this could pavethe way for Eritrea-Ethiopia unification.

Abraha Belay disagrees: To begin with, Abraha says, most of Crimea'sinhabitants are Russian. Even though Crimea has been part of Ukrainesince 1950s, the people have been proud of their Russian heritage. Crimea's Sevastopol is home to Russia's biggest naval force, the Black SeaFleet. It is a symbol of Russian sea power and hence a pride for young Russian descendants in Crimea. In the case of present-day Eritrea, the situation is sadly quite different. Due to hostile propaganda Eritrean political groups conducted for generations against Ethiopia, young Eritreans see Ethiopia not as their motherland but as a neighboring country at best, or as an enemy at worst. What is crucial for Ethiopians is to forge unity, remove the vestigial mercenary group that Meles Zenawi left in power, and get Ethiopia into the hand of an Ethiopian group. A referndum on Red Sea Afars would reverse the annexation that the two Eritrean groups - Meles and Isaias - committed in the 1993 "referendum".When Ethiopia legally reclaims her Red Sea coast, goes maritime and emerges as a mighty economy and military power, not only Eritrea but other small states in the region my dream a healthy dream to return to the Ethiopian fold and get a slice of the pie. (Text ends)

TRIBAL CLASH: Scores die in Southern Ethiopia due to a conflict betweenMezhenger and ‘highlanders’

ESAT News (October 10, 2014) Although the Ethiopian Defense struggledto quell the conflict between the Mezhenger communities and the commonly known “highlanders” that has killed so many people in Southern Ethiopia last month, the conflict has now spread to the Gurafarda Woreda area where at least 20 people have so far been killed and many have fled the area.

Sources have said to ESAT that women and children have fled the regionand a contingent of the Defense Force has started moving to the conflictregion due to the escalation of the conflict in the past three days alone. Residents fear the conflict may spread to other towns. Although some ofthe internally displaced people had been returning to the area since the conflict started early September 2014, they say they still fear for their safety.

ESAT has received graphic photo and video evidences that show savagelykilled children, mothers and elders in the region. ESAT has decided not tobroadcast them due to its editorial policy. Although the government’s ethnic centred policy is the main cause of the conflict, sources that follow the issue closely say the land grab in the region has triggered the conflict.ESAT has just learnt a little after entering studio that the conflict has “terrifyingly intensified.” (Text ends)

Ethiopia says US embassy intruders must be charged’

By Associated Press (October 10, 2014) ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia

Ethiopia's government said it hopes U.S. authorities will prosecute protesters who tried to take down the national flag on the grounds of itsembassy in Washington.

A security attache at the embassy, who has since returned home, fired agun during the Sept. 29 incident, which has renewed tensions between Ethiopia's government and dissident groups. Dina Mufti, a spokesman for Ethiopia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, told Ethiopian state television late Thursday that the protesters have ties with Eritrea and the Somali Islamicextremist group al-Shabab.

He said the U.S. government is expected to protect the integrity of theembassy and to charge the "intruders," who chanted anti-government slogans as they tried to take down the flag of Ethiopia. But on Oct. 2, a U.S. State Department spokeswoman in Washington indicated that authorities were instead looking to investigate the shooting incident, which reportedly caused no injuries. "In this case, we requested a waiver of (diplomatic) immunity to permit prosecution of the individual involved in that incident. The request was declined and the individual involved hasnow left the country," State Department spokeswoman Jen Psaki said onOct. 2.

William Miller, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia, said Friday that the office has "no comment on the statements or reports" and that "no other charges have been filed in the incident." Critics of Ethiopia's government say it is intolerant of political dissent. Human Rights Watch says Ethiopia's government has "clamped down heavily" on protests, arbitrarily detaining and beating protesters. Head of the opposition Blue Party Yilkal Getnet said Ethiopia's governmentroutinely characterizes protesters as criminals, adding that opposition groups back home have been similarly treated.

The Greatest Threat, “the next elections in May-2015″

Expert Analysis By Ahmed Soliman, a researcher with the AfricaProgramme at the Chatham House think tank

London (HAN) (October 13, 2014) is, in London.

In Ethiopia, Since 2000 has registered some of the greatest gains in human development seen anywhere on the planet. It is one of Africa’s fastest-growing economies, with near double-digit GDP growth over thepast decade and large-scale infrastructural development..

Ethiopia’s geostrategic significance is built on a base of relative stability ina volatile region, enabling it to foster international partnerships on development and regional security. But its largely rural population remains poor, and images of drought, famine, poverty and war from the 1970s and 1980s have endured in the popular imagination around the world. The population has grown by more than a quarter since 2001; the UN says Ethiopia will be one of the world’s 10 most populous countries by2050. This population pressure drives Addis Ababa’s “pro-poor” vision for national development.

“The famine that hit the Horn of Africa in 2011 was a stark reminder thatEthiopia is still vulnerable to food insecurity. The ruling Ethiopian People’s RevolutionaryDemocratic Front, in power since 1991, is acutely aware of the need to prevent massstarvation; it has institutionalised an early- warning system to reduce future risks.”

In a country that likes to be known as a “democratic developmental state”, significant obstacles remain as central government keeps a grip onpolitical and social freedoms. The death of Meles Zenawi, a visionary leader, in 2012 took Ethiopia into unknown territory. With no clear replacement, succession was a key issue in this federated country, where citizenship, politics and identity are based on ethnic representation. The new prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, is from a minority group; he is an acceptable compromise for the historically dominant and larger Tigray, Amhara and Oromo communities.

“The next elections, due in 2015, will likely see another win for the rulingparty, but Ethiopia’s western partners will be hoping for some opening up of a political spacethat has constricted since 2005. Restrictions on the media and NGOs come under the guise ofprotecting national security. A splintered opposition provides no alternative vision.”

The government keeps a strong hand on the economy, with banking, telecommunications, power and shipping all tightly regulated. Ethiopiastands alone in Africa in terms of tapping into its vast green-energy potential. The focus is the country's hydroelectric potential, but wind, solar and geothermal energy is also being harnessed.

In 2010 Ethiopia provided electricity to fewer than a quarter of its citizens,and blackouts and intermittent power were the norm. More than tripling energy capacity by 2017 should provide electricity across 75 per cent of the country. This is a huge leap: more supply will boost social development and increase job creation and trade, especially in rural areas.Equally impressive are plans for Ethiopia to become the top electricity supplier in Africa. It already exports power to Djibouti, Kenya and Sudan; linking to other grids will boost regional infrastructure and transport.

But Ethiopia will also have to be aware of the negative impact of its plans.The construction of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, on the Blue Nile, is potentially combustible politically, as Egypt sees any reduction to its current flow of water as a threat to its national security. Perhaps the greatest threat to Ethiopia comes from within, as the government seeks to implement national-development initiatives in peripheral areas that bring it into conflict with its own people. An increasingly educated and diverse population will also make greater demands for political representation andthe equitable distribution of goods and services. The government must translate growth into higher living standards for its citizens.

Ethiomedia (October 13, 2014) SEATTLE

Police on Monday arrested Temesgen Desalegn, a prominent journalist whose publications he edited and published were shut down by the government one after the other. Temesgen, known as a fiery critic of the government in Addis, was editor of Addis Times magazine, which the government shut down recently. Prior to that, he was editor of Feteh, a popular weekly which the government also banned in 2012. Written in Amharic, his articles also appeared weekly on Ethiomedia, much to the satisfaction of the Ethiopian diaspora that has little or no access of news and information from the tightly-controlled country in the Horn of Africa.

Temesgen spent the last two years in court, defending himself against 114charges, including allegedly "a call for the overthrow the constitutional order by violence," "defaming the government," and "stirring public thoughts for an anti-government uprising ." The charges carry sentences from three to up to 17 years in prison. Temesgen faces sentencing on October 27. Following the arrest of the Pen-Award-winning journalist Eskinder Nega in September 2011, Temesgen emerged as as a journalist known for his razor-sharp commentaries. He was the lone voice of the people for writing against the high handedness of the government of Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn. His writings ranged from the attacks on press freedom to widespread corruption and the dangers of ethnic politics which the government fuels relentlessly.

In April this year, Ethiopia arrested six bloggers and three journalists known as Zone 9. The group was charged with ‘terrorism’, and deploying ‘encryption tools’ to conceal ‘sources.’ They still remain behind bars. Last August the government filed charges against five magazines, a newspaperand their publishers, for allegedly promoting “terrorism and radicalism.” Most of the editors and journalists have since fled the country for fear of arrest. The Story of Ethiopian Armenians’- In The Company of Emperors’By Ani Aslanian, The Armenite (October 19, 2014)

Addis Ababa is the capital of Ethiopia and the seat of the African Union. Taking a stroll through the capital today, you may be entirely unaware ofthe extensive Armenian presence in the city during the modernization period of Ethiopia. Although Armenians and Ethiopians share a long history as members of the same branch of Orthodox Christianity, there isa lesser-known story regarding the contributions of Armenians in Addis Ababa and how they transformed a newly born agricultural town into a thriving capital of culture and commerce.

During the early 1900s, under the rule of Emperor Menelik II, there wereapproximately 50 Armenians in Addis Ababa. But the size of the community would soon grow tremendously and flourish with the turn of the century under Haile Selassie’s rule. Known by his official name, TafariMakonnen Woldemikael, Haile Selassie was Ethiopia’s head of state from 1916 to 1930 and Emperor from 1930 to 1974. His life and legacy carry afundamental role in African and Ethiopian history as well as in the Rastafari movement. In the case of the latter, he is considered a messianic and holy figure. In fact, the African-Jamaican spiritual ideologyknown as Rastafari gets its name from the imperial title of “Ras,” and Tafari — Selassie’s first name.

After becoming the regent and de facto ruler of Ethiopia in 1916, Selassie began to gradually modernize Ethiopia, beginning with the capital, Addis Ababa. He started by having Ethiopia admitted to the League of Nations in1923 and his diplomatic trips in the following years aimed to solidify stableconnections outside of Ethiopia. The first of these diplomatic visits was in 1924, when Selassie went on a trip to Europe and the Middle East in the hopes of establishing allies in Europe. But it was in the heart of the MiddleEast — in Jerusalem — that Selassie would soon become acquainted with the 40 Armenian orphans who would ultimately become the forerunners inthe modernization of mainstream music in Ethiopia. As Selassie toured Jerusalem, he visited the Armenian Quarter and marveled at the St. James Armenian Apostolic Church (Surb Hakobyants Vank.’) Selassie himself was a devout member of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and henoted the striking similarities between the two churches, as well as the likeness in written script.

More significantly, however, it was on this day, as he was walking throughthe Armenian Quarter of Jerusalem, that Selassie observed a marching band composed of 40 young Armenian men; he was deeply moved by the band’s musical talent. After concluding his tour of the Armenian Church and district, Selassie had a conversation with Patriarch Turyan and learnedthat these 40 talented young musicians were orphans of the Armenian Genocide. He also learned of the terrible financial strain that came with raising these orphans. In response, Selassie offered to adopt and bring the marching band back with him to Addis Ababa.

The 40 Armenian orphans arrived to the capital on September 6, 1924, accompanied by Father Hovhannes Simonian, and officially became knownas the Arba Lijoch ("forty children" in Amharic, the official language in Ethiopia.) The Arba Lijoch formed the royal imperial brass band of Ethiopia and each of the children were allocated a monthly stipend, provided withhousing and trained by their musical director, Kevork Nalbandian.

Nalbandian was an Armenian orphan himself, originally from Aintab (modern-day Gaziantep) in the southeastern region of the Ottoman Turkish Empire. It was Nalbandian who led the Arba Lijoch with his musical compositions and Selassie was so impressed with the band's compilations, he asked Nalbandian to compose the music for Ethiopia's national anthem. In 1926, Nalbandian composed the Ethiopian Imperial National Anthem titled, "Teferi Marsh, Ethiopia Hoy," which translates to "Ethiopia, be happy" and it was performed by the 40 orphans for the firsttime in public during Haile Selassie's official crowning as Emperor on November 2, 1930 in Addis Ababa.

A recent project by Silva Sevlian, which was conducted during her time atthe University of Southern California, documents the experience of the Armenian community in Addis Ababa at that time. Included in these documents is an oral account of an Armenian who witnessed one of the anniversaries of the coronation in the late 1950s. Araxi Aslanian recalls the memory: "During [the anniversary of the]coronation, the emperor passed through the piazza and stopped in front of the Armenian Church. And the Armenian community was there to greet him. The heads of the community would salute him, and it so happened that I was eight years old. I gave flowers to the Emperor when I approached him, and he gave me his hand. Later, we were invited to the palace the following day, and when we went to the palace, I finally had the chance to see where the emperor that I had seen all my life lived!"

Aslanian wasn't the only Armenian that Selassie had made an impact on. In fact, Selassie's initial coronation on November 2, 1930 set a defining tone for the Arba Lijoch and the Armenian community in Ethiopia. The Arba Lijoch began performing for nearly every imperial event of the state,and later trained Ethiopia's army and imperial bodyguard bands. These 40orphans who were once deprived of their most earnest childhood memories due to genocide and dispossession had now found their beacon of hope through music. While not much is recorded about the personal lives of the 40 orphans, Mesfin Kebede, a native Ethiopian resident of Addis Ababa, possesses some documents that provide a look into the livesof the orphans, including their names, ages and hometowns. Kebede recounts that the majority of the orphans were originally from various Armenian towns and that most of the orphans came from Vaspurakan (Van), Karin, Zeytun, and Sis.

Kebede described the Arba Lijoch as "diligent, abstemious, and honest," virtues that, according to him, “are qualities of the race to which they belong.” While Selassie gave these orphans the opportunity for a new life,the Arba Lijoch gave Ethiopia the opportunity to modernize its music.

Through their brass instruments and widespread musical instruction, the40 orphans forever changed the framework of mainstream music in Ethiopia. Though it’s undeniable that select brass instruments were eminent in intimate circles of musicians in Addis Ababa since the early 1900s, it’s widely agreed by Ethiopian and non-Ethiopian musicians andscholars that the Arba Lijoch was both directly and indirectly responsiblefor modernizing popular music in Ethiopia.

Prior to the Arba Lijoch and Kevork Nalbandian, the prominent musical instruments in Ethiopia were mostly made of wood and string. For example, traditional Ethiopian folkloric music utilized ethnic instruments such as the ney and washint; similar to what the tsiranapogh (commonlyknown as duduk) instrument is to Armenian folk music. The replacementof wood and string instruments with brass instruments among popular music earned Arba Lijoch the prevalent recognition of being the pioneersof musical modernization in Ethiopia.

This musical development in Ethiopia took place in two phases. First, the imperial brass band trained and lent support to the development of other modern music ensembles such as the army, police, and imperial bodyguard bands. Secondly, as the Arba Lijoch began performing among crowds during national events throughout the years, musicians began to prefer new brass instruments as opposed to the more traditional wood andstring.

Musician Vahe Tilbian, a fourth generation Armenian-Ethiopian who currently lives in Addis Ababa expands on the influence of the Nalbandians: “A good friend of mine and virtuoso of Ethio-jazz is Samuel Yirga who has taken the world by storm with his compositions and his piano skills. We often discuss music and it is never a doubt that musiciansare grateful for Nerses Nalbandian’s work, which is highly commended andrespected. Orchestras like the Either/Orchestra based in Boston have come all the way to Ethiopia to perform Nerses Nalbandian’s compositions.”

Currently, one of the most respected musical institutions in Ethiopia is theYared School of Music at the Addis Ababa University, which Kevork Nalbandian, along with his Greek and Ethiopian colleagues, founded in 1954. The Yared School of Music’s periodical of 1973 reads: “Two Armenians Kevork (1924-1949) and Nersès Nalbandian (1930s-1977) were major forces in developing and nurturing modern Ethiopian band andorchestral music. Over the next 50 years, countless Ethiopian bands followed their same line-up and forged a stately brand of jazz-funk.”

The particular jazz-funk that the Yared periodical and Tilbian referenced was the emergence of a unique musical genre known as Ethiopian jazz (or, Ethio-jazz) that developed sometime in the mid-1950s and reached its peak in the late 1960s. During the initial years of Ethio-jazz, the first recording studio in Ethiopia was opened in 1952, by an Armenian musiciannamed Garbis Haygazian.

Haygazian, in collaboration with Kevork Nalbandian's nephew, Nerses Nalbandian, would continue the tradition of Armenians in contemporary Ethiopian music by becoming founding fathers of this genre. Nerses carried Kevork's musical legacy by becoming the musical director of the Haile Selassie National Theater in the 1950s, later composing the anthemfor the African Union and, most importantly, influencing and training popular Ethiopian artists such as Mulatu Astatke. Among Ethiopian societytoday, Astatke is widely regarded as being the father of Ethio-jazz and evolving the orchestral brass band sounds of the Nalbandians to encompass jazz and funk tunes. His musical style incorporates a unique mix of Ethiopian melodic tunes through the medium of brass instruments.

A story passed down to Tilbian by one of the last remaining members of the Arba Lijoch, tells us that it was customary for the Arba Lijoch to play the national anthem for visiting diplomats. One year, Selassie's interior had summoned the orphans to learn the anthem of Turkey in preparationof the visit of Turkish delegates. All 40 orphans, in protest, refused to learn the anthem, saying "We will not learn the anthem of a country thatkilled our parents." After much pleading from the Ethiopian interior, the Arba Lijoch eventually learned the anthem. But when the time came to perform it to the visiting delegates, the orphans performed an ethnic Armenian song instead.

The plight of the Armenian orphans and residents of Addis Ababa was alsowell known to Selassie himself, for he lent special treatment to the Armenian community and believed in their good intentions towards Ethiopian society. Not only were the Armenians granted asylum, but they also had a special role within Ethiopia, which explains why the Armenians were the only ethnicity besides Ethiopians who were allowed to arrive to and depart from Ethiopia freely. In contrast, both Emperors Menelik II andSelassie often had doubts regarding their relations to other ethnicities andwere generally weary of the possibility that the other ethnicities may attempt to colonize Ethiopia. Thus, the other ethnic minorities were forbidden to travel.

In a varying viewpoint to the popular theories of Ethiopian modernization, Ethiopian scholar Milkias Paulos suggests that prior to the 1900s, association with business was looked down upon by Ethiopian society at large. Paulos thus postulates that this is the reason why most of Ethiopia'searly businessmen, musicians and other professionals were mostly composed of professionals who were ethnically Greek and Armenian. In his book Haile Selassie, Western Education and Political Revolution in Ethiopia, Paulos provides a demographic of the ethnic minorities in Ethiopia that highlights the Armenian community at its peak in 1935 with a population of 2,800, slightly under the Greeks and Arabs. Though the numbers of the Ethiopian Armenians were marginal in comparison to otherethnic minorities, it's undeniable that the influence of the Armenian community at times surpassed that of other communities. Even when the Armenian community numbered less than two hundred in 1909, an Italianmap printed during the same year made a specific note to highlight the Armenian quarter just north of the Ras Makonnen Bridge.

The Armenian influence in Addis Ababa wasn't just limited to the Arba Lijoch, but also encompassed various professional roles within a given society. While the Armenian orphans led the wave of musical modernization in Ethiopia, the Armenian community in Addis Ababa alsogoverned the pharmaceutical and medical institutions at the turn of the 20th century.
Dr. Richard Pankhurst, a highly-renowned scholar of Ethiopian history, highlights figures such as the Devletian and Latifian families. He notes that Hovhanes Devletian was a native of the Van region and became Selassie's personal physician, while the Latifians owned and managed the imperial pharmacy in Addis Ababa. This tradition of Armenian physicians and dentists is also present today: according to Kebede, one of the sons of the Arba Lijoch, Mesrop Sarkisian, is one of the most renowned dentistsof Addis Ababa.
In modern times, when scholars and historians research and engage in the historiography of modern Ethiopia, they often utilize the primary visualsources that are largely indebted to the work of Bedros Boyadjian.
Boyadjian, born in Tigranakert (modern-day Diyarbakir), in the Ottoman Empire, became the first royal photographer of Ethiopia. Initially, he was the photographer of Menelik II, and later became the photographer for Selassie's imperial court. Boyadjian was widely acclaimed for developing atalent for photography that was different from the norm at the time.
Almost defiantly, he incorporated female and male subjects in one sittingframe and habitually cropped and montaged photographs to depict his royal subjects in the most optimal way possible — a practice that was almost non-existent in Ethiopian royal photography prior to Boyadjian.
Engineering and city planning were also industries that Armenians in Ethiopia thrived in, with the most notable contributors being Krikor Howyan and Minas Kherbekian. Howyan was born in Constantinople, graduated from the prestigious Ecole Nationale University in Paris with a degree in mathematics, and later published many scientific studies. Most notably, however, he was the chief engineer of Addis Ababa and built many bridges throughout the capital, as well as one of Addis Ababa's mostwell-known historic hotels: the Itegue.
Even before Haile Selassie assumed the position of emperor, Howyan hadalready established the first modern astronomical observatory in Addis Ababa in the imperial palace of Menelik. He also assumed an official position in the Astronomical Society of France (Société Astronomique de France) through the assistance of established networks throughout Europe. Howyan studied the constellations, meteors, and planets as seen from Addis Ababa and communicated his discoveries with the Astronomical Society of France on behalf of Ethiopia. When he wasn't serving the Ethiopian royalty, he focused his attention on the small but thriving Armenian community in Addis Ababa. For example, Howyan constructed the first Armenian school in the country's capital, in which Amharic, Armenian, English, and French languages were taught. The state-of-the-art school also included a gymnasium and a sports club named "Arax" after the Araxes River of the historic Armenian Highlands.And in 1943, a second sporting branch was opened, called the "Ararat Sporting Association." A couple years prior to his death, Howyan split hiswill three ways: partly to his immediate family, partly to the Armenian community in Addis Ababa and partly to the newly established ArmenianRepublic.

Working under the patronage of Howyan was Minas Kherbekian, or betterknown by his nickname in Amharic, Betafras Minas, which translates to "Minas the house-crusher." Kherbekian became to Addis Ababa what Haussmann was to Paris. According to accounts of the time, Kherbekian would walk around the city with a pointing stick and single out the structures in Addis Ababa that he deemed necessary for renovation or demolition. In their place, Kherbekian built new houses and institutions that incorporated traditional aesthetic motifs of Armenian, Arab, Italian and Ethiopian architecture to create unique structures.

Despite being frequently met with opposition and skepticism, Kherbekian remained devoted to his plans of modernization and a vision of an urban capital that was suitable for the 20th century. Most of Kherbekian's constructions can still be seen in the capital today and are currently beingrenovated as part of an effort to preserve old Addis Ababa. Additionally, one of the buildings that Kherbekian had designed and built is one of Addis Ababa's most well-known tourist attractions called the Mohammedaly house. During Kherbekian's time, the Mohammedaly institution was the largest importing and exporting trade firm, and he wascommissioned to construct the central headquarters. Today, the Armenianinfluence of Kherbekian's distinguished design of the Mohammedaly houseis most prominently evident in the pillared staircases with triangular designs. On the other hand, the residential structures of Kherbekian include intricately detailed balconies, which encircle the upper floors of hisbuildings. These two styles of infrastructure carry exemplary designs of architecture that can be traced to cities with long-standing Armenian cultural and historical backgrounds, such as Gyumri or Shushi.

While Howyan translated the visual poetry of the heavens into scientific studies and Kherbekian focused on infrastructure, their countryman HaigPatapan occupied himself with the intellectual realm. The extensive historiography of Armenian-Ethiopian relations is widely documented, thanks to Patapan's 400-page text that was published in 1930 on the Armenian island of San Lazzaro in Venice, Italy. When he wasn't translating the philosophical works of Friedrich Nietzsche into Armenian and Amharic, Patapan focused his attention on compiling encyclopedia-liketexts about Ethiopian history.

One account of Ethio-Armenian relations tells us a story of Kherbekian. Patapan documented that shortly prior to Selassie's crowning, Kherbekian concluded the construction of one of the most advanced bridges in Addis Ababa. Society at large, including Emperor Menelik II, doubted the modern design of the bridge and determined that it would not be secure enough for heavy traffic. The Emperor asked the crowd, "What fool would cross this bridge?" Confidently, Kherbekian replied, "I will be that fool." Hequickly called upon his friend and industrialist Sarkis Terzian to bring his latest invention, the steamroller, which was the heaviest machinery in Addis Ababa at the time, to test the bridge. Kherbekian successfully maneuvered the steamroller across the bridge while the diverse communities of Addis Ababa watched at the other end with their breath held in anticipation. When Kherbekian reached the other side of the bridge, Emperor Menelik II made his way to Kherbekian with a grin and bowed to him out of respect.

A notable Ethiopian historian, Bahru Zewde, addressed the influence of Terzian's innovations in his book titled, A history of Modern Ethiopia: "TheArmenians, also Orthodox Christians, like the Greeks, were welcomed to Ethiopia at a time when they were suffering persecution in their homeland. They were to attain the highest level of integration into Ethiopian society and they thrived mainly as craftsmen catering to the upper class. But one of their pioneers, Sarkis Terzian, made his fortune asan arms trader and his fame by introducing the steamroller (aptly named Sarkis 'babur,' the steam engine of Sarkis) into the country."

By the year 1935, the Armenian population in Addis Ababa was roughly estimated at a little over 2,000. The extensive labor and love that the Armenians of Addis Ababa put out in the years prior had already solidifiedtheir reputation in Ethiopian society and in the eyes of Haile Selassie.

Additionally, it seemed that Selassie had Armenian acquaintances outsideof Ethiopia as well. For example, while Ethio-jazz was booming in the country's capital in the 1950s, Selassie took a tour of the United States and had several meetings in San Francisco, California. Armenian entrepreneur and philanthropist George Mardikian frequented Selassie during his stay in the Bay Area with boxes of Armenian halva (a sunflower-seed-based candy).

When Selassie returned home to Addis Ababa, he continued his rule for many years to come until his death in 1975, under mysterious circumstances. According to Tilbian, this political strife took a toll on Ethiopia as a whole, but also on the Armenian community specifically. Reflecting on the dwindling numbers of the Armenians left in Addis Ababatoday, Tilbian states "Most Armenians left when the Derg communist regime nationalized homes and businesses and currently more will leavefor post secondary education."

Indeed, today, there are about 100 Armenians remaining in Addis Ababa who stay interconnected largely in thanks to the Kevorkoff Armenian school and the St. George Apostolic Church, which continues to operate, thanks to Simon Hagopian, the son of one of the 40 orphans, and Archdeacon Vartkes Nalbandian. Equally imperative, Vahe Tilbian is producing music in English, Amharic and Armenian, while performing to various audiences in Ethiopia. When asked about music, and the Armenian community's future prospects, the Armenian native of Addis Ababa had this to say:

"The older generation is more aware of the Armenian presence in Ethiopiawhile the younger generations who have gone to music school or are involved with music know of the Armenian contributions. I also meet strangers who, once they hear I am of Armenian descent, tell me stories of how their father was a friend with an Armenian family or they had Armenian neighbors back in the day. I would say, on the most part, Ethiopians view Armenians very positively. Armenians who came to Ethiopia during the Armenian Genocide and in the aftermath were given citizenship, allowed to live and work here, and were given land to build homes. It really is a great story of acceptance and finding a safe haven."

Today's global citizens are finding innovative ways to bring this vibrant community's story to life through the medium of film. Filmmaker AramaztKalayjian is working on a documentary about the Armenian Ethiopians entitled, "TEZETA: The Ethiopian Armenians." When asked about what hehopes to achieve through the film, Kalayjian says:

"It's a story which documents the rare cultural co-creation that has existed between Armenians and Ethiopians that has developed so much inEthiopia… I want to share this inspiring story in the most fun, musical, andentertaining way so that our story as Armenians starts to diverge from themelancholic narrative we often find ourselves attached to, with regards to Genocide and past traumas that no longer need to serve as our driving force. There are aims and goals that we can set our minds and efforts to work towards that are higher than waiting for recognition or retribution.

As prospering citizens of the world we have a chance to take hold of ourfuture, this film aims to inspire that feeling."

For the Arba Lijoch, Ethiopia not only became an asylum from genocide, but a place to thrive artistically and professionally, in the mold of Howyanand Kherbekian before them. As thanks for the opportunity, these "diligent, abstemious, and honest" Armenians left their enduring mark onthe history of Ethiopia and its rich culture. (Text ends)

INSA asked to take measures against ESAT, other media'

ESAT News (October 20, 2014) An edited discussion doc prepared by theFederal Affairs Ministry of Ethiopia and tabled for the discussion of the members of the ruling EPRDF has been seen by ESAT. The document seeks the government's technology spy agency, Information Network Security Agency (INSA) to take measures against ESAT Television and Radio, the Voices of America and German, also asks the government to found religious associations in the names of the youth and intellectuals and support the establishment of institutions that train students in religious education with a certificate and degree programs.

The 16 page document prepared for the members of the EPRDF council suggests recommendations on religious extremism, which it considers is a"threat to the government's existence". Under the sub section of saving the youth from unemployment, the document states that unemployment within the youth has been a threat to the government since the 2005 election which still is within the educated and landless youth farmers. It notes that the messages that are disseminated by 'forces of destruction' need to be well defended and countered with efficient messages. Urging that the transmissions of ESAT, VoA and

Deutsch Welle should be controlled, the document states that the focus should be on the points that are raised by forces that conduct political businesses in the name of religion using these media. Especially successive measures need to be taken against their members at home, it adds. The report states that each religious belief and institution does not contradict with the constitutional system and those that go out of that line are first given an advice and if they do not improve, legal actions will be taken. Preachers of all religious groups would be given identity cards. Religious extremism has been increasing because of the absence of an educated human resource that can fill the gap of religious knowledge, therefore an institution that trains from short term courses to regular programs is necessary, the document recommends.(Text ends)

ETHIOPIA: South Sudan government has unexpectedly recalled itsambassador to Ethiopia'

SUDAN TRIBUNE, ADDIS ABABA (October 21, 2014)

South Sudan government has unexpectedly recalled its ambassador to Ethiopia. in a move an official described as "a normal administrative practice". Family sources told Sudan Tribune that David Dang Kong was asked by the foreign affairs ministry to return to capital, Juba within 72 hours. But Mawien Makol, the foreign affairs spokesperson downplayed the incident, saying it was done within the ministry's jurisdiction. "This is anormal administrative practice to recall any of our diplomats for briefing atthe headquarters on policy matters and for them to get other directives tohelp them be able to carry out day to today activities and foreign services with confidence while in countries of deployment," he said on Tuesday.

Unconfirmed reports, however, say Kong's summons were mainly due to his alleged involvement in covert activities with South Sudanese opposition forces. "He is claimed to have leaked sensitive and classified diplomatic information to the rebels," a source who preferred anonymitytold Sudan Tribune on Tuesday.

Meanwhile, sections of the Nuer community in Ethiopia have expressed fears that the summoned diplomat could be harshly treated if he returnedto Juba. "As a community we suspect something behind his instantaneouscall," said Peter Jack Kuon, a spokesperson for the community. "We advocate for reinstating Kong if the government has no intention behind his immediate call," he added. Kuon also claimed that the first secretary at the South Sudanese embassy in Eritrea, David Mayan Gatkuoth, was previously summoned in a similar manner, but was never heard from again.

Conflict in South Sudan, which erupted in mid-December last year following a political dispute within the ruling SPLM party, has led to fiercefighting between government forces and those loyal to former vice president-turned rebel leader, Riek Machar. The conflict, which has killed tens of thousands and displaced over 1.5 million, has increasingly dividedcommunities along tribal lines. (Text ends)

Question&Answer - Berhanu Nega says Eritrea crucial to building capacity'

Ethiomedia (October 22, 2014) Dr Berhanu Nega, chairman of Ginbot 7, the Movement for Freedom,

Justice and Democracy, was in Seattle recently. He addressed Ethiopians on the progress of Ginbot 7 as well asthe overall political situation in Ethiopia. Ethiomedia met Dr Berhanu andasked him few questions:

Ethiomedia - How is Ginbot 7 following the arrest of Andargachew Tsege?

Dr Berhanu - Counter to the desire of the TPLF/EPRDF regime, the arrest of Andargachew has galvanized the struggle for justice and democracy. The abduction and eventual end of Andargachew in a Woyane prison has sparked anger throughout the Ethiopian diaspora as evidenced by the protests and demonstrations seen in many countries, including the UnitedStates and Europe. We believe the condition back in Ethiopia is no different than what has been witnessed in the Diaspora.

Ethiomedia- When are you to pull out of Eritrea?Dr Berhanu - Why should we?

Ethiomedia - You think you will succeed where many other Ethiopiansbefore you have failed?

Dr Berhanu - Can you give me a reason for their failure?

Ethiomedia - Because the Eritrean regime didn't want the emergence of aunited Ethiopian force that would topple TPLF.

Dr Berhanu - No, I don't accept that. Those organizations that were in Eritrea failed not because of the Eritrean regime but because they lacked leadership qualities. Poor leadership was to blame for their own failure.Butholding the Ertirean regime for their own weaknesses was the easiest excuse to offer. The Eritrean regime doesn't interfere in our affairs, and if we fail, we blame no one but ourselves.

Ethiomedia- Take the case of Col. Fesseha, the TPDM leader. Many sources said the former TPLF rebel who joined and became a prominent leader of the heavily-armed TPDM was murdered by the Eritrean regime.How come?

Dr Berhanu - You got the information wrong. Fesseha was killed during anargument with an Eritrean known for having mental sickness. But opponents of the Eritrean regime were quick to make it as a politically charged murder.

Ethiomedia - So, no reason to pull out of Eritrea?

Dr Berhanu - We are not saying we will depend on Eritrea forever. We need to build our fighting capacity, and the only ideal place to achieve ourgoal is in Eritrea. Once we are done with building our [fighting capacity], we will move into our country where we shall fight to secure our own military base.

Ethiomedia - Your organization vows to use both the peaceful and armed struggle to effect a political change in Ethiopia. How is the progress on thearmed side?

Dr Berhanu - We are currently working to bring Ginbot 7, Ethiopian Patriots and TPDM into one fold. We are working so that these three Ethiopian organizations build a common front. We believe this will greatly enhance the armed struggle against the ruling party in Ethiopia.

Ethiomedia - Any time frame?

Dr Berhanu - I can't be specific but we hope to move into a higher gearthis year. (Text ends)

Ethiopian Federal police says it has charged suspected rebels, oppositionunder 36 files’

ESAT News (October 22, 2014) The Ethiopian Federal Police Commissionhas said that it has charged suspected members of the Oromo LiberationFront (OLF), Ginbot 7 Movement for Freedom, Justice and Democracy, Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), Gambela People's Liberation Movement (GPLM), Benishangul People's Liberation Movement (BPLM) andAl Shabaab under 36 files in the past Ethiopian year 2006.

The Force said to loca media that out of the 36 terrorism files, investigation had been completed on 27 of them and the files were sent the relevant department. Out of which four were members of the OLF, six Ginbot 7, one ONLF, three GPLM, two BPLM and two Al Shabaab members.These suspects were trained and sent over here by the Eritrean government, it said. Police said 119 suspects were found guilty and were sentenced from one to twenty-five years imprisonment.

Meanwhile, the Commission preferred to keep quiet regarding the huge casualties that the Force sustained in the Sheko Mezenger area of Southern Ethiopia. Although the Commission said its capacity of fighting terrorism has increased, it has been internationally criticised for linking and detaining bloggers, journalists and politicians with the named rebel groups using the internationally condemned Ethiopian Anti Terrorism Proclamation.

Dr. Dima Nagao of ODF ordered to leave Ethiopia within 24 hours'Source: Anonymous (October 25, 2014)

Dr. Dima Nagao, the second in command of Oromo Democratic Organization (ODF), has been ordered by the TPLF security to leave thecountry within 24 hours.

An anonymous source has informed us that Dr. Dima was said to have arrived in Ethiopia for the funeral of late Aadde Tsehay Tolasa, the wife oflate Pastor Gudina Tumsa, religious leader and Oromo nationalist. Sourcesclaim Dr. Dima intended to discuss with the Ethiopian regime about the terms of ODF's plan to enter Ethiopian domestic politics.

Dr. Dima was seen with Obbo Abba Dulaa Gammada at the funeral ceremony. He also informally met Obbo Muktar Kedir, the president of Oromia regional state on the same ceremony. However, both OPDO and TPLF senior leaders declined Dima's request for official meeting. They instead sent a mid-level official, Faysal Aliy who was formerly working at Washington DC embassy but currently head of the diaspora affairs department within the Ethiopian Ministry of Foreign Affairs (EMoFA). This made it clear that EPRDF/OPDO does not want to deal with ODF within domestic political framework yet. Later on, it is believed discussions brokedown. Although the details of the terms, both by ODF, and EPRDF, are not entirely known to the public, sources close to the matter indicate there is strong disagreement. EPRDF/OPDO wants to see ODF to completely distance itself from any OLFlegacy including the famous OLF flag emblemed with Odda. It wants to see ODF denounce past ''atrocities'' and current OLF ideologies and the armed struggle. Above all, EPRDF/OPDO demands all ODF members give up their foreign citizenship for Ethiopian passport. Although Dr. Dima showed a sign of willingness to accept these terms, he was not able to getgreen light from the remaining ODF leaders to enter into official agreement with the regime.

ODF's demands include amnesty given to leadership for their role withinOLF. They also asked for their party to be legalized and allowed participation in the next election. EPRDF/OPDO dropped the demands. After Dima informed Faysal his inability to secure consent from ODF leaders to accept the government's precondition, intelligence officers ordered him to leave the country in 24 hours. He has now left . What willbecoming of the ODF plan to return hangs in limbo. (Text ends)

PMHD responds to the PM of UK on the Andargachew Tsege case'

Ethiomedia (October 26, 2014) Ethiopia's Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn gave a brief response to UK prime minister David cameron whopleaded for the life of imprisoned rebel leader Andargachew Tsege. Mr.

Cameron has reportedly "written personally" to Desalegn requesting that Mr Tsege be saved from death penalty. In response to local media questions, Mr Desalegn said he can not "interfere with the legal proceedings" facing Tsege in Ethiopia. Mr Desalegn also revealed that theprosecution has received "new and updated evidence" that Mr Tsege and his Ginbot7 organization is actively engaged in terrorist activities against the Ethiopian government. He is reportedly referring to a recent article byUS based website "Ethiomedia" which interviewed Ginbot7 Chairman Berhanu Nega this week. Mr Berhanu told Ethiomedia that Ginbot7 is training its militia in Eritrea in order to fight the Ethiopian government. Desalegn said Tsege has been given a defense lawyer, though his chancesof winning are "very low." But Mr Desalegn advised London to "review its policy" of giving asylum and rewarding citizenship to individuals and groups engaged in violent anti-goverment activities in Africa. He mentioned the ONLF rebel group example, whose leadership resides in thecity suburbs of London. In 2007, ONLF rebels in southeast Ethiopia admitted murdering over 70 Ethiopian and chinese mine workers. Over the years, the ONLF rebels have also been accused of assassinating manysomali-Ethiopians and bombings that killed civilians, including children.

The Ogaden-Somali community in London provides most of the funding forONLF rebels. Mr Desalegn said Mr Tsege might still become eligible for reduced prison sentence (presidential pardon) in 2015 if the court decides to convict him.(Text ends)

Eritrea, Ethiopia among 10 countries most affected by hunger'By Matt Petronzio (October 27, 2014) According to the International Food Policy Research Institute's 2014 Global Hunger Index (GHI), released last week, hunger in developing countries has decreased by 39% since 1990. However, the global state ofhunger remains in the "serious" category — the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) estimates that 805 million people continue to go hungry around the world. In fact, Burundi and Eritrea fall into the "extremely alarming" category of hunger (the highestlevel), while 14 other countries' levels of hunger are "alarming."

The following chart, created by statistics portal Statista, shows the countries with the worst hunger levels based on three unweighted averages (hence why some numbers look like they exceed 100%): the percentage of the population that is undernourished, percentage of children under five who are underweight and the under-five mortality rate.The countries worst affected by hunger, and scoring worst in the 2014 Global Hunger Index (GHI) were namely, Burundi, Eritrea, Timor-Leste, Commoros, Sudan, Chad, Ethiopia, Yemen, Zambia, and Haiti. Amnesty says Ethiopia detains 5000 Oromos illegally since 2011'By William Davison, Bloomberg News (October 28, 2014)

Ethiopia's government illegally detained at least 5,000 members of the country's most populous ethnic group, the Oromo, over the past four years as it seeks to crush political dissent, Amnesty International said. Victims include politicians, students, singers and civil servants, sometimesonly for wearing Oromo traditional dress, or for holding influential positions within the community, the London-based advocacy group said ina report today. Most people were detained without charge, some for years, with many tortured and dozens killed, it said.

"The Ethiopian government's relentless crackdown on real or imagined dissent among the Oromo is sweeping in its scale and often shocking in itsbrutality," Claire Beston, the group's Ethiopia researcher, said in a statement. "This is apparently intended to warn, control or silence all signs of 'political disobedience' in the region." The Oromo make up 34 percent of Ethiopia's 96.6 million population, according to the CIA World Factbook. Most of the ethnic group lives in the central Oromia Regional State, which surrounds Addis Ababa, the capital. Thousands of Oromo have been arrested at protests, including demonstrations this year againstwhat was seen as a plan to annex Oromo land by expanding Addis Ababa'scity limits. Muslims demonstrating about alleged government interference in religious affairs were also detained in 2012 and 2013, Amnesty said in the report, titled: 'Because I am Oromo' – Sweeping Repression in the Oromia Region of Ethiopia.

Government Denial: The state-run Oromia Justice Bureau said the findingswere "far from the truth" in a reply to Amnesty included in the report. "Nosingle individual has been and would not be subjected to any form of harassment, arrest or detention, torture for exercising the freedom of expression or opinion.” The majority of detainees are accused of supporting the Oromo Liberation Front, which was formed in 1973 to fightfor self-determination, according to Amnesty. Senior Oromo politicians Bekele Gerba and Olbana Lelisa were jailed in 2012 for working with the group, which was classified as a terrorist organization by lawmakers in 2011. “The accusation of OLF support has often been used as a pretext tosilence individuals openly exercising dissenting behavior,” Amnesty said.

The bulk of Amnesty’s information came from interviews with 176 refugees in Kenya, Somalia and Uganda in July this year and July 2013. More than 40 telephone and e-mail conversations were also conducted with people in Ethiopia, it said. Some interviewees said they fled the country because of conditions placed on them when released, such as being told to avoid activism, meeting in small groups, or associating with relatives who were political dissenters, the report said. Amnesty has beenbanned from Ethiopia since 2011 when its staff was deported. (Text ends)

Keeping Ethiopians in Perpetual poverty, Starvation, and sparked ethnicconflict is key ERPRDF policy, Ex State Minister of Communications’

Ethiomedia (November 3, 2014) SEATTLE - Keeping Ethiopians in dire poverty so that they would starve perpetually, and remain too weak to rise up against repression, is one of the leading directives of the EPRDF ruling party, former EPRDF communications minister, Ermias Legesse, shocked a gathering of Ethiopians here in Seattle on November 1, 2014. Former State Minister of Communications Affairs Ermias Legesse tells a crowd in Seattle that pitting one ethnic group against the other in Ethiopiais one of the leading EPRDF principles. He also said keeping Ethiopians in dire poverty so that they would starve perpetually is another guideline of the ruling party. He said the architect of all the heinous principles was thelate prime minister Meles Zenawi.

Fueling unrest and conflict among the various ethnic groups was also another key directive, Ermias said, mentioning other directives of the ruling party that may easily qualify as 'crimes against humanity.' Once a trusted political cadre of the ruling party, Ermias said they were given various directives how to work with 'security workers' of the regime, and eliminate young and rising opposition figures, including using the "anti- terrorism law" that has sent many of the promising opposition leaders to prison. (A must-watch 2nd video will be posted soon). Though Meles Zenawi, the architect of punishing Ethiopians in the most vicious ways died in 2012, Ermias said, the key directives are still in place and hence the continuity of the post-Meles regime without challenges from the public. (A must-watch 2nd video will be posted soon).

The meeting, moderated by Dr Ashenafi Gossaye, chairman of Ethiopian Public Forum inSeattle, was held at Ethiopian Community Center.

Security pre-cautionary notice for U.S. Citizens in Ethiopia’

(PR) US EMBASSY, ADDIS ABABA (November 7, 2014)

The U.S. Embassy reminds U.S. citizens of the on-going threat of terrorist attacks in Ethiopia. U.S. citizens are reminded and encouraged to maintainheightened personal security awareness. Due to serious safety and security concerns, U.S. government personnel and their families are presently restricted from traveling to the following areas except as permitted on a case-by-case basis: Ethiopian/Kenyan Border (Southern Ethiopia): In southern Ethiopia along the Kenyan border, banditry and incidents involving ethnic conflicts are common. Security around the town of Moyale is unpredictable, and clashes between Ethiopian forces and the Oromia Liberation Front (OLF) have been reported.

Be especially vigilant in areas that are potential targets for attacks, particularly areas where U.S. and western citizens congregate, including restaurants, hotels, bars, places of worship, supermarkets, and shopping malls. Al-Shabaab may have plans for a potential attack targeting Westerners and the Ethiopian government, particularly in Jijiga and Dolo Odo in the Somali Region of Ethiopia, and Addis Ababa. Attacks may occurwithout warning.

Ethiopia/Eritrea Border (Northern Ethiopia): Ethiopia and Eritrea signed apeace agreement in December 2000 that ended their border war.

However, the border remains disputed. The border area is a militarized zone where there is the possibility of armed conflict between Ethiopian and Eritrean forces. U.S. government personnel are restricted from travelnorth of the Shire (Inda Silassie)-Axum-Adigrat road in the Tigray region of Ethiopia. Personnel are further restricted from travel north of the road from Dessie through Semera to the Galafi border crossing with Djibouti, including the Danakil Depression and the Erta Ale volcano. In January 2012, a group of foreign tourists were attacked near the Erta Ale volcano in the Afar region near the Eritrean border, approximately 100 miles southeast of Adigrat in the Danakil Depression. The attack resulted in five deaths, three wounded, and four people kidnapped. The victims were European and Ethiopian citizens. The two Europeans who were kidnappedwere subsequently released. On February 15, 2012, Ethiopia, which blamed Eritrea for the attack, retaliated by striking military camps in Eritrea where the attackers were allegedly trained. This episode illustratesthe continuing volatility of the border area.

Somali Region (Eastern Ethiopia): Travel to Ethiopia's Somali regional state is restricted for U.S. government employees, although essential travel to the region is permitted on a case-by-case basis. Since the mid- 1990's, members of the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) have conducted attacks on civilian targets in parts of the Somali regional state, particularly in predominantly Ogadeni zones. Expatriates have been killed in these attacks. In 2010, the Government of Ethiopia initiated peace talks with the ONLF, which are ongoing. Despite these talks, incidents of violence continue to occur. Throughout 2013, skirmishes between the ONLF and regional government security forces took place. Some of theseincidents involved local civilians. Al-Shabaab maintains a presence in Somali towns near the Ethiopian border, presenting a risk of cross-borderattacks targeting foreigners.

Gambella Region (Western Ethiopia): Sporadic inter-ethnic clashes are a concern throughout the Gambella region of western Ethiopia. While the security situation in the town of Gambella is generally calm, it remains unpredictable throughout the rest of the region. Intensified conflict between Sudan and the Republic of South Sudan (RSS) has significantly increased refugee flows into Western Ethiopia. Travel to the border areasin the Beneshangul-Gumuz Region (Asosa) is restricted to major towns north of the area where the Great Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) isbeing constructed due to political sensitivity.

We strongly recommend that U.S. citizens traveling to or residing in Ethiopia enroll in the Department of State's Smart Traveler Enrollment Program (STEP). STEP enrollment gives you the latest security updates,and makes it easier for the U.S. embassy or nearest U.S. consulate to contact you in an emergency. If you don't have Internet access, enroll directly with the nearest U.S. embassy or consulate. (Text ends)

ENTC PR - “We condemn the ethnic apartheid regime while applauding ourheroes”

ENTC (November 9, 2014) The Ethiopian National Transitional Council (ENTC) strongly condemns the brutal suppression of peaceful protests inAddis Ababa this weekend by the ethnic apartheid TPLF/EPRDF’s regime. This barbaric act is deeply reprehensible as it targeted opposition forces legally registered in Ethiopia. Those that were brutally beaten and detained include leaders, members and supporters of Semayawi party, the9-party coalition and Muslim protestors. ENTC calls for all Ethiopian opposition parties, Ethiopians both inside and outside of the country and the diplomatic community to collectively and strongly condemn the latest brutal action by TPLF/EPRDF. ENTC is outraged that TPLF/EPRDF’s barbaricresponse to peaceful demonstrations calling for fair and free elections, hasbeen beatings and jail. We applaud the heroic acts of protestors and organizers who are paying heavy price for their freedom.

Ethiopia's regime accused of massacring civilians to clear way for foreignfarming investment’

'Nightmare' for Ethiopian pastoralists as foreign investors buy up land - Thinktank accuses Ethiopian government of stirring ethnic tensions as Suridisplaced to make way for large plantations By Lara Whyte | The UK Guardian (November 10, 2014)

Ethiopia, one of the world's hungriest countries, is selling off vast chunks of its land to foreign investors who are growing food products for export —and those who get in the government's way are being killed or silenced, according to a new investigation. Under the country's controversial "villagization" scheme, huge populations of farming communities are beingmoved out of their homes on land eyed for development and into new settlements built by the government. Residents not lured out by promises of better infrastructure and services are often forced to go against their will, and resistance often brings violence or intimidation into acquiescence or exile, US-based rights group the Oakland Institute says in a report due for release on Monday. Now, for the first time, pictures obtained exclusively by VICE News appear to show evidence of the widespread atrocities and abuses being reported by farming communities and minoritygroups across the country. Second how in hell they going to lose their cattle food when a large farming left over is more then enough to feed their cow...now back to the road the road benefit is the market will reach them that mean good price for their cattle Another benefit is technology will reach them if power, water and telephone come to Lara's farming them they will be benifited u lose some u gain same. Education and healthis the one is the most important that will reach them too.

Four men who raped and dismembered Ethiopian woman in Dubai released from jail after paying blood money and receiving pardon fromEthiopian embassy’

GULF NEWS (November 11, 2014) Four men facing the death penalty forraping, killing and dismembering an Ethiopian maid five years ago have been bailed after blood money was paid to the victim's family. The Sharjah Appeals Court dropped the death penalty, according to a ruling announced on Monday by presiding Judge Abdullah Yousif Al Shamisi.

The court reversed the death penalty and reduced the prison sentence tothree years each.

The Emirati men, who have now spent more than five years in jail, are now out on bail, according to their lawyer. Salem Obaid Bin Sahoo, the men's lawyer, told Gulf News that the ruling announced on Monday followspayment of Dh100,000 ($27,000 USD) by the convicted men.

"We received a pardon from Ethopian authorities through the Ethiopian consulate in Dubai and we were told that the victim's family had accepted the blood money and dropped the demand for the death penalty," he said."The amount of Dh100,000 has been deposited in the safe of the court and they were bailed on this basis," he said. The approval by the family isa complete reversal from its original refusal to pardon the killers during the early days of the case.

In 2010, the Sharjah Court of First Instance issued the death penalty toA.M., 35, S.R., 32, H.A., 33, and A.J., 30, for the gruesome murder in what became known as the "Al Dhaid murder". The original verdict was handed down by Judge Yaqoub Al Hammadi and two other judges on the bench, Hussain Al Asoufi and Ahmad Awdh. Sharjah Police had earlier saidit was one of the gravest crimes of its kind as it included rape, alcohol andmurder.

According to court records, the four kidnapped an Ethiopian maid in Khor Fakkan, taped her mouth, pushed her into their Land Cruiser and took herto the desert in August 2009. They raped her in Khor Fakkan, dragged herinto their vehicle again, before driving to Al Dhaid mountains where the act was repeated. Prosecutors said after raping her in Al Dhaid the men ran their SUV over her head and battered her with rocks before attempting to hide her body.

According to the police, in 2004, one of the killers had raped and killed a13-year-old Pakistani girl with two other accomplices. They were all sentenced to death, but he was forgiven by the victim's father. Cases involving capital punishment automatically go to appeal. Representativesfrom the Ethiopian consul attended the session and followed up the casewith the court on the behalf of the family. (Text ends)

H&M says seeks to ensure cotton does not come from disputed land'

STOCKHOLM, REUTERS (November 11, 2014) – Hennes & Mauritz "HMb.ST", the world's second-biggest fashion retailer, said on Tuesdaythat it made every effort to ensure its cotton did not come from appropriated land but could not provide an absolute guarantee.

Swedish TV4 said H&M was using cotton from areas in Ethiopia that are vulnerable to land grabbing — the buying or leasing of land in developing countries, often by foreign companies, without the consent of affected local communities. "According to (TV4's) investigation, cotton used for theproduction of H&M's clothes in Ethiopia comes from areas subject to land grabbing," TV4 said in an emailed statement. H&M said it did not accept such practices. It began small-scale buying of clothes from suppliers in Ethiopia in 2013, its first sourcing from an African country.

Its operations are widely seen as part of the Ethiopian government's plansto build up a garment production industry. "H&M does not accept appropriation of land, so-called land-grabbing," the company said in a statement. "Because of that we demand that our suppliers ensure that they do not use cotton from the Omo Valley region where there is a higherrisk for land-grabbing."

However, H&M said it could not guarantee that cotton in its clothes does not come from areas subject to land-grabbing. The company said it had undertaken an analysis that showed land-grabbing did not occur in the area where its direct suppliers are located. It was not possible to trace anyland-grabbing further down its cotton delivery chain, it said.

The Ethiopian government has leased large swathes of land, mainly in itswestern Gambella and Benishangul Gumuz regions, to large companies such as Indian firm Karuturi Global, hoping to boost agricultural productivity. Critics, however, say many people — poor farmers in particular — have been forced off their land under the scheme. H&M sources mainly from Asia and is sensitive about its supply chain. A Bangladeshi factory collapse last year killed more than 1,100 people, heaping pressure on big fashion firms to improve working conditions at suppliers. (Text ends)

EETHIOPIA: Ark of Covenant Reported Stolen by Church Authorities'AXUM (November 13, 2014)

The Patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, His Holiness Abune Mathias, announced this morning that the most prized biblical treasure in the world, the Ark of Covenant, was stolen last night from the catacombs of the Church of Our Lady Mary of Zion. The guardians of the artefact were allegedly put to sleep through the use of chemical weapons,before the robbers entered the crypt and stole the precious Holy item. Thecriminal operation was reportedly executed by a team of 12 to 16 highly- trained professionals who travelled aboard two black military helicopters. They landed less than 500 meters away from their objective after allegedly arriving from the East. The men were dressed in black military- style uniforms and seemed to function as a well coordinated army unit.

They were equipped with night-vision equipment and armed with high caliber weapons, giving them an incredible advantage over the local security forces. The 11 guards and armed volunteers present on the site to defend the Ark were neutralized by the thieves, using some high technology grenades that released a rare opium-based soporific gas. The robbers then went into strenuous labor, using jackhammers and explosives to enlarge the corridors in various locations inside the catacombs leading to the Ark, in order to be able to remove the large chest from its underground vault. The entire operation was over in less than an hour, an incredibly short time considering the number of obstaclesthat had to be overcome. This amazing efficiency suggests that the thieves had repeated the operation and had carefully prepared their crime.The Ethiopian Orthodox Church claims to possess the Ark of the Covenant in a chapel in the small town of Axum, in their country's northern Highlands. It arrived nearly 3,000 years ago, they say, and has been guarded by a succession of virgin monks who, once anointed, are forbidden to set foot outside the chapel grounds until they die. No one except the Guardians are ever allowed to see the Ark, not even the Patriarch of the Church.

The story is told in the Kebra Negast (in Ge'ez language, Glory of the Kings), Ethiopia's chronicle of its royal line: the Queen of Sheba, one of itsfirst rulers, traveled to Jerusalem to benefit from King Solomon's wisdom; on her way home, she bore Solomon's son, Menelik. A few years later, Menelik went to visit his father, and on his return journey was accompanied by the firstborn sons of some Israelite nobles—who, unbeknown to him, stole the ark and carried it with them to Ethiopia. When Menelik learned of the theft, he reasoned that since the ark's frightful powers hadn't destroyed his retinue, it must be God's will that it remain with him. It was then presumably kept in the islands of Lake Tana for about four hundred years and finally taken to Axum, where it was keptsafe for more than two thousand years. The disappearance of the Ark is certainly dramatic news for the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, as much of itsprestige came from the possession of the relic and many of its rituals werecentered on it. His Holiness Abune Mathias was visibly emotional when he made the announcement many of the journalists and faithfuls present for the press conference, burst into tears when they heard the news (Text ends)

A Policeman on duty brutally killed a mother and son in Jimma town'ESAT News (November 13, 2014)

Ethiopian Federal police officers stationed in Jimma, Southwest Ethiopia, have brutally gunned down a mother and her son in the early hours of Thursday 13 November, 2014. They fired over 10 bullets after breaking into the house of the victims. The officers returned to their camp later thatmorning.

The residents of the area, who protested the killing, were met by anotherpolice action. According to eyewitnesses, the deceased Mrs Membere andher son, Yonas owned a hotel in Jimma town. On that fateful night, a group of Federal police officers reportedly refused to pay for the services after dinning in the hotel. Yonas reportedly said to them "are you not paying because you are servants of this government?" After leaving the hotel quietly, the police officers returned armed to gun down Yonas with five bullets in front of his own mother. They then shot his mother dead, who was pleading for her son not to be killed.

A resident of the town said to ESAT that although the residents of the town took to the streets protesting the brutal stabbing of a young man named Anwar in the town, they were returned back by police. Kennedy Mengesha, a government employee was also killed one month before by the Federal police in the town. The residents say the actions of the federalPolice forces are beyond what they can take. ESAT's effort to speak to police in Jimma was unsuccessful.

Ethiopia's Land Grab – The poorest citizens are paying the price'November 15, 2014 By Vince Beiser Vince Beiser has reported from more than two dozen countries for Wired,Harper's, The Atlantic, Rolling Stone, and others. In 2014 he won the Media for Liberty Award. Ethnic Suri in Ethiopia. The group has been pushed off grazing land, without compensation, in favor of a palm oil plantation, profits from which are expatriated, according to land rights advocates.

Ethiopia's rapid growth in recent years—per capita GDP has more than quadrupled since 2002—is often touted as an African success story. But the economic boom is costing traditional pastoral people their land and livelihoods, a new report charges. The report comes just in time for this week's Group of 20 summit in Brisbane, Australia—a meeting of leaders of"the world's largest advanced and emerging economies." On Friday,protesters with the international anti-poverty group OXFAM called on leaders to address the "rising tide" of global inequality, saying that richcountries exploit poor communities around the world. Ethiopia, like many developing nations (and the U.S., for that matter), hasin recent years started leasing huge tracts of land to foreign investors eager to develop industrial-scale farming operations. The country's government has already handed over some 7.4 million acres. The problemis, millions of local people live on and use that land, according to the*report*by the California-based Oakland Institute and the U.K.'s Anywaa Survival Organisation. 8 Maps That Will Change the Way You Look at Africa - The report focuses on Suri pastoralists—herders of cattle, goats, and sheep—who have lived in Southwestern Ethiopia for centuries. Massive agriculture development isnow cutting them off from grazing lands and water supplies essential to their survival. "Here they push and push and push until we don't have a choice," says C.D., a Suri man from Regia Village quoted in the report. "I did not decide to go myself. I go because they push." The groups' investigation began after violence broke out in the area in 2012 when the government diverted water from the Koka river to irrigatea foreign-owned palm oil plantation, drying up the Suri's water source fortheir cattle. The Suri responded with a violent uprising, which led in turn to the massacre of 54 unarmed Suri by government forces at a marketplace. The fighting has also sparked conflict between the Suri and various local ethnic groups, something other organizations have warned about. "The tragic experiences of the Suri people outlined in this report are justone of many examples of the human rights abuses experienced by pastoralist communities in regions across Ethiopia," said the Oakland Institute's executive director, Anuradha Mittal, in a statement. "These incidents are intimately tied to the Ethiopian government's priorities of leasing land to foreign entities." The report also shows that World Bank funds have been used to encourage the forced resettlement of pastoralcommunities, using suspension of food aid as a threat to force them tomove.

Ethiopia's government also happens to be among the world's largest recipients of U.S. assistance, slated to receive nearly half a billion dollars in American aid this year. It was also the beneficiary of one of the world's most famous charitable efforts 30 years ago: the Band Aid song "Do They Know It's Christmas," a star-studded single recorded to raise money to aidfamine victims. Rocker Bob Geldof, who organized that effort and was knighted by the Queen of England for his efforts, announced this week he's producing a new version of the song with new performers including Coldplay's Chris Martin and Sinead O'Connor. This time, funds will be directed to help the fight against Ebola. (Text ends)

TPLF announces elaborating new law aiming at further criminalizing civilsociety & private sector'

THE ETHIOPIAN OBSERVATORY (November 16, 2014)

THE ETHIOPIA OBSERVATORY (TEO) Exactly 55 days, after the United Nations Human Rights Council (HRC) on September 19, 2014 approved a load of recommendations to facilitate improvements in Ethiopia's human rights record, the TPLF regime has chosen to further tighten the nooses ofrepression against the neck of remnants of Ethiopia's civil society. As a matter of fact, in keeping with past habits and practices of the regime, this sombre development has also come on the eve of the May 2015 election. That total membership-wide effort on the part of the United Nations is its so-called Universal Periodic Review (UPR). Its recommendations pertainingto Ethiopia are recorded in document A/HRC/27/17s (press E for English), which, among others, is calling for the removal or revision of the country'santi-civil society and anti-terrorism laws. Not surprisingly, instead, today Ethiopians have learned that the TPLF regime has sent to parliament, according to Fana Broadcast – TPLF's news and information outlet – draft legislation for deliberations by parliament on an "anti-corruption bill focusing on civil society organizations and the private sector." In Ethiopia, the parliament is nothing different from a 'potted plant' of the TPLF, whose 99.6 percent of its seats the regime's members occupy, rather thanit being a body for the peoples' representatives crafting legislation to advance and protect the interests of citizens and the nation's wellbeing.

The intention of the draft bill is described as being to create "a legal framework whereby private corporations, unions, share companies, civilsociety organizations, education and health institutions, banks, insurers,etc. will be held accountable in the fight against corruption."

An already trodden path : Nonetheless, experience has shown Ethiopiansthat any illegal action to be taken by the TPLF regime after the 2005 election has, without exception, come on the back of legislations. That shows the TPLF's mockery, sending an ironic message that casts it as always abiding by the rule of law. By so doing, it is aiming to strengthen its hand, thereby enabling it to take charge of all means of state control over citizens under legal cover. Simply put, in a world full of individuals, small and powerful nations willing to be duped the sense and face of the agency of law allows the Addis Abeba regime to extend its continuation inoffice until the Second Coming.

A look back to the birth in Ethiopia of the charity society and anti- terrorism laws in 2009 shows that this is how the anti-civil society and anti-terrorism laws have been born in Ethiopia and proved effective in becoming the vehicle of state control and its violences that have resulted in subjugation and subordination of Ethiopians. Any nation with capacity to oversee global leadership is lamenting in secret disappointed how it hasbecome collaborative in this endeavor and in summoning the evil it could not dismiss, such as Ethiopia's explosive situation. Notwithstanding the discomforts of passivity this has engendered, global power contiues to be passive observer of the evil designs of the minority group in Ethiopia and elsewhere the influence has reached, as Africa Review recently noted in (Taming the civil society. East Africa aping Ethiopia » Taming the civil society. East Africa aping Ethiopia). All this because of the prioritization of Western security and economic interests.

However, they realize that the mafia is in power in Ethiopia, which has been lusting after the privileges and riches power proffers on its holders and are willing to exercise control, repression and oppression whatever itsprice – just for their own continuity in the palace. Unfortunately, this Ethiopian experience in repression and control of society since 2009 has proved potent, thanks to the collaboration of China, the West and the global corporate interests. This has forced payment dearly of price by ordinary people in all countries; this path has further diminished open anddemocratic public space, concern for fundamental human rights, respect for human dignity and equity in society. As Africa Review has observed, this has given the TPLF regime many admirers that are borrowing leaves from the dictator's book, who has endangered Ethiopia's future, even governing it from under the grave.

In other words, this is not the first time that something like this is happening in Ethiopia under the TPLF and on the eve of election. Just exactly on the eve of the 2005 election, a band of selected TPLF cadres – under the auspices of the then Mayor Arkebe Oqubay, fanned the length and breadth of Addis Abeba to handover charges of tax evasion initially towell to do business owners. Many individuals were sent to prison. At present, State Minister of Finance Abraham Tekeste of the Ministry of Finance was responsible for snatching Addis Abeba's lands from its legitimate owners.

The past guiding the present? The objectives of the marauding at that time by Arkebe's troops, according to former State Minister Ermias Legesse's book: የ ሞለ ስ "ት ሩ ፋ ቶ ች" ባ ለ ቤ ት አ ል ባ ከ ተ ማ ኤ ር ምያ ስ ለ ገ ሰ , were two: to threaten into submission those well to do people into politically and financially supporting the TPLF. The election result being what it was – source of displeasure to the TPLF – in the post-election days and weeks, the of mobilizing support by threat was transformed into the transfer fromnon-Tigreans of prime urban lands, kebele houses and several businessesto Tigrean ownership. The beneficiaries were and are still TPLF civilian officials (ministers, ambassadors, company managers, businesspersons, etc) and senior military officials (above rank of colonel), political cadres (the media and severa in the civil service). With its quality of fungibility and generating more resources, the assets so acquired became the sourceof enrichment of Tigreans, with support and loyalty to the TPLF, and a further basis of ethnic inequality in Ethiopia, the illegality of has no parallel in Ethiopian history.
In other words, what happened is that when the TPLF realized that the people so much wanted to see its back, the illegal acquisition of Addis Abeba's prime lands, businesses and homes was translated into action. While this draft bill before parliament (for formality's sake), Ethiopians understand that in a very typical fashion befitting the TPLF un-statesman behavior, history is repeating itself. This means that the outcome of this latest exercise with a loyal and submissive parliament is likely to be cruel,dangerous and an added source of dissension likely to be destabilizing in an already strained and resentful society.
Although the draft bill states that it would not be applicable to religious and political organizations, the sense is that Mahibere Kidusan, probably the only independent civil society youth organization in the country under the Ethiopian Orthodox islikely not be outside reach of the TPLF attacks.
Already, the regime has been signaling its lustful intents to do so, including through the use of the Tigrean head of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church patriarchate that has accused them of insubordination and "extremism." Fortunately, the Synod has openly rebelled and rebuffed theendless interference in Church affairs. This might be the reason why the clause for the inapplicability of the law in its draft form has been specifically included. Since when has the TPLF ever been accountable to laws and institutions of the country? Similarly, the Muslim society of Ethiopia, especially the youth have been facing lots of state violence, withits committee members going into their second year now.
There is possibly some truth in the story by the TPLF sources that the billwould not be applicable to opposition political parties. This is not becauseof the TPLF accountability. But simply because from Tigrai in the north toNegele and Arba Minch in the south, Jijiga in the east and Gambella and Benishangul-Gumuz in the east, in brief, the whole width and breadth of the country including in Addis Abeba, the TPLF has managed to abduct, imprison and even kill lots of opposition members and supporters in thesethree months! Accountability is rude word for the TPLF regime

Stop for a moment and think of the sister of one of the opposition leaders in Armachiho, Gondar, who at 5:00 A.M. woke up when security forces broke her family's door to take her brother. She believed in the potency ofthe law and pleaded with the security forces and at the height of emotion she told them that they had no right to do so or take her brother. Their response to her was quick: the butt of a gun, whose collapse expedited her exit from their way to find herself in a hospital bed! This is Ethiopia the TPLF has been ruling! (Text ends)

Several being arrested in Oromia regionESAT News (November 18, 2014)

Weeks after the mass arrest of people in Oromia region saw the light of international media; several people are still being detained and sentenced in the Region. According to the Human Rights League of the Horn of Africa(HRLHA), more than 20 Oromos students, teachers and farmers from different villages were arrested since November 11, 2014, in Ambo town and the villages of Mida Qagni district in the Eastern Shewa Zone of Oromia. The arrests came after people protested the sale of land for investors. According to HARLHA some of the people arrested include KitataRegassa, Tolessa Teshome, Dirre Maasho, Tariku Bulsho, Yalew Banti, Biyansa Ibbaa, Tesfaye Biyansa, and Mengistu Mosisaa.

Ahead of the May 2015 election, "the TPLF/EPRDF government of Ethiopiahas started the campaigns of intimidation against whom it suspects are members of the other political organizations running for the election." thepresser stated. The League noted that three members Oromo Federalist Congress (OFC) Mr. Ahjeb Shek Mohammed, Mr. Mohammed Amin Kalifa and Mr. Naziv Jemal from Jimma Zone of Oromia were sentenced to two years and six months imprisonment charged with terrorism and dissemination of false and hateful information against the Ethiopian government.

Bekele Nega'a, Main Representative of OFC, told ESAT that the men werewrongly sentenced for hiding weapons while they do not at all have any weapon. Mrs Adanech, the wife Ahjeb Shek Mohammed, told ESAT that she has been unable to leave her house since her husband has been wrongly charged and sentenced. She has been denied of even getting a scratch of fire from neigbors and stones are often thrown to her house.

Adanech said her brother-in-law had moved to the town after he faced similar discrimination and attacks. It has to be recalled that Amnesty International revealed early in November 2014 that at least 5,000 Oromoswere imprisoned. (Text ends)

HISTORY: Tracing the Origins of Judith, a mysterious Ancient Queen ofEthiopia'

EPOCH TIMES By April Holloway, www.ancient-origins.net (November 22,2014)

According to local tradition, the fall of the Aksumite kingdom of Ethiopia toward the end of the 10th century A.D. was attributed to a queen who invaded from the south. This queen is said to have laid waste to the city ofAksum and the countryside, destroyed churches and monuments, usurpedthe throne from the ruling Aksumite king, and attempted to wipe out the remaining members of the royal family. Yet, this queen is a great mystery, and opinions about her vary from one scholar to another. For a start, the queen seems to have different names. Although she may have been known as Gudit, Judit, Yodit or Judith (which are similar), she is alsoknown as 'Esato in Amharic, and Ga'ewa in Teltal.

Despite the differences in name, there are other problems surrounding thecharacter of Gudit. For instance, Ethiopian tradition suggests that Gudit belonged to the Jewish faith, or had adopted it from her husband. This hasbeen disputed, however, as some have suggested that the queen adheredto a form of indigenous African-Ethiopian based religion. Thus, her resentment towards the Aksumite Kingdom may be interpreted as a reaction against the encroachment of her territories by the Christian kingdom. Another interpretation suggests that Gudit was neither a Jew, nor a pagan, but an Ethiopian Christian woman. In fact, it is also suggested that she belonged to the Aksumite royal family and had a legitimate claim to the throne, and she succeeded in capturing it in a succession struggle. The traditional depiction of the queen as 'Jewish' mayhave been metaphorical, rather than literal. In other words, Gudit may have been called Jewish simply based on her actions which were deemed 'un-Christian', such as the burning and destruction of churches.

Remembering a date (24th of November 1974) that shall live in infamy inEthiopian history.

Ethiopia's Black Saturday Remembered - The Provisional Military Administrative Council PMAC locally known as the Duerg and the Extra-judicial execution of November 24th , 1974

Important Notes:

On the fateful night of Saturday 23 November 1974, exactly 40 years agotoday, 60 prominent Ethiopians, government ministers and high ranking military officers from the just collapsed kingdom of Emperor HaileSelassiewere executed by the Marxist junta's firing squad. Even though they havenever been tried in a court for any crime, they were accused of corruptionand gunned down. The Ethiopian history has marked this day As "Black Saturday" and as always say "no one deserves to be forgotten."

Regardless of who they were or what they meant to our society, they deserve to be remembered. The Ethiopian history has marked this day As “Black Saturday” and as we always say “no one deserves to be forgotten.”Regardless of who they were or what they meant to our society, they deserve to be remembered. “ remember the day very well, I am sorry for them all,I didn't feel the same as I do now,we were a little brainwashed by the Duerg regime propoganda in the first months.” “As a human being it makes you sad to think of what happened to the emperor, his family and all the dignitaries and how many more have died in the same situation, as John Lennen song in his famous song ‘imagine’ "no reason todie or to kill for"

On the evening of November 23, 1994, the Duerg members reviewed alist of 250 detainees of the former imperial government for summary execution to cover up and to make the murder of Gen. Aman more palatable to the public..

On November 24, 1974, the Provisional Military Administrative Council(PMAC) locally known as the Duerg announced the dreadful news of itsdastardly deeds to a shocked public.

In justifying the summary executions, the Duerg issued the following statement: “The Council known locally as the Duerg, also found it necessary to execute former civilian and military officials on whose account repeated plots have been made that might engulf the country intoa bloodbath. This decision was imperative to save the lives of innocent people that had suffered for so long in the past.

Hence the Council ordered the execution of those found guilty of mal- administration, hindering fair administration of justice, selling secret documents of the country to foreign agents and attempting to disrupt thepresent Ethiopian popular movement.” The 60 victims were all buried in amass grave with their hands tied as evidence later proved following exhumation of their remains. The exhumation and reburial of the remainsof the 60 victims.

On that fateful day, a military junta gathered and took a “simple vote” tosummarily execute 60 high level government officials, civil servants, decorated war veterans and elite army officers and enlisted men of the imperial regime of H.I.M. Haile Selassie.

The 1974 military takeover of power in Ethiopia has been described alternatively as a “bloodless” and “creeping” coup. Unlike most Africancountries that experienced violent military coups in the post-colonial period, the junior officers in Ethiopia tiptoed their way into a power vacuum left by a decaying imperial regime whose leaders were in confusion and disarray over the burgeoning civil unrest at the time.

The “creeping” coup began haltingly as a ragtag bunch of junior officers bungled their way into power. Their slogan was “Yaleminim Dem Ityopia Tikdem” (“Without shedding blood, Ethiopia First (Forward)”) They organized themselves in a self-styled “Duerg”, (Coordinating Committee ofthe Armed Forces, Police, and Territorial Army). By September 1974, the Duerg had dethroned H.I.M. Haile Selassie and arrested many of his top officials.

The pretext for the Duerg’s seizure of power included the purported need to control the civil arrest triggered by student protests over economic hardships following the 1973 oil crises, the need to establish accountability for official neglect of widespread famine in northern Ethiopiaand to address mutinous soldiers’ demand for pay increases and improvements in military service conditions.

To ingratiate itself with the protesters and the public, the Duerg launched a public relations campaign using the rallying cry, “Ethiopia Tikdem (First)”. The Duerg later made a political platform out of the slogan to articulate its ideas about promoting equality and grassroots democracy, reforming the judicial, justice and land sectors and to pledge implementation of national health and literacy campaigns. The Duerg infused its populist propaganda with combative and militaristic rhetoric. In1975, the 120-member Duerg proclaimed its allegiance to communism and renamed itself the “Provisional Military Government of Ethiopia”.

Despite the official change in name, most people continued to refer to themilitary junta as “Duerg”.

As the Duerg implemented its “creeping coup”, it began arresting high level officials of the imperial government. The arrests provided grist to theanti-imperial government propaganda mill and fueled the widespread dissatisfaction with the imperial government and its ineptitude in dealing with pressing demands for economic, social and political change. The Duerg arrested and detained hundreds of officials in the imperial government. It promised to undertake a full investigation into their alleged official misconduct, wrongdoing and malfeasance. The promised investigative process was stillborn on the night of November 23, 1974.

The events leading to the executions of the 60 high officials of the imperialgovernment was diabolically conceived and staged by Majour Mengistu Hailemariam, a junior officer whos consumed by blind ambition. From the beginning, Mengistu’s eye was fixed on the top prize, the chairmanship of the Duerg; but he had to consolidate his power. Mengistu cleverly orchestrated the massacre of the 60 former imperial officials as his ultimate power play game for the chairmanship. Majour Mengistu first scapegoated Gen. Aman Michael Andom, the first titular chairman of the Duerg. Gen. Aman was not only a highly decorated military leader but alsowidely respected and loved by the troops under the Eastern military command. He led Ethiopian troops during the Korean War and distinguished himself in the Ethiopian Somali border conflicts in April,1964.

Mengistu set in motion an elaborate intrigue to oust Gen. Aman Andom byfabricating a story that Gen. Aman was plotting to sabotage the “revolution” spearheaded by the Duerg. He accused Gen. Aman of being an appeaser of the rebels in Eritrea because Gen. Aman had proposed a negotiated settlement of that conflict. Gen. Aman had ethnic roots from Tsa-Azega in Eritrea and Mengistu sought to play on prevailing sentimentsof ethnic mistrust in the Duerg. He depicted Gen. Aman as a conspirator and rebel sympathizer and insisted that the Eritrean rebellion could and should be crushed militarily.
Gen. Aman actually had other fundamental disagreements with Mengistuand his faction in the Duerg. For instance, Gen. Aman Mikael Andom as chairman rejected Mengistu’s demand for the summary execution of certain detained former imperial officials. Gen. Aman also did not believeEthiopia could be led by a gathering of callow and sophomoric NCO’s andenlisted men. As a result of deep disagreements with Mengistu, Gen.
Aman resigned.
On November 23, 1994, Mengistu sent troops to “arrest” Gen. Aman. In the ensuing battle, Gen. Aman Andom was killed. It was rumored that hecommitted suicide than be captured. It will never be known whether Gen.Aman could have delivered a negotiated settlement of the conflict in Eritrea, but in 1994 Eritrea seceded from Ethiopia. (Text ends)
70% Ethiopian women face physical and sexual harassment’Teen’s gang rape in Addis Ababa sounds alarm’
Hanna Lalango, 16, died on Nov. 1, from a brutal gang rape after five menkidnapped and held her captive for several days in Ethiopia’s capital, AddisAbaba. Hanna attended a private high school in the city’s Ayer Tena neighborhood.
On Oct. 1, the day of her kidnapping, Hanna, the youngest of six siblings,“complained about not feeling well” before she left for school. "She was atypical young girl ... a timid and respectful child," Hanna’s brother told Blen Sahilu, who first posted the story on Facebook, as part of the online #JusticeForHanna campaign. “She was really nice.” Hanna reportedly leftschool around 4 p.m. local time and got on a taxi that already had a couple of passengers. It is unclear at what point Hanna knew she was being kidnapped. But the culprits allegedly threatened the teen with knifeand took her to one of the suspect's house. Reports vary but Hanna’s father told the local media she was raped for at least five days.
Hanna’s kidnappers had other plans. They apparently contacted her sisters by phone, perhaps to kidnap them as well. They met the sisters at an arranged place, driving the same minibus, and reportedly asked themto come along. When they refused, the men drove off, exclaiming, “You won't see your sister then!” A few days later, the suspects left Hanna to die in an abandoned area in the outskirts of the city. Hanna was found unconscious on Oct. 11 and taken to hospital. “My phone rang 11 days after Hanna disappeared, it was the voice I missed,” Hanna’s father told the U.S.-based Admas Radio last week. “She was weak and exhausted.” For the next few days the family spent going between various referral hospitals and waiting to be admitted. Among other injuries, Hanna suffered from fistula and lost her battle 19 days after she was found. Shereportedly identified three of the five suspects from her hospital bed.

On Nov. 19, police brought five suspects before the First Appearance Court in Addis Ababa, according to local reports. During a hearing attended by journalists and women right's groups, one of the suspects pleaded innocence and all five denied the allegations, telling the courttheir initial confessions were obtained under duress. The police deniedtorturing the suspects and asked for 14 days to conduct further investigation.

Hanna could have been saved. The police were slow to investigate the case as a sexual crime. The hospitals failed to treat Hanna’s case with theoutmost urgency the situation demanded. I broke down in tears as I readabout Hanna’s ordeal. I tried to imagine what she might have felt as her captors took turns to satisfy their desires. I imagined how helpless she might have felt. I imagined Hanna worrying and speculating about how todeal with this tragedy or even tell her parents. Hanna spent days on the streets after suffering a brutal gang rape. It took her few days to call her parents and seek help. It remains unclear whether this was planned or a random incident. But Hanna’s story is far from isolated.

Guilt and sexual trauma: Ethiopia is a deeply patriarchal, closed and conservative country. It has one of the highest rates of sexual violence in the world. More than 70 percent of Ethiopian women face physical and sexual violence, according to a study by the World Health Organization (WHO). Seven percent of girls surveyed by WHO reported experiencing sexual abuse before the age of 15. Seventeen percent said their first sexual experience was forced. The country also has one of the highest rates of bridal kidnapping or marriage by abduction. Most women and girlskeep incidents of rape and sexual abuse secret to avoid societal shunning.About 39 percent never talk to anyone about the violence and the violations they endure, according to WHO. Even fewer women ask authorities for help. Some 53 percent feared repercussions and threats from their partners, while another 37 percent “considered the violence ‘normal’ or ‘not serious,’” the WHO report said. Worse still, most gender- based violence is solved through family arbitration and socially sanctionedcompensation for the victim’s family. As a result, women often don’t feel the need to go public with their story. Therefore, it is not surprising that

Hanna’s kidnappers reportedly sent “elders” seeking reconciliation withher parents even as Hanna clung to her last breath in a hospital bed. (Text ends)

Ethiopia's Growth In Education: Real or Deceptive?By Solomon G.S. (November 25, 2014)

Historically, education has been the creator of a level field ensuring poverty does not trap generation after generation of the poor. In meritocratic societies, with equality of educational opportunity, there is no reason that those born to poor parents should not break the cycle of poverty and change their life chances and status. Although such meritocracy was largely practiced in the West, recent trend lines show that only in the social democratic Nordic European countries this is assured. Other societies are being challenged by the power of money, inheritance and political connections. We will next see if Ethiopia’s educational system under the EPRDF will contribute towards changing, and reducing the growing inequality in the country.

Declining quality of education adversely impacts more the poor, as those with resources have alternatives at their disposal to improve their life chances by the means of money and connections. To start with, educatorstell us that the formative years of 1-5 are very crucial in one’s future educational success. In that regard, experts encourage wise investment inpre-school education and care of children. In Ethiopia, fate (or is it negligent regime?) is from the start against 68 children per 1,000 under the age of 5 as they prematurely die. This is in fact a far better number than the 200 deaths per 1,000 some 20 years ago. This is data EPRDF provided to the lending institutions and the World Health Organization in support of its claim of meeting the Millennium Development Goals of reducing child mortality by 2015. If the data is to be believed, still, the 68 deaths per 1,000 most disproportionately are deaths of children with poor mothers that did not have much to eat during pregnancy, and to get proper health care. Of those lucky enough to live, it is a safe bet to say that at least half of poor children are not going to school for lack of basic needs like food, shelter, and school supplies. This is strike 2 by fate. The small percentage (5% of poor children by some studies), then is faced with poor quality public schools that have little or no resources in contrast to those kids going to private and affluent schools. This is strike 3, and fate is not going to relent as it would pursue these hapless kids into middle and secondary education (where the dropout rate is 50% accordingto the Ministry of Education), and for those lucky enough to pursue their learning to tertiary level.

A few citizen commentators have written helpful essays on the current crisis in education in the country. The ones I have come across are on webpages inside the country and outside, including by Kal’ayu Abraha, Kidus Yohannes, Samrawit Hiruy, Assefa Belatchew, goolgul.com, and on a Wazema podcast, two educators, Abraham Alemu and Endalkatchew HaileMichael. Their righteous indignation, fear, and concerns about the shockingly declining quality can be summarized and categorized as enumerated below.

1. The politicization of education: Meles himself opened the floodgates when he said in mid-2000 in the Ethiopian Parliament that his party focuses on one's loyalty to EPRDF rather than on one's educational level. This was not idle talk. As the Party's practice over the last 2 decades haveshown, political cadres make decisions in educational office appointments,they get the choice scholarships, and they lord over teachers and professors while being students (to the point of demanding test date changes, grade changes and the like). For these cadres, hard work and study are foreign notions, as they can get what they want, including jobs after "graduation" simply because of their affiliation and connection. This leaves the majority of poor students, who are unable to afford a private orforeign education, to get lower grades than the cadres because they have no influence, and eventually when they graduate to remain jobless, thus forcing their hand to compromise their principles and to reluctantly ally with a branch of the ruling party's organizations.
2. Discipline: Because the system is so flawed and rigged, there is little incentive to observe school regulations, and law and order. Absenteeism,and only showing up on exam dates, is common, as are school site fighting and cheating.
3. Poor Quality of Education: This is a complex and circular problem. The quality of some teachers, especially those who are zonal university teachers, and to begin with got appointed not because of their undergraduate achievement, but due to "nativism", and by the Ministry ofEducation's decree, do not have to sit and pass a graduate university education exam, in turn go out with a master's degree and go to schools where the bland lead the bland. This is on top of the worthless degrees that are bought offshore and that pass for qualifying proof of matriculation. Nowhere is this poor quality more manifest in the poor English knowledge of both teachers and students alike. The desire in majoring in math and physics (basic parameters for technology and engineering growth) is tragic. Although the government has a policy of 70/30 to encourage the reach of the education of science, as one of the commentators said "math and science education is feared with the intensity for the fear of AIDS". As further evidence, Berhanu Nega quotesin his book a study by Forum for Social Studies in 2009, that said only 7.6% of high school students passed the national college entrance exam in 2007, and that number went even down the next year when only 3% passed (p.173).

4. Symbolism: The government seems to be perpetually seeking validation at home and abroad by announcing numbers and numbers only.The case of the over 30 university building is one such kitsch. No one questions about the quality and capacity of these institutions, not least theso-called development partners. They all parrot the " 4 or so pre-EPRDF universities growing now into over 30" line. This shortchanging quality for quantity is not limited to the number of new universities alone. The regime awards its party affiliates to put workshops and produce posters toevaluate the "condition of education" in Ethiopia and to make recommendations. The never-ending workshops and recommendations have become a money making business to domestic and foreign partners of EPRDF, and thus money and resources that could have been allocated to make real dent in closing the gap between poor and rich, and improve education, is being circularly wasted.

5. Mercantilism in education: At present there is a cottage industry of unregulated neighborhood colleges and universities. They are degree mills. The instructors know not to give D's and F's as that would kill theirmarket.

6. The regionalization of education: While the concept of decentralizing education in Ethiopia is excellent, as it will empower regions and provincesto properly manage the education of people in their respective regions, what is going on in EPRDF's Ethiopia in the name of decentralized education is the raising of a generation that has no knowledge of other parts, cultures and provinces of Ethiopia. One of the goals of education is to contribute to the ideal of a common Ethiopian citizenship by teaching students about the geography, history and common virtues of its citizens. Unfortunately, in EPRDF's Ethiopia, regions appear to have closed their doors, and looking at Ethiopians in other provinces as "Others".

7. Lack of Academic Freedom: Centers of higher learning, especially universities, are places for independent thinking and free expression of thought. A university is a place of research and experimentation. If academic freedom is stifled as is the current practice, there is no vibrancyand life, and no new ideas to improve the nation's future would be forthcoming.

8. No critical thinking in top to bottom education: An educational system afflicted with so many of the problems discussed above cannot be anything but a zombie, rote-learning, and walking dead system. Studentswant to conform and simply find jobs, rather than critically think and dissent when necessary.

9. Lack of Adequate Infrastructure: This should have been the easiest ofthe problems for EPRDF to solve. A regime that prides itself in erecting over 30 universities, and one that gets billions in development aid, has not been able to do basic infrastructure maintenance of some school facilities. Tables and desks are breaking in most schools; paint peeling offwalls, there is a shortage of text books, live electrical wires in some schools are open posing danger; there are no working generators as substitutes for the frequent power outages; and there is no reliable internet service for teachers and students to reliably do studies and research.

In conclusion, there are a number of actions the so-called developmentalstate could take to improve the condition of the undernourished. Setting aside the fundamental issues of human rights, and opening up the democratic space, the regime could take narrowly focused economic actions. For one, it could listen to the counsel of the majority of citizens and attempt legally to get the port of Asseb. Millions of our citizens believe Asseb is rightly ours. That way, the port fee the government has been paying to Djibouti, according to Getachew Begashaw and others, to the tune of $745 million annually – breaking down to $4.03 per person perday for every Djiboutian, would rather be spent at home in poverty reduction. Two, the regime could vigorously, and not half-heartedly and motivated by politics, as it does now, prosecute corruption cases and stop the billions of dollars leaving the country, thus saving money that could have otherwise been spent on improving education and poverty reduction.

Who in their right minds would think that the children of Koshe residents would break the cycle of poverty and that they themselves would not continue to live off Koshe as their parents now do? Not while EPRDF staysin power, or stays on its current misguided course.

Fighting for narrowing the gap between rich and poor, and reducing the growing inequality in Ethiopia is a noble cause. The problem cuts across all ethnic groups, religions, and gender differences. It is an Ethiopian issuethat must bring all Ethiopians of good will together in a socially just cause.(Text ends)

Is Ethiopian police covers up the Hana Lalango’s gangrape to deathmurder case?

ER COMMENTARY (December 1, 2014)

The following heart breaking report by the Ethiopian Police on EBC (formerly called ETV) today. As a survivor of sexual assault myself, I couldnot help but try to get more information and ask the following questions:

1. Hana was recovering well after she was admitted in hospital, but suddenly she was found dead. The family suspect that she was poisonedin the hospital. Is the family allowed to have an autopsy done by an independent expert to find out the cause of her death?
2. Why didn't the report mention that Hana was taken by her kidnappersto a shisha house that is frequented by government officials?

3. Why didn't the police report mention the fact that Hana's friend who tricked her into going to the shisha house where the gang rape took placeis still not in police custody? Is it because she could name the real rapistsand expose other rape incidents that she facilitated?

4. Why didn't the police talk about other shisha houses in several parts ofAddis Ababa that are being used to lure teenage girls and rape them? Is itbecause many of the rapists are police officers and government officials? Rape is common in today's Ethiopia because many of the perpetrators arepowerful people. In Hana's case, the taxi driver and a couple of other individuals may be punished, but the real culprits will walk free. (Text ends)

TPLF shockingly admits failures in EthiopiaBy Admasu Belay (December 2, 2014)

Since it came to power over 20 years ago, the TPLF regime has always declared its achievements in Ethiopia's political and economic sectors. Everybody knows the state media ETV and its daily nonstop propaganda ofhow much better Ethiopia has become over the years. Not only that, TPLF has been telling the international community about how it changed and transformed Ethiopia. So much so that it had even deceived some Bush and Obama adminstration officials to believe its lies. But after over 20 years, the London-based Financial Times (FT) reported today that TPLF has finally admitted its massive failures in Ethiopia.

Shockingly, the TPLF admitted its disasterous policy of landlocking Ethiopia and its economic impact as well as the risk of another famine in Ethiopia. For the last two decades, this "F word," was banned by Meles and all his TPLF disciples. In the past, If any foreign officials dared to use the words "famine" and "Ethiopia" in the same sentence, the wrath of TPLF's "ministry of foreign affairs (mfa)" would attack and humiliate themwith endless MFA press releases. Meles himself told Ethiopians to forget about famine and promised that even our poorer people "will eat three times a day very soon." That promise was made in 1994! Ironically today,the TPLF government sent a document to international investors, admitting another " risk of famine, the high level of poverty" in Ethiopia, according to the Financial Times. Not only has Ethiopia lost most of its hard currency reserves but the "steadily depreciating exchange rate may adversely affect Ethiopia’s economy?," according to the TPLF document.

That is not all. TPLF also admitted the chance of "resumption" of the warwith Eritrea and more unrest from "political turmoil" as well as bad relations with Djibouti causing the "blocking of the country's only access to the sea." It is about time TPLF accepted its failures! Out of TPLF's top five policy changes since it removed Mengistu regime in 1991, it has nowadmitted four policies have failed already.

On Eritrea policy and access to the sea. (ADMITTED FAILURE)Avoiding drought and famine (ADMITTED FAILURE)
On Improving Ethiopian economy/fiscal policies (ADMITTED FAILURE)Political reform and democratization (ADMITTED FAILURE)
Ethnic federalism (No admission yet)
Regarding the 5th TPLF policy, everybody knows TPLF has failed. Soon it will admit this failure too. In 1995, TPLF claimed its "ethnic federalism" system will empower tribes without dividing Ethiopians. But today, Ethiopia is the most ethnically divided country in the world. Ethnic hatred,propaganda and tensions today are the highest ever in history. Just like the 1990s Rwanda, tribalism has destroyed Ethiopian nationalism and humanity. Sooner or later, TPLF will be forced to admit its last and final failure. Regardless, Today will go down in history as the day TPLF admitted that ithas achieved almost nothing (other that a few tall buildings) since it removed the DERG regime in 1991. It has failed Ethiopia in every way possible. The only reason TPLF is still in power is because Ethiopians are peaceful people, unlike the warmongering and hate-filled TPLF. For all those EPRDF ruling party supporters and TPLF footsoldiers worldwide, thismust be the most embarasssing day. One single TPLF document has virtually dismissed over 20 years of ETV propaganda. Ethiopian government to people: This land is your land - psyche!By Vince Beiser Takepart.com (December 2, 2014)
Ethiopia’s rapid growth in recent years - per capita GDP has more than quadrupled since 2002 - is often touted as an African success story. But the economic boom is costing traditional pastoral people their land and livelihoods, a new report charges. The report comes just in time for this week’s Group of 20 summit in Brisbane, Australia—a meeting of leaders of“the world’s largest advanced and emerging economies.” On Friday, protesters with the international anti-poverty group OXFAM called on leaders to address the “rising tide” of global inequality, saying that rich countries exploit poor communities around the world. Ethiopia, like many developing nations (and the U.S., for that matter), hasin recent years started leasing huge tracts of land to foreign investors eager to develop industrial-scale farming operations. The country’s government has already handed over some 7.4 million acres. The problemis, millions of local people live on and use that land, according to the report by the California-based Oakland Institute and the U.K.’s Anywaa Survival Organisation.

The report focuses on Suri pastoralists—herders of cattle, goats, and sheep—who have lived in Southwestern Ethiopia for centuries. Massive agriculture development is now cutting them off from grazing lands and water supplies essential to their survival. “Here they push and push and push until we don’t have a choice,” says C.D., a Suri man from Regia Village quoted in the report. “I did not decide to go myself. I go because they push.” The groups’ investigation began after violence broke out in the area in 2012 when the government diverted water from the Koka riverto irrigate a foreign-owned palm oil plantation, drying up the Suri’s water source for their cattle. The Suri responded with a violent uprising, which led in turn to the massacre of 54 unarmed Suri by government forces at amarketplace. The fighting has also sparked conflict between the Suri and various local ethnic groups, something other organizations have warned about.

“The tragic experiences of the Suri people outlined in this report are justone of many examples of the human rights abuses experienced by pastoralist communities in regions across Ethiopia,” said the Oakland Institute’s executive director, Anuradha Mittal, in a statement. “These incidents are intimately tied to the Ethiopian government’s priorities of leasing land to foreign entities.” The report also shows that World Bank funds have been used to encourage the forced resettlement of pastoral communities, using suspension of food aid as a threat to force them to move.

Ethiopia’s government also happens to be among the world’s largest recipients of U.S. assistance, slated to receive nearly half a billion dollars in American aid this year. It was also the beneficiary of one of the world’s most famous charitable efforts 30 years ago: the Band Aid song “Do They Know It’s Christmas,” a star-studded single recorded to raise money to aidfamine victims. Rocker Bob Geldof, who organized that effort and was knighted by the Queen of England for his efforts, announced this week he’s producing a new version of the song with new performers including Coldplay's Chris Martin and Sinead O’Connor. This time, funds will be directed to help the fight against Ebola. (Text ends)

ECONOMY: The risk of investing in Ethiopia - FINANCIAL TIMESLONDON – (December 3, 2014)

Every country tapping the global sovereign bond market details the dangers investors face in its prospectus, often in a boilerplate section enumerating possible problems – such as fiscal deficits or taxation issues

− that is largely ignored. But the document sent by Ethiopia to international investors ahead of its foray into the global sovereign bondmarket is somewhat different. Far from a boilerplate, it includes a list of unfamiliar hazards, such as famine, political tension and war.

The document, seen by the Financial Times, is a sobering reminder of therisk of investing in one of Africa’s less developed nations. With gross domestic product per capita at less than $550 per year, Ethiopia is the poorest country yet to issue global bonds. In the 108-page prospectus, issued ahead of its expected $1bn bond, Ethiopia tells investors they needto consider the potential resumption of the Eritrea-Ethiopia war, which ended in 2000, although it “does not anticipate future conflict”.

There is also the risk of famine, the “high level of poverty” and strained public finances, as well as the possible, if unlikely, blocking of the country’s only access to the sea through neighbouring Djibouti should relations between the two countries sour. Addis Ababa, Ethiopia’s capital, also warns that it is ranked close to the bottom of the UN Human Development Index – 173rd out of 187 nations – and cautions about the possibility of political turmoil. “The next general election is due to take place in May 2015 and while the government expects these elections to bepeaceful, there is a risk that political tension and unrest . . . may occur.”

Ethiopia: The Right To Remain Silent By Ben Rawlence (December 4, 2014)

Few political rights exist in Ethiopia and even fewer voices criticise the government. The right to remain silent is one liberty not denied to critics of the Ethiopian government. Most other political entitlements have vanished. This explains the puzzle of Ethiopia's invisible political opposition: it is so battered and brutalised, tattered and torn, that what isleft of its pieces may never fit together again.

The current government is mostly to blame. It came to power in 1991 after it toppled the communist military junta led by despot Mengistu HaileMariam. The victorious coalition of ethnic militias promised a new dispensation, based on the concept of "ethnic federalism". But nearly a quarter of a century later, Ethiopia remains a de facto one-party state. Ascountless analysts have noted, including successive European Union election observation missions, there is no separation between the government bureaucracy and the ruling Ethiopian Peoples Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). No political space is allowed to dissenting voices.

Most critics are behind bars, the first and main reason for the absence of apolitical opposition in Africa's oldest independent nation. Of the 547 members of Parliament (MPs), only one is from an opposition party. GirmaSeif Maru of the Unity for Democracy and Justice party (UDJ) is the lonely MP--window dressing whom the government allowed to win a seat in the last general election in 2010. But large swathes of the UDJ are in prison.

Other opposition party members, including Bekele Gerba, a leader of theOromo Federalist Democratic Movement, and Olbana Lelisa of the Oromo People's Congress Party, were imprisoned days after meeting withrepresentatives from Amnesty International in 2011.

Andualem Arage, the UDJ's vice-chairman, and another UDJ leader, Natnael Mekonnen, were put behind bars for debating the 2011 Arab spring rebellions. So was outspoken journalist Eskinder Nega, who posed questions about the possibility of a similar Ethiopian movement in his online pieces. In June 2012 Mr Andualem was sentenced to 75 years in prison, while Messrs Eskinder and Natnael got off lighter with 18 each.

They are just three of the thousands of government critics silenced in the slammer. Barely a month goes by without news of fresh arrests and detentions. In July, four more leaders of the UDJ, Arena Tigray and Semayawi ("Blue") opposition parties were detained. In addition, Andargachew Tsige, an Ethiopian opposition leader and British citizen, wasarrested in Yemen and extradited to Addis Ababa, the capital, in July. He is facing the death penalty for allegedly plotting a coup in 2009.

In July 2013, thousands of people took to the streets of Addis Ababa demanding the release of some of Ethiopia's estimated 30,000-40,000 political prisoners, according to Amnesty International and Human RightsWatch. The protestors also called for the repeal of a draconian anti-terrorlaw that has been exploited to target legitimate opposition members.

Crackdowns and arrests followed, including the detention of 40 UDJ activists who had distributed flyers encouraging people to protest. The second reason for the opposition's muffled voice is fear: a decade or moreof repression has taken its toll. The government spies on dissidents in thediaspora and uses its control of food aid to literally starve the opposition at home, according to Human Rights Watch. Yet, Ethiopia's citizens seem to passively accept each new transgression of their rights. They are just too scared to fight back.

A brief emancipatory moment swept Ethiopia in 2005. The ruling EPRDF, under the leadership of the late Meles Zenawi, allowed the forerunner of the UDJ, the Coalition for Unity and Democracy (CUD), a degree of freedom to campaign in the general elections that year. In polls that appeared relatively free, 174 opposition MPs were elected. But the CUD disputed the results and protests erupted in the capital. Police killed nearly200 unarmed protestors and arrested 40,000 CUD members and sympathisers in a nationwide clampdown, according to media reports. Thememory of that brutality still casts a long shadow. Since then, the government has given no quarter.

This is the third factor explaining Ethiopia's invisible opposition: the government controls every aspect of daily life. In 2010 Human Rights Watch documented the strategic use of food aid, agricultural inputs such as seeds and fertilisers, access to microcredit, teacher training and even university admissions to encourage support for the ruling party. It worked.In the 2008 local election the ruling party won 99% of the votes and 3m local government seats. In the 2010 general election, the debacle of 2005was avoided and voting was peaceful. The EPRDF took 99.6% of the parliamentary slots, leaving the UDJ with the one decorative seat.

The final squeeze on the political opposition and any form of dissent hasbeen the use of repressive laws. The 2009 anti-terror law has a sweeping definition of terrorism. Another 2009 law bans NGOs that engage in human rights or advocacy activities from receiving more than 10% of their funds from abroad. It also requiresall NGOs to re-register with a new government agency. This legislation closed down Ethiopia's critical organisations and made hundreds of activists redundant. As long-time Ethiopia observer, René Lefort, commented in July in an article on the Open Democracy website: "When the political space is impermeable, the inevitable internal conflicts can only overflow into the ethnic and/or religious sphere." They have. The government has been jostling for the last two years with the Muslim community that objected to government attempts to interfere in the appointments of the Islamic council. Every Friday, peaceful protests are held at mosques in Addis Ababa. Every Friday security forces shut them down and jail religious leaders, as reported in the media and acknowledged implicitly by government statements.

In June more protests erupted just outside Addis Ababa in opposition to what is considered a discriminatory plan by the city council to expand the capital and displace many of the ethnic Oromos who live at its edges. The government often makes blanket accusations against critics based on theirethnicity, linking them to banned ethnic-based militias such as the Oromo Liberation Front and the Ogaden National Liberation Front, active in Ethiopia's eastern Somali region. At least 5,000 ethnic Oromos have been arrested between 2011 and 2014 based on their actual or suspected opposition to the government, according to an October 2014 Amnesty International report.

The EPRDF has portrayed itself as a vanguard party, charged with a sacred duty to articulate the "developmental state". Its dictum is "You are either with or against us." It has evolved a rich rhetoric for those who oppose it by labelling them "anti-development" or "neoliberal". In the meantime, the state's command economy depends on dollars from "neoliberal" donors. It took $3 billion in external assistance in 2012, according to the World Bank, more than any other country in Africa. In therun-up to the May 2015 general election, will the EPRDF allow the opposition to compete? Will the opposition participate or boycott the polls?Such queries are beside the point: the struggle for democracy in Ethiopia was lost long ago. The next election will be another EPRDF landslide, in keeping with the history of the current ruling party and its revolutionary roots. Ethiopia sees record coffee exports after Brazil's drought’

By ADDIS ABABA (Reuters) (December 5, 2014) - Ethiopia expects coffeeexports for its 2014/15 crop to hit a record high because of drought and disease stifling crops in Latin America, the head of its exporters association said on Wednesday. An unprecedented drought early this yearreduced the 2014/15 crop in the world's biggest coffee producer Brazil.

The International Coffee Organization forecast in September that globalcoffee production will fall short of demand.

In the four months from July this year, Ethiopia - Africa's biggest producerof the bean - exported 54,000 tonnes of coffee worth $231.9 million, compared with the $172.5 million it earned from 51,000 tonnes over the same period last year. Hussein Agraw, chairperson of the Ethiopian CoffeeExporters' Association, said he expected the amount of coffee exported to rise to 235,000 tonnes by the end of 2014/2015, generating $862 million in revenue. Ethiopia exported around 190,000 tonnes in 2013/14, earning $841 million, he said. Exports hit a previous record high of 193,000tonnes the year before, he said.

"We are making these expectations because of the fall in production inBrazil," he told Reuters.

"Because of this, we are expecting the international market to go up,"Hussein added, referring to demand.

Total coffee production in Ethiopia amounted to 450,000 tonnes over the 2013/14 period, according to official figures. Officials expect a similar output by the end of 2014/15. Ethiopia prides itself on being the birthplace of coffee. Some 15 million people are involved in its production,mostly in smallholder farms in the misty forested highlands in the country's west and southwest.

Ethiopia launches $1 bln debut Eurobond

ADDIS ABABA (Reuters) (December 5, 2014) - Ethiopia launched a $1 billion debut Eurobond with a term of 10 years and yield of 6.625 percenton Thursday, swiftly attracting an initial order book worth more than $2.6billion, Thomson Reuters news service IFR reported. Rated B1 by Moody'sand B by Standard & Poor's ratings agencies -- well below investment grade -- it is the latest African sovereign to receive a strong response in its first foray in the international debt markets. IFR cited a lead bank for its report, without naming the source. Deutsche Bank and JP Morgan are the lead managers. Ethiopia, which 30 years ago struggled with famine, now boasts some of the fastest economic growth rates in Africa, around 9percent according to the International Monetary Fund.

It is also among the poorest African nations to launch such a bond, analysts said. Gross domestic product per capita was $631.50 in fiscal 2013/14, according to the bond prospectus obtained by Reuters. After years when major central banks have taken interest rates to record lows,there is keen investor appetite for debt offering high yields. Consultancy IHS Global said it had expected a strong reception, citing growth prospects and limited external debts.

In a research note, IHS also cited "non-negligible risks" to repayment, saying growth rates may be overstated and limited hard currency earningsmade debt servicing capacity weaker than some other African sovereigns. The IMF said in a September report that the risk of Ethiopia facing external and public "debt distress" remained low but said it was on the "cusp of a transition to moderate" risk. It estimated public debt at 44.7 percent of GDP in fiscal 2013/14.

IHS noted Ethiopia only had foreign reserves to cover 2.2 months of imports in 2013/14 and said the capacity to build reserves would remainunder pressure in the near term due to a limited ability to increase exports and foreign investment. Kenya had almost four months' reservescover when it launched its debut $2 billion Eurobond in June. Kenya secured a yield of 5.90 percent when it increased the size of the bond's 10-year tranche last week. That compares to 6.875 percent at launch. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA: Police use brute force to detain opposition figures, activists’

Ethiomedia, ADDIS ABABA (December 6, 2014) - A huge federal police force on Saturday rounded up and brutally beat opposition party leaders, supporters and rally organizers who were streaming to a big square in thecapital to stage a protest rally. Prominent among those arrested are YilikalGetnet, leader of the opposition Semayawi Party, and dozens of other senior opposition party figures. The huge Meskel Square where the rally was to be held was a scene of police brutality, with unarmed civilian protesters coming under attacks by club- and batton-wielding members ofthe Federal Police force.

Police blocked the main roads that lead to the Meskel Square, arresting several members of the Muslim community whom they took along with others to the Exhibition Center, which police turned to a temporary detention facility. The protest rally organized by nine opposition coalitiontaksforce was to pressure the ruling party that a forthcoming election befree and fair. Intentionally fragmented along ethnic lines, impoverished Ethiopia has been under a one-party repressive rule since 1991.

ADDIS ABABA (updates) - Senior opposition party leaders and three busloads of protesters were admitted to the 3rd Police Station on Saturday night, eye-witnesses said. The 3rd police station is adjacent to the infamous Maekelawi Prison in the capital. Many of the arrested were limping with injuries from police beatings. Engineer Yilikal Getnet, chairman of Semayawi Party, reportedly suffered a broken hand.Families and friends who tried to take food and clothing to the detainees at the 3rdPolice Station and elsewhere, were turned back, without passing the essentials. Other activists who suffered beatings were also being held at Kazanchis and Cherkos police stations.

ETHIO-POLITICS: Sebhat Nega wants to return to TPLF ExecutivePolitburo'

(Indian Ocean Newsletter) Removed from the politburo of the Tigray People’s Liberation Front (TPLF) in 2010, Sebhat Nega still holds hopes of once again heading the party he helped to found. Despite his advancing years and his ousting from the top of the Tigray People’s Liberation Front (TPLF, mainstay of the coalition ruling Ethiopia) and from EFFORT (the holding company for TPLF companies), Sebhat Nega is keen to go beyond his current post of executive director of the pro-government Ethiopian International Institute for Peace and Development (EIIPD). An old hand inthe TPLF who has long been in dispute with Azeb Mesfin, the widow of thelate Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, he is still making his presence felt behind the political scenes. While on a tour of the Tigray Regional State inearly May to sound out the local TPLF leaders, managers and activists, Sebhat Nega hit the headlines when he agreed with those present at a meeting denouncing corruption, nepotism and iniquity of the TPLF regime.He then immediately toned down his criticisms, stating “we must join together to solve these problems”. Interviewed about the TPLF’s record on the German radio station Deutsche Welle in the Amharic language a few days ago, Sebhat Nega defended the party's policies over the 23 years it has been in power since 1991. He justified sidelining the pan-Ethiopian organisations in the Transitional Conference of the time. Nevertheless, hethen stated he was prepared to launch a campaign himself to reconcile with these political groups. (Text ends)

MIGRATION: Yemen migrant boat carrying Ethiopians sinks killing over 70'

(BBC News December 7, 2014) Last updated: A boat carrying African migrants has sunk off Yemen's western coast, killing 70 people, Yemeni officials say. The boat, carrying mostly Ethiopian migrants, sank off Yemen's al-Makha port due to strong winds and rough waves, security officials said. Tens of thousands attempt to cross the Red Sea into Yemenevery year, often in rickety, overcrowded vessels. Hundreds have died making the journey. Yemen is viewed by many migrants as a gateway to the Middle East or Europe. The latest sinking occurred on Saturday, with reports of the incident emerging on Sunday. The Red Sea crossing between the Horn of Africa and Yemen is one of theworld's major migration routes, BBC Arab affairs editor Alan Johnston says.Migrants dream of finding jobs and better lives in rich places like Saudi Arabia - but they are in the hands of unscrupulous people smugglers and, too often, never reach the Yemeni shore, our correspondent adds. In October, the UN refugee agency said that more than 200 people had died at sea in 2014 while attempting to reach Yemen. "There have been frequent reports of mistreatment, abuse, rape and torture, and the increasingly cruel measures being adopted by smuggling rings seem to account for the increase in deaths at sea," the UN said at the time. Many travel to Yemen in hope of finding better lives in the Middle East or Europe

Over 21 bodies recovered after 70 Ethiopian migrants drowned off Yemencoast: UN'

SANAA AFP (December 8, 2014) - The UN refugee agency said Monday 21bodies have been recovered after Yemen reported dozens of Ethiopian migrants drowning when their boat sank near the entrance to the Red Sea.The interior ministry in Sanaa said in a statement posted on its website Sunday that 70 migrants had died when their vessel capsized in bad weather off the port of Al-Makha, near Bab el-Mandab strait. "All those who were on board died," the statement said, adding that they wereall from Ethiopia.

It named the boat's owner as known people smuggler Ahmed Salem al- Hilali, and said security forces were hunting for him.The ministry did not say when the accident took place, but the UN refugee agency's representative in Sanaa, Jamal Al-Najjar, told AFP it happened more thantwo days earlier. "So far, we have recorded the bodies of 21 Ethiopian migrants who died in a shipwreck overnight Friday Saturday off Al-Makha," he said. "The search continues for more possible victims."

Thousands of people fleeing troubled Horn of Africa states try to reach Yemen every year in the hope of using the impoverished Arabian Peninsula state as a stepping stone to oil-rich Saudi Arabia and the Gulf. In the past five years, more than 500,000 people -- mostly Eritreans, Ethiopians and Somalis -- have reached Yemen via the Gulf of Aden andthe Red Sea following treacherous journeys on vessels that are often overloaded. The country is home to up to two million migrants, mostly illegals who entered from other countries of the Arabian Peninsula, according to unofficial estimates commonly cited by experts and humanitarian organisations.

In October, the UNHCR said the number of migrants and asylum seekers from the region losing their lives while trying to reach Yemen in 2014 wasthe highest in years, exceeding the combined total for 2011, 2012 and 2013. On May 31, 60 migrants from Ethiopia and Somalia along with two Yemeni crew members drowned off the coast of Yemen, the agency said. On October 2, 64 migrants and three crew died when their vessel sank in the Gulf of Aden after leaving Somalia, UNHCR spokesman William Spindler told reporters in Geneva.

It was the deadliest sinking since June, when 62 people died. Forty-four people perished in March in another incident, while another in April claimed 12 lives. "From the beginning of the year to the end of October, 205 African migrants have died off Yemen," the UN agency's Najjar said inSanaa. Yemen is the only country in the Arabian Peninsula that is signatory to two international accords dating back to 1951 and 1967 governing the protection of refugees. It currently hosts 246,000 refugees,of whom more than 230,000 are from Somalia and a smaller number fromEthiopia, Eritrea, Iraq and Syria, according to UNHCR figures. (Text ends)

DIARIES The 24-Hour Semayawi (Blue) Party's Addis Ababa protest -update

Semayawi Party office in Ethiopia's capital surrounded by police. Federal Police surrounded Semayawi Party's office in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, ahead of the 24 hour protest demonstration that was called by acoalition of 9 opposition groups for this coming weekend. The protest is planned to be held at Meskel Square.

The 24-hour protest that was called by a coalition of 9 Ethiopian opposition groups is currently taking place in Addis Ababa. The Federal Police is arresting many of the organizers and blocking the streets so thatthe protesters do not arrive at Meskel Square. Police is trying to disperse the demonstration:

Senior Blue Party leaders, members and supports have been detained (Updates) On Saturday, December 6,2014, the ethnic based Ethiopian government security forces have arrested leaders of Blue and other Partyleaders, members and supporters at the start of a peaceful public rally todemand free and fair election. Blue Party Chairman Eng. Yilkal Getnet along with senior party members have been detained. This protest rally was organized by a coalition of opposition political parties fully in compliance with the law.

This is a clear manifestation of the governing party's total dictatorship andabsolute intolerance for peaceful decent. At this point, the exact number of detainees is not available nor where they have been detained. We will release more information soon. (Text ends)

Ethiopian Parliament Passes Ethio-Sudan Security Agreement Bill'The Reporter ADDIS ABABA, ETHIOPIA (December 8, 2014)

Editor's Note - What is adopted as law is further evidence on the part ofthe ruling party in Ethiopia that: 1) The vast, fertile areas from which Ethiopian farmers were uprooted and ceded to Sudan are now an indisputable part of Sudanese sovereignty, and 2nd) Ethiopians who fleeto the Sudan for fear of political persecution would be hunted down anywhere in Sudan, and be extradited for further punishment, and possibly death.

The House of Peoples' Representatives (HPR) on Tuesday passed a bill dubbed the Mutual Legal Assistance Agreement on Criminal Matters between Sudan and Ethiopia. The bill stipulates an exchange of vital evidence and witnesses in criminal investigation taking place in the twocountries that was signed between the governments of Ethiopia and Sudan in December 2013.

The security cooperation deal was first signed in Khartoum ultimately focusing on information and evidence exchanges as part of fighting cross border crimes and terrorism. A month ago the Houses deliberated on several provisions including the extradition of suspected criminal and exchange of intelligence regarding documentation and profiles of criminalsamong the two nations. The security pact, which the Ethiopian government considers it as a highly rated agreement for its security and cross border criminal offenses, was highly accepted and was endorsed nemine contradicente.

According to the document presented to the house last month, the security agreement is intended to ensure peace and stability which in duecourse helps restoring justice. Detailed in the agreement, the mutual assistance that is expected to be implemented includes taking evidence and statement from persons; assisting in availability of detained persons or others to give evidence or assisting in criminal investigation; effecting service of judicial documents; executing searches and seizures; examiningobjects and sites; providing information and evidentiary items; providing certified documents such as banks', financial; in general corporate and business records. Earlier this year, in April, minister of Defense Siraj Fegessa told MPs that the country had agreed with the Government of Sudan to establish joint forces to tighten security along the common border of the two nations against any external aggression and potential threat. Meanwhile, the latest document revealed that judicial cooperation will help contribute to combat and control the growing cross-border criminal activity that stretches to international level. A Regime At The Wrong Side of History - Why TPLF is in a rush to destroyhistoric books and records? What is behind TPLF's rush to destroy records?

By Professor Mesfin Woldemariam (December 8, 2014)

Thirty to fifty years ago the TWINS, the shabia (EPLF) and the weyyane (TPLF) discovered that one of their formidable and impregnable enemies was RECORDED HISTORY. In their boundless ignorance they believed theycould wipe out RECORDED HISTORY by destroying the books on Ethiopia. They started their destructive campaign in London and Washington DC. The University of London and the Library of Congress were, I believe, theirfirst targets. This is a consequence mainly attributable to IGNORANCE.

Now that the TWINS are presumably incontestably in power they have resumed their campaign of destruction of accumulated knowledge. In Ethiopia the campaign started with the libraries in the Catholic Churches, The Municipality of Addis Abeba and perhaps in less known other organizations. Priceless books in these institutions and organizations weresold dirt-cheap by weight! Fortunately for Ethiopia their ignorance when combined with their greed led to a consequence partially opposite to their desired purpose of total destruction. Although some books were bought bythose who would destroy them, some were also bought by those would preserve them.

Now the weyyane possessed by ignorance and greed attacked the most important treasure of the country: THE ETHIOPIAN NATIONAL LIBRARY. The ancient books in this library were sold at a price of ten Birr (US $0.50)per kilo. Is this not a crime against humanity? Are the Western Powers free from this crime? Does this not demonstrate the TOTALITARIAN TYRANNY under which the Ethiopian people live? Is this not a war against knowledge, against science? Is this not a war against human progress? Is this not a childish attempt to start Ethiopian, indeed Human, history like animals from zero? Is this not a solid proof for the fact that there are no universities in Ethiopia?

Jean Paul Sartre emphatically explains that every generation of all animalsstarts from zero with no accumulated experience to guide it. The weyyaneproject is to reduce all Ethiopians to their level of ignorance; however theyfail to realize the universality of knowledge and science. Therefore, while they have American dollars, European Euros and English Pounds as well asWestern war machines, they may believe they will succeed in keeping Ethiopians ignorant. Add to this the stifling of freedom of expression, internet, newspapers and other free and independent media there is surely a tremendous weight of ignorance on them; but they are not givingup the pursuit of knowledge. In fact the Project-Ignorance of the weyyanehas become a challenge for Ethiopians to know more about themselves and the world. Today, thanks to the weyyane and the Derg there is inhabited continent where Ethiopians are not found.

Most of all the Weyyane Project forgets or ignores the fact that Ethiopia was a symbol of FREEDOM AND INDEPENDENCE and a BEACON OF HOPE as well as an INSPIRATION OF COURAGE. A proud history of a proud people standing solidly for thousands of years has been reduced to a mere collection of tribes who were forcefully united by Minilik. The Weyyane Project ignores or forgets the tumultuous Sixteen Century that brought challenges which the Ethiopian people converted into opportunities. It is these challenges and opportunities that shaped present-day Ethiopia. The Weyyane Project has no notion about the resilience of the Ethiopian people. If the weyyane live to regret their ignorance and their stupidity, they will witness the rise of Ethiopia with vengeance! The above photographs of the covers of some of these priceless books are onlya small sample of the consequence of the Weyyane Project making moneyby selling cheaply these books by weight. Dysgenics In Ethiopia

PERSPECTIVE by ANONIMOUS (December 9, 2014)

This topic might be very controversial but is a reality and a key answer towhy Ethiopia found itself at the bottom of every index of measurements you see in our time; economic, IQ, good governance, humanity, morality,character...etc.

As you all know, the student movements in the 1960s produced massive number of bright kids who went to universities all over the world, becomeable learners and sacrifice all for the betterment of society. There was a lot of naivities related mainly to age, but they took a noble cause demanding land to the tillers, equality in all spectrum...etc

In ethiopia, bright high school kids, together with very bright university counterparts and successful professionals (doctors, philosophers, lawyers..etc) all joined EPRP, MEISON...etc colliding with the military junta(derg) due to differences on how the country should be governed. The result of such political disagreement was the massacre of the brightest and the cream of the societies elite. Estimates indicate that the low ranking and low IQ derg military junta massacred more than 50k elite opponents in an urban crackdown that resulted this dysgenic effect. Some estimates put the number of the dead between 100k-500k.

Ethiopian population at the time was probably 20 million. And losing sucha high number of bright and high IQ elite people has consequences and that consequence is the situation where 80 million Ethiopian found themselves now; I.e live a sub-human life standard.

With the loss of those bright generation, the low IQ section of the population managed to breed and over breed making the country the 2ndfrom the bottom in many of the measures I listed on the beginning of the paragraph. Such low quality population that filled the demographics now can not seem to find a way out from the stalemate. We see it people labouring on demonstrations which proved to have no positive outcome. We even see it here in this forum that people who are under brutal oppression chose to direct their energy on other oppressed people rather than the opposer. The corruption in opposition and lack of understanding the big picture and forming hundreds of opposition parties rather than narrowing that to a good 4 or 5...etc

The other fact that we have to know is that the elite of our society are moving out of the country and migrating to the west to never return back.This is also called "brain drain". We have thousands of doctors, engeeners,artists, ..etc basically the elites of our society moving out leaving the country to be filled by low quality population that will be unable to find solutions because it was breed from low Intellegence family.

If we have to see a bright Ethiopia, we only have two avenues.

1) those who have a better Intellegence within the regime (if they exist)try to see the big picture anderstand this fact, democratize the country, stop brain drain and create incentive to bring back those who are out tocontribute in Ethiopia and breed there to tip the balance against the lowIQ ones

2)the diaspora form a platform for all to engage and narrow differences tochange the system in Ethiopia eventually stopping the brain drain and therepatriation of the highly intelligent diaspora elites.

This can only happen through institutionalized effort where corruption andone man dictatorship is not tolerated. That is the only way out. If this is not done, Ethiopia will regress further and further. We are already a liability for the world since we are still unable to feed ourselves. The day they unplug the AID, caos will reign in that land and we will be forced to say adios to peace and we will be on headlines similar to the 1990s Rwanda. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIAN POLITICS: Opposition leaders denied bail, reportmistreatment’

Ethiomedia (December 9, 2014)

On December 6, police and security forces were everywhere, beating andarresting anyone suspected of trying to join a planned protest rally. Manyended up in prison, facing 'treason' charges as usual

ADDIS ABABA - Nine opposition leaders and dozens of protesters who were on Monday charged with "attempts to overthrow the constitutionalorder" were denied bail and sent back to prison because the prosecutorneeded more time to collect evidence, a source has reported.

The US-based pro-democracy website, Abugidainfo, said the detainees who on December 6 tried to stage a protest rally in Addis but came underbrutal police attacks are advocates of a non-violent struggle for democracy and justice but were now the victims of government brutality and violence.

The detainees, including Semayawi Party chairman Yilikal Getnet, ArchaffoErdalo, Alessa Mengesha and others, were also accused of "stirring violence and holding an illegal protest rally." The charges, including what the prosecutor put as "attempts to overthrow the constitutional order," carry long-term prison sentences. "Nine leading Semayawi Party figures as well as journalist Belai Manaye complained to the court that they were tortured in addition to being held in freezing and dark solitary confinements," Abugida said of the hearing which was closed to public.

Meanwhile, FaceBook activists, including Eyerusalem Tamiru and 27 others also appeared in Kera Court but were denied bail and sent back toprison as their hearing was adjourned for next Tuesday.

Human Rights Watch and other organizations often criticize the government's appalling human rights violations that are worsening fromtime to time. The rights groups accuse the West, which for instance, pumped $4 billion into the coffers of the regime in 2013 alone, of being indifferent to crimes against non-violent opposition parties as well as journalists and bloggers. Hana Lalango's ‘Gang-rape To Death’ Case Causes Scrutiny of Ethiopia’sAnti-NGO Law’

NEWSANALYSIS (December 9, 2014)

The brutal kidnapping and gang rape of a teenage student in Addis Ababahas spurred a movement against gender-based violence in Ethiopia and throughout the country's diaspora communities. Sixteen-year-old Hanna Lalango was abducted by a taxi driver and a group of passengers in Ethiopia's capital on October 1 after she boarded the driver's vehicle on her way home from school, according to local media reports, activists, andother sources who spoke with VICE News about the incident. A few days later, Lalango's sisters received a call from the kidnappers, who offered toarrange a meeting to negotiate the release of their hostage. When the sisters arrived at the meeting, they were asked to board the same taxi used for Hanna's kidnapping in order to be taken to the house where she was held. The sisters refused, and the assailants drove off, shouting that Lalango would not be released. On October 11, Lalango called her father and directed him to the Kolfe Keraneo district in western Addis Ababa, where the kidnappers had abandoned her. She revealed that multiple menraped her repeatedly over a period of at least five days, and was reportedly able to identify three out of five suspects from her hospital bed.She received treatment at several hospitals in Addis Ababa, but died November 1 from wounds sustained during the attacks.

The incident galvanized activists on social media, and the hashtag #JusticeForHanna became a top trending topic on Twitter in Ethiopia. A "Justice for Hanna" page on Facebook has received more than 20,000 likes. Activists are now demanding that national press outlets in Ethiopia devote extensive coverage to Lalango's case and the issues that surround it. The UN's International Day for the Elimination of Violence Against Women, which was observed Tuesday, November 25, has also helped raise awareness of Lalango's case. An epidemic of brutal sexual assaults isterrorizing women in Bangladesh. Read more here. "Women's rights organizations and concerned citizens are calling upon the media to move away from sensationalized reporting and move toward sustainable reporting in highlighting the systemic gaps that perpetuate such acts," an author and women's rights activist coordinating awareness campaigns about the incident in Addis Ababa, who requested anonymity, told VICE News.

Blen Sahilu, a former lecturer at Addis Ababa University who helped organize a November 24 press conference on the case, posted on Facebook that since Hanna's trial started receiving media attention, other accounts of sexual assault have begun to surface in Addis Ababa. "In this past week alone I have heard of so many similar stories that I began to wonder where I have been all this time?" she wrote. "One girl here, another one there, a few more in that high school [...] we are all in pain I guess." Sahilu, who could not be reached for comment, continued, writing,"Many families bury the secret and soldier on, perpetuating the myth that this is not such a big problem."

According to a 2005 World Health Organization report, 71 percent of women in parts of Ethiopia have experienced some form of physical or sexual assault. While 75 percent of women interviewed for the study in Brazil, Namibia, Japan, and other countries said violence by men towardwomen was never justified, only 25 percent of the women interviewed from Ethiopia shared the same opinion. Tigist Geme, a former lecturer at Addis Ababa University, wrote a column for Al Jazeera America about Lalango's case, arguing that Ethiopia's legal constraints on non-governmental organizations (NGOs) are partly responsible for the lack of infrastructure to prevent and document violence against women in the country. Ethiopian researcher Rediet Yibekal Wegayehu, who reported on Lalango's case for the blog Kweschn, told VICE News that critics of the country's anti-NGO policy cite a 2009 law called the "Charities and Societies Proclamation" (CSP) as being especially harmful. Rape and sexual assault are being used as a weapon in South Sudan, says UN. The CSP forces NGOs operating in the country to register beneath one of threedifferent NGO banners that divide national NGOs from international NGOs.International groups — including Amnesty International and the United Nations Human Rights Committee — have criticized the law for preventinghuman rights defenders and groups from collecting data on marginalized communities.

According to Zenebu Tadesse, Ethiopia's Minister of Women, Children and Youth, the law was enacted to prevent foreign influence on national issuesand the "worshipping" of foreign aid. But Amnesty International notes thatthe proclamation has had a "devastating impact," as it prohibits international organizations from working on human rights issues in the country, and drastically curbs the amount of foreign aid that national human rights NGOs can receive. As a result, prominent groups — such as the Ethiopian Human Rights Council and the Ethiopian Women Lawyers Association — have been forced to cut nearly 70 percent of their workforces. After the law was enacted, both groups had their bank accounts frozen, and they were denied access to nearly $500,000 in received foreign aid.

In response to Lalango's death, the Network of Ethiopian Women's Organizations is now collecting signatures for a petition that asks the country's prime minister to create a special task force to monitor sexual assault cases within the country, establish a gender-based violence fund, and reformat the Charities and Societies Proclamation to allow more funding to women's organizations helping victims of sexual assault, according to a VICE News source. The incident has dovetailed with a number of high-profile sexual assault cases in neighboring countries that have recently brought international attention to violence against women inEast Africa. In Sudan, the United Nations-African Union peacekeeping mission (UNAMID) came under fire for lagging in its investigation of reports that 200 women were raped by government soldiers in Darfur lastmonth, and in Kenya hundreds of women protested in the streets of Nairobi after video of a local woman being stripped in public for wearing a miniskirt went viral a few weeks ago. A trial against the five suspects accused of kidnapping Lalango began December 1, but according to VICE News sources, the public has been barred from attending. (Text ends)

Family Urges Norway to take action for the release of Okello OchallaOquay'

By Betre Yacob (December 12, 2014)

The family of a Norwegian citizen of Ethiopian origin detained by the Ethiopian Government has urged the Norwegian authorities to exert pressure for his safety and fair trial. Okello Ochalla was seized in South Sudan by South Sudanese security forces and extradited to Ethiopia in March this year. And he was brought to court in June with charges of terrorism offences.Okello Ochalla was seized in South Sudan by South Sudanese security forces Mr. Ochalla is the former governor of Ethiopia's Gambella region. He left the country in January 2004 protesting the ongoing human right violation in the region, and became a Norwegian citizen in 2009. Since he left Ethiopia, Mr. Ochalla used to speak against the atrocities committed by the Ethiopian government and was working for justice and human rights of his people. Now as he is heading to another hearing, his family is concerned: it is not only about his safety buthis life. They are afraid that he is being tortured, and could face death penalty. According to Human Right Watch, Ethiopian authorities subject political detainees to torture and other ill-treatment. It also accuse the country of misusing its anti terrorism law to convict oppositions and journalists. The law permits long-term imprisonment and even the death penalty.

In his letter written yesterday to government of Norway, Obok Okello, the son of Mr. Ochalla, says that if the Norwegian government does not intervene and demand respect of international law, it is likely that his father will be convicted and sentenced to death for wanting justice for his people. "My family is not aware of any efforts being made by the Norwegian government, and as the months pass by, the family is becoming more worried. So we urge that the Norwegian Ministry of Foreign Affairs publicly describe the steps it has taken to ensure they havedone everything within their power to demand Mr. Okello Ochalla receive a fair trial and ensure his safety in detention by the Ethiopian Government" Obok Okello explains in his letter. Obok Okello further pleads the international community to get back his father who is in the hand of the Ethiopian government. "My father is a good man who has always stood by the truth. Please help me in urging the Norwegian Ministry of Foreign Affairs to advocate for his freedom" he pleads.

Reports shows there is widespread human right violation in Gambela Reginal Statein the name of villagization program in order to make way for large-scale land deals in the area. And the government has been accused of trying to silence voices coming out of this area and oppositions to its land policy in the regine. Betre Yacob is an Ethiopian Journalist and blogger. The US Government Must Implement Congress' Stance Against ForcedEvictions in Ethiopia'

Oakland, CA (December 13, 2014) – The Oakland Institute applauds the US Congress for adopting language in the 2015 Omnibus Appropriations Bill that ensures US funding to Ethiopia will not be used to support forcedevictions in the country.

This provision in the bill acknowledges the ongoing crisis of human rights abuses resulting from forced evictions and land grabbing in Ethiopia and prevents US assistance from being used to support activities that directly or indirectly involve forced displacement in the Lower Omo and Gambella regions. Furthermore, it requires US assistance to be used to support localcommunity initiatives aimed at improving livelihoods and be subject to prior consultation with affected populations. The bill also opposes US funding to international financial institutions such as the World Bank for programs that could lead to forced evictions in Ethiopia.

Several reports from the Oakland Institute have exposed the scale, rate, and negative impacts of large-scale land acquisitions in Ethiopia that will forcibly displace over 1.5 million people. This relocation process through the government's villagization scheme is destroying the livelihoods of small-scale farmers and pastoralist communities. Ethiopian security forceshave beaten, arrested, and intimidated individuals who have refused to relocate and free the lands for large-scale agricultural plantations. Ethiopia's so-called development programs cannot be carried out without the support of international donors, particularly the US, one of its main donors. Oakland Institute's on-the-ground research has documented the high toll paid by local people as well as the role of donor countries such asthe US in supporting the Ethiopian policy.

With this action, the US Congress clearly sends a message to both the Ethiopian government and the US administration that turning a blind eyeto human rights abuses in the name of development is not acceptable.

The new Bill reiterates provisions already contained in the 2014 Appropriations Bill, however, to date no evidence has been made availableto demonstrate how US agencies and International institutions have implemented the provisions of the previous Bill. As the oversight authorityof the State Department, Congress must ensure that the law is fully upheld and implemented. This warrants thorough scrutiny of USAID and World Bank programs to Ethiopia and their role in the forced resettlementsand human rights abuses.Other human rights abuses – including the unlawful extradition and detainment of two Ethiopian-born individuals holding citizenship in Britain and Norway – abound, making strong actionby the US Government imperative.

Thus, while the Oakland Institute applauds the US Congress for continuingits commitment to funding meaningful development work in Ethiopia, we believe that more needs to be done. We are calling on members of the Congress to demand that monitoring and reporting from the US State Department, Treasury, USAID, and other involved institutions begin immediately. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA: To Federalize Shashamane-Hawasa Corridor of Ethiopia'By Anonimous Oromia (December 14, 2014)

Major cities in Oromia are administered in what is termed as "special zone." Jimma and its surrounding is special zone; Addis Ababa and its surrounding is special zone; Adama and its surrounding is special zone. Now the federal government of Ethiopia is considering to create one for Shashamane because, sources disclose, the city is becoming home for "nations and nationalities" and economically very significant to be left forthe regional government. In fact, the federal government wants to take over the entire corridor of 25km between Hawasa and Shashamene. Andboth Sidama Zone or SNNPR and Oromia have not been consulted yet.

The plan will land on table presumably after 2015 election and EPRDFsecures majority in the house that is already decided at the council ofministers in their last successive meetings.

As a tradition, top-down orders from the Government of Ethiopia (GoE), which is mostly controlled and manipulated by the Tigrayan minority group TPLF, would not be questioned by the regional states and the rulingregional "allies." Any form of divergence from what the GoE says would not be tolerated and often officials are intimidated. The Addis Ababa master plan for example faced stiff resistance and after about months of "mediation," the GoE via Addis Ababa city administration is bracing for what is thought to be a potential escalation of dispute with Oromia when the plan is once again put for test in January 2015. The exact terms reached between Addis Ababa and Oromia with more arbrating than mediating role of Federal officials will never be known until documents areavailable for media and public. As to Diriba Kuma himself, he is nervous because he wants to return back to Oromia with his little left reputation.

Aafter all Oromia is much formidable place for officials than the federalgovernment, and this master plan is not making things easy for him.

Again, he also wants to stay and turn things around, and that would riskhim for intimidation by GoE.

The word ''federalize'' is only used in this context to describe the intentionof the Federal government. As it is dictated by the constitution and other bylaws, federal government can't own land. However, the GoE acts as if itowns everything in the empire amplifying the stark reality and difference between what is on paper and what is being practiced. In fact, the creation of special zones can be taken as a strategy of weakening the regional governments by snatching economically viable and productiveareas, at the same time, strengthen the much talked about TPLF's economic empire.

Creating a special zone is not new thing in developing countries. The noblemotive of creating such geographic and administrative demarcation is to facilitate development and ensure smooth and dynamic rural-urban divide,and reduce the negative impacts of emerging industries on the the environment and the society. However, the case of Oromia is quite different, or perhaps as the source indicates, disastrous.

In Addis Ababa, rampant mismanagement and corruption of land is sourceof fortune for few and destitution for most. Although rarely, this has been acknowledged by the city government itself. The last wave of urban land grab was right after the 2005 election. The so called Land Bank was fabricated to ration land to Tigrayans; following that campaign, Ex- Minister Ermisa Legese tells, over 150000 Oromo farmers and their families were displaced in what is now understood as systematic genocide.The second wave of land grab, this time deep into Oromia, is an ongoing project since 2012 right before Mele's death. And many believe this Adds Ababa master plan legitimizes what has been done under the radar for thelast 10 years. We should be afraid that It might take another 15 year but a complete social and economic Abyssinianization of Jimma, Adama and Shashamane is quite possible within this regime unless change is pending.

As smooth as it looks from outside falsely to handle investment and industries, the creation of special zone is an administrative hurdle becauseit is a redundant procedure. Creating a zone within Zone, society within society, economy within economy, is not sustainable and fair. There are experiences from other federal countries how to develop both social and economic sectors of the population without adversely impacting the livelihood of the people and the ecology. And the best way to do that is not to disconnect the rural surrounding from its urban epicenter.

Special zone model is attentively and particularly geared to be applied inOromia as neither in Amhara nor in Tigray regions that they have specialzones in a way they are in the former. In the later two regions, there areMekele zone and Bahirdar zone but it is only purely for economic reasonssince they have a smooth and consistent social transition from urban to rural settings. Without bold social and economic policy changes, my source thinks, these cities such as Jimma or Adama are administratively would soon be out of Oromia. because of their economic and administrative model and their social mix, which are not according to theinterest of the Oromo people, just like Addis Ababa.

Apart from serving as a new hotbed for corruption and mismanagement,the new special zone around Shashamane and its link with Hawasa is intended to create an ‘’atmosphere of cooperation’’ between the two regional states. The increasing hostility between regional states were anintense topic during several federal security meetings. Most of these disputes are over land and border. Tigrayan controlled GoE, heavily influenced by Amhara individuals (not ANDM persei), wants to check anddemise the little autonomy of regional state in pretext of ‘’creating one socio-economic community’’ rhetoric of the constitution thereby pleasingthe assimilative and border-phobic motives of some influential Amhara elites to restore their nostalgic interest of the empire and at the same time ensuring the continuous economic hegemony of Tigrayan minority. STAPLE GRAIN: Why do Americans love ancient staple grains such as'teff'?

BBC (December 16, 2014)Would you like to taste the health-giving grain found in the tomb of King Tutankhamun? Or feast on the unprocessed kernels said to have been stored on the ark by Noah? Or how about a vodka made from traditionally farmed Bolivian quinoa? If any of this whetsyour appetite, you are not alone. In the past five years there has been an explosion in popularity of so-called "ancient grains" in the American food market. There is no comprehensive list of "ancient" grains, but the category is generally agreed to include amaranth, barley, bulgur, buckwheat, kamut, millet, spelt, teff and quinoa. Many of these grains - Bolivian quinoa and Ethiopian teff, for example - have been planted and harvested in the same way for thousands of years."It's been a positive perfect storm for these ancient grains," says Cynthia Harriman, director of food and nutritional strategies at the non-profit organisation, the Whole Grain Council. "They fit with our desire to look fora super-food, a magic bullet we should be eating," she says.

Ancient grains are perceived as the opposite of modern wheat, which is the descendant of three ancient strains of wheat - spelt, einkorn and emmer - and often heavily refined. They are seen as more healthy, morenatural and better for us, providing more vitamins, minerals, fibre and protein than modern wheat - partly because they are rarely eaten in processed form.

Ancient Grains:

Amaranth - a South American grain which is both gluten and wheat-freeand is a source of vitamin C

Barley - an excellent source of fibre, manganese, selenium, and thiamine

Bulgur - a quick-cooking form of whole wheat which is high in manganese

Kamut - has a nutty flavour and is high in fibre, protein and severalminerals, including selenium and manganese

Millet - a small, whole grain is a staple in many Asian and Africancountries but thought of mostly as bird food in the United States

Spelt - commonly eaten in medieval times, spelt is part of the wheatfamily and is high in protein and fibre

Teff - common in Ethiopia, this grain has the highest calcium content

Quinoa - perhaps the best known ancient grain, quinoa is a completeprotein since it has all nine essential amino acids. Source: Today's Dietitian

Many of the grains are also gluten-free, or at least low in gluten, tappinginto a growing demand from consumers.

Part of the popularity of these grains are the stories that surround them,says Harriman.

"We're drawn to the idea that kamut comes from King Tutankhamun'stomb, the story draws our attention," she says.

"It's a revolt against processed food. It's the opposite of modern."Other nutritionists agree.

"Aztec, Indian, African," says Vandana Sheth, nutritionist andspokesperson for the Academy of Nutrition and Dietetics.

"People might be more interested in trying these grains because of theirplace of origin, history and the culture," she says.

One of the first references to ancient grains as a health food was in anarticle in the New York Daily News in 1996.

Since then they have seen a steady surge in popularity, with a huge increase in consumption over the past five years, particularly in the lastyear.

According to figures released by the US Whole Grains Council, sales of kamut rose 686% in the year from July 2013, while sales of spelt rose by363% and amaranth by 123% - all, admittedly, from a low base.

Such growth figures have spurred the processed food industry to take notice, especially against a backdrop of falling sales of breakfast cereals.

Hemi Weingarten Fooducate :

"In the past year ancient grains saw a 50% growth across all categories, and a 44% growth in the cereal category," says Alan Cunningham, marketing manager for new products for the food giant General Mills. Thecompany has announced it will be launching a new line of its successful breakfast cereal, Cheerios, with ancient grains next year. "It's a way to bring this product into the mainstream," Cunningham says. "Consumers may feel that the barrier to eating ancient grains is that they're not convenient, so we figured a way to deliver them in a bowl of cereal." But this will also mean including five times as much sugar as in the original Cheerios recipe - 5g of sugar per 28g serving, instead of just 1g - though,as Cunningham points out, about half as much as in the company's best seller, Honey Nut Cheerios. "We feel great about the health profile of this Cheerios," he says. But the addition of sugar and heavy processing has led some to accuse companies like General Mills of cynically making money from the "health halo" surrounding ancient grains. "Like any grain they can be used in a healthy or unhealthy way," says Hemi Weingarten, founder and CEO of the food blog site Fooducate.

"The gullible consumer is going to buy more if it sounds healthy," he says.Nutritionists argue that consumers should look at carefully at nutrition labels before buying processed food, to check for the amount of whole grains, and of added ingredients, such as sugar. "I have heard industry analysts talking about taking advantage of the ancient grains trend," saysnutritionist Cynthia Harriman. "With ancient grains on the label, you couldincrease the price by 50-300%," she says. The main barrier standing in the way of incorporating more ancient grains into the American diet is a shortage in supply. There are also concerns that the exploding market for the grains could have an adverse effect on populations that have eaten them for centuries, the quinoa-growers of Bolivia, for example. But experts do not see this as a passing fad. "By incorporating ancient grains,we'll benefit by not only getting more whole grains but enjoying a wider array of flavours, textures and nutritional profiles," says Vandana Sheth. "Although they are currently thought of as a hot trend, I believe that ancient grains are here to stay." (Text ends)

Regime security forces kill, injure protesters in Bahir Dar'ESAT News (December 19, 2014)

Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church (EOTC) faithful held a protest in Bahir Dar City, the capital of the Amhara regional state of Ethiopia some 578KM from the Capital, on December 19, 2014 opposing what they said the plans of the Bahir Dar City Administration to sell Meskel Square, a place where most religious ceremonies are held, to a private investor.As aresult of the clash between the protesters and police at least five civilians have been killed, scores have been injured and at least 27 people are being tortured in prison.

Eyewitnesses said although the demonstrators marched to the former building of the Regional Council located in the middle of the city, the police stationed in the area had fired gun shots to disperse the peacefuldemonstrators. Thousands of faithful had surrounded the Council's building singing different religious songs and transportation from and toGonder was interrupted. Although the officials of the City said that the plan can be reversed if it is not in the interest of the people, the protesters refused to leave the area until they are given a written confirmation.

The protest temporarily clamed after the City Administration stated that ithas stopped bulldozing the areas however observers say similar protests are very likely to reoccur if the Administration plans to sell the land for investment. Deacon Zelalem Takele, who followed the official presser, toldESAT that the Administration told the protesters that it had planned to usepart of the Square for only road construction but not for private investment. It has been learnt that the road construction could take at least seven meters of land from the Square, where the Tablet rests and Meskel, the finding of the true cross, are celebrated.

ETHIOPIA: Having with multi-purpose combat helicopter EAF pilots defected to Eritrea, Ethiopia admits' ESAT News (December 22, 2014)

The Ethiopian Defense Force has admitted that Ethiopian Air Force pilots have defected to Eritrea flying a helicopter while ESAT's Air Force sourceshave said that the Ethiopian Air Force had lately stopped the search for the two pilots and a technician, who disappeared since Friday. The Ethiopian Defense said in a statement that was read on Ethiopian state television that the “traitor” pilot of the helicopter forced the assistant and the technician to fly to Eritrea.

ESAT learned that the search for the defecting pilots stopped after the AirForce confirmed that the pilots had intended to defect and had safely landed in an “unspecified place”. ESAT broke the News on Saturday that the defecting pilots were two however; new reports from the Ethiopian AirForce indicate that the missing crew were three namely Captain Samuel Ghidey, Lieutenant Bililign Mekonen and technician Tesagbirhan Gidey.

ESAT’s efforts to speak to Brigadier Mashu Hagos, Deputy Head of the Ethiopian Air Force were unsuccessful; however, ESAT attempted to speakwith Colonel Abebe Teka, who is believed to be the shadow leader of the Air Force and Deployments. When informed that we were calling him fromESAT, Colonel Abebe asked “did they (the defecting pilots) phone you?” ESAT’s journalist tried to explain that we were calling him after receiving information about their defection, the Colonel shouted “shut up” and hanged the phone up. ESAT will continue updating about the ongoing issue. (Text ends)

Former US Diplomat Calls for Free, Fair Elections in EthiopiaBy James Butty (December 22, 2014)

WASHINGTON D.C. Former US Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Herman Jay Cohen said Ethiopia should not be afraid to have freeand fair elections or a free press. Herman Cohen said the government isdoing good things that it can win an election on, such as creating jobs, carrying on infrastructure development and boosting trade. But he cautioned that the government has made no move to implement his suggestions.

“Ethiopia, I believe, should open up more toward multiparty democracy. Right now, you have opposition parties that exist, but they really do not have much access to the public. The press really does not give them muchvoice, and journalists have been imprisoned for saying things that the government doesn’t like. So, I think it’s time for the government to loosenup because they are doing good things in Ethiopia,” he said. But Berhanu Nega, professor of economics at Bucknell University and former leader of the Coalition for Unity and Democracy in Ethiopia, said the government can never have free and fair elections.

“The reason why there’s so much repression, the reason why there’s so much muzzling of the press, the reason why the Ethiopian government isarresting opposition figures inside the country is precisely because they know that this is a despised government. It cannot last a day in an environment of freedom. This is a government that will lose catastrophically if there were [a] free and fair election," Nega said.

Cohen also said he wanted to set the record straight about his recommendation during a London Conference on Ethiopia and Eritrea andPort Assab.

He said he did not say the port belongs to Ethiopia, contrary to what somein Ethiopia had attributed to him, and that he only recommended Ethiopia and Eritrea maintain a common economic union after Eritrea's independence allowing Ethiopia to use the port.

"There are some people in Ethiopia who said that during the London Conference of 1991 I recommended that the Port of Assab belonged to Ethiopia. This is not correct. What I recommended was Ethiopia and Eritrea maintain a common economic union after Eritrea's independenceand, in that way, Ethiopia could use the Port of Assab," he said.

Cohen said that before the war of 1998, Ethiopia used a section of the port for their imports and exports, which means that Assab did not belongto Ethiopia, but it had access to an exclusive zone. He said the port shouldbe the sovereign territory of Eritrea, but that Ethiopia should have the right to use it. (Text ends)

Ethiopian pilots very likely to have landed at Eritrea-held Assab airport:sources'

Ethiomedia (December 23, 2014)

WASHINGTON, DC - An Ethiopian pilot and two of his crew members defected to Eritrea flying an Mi-35 combat helicopter, the state television announced on Monday. The pilots were based in the eastern city of Dire Dawa and they executed their plan during what the state-owned TV calleda "routine flight training." The announcement came in after days of massive aerial search across northeastern Ethiopia. The crew members were Captain Samuel Giday, Lt. Bililign Desalegn, and flight technician Tsegaberhan Giday. It was not known whether the pilot and technician aresiblings. The TV didn't specify where in Eritrea the pilot landed the helicopter, but an Ethiopian Air Force source cited the Port of Assab as the most likely place of landing the aircraft.

The $25 million Mi-35M helicopter integrates modern high-precision weaponry for destroying ground-based armoured targets and providing airsupport for ground missions, according to one source related to selling theRussian-made helicopter. "It is a huge loss for the government," the source said, adding that "since Ethiopia and Eritrea have no diplomatic ties, Addis Ababa may seek the help of neighboring Sudan to retrieve the multi-purpose combat helicopter." Earlier this year, eight Air Force men defected to Eritrea where they reportedly joined Ethiopian rebel groups.

Eritrea gets 2nd helicopter gunship: It is the second time that Eritrea has acquired Mi-35 helicopter from Ethiopia. "During the 1998-2000 Ethiopia-Eritrea War, an Ethiopian pilot landed an Mi-24 helicopter, which is a predessor to Mi-35, in an Eritrean territory, claiming that his copter was attacked and damaged. He was rescued but the helicopter was left there intact. The next day, the Eritreans sought the help of an Ethiopan pilot who was living in Asmar a as a political asylee, and flew the helicopter toAsmara, signifying that it had no damage."

The Air Force source, who was speaking to Ethiomedia on condition of anonymity, said it was a mystery why the Ethiopian pilot chose to leave an important war machine in the hand of the enemy instead of destroyingit. First, he landed the helicopter in an enemy territory, though it was not damaged. Second, the rule of war dictates that war machines be destroyed lest the enemy makes use of them. They failed to do that. This makes it a mystery: either the pilots were not very well qualified to do thejob, or else there was a conspiracy of passing an important war machine to the hand of the enemy.

The latter may sound far-fetched but it should be remembered that Ethiopia was in the hand of the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, an ultraEritrean nationalist mercenary who kept a low profile until he wiped out his Ethiopian critics and sabotaged the war victory over Eritrea. Today Eritrea is a pariah state, with its citizens fleeing in every direction to escape the harsh rule of President Isaias Afewerki. But the Eritrean deserthas also an oasis for Ethiopian Air Force men who desperately seek a refuge from the choking political repression at home. (Text ends)

Excerpted from US-Korea Institute at SAIS (December 24, 2014)Build It and They Will Come (Again)

Contradictory statements by Ethiopian officials, as well as fresh suspicions about Gafat’s ties to North Korea, are reasons to continue to ask questions about whether Pyongyang’s involvement in domestic arms production persists. Alleged dependency upon North Korean supply is another. General Samora and other Ethiopian officials have repeatedly affirmed that METEC-run weapons factories are ‘dependent’ upon North Korean spare parts and machines for their production lines, as noted above. Provision of any suchspare parts, machines or maintenance services by North Korea would nowbe sanctioned activity.

Even if cooperation has recently ended, modest but growing evidence suggests that sanctions may at some stage have been breached by the Ethiopian government and/or METEC, which controls the two factories inquestion. The UN Panel of Experts’ recent interest in Homicho speaks tothe Panel’s concern that any North Korean link with the site may be in violation of UN Security Council Resolution 1874. Indeed, Homicho's subsequent, swift sanitization of its publicized suppliers list compounds suspicion that interaction between METEC and Pyongyang is continuing in breach of the current sanctions regime. Furthermore, North Koreans were acknowledged by officials to still be on the ground at the Gafat site only months before Resolution 1874 was passed—as part of a contract betweenthe government-run METEC and the Korea Ryong Bong General Corporation. Temporally, this takes confirmed cooperation too close to sanctions territory for comfort.

The Homicho Ammunition Industry: Since the 1970s, Ethiopia has been inthe company of North Korea's most loyal military customers. Amongst other things, Pyongyang has been a source of munitions, armored personnel carriers, tanks and tank parts, artillery and rocket fuel. In addition to these forms of assistance, North Korea has helped Ethiopia construct, operate and upgrade two weapons factory complexes—today known as the Gafat Armament Industry and Homicho Ammunition Industry. From Ethiopia's perspective, contracting to North Korea for the initial supply of weapons production technology was a means of reducing long-term dependence on foreign military suppliers.

The first of two Ethiopian defence industry sites believed to have ties to North Korea—the Homicho Ammunition Industry—was established in 1987as 'Project 130' and subsumed under the parastatal Metals and Engineering Corporation (METEC) in 2010. Based near Ambo, its production lines include: small, medium and heavy ammunition; tank shells, mortar bombs and grenades; and 120mm 'Katyusha' rockets.[4] The Homicho complex is the largest North Korean-assisted site. Initially, Pyongyang's involvement probably centered on the design and establishment of production lines for munitions. These forms of assistanceapparently continued through to at least late 2007, and included help manufacturing rocket-propelled grenades and truck-mounted multiple rocket launchers.

Around the same time, it also became clear that Ethiopia was suffering from dependency on North Korean spare parts and machinery for the factory. Because of their (presumably antique) North Korean design heritage, Homicho's production lines use specific parts and machines, for which there are apparently few cost-effective available sources outside of Pyongyang.[5] Sunk costs in those facilities would have similarly made re-tooling a pricey affair.

Homicho's centrality to the Ethiopia-North Korea relationship has made it a subject of intense interest and scrutiny. Until at least 2009, and likely thereafter, the US Embassy in Addis Ababa [6] continually exerted pressure on senior Ethiopian officials to sever related contracts with NorthKorea, much like the US had previously done with governments in Libya and Yemen. In November 2008, it appeared that this pressure might finally yield greater cooperation by the Ethiopian Ministry of Defense, which agreed to let the US Ambassador and a small team into Homicho the following month. Only a few days before the visit was scheduled to take place, the Defence Minister resigned and US access was promptly suspended. The Embassy was told that 'there would be no problem with the visit if Ethiopia were to get technology or financial assistance from it.' It is unclear whether access was successfully facilitated thereafter, thoughthe initial offer suggests that the Ethiopian government may at least be open to greater transparency.[7]

In 2014, the UN Panel of Experts spotted public evidence of a possible continuing link between North Korea and the Homicho Ammunition Industry—by then controlled by METEC. Homicho's official company profilelisted the 'Korea Mineral Trading General Corporation' as one of its primary suppliers: an entity that does not appear in South Korean company registries. Given the factory's history, it is therefore reasonable to assume that the company is North Korean. Supporting this conclusion isthe fact that reference to the Korea Mineral Trading General Corporation was swiftly removed from the Homicho website following the publication ofthe UN Panel's report[8] (though they apparently forgot to sanitize the accompanying PDF brochure).

Gafat Armament Engineering Industry: The second site known to have been assisted by North Korea in the past is the Gafat Armament Engineering Industry, located near Debre Zeit. Gafat was opened in 1989, two years after the Homicho plant. While originally built to manufacture AK-47s and light machine guns, in 2002 it was incorporated into METEC (which also controls Homicho) and was upgraded to produce '40mm grenade launchers and other automatic weapons attached on armored vehicles and helicopters' as well as 'heavy artillery and howitzers.' Aroundthis time Gafat's remit was also allegedly expanded to include armament maintenance.

In addition to the confirmation of early North Korean involvement in Gafatoffered in leaked US cables, a glance at marketing material for Gafat highlights the evident overlap between the weapons systems North Koreais able to indigenously produce, and those that Gafat now manufactures.

Many of the systems shown above are ones that North Korea is able to produce. Of course, it is worth noting that North Korea originally received or reverse-engineered many of these same systems from the Soviet Unionor China, and therefore the Gafat designs bear resemblance to weapons produced by those countries as well. The twin-barreled anti-aircraft gun that is depicted (originally a Soviet design), or twelve-barrel multiple rocket launcher (originally a Chinese design) are examples. Worthy of note is the tear gas gun shown in the top right of the Gafat brochure. A gun of strikingly similar design was photographed in the hands of North Korea's People's Security Minister while on a 2013 visit to Uganda—a country also suspected of having received North Korean assistance in indigenous weapons production. While not conclusive evidence, a commonality between many of the designs featured in Gafat's marketingmaterial is their familiarity to North Korea's own defense industrial complex.

More concrete evidence of North Korean involvement in operations at Gafat dates to late 2007. An industrial engineering study of the complex'sinefficiencies, published by the University of Addis Ababa, speaks of a contract with the 'Korea Ryong Bong General Corporation,' active at the time of writing in late 2007, to retool production lines for the AK-47 and AK-103. Records of conversations between General Samora and US officials in 2008 discuss what seems to be the same contract between the governments of Ethiopia and North Korea. Samora insisted, however, that"North Koreans have now finished their work and are leaving" Gafat.

The General's statements regarding the North Korean presence at Homicho and Gafat were frequently contradictory, however. They alternated "between 'we will continue to source from North Korea' and 'we haven't sourced from North Korea in the past year' as well as 'the North Koreans have left' and 'some of the North Koreans may still be around.'" Itis therefore possible that Pyongyang's involvement in Gafat and other Ethiopian weapons factories continued beyond 2008. Enquiries into the affiliation of the 'Korea Ryong Bong General Corporation' and the nature and duration of its contract with Gafat is therefore necessary. (Text ends)

A British national killed in Bahir Dar city of Ethiopia'

Local News (December 25, 2014) The Briton's body was taken to Addis Ababa for a post-mortem examination A British national was killed when he was accidentally shot in Ethiopia on Christmas Eve, reports have said.The 47-year-old male tourist was shot with a rifle in the north-western city of Bahir Dar, AFP quoted a government spokesman as saying

A suspect has reportedly been arrested. The body has been taken to AddisAbaba for a post-mortem examination. A Foreign Office spokeswoman said: "We can confirm the death of a British national in Ethiopia." No further details were disclosed. 'Old rifle' Government spokesman ShimelesKema told AFP the suspect had not known the gun – an "old rifle" – was loaded, and the incident happened in a church on the morning of Christmas Eve. He said: "It appears that a resident of Bahir Dar, who was licensed to carry a gun, accidentally discharged his gun while changing thegun position from one shoulder to the other." Bahir Dar is a popular tourist destination located some 310 miles (500km) north-west of Addis Ababa in Ethiopia's Amhara region. Briton shot dead in Ethiopia (The Guardian updates December 26, 2014)

A British tourist has been killed in Ethiopia, the UK's foreign office has confirmed, with Ethiopian officials describing it as an accident. The Britishnational was shot dead when an AK-47 went off in the north-western cityof Bahir Dar at 10.30am local time on Christmas Eve, according to reports. A suspect was reportedly arrested and the body taken to the capital, Addis Ababa, for a postmortem examination. Government spokesman Shimeles Kemal, quoted by Sky News, said the suspect had not known his gun was loaded and that the incident happenedin a church. Kemal said: "It appears that a resident of Bahir Dar, who waslicensed to carry a gun, accidentally discharged his gun while changing thegun position from one shoulder to the other." There were varied accounts of what happened, with other reports quoting the same official, Kema, saying the armed man had been on his way to renew his gun licence whenit went off. The victim was described as a 47-year-old man.

A spokeswoman for the UK Foreign Office said: "We can confirm the deathof a British national in Ethiopia. We are providing consular assistance to the families." Bahir Dar is a tourist destination 310 miles (500km) north west of Addis Ababa in Ethiopia's Amhara region. Located on the southerntip of Lake Tana at the source of the Blue Nile river, it is home to 200,000people and several ancient monasteries and churches. Five tourists were killed, four people were kidnapped and three injured during an attack at Erta Ale volcano in Ethiopia's northern Afar region in January 2012.

ADDIS ABABA (AFP updates) December 25, 2014: A 47-year-old British tourist was killed in a church in northwestern Ethiopia after a man accidentally fired a gun, a government spokesman said on Thursday. Theincident occurred on Wednesday morning in Bahir Dar, a leading tourist destination about 500km from the capital Addis Ababa and famed for the nearby Lake Tana, the source of the Blue Nile. "It appears that a residentof Bahir Dar, who was licensed to carry a gun, accidentally discharged hisgun while changing the gun position from one shoulder to the other," government spokesman Shimeles Kema said. "The gun is an old rifle," hesaid, adding that the man did not know it was loaded. "He is a civilian. Hehas been arrested and the investigation is ongoing. The accident happened in a church," he said. The British embassy confirmed that a national had died but gave no details. Ed's Note: Ethiopian regime claims the shooting death of a British tourist in Bahir Dar was an accident.

Eyewitnesses told a different story. They said that the British national wasambushed by a policeman on duty.

The shooting of a British tourist in Bahir Dar will not affect tourism –MoC&T

The body of a British tourist who was gunned down by a policeman arrivedat Bole Airport, Addis Ababa, Ethiopia

ENA UPDATES (December 25, 2014) -- The death of a British tourist after fatally shot by a gunman yesterday in Bahir Dar couldn’t affect the tourism flow to the country, the Ministry of Culture and Tourism said. The tourist was killed earlier yesterday in the city of Bahir Dar, in Amhara regional state and the suspect is under custody. The 50-year tourist was walking on the streets of Bahir Dar when he was fatally shot by a gunman,who turned himself in to police.

The identity of the victim and the suspect is not released yet. Upon arrivalof the body of the deceased in Addis Ababa for forensic tests, the MinisterAmin Abdulkadir said this incident will not affect the country's tourism industry. Expressing condolences for the family of the deceased, the Minister said tourists should not be disturbed by this incident because it was not pre-planned and organized crime. He affirmed that the police andmilitary will work hard to ensure safety of tourists and citizens.

Spokesperson of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ambassador Dina Mufti expressed hope that the strong and age long relationship between the twocountries will not affect by this incident. British Ambassador to Ethiopia Greg Dorey said the bilateral cooperation between the countries will be continued further strengthened. He remarked that the British governmentunderstands that Ethiopia is a peaceful country, despite the case needs intensive investigation.

Gunmen in southern Ethiopia fired on Swedish tourists'

Expressen (December 16, 2014) The Swedish newspaper Expressen reported that unknown gunmen opened fire on Swedish tourists who werevisiting the Omo Valley, southern Ethiopia on Dec. 12. The following is a Google translation: Four Swedish tourists were shot at in southern Ethiopia on 12 December 2014. None of them were injured in the incident.

The Embassy was in contact with them and they feel good under the circumstances, says Ulla Jacobson at the Foreign Ministry’s press office toSVT News.

According to the Foreign Ministry, the Swedish tourists were at an animalsanctuary when they came under fire.

According expressen.se, which spoke with the wife of one of the shot, putthe Swedes in a jeep. The husband saw other jeeps run to catch up, saw that they were getting ready to open fire and he threw himself down on the floor.

Firefight with park rangers. A gunfight broke out between the pursuers and park rangers in a jeep in front, with the Swedes vehicle in the middle.

Afterwards boxes on their jeep riddled and it was bullet holes in the door,says his wife to Expressen.

She says that the tourist group has been in Ethiopia for a week, and thatthey consist of a group of friends at around a dozen Swedes who is on holiday in the country.

It was in the Omo Valley in southern Ethiopia as the Swedes came underfire near the border to northern Kenya. In northern Kenya, the terrorist group Al-Shabaab active and the group has previously claimed responsibility for several attacks. But according to Ulla Jacobson does notknow the Foreign Ministry that the area would be particularly risky. We have no record of it, she says to SVT News. PMHD calls on African countries to withdraw from the ICC'Written by NAN (December 29, 2014)

THE Ethiopian Prime Minister, HaileMariam Desalegn, has called on Africancountries to withdraw their membership from the International Criminal Court (ICC) as the organisation is only serving the interests of Western nations. The Prime Minister made the remarks while receiving the Sudanese State Minister for Information, Yasser Yusuf, who concluded a three-day visit to Addis Ababa on Monday. Desalegn said that he totally agreed with the call on African countries to pull out of the ICC. The prime minister had noted that the ICC had become a tool that serves the interest of the countries who, ironically, refused to be members of the court. He expressed happiness that Ethiopia was not member of the court,because "the court is not the place for justice as all permanent members of the UN Security Council have stayed away from the court, but still use it to implement their political will''.

He called for the need to revitalise the cooperation and exchange ofprogrammes, information and news between Ethiopia and Sudan.

Desalegn urged the media to play a major role in reflecting the development and concerns of the people in the two countries. He underscored the need to reflect on what was common and promote theeconomic, political or developmental interests of the two nations.

The News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) reports that the Sudanese minister hadsigned various agreements with the Ethiopian Government, including a news exchange between the Ethiopian News Agency (ENA) and the SudanNews Agency (SUNA). The two nations also agreed on exchanges betweenthe countries television and radio stations as well as sharing experiences on various cultural, technical and professional fields. The Sudanese minister was hosted by his Ethiopian counterpart, Ridhwan Hussein, who took the Sudanese delegation on tour to various information and media institutions in Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian Capital. Herman Jay Cohen on the port of Assab, "Ethiopia Have a Right to Use it"

Asmara (HAN) December 30, 2014 – Public diplomacy and Regional Orthodox, Catholic and Evangelical Church News for regional Partnershipand Cooperation. By. Herman Cohn – The Port of Assab is Eritrean Land,but Ethiopia Should Have Right to Use it for regional transport and commodities access. Former U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for AfricanAffairs Herman Cohen said he wanted to set the record straight about hisrecommendation during the 1991 London Conference on Ethiopia, Eritreaand Port of Assab of Eritrean Red Sea Coast.

After being part of Ethiopia for forty years, the people of Eritrea held a referendum in April 1993 and decided to establish an independent state. The referendum took place in the aftermath of a thirty-year insurgency against two successive Ethiopian regimes waged by the Eritrean Peoples Liberation Front (EPLF). At the same time, an allied insurgent group, the Tigrean Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF), took over power in the Ethiopiancapital, Addis Ababa, after the military collapse of the Soviet-supported regime headed by President Mengistu Haile Mariam.

FORMER U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Herman Cohen said he did not say the port belongs to Ethiopia, contrary to what some in Ethiopia had attributed to him, and that he only recommended Ethiopia and Eritrea maintain a common economic union after Eritrea's independence allowing Ethiopia to use the port. "There are some people inEthiopia who said that during the London Conference of 1991 I recommended that the Port of Assab belonged to Ethiopia. This is not correct. What I recommended was Ethiopia and Eritrea maintain a common economic union after Eritrea's independence and, in that way, Ethiopia could use the Port of Assab," he said.

The former U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Herman Cohen said that before the war of 1998, Ethiopia used a section of the port for their imports and exports, which means that Assab did not belong to Ethiopia,but it had access to an exclusive zone.

British Security Guard Faces Death Penalties in Ethiopia (TheIndependent)

British security guard faces death penalties in Ethiopia over terrorismcharges.

By Robert Verkaik (December 31, 2014)

Ali Adorus, a security guard from east London, was subjected to electrocution, hooding and beatings during his 18-month imprisonment inthe East African country, according to allegations made against Ethiopia and Britain to the United Nations High Commission.

Before leaving Britain to visit family in Ethiopia in 2012, Mr Adorus had complained that he had been targeted by MI5 and the Metropolitan Policeover alleged links to Islamic extremism. His lawyers also allege that someinformation contained in a false confession – which he claims was beaten out of him in an Ethiopian prison – could have been provided only by “British intelligence”.

Mr Adorus, who has a wife and child in the UK, was found guilty by the Ethiopian courts earlier this month but is now facing the death penalty. Today, his wife, who is being supported by the human-rights group Cage,described the court process as “shockingly biased and unfair”. She said: “The Ethiopian court does not even operate according to its own laws. It has refused to acknowledge the torture my husband endured. My husband’s testimony was dismissed by the court, as were the testimoniesof the defence witnesses who were witnesses to the torture. The prosecution witnesses were bribed, threatened and some tortured to givefalse evidence against my husband.”

The Independent has seen a report written by the British embassy in Addis Ababa and sent to the Ethiopian government which raises the UK’s “grave concern” about his detention. The document, written by officials atthe embassy, names the Ethiopian senior police officer alleged to have carried out the torture. It says: “The British Government takes all allegations of torture of British nationals very seriously. The treatmentalleged is prohibited under international human-rights treaties."

The report adds that the failure of the Ethiopian authorities to inform the embassy of his detention is of "grave concern to the British Government". It says that he alleges he has been "handcuffed for long periods", was "hooded and then beaten" and "was electrocuted". Mr Adorus's barrister inthe UK, Toby Cadman, said that the conviction was "deeply troubling". He claimed that the authorities had used "beatings and electric shocks to extract his confession" and said Ethiopia "must immediately start proceedings with a view to an investigation being commissioned".

Mr Adorus, who was born in Ethiopia before coming to the UK as a young boy, was arrested in January 2013 on a bus during a family visit, and taken to a police station without any access to a lawyer. During his custody, he signed a forced confession in Amharic – a language he does not speak – after four days of beatings, he alleges. He is accused by the Ethiopians of being a member of a number of terrorist groups and of waging a jihadist war since 2006. But his lawyers say the case against himis fabricated and have petitioned the United Nations, which is now considering the complaint. A spokesman for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office said: "We can confirm the detention of a British national in Ethiopia. We are providing consular assistance."

Mr Adorus has a history of testicular cancer and was being monitored regularly in London. He and two friends had previously complained that they had been questioned by police and MI5 after returning from a safari holiday in Tanzania in 2009.Asim Qureshi, a research director at Cage, which campaigns against abuses associate d with the war on terror, said: "The case of Ali Adorus is yet another example of a British citizen who washarassed by UK security services and who ends up arbitrarily detained andtortured in a third country. The UK has failed to protect him from torture."Last year, Andrew Parker, the head of MI5, said: "We do not participate, incite, encourage or condone mistreatment or torture." But the complaint to the UN states: "It is alleged that intelligence officials provided direct and/or indirect assistance to the Ethiopian authorities in carrying out the arrest and torture of Mr Adorus." LAND GRAB NEWS: Local Ethiopians miss out as big agriculture firmsstruggle in Gambella'

The Guardian By William Davison in Gambella, January 1, 2015

As dusk envelops the grasslands of Gambella in western Ethiopia, a wearyJakob Pouch sits on a jerry can, resting his chest against a wooden staff. The 45-year-old evangelical preacher from the Nuer community has just made the three-hour walk from the banks of the Baro river, where he tends to his large family's small plot of corn. His daughters are preparing cabbage and cobs to be cooked on an open fire.

In the opposite direction, across the asphalt road that leads to South Sudan, lies the farm of BHO Bioproducts, an Anglo-Indian company growing rice and cotton on the 27,000 hectares (67,000 acres) it has leased. Pouch says the company doesn't care about the people of his village, Wath-Gach. Grazing land has been lost, and BHO has built a wooden cage around a water pump to prevent locals using it. "From thebeginning we did not have a good relationship," he says. "It was given without consultation. There has been lots of negative impact." The company didn't respond to a request for comment.
Harvesting rice at Saudi Star's farm investment in Gambella. The company says it is tryingto ensure that local communities benefit from the operation.
BHO's operation, which began in 2010, is one of many concessions Ethiopia's government has granted in Gambella, including one plot leased to the Indian company Karuturi Global of 100,000 hectares. Commercial farmers are expected to bring knowhow, technology and jobs to one of thecountry's poorest and most remote regions. By converting uncultivated bush into productive farms, officials believed food security and export revenues would improve in a country dominated by subsistence agriculture. But despite those worthy ambitions, progress has been hampered by Gambella's logistical difficulties, and a failure to ensure local communities benefit.
The village of Ilea is home to people from Gambella's other main indigenous group, the Anuak. It's also been the headquarters of Karuturi'soperation for the past five years. In the village, a group of men shelter from the afternoon heat, passing round a tobacco waterpipe. Behind them, women draw water from a well built by the government. Karuturi's project has stalled after managers discovered that four-fifths of the land isin a floodplain. The firm also failed to build relations with residents, according to the elders. Complaints include reduced land for farming and hunting, no promised health clinic, cattle dying from ingesting pesticides, the burning of unwanted maize, and only a handful of jobs for villagers.
"The government benefits from the tax but the community does not benefit," says Obang Wudo, one of the elders. Jakob Pouch says his community in Gambella hasn't benefited from a nearby commercial farm.The gripes of Ilea's residents about Karuturi are compounded by their concerns about nearby land parcelled out to Ethiopian investors from outside Gambella. They say they frequently lobby the regional government to act, but nothing has been done. That region's president, Gatluak Tut Khot, expresses support for investors engaged in "very difficult work". The regional government can't force companies to pay more, he explains, but his administration has held meetings to improve relations. "They have to respect the interests of the community and thosewho need jobs from them," he says.

Gambella has been the focus of a political fallout between the central government and advocacy groups such as Human Rights Watch and the Oakland Institute – with donors uncomfortably positioned in the middle. The critics claim that a resettlement programme to move scattered ruralpopulations to larger settlements was coercive and designed to clear theway for investors. Ethiopia says rights groups from the global north are ideologically opposed to its state-heavy development model and that thevoluntary resettlement programme was to make public service delivery more cost-efficient. The UK's Department for International Developmentand the World Bank are facing legal inquiries for funding the salaries of civil servants who staffed the enlarged villages.

Bikrum Gill is studying the impact of Indian investors on Gambella's people for his doctorate, with a specific focus on Karuturi. He found that locals had hoped to access more food and better farming technologies, butwere often disappointed. Instead, communities lost land and flooding worsened. Speaking specifically about the Karuturi investment, Gill says: "It's difficult to ascertain, what, if any, benefits this project has brought toaffected local people." Karuture farm managers at the site referred inquires to the company's head office, which didn't respond to attempts tocontact it.

One farmer from Ethiopia's highlands, who did not want to be named, tellsa different story. He thinks the wave of commercial farming will transforman economic backwater. "They were sitting on the side of the riverbank," he says about locals. "If investors are coming, their life has changed, theyare operators, technicians." He pays 50 birr (about £1.60) a day – above the average for manual labour in Ethiopia – and provides transport for his workers. Eight houses have been built for teachers, he says, and 25 hectares cleared for the community to plough. Some larger enterprises are also reaching out. At the request of the regional administration, Saudi Star Agricultural Development's four-year-old rice farm in another part of the region has hired 40 local professionals, while district governments will each get two tractors for young people to use.

"We know we're creating job opportunities, transforming skills, training locals," says the firm's chief executive, Jemal Ahmed. "The community hasto profit from the project and we have social responsibility." He is fully aware of local sensitivities about the company's work. The farm, bankrolled by Ethiopian-born Saudi billionaire Mohammed al-Amoudi, was attacked by gunmen two years ago and has been criticised as a land-grab.Ahmed says no one was displaced from Saudi Star's 10,000 hectares, which were earmarked in the late 1980s by the previous government for large-scale agriculture. "It's not part of any villagisation, it's not been grabbed – that's a fact," he says. "But people who have their own agenda, − Oakland Institute and Human Rights Watch – fabricated stories andcampaigned against this project."

Gill says part of the problem is thatinvestors are "not seeing the people on the land … It precludes the possibility of engaging with locals. To succeed you have to build out oflocal diversity and knowledge.”

FISTULA: CATHERINE HAMLIN talks to Peter Thompson of Talking Heads,
Dr Catherine Hamlin can confidently say she has turned around the lives of twenty four thousand women. Her work at the Addis Ababa Fistula Hospital in Ethiopia, repairing injuries sustained in childbirth, has seen hernominated for a Nobel prize. A recent appearance on the Oprah Winfrey program unleashed a wave of donations.
“We arrived in May 1959. I remember the first fistula patient - she was avery small young girl, perhaps about 16, I think, or 17. And she was in rags. Mostly the husband would leave a girl because of the difficulty of trying to live with a woman with a fistula in the bladder. And we were appalled at her condition. She was pushed aside in the out-patients because she was smelling and my husband found her sitting there alone.We took this little girl in and she had a very simple repair to do. So we cured her in about two weeks or less than that. Of course others heard and we had 30 I think that came. The next year, I think it was over 100 and then they built up very rapidly.
We were beginning to get very involved with these fistula patients and werealized that we were there to look after them. We read all the books we could about fistula repairs. And we developed techniques that some people hadn't thought of. We became successful in repairing these girls.
In the beginning, we thought we must enlarge our hospital, we must takeevery patient in. We built hostels in the ground of this general hospital that we were working in for many years. Even those became overcrowded, we had 60 women living there, some of them for years waiting to get a chance to get into the hospital to be operated on. So my husband said one day to me, "Why don't we build our own hospital?" So we were fortunate to have the Emperor's permission. We were able to open our hospital. We took some years to gather the money together butwe got it built and we opened in 1974”.
Yes, it's wonderful. This is why it's so wonderful to be a fistula surgeon, the joy that they display once they're cured is all in the world we need. Anyone looking after a fistula girl's cure joins in this joy as they go home to a new life. We were not patching up old women for a few more years, we're giving a new life to a young girl at the beginning of her life. Women have been treated really in most of Africa as second-class citizens. But I feel setting up the Fistula Hospital and devoting so much work to women -the poorest of the poor and most outcast women - has made a difference.
I was born in 1924 in Sydney in the suburb of Ryde. I was christened Elena Catherine Hinkelson. My mother cried when I was born because Iwas the second girl. (LAUGHS) I remember when my brother was bornshe was all filled with joy. I had a very happy childhood. I was loved intensely by my parents. I had an elder sister and lots of brothers and sisters later on and we had a wonderful family life together in a big old house that was built by the convicts, lovely grounds, and my mother was a great gardener. My father was fond of boats so we had a wonderful childhood with horses and with ponies and dogs. We had a very privilegedlife as children. We had a maid and a married couple, a gardener and the cook. And when we were little, we had a nurse. We didn't eat with our mother and father, we ate in the nursery. My father was the most kind man - a sweet temperament and very seldom got angry. My mother was astricter person and she was very - she was very kind and she was very loving too, but she was the one that would dole out the punishment if we'd been naughty. Perhaps I was maybe the naughtiest, I'm not sure.

We had a tremendous upbringing as Christians. We had family prayers every morning, and we were very regular churchgoers. We knew the Biblewell, my mother would read us Bible stories and my father too. I think I was 12 when I was sent to boarding school and I was very upset at the time of thinking of leaving my home.

We kept a low profile because all mission hospitals were nationalized or taken over by the government and many had to leave the country. And sowe just went on working, we never had an empty bed even through those years. But at that time, we did have a lot of fighting. I was operating with a Russian professor in the room, in a theatre, and there was a lot of shooting across the valley of the old palace, and he said to me, "What's going on?" and I said, "We're going through a revolution." I said "I've never been through a revolution but you have so you might know what it'sabout." (LAUGHS) After the Red Terror, that was the worst time. It was a terrible time where people were being killed and you'd drive into the city and you'd see many dead bodies lying in the plateau, and - I can't go into all the stories - they're very sad - but we lost a lot of friends. We were confined really to the hospital. You had to get the permission to drive on weekends if you wanted to go to church, if you wanted to go have a picnic, you had to get permission for everything.

We did fundraise and my late husband was very good at writing letters, sowe raised money, we decided to enlarge the hospital. My husband got a cytoma, a very serious cancer which grows quickly, and he got it in the leg. We thought it had been removed successfully but it soon came back. So that was what killed him in the end. The patients kept coming and coming and we thought, why don't we put up provincial hospitals, smaller hospitals in some of the provinces and we started with one at Bahr Dar which is at the bottom of a big lake with is the source of the Blue Nile andwe set up a centre there. Actually our builder paid for that centre out of his own pocket, which was an enormous encouragement. (Text ends)

PRESS: PMHD’s “top 10 educated” list falls to be recognized’(By Abebe Gellaw)

The official website of India TV that had published a dubious online ranking two weeks ago that it claimed to be a list of the “top 10 mosteducated politicians in the world” has retracted the story. Indiantvnews.com has now pulled back the “top 10” story and changed the title saying the random list was just intended to highlight the educational backgrounds of 10 leaders from around the world without any sort of ranking.

In response to an email inquiry challenging the authenticity of the originallist that contradicts publicly available facts, Anushrav Gulati, an editor with the website, acknowledged mistakes in the confusing ranking.

“The list was not intended to be any sort of ranking of politicians on the basis of their educational qualifications, but, on the other hand, is merelyintended to highlight the educational backgrounds of ten persons,” the editor explained.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn was erroneously included in the list despite the fact that he and some of those ranked as being “most educated” turned out to be less educated than so many leaders whowere not included in the list. Many leaders with PhD degrees and an impressive list of advanced academic credentials were not included while others with first degrees like Putin were listed among the “most educated politicians.

”Gulati blamed the mishap on the title which originally claimed to be a “top 10” ranking. “You are, perhaps, justified in pointing out that the titleof the news item in question could be said to generate some amount of confusion. We have modified the title to reflect the true intention behind the list as being one highlighting the educational backgrounds of 10 leaders from around the world.”

Hailemariam Desalegn was ranked as the 4th most educated politician in the world. However, it was highlighted to the website that he was not the most “educated politician in Ethiopia, let alone in the world.” In Ethiopia, acountry whose literacy rate is one of the lowest in the world, there are several academics and scholars in politics who hold PhD degrees. It is, however, widely believed that educational qualification is less important inpolitics than other attributes such as humility, honesty, leadership, selflessness and the ability to inspire and empower others. TPLF’s puppet Hailemariam Desalegn is more known for his naked opportunism than his political acumen and leadership qualities.

Indiantvnews.com had ranked U.S. President Barack Obama, who got a

B.A degree from Columbia University and J.D. from Harvard Law School, as the foremost educated leader in the world. Although Obama is arguablyone of the most outstanding politicians in the world, he is not among the “most educated” politicians in the word.

If educational credentials matter to rank politicians, Zimbabwean President Robert Mugabe can claim the gold medal. The 90-year old dictator has amassed 8 degrees in various fields, without counting nearly 20 honorary degrees he received from universities around the world. Afterqualifying as a teacher, he earned a Bachelor of Arts degree from the University of Fort Hare in 1951. He received six more degrees including a Bachelor of Administration and Bachelor of Education from the University of South Africa. Then he went on to earn a Bachelor of Science, Bachelor of Laws, Master of Science, and Master of Laws, all from the University of London. He earned the two Law degrees while he was in prison. He got a the Master of Science degree while he was Prime Minister of Zimbabwe (1980-1987).

According to his biography, Hailemariam was born in 1965. In the same year, current Malawian President Prof. Arthur Peter Mutharika,74, got a law degree from the University of London. The distinguished scholar received LL.M in 1966 and a doctorate degree in law in 1969 from Yale University. Then he became a professor and taught at University of Dar esSalaam (Tanzania), Haile Selassie University (Ethiopia), Rutgers University(USA), the United Nations Institute for Training and Research Program for Foreign Service Officers from Africa and Asia at Makerere University (Uganda), and for 39 years at Washington University (USA).

Prof. Mutharika was democratically elected as President of Malawi defeating Joyce Banda in the general elections held on May 20, 2014.TheIndian website that did not even mention Mugabe or Mutharika, among many others such as German Chancellor Angela Merkel (PhD, Physics), Chinese President Xi Jinping (PhD, Law), and Belgian PM Elio Di Rupo (PhD, Chemistry) seemed to be oblivious of the facts when it compiled itsrandom “top 10” most educated politicians list.

Other African leaders that have advanced degrees include Nigerian President Goodluck Jonathan (PhD in Zoology), President Yayi Boni of Benin (PhD in Economics) and the outgoing Prime Minister of Mauritius Dr.Navin Ramgoolam, who was a distinguished medical doctor with numerousacademic and professional credentials. It appeared Surbhi Gloria Singh, the reporter who compiled the list failed to do her homework well enough.

TPLF army of cadres distributed the bogus “top 10” list online without checking publicly available facts. Hailemariam, who lacks depth and communication skills, is probably the only Prime Minister in the world whois given a title with little power and influence while TPLF bigwigs commandlegislative, judicial and executive branches of government. - See more at:http://www.satenaw.com/hailemariams-fake-top-10-educated-list-falls- apart/#sthash.99JfbB6F.dpuf

Ethiopia: Ex-Mayor Arkebe’s Brother to Assume Top Position At EthiopianRoads Authority’

(By Fortune Staff Writer) Position had been vacant for two months after Prime Minister's office removed Ziad Woldegebriel Prime Minster Hailemariam Dessalegn is considering to assign Getachew Equbay brotherof Arkebe Equbay as director general of the Ethiopian Roads Authority (ERA) replacing the former director general Zaid Woldegebriel. Getcahew had been general manager of Mesfin Industrial Engineering Plc (MIE) for acouple of years. And he had also been general manager of Messebo Cement Factory Plc. Both companies Getcahew worked for are affiliates ofthe Endowment Fund for the Rehabilitation of Tigray (EFFORT), a group ofcompanies established by Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF). We are still on the evaluation process of the eight candidates we short listed for the post and the evaluation process will be finalised in a month time, saidWorkneh Gebeyehu, minister of Transport, but sources said that the government is waiting for Getachew to return from a trip abroad in order to issue a letter notifying him his appointment.

The Prime Minister's Office removed Zaid from his post on October 30, 2014 by a request from Ministry of Transport (MoTr) headed by Workneh, saying that the whole Authority needed to be restructured. After the removal the Prime Minister Office assigned an acting director general Sisay Bekele who has been serving in the Authority as deputy director general for Human Resource & Finance, one of the three deputy generals in the Authority; the other two being for the engineering and planning, effective from November 3, 2014. According to official from the MoTr, Zaidwas removed in order to solve two problems related to road design and exaggerated construction costs caused by improper tender processes. Therecent contract cost for road construction ranges between 20 million Br to 25 million Br for a kilometer far above the average rate of 12 million Br per kilometer premeditated by the World Bank (WB). A recent study by Construction Sector Transparency Initiative (CoST) disclosed that road project design problems are causing time delay and are pushing budgets beyond limit. ERA was established during the imperial regime, with duties to plan, design, construct, and maintain roads; however, it has been restructured and renamed several times since then. Its last restructure was in 1997, when it was subordinated to the MoTr, and was tasked to develop and administer highways and to ensure the adherence of standards during road construction. Zaid became director general of the ERA in 2004, replacing Tesfamichael Nahusenay, who left ERA to assist Arkebe Ekubay when he became mayor of Addis Abeba and later Tesfamichael left the city administration and join the WB. Zaid has a BA degree in Economics from Addis Abeba University (AAU), as well as a Masters degree in Transport Economics from Leeds University in the United Kingdom(UK). He has worked in the transport sector for the past 30 years, starting at the Federal Transport Authority (FTA) and at MoTr asplanning department head. He joined the ERA in 1998 as planning head, and becomes the director general in 2004. According to sources Getachewreceived the offer and will take the post by this week. (Text ends)

ETHNIC POLITICS: Exterminating the Amharas: TPLF's Grand PoliticalAgenda'

COMMENTARY By Anonymous

I am really trying to understand the relationship and difference between racism and ethnicity. Many Ethiopians specially the Amharas are understanding the two terms to be the same. For example they are not comfortable to tell which ethnic group they are coming from. For them thisis to be considered as racism or ethnicism. Am I really acting like a racist or ethnicist if I renounce I am an Amhara, Oromo or Tigre? What is racism& ethnicism and how interfaces eachother? I would have loved if some onecan elaborate on this in detail.

Racism & Ethnicism: outdated: concepts in terms of Ethiopian politics:

1. Keeping the Amhara poor in education infrastructure development, investment, and business. There are few schools in the region, few primary schools, few secondary schools, and few preparatory schools. There are no roads. Majority part of the region is without sufficient roads.Asphalt road is a luxury. The investment is poor and many investors are not allowed to invest there. Systematic discrimination in foreign trade, investment is visible.

2. Few Amhara students... enter the universities. The reason is: most of the youth in the region have no access to education. They have to travel for one day to get secondary school and preparatory school. School dropouts at primary school is at a higher level. Secondly, the TPLF appointed officials mainly to reduce the results of Amhara students who sitfor grade 10 and 12 examinations.

3. Amhara businessmen and traders cannot get foreign currency, cannotbank loan, cannot get easy access to foreign trade, they pay unfair tax, they are sent to jail without committing crime. They are forced out of business and they are closing their businesses. They are jailed for fabricated crime..... Investors are not allowed to invest in the region.....

4. Spreading HIV/AIDS in the region. The TPLF government is deliberatelyspreading HIV/AIDS in the region to kill the Amhara people. TPLF government spreads contaminated blood and materials, unsafe condoms....to deliberately spread the HIV.AIDS. The disease is spreading in the rural area in a very fast way.

5. Mass Sterilization of Amhara women: The TPLF government is systematically making Amhara women and men infertile (unable e to givebirth) by vaccination. This is totally to stop Amhara generation and achieve its long project of Amhara extermination. Amhara women between the age of 16 and 38 are being made infertile through vaccination and other menses.

6. Amhara Genocide by TPLF(the silent genocide) Dr. Asefa Negash explains the Amhara genocide via supported documentation from various statistics on Ethiopia and specifically on the Amharas. He also presents statistics on farmland, education, health, economic, social, and political and much more. He puts forward how the Amhara people have been subjugated and disfranchised purposely by the TPLF led regime. Much of what he says is truly scary and horrifying as to how the TPLF has targetedthe Amharas. (Text ends)

Taitu Hotel A Precious National Treasure Burns in Ethiopia'

New York TADIAS updates For more than a century Ethiopia’s iconic Taitu Hotel in Addis Ababa, which was badly burned by a raging fire this past weekend, had stood tall bearing the namesake of its founder and the mostadmired woman in Ethiopian history — Itegue Taitu Bitul who was also one of the leading architects of Ethiopia’s winning strategies at Battle of Adwa on March 1st, 1896. Empress Taitu opened the hotel a few years after Adwa as the nation’s first full-service hotel prompted by the increasing number of international dignitaries and travelers visiting Ethiopia after the country’s decisive victory against Italian colonial powersat Adwa. Encyclopaedia Aethiopica notes that for a time the Hotel was nicknamed Bollotatos Hotel for its Greek manager. Taitu Hotel was favored by Emperor Menelik as well as Ethiopian students returning from overseas and the political elite of the times. According to historian Ayele Bekerie, an Associate Professor at the Department of History & Cultural Studies at Mekelle University, Ethiopia hosted a reception at Taitu Hotel in1903 in honor of the centennial anniversary of the Haitian revolution.

Furthermore, Taitu Hotel was where war correspondents and photojournalists from around the globe covering the second Italian invasion of Ethiopia were housed in 1935. Professor Ayele had written extensively about the significance of that era in modern African history and beyond. “Following the war Taitu and Menelik shared the enormous task of building a newly reconstituted country with diverse population andcultures," notes Professor Ayele. He shared an article honoring Taitu for Women's History Month two years ago published here. "Empress Taitu Bitul was actively involved in Menelik's government. It is worth mentioning that she was married to Menelik at the age of forty-three and she was four years older than him," Professor Ayele states. "Taitu's pioneering and enduring work in politics, economics, culture, social welfare, military have added to the definition and implementation of a national agenda. The founding of Addis Ababa as a new capital city allowed people to migrate and settle in this new town from all regions of the country." Professor Ayele says the Taitu Hotel is a monument not onlyto the timeless legacy of our forefathers and mothers who kept Ethiopia free, but also stood as a tribute to the woman who established the capitalcity that today millions of residents call their home. "Taitu Hotel is one of the most important historic landmarks of Addis Ababa," he said. "Terribly saddened by what happened. It is a precious national treasure. I am hopeful that the building will be restored as soon as possible."

TAITU HOTEL the EPRDF and ARSON FIRE

ETHIOMEDIA updates (January 13, 2015)

When on Monday the landmark hotel was going up in smoke, fire fightersbegan work after one hour, when the hotel was largely destroyed.

Witnesses said distance couldn't be a reason as the fire station was only afive-minute drive away. The fire fighters were haggling how much they should be paid before the raging fire was brought under control and the hotel saved.

But 'haggling' was a cover-up. Well-informed sources say it is in the interest of the ruling party to keep destroying historical landmarks like Taitu's, whose founder was the wife of Emperor Menelik II, a leader Ethiopians credit as the first unifier, modernizer of the nation. Menelik II isalso hailed for leading a huge Ethiopian force that crushed the Italian colonial invaders at the Battle of Adwa in March, 1896. And such credits ofthe emperor upset the ruling party, which has lived up with demonizing the late Emperor Menelik as an expansionist and divider of "nations and nationalities."

"Taitu Hotel is believed to be destroyed in an arsonist fire, one source withclose ties to the ruling party told the Ethiomedia by phone that like many private businesses have been burned down because the ruling party's sabotage to dominate the market, so then did it to such historic hotel, said the source. "If they can't send you to prion," he quipped, "they burn you down." Without the need for evidence, the foreign media may report Ethiopia as one of the fastest economies in Africa. For the citizens of the country, however, they believe their country is one of the failed states in Africa reeling under a regime that is not only a tyrant but also a mercilessarsonist.

EMPRESS TAITU HOTEL (IMPORTANT NOTES)

In August, 1898: The first local hotel founded in Addis Ababa under thepatronage of Empress Taitu Bitul.

In September 1898: The first local hotel in Ethiopia inaugurated andrenamed after the name of the empress since then.

In November3, 1898: To promote the “Taitu Hotel” the emperor Menelik IImade a state reception to resident foreign dignitaries in his good will gesturing. And Zelequa Agardew appointed reception manager. (ምኒልክ በአዲስአበባ ያሉ ዲፕሎማቶችንና የውጭ አገር ሰዎችን ጋብዘውሆቴሉን አስመረቁ፡፡ የመጀመሪያውሥራ አስኪያጅም ሙሴ ፍሬደሪክ ሐል ነበር::በኋላ ግን አቶ ዘለቃ አጋርደው ተሾሙ፡)

In January, 2015: The historic privately-owned Taitu Hotel was burned down, with the public squarely pointing its accusatory finger at the rulingparty or government.

Taitu Hotel, the first Hotel founded in Ethiopia in 1898 is burning with a part of the Piazza buildings around it. People in the area ask where are thefirefighter's new lorries and what will happen after. The State-employed fire fighters spent one hour haggling over how much the owner of the hotel should pay them to spare his property. By the time the firefighters agreed, and much of the historic site was gone.

“Alphabetic African Timeline” Website Launched at a LandmarkEvent (BERGEN, NORWAY January 15, 2015)

Alphabetic African Timeline - Take an Overview on the African continent (The Complete Guide to the African countries, people, and politics)", a Manual on African individual nation states Launched at a Landmark Eventin the western Norway city of Bergen.

Moges Mulugeta Amharay, it's Founder, Editor At-large & President told reporters that "Alphabetic African Timeline showcases the rich African socio-culture, socio-history, socio-politics and all that it has to offer to theAfricans living within Africa and the Diaspora, and non-Africans living around the world without regard to race, social standing, and occupation, political and religious beliefs. This also includes such people who are interested in learning about, and experiencing the vast diversity of the continent's rooted culture, traditions, art, and culture. Through this encounter "Alphabetic Africa – Take an Overview on the African continent"attempts to "edutain", (educate and entertain) the general public with it'scommunal approach." Moges Mulugeta alias "Blatta" is an Ethiopian national and a public Diarist, editor, and journalist who has specialized in ethnography and African studies. He is widely admired, has been known and written the chronology of African countries with spectacular events ortimeline facts and figures happened in the history of individual African states.

It provides numerous eyewitness accounts of notable people and events on African states entitled, "Alphabetic Africa Timeline – Take an Overviewon the African continent (The Essential Guide to the African countries, people and politics) in A to Z (Algeria – Zimbabwe) format. Moges Mulugeta is responsible for the creation of sub-projects under 'AlphabeticAfrican Timeline'. He has succesfully compiled and edits a manual on to the African individual nation states under a project, "Alphabetic African Timeline" entitled as "Take an Overview on the African continent – A Complete Guide to the African countries, people, and politics", a four- colors, 14, 800+ pages collected version at its A to Z

(Algeria - Zimbabwe) format at present as well as a digitally separated four-colors

10 things about Ethiopia that might probably surprise you -AfricaEncompassed

Thanks to sensational media and lack of public knowledge, Ethiopia has tohave one of the worst tourist reputations going. Thanks to Bob Geldof's fabulously publicised famines of 30 years ago, the country has this poverty-stricken, war-ravaged dustbowl reputation that we're sure they'rekeen to kick. In actual fact Ethiopia is country rich in tradition, with a staggering diversity of landscape and a kaleidescope of culture and history, tracing back to the very beginnings of our species. This all makesfor one heck of a surprising travel destination.

Let us dispel some more rumours for you…

1. 13 months in a year: There are a multitude of cultures that prefer theirown calendar to the universally accepted Gregorian one, but most run their countries based on the 12 months in a year rule. Ethiopia said heck no, in typical trend-bucking fashion, and continued to count 13 months every year for several thousand years. Which technically means it's still 2006 there, and tourism boards can actually boast 13 months of sunshinea year. Leave the gloom of a European winter behind, head to the warm sunshine of Ethiopia!

2. Ethiopia time: Once upon a time, I would refer to a thing called "Africa time" where buses, trains and other forms of public transport would run toa non-existant schedule determined by the driver and no one else.

Ethiopia takes this to a whole new level though, they actually measure thehours of a day to a different schedule. With logic that's hard to argue with,they think it's less confusing to start the clocks when the day starts. So, sunrise is 1 o'clock and sunset is 12 o'clock. When buying bus tickets etc, make sure you check if the departure is in Ethiopia time or Western time.

3, Unconquered and proud: Locals will never tire of proudly informing you that they are the ONLY African nation to never be brought under colonial control. The Italians had a go at it back in 1935, during the great African land grab by Europe, and while they succeeded in holding military control for six years, the Ethiopian forces waged military opposition and the entirecountry was never fully controlled by Italy. I heard the story from a local man, who told me 'We waiting until they built us some nice new railways and buildings and then we kicked them out."

4, The possible birth place of Christianity: Archeological artefacts evidencing Christianity as an official state of religion dating back to 324ADhave been found all over the country, and claims have been made that this confirms Ethiopia has the first official Christian state. Armenia has held the title for a long time, so we'll leave this argument to the experts!

5. Birthplace of the Rastafarian movement: Did you think it was Jamaica? You're only half right. Much of the Rasta movement did evole in Jamaica, but the spiritual home is in actual fact, right here in Ethiopia. In fact, 'ras' is the similar title to cheif, and 'tarfari' is the first name of Emporer Haile Selassie I – which essentially means that the movement posits Selassie asan incarnation of God. Need more proof? Check out the Ethiopian flag.

6. The beginning of coffee: While you're sitting there sipping your morninglatte, do you ever wonder where that cup of delicious caffeine comes from? Ethipoian goats. That's right, GOATS. The story goes that a goat herder was watching his herd, and they seemed to be attracted to a certain bush. So he decided to try the fruits himself, and his day was noticably more efficient for it! Starbucks and the rest of the coffee industry took it from there. We'd like to make a special point, Ethiopian, Kenyan and other coffee farmers around the world are paid a pittance by most of the big coffee companies for their beans. Make sure you give them a fair go, and buy fair trade wherever possible. Oxfam run a wonderful Fair Trade program, and you can keep an eye out for their logo to make sure.

7. The birthplace of humankind: We recently wrote an article about cavingin South Africa, and a place called the Cradle of Humankind, however several archaeological findings in Ethiopia's Afar region go quite some wayin suggesting that the country may be where we all started out from. In 1972, Donald Johanson and Tim D. White discovered Lucy, a 3.2 million year old hominid skeleton. For years, Lucy was all the rage, embarking ona nine-year worldwide tour and enjoying widespread fame. Then Ardi, also from the Afar region but one million years her senior, rocked up and blewher out of the water. So you arguably also have the Ethiopians to thank for, well… you.

8. Abebe Bikila: Abebe is the first black African to win an Olympic gold medal, but he only made the team last minute do to another athlete's broken foot. He opted to run his marathon barefoot, and beat the hot favourite from Morocco by a full 25 seconds. Four years later, he won goldagain at the Tokyo Olympics, making him the first ever person (of any colour or either gender) to win the Olympic marathon twice in a row. Since then, Ethiopians have made for some pretty stiff competition in most running events worldwide.

9. Addis Ababa – the New Flower: If Cape Town is the jewel of South Africa, then Addis is the shining beacon of what African capitals should be.Sure, it fits all the dusty, overcrowded cliches of any capital city – but it also hosts the home of the African Union and the HQ for the UN EconomicCommission. It's also the world's 4th highest capital city, sitting pretty at 2450m above sea level. Addis Ababa translates from Amharic as New Flower, and couldn't be more fitting.

10. Vegetarian heaven: Africa is renowned for being a terrible destination for vegetarians. In a continent where the diet is basically meat, with a side of meat, Ethiopia has risen to the challenge and given us a tasty, healthy diet that is one of the most diverse on the continent. There's a perfectly reasonable reason – most Ethiopians follow a particular strand ofOrthodox Christianity that prohibits the eating of any animal product on Wednesdays and Fridays, so for two days a week, the entire country is actually vegan. For us hippy backpacker types, that means that restaurants always have spciy vegan stews and soups on the menu, and they actually understand the concept of being vegetarian or vegan. Unlikeneighboring Kenya, where it's considered a sign of wealth and prosperity to be able to eat meat and they just can't fathom why a rich tourist wouldforgo the pleasure.

Commentary By Muse Abebe (January 19, 2015)

The National Electoral Board of Ethiopia (NEBE) consists of the Board and the Secretariat. The current Board consists of nine individuals who were nominated by the late Prime Minster and whose nomination was approvedby the parliament. The members have different roles in the Board. Few ofthe members play a significant role in the unfolding drama orchestrated by TPLF while most of them have nominal and marginal roles. The first four individuals mentioned in the list known to have close connections with the TPLF power base and responsible for making major decision in the Board while the role of the other members is marginal and supportive.

The other members not only approve the decisions supported by the fourprominent members but also they do not regularly attend meetings.

Merga Bekana (Chairman): Dr. Merga was born in 1957 in Horo Gudru of East Wellega zone. Dr. Merga has been a university lecturer for over 25 years at the Addis Ababa University Veterinary School. TPLF identified theopportunist and submissive nature of the person to serve its purpose. He accepted the nomination to the position at the Election Board in view of being relived from the teaching duty and receiving additional financial benefits. During the last ten years of his chairmanship of the Board, he has never been engaged in any serious teaching or research activities. Hehas now established a very close relations with high TPLF and OPDO officials. He receives instructions from security and party apparatus in theform of advises during informal face to face and telephone discussions. Heis very committed to execute any instruction given to him by the TPLF inner circle. TPLF is masterful in identifying individuals such as Merga whohave high academic ranks while lacking the integrity commensurate to their social status. Dr. Merga is the most important figure assigned by TPLF next to Dr. Addisu Gebre-Egziabher, who plays the 'Tako' role in manipulating Dr Merga.

Addisu Gebre-Egziabher (Deputy Chairman): Dr. Addisu was born in 1972in Adigrat, Tigray. He is currently working as Department Head at the Ministry of Federal Affairs. Since Dr. Addisu is affiliate member of TPLF, heis the most important figure for executing the agenda of TPLF in the Election Board. He is a close friend for most of the Central Committee members of TPLF. His role in protecting the interests of TPLF during the 2005 rigged election was instrumental. Currently, most of the agendas of the Board comes through him and presented to the other members as legitimate issues to be addressed by the Board. He is the right hand person for TPLF expected to play an important role in protecting TPLF's interests during the upcoming election in May.

Mohammed Abdulahi Hussein. Dr. Mohammed was born in 1970 in NegeleBorena, Oromia region from Somali parents. He is working as a lecturer atthe Ethiopian Civil Service University. He is well connected with TPLF officials since the 1990s when he was recruited to become a student at the Civil Service College. His wife is also a senior member of the party administering the Somali Regional State. She was Minister of Federal Women Affairs office between 2005 to 2009. Dr. Mohammed plays a significant role in the decision making process of the Election Board though he is not publicly seen with the chair and deputy chairs of the Board. Given his close connection with the power base for several years, he is a vital figure to carry out the dirty job assigned by TPLF to the Election Board.

Tegene Getaneh Kifle: Tegene was born in Mettu, Illubabor Zone of in 1961. He is currently president of the Federal Supreme Court. He was one of the seven members of Gambella violence inquiry commission, in which he served as Secretary. The Gambella inquiry commission was establishedto probe the violence which occurred in Gambella Region in December 2003. The commission finally ruled that the government did not use excessive force during the violence. His appointment to the presidency of the Supreme Court and membership to the Election Board linked to his loyalty to The TPLF regime. His loyalty was approved by TPLF operatives in the justice system such as Menebretsehay Tadesse(former president ofthe Supreme Court), Medhin Kiros(vice president of the Supreme Court and former commander of TPLF) and Desalegn Berhe (President of Federal First Instance Court). Currently, he is well connected with senior TPLF operatives and he is known for his soft behavior and willingness to perform any duty assigned to him by TPLF. (Text ends)

COMMERCIAL FARMING: Karuturi under the spotlight - Karuturi on theverge of collapse' Officials fretful on loan repayment, land lease and country's image

CEO says will settle local debts

By Berhanu Fekade, The Reporter (January, 2015) It has been over a yearsince the Ethiopian government expressed discontent with the performance of the Indian giant, Karuturi Global Limited, a company engaged in the business of commercial farming.

Karuturi Global, which earlier agreed with the Ministry of Agriculture (MoA) to grow wheat on 300 thousand hectares of fertile land has fell todeliver its promises of becoming a leading agricultural company.

Karuturi was almost foreclosed after failing to repay a 65 million birr (a little over USD three million) loan extended via overdraft facility from thestate-owned Commercial Bank of Ethiopia (CBE). However, the companyimmediately settled the minimum, 25 percent of the debt. But government officials told The Reporter that Karuturi is no longer reputed in Ethiopia.

Abera Mulat, director of agricultural investment and land administration agency, at the MoA told The Reporter that Karuturi no longer a reputablecompany in Ethiopia. According to Abera, the Indian giant has failed to deliver. The official went on to say that Karuturi is on the verge of collapsing in Ethiopia.

"Karuturi has gone bankrupt following internal management crisis," Abera said.

In a telephone interview from Bangalore, India, Ram Karuturi, CEO of thecompany, told The Reporter that he will continue investing in Ethiopia.

Currently, he is selling out machineries and equipment worth some 15million birr to repay debts the company has incurred here. Karuturi is known for borrowing from CBE, Dashen and Zemen banks. The loan extended to the company exceeds 170 million birr and the CEO said thathis company is set to settle the debts by the end of this month.

The multimillion dollar company has been flouting stock shares at the international market intending to raise capital. Officials reason out that the rift among the 19 figures of the Karuturi Group at global level is the result for Karuturi to go down. But Karuturi pointed at government officials for some of the challenges his company is facing. The recent announcement of Karuturi's selling out of machineries and equipment andother accessories prompted the concerns of local officials. However, Ram Karuturi denied that selling out those machineries is based on the intention of settling debts. Furthermore, he said that the company is selling out the surplus equipment it had in the farms. According to the CEO, the company has a USD 70 million worth of machineries in Ethiopia.

Abera recalled that the company was privileged to acquire massive farm land with the lowest level of lease agreements. The lease price was way below one dollar, according to Abera. In addition to that the government has provided huge duty free incentives, he mentioned. In its 2011 annualreport to the shareholders, Karuturi claimed that its operation in Ethiopiawas causing delays due to logistics and local clearances. But its investment was probed right from the beginning when it has flouted shares at stock markets for the sale of the massive farm land, in the Gambella Regional State.

Ambitious Karuturi again was in under the spotlight following its debt withZemen Bank. Officials of the privately run bank confirmed to The Reportersome months ago that there were disagreement between the two regarding loans repayment. Though Karuturi is said to retain its international presence of floriculture business, back home its performanceis at stake. According to the information The Reporter has obtained from the Ethiopian Horticulture Development Agency, Karuturi has been requested to report on its activities. Officials at the agency said that the request is still pending. Karuturi operates two flower farms called Surya Blossoms and Ethiopian Meadows in addition to the Karuturi Agro ProductsPLC and Shiva Packs PLC.

The 2012-13 annual report of the company indicated that Karuturi has developed some 14 thousand hectares of land. The report also indicated that some 21 thousand tons of maize has been harvested on four thousand hectares. However, that has been scrutinized by the governmentwhich the officials downplay that Karuturi has been unable to harvest in such scale. Most of all they want Karuturi to export more. The company was bullish to produce one million tons of maize and other produces in Ethiopia. Few months ago, Tefera Deribew, minister of agriculture took a trip to India. In his statement to Indian media, the minister said that Karuturi and the like performed way below the expectation of the government. Minister of state Wondyrad Mandefro was also obliged to answer questionsraised from MPs regarding the poor achievements of commercial farms. (Text ends)

ETHIOPA: The deepening tribal clashes b/n the Affars & Issas’

What is happening between the Afars and Issas in Ethiopia is a similar rush to take land by Gun. The regime in power is using this historical conflict for water and grassland as it fits to promote its own interest. The"Assab" Addis Ababa road has to remain open. A railway project to connect Tigrai with Djibouti that pushed the Afar pastoralist to less resource combined with large commercial farms of sugar plantation has exasperated the crisis. Similar things had happened early in 1990s after TPLF came to power. Huge tracts of land from Gonder was demarcated infavor of Tigray. Similar things though in small scale from Wollo to Tigray.Fertile farmlands of sesame is now under Tigrai region. Tigrai has now an open boundary to commercialize with the Sudan for the first time.

BOOKS: CATHRINE HAMLIN - A Mighty Girl

Happy 91st birthday to Australian obstetrician/gynecologist Dr. CatherineHamlin who has spent much of her life living in Ethiopia where she has revolutionized ...care for a childbirth injury called obstetric fistula. Dr.

Hamlin was nominated for the 2014 Nobel Peace Prize for her work building the world's only medical center dedicated to providing free repairsurgery to poor women suffering from this devastating condition -- one that affects more than two million young women around the world.

When Dr. Hamlin first moved with her husband, Dr. Reginald Hamlin, to Ethiopia in 1959 to establish a midwifery school, they had never encountered an obstetric fistula as the condition is very rare in developedcountries due to modern obstetric techniques such as Caesarean section. They soon learned that fistulas were common in Ethiopia and in much of the developing world. An obstetric fistula is a medical condition in which ahole or fistula develops in the birth canal area after a difficult or failed childbirth. Most often, the child dies and the fistula renders the woman incontinent. Due to the leaking which occurs and the resulting odor, women are frequently ostracized from their families and communities.

Recognizing the great need for fistula treatment, the Hamlins founded the Addis Ababa Fistula Hospital in 1974 to provide free fistula repair surgery to women in need. Since then, they have treated 35,000 women with a success rate of 95 percent. Dr. Hamlin has spent years building up local expertise in the surgical procedure and has since opened additional medical centers in other Ethiopian cities. Now established as the global center of expertise on fistula repair, surgeons come from around the worldto be trained by Dr. Hamlin and her associates.

To help prevent more women from developing fistulas in the first place, Dr. Hamlin established the Hamlin College of Midwives in 2006. Globally, there are over 300,000 maternal deaths every year, 99 percent of which occur in poor countries, and for every death, at least 20 women suffer severe complications from childbirth. Complications in pregnancy and childbirth remain the leading cause of the death among adolescent girls inmany developing countries. In a country like Ethiopia which has fewer than 200 OB/GYNs for a population of nearly 100 million people, midwivesoffer the best hope of providing front-line maternal care to women, especially those in rural areas.

Dr. Hamlin's work put obstetric fistula on the global health agenda, and her work has been internationally recognized by governments and professional medical societies around the world. At Dr. Hamlin's 90th birthday party this past year, her son, Richard, declared that "Catherine has one son and 35,000 daughters." Dr. Hamlin, who lives in a cottage atthe hospital and continues to be active in its day-to-day work, has trainedmany to carry on her important mission. At her party, Dr. Hamlin told those who had gathered to celebrate the life of this remarkable woman: "We have to eradicate Ethiopia of this awful thing that's happening to women: suffering, untold suffering, in the countryside. I leave this with you to do in the future, to carry on."

Dr. Hamlin's life-changing work is possible due to the support of donors from around the world through two non-profit organizations -- both wonderful charities to support this holiday season -- the Australian-basedHamlin Fistula Ethiopia (http://hamlin.org.au/) or the US-based Hamlin Fistula USA (http://hamlinfistulausa.org/).

DIPLOMACY: UK clash with Ethiopia over Andargachew Tsige'

(DAILY MAIL) - An explosive row has erupted between diplomats andMinisters over their reluctance to help a British man on death row in Ethiopia.

A series of extraordinary emails, obtained by The Mail on Sunday, revealofficials' increasing frustration at political inaction over Andargachew Tsege.

Tsege, 59, a father-of-three from London, was snatched at an airport in Yemen last June and illegally rendered to Ethiopia. There are concerns hemay have been tortured.

Yet Foreign Secretary Philip Hammond said he could not 'find time' for aphone call to raise the issue and did not want to send a 'negative' letter.

In one email, an exasperated official asks: 'Don't we need to do more thangive them a stern talking to?'

Tsege, who has lived in the UK since 1979, has been called Ethiopia's Nelson Mandela. Tsege fell out with his university friend ex-Prime MinisterMeles Zenawi, after he exposed government corruption and helped establish a pro-democracy party.

In 2009, he was sentenced to death in his absence for allegedly plotting acoup and planning to kill Ethiopian officials – claims he denies.

He was abducted on June 23 while en route to Eritrea, emerging two weeks later in Ethiopia, where he has since been paraded on TV. It is notknown where he is being held.

The diplomatic exchanges disclose how officials were dismayed whenBritish Ministers rejected requests to raise the case with Ethiopia.

'I feel so shocked and let down,' said Tsege's wife Yemi Hailemariam. 'I thought Britain was a nation driven by fairness but it seems my husband'slife is simply not valued.'

The series of emails begins on July 1, with Foreign Office officials confirming his capture: 'His detention in Yemen is significant news, andcould get complicated for the UK.'

Diplomats noted that neither Yemen nor Ethiopia informed Britain about the rendition of its citizen. 'It feels a bit like I'm throwing the kitchen sinkat the Yemenis but I want them to think twice before they do this again,'wrote one senior figure at the British Embassy in Addis Ababa.

He also noted that a prominent Ethiopian minister had given assurancesover Tsege's treatment –'but I wouldn't take them with complete confidence'.

Ethiopia has claimed Tsege tried to recruit other Britons to become involved in terrorism. But the regime has used anti-terror laws to jailjournalists and silence political rivals, and UK officials had not seen credible evidence.

One diplomatic cable says: 'All we have seen are a few pictures of himstanding in an Eritrean village – hardly proof that he was engaged in terrorist training.'

Three weeks after Tsege's kidnap, the Foreign Office's Africa directorwrote that Ministers 'have so far shied away from talking about consequences... their tone has been relatively comfortable'.

On July 21, Hammond's office was still reluctant to talk to his Ethiopiancounterpart on the phone.

'I don't think we are going to be able to find time for that at the moment,'wrote his private secretary. He also turned down sending a 'negative' letter, asking for it to be rewritten 'setting out areas of co-operation. It can end with a paragraph on the Tsege case.'

Despite concerns over Ethiopia's human rights record, the nation receives £376 million a year in UK aid. One farmer there is suing Britain, claimingthe money was used to usurp him from his land.

Hammond is believed to have finally called his counterpart at the end ofJuly, one month after the kidnap. It is understood he focused on requesting consular access rather than condemning the capture.

Reprieve, which campaigns against the death penalty said: 'These shocking emails show the Foreign Secretary appears to have blocked anymeaningful action that could potentially bring this British father home to his family, unharmed.'

The Foreign Office said they were 'deeply concerned' by Tsege's detentionand were lobbying for further consular access as well as seeking confirmation the death penalty would not be carried out.

IMPORTANT NOTES

Did British intelligence assist Ethiopian security services to kidnapAndargachew Tsige?

Did UK officials, for example, provide Ethiopian agents with Mr. Tsige'stravel itinerary?

There are telltale signs that the UK government knows more than it wantsto admit.

A series of leaked e-mails newly published in the Daily Mail hint at UK collaboration with Ethiopian security officials in the forcible rendition of theprominent opposition figure during a stop over at Sana'a airport in Yemen in June 2014. Although Ethiopian by birth, Mr. Andargatchew Tsige is a British citizen. According to the Mail, UK Foreign Secretary Philip Hammond didn't wantto be bothered with Mr. Tsige's case.

Mr. Hammond "could not find time' for a phone call to raise the issue."

Ethiopian Shade Coffee Is World's Most Bird Friendly’

A new study found high biodiversity on traditional coffee farms

Brian Clark Howard (National Geographic Published February 4, 2015)

(New Science In Brief) Shady coffee plantations in Ethiopia, where *coffee*has been grown for at least a thousand years, hold relatively more forestbird species than any other coffee farms in the world, new research shows.

The research suggests that traditional cultivation practices there supportlocal forest bird biodiversity better than any other coffee farms in the world.

In Ethiopia, coffee is traditionally grown on plantations shaded by nativetrees. These farms boasted more than 2.5 times as many bird species asadjacent mountain forest, according to a study slated for publication February 11 in the journal Biological Conservation.

"That was a surprise," says study co-author Cagan H. Sekercioglu, a biologist at the University of Utah and a National Geographic Society grantrecipient. Further, "all 19 understory bird species we sampled in the forestwere present in the coffee farms too, and that just doesn't happen elsewhere."

Other studies have shown that shade coffee farms provide better bird habitat than full-sun plantations, but the effect may be more prominent inEthiopia because farmers there tend to use native trees instead of the exotic species popular elsewhere.

Why It Matters

The new study may be the first of bird biodiversity on Ethiopian coffee farms, because the country is relatively remote and poor. Ethiopian coffeefarmers face pressure—as in many countries—to convert more coffee production to full-sun plantations.

Growing coffee in the sun can reduce the risk of fungal disease, cuts labor,and can yield more coffee beans, but at the costs of lower-quality coffee that fetches less per pound and degraded habitat for wildlife, says Sekercioglu.

The Big Picture

Scientists found all but one of nine species of migratory birds on the coffee farms, but not in adjacent forest. Sekercioglu suspects that the open structure of the farms was more inviting to the birds than the densernatural forest because it more closely resembles the habitat they are usedto in the north.

Still, Sekercioglu cautions that "coffee farms cannot simply replace forestfor habitat." Although all forest understory bird species were also represented on the farms, their number of individuals was about 80 percent lower.

What's Next

The team would like to measure how birds in the canopy above the coffee farms are faring, since they only measured birds caught in the understory,or the first ten feet above the ground. The scientists also want to study long-term the breeding success and population changes of birds in forest versus shade coffee.

Sekercioglu also suggests that the Smithsonian Migratory Bird Center orthe Rainforest Alliance, which certify bird-friendly coffee from other countries, should consider extending their programs to Ethiopia. Certification allows farmers to recoup a price premium, which can help deter the impulse to convert farms to full sun or otherwise develop theirland.

DECEIVING PUBLIC?: Aba Dula Has Degrees to His Credit Even ThoughThey Are Fake

(ADDIS VOICE) By Abebe Gellaw (February 10, 2015)

Addis Voice can reveal that the 4th term speaker of the House of People'sRepresentatives has bought and used two fake degrees from a bogus university selling non-accredited diplomas online. "Honorable" Abadula Gemeda, who is the chief "lawmaker" in Ethiopia as speaker of the lower house, bought Bachelor of Arts and Masters "degrees" in public administration in 2001 and 2004 respectively from American Century "University".

American Century University, owned by Iran-born diploma mill operator Ali Marzaei, is notorious for its degree-for-cash schemes. Mirzaei tried tosell this reporter worthless MBA and PhD degrees for $4000 without realizing that his fraudulent scheme was under scrutiny. After a lengthy legal battle with the U.S. Department of Education, Mirzaei was forced toclose down Hawaii Business College (HBC) in 2007 after it lost Federal student aid because of the forgery and fraudulent business practices thathe was previously involved in.

HBC was accredited before he and his two sons acquired it. It collapsed after Mirzaei lost court cases, its accreditation and students. The conman runs a variety phoney online colleges and schools including American Century College, American Century International High School, American Pacific University and American Pacific High School International under themotto, "Your education is your future."

Abadula, who dropped out of school at 8th grade before he joined Derg's army as a private over three decades ago, also claimed to have earned a BSc degree from "Chinese Defense University" in military leadership in 1995. But the claim turned out to be false as there is no such university inChina that conferred a degree on the speaker.

AV confirmed from reliable sources that he has never been to China to study for a BSc degree program. After we started investigation the BScdegree was downgraded to a certificate on the parliament's website butwe have already taken screenshots.

The renowned African scholar Professor George Ayittey says that the issueof phony degrees cannot be taken lightly as it is a corrupt and criminal practice that reflects on the nature of the government. "A regime that employs people that purchase fake degrees from diploma mills instead of working hard to earn them cannot be trusted," he said. Professor Ayittey refers to fake and greedy power mongers like Abadula "hippos" that must give way to the more agile and competent cheetah generation eager to positively transform nations suffering under tyrannies.

The damning evidence on Abadula's bogus diplomas has also been discovered in the speaker's biographies posted on the parliament's website, his official Facebook page as well as Wikipedia. The almost identical biographies on the official pages claim: "Abadula has a rare mix of military and civilian education. His military education was obtained fromthe Defense University of China, a close ally of Ethiopia under the EPRDF, in Military Leadership in 1995. "But Abadula seems to not stop there. His civilian education has taken him both ways across the Atlantic," it claimed."His education in the U.S. was focused on public administration. BSc in military science from the Defense University of China [nonexistent] in 1995, BA in Public administration from Century University of USA in 2001.MA in Public administration from Century University of USA in 2004 MA in International Relations from Greenwich University, UK, in 2009." The same line of narration about the speaker with four degrees has been repeated by the state-controlled media.

The English business weekly Addis Fortune's profile of Abadula (SEP, 08,2013 [VOL 14 ,NO 697) also claims that he got his BA and MA degrees from Century University.

A couple of weeks ago, AV exposed fake "professor" Constantinos Berhe (Costy) for purchasing and using MBA and PhD degrees. The AAU administration has not yet opened investigation on the bogus professor who teaches and advises graduate students. AV cannot verify whether the"professor" assisted the "lawmaker" in the purchase of the unearned degrees.

Former Derg soldier Abadula, whose real name was Menase Wolde Giorgisbefore TPLF re-baptized him as Abadula, was captured by EPLF fighters inEritrea in mid 1980s but was handed over to the TPLF as a prisoner of war, along with Kuma Demeksa (Taye Teklehaimanot) and others.TPLF reoriented the Derg soldiers and made them leaders of the Oromo People's Democratic Organization, which was set up in 1991 under the tutelage of the TPLF to serve as a Trojan horse to control Oromos.

Ermias Legese, former Minister d'etat of Government Communication, says Abadula is one of the most insecure people in the regime who alwaysaspires to please his TPLF masters. "The fact that he has bought fake degrees, even if he is supposed to be the chief lawmaker, may only certifythat his very existence is forged by the TPLF. Forged identity imposed by someone else is always a problem and deep psychological crisis," he said. The constitution of the "Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia" declares that the House of Peoples' Representatives that Abadula heads as the speaker is "the highest authority of the Federal Government, responsible to the people," as stipulated in Article 50 (3). Members of the house, which is currently controlled by the TPLF and its allies, are installed every five years.

The constitution further declares that members of the House are representatives of the Ethiopian people who are governed by the constitution, the will of the people and their conscience. But the chief lawmaker purchased the degrees and fraudulently gained material gains with no regard to the people, the "constitution" and his own conscience. Ironically, the constitution vests the power of "enforcing all disciplinary actions the house takes against its members" on Abadula, as the speakerof the house.

According to the Criminal Code (Art. 385), presenting forged certificates for the purpose of obtaining for oneself or procuring for another an advantage or betterment is punishable up to one year imprisonment. It isto be seen if the lawmaker will go to jail or get promoted for his fake degrees. (Text ends)

African Panel Ranks Ethiopia Top 10 in Illicit Financial Flow(Addis Fortune February 13, 2015)

African Union's (AU) high level panel on illicit financial flows (IFF) from Africa ranked Ethiopia ninth from the top 10 African countries with high illicit financial flows from 1970 to 2008 next to Côte d'Ivoire and Sudan. The panel, which was chaired by Thabo Mbeki, former South African president and comprised nine other members, released its report at HiltonHotel on February 1, 2015.

The high level panel is the first African initiative mandated to be established after the fourth joint annual meeting of the AU/ECA conference of ministers of finance, planning and economic developmentadopted a resolution to establish the level of IFF from the continent, to assess its long term impacts and to propose policies in reversing the illegal outflows.

The Report of the High Level Panel on Illicit Financial Flows from Africa, used estimates by various researches on illicit financial flows from Africa,adding that a significant amount was from sources such as bribing and trafficking of drugs, people and firearms, which are secret in nature andcould not be properly estimated. The panel reported that Ethiopia could have lost 16.5 billion dollars due toillicit financial flow from 1970 to 2008, which was 2.3pc of the total IFF from the continent, based on which the total continental loss could be computed to a little over 700 billion dollars. However, the report gives a different figure, 854 billion dollars for the total loss during the period.

The report, however, also adds that the loss of the last 50 years could bein excess of over one trillion dollars, adding the average annual loss couldbe significantly higher than the estimates because of secret bribes and trafficking.

Similar reports have previously been released by other bodies. Citing corruption and bribery as major reasons for the increase in IFF, the Globalfinancial report, which had illustrated data from World Bank and the International Monetary Fund showed that Ethiopia had lost 11.7 billion dollars in illegal financial out flow between 2000 and 2009. Similarly, the UNDP report had shown that Ethiopia had lost 8.3 billion dollars from 1990to 2008 representing 3.6 pc of its GDP.

The AU panel, after noting that IFFs had a negative impact on fiscal shortfall and on social spending, showed that Ethiopia loses six percent ofits gross domestic product (GDP) due to IFF per year. According to the report, Nigeria, Egypt and South Africa are the top three African countrieswith 217.7, 105.2 and 81.8 billion dollars cumulative IFFs respectively from 1970 to 2008, with Nigeria accounting for 30.5 pc of the total. LEGEND PEOPLE: In Memory of Ketema Yifru: the man who missedout by the Ethiopian foreign diplomacy

The renowned former Foreign Minister of Ethiopia, who played an iconic role in the establishment of the Organization of African Unity (OAU). Theformer Ethiopian foreign minister Ato Ketema Yifru (b. 1929) was instrumental in the creation of the Organization of African Unity (OAU). As foreign minister of Ethiopia, Ketema played a major role insolving political conflicts in the Congo region, as well as in Algeria andMorocco.

Born by the slopes of Mount Gara-Muleta, Harrarghe prov...ince of EasternEthiopia, Ketema rose to the highest levels of Emperor Haile Selassie's government, including Ministry of Foreign Minister between 1961 to 1972,and the Imperial Minister of Trade & Commerce (1972 to 1974).

Ketema was a son of a farmer in a rural sub-region known as Gara-MuletaAwraja. He was among the very few young Ethiopians of farmer family background to rise to the position of high government rank through his educational achievement. He played an important role in the formation ofthe Organization of African Unity, the predecessor of the present-day African Union.

Ketema also served in several ministries in the Aklilu Habte-Wold government. He was jailed without charge by the Derg regime for eight years. Following his release, Ketema Yifru accepted a senior position withthe United Nations agency, the World Food Program. He passed away of pancreatic cancer on January 14,1994.

What Ethiopia is facing as a nation – And the only hope forEthiopians'

PERSPECTIVE (By anonimous) Under the ethnic-lined federal system ofgovernment under the TPLF/EPRDF, Ethiopia has become a country with no real future for the majority of people. Our children are dying every day.If they are lucky, our youth, except those in the Tigray region, are only studying up to grade 10 in an educational system that is worse under this regime than during the Duerg. Even those who have an education must becontent with doing handicraft work. Those who are not so fortunate, end up on the streets as beg...gars or prostitutes.

The only hope for Ethiopians youth today is for them to leave the countryand this is full of risks—many die while attempting to make their way to another country in order to gain more opportunity. For example, think ofour million Ethiopian women suffering in the Middle East under dire conditions, or those who are dying in the refugee camps of Kenya and Sudan or those who drown in the Red Sea, attempting to reach Yemen. Icould go on and on, but most of you know what we are facing as a country and as a nation.

That is why I want to call on all our Ethiopian people from every ethnic and religious groups to say that if we are to have a future for this country,we have to come together. There is no other way. We can disagree, but we will have to find a way to still work together, not because we like it, but because our survival depends on each other.

We have to learn to disagree, but to still cooperate. We have to find a common interest like the many diverse groups are able to do. If we haveno national interest in Ethiopia, we have to create one. Such national interests should be founded on the principle that every living Ethiopian iscreated in the image of God and is of equal value as a human being and therefore should share basic human rights.

Our national interest should be all our people and the children of the future not one ethnic group like that of the TPLF. The main problem we face in Ethiopia right now is that we have become a society that trampleson the worth, dignity and respect of its people unless they serve one's interests or are within one's favored group.

The answer to the problems we face in Ethiopia call for a national movement that is larger than any political party interests—bigger than theKinijit, the UDJ, the Blue party, the Hebret, the OLF, the ONLF, the TPLF/EPRDF or any other political party or group of which you can think.

This is the reason I am calling on every Ethiopian citizen to be part of themoment for justice and freedom for all ethnic groups. May God help us tobe people of virtue, love, integrity, compassion and justice for all.

World Bank: Address Ethiopia Findings (Human Rights Watch)Washington, DC (February 23, 2015)

The World Bank should fully address serious human rights issues raised bythe bank's internal investigation into a project in Ethiopia, Human Rights Watch said in a letter to the bank's vice president for Africa. The bank's response to the investigation findings attempts to distance the bank from the many problems confirmed by the investigation and should be revised. The World Bank board of directors is to consider the investigation report and management's response, which includes an Action Plan, on February 26, 2015.

The Inspection Panel, the World Bank's independent accountability mechanism, found that the bank violated its own policies in Ethiopia.

The investigation was prompted by a formal complaint brought by refugees from Ethiopia's Gambella region concerning the Promoting BasicServices (PBS) projects funded by the World Bank, the United Kingdom'sDepartment for International Development (DFID), the African Development Bank, and several other donors.

"The Inspection Panel's report shows that the World Bank has largely ignored human rights risks evident in its projects in Ethiopia," said JessicaEvans, senior international financial institutions researcher at Human Rights Watch. "The bank has the opportunity and responsibility to adjust course on its Ethiopia programming and provide redress to those who were harmed. But management's Action Plan achieves neither of these goals."

The report, leaked to the media in January, determined that "there is an operational link" between the World Bank projects in Ethiopia and a government relocation program known as "villagization." It concluded thatthe bank had violated its policy that is intended to protect indigenous peoples' rights. It also found that the bank "did not carry out the requiredfull risk analysis, nor were its mitigation measures adequate to manage the concurrent rollout of the villagisation programme." These findings should prompt the World Bank and other donors to take all necessary measures to prevent and address links between its programs and abusive government initiatives, Human Rights Watch said.

Rather than taking on these important findings and applying lessons learned, World Bank management has drafted an Action Plan that merely reinforces its problematic current course, Human Rights Watch said. The Action Plan emphasizes the role of programs designed to mobilize communities to engage in local government's decisions without addressingthe significant risks people take in speaking critically.
The Inspection Panel also found that the bank did not take the necessary steps to mitigate the risk presented by Ethiopia's 2009 law on civil society organizations. The law prohibits human rights organizations in Ethiopia from receiving more than 10 percent of their funding from foreign sources.As a result of the law, most independent Ethiopian civil society organizations working on human rights issues have had to discontinue their work.
The plan also pledges to enhance the capacity of local government staff tocomply with the bank's policies and to provide complaint resolution mechanisms without addressing the role of the local government in humanrights abuses. This continues an approach of seeing the officials implicatedin human rights abuses as a source of potential resolution, Human Rights Watch said. Management has also concluded, contrary to the Inspection Panel, that the World Bank is adequately complying with the bank's policy to protect the rights of indigenous peoples.
Human Rights Watch research into the first year of the villagization program in the western Gambella region found that people were forced to move into the government's new villages. Human Rights Watch found thatthe relocation was accompanied by serious abuses, including intimidation, assaults, and arbitrary arrests by security officials, and contributed to the loss of livelihoods for the people forced to move. While the Ethiopian government has officially finished its villagization program in Gambella, it is forcibly evicting communities in other regions, including indigenous people, ostensibly for development projects such as large-scale agricultureprojects.
Donors to the Ethiopia Promoting Basic Services Program, including theWorld Bank and the UK, have repeatedly denied any link between theirprograms and problematic government programs like villagization.
Human Rights Watch has long raised concerns over inadequate monitoringand the risks of misuse of development assistance in Ethiopia. In 2010 Human Rights Watchdocumented the government's use of donor- supported resources and aid to consolidate the power of the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). Government officials discriminated on the basis of real and perceived political opinion indistributing resources, including access to donor-supported programs, salaries, and training opportunities. Donors have never systematically investigated these risks to their programming, much less addressed them.

The Inspection Panel report is the first donor mechanism that has investigated the donor's approach to risk assessment in Ethiopia. Althoughthe Inspection Panel adopted a narrow view of its mandate and decided explicitly to exclude human rights violations, its findings underscore the need for donors to considerably enhance and broaden their risk assessment processes in Ethiopia. These processes are crucial for ensuring that their programs advance the social and economic rights of the people they are intended to benefit, without violating their human rights.

Management's response misrepresents the panel's view of its mandate, erroneously concurring "with the panel's conclusion that the harm allegedin the Request cannot be attributed to the Project" – the Inspection Panelreport makes no such sweeping conclusion.

"The bank directors should send management's response and Action Planback and insist on a plan that addresses the Inspection Panel's findings and the concerns of the people who sought the inquiry," Evans said. "A meaningful Action Plan should address the program in question, bank- lending in Ethiopia more broadly, and how to apply lessons from these mistakes to all bank programing in high-risk, repressive environments around the world."

The Action Plan should include provisions for high-level dialogue betweenthe bank and the Ethiopian government to address key human rights issues that are obstacles to effective development, Human Rights Watch said. These issues include forced evictions and development-related displacement, restrictions on civil society, including attacks on independent groups and journalists, discriminatory practices, and violations of indigenous peoples' rights.

The plan should include provisions for identifying and mitigating all humanrights risks and adverse impacts at the project level, and for independent monitoring to make sure these concerns are fully addressed. The plan should also include provisions for people affected by projects to be involved in projects from their conception and remedies for people negatively affected by bank projects.

Given the climate of fear and repression in Ethiopia, Gambella residents who brought the complaint to the bank and have taken refuge in South Sudan and Kenya are unlikely to feel safe returning home. In light of this,the Action Plan should address their most urgent needs abroad, includingeducation and livelihood opportunities, Human Rights Watch said.

The Inspection Panel's findings also have wider implications for donor programming in Ethiopia. Donors' current appraisal methods do not consider human rights and other risks from their programs. The panel highlighted particular problems with budget support or block grants thatcannot be tracked at the local level.

“The Inspection Panel report illustrates the perils of unaccountable budgetsupport in Ethiopia,” Evans said. “Donors should implement programs thatensure that Ethiopia’s neediest participate in and have access to the benefits of donor aid.” (Text ends)

It’s All About Teff - Ethiopia’s tiny secret going globalBy Deutsche Welle February 24, 2015

Every six days a week an Ethiopian Airlines flight departs Addis Ababa forWashington in the US with a fresh batch of 3,000 injera on board. This pancake-shaped grey spongy bread is a centuries-old Ethiopian staple made from teff, a tiny grain now making a health food name for itself globally. "For the future this company is planning to distribute Ethiopian traditional food all over the world," said Hailu Tessema, founder of MamaFresh, Ethiopia's first large-scale factory producing teff-based products.

Inside the factory there are several tall blue barrels full of teff flour mixedwith water. The mixture is left there for four days to ferment. Afterwards the fermented mixture is moved next door where women scoop out smalljug-sized amounts to pour onto a heated clay surface where it sizzles andturns into a pancake like bread which is called injera.

Calcium, iron, protein, amino acids

Teff's tiny seeds are high in calcium, iron, protein and amino acids and itis also gluten-free. Even before the modern state of Ethiopia existed, Ethiopians have been grinding teff into flour to make injera, remaining unaware of the nutritional gem in their midst. But increasing global demand for healthy food along with Ethiopia's large diaspora in cities likeWashington has put teff flour in the spotlight. Teff flour can also be usedto make any flour-based food such as bread, pasta, tortillas and cookies.

Mama Fresh has also eager customers in Europe. The company flies injerato Sweden three times a week, to Norway twice a week and to Germany three times a month, with demand increasing by about 10 percent every month, Tessema said. "Predominately it's Europeans buying teff bread; those who cannot eat wheat or who are heath conscious," said Sophie Kebede, owner of Tobia Teff, a UK-based business firm specializing in the grain. "When we started in 2007 nobody knew when we said teff whether it was a Christmas pudding or a banana split, but I'm very happy to say we've come a long way from that now," Kebede said. "It's not yet a household name but at least many people know what teff is."

Protecting teff for the masses

Kebede gets her teff from farms located in southern Mediterranean countries. This is due to the Ethiopian Ministry of Trade strategically restricting exports of its increasingly sought-after grain to protect thecountry's food security.

Evidence would suggest the government has a right to proceed cautiously,because teff's global debut comes after a super grain quinoa hit a global market, rising consumption in more affluent countries. This made quinoa too costly for some locals in the countries growing it. "The government has to cover the daily consumption of its own people before it exports outside, which I can appreciate," Kebede said. "But at the same time it is much better for us if we can get teff from an Ethiopian farmer, because who is better than an Ethiopian farmer when it comes to teff."
The consensus among those involved in the teff industry appears to be that the ban will eventually be lifted, although when and how the government goes about it will require significant coordination.
"Obviously you've got the risk of driving up domestic prices of teff, and nobody wantsthat at all", said an American Matthew Davis, a partner at Renew Strategies, an early stage venture capital company based in Addis Ababa investing in Mama Fresh's plans. "So I think the government is going to bevery cautious about that, and the way they're going to control that is by giving licenses to a select, controlled number of companies or exporters."
Davis notes that already much teff is leaving the country illegally acrossborders to Djibouti, Somalia and beyond to the West. "If it's going to happen, you might as well control it and get some tax revenue from it, and everybody's happy."
Wrestling with demand
Despite all the praise for teff's amazing nutritional properties it does havean Achilles heel. Due to teff previously being limited to growing in Ethiopia, it hasn't benefited from international agricultural research.
Consequently, Ethiopian farmers haven't had access to modern farmingmethods or techniques available to other crops.
Such constraints have kept the crop's yields low and unable to keep pace with Ethiopia's increasing population, thereby driving the price of the grainbeyond many Ethiopian families. The Ethiopian Agricultural TransformationAgency is focused on increasing teff production to at least match domestic demand, after which exporting it should be more palatable. "The opportunity this presents to the country is significant and the benefit over the long term will far outweigh the risks", Davis said, while noting the industry would have to commercialize and professionalize to export effectively, and take measures not to undermine the local market.
During the teff harvest, oxen are still used to stamp teff seeds out of the grass, followed by pitch forks to winnow. That hipsters in New York and Amsterdam are suddenly after a teff fix, might well perplex some of those 6.3 million Ethiopian farmers producing it.

Those at the forefront of teff's global march, such as Hailu Tessema at Mama Fresh, appear content with the current trajectory. "I'm very happy, Ethiopia is the founder of teff, so like coffee our teff is becoming importantall over the world," Tessema said. (Text ends)

Eritrean children migrating to Europe alone

BBC Panorama: Children of the Great Migration (February 24, 2015)

Children as young as seven are leaving their homes in Africa to travel thousands of miles alone, across land and sea, to Europe. More lone children than ever before are attempting the route, some sent by their parents who do not want them to grow up in repressive countries. One of the busiest and most dangerous routes begins in Eritrea, where they crossthe border into Sudan.

Ethiopia: Digital Attacks Intensify - Spyware Firm Should Address AllegedMisuse’

By Human Rights Watch (New York, March 9, 2015) – The Ethiopian government has renewed efforts to silence independent voices abroad by using apparent foreign spyware, Human Rights Watch said today. The Ethiopian authorities should immediately cease digital attacks on journalists, while foreign surveillance technology sellers should investigatealleged abuses linked to their products.

Independent researchers at the Toronto-based research center Citizen Labon March 9, 2015, reported new attempts by Ethiopia to hack into computers and accounts of Ethiopian Satellite Television (ESAT) employees based in the United States. The attacks bear similarities to earlier attempts to target Ethiopian journalists outside Ethiopia dating back to December 2013. ESAT is an independent, diaspora-run television and radio station. “Ethiopia’s government has over the past year intensified its assault on media freedom by systematically trying to silencejournalists," said Cynthia Wong, senior Internet researcher at Human Rights Watch. "These digital attacks threaten journalists' ability to protectthe safety of their sources and to avoid retaliation."

The government has repressed independent media in Ethiopia ahead of the general elections scheduled for May, Human Rights Watch said. Manyprivately owned print publications heavily self-censor coverage of politically sensitive issues or have shut down. In the last year, at least 22journalists, bloggers, and publishers have been criminally charged, at least six publications have closed amid a campaign of harassment, and many journalists have fled the country.

Many Ethiopians turn to ESAT and other foreign stations to obtain news and analysis that is independent of the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front. However, intrusive surveillance of these news organizations undermines their ability to protect sources and furtherrestricts the media environment ahead of the elections. Government authorities have repeatedly intimidated, harassed, and arbitrarily detainedsources providing information to ESAT and other foreign stations.

Citizen Lab's analysis suggests the attacks were carried out with spyware called Remote Control System (RCS) sold by the Italian firm Hacking Team, which sells surveillance and hacking technology. This spyware was allegedly used in previous attempts to infect computers of ESAT employees in December 2013. If successfully installed on a target's computer, the spyware would allow a government controlling the softwareaccess to activity on a computer or phone, including email, files, passwords typed into the device, contact lists, and audio and video from the device's microphone and camera.

Citizen Lab also found that the spyware used in the attacks against ESAT appeared to have been updated as recently as December 2014. On November 19, a security researcher, Claudio Guarnieri, along with severalnongovernmental organizations, publicly released a tool called Detekt, which can be used to scan computers for Hacking Team RCS and other spyware. Citizen Lab's testing determined that Detekt was able to successfully recognize the version of RCS used in a November attack, but not the version used in a December attack. Citizen Lab concluded that thismay indicate that the software had been updated sometime between the two attempts. These new findings, if accurate, raise serious concerns that Hacking Team has not addressed evidence of abuse of its product by the Ethiopian government and may be continuing to facilitate that abuse through updates or other support, Human Rights Watch said.

Hacking Team states that it sells exclusively to governments, particularlylaw enforcement and intelligence agencies. The firm told Human Rights Watch in 2014 that "we expect our clients to behave responsibly and within the law as it applies to them" and that the firm will suspend supportfor its technology if it believes the customer has used it "to facilitate grosshuman rights abuses" or "who refuse to agree to or comply with provisions in [the company's] contracts that describe intended use of HT [Hacking Team] software." Hacking Team has also stated that it has suspended support for their product in the past, in which case the "product soon becomes useless."

Media reports and research by independent human rights organizations inthe past year have documented serious human rights violations by the Ethiopian government that at times have been facilitated by misuse of surveillance powers. Although spyware companies market their products as "lawful intercept" solutions used to fight serious crime or counterterrorism, the Ethiopian government has abused its counterterrorism laws to prosecute bloggers and journalists who merely report on public affairs or politically sensitive issues. Ethiopian laws that authorize surveillance do not adequately protect the right to privacy, due process, and other basic rights, and are inconsistent with international human rights requirements.

Hacking Team previously told Human Rights Watch that "to maintain theirconfidentiality" the firm does not "confirm or deny the existence of any individual customer or their country location." On February 25, 2015, Human Rights Watch wrote to the firm to ask whether it has investigated possible abuse of its products by the Ethiopian government to target independent media and hack into ESAT computers. In response, on March6 a representative of the firm emailed Human Rights Watch that the company "take[s] precautions with every client to assure that they do notabuse our systems, and, we investigate when allegations of misuse arise"and that the firm is "attempting to understand the circumstances in this case." The company also stated that "it can be quite difficult to get to actual facts particularly since we do not operate surveillance systems in the field for our clients." Hacking Team raised unspecified questions aboutthe evidence presented to identify the spyware used in these attacks.

Human Rights Watch also asked the company whether contractual provisions to which governmental customers agree address governments'obligations under international human rights law to protect the right to privacy, freedom of expression, and other human rights. In a separate March 7 response from the firm's representative, Hacking Team told Human Rights Watch that the use of its technology is "governed by the laws of the countries of our clients," and sales of its technology are regulated by the Italian Economics Ministry under the Wassenaar Arrangement, a multilateral export controls regime for dual-use technologies. The company stated that it relies "on the International community to enforce its standards for human rights protection."

The firm has not reported on what, if any, investigation was undertaken inresponse to the March 2014 Human Rights Watch report discussing how spyware that appeared to be Hacking Team's RCS was used to target ESAT employees in 2013. In its March 7 response, the company told Human Rights Watch that it will "take appropriate action depending on what we can determine," but they "do not report the results of our investigation to the press or other groups, because we consider this to be an internal business matter." Without more disclosure of how Hacking Team has addressed potential abuses linked to its business, the strength of its human rights policy willbe in question, Human Rights Watch said.

Sellers of surveillance systems have a responsibility to respect humanrights, which includes preventing, mitigating, and addressing abuses linked to its business operations, regardless of whether government customers adequately protect rights. "Hacking Team should publicly disclose what steps it has taken to avoid abuses of its product such asthose alleged against the Ethiopian government," Wong said. "The company protects the confidentiality of its customers.

Yet the Ethiopian government appears to use its spyware to compromisethe privacy and security of journalists and their sources."

TOURISM Addis Ababa: Africa's New Flower(All About Ethiopia March 15, 2015)

Amazed by the beauty of a rare flower during one of her luxurious walks, Empress Taytu – Wife of Emperor Menelik II named today's Ethiopian capital "Addis Ababa", which translates to beautiful flower in the ancient Amharic language. That was in the year 1886. Today, Addis Ababa is the metropolitan capital of Ethiopia. The city's fascinating architecture houses more than 120 international missions and embassies. The headquarters ofthe African Union are based here as well as United Nations Commission forAfrica, hence the title "the political capital of Africa"

Surrounded by hills and stretches of highland vegetation, Addis Ababa stands at 2, 665 meters above sea level, therefore making it a cool and pleasant place for outdoor tours. Apart from the town's architecture, Addishas a number of thrilling artefacts archived in the numerous museums, medieval churches and cathedrals that date back to 13th century, open airmarkets that sell anything from designer second hands to largest assortment of spices as well as adventurous feasts and celebrations that mark the calendar throughout the year. Here are three top attractions thatkeep the flower as flesh and charming as on the day her majesty burrowed her senses in its scents.

The National Museum

Lucy the hominid: The collection in the show is undoubtedly an important representation of our ancestors and testimony for Darwin's theory of evolution. The main exhibit is Lucy – world's oldest humanoid estimated tohave lived about 3.2 million years ago and discovered in 1974. ChristenedDinknesh – Amharic for 'you are marvelous', the two fossilized hominid of Lucy are the most remarkable features of the museum which also containsfossilized evidence of extinct animals.

The National Museum offers a great and insightful tour for tourists interested in the Science of evolution human as well as historians interested in culture and civilization. There are a number of paintingsdepicting different ruling eras and elites as well as craft and tools.

Merkato The Grand Open Market: Said to be the continent's largest open market, Merkato – a derivative of the Italian word meaning 'market' is crowded yet quirky, chaotic but charming market place full of life and blossoming in agricultural supplies. Perhaps the only other scent that overcomes the glorious aromatic smells of the various spices is that of coffee; Ethiopian coffee is ranked among the best in the world. Apart fromagricultural and related merchandise, any free spirited shopper will find great deals in designer second hands as well as amazing memorabilia in the makes of Ethiopian fabric and artefacts. Merkato is one of those few places you'll get lost in, yet come back feeling better! It's a place where nothing changes, yet every day is a totally different adventure.

Entoto Hill: At 3,200 meters above sea level, Entoto hill can be said to bethe unrivalled roof of Addis Ababa. The rich plantation of age old eucalyptus form quite a breeze on the city below, hence earn the tag 'thelung of Addis Ababa'. A historical and spiritual destination, Entoto Hill served as the location for Menelik II and his wife Taytu's palace until she discovered the beautiful flower far below the hill top. Folklore has it that when Menelik II put up his palace on top of Entoto, the royal palace was curbed by shortage of fuel, and so he imported loads of eucalyptus from Australia – the towering tropical forest stand as evidence to his legacy.

Today, Entoto Hill is a tourist's favorite; the climb itself is thrilling, as you leave the city below for a magnificent view from atop. Once on the hill, the Maryam church, built by the Emperor as a dedication to Virgin Mary isa solemnized place of worship. At the back of the church is the Entoto St. Mary Museum which serves as an archive for the royal paraphernalia including imperial crowns, ceremonial robes as well as drums and a rifle used during the battle of Adwa where his majesty, the Emperor triumphantly defeated the Italians? On your way down, take an hour or soat the Shiromeda market on your way down and make a good bargain forEthiopian souvenirs.

Restaurants: Ethiopian food: If Paris or Tokyo are the food capitals of the world, Addis must be the mega coffee center of the world! As one traveler christened the experience, “its coffee at its birthplace” The aromatic andnourishing whiffs from the espresso makers or the more traditional roasted and ground beans are part of the city’s traits. Coffee is a ceremony deeply embedded in Addis lifestyle. Sample Ethiopian cuisine mainly consisting of injera – bread made from fermented teff flour and accompanied by lots of spicy meaty stews or vegan dishes. There are a number of local/Ethiopian, Italian and French restaurants as well as popular night spots across the city

Fabric and souvenirs shopping: Tourists will find best purchases in Ethiopian fabric and souvenirs. If not too much hassle with the immigration, always pack a packet or two of Ethiopian coffee for gifts to family and friends. Merkato mentioned in the Top 3 is a great stop for this.Always remember that prices are hiked 20-50% above normal. Carry around your toughest set of bargaining skills!

Perhaps Addis is the only city you can drive around in vintage Russian carswithout breaking your bank! Known as lada, this distinctive collection of well maintained, vintage blue taxis are all time markers of the cozy relationship between Ethiopia and Russia.

Safety: Addis Ababa is fairly a safe place, thanks to the security guards inevery other corner of the streets. However, like every other city, be on the lookout for petty criminals (Merkato market), fake guides (mostly outside hotels) and fake cultural shows, which is a clever name for scam show. Money: Eth. Birr. All International Credit Card (Visa, MasterCard) are accepted in the ATM.

A Pentagon report blames Ethiopian regime's atrocities for the creation ofAl Shabab

Lessons Learned from the African Union Mission in Somalia

ER (7 April, 2015) Ethiopian soldiers were accused of committing a wide range of atrocities, including firing mortars on civilian hospitals, press institutions, and houses, and rape, theft, kidnapping, and murder of Somali civilians. Among many Somalis, these strikes established the U.S. as an instigator of the Ethiopian invasion, which provided a propaganda opening for al Qaeda and precipitated a flood of foreign jihadi fighters intoMogadishu. By early 2008, confidential Somali sources estimate that some2,000 foreign fighters had entered Somalia, approximately 40 percent of them from the Somali diaspora. While the moderate members of the SCICfled into Eritrea and Djibouti—where they established allied political movements called the Alliance for the Re-Liberation of Somalia—the hardline elements of the SCIC regrouped, and more were trained by the new foreign fighters in the use of remote-controlled detonations. Suicide bombings and other un-Somali tactics became increasingly common.

On 21 March 2007, a Somali mob dragged the bodies of Ethiopian and TFG soldiers through the streets of Mogadishu and set them on fire. Overthe next two years, outrage over Ethiopian atrocities—particularly the systemic use of rape—prompted more than 20 members of Minnesota's Somali diaspora to return to Mogadishu to fight the Ethiopian and TFG forces. Their possession of U.S. passports raised the specter of home- grown terrorism and heightened concerns about Somalia's conflict in Washington.18 Even members of AMISOM began to hear the name of al-Shabaab, which emerged in the midst of the public anger as a popular resistance movement.

By the end of 2007, Ethiopian casualties escalated to an unsustainable level: Somali sources living throughout Mogadishu at that time estimate that Ethiopian forces suffered approximately 200 casualties (wounded andfatalities) each week. The TFG remained hopelessly swamped in political infighting—Prime Minister Gedi was fired and in his place came a parade offour prime ministers over the next five years. Ethiopia, losing patience with the TFG and increasingly doubtful that the African Union would succeed in deploying an adequate peacekeeping mission to relieve Ethiopian forces, began to look for an exit strategy. By the end of March 2008, the Ethiopian National Defense Force (ENDF) claimed to have drawndown to approximately 2,500 troops, mostly based in Mogadishu and Baidoa (although Somali sources dispute this figure). Nevertheless, the operation was still a financial drain for Ethiopia, which prompted the government in Addis Ababa to call for international assistance to reimburse its costs. Ethiopia was also thought to have concluded by early 2008, in the face of rising public support for al-Shabaab, that a military solution in Somalia would not be possible. (Text ends)

HISTORY: Ras Gobana: a heroic story of ethnic Ethiopians'By Teshome M. Borago (April 10, 2015)

In response to my last article about Consociational democracy, I receivedmany comments and feedback from readers. Some readers supported myproposal to redesign Ethiopia's federal structure to grant regional statehood to all identities in Ethiopia [like one-ethnic nationalists, mixed- ethnic Ethiopians etc..] But to my surprise, most responders emailed me about my statements on multi "ethnic ethiopians" or "mixed Ethiopians." Many people are asking, why don't we talk enough about mixed Ethiopians?

Since 1991, one of TPLF/EPRDF's missions has been to suppress millions of mixed "ethnic Ethiopians" because they do not belong to any of the ethnic identification categories. While searching for the best angle to writeabout these mixed ethnic Ethiopians, i stumbled upon the heroic story of Ras Gobana Dacche.

So, What makes the story of Ras Gobana unique?

Historically, it is well-known that Cushitic, Omotic and Semetic speaking people of the Horn of Africa have been mixing and intermarrying for manycenturies as Abyssinian kingdoms expanded southward, and as Oromos migrated north & west; while trade/competition for resources reshaped boundaries. But in recent history, Ras Gobana played the most prominentrole which has a lasting impact on our identity.
Born in May 1821, Ras Gobana Dacche came from a family of warriors. When he was a child, half a century has already passed since the Yejju Oromo dynasty conquered and outmaneuvered its opponents in Gondar. His era was politically fragile and foreign interests on Ethiopian lands werealso ripe. For example, during Gobana's time, the Sudanese Mahdists were planning to annex northwestern Ethiopia and the Ottomans still had their agents lurking in eastern Ethiopia while Europeans were fighting to control the whole region. This was the era and Gobana's powerful family was already involved deep in politics, including in the leadership of the influential Macha & Tulama Oromo clans.
In the eyes of the competing oromo clans, Gobana was the bravest and skilled fighter; feared by other Oromo mootis (kings). His Family from hisfather's side was also connected to Abba muda, the spiritual and traditional leader of oromo.
What everybody today knows about Ras Gobana is that his Shoan Oromosoldiers were allied with Emperor Menelik II; and this alliance defeated other Oromo and non-Oromo regions. But one fabrication that we are repeatedly told in recent years by OLF & TPLF is that Ras Gobana was anOromo "traitor."
So… was Ras Gobana really a traitor?
The answer is simple. Some Oromo politicians today mistakenly think thatRas Gobana was a full Oromo. But several Oral accounts and historical books say that he was half-Oromo and half-Amhara. In his journal, the1800s Russian scholar Alexander Bulatovich described Gobana's mixedethnicity, by clearly stating: "his father was an Oromo, and his mother anAbyssinian."
So, the main problem is that those people who accuse Gobana do not really know him or know how identity influences politics. Despite Gobanabeing the top Ethiopian minister of war, critics falsely believe that he wasonly serving Menelik, without his own personal interests. Many modern politicians do not know how Gobana's mixed ethnic identity shaped his political decisions to strengthen the unity of the Shoan Oromo family andthe Amhara family into one strong country.
Long before he united with Menelik, Gobana and his horsemen were already powerful and very popular in the south. According to firsthand accounts by Alexander, "all the best fighting elements of Shoa thronged under his banners." Gobana was visionary and his Shoan Oromo forces also acted as peacekeepers between Oromo clans who otherwise “slaughtered one another like cattle,” according to historian Prof. DonaldLevine.

Other historical achievements that Ras Gobana is credited for include:destroying the Gojjam Amhara forces that opposed Shoa.
settling disputes between warring Western Oromo clans convincing the King of Jimma to peacefully unite with Shoa helping save the Leqa Naqamte (welega) kingdom from Sudaneseinvasion.
These achievements prove that he was one of the visionary founders of acentralized Multi-ethnic Ethiopian state under Shoa rule. During his military leadership, other mixed Oromos were promoted into the highest ranks in the Ethiopian military, including the famous minister Habte Giyorgis Dinagde.
While he was not the first, Gobana’s achievements were a major milestone in our transformation into a multi-ethnic Ethiopian society. So from a viewpoint of one-ethnic based politics, YES, Gobana might look likea “traitor” (the same way as the south-born Abraham Lincoln was a “traitor” for the southern Confederate states.) But from the standpoint of the evolution of a supra-ethnic Ethiopian identity, Ras Gobana is a pan- Ethiopian trans national hero.
In Summary, we should not underestimate the impact of ethnic mixture inEthiopian politics. It is a tradition in Ethiopia that most people pick their father’s side of ancestry during self-identification. But this bad tradition does not affect their school of thought or political consciousness, which is still defined by their mixed heritage. So I would argue that we improve our old tradition and embrace our mixed identities. Mixed people should be proud of their mixed heritage and avoid picking one-side of their family. They are simply “Ethnic Ethiopians” by birth since they are the byproduct of the Ethiopian nation-state formation.
In the book “Becoming Oromo” authored by Mekuria Bulcha, there is one short story of a man living in Sudan. He is originally from eastern Wallagaand he was approached by Oromo nationalists to recruit him for OLF. TheOLF was apparently desperate and they did not know the man was a mixed Oromo. So an OLF representative eagerly asked him to join their organization. To their surprise, he rejected their offer by saying his ethnicity is “Ethiopian!” In this important time for our country, it is time that all mixed Ethiopians stop picking only one part of their identity and embrace their whole being. It is time that we embrace our Ethiopian ethnicity by saying “Gosaye Ethiopia!”

Just like Ras Gobana, for millions of mixed Ethiopians, our “Gosa” is Ethiopia. The ethnic Oromo has Oromia region, the ethnic Amhara has Amhara region and the Tigrayans have Tigray; but for us ethnic Ethiopiansboth our identity and our ethnicity is Ethiopia. Thus defending the Ethiopian state is our duty just like Gobana and his grandson Ras Abebe Aregai did. Ras Abebe (son of Gobana’s daughter Askale Gobana) was the leader of the “Arbegnoch” in the 1930s, which defeated the Italian occupation and who later became the Minister of Defense under Emperor Haile Selassie. Who among the TPLF camp would dare to tell Ras Abebe Aregai choose only one part of his ethnicity? (Text ends)

Johannesburg (AFP News) - Two Ethiopian nationals suffered serious burns when their shop in a South African township was setalight by a mob, police said Saturday, as violence against foreign immigrants spread."

Johannesburg (AFP News April 13, 2015)

Ethiopians residing in South Africa badly burned in an anti-foreigner violence Two Ethiopian nationals suffered serious burns when their shop ina South African township was set alight by a mob, police said Saturday, asviolence against foreign immigrants spread.

The men were in the shop in Umlazi, south of Durban, when it was petrolbombed on Friday night. "They suffered severe burn wounds and are being treated in hospital," police spokesman Thulani Zwane said.

Three people including one foreigner had been killed in violence betweenresidents and foreign nationals that has been raging for the past two weeks in townships south of Durban. Seventeen people have been arrested over the recent attacks.

"The situation is still tense in all affected areas, and police are out in forceto prevent further clashes," Zwane said. The unrest erupted two weeks ago in Isipingo and Chatsworth, where several grocery shops owned by foreign nationals were looted and vandalised. It has now spread to KwaMakhutha and Umlazi, also in the south of Durban, forcing over a thousand mostly African foreign nationals to flee their township homes.

Some of those who have fled are being housed in community halls andtents pitched in sports grounds.

The South African Police said the reason for the current outbreak in xenophobic violence was unclear.

However clashes between immigrantsand locals are not uncommon in South Africa, as impoverished residentsoften accuse foreigners of taking their jobs.

President Jacob Zuma Friday spoke out against the attacks, saying "noamount of economic hardship and discontent will ever justify attacking foreign nationals". He said the government was "deeply concerned" aboutthe violence.

Meanwhile, Zulu king Goodwill Zwelithini, who recently came under fire forsuggesting that immigrants should "pack their bags and leave" the country, has rejected the comment as a distortion. In a statement issued Friday, the king said the attacks were "taking our continent backwards".
"A mere suggestion that people who were looting were doing that underthe king's instruction is disingenuous," said the king, who commands respect in the Durban region that is mostly inhabited by Zulus. Some foreigners have begun to fight back, with a group protesting against theviolence in an illegal march on Wednesday that was broken up by policewho fired tear gas.
The latest round of xenophobic violence came just months after similar attacks around Soweto, south of Johannesburg. Foreign shopkeepers in and around the township were then forced to vacate their premises afterviolence and looting broke out. In 2008, 62 people were killed in similar violence in Johannesburg townships. (Text ends)
If Ethiopia is so vibrant, why are young people leaving?April 28, 2015 by Hassen Hussein @HusseinHxhuss10
The latest tragedies may have temporarily united Ethiopians but has raised doubts about the country's economic miracle. Within a week, Ethiopians were hit with a quadruple whammy. On April 19, the Libyan branch of the Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant (ISIL) released a shocking video purporting to show the killings and beheadings of EthiopianChristians attempting to cross to Europe through Libya. This came only days after an anti-immigrant mob in South Africa killed at least three Ethiopian immigrants and wounded many others. Al Jazeera America reported that thousands of Ethiopian nationals were stranded in war-torn Yemen. And in the town of Robe in Oromia and its surroundings alone, scores of people were reportedly grieving over the loss of family membersat sea aboard a fateful Europe-bound boat that sank April 19 off the coast of Libya with close to 900 aboard.
These tragedies may have temporarily united Ethiopians of all faiths and ethnic backgrounds. But they have also raised questions about what kind of desperation drove these migrants to leave their country and risk journeys through sun-scorched deserts and via chancy boats. The crisis comes at a time when Ethiopia's economic transformation in the last decade is being hailed as nothing short of a miracle, with some comparingit to the feat achieved by the Asian "tigers" in the 1970s. Why would thousands of young men and women flee their country, whose economy isthe fastest growing in Africa and whose democracy is supposedly blossoming? And when will the exodus end?

After the spate of sad news, government spokesman Redwan Hussein saidthe tragedy “will be a warning to people who wish to risk and travel to Europe through the dangerous route.” Warned or not, many youths simplydo not see their dreams for a better life realized in Ethiopia. Observers cite massive poverty, rising costs of living, fast-climbing youth unemployment, lack of economic opportunities for the less politically connected, the economy’s overreliance on the service sector and the requirement of party membership as a condition for employment as the drivers behind the exodus.

A 2012 study by the London-based International Growth Center noted (PDF) widespread urban unemployment amid growing youth landlessnessand insignificant job creation in rural areas. “There have been significant increases in educational attainment. However, there has not been as much job creation to provide employment opportunities to the newly educated job seekers,” the report said.

One of the few ISIL victims identified thus far was expelled from Saudi Arabia in 2013. (Saudi deported more than 100,000 Ethiopian domesticworkers during a visa crackdown.) A friend, who worked as a technicianfor the state-run Ethiopian Electricity Agency, joined him on this fatefultrek to Libya. At least a handful of the victims who have been identifiedthus far were said to be college graduates.

Given the depth of poverty, Ethiopia’s much-celebrated economic growthis nowhere close to accommodating the country’s young and expanding population, one of the largest youth cohorts in Africa. Government remains the main employer in Ethiopia after agriculture and commerce. However, as Human Rights Watch noted in 2011, “access to seeds, fertilizers, tools and loans … public sector jobs, educational opportunitiesand even food assistance” is often contingent on support for the ruling party.

Still, unemployment and lack of economic opportunities are not the onlyreasons for the excessive outward migration. These conditions are compounded by the fact that youths, ever more censored and denied access to the Internet and alternative sources of information, simply donot trust the government enough to heed Hussein’s warnings. Furthermore, the vast majority of Ethiopian migrants are political refugees fleeing persecution. There are nearly 7,000 registered Ethiopian refugees in Yemen, Kenya has more than 20,000, and Egypt andSomalia have nearly 3,000 each, according to the United Nations refugee agency.

Increasingly despondent populace.

Ethiopians will head to the polls in a few weeks. Typically, elections areoccasions to make important choices and vent anger at the incumbent.But on May 24, Ethiopians will be able to do neither. In the last decade, authorities have systematically closed the political space through a seriesof anti-terrorism, press and civil society laws. Ethiopia's ruling party, nowin power for close to 24 years, won the last four elections. The government has systematically weakened the opposition and does not tolerate any form of dissent.

The heightened crackdown on freedom of expression has earned Ethiopiathe distinction of being the world's fourth-most-censored country and thesecond leading jailer of journalists in Africa, behind only its archrival, Eritrea, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists.

There is little hope that the 2015 elections would be fundamentally different from the 2010 polls, in which the ruling party won all but two of the 547 seats in the rubber-stamp national parliament. The ruling party maintains a monopoly over the media. Authorities have shown little interest in opening up the political space for a more robust electoral contest. This was exemplified by the exclusion of key opposition parties from the race, continuing repression of those running and Leenco Lata's recent failed attempt to return home to pursue peaceful political struggle after two decades of exile. (Lata is the founder of the outlawed Oromo Liberation Front, fighting since 1973 for the rights of the Oromo, Ethiopia'smarginalized majority population, and the president of the Oromo Democratic Front.)

A few faces from the fragmented and embittered opposition maybe elected to parliament in next month's lackluster elections. But far from healing Ethiopia's gashing wounds, the vote is likely to ratchet up tensions. In fact, a sea of youth, many too young to vote, breaking policebarriers to join opposition rallies bespeaks not of a country ready for elections but one ripe for a revolution with unpredictable consequences.

Despite these mounting challenges, Ethiopia's relative stability — compared with its deeply troubled neighbors Somalia, South Sudan, Eritrea and Djibouti — is beyond contention. Even looking further afield,across the Red Sea, where Yemen is unraveling, one finds few examplesof relative stability. This dynamic and Ethiopia's role in the "war on terrorism" explains Washington's and other donors' failure to push Ethiopia toward political liberalization.

However, Ethiopia's modicum of stability is illusory and bought at a heftyprice: erosion of political freedoms, gross human rights violations and ever-growing discontent. This bodes ill for a country split by religious, ethnic and political cleavages. While at loggerheads with each other, Ethiopia's two largest ethnic groups — the Oromo (40 percent) and the Amhara (30 percent) — are increasingly incensed by continuing domination by Tigreans (6 percent).

Ethiopian Muslims (a third of the country's population of 94 million) havebeen staging protests throughout the country since 2011. Christian-

Muslim relations, historically cordial, are being tested by religious-inspiredviolence and religious revivalism around the world. Ethiopia faces rising pressures to choose among three paths fraught with risks: the distasteful status quo; increased devolution of power, which risks balkanization; and more centralization, which promises even further resistance and turmoil.

It is unlikely that the soul searching from recent tragedies will prompt the authorities to make a course adjustment. If the country's history of missed opportunities for all-inclusive political and economic transformationis any guide, Ethiopians might be in for a spate of more sad news. As longas the answer to these questions focuses on security, the door is left wide open for further exodus and potential social unrest from an increasingly despondent populace. The United States' irresponsible praise of Ethiopia's regime'The Post's View (By Editorial Board (April 30, 2015)

ETHIOPIA'S ELECTIONS, scheduled for May 24, are shaping up to be anything but democratic. A country that has often been held up as a poster child for development has been stifling civic freedoms and systematically cracking down on independent journalism for several years.

It was consequently startling to hear the State Department's undersecretary of state for political affairs, Wendy Sherman, declare during a visit to Addis Ababa on April 16 that "Ethiopia is a democracy that is moving forward in an election that we expect to be free, fair andcredible." The ensuing backlash from Ethiopians and human rights advocates was deserved.

Ms. Sherman's lavish praise was particularly unjustified given Ethiopia's record on press freedom: It has imprisoned 19 journalists, more than anyother country in Africa. According to a new report by the Committee to Protect Journalists, the country ranks fourth on its list of the top 10 most censored countries in the world. At least 16 journalists have been forced into exile, and a number of independent publications have shut down dueto official pressure. Last weekend marked one year since six bloggers were arrested and jailed without trial. The "Zone 9" bloggers, who used their online platforms to write about human rights and social justice and to agitate for a democracy in Ethiopia, were charged with terrorism underthe Anti-Terrorism Proclamation, which has been used to clamp down on numerous journalists critical of the regime. Today, the bloggers remain imprisoned, awaiting what will likely be a trial by farce.

As for the elections, opposition parties say the ruling Ethiopian People'sRevolutionary Democratic Front , led by Hailemariam Desalegn, has undermined their efforts to register candidates for the May vote. Since lastyear, members of opposition parties and their supporters have been arrested and harassed. In March, the sole opposition leader in Parliament said he would not run for reelection due to state interference with his party's affairs. The EPRDF, which has been in power since 1991, was reported to have won the last elections in 2010 with 99.6 percent of the vote.

The State Department released a statement last week urging Ethiopia torelease journalists who have been imprisoned for doing their jobs. But asthe considerably more high-profile statement by Ms. Sherman indicated, the Obama administration has been reluctant to criticize what it regards as a key security ally in the Horn of Africa. A State Department spokeswoman confirmed this week that Ms. Sherman's comments "fully reflect the U.S. government's positions on these issues." (Text ends)

ETHIOPIAN MUSIC: Girma Yifrashewa's blend of European piano andEthiopian music'

By Michael West, Washington Post (May 6, 2015) "There is no place in Ethiopia where Girma could do this!" an immigrant from Addis Ababa explained during Sunday night's intermission at Bethesda Blues & Jazz Supper Club. "People there don't pay attenton to classical music. It's all cultural, traditional music." Pianist and composer Girma Yifrashewa, then,is as unique in his homeland as he is in the United States: a man who hasstudied the European piano repertoire and has applied its devices to Ethiopian traditional music. At the club, he showcased both traditions in one of this year's most mesmerizing concerts.

Yifrashewa made headway in the States with the release of 2014's "Love & Peace," featuring five original compositions for solo piano. (NPR namedone piece, "Sememen," its song of the year for classical and jazz.) But with the exception of the opener, a somber new piece dedicated to the recent Ethiopian victims of the Islamic State, his first set on Sunday was all repertory. His choices, though, were very revealing: heavy on Chopin (who wrote three of the seven selections), with his static harmony and dense latticework, and nearly all waltzes, including Tchaikovsky's "Autumn" and Liszt's "Consolation No. 3," as well as his own composition.

This formed important context; waltz time (3/4 and 6/8) is very importantin Ethiopian music, and Chopin, as became clear in the second half, is a major influence on Yifrashewa's composing. They were also beautiful performances in their own right, Yifrashewa employing a tenderness of tone and light rhythmic touch that added heft to his more emphatic attackon pieces by Chopin and Schumann.

The second half opened with another waltz, James Lee III's "Memories ofAxum." Then came Yifrashewa's pieces from "Love & Peace." These, he explained, were based on Ethiopian folk songs, but the European development techniques were so firmly in place that it was often hard to hear the East African elements. The pastoral “The Shepherd with the Flute,” for example, was built on a set of right-hand trills that emulated the titular instrument but also drew on Chopin’s filigrees; those same trillsoccupied “Elilta,” in this case evoking a joyful Ethiopian yelp, in a melody that resembled a Protestant hymn with Beethovenian ornamentation. “Ambassel” made the Ethiopian tradition most apparent, with rumbling modal harmony and stately 6/8 time.

Yet there was also a surprising amount of American influence in Yifrashewa’s music. “Elilta” was a 4/4 tune with triplet phrasing on the piano, reminiscent of swing rhythm; swing went from reminiscent to overtin “Chewata,” with a syncopated section that echoed Gershwin’s “Rhapsody in Blue.” “The Shepherd With the Flute” suggested a blues aesthetic in its middle section as well. And, as if to make sure this point wasn’t lost, Yifrashewa’s encore for the evening was a fast and lively rendition of Scott Joplin’s “Maple Leaf Rag.” From an Ethiopian musician who studied in Europe and was now performing in the United States, it was a tidy package. Egyptian forces rescue 30 Ethiopians from IS in Libya

(May 7, 2015) የግብጽ መከላከያ ሃይሎች 30 ኢትዮጵያውያንን ከአይኤስ ቁጥጥር ነጻ አወጡ። የግብጹ ፕሬዚዳንት አል ሲሲ ነጻ የወጡትን ኢትዮጵያውያን አውሮፕላን ማረፊያ ድረስ ሄደው ተቀብለዋቸዋል።

CAIRO (Reuters) - A group of Ethiopians reported to have been kidnappedin Libya arrived at Cairo airport on Thursday after Egyptian authorities managed to get them released, Egyptian state television said. The stationaired live footage from the airport where Egyptian President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi greeted about 30 Ethiopians who had arrived on an Egyptian government plane. It gave no details of their identity, the manner of theirrelease or circumstances of detention. Sisi has repeatedly called for international efforts to combat Islamist militants in Libya, which has descended into chaos since veteran autocrat Muammar Gaddafi was toppled in 2011 during the Arab Spring uprisings. The former Egyptian army chief has portrayed himself as a champion of moderate Islam in a battle against what he calls the global existential threat from groups suchas Islamic State.

ATHLETICS: Ethiopian distance runner Haile Gebrselassie announces hisretirement

(Reuters, May 11 2015) Haile Gebrselassie, considered one of athletics’greatest distance runners, said on Sunday (Monday NZ time) he was retiring from competitive running.

The Ethiopian’s long-time manager at first said it was not the end of Gebrselassie’s career, but later issued a press release saying the runnerhad retired from athletics.

“Running legend Haile Gebrselassie announced his retirement from competitive running at the Great Manchester Run today where he ran hislast competitive race,” the statement said.

Gebrselassie was quoted as saying: “I am retiring from competitive running, not from running. You cannot stop running, this is my life. And Iam still enjoying my farewell tour like today in Manchester.”

His manager, Jos Hermens, could not be reached to explain the newstatement.

“Yes, probably a kind of retirement!” Hermens said in a text messagealerting Reuters to the new statement.

Earlier, Hermens had texted Reuters: “No, he’s not retiring; he will be inGlasgow in October. He’ll probably never retire.”

Gebrselassie, 42, had told BBC Sport he was retiring from competitiverunning after finishing 16th in the Great Manchester Run on Sunday.

But it is not the first time he has talked about calling it quits.

Gebrselassie had tearfully retired five years ago after knee problemsforced him to drop out of the New York City Marathon.

But he returned to racing a few months later.

Hermens admitted Gebrselassie was training a lot less than before, “somay be kind of a farewell trip in the UK!” the manager said of Gebrselassie’s upcoming race in Glasgow.

The soft-spoken Gebrselassie achieved success both on the track and theroads during his long career.

Nearly unbeatable on the track in his prime, he won his first of eight indoor and outdoor world championships at Stuttgart in 1993 and went onto hold world records from the 5,000 metres to the marathon.

His Olympic medals came in the 10,000 metres in successive Olympics,1996 in Atlanta and 2000 in Sydney.

Gebrselassie will now focus more on his businesses in Ethiopia where he isinvolved in real estate projects, owns four hotels, a coffee plantation and is an automobile distributor, his management company’s statement said. “He will also remain a running ambassador and wants to stay active in athletics.” (Text ends)

Ethiopia: Opposition claims harassment ahead of electionsBy Elias Meseret, AP (May 14, 2015)

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP) — Ethiopian opposition groups are accusingthe government of harassing their members and carrying out illegal detentions ahead of the May 24 elections.

Yonathan Tesfaye, spokesman for the Blue Party, told The Associated Press this week that some party members are being beaten, especially inthe southern region. He said his party may boycott the elections.

"If the current level of harassment and detention along with the problemin registering our observers continues, we might be forced to consider exiting from the election process," he said.

Chane Kebede, leader of the Ethiopian Democratic Party, also complainedof a climate of fear.

"We have now come to the understanding that the ruling party wants a100 percent control of the government after the upcoming election," hesaid.

Only one opposition lawmaker won a seat in the country's parliament in the 2010 general elections, which watchdog groups said were marred byintimidation and harassment of opposition activists.

But a spokesman for the ruling party, Desta Tesfaw, dismissed the allegations and accused opposition parties groups of trying to discredit theelections.

"They don't have their own policies and agendas, and that's clear to the Ethiopian people," Tesfaw said, referring to the political opposition. He noted, however, that the ruling party had "taken some measures againstour members who were found violating the election code." He did not saywhat the violations were.

In 2010, the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front, or EPRDF, won 99.6 percent of all parliamentary seats — a victory that Human Rights Watch said was "the culmination of the government's five- year strategy of systematically closing down space for political dissent andindependent criticism." ETHIOPIA: Voters being forced to cast ballots ahead of election day -SMNESMNE Press Release (May 14, 2015)

WASHINGTON, DC - The Ethiopian National Election is on May 24, 2015, less than two weeks away, but the authoritarian regime, under the controlof the Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) for the last 23 years, appears to be panicking. The political mood of the Ethiopianpeople is feistier than ever as they see the election to be a totally controlled process, hardly worthy of their participation. Yet, even despite the scrupulous closing down of all political space, the EPRDF is obviously still scared and has come up with a new plan to further protect themselvesfrom the vote of the people, even while pretending otherwise. Regime cadres, all on salary, have been organized so that one cadre is responsible to ensure five people fall into line with the goals of the EPRDF.These cadres have been going to the homes of those people assigned to them with election ballots for the May 24th election. The people are told they must immediately cast their ballots and to stay home on Election Day. Reportedly, the ballots are not secret, but are collected by these agents who also write down their names. Anyone who refuses to cast theirballot or who tries to vote on Election Day will face serious consequences like the loss of jobs, opportunities, or other benefits. Some are threatenedwith punitive actions, which in this country might mean arrests, beatings or other abuse. With the full authority of the regime behind them, they are able to harass and intimidate these persons in order to achieve full compliance.

This is the first election since the death of the former Prime Minister MelesZenawi and the atmosphere of discontent in the country is greater than ever. Since the 2005 election, where some limited space was allowed for the opposition, the EPRDF has increasingly tightened the political space. In2010, the EPRDF clamped down on nearly all political space to opponents and according to documentation by Human Rights Watch, used humanitarian aid as a means to manipulate votes. The unpopular EPRDF then claimed an absurd 99.6% electoral victory, giving only one opposition member a place in the 547-member parliament. However, in 2015, the EPRDF has restricted the playing field even more. If one thought of it as a soccer field; there would be only one ball, one net and one team—their own. No other team would be on the field and now, even the spectators would have to stand outside. It is obvious that Ethiopia has become one of the most repressive regimes in Africa; however, beyond that, it may be the most egregious example of an ethnic-apartheid regimeon the continent—possibly worse than South Africa.

The four ethnic-based parties that make up the EPRDF fail to represent the over eighty or more ethnic groups in the country; yet, even those in three of the four parties are puppets of the one controlling group of the Tigrayan Peoples Democratic Front (TPLF). Going even further, the TPLF does not represent many of their own people who object to its actions. It is a system built on patronage. In order to gain and maintain power, the TPLF has built an entrenched system of gifting regime loyalists from everyethnicity; but especially endowing its own region with perks as a means ofentrapping them and making them complicit in supporting the regime.

However, only those with connections to the Tigrayan Central Committee are assured the benefits. These are the people who dominate all key positions throughout every sector of society and who have greatly profitedfrom this association. If the TPLF loses the election, this power group fears losing everything they have gained through years of brazenly seizing thepower and assets of the country with impunity.

Words like democracy, elections, and the rule of law are used to cloak thetruth. Actions in the light are only meant for public display while what happens in the shadows undermines all else. For example, the TPLF/EPRDF is a regime that espouses the values of a robust civil society;yet, they passed a law, the Charities and Societies Proclamation (CSO), which has totally silenced any independent civil society voices within Ethiopia. In their place, government-controlled institutions have taken theplace of the previous ones, working in concert with the goals of the TPLF/EPRDF. For example, efforts to advance such things as women's empowerment, human rights, reconciliation, justice and electoral rights, have been criminalized if an organization receives more than 10% of theirfunds from foreign sources. Over 2,600 organizations closed as a result.

Another example is an anti-terrorism law that has been used to silencepolitical dissent. In the light, it pretends to be working to protect the people against terrorism, but in the dark it has resulted in the imprisonment or exile of human rights bloggers, journalists, political activists, religious leaders or any others who speak out.

Now, there is a national election scheduled that is merely for show. WendySherman, the U.S. State Department Undersecretary, is the only one calling it a free, fair and credible election. She is the only one figuratively selling tickets to a political game where there are no seats left for anyone but the TPLF. All the groundwork has been laid months ago to ensure there is no competition.

As we described in a February 2015 press release, the TPLF/EPRDF has taken many steps to make sure there are no viable opposition groups running against them. Instead, they have manipulated the process all along the way so as to deny any entry. This has included intimidating andarresting political leaders and hijacking at least one organization from its leadership—Unity for Democracy and Justice (UDJ)—by replacing the legitimate leaders with their own regime cadres. Now they, under the guise of UDJ, will compete against themselves so they can win either way.Yet, even though they have successfully closed off all political space, theystill are afraid of the people.

Now they are sending their agents door-to-door to urge people to cast their ballots right there, warning them that now that they have voted, theTPLF/EPRDF knows who they are and how they voted. Many will be afraidto cast their vote for any other than the TPLF/EPRDF candidates. Those who resist are threatened.

When one tiny section of a political party, like the TPLF, holds completepower over the marketplace of opportunities as well as over the institutions capable of punishing those who fail to yield to its authority, you get a country like today's Ethiopia and an election like the one comingup this month. Just wait until the TPLF manipulates the political scenery by removing Hailemariam Desalegn, the current prime minister who comes from the south—not from the Tigray region like others in the TPLF—and replaces him with one of their own TPLF cronies. How long can such a regime last when it excludes the vast majority of Ethiopians by ethnicity and corruption? The answer to this question is "not long" for it is unsustainable. It is out of desperation that this new pre-election vote is being forced on the people of Ethiopia.

Interestingly, the recent tragedies affecting Ethiopians abroad have taken on a life of their own, uniting the people around their deep compassion forthe many nameless Ethiopians whose ethnicity, religion, and background no longer seem to matter. Diverse Ethiopians have been greatly affected by the death or hardship of these fellow Ethiopians—who were shot or beheaded in Libya for their Christian faith, who were burned alive in SouthAfrica, whose organs were removed in the Sinai Desert, who are unwantedin countries among a flood of other refugees, who have been raped, abused or kept in domestic servitude in the Middle East until some even hung themselves or jumped off a bridge or balcony, or who drowned in the Mediterranean Sea as they posed as Eritreans because so many international authorities discount the totalitarian nature of the TPLF/EPRDF. They left seeking freedom, safety from arrest or abuse, or a better life outside of Ethiopia. Ethiopians grieve for them and their loved ones regardless of their differences.

We are witnessing a change before our eyes. Ethiopians are putting humanity before ethnicity, one of the foundational principles of the SMNE,as never before and it is a threat to the TPLF/EPRDF. When Ethiopians came out to mourn for those who died it turned into a protest against a system that drives so many of our young people from their homeland.

In fact, during the protest some of the younger people, born under the rule of the TPLF/EPRDF, were calling for former Ethiopian President Mengistu Hailemariam, a known brutal dictator, to come back to rule the country; choosing him over the current brutal and corrupt ethnic- apartheid system. Their position was based on the belief that people weremore unified under Mengistu and that there had been more equal opportunity regardless of ethnicity. No wonder the TPLF/EPRDF fears whatmight happen if people came out to vote.

In conclusion, is this the democratic process that Wendy Sherman alludedto a few weeks ago that keeps getting better and better? Is this what a credible election is to the Obama administration? Obama was not elected in this way. If the State Department speaks the language of democracy building, should they not be outraged by what is happening in Ethiopia?

Why is such a double-standard tolerated? Why is no one condemning it?Where are the other donor countries who are the financiers of this regime? Where is their voice? They cannot claim they do not know. We are attaching the voting cards that have been handed over to the peopleso others can see further evidence of what is happening on the ground. Now, the US, the UK, the EU and others cannot claim they did not know.

We are calling on donor countries to make the TPLF/EPRDF accountable. Ifdonor countries can condemn a corrupt, rigged election process in countries where we have no alliances; but then overlook it in places like Ethiopia where we have national interests, is it not morally wrong? For Ethiopians, it is not only about our own national interests, but it is about the survival of our people and about our future.

The greatest responsibility for change in Ethiopia lies on the shoulders of the people of Ethiopia. For us, whether or not the outsider comes to our aid, we cannot determine, but with God's help and in keeping with His sovereign will, we Ethiopians will free ourselves. We are not begging for our freedom to be handed over like foreign aid. Ethiopians will claim it forthemselves. What we are asking is for outsiders not to be a roadblock to our freedom or to our future and to speak out truthfully when harm and immoral actions are committed.

The SMNE was created for the freedom, justice, and overall wellbeing of the Ethiopian people, but even if there was opportunity for a change of government or leadership, it would not be enough. During the domination by the TPLF/EPRDF, the people of Ethiopia have been encouraged towardsdivision, hate, violence and self-interest. Without change in the hearts andminds of the people of Ethiopia, we will be stuck in a self-defeating pattern. If we are to become a healthy, well-functioning society of diversepeople, we must put humanity before ethnicity and care about the freedom, justice and well being of others like we care about our own for no one is free until all are free. This goes beyond our borders to our neighbors close and far in this global society.

Right now, the TPLF/EPRDF is not free. They are consumed with their personal survival and it is becoming increasingly more difficult for them tolive in their self-made prison. We must find a way as a society to re- engage as people. The apparatus of the TPLF/EPRDF political collective includes millions of regime collaborators who have chosen to buy into the system rather than to stand up against it; however, that loyalty is not deep, but can quickly change. Right now, only a few are thriving while the majority struggles to survive.

Let us strive to be people who will not collaborate with what is to the detriment of others. Let us not take advantage of our own people, but instead, let us help contribute to the creation of a government of the people, by the people and for the well being of all the people. May Godgive courage to Ethiopians to stand up for what is right, good, and wisefor our future together. (tText ends)

TRAVEL WARNING: US State Department issues travel alert to Ethiopia

PRESS RELEASE (May 15, 2015) The US State Department recommends

U.S. citizens maintain a high level of security awareness during the electoral period and avoid political rallies, polling centers, demonstrations,and crowds of any kind as instances of unrest can occur. Review your personal security plans; remain aware of your surroundings, including local events; and monitor local news stations for updates. Although there have been no specific incidents of violence targeting U.S. citizens, U.S. citizens are urged to exercise caution and stay current with media coverage of local events. Election results are scheduled to be announced June 22, 2015.

During previous elections, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) required alldiplomats and international organization staff living in Addis Ababa to receive an official pass from the MFA if they planned to travel outside of Addis Ababa during the election season. While not in effect this election, the U.S. Embassy continues to urge U.S. citizens to be aware of election sensitivities. We especially recommend avoiding public polling stations on the day of the election, including schools and other public buildings. In Addis Ababa alone there will be nearly 1,600 polling stations – roughly one polling station for every kilometer.

We strongly recommend that U.S. citizens traveling to or residing in Ethiopia enroll in the Department of State's Smart Traveler Enrollment Program (STEP) at travel.state.gov. STEP enrollment gives you the latestsecurity updates, and makes it easier for the U.S. Embassy or nearest U.S. Consulate to contact you in an emergency. If you do not have Internet access, contact the nearest U.S. Embassy or Consulate to enrolldirectly.

Regularly monitor the State Department's website, where you can find current Travel Warnings, Travel Alerts, and the Worldwide Caution. Readthe Country Specific Information for Ethiopia. For additional information,refer to the "Traveler's Checklist" on the State Department's website. (Text ends)

Heavily armed Ethiopian troops invade Kenya'

Kenyan security agencies have been put on high alert after about 50 heavily-armed Ethiopian soldiers and police officers crossed the borderand reportedly took over a police station.

Police said the incident at Illeret Police Station in North Horr came just a week after surveyors had completed demarcating the Kenya-Ethiopia border. Armed with AK47 rifles, the Ethiopians arrived in 10 vehicles. Theydisembarked and took strategic positions around the police station.

They inspected the area and took photos of the area, which is 16 kilometres from the border. They are said to have gone to inspect the border and a lake. They, however, admitted that the Kenyan Governmentwas not aware of their presence. But they vowed to return.

THIRD TIME

This is the third time Ethiopian forces have crossed into Kenya this year. North Horr OCPD Tom Odero said the Ethiopians stormed the station a fewdays after Kenyan and Ethiopian surveyors concluded surveying and demarcating the border. “Their intention is not clear,” read a brief from Inspector-General of Police Joseph Boinnet’s office in Nairobi.

Mr Odero also called for reinforcements, saying there were not have enough officers. “Illeret Police Station has nine officers only, but the fewwho are there remain on high alert, monitoring the border,” the brief read.

The Kenya Defence Forces spokesman, Colonel David Obonyo, said they were not aware of the incident. “We do not have information. However, Ethiopia is one of our traditional friends and I do not think they would doanything bad,” said Col Obonyo.

As Ethiopia Votes, what’s ‘free and fair’ Got to do with it? (WashingtonPost)

NEWS ANALYSIS By Terrence Lyons (May 18, 2015) ‘The voting that willtake place on May 24 will not provide citizens a meaningful role in selecting their next government.”

Ethiopia, Washington’s security partner and Africa’s second most populouscountry, is scheduled to hold national elections on May 24. The ruling Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) and its allied parties won 99.6 percent of the seats in the last round of elections in 2010. There is no doubt that the ruling party will win again.

The party has ruled since 1991 when it seized power following a prolongedcivil war. It dominates all major political, economic, and social institutions,has virtually eliminated independent political space, and opposition partiesare fractured and harassed. Ethiopia has jailed more journalists than any other country in Africa.

The EPRDF is an extremely strong and effective authoritarian party. Yet Wendy Sherman, the Under Secretary of Political Affairs in the Department of State, recently said, “Ethiopia is a democracy that is moving forward in an election that we expect to be free, fair and credible.”What roles do elections play in authoritarian states and what, if anything, do they have to do with “free, fair, and credible” standards?

Part of the answer is to recognize that elections and political parties in autocratic states play different roles than they do in democratic states. Electoral processes are used by authoritarian regimes to consolidate power and to demonstrate the ruling party's dominance, as argued by scholars of comparative politics such as Schedler and Gandhi and Lust- Okar. Research by Geddes shows that single-party authoritarian regimes tend to be more stable and last longer than military or personalistic ones. Strong parties manage instability by encouraging intra-elite compromise, co-opting opposition, and institutionalizing incentives to reward loyalty. Elections and strong political parties thereby contribute to"authoritarian resilience," as scholars note with reference to China, Iran and Syria, and Zimbabwe.

Non-competitive elections are common in authoritarian states and incumbents often win by incredible margins. In Sudan, President Omar al-Bashir won 94 percent of the vote in April 2015 elections, Uzbek PresidentIslam Karimov over 90 percent in March 2015, and Kazak President Nursultan Nazarbayev 97 percent in April 2015. Rwandan President Paul Kagame, when asked if his 93 percent landslide in 2010 represented the will of the people, reportedly answered: "So, 93 percent – I wonder why it wasn't higher than that?" The EPRDF's 99.6 percent victory in 2010created credibility problems in North American and European capitals where diplomats often asked, "Couldn't they have just won by 60 or 75 percent?" But the point of elections under authoritarian rule is not to obtain a working majority or to win international approval. The purpose isto dominate domestic politics completely and thereby deter any leader from thinking he or she could challenge ruling party successfully. The dramatic, overwhelming victories send an important domestic message ofstrength and power, even as they strain credibility abroad.

The EPRDF recognizes the dangers it faces from competitive elections andthat it democratizes at its peril. In 2005 Ethiopia held competitive elections, complete with significant opposition participation, major rallies,and televised debates. According to official results, the opposition's shareof seats in parliament increased from 12 to 172, representing 31 percent of the total. The opposition parties swept all the seats in Addis Ababa andmany cabinet ministers and high-ranking officials lost their positions. Thisshift represented the potential for an important advance in democratization and a major break in the ruling party's domination.

Members of the opposition, however, refused to accept the results and claimed that massive fraud had denied them outright victory. Some opposition leaders boycotted the parliament. Post-election demonstrationsturned violent and were brutally put down by the Ethiopian military, leaving nearly 200 dead and an estimated 30,000arrested. The 2005 election began with a democratic opening but ended with what the Department of State characterized as the criminalization of dissent.

In the aftermath of the 2005 crisis, the EPRDF responded by demonstrating its extraordinary strength in using the levers of state powerand its considerable organizational capacities to control all aspects of political life. New laws largely eliminated civil society institutions and the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation has been used against journalists and other critics. Just before a visit by Secretary of State Kerry in April 2014, the regime arrested a group of young bloggers who called themselves Zone Nine and charged them with terrorism. Washington recently urged Addis Ababa "to refrain from using its Anti-Terrorism Proclamation as a mechanism to curb the free exchange of ideas."

As a consequence of its restrictions on politics over the past decade, the ruling party has little to worry about with regard to the opposition parties competing in the upcoming elections. The limits on formal political competition have made social mobilization outside of the electoral processmore important. A series of non-violent protests in 2012 by Ethiopian Muslims provided an important model of sustained, peaceful social mobilization. The regime arrested the movement's leadership and has tried to link the protests to external enemies and terrorism. In 2014, the security services quickly suppressed demonstrations on university campuses by Oromos, highlighting the historical sense of marginalization perceived by many in Ethiopia's single largest ethnic group. In April 2015,a government organized rally to mourn the killing of Ethiopian migrants inLibya by the Islamic State (ISIS) ended with arrests and clashes between security forces and protestors. The Ethiopian regime has managed each ofthese challenges without significant difficulty but the underlying grievances remain.

Under Secretary of State Sherman characterized Ethiopia's elections in terms of "free, fair, and credible" but that obscures the nature of the regime and mischaracterizes the functions of elections under authoritarianism. A Washington Post editorial recently criticized Sherman and argued: "If the election is not judged by independent observers to liveup to Ms. Sherman's billing, the administration should swallow her words — and change its approach." But the results in Ethiopia and other authoritarian regimes holding elections are largely settled months if not years in advance, as powerful ruling parties restrict political opposition, civil society, and independent media in ways that virtually eliminate competition. The voting that will take place on May 24 will not provide citizens a meaningful role in selecting their next government. Such elections, however, are not pointless. As in other authoritarian states, elections play a key role in providing the setting for the ruling party to demonstrate its domination. Rumour News: A piece of information which is not confirmed and may befalse be spread as a rumour among the public says, “Mengistu Hailemariam died of massive heart attack today”.

Side note: According to the news from zimbabwe national tv report, the former bloody dictator, Mengistu Hailemariam suffered massive heart attack yesterday and rushed to hospital in Harare. He was already lost his conciousness by the time he arrived. In an effort to revive him the doctorsput him on life support for 24 hours and latter he was pronounced dead atthe hospital . http://www.newzimbabwe.com/ Details are being expected as a lot of mourners are being fled to his residence and hospital. Many Ethiopians will shed genuine tears for his death. He made some bad choices but he was a truly patriotic Ethiopian unlike the ones who came after him. Someone can accuse Mengistu Haile Mariam of many things buthe was not a person who was scared for his own life. Even his ardent detractors give him credit for his bravado. He was a hands-on leader and even as a president he directly went to Eritrea, Tigray and Somalia fronts to conduct wars personally. I believe the only reason he fled Ethiopia is to avoid further bloodshed in the capital city not otherwise based on his trackrecord.
The main difference between Mengistu and Meles (TPLF) is their intentions. For instance, Mengistu granted 'land to the tiller' which was one of the noblest achievements of his.(contrast that with - TPLF's stripping farmers off their lands unjustly). But that same noble policy of Mengistu resulted in famine because farmers were unable to manage theirlands properly. But that doesn't take away from the fact that Mengistu didthe right thing.(contrast that with - even if TPLF giving land to 'investors' results in 'better output', that doesn't take away from the fact that TPLF isdoing the wrong thing since the ordinary, poor farmer is worse than ever before. The solution is not chasing away the poor farmer but enabling and empowering him to be more productive.)
Apart from Mengistu's brutal crackdown on local opposition, his policy towards fighting back the rebel insurgency in Eritrea and Tigray was also anoble cause. No leader in his right mind would stand idly by and let his country break apart. However he could have kept the balance between force and compromise. He could have granted Eritrea an autonomy while being a part of Ethiopia as per Eritrean rebels' initial reason for rebellion.
He could have shared power with TPLF since TPLF craves for power so much.(Still, I'm not sure if TPLF would have been satisfied for anything less than total subjugation of Ethiopia under their rule). On the contrary,you can barely find a noble cause behind many of TPLF's engagements, only sinister interior motives. We can go and on but I guarantee you Mengistu will come out on top of Meles (plus the whole TPLF junta) whenhistory is remembered many years from now. (Text ends)
ETHIOPIA: The TPLF/EPRDF could have been different!

“Politicizing access to job and education opportunities.” By Obang Metho

Meles Zenawi and his Tigrayans elites had a chance and did not use it for the common good! The formation of the TPLF was incited by the egregiousmistreatment and marginalization of Tigrayans at the hands of the Derg, causing them to go to the bush to fight. When they came to power they had a choice. They could have been different from the feudal rulers of the past and the Derg, opening up Ethiopia to a more just, fair and good government... that could have helped all Ethiopians to prosper—instead of only selfishly thinking of themselves and some within their ethnic group. Claims of greateconomic advancements only indicate the great wealth accumulated by a few while Ethiopia remains on the bottom of nearly every index of well being, affecting the majority.

In our country, we have repeatedly failed to have a government of the people by the people and for the people that cares about the well beingsall Ethiopian people— Mengistu failed, Meles failed, and the TPLF /EPRDFare failing. The TPLF leaders must show their willingness to come to the table. Release the political prisoners, journalists, human rights activists,religious leaders and opposition leaders. Stop charging everyone who disagrees with them as a terrorist.

The ethnic apartheid regime of TPLF cannot hold on indefinitely to power by using force. The TPLF/EPRDF leaders and their supporter must show humility. They must show signs of openness to bring change. They must be honest. They must speak the truth, not lies. They must take actions that are not deceptive, but which will build up trust between the people Without change, the TPLF will pass on a legacy of death and consequencesto others, most of whom are innocent bystanders or future generations.

We all know that one of the reasons the Ethiopian migrant workers crisis is so mammoth is because it did not start two months, or two years ago. The influx of Ethiopians to the Middle East started nearly 10 years ago, but the flood of Ethiopian refugees and migrant workers was birthed out ofthe ethnic apartheid policies of the TPLF/EPRDF and the exclusion of most Ethiopians from equal opportunities reserved for party supporters.

Under other circumstances, these workers wou...ld have remained to live and work in their home country; however, so many of our people are so desperate with the lack of food, opportunity, hope and life in Ethiopia thateven if they were warned about inhumane working conditions and abusivetreatment in the Middle Eastern countries like Saudi Arabia, they ignored them. Large billboards paid for by employment agencies throughout AddisAbaba, other cities and even in the countryside advertised to attract more innocent and unwitting recruits. Yet, many quickly became entrapped in situations where they were regularly beaten, raped or overworked but could not escape because of those papers and laws that prohibited themfrom changing employers.

What has the TPLF/EPRDF done in response to the daily or weekly accounts of Ethiopians committing suicide or losing their minds—even after recently hearing that 90% of those in hospitals for mental breakdowns were Ethiopian women? Why did the TPLF/EPRDF regime notstop these employment agencies from continuing to recruit these young Ethiopian people? Instead, tens of thousands of workers were sent off to this plight on a monthly basis. (Text ends)
Washington enables authoritarianism in Ethiopia –Al Jazeera Blanket US support for the Ethiopian regime risks dismantling thecountry's already beleaguered opposition
NEWS ANALYSIS (May 20, 2015) by Awol Allo It was only two months agoduring the Israeli election that the White House was scrambling to convince the American public that the United States does not intervene inthe electoral processes of other democracies.
"This administration goes to great lengths to ensure that we don't give even the appearance of interfering or attempting to influence the outcomeof a democratically held election in another country," White House press secretary Josh Earnest said in defense of President Barack Obama's refusal to meet with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.
But the U.S. makes no apologies for its interventions on behalf of autocratic regimes elsewhere. For example, during a recent visit to Ethiopia, Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Wendy Sherman praised Ethiopia as a vibrant and progressive democracy. "Ethiopia is a democracy that is moving forward in an election that we expect to be free,fair, credible, open and inclusive," she said. "Every time there is an election, it gets better and better."
Sherman's remarks drew the ire of activists and human rights organizations. Daniel Calingaert, the executive vice president of Freedom House, dismissed her praise as "woefully ignorant" and at odds with the reality of life as lived by ordinary Ethiopians. Not only were her claims inconsistent with human rights reports, but they also fly in the face of herdepartment's annual country surveys, which tell a radically different story.
In its latest Ethiopia report, for example, the State Department identifiedsignificant human rights violations, including restrictions on freedom of speech, Stalinist-style show trials, and crackdowns on free press, opposition leaders, activists and critical journalists. The report and othersby human rights groups reveal a consistent and widespread pattern of abuse, including torture, arbitrary killings, restrictions on freedom of association, interference in freedom of religion and the politicized use ofthe country's anti-terrorism proclamation.

Defending status quo

Sherman's comment was not an isolated gaffe. Since the death in 2012 of Ethiopian strongman Meles Zenawi, the U.S. government has moved from tacit support to publicly defending the regime in Addis Ababa, concocting irresponsible, make-believe stories. After Zenawi's death, Susan Rice, then the top U.S. diplomat at the United Nations and Obama's current national security adviser, eulogized Zenawi as a selfless and tireless leader"totally dedicated" to his people. She praised his intellectual prowess and called him "uncommonly wise, a man able to see the big picture and the long game." She ended her tribute by calling for the continuity of his legacy.

Contrary to Sherman's claims, Ethiopia is an authoritarian state. Insteadof getting better and better at strengthening democratic institutions andopening up democratic spaces for free and fair elections, it got better atbuilding surveillance structures that allow the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), now in power for nearly 24 years, to exercise total control over the population. With a general election set for Sunday, EPRDF retains a monopoly over politics and hasthe technical and institutional capabilities to monitor and intimidate individuals. The government allegedly monitors exiled journalists and activists using Chinese- and European-made spyware. «Enabling the oppression of one ethnic group by another is no way of guaranteeing stability in Ethiopia.»

Over the last 10 years, Ethiopia has fostered an increasingly invasive technical capacity and a bureaucracy that enabled authorities to conceal and hide its oppressive profile. Since 2005, the country has adopted a slew of draconian laws with the aim of restricting democratic politics. This includes the 2009 Anti-Terrorism Proclamation and the Charities and Societies Proclamation, which effectively destroyed the conditions necessary for credible, free and fair elections. Together, the two laws allowed the government to circumvent or indefinitely suspend basic guarantees of the constitution. Under the pretext of fighting terrorism, theregime exiled, prosecuted and convicted several opposition leaders, journalists, community leaders and activists.

This and many other instruments of control enabled the EPRDF to win

99.6 percent of the votes in the 2010 elections, losing only two of the 547seats in the federal Parliament and one seat out of the 1,900 in the regional assemblies. Five years of intimidation and harassment of the opposition and war against free press means that Sunday's voting will be anything but fair and free.

Ethiopia is the fourth-most-censored country in the world. Journalists are among the collateral damage of Ethiopia's ever widening counterterrorismdragnet, with several reporters exiled or prosecuted and convicted on trumped-up charges under the country's anti-terrorism law. At least 60 journalists have been forced into exile since 2010, and at least 19 have been imprisoned, according to Human Rights Watch. In 2014 alone, 30 journalists were forced to leave the country, 22 were charged with crimes,and five magazines and one newspaper were closed. The State Department has on several occasions called on Ethiopia to refrain from using its anti-terrorism proclamation "as a mechanism to curb the free exchange of ideas."

The Ethiopian government has proved adept at creating facts, stories and images that imply an imminent disintegration of the country and destabilization of an already volatile region. Zenawi was successful in casting himself and his party as the best hope for a united Ethiopia and a stable Horn of Africa as well as a bulwark against Islamic extremism in an increasingly volatile region. With that, he drove a wedge between the pan-Ethiopian nationalists committed to the continuity of a unitary and centralized state and ethno-national forces pursuing ethno-cultural and linguistic justice for those on the periphery of Ethiopian politics.

This image of the EPRDF as the only guarantor of stability and continuity captured the imagination of Western diplomats whose fears of rampagingterrorism in East Africa trumped their objections to dictatorship. Their endorsements are not merely influential but also consequential. For one, such blanket support bolsters the government, giving it license to silenceand paralyze the already fragile opposition and disgruntled activists. It also risks encouraging the regime to perpetuate violence.

For most Western diplomats, Ethiopia offers what they want: the best chance at providing stability in the troubled Horn of Africa. However, propping up a minority regime and enabling the oppression of one ethnic group by another in a country where ethnic identity is the basic form of political expression and recognition is no way of guaranteeing stability. It is a principal marker of long-term instability and perhaps one of the manyticking time bombs threatening Ethiopia's integrity.

Ethiopian PM Faces His First Election Ever

By amharicdrama on May 20, 2015 ADDIS ABABA

Ethiopia's Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, who assumed power in2012 after the death of Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, has never had to participate in an election before.
He took over the office and the leadership of the ruling party, the EPRDF,after the death of Zenawi, who ruled the East African nation for 21 years.
Special Adviser to the Prime Minister Getachew Redda had already workedclosely with Hailemariam when he was Minister of Foreign Affairs. He described Ethiopia's leader as dedicated and committed.
"The first achievement that Hailemariam has is as leader of EPRDF," he said. "He presided over an organization, which many thought would be incrisis following the death of an important [figure] such as Meles Zenawi. So that by itself is an important achievement on his right."

Ethiopia will be voting Sunday, May 24. It is widely expected that the ruling party — the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democracy Front — will win for the fifth consecutive time and that Hailemariam will continue inhis current position.

Parliament member Girma Seifu of opposition party UDJ, Unity for Democracy and Justice, experienced both Meles and the current primeminister.

He said he was optimistic when Hailemariam assumed office.

"The very good reason that makes me optimist was his civil nature, because he was not in the fight with the Derg regime," Girma said. "Rather he was a civil employee in the Derg regime. So that he has no negative attitude or any other revenge mentality."

Meles came to power in 1991 after being part of the guerilla movement that overthrew the former Derg regime, a military junta led by MengistuHailemariam.

Desalegn was not part of the struggle. He trained as an engineer and worked as a university dean and administrator of the Southern Regions inEthiopia before becoming a special adviser to Meles and then foreign minister in 2010. (Text ends)

PM Haile-Mariam warns opposition parties, leaders on election riot ESAT News (May 23, 2015)

Ethiopia's Prime Minister, Haile-Mariam

Dessalegn, sent a strong warning to opposition parties in EPRDF controlledparliament. He did not particularly name the parties. The Prime Minister labelled the leaders of the opposition parties as, half-hearted who enteredthe election hoping to use riot and chaos to fulfill their dreams.

Haile-Mariam said some opposition parties were lobbying the electorate,"We have already won the election and if we lose the election; it must have been rigged so you should be aware of this and respond accordingly."

Haile-Mariam informed the parliament that the government could take serious measures to the extent of "devouring opposition leaders". He saidthat security officers have made adequate preparations to take measuresagainst those who incite violence.

The PM said the "stooges of Shabia (Eritrea's ruling party) work 24/7 destabilize the country but have so far been unsuccessful because the public did not give them support." He said the capacities of the EthiopianDefence Force have been well-developed.

Foreign based ESAT had reported that Haile-Mariam was recently evaluated by his own party members and had received a median score inhis performance. Ahead of the election, Federal Police force was deployedaround the country to exert psychological pressure on the public; the youth and civil servants are also being arrested and beaten.

Gathering, talking in groups and sitting in recreational areas has been is considered as conspiring against the regime. ESAT received reports that members of Arena Party, who were campaigning at the Atsbi Wenberta Woreda of Tigray region, were attacked by ruling party supporters. KirbomHaileselassie, Woldeabraha Gebremedhin, Woldegebriel Hailu and Negasi Kinfu are currently receiving treatments at hospitals in Tigray. Many othermembers of the Party are also receiving treatment after they were beaten severely. (Text ends)

Five Armed Ethiopian Opposition Forces Agreed to Unite Byamharicdrama on May 23, 2015

Five opposition rebel groups fighting against the Ethiopian governmenthave signed a cooperation agreement thatthey say would culminate ineventual unification.

In a press statement sent to ESAT on May 15, 2015, Tigray People's Democratic Movement (TPDM), Gambella People's Liberation Movement (GPLM), Benishangul Peoples Liberation Movement (BPLM), Amhara Democratic Force Movement (ADFM) and Arbegnoch Ginbot 7 for Unity and Democratic Movement (AGUDM) had signed anagreement to liberatethe people of Ethiopia from suppression and to bring democracy and stability to the country.

"Our intention is to save the country and its people from the looming danger," says the press statement released on Friday May 15, 2015. Thegroups in their statement said that suppression, harassment, torture, kidnaping and killing under the current TPLF/EPRDFregime have exacerbated in Ethiopia, and it is time for Ethiopians to stand in unison tofree the country and its people from the minority dictatorship.

It is recalled that Ginbot 7 and Arbegnoch Ginbar have recently merged tofight dictatorship in Ethiopia. Other five organizationsare expected to follow suit soon, and the progress would be publicized for the public, according to the press release. The five armed groups called Ethiopians living in the country and abroad to cooperate and extend their support in their endeavor to bring about freedom and justice to the country.

Ethiopians vote, ruling party expected to keep grip on power Associated Press (May 25, 2015)

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP) — Ethiopians voted Sunday in national and regional elections in which the ruling party is expected to maintain its iron-clad grip on power. Some opposition leaders said their members had been harassed and beaten up while trying to cast their ballots. A spokesman for the opposition Blue party, Yonathan Tesfaye, told The Associated Press that Sunday's electionwas "full of games," apparently referring to electoral malpractices. "We have received lots of complaints from our observers who were banned from observing the election process. The government has beenusing a number of techniques to harass them all day," Yonathan said.

But the Ethiopian News Agency cited African Union as saying the voting had been mostly "orderly." Shimelis Kemal, a state minister at the Government Communications Affairs office, said voter turnout was morethan 85 percent and that the process had been peaceful.
The Election Board said late Sunday that polling will be extended until Monday in some universities and colleges where there had been a shortage of voting materials. Provisional results are expected in a week but final results won't be released before June 22. More than 36 millionvoters were registered to vote in this East African nation of about 90 million people.
In 2010, the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front won 99.6 percent of all parliamentary seats. Only one opposition lawmakerwon a seat in an election that watchdog groups said was marred by intimidation and the harassment of opposition activists.
Human Rights Watch called that victory "the culmination of the government's five-year strategy of systematically closing down space forpolitical dissent and independent criticism."
Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, a former university professor- turned-politician, has been leading the country since the death in 2012 ofstrongman Meles Zenawi, who built the ruling coalition into a powerful political organization. These are Ethiopia's first elections since his death. (Text ends)
Governance: Ethiopia's election is a wake-up call on human rights andsound governance
The international community must challenge Ethiopia’s oppressive regime by funding local human rights and democracy groups. By Daniel Calingaertand Kellen McClure (Saturday 23 May 2015)
On Sunday, millions of Ethiopians will line up at polling stations to participate in Africa’s largest exercise of political theatre. A decade-long campaign by Ethiopia’s government to silence dissent forcibly has left thecountry without a viable political opposition, without independent media, and without public challenges to the ruling party’s ideology. For most Ethiopians, these elections are a non-event.
The one potential dividend of these sham polls, however, is the international attention they will garner for the government’s growing political repression. The blatant disregard for internationally recognised standards for free and fair elections just might convince Ethiopia’s largestdonors that it is time to rethink their relationship with an increasingly authoritarian government.
As long as democratic governance and respect for human rights are pushed aside by donors in favour of economic development and securitycooperation, Ethiopia’s long-term stability is at serious risk.
As long as democratic governance and respect for human rights are pushed aside by donors in favour of economic development and securitycooperation, Ethiopia’s long-term stability is at serious risk. Since 2005,the ruling Ethiopian Peoples’ Revolutionary Democratic Front’s (EPRDF) has cracked down on independent media and human rights groups.

In 2009, parliament passed the charities and societies proclamation, which placed restrictive regulations on non-government organisations,including limitations on foreign funding. Today,only a handful of these groups exist, and most are struggling to survive.

The preferred government strategy for eliminating independent media isto file criminal charges against publishers, and to impose hefty fines andprison terms. When lawsuits do not succeed, the government simply arrests journalists, as occurred last year when bloggers and journalists affiliated with the Zone 9 blogging collective were apprehended. The group remains imprisoned and charged as terrorists.

Post-election, the EPRDF, secure in its hold on power, might be willing to allow a small degree of dissent: Ethiopian officials are increasingly wary ofreactions by the international community to the crackdown on critics and in 2013 published a national human rights action plan.

The US, UK and European Union – Ethiopia's largest donors – need to increase their support for democracy and human rights because much canbe done right now.

Despite years of political repression, a new generation of human rights defenders is slowly emerging. The Zone 9 bloggers represented this newgeneration, using new technologies to educate fellow Ethiopians on exercising and defending their rights.

The human rights and democracy groups that remain are finding creative ways to conduct their work. This includes working with traditional development organisations, which the government generally tolerates, or focusing on seemingly apolitical issues, such as government accountabilityand corruption, that are important in strengthening Ethiopia's democracy.

Donor countries fall short in their support for these groups. In the US, President Barack Obama's latest budget request includes some $400m (£257m) in assistance to Ethiopia – but only $2m of it is for democracyand human rights programming.

The UK is equally parsimonious in democracy support. One reason is thatthe EPRDF makes it difficult for domestic groups to accept outside aid.

Donors could take concrete action right now. First, supporting off-shore programming allows activists to travel outside Ethiopia to get technical and strategic advice. Second, donors' strategies for Ethiopia should include funds specifically dedicated to strengthening independent media outlets and journalists; the EU intends to take this step after the election.

Also, donors can find ways around foreign funding restrictions by pushing for the creation of funding pools considered local under Ethiopian law. TheEU did this in 2011, when it created the Civil Society Fund, providing assistance to local human rights and democracy groups. The US should use its economic and diplomatic leverage to do likewise, a move that would provide a much-needed lifeline for these groups.

Greater funding for human rights will be vital for Ethiopian activists, whose reach has been limited by the charities and societies proclamation.

Before that came into being six years ago, the country's leading humanrights organisation, the Ethiopian Human Rights Council (EHRCO), operated with a budget of $400,000 and 60 employees.

Today, its budget is less than half that figure, and staffing is down 80%.The only thing keeping EHRCO alive is financial aid from the EU Civil Society Fund.

Ethiopia receives nearly $4bn in official development assistance. This is more than any other country in Africa and makes up a significant portion of the government's annual budget. If the US, UK, EU and Canada coordinated policies, Ethiopia would have to respond to their human rightsand democracy concerns.

Ethiopia's election should be a wake-up call for the international community. With each successive election that does not allow genuine choice, both apathy and resentment grow, and Ethiopia risks falling preyto the same instability that has plagued its neighbours. *Daniel Calingaertis executive vice-president of Freedom House. Amnesty reports abduction, torture and rape of migrants in Libya

Rampant abuse by armed groups is driving refugees to risk their lives in treacherous Mediterranean crossings, says human rights group. When the 17-year-old boy, who had been locked in a house for months near Sabhain Libya, said his family in Ivory Coast could not pay for his release, his captors showed no mercy.

"They tortured us to force us to call our relatives to extort money from them. If you don't pay, you don't go out ... I told [the head of the 'prison']that I did not have any family members, that all of them had died. He answered: 'You will join them in death if you don't pay.' I started crying, and so they started beating me with a belt and a broomstick," he said.

The teenager's story was included in an Amnesty International report documenting abductions, torture and other abuses by smugglers and armed groups in Libya. The rights group said these horrors are driving many refugees and migrants to "risk their lives in treacherous sea crossings in a desperate attempt to reach safety in Europe".

The chilling testimonies were released as the EU struggles to tackle the growing number of people attempting to cross the Mediterranean from Libya. The European commission is due to unveil new proposals to imposemigrant quotas on its members on Wednesday, while plans are also beingdrawn up for military attacks to target the trafficking networks.

Migration 'We see more and more unaccompanied children on migrant boats' Chiara Montaldo is working with Médecins Sans Frontières in Sicily,where 700 migrants have arrived in the past week, all in vessels unsafe for travel. Amnesty warned that efforts to destroy smugglers' vessels before they are used could leave migrants and refugees trapped in a conflict zone, and it urged the EU to swiftly deploy promised rescue vessels where they are needed most, as well as to offer more resettlement places. "Introducing measures to tackle smugglers, without providing safe alternative routes out for the people desperate to flee conflict in Libya, will not resolve the plight of migrants and refugees," saidPhilip Luther, Amnesty International's director for the Middle East and North Africa.

"Neighbouring countries, including Tunisia and Egypt, must keep their borders open to ensure anyone fleeing violence and persecution in Libya isgranted safe refuge," he said. Amnesty carried out 70 interviews between August 2014 and March this year. As well as newly arrived migrants, Amnesty found that people from established migrant communities in Libyawere seeking to flee the growing lawlessness. The young Ivorian arrived in Sicily last June; he said the smugglers, who had helped him get into Libya in March 2014, handed a group of migrantsover to an armed group, who imprisoned them in a three-storey house formonths. The teenager, who was not named, said the "prison" was run by Libyans but that Ghanaians were also working there. Mohamed, a Somali refugee interviewed in Sicily in April, said his group had entered Libya through the Sahara.

In the desert, Libyan men were torturing us, beating us with swords,guns, stones and Kalashnikovs

"In the desert, Libyan men were forcing, torturing us, beating us with swords, guns, stones, Kalashnikovs. They would beat us every day. They broke my finger, a friend had [a] broken arm. We couldn't escape. My friend Mohamed tried to escape and was shot dead. Another man was hit on the head with a stone and died ... I stayed one month, then paid. My mother's brother is in Holland; he paid," he said. The report said migrantsand refugees faced abuses at all stages of the smuggling routes from westand east Africa towards the Libyan coast. Many were abducted and tortured to force them and their families to pay ransoms.

"Those unable to pay are often held effectively as slaves – forced to work without pay, physically assaulted and robbed. Smugglers also sometimes pass the migrants and refugees on to criminal groups once they cross the border in desert areas, or in major transit cities along the migration route,such as Sabha in the south-west or the coastal city of Ajdabiya in eastern Libya," it said. A Nigerian woman told Amnesty she was gang-raped whenshe arrived in Sabha in December 2012, after a gang of five armed robbers had abducted her and her husband. "They took us to a far place outside the city in the desert. They tied my husband's hands and legs to apole and gang-raped me in front of his eyes," she said.

Amnesty found that abuses were not confined to desert areas but continued in major cities. Ibrahim, a 25-year-old from Mali, said he was abducted in Tripoli last September. He was kept in a small, dirty room with 46 others. "If you have 1,000 dinars ($740), they let you out. If youdon't, you stay. Often, the guards would come and slap you. I eventuallyhad to pay to get out. It is effectively a business that they are running.

They detain you so that you have to pay," he said. Ali Sandeed, a Syrian-Palestinian refugee living in Lebanon, describes the misery and despair that almost drove him to risk his life and flee to Europe. Amnesty's researchers were also told of abuses in immigration detention centres where migrants and refugees, including children, can be held indefinitely. One woman said officials at one centre had beaten a pregnantwoman to death. Those interviewed for the report also highlighted the particular risk faced by Christians at the hands of some armed groups, such as Islamic State, which recently killed at least 49 Christians, mostly from Egypt and Ethiopia. Charles, 30, from Nigeria, said he fled in March after being abducted and assaulted by a criminal gang in the coastal city of Zuwara.

“Sometimes young men would come to our house to steal our money. They would come with guns ... I am a Christian and that’s why the menwould always come to our house and attack us,” he said. “The international community has stood and watched as Libya has descended into chaos since the 2011 Nato military campaign ended, effectively allowing militias and armed groups to run amok,” Amnesty’s Luther said.“World leaders have a responsibility and must be prepared to face the consequences, which include greater levels of refugees and migrants fleeing conflict and rampant abuse in Libya.”

TOURISM: The People of the Omo Valley are incredibly Photogenic(The Observer) By Matilda Temperley (Sunday 24 May 2015)

The people of the Omo Valley are incredibly photogenic. But tourism is turning their lives into a daily fancy dress parade. Photographer and writerMatilda Temperley, feeling partly responsible, decided to chart their transformation

The cultural heritage of Ethiopia’s Omo Valley and Kenya’s Lake Turkanabasin has, until recently, been relatively untouched by globalisation.

Thousands of years as a crossroads of human migration has resulted in amarked diversity. At least 10 distinct ethnic groups occupy the borders between Kenya, South Sudan and Ethiopia. Like most photographers, I was drawn to the Omo Valley not by its landscape, but by these inhabitants, the ochre-skinned Hamer, the lip-plated Suri and Mursi, andthe painted Karo amongst them.

Since my first visit to the Omo Valley in 2007, I have witnessed a change in both the landscape and its inhabitants. While modernisation is inevitable, in the Omo it appears to be at the expense of the locals rather than at their hands. The scars are visible in the hundreds of thousands of acres of bare earth waiting to be planted by multinational corporations, assubsistence agriculture is replaced by large-scale industrial farming.

Nasedi, a Suri woman in Coca.

The fate of the Omo Valley was sealed in 2006 when the Ethiopian government began constructing the Pride of Ethiopia: the highly ambitiousand controversial Gibe III hydroelectric dam. The dam allows for large- scale commercial farming through irrigated agriculture and has been described as a potential humanitarian disaster for the estimated 500,000 people who live along the Omo River, and around Lake Turkana.

To clear traditional grazing grounds for farming, the government has embarked on a policy of moving people into new model villages. This process is non-negotiable, and has come with many reports of human rights abuses. The Suri warriors are being turned into beggars, living onfood hand-outs. No land allowance has been made for the Suri's cattle herds, nor for subsistence agriculture. Without the cultural identity that land and livestock provides, the fabric of their pastoral society is being destroyed.

Yet ironically, while eroding the Suri's culture, the government promote them as an "unspoilt tribe". It is estimated the Suri receive fewer than 1,000 visitors a year, mostly photographers and filmmakers hoping for an"authentic" experience. In reality there is little authenticity in a visit to themost popular Suri villages. When I entered Regiya it was impossible not tobe struck by guilt at being a participant in the performance that followed. The Suri women, renowned for their ceramic and wooden lip plates, rushed to collect face paint. Plastic bottles were put aside and T-shirts removed. Children formed tableaus along the path, shimmying up trees tolook dreamily into the distance. A huddle of toddlers joined the parade, lying belly-up in the grass. In the pursuit of "photo money", women piled pots, pans, horns and bushes on their heads; flowers were placed in mouths, stuck in ears and on nipples. Offers to form singing groups, body paint and even to scarify themselves ensued. Susan Sontag's words aboutthe "predatory nature of the photographic act" resounded.

The fancy-dress parade I witnessed in Regiya fuels fantasies of exoticism,but is performed solely for the benefit of the visitor who pays for the privilege of photographing it. Natterre, a former Suri spokeswoman, said wryly: "We do it for tourists because they ask us to, when the tourists leave we wash our faces and go to the town." Hans Silvester's Natural Fashion: Tribal Decoration from Africa, a book on tribal decorations that made waves in 2009, might be one reason why outfits in the villages havebecome more elaborate in recent years. A tide of photographers followed and local guides are often expected to provide replications of the images, from the face paint to the foliage. Suri women only usually paint their faces for weddings. Local boys paint their bodies for money.

On the other side of the valley, dressing up for visitors has long been normalised. There the tourist dollar is a way of life and convoys of 4x4s snake into villages, gate crashing ceremonies and bribing the participants.East of the Omo Valley encounters with the lip-plated Mursi women are often described as aggressive and uncomfortable. Having watched a 4x4 convoy arrive in a village at first light, and the ensuing scramble for pictures followed by a hasty retreat 20 minutes later, it is easy to see why. There is no pretence at social interaction. Adding to the objectification of those with lip plates is the fact that it is hard to find a translator, and so for most tourists it is impossible to breach the little common ground available. Although the Suri are not yet subject to such large numbers of tourists, it is poignant that the local guides describe those in the most- visited villages as "looking like the Mursi".

In another Suri town, Kibish, upturned plastic bottles on poles indicate when there is local beer or honey wine available in the huts that crouch alongside the town's main streets. By dusk the town seems to sway, andas I listen to chatter, drumming and occasional gunshots, Abdi and I discuss the future of tourism in the Omo. He says: “Five years ago I thought we could be responsible, now it’s obvious that people like the Mursi would be happier without tourists. I hate bringing people here now.”While Ethiopia’s industrialising government is by far the biggest threat to life in the region, as a photographer I am also partly responsible for what is fast becoming a human zoo. POLITICS: Merera Gudina says ballot boxes were stolen in organizedrobbery

By Aaron Maasho, Reuters (May 26, 2015)

ADDIS ABABA Merera Gudina, one of the top opposition figures who lost inthe election, said on Tuesday ballot boxes were stolen in an organized robbery by the ruling party whose stay in power for the next five years was a foregone conclusion. Other big figures who lost in the steal-the- ballot-box election was Gebru Asrat, who ran in Mekelle in Tigrai region, as well as Beyene Petros, all members of Medrek. The African Union team,which is prone to bribery, hailed the election as "fair and balanced." African Union was invited by the ruling party but rejected by the opposition.

The African Union observers said on Tuesday that Ethiopia's parliamentaryelection held on Sunday was credible except for a few irregularities, but the opposition dismissed the vote as marred by violations including ballot box theft.

Provisional results in Africa' second most populous nation are due later this week and few expect anything but a landslide for the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) coalition, in power sinceousting dictator Mengistu Haile Mariam in 1991.

Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, who took over after EPRDF's long- serving leader Meles Zenawi died in 2012, has pushed on with EPRDF's highly-centralised statist economic model credited with turning around thefortunes of a country once ravaged by war and famine.

But the opposition -- which has one seat in the outgoing 547-member parliament -- accuses the government of crushing dissent, limiting freespeech, and muzzling the press. The EPRDF denies this, saying the political space is open for all.

"The African Union Election Observation Mission (AUEOM) concludes thatthe parliamentary elections were calm, peaceful, and credible as it provided an opportunity for the Ethiopian people to express their choicesat the polls," former Namibian President Hifikepunye Pohamba, the headof the AU mission, said.
Pohamba said 59 members from 23 African countries visited 356 polling stations. Ethiopia did not invite Western observers to this election. About37 million out of Ethiopia's 96 million people registered to vote.
The observers said no major incidents occurred and that they could vouchfor the secrecy of the vote in 95 percent of the polling stations it observed.
However, the mission said that in 21 percent of all stations it visited,station officers violated rules by failing to display empty ballot boxesbefore the official start of the elections.
It also noted that a few voting centres had opened ahead of time, thoughstaffers claimed this was due to requests from voters.
WITCH-HUNTS
Merara Gudina, deputy chairperson of the opposition Medrek coalitiondismissed the AU report, claiming the body had failed to report on violations in many constituencies.
Merara told Reuters that security personnel had launched a "witch-hunt" on the eve of the vote by arresting his group's observers. He also said ballot boxes had been stolen in his constituency outside the western townof Ambo some 130 kilometres (81 miles) from the capital.
"The whole process was a farce. In my constituency, we do not even knowwhat happened to over 80 percent of the ballot boxes right after the polls closed, " he said. "It was organised robbery."
The electoral board -- which is set to announce provisional results beforethe end of the week -- was not immediately available to comment on theclaims.
On the day of the vote Hailemariam rejected opposition claims of foulplay.
"They have been campaigning freely. There has not been any repressionas far as this is concerned," Hailemariam told Reuters on Sunday in his constituency in Gununo, a town 330 kilometres southwest from the capital.
Ethiopia's economy has been one of the fastest growing in Africa andbeyond. The World Bank forecasts growth of 10.5 percent in the yearstarting in July. (Text ends)
POLITICS: New Opportunities Post-Fake-Election: It is the People’s TimeNow
SMNE Press Release (May 27, 2015)
(Washington, DC) – The fake and unlawful election of May 24, 2015 is over in Ethiopia. No one is surprised with the sweeping victory of the incumbent regime, the Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front(EPRDF), over the stifled opposition. Over the last five years, the EPRDF, which is mainly controlled by one ethnic group making up 6% of the population, the Tigrayan Peoples Liberation Front (TPLF), has focused enormous efforts on closing all political space to any contenders. They arenow claiming themselves the winners—by a landslide. Although the final “count” is not yet in; some early reports indicate the EPRDF has “won” every seat in parliament—a 100% victory. This highly unpopular regime has somehow managed to improve upon the results of 2010 when they received a mere 99.6% of the vote. What is surprising is their apparent lack of shame and embarrassment when everyone knows the results are blatantly false.

Thanks to new technology, pictures of some of the obvious manipulations by election officials are already being posted on the Internet. For example,election results are hand-recorded on official documents. These documents carry the logo of the election board and are signed and dated by election officials; yet, one can see that the numbers have been repeatedly crossed out and changed to the advantage of the EPRDF candidates only. This resulted in some candidates being listed multiple times with various different numbers of votes. A specific example is of a Blue Party candidate who was winning by nearly 800 votes over the EPRDF candidate. The Blue Party candidate’s votes were crossed out and the lead disappeared. Conversely, the EPRDF candidate’s lower numbers were crossed out and replaced with much higher numbers, but the continuing manipulation of the number of votes could easily be seen and occurred multiple times in some cases. No one knows why votes suddenly disappeared for non-EPRDF candidates while large numbers were added tothe regime’s candidates. The election board did not even make an effort tohide what they were doing, not anticipating that the documents would be leaked.

Reports are also surfacing regarding people voting for the EPRDF on behalf of absent family members—for example, a man for his pregnant wife or a man for his elderly father. These votes and others like it were allaccepted when they were cast for the ruling party. In other cases, local officials demanded to see how people were voting and intimidated any who did not want to vote for the EPRDF. One election official was filmed harassing a voter, saying if the voter did not vote for the EPRDF he wouldnot get salt, sugar or anything.

Those within the TPLF/EPRDF who have a sense of morality should know itis time to stand with the rest of Ethiopians in opposition to this shameful injustice. Donor countries, who speak of a commitment to strengthening Ethiopia’s democratic institutions, encouraging the opening up of more political space, and the furthering of human and civil rights, should realizethat support for this ethnic-apartheid regime is not only totally incompatible with these goals, but it is also immoral.

These brazen violations of the process and bullying of the people are indications of the TPLF/EPRDF’s arrogance and belief that they are invincible. To outsiders they may use democratic rhetoric and carry on thepretense of an election for the benefit of Western donors; but at the ground level, they lack any conscience as they steal the election.

Reports indicate that some TPLF officials are further aggravating the situation with sarcastic and challenging remarks. One example was an official who boasted about the TPLF’s 100% victory and then incited the people by asking them what they were going to do about it. He then added that winning this election proves what the Obama administration and the Under Secretary of the US State Department, Wendy Sherman, recently said about expecting the election to be “free, fair, credible and democratic.” Nothing is further from the truth and all Ethiopians know it.They also know that the TPLF/EPRDF have done nothing for the people orfor the country. No one buys what they are saying except themselves.

What this TPLF official and others do not understand is that the people of Ethiopia will make the decision what to do and when. In fact, we may actually find that the TPLF/EPRDF actions will backfire, creating one of themost opportune times in many years to change the course of direction in Ethiopia. We are highly encouraged about these indications. However, it does depend on whether or not the people are ready and willing to make use of this opportunity.
We see several different options:

1. Maintain the status quo
2. Collaborate while remaining in ethnic, political, regional, religious, andsectarian groups
3. Join together as one force, in a non-political, non-violent, principle-based movement for democratic change for all Ethiopians

Option one will mean we remain in our separate groups. This means working as sub-groups, focusing on making improvements for these sections of Ethiopians, possibly even hoping to take the position of the TPLF/EPRDF. Those without hope or in competition with others will resist these efforts due to lack of any assurance of being included in the benefitsor wanting to take charge themselves. Still others will continue to suffer under this flawed model of governance. This approach is what brought thecurrent regime into power. It is easily exploited by the TPLF/EPRDF in maintaining division among the opposition and is ineffective in bringing change; however, our familiarity with it can entrap us.
Option two will improve our chances; however, where core principles arenot shared or when groups see collaboration only as a means to gain dominance for their own group or sub-section of Ethiopian society ratherthan for all; this effort will fail. If by chance one sectarian-based group succeeds, the interests of others may be ignored or forgotten. The legitimate interests of sectarian groups can be best advanced through a fair, just and free Ethiopian system of government.
Option three provides the opportunity to join together around shared principles which incorporate the interests of both large and powerful groups as well as those of the minorities and the less powerful. The goal isa change to a more equitable, free and fair system; not simply a change of power-holders. It is also far more effective for one strong and united group to call for change than for independent groups. It may be time to rethink the effectiveness of our previous modus operandi and consider what could bring a better, more sustainable result.
It may have become clearer than ever that an ethnic-based or regional- based approach will only prolong the TPLF/EPRDF. If it has not worked in24 years, a new strategy is needed. Furthermore, even if this approach were to be successful, which is doubtful; it would likely produce another tribal-based system that promotes one group over another.

The election results should make it clear that the only way to confront theTPLF/EPRDF and win over many within its ranks is to join together in one strategic and coordinated effort. We must learn to at least tolerate each other and respect the rights of those outside our groups. You do not haveto love each other, but if we share core values, we should be able to worktogether towards common goals.

If we want to move forward, our goals must reach beyond ourselves and include the goal of lessening the suffering of others. It is not about political leaders competing for dominance, but about serving the interestsof the greater good and about the survival of Ethiopians of our country.

This is about saving lives in this time of great tension. Some are angry and want to lash out, but it will be the innocent of this generation and thenext who will bear much of the burden if the situation explodes into a violent bloodbath. This is not who we are nor is it who we should become.

Some foreigner governments say there is no viable alternative in Ethiopia so they will wait until it explodes and then they will know who the players are. This is not an option for us. If violence begins, it will be Ethiopians killing each other. If we join together to bring about an Ethiopia conduciveto free and fair elections, we can compete for political opportunities in the future. We can lobby or represent the interests of sectarian interest groups in a civil and effective way. Above all, it is about the survival of our country, our people and our descendants.

It is now up to us to plan for a better future. We are ready to do that andare already taking steps in that direction. The real election has not taken place yet. Our votes can be acted upon in the days and months ahead. Itis not a time to be discouraged; but instead, it is an opportunity to learn from what has happened and to set a new agenda for the next five years.This agenda should be one that will liberate this country from a dictatorship and ethnic-apartheid system where the few thrive and the majority hardly survives.

This is the beginning of the movement of the people. If there is a rally in the coming days, weeks or months; it should be a rally of the people—not of a party, a tribe, a region or a religion. It should embrace all of the people of Ethiopia—putting humanity before ethnicity—because freedom, justice, and well being is far more attainableand sustainable when we care about our neighbors—for no one is free until all are free!

Ethiopian people in the Diaspora should prepare, standing ready to respond to what the people do at home. There must be a coordinated effort. All groups should play their roles—religious leaders, civil societyleaders, youth, the media, journalists, business leaders, intellectuals, people who have financial means, and other various groups and individuals. It is when each of us contributes our share that we will be most effective.

We know the games of divide and conquer that defeated Ethiopians following the 2005 election. We must be cautious if the TPLF/EPRDF attempts to reach out to one group in order to divide and defeat the heart of the struggle. They can even engage foreigners to play into their hands in order to achieve their purposes. We must be discerning with those whowant negotiation in order to ensure it is genuine so that the mistakes of 2005 are not repeated. All dishonest efforts should be rejected; on the other hand, it may be a better time now than ever before for people tojoin together as one force.

It was twenty-four years ago today (May 28, 1991) when the TPLF rebels marched into the capital city Addis Ababa to take over the parliament, massacring people along the way, many of them innocent people. They took power by the bullet, not by the ballot. No wonder they do not believein elections so as they celebrate this anniversary, they will boast about their accomplishments, but all the people know that they never offered anything better to the people or to the country than the previous dictatorial regime. In some ways they have made it worse through their ethnic-apartheid policies that have divided the people as well as the lack of security and economic opportunity that has caused millions to endangertheir lives as they sought refuge or better lives abroad. Do not be fooled, they know what they have done in killing their way to power and dividing the people to sustain their rule. We must find a much better way that includes everyone, including them and their descendants.

May we seek God's guidance, strength, and help through these days ofopportunity. May we reach out to our Ethiopian brothers and sisters, regardless of ethnicity or religion, in reconciliation and solidarity. (Textends)

HISTORIC RECORDS:

The World's 22 designated heads of states

In 1889, a photo-montage was made in Europe with the 22 main heads ofstate in the world. Ethiopia was included and the Emperor Yohannes IV, King of Zion and King of Kings of Ethiopia was 1 of the 22 main heads of state in the world. Emperor Yohannes IV of Ethiopia , Tewfik Pasha of Egypt, Sultan Abdülhamit II of Ottoman empire, Naser al-Din Shah Qajar of Persia, Christian IX of Denmark, Luís I of Portugal, William III of the Netherlands, Pedro II of Brazil, Milan Obrenović IV of Serbia, Leopold II of Belgium, Alexander III of Russia, Wilhelm I, German Emperor, Franz Joseph I of Austria, Queen Victoria of the United Kingdom, Jules Grévy of France, Pope Leo XIII, Emperor Meiji of Japan, Guangxu Emperor of China, Umberto I of Italy, Alfonso XII of Spain, Oscar II of Sweden and Chester A. Arthur the 21st President of the United States.

The Oromos of Harrarghe:

Remarks on "Galamso Aw Seid and Odda Bultum"

The town of Galamso has historical significance in the tradition of the Oromo of Harerghe. Yet, its name is very odd; it has no exact meaning in Afan Oromo and other languages. No town or village in Ethiopia and elsewhere in the world is called by this name except the single town whichis situated at the heart of Carcar province. So what does "Galamso" mean? The answer to this question takes us to some interrelated topics which can show us the impressiveness of the ancient tradition of theOromo people.

The Ittu Oromos, who are native to "Carcar" province, say that the name "Galamso" came from a compound noun "Galma Usso" which was to mean"Usso's hall" or "Usso's worship house". The name refers to a small mosque built by a man called “Usso”. Basically “galma” refers to a worshiphouse of the ancient “Waqqffannaa” religion of the Oromo people.

However, the Oromos used to call a worship house of any religion by thisname. An interesting point here is not the way the name was derived buthow the mosque could be built on the Oromo land where the law of the time didn’t allow it.

The Ittu Oromos say the man who built the mosque at Galamso was actually “Aw-Seid”, a saintly figure who tried to Islamize the Oromos of Carcar province in ancient times. His given name was “Seid Ali”. Latter onthe public added a prefix “Aw” to his name to indicate his sainthood (this is done in the manner of the Somalis and the Hararis who call their saintsand national heroes so).

The elders say when the Oromos were reformulating their constitution andworkings laws (“Heera” and “Seera”) at “Odaa Bultum” in early 13th century, they asked “Sheikh Abadir” of Harar to send with them a scholar who would assist them by giving legal advices. So Sheikh Abadir send “AwSeid” to Oda Bultum up on certain agreements; that “Aw Seid” would live and act according to the law of the Oromo land, that he would assist the Oromos in drafting the laws; that he would remain as a legal adviser of the people, that the Oromos take care of him and his family; that he would practice his religion freely and build his mosque at his place of residence, that he can work and own properties.

Based on the aforementioned agreement reached between the Oromos and Sheikh Abadir of Harar, elders say, “Aw Seid” came to the Oromo landand built his residential house at Galamso. He was officially adopted to theOromo citizen and made “ilma gosaa” (adopted son) of the Warra Qallu clan (one of the ten clans that make up the Ittu Oromo). On the adoption ceremony, the Oromos gave him the name “Usso”. When “Aw Seid” built his mosque short time later, the Oromos started tocall it “Galma Usso” just to mean “mosque of Usso”. The newly built structure became a sign that would indicate the place and its surroundings. And in the long period of time, the Ittu elders say, the name “Galma Usso” evolved to “Galamso”.

The Oromo elders say “Aw Seid” became a chief legal adviser of the “CaffeGadaa” assembly of “Oda Bultum and the “Mana Bokku” of the Ittu Oromoand he lived on this service for many years. He also became a chief traditional healer of the era since he had wide knowledge of Arabian and African medicines. Because of his preaching efforts, few people acceptedIslamic faith.

As time passed, dispute rose between the Oromos and “Aw Seid”. The origin of the dispute is narrated in different ways; some elders say “Aw Seid” has changed many of the traditional working laws of the Oromos and thus the land of Oromos was attacked by serious drought that persisted for three consecutive years. The people felt that they became sinful for altering the traditional law of their forefathers. The leaders of those dissatisfied people gathered and asked for the return of the ancientOromo laws. The Caffee Assembly called an extra-ordinary congress and reformulated the laws according to the ancient tradition of the Oromo people. And at the end, they sent back “Aw Seid” to Harar where he passed the rest of his life and died.

Contrary to the above, other elders say that a son of “Aw Seid” was killedby certain Ittu man but the Oromos paid the blood money of the dead as though the he was “amba” (non-citizen). “Aw Seid” asked for higher payment arguing that his dead son was already a “lammi” (citizen) because he was born in the Oromo land. He couldn’t reach an agreement with the Oromos so that he became frustrated and returned back to Hararwhere he came from.

These two views are widely narrated in different story lines. But the writerof this essay observed that the latter view has many supporters. An act that strengthens this view happened in 1991 when the renaissance of “Caffee Gadaa” assembly was celebrated at Oda Bultum after its disappearance for more than hundred years. At that time, thousands (andthis writer as well) attended a ceremony on which the Oromos gave manycattle to the family (clan) of Aw Seid as unpaid blood money of his dead son. The Oromos say when their land was conquered by Emperor Minilink’s army, their forefathers told them that the trouble was happenedto them because they annoyed a big saint which contrary to the Oromo ethical code (the ancient Oromos used to pay a respect to saints of any faith and they wouldn’t attack the shrines and worship houses of those religious figures) and that they established a tradition urging the future generations to pay the blood money of Aw-Seid’s son whenever they will get their freedom.

On the other hand, the interrelation between “Aw Seid” and “Oda Bultum”can be expressed by one vital fact; throughout the life experience of the writer of this article, “Oda Bultum” is also called “Aw Seid” and many people continue to call it by this name.

The history of the mission of “Aw Seid” partly appears in scholarly writtenrecords, many hagiographic documents as well discuss it. On the other hand, the name of “Aw Seid” appears many times in the list of the saints of Harar (in his full name “Aw Seid Ali”). Accordingly, the validity of the above Oromo oral traditions is unquestionable. However, the time is disputed. Many scholars including Professor Ulrich Braukamper say that the mission of Aw-Seid was probably a phenomenon of 16th Century. Thisview makes good historical sense on two grounds. First, many written sources agree that the Eastern Oromos established their separate Caffee Assembly at Oda Bultum only after the second half of 16th Century. Second, the Ittu elders say that it’s 69 Gadaas (i.e. 552 years) since the Oda Bultum assembly was founded separately to serve the eastern Oromos; prior to that the Oromos of Harerghe held their Caffee Assemblyat Oda Walabu (found in Bale) together with Arsi and Karrayu Oromos.

“Aw Seid” is a saint associated with Galamso town. An establishment of permanent settlement on the current site of the town is ascribed to him although its urbanization process took many years (few centuries). On theother hand, a perennial river that rises from the western side of the town is called in the name of “Aw Seid” which can show the strong bond existing between the saint and the town. In the last century, a small “galma” (prayer house) and a shrine was built at a place thought to be a sight of the ancient “Galma Usso”.

Why “Aw Seid” selected the site of Galamso town and built his mosque there is still unclear. Some say Galamso was the seat of “Mana Bokku” (President’s Office) in ancient times and Aw-Seid settled there in order to be close to the administrators of the time; others say he’s residence was decided by the Warra Qallu clan who adopted him as their son. As the town is surrounded by two places called “Caffee” which are regarded as the remnants of ancient local “Caffee”s, as a place like “Halaya Buchoro” where the Oromos used to execute criminals by throwing to a chasm is located in its vicinity, and as the town was the only one which had seven “karra” (gates) in the Oromo tradition (five “karra” according some sources consulted recently), then it seems to the writer of this essay that the former story can tell us the most likely reason. That is, Galamso mighthad been the seat of “Mana Bokku” of the ancient Ittu Oromo tribal administration and that could be a reason for which “Aw Seid” settled there and built his mosque in local oromiffa, “Galma Usso”. POLITICS: Unequal Power and EPRDF’s VictoryBy Daniel Teferra (PhD) (May 27, 2015)

The National Electoral Board of Ethiopia (NEBE) believes, based on itspreliminary survey, that Ethiopian Peoples’ Revolutionary DemocraticFront (EPRDF) will handily win this year’s national election.

A reporter asked someone, who voted for EPRDF why he voted for the group. The man answered, “I voted for EPRDF because it is the government.” This is a rational answer. If the government is in charge ofeverything and EPRDF controls the government, it is logical for people tovote for EPRDF.

It is foolhardy to believe that EPRDF won because of its economic record.In fact, In Ethiopia, standard of living has been declining. One woman, after voting for EPRDF, complained about the economic hardship to a reporter diplomatically. She said, “Everything under this government is very, very good. It is just the economy that needs a little bit more attention.” EPRDF will continue to win, no matter what, as long as it controls the government.

In 1991, the Tigray Liberation Front (TPLF) upon taking state power, formed Ethiopian Peoples’ Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) and has since controlled the government. This is different from the practice indemocratic societies. For instance, in the United States of America, political parties and the government are separate. A political party in America runs the government when it wins a national election. It relinquishes power when it loses an election. Political power ultimately rests with the people. Therefore, America’s government is democratic.

In a democratic government, property and power are decentralized. Consequently, people are free to make their own independent decisions.The state belongs to the people and elections give the people voice in government. Succession of leadership is peaceful.

On the other hand, in a regime government like the one in Ethiopia, property and power are monopolized by a non-working elite group due to possessing a military might. Consequently, the people are not free to make their own independent decisions. There is a gap between the peopleand the state. Fig leaf elections are common. The people have no voice ingovernment. The ruling group maintains state power through repression. Succession of leadership is often violent. Ethiopia's history is replete with examples.

During the period leading up to this year's election, there have been numerous reports about harassments and intimidations of the opposition parties by EPRDF. These should be expected. A regime government will not relinquish its monopoly over resources and power willingly. During anelection debate with opposition parties, the regime was the only one thatwas opposed to privatization of land.
There is a lesson to be learned by the opposition political parties from all these. And that is, there has to be first and foremost a democratic state inEthiopia for elections to be free and fair. The question, therefore, for any political party is whether its primary goal should be to wrestle state powerout of the hands of EPRDF or to democratize the state. Competition for state power will not democratize Ethiopia. It will extend EPRDF's control for many more years or create another regime government.
Many Ethiopians complain that the opposition political parties are not united to be an effective countervailing power. This may be true. But it islogical to ask why they are not united. Some in Ethiopian politics blame lack of trust among the political parties for the problem. This is not aconvincing argument. The real reason for the lack of unity is that most of Ethiopia's politicians compete for the same thing—that is, to take state power. Unfortunately, they are still relying on an outdated EPLF/TPLF model. A paradigm shift isnecessary, especially by the non-Tigray/Amhara political groups who are struggling for territories rather than rights. There will be unity among Ethiopia's political groupings if their focus is to struggle for equal rights.
There will be no democratic unity among Ethiopia's politicians if one groupdenies the others the rights it demands for itself. Only unity based on equal rights can create democracy in Ethiopia. This will free the government from control by a single group like EPRDF and thereby createa level playing field for all.

Ethiopia's Suspenseless Elections Obscure Ruling Party RivalriesBy Charles Schaefer, May 22, 2015, Briefing
There are few political posters to be found on the streets of Ethiopia's capital, Addis Ababa, ahead of Sunday's general elections. Print media coverage is remarkably cryptic. The few debates held on TV have been derided by some Ethiopians as boring and even embarrassing for the opposition, which today is weaker and more divided than it has ever been.Election results seem like a forgone conclusion, with good reason. In 2010, the longtime ruling party, the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), won 546 out of 547 seats in Parliament. The country's political context has not changed in the five year since, and an equally one-sided victory may be in store.
Despite its political dominance, or perhaps because of it, the EPRDF has lost its zeal and is becoming increasingly authoritarian and listless since the death of its charismatic leader, former Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, in2012. Sunday's election is the fifth since the first national elections in 1992, in a country theoretically committed to a democratic and decentralized state crafted around "ethnic federalism," a progressive constitution and a commitment to human rights. Today reality differs markedly from those ideals championed in the early 1990s.

MIGRATION: A big wave of immigrants from Ethiopia is passing throughTanzania - MoHA

THERE are a total of 250 Ethiopians in various prisons in the country, Deputy Minister for Home Affairs, Mr Pereira Silima has said. There are 68in Kilimanjaro, 34 in Lindi, 70 in Tanga, 22 in Mbeya, 39 in Morogoro, onein Mwanza and 12 in Mara. Mr Silima was responding to a question from Ms Amina Clement (Koani-CCM), who sought to know how many Ethiopianillegal immigrants have been arrested and where they are being held.

She also asked to know steps taken after the illegal immigrants have completed serving their sentences.

Deputy Minister Silima said so far 96 illegal immigrants have completed their sentences out of whom 91 are Ethiopians waiting for procedures to be complete before they can be deported back to their country.

He said previously the government wouldwork with Kenyan government through the immigration department, to deport Ethiopians through Kenya by road but due to security fears this isnot possible.

“The next step after the illegal immigrants complete their sentences is to deport them back to their country as directed by courts. Initially we woulduse road transport through Kenya but due to security fears this is not possible, so we now use air transport,” he explained. Mr Silima said there is a big wave of illegal immigrants from Ethiopia passing through Tanzaniagoing to South Africa, which started in 2007.

He said a number of strategies are being employed by the governmentincluding boosting security along the country’s borders, taking to courtand deporting illegal immigrants.

He said these steps have reduced the number of illegal immigrants passing through the country to other nations including South Africa. He added that the government is also looking to provide working equipmentsto security personnel working along borders to bolster efforts to curb illegal immigrants from crossing into the country. Ethiopian troops invaded Kenya today, for the second time this month

STANDARD MEDIA (May 26, 2015) More than 30 heavily armed Ethiopiangovernment soldiers invaded Lataka village in Sololo, Kenya, on Tuesdaymorning and allegedly roughed up locals. The soldiers also allegedly disarmed a Kenya Police Reservist (KPR) officer and arrested some residents of the village. Locals claimed the Ethiopian soldiers demanded they produce and disclose whereabouts of Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) rebels, which is an outlawed militia in Ethiopia.

The incident happened two days after Ethiopia held its national elections and at a time when the Sololo border remained closed due to the polls. Speaking to The Standard, they said soldiers were armed with AK47 rifles,hand grenade and sophisticated weapons. "They roughed up several people in the village and my elder brother suffered head and leg injuries during the 6am incident," a resident, Halkano Huka, said.

Locals said the troops crossed into Kenya on Monday evening, through the Godi-loni border point, and invaded Lataka village on Tuesday morning which is some 20 kilometres from the border.

During the invasion they arrested two people from the village and released them after three hours. The residents said soldiers went towardsQicha village some 10 kilometres towards the border and by the time we went to press, the fate of the village remained unknown. The villagers saidKenyan police arrived at the village at 9am and went to Sololo Police Station where they interrogated the two abducted villagers, Gimbe Jarso and Rob Jarso. Sololo Deputy County Commissioner Raphael Muiruri confirmed the incident and said a KPR officer was disarmed.

There are signs of a renewed power struggle between the party's Central Committee and a group of senior ethnic Tigrean revolutionaries that were sidelined in 2000 after the Eritrean-Ethiopian War, according to René Lefort, a longtime observer of Ethiopia. Moreover, Lefort suggested that a younger generation is also struggling to assume power. On top of this, thepuppet parties that the EPRDF created as a facade of decentralization have assumed enormous power themselves. Amid all the political wrangling, the military is becoming an industrial and economic leviathan, a "deep state" similar to Egypt's military.

The election, therefore, is a screen obscuring the real contest, which will be decided within the EPRDF between those four power blocs. No person or clique has emerged within the EPRDF to unseat Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, who, though often depicted as the EPRDF's ineffectual figurehead, will likely remain prime minister. Desalegn's experience serving under Zenawi should not be underestimated. It was also under his watch as chief party whip that Parliament passed the set of laws that essentially gave the EPRDF unchecked powers in 2009. Intrigue behind the scenes within the ruling EPRDF

VIEWS BY ANONIMOUS - I predicted this sort of gossip to resurface again immediately after weyane declares its usual ground-shaking victory. To this day, we were flooded with baseless innuendoes depicting the stellar rise to power of the inept and immature opposition groups and the imminent destruction of weyane and its FDRE, but now after weyane won 100% of the votes the only thing that remains for them sore loser anarchists and their evil international masters is fabricating another baseless power struggle within weyane and its various branch organizations. Do these people have shame and stop recycling this sort of childish talk? Weyane EPRDF had already made this very clear: Power rests within the collective weyane EPRDF leadership and not on one individual, and thus the concept power struggle has no meaning within theweyane EPRDF. Weyane had also made it very clear that brother

ARCHAEOLOGY: New Hominin Species Discovered in Ethiopia(May 27, 2015) By Janet Fan

Meet Australopithecus deyiremeda, a previously unknown human ancestorspecies who lived alongside Lucy’s species, Australopithecus afarensis, in Ethiopia over 3 million years ago. The jawbones and a few isolated teeth of the new hominin (that’s us and our extinct ancestors) are described in Nature this week.

On March 4, 2011, a left upper jaw complete with a few teeth (picturedabove) was discovered on top of sandstone in the Burtele area of Woranso-Mille in the central Afar region of Ethiopia. Later that day and theday after, two lower jaws were discovered: one was found in the Burtele area in two pieces (the left half is pictured below to the right), the other was found at a locality called Waytaleyta about two kilometers away.

Based on the geology, radiometric dating, paleomagnetic data, and the rate of sediment deposition, the layer the fossils had weathered out of wasbetween the ages of 3.3 and 3.5 million years. The area is just 35 kilometers north of Hadar, where Lucy was discovered.

When an international team led by Yohannes Haile-Selassie from the Cleveland Museum of Natural History analyzed the fossils, they found thatthe size and shape of the teeth are more similar to known Australopithecus specimens than other hominin genus – but their featuresare distinct enough to warrant a new species. The cheek bones were situated more forward than Australopithecus afarensis, and the part of thelower jaw that connects to the cranium had a more forward position, University College London’s Fred Spoor writes in an accompanying New & Views article. And some of the cheek teeth are notably small.

The species name comes from the local Afar words "deyi" meaning "close"and "remeda" for "relative" – referring to how the new species is a close relative of all later hominins.

Another specimen that may have belonged to Australopithecus deyiremeda was previously unearthed in 2009: a 3.4-million-year-old partial right foot from Burtele. The team described the fossil in 2012, but it wasn’t possible to assign it to any known hominin species at the time. The Burtele partial foot indicated that multiple early hominin species lived3 to 4 million years ago, but many researchers were arguing that at any given moment, there was only one species, which would then give rise toanother.

Australopithecus bahrelghazali from Chad and Kenyanthropus platyopsfrom Kenya were thought to have co-existed with eastern Africa’s Australopithecus afarensis, which lived from 2.9 to 3.8 million years ago.However, their validity has been questioned because of distorted fossils and the scarcity of specimens. Australopithecus deyiremeda is the most conclusive evidence that multiple closely related hominin species were contemporaries prior to 3 million years ago.

"The new species is yet another confirmation that Lucy’s species, Australopithecus afarensis, was not the only potential human ancestor species that roamed in what is now the Afar region of Ethiopia during the middle Pliocene," Haile-Selassie says in a news release. "Current fossil evidence from the Woranso-Mille study area clearly shows that there wereat least two, if not three, early human species living at the same time andin close geographic proximity." Although, what led to this diversity and exactly how more than one species coexisted in a stable ecosystem remain open questions for now. Casts of the jaws are pictured below. (Text ends)

NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM, LONDON (BBC Science Correspondent) - Scientists have unearthed the jawbone of what they claim is one the veryfirst humans.

These new studies challenge us to consider the very definition of what it'sto

The 2.8 million-year-old specimen is 400,000 years older than researchersthought that our kind first emerged. The discovery in Ethiopia suggests climate change spurred the transition from tree dweller to upright walker. The head of the research team told BBC News that the find gives the first insight into "the most important transitions in human evolution".

Prof Brian Villmoare of the University of Nevada in Las Vegas said the discovery makes a clear link between an iconic 3.2 million-year-old hominin (human-like primate) discovered in the same area in 1974, called"Lucy".

Could Lucy's kind - which belonged to the species Australopithecus afarensis - have evolved into the very first primitive humans? "That's whatwe are arguing," said Prof Villmoare. But the fossil record between the time period when Lucy and her kin were alive and the emergence of Homoerectus (with its relatively large brain and humanlike body proportions) two million years ago is sparse.

The 2.8 million-year-old lower jawbone was found in the Ledi-Geraru research area, Afar Regional State, by Ethiopian student Chalachew Seyoum. He told BBC News that he was "stunned" when he saw the fossil."The moment I found it, I realised that it was important, as this is the time period represented by few (human) fossils in Eastern Africa."

The fossil is of the left side of the lower jaw, along with five teeth. The back molar teeth are smaller than those of other hominins living in the area and are one of the features that distinguish humans from more primitive ancestors, according to Professor William Kimbel, director of Arizona State University's Institute of Human Origins. "Previously, the oldest fossil attributed to the genus Homo was an upper jaw from Hadar,Ethiopia, dated to 2.35m years ago," he told BBC News.

"So this new discovery pushes the human line back by 400,000 years orso, very close to its likely (pre-human) ancestor. Its mix of primitive andadvanced features makes the Ledi jaw a good transitional form between (Lucy) and later humans."

A computer reconstruction of a skull belonging to the species Homo habilis, which has been published in Nature journal, indicates that it maywell have been the evolutionary descendant of the species announced today.

The researcher involved, Prof Fred Spoor of University College London toldBBC News that, taken together, the new findings had lifted a veil on a keyperiod in the evolution of our species.

"By discovering a new fossil and re-analysing an old one we have truly contributed to our knowledge of our own evolutionary period, stretchingover a million years that had been shrouded in mystery," he said.

Climate change

The dating of the jawbone might help answer one of the key questions inhuman evolution. What caused some primitive ancestors to climb down from the trees and make their homes on the ground. A separate study inScience hints that a change in climate might have been a factor. An analysis of the fossilised plant and animal life in the area suggests that what had once been lush forest had become dry grassland.

As the trees made way for vast plains, ancient human-like primates founda way of exploiting the new environmental niche, developing bigger brainsand becoming less reliant on having big jaws and teeth by using tools.

Prof Chris Stringer of the Natural History Museum in London described thediscovery as a "big story".

He says the new species clearly does show the earliest step toward humancharacteristics, but suggests that half a jawbone is not enough to tell just how human it was and does not provide enough evidence to suggest that it was this line that led to us.

He notes that the emergence of human-like characteristics was not uniqueto Ethiopia.

"The human-like features shown by Australopithecus sediba in South Africa at around 1.95 million years ago are likely to have developed independently of the processes which produced (humans) in East Africa, showing that parallel origins are a distinct possibility," Prof Stringer explained.

This would suggest several different species of humans co-existing in Africa around two million years ago with only one of them surviving and eventually evolving into our species, Homo sapiens. It is as if nature wasexperimenting with different versions of the same evolutionary configuration until one succeeded.

Prof Stringer added: "These new studies leave us with an even more complex picture of early humans than we thought, and they challenge usto consider the very definition of what it is to be human. Are we defined by our small teeth and jaws, our large brain, our long legs, tool-making, or some combination of these traits?" (Text ends)

JOURNALISM: Veteran journalist and diplomat Mairegu BezabihBy Arefayné Fantahun, Ethiopia Observer (May 27, 2015)

Mairegu Bezabih has served his country in various capacities for the past forty years. He had worked as special assignment reporter and feature writer for the Ethiopian Herald, department head of the English Features Desk of Radio Ethiopia, producer for “Balemuyaw Yinager” (Let the expert speak), a weekly television program, Editor-in-Chief of the quarterly magazine, Point Four, Editor-in-chief of weekly Amharic Yezaretu Ethiopia,the daily Addis Zemen, and Yekatit magazine. He also served as press counsellor of his country at the UN Mission in Geneva and at the EthiopianEmbassy in London. He was a columnist, editorial contributor and editorialboard member for a private Amharic monthly magazine, Lisane Hizib, Deputy Chief of a European desk at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He is the founder and editor of the private English paper, the Daily Monitor. He has distinguished himself as a teacher of journalism and communication, teaching journalism, development communication and public relation courses at the Addis Ababa University and Unity University for over twentyyears. Ato Mairegu has written a book on journalistic techniques as well asa history of print journalism in the country, Yegazetegnet Muya, Nidife Hasabu Ena Ategebaberu (The profession of Journalism, Its Theory and Practice. He has contributed articles, commentaries, reviews and historicalstudies to different publications and a piece on Ethiopia's press history in Frank Barton's book, The Press of Africa. He has written and edited work on a wide array of subjects related to reporting, press freedom, and publicpolicy and he has appeared on many radio programs such as the EthiopianTelevision, Radio Free Europe in Paris, BBC Bush House in London, Ethiopian Broadcasting Service (EBS) and Voice of America.

As a journalist, Mairegu has been instrumental in opposing government attempts to curb media freedoms through statutory regulation and secrecy legislation. When the current government introduced the press law in 1992, Mairegu was one of the few people who argued against someof the articles which he found might curtail and limit press freedom ratherthan enhance it.

Regarding the current state of journalism, Mairegu is of the opinion that it leaves much to be desired. "There is a problem with presenting news in a way that is accurate and factual. One reason being that news items are passed around among the papers without proper investigation of their accuracy and the appropriate editing. Follow-up is a very important task injournalism because most news items cannot be complete at first instance reporting. Most journalists lack the skill or the motivation to further investigate some happenings which could be of much interest to the public. Facts get mixed up, names get wrong. Most of those who are in the trade don't have the proper training that the job requires. Most of the journalists who are now in the trade come to the profession with the experiences they had in mini media school. The ground is not propitious for journalism which is sober and highly responsible," he says.

Mairegu was born in August 1938 in Korrem, Wag Awraja, in the former Wollo province, which he describe as the land of the Agew and Amhara. His father, Fitawrari Bezabih Yimam, was a patriot who died during the Italian occupation. His father's younger brother Dejazmatch Hailu Kebede,who was posthumously appointed lieutenant general by Emperor Haile Selassie was a great heroic patriot who tried to liberate Sekota, the capitalof Wag from the Italian occupation. He was killed in the war that ensued. His mother comes from the same area, Wag. She was a housewife, very religious type, he says. She was extremely fond of recounting her family history and lineage, which trait has passed on to him.

Mairegu attended Atse Yoahannes IV Elementary School in Mekele town and continued at Kusquam, Kokebe Tsibah and Asfaw Wosen schools in Addis Ababa. He later enrolled in the General Wingate School in Addis Ababa where he completed his studies in 1957. Mairegu says Wingate inthose days was rather an elite school- a kind of Eaton of Ethiopia. "My years in Wingate were the most formative years in my life. It was in Wingate that I learnt about the history of this great country, Ethiopia, about our great emperors such as Tewdros, Yohannes, Menelik and HaileSelassie," he once wrote in the school's publication.

At Wingate School he had an Amharic teacher who was influential to his future journalism and writing career. The teacher named Kifle Worku tooka particular interest in encouraging him and his classmates, and through him he developed love of Amharic literature. "He talked about literature with great passion. It was contagious and inspiring. He convinced me of the great power of the Amharic language and who instilled in me tremendous love for Amharic literature, poetry, prose and drama," hesays. (Kifle later became Vice Minister before he died in a suspicious circumstance during the Derg.)

Mairegu also recalls his English literature teacher, Mr. Michael Halsted, who used to read Shakespeare's Julius Caesar in class. "He used to makeus feel and live as contemporaries of ancient Romans." As the teacher made him recite the words of Caesar, he remembers how he felt being a Caesar himself.

One of Mairegu's year mates at Wingate who was later to become an eminent figure and his boss, was Baalu Girma. "Baalu was interested in music. I remember when there were recreational events on weekends, he used to sing his favourite French song, C'est Si bon. Next opportunity for us to meet was while we were both working at the Ministry of Information.He started working as an editor for the then weekly, Yezareitu Ethiopia.

Later he became state Minster, known then as Permanent Secretary, whenI became an editor of Addis Zemen," he says.

Another school mate, Tamiru Feyissa, was later to be known in the 1960'sstudent movements for his poem, "Dehaw Yinageral" (The poor man speaks out), a poem depicting the miserable life of the poor. At Wingate, Mairegu also formed a warm continuing friendship with Mengistu Hailemariam Araya, who went on to enjoy a distinguished career as presiding judge and later became Mairegu's lawyer when he was put into prison.

After completing his high school education, Mairegu enrolled at the Extension Department of the then University College of Addis Ababa. He found the atmosphere at University College encouraging and inspiring. "We used to read and write a lot; we used to debate and compete with each other. "Thankfully, I received a very thorough liberal arts and literature background," he says. He chose political science because he feltit has some kind of mysticism. He appreciates particularly Professor Schuldrinsky, Dr. Richard Pankhurst and Sven Rubenson. Pankhurst madea deep impression on Mairegu and got him interested in history.

Pankhurst's relationship with the students was very friendly, he said. Rubenson was an enormous fan of Emperor Tewodros. "It was pleasing tosee a foreign historian who devoted much of his time in researching on anAfrican leader. He was so obsessed with Tewodros that even during his meal time and coffee breaks he used to incessantly talk about him. He later wrote a well-known book, "The Survival of Ethiopian Independence".It was a real fixation and obsession," he says.

Following his graduation, Mairegu travelled to study at Institute of OrientalStudies in Naples. However, it didn't interest him. "It was mostly about Semitic languages, Arabic and Islamic disciplines. This doesn't go with me," he says. He instead joined the prestigious Johns Hopkins University, Bologna Chapter, where he studied advanced diplomacy and internationalrelations. He found Bologna, a vibrant, exciting European city and he sayshis stay in Italy was pleasant. He never felt any racial prejudice.
How did he decide to become a journalist? In part, he says, it was accident. After his return from Italy with his masters in international relations, the employment that naturally occurred to him was to go the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and present his credentials in the hope of beingemployed, his expertise being Eastern Europe. He thought he would be ofsome use. "But the person who was in charge of recruiting personnel wasnot very enthusiastic about the job request. While his qualification was desirable, they had no opening, he told him. Having his cherished dream dashed, he went to his hotel in a state of dejection. "The next day I had asurprise call from Shamble Atinafu, who was in charge of foreign publications department of Ministry of Information. He suggested that I could take up a post at the Ethiopian Herald. Since I had a master's degree, they made me a special assignment reporter. I interviewed important personalities, including head of states during their official visit to Ethiopia."
Before going abroad, Mairegu used to contribute articles to newspapersand magazines.
On the following day, he headed to the Ministry of Information and sat down with Shamble Atinafu and the Colombia-graduate Tegegne Yeteshawork, whom he referred as "the giant journalist" to discuss about his employment. He was hired and to his surprise, he loved his new job. "Ienjoyed it. It was quite exciting. I was young. There was also the glamor of it, you get invited to important events and embassy reception". Among the notable personalities he interviewed were the world renownedSouth African singer Miriam Makeba, the then freedom fighter Mandela and the Namibian freedom fighter who became the country's first president. He interviewed Miriam Makeba, at the Hilton Hotel and he found her to be a fascinating personality. She used to hum while being interviewed. Mairegu had a chance to interview many Ethiopian personalities over the years that became his friends. One was the late artist Maître artist Afewerk Tekle whom Mairegu interviewed for the first time in 1970 after the artist did an inaugural mural at St. Paul's Hospital in 1970. (The large painting has a combination of religious imagery and aportrayal of the former Emperor Haile Selassie I, the hospital's original patron.) "Afework lacked confidence with media people. When I was working for the Herald, the first article I wrote about him, he loved it. Thepainting was later criticised by the student movement for showing the Emperor as godly figure. But my article was positive." Though some thought of the artist as pompous person but Mairegu doesn't think it was a reasonable assessment. "You see, he went to England when he was young. He grew up among the aristocracy. Painters, poets and authors in Europe live like princes. He was also trying to do that here. He lived in a white stuccoed villa. He had a valet dressed gorgeously like those at Rasor the Ghion Hotel. His works were grand in scale. He has become rich with his works. Some thought he was pompous, arrogant, but my experience of Afework was that, he was, extremely meek, kind. He lovedhis country."

While working for the Ethiopian Herald, Mairegu left for the United Kingdom for journalism training at the Thomson Foundation Editorial Studies Centre, Cardiff (South Wales). There he was attached to the newspaper, South Wales Eco where he wrote a number of articles, like one about Emperor's Haile Selassie's stay in Bath during his wartime exile.

With such a background and clear cut objectives, he came back enthusiastic about pursuing the profession of journalism. But that was tobe somewhat thwarted as he was removed from his post in the Ethiopian Herald and put as head of public relations office for the Ministry of Information where he worked almost two years.

Then he joined the English service of Radio Ethiopia where he worked withcolleagues like Teferi Wosen and Mussie Ayele. "We were writing feature stories and Leul-Seghed Kumsa would read it with his beautiful English accent. When Leul-Seghed wasn't around, it would fall to us to read in hisstead. Being an excellent reader that he was, he was naturally a hard act to follow and we naturally fell short".

Then the revolution came, shortly after the ouster of Haile Selassie in 1974, Mairegu wrote for an English paper in London: "The journalists of Ethiopia, oppressed and frustrated from time immemorial-are biting theirnails waiting to see what life without the Emperor will mean.' 'The only consolation newsmen have in this wait-and-see period is that things can hardly be any worse than under the Emperor,' he had written in the African Journalist, as quoted in Frank Barton's The Press of Africa.

Ethiopia opposition says elections an 'undemocratic disgrace'By AFP (May 30, 2015)

Addis Ababa (AFP) - Ethiopia's main opposition party on Friday condemned weekend elections, which saw the ruling party cruise back intooffice, as a "disgrace" and proof the country was a one-party state.

According to preliminary results from last Sunday's elections, the ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) of Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn secured all 442 parliamentary seats so fardeclared out of the 547 seats up for grabs.

The EPRDF, in power in Africa's second-most populous nation for over twodecades, were widely expected to secure a near clean sweep of parliament, and the outgoing chamber had just one opposition MP -- but even this was taken by the ruling party.

"The Blue Party does not accept the process as free and fair and does not accept the outcome of unhealthy and undemocratic elections," the main opposition party said. "This 100 percent win by the regime is a message ofdisgrace" and shows that a "multi-party system is over in Ethiopia".

Ahead of Sunday's polls the opposition alleged the government had used authoritarian tactics to guarantee victory -- such as intimidation, refusingto register candidates or arresting supporters.
The Blue Party's spokesman, Yonatan Tesfaye, alleged that 200 partycandidates were denied the right to stand for parliament and 52 partymembers were arrested in the run-up to the polls.
"We don't think there is an independent justice system to deal with ourcomplaints. We'll continue our peaceful struggle," he told reporters.
After the elections, the United States, which enjoys close security cooperation with Ethiopia, also said it remained "deeply concerned bycontinued restrictions on civil society, media, opposition parties, and independent voices and views."
The European Union also said true democracy had yet to take root in Ethiopia, and voiced concern over "arrests of journalists and oppositionpoliticians, closure of a number of media outlets and obstacles faced bythe opposition in conducting its campaign."
The African Union observer mission, however, described the polling as "credible" and "generally consistent with the AU guidelines on the conductof elections in Africa." On Wednesday government spokesman Shimeles Kemal said the win came as the result of Ethiopia's economic advances.
"Voters have credited the ruling party for the economic progress it introduced in the country," he told AFP. "In view of the weak, fragmentedopposition and the lack of a viable alternative, it was very likely that the ruling party would win in a landslide. (Text ends)
Freedom in the World 2014 – ETHIOPIA REPORTOverview:
Despite a relatively smooth political transition following the 2012 death ofPrime Minister Meles Zenawi, the Ethiopian government in 2013 continuedharassing and imprisoning political opponents, journalists, and the country’s Muslim population under Meles’s successor, Hailemariam Desalegn of the ruling Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF).
Tensions with Eritrea showed signs of easing in 2013, after Ethiopia announced a willingness to hold peace talks. Though no formal dialogues were held, domestic and regional developments suggested a possible movement toward normalization of relations. Ethiopian troops had carriedout a series of incursions into Eritrea in 2012—the first since the end of the war in 2000—reportedly in pursuit of rebels responsible for kidnappinga group of foreign tourists in Ethiopia’s Afar region.
Violence resumed in Ethiopia’s Ogaden region in 2013 after talks failed between the government and the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), a separatist group that has fought for independence since 1991. Talks between the government and the ONLF had been convened in Kenyabut broke down in 2012 without agreement. In October 2013, the ONLF conducted a series of attacks against Ethiopian military posts that resultedin the deaths of 24 Ethiopian soldiers.
Ethiopia ranked 33 out of 52 countries surveyed in the Mo Ibrahim Indexof African Governance, below average on the continent and among the bottom in the East Africa region. The country's modest gains in the indexare largely due to its improvement in human development indicators; itslowest score was in the category of Participation and Human Rights.

Political Rights and Civil Liberties:

Political Rights: 7 / 40 [Key]

A. Electoral Process: 1 / 12

Ethiopia's Parliament is made up of a 108-seat upper house, the House ofFederation, and a 547-seat lower house, the House of People's Representatives. The lower house is filled through popular elections, while the upper chamber is selected by the state legislatures; members of bothhouses serve five-year terms. The lower house selects the prime minister,who holds most executive power, and the president, a largely ceremonial figure who serves up to two six-year terms. In October 2013, Mulatu Teshome, Ethiopia's ambassador to Turkey, was selected as Ethiopia's new president.

The 2010 parliamentary and regional elections were tightly controlled bythe EPRDF. Voters were threatened with losing their jobs, homes, or government services if they did not turn out for the ruling party.

Opposition meetings were broken up, and candidates were threatened and detained. Opposition-aligned parties saw their 160-seat presence in Parliament virtually disappear, with the EPRDF and its allies taking all buttwo of the 547 seats in the lower house. Hailemariam will remain prime minister until elections in 2015.

B. Political Pluralism and Participation: 2 / 16

Shorn of their representation in Parliament and under pressure by the authorities, opponents of the EPRDF find it difficult to operate. Oppositionparties held peaceful demonstrations in June 2013, the first to be allowedby the government since 2005. Later in the year, however, opposition parties—including the Blue Party and the Unity for Democracy and JusticeParty—accused the government of arresting large groups of their members and holding them without charge.

Political parties are often ethnically based. The EPRDF coalition is comprised of four political parties representing several ethnic groups. Thegovernment tends to favor Tigrayan ethnic interests in economic and political matters, and the EPRDF is dominated by the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front. While the 1995 constitution grants the right of secessionto ethnically based states, the government acquired powers in 2003 to intervene in states' affairs on issues of public security.

C. Functioning of Government: 4 / 12

All of Ethiopia's governance institutions are dominated by the EPRDF,which tightly controlled the succession process following the death ofMeles in 2012.

Corruption remains a significant problem in Ethiopia. EPRDF officials reportedly receive preferential access to credit, land leases, and jobs. Petty corruption extends to lower level officials, who allegedly solicit bribes in return for processing documents. In 2013, the Ethiopian government attempted to demonstrate its commitment to fighting corruption after the release of a World Bank study the previous year that detailed corruption in the country. As part of the effort, the Federal Ethics& Anti-Corruption Commission (FEACC) made a string of high-profile arrests of prominent government officials and businessmen throughout the year. In October, Hailemariam opened the conference of the NationalAnti-Corruption Coalition, outlining a national anticorruption strategy andurging other officials to support the initiative. Ethiopia ranked 111 out of 177 countries and territories surveyed in Transparency International's 2013 Corruption Perceptions Index.

Civil Liberties: 11 / 40

D. Freedom of Expression and Belief: 3 / 16

The media is dominated by state-owned broadcasters and government-oriented newspapers. One of the few independent papers in the capital, Addis Neger, closed in 2009, claiming harassment by the authorities. Privately owned papers tend to steer clear of political issues and have low circulations. In 2013, three news outlets were either banned or shut down indefinitely. A 2008 media law criminalizes defamation and allows prosecutors to seize material before publication in the name of national security. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ),Ethiopia had the second-highest number of jailed journalists in Africa afterEritrea as of December 2013. Restrictions on journalists perceived to be sympathetic to widespread protests by the Muslim community are particularly tight. In August 2013, Darsema Sori and Khalid Mohammed ofRadio Bilal, which has covered the demonstrations, were arrested and heldwithout charge.

Journalists reporting on opposition activities face serious harassment and the threat of prosecution under Ethiopia's sweeping 2009 Antiterrorism Proclamation. An estimated 11 journalists have been convicted under the law since 2011, three of whom remained in prison in 2013. Two additionaljournalists remain on trial under the law. In September 2013, Reeyot Alemu, a Feteh newspaper columnist serving a five-year sentence on terrorism charges at Kaliti prison, undertook a four-day hunger strike to protest visitation restrictions and threats of solitary confinement. Reeyot'shealth is said to have deteriorated significantly in prison. In July 2012, sixjournalists were convicted of terrorism. While five were convicted in absentia, the sixth, Eskinder Nega, received 18 years in prison. The judgesaid that he had consorted with the political group Ginbot 7, a designatedterrorist entity in Ethiopia. The United States, the European Union, and the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights expressed dismay at the verdicts. The UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention characterized Eskinder's detention as a violation of international law and recommended his "immediate release." He continued to publish from prison in 2013, appearing in both the New York Times and the Guardian. Both Eskinder and Reeyot's cases are being appealed to the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights under the African Union.

Due to the risks of operating inside the country, many Ethiopian journalists work in exile. CPJ says

Ethiopia has driven 49 journalists into exile in the past 5 years. Authorities use high-tech jamming equipment tofilter and block news websites seen as pro-opposition. Legislation adoptedin May 2012 criminalizes the use of telecommunications devices to transmit any “terrorizing message.” Critics said the vaguely worded law also effectively banned the use of Skype and other voice-over-internet protocol services that cannot be closely monitored by the government.

According to Human Rights Watch (HRW), since 2010 the Ethiopian government has developed a robust and sophisticated internet and mobileframework to monitor journalists and opposition groups, block access to unwanted websites, and collect evidence for prosecutions in terrorism andother trials.

The constitution guarantees religious freedom, but the government has increasingly harassed the Muslim community, which has grown to rival theEthiopian Orthodox Church as the country’s largest religious group.

Muslim groups accuse the government of trying to impose the beliefs of an obscure Islamic sect, Al-Ahbash, at the expense of the dominant Sufi- influenced strain of Islam. Before his death, Meles accused the Muslim community of being a source of extremism, claiming it had links to Al- Qaeda. Academic freedom is often restricted in Ethiopia. The governmenthas accused universities of being pro-opposition and prohibits political activities on campuses. There have been reports of students being pressured into joining the EPRDF in order to secure places at universities.The Ministry of Education closely monitors and regulates official curricula,and the research, speech, and assembly of both professors and students is frequently restricted. In March 2013, authorities arrested Addis Ababa University student Manyazewal Eshetu for posting “unconfirmed information” after he wrote about government corruption on his Facebookpage. Manyazewal was later released without charge. The presence of theEPRDF at all levels of society inhibits free private discussion. Many peopleare wary of speaking against the government for fear of being overheard by party officials. The EPRDF maintains a network of paid informants, andopposition politicians have accused the government of tapping their telephones.

E. Associational and Organizational Rights: 0 / 12

Freedoms of assembly and association are guaranteed by the constitutionbut limited in practice. Organizers of large public meetings must request permission from the authorities 48 hours in advance. Applications by opposition groups are routinely denied. Ongoing peaceful demonstrationshave been held by members of the Muslim community since December 2011 with violent responses from security forces. The protesters allege government interference in religious affairs and politically motivated selection of members of the Ethiopian Islamic Affairs Supreme Council.

Tens of thousands participated in demonstrations following Eid holiday prayers in August; the protesters were met with a heavy-handed police response that resulted in hundreds of arrests and an unconfirmed numberof deaths. Twenty-nine demonstration leaders have been charged under the antiterrorism law with conspiracy and attempting to establish an Islamic state; their trial remains ongoing. Trial proceedings have been closed to the public, media, and the individuals' families. According to HRW, some defendants claimed that they have been restricted access to legal counsel. Though momentum has slowed, protests remain ongoing.

The 2009 Charities and Societies Proclamation restricts the activities offoreign nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) by prohibiting work on political and human rights issues. Foreign NGOs are defined as groups receiving more than 10 percent of their funding from abroad, a classification that includes most domestic organizations as well. NGOs have struggled to maintain operations as a result of the law, which also requires them to reregister with the authorities. According to Justice Ministry figures, there were 3,522 registered NGOs before the law was passed. Estimates of the number of NGOs since the passage of the law ranged from 1,500 to 1,700 as of the end of 2013. In 2010, the Human Rights Council (HRCO) and the Ethiopian Women Lawyers' Association (EWLA) had their bank accounts frozen for violating the rules on receivingforeign funds. An appeal against the ruling by the HRCO was rejected by the Supreme Court in October 2012. Both organizations have dramaticallyreduced their operations. As of 2013, HRCO shut down three-quarters of its offices and shed 85 percent of its staff, while the EWLA scaled down itsstaff by 70 percent.

Trade union rights are tightly restricted. Neither civil servants nor teachers have collective bargaining rights. All unions must be registered,and the government retains the authority to cancel registration. Two-thirds of union members belong to organizations affiliated with the Confederation of Ethiopian Trade Unions, which is under government influence. Independent unions face harassment, and trade union leadersare regularly imprisoned. There has not been a legal strike since 1993.

F. Rule of Law: 3 / 16

The judiciary is officially independent, but its judgments rarely deviate from government policy. The 2009 antiterrorism law gives great discretionto the security forces, allowing the detention of suspects for up to four months without charge. It was used in 2011 to detain more than 100 members of opposition parties; terrorist suspects were denied legal assistance while they awaited trial. In April 2013, nearly 30 individuals suspected of having links to Al-Qaeda and the Somali Islamist group Al- Shabaab were charged under the antiterrorism law. Conditions in Ethiopia's prisons are harsh, and detainees frequently report abuse. A HRW report released in October 2013 documented human rights violationsin Addis Ababa's Maekelawi police station, including verbal and physical abuse, denial of basic needs, and torture. Domestic NGOs estimated that there were up to 400 political prisoners bythe end of 2012, though estimates vary significantly. In August 2013, Tesfahun Chemeda, an engineer who had been sentenced to life in prisonin 2010 for holding political views that dissented from the EPRDF, died in Kaliti prison. He had reportedly been tortured repeatedly, and human rights groups have called for an investigation into his death.Repression of the Oromo and ethnic Somalis, and government attempts toco-opt their parties into subsidiaries of the EPRDF, have fueled nationalism in both the Oromia and Ogaden regions. Persistent claims that war crimeshave been committed by government troops in the Ogaden area are difficult to verify, as independent media are barred from the region.

G. Personal Autonomy and Individual Rights: 5 / 16

Private business opportunities are limited by rigid state control of economic life and the prevalence of state-owned enterprises. All land mustbe leased from the state. The government has evicted indigenous groups from various areas to make way for projects such as hydroelectric dams.

It has also leased large tracts of land to foreign governments and investors for agricultural development in opaque deals. Up to 70,000 people have been forced to move from the western Gambella region, although the government denies the resettlement plans are connected toland investments. Journalists and international organizations have persistently alleged that the government has withheld development assistance from villages perceived as being unfriendly to the ruling party.

Women are relatively well represented in Parliament, holding 28 percent of seats and three ministerial posts. Legislation protects women's rights, but they are routinely violated in practice. Enforcement of the law againstrape and domestic abuse is patchy, with cases routinely stalling in the courts. In December 2012, the government made progress against forcedchild labor, passing a National Action Plan to Eliminate the Worst Forms ofChild Labor and updating its list of problematic occupations for children. Same-sex sexual activity is prohibited by law and punishable withimprisonment.

Ethiopia's economy:Neither a sprint nor a marathon

Africa's most impressive economic managers suffer from excessive cautionThe Economist May 30, 2015

ADDIS ABABA

NOWHERE in Africa is modern China more of a lodestar than in Ethiopia, which on May 24th held an uneventful election with a predetermined outcome: another term in office for the long-standing ruling party. The continent's second most populous country and fastest-growing big economy has close intellectual links with China's Communists and often sends officials to their party school in Beijing. There Ethiopians imbibe the gospel of industrialisation overseen by a strong state that exerts tightcontrol over an ethnically diverse population with a history of strife.

But all is not well in the relationship. When a new Chinese ambassador arrived in Addis Ababa in February, he presented an unexpectedly awkward message to his hosts. La Yifan told the ruling elite—behind firmlyclosed doors—that it must discard the isolationism of the past and open up an economy in which the flow of money and information is still restricted. Banking and telecoms are almost antediluvian (see chart).

Investors are frustrated. Trade lags expectations. After years of praising the government, the Chinese are now singing from the same hymn sheetas Ethiopia's Western critics.

The problem is a lack of courage. Many in the Ethiopian government, ruling party and security apparatus acknowledge that only further reformscan sustain the goals of economic growth and political stability. But they are slow to enact them.

The government's main priority is industrialisation. But endless red tape and restrictions on finance deter investors. Officials point to Huajian, a Chinese shoemaker that has gone from employing 600 locals to 3,500 in afew years. But Ethiopia needs a hundred Huajians. Without faster growth of industry, the country will struggle to absorb labour it hopes to free up from modernising subsistence farms that provide a living to 80% of its people.

The government is trying to help industry by building roads, railways, power stations and dams—following the Chinese playbook. These effortshave kept the official GDP growth rate above 10%, although outside experts reckon a more realistic tally is 7-8%. Inflation has dropped to single digits. But no progress has been made towards joining the World Trade Organisation in the past three years. And the prospects for attracting desperately needed foreign equity capital remain dim.

The fear of being overthrown looms behind the elite's reluctance to reform. In some ways it is a victim of its own success. Discipline and administrative sophistication have given the elite access to coercive tools that many counterparts on the continent can only dream of. But now it finds it hard to imagine life without them.

The situation has become worse not better since the death in 2012 of Meles Zenawi, the prime minister and architect of the country's resurrection after a bloody civil war between 1974 and 1991. By force of personality, intellect and ties forged in battle he could on occasion shift the system forward. Admittedly, he hated the private sector and civil society. But at least he removed logjams. After his death the governmentpulled off a peaceful transition of power. The deputy prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, took over as planned.

The new leadership is much more collective. The prime minister is no Meles, whose legacy as it turns out included masking how divided the regime has always been. Before ministers make decisions now they often need to seek the consent of the old guard. And ethnic Tigrayans, of whomMeles was one, still control the army, security services, telecoms and foreign affairs. It will take at least another decade for them to retire or die.

The new prime minister is a reasonable and, to some extent, reform- minded man. But he is a relatively weak figure. He is probably going to beconfirmed as party leader at a congress of the ruling EPRDF in September,but his tenure is not assured. Few have forgotten why Meles chose him: as a political leader from the ethnically fragmented south of the country he is no threat to the more dominant groups.

One senior member of the Chinese community in Ethiopia describes, with some frustration, what he sees as the country's big problem: that in Chinathe central government dominates the regions but in Ethiopia everything is federal. Business parks are built by regional rota, for example, not in the best locations. Furthermore, Mao's maxim that "the party controls thegun" is neglected; the securocrats are a law unto themselves.

And lastly, although the senior leadership in Ethiopia is very capable, thecountry lacks China's talented mid-level administrators. Overall, many Chinese see a country that is dotted with too many powerful barons.

What the Chinese won't say but many Western observers do is that political repression also weakens the system. Young people are angry andjobless. Outlets for their frustration are quickly shut off. Sensible opposition leaders are pushed into exile or prison, ceding the field to hotheads. Universities have grown more than tenfold but there are insufficient jobs for all these bright new graduates.

Ethiopia is stuck thanks to its paranoid elite. The country will be able tolimp on for a while, given its impressive growth rates. It may even get further boosts from new infrastructure like hydropower. But Ethiopia is missing out on becoming something far more impressive. (Text ends)

Ethiopian troops killed a Kenyan security guard and stormed ahospital in northern Kenya

By Liban Golicha and Ali Abdi (Standard Digital May 31, 2015)

A Kenyan security guard was killed and Moyale District Hospital stormed when Ethiopian government forces and members of the Oromo LiberationFront (OLF) exchanged fire at the border point near the Meteorological Department in Moyale, Kenya, at 1 AM yesterday.

The Kenyan government said the OLF militia was not in Kenya. Marsabit County Commissioner Peter Thuku later said, "The Ethiopian fighters werein Illeret and at Sololo and Moyale on several occasions. I have relayed the message to the headquarters. This problem will be dealt with from Nairobi, but there is a real concern about forces crossing into our country."

Moyale OCPD Thomas Atuti identified the deceased as Boru Huka, a 55-year-old security guard at Full Gospel Primary School.

According to Abduba Wapo, Huka's colleague, shortly after the gun fightthat lasted hours, armed men in uniform rushed into the school. "I hid behind the gate. They broke the fence and grabbed Huka then shot himseveral times in front of the school gate," Abduba told The Standard on Sunday at the scene before recording a statement at Moyale Police Station. He said some attackers spoke Oromo.

At about 3 a.m., the same uniformed men stormed Moyale District Hospital and harassed patients and staff. The heavily armed men are saidto have gone through the wards brandishing firearms. They could have been looking for injured Ethiopian rivals.

"I saw about seven men armed with rifles enter the maternity ward and harass patients," Nuria Kasa, a nursing officer, said. "When I asked the watchman what was happening, he said the group had broken the gate and marched into the hospital." The group left bullet holes in the nurses'quarters.

Moyale DCIO Ayub Bakari said he had collected several cartridges fromthe scene and within the hospital compound. Source: http://www.standardmedia.co.ke/article/ ... order-post

Ethiopia, Horn of Africa, and the International Migration: Push or Pull?By Magill Dyess Martini (June 1, 2015)

In a theory of migration, the forces that cause people to move around theglobe can be seen as either push or pull forces. At present the world is very concerned with defining the forces that drive human movement in Ethiopia and the Horn of Africa. What extreme circumstances would makeEthiopian young people undertake the dangerous and difficult journey from Ethiopia to distant countries as undocumented immigrants?

Compelling forces that pull people to move from one place to another include simply when people seek change in their lives, or when they wouldlike to experience a new culture. It can also include pursuing better opportunities like work or service in other parts of the world. The forces that push people to move from one place to another are fundamentally different. They occur due to the forceful pressure of human will. This pressure might come in the form of psychological, emotional or physicalimposition. War, political oppression, severe poverty, social and culturalmarginalization or religious persecution are examples of push factors tomigrate.

Migration of people across countries or continents is not a new phenomenon in human history. People have abandoned their native placesin search of a better life across time. In fact, people migrate for economic,political, education, or for any other various reasons. Let us now weigh upthe pros and cons of migration. Developing countries are enjoying foreign currency remittance released by migrants abroad. It has also provided access to a cheap labour for hosting countries. So the benefit is obviously mutual. In fact, Illegal migration has caused horrible deaths in the Mediterranean ocean. The people of the horn of Africa are victims of illegalmigration. For example, hundreds of sub-Saharan African migrants die every year when the boats sink in Libyan coast in a vain attempt to reach Europe. Drowning is not the only fate of desperate young Ethiopians. The world knows the mass execution and beheading of Ethiopians by barbaric ISIS terrorists in Libyan gulf shores. Young Ethiopian boys and girls also migrate to Arab countries to make money and improve their lives.

However, after years of hard work, they return home with a psychological crisis hard to get over. Many young women are mentally unwell as a resultof the bad experience there.

We have seen an increase in migration through the years as parts of the globe experience rapid growth and modernization. The contributing factorsto this migration will necessarily vary from case to case and country by country. An estimated 2,323 million people around the world currently liveaway from their homes. More than 25 million Indians and around 7 millionSouth Koreans live away from their homelands. It is believed that 3 to 6 million United States citizens live outside of their country at any given time. Interestingly, the US has also become the chosen destination of millions of immigrants from all parts of the world. More than 3 per cent of the global population lives outside of their native country at present. Migration in the Ethiopian and Horn of Africa context are characterized byeconomic and political pushers. Let's look more closely at some of these factors to more clearly understand the current migration crisis in Ethiopiaand the Horn of Africa at large.

Note Readers: The term this publication use regarding the words "migrants" or "asylum seekers" to describe those smuggled clandestinely by boat from Libya to Malta. We wish to emphasise that however People are labelled, migrants, asylum seekers, refugees... they should never be returned to a country where they face a real risk of inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment, and where their fundamental rightswould be ignored. Most migrants are in fact asylum seekers; at the first opportunity, they file a claim for international protection. In 2012, 1890 migrants arrived by boat to Malta. Only 52 did not apply for asylum. In that year, 78% of all asylum seekers were granted some form of protection and another 9% provisional status. Somalis accounted for 86%of those granted international protection, followed by Eritreans. Debebe Eshetu talks about his new role as an immigrant in Israel'

(June 4, 2015) Debebe Eshetu is one of Ethiopia's shining lights on stage,TV and in movies. The celebrated actor made his stage debut in Ya LachaGabicha (Marriage of Unequals) in 1963, but it was his iconic role as Wassa in The Shaft in Africa (1973) that won him an international fame. He would go on to appear in some widely recognized films including The Great Rebellion, The Sailor from Gibraltar, The Grave Digger, Zelda, Gouma, A Season in Hell.

Now, nearly 71 and still involved in theatre, Debebe has earned raves for his brilliant portrayal of an Ethiopian immigrant in Israel in Red Leaves, a performance which was described by a critic as a "tour de force." Red Leaves is a film is about a Bete Israeli, sets out on a journey through his children's homes after losing his wife. With his role as hard and obstinate man Masganeo, the kippa wearing Debebe (He is not Jewish) got to extend his acting chops further than he ever has before. Having held on stubbornly to his culture, in the 28 years since leaving home, Meseganio'sjourney to reconnect with his family becomes a fierce quest to pass on fading cultural values to his sons, and an immigrant community, that havelost their way. (The Bete Israels are an Ethiopian ethnic group who defined themselves as Jew while they were living in Ethiopia. Virtually all of the Falashas, more than 120,000 souls had immigrated to Israel.)

I recently had the honour of sitting down with the great Debebe, to talk about his work on Red Leaves in his home in Addis Ababa around Enkulal Fabrica area, seated in a living room adorned with paintings, sculptures and medals. He wore a shirt with motives and suspenders. The movie is billed as “kind of based on a true story.” “It took the director around six months looking for actors for the leading part. He saw my photo and he thought of me to play the part. He didn’t know my name properly and he didn’t know how to reach me. Later someone helped him to contact my daughter, Tseday Debebe who lives in Los Angeles on her Facebook page.She called me to tell me about it and I told her to give him my email. Thatis how the director got in touch with me. I asked for the manuscript and he emailed it to me. I loved it when I saw it. It is written is English, Hebrew and Amharic. I went to Israel to start filming. I saw the location. We discussed about the film for about fifteen days. I made some suggestions and tips on the script and the director happily accepted it. The director even suggested that I participate in selecting actors but I refused telling him that that is the casting director’s task. I would have no problem working his casts. ”

The filming took four months. In preparation for the role, Debebe frequented bars and clubs of the Bete Israel community, who are the focus of the film. He played cards with them to study their accent and dialect. Some were surprised to see him there and asked him if he was converted to Judaism. When I asked Debebe if there were grumbles aboutan Ethiopian actor being cast in a quintessentially Israeli role, he said no. “We shot the film in different cities of Israel. Working with Bazi was a lot of fun. He is one hardworking director. Very intelligent. We really enjoyedeach other. I got along very well with his parents and every Friday night Ishared the popular Shabbat meal with them,” Debebe said. “The film is about intergenerational gaps and conflicts, concerning tradition, family values, gender roles, and relationships. Any descendant of immigrants could easily relate. The principal character comes to realize that he belongs to a rapidly disappearing class that believes in retaining Ethiopianculture. The harsh reality hits him in the face. Having come to know someof life’s new realities, he tries to survive according to his own ways.”

Debebe says many of the Bete Israeli found the film accurate and the women said they saw their own husbands and the men their own wives. Many white Jews also came to watch the film. “I got to see twice to see audience reaction and it’s really good. It’s just really kind of neat.” Being cast in this film introduced Debebe to wider audiences, as his leading role in such international film has been his debut. Debebe, who has four children and seven grandchildren, said his social network mostly revolves around old friends and members of his family. Living with his wife of 40 years, Debebe is taking his latest recognition in stride, just as he has the various highlights of his career, some tumultuous time. Debebe is well known in Ethiopia for his stage work having trained at the Budapest School, Hungary. He acted in dozen plays in the National Theatre, Hager Fikir Theater, Ras Theatre. He also contributed a lot as teacher and manager and he was head of the theatre training department at the National Theatre. Among his students, Alem Tsehay Wodago, Tekle Desta,Alemu Gebreab, Sirak Tadesse became notable actors and directors in their own rights. After a long and pioneering career in theatre, he was detained by the Ethiopian government on 2011 on charges of ties to terrorism. “Two days after I was released two young Ethiopian actors, Solomon Bogale and Binyam Worku came home to ask me to play in theirfilm, Seba Selasa. It was a modest film for local production but a good one. It occupied me and I’d like to thank them for taking me out of the downheartedness and anger I was in,” he says. Red Leaves again sealed Debebe’s status as an international film celebrity. “Not bad coming aftersome difficult and desperate time in my life,” he says. (Text ends)

ARCHAEOLOGY: Dazzling jewels from an Ethiopian grave reveal 2,000-year-old link to Rome By Dalya Alberge, Guardian (June 7, 2015)

Spectacular 2,000-year-old treasures from the Roman empire and the Aksumite kingdom, which ruled parts of north-east Africa for several centuries before 940AD, have been discovered by British archaeologists innorthern Ethiopia.

Louise Schofield, a former British Museum curator, headed a major six- week excavation of the ancient city of Aksum where her team of 11 uncovered graves with “extraordinary” artefacts dating from the first and second centuries. They offer evidence that the Romans were trading therehundreds of years earlier than previously thought. Schofield told the Observer: “Every day we had shed-loads of treasure coming out of all the graves. I was blown away: I’d been confident we’d find something, but not on this scale.” She was particularly excited about the grave of a woman she has named “Sleeping Beauty”. The way the body and its gravegoods had been positioned suggest that she had been beautiful and much-loved. Schofield said: “She was curled up on her side, with her chin resting on her hand, wearing a beautiful bronze ring. She was buried gazing into an extraordinary Roman bronze mirror. She had next to her a beautiful and incredibly ornate bronze cosmetics spoon with a lump of kohl eyeliner.” The woman was also wearing a necklace of thousands of tiny beads, and abeaded belt. The quality of the jewellery suggests that she was a person of very high status, able to command the very best luxurious goods. Other artefacts with her include Roman glass vessels – two perfectly preserved drinking beakers and a flask to catch the tears of the dead. There was alsoa clay jug. Schofield hopes that its contents can be analysed. She believesit would have contained food and drink for the afterlife.

Although “Sleeping Beauty” was covered only with soil, her grave was cutinto a rock overhang, which is why the finds survived intact. The team also found buried warriors, with each skeleton wearing large iron bangles.They may have been killed in nearby battlefields. Other finds include another female skeleton with a valuable necklace of 1,065 coloured glass beads, and, elsewhere, a striking glass perfume flask.

In 2012, the Observer reported that Schofield’s earlier excavations in theregion had discovered an ancient goldmine that may solve the mystery offrom where the Queen of Sheba of biblical legend derived her fabled treasures. Aksum, the capital of the Aksumite kingdom, was a major trading power from the first to the seventh centuries, linking the Roman Empire and India. Aksumites were a literate people. Yet little is known about this so-called “lost”’ civilisation.

“Ethiopia is a mysterious place steeped in legend, but nobody knows very much about it,” said Schofield. “We know from the later Aksumite period –the fourth and fifth centuries, when they adopted Christianity – that they were trading very intensely with Rome. But our finds are from much earlier. So it shows that extraordinarily precious things were travelling from the Roman Empire through this region centuries before.”

In return, the Romans sought ivory tusks, frankincense and metals. Schofield’s excavations also found evidence of iron working. The finds will go to a new German-funded museum, opening in October. Schofield hopesto organise a loan to the British Museum, but first the finds must be conserved: the mirror, for example, is corroded and slightly buckled.

Germany is sending nine conservators. Excavations were paid for by theSainsbury family’s Headley Trust and the Tigray Trust, a charity that promotes sustainability in the region; and by individual donations. (Textends)

ETHIOPIA: crackdown on dissent drives opposition to push for 'freedomfirst'

Government’s critics weigh options after ruling party landslide leads to loss of faith in ballot box while case of Zone 9 bloggers discourages freeSpeech.

(Governance June 11, 2015) On the very day Ethiopia’s ruling party celebrated another crushing electoral victory, a young blogger on trial under anti-terrorism laws in an Addis Ababa courtroom lashed out at the authorities. “You yourself should respect the law,” said Abel Wabella, 28,from the Zone 9 blogging group, after judges denied him the chance to protest against the tortuous pace of legal proceedings that began more than a year ago.

The case of nine journalists and bloggers arrested in 2014 has been decried by human rights groups as an example of Ethiopian authorities’ crackdown on dissent. The nine were detained on allegations that they worked for foreign human rights groups or had used social media to inciteviolence.

Prosecutors have yet to present any evidence of illegal activity against theZone 9 defendants, who say they merely exercised their constitutional right to freedom of expression. Wabella’s frustration is symptomatic of a generation of politically engaged Ethiopians who have no faith in the ballotbox and are wary of expressing dissent through other channels in a country that is regularly criticised by rights groups for stifling basic freedoms.

Opponents of the government despair at this stagnant environment, saidone government critic on social media, who did not want to be identified for fear of being harassed by the authorities. “If Zone 9 is not toleratedthen it seems there is no political space to engage,” he said.

The latest landslide at the ballot box means that Ethiopia will be ruled until at least 2020 by the Ethiopian Peoples’ Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), a former rebel group, which took power in 1991 by unseating a military regime. All 442 constituencies announced so far havegone to the ruling coalition, giving them a majority in the 547-seat Parliament.

The opposition lost in all 23 constituencies in Addis Ababa last month,including the one seat they had won in 2010. Local newspaper reportssuggest the EPRDF increased its share of the popular vote by 10% to 64%.

Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn's government says it has delivered economic development and stability, but critics maintain this has come atthe cost of human rights.

Yilkal Getnet, leader of opposition rising star the Blue party, says the claims of economic development are "not real". The Blue party captured16% of the vote in Addis Ababa this time, but failed to secure a seat under the first-past-the-post electoral system.

Getnet says the opposition's plan is to push for "freedom first" rather thanchallenging the government's policies. Abel Asrat, an online entrepreneur who is politically independent, said the Blue party shrewdly capitalised on popular anger over the execution by Isis militants of Ethiopian migrants inLibya in April. But the party, which was formed in 2012, now needs a more substantial and moderate programme, he said. "The vast majority of the voters are inthe middle. You have to focus on them rather than those that have made up their mind." With more than 2 million Facebook users in Ethiopia, the opposition should also use social media more to reach out to young undecided voters, Asrat said.

Blue party spokesman Yonatan Tesfaye said he was encouraged by the "huge" support the party received in the May vote. Now it wants "dialoguewith the government on reforming election and press laws in order to create a fairer environment". If that doesn't work, "it will be up to people to come out and confront repression," he said.

There are tentative signs that some ruling officials recognise a need for change: privately, individuals fret at the lopsided results produced by theparty's ruthless efficiency and the first-past-the-post system. Getachew Reda, a special adviser to Desalegn, said the overwhelming victory is natural given the EPRDF's achievements and protest votes against opponents who were "there for the noise and blood of it", rather than asserious contenders.

The most significant challenge to the EPRDF's domination came in a 2005vote, when an opposition coalition made significant gains in urban areas.The results were disputed, and thousands of people took to the streets toprotest. Security forces killed 193 people and opposition leaders were imprisoned. Seven policemen were also killed.

The government said the opposition was trying to use violence to force anunconstitutional change. It enacted laws to restrict dissent and began to solicit investment for projects such as roads, universities, low-cost apartments, hydropower dams and sugar factories.

Since then, electoral politics has presented a dilemma for the opposition,which participates in a process it calls undemocratic. Some observers saythe opposition must work within this narrow political space to build from the grassroots, aiming to make gains first in local elections in 2017. In addition to the federal parliament, the EPRDF holds almost all other elected positions in the country.

Beyene Petros from the Medrek coalition, the main opposition party, disagrees, arguing that peaceful resistance is necessary to “push this group to the negotiating table on levelling the electoral landscape”. Theidea of urban disobedience forcing change is anathema to the EPRDF, which styles itself as the party of the rural masses.

Addis Ababa University lecturer Nahusenay Belay, who supports the EPRDF, points to what he identifies as the failures of the Arab spring, where elites “mobilised primarily against the incumbent regime rather than for a common set of values or policies”, to warn against any similarattempts in Ethiopia.

“The suggestion for every political actor is therefore to stick to the hardbut the possible and relevant political path available, ie the formal democratic way,” he wrote in an essay in May. Some opponents agree that new leaders won’t change systemic problems. What is needed is a shift to more consensual politics that accommodates Ethiopia’s diverse viewpoints, said the critic on social media, who did not give his name.

Asrat, the entrepreneur, is pessimistic about the chances of change or of increased political engagement, given the EPRDF’s entrenched dominance.Could social media activists like him ramp up the pressure? “I think my own fate would be like [that of] Zone 9, and that scares me a lot,” he said. Ethiopia, Egypt, Sudan, the origins of the African Nations Cup’

The origins of the African Nations Cup date back to June 1956 when the creation of the Confederation of African Football was proposed during the third FIFA congress in Lisbon. There were immediate plans for a continental nation's tournament to be held, and in February 1957, the firstAfrican Cup of Nations took place in Khartoum, Sudan. There was no qualification for this tournament, the field being made up of the four founding nations of CAF (Sudan, Egypt, Ethiopia, and South Africa). SouthAfrica's insistence on selecting only Caucasian players for their squad due to that nation's apartheid policy led to its disqualification, and as a consequence Ethiopia were handed a bye straight to the final. The Ethiopian delegation headed by the late Yidnekachew Tessema who servedas CAF President before Issa Hayatu, played crucial role to suspend South Africa from the tournament for its Apartheid Policy.

Hence, only two matches were played, with Egypt being crowned as the first continental champion after defeating hosts Sudan in the semi-final and Ethiopia in the final. Two years later, Egypt hosted the second cup inCairo with the participation of these same three teams. Host and defending champions Egypt repeated as cup winners, this time defeatingSudan in the final.

The field grew to include nine teams for the third African Nations Cup in 1962 in Addis Ababa, and for the first time there was a qualification roundto determine which four teams would play for the title. Host Ethiopia and reigning champion Egypt received automatic berths, and were joined in the final four by Uganda and Tunisia. Egypt made its third consecutive final appearance, but it was Ethiopia that emerged as victors, after first beating Tunisia and then downing Egypt in extra time.

CAN: Facts & Stats:

Egypt, Sudan and Ethiopia played the first two tournaments in odd years before it increased to four, six, eight, 12 and then 16 teams. The number of participants in the final tournament reached 16 in 1998 (16 teams wereto compete in 1996 but Nigeria withdrew, reducing the field to 15), and since then, the format has been unchanged, with the sixteen teams being drawn into four groups of four teams each, with the top two teams of eachgroup advancing to a "knock-out" stage.

From the 3rd African Cup in 1962 to the 28th African Cup in 2012 the tournament had taken place in even-numbered years. As of 2013, the tournament was once again switched to being held in odd-numbered yearsso as not to clash with the FIFA World Cup.

Since the early days, North Africa - and Ghana in particular - has maintained its reputation, while the other pioneers Ethiopia and Sudanhave deteriorated.

And while there have been many highlights, few African Nations Cuptournaments have taken place without any problems.

One thing is certain, though - that CAF and the Nations Cup still in existence is due to the passion for the game on the African continent.

Egypt is the most successful nation in the cup's history, winning the tournament a record seven times (1957, 1959, 1986, 1998, 2006, 2008, 2010). Besides this they finished once as runners up in 1962 and won thethird place three times (1963, 1970, 1974).

ETHIOPIAN POLITICS-The Ruling EPRDF Claims Absurd Election VictoriesOnce Again -EAC Press Release (San Jose CA June 12, 2015)

The ruling Tigray People Liberation Front (TPLF)/ Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) has once again pulled off one ofthe more spectacular scams on the global political scene – the Ethiopian national elections. In elections held on May 24, it has claimed landslides,near-100-percent victories, throughout the country, allowing it to seat party members in every single parliamentary seat. In the 2000 electionsEPRDF allowed the opposition to occupy at least one seat in the parliament.

No Western Observers

Western nations were not invited to attend or, more probably, did not wish to be associated with what has become a delirious attempt by the TPLF/EPRDF to convince the world and the Ethiopian people that the government is loved by one and all. The African Union Election Observation Mission, the only international organization present to observe the elections, did point out some areas needing improvement, butthe mission receives support money from the TPLF/EPRDF government.

They observed erratic opening times and failure to display some ballot boxes. The elections were peaceful and organized, but there were reportsof harassment, intimidation, and fraud.

Election Results Humanly Impossible

Democratic nations that truly ensure free speech and open elections for their citizens never deign to report landslide victories approaching 100 percent during national voting. Results like that are humanly impossible ina truly democratic society. Does the TPLF/EPRDF want the world to believethat they have perfected human governance almost to the ultimate degree, that they have won the hearts and minds of all the Ethiopian people? A column in International Business Times quoted a 28-year-old student at Addis Ababa University as saying, “This election is just so we can tell Western governments we are a democratic country.”

Opposition Voices

Preliminary results (final results will be released later in June) had TPLF/EPRDF Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn declaring party victoryfor all of the 442 parliamentary seats up for grabs. The AFP, reporting from Addis Ababa, quoted a spokesman from the Blue Party, the nation’sforemost opposition party. Yonatan Tesfaye told reporters, “"We don't think there is an independent justice system to deal with our complaints.We'll continue our peaceful struggle. The Blue Party does not accept the process as free and fair and does not accept the outcome of unhealthy and undemocratic elections. This 100-percent win by the regime is a message of disgrace" and indicates that a "multi-party system is over in Ethiopia."

Enigmatic Election

The landslide election results favoring the ruling TPLF/EPRDF and its alliesmay not be a true indicator of the voices of the Ethiopian people, but theyare indicative of something. Landslides of this magnitude can only be engineered by intimidating voters and stifling opposition voices. The elections were not free and fair and votes were stolen or discarded. It could even be a message to the people telling them that if they don’t like the government, there is nothing they can do about it. Columnist Messay Kebede calls Ethiopian national elections “periodical rituals displaying the submission of the people.”

Population Control

In rural areas where the majority of the population resides, dissent is dealt with using a 5:1 system of grassroots surveillance whereby one individual is responsible for monitoring the activities of five households. This allows officials to clamp down on dissent before it spreads. Also, government cadre are in rural areas implementing modern farming techniques so most villagers only see government officials at work in thecommunity. Cadre also teach “voting classes” for the people.

“Oppositions are not getting a fair proportion of time and location, financing, things like that. Not only that, there are tremendous repressions,” said Yonatan Tesfaye, a Blue Party spokesman, indicating that about 50 party members had been arrested in Addis Ababa alone. Telephone surveillance is commonplace, and the ongoing trial of a groupof bloggers called Zone 9 has resulted in online users facing self- censorship or arrest.

Merara Gudina, deputy chairperson of the opposition Medrek coalition toldReuters that security personnel had launched a "witch-hunt" on the eve ofthe vote by arresting his group's observers. He also said ballot boxes had been stolen in his constituency. Protesters and organizers have frequentlybeen arrested and harassed, their equipment has been confiscated, and permits unfairly denied. One Blue Party leader is on trial on trumped-up terrorism charges.

American Hypocrisy

The United States government, in a tepid letter from the State Department, congratulated the Ethiopians on a peaceful election. The American government has many agreements with the present Ethiopian government. However, the lavish praise for the late Prime Minister Meles Zenawi by a State Department spokesperson at his funeral services was embarrassing. Columnist Messay Kebede, mentioned earlier, called to taskWendy Sherman, State Department Under Secretary for Political Affairs (since resigned), for her endorsement of the Ethiopian election results.

It’s odd to consider that the American government, renowned for its war on terror, could look the other way while a partner nation proceeds to terrorize its own citizens. It’s odd to consider that the American president,himself an African-American, could be so innocuous about the human rights violations of the people of Africa’s second most populous nation. It’sno secret that U.S. military allies in Africa have often used security forces,pumped with American hardware and other support, against their own critics at home.

Deplorable Future

Unless true political expression is allowed, the Ethiopian people face two sad prospects. These trumped-up elections will continue to raise the hopefor change and then pull them down with unbelievable election results, and the people’s resignation will deepen. The other alternative is open rebellion and armed conflict.

The TPLF/EPRDF credits it electoral success with the economic progress and Ethiopia's economy has been one of the fastest growing in Africa and beyond. But the people experience no benefit. The TPLF/EPRDF will not beable to manage a surging economy resting on a populace that is a hotbedof discontent. The TPLF/EPRDF has been inflating election returns since 1995, when it did at least allow a good number of opposition members to be seated. Results have only worsened, culminating in this election with the TPLF/EPRDF sweeping the entire parliament. Fake elections only turn up the heat.

The Ethiopian government has the obligation and responsibility to defend the people of Tigrai from ShabiyaBy Girmay Abraha (Tigrai Online, August12, 2015)

Ethiopia is heavily involved in the day to day military activities in Somalia.The Ethiopian army is fighting and winning against the Al-Shabab group inside Somalia. Ethiopia has been in and out of Somalia for more than 20 years now. The terrorist threat against Ethiopia based in Somalia basicallythe same. It is contained for the time being, but not eliminated. The reason, the terrorist threat against Ethiopia is not originating in Somalia, itis originating from Eritrea. The Eritrean government is openly trying to demolish the Ethiopian nation as we know it using different tactics. The tactics vary from openly invading the country and devastating the bordercommunities to arming, training, financing, and transporting armed groups to the heartland. One of those methods is to use the lawlessness and anti Ethiopia sentiment in Somalia.

Why is the Ethiopian government trying to deal with the symptoms of theEthiopian insecurity instead of directly dealing with actual problem?

The border states of Tigrai and Afar are in a constant threat of war from Eritrea if not real perceived and that is extremely damaging to the economies of those regions. Local and foreign investors will not be willingto pour millions of dollars in to an area where the safety and security of their investment is not guaranteed.

It seems the EPRDF government is waiting for another wakeup call like theone we got in 1998 where hundreds of thousands of Tigrai people were uprooted from their homes. Many people including school children were killed and millions of dollars worth of property destroyed. The United Nations Security Council without any doubt has confirmed Eritrean government is actively trying to destabilize Ethiopia by arming terrorist groups.

There are more than 20 UN reposts concerning Eritrea's involvement in Ethiopia and Somalia and each of them are carefully researched by the Monitoring Group on Somalia and Eritrea. The Security Council has manyresolutions condemning Eritrea's terrorist actions in the region giving Ethiopia and the rest of the Horn of African countries the legal tools theyneed to action to defend their sovereignty from the aggression of the Eritrean regime.

The following is an opening paragraph by the chairman of the MonitoringGroup on Somalia and Eritrea. "In accordance with paragraph 28 of Security Council resolution 2111 (2013), we have the honor to transmit herewith the report on Eritrea of the Monitoring Group on Somalia and Eritrea." In the 2014 report the Monitoring Group found ample and concrete evidence that Eritrea is working hard to ignite a bloody civil waramong the Ethiopian people.

Part of the report says: "However, the Monitoring Group has obtainedtestimonials and evidence that Eritrea continues to support armed opposition groups from neighboring countries, notably the following in Somalia and Ethiopia:

The Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF)

The Tigray People's Democratic Movement (TPDM)Ginbot Sebat The Monitoring Group has noted differences in scale and pattern of support that Eritrea is providing to the three armed groups named above.The difference will be detailed in the sections below." The Monitoring Group's report is so detailed and very specific, it even names the individual Eritrean government and military people who are directly and indirectly involved with the training and arming of Ethiopian terrorists.

"The Monitoring Group understands that Colonel Fitsum Yishak, also known byhis nickname "Lenin," directs Ethiopian armed groups. The Grouphas twice in the past identified Colonel Fitsum for his role in overseeing the training and arming of regional armed groups (S/2011/433and S/2012/545). Colonel Tewelde Habte Negash, who is also known by the aliases “Amanuel Kidane”, “Wedi Kidane”, Colonel “Musa” and Colonel “Hagos,” oversees Somalia-based groups. Both Colonels Fitsum and Negash report directly to Colonel Tesfaldet Habteselasie, who is understood to be in charge of security and the financing of armed groups in the President’s Office.” You can check all the UN reports here http://www.un.org/sc/committees/751/mongroup.shtml

The Eritrean regime’s destructive effort could not be more clearer than theabove paragraph by the Monitoring Group for the Security Council. We arehundred percent sure the Ethiopian intelligence agencies have more detailed and extensive evidence than the UN one. The question is why theEthiopian government is hesitating to take action against the brutal one man regime in Eritrea to defend the people. It is time for the EPRDF government to use its mandate and protect all the Ethiopian people including the people of Tigrai. The Ethiopian government has the obligation and responsibility to defend the Tigrai people or they will be forced to fend for themselves and that would be a dangerous situation for the EPRDF. EPRDF should not take the Tigrai people and their support for granted. (Text ends)

The renowned singer Mahmoud Ahmed to receive Honorary Degree fromAAU

The Addis Ababa University is to award an honorary degree to Ethiopia’s famous and revered singer, Mahmoud Ahmed. The university, which has awarded honorary degrees to Turkey’s president Tayyib Erdogan, chairman of Microsoft Corporation and humanitarian Bill Gates, the Ethiopian author, Kebede Michael, musician Tilahun Gessesse and a number of local and international personalities, will present Mamoud withthe title Doctor of Music at a ceremony in Addis Ababa University on July11.

Mamoud, who left school unqualified in his teenager years, will make aspeech at the ceremony. Ethiopia’s most famous living musician and an international star, Mahmoud has been promoting Ethiopian culture at home and in the Westfor decades. His songs are largely consecrated to love, earning him great fame. With dazzling combinations of unforgettable Amharic lyrics, tone and melody, Mahmoud Ahmed’s soulful body of work –ranging from recordings like Almaz (1973); Alemye (1974); Ere Mela Mela (1975); Tezeta (1975)– is not only part of his personal legacy but also part of a wider heritage collection; a valuable part of Ethiopia’s musical history andcultural heritage.

Mahmoud began work as a shoe shine boy. A series of jobs followed until he ended up handy-man at the Arizona Club. This is where he got a breakin the 1960s, stepping in to sing due to a “no show” by the lead singer of the Imperial Body Guard Band. His star ascended and this opportunity ledto a long term engagement until today, and his first 45 rpm recording in 1971. Between his record store and constant demand for his performances, he played at the beginning mainly in his home country andin recent years abroad as his fame grew. In 2007, he was awarded the BBC World music Award.

ARCHAEOLOGY:

'Sleeping beauty': 2,000-year-old remains found in biblical cityBy Daisy Carrington, CNN updates June 15, 2015

(CNN)- It was the Queen of Sheba that first drew Louise Schofield -- an archaeologist and former curator at the British Museum -- to the Gheraltaplateau in northern Ethiopia. She'd heard tell of a 20-foot stone stele carved with an inscription and a symbol often linked to the biblical queen:a sun and crescent moon.

"The story of the Queen of Sheba has a central place in the heart of all Ethiopians, so I became interested in the story myself," she recalls (Shebais thought to be located in parts of Ethiopia).

It was this initial visit that ultimately led her to discover the 2,000-year-old remains of a character she fondly refers to as "sleeping beauty."

The grave was discovered at the stone stele, in an area that was once partof the ancient kingdom of Aksum, which today encompasses Ethiopia and Eritrea. Inside, Schofield's team found the skeleton of a woman posed in aresting position, with her chin laid gently on one hand. A Roman-era bronze mirror was placed before her face. The corpse was surrounded withglass vessels (to catch the tears of the dead), as well as a bronze cosmetics spoon and a lump of kohl eyeliner.

"She must have been very wealthy, and probably well-loved to be placedin this position, and judging by all the items of finery around her," surmised Schofield.

The dig also uncovered several other graves, all of which had several bodies buried beneath. In some, she found the remains of large warriorsclad who each wore an iron bangle. "We think they were warriors from abattle," she says.

The unusual find suggests trade between Rome and Aksum started at least 200 years earlier than previously believed. As the dig is less than a month old, there's still a lot of information yet to come in about this restful lady. A bone expert wasn't able to ascertain her age at the time of death because the pelvis -- which usually provides a close approximation -

- had been consumed by termites. Schofield hopes that analysis of theteeth will provide some answers.

"There was something very personal about the way she was lying," Schofield says. The remains were also found surrounded by clay containers that likely contained food or drink (these have also been sent off for analysis). "The food, drink and cosmetics were all presumably left for her to use in the afterlife. She was pre-Christian and that's how peopleburied their dead then," says Schofield.

Shofield has a bit of the Midas touch when it comes to extraordinary finds.She also recently uncovered a Roman-era perfume flask in the same cemetery, although by chance. The archaeologist is also the director of London-based NGO The Tigray Trust, and the item was first brought to herattention by a local farmer she knew through the organization.

"I had been showing around a member of the Peace Corps who had beenworking in a nearby town (around the site), and we'd been out in the blazing sun for 8 hours, when a farmer I knew said his friend found something old, and he'd been keeping it for me," she recalls. "I was apologizing to the Peace Corps guy. I told him, 'it could be an old coffee pot, but you never know, it could be the Queen of Sheba's perfume flask.'" (Text ends)

Popular Opposition Semayawi (Blue) Party Leadership Beaten and Stabbedto Death by Ethiopia's TPLF Security Operatives. CNN News June 17, 2015: A young, fearless, intelligent, and peaceful man that hails from the small town of Debre Markos in The Amhara Regional State, has been beaten to death by the ruling junta (TPLF) security operatives. Even though Samuel was taken to a nearby hospital, he was determined dead on site during the beating.

Semayawi Party officials told ESAT Radio on an interview that he was beaten and stabbed to death near his house by the main bus station inDebre Markos city around 7PM on Monday June, 15, 2015. His face was horribly mutilated by beating and stabbing and he lost a lot of blood. He was determined dead before he was even reached the nearby hospital. The Washington based ESAT Radio also replayed the audio of Samuel's interview before the election last month stating that he was taken to the woods by TPLF security agents. He said "two of the men pointed pistols atme and took me to the jungle and I was severely beaten and warned thatI will be killed if I won't stop my political activity." His picture after the beating went viral on Facebook.

Samuel was buried today at a church's graveyard at another small town. However, the mourners were intercepted by police before they reached the town of Debre Markos and were handed over to militias. Up until this report was prepared, their vehicle driver's license was taken and they were surrounded by the militias and prevented to enter the town of DebreMarkos. Samuel was the co-founder and council member of the popular Semayawi Party. He was a respected Lawyer by profession. (Text ends)

URBAN: What Do You Know About The City of DIRE DAWA’(CREDIT: Afendi Muteki, ethnographist)

The people of Dire Dawa are always "fannaan" and "qashtii". They are giants of creativity, modernity, modesty and sociability. However, the statement of the boy is more applicable to the city itself. Dire Dawa is only110 years old. But it excels all Ethiopians cities in the role it has played forthe modernity of the nation save Addis Ababa and Harar. It is the centre of trade, banking, manufacturing, transport, technology and art. Through its mystique threads, it has connected the natives of the three continents (Africa, Asia and Europe) at one place. In short, modern civilization entered Ethiopia through it.

Dire Dawa was born in the way I described in the above section. The exactplace of the ancient oasis called “Dhawa” is unknown. Train and railway are inseparable from Dire Dawa. And we can’t neglect the role played by the Franco-Ethiopian Railway Line (Now called “Djibouto-Ethiopian RailwayLine) in the growth of the city. An important thing that justifies this notionis the name of Dire Dawa’s earliest borough called “La Gare” which is to mean “rail station” in French. In the early years of the city, “La Gare” was its leading commercial and financial centre.

Dire Dawa is only 110 years old. But it excels all Ethiopians cities in the role it has played for the modernity of the nation save Addis Ababa and Harar. It is the centre of trade, banking, manufacturing, transport, technology and art. Through its mystique threads, it has connected the natives of the three continents (Africa, Asia and Europe) at one place. Inshort, modern civilization entered Ethiopia through it.
The elderly people say that the current site of Dire Dawa and its surrounding was inhabited by three pastoralist communities. They were the Nole Oromo, the Issa Somali and the Gurgura Somali people. On the site where the Nole Oromo were living, there was an oasis which the whole people of the area were frequenting for its good and safe drinking water. The oasis was called by the Oromos "Dhawa" and accordingly, thesite where it was found was named "Diree Dhawaa" (meaning "where theoasis was found").
When the rail road connecting Addis Ababa with Djibouti was planned to be constructed, it was thought to reach the city of Harar on the first phaseand to run from Harar to Addis in the second phase. But when the plan was implemented, the French engineers who were in charge of constructing the railway learned that it was difficult to cross the highlandsnearby Harar and insert the railway to the old city. Therefore, they decided to undertake the construction in the lowlands situated north of Harar.
In the first phase of the construction, the railway reached a place where the aforementioned oasis was found and stopped there. No sooner than the company that owned the railway built its main terminal in area, peoplestarted to settle there. With the fortune of the incoming and outgoing commodities, trade bloomed in the area and caused the small settlement to turn to a new urban centre. Many European, Arabian and Indian traderscame to the area and introduced new transactions and building styles.
Within a decade, a town rivalling the centuries old Harar as the main commercial centre appeared in east Ethiopia. Dajazmach Yilma Mekonnen,a son of the late Ras Mekonnen and the governor general of Harerghe then, proposed naming the new town "Addis Harar" (the New Harar). But people gave it low attention and continued to call the town "Dire Dhawa", the ancient name of the place.
Dire Dawa was born in the way I described in the above section. The exactplace of the ancient oasis called "Dhawa" is unknown. Let historians dig out all sources and tell us in the future. Hoping good luck for them, I turn now on narrating other tales of the beautiful Dire Dawa.
Train and railway are inseparable from Dire Dawa. And we can't neglect the role played by the Franco-Ethiopian Railway Line (Now called "Djibouto-Ethiopian Railway Line) in the growth of the city. An important thing that justifies this notion is the name of Dire Dawa's earliest boroughcalled "La Gare" which is to mean "rail station" in French. In the early years of the city, "La Gare" was its leading commercial and financial centre. Many historical figures like the Syrian-born Merchant and adviser of Lij Eyasu called Hasib Yidilbi and the leading Ethiopian scholar of early 20th century called Gebre-Hiwot Baykedagne resided in the borough.
As the road and air transportations were getting more preferences, the importance of rail transport started to drop and so was the importance of “La Gare” in the city's commercial and cultural lifes. In recent years, when the rail transportation is interrupted for rehabilitation purposes, “La Gare”has becoming the frigid zone of Dire Dawa. However, its historical significance will never be forgotten. When the rehabilitation project is completed, “La Gare” may resurrect again as an important commercial centre of the city. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIAN POLITICS: Ruling party murders 2 regional oppositionleaders

By Abraha Belai, Ethiomedia June 18, 2015

"Whatever price I pay, it's for the honor and freedom of my country. Theymay throw me into prison; but they cannot imprison my conscience. Evenif they kill me, keep the struggle alive." - Samuel Awoke

DEBRE MARKOS, Northwest Ethiopia - After brushing off numerous death threats, a young leader of the opposition Semayawi Party was beaten andstabbed to death on Monday night, hospital sources said.

Samuel Awoke, 29, was his party's candidate for the recently-concluded bogus election in which the ruling party declared a 100% win. The victim'sbody bore several stabbings, with his hands crushed, and the photo was too graphic to be posted on Ethiomedia.

Previously a member of the now-defunct Andenet Party, Samuel was onseveral occasions beaten and jailed before his killers, undoubteldy members of the notorious security service of the TPLF regime, killed himin an agonizing way.

Emerging as the hope of the Ethiopian people as a trust-worthy political organization, Semayawi Party called on all justice-loving forces to condemn the brutal killing of the young opposition leader who was buriedon Wednesday at Arbaitu Ensesa Church in eastern Gojjam.

Meanwhile, another member of the opposition Arena party was strangledto death while the victim was on his way home in Mai Kadra of Humera woreda, northwest Ethiopia.

Tadesse Abraha, a meber of the opposition Arena Party, was heading home at 9:00 PM when unknown assailants strangled him to death, hisparty said in a press release on Wednesday.

Arena accused the ruling party of political murder, despite attempts to make the crime look like a robbery gone wrong. Based in Mekelle, Arena has suffered political murders of its active members over the years. (Textends)

Ethio-British leader on death row 'might' escape execution: governmentBy AFP (June 18, 2015)

An Ethiopian opposition leader with British citizenship on death row willnot be pardoned but might escape execution, the government said Thursday, after reports he was struggling in solitary confinement.

Andargachew Tsege, 60, the leader of the outlawed Ginbot 7 group and who was granted political asylum in Britain, was convicted in absentia in2009 for terrorism, and was imprisoned a year ago after being controversially extradited from Yemen.

"Death sentences are very rarely carried out by the court in Ethiopia. His sentence might be commuted to life imprisonment, but he won't be pardoned, he won't be released," government spokesman Shimeles Kemaltold AFP. "He is an incorrigible criminal and a recidivist who tried to overthrow the Ethiopian government, plant bombs and who organized unrest after the 2005 elections." Ethiopia accuses him of also training opposition groups in neighbouring long-term foe Eritrea. Andargachew, known as Andy, was arrested on June 2014 in Yemen's Sanaa airport en route to Eritrea, and controversially extradited to Addis Ababa, an action criticised by Britain for being in defiance of international law. Britain is oneof Ethiopia's largest donors, with development aid totalling some 303 million pounds (482 million dollars, 422 million euros) for the period 2015-2016. The British ambassador to Ethiopia last saw him on April 24, the third visit permitted to diplomats since his imprisonment.

A report this week by London's The Independent newspaper quoted a Foreign Office report of the meeting, in which it said Andargachew is beingheld in solitary confinement. "Andargachew looks physically in reasonable shape but has health concerns. And he appears in a bad place psychologically. No evidence of mistreatment, other than the solitary nature of his confinement," the report read, according to The Independent. The report left his wife, who is looking after their three children, at "breaking point", the newspaper added. London has requestedhe be moved to a normal jail.

"The Foreign Secretary is extremely concerned about Andargachew Tsege's continued detention. That is why he has raised his case with the Ethiopian Foreign Minister on 13 separate occasions," a Foreign Office spokesman said. "We will continue to lobby at all levels, conveying our concern over Andargachew Tsege being detained without regular consularvisits and access to a lawyer."

Rights groups have criticised Ethiopia's anti-terrorism law, accusing the government of using it to silence dissent and curb freedom of expression. The Ginbot 7 group is considered a terrorist organisation under Ethiopian law. Its name commemorates the Ethiopian calendar date -- May 15 in theGregorian calendar -- when post-election violence in 2005 left over 200 people dead.

Side note: It has to be recalled that on June 23 or 24, Andargachew Tsige,a British citizen and secretary-general of Ginbot 7, was deported to Ethiopia from Yemen while in transit, in violation of international law prohibitions against sending someone to a country where they are likely toface torture or other mistreatment. He had twice been sentenced to deathin absentia for his involvement with Ginbot 7, an opposition armed rebel group. His whereabouts in Ethiopia are unknown. He has been detained for more than three weeks without access to family members, legal counsel, or UK consular officials, in violation of Ethiopian and internationallaw.

ARCHAEOLOGY: CNN on the 2.8 million years old jawbone found inEthiopia

With the discovery of a gray, fossilized jawbone in a remote corner ofEthiopia, an Ethiopian student at Arizona State University may have changed our understanding of our earliest ancestors.

The partial lower jaw is the oldest known fossil evidence of the genus Homo, to which modern day humans belong, according to a study published Wednesday in the journal Science. The jawbone has been datedto 2.8 million years ago — which predates the previously known fossils of the Homo lineage by approximately 400,000 years, according to Arizona State University.

Chalachew Seyoum, a graduate student from Ethiopia, came across thefossil — the left side of a lower jaw with five teeth — while on a field expedition in the Afar region of eastern Ethiopia in 2013.

"Honestly, it was an exciting moment," Seyoum said, according to a newsrelease from the university. "I had good experience in field surveying and knew where potential sediments are. I climbed up a little plateau and found this specimen righton the edge of the hill." The age of the fossil means it could help fill in animportant gap in our knowledge. Fossil found by fisherman may reveal new type of ancient human. It also means the Homo genus could have evolved nearly half a million years earlier than previously thought.

Researchers have previously found fossil remains dating back 3 million years or more, such as the skeleton of "Lucy," the famous 3.2 million- year-old remains of the species Australopithecus afarensis. Those remainswere found in 1974 not far from the site of the latest discovery.

Scientists have also found fossils that are 2.3 million years old and younger, which are in the genus Homo and are closer to modern dayhumans. But until now there has been little fossil evidence from the 700,000 years in between — a crucial period in the evolution from hominids like Lucy to the Homo genus.

"The importance of the specimen is that it adds a data point to a period oftime in our ancestry in which we have very little information," said William

H. Kimbel, director of ASU's Institute of Human Origins, in the university'snews release. "This is a little piece of the puzzle that opens the door to new types of questions and field investigations that we can go after to tryto find additional evidence to fill in this poorly known time period."

The jawbone, found in the Ledi-Geraru area of the Afar region, combinesfeatures seen in Australopithecus afarensis with those seen in later specimens of the Homo genus, according to the study. Professor Kaye Reed, of Arizona State University, said the discovery was the result of years of searching in the area. Surveying began in 2002, she said, but researchers only began to pick up fossils in the area where the jawbone was found in 2012, having realized the sediments there were old enoughto yield Australopithecus afarensis specimens. "Instead, we were rewarded with a much more exciting discovery," she said.

Already the team has been able to establish that this early human ancestor walked on two legs and lived in a dry, arid climate, Reed said. Researchers are still working to determine what it ate and whether it used stone tools. "It's an excellent case of a transitional fossil in a critical time period in human evolution," said Kimbel. Ethiopian Opposition Party: Candidate's Murder Was Politically MotivatedBy Reuters (June 19, 2015)

ADDIS ABABA

An Ethiopian opposition party said on Wednesday that one of its candidates, who took part in last month's elections, was beaten to deathin a "brazen attack" it believes was politically motivated.

A government spokesman denied that Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn's government was involved in any way. The Horn of Africa country has won plaudits for delivering growth for much of the past decade, but rights groups often accuse the government, which has wonevery seat announced so far in the May election, of clamping down on dissent.

Samuel Awoke, a Semayawi Party candidate in the north-central AmharaRegion at the May 24 vote, was attacked on Monday evening in Debre Markos, less than 300 km (190 miles) north of the capital Addis Ababa, party chairman Yilekal Getinet said. “His attackers approached him at 7:30 in the evening and beat him to death, right in the middle of the street on his way home,” Yilekal told Reuters.

“It was a brazen attack carried out on an individual who was critical of thegovernment and who was a victim of a previous assault on election day.

This was not some petty crime – it must have been politically motivated,”he said. A second government official confirmed the incident but rejected claims of political foulplay, saying Samuel – a lawyer – was attacked by aclient aggrieved over his handling in court of a dispute over land. “The attacker is in custody while another individual is being investigated,” the government spokesman, Shimeles Kemal, told Reuters. “There was nothing political about it.”

The ruling Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front coalition swept all 442 seats announced so far, out of a total 547. The oppositionheld a sole seat during the last term.

Critics and the opposition say the government has quashed dissent, jailedbloggers and journalists for their views and may have rigged elections.

The government denies the charges, saying it guarantees free speech andconducts fair elections. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA POLITICS: Ethiopian General Election: An Insult to the Peopleand Democracy’

By GRAHAM PEEBLES

Every five years the Ethiopian people are invited by the ruling party to take part in a democratic pantomime called ‘General Elections’. Sunday24th May saw the latest production take to the national stage.

With most opposition party leaders either in prison or abroad, the populace living under a suffocating blanket of fear, and the ruling party having total control over the media, the election result was a foregone conclusion. The European Union, which had observed the 2005 and 2010elections, refused to send a delegation this time, maintaining their presence would legitimise the farce, and give credibility to the government.

With most ballots counted, the National Election Board of Ethiopia announced the incumbent party to have ‘won’ all “442 seats declared [from a total of 547], leaving the opposition empty-handed…the remaining105 seats are yet to be announced.” ‘Won’ is not really an accurate description of the election result; as the chairman of the Oromo FederalistCongress, Merera Gudina, put it, this “was not an election, it was an organised armed robbery”.

The days leading up to the election saw a regimented display of state arrogance and paranoia, as the government deployed huge numbers of camouflaged security personnel and tanks onto the streets of Addis Ababaand Bahir Dar. For months beforehand anyone suspected of political dissent had been arrested and imprisoned; fabricated charges drawn up with extreme sentencing for the courts, which operate as an extension of the government, to dutifully enforce. Despite the ruling party's claims to the contrary, this was not a democratic election and Ethiopia is not, nor has it ever been, a democracy.

The country is governed by a brutal dictatorship in the form of the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) that has beenin power since 1991, when they violently overthrew the repressive Derg regime. The EPRDF speaks generously of democracy and freedom, but they act in violation of democratic principles, trample on universal humanrights, ignore international law, and violently control the people.

Independent international bodies and financial donors, from Human RightsWatch and Amnesty International to the European Union and the US StateDepartment, are well aware of the nature and methods of the EPRDF, which is one of the most repressive regimes in Africa. The Committee to Protect Journalists reports that Ethiopia is "the fourth most heavily censored country in the World", with more journalists forced to leave the country last year than anywhere except Iran.

In the lead up to the recent election, CPJ found that, "the state systematically cracked down on the country's remaining independent publications through the arrests of journalists and intimidation of printingand distribution companies. Filing lawsuits against editors and forcing publishers to cease production." Various draconian laws are used to gag the media and stifle dissent, the Anti Terrorist Proclamation being the most common weapon deployed against anyone who dares speak out against the government, which rules through fear, and yet, riddled with guilt as they must surely be, seem themselves fearful.

Democracy and Development

The government proudly talks a great deal about economic development, which it believes to be more important than democracy, human rights andthe rule of law, all of which are absent in the country. And, yes, during thepast decade the country has seen economic development, with between 4% and 9% (depending on who you believe) GDP growth per annum achieved, the CIA states "through government-led infrastructure expansion and commercial agriculture development." It is growth, however, that depends, the Oakland Institute make clear, on "state force and the denial of human and civil rights." GDP figures are only one indicator of a country's progress, and a very narrow one at that. The broader Ethiopian picture, beyond the debatable statistics, paints a less rosy image:

Around 50% of Ethiopia's federal budget is met by various aid packages, totaling $3.5 billion annually. Making it "the world's second-largest recipient of total external assistance, after Indonesia" (excluding war tornnations, Afghanistan and Iraq), Human Rights Watch states. The country remains 173rd (of 187 countries) in the UN Human Development Index and is one of the poorest nations in the world, with, the CIA says, over 39% of the population living below the low poverty line of $1.25 a day (the World Bank worldwide poverty line is $2 a day) – many Ethiopians question this figure and would put the number in dire need much higher.

Per capita income is among the lowest in the world and less than half the rest of sub-Sahara Africa, averaging, according to the World Bank, "$470 (£287)". This statistic is also questionable, as Dr. Daniel Teferra (Professor of Economics, Emeritus at Ferris State University,) explains, "In2008-2011 income per capita (after inflation), was only $131," contrary tothe International Monetary Fund's (IMF) 2013 report, which put the figureat $320.

The cost of living has risen sharply (current inflation is around 8%) and, as The Guardian reports, "growing economic inequality threatens to undermine the political stability and popular legitimacy that a developmental state acutely needs. Who benefits from economic growth isa much-contested issue in contemporary Ethiopia." Not amongst the majority of Ethiopians it isn't: they know very well who the winners are.

As ever it is the 1%, who sit in the seats of power, and have the educationand the funds to capitalize on foreign investment and development opportunities.

Some of those suffering as a result of the government's development policies are the 1.5 million threatened with 'relocation' as their land is taken – or 'grabbed' from them. Leveled and turned into industrial-sized farms by foreign multinationals which grow crops, not for local people, butfor consumers in their home countries – India or China for example.

Indigenous people cleared from their land are violently herded into campsunder the government's universally criticised "Villagization" program, which is causing the erosion of ancient lifestyles, "increased food insecurity, destruction of livelihoods, and the loss of cultural heritage", relates the Oakland Institute. Any resistance is met with a wooden baton or the [deleted] or bullet of a rifle; reports of beatings, torture and rape by security forces are widespread. No compensation is paid to the affected people, who are abandoned in camps with no essential services, such as water, health care and education facilities – all of which are promised by the EPRDF in their hollow development rhetoric.

An Insult to the People

Economic development is not democracy, and whilst development is clearly essential to address the dire levels of poverty in Ethiopia, it needsto be democratic, sustainable development. First and foremost human rights must be observed, and there must be participation, and consultation, which – despite the Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn'sduplicitous comments to Al Jazeera that, "we make our people to be partand parcel of all the [developmental] engagements," – never happens.

The Prime Minister describes Ethiopia as a “fledgling democracy”, and saysthe government is “on the right track in democratizing the country”.

Nonsense. Democracy is rooted in the observation of human rights, freedom of expression, the rule of law and social participation. None ofthese values are currently to be found in Ethiopia.

Not only is the EPRDF universally denying the people their fundamental human rights, in many areas they are committing acts of state terrorism(one thinks of the abuses taking place in the Ogaden region and the atrocities being committed against the Oromo people, for example, that amount to crimes against humanity.

The recent election was an insult to the people of Ethiopia, who are beingintimidated, abused and suppressed by a brutal, arrogant regime that talks the democratic talk, but acts in violation of all democratic ideals.

MIGRATION: Why Ethiopian migrants brave illegal crossings again – and again

By William Davison, CSM June 19, 2015

Ethiopia is one of Africa's fastest-growing economies, but that hasn't stopped the outflow of migrants, underscoring the challenges countriesface in trying to stem what were record levels of migration globally in 2014.

Addis Ababa, Ethiopia — Among the young Ethiopian entrepreneurs idly sipping coffee near their shops in Addis Ababa, Tariku Temesgen stands out as the joker. Wearing scarlet dungarees and aviator shades, he drawslaughter by describing his routine as a ?merchant ?who has nothing to sell. “I just stand here all day staring at my empty shop,” he says, leaningagainst the wall of his would-be electronics repair ?store. Like many of the shopkeepers in this complex?, Mr. Tariku doesn't pay rent, courtesy of a government program to create jobs for returning migrants. But the nearby construction of a $475 million railway has killedtraffic, ?leaving rows of merchandise ?in shops waiting for customers ?who do not come. ? So even though Tariku has attempted unsuccessfullyto migrate through Sudan five times over the past six years, he is thinking – yet again – about heading abroad to look for work.? Recommended:Think you know Africa? Take our geography quiz.

The horrors that many migrants confront on their illegal journeys abroad –from sexual assault? and other abuse to drowning ?or execution ?by militants – ?are well publicized. But Tariku’s determination to repeat the experience speaks to the economic forces that have helped drive an increasing number of Ethiopian migrants abroad, despite a booming economy that has grown nearly 9 percent annually over the past four years, according to the IMF.

While the growth is dramatic, many say it has largely benefited the business class, says Michael Woldemariam, a political scientist at Boston University in Massachusetts. The "losers" include a mass of jobless graduates and poor city dwellers that struggle beneath skyrocketing livingcosts.

With these prospects, many young Ethiopians are willing to take their chances rather than settle for an average monthly pay of $60, intensifyingpressure on the government to try to increase opportunities more broadlyamong the population. “As long as you are human you always want to improve your life,” Tariku says. “If things don’t start improving here, thenI might try again.” ? Accessing money His will to leave persists despite thefact that over the past few months, sickening news of migrants' journeys has been arriving from all directions.

Some who went north through Sudan, the same route Tariku took, drowned in the Mediterranean or were executed in April by an Islamic State offshoot in Libya. In the east, thousands have been caught in Yemen’s civil war as they try to reach the wealthy Gulf nations. Ethiopianswere also targets of xenophobic attacks in South Africa two months ago.

Still, it is estimated that around 75,000 Ethiopians tried to reach the Gulfin 2014, with tens of thousands more making equally treacherous trips totry and reach Europe and South Africa.

They are fleeing rock-bottom wages and inflation that has averaged 17 percent a year over the past decade. While the economic growth has helped bring 2.5 million people out of poverty since 2005, the number stillliving under a poverty line of 60 cents (US) a day has remained constant at around 25 million, due to a rapidly increasing population. Better wages in Sudan when he lived in Khartoum, the capital of the economically struggling Sudan, Tariku earned $22 a day from welding and washing dishes at a pizza restaurant. In comparison, his welding skills only earn him $7 a day in Addis Ababa, although sometimes he doesn’t get paid for work, he claims. With house rent of $54 a month and a basic meal costing $1.25, he is barely surviving.

His store, though free, cost him around $430 to partition, despite doing allthe work himself. Now he has no cash left to stock it, and officials threaten to evict him and hand his space to someone else in their enterprise program. While there are loan facilities for the micro- entrepreneurs, Tariku can’t find a guarantor and doesn’t possess assets for collateral. Alem Berhane, another shopkeeper in the enterprise ?plan, is also struggling. She was among 168,000 Ethiopian workers deported from Saudi Arabia in late 2013. Now she is under-employed, selling coffeeto a handful of construction workers to make around $1 a day.

According to Mr. Woldemariam, “the out-migration will continue” unless the government can “more concretely addresses the structural problems.”Government efforts Half of those who were deported from Saudi Arabia tried to migrate again, the Ethiopian government says. Such choices are partly due to misconceptions that is easier earning a living abroad, says Solomon Tesfaye of the prime minister’s office, who heads a task force tocombat human trafficking. Donor-supported “community conversations” where people discuss the harsh realities of illegal travel, are effective at putting off potential migrants, he adds. Stiffer sentences for human trafficking are on the way, as is legislation to better regulate employmentagencies and improve pre-departure training for workers. Legal routes may re-open once the new legislation is combined with labor agreements with Gulf countries.

Alem praises the government for trying to improve Ethiopians' lives by doing everything from teaching people about the hazards of illegal migration to creating jobs opportunities. She had flown to Saudi Arabia in2011 legally to work as a housemaid in Jeddah, where she earned a tax- free salary of around $187 a month. The job went well until her employer wanted her for his "second wife." She declined and wasn't paid for three months before leaving to work other jobs illegally. Overall, she described her two-year experience as "not bad," mostly because she wasn't sexuallyassaulted like other Ethiopian maids, and her savings allowed her to provide for her relatives.

By opening a bar in the capital and building an extension to her parents' home in the Tigray region, Alem says the money she earned in Saudi Arabia changed her family's life. Unfortunately, a church opened above the bar and her regulars drifted elsewhere. Now she's not sure what to do,partly hoping the coffee brewing business improves, partly waiting for legal channels to re-open. "There is opportunity for me to improve my life there, much more than here," she says. (Text ends)

ARCHAEOLOGIC HISTORY

Ethiopian Gold Mine that may have supplied the Queen of Sheba with herriches'

ROBIN WHITLOCK (JUNE 20, 2015)

In 2012, Archaeologists discovered the Ethiopian gold mine that may havesupplied the Queen of Sheba with her riches a team of British archaeologists discovered an enormous gold mine in northern Ethiopia, along with a nearby battlefield and the ruins of a temple. The site is located on the high Gheralta plateau and the archaeologists knew it was once part of the realm of Sheba from the 20ft stone stele carved with theimage of the sun and crescent moon – the emblem of Sheba.

Ever wondered where the Queen of Sheba got her gold from? During a2012 excavation in Ethiopia, a team of British archaeologists may verywell have found the answer.

The Queen of Sheba is famous in Biblical legend as the ruler who visited Jerusalem with loads of gold in order to impress King Solomon. Little else is known about her but the tale of her love affair with King Solomon inspired later mystical medieval literature in which she is described as possessing divine wisdom. She was also depicted in Turkish and Persian art and was featured in Handel's oratorio Solomon. She is also mentionedin various treatises in the Kabbala and her story was later the subject of Hollywood movies such as Solomon and Sheba of 1959. The legend statesthat she taunted the king with riddles and that he wooed her in return.

Their child, Menelik, was the ancestor of the kings of Abyssinia. Sheba was an ancient realm that existed during the 8th Century BC. It lasted for a thousand years and included what is now modern Ethiopia and Yemen. The realm traded in incense and prospered because of its links with Jerusalem and the Roman Empire. Its famous Queen is mentioned both in The Koran and The Bible, which mentions that the Queen of Sheba arrivedin Jerusalem “with a very great retinue, with camels bearing spices, and very much gold and precious stones ... Then she gave the king 120 talentsof gold, and a very great quantity of spices.”

The Biblical stories of Sheba were written in the Iron Age. Several figuresin the Bible are referred to as Sheba, one of them being a descendant of Noah’s son Shem. However, the name Sheba is actually a derivation of the Arabic ‘Shaba’, also known as the Sabaean kingdom. The story of its famous Queen appears in the Biblical book of Kings. Its capital was the city of Marib but the kingdom declined after a long civil war between numerous dynasties who each claimed the throne.
In 2012, a team of British archaeologists discovered an enormous gold mine in northern Ethiopia, along with a nearby battlefield and the ruins ofa temple. The site is located on the high Gheralta plateau and the archaeologists knew it was once part of the realm of Sheba from the 20ftstone stele carved with the image of the sun and crescent moon – the emblem of Sheba.
The Legendary Queen of Sheba and Her Iconic Visit with King SolomonTracing the origins of a mysterious ancient Queen of Ethiopia
The Intricately Carved Tiya Megaliths of EthiopiaQUOTATION:
One of the things I've always loved about archaeology is the way it can tieup with legends and myths” archaeologist Louise Schofield told The Guardian shortly after the discovery. “The fact that we might have the Queen of Sheba's mines is extraordinary.”
Despite being warned the rock was the home of an enormous cobra, Schofield crawled beneath it where she discovered an inscription in Sabaean, an ancient language that would once have been spoken by the Queen of Sheba herself. On a mound nearby, the archaeologists discovered the ruins of an ancient temple that may have been dedicated to the moon god of Sheba. The team also discovered human bones on thesite of an ancient battlefield nearby.
The ancient mine is believed to have once belonged to the Queen of Sheba. It was situated on a hilltop and entered by a shaft which is buried some 4 feet below the surface. The archaeologists found a human skull in the entrance, where chisel marks are still visible. It may indeed once havesupplied the Queen of Sheba’s treasure house. Art Gallery of New South Wales (Wikimedia Commons)
REPORT: ISIS Fighter Who 'Enjoyed' Killing Christians Wants to Follow Jesus After Dreaming of Man in White Who Told Him 'You Are Killing MyPeople'
It has become a common occurrence over the years for Muslims in the Middle East who have converted to Christianity to claim to have been compelled to do so after dreaming of a person who they believe is Jesus Christ. Now, one militant belonging to the brutal Islamic State that has massacred Christians has converted to his victims' religion after dreamingof "a man in white" with a startling message, according to one missionary's account.

"One of our YWAM workers in the Middle East was contacted by a friend earlier this year and they met up and he was introduced to an ISIS fighterwho had killed many Christians already. I mean that's a horrible situation,and admittedly, he was probably on guard," Gina Fadely, director of YouthWith A Mission Frontier Missions, Inc. (YWAM), said during a recent appearance on The Voice of the Martyrs Radio Network.

YWAM, a nonprofit missionary organization active since 1960, describes itself as "a global movement of Christians from many cultures, age groups, and Christian traditions, dedicated to serving Jesus throughout the world." The Voice of the Martyrs (VOM) is another nonprofit that drawsattention to Christians facing persecution around the world.

Fadely, who appeared on the VOM radio program along with Kevin Sutter,another YWAM leader, went on to share that this Islamic State jihadi confessed not only to killing Christians but "that he had actually enjoyed doing so."

"He told this YWAM leader that he had begun having dreams of this manin white who came to him and said, 'You are killing my people.' And he started to feel really sick and uneasy about what he was doing," Fadely continued. "The fighter said just before he killed one Christian, the man said, 'I know you will kill me, but I give to you my Bible.' The Christian was killed and this ISIS fighter actually took the Bible and began to readit. In another dream, Jesus asked him to follow him and he was now asking to become a follower of Christ and to be discipled."

"So who knows. Perhaps this man will be like Saul in the Bible that persecuted Christians and he turned from that persecution of the earlychurch to become the Apostle Paul who led it," Fadely added. "God can turn it around." (Text ends)

The White House: Statement by the Press Secretary on the President’sTravel to Ethiopia

In late July, President Obama will travel to Ethiopia for bilateral meetingswith the Government of Ethiopia and with the leadership of the African Union. This visit, which will follow the President’s travel to Kenya, will build on the success of the August 2014 U.S.-Africa Leaders Summit by strengthening ties with our African partners and highlighting America’s longstanding commitment to investing in Africa. This will be the first visitof a sitting U.S. President to Ethiopia and to the African Union headquarters, underscoring our efforts to work with the countries and citizens of sub-Saharan Africa to accelerate economic growth, strengthendemocratic institutions, and improve security.

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press SecretaryWashington, D.C.

June 19, 2015

The White Housepress statement says the late July stop is being added to a previously announced trip by Obama to Kenya to participate in a global entrepreneurship summit. Obama will meet with leaders of Ethiopia's government. He plans separate meetings with leaders of the African Union. The trip to Kenya will also be Obama's first there as president. His father was Kenyan, and Obama traveled there as a senator in 2006 beforehe ran for president.

Obama to visit Ethiopia, African Union in July

By Andrew Beatty, AFP updates (June 20, 2015) San Francisco

US President Barack Obama will in late July become the first sitting American leader to visit Ethiopia and the headquarters of the AfricanUnion, the White House said Friday. Obama's trip to Addis Ababa will come directly after an already announced trip to Kenya, his first as president to his father's homeland, press secretary Josh Earnest announced.

Obama will meet both the Ethiopian government and AU leaders, for talkson how to "accelerate economic growth, strengthen democratic institutions and improve security." The election of the United States' first black president -- and the first with an African parent -- raised high hopeson the continent, but Obama has been a cautious friend.

In August last year, the White House hosted a huge Washington summitof African leaders and the upcoming July trip is intended to build on progress towards closer economic ties. A presidential visit to Kenya hadbeen put on ice while President Uhuru Kenyatta faced charges of crimesagainst humanity for his role in 2007-2008 post-election violence.

The International Criminal Court has since suspended that prosecution, citing a lack of evidence and Kenya's failure to cooperate. Human rights groups have questioned the visit to Kenya, but are also asking why Obama is visiting Ethiopia so soon after a contested election. Africa's second most populous nation held a vote in May that was described by many independent observers as flawed. The governing party, which has ruled for over two decades, won a landslide, amid opposition allegations ofintimidation and vote rigging.

"The decision by President Obama to travel to Ethiopia, which has seenthree opposition party members murdered this week alone, is very troubling," Jeffrey Smith of the Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice & Human Rights told AFP. Smith said the timing, and the symbolism of Obama's trip, would "further solidify the image that America stands behind Africa's autocrats."

The White House stressed that it frequently addresses issues of democracy and political rights with countries in the region. "We regularly,both in public and in private, communicate our concerns about some of the issues," White House spokesman Eric Schultz said.

"I don't think that is going to stop because of this visit."Ethiopia and Kenya have both been on the frontline of the fight against Somalia's Al- Qaeda-allied militia Shebab, and have been important security partners toWashington.

Shebab units have been hunted by African Union troops and US drones inside Somalia -- but have outflanked the Kenyan contingent in Somalia tomount a string of gruesome cross-border raids. In April last year the group attacked a university in Garissa, Kenya killing 148 people -- most ofthem students. (Text ends)

Two additional members of the Ethiopian opposition were killedthis week following the beating to death of a parliamentary candidate - Bloomberg updates

By William Davison (Bloomberg June 21, 2015) - Two members of the Ethiopian opposition were killed this week following the beating to death of a parliamentary candidate from the Semayawi Party, Samuel Awoke, onJune 15, opposition leaders said.

Tadesse Abraha, an organizer for the Arena party, which is part of the Medrek opposition coalition, was assaulted on June 16 near the town of Humera, according to Gebru Asrat, Arena's chairman. A Medrek member,Berhanu Erabo, died after an attack on June 18, coalition leader Beyene Petros said by phone from the capital Addis Ababa on Saturday.

The incidents come a month after a landslide election victory for the rulingEthiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front coalition, which extended its 20-year rule over Africa's second-most populous country.

Supporters of the government are responsible for the attacks, accordingto Beyene.

"They say without supporting ERPDF you cannot survive in the communityand we'll get you," he said. "This is a threat that's now being translated into action." President Barack Obama should raise human-rights concernswith Ethiopian leaders next month when he becomes the first sitting U.S. leader to visit the country, Human Rights Watch said on Friday. Ethiopia election: EPRDF wins every seat in parliament

BBC (June 22, 2015) Ethiopia's ruling party, the EPRDF, and its allies havewon every single parliamentary seat in May's elections, according to official results.

This includes the one seat held by an opposition politician following the2010 poll. Election commission chairman Merga Bekana made the announcement saying the elections were credible and free and fair.

Opposition parties have said that the process was rigged. African Union observers described the 24 May vote as "calm, peaceful and credible" andthat "it provided an opportunity for the Ethiopian people to express their choices at the polls".

Beyane Petros, the leader of Medrek, one of the main opposition coalitions, said last month that there was no election to speak of as it wasnot conducted in a fair way, according to the Horn Affairs website.

Medrek has said that hundreds of its members and supporters have been arrested and beaten in recent months, according to an opposition website.The EPRDF has been in power since the overthrow of the military government in 1991.

In 2005 official results said the opposition won more than 150 seats, but the opposition claimed the figure was much higher. More than 190 peoplewere killed as protesters clashed with police in the wake of the announcement of those results, an independent report found. The government says the number was much lower. In the two elections sincethen the EPRDF has dominated the parliament. (Text ends)

Obama's plan to visit Ethiopia criticised as 'gift' for repressivegovernment...

Activists express anger at US president’s trip to country widely criticisedfor human right abuses.

Barack Obama’s decision to visit Ethiopia has shocked human rightsactivists, who say the visit sends the wrong message to a repressivegovernment widely accused of clamping down on dissent.

One year on, jailed Ethiopian bloggers are still awaiting trial

A White House statement said Obama will visit the east African country formeetings with government officials as part of his last African trip as president. As well as meeting the leadership of the African Union, the visitwill form part of US efforts to strengthen economic growth, democratic institutions and improve security in the region.

But as activists and social media users have been making clear, Ethiopia’strack record on human rights and democracy is deeply troubling.

In its 2014 report, Human Rights Watch noted that Ethiopia increasingly clamps down on the freedoms of its citizens “using repressive laws to constrain civil society and independent media, and target individuals withpolitically motivated prosecutions”.

Last month, Ethiopians voted in parliamentary elections which were widelydenounced as unfair. Though the African Union declared that the vote waspeaceful, they fell short of using the words “free and fair”.

While the US state department has expressed concerns about restrictionson civil society, media, opposition parties, and independent voices, Ethiopia remains a significant recipient of foreign aid money and securitysupport.

Ethiopian ruling party wins all parliamentary seatsBy Karim Lebhour, AFP (June 23, 2015)

Addis Ababa (AFP) - Ethiopia's ruling party and its allies achieved a cleansweep in last month's general election, winning all 546 parliamentary seats, the final results showed Monday.

The Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) of Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn scored a landslide victory, stripping the opposition of the one seat it had held in the outgoing chamber, said MergaBekana, chairman of the electoral board.

African Union observers said the polls passed off without incident, but theopposition alleged the government had used authoritarian tactics to guarantee victory. Preliminary results for the one constituency that still had to return final results -- the southwestern Bonga district where elections were delayed -- showed the EPRDF also winning that seat. "Theperformance of the ruling party is good but the competition was strong," Merga told reporters at the release of final results.

"The general elections were characterised by high voter turnout andorderly conduct of the elections proceedings. The elections were culminated in free, fair, peaceful, credible and democratic manner."
The EPRDF, in power in Africa's second-most populous nation for over twodecades, along with its allies also won a near clean sweep in regional statecouncils, winning all but 21 of the 1,987 seats.
Government spokesman Shimeles Kemal said the party's success was theresult of Ethiopia's economic advances.
"Voters have credited the ruling party for the economic progress it introduced in the country," he said, speaking before the final results were announced. "They want the continuation of this policy. In view of the weak, fragmented opposition and the lack of viable alternative, it was verylikely that the ruling party would win in a landslide."
Opposition leader Yilkal Getnet, president of the Semayawi or Blue Party,criticised the results.
"The political space in Ethiopia is totally closed," he told AFP. "The practical lesson for Ethiopians and for the international community is that the EPRDF has no interest in creating a multiparty system in Ethiopia. Thispolicy of dictatorship have been uncovered." Critics also dismissed the results.
"This result was completely expected, there is no multiparty system in Ethiopia. It's just fake," said Taye Negussie, a sociology professor at AddisAbaba University. Ahead of the results, the Addis Standard, a rare independent voice in the Ethiopian press, commented on the "tragic demise of the multiparty system."
Opposition lose all seats
The EPRDF took back the only seat that was held by the opposition, securing all 23 seats in the capital Addis Ababa. Ethiopia, whose 1984 famine triggered a major global fundraising effort, has experienced near-double-digit economic growth and huge infrastructure investment -- making the country one of Africa's top-performing economies and a magnet for foreign investment.
It also remains a favourite of key international donors, despite concernsover human rights, as a bastion of stability in an otherwise troubled region.
Ethiopia's former Marxist rebel-turned-leader Meles Zenawi, who died in 2012, was succeeded by Prime Minister Hailemariam, who has said he is committed to opening up the country's political system to allow more space for opposition parties. But rights groups routinely accuse Ethiopia ofclamping down on opposition supporters and journalists, and of using anti-terrorism laws to silence dissent and jail critics.
Activists have said the polls were not free or fair due to a lack of freedomof speech.
The United States, which enjoys close security cooperation with Ethiopia,also said it remained "deeply concerned by continued restrictions on civilsociety, media, opposition parties, and independent voices and views."
US President Barack Obama will in late July become the first sittingAmerican leader to visit Ethiopia.
The European Union has also said that true democracy had yet to takeroot in Ethiopia.

The African Union deployed 59 observers for the polls, but European Unionand Carter Center observers, who were present for the 2010 vote, were not invited. (Text ends)

SOCIAL ISSUE-What is Quenat (in Amharic) Jealoussy or envy (in english)

In local Tigrigna or in Eritrean term “Quena’a” “Hassad” or “Hasot”

Quenat (Amharic) Quena'a, Hassad, or Hasot is a tigrigna translation for “jealousy or envy”, meaning for an envy or self-loathing character. It’s a pernicious trait of Ethio/Eritreans, whose mainly categorized as “Habeshas”, it’s such an inferiority complex now more spreads among the society as cancerous disease under the poverty ridden economy especiallyunder the TPLF led regime. Hasot is a tigrigna meaning for lie or deceptionwhich you can read easily at her/his or the regime's lips during our everyday life. Frankly speaking “Quena’a”, “Hasad” or “Hasot” is a kind of an evil personal character where someone never to give any credit or helpto another person out for fear of being a lesser person for it.

Literally speaking, “quena’a” is a moral sickness or self-enslavement, according to social experts, though, the youngest and the brightest generations of should cherish to fight or eliminate such cancerous social disease being at the right side of history against Quena’a which widely believed it was inherited mostly from Italian colonial invadors whos also promoted commercial prostitution in our country at the time according to historic records. It's widely believed that Italian Cicilianos Mafios came outof such worst scenarios, it’s highly spreaded among the populated communities like India, China, and the Habeshas as a whole. As example, in our Abissinyan culture, mere lie is unproductive and you gain nothing out of it, rather you fall ashamed, and go to hide under a small table whenpeople alerted of you, according to Italian Cicilianos Mafios mere lie is more productive, probably it produces you more millions, and you go boastedly unashamed.

ETHIOPIA POLITICS-Dispatches: Alarm Bells for Ethiopia’s 100% ElectionVictory '

By Felix Horne (June 24, 2015)

Elections where a ruling party wins 100 percent of the seats in parliamentshould always ring alarm bells. Results in Ethiopia from the May 24 general election, released yesterday, are no exception. According to Ethiopia’s National Electoral Board, the ruling Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) coalition won 546 parliamentaryseats (with the 547th seat still to be announced).

The results shouldn’t be seen as a stamp of approval for Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn’s government – rather they are the inevitable outcome of a political system in which opposition parties face extraordinary challenges and nearly all avenues for citizens to engage inpolitical debate are closed.

The seeds for this situation were sown years ago. Since the last election in2010, in which the EPRDF won a mere 99.6 percent of parliamentary seats, political space has been further restricted: the independent media has been decimated, civil society groups virtually eliminated, and peacefulpublic demonstrations quelled, sometimes by force.

The crackdown on opposition parties and their supporters was the final piece of the puzzle. In the lead-up to the elections, the authorities arrested leading members of the opposition and put them on trial on trumped-up terrorism charges. Political parties reported difficulties in registering candidates and acquiring funds to which they are legally entitled. Security force personnel arrested and harassed people organizing rallies, confiscating their equipment and unfairly denying them permits.

Over the last two weeks, several opposition members and candidates havebeen beaten to death in suspicious circumstances.

International observers were largely absent, choosing not to monitor a vote that provided little opportunity to be independent and effective observers. The African Union was the exception, concluding that the elections were “calm, peaceful, and credible” – a standard very differentfrom being free and fair.

The European Union and the United States, two of Ethiopia’s key allies, were largely silent on the political crackdown. Instead, they congratulatedEthiopia for a “peaceful” election, more concerned with the increasing potential for violence than with a fair electoral landscape. This is short- sighted and dangerous. Authoritarian control rarely provides long-term stability and nearly always compounds significant human rights violations.

For many Ethiopians, the elections confirmed what they already knew: theruling coalition completely controls all aspects of their daily life and permits no alternative political views. The question is, when will Ethiopia’sallies open their eyes?

Mr. Obama’s visit to Ethiopia sends the wrong message on democracy’

WASHINGTON POST June 25, 2015

"AFRICA DOESN’T need strongmen, it needs strong institutions.” Those were President Obama’s words when he addressed Ghana’s parliament inJuly 2009, during his first trip to sub-Saharan Africa as president. The historic speech, watched around the globe, was an optimistic clarion call to the leaders on the continent from the son of a Kenyan. “First, we mustsupport strong and sustainable democratic governments,” Mr. Obama said.

The president seems to have forgotten that speech. Last week, the WhiteHouse announced that, while traveling to Kenya next month, Mr. Obama also will stop in Ethiopia, the first such visit by a sitting U.S. president to the country of 94 million. It’s almost unfathomable that he would make time for an entrenched human rights abuser such as Ethiopia while cold- shouldering the nation that just witnessed a historic, peaceful, democraticchange of power: Nigeria.

Administration officials justify the trip by citing the United States’ long- standing cooperation with Ethiopia on issues of regional security and thecountry’s accelerating economic growth. Ethiopia is a major recipient of U.S. development assistance, and the African Union has its headquartersthere. But it also stands out in Africa for its increasingly harsh repressionand its escalating chokehold on independent media and political dissent. Since June 2014, 34 journalists have been forced to flee the country, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists. Ethiopia is also one ofthe world's leading jailers of journalists.

The administration already undermined Ethiopia's struggling journalists and democracy advocates in April, when Undersecretary of State Wendy Sherman said Ethiopia has "moved forward in strengthening its democracy. Every time there is an election, it gets better and better." Shortly after her statement, the ruling party held an election in which it secured 100 percent of the parliamentary seats. That was indeed an improvement upon its 2010 performance, when it won 99.6 percent of seats. In the months ahead of the May 24 polls, opposition party membersand leaders were harassed and arrested. The Ethiopian government refused to allow independent election observers, except from the African Union. Since the election, two opposition members and one candidate have been murdered. The government has denied any responsibility for the killings. (Text ends)

Meanwhile, Nigeria, the continent's most populous nation and the one withthe largest economy, overcame risks of electoral violence and Boko Haram's terrorism to manage a peaceful transfer of power for the first time since the country's return to democracy in 1999. With numerous African countries facing elections in the next two years, a visit to Nigeria would have signaled U.S. commitment to partnering with governments that respect freedom, the rule of law and the will of their people.

Snubbing Nigeria for a trip to Ethiopia sends the opposite message, in essence validat ing Ethiopia's sham elections and rewarding a regime thathas shown no intent to reform. Six years after his idealistic speech in Ghana, Mr. Obama is sending a message to Africa that democracy isn't allthat important after all. (Text ends)

HISTORY of US/ETHIOPIAN RELATIONS:
Since 112 years ago this month the first American diplomatic mission arrived in Ethiopia – Still it’s widely believed a luckless historical ties withthe USA goes on’
(ARCHIEVES) Ethiopia participated in earnest in the “Collective Security”missions inspired by the United States and the United Nations. Some outstanding examples are as followed:-
Former Secretary of State John Foster Dallas asked the Fascist Italy toescalate faster into Addis Ababa and stabilize the city.
The Korean war of 1950-53 in which Ethiopia’s “Kagnew Battalion” foughtwith admirable prowess and gallantry for which the USA paid a glowing tribute decorating the men in uniform;
The UN’s peace keeping mission to the former Congo Leopoldvillspearheaded and other troubled parts of the African continent.
Former US President Jimmy Carter stopped delivery of self-defensemilitary supplies thereby emboldening Somalia to invade Ethiopia.
Former Assistant Secretary of State Herman Cohn facilitated entry of theTPLF led forces into Addis Ababa excluding potential rival unionist opposition political partis.
Former Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice worked hard to kill passage ofHR2003 in the Senate and took her own pride for that.
Former Assistant Secretary of State and later the US ambassadress to the UN Suzan Rice, the late Meles Zenawi’s close ally, by her own admission inher eulogy at his funeral, strongly supported the policies of the tyrant;
The current Secretary of State John Kerry has failed to publicly declare hisstand on the rampant gross violations of human rights in Ethiopia and failed to denounce the active stance of the regime to nip democracy in thebud. (Text ends)

The Guardian: Philip Hammond warns Ethiopia over treatment of Britonon death row

By Owen Bowcott The Guardian June 25, 2015

Foreign secretary condemns detention of Andargachew Tsige in solitary confinement with no access to consular help or right to appeal. The treatment of a Briton on death row in Ethiopia is threatening to underminethe country's relationship with the UK, the foreign secretary has warned.

In an unusually blunt statement, Philip Hammond has called for rapid progress in the case of Andargachew Tsige, who is being held in solitaryconfinement in an unknown location in Ethiopia.

The foreign secretary's comments, released a year after Tsige was abducted while transiting through Yemen, is a clear sign of official disapproval of the approach taken by the regime in Addis Abbaba. The Foreign Office is escalating the case beyond confidential diplomatic exchanges.

On Wednesday, Hammond spoke to the Ethiopian foreign minister, TedrosAdhanom Ghebreyesus, about the case on the phone. His statement said:"I am deeply concerned that, a year after he was first detained, British national Andargachew Tsige remains in solitary confinement in Ethiopiawithout a legal process to challenge his detention.

"I am also concerned for his welfare and disappointed that our repeatedrequests for regular consular access have not been granted, despite promises made.

"I spoke to foreign minister Tedros and made clear that Ethiopia's failureto grant our repeated and basic requests is not acceptable. I informed DrTedros that the lack of progress risks undermining the UK's much valuedbilateral relationship with Ethiopia.

"I asked Dr Tedros once again to permit immediate regular consular access and for our concerns regarding Mr Tsige's welfare to be addressed.I have also asked that the Ethiopian authorities facilitate a visit by Mr Tsige's family. Foreign Office officials will continue to provide consular support both to Mr Tsige and to his family during this difficult time."

Tsige's partner, Yemi Hailemariam, also a British national, lives in Londonwith their three children. She has spoken to him only once by phone sincehis abduction.

"He's in prison but we have no idea where he is being held," she told the Guardian last month. "He said he was okay, but I'm sure the call was being listened to. He had been in Dubai and was flying on to Eritrea whenthe plane stopped over in Yemen. He hadn't even been through immigration. We think Yemeni security took him and handed him over to the Ethiopians.

"They say there was an extradition agreement, but it was so quick there was no time for any semblance of a legal hearing. Yemen and Ethiopia hadclose relations then. The [Ethiopian] government have put him on television three times in heavily edited interviews, saying he was revealingsecrets.

"He has been kept under artificial light 24 hours a day and no one [otherthan the UK ambassador] has had access to him."

Tsige, 60 – known as Andy – had previously been secretary general ofGinbot 7, a political opposition party that called for democracy, free elections and civil rights. He first came to the UK in 1979.

The Ethiopian government has accused him of being a terrorist. In 2009, he was tried with others in his absence and sentenced to death. The latestreports suggest that his health is deteriorating.
His lawyer, Ben Cooper, of Doughty Street Chambers, said: “We welcomethe Foreign Secretary condemning the illegality of Andy Tsige’s detention,confirming the fact of his solitary confinement and demanding consular visits. But we have a simple ask: please request Andy Tsige’s return hometo his family in London. Mr Tsige was kidnapped by Ethiopia at an international airport and the only remedy for kidnap is release. Why has Mr Hammond not yet asked Ethiopia to release Andy so he can return home to England?” Juan Méndez, the UN special rapporteur on torture, has written to the Ethiopian and UK governments saying he is investigating Tsige’s treatment.
Who is Andargachew Tsige?
Andargachew, or Andy, Tsige fled Addis Abbaba in the 1970s followingthreats against his life from the military regime, the Derg, which then controlled Ethiopia.
A student activist, he had attracted the attention of the authorities. His younger brother was killed by the security forces. Tsige escaped into themountains to join opposition groups.
In 1979, after falling out with fellow rebels, he sought asylum in the UK. He studied at the University of Greenwich and obtained full UK citizenship.
Tsige returned to Ethiopia after the Derg was overthrown but moved backto the UK in the early 1990s where he became active in opposition politics.
In 2005, he returned to Addis Abbaba again. He took part in that year’s election and was briefly imprisoned. after being freed, he founded a newpolitical movement, Ginbot 7, from his exile in London. The organisationwas alleged by the Ethiopian government to have launched a failed coupin 2009. Tsige was condemned to death in his absence.
In June 2014, he had flown to the Gulf to give lectures. An unexpected change to his return route saw him fly back via Yemen where he changed planes. At Sana’a airport, he was arrested by guards and put on a plane toEthiopia on the grounds that there was an extradition agreement between the two countries.
Supporters say that had he been born white and in the UK, the Foreign Office would have taken a more forceful line in campaigning for his releasefrom death row in east Africa. His partner, Yemisrach Hailemariam, and their three children live in London. She has campaigned actively for his freedom.
In February a delegation of MPs, led by Jeremy Corbyn, his local member,was scheduled to visit Ethiopia in an attempt to secure his release. The trip was abandoned following a meeting with the Ethiopian ambassador. (Text ends) Unexpected turbulence at Dublin Airport: seven passengers on inauguralflight from Ethiopia claim asylum (June 26, 2015) Seven passengers – including two children – on the inaugural Ethiopian Airlines flight throughDublin claimed asylum at the airport’s immigration gates.
A Garda spokeswoman this morning confirmed that it was five adults andtwo children that claimed asylum. “We are working with Ethiopian Airlinesto ensure proper processes are in place for people coming into the country,” she said. The new service from Addis Ababa stops in Dublin en route to Los Angeles and the maiden flight took place on Saturday. It is understood that the passengers disembarked and made their way to Dublin Airport’s immigration gates where they claimed asylum. They reportedly arrived at the desk without ID or travel documentation.

A spokeswoman for Ethiopian Airlines this morning insisted that all passengers on the flight had full legal documents when they boarded in Addis Ababa but said that the airline does not comment on individual cases. “Ethiopian Airlines has been operating for over 40 years in Europe and Dublin is its 11th City. “We only carry passengers with full legal documents and appropriate visas. We also carry out extra checks when indoubt and take guidance from appropriate immigration teams of the destination country we operate to, if needed,” she said.

An event to mark the airline’s first flight through Dublin had been taking place at the Departures gate a DAA spokeswoman said. “It’s literally tea,coffee and juice and we do this every new airline or flight to welcome thenew route. “Separately, downstairs, apparently passengers had declared asylum, but that’s a matter for the GNIB (Garda National Immigration Bureau),” she added.

A Justice Department spokesman said “it is a regular occurrence that claims for asylum be made by persons arriving at Dublin airport.” “In 2014, 221 persons claimed asylum at ports of entry having been refusedleave to land. “However, this must be seen in the context of overall numbers of persons refused leave to land and returned to where they came from. “In 2014, almost 2400 persons were refused entry to the State and returned to the place from where they came,” he said.

President Abdi Elay In The Front Line Against ONLF Combatants

(June 27, 2014) The president of Ethiopia’s Somali region, Abdi MahmudOmar known as Abdi IIay is drawing lessons from the deadly fighting between the Liyu Police (the region’s special police) and a Hawiye/Haber Ghedir confederation militia on the Ethiopian-Somalian border in late May/early June, the Indian Ocean Newsletter disclosed. Abdi Mahmud Omar, who is under pressure from the Ethiopian federal government, is working with the Somali officials, various factions and clanleaders to end the recurrent conflict.

According to the paper, following discussions in Jigiiga on 7 and 8 June between an Ethiopian delegation led by the ambassador Shemsuddin Ahmed Robleh and the Somalian side headed by the Secretary of State Minister for Presidency of the Federal Republic of Somalia, Mahad Mohamed Salad, he obtained an undertaking from the Hawiye/Haber Guedir traditional elders to collaborate against Ogaden National LiberationFront (ONLF) combatants.

At least 35 people, most of them civilians, have been killed in a week of clashes in the latest attack. A splinter faction of the ONLF has signed a peace deal with the Ethiopian government in 2010 but the other one has continued its armed struggle. Ethiopia has long designated the ONLF group as terrorist entity along with the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) and Ginbot-7 movement.The ONLF wants self-determination for residents of Ethiopia's Somali region, which is also known as Ogaden.The Somali National Regional State-also known as Zone Five- is one of the largest regions in Ethiopia. Around 85 percent of its population are nomads. (Textends)

OPPOSITION: Ginbot-7 Gearing Up for Change in Government'

Senior leaders of Ginbot7, Abebe Bogale and Dr. Tadesse Biru Kersemo,disclosed to ESAT that their movement is working expeditiously to bringEPRDF to the negotiation table or remove it from power altogether.

According to them all efforts exerted so far have produced appreciable results and a slew of coercive measures are underway to hasten the process of political change in Ethiopia. The two leaders have emphasised the role EPRDF could play in averting a serious and highly consequential political crises. The only viable way forward is to embrace the inescapablepolitical change and work towards a transitional arrangement where all political actors will have a role in governing the country until a duly constituted and democratically elected government takes over. The two leaders warned if EPRDF is not willing to negotiate, then change will comethrough other mechanisms including violent revolution. The two leaders say over the previous four years their organization has been operating modelled as a transitional government and were confident in their movements' capacity to fill any void should the EPRDF government is to collapse. According to the leaders, the movement has worked tirelessly tobring all political forces towards cooperation. Other efforts to break the pervasive media monopoly EPRDF has been enjoying for a long time has been successful. Ginbot7 of today is a movement with a strong and efficient organizational structure said the confident duo. Meantime, there has been no sign that the government plans on political reforms. Government officials have repeatedly said they will continue the policies ofthe Meles Zenawi. (Text ends)

From One-Party State to Democracy: Lessons for Ethiopia

By Daniel Teferra (PhD) June 29, 2015

In May 1991, the TPLF/EPRDF, a Marxist-Leninist rebel group, took state power in Ethiopia, sanctioned by the United States of America. But takingstate power militarily violates the fundamental principle of democracy, representation and playing by fair rules.

Ethiopia is not a democracy yet. It is a one-party state. In a one-party state, voting is a formality and its results become predictable. The real issue facing Ethiopia is a transition from a one-party state to a democracy.For instance, in the late 1980s, Ethiopia and Eastern European countries were both under a Marxist-Leninist, one-party rule. While Eastern European countries transitioned to a democracy, Ethiopia did not. There are useful lessons to be learned from the successful experience of Eastern Europe.

When the Second World War ended in 1945, the Allied Powers agreed thatEastern Europe would be Soviet Union's "sphere of influence." Consequently, the Soviet Union imposed Marxist-Leninist, one-party stateson Eastern European countries. For the following forty five years, these countries lived under one-party tyranny, marred by imprisonment, state murder and corruption.

Then the fate of Eastern Europe, all of a sudden, changed for the better when the Soviet Union was compelled to introduce its own reforms in the late 1980s. The Soviet Union encouraged similar reforms in its satellite states. This new development signaled that there would be no anti-reforminterventions in these countries by the Soviet Union unlike in the Hungarian uprising of 1956 and the Czech reforms of 1968. Consequently,intellectuals and labor leaders in Eastern European countries seized this opportunity and created open and free discussion groups to think about analternative political system for their societies. These discussion groups helped provide new leaders for the 1989 freedom and democracy movements in Eastern Europe. The new leaders were convinced that a Marxist-Leninist, one-party state had failed to create free and just societies in Eastern Europe. They were, therefore, not interested in reforming the one-party rule. Their primary goal was to replace it with a new system, which will respect individual freedom and allow the fulfillment of human potential. Thus, they adopted the philosophy of liberal democracy, embracing its fundamental values of civil and political rights, freedom of expression and economic liberty. Next,they organized extensive campaigns against the system of one-party rule.

The ruling regimes finally began to disintegrate as a result of the intensepressure created by the relentless campaigns.

In Poland, the Solidarity Movement managed to force the Communist government to roundtable talks, which produced a new constitution. The Constitution provided for free elections for a bicameral legislature, and allparties, including former Communists, were allowed to compete. In Hungary, the Democratic Forum, a pro-democracy coalition, persuaded the Communist regime to reach a roundtable agreement on a democracy package. This included freedom of association, assembly and the press; and a new electoral law, fundamentally changing the existing constitution.In Bulgaria, the Union of Democratic Forces used the Polish model of roundtable talks and reached an agreement with the government on transition to a democracy. The freedom and democracy movements in Eastern European countries, with the exception of Romania, were remarkably peaceful. Czechoslovakia's "Velvet Revolution" was able to assemble, at one point, as many as 800,000 peaceful protesters at Prague. Such a mass movement ultimately brought down the Communist government and transitioned the country to a democracy.

The 1989 popular protests in Eastern European countries succeeded because of three major factors: the Soviet reforms of the 1980s, the unityof purpose among the intellectual communities and political reformers, and finally the external support from the Roman Catholic Church, and the United States and its the Western allies. What are some of the lessons that Ethiopia's intellectuals and political reformers can take? In the first place, they have to come together and discuss openly and freely what kind of society they want to build for Ethiopia. They have to have first their own roundtable talks to sort out their divergent views. It is not hard to criticize the TPLF/EPRDF regime. It is not hard to constantly argue with one another. It is not hard to complain (abaetuta) to world powers (as if they would care) hoping to use them or be used by them.

On the other hand, what is hard, but is a sensible thing to do, is to come together and discuss intelligently in order to reach a consensus to abandon the system of one-party rule and transition the country to a democracy. There are presently two impediments to this. One is a parochial outlook. The other is a Marxist-Leninist mindset, which has beeninstitutionalized in Ethiopia in the last forty years. Ethiopia's intellectuals have to show independence and think objectively to tackle the real issue facing the country and provide voice of conscience for leadership and development of their society.

Finally, no mass movement for freedom and democracy can succeed without an international alliance. For instance, Eastern European countrieswere able to receive the support of the Roman Catholic Church and the Free World because, for one, their struggle coincided, luckily, with the interests of the Free World. But more importantly, the people were determined to end the system of one-party rule and transition to a democracy.

Thus, if the people of Ethiopia get united in their opposition to the systemof one-party rule and demand a transition to a democracy, it will not be inthe best interest of the United States and its Western allies, or any other country, to continue to stand by the TPLF/EPRDF regime. Furthermore, it needs to be mentioned that change is primarily internal; not external. In the final analysis, the responsibility to end the system of one-party rule and transition the country to a democracy rests on the people of Ethiopia themselves. Only working together in unison with one another can they fulfill this responsibility. Emeritus Professor of Economics at Ferris State University; UW-Whitewater; teferrad@uww.edu.

CocaCola Greeting (Tena yistellen)! Welcome to East Africa & Ethiopia

The rich and fertile highlands of Ethiopia – laden with historical treasures like the ancient tombs and obelisks of the Kingdom of Aksum (first to sixthcenturies AD) to 17th century castles – bear testimony to the country's fascinating past. The oldest independent country in Africa, its history dates back to around 3000BC, when Egyptian traders compiled the first records of Ethiopia.

Ethiopia is one of the founding members of the UN, the Group of 24 (G- 24), the Non-Aligned Movement, G-77 and the Organization of African Unity, with Addis Ababa serving as the headquarters of the African Union,the Pan African Chamber of Commerce and Industry, the UNECA, African Aviation Training HQ, the African Standby Force and much of global NGOsfocused on Africa.

Coca-Cola was first bottled in Ethiopia's capital Addis Ababa in 1959 bythe Ethiopian Bottling Share Company, which later opened a second branch in Dire Dawa in 1965.

The two plants were nationalized in 1975 and ran as public companies until 1996 when they were bought by Ethiopian entrepreneurs. Just prior to this, in 1995, Coca-Cola Sabco bought shares in the business and, in 1999, signed a joint venture agreement with the plants. With its leadership working hand in hand, the business has seen significant growthover the years. Processes and functions have been improved, resulting in considerable sales increases.

In 2001, Coca-Cola Sabco increased its shares to 61% and the companychanged its name to the East African Bottling Share Company (EABSC). The EABSC continues to run the two plants and has 700 employees.

East African Bottling Company (Coca Cola's) achievements include,

-In 2001, its two plants achieved The Coca-Cola Quality System (TCCQS)Phase One certification.

-In 2002, it celebrated the US$6,4-million upgrade project of its AddisAbaba plant.

-2003 saw the inauguration of the brand new 'Philipp H Gutsche TrainingCentre' at the Addis Ababa plant.

-In 2004, for the first time in its history, the EABSC registered a volumescore of 'Ten Million Plus'.

-In 2013 it inaugurated a new PET line and a massive expansion to itsDire Dawa Branch at a total cost of $70 million dollar.

-In 2013 it has gone live with SAP (Systems Application Products)

-In 2013 it has economically empowered more than 6000 women andcreated access for clean water for over 100,000 people in four different regions of Ethiopia together withThe Coca-Cola Africa Foundation.

-In 2013 it launched Route to Market Project.

-In 2013 it has received 30ha of land from the Bahir Dar cityadministration to build its third Coca-Cola factory

-In 2014 the Addis Ababa plant approved for ISO 9001/14001/18001 andthe Dire Dawa plant for ISO 14001/18001.Ethiopians enjoy a range of beverages from EABSC,including those from the Fanta group, Coca-Cola, Sprite, Schweppes, Coke Light and Dasani BottledWater. (Text ends)

The former Ethiopian Head of State and Life In Exile'

Mengistu Hailemariam moves to a new location' Exiled former Ethiopianstrongman Mengistu Haile Mariam is believed to be living in the scenic Vumba area, south east of this eastern border city. Sources told that Menguistu quietly Ieft Harare to settle in the Vumba area almost a year ago. He lives a lavish but reclusive life in Zimbabwe amid fears over his safety. The former Marxist ruler fled his motherland in late May, 1991 after a then rebel group led by the ruling-EPRDF overrun the Ethiopian army. The former dictator Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam was tried and found guilty of genocide in absentia and was sentenced to life in prison in January, 2007. But Zimbabwe where he received sanctuary due to friendship with President Robert Gabriel Mugabe, said it would not extradite him. He was initially staying in GunHill, a low density suburb for rich Zimbabweans in the capital Harare, but there was an assassination attempt against his life. Some armed Eritreans sneaked into Zimbabwe and trekked him to GunHill where they shot at him but he escapsed unhurt. His attackers were arrested and given lengthy jail terms. Sources told Lt. Colonel Mengistu was now staying in the Vumba area, a popular tourist spot with his family. They said he is under tight security protection,although he often frequents upmarket restaurants in the Vumba area suchas Genaina. Zimbabwean authorities have largely shielded him from the media since his arrival in late May, 1991. In the very few interviews he has given Zimbabwean media Mengistu Haile Mariam has said he had no regrets about his rule and that he tried his best for Ethiopia. Mengistu Haile Mariam in the rank of Majour this time came to power in September,1974 after the Ethiopian Revolution had overthrown the long-time and lastSolomonic dynasty emperor Haile Selassie I. Ethiopia mulls tough trafficking law, including death penalty'By Aaron Maasho, Reuters

July 2, 2015 ADDIS ABABA (Reuters) - Human traffickers in Ethiopia couldface life in jail or the death penalty under a bill presented to parliament onTuesday aimed at curbing the illegal flow of people in and out of the Horn of Africa country. The move comes two months after at least 30 Ethiopian migrants were shot and killed by Islamic State militants in Libya and after others have died while heading to Europe on rickety boats across the Mediterranean. The legislation, proposed by the Ministry of Justice, contains a range of penalties for trafficking and smuggling including fines of up to 500,000 birr ($7,500) and the death penalty in cases where victims suffer severe injury or death.

The bill must be approved by the House of Representatives, which could take several months, officials said. Although Ethiopia's economy is growing at one of Africa's fastest rates, unemployment still remains highand thousands of people opt to take treacherous treks across the Saharato reach Europe via the Mediterranean or brave the Gulf of Aden to reachwealthy Gulf states in search of jobs. For a period of several months beginning in late 2013, Saudi Arabia deported more than 163,000 Ethiopians it said lived in the Kingdom illegally. The U.S. State Department urged Addis Ababa last year to amend and strengthen its laws to tackle people smuggling, toughen penalties, boost judicial understanding and police capacity, as well as improve oversight ofrecruitment agencies. The draft legislation provides immunity to victims and proposes the formation of a national committee led by Ethiopia's deputy prime minister to coordinate anti-trafficking Activity. (Text ends)

UN calls for 'immediate release' of British activist jailed in EthiopiaANI July 5, 2015

The United Nations (UN) has called for the immediate release of an Ethiopian-British citizen being held on death row in Ethiopia for more thana year, a case which campaigners have claimed exposes Britain's poor diplomacy. Signalling an abrupt hardening of its stance on the case, experts from the UN Human Rights Council have asked Ethiopia to pay Andargachew Tsige 'adequate compensation' before sending him home toLondon, reported The Guardian.

An eight-page judgement handed to Ethiopia by the UNHRC's working group on arbitrary detention also claimed that 'reliable evidence' had suggested possible situation of physical abuse and mistreatment which could amount to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. Earlier, internalForeign Office emails, disclosed for the first time, had revealed that Tsige was abducted and jailed in an unknown location in June 2014, with many British officials voicing fears about real risk of torture if Tsige was returnedto Ethiopia. The 60-year-old was detained at Yemen's main airport while in transit and forcibly moved to the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa. He isa prominent opposition politician and an outspoken critic of the Ethiopian government and the country's human rights record. (ANI)

Post Meles Era: Ethio-Eritrea, Land Grab, Amhara Ethnic Displacement,GERD et-al'

VIEWS by Anonymous

It has been a while since I have stopped writing articles; I guess about three years now. However, I have been following up all episodes that havebeen taking place in Ethiopia on daily basis. I am writing in reference of four issue which I believe are very relevant to the context of Ethiopia.

These includes Ethiopia after Meles, Ethio-Eritrea, land grab issue, the displacement of amhara ethnic from the southern part of Ethiopia. I have to be quite frank that I never liked Meles Zenawi in his life time due to merely the way he had handled the Ethio-Eritrea issue before the war andafter the war, even worse all the EBBC, Alger’s agreement. I used to detest Meles Zenawi because of those things only. However, my heart completely flipped towards Meles Zenawi after the uncivilized way treatment of Meles Zenawi by Mr. Abebe Gelaw. Unfortunately, Meles did not stay long and he died. Thereafter, I was not sure what was in store for Ethiopia. But to my surprise, I have been impressed by the way EPRDF handled Ethiopia after Meles. Now the dust has settled. All the doom dayprophesy and oracles proved wrong by EPRDF.

However, the issue of Ethio-Eritrea still remains in the same state of no peace no war. I do believe the no war no peace state of affaires between Ethiopia and Eritrea is not a durable solution and it is not sustainable. As an Ethiopia who love both people equally and do not even believe in the independence of Eritrea due to the fact I am against anything that is related to colonialism. The fact I do not endorse Eritrea as independent state is not because I hate Eritreans. It is because I do believe it is not relevant and in the interest of the both people. I do not see the benefit 4 million deki Bahri Negash or deki Mereb Melash isolated in the north. I justdo not see the benefit even for them. Eritreans will better off working in a huge 94 million people market consumer Ethiopian than isolated like now. Time has proved me right that Eritreans did not get anything from independence than more suffering. My hope now is the after Meles EPRDF will end the Ethio-Eritrea issue a different way than before. In my opinion,I envision two solutions for Ethio-Eritrea problems: Put aside the past, andreunion of Eritrea with its motherland and work for better and democratic Ethiopia and eliminate all conflict, bias, hate, prejudice, war forever and the people live in peace as one people . That is a durable solution. It will benefit all people. Imagine, middle class Ethiopians spending weekends in Massawa Gurgusom beach all year round? Who benefit? It will be Tigrai and Eritrea. Because the rest of Ethiopians will shuttle through mekelle to massawa. Imagine the local tourism which benefit Tigreans and Eritreans in particular. This is the best scenario I think of as durable solution due to the fact that no peace no war is neither peace nor war. It is just keeps theproblem forever. Problem must be solved, but not postponed with no peace no war.
The second solution, if the above does not work, another durable solution can be portioning the red-sea into two: giving the third of the redsea to Ethiopia because Ethiopia owned the entire red sea for millennia and are entitled to own part of the Red sea. In my opinion, it must have 2/3 of theRed Sea and Eritrea must have 1/3 of the Red Sea. Thereafter normalize relation and let Eritrea determine its own destination. This is a durable solution. You can have a durable solution by appeasing only one side.
Durable solution must satisfy both parties and then both parties must be in peace after settling outstanding issues. I hope EPRDF will choose of these strategies. Then EPRDF has to deal with land grab issue another problem. I have red a lot of history books, the bible is my good resource.In biblical time, land used to be rented for share or rented up to ten years. The renter must pay rent and returned the land to the owner afterthe contract is ended. If someone failed to pay the rent, the owner used to take back the land and the renter. The renter used to become slave forthe landlord when he failed to pay the rent money. Apart from that, I never came across in biblical or modern time, land leased or rented for 100 years. There is no record in human history land rented or leased for100 years.

It is weird EPRDF which claims it fought to liberate citizens engaged in thisunholy business of taking away land from land owners by removing peoplefrom their ancestral land. The government does not have a right to take away land from land owners to give it to foreigners. This is not hate of foreigners. In every country land is reserved for citizens. You do not leaseor give away land to people form another continent who has nothing to dowith welfare of the people. Even in biblical time, the land used to be leased up to 10 years only for locals. EPRDF has done a second blunder onthis. While we were crying the way EPRDF handled the Eritrean issue, theykept on adding more mistakes by inviting water, land thirst Arabs, Indians,… and giving them other people land. I think this requires a consorted protest and opposition from citizens. When government do blunders like this, citizens must stand and say no this wrong. I hope we will do this in a civilized manner and give back the land to our people in Gambela. This is unholy business which will not benefit anyone. In turn, the land issue brought another concatenated problem, the displacement ofamhara ethnic from the south is also something weird. While the government is claiming that Ethiopia has more land and inviting foreignersand give them land. The government removes Ethiopians by claiming there is no land for other Ethiopians. This is really heart-breaking. I never expected this to happen. I have to be also honest,I have a lot of information on this. I know land ownership through inheritance has a longhistory. I am not sure even locals are claiming ownership which was takenby settlers, amhra ethnic. If that is the case, the government must have had a law that protects citizens and also addresses claims.
For instance, in South Africa, the whites now own the land. But the land belonged to the local blacks. When the whites settled in Southern Africa, they removed the people and put them in designated area and they took the land away from them. Then they have been using the land as their own for 400 years. But now after 400 or 500 years, the blacks wanted back their ancestral land. Who owns the land? The people who took over or who settled there, that is the white have no right of ownership. In Zimbabwe, the land is returned to the owners. In South Africa, the issue isstill outstanding and the local craving to take the land back. I do not knowthe history of the amhara ethnic in Benshangul zone or state. I was just puzzled and I was thinking that may be the amhara ethnics were settlers and the locals are claiming the land back. I do not see any other good reasons to evict 5000 people? It is very sad such happens to our people.
Anyway, whatever the reasons are, anything illegal is illegal. One can notremove 5000 people from where they live without any reasons and without any legal procedure.
That Amhara ethnic removal has exposed EPRDF ethnic policy weakness.It is good to have the ethnic federalism to ensure equality of ethnics, but it is not good not to have a law that enable citizens to live and work across the country. It is my hope the government will address this issue and such thing must never happen again. About the Abay Dam, whetherwe like it or not, Meles has passed but he has made history. Abay will beharnessed and only because of Meles Zenawi laid the corner stone.

Diasporas who oppose the Dam are lost; and those people who oppose the dam leave alone to help Ethiopia? They can not help themselves. Abaywill be harnessed and no one can stop it. All those who oppose the Dam are nothing but losers of all time. I do not believe even they have Faculty to think. .EPRDF has a big time on this Dam; they need to be applauded on this. We will defend the Dam and even die for it. Being political opponent is one thing, but opposing development is insaneness at its ugliest level. (Text ends)

A fragile truce has held, but the UN says ongoing disputes over the demarcation of the border threaten peace. Ethiopia is one of Africa’s poorest states, although it has experienced rapid economic growth since the end of the civil war. Almost two-thirds of its people are illiterate. Theeconomy revolves around agriculture, which in turn relies on rainfall. It isone of Africa’s leading coffee producers. Many Ethiopians depend on foodaid from abroad. In 2004 the government began a drive to move more than two million people away from the arid highlands of the east in an attempt to provide a lasting solution to food shortages.

Drought-prone and short of food, Ethiopia has suffered a series of faminesin recent decades. At the end of 2006 Ethiopia sent between 5,000 and 10,000 troops into Somalia to support forces of the weak transitional government there and helped to oust the Islamists who had controlled southern Somalia for six months. But, despite initial successes, the Ethiopians were unable to break thepower of the Islamists, who gradually began to win back lost territory.Ethiopia’s presence in Somalia formally ended in early 2009, when it pulled its troops under an agreement between the transitional Somali government and moderate Islamists. ETHIOPIA: The ruling PFDJ (Shabia) is helping TPLF (Woyanne) to divertpublic attention from domestic troubles that were compounded by the recent North Korean style elections

Editorial (July, 7, 2015)

I have yet to be able to confirm ESAT's recent report about Ginbot 7's military action in the Tigray region of Ethiopia. Many of the people I spokewith in Humera and surrounding towns say that they had heard about skirmishes between local Woyanne militia and a group of unidentified gunmen over the past week, but not the kind of full-scale war that was reported by ESAT. Others say that it was a brief exchange of gun shots between local militia and TPDM rebels. Few people I spoke with believe that Ginbot 7 has the capability to insert an armed group in Tigray region and wage a war.

Last night, Ginbot 7's public relations director Ephrem Madebo responded to my email inquiry with the following one-liner: "I wish God does the same favor to you that he did for the Biblical Elijah." I am not sure if he was sober when he wrote that. The only reason I contacted him was to live up to the agreement I made with Dr Berhanu Nega 3 weeks ago that Ishould contact the PR officer before I write any thing about Ginbot 7.

Whether or not there was a military offensive in Tigray this week, ESAT's report seems to have benefited both Woyanne and Shabia at the expenseof Ethiopia. Woyanne is benefiting by diverting the attention of an angry and frustrated population, not to mention a growing international criticismover its human rights atrocities.

Shabia is benefiting by expanding its influence in the Ethiopian oppositioncamp through Ginbot 7 and ESAT. Shabia is orchestrating a deafening propaganda campaign that is intended to position Ginbot 7 as the only dominant opposition force -- not to benefit Ethiopia, but to achieve its ultimate goal of Balkanizing the country.

Currently, these two anti-Ethiopia forces, Woyanne and Shabia, are completely dominating Ethiopian politics both from the ruling and opposition sides, thanks to Ginbot 7's willingness to make itself a puppet of Shabia. We Ethiopians must never forget for a second that both Woyanne and Shabia have the same goal, i.e., to subjugate, Balkanize and plunder Ethiopia. From what I have personally observed over the pastfew years, and as many knowledgeable people have been informed me fora long time, Shabia considers Eritrea not free until Ethiopia is divided into multiple mini-states.

Let's also consider the fact that Shabia and its financial backers do not look at Woyanne as an existential threat. What they look as an existentialthreat is pro-unity Ethiopians. That is why Shabia will never allow a unitedEthiopian opposition to operate out of Eritrea. And now it is going even further in trying to infiltrate and control the Ethiopian opposition camp through our own Ginbot 7 and ESAT. Shabia is investing millions of dollarsfor this purpose.

My fellow Ethiopians, we must not gamble away Ethiopia's future to Shabia just because we feel desperate today. We have better alternativesto free our country from both Woyanne and Shabia, the twin enemies of Ethiopia. Let's come together and work to make sure that both Woyanne and Shabia are no more threats to Ethiopia. Let's remember Berhanu Nega's warning. (Text ends)

LANGUAGE: Top 10 Reasons: why Afaan Oromo should be thefederal working language' By Birhane Meskel Abebe Segni

Nowhere in the world has the government of the country refused to speakthe language of the majority of its people. It is weird, unthinkable, unjust,undemocratic, immoral, and absolutely unacceptable. Ethiopia is all of these. The Ethiopian federal government and two of its largest cities do not speak the language of the majority of the people, Afaan Oromo. This is a preliminary outline to say the obvious. Make Afaan Oromo legally andunconditionally the working language of the federal government of Ethiopia and the two largest cities of Addis Ababa and Dire Dawa.

Here are the top ten reasons why:

1. Demographic Reasons: Afaan Oromo, the language of the Oromo people, is the single most widely spoken language in Ethiopia and the fourth largest African language in terms of the number and size of speakers. It is spoken in at least three countries outside Ethiopia. Although statistical data's may vary, about 50% of the Ethiopian population are estimated to speak Afaan Oromo. In comparison, only about 29.1% of the entire population of Ethiopia speaks Amharic, the legally imposed official language of the Federal government and the two largest cities of Dire Dawa and Addis Ababa. Given this demographic weight; it is unjust, undemocratic, and discriminatory to say the least notto use the language of the majority of the people as working language ofthis multinational and multilingual country.

2. Geographic Reasons: All of the segregationist entities including the federal government, the Addis Ababa City Administration, and the Dire Dawa city administrations are based in and hosted in the Afaan Oromo speaking Oromia National Regional State. Yet, due to the discriminatory and exclusionary Amharic only language policy, the federal government institutions and these two large cities do not speak the language of the host people and the host state. These entities which feels like an occupying force rather than a governing force cannot continue as Amharicspeaking island in the middle of the sea of Afaan Oromo speaking population while fully relying on the resources of the Oromo people for their existence including food, water, electricity, ports, waste disposals and roads at a very high human, financial and environmental cost to theOromo people and the Oromia state.

3. Unity of the country as a Reason: The exclusionary Amharic only language policy is the antithesis of the multilingual and multicultural nature of Ethiopia. The Ethiopian federal government and the two segregationist cities under its administration have an urgent national duty,if they care, to abolish this divisive and dangerous policy that undermines the equality, mutual respect and peaceful coexistence of the Ethiopian people. Ethiopia cannot continue as united whole with its current segregationist policy which benefits one segment of the population while fully excluding the other segment of the population.

4. Economic and job opportunities: This segregationist and exclusionary Amharic only language policy of the federal government and the two largest cities of Addis Ababa and Dire Dawa have fully and completely excluded Afaan Oromo speakers from all federal, municipal, corporate, and private jobs as well as all economic and business opportunities including the right to do business and live in these jurisdictions unless onespeaks Amharic. All employees of the federal government and these two largest cities are 100% Amharic speakers. Less than 10% of ethnic Oromos who were assimilated into Amharic speaking are presently employed both in the federal government institutions and by these two segregationist cities. Even worse, none of the federal government offices and offices of these two cities including hospitals, businesses and all otherservice providers provide translation services for Afaan Oromo speaking customers and users. Yet, Afaan Oromo speakers and their state, Oromia,is the economic backbone and major sources of export and tax revenue for the federal government and these two segregationist cities.

5. Representational Reasons: The Ethiopian federal government institutions and its bureaucracies; and the two major cities of Addis Ababaand Dire Dawa legally excluded Afaan Oromo speakers by adopting Amharic as their only working language. Under this condition, it is very hard to either say Afaan Oromo speakers are represented in the Federal Government and these two cities or the federal government and these twocities represent the Afaan Oromo speakers. The rootless Amharic speakingethnic Oromo political appointees the government and these two cities flag as representatives of the Afaan Oromo spearkers are outlaws who don’t even represent themselves. Even the percentage of assimilated, culturally and linguistically disconnected ethnic Oromos employees in Ethiopian federal institutions and the institutions of these two major cities as a whole are less than 10%. This is in a country where the Oromo people constitute more than 40% of the total population.

6. Legitimacy Reasons: The government that does not speak the languageof the people it claims to govern neither do speak for that people nor do legitimately represents the interests of that people. For the Ethiopian government to be considered legitimate representative of the Afaan Oromo speaking population, it must speak Afaan Oromo and be the representatives of the interests of the Afaan Oromo speakers at all levelsof its institutions not just in nominal political appointee positions and portfolios.

7. Justice, Equality, Equity and Fairness Reasons: Justice, equality, equity and fairness demands equal opportunity and equal treatment of Afaan Oromo speakers on equal basis as the Amharic speaking segment of the population. The Amharic only language policy of the federal government and the two segregationist cities have completely left the Afaan Oromo speaking population outside all economic, social, religious and educationalinstitutional framework creating a country where close to half of its population lives in subhuman situation without any single institution of their own. The Ethiopian federal government and these two largest cities must not only immediately abolish this unjust, discriminatory and apartheid language policy but also invest financial and human resources tocreate Afaan Oromo economic, religious, cultural and educational institutions; and adopt economic empowerment policies that will remedy and address the historical injustice Afaan Oromo speakers passed throughand are passing through right now.

8. Multilingualism to create bond among various nations and nationalities:The Amharic only policy that was intended to assimilate over 80% of the Ethiopian population into the Amharic speaking few or exclude them from the political, economic, religious, and social structure and institutional fabrics of the Ethiopian state has created a very racist and hate groups who don't accept and respect the equality of various nations, nationalities,languages, and various ethnic identities. This dangerous policy has now lent legitimacy to the development of racist and hate groups who claim tostruggle for the 'unity of Ethiopia in the name of this Amharic only language policy' to openly discriminate, propagate hatred towards non-Amharic speakers, and even issue racist political manifestos in a way that will destroy the social bond among various nations and nationalities of Ethiopia. The main targets of these hate and racist groups incubated and developed through this Amharic only racist and bigotry policies are the Afaan Oromo speaking population of Ethiopia.

9. One language and one ethnic hegemony policies will kill Ethiopia: Diverse and pluralistic Ethiopia can only stand on the acceptance of the policy of unity through diversity. The two most important challenges that works against this most important policy presumption to keep diverse andunited Ethiopia are the effort to create one ethnic hegemonic country andthe Amharic only language policies. These are two equally cancerous and terminal policies that will kill Ethiopia. Ethiopia will only continue to exist on multinational and multilingual federal structure where mutual respect and peaceful coexistence of its multiple nations and nationalities are protected and respected by institutionalizing constitutional system of governance where fair economic power and political power sharing mechanism are legally established. Making Afaan Oromo the working language of the federal government and the two largest cities will open the door to save this sick and disabled country that now operates with lessthan one third of its potentials.

10. Language as a core factor in Human Development: The only means and avenue through which any human society could produce, develop, exchange and disseminate knowledge and information for self-actualization, economic and social development is language. The Ethiopianfederal government and the two segregationist cities of Addis Ababa and Dire Dawa denied the Afaan Oromo speaking population of Ethiopia this fundamental, inalienable and basic rights through its Amharic only policies. No wonder Ethiopia is the tail of the world and at the very bottomin human development index. As a conscientious member of the Afaan Oromo speaking society and because of the above listed reasons and so many others, I call upon the Ethiopian government to immediately and unconditionally abolish the Amharic only language policy and make Afaan Oromo the working language of the federal government and the two largest cities of Addis Ababa and Dire Dawa. ETHIOPIA/SOUTH SUDAN: The Impact of Sudan Civil Wars on theAnyuaks of Ethiopia'

(ANALYSIS) The Anyuak communities in both Ethiopia and Sudan (now South Sudan) are bordering to the most hostile communities in Africa. Since 1955 until 2005, Sudan, like most African countries, has experienced three consecutive civil wars. The first civil war (Anyanya/Anya-Nya) local meaning "Snake" for erupted in 1955 and ended in 1972. The peace agreement which was signed in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, in 1972 did last long. The discontented former Anyanya I leaderstook up arm again in 1975 and formed Anyanya II.

However, after seven years, the Anyanya I was hijacked and was converted to South Sudan Liberation Army/Moment (SPLA/M) in 1983. The liberation moment waged civil war against North Sudan government until comprehensive agreement was signed in Kenya in 2005. All these civil wars were furnished by the Anyauks and they were carried out in theAnyuaks' lands. Regrettably, the Anyuaks in both Ethiopia and South Sudan have not benefited from these two civil wars. Instead, they lost their livelihood, lives, lands, culture, and etc. Even though the author of this article did not witness the suffering of the Anyuaks in the hand of Anyanya I, it is rational to assert that the Anyuaks must have suffered in the hand of Anyanya I as well. During the 39 years of the civil wars, the Anyuaks' land and natural resources had been used up. Their wives were gang raped, their children were kidnaped, killed, their foods were robbed,and their cattle were raid.

When South Sudan Liberation Army/Moment (SPLA/M) was waging civil war against the Northern government in the 1980s, the Anyuaks were very hospitable to the South Sudanese refugees who came to their land. The Anyuaks would share whatever they have with the refugees; the Anyuaks would give the freedom fighters benign passages to wherever they were going; and some of the refugees were even integrated into theAnyuaks' communities.

On the other hand, the SPLA/M and South Sudanese refugees alike were very hostile to the Anyuak communities. Both SPLA/M and the refugees had hatred toward the Anyuaks. When Sudanese refugees were residing inItang, one of the cities in Gambella, Ethiopia, the refugees would go outside the city and hideout to wait for women to gang raped them or waited for someone who had something of value to rob. During 39 years of Sudan civil war both SPLA/M and refugees had done vices things to the Anyuaks and the Anyuaks will never forget. The SPLA/M hostility even went further when they opened fire on the unarmed civilians in Pnyodo, one of the cities in Gambella, Ethiopia and killed a numbers of people. When the SPLA/M was evicted in 1991, they dismantled all the houses orany building in Itang and other areas they were residing. The rationale behind the destruction of the properties was that they do not want the inhabitants to use the buildings or houses that were built for SPLA/M or refugees. This is just to mention few of the immoralities things the SPLA/M and South Sudanese refugees have done to the Anyuaks.

After 22 years of civil war, the SPLA/M and Khartoum government signedcomprehensive peace agreement in Kenya in 2005 that led to South Sudan's independent in 2011. In December 2013, South Sudan was engulfed with civil war again and the Southern Sudanese refugees are pouring into Gambella, Ethiopia.

These refugees are not mere refugees but they are from the Ethnic Nuers who were briefly trained in South Sudan border with Gambella and sent toSouth Sudan major cities to fight the incumbent President Salva Kirr's government. When the Nuers were badly defeated, they came back to Gambella and seek refuge in the region. These refugees are also heavily armed. Gambella region is facing anarchism again because these refugeesare the Nuers ethnic groups who claimed to have dual citizens. They claimed they are Ethiopians but at the same time they believe they are Southern Sudanese.

The Anyuaks border with some of the wildest people in the world, and thegovernments in both Ethiopia and South Sudan do not provide them with the needed protections. During Col. Mingestu Hallemaraim's government, farmer association used to have militias and those militias somehow protected the Anyuaks' lives. However, the current government not only disarmed the Anyuaks but it also criminalized gun ownership. Therefore, if the federal and regional governments do not take major steps to protectthe Anyuaks' land and lives, we will lose one of the best. (Text ends)

RULE of LAW: Supporting the ultimate struggle for building democraticsystem in Ethiopia.

There was no reign or rule in the history of Ethiopia like the rule of TPLF under the disguise of EPRDF under which Ethiopians humiliated, undignified, undermined and lost their identity. At present the fundamental trouble of Ethiopia and its citizens is not just an abridgmentor depletion of basic democratic and human rights but also the sovereignty of this ancient country is under great danger to continue or prevail as a unified nation. In consequence, liberators and freedom fighters are sacrificing their lives to the freedom of the people of Ethiopiaand emancipate the country from the imposed danger. Ethiopia and its citizens have never been endangered and humiliated as under the rule ofthe TPLF led EPRDF regime. The current problem of the country and its people is not only a question of lack of basic human rights, but it is a matter of life and death to the people and existence of the Ethiopia as a sovereign nation.

Obama Should Stay Away From Ethiopia - Washington wants a stable partner in the Horn of Africa. But cozying up to the repressive regime in Addis Ababa isn't the way to go about finding one. FOREIGN POLICY EDITORIAL July 8, 2015: Later this month, President Barack Obama willbecome the first sitting U.S. president to ever visit Ethiopia, Africa's second-most populous country, and a nation viewed by many as a bastionof stability in a region otherwise beset with civil strife. The trip — which will also include a stopover in Kenya — is being billed as part of the Obama administration's regional efforts "to accelerate economic growth, strengthen democratic institutions, and improve security."

These are indeed laudable goals and should be actively pursued by the U.S. government. But the timing and tenor of the visit to Addis Ababasends a worrying signal that Washington's priorities — not only in Ethiopia, but on the entire continent — are actually at odds with the president's oft-repeated rhetoric about advancing human rights and strengthening African democracy and institutions.

Let's be clear: Ethiopia is not a model of democracy that should be rewarded with a presidential visit. The long-ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front, or EPRDF, now in power for 25 years, claimed a landslide victory in legislative polls held in May, winning all 547parliamentary seats, which places it among the ranks of North Korea andSaddam Hussein's Baathist Iraq in terms of the sheer efficiency of its electoral sweep. The results should not have come as a surprise: The ruling party swept the last four elections, including in 2010, in which it took a whopping 99.6 percent of the vote. This time around, Washington and the European Union did not even bother sending election observers,knowing full well that an EPRDF victory was a foregone conclusion.

The lead up to the May 24 vote saw a widespread crackdown on journalists, human rights activists, and opposition supporters. What's worse, Obama's trip was announced on June 19, the same week it was revealed that three opposition party members were murdered in the country, all under highly suspicious circumstances.

So why is President Obama visiting a country where democracy is in such a sorry state and where human rights violations remain systemic and widespread? Because, despite the obvious lack of political rights and civil liberties in Ethiopia, and its status as one of the top jailers of journalists inthe world, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn is palatable to Washington and other Western donors precisely because of who he is not:a retrograde dictator in the mold of his regional counterparts, Isaias Afwerki of Eritrea or Omar al-Bashir of Sudan. The brutal and often heavy-handed oppression exhibited by the latter two regimes is brazen, whereas Desalegn and the ruling party work within the (regime-controlled) judicial system, giving their repression a veneer of legality.

A former academic, Desalegn's elevation to the highest office in Ethiopia came courtesy of the sudden death in 2012 of Ethiopia's strongman, MelesZenawi, who had ruled the country for two decades. Zenawi was a favoritein Washington: Though he brutally crushed political opponents and implemented a series of draconian laws meant to muzzle the press and stifle dissent, he also managed to establish an image of Ethiopia as a stable and growing economy in the troubled Horn of Africa. Zenawi's Western allies, particularly the United States, applauded the country's modest economic growth and the regime's willingness to endorse the so- called "War on Terror." As a result, leaders in Washington routinely turned a blind eye to the EPRDF's rampant human rights abuses and its ongoing suppression of civil society, the media, and political opposition.

Several key Obama advisors were close associates and personal friends ofthe late prime minister. Susan Rice, Obama's national security advisor andformer top diplomat at the United Nations, for instance, made no secret ofher esteem for and friendship with Zenawi, whom she eulogized as "a servant leader." Another top Obama aide, Gayle Smith — the current nominee to lead the United States Agency for International Development, which provided Ethiopia nearly $500 million in 2013 — was also never shyabout her admiration for Zenawi.

Desalegn, largely seen as a compromise candidate for the shaky, ethnicity-based EPRDF coalition, has continued to rule in the same mode — and Washington's perverse need to embrace a dictator in technocrat's clothing has continued. In April, one month before Ethiopia's sham elections, U.S. Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Wendy Sherman publicly praised Ethiopia's "democracy" during a visit to the country, whichState Department spokeswoman Marie Harf further bolstered by saying "her statements fully reflect the U.S. government's positions." Even a cursory glance at Ethiopia's abysmal human rights record would turn this bogus claim on its head.

On June 25, the State Department released its annual human rights reporton Ethiopia, citing widespread "restrictions on freedom of expression," "politically motivated trials," "harassment and intimidation of opposition members and journalists," "alleged arbitrary killings … torture," "limits on citizens' ability to change their government," and restrictions on freedom of assembly, association, and movement. Yet Ethiopia's donors, including the United States, which provides nearly half of Ethiopia's national budget, have continued to ignore these signs of trouble. The facade of economic growth and the West's eagerness for a "development success story" to tout on the international stage has seemingly precluded genuine diplomatic pressure to reform.

To be sure, deeply afflicted countries surround Ethiopia. Despite recent progress, Somalia faces credible and ongoing threats from the al Qaeda affiliated militant group, al-Shabab. South Sudan has devolved into an intractable civil war with no end in sight. Kenya has yet to fully overcomethe ramifications of post-election violence in 2007–2008, not to mention its inability to ward off al-Shabab's cross border attacks. Eritrea, dubbed by some as the North Korea of Africa, remains a highly repressive police state from which hundreds of thousands continue to flee. Further afield, Yemen is in a state of bloody lawlessness. By contrast, Ethiopia has remained largely stable.

Despite this outward veneer of stability and progress, Ethiopia's current system is unsustainable. A onetime vocal opposition has been systematically weakened. Ethnic discontent is rife. Religious revival has been met with brutal state repression. Economic prosperity is not widely shared and inequality continues to rise. Nepotism and corruption plague an already bloated bureaucracy. Youth unemployment is a persistent andserious challenge. Independent media, the human rights community, andcivil society writ large have been decimated. And countless citizens are being displaced from their ancestral lands under the guise of development. These factors, taken together, may ultimately sow the seeds of a tangled conflict that could reverberate across an already troubled and tense region.

In this context, Obama's upcoming visit to Ethiopia sends the wrong message on Washington's stated commitment to strengthening democratic institutions — not strongmen — in Africa. What is more, turning a blind eye to widespread human rights abuses for the sake of counterterrorism cooperation and so-called "regional stability" may prove to be a self-defeating strategy that is bad in the long term for the UnitedStates, as well as for citizens throughout the Horn of Africa.

If the United States wanted to help strengthen democratic institutions andstand in solidarity with Africans, who are now more than ever demanding democracy, then Nigeria would have been a much better alternative model. Nigeria, Africa's most populous nation and its largest economy, held landmark elections this March, in which an opposition candidate ousted an incumbent who then graciously accepted defeat. In Ethiopia, this scenario remains a pipe dream for its 96 million citizens. The ruling party is now set to lord over the country at least until 2020, allowing it to further entrench its repressive machinery and to extend its dominance long beyond its current mandate.

It is unlikely that Obama and his handlers will change the itinerary of hisupcoming trip. However, it is not too late for the president, and for the United States government, to speak honestly to the people of Ethiopia, making it clear that the historic visit is not intended to validate or otherwise endorse the EPRDF's autocratic dominance. Rather, Obama should be clear with EPRDF leadership, both in private and most importantly, in public that the United States appreciates the complex challenges facing the country and that repression is not an acceptable means of addressing them.

Obama and his staff should also meet openly with Ethiopia's political opposition and civic leaders, including those based in the country and abroad in Kenya, where many have been forced to relocate due to increasing oppression at home. Obama should additionally raise the issueof the recently murdered opposition members, as well as the many casesof journalists, activists, and political prisoners who have been wrongly jailed and arbitrarily detained under a raft of draconian laws that have criminalized dissent.

In the long term, the U.S. government should redouble its commitment toEthiopia's beleaguered civil society. Obama's 2016 budget request includes more than $400 million in assistance to the country, of which lessthan 1 percent is allocated for democracy and human rights programming — an actual improvement from last year, when zero was devoted to this vital sector, much of the spending going towards health and humanitarianaid. A robust, reenergized, and empowered Ethiopian civil society, in which human rights groups are free to operate, is central to deepening democratic principles, not only in Ethiopia but also throughout the East and Horn of Africa.

Overall, Obama must firmly reiterate that stability and security, and respect for basic human rights, and the legitimacy of civil society are notmutually exclusive objectives in Ethiopia or elsewhere. Rather, he shouldbe unequivocal — in both rhetoric and in practice — that, together, these issues help form an unshakable and long-term pillar for U.S. engagementon the African continent. Wendy Sherman, undersecretary of state for political affairs, praised Ethiopian democracy on April 16 of this year during a visit to the country.Mohammed Ademo is an editor at Al Jazeera America. Ethiopia after its electoral drama: second “renewal” imminent ?

By René Lefort July 8, 2015

(OPINION) The history of this country is one of eternal recurrence. The‘national question” re-emerges where it has always been, with varyingdegrees of visibility: at the heart of Ethiopian political life.

The so called “dominante party” steamroller has flattened everything in itsway. The opposition held one seat in the outgoing parliament. It will not hold a single one in the parliament elected on May 24, 2015. And of the 1,987 seats in the regional parliaments, only three will have escaped the ruling party. In the light of these figures, the multi-party state that the regime claims to have established remains a distant mirage.

The first factor in this sweeping triumph is the first-past-the-post electoralsystem. Under a proportional system, with 9% of the votes, the oppositioncould have counted on some fifty MPs.

Vigorous economic growth also played a hefty role. Even if the official figures are exaggerated, annual growth has probably been running at around 6% to 7% for the last decade. The infrastructure boom is astonishing, as is the proliferation of schools and health centres, the widening of access to drinking water and, more generally, a net reductionin the percentage of people in poverty, although the number of those below the national poverty line remains stable, currently at around one quarter of the population.

Now with more than 7 million members, one in five Ethiopians aged between 20 and 65 is a member of the EPRDF. The so-called “one to five”system was created to build a “development army”. The idea is that each“model farmer” – obviously a party member – should bring five peasant neighbours in his wake. However, this “army” has also become a multi- tentacled tool to enlist and to control the whole population.

Finally, the opposition is virtually non-existent. The National Electoral Board, making sovereign decisions based on murky criteria, inter alia, about the eligibility of candidates, contributed to this, and even more so an increasingly constricted political sphere. However, the opposition is also a victim of its own divisions and the inconsistency of its programmes.

This weakness arises, amongst other things, from the extreme difficulty ofbuilding a political force with the goal of acceding to power not through the gun but through the ballot box, when there is no evidence that the ruling power would accept the result, and in a country where power has historically always been acquired by force.

In consequence, these elections were – as expected – no more than a ritual performance and, as such, failed to play one of their essential roles:to bring to the fore during the campaign – explicitly and clearly – problems that have been becoming ever more acute, in particular since the death of the omnipotent Prime Minister Meles Zenawi in 2012.

In the absence of a real opposition and a vigorous civil society, they can only be tackled within the de facto single party, the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). The question is, does it want to and is it able to tackle them? Time presses. Each of the party's four components – Tigrean People's Liberation Front (TPLF), Amhara National Democratic Mouvement (ANDM), Oromo People's Democratic Organisation(OPDO), Southern Ethiopian People's Democratic Movement (SPDM) – willbe holding their congresses in August, the EPRDF as a whole in September.

Sebhat Nega, patriarch of the TPLF since its foundation, no longer holds any official position within the Front. In reality, he continues to play a decisive role, along with a handful of former senior figures from the "old guard". In spring of last year, after a trial of strength with the Front's current leadership, which has changed since 2010, following a rejuvenation campaign decided by and begun under Meles Zenawi, this group was the first to sound the alarm after visiting Tigray to hear what the people had to say. With a frankness that he is one of the few to allow himself to express, he delivers his assessment: "the people is not satisfied, it has a lot of grievances."[1] Sebhat begins by identifying three:"corruption, bad governance and lack of accountability." These may be theheadline criticisms, but the censure goes much further.

The developmental state

Petty corruption has become systemic. It is standard practice amongst local authorities and officials – almost all party members – and arouses powerful resentments. Inflation also weighs heavily, quantitatively affecting farmers more than the urban populations, since more than half of the former are net purchasers of food, unable to produce enough for their needs. "Inflation is worse than prison", is a common refrain. True, it has fallen, but prices have nonetheless doubled over the last four years. In any case, it is probably not the countryside that is likely to be the arenafor inflation-fuelled "food riots", given the ascendancy of the new class of "rich" peasants, many of whom are now supporting the regime.

In the cities, on the other hand, the possibility of such riots is one of the regime's obsessive fears, especially with the explosion in youth unemployment, even amongst recent graduates. Recently, it has taken ona particularly tragic form: the clandestine migration of tens of thousands of boat people via the Mediterranean, but also – with much less media coverage – via the Red Sea to the Arabian Peninsula.
This exodus raises a crucial question: nobody in the leading circles disputes that the "developmental state" should remain in charge of key sectors and rigorous economic planning. However, funding is becoming more and more problematic. Loan repayments, in particular to private banks, will soon start to become a burden. The deficit in the trade and services balance accounts for almost a fifth of GDP, external debt – though still moderate – has risen to almost half of GDP. The estimates forfuture growth are expected to diminish. [2]The early outlines of the next five-year Growth and Transformation Plan suggest a more "liberal" economic strategy. The idea is that the private sector, largely from abroad, will set up "sweatshops", bringing local investors in its wake and thereby absorbing mass unemployment. However, this assumes that foreign capital will flood in,[3] and even more that local capital will follow:this is the only way to generate a dense network of small and medium- sized enterprises, the main potential source of jobs.
However, domestic capital continues to neglect industry in favour of services, where risks are lower and profits higher. The real challenge, therefore, is to find a good balance between continuing necessary public intervention and increasing the entrepreneurial autonomy essential to a market economy. This is a vital issue for the ruling party: the main creditto the regime is coming from the high levels of growth. "As long as the state will deliver, its legitimacy will be kept", is the refrain that emanatesfrom the business community and experts in international institutions.
Ethiopia stuck
In a 180° turnaround from its previous laudatory positions, The Economistconcluded a highly critical article as follows:"Endless red tape and restrictions on finance deter investors… Only further reforms can sustain the goals of economic growth and political stability… (But) Ethiopia is stuck."
Reform versus deadlock: that is the heart of the economic problem. Firstin the dock is the EPRDF. It has turned the entire state and its components into a satellite. Front and state have merged. Civil servantswho are not party members are few and far between. As a result, the agenda of the Front and its hierarchy takes precedence over that of the state, party obedience hinders the free exercise of professional competence. The complaints about this issue are constant. Yet the smarter public management required by a more advanced economy demands that administrative managers should have freedom in their analyses and proposals. In the private sector, the obligation to meet the growing demands of the party, which include “voluntary contributions” and baksheesh, are less and less tolerated. While the multinationals have access to the topmost political echelons, small entrepreneurs are in the hands of small-time local operators. Finally, there is the weight of history:centuries of authoritarianism, an implacable sense of hierarchy, a ruling power that has always been the fulcrum of the economy, government membership or high connections that have always offered the opportunityfor lucrative rewards. In short, the legacy of a “mediaeval culture”, as thehistorian Haggai Erlich calls it. Reform is on the TPLF agenda, but with no direct priority in the economic sphere. “There is a gap between the demand of the people and the supply brought by the Party, the government, and all of their services”, asserts Sebhat Nega. Indeed, “the Front is staggering… Its political soul is not lost, but it is at least too weak”. “Massification” – the transition in party membership from 400,000to 7 million in ten years – has taken place in the absence of “a very disciplinary political education”, as was the rule during the armed struggle: it has thrown open the doors to “power mongers and rent seekers”, the expression used for those who take venal advantage of theirposition.

The TPLF has become a “machinery which has lost its capacity of producing people who are qualified, competent and committed to the cause of the people”. And this machinery is also – at least partially – pursuing its own course: “it is not deeply organized so it doesn’t fully control its people, it isn’t strictly followed.” Consequence: “the Front must be revived and purified.” It needs to be repoliticised in order to recapture the militant purity of the glorious era of armed struggle. Sebhat Nega callsfor a second campaign of “renewal” (“Tehadso”), lasting “three or four years”. According to him, the first “renewal” focused on the political line after the 2001 TPLF’s internal crisis, with the elimination of key figures from its leadership, followed by the purge of thousands of mid-level cadres. The second would concern only people and organization. To make an ecclesiastical parallel: the dogma is irreproachable, the rules impeccable, but there are too many lost sheep…

The first goal is for the Front once again “to internalize the problems, theircauses and the issues”. So everyone must be “free to speak his mind without any fear” at all levels, not only internal but also external: “zero defence between the party and the people.” This freedom must also applyin the famous sessions of gimgema (criticism and self-criticism), one of the Front’s political and functional keystones. They have drifted, and needto recapture their original purity, which includes opening them up without fear or taboo to the people, before whom local officials will need to account for their actions.

But nobody, even the Front's most "reformist" members, is calling for thisprocess of democratisation to challenge the party's "democratic centralism". Open debate about everything, fine, but the decision-makingprocess must remain the prerogative of the leadership, which can then draw on all the discussion in reaching its conclusions.

Meles Zenawi's Legacy

Should this democratisation be extended – even timidly – to civil society? For Sebhat, the Front needs first to be successfully updated in order to deprive the present "destructive opposition" – as it is commonly called - ofits critiques when they are justified, and thereby make room for the emergence of a "loyal opposition". However, others go further. If they are not given some elbow room, opponents will only be tempted by armed extremism, religious or ethnic, or seek to encourage popular uprisings, thereby compromising the country's long-term stability. An external stimulus is needed to prevent the EPRDF stagnating again. [5]

The second objective is to purge the Front of its "rent seekers" and "powermongers", at all levels. "The party machinery has to be rebuilt", explains Sebhat Nega, "but through a political process, not an administrative one." To achieve this, he simply points to the upcoming congresses, where the "agendas should circulate at the grassroots level". Then the central committee and finally the executive council will need to "assign people with clear duties" and impose "responsibility and accountability, at all levels, from the bottom to the top". But young and devoted members of the Front are more explicit: the purge must include members of the current leadership. Their view is that these leaders have completely failed,that their eradication is a necessary condition if the Front is to recover its popularity.

Few, however, are bold enough to break a near taboo: questioning the dark side of Meles Zenawi's legacy. It is after the 2001 crisis that the Front gradually mutated into a "machinery". Meles held it in an iron grip. Meles and Meles alone devised and relentlessly imposed what became thecountry's intellectual orthodoxy, preventing the emergence of any independent thinking. He transformed the Front into a multi-tentacled channel for the communication of orders from above – penetrating the remotest hamlet – and into an organ of control of the population. Some ofhis most ardent admirers go so far as to concede that he appointed too many "yes-men" to key positions. In return for blind discipline and total commitment, its members progressively came to see the party as an escalator to greater powers and material benefits, by legal but increasingly by illegal means. After its designer, builder and principal – if not sole – beneficiary died, without a leader of his stature emerging, this decapitated, depoliticised and devitalised pyramid lacks the indispensable internal strength to play its role as the near-single party.

In consequence, hidden failings of this system have come to light. The most striking is the dislocation of the leadership. Since the TPLF, the pillarof the EPRDF and by far the most robust and legitimate of the EPRDF's components, is "staggering", a chain reaction has begun. In the other components, where again the real "bosses" are not always – indeed rarely – those who hold the highest positions. In the government, despite its facade of unity. In the army and security services, which run their showpretty much as they like. At national level, where centrifugal forces are increasingly evident. And above all between the four components of theEPRDF, whose cohesion is cracking.

When questioned about this, Sebhat Nega responds soothingly. He can't ignore the fact that if the TPLF "staggers", the whole EPRDF edifice inevitably totters. But he refrains from giving an opinion on the state of the ANDM and OPDO. However, he denies a thrust from the "chauvinists" in the ANDM – a code word for "vengeful" Amharas accused of having never truly accepted the loss of their supremacy – and the "narrow nationalists" in the OPDO – another coded term stigmatising Oromos whowant much more autonomy for Oromya. He emphasises the work done bythese two parties to counter these tendencies, in particular through their general mobilisation for several weeks last autumn.

The 'Tigrean perspective'

Sometimes saying out loud what is whispered within the TPLF behind locked and bolted doors, Tigray On Line, run by members of the Tigreandiaspora, who are strong supporters of the Front, is one of the few foreign-based websites on Ethiopian politics that is accessible in Ethiopiaitself. One of its most recent postings opens with an entirely typical reading of what Tigrean intellectuals call "the Tigrean perspective" on history. Briefly put, this perspective is that, from the reign of Menelik (1889-1913) onwards, Tigray was deliberately divided, weakened, marginalised, in a word disempowered and impoverished, to perpetuate what they call "the domination and oppression of the Amhara/Shoan ruling class".

However, the article goes on to acknowledge the current primacy of the Tigreans, a primacy fiercely denied by the authorities. The regime "is being accused of having an army with mostly Tigrean generals, a bureaucracy dominated by Tigreans, topmost political positions occupied by Tigreans, and the economy "suffocated" by Tigrean investment". But since the vanquishers of the Derg military junta were essentially a Tigreanforce, "historical processes may by themselves create the situation which may be hard to avoid. This imbalance requires time and patience and a slow and steady political process to correct." But is this imbalance diminishing, increasing or remaining static?

Opinions, whether they reflect reality or not, greatly differ in this regard. Nonetheless, according to this view, Tigreans everywhere, in every sector,are and remain victims of nothing less than a “war of hate”. They are “harassed” and “they have in fact become the most marginalised… as theyhave always been”. Worse still: this hatred comes “even many times fromthe non-Tigrean members and sympathizers of the EPRDF”. In summary, writes another commentator from the same website, “the fight all in the Ethiopian politics… is between those who fabricate lies to bring the old system and stay on top of the majority of Ethiopians” – in other words: the “chauvinists” or more broadly the Amhara – “and those who want to build a just and equitable society”. In clear terms, this quote asserts that Ethiopian politics continue to be dominated by the age-old conflict between Amhara and Tigreans.

For its part, the ANDM, or at least its mid-level cadres, often express a symmetrical resentment. They are no longer ready to tolerate bearing their Amhara identity like a cross, in other words being pilloried because they are descendants of the ethnic group whose leaders dominated Ethiopia for a century. They frequently employ the same language as usedby the Tigrean militants during their armed struggle, claiming to have become “second class citizens”. Many are bitter towards their leadership, in which the overrepresentation of natives of North Wollo, on the periphery of the Amhara region, is a further source of diminished legitimacy. They accuse it of selling out the rights and interests of their nation.

In OPDO, the charges are equally harsh. They essentially revolve around the central authority’s annexation – real or imagined – of whole chunks ofOromya. This is a reference to the Addis Ababa Masterplan, perceived as having been launched as a fait accompli, under which the capital will extend into Oromya territory. The central authorities will also play a majorrole in the future “industrial parks”, numerous in this region. In the background hovers the trauma of the conquest of much of Oromya by Menelik’s armies. Here again, the leadership of the OPDO is accused of lacking determination.

The regime constantly proclaims that its most striking success, perhaps even greater than the economic successes, is to have established harmonious relations between the different “nations, nationalities and peoples” of Ethiopia, through the introduction of federalism. These relations are being severely tested. A cohesion enforced by Meles’ ascendancy is giving way to divisions brought about by the advancementof regional powers and interests, one of the primary drivers of which is apolarisation based on identity – ethno-nationalism – which can reach irrational dimensions. What is really at stake is the EPRDF’s capacity to construct a federalism that is genuinely accepted by its four components,to broker agreement on a division of powers and resources which would be perceived as equitable. The history of this country is decidedly one of eternal recurrence. The “national question” re-emerges where it has always been, with varying degrees of visibility: at the heart of Ethiopianpolitical life.

The national question recurs

This is the backdrop to the project for a second “renewal”. It cannot be ruled out that the purpose of the reform sought by part of the TPLF is alsoto strengthen its hand as much as possible in preparation for this federal shakeup. A TPLF with a “strong organization” and “high political maturity”

– Tigrean activists acknowledge – is the ultimate guarantee of the survivalof the federal system, i.e. of the survival of the Tigrean minority’s equal rights in relation to the other, more populous nations.

Amharas and Oromos respectively represent 27% and 35% of the population, together around 62%, as compared with 6% for Tigreans. Butthe federal system, at least as perceived by the TPLF, is based on the rule: one nation, one vote, whatever the size of population. Moreover, theANDM and OPDO approach this restructuring with a serious handicap.

Never, since their creation under the aegis of the TPLF in the late 1980s, have they been able to claim to be genuinely representative of their nations, whether because they lacked the capacity to do so or were prevented. Their current share of real power – political, economic, militaryand security-related – is limited. Finally, the OPDO is riddled with profiteernetworks whose power and secrecy undermine its formal political order.

And then, will they want – and be able – to engage in this second “renewal”? The names that come up most often as potential leaders of such a movement are those of the TPLF’s “old guard”; Arkebe Oqubay, also a member of the Front, adviser to the Prime Minister, very active in opening up Ethiopia to foreign capital; Redwan Hussein, number three inthe Southern Movement, Minister at the Government Communication Affairs Office; and of course Haile Mariam Dessalegn, who is purported tobe a committed reformist. As a southerner, his constituency is the weakest of the four. However, the tensions between the three others make him – prime minister by default though he may be – paradoxically strong. He could play a major role as go-between.

Is it an accident that none of the leaders of ANDM and OPDO is mentioned? Do they believe themselves sufficiently strong to launch their parties into a root and branch reform process while maintaining control, inother words to lift the lid off the pot without getting burnt by the steam?

Otherwise, what modus vivendi might develop within the EPRDF between a TPLF in genuine mutation, and an ANDM and OPDO clinging to the statusquo?

Then there is the position of the army and the security services. To find out where they stand would mean piercing the enigma at the heart of analready enigmatic universe. The most plausible hypothesis is that they would favour this reform agenda. Amongst the few certainties in this sphere: army chief Samora Yunus refused to intervene in Meles Zenawi'ssuccession process, and Getachew Assefa, head of the security services, has proved that he is ready to take a stand against corruption.

As is often the case, these institutions have a ringside seat from which to spot the cracks. There is no doubt that if the regime were to falter, they would step forward. However, it appears that they would only wish to act as a last resort. They would seem to feel that they have enough to do, with – amongst other factors – the threat of Islamism, the interventions inSomalia and South Sudan, the cold war with Eritrea, to welcome the establishment of a power sufficiently coherent and robust to tackle political issues initially by political means.

Amidst all these "machineries", will the "reformers" be able to muster the critical mass needed to succeed, against the combined forces of those withentrenched advantages to defend, whether political, economic or administrative – though the three generally go together? The hard-core of"reformers" consists of an alliance between TPLF founders and an ardent "new guard". The latter look to the "old guard" to lead this reform successfully. It is the only group it trusts. It is resolved to support it with all its strength. But will it find sufficient backing amongst the mass of mid-level cadres?? This hard-core is calling for a return to disinterested activism, for the renunciation of personal advantage, in return for the moral satisfaction of "serving the people". Will this be persuasive?

The new middle class

The attitude of a group that has become a key player in Ethiopia's politicalgame could be decisive: the new middle class. It is everywhere on the rise. In the countryside, it is represented by the peasant elite, the "model farmers", the local officials, the big shopkeepers. In town, this class is firstof all represented in the administration, but it is also present in public andsemipublic companies, and in the service segment, in particular the private sector. Yet its attitude to the EPRDF is ambivalent, even schizophrenic.

On the one hand, it knows that it is indebted to the party. First for peaceand security, at a time when the memory of the two bloody decades (1970-1990) remains traumatic. Then, for a strong economic environment. It knows that its membership of the Front – to which the vast majority of the new middle class belongs, voluntarily or by necessity – brings it benefits in recruitment, in promotion, in support, even in hardcash. It wants to maintain those advantages, and with them the general order that underpins them. However, there is another side to the coin. Public service salaries remain meagre, and are further curtailed by taxesand "voluntary contributions". This new group is the first to perceive thatdiscontent with the regime is steadily rising, as is the thirst for change that goes with it, and that – unless it is stemmed – it could lead to the worst. However, at least at this stage, the most common middle-class demand is not primarily for the exercise of democratic rights, starting withfreedom of opinion and expression. Rather, its slogan could be: let us do our work, let us go about our business! It fluctuates between satisfaction and frustration, the desire for and fear of change.

All these unknowns, at least as much as the rise in popular discontent, contribute to the vague but palpable disquiet in the ranks of the EPRDF. There is a general sense of having embarked upon a period of high tension whose outcome remains uncertain. The alternative presented by the “reformers” is between movement and inaction, in other words a weakconsensus in the upcoming congresses and the symbolic roll of a few heads, and with it an inevitable escalation of the difficulties until a breaking point is reached.
“The survival of the TPLF is at stake”, some Tigreans go so far as to say. If this is true of the Front, it is even more so for the ANDM and OPDO. Sebhat Nega is not prepared to go so far: “The party is weakened, but still alive”, he asserts. And when asked for his prognosis, he sinks into his armchair in a long drawn-out silence, takes a slow drag of his nth cigarette of the day and, with eyes half-closed and a discreet smile on his lips, answers: “I am optimistic”. Is Democratic Change through Electoral Process 100% Dead in Ethiopia?TPLF’s ‘democratic election’ an oxymoron’
By Alem Mamo July 9, 2015
(OPINION) "It's not the voting that's democracy; it's the counting." - FromTom Stoppard’s philosophical play Jumpers first produced in 1972 * * * “It doesn't matter who votes; it matters who counts the votes.” - Joseph Stalin * * * “Those who make peaceful revolution impossible will make violent revolution inevitable.” - John F. Kennedy
Most international and national political analysts and observers of political discourse in Ethiopia weren’t the least surprised that the Tigray People’s Liberation Front (TPLF) regime would declare itself a winner in the May 24,2015 ‘election’. What surprised most observers was the brazen nature andaudaciousness of the regime to claim 100% of 547 seats in the parliament. This, even by the standard of Africa’s electoral practice, is unprecedented. In recent years, authoritarian regimes in Africa (with a few exceptions) have given directives to their electoral commissions to trim election victories away from the traditional 99.9 – 100% victory. In this regard, the TPLF’s ‘victory’ defies any form of mathematical algorithmand logic including common sense.
In effect what this means is that TPLF has officially removed its democratic mask and joined the rank and file of North Korea’s WorkersParty that declared 100% in 2014 election, Iraq’s Bath Party under Saddam Hussein, which claimed 100% victory in a 2002 referendum on whether or not to continue Saddam Hussein’s decade long rule. Raul Castro and the Cuban Communist Party earned 99.4% votes in the 2008Cuban election. Syria's Bashar al-Assad claimed 97.6% of votes for his 2007 presidential referendum. Turkmenistan's Saparmurat Niyazov and the Communist Party of Turkmenistan declared 99.5 % in the 1992 national election, and most recently Sudan’s Al – Bashir, wanted by the International Criminal Court (ICC), declared 94 % victory in national election.

The political reality in Ethiopia can no longer be described as a ‘nation at acrossroad’.

The fact is that Ethiopia has crossed the road into a path of inevitable conflict involving multiple players, groups and citizens disenfranchised andexcluded from the political, economic and social discourse of the country. For those who have been keenly following the political atmosphere in Ethiopia over the last two decades. This new emerging direction of conflict, unfortunately, is by no means a surprise. In fact, some would argue that it is long overdue. As we have seen in Tunisia, Libya, and Egyptover the last few years when citizens are denied of their dignity, fundamental human rights and stake in the political and economic processof their country they are left with no option but to rise up. Thus, it is a choice imposed on the people of Ethiopia by the TPLF led regime that makes a mockery of democracy, the rule of law and human rights. Twentyfour years is a very long time to promote national reconciliation, build democratic institutions and guarantee citizens’ rights under the rule of law, and most importantly to create a political environment where citizensdetermine in a free and fair election which political party should govern them. Sadly, TPLF has squandered the last twenty four years for personal gain, ethnic nepotism and belligerent authoritarianism.

The rumblings of conflict in Ethiopia has been on the horizon for a long time, including sporadic skirmishes between different resistance groups and TPLF defense army. This time, however, the dynamic and nature of conflict has different complexities and magnitudes. This unfolding situationcould have a reverberating effect for the country, as well as the entire Horn of Africa/East Africa region.

No one for certain can predict when and how the emerging path of conflictwould be resolved. What is certain is the proud people of this ancient landhave been humiliated, abused and collectively traumatized under the TPLFrule of the last twenty four years. This humiliation and suffering has led them to the place where they are now, which is full out resistance to reclaim their dignity and change the meaning of citizenship to its true definition.

No one should celebrate conflict, but one must also remember the wiseand powerful words of President John F. Kennedy: “Those who make peaceful revolution impossible will make violent revolution inevitable." Inthe end, the historical autopsy of the last twenty four years will show thefact that TPLF's criminality and belligerence. TPLF is not known for resolving conflicts through peaceful negotiation and diplomacy, and it's not in the regimes DNA to do so. However, the regime must be forced bythe international community not to lead the country into the abyss of conflict with serious and unpredictable consequences. Regardless of the regime's opposition to peaceful conflict resolution and national reconciliation, all peace loving citizens and the international community must realize and advocate for a comprehensive national reconciliation.

The crackdown on Muslim activists is part of Addis Ababa's crusadeagainst independent voices and opposition leaders

July 10, 2015 2:00AM ET by Awol Allo @awol_allo

On July 6, Ethiopia's Federal High Court convicted leaders of the EthiopianMuslims protest movement on charges of terrorism and conspiracy to create an Islamic state in Ethiopia. The verdict — against two Muslim journalists, 10 activists and six members of the Ethiopian Muslims Arbitration Committee — came after three years of a politically motivated trial whose outcome was long ago determined. Sentencing is scheduled forAug. 3.

The trial and the verdict against the Muslim leaders is a political spectacledesigned to conceal the regime's reindoctrination campaign and silence long-standing grievances of the Muslim population. The crackdown on Muslim activists is part of the ruling party's larger crusade against journalists, bloggers, activists and opposition leaders and supporters.

A peaceful movement

The Ethiopian Muslims movement was organized around the community'sthree core demands: ending the government's continued control of the Ethiopian Islamic Affairs Supreme Council, the official Islamic authority inEthiopia; terminating the controversial reindoctrination of Ethiopian Muslims launched by the government in July 2011; and reopening the Awoliya College, the country's only Muslim college. Authorities closed theinstitution in 2011, alleging it had become a breeding ground for radicals.

While the government has always controlled the council, it was Awoliya'sclosure and the coercive reindoctrination campaign that triggered the confrontation. The government denies allegations of interference and control of religious institutions, but a leaked audio from the initial indoctrination sessions shows that it has invited preachers from Lebanonto introduce Al-Ahbash, a supposedly moderate sect of Sunni Islam, to Ethiopia.

Authorities arrested members of the Arbitration Committee in July 2012 after negotiations with the government failed, and they were charged with“intending to advance a political, religious or ideological cause” by force, signaling the impending criminalization of the peaceful movement.

Repressive political ends

Since the disputed 2005 elections and the mass arrests of opposition leaders and journalists, the use of court proceedings for repressive political ends has become one of the signature traits of the Ethiopian government. The primary purpose of these administrative acts disguised as criminal proceedings is the elimination of political opposition and criticalvoices. These trials function not to adjudicate legal disputes but to removeactors from the democratic sphere. The judicial machinery is set in motionnot to determine guilt or innocence but to sustain and consolidate the government’s authoritarian stranglehold on its people.

In order to build a coherent narrative, the government often recasts genuine grievances as a national security threat and reconfigures activismas criminal offenses. For example, it accused the jailed Muslim leaders of working in tandem with foreign terrorist groups to destabilize Ethiopia andundo its economic progress. By dramatizing the impending danger and alleged links to regional militant groups such as Somalia’s Al-Shabab and Nigeria’s Boko Haram, the defendants’ prolonged trial was used to create an alternative reality manufactured by the ruling Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF).

The accused Muslim leaders see their actions as a defense of the constitution and their trial as persecution — a dubious plot to delegitimizetheir peaceful protests against the injustices of the state. The government presented various forms of evidence — including documents, audio and video of sermons and speeches by the defendants, witness testimonies and material obtained through surveillance. However, most of the evidence was presented in closed sessions, and the accused were not given adequate opportunities for cross-examination. The government has deployed stealth propaganda to incriminate the defendants. Since the committee members’ arrests, authorities have produced two fake documentaries intended to generate images and narratives of terrorism toscare Christian Ethiopians and Western observers, in flagrant violation of the presumption of defendants’ innocence until proven guilty.

The verdict of history

The accused Muslim leaders see their actions as a defense of the constitution and their trial as persecution — a dubious plot to delegitimizetheir peaceful protests against the injustices of the state. The government misrepresented their cause in a desperate attempt to suppress their aspiration and consolidate its control over religious institutions and doctrines.

As the judge read out the verdict, one of the committee members accusedthe judge of being complicit in the perversion of justice and reading a judgment “written by the security establishment,” according to defense lawyers. “We appear before this court not because we thought that this court is an institution of truth and justice that judges without fear of favorbut to clarify the historical record,” another defendant said.

The trial has been an occasion for the defendants to mount their objectionto the government’s oppressive narratives and expose its abuse of institutions of truth and justice. As part of their struggle over the historicalrecord, the committee members petitioned Africa’s top human rights watchdog, the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights, to intervene in the matter. Given the justice system’s lack of independence, the defendants are seeking to present their version of events before an independent international institution, contesting the allegations and images the government created in a trial in which it is both prosecutor and judge. In February 2015 the commission granted a provisional measure, asking Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn to undertake a full investigation into allegations of torture and other violations of due processrights.

The EPRDF is using counterterrorism as carte blanche to consolidate its authoritarian control over the country. Meanwhile, the United States, Ethiopia’s close ally in the global war on terrorism, has turned a blind eyeto the misuse and abuse of its counterterrorism funding. President BarackObama’s upcoming trip to Addis Ababa would be seen as yet another sealof approval for the regime’s repressive practices and the ruling party’s landslide victory in the recent elections. Ethiopia’s sudden and unexplained release of journalists and bloggers ahead of Obama’s visit later this month is a strategic move meant to assuage Washington’s concerns and to minimize the bad publicity around their continued incarceration.

Regardless of the outcome of these trials, history’s judgment will be different. In the verdict of history and the archives and repertoires of the oppressed, these individuals, like many who came before them, will be seen as victims of a grotesque system of justice. ETHIOPIA Live BAND Aid: 30 Years Ago Today On July 13, 1985

Woman who was face of Band Live Aid laments price of fame 30 years on’

Footage of Birhan Woldu as a starving child was seen around the world and after recovering she joined Sir Bob Geldof on stage at Live 8 concert.

The woman who as a starving three-year-old became the face of Live Aid30 years ago has said the campaign has done “nothing” for her, and the celebrity that came with it has forced her to live a life underground.

Birhan Woldu, now 34, told the Guardian that because of her unasked for fame she has struggled to get a job. Woldu was catapulted into the limelight after being rediscovered in 2005 and brought on stage by Sir BobGeldof during the Live 8 concert, 21 years after she was captured by a Canadian camera crew, moments away from death at a feeding station in the Tigray region of northern Ethiopia in 1984. Introducing the then 24-year-old student, Geldof told the crowd and the millions watching around the world that the Ethiopian had only 10 minutesto live when her image was captured: “Because of Live Aid 20 years ago …last week she did her agricultural exams in the school she goes to in the northern Ethiopian highlands. She is here. Don’t let them tell you that thisdoesn’t work. Look at this beautiful woman.”But Woldu, who was put through school, along with several other family members, by the Canadianjournalist Brian Stewart – whose Canadian Broadcasting Corporation crew had originally filmed her – has said the fame that was thrust upon her hasheld her back because “people know my stories and see me with famous people”. She praised Live Aid for changing “the lives of many of my sistersand brothers” in Ethiopia, particularly during the famine.But she added: “For me, personally, Live Aid has done nothing. I am branded as the symbol of Live Aid due to the image of the 1980s. My stories are well documented and have reached the skies. But I live underground. The state I am in at this moment is miserable. I do not have a job and I cannot support my family on my own.”

Birhan Woldu explained that she had been hired as a nurse for 10 months soon after graduating from the private Sheba University College in the cityof Mekelle, Tigray, but had been jobless since. She married at 28 but has since separated and lives in a one-room house with her two daughters. “[People] question how it is I am not able to support my family,” she said.“They help many people like me who have no one to support them,” she said. “They pay for children’s school fees and provide monthly stipends.” She added that she now wants to get a job and raise her daughters.Woldu is positive about change in her country since the famine of 1983-85, which took the lives of her mother and sister, sparing only herand her father. “The country has come a very long way since then,” she said. “We now have schools and hospitals and road access to remote areas. Mothers no longer endanger their lives by delivering babies in their homes. They can go to a hospital. Things are very good now.”

While she congratulated Live Aid on its 30-year anniversary, saying manyfelt grateful and indebted to the work it had done, she felt the organisation could help further: “As an aid agency, I believe they could do more in terms of building schools and hospitals. I encourage them to do more in that regard. That way we can be able to transform our country and offer a better life for our children.”

Giving aid in the form of food and stipends was not the way to bring aboutsustained change, she added. “Building infrastructure like schools and hospitals or factories that can hire a lot of people will make a big difference.” Food aid would only “make people even more dependent for all their lives … but if people get education and get jobs, they can transform their lives and their country.” (Text ends)

FLASHBACK: ETHIOPIA Live Band Aid: 30 Years Ago Today On July 13,1985

From All-Conquering Queen To All-Swearing Bob Geldof,We Remember The 10 Most Unforgettable Moments

The Huffington Post UK By Caroline Frost (July 13, 2015) 30 years ago today... Bob Geldof summoned his most elite of pop troops and changedthe nature of charity gigs forever.

With Live Aid, the help of co-producer Midge Ure and promoter Harvey Goldsmith, 58 of the world's biggest music acts, a bunch of satellites, a few thousand volunteers and a force of will that saw the BBC clear its schedules for a day, Bob Geldof put together the world's biggest gig - withtwo simultaneous concerts occurring on either side of the Atlantic, and beamed around the world to an estimated 1.9 billion viewers.

Notable absences that day included Bruce Springsteen - "simply didn't realise how big the whole thing was going to be" - and Cliff Richard, booked to play a gospel concert in Birmingham. But there was plenty ofstar-power to be going on with... from the newcomers Nik Kershaw andHoward Jones, to the icons Bob Dylan and Led Zeppelin.

Even with this heavyweight line-up, it was sometimes the little things thatcaught our eye. Here are the top 10 memories we've been enjoying againon the 30th anniversary of a unique day...

Everything you need to know about pop, where it was then and where it most definitely no longer is, can be summed up by the simple fact that theQuo opened the show. Never has one act been so suited to a 12-minute slot, or four minutes per chord. But, when one of your songs is Rocking AllOver The World, who needs anything else?

A one-off duet by two of rock's greatest figures, this version of 'Dancing inthe Street' was memorable for a) Mick's Miami-Vice green suit, b) the fitting geographical roll-call of 'Tokyo, South America,' etc, and c) the energetic charisma between the two, each at the height of their powers. Atune that, even now, guarantees to take you straight back to that historic day.

What should have been another impressive rock set by U2 took on another dimension when a suede-booted Bono spotted a spectator being crushed, took matters into his own hands and left the stage to slow-dancewith her for 'Bad'. Another song had to be dropped, his bandmates were reportedly furious at the time, but this impromptu display was a key step on the Irish rockers' ladder to world domination. A year later, The Joshua Tree was released, and their status was sealed.

One of the most memorable acts of the day was actually a video of victimsof the Ethiopian famine, made unforgettable by adding the Cars' mournful love song 'Drive', and introduced on stage by David Bowie. This song will forever take us back to that hot day in July, and its stern reminder that not everyone in the world was dancing along.

The UK finale - led by Paul McCartney in a spirited rendition of Let It Be, an aching wait for his microphone to work, and then joined on stage by Bob Geldof, Alison Moyet, David Bowie and Peter Townshend, before 'BandAid' collected every star left in the stadium. Memorable for George Michael's astonishingly yellow shirt, and Bob Geldof looking like a gothic art installation as he was hoisted onto waiting shoulders, with his competing sensations of palpable triumph and all-pervading fatigue.

Prince Charles dancing gave an impressive impression of an aristocratic dad at a middle-class wedding reception. If the chasm in the royal box between the all-elbows Prince and a boogying Diana had a few years to gofor the full reveal, this was perhaps the beginning of the end, or at least the end of the beginning.

It would be churlish to raise eyebrows at the inclusion of Bob Geldof's ownBoomtown Rats on a bill packed to the rafters with the world's best and best-selling performers, even if he did reportedly boot Ultravox off the stage so he got to sing in front of the royal couple. Self-indulgent gave way to seismic, however, during their hit 'I Don't Like Mondays'. Bob paused eternally at the line "The lesson today is how to die" and remindednearly two billion people what the day was all about.

Phil Collins appearing first on stage at Wembley to perform 'Against All Odds', then jumping on Concorde - as you do, on a day dedicated to eradicating poverty - and rocking up to the stadium in Philadelphia to playdrums for Eric Clapton and Led Zeppelin. Self-indulgent? Oh yes. Still remembered today? Most definitely.

The tireless showrunner was told there wasn't enough money coming in for his efforts and so legged it to the studio to make an unplanned appeal,and one of Live TV's great rants. When the hapless presenter Dave Hepworth understandably started to read out the charity addresses, Bob cut him off. "Fuck the addresses," he told two billion global viewers, "Giveme the money. There are people dying NOW." Thus was history made, with donations increasing to £300 per second, and Live Aid going on to raise £150million. And Bob still got his knighthood.

Unlike some of the other bands on the day, Queen were aware of the import of the occasion, and spent four days rehearsing their 18-minute slot. Such diligence paid off, to the tune of Radio Gaga and the stunning sight of 72,000 concert-goers joining in the claps as directed by a peerlessFreddie Mercury. It would not be overstating it to say Queen owned Live Aid. (Text ends)

FLASHBACK: ETHIOPIA Live Band Aid

30 Years Ago Today On July 13, 1985 Did we see the greatest live concertof all time? Was Live Aid the best rock concert ever?

Today fm By Ed Smith 13th July 2015

It was 30 years ago today that Live Aid, billed as the biggest rock eventthe world would ever see,had us all camped in front of our TV's for 16 hours.

The lineups at Philadelphia's JFK Stadium and London's Wembley Stadiumfeatured some of the world's biggest pop stars, including Paul McCartney,Elton John, Bob Dylan, David Bowie and, on both continent, Phil Collins.

More than 70 acts in all performed during the 16 hours of music, viewedby 1.5 billion people in 110 countries.

So dust down the shoulder pads and throw the Mr Freezes in the...well...the freezer as we look back at 5 of the most memorablemoments from that incredible day.

U2 Hit The Big Time

Bono and U2 will make the most of any size platform given them. Not everybody knew that when drummer Larry Mullen Jr. counted off Sunday Bloody Sunday at London's Wembley Stadium, but they sure did 17 minutes later, when the band left the stage. During a 12-minute renditionof Bad that incorporated bits of Lou Reed and Rolling Stones songs, Bono climbed down from the stage to help security guards extricate three girls from the crush of the crowd. That bit of improvisation cost the band the chance to play its lone U.S. Top 40 hit, Pride (In the Name of Love), but itvaulted the group to a new career stratus.

Queen Rule

If U2's Live Aid performance turned the band members into superstars, Queen's secured its position as one of the greatest live acts ever. In fact, the group's 19-minute set at Wembley Stadium, during which they managed to squeeze in six songs, including Bohemian Rhapsody, Radio Gaga and We Are the Champions, was ranked the great rock performanceall of all time by a 2005 BBC poll.

Led Zeppelin Go Down In Flames.

It wasn't all greatness...a few bum notes were hit on that day too. Who knows how musical history might have been different had this set at Philadelphia's JFK Stadium gone well? While it wasn't technically a Led Zeppelin reunion, Robert Plant, Jimmy Page and John Paul Jones hadn't performed together publicly since drummer John Bonham's death five years before. Problems began immediately, with the band members not being able to properly hear themselves in their monitors: Considering what everyone else was hearing, that was probably just as well. Page's guitar was out of tune. Plant was hoarse. The appearance caused severedamage to the band's reputation that wasn't fully repaired until a stellar 2007 set for an Ahmet Ertegun tribute concert at London's O2 arena thatlikely was the band's final performance.

Bob Drops The F-Bomb

You could scarcely question Bob's passion and commitment to the cause. It was a monumental undertaking that must have driven the man and those around him to distraction and or drink. If there was any doubt aboutwhat this meant to Geldof, his glorious use of the f-word here shook viewers out of their cosy stupor and reminded us that this wasn't just a free gig laid on for our lazy amusement. Often mistakenly remembered as“give us your fing money” ...this is actually what went down. G'wan the Bob!

A Fitting Finale

What better way to finish than with the song that started it all. An incredible end to what was an astonishing day as Bob Geldof bats away any sense of self congratulation or acclaim to change the lyrics and drivethe message home once again. (Text ends)

FLASHBACK: Margaret Thatcher demanded UK find ways to 'destabilise' Ethiopian regime in power during 1984 scene of famine –a revealed secretdoc’

(The Independent By Cahal Milmo Thursday 16 July 2015)

Margaret Thatcher demanded that Britain find ways to “destabilise” theregime which presided over Ethiopia’s disastrous 1984 famine after concluding that British aid was wrongly supporting its “particularly cruel”government, according to previously unpublished records.

A top secret Downing Street memo reveals how the former Prime Ministerwanted to support rebels fighting the authoritarian regime of Mengistu Haile Mariam and suspend some types of relief to the Ethiopians after a year of aid operations to alleviate the famine which killed a million peopleand inspired Band Aid and the Live Aid concerts.

Documents released by the National Archives at Kew, west London, showMrs Thatcher decided it was wrong to “jog along” with the Mengistu government, whose human rights abuses greatly exacerbated the death toll from the famine, and lambasted the Foreign Office for failing to comeup with robust measures to tackle the regime.

After the existence of the famine across Ethiopia was brought to the world’s notice by the harrowing reports of the BBC’s Michael Buerk in October 1984, a global response was mobilised with at least £150m in public donations and a vast international relief operation delivering hundreds of thousands of tonnes of food. In Britain, the public outcry wasled by the singer Bob Geldof, who co-ordinated the Band Aid record and later famously employed the f-word on television to encourage donations during Live Aid in July 1985.

But the secret records reveal profound disquiet at the highest level of theBritish government as significant aid began to reach the starving and an emergency airlift operation involving the RAF was discontinued towards the end of 1985.

Mrs Thatcher had become frustrated at evidence of problems caused bythe Ethiopian regime over distribution of food to famine victims, often inrebel areas, and attempts by the Addis Ababa government to impose customs duties on the aid shipments.

In two memos by her private secretary Charles Powell, it is made clear that the Prime Minister was troubled by the idea that British aid had provided no geo-political influence over Mengistu’s Marxist regime and asked officials to answer the question: “Is it not inherently wrong to pourtens of millions of pounds of aid into a country and yet conclude that we have no serious scope for influencing its particularly cruel and objectionable government?”

The documents, marked “top secret and personal” and restricted to only two copies, asked Foreign Secretary Geoffrey Howe to come up with waysto “put the Ethiopians under pressure and even destabilise them”.

Mr Powell added: “The Prime Minister continues to believes that it is notenough just to jog along in our relations with the distasteful regime in Ethiopia.

“If the conclusion is that our present relations offer no positive scope for exercising beneficial and positive influence, she would like serious thoughtgiven to how we can make life harder for the Ethiopian regime.”

Among additional suggestions put forward on Mrs Thatcher’s behalf in thepartially redacted memo were seeking American help to assist opposition figures inside Ethiopia and persuading the then European Community to take a tougher line over abuses such as customs duties.

Stung by suggestions that its earlier answers (which included a plan to improve agricultural policies in Ethiopia) had not “adequately answered”Mrs Thatcher’s concerns, the FCO huffily replied that it had succeeded inpersuading other European countries to stand up to the abuses of the regime, which was propped up with extensive military support from the Soviet Union.

Senior diplomats poured cold water on suggestions that covert aid to rebels in Eritrea, at the time still a dominion of the government in AddisAbaba, would be a sensible strategy.
The reply, sent on behalf of Mr Howe, said: “It would lead to even greatermisdirection of the resources in Ethiopia towards civil war and would thusincrease the likelihood of further famine and the need for further large- scale Western humanitarian aid.”
Noting that the famine situation still remained critical, the memo concluded: “The Foreign Secretary shares the Prime Minister’s distaste forpouring aid into a country whose policies are objectionable. Nevertheless he does not see how we can avoid regarding humanitarian considerationsas paramount.”
The exchange seems to have produced a stalemate between Mrs Thatcherand her Foreign Secretary. A note on the FCO’s reply by Mr Powell states:“Prime Minister, pretty much a nil return… Agree to leave it at that for thetime being?” (Text ends)
FLASHBACK: SECRET DOCUMENT On the 1984 scene of famine in Ethiopiarevealed:
By Activist Obang Metho
Former British PM Margaret Thatcher demanded UK find ways to 'destabilise' Ethiopian regime in power during 1984 famine. Margaret Thatcher demanded that Britain find ways to “destabilise” the regime which presided over Ethiopia’s disastrous 1984 famine after concluding that British aid was wrongly supporting its “particularly cruel” government,according to previously unpublished records.
A top secret Downing Street memo reveals how the former Prime Ministerwanted to support rebels fighting th...e authoritarian regime of Mengistu Haile Mariam and suspend some types of relief to the Ethiopians after a year of aid operations to alleviate the famine which killed a million peopleand inspired Band Aid and the Live Aid concerts.
Documents released by the National Archives at Kew, west London, show Mrs Thatcher decided it was wrong to “jog along” with the Mengistu government, whose human rights abuses greatly exacerbated the death toll from the famine, and lambasted the Foreign Office for failing to come up with robust measures to tackle the regime. After the existence of the famine across Ethiopia was brought to the world’s notice by the harrowingreports of the BBC’s Michael Buerk in October 1984, a global response wasmobilised with at least £150m in public donations and a vast international relief operation delivering hundreds of thousands of tonnes of food. In Britain, the public outcry was led by the singer Bob Geldof, who co-ordinated the Band Aid record and later famously employed the f-word on television to encourage donations during Live Aid in July 1985. But the secret records reveal profound disquiet at the highest level of the British government as significant aid began to reach the starving and an emergency airlift operation involving the RAF was discontinued towards the end of 1985.

RADIO/TV JAMMING: Ethiopia regularly and easily records phone callsusing foreign equipment'

(AP News) NAIROBI, KENYA – A rights group says that Ethiopia's government regularly listens to and records the phone calls of oppositionactivists and journalists using equipment provided by foreign technologycompanies. Human Rights Watch said in a report Friday that the foreign equipment aids the Ethiopian government's surveillance of perceived political opponents inside and outside the country. The group's Arvind

Ganesan said Ethiopia is using its government-controlled telecom system to silence dissenters. The group says that recorded phone calls with familyand friends are often played during abusive interrogations. Human Rights Watch said most of the monitoring technology is provided by the Chinese firm ZTE. Several European companies have also provided equipment, thegroup said, including from the U.K., Germany and Italy.

MONACO DIAMOND LEAGUE: Genzebe Dibaba breaks world women's1,500 meters'

Friday July 17, 2015 4:29pm EDT

MONACO (Reuters) - Ethiopia's world indoor champion Genzebe Dibaba broke the 22-year-old 1,500 meters world record on Friday when she clocked three minutes 50.07 seconds at the Monaco Diamond League. Running the last lap on her own after the pacemaker dropped out, the 24-year-old dipped inside Chinese Qu Yunxia's previous mark of 3:50.46 set in Beijing on September 11, 1993.

"I am very happy," Dibaba told the track announcer as the crowd stood and applauded. Dibaba, the younger sister of three times Olympic champion and 5,000 meters world record holder Tirunesh Dibaba, said onThursday she would decide whether to run the 1,500 or the 5,000 at nextmonth's Beijing world championships after Friday's race. She told reporters she had been concentrating on her speed in training this year. Five personal bests were set in the race. (Reporting by John Mehaffey, editing by Pritha Sarkar)

JUSTICE: Justice Dellivered to Victims Finally –DENVER-THE WEST

The Notorious Ethiopian prison guard Worku sentenced to maximum 22years.

By Kirk Mitchell T*he Denver Post*

A woman who was beaten routinely by a notorious Ethiopian prison guard — a man accused of killing and torturing dozens of people — hugged prosecutors after her tormentor was sentenced to 22 years in prison. Others wept and shook during Friday's hearing in Denver in which

KefelgnAlemu Worku, 62, was sentenced to the maximum prison term following a U.S. immigration fraud conviction. Worku was convicted of lying on immigration documents and stealing another man's identity to gain entryto the United States. He lived a quiet life in Aurora for years until one of his victims recognized him.

"If any case called for a maximum sentence, it seems to be this one," said
U.S. District Judge John Kane. Kane added that giving Worku the maximum sentence is one way to demonstrate that the U.S. is not a haven for people committing heinous acts against humanity like Argentina became for Nazis after World War II. Kane said Worku's citizenship statusis revoked and he will likely be deported to Ethiopia following his sentence.

Worku, speaking through a translator, issued a rambling statement to thejudge that continued for nearly an hour. He denied the accusations and said he was a victim, incarcerated for six years. "I never did the inhumanthings that I am accused of. I'm not someone who would beat someone 30 minutes every day," Worku said. But Abebech "Abby" Demissie testified that Worku struck her with an AK-47, causing her to vomit for days.

In another instance, Worku, after executing several prisoners, ordered other prisoners to drink their blood or clean their blood off the floor with their tongues, Demissie said. He also shot a 14-year-old boy in the stomach. "I still remember Worku's characteristic arrogant smirking smile.The smirk I saw on his face after he had shot 14-year-old Hailu Tadesse was the same kind of grinning smile he gave me while I was testifying against him after the Honorable Judge Kane ordered him to turn his face towards me in order to let me identify him," Demissie said.

Following the sentencing Demissie hugged members of the prosecution team. She said she felt a great sense of relief after she was able to testifyat Worku's trial. "I believe Worku would obtain some peace of mind if he admits he committed crimes against humanity in Ethiopia," Demissie said.She said he should disclose where bodies of victims were "dumped."

Worku was convicted in October of three charges related to forging immigration papers in 2004 to come to the U.S. He was arrested in 2012.Worku, a former member of the Marxist Derg junta, could be deported toEthiopia, where he was sentenced in November 2000 to death for torturing 101 people to death. During his five-day trial in October, torturevictims testified Worku was a brutal guard at the Higher 15 prison in the late 1970s. According to a federal document, it is unlikely the sentence would be carried out in Ethiopia, where many members of the Derg juntahave been pardoned, according to a report. (Text ends)

Newly-freed Ethiopian Journalist Vows to Continue Work’

By Marthe von der Wolf, VOA July 17, 2015

ADDIS ABABA - Reeyot Alemu, an Ethiopian journalist who was unexpectedly released from prison last week after being convicted on terrorism charges, vows to continue her work as a reporter. “I am sure I will continue my writings because it's my job, and also its my passion to write," she said. "And also I want to serve my country. I want to make Ethiopia a democratic country, it is my responsibility as a citizen and as ajournalist also."

Reeyot had spent four years and 17 days in prison after a conviction manybelieve was a result of her articles which criticized the Ethiopian government. She believes that her writings may lead to future imprisonment, as she does not believe this government allows anyone to live safely in Ethiopia while opposing those in power.

In 2011, Reeyot was arrested and then sentenced to 14 years in prison, which was reduced to five years after appeal. Her release last week came one day after five other imprisoned journalists and bloggers were releasedunannounced. During most of her imprisonment, Reeyot shared one roomwith four other prisoners. The most difficult part, she says, was not not being able to receive visitors while dealing with a breast tumor.

"They denied my rights to be visited by my friends, my legal advisors. Even with my sister, they allow her these two months," she lamented. "Before that for one year and eight months, even I did not see my sister. Only my parents, my mother and my father." Her father is also her lawyer, but during visitations they were not allowed to discuss legal matters.

While in prison, she says there were many offers for early release under the condition that she would agree to sign a letter admitting her wrongdoings or falsely accusing others. Reeyot refused and as a result, was ordered to spend another 11 months in prison. These days Reeyot's house is filled friends, family and other visitors welcoming her back. Nextweek she will go for a medical check up to continue treatment for her breast tumor.

Reeyot also plans on doing what she missed very much - reading books onpolitical issues.

"I want to read how this country is, about the world," she explained. "Because these four years I did not know, I did not get many information." Many international organizations continuously pressured the Ethiopian government to release the imprisoned journalists. The country has been frequently criticized by human rights organizations for repressing dissident voices.

The Committee to Protect Journalists says Ethiopia is Africa's second worstjournalist jailer with 11 other journalists and bloggers still imprisoned. On social media, some people commented that the decision to release the journalists is linked to the visit of U.S. President Barack Obama to Ethiopialater this month.

Bucknell University Professor forgoes chalk in order to pick up kalashnikovto fight the regime'

SEATTLE ETHIOMEDIA (July 20, 2015) – Berhanu Nega, leader of PatrioticGinbot 7, on Saturday bid farewell to his career as an economics professor here in America to lead a struggle in Africa against the despotic regime inAddis Ababa, Ethiopia. Dr Berhanu and other senior leaders of the Movement arrived in the Eritrean capital of Asmara on Saturday, according to ESAT, which also released a picture of the leader being welcomed by uniformed combatants of his organization.

News of Berhanu's life being turned into a combatant came as a surprise for many, because they never thought the Bucknell University professor would give up his life to enter the harsh world of armed insurrection on anAfrican soil. "The level of the struggle has reached such a point that leaders of Patriotic Ginbot 7 should join the fighters on ground and lead the fight to victory," a press release said.

Ethiopia has been in the hand of the ruling EPRDF regime since 1991, andall hopes for a peaceful transition of power through election were dashed recently when the ruling party claimed a never-heard-of 100% victory.

The act was quickly described by critics as the last nail on the coffin of a non-violent form of struggle in Ethiopia. "EPRDF's audacity to claim to have won the election 100% makes the political environment conducive toan armed uprising," one political analyst who sought anonymity told Ethiomedia by phone.

Whether by coincidence of careful planning, Patriotic Ginbot 7 launched armed operations about two weeks ago in northern Ethiopia. Ethiopia andEritrea have technically been at war since the doomed 2001 peace agreement, and the sudden accusation by Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn that Eritrea was once again in the business of destabilizing the region was a clear indication that Patriotic Ginbot 7 armed engagements were unsettling the government in Addis.

Even if Eritrea bears the image of an enemy state because of the 1998- 2000 war, the news that Ethiopian rebels led by Berhanu Nega were gaining ground in northern Ethiopia would inspire multitudes of Ethiopia'sunemployed youths to join the ranks of the rebels.

Ed's Note: Large number of Ethiopians believe that, Berhanu Nega Bongeris trully one of Ethiopia's greatest sons; very patriotic, educated and of course, the first democratically elected mayor of Addis ababa city. Birhanuled the CUDP in May-2005 national elections to a convincing election victory, not only in Addis Ababa and Amhara region, but also in most areas of the Southern Ethiopia. Such nationwide success by the CUDP in May-2005, even in some parts of Oromia region, surprised many and proved that the Meles Zenawi regime has not yet made tribalism more powerful than Ethiopian nationalism in the country. But the latest 100% "election victory" of the EPRDF regime in Ethiopia seems to have pushed many Ethiopians like Berhanu Nega to the limit, to a place where nothing can get worse than it already has.

FLASHBACK: Ethiopia's Red Terror Bitter Legacy'

By Berhane Tadesse, New York City (July 20, 2015)

Hosted by Ethiopian Community Mutual Assistance Association (ECMAA)

Ato Nesibu Sebhat came to New York City on July 19, 2015 at Tsion café in New York City to talk about his new book entitled "Fistum Naew Emnetae."(ፍጹምነ ውእምነ ቴ). Some of us do not want to be reminded of thepast. Some of us indeed wish to do something to benefits for the people left behind. It is either bad or good we all share many things in common, we love our country and want to know what happened during that difficult time. The book contains personal experience and recollection of victims of the historical terrifying events of Red Terror political campaign as it happened in one of Addis Ababa neighborhood known as Kassanchese (Keftegna 15).

The book is a testament of a man who had been part of the youth strugglewho were in their teens or twenties that have made the ultimate sacrificesfor Ethiopian people rights in 1974 revolution. It takes you back to "radical" Ethiopian Student Movement, the good and bad memories of the late 1960s and 1970s of the revolution period. The stories demonstrated that the young men and women sacrifice courageously out of their convictions to free the Ethiopian oppressed people. Their story should be told and retold in history books. They stood for democracy in the face of the tyrant regime and amazingly fought with whole hearted devotion. It isa lesson for Ethiopian youth both at home and abroad to carry on this struggle for establishment of democracy and rule of law for Ethiopian people.

The revolution that erupted in February, 1974 is a great landmark in Ethiopian history. Several books have been written about it. But the history of Red Terror unfortunately remains not fully reported and documented. The military junta (better known as the Derg) ruled the country for seventeen years with unbounded political authority. The regime declared the Red Terror, a public harassment campaign; by imprisoning, torturing, and executing those who opposed the military junta. From the very early beginning, two months after it assumed poweron November 23, 1974, Derg executed 60 officials of the previous Imperial government high ranking officials and jailed hundreds of civil service officials, business men and feudal lords without trial. The book entitled Fistum Naew Emnetae written by Nesibu Sebhat tells the story ofred terror and its bitter legacy. The book is divided into four sections and with several sub-sections. Keftegna 15 is a prison where the author's ordeal took place. The introduction is pre red terror story related to the author's childhood life. He tells his own story as a boy growing up in Kassanchese area, including schooling, his insights into Ethiopia People Revolution Party (EPRP) and the youth league's clandestine organizationalstructures. He continues to tell how he was involved in politics, his untyring effort for his party to gain an influential role in the struggle, followed by numerous challenges of political struggle that include noticingfriends and members shifting loyalties from his party to opposite party, the revelation of division within his own clandestine party, and random imprisonment. The final section tells the story of the arrest of the top notorious prison guard leader of Kefetegn 15 in the US.

Limited number of authors have written a book about red terror. The bookFisum Naew Emmetae is attempting to close the gap of red terror accounts by exposing the brutality that took place inside his prison cell byderg loyalist. Mr. Nesibu tells the very personal story of his experience as a prisoner in Keftegna 15 prison. He tells this story from his recollectionand also with help of others oral testimony of former prisoners.

Red Terror was a violent political campaign conducted between 1977 and 1978. The regime arrested thousands of suspected EPRP members and EPRP youth league members as prisoners. All of them were held without any charges. Some prisoners could not stand the torture in prison and admit “guilt” whether they are or not member of EPRP. Methods of tortureused by guard were gruesome. Nesibu was brutally tortured and had heard agonizing screams from fellow prisoners during torture. Prisoners were summarily executed by prison guards in the prison compound. He witnessed the guards carry the dead bodies in trucks and bury them in unmarked mass graves. He observed the guards stealing food brought to prisoners by the families and friends. This food theft left the prisoners always on the brink of starvation. The red terror campaign inflicted physical and psychological damage to countless prisoners. It is mind boggling to imagine that the author and some of the youth remained defiance during harsh interrogation to keep the party’s secrets. Accordingto Nesibu, this heroic defiance originated from absolute commitment to the promise made by party members to keep struggle live until the oppressed people are free.

The talk and discussion with author under the book signing event provideda launching pad in sharing thoughts and opinion on the past, present and future socio-political issues. It is one way to remember the sacrifice they made in their hope we may live in peace and freedom in Ethiopia. This book by no means a full story of a red terror legacy, but it included several firsthand stories of red terror. Thanks is extended to Nesibu Sebhat for his attempt to give legitimate place in history about the struggle of the young generation of 1970s for freedom of all Ethiopians. (Text ends)

NPC urges Ethiopian government to improve press freedom’

Jul 23, 2015 – WASHINGTON, DC – As President Barack Obama leaves fora trip to Ethiopia and Kenya today, the National Press Club urged the Ethiopian government to immediately release jailed journalists imprisonedfor their work. While six journalists were reportedly released from jail in Ethiopia on July 9, at least 11 others remain imprisoned, according to human rights groups.

Among those still detained is Eskinder Nega, whose high-profile advocacyfor press freedom has prompted charges of terrorism – an accusation frequently leveled without basis in fact by governments against their critics. Nega has earned international recognition for his case, including the World Association of Newspapers and News Publishers’s 2014 GoldenPen of Freedom award.

Ethiopia's record of jailing journalists is the second worst in Africa, behindEritrea, and the country's press is considered the fourth-most censored inthe world, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists.
"There are all too many cases of courageous journalists who have had to stand up against the Ethiopian government's crackdown on unfavorable press," said NPC President John Hughes. "While we welcome the government's release of some reporters, those still imprisoned in Ethiopiamust be set free. And press freedom, more broadly, must be better protected there."
The National Press Club's Press Freedom Committee speaks out on press freedom and transparency issues. The NPC, established in 1908 and basedin Washington, D.C., is the world's leading professional organization for journalists. (Text ends)

POLLUTION : In Protection of the Lake-Kokka's PeasantryFamilies'

In the Southeast of Addis Ababa, less than 100 kilometers Lake Koka lies -an expanse of freshwater that supports the lives of over 15,000 people.
Lake Koka is one of the lakes in the East African Rift Valley. For years, it has served generations of peasantry families as the only source of clean drinking water, freshwater fishing and water for irrigation. Now, this precious commodity is under irreversible pressure from the economic development. Tanneries, flower farms and various small-scale factories, starting from soaps to sugar, and plastic manufacturings, have sprung up in the last 50 years, especially in the last decades, along the Akaki, locallyknown as "Aba-Samuel" to Awash river basins, industrial effluents containing deadly chemicals, such as heavy metals and organic pollutants,from these adjacent factories and flower farms streaming into the lakes and rivers that support millions of area residents as the only source of water for drinking, cooking, and washing as well as livestock feed. A scientific study has found heavy metals, which are said to severely impair water quality, in samples taken from Lake Koka and the adjacent factories
- confirming the source of pollution. "We don't know whom we could talk to, after all, since the responsible body of the government and the factoryitself has so far not given any solution to the pollution and the impact thathas been undergoing on the ecology and habitat around the area," a resident told The Reporter recently. "However, we still look forward that this could get solved by anyone who has the feeling of our suffering and understand the degree of the impact on our environment." (Text ends)

ECONOMY: Ethiopia At A GDP of $118.2 billion'PERSPECTIVE by Dr. Dejene Kebede Challa

As one of the fastest growing economies in the world, Ethiopia has had tocontend with the rising number of able youths eager to work. The Ethiopian economy depends largely on agriculture so if you've got an Ethiopian cousin, he's most likely learning the tools of the farming trade, although you wouldn't find such people in the country's capital, Addis Ababa. Most young people in Addis ...Ababa are into telecommunications and the financial industry, spending their free time sipping local coffee andtouring the magnificent buildings.

Demolition of houses in Arada sub-city or in much of Addis Ababa is a verycomplicated problem. United Nations figures indicate that well over 86% of the urban dwellers in Addis live in shanty areas with considerable hardship. Demolition and forced relocation of residents will exacerbate theexisting housing problem and pushes people from one area to another.

Even with the new housing construction taking place in Addis, the units are very expensive for the majority of the urban residents. Those who canafford to buy the new units face considerable change in their life style withits own new financial requirements.

More importantly, demolition and the forced removal of inhabitants will alter the unique urban fabric of Addis. Unlike other African colonial cities where racial and class segregation was carefully inserted into the urban fabric, Addis has escaped this colonial tragedy even with the brief fascist occupation of the city.

Considerable thought must be given in upgrading shanty areas with a view of building an inclusive city for all residents withaccess to opportunities and a space to make living and maintaining the social cohesion that exist among residents. The escalating land prices in Addis and related urban growth issues is putting considerable pressure onscare land within the city making shanty areas target for demolition.

The International Monetary Fund (IMF) ranks Ethiopia as among the five fastest growing economies in the world. After a decade of continuous expansion (during which real GDP growth averaged 10.8% per annum), in2013/14 the economy grew for its 11th consecutive year posting 10.3% growth. Over the 12 months from July 2013 (the country's fiscal year runsfrom July-July), all of the economy's main sectors performed well.

Agriculture (which represents 40.2% of GDP) grew by 5.4%, industry (14% of GDP) expanded by 21.2% and services (46.2% of GDP) rose by11.9%. This positive growth should continue for the coming two years, although constraints on private sector development could slow its momentum. (Text ends)

POLITICS: Ethiopia's EPRDF Regime Liability to US Interests or, Asset? (ByAmanuel Biedemariam)

By design US Horn of Africa policy could only be effective if Ethiopia controls Eritrea. If that succeeds, the US can run regional affairs throughthat channel effectively.

However, this policy has been a recipe for wars because it makes Eritreathe biggest prize for Ethiopian leaders and that means without Eritrea, Ethiopia's role will be minimized. For this reason, historically, all Ethiopianleaders have waged wars against Eritrea. After World War II, the US handed Eritrea to Ethiopia and anointed Emperor Haile Selassie led Ethiopia "Anchor State" of the Horn of Africa and the Red Sea basin. In exchange the US took Kagnew Station, a base in the city of Asmara Eritrea, and assumed control of one of the most strategic locations and waterways of the World.

The alliance with the US made Ethiopia the epicenter of African politics, the powerhouse of the region and significant world presence until 1974- when unexpectedly, power fell onto the hands of low-ranking Ethiopian officer, a brutal dictator, Colonel Mengistu Hailemariam. Soon thereafter Hailemariam established alliance with the then Soviet Union (USSR) and ejected the US from Ethiopia and Eritrea. This power transition fostered anew era of geopolitical juxtaposition between the US and the then USSR. In 1991, as the USSR fell, Eritrea won independence and ushered a renewed geopolitical outlook in the Horn of Africa (HoA). As the only superpower standing, the US immediately reasserted its position and attemptedto control the agendas of the HoA. Immediately thereafter the US restarted the old Eritrea policy that was initiated 1952. Ethiopia was againchosen to play the anchor state role, and within that framework the late war-monger dictator Meles Zenawi received the green light to play the hegemon and aimed to bring Eritrea down.

US Eritrea policy was and remains to undermine Eritrean independence and allow Ethiopia to control Eritrea as it did during the reigns of Haile Selassie. To that end, the late Meles Zenawi was tasked to defeat the leadership in Eritrea and create a mechanism to control Eritrea. This failedpolicy lead to wars that took the lives of over 20,000 Eritreans and 120, 000 Ethiopian soldiers needlessly. When that failed, immediately, the No War No Peace agenda was initiated with a goal to render Eritrea a failed state. Hence, the common link of US policies since 1952 has been Eritrea. The goal is to control Eritrea which in turn will enable the US to control the entire Red Sea basin. With the Mediterranean Sea firmly under control ofNATO countries, assuming control of the Red Sea will allow the US to control a-vast-waterway of the world. This agenda is transparent by US presence in Djibouti and Yemen's Socotra Islands amongst other areas inthe region. This has been a longstanding US policy.

The above policy failed in 1974-75 with the ouster of Haile Sellasie. Thepolicy failed in large part because it ignored the needs of the people of Ethiopia. At the time, Ethiopia faced severe droughts that Emperor HaileSellasie's regime ignored. When it was discovered, shocking pictures of starved Ethiopian children was distributed around the world. To this daythese pictures remain seared in the memories of the world. The feudal Emperor Haile Selassie failed to ensure democratic governance, equaldistribution of land and wealth which ultimately lead to his ouster.

The brutal dictator Mengistu Hailemariam's failed-social-experiment was defeated by Eritrea during the time fall of the Soviet Union. As the fundingfrom the USSR died the regime died along with it because it was only ableto stand with massive military and financial infusion by the former USSR.

The late brute-dictator Meles Zenawi was a master of the art of deception,lies and, divided Ethiopia along ethnic, regional and religious lines to rule.Meles used brute force to control Ethiopia while receiving massive aid from the US, UK, EU and other foreign donors in pursuit of Western interest at the expense of the people of Ethiopia and region.

His successor Hailemariam Desalegn is on the same path openly declaringhimself as uncontested winner of a rigged election with 100 % of the votes going for the EPRDF. While Desalegn is considered weak and baseless, the US appears intent on keeping him on the helm. President Barack Obama's visit could bolster his stance in the eyes of the EPRDF cronies because they will definitively know that Desalegn is America's man.

Like Meles, Desalegn's regime is openly declaring war, regime change inEritrea and pursuing a federal system in Somalia ignoring international norms and laws as if there are no consequences. Be it domestic or international, it matters-not what the transgressions are as long as the regime is on-leash in pursuit of US agendas. The Obama administration could have learned from history and readjusted US policies.

To the contrary, it is pursuing the same policy. In 1974, failure to foster broad based governance, and propping an emperor for life became futile for US interests. Millions were made to suffer under the brutal hands of Mengistu Hailemariam as a result. Today Ethiopia is at the same place it was in 1974 when Haile Selassie was ousted and US presence replaced bythat of the USSR. The US has now placed all its eggs on EPRDF's basket and allowed the minority mafia regime to handle Ethiopian and regional matters as it pleased. According to Professor Terrence Lyons,

"Ethiopia's ruling EPRDF is getting increasingly authoritarian but for the policy makers in Washington, the EPRDF is known instead as a 'friendly authoritarian' regime." The difference however, in 1974 Ethiopia was moreunited than it is today. Despite its misgivings, the reign of Emperor Haile Selassie as well as Mengistu Hailemariam placed the needs of a united Ethiopia first and foremost. To the contrary, today, Ethiopia is fragmenteddue to the Ethnic Federalism introduced by Meles Zenawi and his ethnic minority clique ruling Ethiopia.

After four rigged elections, the people of Ethiopia have given up on the notion of free and fair democratic transition, and as a result forced to pick up arms. Now Ethiopia is mired by armed rebellion and fire is raging throughout as there exist no other option. US policy makers know that Ethiopia is a tinderbox ready to explode at any moment. The discontentment of people is palpable. Former US Ambassadors Vicki J. Huddleston and Donald Yamamato are first hand witnesses to the frustration and suffering of the people. Yet, the US administration keepssupporting this failing regime to the point of a presidential visit.

President Barack Obama is the first sitting US president to visit Ethiopia.His visit will have implications for the future. Some consider it a legacy visit as he will be the first American president to address the African Union, in Africa, important historic consideration for a black president.

However, the aim is to mitigate China's advances in the continent, to bolster the regime and to assure all that Hailemariam Desalegn has theconfidence of American President.

Conclusion

The EPRDF regime's relationship with Ethiopians is irreparable. Genocides in Gambella, in the Ogaden, Oromo, and torture of citizens all over, illegal seizures of land, deliberate confrontation with religious communities, corruption, land grab and the atrocities are endless. The people of Ethiopiahave lost confidence completely particularly after the deportation of thousands of Ethiopians fromSaudi Arabia and the beheading of by ISIS.

President Obama's visit will likely achieve two things: embolden Ethiopianresolve and loss of confidence on US Ethiopia policy. Absent of hope for democratic transition, Ethiopians have concluded change can only come with credible threat of force. As a result Ethiopians are picking arms in record numbers. That means change will come in Ethiopia and history willrepeat itself. The question is how will the emerging multi polar world influence the future and whether the US can regain its favored special relationship status with the people of Ethiopia again?

No government that poorly manages a nation that is overburdened by debt and mired by conflicts from within and out can be an asset. No government can be an asset when it could only govern by fear with propaganda as its vital organ. US administrations could claim that Ethiopiais a sovereign nation and that Ethiopia's decisions are independent.

However, as history proves; to bolster successive oppressive client regimes, the US may have lost the best ally in the people of the regionand risked the long term interests of the US. (Text ends)

AFRICAN UNION (AU): Build Statue of HIM At Center Front of AU Building!

(CHANGE.org): His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I the late emperor ofEthiopia was the visionary leader and main architect in establishing the African Union (formerly known as Organization of African Unity) in AddisAbaba on May 25, 1963. Despite playing an instrumental role in supporting liberation movements in Africa that led to the development of free and independent African nation states, His Majesty Emperor Haile Selassie has not received due credit and recognition for His Majesty's unparalleled dedication, commitment and contributions to African independence and unity, and for His Majesty's key role in establishing theAU/OAU.

POLITICS: Ethiopian Opposition Leader Travels to Eritrea to LeadRebellion'

By William Davison July 25, 2015

The leader of a U.S.-based Ethiopian opposition group relocated to Eritreato organize civil and armed resistance against the government in the capital, Addis Ababa, a movement spokesman said.

Berhanu Nega, a U.S. citizen, traveled to Ethiopia's northern neighbor following the merger of his Ginbot 7 group with the Ethiopian People's Patriotic Front this year, spokesman Tadesse Kersemo said. Renewed tensions between the Horn of Africa nations, which fought a two-year warthat ended in 2000, come before next week's visit by Barack Obama to Ethiopia, the first by a sitting U.S. president. "We are following a kind of merged strategy, blending peaceful resistance with non-peaceful resistance," Tadesse said by phone from London on July 21. Attacks on security installations seek to inspire Ethiopians to engage in non-violent opposition, he said.

Ethiopia has fractious relations with Eritrea, which became independent from its larger neighbor in 1993 after three decades of armed struggle. Sections of the border remain militarized after a failure to implement a 2002 United Nations ruling that awarded disputed territory to Eritrea. Bothgovernments back insurgencies against each other. Sporadic attacks by anti-government militants haven't stopped Ethiopia's economic growth, which is forecast by the International Monetary Fund to exceed an annual rate of 8 percent over the next two years. Ethiopia's government classes Ginbot 7 as a terrorist group and has sentenced Berhanu to death in absentia. Berhanu's deputy, British citizen Andargachew Tsige, is on death row in Ethiopia after being captured in Yemen en route to Eritrea in June 2014 to negotiate the merger, Tadesse said.

'Appropriate Action'

Ethiopian security forces and the rebel coalition clashed in the northern Tigray region last month, Tadesse said. On July 8, Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn warned Eritrea he would take "appropriateaction" if regional destabilization continued. Ethiopia says it last conductedstrikes inside Eritrea in 2012.

Ginbot 7 is militarily weak and Berhanu's move is a "publicity stunt,"Getachew Reda, a special adviser to Hailemariam, said Thursday by phone. "The only way they can galvanize support among a dwindling following is by concocting some kind of drama."

Ginbot 7 comprises former members of the Coalition for Unity and Democracy, an opposition grouping that made unprecedented gains against the ruling Ethiopian Peoples' Revolutionary Democratic Front in 2005 elections.

Eritrea Deal

Protests occurred after the CUD claimed victory, leading to almost 200 people being shot dead by security forces. Opponents were jailed en masse for treason before being pardoned and leaving Ethiopia. Oppositionparties won one seat in parliamentary elections in 2010; this year the ruling coalition took all 547 constituencies.

The merged rebel group's only deal with Eritrea is using it as a base, Tadesse said. President Isaias Afewerki rules a one-party state that's banned private media and was accused of possible crimes against humanity by UN investigators last month. The government says wartime powers, including indefinite national service, are necessary because of thethreat from Ethiopia, whose population of 96 million is about 15 times larger than Eritrea's.

The report of clashes "strengthens the hand of securocrats in the government that have wanted to see a more robust military approachtowards" Eritrea, said Michael Woldemariam, assistant professor of international relations and an expert on African politics at Boston University. "The situation is volatile, and the potential for heightened conflict is real." (Text ends)

As Obama Visits Rights Groups Decry Treatment of Media in Ethiopia'(News Analysis July 25, 2015)

Journalist Reeyot Alemu said U.S. President Barack Obama is unlikely to see the real Ethiopia during a historic state visit to the East African powerhouse. Until earlier this month, the award-winning reporter said sheexperienced the dark side of her country by spending nearly five years in the bowels of an Ethiopian prison.

Reeyot is among at least nine journalists and bloggers who were arrestedand charged with terrorism, though she and her lawyer say she did nothing but write critical articles about the government. While in prison in2013, she won the UNESCO/Guillermo Cano World Press Freedom Prize.

Jailed journalists Five others were also released just weeks before Obama's visit, and their charges were completely dropped. But at least 11 journalists and bloggers remain in prison, according to the the Committeeto Protect Journalists.

Reeyot has vowed to continue her work, but told VOA she won't be amongthe media horde covering Obama's trip. She said she's been deluged by visitors and well-wishers since her release and needs time to rest and recover. But Reeyot wishes she could talk to the American president. "I want to talk to him about Ethiopians' conditions," Reeyot told VOA News on the eve of his arrival. "He can't know about it from government officials. "He can't know about it by looking only at the new buildings and the new roads, he must know about it by communicating with the real opposition party leaders, by talking to the private press journalists," she said.
Ethiopia has in recent years become the darling of the international development community for its effective use of aid money and for its rapiddevelopment. Obama last year described the East African nation as a "bright spot" on the African continent. "We have seen enormous progress in a country that once had great difficulty feeding itself," he said. But critics of the Ethiopian government say that is far from the full picture.
Grim situation
International watchdog Human Rights Watch, which the Ethiopian government accuses of bias, said the situation is grim. The nation recentlyheld national elections in which the ruling Ethiopian People's RevolutionaryDemocratic Front won every single seat in parliament. Opposition groups complained that they were denied equal treatment during the campaign, and claimed they were harassed and intimidated.
"Authorities use arbitrary arrests and politically motivated prosecutions to silence journalists, bloggers, protesters, and perceived supporters of opposition political parties," Human Rights Watch said in a recent report. "Security forces respond to peaceful protests with excessive force, and detainees routinely allege torture and ill-treatment." Reeyot said she's seen that up close.
'Human rights violations'
"There are many bad things, human rights violations in Ethiopia," she said. "For example, if you take my case, I wrote articles that concerned this government. I didn't do any crime. But they put me in prison and alsothey didn't give me medical treatment, they don't let you read political books, historical books. …
"And there are also many human rights violations, and also my colleagues, many other journalists and opposition party leaders, they beat them, there are many bad things. There is no democracy in Ethiopia. There is no justice. Therefore he must know aboutit," Reeyot said. (Text ends)

OBAMA ETHIOPIA VISIT: Rainbow Sparked Controversy As Obama Landed'(July 26, 2015) Social media response to a picture of a rainbow showed mixed sentiment over Obama's visit

A picture of a rainbow welcoming U.S. President Barack Obama in EthiopiaSunday sparked mixed reactions on social media: Some praised the meteorological phenomenon as a heavenly promise to mankind while others slammed it as a symbol of Obama's "gay agenda." Ethiopia's Minister of Foreign Affairs Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus posted the picture on Facebook, saying the rainbow rose above the country's capital as Obama landed in Air Force One for a two-day visit to the East African nation.

Ethiopians on social media were quick to analyze what the rainbow meant.For some, it was a sign of good to come. For others, it was a warning against Obama's "evil agenda." Still for others, the rainbow was a gift to Obama, or a gift to Ethiopia. Obama arrived in the country from Kenya,where he made clear his position on gay rights—a contentious issue between the U.S. and Kenya. "I believe in the principle of treating people equally under the law, and that they are deserving of equal protection under the law and that the state should not discriminate against people based on their sexual orientation," Obama said during a press conference. While in Ethiopia, Obama will hold talks with local and regional leaders and become the first U.S. president to address the AfricanUnion. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA/KENYA: Obama tries to save face on South Sudan'POLITICO: By EDWARD-ISAAC DOVERE

At the White House the day before the president left for Africa, Rice was asked specifically if she considered the Ethiopian prime minister to be "democratically elected." She said that the purported 100 percent supportthat Hailemariam supposedly won suggests "some concern for the integrity of the electoral process — at least if not in the outcomes, then insome of the mechanisms that supported the process, the freedom for theopposition to campaign."

Pressed to clarify whether she thought that made the prime minister ademocratically elected leader, Rice smirked and pointed again to the election results: "100 percent."

In Nairobi on Sunday, deputy national security adviser Ben Rhodes wasmore explicit: "Clearly an election that has 100 percent is not one that enjoys the broad support and legitimacy that a free and transparent election would have."

A senior administration official said after Obama's remarks that there wasno distinction: Saying the government was democratically elected, the official said, was not the same as saying that the government was electedby a process that was fully free, fair and democratic.

“These elections were far from perfect, but these elections certainly took place,” the official said. “Had the president been asked was this a perfectlyfree, fair and democratic election, the answer would have been, ‘Absolutely not.’”

Obama’s stop in Ethiopia, tacked on to his Kenya homecoming over the weekend, put him in contortions over holding a bilateral meeting and statedinner with Hailemariam, who’s using the visit by the American president to claim legitimacy. The White House feels that’s worth it to nurture the larger security relationship with Ethiopia — and to press Hailemariam to a higher standard now that Obama’s recognized him as the leader. “There are certain principles that we think have to be upheld,” Obama said, no matter Ethiopia’s history or recent troubles. OBAMA IN ETHIOPIA: Begins Ethiopia, African Union visit’

By Andrew Beatty, Karim Lebhour, AFP (July 27, 2015)

Addis Ababa (AFP News updates) - US President Barack Obama landed inEthiopia on Sunday, beginning a two-day stay and becoming the first American leader to visit Africa's second most populous nation.

Air Force One touched down at Addis Ababa's international airport after a short flight north from the Kenyan capital Nairobi, and the president was greeted on the tarmac by Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn.

The visit will include talks with the Ethiopian government, a key strategically but criticised for its record on democracy and human rights. Obama will also become the first US president to address the African Union, the 54-member continental bloc, at its gleaming, Chinese-built headquarters.

He will also hold talks with regional leaders on the civil war in SouthSudan.

AU Commission chief Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma hailed what she said willbe an "historic visit" and a "concrete step to broaden and deepen the relationship between the AU and the US."

While Kenya launched one of the biggest security operations ever seen in the capital Nairobi to host Obama from Friday evening to Sunday, the habitual reach of Ethiopia's powerful security forces meant there was littleobvious extra fanfare ahead of his arrival.

Ethiopia, like Kenya, has been on the frontline of the fight against theSomali-led, Al-Qaeda affiliated Shebab. Both nations have troops in Somalia as part of an AU and US-backed force, and are key securitypartners to Washington.

But the visit also comes two months after elections that saw the prime minister's ruling coalition take every one of the 546 seats in parliament.
The opposition, which lost its only seat, alleged the government had usedauthoritarian tactics to guarantee victory.
The US State Department notes Ethiopia's "restrictions on freedom of expression," as well as "politically motivated trials" and the "harassmentand intimidation of opposition members and journalists."
Ahead of the visit, the White House stressed it frequently addresses issuesof democracy and political rights with countries in the region. Having spoken frankly in Kenya on human rights and corruption, Obama can also be expected to address Ethiopia's -- and Africa's -- democracy deficit.
South Sudan peace push
Through the tinted windows of his bomb-proof presidential limousine, nicknamed "The Beast," Obama will see Addis Ababa's construction boomof tower blocks, as well as sub-Saharan Africa's first modern tramway.
Ethiopia has come far from the global headlines generated by the 1984famine, experiencing near-double-digit economic growth and huge infrastructure investment -- making the country one of Africa's top-performing economies and a magnet for foreign investment.
The Horn of Africa nation also remains a favourite of international donors -
- despite concerns over human rights -- as a bastion of stability in anotherwise troubled region.
On Monday Obama will try to build African support for tough action against South Sudan's warring leaders if they reject an August peaceultimatum.
Obama will meet with leaders from Ethiopia, Kenya and Uganda as well asSudanese Foreign Minister Ibrahim Ghandour in Addis Ababa to try and build a collective front to end the 19-month-old civil war in the world's youngest nation. Signalling a deeper commitment to ending violence that has killed tens of thousands of people and forced more than two million from their homes, Obama is expected to make the case for tougher sanctions and a possible arms embargo.
South Sudan's rivals -- President Salva Kiir and rebel leader Riek Machar,who will not be at the meeting -- effectively face an ultimatum, a "final best offer," according to one senior administration official. "The parties have shown themselves to be utterly indifferent to their country and theirpeople, and that is a hard thing to rectify," the official said.

Rights groups, however, are not happy about Obama visiting Ethiopia, saying the trip could lend credibility to a government they accuse of suppressing democratic rights. They say that includes the jailing of journalists and critics, often using anti-terrorism legislation said to stiflepeaceful dissent.

"We don't want this visit to be used to sanitise an administration who hasbeen known to violate human rights," said Amnesty International's Abdullahi Halakhe, adding he feared Ethiopia would "spin" the visit to its benefit.(Text ends)

Barack Obama In Ethiopia:

Obama differs from top aides over Ethiopia's democracy' Visiting the country, the president refers to the government as

`democratically elected' while his top aides do not. By EDWARD-ISAACDOVERE (July 27, 2015)

(POLITICO ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia) – President Barack Obama divergedfrom top aides and most outside observers here Monday by declaring twice that he thinks Ethiopia's government was "democratically elected."Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn's party knocked out the last remaining opposition member of the parliament in the June elections, giving it, purportedly, 100 percent of the vote — a figure that American and other international officials have repeatedly condemned as proof the elections were neither fair nor representative. Story continued below,

Standing tensely at his joint press conference with the prime minister at the Jubilee Palace, Obama said "I don't bite my tongue so much when it comes to these issues." He ran through a list of areas of planned cooperation that Ethiopia is seeking, including economic investment, geo-thermal energy development, security and counterterrorism. "Everything I've mentioned," Obama noted, "also depends on good governance."

But as he did, Obama differed from his top aides, who have expressed impatience with Ethiopia and its elections. By contrast, Obama expressedsome understanding for Ethiopia's travails: "It's been relatively recently that the constitution was formed and the elections put forward a democratically elected government," he said. That's not what national security adviser Susan Rice said she thinks.

Barrack Obama in Addis Ababa for three days visit’

US president Barrack Obama arrived at Bole International Air Port, Addis Ababa,a few hours ago to a cloudy sky marked with rainbow, something Ethiopians tend to relate to spirituality. In fact, rainbow is called “Ye Maryam Mekenet” literally a long scarf like piece used by the Virgin Mary. Obama left for Addis earlier today after wrapping up his visit in Kenya where his effort to bring same sex marriage issue to the limelight was castaside by Kenyan president Uhuru Kenyatta. Obama was greeted by Ethiopian prime minister Hailemariam Deslagne and his cabinet members up on his arrival at Bole international Air port.

According to Ethiopian Broadcasting Corporation news, Obama is expectedto hold talks with Hailemariam Desalegne and Mulatu Tseshome, more likea ceremonial president of Ethiopia, on bilateral, regional and security issues. In addition, Obama is expected to discuss South Sudan with leaders from the region and Dr.Mulatu Teshome of Ethiopia, according to the report by EBC.

Barrack Obama is the first US sitting US president to visit Ethiopia and hewill be meeting with leaders of the African Union (AU) during his three days stay in Ethiopia. The security arrangement in Addis Ababa is very tight. US air force helicopters are seen in the skyies of Addis Ababa and US security personnel assumed greater part of security task in Addis Ababa just like what they did in Kenya. There is great enthusiasm and excitement among supporters of the regime in power about Obama’s visitto Ethiopia. For them, Obama’s visit is a validation that the Ethiopian government is on the right track on all the things it is doing.

On the other hand, reputable human rights organizations including HumanRights Watch and Ethiopian activists are crying foul opposing Obama’s visit on grounds that Ethiopian government has turned out to be a total tyranny. In addition to the recent 100 % election win, these group point to recent killings of opposition figures, attacks on the free press and media – among other things – to prove the point that total repression. Twitter campaign under the hashtag #ObamainEthiopia ishighlighting dimensional problems wrought about by the regime in Ethiopia.

Ethiopia is under

With prevalence of harassment of opposition members and killings, political forces in Ethiopia seem to think that peaceful opposition is virtually impossible and not realistic to effect change for the better. Increasing number of Ethiopians are thinking in terms of armed struggle to effect regime change. In fact, a rebel group based in Northern Ethiopiais gaining momentum as the political condition in Ethiopia proves that involvement in opposition politics is risky.

Weeks before Obama's arrival, Ethiopian government releases incarcerated bloggers and journalists including Reyot Alemu. There are, however, quite high numbers of journalists, bloggers and opposition members in prison. For example, about half of bloggers group of Zone 9 are not released, blogger Eskindir Nega, renowned journalists like Temesgen Desalegne – just to name few – are still in jail. Would Obama'svisit influence change in the over repressive political climate is a questionthat lingers among some at least in the quarter of human rights and political activism. Yet, there is a considerable number of Ethiopians who seem to be indifferent about Obama's visit to Ethiopia and expect no change because of his visit. (Text ends)

HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: Obang Metho on to Obama's visit to Ethiopia'

President Obama knows very well that PM, HMD and the entire leadershipof the ethnic apartheid regime of TPLF/EPRDF have not been elected through free and fair elections and the regime doesn't allow basic freedoms, independent judiciaries, open political space and multi-ethnic governments. Instead, corruption is rampant, the human and civil rights of the Ethiopian people are violated and ethnic and religious based conflicts have caused untold suffering throughout Ethiopia.

Th...e daily struggle for survival, the dislocation of the Ethiopian people, cronyism, ethnic favoritism and strong-armed leaders trump the maximization of human potential in Ethiopia for all but a few. Yet, the people of Ethiopia have not given up and will never give up their hope for a NEW and Better Ethiopia for ALL its beautiful people (not beggar Ethiopian of the TPLF/EPRDF and we the people of Ethiopia will continue tostrive towards progress despite these obstacles.

Ethiopia needs more international partners ready to speak the truth so theneed for real reforms are acknowledged. In the long run, the greatest stability will only come as the companion of meaningful reforms, the restoration of justice and the reconciliation of the Ethiopian people. Only then will Ethiopia be in a position to use its strategic influence for the goodof the people of Ethiopia, Africa and beyond.

If President Obama wants to work on the side of the Ethiopian people towards peace, stability and prosperity in Ethiopia and in the Horn of Africa, now is the time to show such readiness. We, the people of Ethiopiaare extending our hand to work with him, but leave the decision up to Him.
President Obama should not feed Ethiopian or the African people rhetoric of words while feeding the dictators with aid money. This kind of thing is unhealthy and will backfire. Will President Obama now choose to side withthe democratic movement of the Ethiopian people or will he continue withthe status quo, supporting a dictator who has stolen the votes of the people?
I call on the Obama to speak out about the injustice in Ethiopia. As for us,we will carry on our struggle until we free ourselves. We are not asking anyone else to do it—the US, the EU, or others— but, we do ask the Obama to not be a roadblock to our freedom. It is time for Ethiopia Africato progress and thrive! That would be cause for which we are ready to stand for! (Text ends)

Obama In Ethiopia: visit raises Ethiopia's stature amid rightsconcerns’

By Elias Meseret, AP (July 27, 2015)

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP) — Like the visit to Kenya, President BarackObama's trip Sunday to Ethiopia represents the first time a sitting U.S. president has been to this East African country and according to its government, it is a sign of the nation's growing stature.

Grave concerns remain, however, over political freedoms in this nation ofmore than 90 million — Africa's second largest — and opposition figures fear that the visit, coming on the heels of an improbable 100 percent ruling party win in elections, will give international legitimacy to a repressive government.

With its history of pan-African activism, Ethiopia is also the home of theAfrican Union and on Tuesday Obama will be addressing the whole continent from the organization's new headquarters in Addis Ababa.

After centuries of ties — the first bilateral trade agreement was signed in1903 — only now is a U.S. president visiting, noted Communication Minister Redwan Hussein.

"The choice by a sitting U.S. President to visit us was made because we have become more visible and important enough to be visited," he told The Associated Press. "Being visited by the first sitting American presidentwill enhance the confidence and aspirations of Ethiopians."

Obama is set to holds talks with his counterpart Mulatu Teshome as wellas Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn and is expected to discuss the conflict in southern Sudan, confronting the al-Qaida-linked al-Shabab inSomalia and economic development.

Administration officials have also promised frank discussions over the lackof press freedom and political openness in Ethiopia.

In May, the ruling party took all the seats in legislative elections describedby the U.S. and the European Union as unfair.

Woretaw Wassie, a leader of the opposition Blue Party said members ofhis party were arrested ahead of Obama's visit on suspicion they wouldmake a fuss.

"Visiting a country which is totally contrary to the values of the West is very controversial," he said. "But in any case, the U.S. believes that engaging can make a difference so maybe it will be a good opportunity toput some pressure."

Another touchy subject would be gay rights which Obama championed onSaturday in Kenya, calling for equal treatment for all under the law. "All religions in Ethiopia should oppose the president if he raises the gay issuehere," said Memihir Dereje Negash, of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church- linked Weyiniye Teklehaimanot Association.

Obama set to begin Ethiopia talksBBC (July 27, 2015)

President Barack Obama is in Ethiopia on the second leg of his African tour

- the first serving US leader to visit the country.

He is due to hold talks with government officials and discuss the civil warin South Sudan with regional leaders.

President Obama will also be the first US president to address the 54-member African Union at its headquarters in Addis Ababa on Tuesday.

Mr Obama flew to Ethiopia after a two-day visit to Kenya.

There he had discussed trade and security but also called for greaterhuman rights and warned of the dangers of corruption.

The US president was greeted at Addis Ababa's international airport byEthiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn.

On Monday, Mr Obama is due to discuss ways to bring South Sudan's 19-month-old civil war to an end.

At the scene: Karen Allen, BBC News, Addis Ababa

Compared to the Kenyan leg of his tour, President Obama's arrival inEthiopia signals a more sombre mood.

Ethiopia is a close ally of the US in fighting militant Islamists. Thousandsof Ethiopian troops are in Somalia, where the capital Mogadishu was thescene of a major bomb blast on Sunday.

But despite security ties, Mr Obama is expected to raise concerns aboutwhat critics say is the erosion of democratic freedoms in Ethiopia.

Recent elections in which the ruling party secured all of the parliamentaryseats, and a further clampdown on the media and the jailing of bloggers, are among the issues on which the US president is expected to express alarm.

In talks with leaders from Ethiopia, Kenya and Uganda as well as the Sudanese foreign minister, he is expected to call for tougher sanctionsand a possible arms embargo if the warring factions do not agree on apeace deal.

However, a US official travelling with Mr Obama said Monday's talks were not expected to lead to a breakthrough. "This is an opportunity to reinforce the effort that's on the table and to strategise... on next steps inthe event that it doesn't succeed," the official told reporters.

Fighting in South Sudan has left thousands of people dead and displacedmore than two million.

Security issues will also be on Mr Obama's agenda as Ethiopia, like Kenya,is battling the jihadist group al-Shabab.

Correspondents say he is also likely to call for greater democracy andhuman rights while in the country.

Ethiopia's ruling party, the EPRDF, and its allies won every single parliamentary seat in May's elections. Opposition parties claimed theprocess was rigged.

Some rights groups have criticised Mr Obama's visit to Ethiopia, warningthat the trip could lend credibility to a government accused of jailing journalists and critics.

Amnesty International's Abdullahi Halakhe said: "We don't want this visitto be used to sanitise an administration that has been known to violate human rights."

Human Rights Watch and other organisations urged Mr Obama to put the"pressing human rights concerns... at the forefront of your discussions".

A legal case currently being fought through the US courts alleges thatagents of the Ethiopian government eavesdropped on the internet activities of a man in the US state of Maryland.
The man, born in Ethiopia and now a US citizen, works for a politicalopposition group outlawed in his home country. (Text ends)
HUMAN RIGHTS CONCERN: Activist Obang Metho’s concern on Obama's visit to Ethiopia' President Obama knows very well that PM, HMD and theentire leadership of the ethnic apartheid regime of TPLF/EPRDF have not been elected through free and fair elections and the regime doesn't allowbasic freedoms, independent judiciaries, open political space and multi- ethnic governments. Instead, corruption is rampant, the human and civilrights of the Ethiopian people are violated and ethnic and religious based conflicts have caused untold suffering throughout Ethiopia.
Th...e daily struggle for survival, the dislocation of the Ethiopian people, cronyism, ethnic favoritism and strong-armed leaders trump the maximization of human potential in Ethiopia for all but a few. Yet, the people of Ethiopia have not given up and will never give up their hope for a NEW and Better Ethiopia for ALL its beautiful people (not beggar Ethiopian of the TPLF/EPRDF and we the people of Ethiopia will continue tostrive towards progress despite these obstacles.
Ethiopia needs more international partners ready to speak the truth so theneed for real reforms are acknowledged. In the long run, the greatest stability will only come as the companion of meaningful reforms, the restoration of justice and the reconciliation of the Ethiopian people. Only then will Ethiopia be in a position to use its strategic influence for the goodof the people of Ethiopia, Africa and beyond.
If President Obama wants to work on the side of the Ethiopian people towards peace, stability and prosperity in Ethiopia and in the Horn of Africa, now is the time to show such readiness. We, the people of Ethiopiaare extending our hand to work with him, but leave the decision up to Him.
President Obama should not feed Ethiopian or the African people rhetoric of words while feeding the dictators with aid money. This kind of thing is unhealthy and will backfire. Will President Obama now choose to side withthe democratic movement of the Ethiopian people or will he continue withthe status quo, supporting a dictator who has stolen the votes of the people?
I call on the Obama to speak out about the injustice in Ethiopia. As for us,we will carry on our struggle until we free ourselves.
We are not asking anyone else to do it—the US, the EU, or others— but,we do ask the Obama to not be a roadblock to our freedom.

It is time for Ethiopia Africa to progress and thrive! That would be causefor which we are ready to stand for! (Text ends)

How the “War on Terror” Stole Democracy in Ethiopia: Dispelling the mythof the US claim as a “guardian of liberty and freedom” in the world VIEW POINT By Alem Mamo August 1, 2015

“It would be unjust and deplorable for foreign powers to intervene and frustrate the Salvadorian people, to repress them and keep them from deciding autonomously the economic and political course that our nationshould follow.” —Archbishop Oscar Romero, 1980

“The greatest weapon in the hands of an oppressor is never his guns andarmies, but the mind of the oppressed.” —Steven Biko

“It is counterproductive to hold Ethiopia up as a model of good governance when the current government has created one of the most oppressive regimes in Africa and has largely shut down civil society and the independent media. It is questionable, however, whether progress oneconomic indicators can be sustained as long as a repressive one-party government, largely representing a minority group, continues to exercise power by force” —The Irish Times

Once upon a time, not too far in the distant past, countering the expansion and influence of the USSR was the most important driving forceof US foreign policy. It is in this context that the Cold War “friendly state” list included the most brutal and corrupt authoritarian regimes who committed heinous acts of genocide, mass murder, and crimes against humanity. The list of such brutal regimes include Suharto of Indonesia, Mobutu Se Se Seko of Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo), General Augusto Pinochet of Chile, and during the Vietnam War, the US administration supported and collaborated with Vice-President General Nguyen Cao Ky of South Vietnam, who idolized Adolf Hitler as his hero.

Even, the most degrading and appalling white supremacist regime in Apartheid South Africa was an ally of the West, while Nelson Mandela, thegiant of human dignity, freedom, and justice, was marked as a “terrorist.”These are just a few; the list is long and full of despots with abhorrent human rights records and bloody legacies.

In South and Central America, paramilitary death squads, mostly trained and supported by the US government, roamed the streets, villages, and towns terrorizing, raping, killing, and maiming innocent civilians. Millions have fallen victim around the world in the raging blaze of the Cold War. InAfrica, Asia, South, and Central America, countless mass graves hold the open secrets and bleeding wounds of many nations. In El Salvador, for instance, the pain and suffering of the Salvadorian people was remembered recently at a ceremony of the beatification of the man they called “the voice of the voiceless,” Archbishop Oscar Romero, an ordinary man with an extraordinary dedication and unwavering service to the poor,the marginalized, and neglected. On February 17, 1980, Archbishop Romero wrote a letter to President Jimmy Carter lamenting the US government's collaboration with the military junta in El Salvador and its impact on the Salvadorian people: "I am very concerned by the news that the government of the United Statesis planning to further El Salvador's arms race by sending military equipment and advisors to 'train three Salvadoran battalions in logistics, communications and intelligence.' If this information from the papers is correct, instead of favoring greater justice and peace in El Salvador, yourgovernment's contribution will undoubtedly sharpen the injustice and the repression inflicted on the organized people, whose struggle has often been for respect for their most basic human rights."

President Carter never responded to Archbishop Romero's letter. A week later, on March 24, 1980, the humble servant of the people, Monseñor Archbishop Oscar Romero, was assassinated while he was celebrating mass. His dedication to the poor and marginalized was so pure and creative that the Archbishop began to read the names of those who were snatched from their homes by paramilitary forces: the desaparecido – thedisappeared, as they became to be known. Such a simple act of weekly reading of the names on the radio reached into every household in El Salvador infuriating the military junta. His legacy and commitment continues to inspire many around the world.

While most countries are still trying to recover from the Cold War trauma, the so called "War on Terror" has emerged as the sequel of this tragic chapter in human history. The US and the West once again have forged analliance with murderous regimes who do not flinch for a second from terrorizing and murdering their own people. Regimes, who do not have an ounce of legitimacy from the people they proclaim to rule, have been endorsed and applauded by the West for their "outstanding contribution inthe fight against terror." Such utter neglect and cruel brutality endorsed and oiled by the West is nowhere more evident than in Ethiopia. For the last twenty four years, the people of Ethiopia endured the most horrendous and indiscriminate form of brutality.

As many international human rights organizations reported torture, extrajudicial killings, and disappearances under the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) ethno-kleptocratic regime are daily occurrences.Civil society and independent media outlets are effectively shut down.

Journalists are risking their lives to tell the truth. Elections are held undertight control of the ruling elite where opposition leaders and members arearrested and intimidated. For example, in the most recent election, the regime declared itself 100% "winner" effectively becoming the first in Africa to win 100% of the seats. It is worth noting that the well- established percentage of victory in Africa is often between 94-99%; the TPLF regime's 100% election "victory" is unfamiliar to most authoritarianregimes on the continent. And yet, the US and the West continue to call such a regime "democratically elected" ignoring the cries of the people. President Obama's lavish praise for such brutal regime has left many bewildered and shocked. Thwarting democracy in the name of fighting terror is not only wrong andmisguided, it could have multiple negative implications in the long run.

First, it actually submits to the objectives of terror groups, such as Al- Shabab, who are committed to disrupting and blocking the establishment of secular, free, and democratic systems in the region. In this regard, theyhave effectively stifled the democratic aspirations of the Ethiopian people. Second, US and Western policy of collaborating with the TPLF ethno- kleptocratic regime is already radicalizing different groups in Ethiopia forcing them to give-up on peaceful and non-violent struggle and opt for other forms of resistance. As humiliation, lack of economic and social mobility, and political exclusion escalates, citizens will risk their lives to reclaim their dignity and humanity. This inevitable path, presents dangerous and horrifying scenario with regional and continent wise ramifications.

The twentieth century, in terms of human warfare, was the bloodiest and the most violent century in history. In what Jose Marti called the "hour of the furnaces," Oscar Romero, Mahatma Gandhi, Nelson Mandela, Desmond Tutu, Martin Luther King Jr., and many others accompanied those who were in the sights of the men with guns. In their unwavering commitment, they made the journey full of hope with anticipation of better future. They made the journey and the struggle stronger as they burned brighter. Who would be the ones who will follow in the path of these giants of the 20th century and shine a light on what already appearsto be a violent and tumultuous century. Once again, the call has gone out for a leadership not only to lead, but also to listen to the pain and anguishof those excluded in the current global political and economic order. Thosewho say "this is not about me" will emerge as true leaders. Those who proclaim the role of "après moi, le deluge" will take citizens into the edge of the abyss – a new century old fight for freedom, justice and democracy.

So, how many more innocent civilians have to die? How many more journalists have to endure imprisonment and torture? How many peacefulpro-democracy activists have to be killed in broad day light? How many children must grow up without parents? How many more mass graves have to be discovered? How many more mothers have to bury their children killed by TPLF security forces? How much blood? How many morelives must we lose before the world wakes up and says enough! (Text ends)

OBAMA IN ETHIOPIA: Obama urges Ethiopia to curb crackdownson media, opposition'

(By DARLENE SUPERVILLE, July 27, 2015)

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP News updates) — President Barack Obama urged Ethiopia's leaders Monday to curb crackdowns on press freedom and political openness as he began a visit that human rights groups say legitimizes an oppressive government. "When all voices are being heard, when people know they are being included in the political process, that makes a country more successful," Obama said during a news conferencewith Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn.

Obama's trip marks the first visit by a sitting U.S. president to Ethiopia, a fast-growing economy once defined by poverty and famine. Later Monday,Obama convened a meeting with African leaders on the crisis in South Sudan, telling them he hoped the discussion would help to "bring about the kind of peace that the people of South Sudan so desperately need." The world's newest nation has been gripped by violence as warring factions in the government fight for power.

"The conditions on the ground are getting much, much worse," Obama said at the news conference. He said if a peace agreement isn't reached by an Aug. 17 deadline, the U.S. and its partners would have to "considerwhat other tools we have." Options under consideration include deepeningeconomic sanctions and an arms embargo. Obama arrived in Ethiopia lateSunday following a stop in Kenya, the country of his father's birth. The crisis in South Sudan and the human rights challenges on his agenda punctured a trip that had otherwise been a celebratory visit of the first black U.S. president to Africa.

Despite Ethiopia's progress, there are deep concerns about political freedoms on the heels of May elections in which the ruling party won every seat in parliament. Obama said he was frank in his discussions withEthiopian leaders about the need to allow political opponents to operate freely. He also defended his decision to travel to the East African nation, comparing it to U.S. engagement with China, another nation with a poor human rights record. "Nobody questions our need to engage with large countries where we may have differences on these issues," he said. "That's true with Africa as well."

Ethiopia's prime minister defended his country's commitment to democracy. "Our commitment to democracy is real — not skin deep," hesaid. Asked about his country's jailing of journalists, he said his country needed "ethical journalism" and reporters that don't work with terrorist organizations.

Ethiopia is the world's second-worst jailer of journalists in Africa, after Eritrea, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists. Ahead of Obama's arrival, the Ethiopian government released several journalists and bloggers it had been holding since April 2014 on charges of incitementand terrorism. Many others remain in detention.

Sarah Margon, the Washington director of the organization Human Rights Watch, said Obama's visit undermines the president's goals of good governance on the African continent. "In many ways, I guess it's a reward," Margon said. "Ethiopia at this time doesn't deserve that." Despitedifferences on human rights, the U.S. sees Ethiopia as an important partner in fighting terrorism in the region, particularly the Somalia-based al-Shabab network. Ethiopia shares intelligence with the U.S. and sent troops into Somalia to address instability there.

The al-Qaida-linked al-Shabab claimed credit for a suicide bomb at a luxury hotel in Somalia's capital Sunday that killed 15 people and injured nearly two dozen more. The Jazeera Hotel was considered the most securein Mogadishu and is frequented by diplomats, foreigners and visiting heads of state.

Obama said the attack was a reminder that "we have more work to do" instemming terrorism in the region.

Ethiopia has also been an important

U.S. partner in the effort to end South Sudan's civil war. The prime minister was among the leaders joining Obama in Monday's meeting onthe crisis.

South Sudan was thrown into conflict in December 2013 by a clash between forces loyal to former Vice President Riek Machar, an ethnic Nuer, and President Salva Kiir, a Dinka. The fighting has spurred a humanitarian crisis, throwing the country into turmoil four years after itsinception.

The U.S. was instrumental in backing South Sudan's bid for independence,which was overwhelmingly supported by the country's people. AP White House Correspondent Julie Pace contributed to this report.

"In many ways,I guess it's a reward," Margon said. "Ethiopia at this time doesn't deserve that."

OBAMA IN ETHIOPIA: Main opposition Blue (Semayawi) party boycotts reception dinner for President Obama to protest Obama'sendorsement of the ruling party's 100% election win’

Side note: Yilikal Getinet, leader of Semayawi (Blue), the main oppositionparty in Ethiopia, has announced today that he will not attend a receptionparty that is hosted at the National Palace in honor of President Barack Obama after he heard the president claiming that Ethiopia's government that has won 100% of the votes in the recent election is "democratically elected."

President Obama's claim has angered Ethiopian opposition parties, independent journalists, and human rights groups. Human rights organizations and democracy advocates world-wide have condemned theMay 2015 fraudulent elections in Ethiopia, and Obama's endorsement of the Ethiopian regime as "democratically elected" is a big blow to the struggle for democracy in Africa, according to observers. Meantime, “Obama touches "Lucy" during his second day visit to the national museum in Ethiopia. Lucy is estimated to have lived 3.2 million years ago in Ethiopia. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA/KENYA EVENT: theguardian: Obama criticised for callingEthiopia's government 'democratically elected'

While The US president calls for end of crackdown on political and pressfreedom, his comments on Hailemariam administration are widely condemned By David Smith in Addis Ababa Monday 27 July 2015

17.44 BST Last modified on Tuesday 28 July 2015

Barack Obama has been criticised by opposition groups and journalists inEthiopia after referring to the country’s government as “democratically elected”, with one human rights watchdog describing the statement as “shocking”.

The US president was speaking at a joint press conference with Hailemariam Desalegn, the Ethiopian prime minister, after the two leadersheld talks in the capital, Addis Ababa.

Although Obama said he had raised issues of good governance – “I don’tbite my tongue too much when it comes to these issues” – he also insisted: “We are opposed to any group that is promoting the violent overthrow of a government, including the government of Ethiopia, that has been democratically elected.”

Answering questions from journalists later, Obama repeated the phrase:“We are very mindful of Ethiopia’s history – the hardships that this country has gone through. It has been relatively recently in which the constitution that was formed and the elections put forward a democratically elected government.”

Barack Obama makes first visit to Ethiopia by serving US president;

US president’s meeting with prime minister of Ethiopia set to focus onsecurity and threat of Somalia-based terrorist group al-Shabaab

Hailemariam’s party and its allies won 100% of seats in parliament two months ago. The opposition alleged the government had used authoritarian tactics to secure victory, including intimidation, arrests and violently breaking up rallies. At the time, the US said it remained “deeply concerned” by restrictions on civil society, media, opposition parties andindependent voices and views. But Ethiopia remains a key security ally for the US in the fight against theIslamist militant group al-Shabaab. It has also become an economic battleground with China, which has delivered huge infrastructure projectsin Africa’s second most populous nation.

Critics accused Obama of granting legitimacy to the regime. Reeyot Alemu, a columnist released earlier this month after four years in jail onterrorism charges, said: “It’s not ‘democratically elected’ because there was only government media and people did not get enough information.

“They also arrested many opposition leaders and journalists. They won theelection by using human rights violations. How can it be democratically elected? It is completely false. I wish Barack Obama had sent a strong message.”

Bekele Nega, general secretary of the Oromo Federalist Congress, representing Ethiopia’s biggest ethnic group, said: “I don’t know if democracy means robbing people’s vote and robbing their election result? They have killed people and they have taken the ballot box with them in organised fraud.”

Nega claimed his party found some of its votes thrown down a toilet, whileat one polling station its victory by 800 votes to 40 was reversed to a 40- 800 defeat. “I wonder if people could tolerate this in America or Britain or wherever? Is this the meaning of democracy in America? We are very sorry that Mr Obama’s comment on our election is really supporting dictators. We know the US is always looking after its own interests and will take over on the military side, sending our people to Somalia.”

Barack Obama In Kenya/Ethiopia: 'no excuse' for treating women assecond-class citizens;

‘Just because something is part of your past doesn’t make it right’, Obamasays in rousing Nairobi address that also offers insight into his African heritage. Obama had let down opposition groups in Ethiopia, Nega added. “We gave support for an African-American to be elected as president of the United States. We hoped Africa and Ethiopia would benefit from Obama, but we found it to be just a mockery of democracy. We expected a lot and we lost everything.”

Obama’s statement appeared to be the closest thing to a “gaffe” he hasmade so far on his east African tour. He earned widespread praise in Kenya for championing both gay rights and women’s rights, challengingAfricans to reconsider traditional practices including female genital mutilation. But Ethiopia’s more restrictive approach to civil liberties wasalways going to pose a tougher diplomatic balancing act.

Felix Horne, Ethiopia and Eritrea researcher at Human Rights Watch, said:“For president Obama to suggest there is anything democratic about Ethiopia is a shocking statement. I wonder what the jailed journalists, bloggers and political prisoners think of his comments? Or the thousands of Ethiopians who have fled their country because they did not support thegovernment? Or the 18 Muslim activists who were recently convicted under the anti-terrorism law? A truly disappointing statement from the USpresident.”
Rachel Nicholson, Horn of Africa campaigner at Amnesty International, added: “While President Obama described the Ethiopian government as democratically elected, the leadup to the elections saw a serious onslaught on the rights to freedom of expression, association and assembly, undermining citizens’ right to participate in public affairs freelyand without fear. Opposition political parties have continued to face harassment since the elections, including reports of the deaths of at leastthree opposition political figures in suspicious circumstances.”
Many journalists, bloggers and political activists remain behind bars in Ethiopia. Maya Foa, of the UK-based pressure group Reprieve, said: “It’s encouraging to hear President Obama telling Ethiopia to ‘open up space’ for opposition voices. But his praise for Ethiopia’s elections as ‘democratic’was woefully misplaced, at a time when the government is systematically detaining and torturing leading activists such as Andy Tsege – a father of three who faces a death sentence for the mere ‘crime’ of holding democratic beliefs.”
Obama and African leaders to consider sanctions in South Sudan's civilwar;
US president and top officials from Uganda, Kenya, Ethiopia, and Sudan toconsider ‘plan B’ to address conflict, including possible arms embargo
Obama is the first sitting US president to visit Ethiopia. He praised the country’s progress in development that has lifted millions of people out ofpoverty, as well as its regional role in fighting al-Shabaab militants and helping peace efforts in wartorn South Sudan, the subject of talks with regional leaders later on Monday.
Speaking at the national palace originally built for emperor Haile Selassie,Hailemariam rejected criticism that his government had crushed opposition and press freedom. “Our commitment to democracy is real andnot skin-deep,” he said, adding that Ethiopia is a “fledgling democracy, weare coming out of centuries of undemocratic practices”.
The country needed “ethical journalism”, he added. “For us it’s very important to be criticised, because we also get feedback to correct ourmistakes. Media is one of the institutions that have to be nurtured for democracy.”

Obama’s visit to Ethiopia is rigidly organised and, although pictures of hisface and US flags adorn much of Addis Ababa, there is little opportunity for interaction with the public. On Tuesday, he will also become the first US president to address the African Union, the 54-member continental bloc, at its Chinese-built headquarters. (Text ends)

Obama draws criticism for saying Ethiopia is democratic’

By Christopher Torchia, AP July 28, 2015

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) — Some African activists have greeted President Barack Obama's remarks that Ethiopia has a democratically elected government with scorn and concern. Obama made the comment on Monday during a news conference with Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn of Ethiopia, whose ruling party won every seat in parliament inMay elections.

On Tuesday, Obama urged African leaders to uphold democratic rights in aspeech delivered from the headquarters of the African Union before he departed Ethiopia to end a two-nation African trip that included a stop in Kenya. "Yesterday he was a tricky and mischievous politician," Yonathan Tesfaye, a spokesman for Ethiopia's opposition Blue party, said in a reference to Obama's comment that Ethiopia's government was democratically elected.

"And today he has become a passionate inspirational human rights activist," Tesfaye said, citing Obama's remarks to the African Union. "Which one should we believe? Which one should we go with?" Merara Gudina, a leading opposition figure in Ethiopia, said he was doubtful that the United States would push hard for democratic change in his country and expressed concern that Obama's visit would end up being "another public relations exercise." Human rights groups have criticized Obama forvisiting Ethiopia, saying his trip lends legitimacy to an oppressive government. Ethiopia is the world's second-worst jailer of journalists in Africa, after Eritrea, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists.

Hailemariam, the Ethiopian prime minister, has defended Ethiopia's commitment to democracy and said the country needed "ethical journalism," not reporters that "pass the line" and work with "terrorist groups." At the news conference Monday, Obama said: "Our policy is thatwe oppose terrorism wherever it may occur. And we are opposed to any group that is promoting the violent overthrow of a government, includingthe government of Ethiopia, that has been democratically elected."

Obama's comment illustrates how the U.S. is becoming "out of touch withAfrican realities," such as the seemingly inevitable electoral victories of ruling parties whose power is entrenched, said Angelo Izama, a Ugandan analyst who runs a policy and security research center called Fanaka Kwawote. "It was kind of ironic that Obama was singing the praises of democracy in Ethiopia while ignoring its flaws there," Izama said. During his visit, Obama urged Ethiopia to widen freedom of expression and otherdemocratic rights. AP writers Elias Meseret in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, and Rodney Muhumuza in Kampala, Uganda contributed to this report.

Let the world know the truth about the ethnic apartheid regime of the TPLF/EPRDF this repeatedly terrorized their own people. Is Ethiopia's increasing repression within the country becoming the source of its owninstability?

There are many sources of discontent and instability; however, it appears that the anger and frustration of the Ethiopian people level is cumulative. Ethiopians in the Diaspora who visit Ethiopia return home expressing fear that the tensions are so high they believe something unexpected could setit off.

Life has always been difficult, but conditions are worsening for many, notonly in regards to freedom and opportunity, but in regards to the impossible challenges of life. In order to continue to exploit the national assets, land and resources, the power-holders must increasingly repress the people. It is an impossible situation if it continues to be ignored.

The most critical question today is whether or not the ethnic apartheid regime TPLF/EPRDF's increasing authoritarianism, corruption and monopoly of all parts of Ethiopian society will lead to its own instability, something which could easily result in an explosion of violence and chaosin the country.

The warning signs are present and ironically, it is the years of refusing to deal with the deepening anger and dissatisfaction among Ethiopian peopleof every background—except by forceful crackdowns—that has created such a ticking bomb. If genocide is to happen in Ethiopia it will be part of

U.S. President Barack Obama legacy because his foreign policy and administration supported the ethnic apartheid regime of the TPLF. (Textends)

POWER GRID: Ethiopia Agrees on First Deal for Privately ProducedElectricity'

By William Davison, Bloomberg (July 30, 2015)

Ethiopia's government signed a deal to buy electricity from a geothermal-power plant being developed by companies including Reykjavik Geothermal Ltd. of Iceland, a partner in the project said.

The state agreed to purchase power at 7.53 U.S. cents per kilowatt hourin an accord signed on Monday during President Barack Obama's visit tothe Horn of Africa nation, said Edward Njoroge, chairman of the CorbettiGeothermal Power project. The signing, which follows talks backed by Obama's Power Africa initiative, paves the way for development of the facility, he said in an interview in the capital, Addis Ababa.

"It was a major milestone," said Njoroge, who represents Berkeley Energy, a Nairobi-based investor in renewable energy projects that's one of at least four partners in Corbetti. "The drilling rigs now will be mobilizedand we should have them within the next three months in the country andstart drilling for the steam."

Ethiopia is expanding electricity to supply an economy that grew at a faster pace than any other African country over the past decade. The government is using domestic resources and loans from partners includingdevelopment banks and Chinese lenders to boost generating capacity from2,300 megawatts. The Corbetti project in Ethiopia's central Oromia region is the first by private companies in Ethiopia, where industries like power and banking are dominated by the state.

'Tight' Agreement

Developing the first 20 megawatts of power output at Corbetti will cost

$100 million, all of which will come from Reykjavik, Icelandic Drilling Co.and the African Renewable Energy Fund managed by Berkeley, Njoroge said. A total of $2 billion is required for generation of the full 500 megawatts, which is expected to be completed by about 2023, he said.

The tariff agreed with the government is "actually tight for us, but we think we can do it," Njoroge said. The cost of electricity from geothermal projects in Kenya, Africa's biggest producer of power from steam, is about 8.5 U.S. cents to 9 U.S. cents per kilowatt hour, he said. U.S. advisers supported negotiations on the tariff via the Power Africa program, whichseeks to boost access to electricity on the continent.

"This will help the government meet its ambitious goal of significantly increasing access to electricity across Ethiopia and help open the marketto developing Ethiopia's other vast renewable-energy sources," Obama told reporters in Addis Ababa on Monday. Ethiopia has the potential to generate 45,000 megawatts of hydropower, which the World Bank ranksas Africa's second-largest after the Democratic Republic of Congo.

Ethiopia's 25-year energy strategy is to invest $100 billion to generate atotal of 37,000 megawatts by 2037, according to the Foreign Ministry. (Text ends)

Ethiopian court sentences Muslim Arbitration members to 7-22 years'

ESAT News August 3, 2015: The Ethiopian Federal High Court today sentenced Muslim Committee members to prison terms that range from 7-22 years. Our Sources from Addis Ababa reported that Abu-Bakr Ahmed, Ahmadin Jebel, Yassin Nuru, Kamil Shemsu were sentenced to 22 years; Bedru Hussien, Sabir Yirgu, Mohammed Abate, Abu-Bakr Alemu and MunirHussien for 18 years; Sheik Mekete Muhie, Ahmed Mustafa, Sheik Saied Ali Juhar, Mubarak Adem, and Kalid Ibrahim for 15 years. The court also sentenced Murad Shakur, Nuru Turki, sheik Bahru Umer and yusuf Getachew to 7 years.

The Muslim Arbitration Committee were composed of volunteer Muslimswho intended to create a conducive platform for the negotiation of the Muslim Community and the Ethiopian government. Dimtsachin Yissema(let our voices be heard), has been calling for the release of Muslim Arbitration Committee Members through well-organized Friday sit-in protests all over the country.

Even though the Ethiopian Constitution grants freedom of religion, Dimtsachin Yissema says the government is trying to meddle in the affairsof the Muslims. It is recalled that the Ethiopian Government closed Awalya, an Islamic School, due to a suspicion that it had become a sourceIslamic fundamentalism. Muslims all over the country also protested against the government to stop its interference in the election process of Islamic Supreme Council (Mejlis), and to halt its introduction of new religious Islamic teaching doctrine called Al-Habesh

The government officials say the Arbitration Committee members were arrested on terrorism, plot, and incitement charges. The Ethiopian government also showed a documentary, Jihadawi Harekat, that accuses the Muslim Arbitrary committee members' attempt of terrorism and publicdisorder.

The Committee members have been in custody since July 2012 under theinfamous anti-terrorism law. Analysts say the verdict passed on Arbitration committee members is politically motivated. (Text ends)

Ethiopia jails Muslims convicted of terror plot'

BBC News updates August 3, 2015: A court in Ethiopia has sentenced 18 Muslims, including clerics and a journalist, to up to 22 years in prison under controversial anti-terrorism legislation. The 18 were convicted last month on charges including terrorism and conspiracy to create an Islamicstate. They were arrested three years ago over protests against alleged government interference in religious affairs. Ethiopia's government has often been accused of stifling dissent. It denies the allegation.

BBC Africa Live: News updates

Some rights groups criticised US President Barack Obama for visiting thecountry last month, warning that it could lend credibility to a governmentaccused of jailing journalists and critics.

Mr Obama called on the government to improve it record on human rights, while praising it as an "outstanding partner" in the fight againstmilitant Islamists in neighbouring Somalia.

Ethiopia's privately owned Addis Standard publication reports on its website that four of the defendants - Abubakar Ahmed, Ahmedin Jebel,Yasin Nuru and Kemal Shmsu - were sentenced to 22 years each in prison.

The other 14 received sentences ranging from seven years to 18 years, it reports.The state-run EBC television station said their sentences would run from when they were first detained. The group denied the charges andsaid they had been mistreated during their detention. A section of Ethiopia's Muslim community staged protests in 2011 and 2012 over several issues, including allegations that the government was interfering in the choice of the main religious body, the Islamic Supreme Council.

The government denied the allegation. Ethiopia is a mainly Coptic Christian country, with a minority Muslim population. Ethiopia's ruling EPRDF coalition, led by Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, won all parliamentary seats in elections in May. The opposition said the poll wasrigged. (Text ends)

ETHIOPOLITICS: US and European officials urge Ethiopia to release Andy,the father of three and lifelong crusader for democracy has been in secretdetention for more than a year (August 7, 2015 by Amel Ahmed@amelscript
Politicians from the United States, United Kingdom and the European Union have sent a letter to Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegnurging the release of British citizen Andargachew "Andy" Tsege, a political activist who has been held incommunicado for more than a year and has been sentenced to death. The father of three was on his way to Eritrea to attend an opposition conference on June 23, 2014 when he was detained in Sana'a, Yemen, during a layover, at the behest of the Ethiopian government.
Tsege, 60, a former secretary-general of a banned opposition party, had already been sentenced to death in absentia by an Ethiopian court in 2009. The letter, obtained only by Al Jazeera, criticizes the Ethiopian authorities for conducting a "deeply flawed" trial and demands the releaseof Tsege, who is kept in solitary confinement and subjected to artificial light 24 hours a day.
"You have emphasized in the past Ethiopia's commitment to human rights,but it is unconscionable and illegal for your government to have targeted

Mr. Tsege in this way. Your government’s treatment of him is a stain onits reputation, and threatens to isolate Ethiopia internationally," said theletter, co-authored in June by California Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, a Republican member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Other politicians who signed off on the letter include British parliament members Jeremy Corbyn, Baron Dholakia, and Emily Thornberry along with European Parliament officials Ana Gomes and Richard Howitt. Britishofficials have only been permitted to see Tsege three times since his arrest in monitored visits that take place away from his jail cell, circumstances that lawyers say prevent him from speaking openly about his mistreatment.

The Independent reported that during one of those visits, in April, Tsege told Greg Dorey, the British ambassador to Ethiopia that he would prefer being executed to remaining in detention. “Seriously, I am happy to go —it would be preferable and more humane,” Tsege reportedly said. Yemi Hailemariam, Tsege's partner and mother of his children, said the ordeal has left the family devasted. “It's dreadful, what has happened. The way he was taken, it's really terrifying. I was hoping things would evolve quickly and he would be released, but it feels like it's only getting worse and worse,” she told Al Jazeera America in an exclusive interview.

Concerns that he is being mistreated by Ethiopian authorities, who routinely subject political detainees to torture, grew after the Ethiopian government released videos of a gaunt and disoriented Tsege apparently confessing to a number of offenses. UK-based legal charity Reprieve submitted the videos to an expert for analysis who concluded that Tsegeexhibited signs of torture.

“The expert found that there are signs of significant deterioration in his mental condition, an indicia of PTSD [post-traumatic stress disorder] that could be the result of torture. And we already know that torture is pretty endemic at Ethiopian detention sites,” said Maya Foa, director of Reprieve's death penalty team. She described Tsege's arrest in Yemen andrendition to Ethiopia as a “politically motivated abduction.”

Ethiopia's embassy in Washington and its mission in New York did not respond to Al Jazeera's calls and e-mails for comment.

Dedicated reformer

Tsege was tried in absentia in 2009 along with a group of opposition members and journalists under Ethiopia's controversial anti-terrorism laws, which human rights experts say are used to repress peaceful political dissent.The charges leveled against Tsege include high treason,espionage and involvement with a terrorist organization.

He was an active member of Ginbot 7, a political party founded in the U.S.

– home to the largest Ethiopian population outside of Africa – that advocates for democratic reforms. Ethiopia designated Ginbot 7 a terroristgroup in 2011, a move that human rights experts say was meant to quashopposition.

"They are not considered a terrorist group by any government apart from the Ethiopian [government]," Foa told Al Jazeera. She added Tsege's arrest was part of a larger crackdown on dissent by the country's authorities in the run-up to the May 2015 elections, in which the ruling party won by an overwhelming majority. Human rights experts have denounced the elections as an exercise in "political theater." "A decade- long campaign by Ethiopia's government to silence dissent forcibly has leftthe country without a viable political opposition, without independent media, and without public challenges to the ruling party's ideology," wroteDaniel Calingaert in The Guardian. Calingaert is the executive vice- president of Freedom House, an International human rights organization. "For most Ethiopians, these elections are a non-event," he added.

The ruling party - Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPDRF) - has been in power for the last 25 years, following the 1991 ouster of the country's military junta, the Derg. When the EPDRF ascended to power, Tsege – who sought asylum in the UK in 1979 – traveled back to Ethiopia for the first time in 20 years to help his homeland rebuild and to serve as the secretary of the Addis Ababa City Council. He resigned from that post 18 months later, having grown disillusioned with the new government, which showed no signs of implementing genuine democratic reform, according to his partner Hailemariam. Tsege returned to the UK, where he had become a full citizen in 2006, and although he lost his Ethiopian citizenship (dual citizenships are prohibited under Ethiopian law) he continued to advocate for change in Ethiopia from the UK. "He never stopped believing change would come to Ethiopia. In the UK, he saw the difference between those who live in a free society and people who live in authoritarian regimes likeEthiopia. He really couldn't let it go. Anytime he saw an opportunity to getinvolved, he was always involved," said his partner, Hailemariam.

In 2005, Tsege published a book entitled Freedom Fighters Who Don't Know What Freedom Is – a scathing indictment of the EPDRF leadership. The following year, he traveled to Washington D.C. to speak on Ethiopia'shuman rights record before a Congressional committee, telling them that"the scale of repression has exceeded Ethiopia's darkest hours during themilitary dictatorship."

Mixed messages

International human rights organizations have long criticized Ethiopia'sruling party for its abysmal human rights record. Activists cite growingrepression and the recent passage of draconian legislation that has targeted journalists and opposition parties. A recent report by the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) ranked Ethiopia as the fourthmost censored country in the world, trailing behind Saudi Arabia and North Korea.

Just this week, Ethiopia imposed lengthy jail sentences on religious leaders, a journalist and 13 human rights activists, the Sudan Tribune reported on Monday. President Barack Obama recently traveled to the East African country, a staunch ally in the so-called war on terror. Duringa joint press conference with the country's prime minister, Obama calledEthiopia's government "democratically elected."

His comments were heavily criticized by African activists and journalists. The next day, Obama appeared to tone down his remarks and urged African leaders to uphold democratic rights. The seemingly conflicting remarks were questioned by rights activists. "Yesterday he was a tricky and mischievous politician," Yonathan Tesfaye, a spokesman for Ethiopia'sopposition Blue Party, told The Associated Press. "And today he has become a passionate inspirational human rights activist," Tesfaye added. "Which one should we believe? Which one should we go with?" Tsege's partner Hailemariam called the comments disturbing and inconsistent. "There needs to be a clear, consistent message sent to the Ethiopian government. That you can't violate human rights, you can't abduct activists and take them to other countries. These are actions by a government that should be condemned, not praised," she said. (Text ends)

OPPOSITION POLITICS: When EPRDF Insults Democracy, AmericaLends a Hand

By Temesgen Zewdie former MP (August 10, 2015)

(Addis Fortune) Another election has come and gone. The ruling party hasimproved its sham election record from a 99.6pc in 2010, to a 100pc win in 2015. The political opposition, on the other hand, has fast regressed from 174 seats in 2005; to just one, yes, just one seat in 2010, to a zero,yes zero, seats in 2015. In democratic countries, polling institutions and political pundits go to great lengths to predict the outcome of an election by taking polls as to who would win, and by what percentage points. This is not the case in Ethiopia. The ruling party, by using its cadres and administrative structures under its total control, is guaranteed to secure a majority seatby whatever means necessary. The means of achieving victory often include harassment, intimidation and imprisonment of journalists, candidates, human rights advocates and opposition supporters, not to mention extra-judiciary killings.

The few genuine opposition parties – not including the over 70 imposters – that are serious challenges to the ruling party are either shut down before the election, as in the case of Unity for Democracy & Justice (UDJ),for example, or are maligned before and during the election, with intentions of denying them credibility in the eyes of the voting public. In Ethiopia, the public media is used as a tool to demonize the few genuine opposition parties that have a chance to seriously challenge the ruling party in the polls.

On the other hand, those parties that operate under the cover of an opposition receive all the perks and exposure on public media, while the genuine political opposition is harassed and intimidated by the security forces, and endlessly criticized by the public media. This was exactly whathappened in the 2015 election.

Individuals' posturing under the pretext of an opposition party leader are given exposure on public television and radio, heaping praise on the rulingparty for allowing them unhindered political space and access to public media, whereas members and candidates of the genuine opposition are harassed by the security forces to disable them from reaching their grassroots supporters. The voters are told 24/7, through the public media,which is controlled by the EPRDF, that the genuine opposition is anti- development and anti-peace, and that voting for the ruling party is voting for peace, and development. That if the opposition is elected there will be chaos and instability; also alleging that the opposition is conspiring with hostile neighboring Eritrea to destabilize the country; are few of the flagrant accusations fabricated by the ruling party's television news, to negatively sway the voting public's opinion.

One clear call that has been repeated ceaselessly on the EPRDF controlledtelevision is the idea of peace, development and stability, being jeopardized if the opposition is elected. The above allegations were used as an opening statement in the evening television newscast for the duration of the election campaign. The opposition has no chance to disprove the charges since the public media is totally closed to the genuine opposition. The few private presses who are not aligned with the ruling party are intimidated to print information that does not show the ruling party in good light or they will be shut down and thrown to prison with bogus charges.

One of the few political parties which had a reasonable chance to challenge the ruling party at the polls was UDJ. As most Ethiopians realize, the Party had been prominent in the affairs of Ethiopian politics since it was formed in June, 2008. UDJ had participated in the 2010 national election, overcoming the heavy-handed interference of the ruling party in the election process, and yet showing a significant support in the polls. In the 2015 election, UDJ had planned to field 450 candidates for the federal parliament, and 1,200 candidates for the regional councils. Theparty had the material and human resources to facilitate the election.

But the ruling party, fearing the distinct advantage UDJ could bring to bear on the 2015 election, both in material and capable human resources,decided to ‘pull the plug’ just weeks before the official campaign begun, transferring the legal administration of the Party to an imposter under thepretext of internal acrimony within the Party. All this is done under the direction of the National Election Board of Ethiopia (NEBE), in complicity with the city police and the security forces.

No complaint was filed with the courts, nor any order executed by the court to shut the office down. It was all done by an administrative order ofthe NEBE which serves as the right hand of the ruling party in ensuring the continuation of their success in the polls. If there is a government thatoperates with total impunity to muscle its way through, unhindered by thelaw of the land and international norms, the ruling party would stand out even among African dictators.

Those of us who had personal property, including our vehicles, at the office of UDJ during the sudden closure by the security forces, were told that we would not be allowed to remove them without submitting to a search. When asked if the police had a court order to search the private property of individuals, the security officer at the scene was quick to pointout that “none was needed”.

Over five years of preparation to participate in the national election cameto an abrupt end by the order of the NEBE. Confirming to all that followedthe drama, that Ethiopia is governed by the security and military forces, not by the rule of law as we are led to believe. What is depicted in the saying, “adding insult to injury”, happened when we decided to go to court seeking justice for the illegal closure of our office. The judge, after adjudicating the case for over two months between the now defunct UDJ and the NEBE ruled that we did not have the legal personality to file the charges.

This is how the legal system works when you are the political opposition inEthiopia. Your legal identity can be snatched away not by a court order, but by an administrative fiat from none other than the NEBE, with the collaboration of the security forces, and when you protest the illegality of the action to the legal system, the court rules you have no right to file thecomplaint in the first place, proving that Ethiopia is ruled by a military power rather than constitutionally promulgated laws of the country. The short journey of UDJ may have ended unceremoniously, without realising our lofty goals of seeing a democratic Ethiopia, but our peaceful struggle for democracy, justice and respect for human rights is just beginning. Young men and women have sacrificed their lives in their quest for democracy in Ethiopia. The recent statement by President Barack Obamathat Ethiopia has a democratically elected government is not only profaneto most Ethiopians, but it also strikes a deep wound in the souls of men and women still dying and languishing in filthy prison cells of the ruling party. They pay for their audacity to challenge the lack of democracy, ruleof law, and respect for human rights in Ethiopia. TEMESGEN ZEWDIE IS AFORMER MEMBER OF FEDERAL PARLIAMENT (MP) AND MEMBER OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE FORMER UNITY FOR DEMOCRACY & JUSTICEPARTY (UDJP).

A book About the Gamo Sparked Protests against government inArba Minch'

A book about the people in the Gamo highlands of south-western Ethiopia,making distinctions about its related communities, sparked virulent protests in Arba Minch town last week. The book authored by Tadele Tuffa, published in February under the title “Madola malana Dogala” sparked anger for its claim that there is no culture and language called Gamo and the northerner of the region Dache are superior than those communities in the south. The book immediately created a controversy and some community members organized protest in Arba Minch town against the author saying the motive behind the book was to insult the Gamo people.

Local media reports arresters were made during the protest. Lemma Folo,the Gamo Gofa Zone security chief was quoted as saying that people werearrested as the demonstration was not authorized and most of them are freed within hours of the arrest. However, around 11 protesters are still behind bars.

The demonstrators asked the state government to ban the book with immediate effect, complaining that the author has the blessing of some local authorities. The Gamo highlands are home to a large number of related communities. Most well-known are those in the northern parts ofthe highlands, such as Dorze, Doko and Ochollo, who are often taken asexemplars of the more general ‘Gamo culture’ and language. In communities such as Balta, Sorba, and Zargulla, the majority of people speak a language that is not intelligible by northern Gamo speakers andfollow a cultural tradition that is significantly different from the northernhalaka initiations. DROUGHT ALERT: Cattle dying as seasonal rains fail in parts of Ethiopia’

Associated Press By Elias Meseret (August 11, 2015)

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP) — Seasonal rains have failed to materialize insome parts of Ethiopia, causing deaths of many cattle and other animals, officials and residents said on Monday. While the government is not callingthe situation in parts of northern, northeastern and eastern Ethiopia a drought, the impact is taking a toll. Adamu Kebede, a truck driver, told The Associated Press he has seen hundreds of cattle lying dead along the main road that stretches from the Addis Ababa to the Afar Region's capital, Semera. He said he has also seen dozens of trucks unloading emergency food aid. The government said it is stockpiling food to preventa shortage.

"The government has enough food stock and it is assisting farmers to continue their farming practices with improved seed items and drought-resistant crops," Wondimu Filate, a spokesman for the Agriculture Ministry, told AP. Impacts of climate change often weigh heavily on Ethiopia's smallholder farmers. Rain-fed agriculture is the primary driverof the Ethiopian economy, contributing to nearly 45 percent of the country's GDP and employing 85 percent of its population. (Text ends)
BOOK:A book authored by the late Birhanu republished' Art & Life, Books, Entertainment News (August 12, 2015)
Berhanu Zeirhun's classic historical fiction inspired by the life and times ofEmperor Tewodros II (1820-1868) was reprinted last month, twenty nine years after its release. Published in 1986, the 297-page novel "Ye Tangut Mistir" (Tangut's secret) was Berhanu's last major work, expanded and revised from an earlier novel, "Ye Tewodros Emba" (Tewodros' Tears) published in 1965.
"Ye Tangut Mistir" and "Ye Tewodros Emba" had made Berhanu Zerihun one of Ethiopia's most established authors, possessing personal verve andpersuasiveness. "Ye Tangut Mistir" shows the nineteenth century leader Atse Tewodros as determined ruler who tried to reform and modernize the country but ultimately failed to fulfill his dream because of his inability to come to terms with the powerful landed aristocracy, the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and the foreign missionaries. The novel portrays the Emperor as lacking in diplomacy skills and persuasion power, often showing erratic behaviour and violent anger when things didn't go his way, resorting to sexual acts to calm his spirit.
The new edition, published by Bahru Publisher, to make the novel accessible to the general public is authorized by Berhanu's children, TsegaBerhanu and Tinsae Berhanu who both live abroad. Nebiy Mekonn, editor of the weekly Amharic Addis Admass, wrote a blurb describing the novel as "full of imagination and suspense, a smoothly flowing narrative". BahruSolomon, owner of Bahru Publisher, told Ethiopia Observer that "Ye Tangut Mistir" is currently one of the best-selling books in the market andhe sent out more than 5,000 copies to its stores and book vendors in lessthan four days. Additional 5,000 copies are on the way.
Berhanu's affinity for Emperor Tewodros was exhibited not only in his ownwritings but also in reviewing other's works. His 1966's review of Abe Gubegna's book about the Emperor Tewodros put him into a lot of trouble.In his review, he held that it did not matter whether Tewodros had been of royal blood but whether he was a good king. This position contradicted the Constitution, which stated that the Emperor should be of the ancient Ethiopian royal line, a fact that Berhanu allegedly did not know or more likely just ignored. He was tried, fined, and subsequently dismissed fromhis position as editor of the government daily Addis Zemen.

Tangut, the new arrival to Gondar town, had been made to marry Atse Tewodors's bravest and most trusted general, Gebre Hiowt Meshesha (more commonly known as Gebreye). Though she was the Emperor's niece, this was hidden from the public because she belongs to outcast andexcluded people, Kimant. Her married life with the Emperor's closest friend and comrades-in-arm, plays out against a dazzling backdrop of royal pageantry, feudalism, political turmoil, and frustration of not conceiving a child, eventually forcing her to get pregnant from another man. Her husband led the Ethiopian army in one of the decisive battles between the troops of Atse Tewodros and those of the Napier expeditions, mortally wounding in the battle. His death shattered her, had considerableeffect on the morale of the army and upon that of the Emperor himself, who wept on hearing the news of the closet comrades' death.
Both epic and popular entertainment, "Ye Tangut Mistir" was written in short, clear, simple sentences, Berhanu's signature writing style, contrary to the long-winded, complicated and rhetorical periods that was common then. Berhanu's upbringing in Gondor town instilled in him a love of Amharic language. He moved to Addis in his adolescent years to Addis Ababa where he studied Tegebared technical School.
After his graduation in 1955 specializing in radio mechanics, he taught as a shop assistant at the technical school for some time, and then worked as a draftsman in theGeography Institute. After a few months, however, he turned to journalism, starting as a cub reporter for Ye Ethiopia Dimtse in 1957.
Berhanu made swift progress, and became editor of Ye Zaretu Ethiopia in1960, before taking over the editorship of Addis Zemen in 1962.
Meanwhile, he had published his first book, Two Letters of Tears, 1950, anepistolary novel that deals with derelict womanhood. Berhanu Zeirhun hassince written a number of novels. (Text ends)
The WikiLeaks Report & it's implications
VIEW POINT by Obang Metho August 13, 2015)
The Wikileaks report attributes responsibility for a car bombing in 2006 tobeing planned and executed by Meles and his ethnic apartheid regime of the TPLF/EPRDF. As done before, the regime blamed others for the act in order to arrest leaders, to intimidate activists and to justify counter- insurgency.
The Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) were the scapegoats this time and the bombing incident was used to justify a series of arrests of Oromo leaders, even leaders who were not part... of the OLF. This ethnic apartheid regimehas often garnered more support from United States of America and the West whenever they can claim they are fighting "terrorists." They also use these false flag tactics for propaganda that justifies maintaining a tightgrip on the country lest it become a failed state like Somalia.

The whole country of Ethiopia is now considered potential or actual terrorists as the regime’s fear of its own people has reached unprecedented levels. To stay in power, they are terrorizing the entire country so now, no one trusts each other, even in families, as spies are everywhere and they are the ones who obtain the perks—the jobs, the education, the business opportunities, food aid or seeds for their crops. The only difference between the TPLF of the past and the TPLF/EPRDF oftoday is that the terrorism is state-sponsored.

The ethnic apartheid regime targets anyone any who resists them even ifthat resistance is in the form of a critical but truthful media report. The real terrorists of 2015 are no longer called guerilla fighters or rebels, theyhave titles like prime minister, minister of foreign affairs, minister of agriculture, governor or first lady; however, those who expose them can now be charged as terrorists under this new anti-terrorism law that basically criminalizes truth.

ETHIOPIAN ECONOMY: Souring income and wealth Inequality

There is a disconnect between the popular perception about inequality in Ethiopia and inequality based on quantitative measures. Ethiopians, resident in the country and those visiting there, speak of the widening living conditions of the "haves" and the "have nots"2. Indeed, in a countrywhere disparities were compressed by design between the mid-1970s andthe early 1990s, the gated residential homes and gated communities of Addis and other major towns, the furniture and fixtures and the fancy carsportray the gap. On the other side, measures based on the Gini coefficientpresent Ethiopia as the most equal country in Sub-Saharan Africa. This paper sheds light on these differences and provides an insight on the historical and underlying factors for the situation that pertains now. It then shares the author's views on some statistical and policy issues.

A Brief Review of Money-Metric Measures

The literature on poverty and inequality in Ethiopia is fast increasing. This paper presents a review of only a few papers – some recent and some a bit out-of-date. The World Bank, in its recent poverty assessment reports that "Ethiopia is one of the most equal countries in the world as a result ofa very equal consumption distribution in rural areas. In comparison to other African countries, Ethiopia has the lowest inequality as measured bythe Gini coefficient3. Ethiopia's Gini coefficient has consistently remained below 30% while other countries have Gini coefficients around 40%. The Gini for rural Ethiopia is particularly low at 27%, and given that the majority of the population is rural this contributes to a low national Gini.

Urban Ethiopia has consistently higher inequality than rural areas, acrossmeasures and across time, but in comparison to other countries it is still quite low at 35%. In urban areas, all measures of inequality show a substantial increase in inequality from 1996 to 2005 and a substantial reduction in urban inequality from 2005 to 2011."4 Similarly, the recent human development report issued by UNDP, referring to Government of Ethiopia sources as well individual authorities, presents a leveling-off in inequality, particularly in urban areas. It reports that "Between 2004/05 and 2010/11, income (consumption) inequality measured by the Gini. (The author could be reached at asefa.belachew@gmail.com)Ethiopian town of Mekelle bans public smoking'

AFP News (August 14, 2015)

The bars and cafes are full and lively in the northern Ethiopian town ofMekelle -- but they are no longer smoke-filled, with the strict implementation of a smoking ban in public places.

"It's a good thing," said Hiriti, the owner of a small bar in a busy street. "Of course, some customers are not happy, but it also depends on the way you tell them not to smoke. "I tell them it is not only about the law.It is also about your health," he said. "They react better if you tell them that way."

The town of Mekelle is bucking the trend in Africa where tobacco use isincreasing driven by companies that see a growing market on the continent amid a tightening of smoking laws elsewhere.

Tobacco consumption in Africa -- excluding South Africa -- increased byalmost 70 percent between 1990 and 2010, according to a study by theAmerican Cancer Society. The number of African smokers could grow by40 percent by 2030, the study predicted.

Ethiopia is not the first country to impose a ban, but is one of the few toact on the law. Kenya's capital Nairobi has designated smoking cabins, with smoking on the street illegal, although the rule is widely flouted.

Several African countries have a complete ban on smoking in public -- most recently, Uganda passed a law banning smoking within 50 metres(160 feet) of any public place -- according to the World Health Organisation (WHO), but such laws are rarely implemented.

Nearly 80 percent of the more than one billion smokers worldwide live in low and middle-income countries, "where the burden of tobacco-related illness and death is heaviest", according to the WHO, which estimates that600,000 people die worldwide each year from the effects of second-hand smoke.

'People really stopped'

In Ethiopia, parliament passed a law banning smoking in public places in 2014 and Mekelle is the first city to implement it. The town of some 200,000 people is the state capital of the far northern Tigray region. SinceJanuary smoking has been banned in cafes, restaurants, schools and hospitals, as well as cultural, sports and religious centres. Those who break the ban face a fine of 1,000 Ethiopian birr ($50) fine, a small fortune in Ethiopia where salaries rarely exceed $100 a month.

"We hardly see more smokers. People really stopped," said Teklay Weldemariam, the head of the city's health department and one of the architects of this law. "The speed of non-communicable diseases is increasing. Cancer is one of them. So it is high time to ban cigarettes in public areas. He hopes Mekelle will be an example to others. "I know other Ethiopian towns are interested in the experience of Mekelle. This canalso inspire other East African cities," said Teklay. Some grumble at the ban, frustrated at the restrictions, but others say the law is necessary.

"If you enter a cafe with smokers, you could not say anything because it was part of social life, it was fully accepted. This prohibition is a very goodidea," said John Haile Selassie. After targeting tobacco, the authorities arealso aiming to stamp out khat, a leafy green herb that is mildly narcotic when chewed.

"Consumption is rising and the government wants to do something," said Teklay. But he recognised the subject is "sensitive" as chewing khat plays a role in some customs and traditions in parts of Ethiopia.

Number of Ethiopians needing food aid surges to 4.5 million after failedrains By Reuters (August 25, 2015) ADDIS ABABA, ETHIOPIA -

The number of Ethiopians who will need food aid by the end of this yearhas surged by more than 1.5 million from earlier estimates due to failedrains, United Nations agencies said on Monday. Ethiopia needs an extra

$230 million from donors to secure aid for a total of 4.5 million peoplenow projected to require assistance this year, the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (UNOCHA), the World Food Programme (WFP) and the U.N. children's agency UNICEF said in astatement.

The country of 96 million people is one of Africa's fastest-growing economies, but failed rains have devastating consequences for food supplies. "The belg rains were much worse than the National MeteorologyAgency predicted at the beginning of the year. Food insecurity increased and malnutrition rose as a result," said David Del Conte, UNOCHA's actinghead of office in Ethiopia, referring to the short, seasonal rainy season that stretched from February to April. Areas normally producing surplus food in the Horn of Africa country's central Oromia region were also affected by shortages, the statement said, adding lack of water had decreased livestock production and caused livestock deaths in other pastoralist areas.

Meteorologists have warned that the El Nino weather phenomenon, marked by a warming of sea-surface temperatures in the Pacific Ocean, isnow well established and continues to strengthen. Models indicate that sea-surface temperature anomalies in the central Pacific Ocean are set toclimb to the highest in 19 years. The El Nino can lead to scorching weather across Asia and east Africa but heavy rains and floods in South America. The United Nations cautioned that the anomaly could further affect Ethiopia's "kiremt" rains that stretch from June to September. "A failed belg followed by a poor kiremt season means that challenges could continue into next year," said John Aylieff, WFP's Ethiopia representative.

The Ethiopians who predict an end to international aid

The rains have been poor again in this mountainous corner of north-eastern Ethiopia - the site of the 1984 famine in which hundreds of thousands of people starved to death.

But just north of the small market town of Korem, bright green fields andneatly terraced hillsides surround a vast lake, and in the brand new local hospital, the ward reserved for severely malnourished babies is all but empty.

Foreign aid is a notoriously difficult business - and much criticised. But ifyou're looking for results, then this vast climate-change challenged country, led by a hugely ambitious and severely authoritarian government, is worth a visit. In the first decade of this century, the number of Ethiopians living in poverty dropped by a third.

In the last five years, child mortality has come down by two-thirds. There's good reason to expect the trend will continue. "Two years ago - before the hospital was built - this baby would have died," said a young doctor, Betgel Mekonnen, as nurses fed an emaciated one year old with fortified milk. "We are grateful to Britain and the international community for their help, but I think we'll [become self-sufficient] in five or 10 years,"he said.

It's a sense of confidence one hears often in a country whose economyhas been growing at close to 10% a year for a decade.

Growth amid repression

This week a big conference in Ethiopia's fast-growing capital, Addis Ababa,will discuss ways to finance ambitious new international development goals - with a growing focus on improving local tax collection, and fightingillicit capital flight, across Africa.

For now, British taxpayers are giving over £300m ($466m) a year to helpfight poverty in Ethiopia. "This is a place where you can see your money achieving something," said Tim Conway, who works in Ethiopia for theUK's Department for International Development (DfID).

"Development processes always create winners and losers, but the vastmajority are sharing in the growth. We've learnt not to question [the government's] ambition too much because they've quite often exceeded what we thought was possible," he said.

But Ethiopia, like tiny nearby Rwanda, poses some difficult questions fordemocratic countries with good intentions. Both nations have achieved remarkable economic growth in the context of an often highly repressiveform of governance.

Critics accuse donors of quietly ignoring human rights abuses, or even of indirectly sustaining them. Mr Conway acknowledged there were a lot of "hard arguments" with Ethiopia's government, and "there are policies we don't support, and won't". But he praised a bilateral partnership that "is really quite effective".

The clear hope, on both sides, is that with the right,sustainable, projects Ethiopia can wean itself off foreign aid within the foreseeable future.

Near the small hillside village of Bahari Hatsra just outside Korem, we found 40-year-old Admassie Mekonen walking home with a simple woodenplough on his shoulder, after a day's work on the small field he rents. For the past four years he, his wife and 10-year-old daughter have benefited from a partly British-funded programme that pays Mr Admassie a monthlywage of about £20 ($31) during the six-month "food gap" season before harvest, when the family has exhausted its supplies.

In return, he works on a variety of public projects, chosen by the community - terracing the hillsides, for example, to prevent soil erosion. The programme is a part of a recent shift away from giving foreign aid money to support individual governments, and instead to put it directly inthe hands of the poor.

Managing without aid

"It's hundreds of thousands of man-hours every year... it's restored the landscape," said Mr Conway. But the challenges ahead remain significant. Ethiopia's population is heading towards 100 million, with a quarter still living in extreme poverty. Sitting down in front of his simple wood and mud home, Mr Admassie said the cash payments had, at times, saved his family from starvation. But he questioned whether he would ever be able to manage without them. "I don't own any land. I rent my fields. I have to give half the crop to the owner as payment. "I can work hard now, but I worry about what will happen when I get older. I will have to go to the city to find work," he said. (Text ends)

“Ethio-Eritrean People to People Relation: Current State and Prospect”

The Ethiopian Satellite Television and Radio (ESAT) Service, in collaboration with Vision Ethiopia (a group composed of Ethiopian academics, researchers, and pro-democracy advocates), is pleased to convene a timely one day seminar on "Ethio-Eritrean Relation: Current State and Prospect" in the Metropolitan Washington D.C. area. The purpose of the conference is to create a forum for scholars and pro- democracy advocates from the Ethiopian and Eritrean Diaspora and friends of Ethiopia to discuss the current political challenges Ethiopia facesand the solutions needed for the country to enjoy lasting peace, stability, democracy, and economic prosperity.

The conference has two main objectives. They are: (1) understanding thecurrent political situation in Ethiopia and devising strategies to bring an enduring political change in the country; and (2) creating a consensus around the means and methods of struggle that the Ethiopian democratic forces may have to follow. All views and positions are welcome. The area of focus to achieve these two objectives include, but not limited to, the relationship between Ethiopian political organizations and the Governmentof Eritrea, feasibility of armed struggle against the regime in Ethiopia staging from Eritrea, and the necessary conditions for Ethiopians to support Ethiopian political organizations using Eritrea as a rear and staging ground.

EBAC PRESS STATEMENT

Ethiopian Border Affairs Committee (EBAC) calls on the Ethiopian peopleto reject re-drawing of border with the Sudan (EBAC Press Statement September 6, 2015) On August 28, 2015, the Governor of Sudan's Gedaref State, Merghani Salih "called for redrawing borders between the Sudan and Ethiopia." This call is intended to finalizesecret deals that EBAC, in collaboration with Ethiopian opposition politicaland civic organizations, has rejected numerous times over the past decade. Once again, we are obliged to protest this sinister act by the dictatorial governments of the two countries in the strongest terms.

Among other things, ceding Ethiopia's territories undermines its territorialintegrity, sovereignty, security and the legitimate interests of the Ethiopian people.

We remind both governments that the respective territorial limits of both countries were defined by the Anglo-Ethiopian Treaty of 1902 at the turn of the last century when Great Britain was the colonial power administering the Sudan. As is customary in international practice in delimiting national boundaries, the treaty provided for the setting up of a Joint Boundary Commission to be appointed by both sides to carry out theactual demarcation of the boundary on the ground. Upon completion of the demarcation process both parties were required to notify their citizensof the boundary as demarcated. This has not been done.

EBAC has provided documentary evidence numerous times that, despite the clear mandate of these undertakings, the treaty has remained a deadletter for over a century and, as a consequence, the boundary between the two countries has never been demarcated by a joint commission.

Contrary to both the spirit and letter of the provisions of the treaty, GreatBritain appointed its own officer, Major Charles W. Gwynn, to unilaterally and arbitrarily demarcate the boundary without the knowledge and the participation of Ethiopian boundary commissioners.

In the event, the demarcation line which resulted from this high-handed exercise greatly favored the Sudan while causing Ethiopia to suffer a corresponding amount of territorial loss. This was vividly affirmed by the words of Major Gwynn when he testified on his report by saying, "I acted ultra vires", meaning, "I acted beyond my power", referring to his give- away of vast lands to the Sudan on top of his unilateral demarcation of the border without including the Ethiopians by violating the mutual agreed border treaty signed between Ethiopia and Great Britain. Hence, the current call for "redrawing the borders" is tantamount to accepting the Sudanese claim that the unilateral demarcation undertaken by the British has validity. Our contention is that no such validity exists. Until the current dictatorship took power in Ethiopia, successive Ethiopian governments had been consistent and unequivocal in rejecting the validityof Sudan's claims.

Instead, these governments had called for a negotiated settlement of theboundary on the basis of the original treaty with the full knowledge, participation and consent of peoples likely to be affected by the demarcation line. The current government of Ethiopia has no right to subvert and undermine this long standing position. EBAC continues to argue that the international political system grants a considerable degreeof importance to rights in respect of territory. The function of a boundarybetween states is the attribution of territory and, thus, the extent of a state's territorial sovereignty. When the extent and limits of a state's territorial sovereignty are determined solely and arbitrarily by one state with the collusion of a non-representative and illegitimate state to the detriment of Ethiopia, the boundary so determined becomes an enduringsource of friction and tension between the adjoining states that neither the Sudan nor Ethiopia can afford. Redrawing the border at enormous costs to the Ethiopian people will inevitably cause permanent discord andlead to more instability in the region.

EBAC believes that neither the government of the Sudan nor the government of Ethiopia has legitimacy and legal credentials to make the secret deals that we have exposed and protested numerous times. In this regard, we call on the Ethiopian people to be vigilant and to reject the "redrawing" of their country's borders conducted under duress and withouttheir knowledge, participation and consent. The amount of fertile farmlands, rivers basins, mountains and hills, flora and fauna and other natural resources involved are substantial. These illegal transfers willaffect Ethiopia's 100 million people adversely and permanently.

Indigenous people whose livelihoods depend on the security of these landswill end up poor and landless. No Ethiopian government can afford to sacrifice, dispossess and marginalize its own citizens in order to reward itsSudanese benefactors. On the basis of the Sudanese press and Ethiopian sources, EBAC has pointed out repeatedly that, under the secretly- negotiated and concluded deals between the President of the Sudan and the late Prime Minister of Ethiopia, huge swathes of our ancestral lands will be ceded to the Sudan.

The Ethiopian people received these reports with utter disbelief, resentment and anger against their own government and will continue to reject their implementation. Neither the current generation of Ethiopians nor those of future generations will allow the deal to stand. "Redrawing" our country's borders without the consent and participation of the Ethiopian people constitutes a serious violation of the treaty regime set upat the turn of the century. It is an affront to the sacrifices of past generations of Ethiopians who struggled hard to preserve the territorial integrity of their country. As we said above, thousands of our people will be forced to lose their homes, farms and investments if the border deal is implemented without their participation and consent. On our part, we call on the Ethiopian people to hold their government accountable for this treachery.

EBAC has sent a formal letter of protest to the Secretary General of the United Nations and to the Head of the African Union rejecting the demarcation and the "redrawing" process. We have alerted the global community that the border deal of today hatched by unelected elites willbe the ticking bomb of tomorrow. Since it has neither support in law norreceived the consent of the Ethiopian people, it will be a major source offriction and tension between the brotherly peoples of Ethiopia and the Sudan. The Horn of Africa is home to several failed states; it does not need an additional source of insecurity and instability beyond those thatalready plague the region.

EBAC is compelled to state clearly that the government of Ethiopia has a choice. It can forestall the dangerous situation of "redrawing" Ethiopia's border with the Sudan and honor Ethiopia's territorial integrity, sovereignty and national interests; or accept responsibility and accountability for the disastrous consequences that will follow for generations to come. In this regard, we urge Ethiopia's Defense Forces toside with the Ethiopian people and defend their lands and borders.

Last and most important, EBAC should like to go on record as assertingEthiopia's right to territorial sovereignty as defined by treaty – and notany other agreement that is reached behind the back of the Ethiopian people. EBAC reserves the right to not honor any boundary that results from the agreement of an unelected government that is devoid of any support or legitimacy among its own people. EBAC also urges all Ethiopians within and outside the country to voice their rejection of the ceding of Ethiopian territory to the Sudanese government.We never compromise with our territorial integrity and sovereignty!

Long Live Ethiopia!

Ethiopia Accused of fomenting chaos to ignite the fire of a devastating war September 7 , 2015

Nairobi (AFP + DIPLOMAT.SO) Eritrea has accused arch-rival Ethiopia of “sabre-rattling” and of threatening to invade, with the neighbours still in a tense standoff following a 1998-2000 border war Asmara’s Ministry of Information said ina statement that war-like rhetoric from Ethiopia’s main party in the ruling coalition — the Tigrayan People’s Liberation Front (TPLF) — had increased.

Eritrea, which broke away from Ethiopia in 1991 after a brutal 30-year independence struggle, remains on an effective war-footing with Addis Ababa after a return to war in 1998. “The TPLF’s sabre-rattling has been acommon staple throughout winter. And this has been ratcheted up in the past few weeks,” said the information ministry statement, released Monday. “The TPLF regime is resorting to tactics of covert intimidation to dissuade various circles from associating with Eritrea. It has gone beyond these hints to openly assert that, ‘it has secured a green-light from the United States to unleash war against Eritrea.’” There was no immediate reaction from Ethiopia, but Addis Ababa has previously dismissed such statements as propaganda.

Eritrea is struggling to stem a flood of refugees from its borders to Europe, an exodus attributed to gross human rights violations in the hermit state. Eritreans make up the third largest number of refugees trying to reach Europe, after Syrians and Afghans. Asmara however says its controversial policy of decades-long national service — a key reason some 5,000 people flee each month — is due to threats from Ethiopia. ButAsmara said its progress had sparked “frustration bordering on insanity inthe camp of the TPLF and its key sponsors.”

Meet the man who built his own plane from scratch, using second- hand parts and YouTube tutorial. The Telegraph (September 9, 2015) When he was a child in Ethiopia, Asmelash Zerefu dreamt he would one day fly a plane. Jonathan Wells talks to the prospective pilot about the struggle to get his plans off the ground His social media pages are plastered with praise for the Wright Brothers, and inspirational quotes such as Mandela's "Everything seems impossible until it is done" and Thomas Edison's “I have not failed. I have just found 10,000 ways that won’t work” punctuate pictures of his own attempts at aviation. Suffice tosay, Asmelash Zerefu is a man with great belief. The 35-year old Ethiopian has suffered countless setbacks in his mission to become a pilot, and despite still never having even set foot on a plane - let alone fly one - theamateur aircraft builder refuses to give up on his dream.

Why do we still accept such awful food on aeroplanes?

Fifteen years ago, Zerefu decided to leave the world of academia behind inorder to pursue his passion of flight - despite scoring a GPA (grade point average) of 3.8 out of 4.0 at high school, and being accepted onto university courses for both Public Health and Civil Engineering.

The prospective pilot planned to leave the Alemaya University campus to join the Ethiopian Airlines Aviation Academy, but encountered his first major setback when the Dire Dawa branch of the aviation school refused to let him enrol. "I was turned down," Zerefu tells me. "I did not meet theheight requirement. I was just one centimetre short." A heavy blow to Zerefu's dreams of flying, many men would have been deterred for good after such a rejection. But not Asmelash.

The secrets of an air steward

"That was the turning point. That was when I decided to build my own airplane in order to fulfil my lifelong dream of flight. This was in 2001." And, since his rejection from the Ethiopian Airlines Aviation Academy, Zerefu has dedicated his whole life to the realisation of his aerial ambitions. Too short to become a commercial pilot, the Public Health Officer set about building his own aircraft; from scratch, in the ninth poorest country in the world. Zerefu has applied his considerable intellectto the meticulous development of his plane. He spent more than a decadeporing over FAA (Federal Aviation Administration) maintenance books, trawling the internet for existing aircraft blueprints and learning the craft of plane building from that font of all knowledge: YouTube.

And then, following ten years of planning, the day arrived that Zerefu hadto begin construction on Ethiopia’s first ever home-built aircraft. After incorporating the design of the Clark-Y Airfoil Wing into his own unique plans, and tailoring other existing plane parts, Zerefu began the long andarduous task of sourcing the components and materials he would need toconstruct his very own magnificent flying machine. "I collected from garages and workshops, and Merkato - which is Africa's largest market - in Addis Ababa. I used first and second-hand materials to build my aircraft.”

Wingman: a dating app for air travellers

After first constructing the fuselage of his aircraft from wood, Zerefu mounted his plane on the modified wheelbase of an old Suzuki motorcycle

− his own take on the all-important landing gear. The intricate internal latticework of the wings took many months to create but, once complete, Zerefu attached these too onto his creation. It was then that he turned hisattention to the engine.

“My aircraft is powered by a second-hand Volkswagen Beetle engine,”beams Zerefu. “It is a horizontally-opposed 40 horsepower engine; 4 stroke, 4 cylinders and it can run at up to 3000rpm.”

A handmade and conditioned laminated wooden propeller was the last technically integral component to be added, that, at 15 pounds, was builtto withstand the power of the 1,285cc engine. Sealing the aircraft, and giving it a final coat of white paint, Zerefu was left only to name it.

"I call it the K-570A. K representing my mother's initial of her name, Kiros, and 570 signifying the number of days it took me to complete my aircraft. The A is for Aircraft." The completed K-570A is a two-seat, open-tandem parasol light aircraft. Designed by Zerefu to fly "slow and low", it cost 160,000 Ethiopian Birr (£4,900) to build and is the product of nearly half of the Ethiopian's entire life. "I came across many, many challenges to build my aircraft," he says. "People surrounding me considered me mad, and it took many trials and errors to build it. Financial problems were another limitation in making my African aviation innovation possible.But despite those difficulties and obstacles I am close to fulfilling my dream." Zeferu's largest disappointment occured on 15 June this year after he put on his motorcycle helmet (safety first) and teed up the K- 570A on his local airfield (an actual field) for her maiden flight. After producing unexpected friction, the propeller shattered, damaged the plane's smoke exit structure, and sent the engineer quite literally back to the drawing board.

Is this the plane of the future?
But it is this perseverance that characterises Zerefu. For a man who hasbeen doubted and stymied by his peers, his government and even his national airline, he retains an extraordinary amount of optimism, and continues to progress in his endeavour to one day reach the sky.

He has recently been in contact with René Bubberman, an aviation expertof the NVAV (Dutch Experimental Aircraft Association) - and the lead guitar player of an Austrian disco band. Bubberman suggested Zerefu shed some of the K-570A's extra weight and, thanks to this advice, the aircraft is fairing better than ever. Zerefu frequently takes his newly improved invention taxiing to test its power. "The performance keeps getting better and better," the prospective pilot reveals.

Zerefu's tenacity and bulletproof resolve is that of a true visionary. Beforethe year is out, he plans to don his helmet once more and, this time, takethe K-570A to the skies. "I want to fly 10 metres above the ground. By doing so, I will the first person in African aviation history who has built anaircraft able to fly high up in the sky. I would like to appear in international media, and promote Africa in terms of science and technology."

And though the amateur aircraft engineer cites the opportunity to challenge people's perception of Ethiopia as the foremost reason he choseto build the K-570A, his boyish excitement betrays him. Asmelash Zerefu
- a man who spent his childhood living in a ravaged region of constant conflict between military regiments and liberation fronts - just wants torealise a lifelong dream.

A dream that took one step closer to becoming reality yesterday when Zerefu was offered a fuly paid scholarship to the Inholland University of Applied Sciences in the Netherlands to study Aeronautical Engineering. Hand-drawn pictures uploaded to Zerefu's social media pages encapsulatethe youthful sense of adventure he has somehow managed to retain and, with a Dutch degree and a bit of luck, hopefully these pencilled pipe dreams will very soon become reality. Ethiopia and Eritrea: Separation Vs IntegrationBy Daniel Teferra (PhD) September 11, 2015
Globalization in the industrialized societies means bringing down bordersand forming currency unions. For instance, during the Cold War period, the realities of international politics dictated the need for bigness in international affairs if a country was not to become a second-rate powercompared to the United States or the former Soviet Union. Thus, to Western European countries, that necessitated integration.

On the other hand, when it comes to poor countries globalization in the Post-Cold War period has lent itself to fragmentation, erecting barriers and less freedom. The concept of self-determination and secession has been pushed in poor countries by the industrialized societies largely out ofself-interest. Contrary to the conventional wisdom, the peoples of Ethiopia and Eritrea are not enemies. The bonds between the two are deep and strong.

In 1890, Eritrea was carved out of parts of northern Ethiopia and the coastal establishments by the Italians. Eritrea was ruled by the Italians for50 years and by the British for another 10 years. Sixty years of Europeanrule had weakened Eritrea’s feudal structure. Urban centers were established and infrastructure was built. Various consumer goods industries were created and the wage system was introduced. As a result of this modern influence, new social groups with a more progressive outlook developed in Eritrea. Compared to resource-rich Ethiopia, the Italian colony of Eritrea was very small and less endowed with agriculturallands. It had an industrious population, but its employment base was verylimited.

Ethiopia had existed as an independent country long before the EuropeanScramble for Africa. Ethiopia was not colonized except for a brief Italian occupation of five years (1936-1941). Italian colonialism left very little impact on Ethiopia, which remained virtually unchanged as a feudal society. Historically, Ethiopia was an isolated country, lying far beyond the horizon of Europe. It had to pay expensive transit cost for its externaltrade. For example, prior to the 1950s, Ethiopia paid, per ton, ten times higher than what was paid in Europe under similar conditions.

The Addis Ababa-Djibouti railway carried about 70 percent of Ethiopia's foreign trade, and freight rates were very high. The remaining 20 percentwas carried through Gambela and up to 10 percent through the Italian colony of Eritrea. These routes were difficult, expensive and entailed longhauls through European colonies to reach the sea. All these changed when Eritrea, with its own government and flag, was federated with Ethiopia in 1952. Ethiopia was now able to transit its goods through threemajor ports: Massawa and Assab on the Red Sea in Eritrea, and Djibouti on the Gulf of Aden. Most of Ethiopia's cargo transited through Assab.

The federation also created opportunities for many Eritreans to freely move to Ethiopia and fill positions in various technical and professional areas or to start businesses of their own. Most of them became quite successful. Eritreans were able to pursue modern education in institutionsof higher learning in Ethiopia paid for by the Ethiopian government. The Ethiopian population always welcomed Eritreans, and their success was not viewed as a threat. The federation was mutually beneficial for both countries, but it did not last long. It was abolished unwisely in 1962.
Eritrea lost its autonomous government and was simply made one of theprovinces of Ethiopia. This suppression of democracy in Eritrea provokedEritrean nationalism and triggered armed resistance (ELF & EPLF).

Upon the overthrow of the imperial regime by the armed forces in 1974, the Eritrean conflict took a dangerous turn. A moderate position of reconciliation in Eritrea and a return to the federation was rejected by thejunta. By acting in self-serving ways to hold on to power, the Mengistu Hailemariam regime exacerbated the conflict.

Finally, as a result of the change in superpower politics in the late 1980s, the Eritrean nationalists (EPLF) and their allies (TPLF) gained the upper hand and toppled the Mengistu Hailemariam regime in 1991. In 1993, Eritrea's independence was formalized by a U.N. sponsored referendum. In 1998, the EPLF and TPLF regimes now went to war, even though they are ethnically the same, over boundaries, demarcated by the Italian colonialists. The separation between Ethiopia and Eritrea did not producea favorable outcome. For instance, it forced Ethiopia into isolation again. The resource-rich central and southern regions of Ethiopia became landlocked. Ethiopia's foreign trade no longer passed through Assab, and consequently Eritrea lost income from transit services. Ethiopia had to divert its cargo to the port of Djibouti that has a smaller capacity, therebyhampering Ethiopia's trade with the rest of the world. The flow of Eritreancapital and labor to Ethiopia ceased. Furthermore, Eritrea's secession created a wedge between Ethiopians and Eritreans. In guise of economic nationalism, the TPLF regime expelled Eritrean entrepreneurs and confiscated their property. This was detrimental to the Ethiopian economybecause Eritrean entrepreneurs had been major players in the private sector. Eritrea's secession also sparked imitation throughout the region.

This is currently threatening to create isolated peoples and fragmentedmarkets, which could exacerbate poverty, ignorance, disease and the curse of famine.

Ethiopia and Eritrea are culturally and geographically cohesive. No ethnicgroup in the region has been untouched by others through trade, intermarriage or war. Ethnic mixing and changes in boundaries have continued for centuries. New borders may be drawn, but the peoples of Ethiopia and Eritrea cannot detach themselves from one another. The so-called conflict between Ethiopia and Eritrea is actually an intra-ethnic rivalry between the two Tigrinya-speaking regimes. This rivalry is also being fueled by external forces for their own self-interest. There is no historical or economic justification for separation between the two countries. Ethiopia and Eritrea need each other for their survival.
Ethiopia's advantage is its rich resources. Eritrea's is its access to the sea and industrious population. For both countries, the benefits with integration are greater than the benefits without integration. Emeritus Professor of Economics at Ferris State University; UW-Whitewater,teferrad@uww.edu.

Ethiopian renegade rebel commander flees to Sudan: ST report September 12, 2015 (KHARTOUM) – A well placed Sudanese source revealed today that a dissident Ethiopian general fled to Sudan on Friday evening along with his soldiers after clashes with the Eritrean army. The source who spoke to the Turkey-based Anadolu news agency on conditionof anonymity said that General Mola Asgedom who heads the Tigray People's Democratic Movement (TPDM) that is based in Eritrea, arrived atthe Sudanese town of Hamdait at the border triangle between Eritrea, Ethiopia and Sudan. He explained that Asgedom escaped to Sudan after armed clashes broke out with the Eritrean army at the outskirts of the Eritrean city of Omhajer on Friday morning.

The source went on to say that Asgedom and 683 of his forces handed over their weapons to the Sudanese authorities. He explained that Khartoum succeeded in preventing the escalation of clashes between Asgedom's forces and the Eritrean army and evacuated the soldiers to Wad al-Hilu town in Kassala State while their leaders were transferred tounspecified areas inside Sudan. He added that 7 of the Ethiopian opposition forces were killed during the pursuit by Eritrean troops to its western border with Ethiopia and Sudan.

Eyewitnesses in the border areas said they heard gunfire during the clashes, noting that the entrance of Ethiopian opposition forces to Hamdaitcreated a state of confusion among the population. A pro-Ethiopian opposition TV confirmed that Asgedom turned himself in to the Sudan, without giving details. The Eritrea-based Ethiopian opposition coalition consider TPDM to be the military wing while the Ginbot 7 of Berhanu Negalead the political forefront. Ethiopia also backs Eritrean opposition groups in the context of proxy wars between the two longtime foes.

Virginia State University professor testing foreign grain in Virginiasoil

By Shelby Mertens, Progress Index September 20, 2015

A Virginia State University professor is researching a foreign superfood grain that may soon be taking global markets by storm. Vitalis W. Temu, of VSU's Agricultural Research Station, is conducting a two-year study on Eragrostis teff — more commonly called teff grain — to see if it could be aprofitable crop in Virginia.

Temu received an $18,534 grant from the Virginia Agricultural Council to pursue his project earlier this year. He began his plots in July. Teff, which originates from Ethiopia, is a tiny grain similar in looks to quinoa, but Temu said it is even more nutritious. The grain is naturally gluten-free andwould benefit vegetarians and vegans who rely on meatless proteins.

"It's very rich in iron and protein and that is unusual for most grains," Temu said. "Sometimes it has been nicknamed a green egg because of how much protein you can get from it. It's about 14 percent protein." Teff also has high calcium, dietary fiber and a good assortment of aminoacids. It is mostly used to make flour. The grain can also be used as animal feed.

Ethiopians have been harvesting teff for centuries and it has largely been a best kept secret until the last decade or so. The Guardian reported thereis an estimated 6.3 million farmers in Ethiopia and over 20 percent of farmland is dedicated to culivating teff. Temu believes teff may become the next popular superfood. In recent years the consumption of superfoods like quinoa and kale have boomed. "People are becoming moreand more conscious of what they eat," he said in regards to teff's widespread appeal.

As like the other superfoods, farmers will have to pay a hefty price for teffright now. Temu estimated the price for brown teff to be $4 per pound and $2 to $3 per pound for the ivory variety. "It's like two or three times the price we pay for corn," he said. "It's highly priced, that's for sure."

However, lack of research has many farmers weary of the grain. Teff has been experimented in the U.S. for forage as well. Temu said harvesting teff can also become difficult because of its small size paired with wind gusts, the grain can lose quality. "People became disinterested so not much has been done on grain production," he said. "Everybody says goodthings about forage production from teff, but when it comes to grain production, not so many. “You just have to have one farmer successfuland others will follow suit,” Temu added.

Another challenge, Temu said, is battling grass weeds from the teff plots. Some of his plots have become filled with crabgrass that is similar to teff in size and height. He said late season planting usually helps deter weeds,but it can be especially tough if the crabgrass already has a presence. He has found so far that the ivory teff has fared much better against weeds than the brown kind.

Teff also happens to be drought-tolerant, making it highly suitable for the dry summer months in Virginia, Temu said. Temu is experimenting with four different soil types to see if soil is a factor that determines teff's nutritional value. “We’re hoping in Virginia, we have red soil and in the tropics where this originates we have red soil,” he said. “So we’re trying tosee if the iron content, which is unusually high, is also associated to the soil in which it is grown.” Temu said if he can prove the best quality of thegrain comes from red soil, it could have tremendous economic impacts in Virginia. “If that happens to be so, then Virginia will win it,” he said. “The red soil is unique to Virginia so our teff would have a premium price, that’s the hope.” Temu is working with local small farmers in Suffolkand Halifax counties who will use his teff. Shelby Mertens may be reached at 804-722-5154 or smertens@progress-index.com

Who Benefits from Economic Growth in Ethiopia?
By Woldeyesus G Mariam September 28, 2015
“Economic Growth,” refers to an increase in real national income or GrossDomestic Product (GDP), and may also be expressed as an increase in percapita income. Many notable Ethiopian economists, intellectuals, and journalists have discussed this issue in an attempt to determine the veracity of the government’s claim of over 10 per cent annual growth for over a decade.

To determine whether or not economic growth has benefitted the Ethiopian people, it is worthwhile to examine the population’s standard ofliving overall. Interestingly, when we do so, we see that in the city of Addis Ababa, and elsewhere in the country, the people are poorer than ever, more families are suffering, and more and more people need help, but cannot find it. Even worse, there is a large population of homeless people who sleep on the city streets, as well as ghettos, where thousandsof young people without jobs, education or hope waste their lives becoming a burden and unproductive members to society.

Inequality has also increased, such that 30% of the population, or 28 million Ethiopians, now live below the poverty line. Thus, despite the apparent fast-growing economy, the country remains one of the poorest inthe world. The following are some of the specific economic outcomes indicating what is being produced, as well as who benefits from it.

Concentration of wealth

It is obvious that only a handful of government bureaucrats and their business affiliates benefit from whatever growth there have been. They hold unparalleled economic and political power while the majority of the Ethiopian people experience high levels of both chronic and acute food insecurity, particularly small-holder farmers, and the rural population in general. Ethiopia is mired in a fiscal crisis fueled by soaring inflation, loss of purchasing power, and mass currency devaluation. This has benefited the few and impoverished the rest, thereby setting the country up to potential social unrest and conflict. Adam Smith (1776), one of the fathersof modern economics, believed that if a society is governed well, people who pursue their own happiness would also provide for other people's happiness. Ghanaian economist George Ayittey, concluded that, "Africa is poor because she is not free." Robert Guest, business editor for The Economist (2004), declared that, "Africans are poor because they are poorly governed."

Sub-standard education

Education is an important determinant of welfare and happiness. It is important to raise educational standards that will increase the population'sliteracy rate and promote a greater diversity of skills. McClelland (1966) concluded that education is not only a precondition for, but also a necessary factor in economic growth. To bring about change in any existing system is a difficult task, no less so than in Ethiopia, where goodwill effort and patience will be required. However, it will be more difficult to transform Ethiopian educational institutions, because they are controlled by a centrally planned and standardized curricula produced through the Ministry of Education (MOE). As a result, children in the primary grades read at un-acceptable levels and are not developing a strong foundation for lifelong learning. School children above grade 10 (ages 15-16 years) are required to attend indoctrination sessions in the ruling party political and economic ideology rather than concentrating on academic studies. Although officially illegal, but in practice admission to colleges is dependent upon membership in the ruling political party. Party membership is also required to secure government jobs after graduation. Teachers, civil servants, and judges are pressured to join the party and adhere to party doctrine. Currently, the government is obsessed with a rhetoric about education reform and overhaul. In the meantime, the children of party officials and members of their extended families are sent to schools overseas or to special private schools in the country.

Healthcare

In general, economic growth helps improve the quality of life through better access to healthcare that increases life expectancy. However, Ethiopia has only one medical doctor per 100,000 people, and an averagelife expectancy of only 48 years. This is because although Ethiopia produces a large number of qualified medical professionals, it is experiencing one of the highest “brain drains” of professionals than any country in the world. Such professionals are attracted by individual freedom and better working conditions overseas. As a result, those who can afford it, government officials and their allies, send their family members outside of the country for medical treatment or even to give birth to “anchor babies” with foreign citizenship, while the majority of Ethiopians do not have access even to basic medical services or clean water. Although significant foreign aid is reportedly spent on health care,a big chunk of it is known to be mismanaged as can be attested by the chronic lack of medicine and quality care.

Unemployment and poverty

Typically, economic growth reduces unemployment by creating jobs. This is significant because lack of jobs is a major source of poverty. Youth unemployment is reported to be over 70%. With no hope for work an increasing number of graduates from high schools and colleges take the risky and dangerous trips to join the masses of migrants in the Middle East, Europe and Africa, where many perish or suffer unimaginable abuse.

Mis-use of Foreign aid

Foreign aid is one of the many tools that can improve the quality of life and help meet many basic needs. Ethiopia has received billions of dollarsin developmental aid. For example, the U.S. gives Ethiopia approximately $800 million in aid annually. However, the question is, who is receiving, and who is responsible for distributing the foreign aid. Obviously, the aid is manipulated along partisan ideological lines. The government has used aid as a political weapon to control the population, punish dissent, undermine political opponents, and increase the wealth of its allies. Basedon their track record, officials of the ruling party have used foreign aid to oppress the very people it is intended to help, and have sequestered someof the money in their foreign bank accounts. There is a general agreementthat foreign aid is far less effective in countries that are poorly governed and corrupt, and indeed, can prove counterproductive. Some economic studies have denounced traditional foreign aid because it enables predatory, parasitic institutions to continue their corrupt and destructive policies indefinitely. Economic studies have found that individual freedom, good governance, and the rule of law are key drivers in promoting economic growth and reducing poverty. Ana Gomes, a career diplomat who serves as member of the European Parliament, expressed her disappointment that foreign aid has failed to benefit those who fight for justice and democracy and that it has actually increased the potential for conflict in Ethiopia and Africa in general. She stated that the politicization and manipulation of aid distribution by the Ethiopian ruling party violates international law and all standards of moral decency. She stated further that those countries that provide aid must take urgent action to ensure that this immoral practice comes to an end. Donors are well aware of the human rights abuses that take place in such countries, but have ignored the repression of civil and political rights, and remained deaf to appeals for justice and freedom. She concluded by saying that the silence on the part of Western governments amounts to collusion, and constitutes a gross misuse of taxpayers' money and a betrayal of international humanrights laws. From a macroeconomic perspective, the donors' taxpayers' money has greatly contributed to prop up Ethiopia's dictatorial regime.

These are some of the economic realities in Ethiopia under the currentrepressive government.

Pervasive Corruption

Several watchdog organizations have stated that the disparity in wealth can be attributed to corruption. In 2014, Transparency International ranked Ethiopia as one of the most corrupt nations in the world. The report alleged that there was minimal transparency in public institutions,minimal oversight of civil servants, and widespread bribery. This dismal score is a sign that corruption is endemic at every level of the government, and there is no punishment for corrupt officials and institutions that do not respond to the citizens' needs. The Indian Ocean Newsletter stated that corruption in Ethiopia, as in the Mafia, is a family affair. The report added that many officials of the TPLF have a reputationfor having amassed huge wealth and enjoyed unwarranted privileges.

According to the Economist Intelligence Unit, "corruption in Ethiopia posesvarious problems for the business environment, as patronage networks are firmly entrenched and political clout is often used to gain economic prowess." The report confirmed further that, "political parties belonging tothe ruling party have established companies which include banks and insurance companies. The ruling party also runs other business conglomerates in construction, agriculture, transportation and import andexport of key products, including fertilizer purchase and distribution. The companies with party affiliation receive preferential treatment for licensesand permits. Transparency International's Global Reports make it clear that corruption in Ethiopia has worsened, and one of the most corrupt practices is that related to land allocation. Despite its importance to the agricultural industry, it lacks appropriate oversight and regulation. It is obvious that the country's economic growth is neither open nor inclusive nor sustainable, because the mechanisms of government are set up to benefit only a handful of its supporters and business affiliates.

The regime is known as well for severe human rights abuses. They spy on every citizen, and opposition forces are silenced brutally. In violation of international law, and in the name of national security, political activists, journalists, and bloggers have been imprisoned and tortured for writing critical reports or dissenting views. Former detainees have described beingheld under horrific conditions, including being hanged by the wrists. The regime has failed to provide good governance that is the most critical determinant of sustainable development. The party leaders make policies designed primarily to indefinitely remain in power by avoiding the risk of arevolution. The Ethiopian constitution and federal laws conform officially touniversal legal standards, and are cited conveniently by politicians and diplomats, but in practice, they are ignored, unenforced, and meannothing to the people.

Conclusion

Peaceful change in the existing Ethiopian political system appears to be impossible. The TPLF/EPRDF regime has catapulted itself to power successfully through the barrel of the gun, and has ever since compromised the country's long-term interests with its misguided fiscal, economic, educational, and military policies. The institutionalization of ethnic-based governance has been promoted to nurture inter-ethnic conflict among citizens who for centuries had lived in relative harmony. Atpresent, armed struggle is the only choice for Ethiopian opposition forces to save "deprivation of liberty". It is understandable that the opposition forces can disagree about some of the particulars, but they cannot deny the need to be responsible in this regard. It is also worthwhile to engage and recruit Ethiopian rank-and-file military forces to help this cause and protect Ethiopia from disintegration.

Malcolm X (1965) had said, "We declare our right on this earth to be a man, to be a human being, to be respected as a human being, to be giventhe rights of a human being in this society, on this earth, in this day, which we intend to bring into existence by any means necessary." Business and bureaucracy: Ethiopia entrepreneurs overcomehurdles

By Karim Lebhour, AFP September 29, 2015

Addis Ababa (AFP) - The large open plan office with staff behind sleekcomputers looks like any newly-started modern business.

But Ethiopia's first online restaurant delivery service, Deliver Addis, mustcontend with major hurdles that would stall many entrepreneurs in moredeveloped nations.

Setting up any business is a challenge, but in Ethiopia, those range fromdaily operating headaches such as on-off Internet -- stalling the highly time-sensitive orders on which it depends -- to even more fundamental business challenges.

As the country's banking and payments systems are still in their infancy,electronic payments are impossible, thus creating a huge hurdle for growth.

"The Internet goes out a couple of times a week -- when that happens, there is not much we can do but rely on phone lines to take orders," saidFeleg Tsegaye, manager of Deliver Addis.

But he also believes the Horn of Africa nation -- the second most populouson the continent -- offers enormous opportunities.

Tsegaye was born and brought up in the United States but moved to Ethiopia, the homeland of his parents, hoping to tap into a still largelyuntapped but swiftly growing market he believes is one of the most promising on the continent.

"The IT sector is still in its infancy -- typically in these markets there is a way to transfer money very quickly and very easily, but here that doesn’texist quite yet," he added.

"Once you have a way for entrepreneurs to make money through technology, I think you are going to see that change very quickly."

- Obstacle course of paperwork -

With a growth rate of nearly 10 percent a year over the past decade, according to the World Bank, Ethiopia has attracted entrepreneurs eagerto take their cut of a market with over 94 million potential consumers.

The Ethiopian capital Addis Ababa now has three "startup incubators",some supported by foreign investors, to help Ethiopian entrepreneurslaunch their own business.

"Everybody wants to own their own business, everybody wants to create something new," said Kibrom Tadesse, manager of the XHub, which describes itself as an "open space for IT entrepreneurs, innovators, technologists, investors, tech companies and coders in Ethiopia to developtheir tech idea into a product".

With a large number of youths set to enter the workforce, Ethiopia's government is keen to develop this potentially large source of new growthand jobs. Ethiopian universities say 70 percent of students are in science programmes.

"Even with the rate of unemployment and the amount of people who arecoming out educated -- and the job opportunities are not matching -- there is definitely a lot of room for innovation and entrepreneurship," Tadesse added.

Yet bureaucracy remains a major hurdle in a country run by formerMarxist rebel fighters.

- 'Small money goes a long way' -

Starting a business in Ethiopia is an obstacle course of paperwork lastingweeks.

The authorities demand businesses have offices, while many entrepreneurs say they would prefer to develop their products shuttlingbetween Internet cafes and home.

"It can take up to six weeks to register a company, and you have to runfrom office to office -- the process is not transparent," said Florian Manderscheid, manager of Ice Addis, a centre supporting young entrepreneurs. "Most people don't know where to start."

Like businesses worldwide, entrepreneurs in Ethiopia also face major challenges in raising cash, with domestic investors hesitant about a stilllargely unknown sector and tough regulations on outside investors.

"It is very hard to find investors, because there is no venture capitalmodel or legal framework for venture capital," Manderscheid added.

"Once the banking system opens a little bit, there will be a big boom Ithink in start-ups and technological development."

Despite the difficulties, Natnael Zeleke and Amanuel Lemma, students aged 21, are developing an online platform to promote Ethiopian artists.

"Creating a company is not common in Ethiopia, but many students arestarting to do it," said Zeleke.

"You don't need to be in the Silicon Valley to succeed. If you have a computer and Internet, you can do whatever you want. Even if we're notin America and have great teachers, we have access to everything thorough the Internet."

For now, with only a little over one percent of Ethiopians with Internetaccess, the industry is still in its infancy, but those working here are confident of future success.

"Some people say we are crazy," Manderscheid said. "But chances of success are higher than in Europe or the US -- small money goes a longway in this growing market."

FAITH: Ethiopia loses 13 pilgrims in Saudi Arabia stampedeBy Tesfa-Alem Tekle, Sudan Tribune October 1, 2015 September 30, 2015 (ADDIS ABABA) â€“ At least 13 Ethiopian pilgrims perished in last weekâ€™s stampede, which occurredduring the Hajj pilgrimage near the Muslim holy city of Mecca in Saudi Arabia, Ethiopiaâ€™s foreign affairs ministry announced on Wednesday.

The government had earlier reported that only two Ethiopians died in thetragic incident. Over 700 people reportedly died in the stampede that occured on Thursday last week while taking part in this yearâ€™s pilgrimage at Mina, an area located in the outskirts of Mecca.

According to media reports, more than 800 people were injured in theincident which was the worst to ever occur during Hajj, since the 1990 disaster that killed over 1,400 people. The Ethiopian foreign affairs ministry said another 26 Ethiopians were also injured in the disaster thatoccurred while two million pilgrims from 184 countries were taking part. Those injured were reportedly receiving medical treatment at hospitals inSaudi Arabia.

The Ethiopian government in collaboration with the embassy and Saudiofficials is providing the necessary help to victims and citizens. An estimated 10,000 Ethiopian Muslims were reportedly taking part at the yearly Hajj pilgrimage in Saudi Arabia. The Ethiopian government has conveyed condolences to the families and relatives of those affected bythe mishap.

Hundreds of Africans, mostly from Morocco and Egypt also died in the incident caused when pilgrims converged at a junction while walking towards the Jamarat Bridge. Officials now fear that the death toll might further rise as many remained missing. The incident has raised questionson the ways the Arab nation handles the safty of pilgrims.

Saudi officials have launched investigations after Saudi Arabiaâ€™s crownprince ordered a probe following a meeting with senior officials who were in charge of the pilgrimage. The outcomes of the investigation will be submitted to King Salman who will then accordingly take appropriate measures, according to media reports in Saudi Arabia. (ST)

‘THE RAINS HAVE FAILED’ – DROUGHT IN BORENA, ETHIOPIA. (GOAL October 1, 2015)

THERE IS A DROUGHT IN BORENA, A ZONE IN ETHIOPIA APPROXIMATELY THE SIZE OF IRELAND’S LEINSTER AND MUNSTER PROVINCES COMBINED, AND THE PEOPLE THERE KNOW IT. “THE IMMEDIATE DIFFERENCE I NOTICE IS HOW DRY IT IS. THERE IS VERY LITTLE VEGETATION. I ALSO DON’T SEE AS MUCH LIVESTOCK AS THERE USED TO BE. “

“CHILDREN ARE NO LONGER GOING TO SCHOOL; THE PRIORITY IS GOING TO SEARCH FOR WATER. THEY WALK FOR HOURS IN THE HOPE THAT THE POND THEY ARE GOINGTO HAS NOT DRIED UP

There is a drought in Borena, a zone in Ethiopia approximately the size ofIreland’s Leinster and Munster provinces combined, and the people thereknow it. Terms such as El Niño, climate change and global warming havebeen repeated over and over again during meetings held in Addis Ababa by the different humanitarian agencies over the past few months. It is clear there is a crisis in Borena, but in order to better understand the situation on the ground, I decided to travel there.

Borena is part of Ethiopia’s Oromia Region and is located in the south of the country. The zone is inhabited by pastoralists that rely solely on their livestock for their existence. They eat the meat, drink the milk and sell the livestock to purchase other food, pay school fees, and purchasemedication when needed.

I had visited this zone during the same month last year and, as we drive into Borena, the immediate difference I notice is how dry it is. There is very little vegetation. I also don't see as much livestock as there used to be. I have been told that the communities have started migrating to neighbouring districts to look for water and pasture. The cattle that I do see has started to show signs of deterioration. I can see their ribs startingto protrude. Without outside intervention, it is likely that the cattle will deteriorate further and by the time communities decide to sell them they will get a quarter of the price, driving them further into poverty.

The Borena people are well-known for prioritizing their children when it comes to food, but I am now told that signs of malnutrition amongst the young ones is starting to show. This is a clear indication of how bad thingsare now – and will be in the months to come. "The rains have failed. The rains have failed." This is the mantra that I seem to hear wherever I go.

During the drought of 2011, the Borenas lost over 250,000 cattle. This year's drought is likely to be even more severe. One woman tells me that the Hagaya rains – the short rainy season from October to November – have not come and if they don't arrive in one week, they will have no water for months to come, unless they are assisted by NGOs or the government with provisions of water. Children are no longer going to school; the priority is going to search for water. They walk for hours in thehope that the pond they are going to has not dried up.

The water point I visited, which GOAL has rehabilitated, was initially meant to benefit approximately 2,000 households and 10,000 livestock.Now it serves double this number because of the lack of water in the neighbouring districts.

An elderly man explains to me that there are also cattle from Kenya that have come across to Ethiopia due to lack of water on the Kenyan side. I am surprised by this generosity in times of scarcity, but he explains to methat these people are also Borena like them, long before man-made borders dictated otherwise.

As we drive back to our office, I find myself unable to gather my thoughtsand think clearly in the face of such a crisis. El Niño, global warming and climate change; for the Borena people these words mean very little. All they know is that the rains have failed them once again and they don't know how they are going to survive in the months to come. By GabriellaPrandini, GOAL Ethiopia Humanitarian Response Programme Manager

TRIBUTE: Mulugeta Lulle, Journalist, author and political analyst

ETHIOMEDIA By Dawit Woldegiorgis (October 8, 2015)

This sad celebration of the life of Mulugeta Lule is worthy of a man who served Ethiopia and Ethiopians with sincere commitment and unparalleled skill in putting on paper and on our screens what all freedom loving peoplewish to achieve, with passion and in style and with a deep sense of history.

He was an unsung humble hero and needs to be remembered not only assuch but as a man who revolutionized Ethiopian journalism together withmy father who as you know was named The Father of Ethiopian Journalism.

I knew him since then when he struggled to open up the media from the grip of the emperor and aristocracy and my father being conservative hadto keep his absolute loyalty to the emperor resulting in a fierce tug of war.And yet my father always admired the writing skill and the energy of Mulugeta Lule.

Mulugeta was humble and not many people know him unless one is close to him. Most of his writings are use different pen names. Not many peopleknow that besides his writing skill he was also involved in the anti Siad Barre insurgency war by helping the insurgents in information management and dissemination and public relations.

He also did the same role in the South Sudanese liberation movement.

I know because I worked with him.he was also at the front lines in Erutreain Ogaden writing and boosting the morale of our fighters.

He was a voracious reader with a very astute memory which I have not seen in any person I know. He can go back decades and remember a discussion an incident or a paragraph he has read and the history of so many great Ethiopians he has interviewed or had the opportunity to meet.

He was a master teacher who can surprise any historian through his knowledge of Ethiopuan history dating back to thousands of years. He wasdeeply religious and a Pasteur in his own rights because he can go through the biblical verses word by word.

For me as it must be to many others he was a brilliant man, a patriot witha deep sense of justice and freedom , he was a friend I commincated withtwice a week from afar, he was my teacher my mentor and source of inspiration.

I lost a friend and a brother and Ethiopia lost one of the most skilled passionate prolific writer, proud thinker and a patriot who never bowed but made the necessary compromises like many of us to be able to servehis people in difficult times. He was indeed a rare phenomenon Lulle, as I used to call him, is ahead of me as always and he is showing me the path.I will follow you Lulle!!! In the mean time good bye and RIP.

COMMENTARY: Journalism In Ethiopian Context

By Tewedaje Tesfu Biru October 14, 2015

Handwritten bulletins which address the daily events of ancient Rome were the earliest journalistic effort made in the first century BC. Then, thefirst distributed news bulletins appeared in China around 750 AD. Germany, The Netherlands, and England produced newsletters and news books of different sizes in the 16th and 17th centuries.

By the early 18th century, politicians had begun to recognize the enormous potential of newspapers in shaping public opinion. Consequentlythe journalism of the period was largely political in nature; journalism wasconsidered as an adjunct of politics and each political faction had its own newspaper. It is also during this time struggle for freedom of expression, which is immunity of the communications media including newspapers, books, magazines, radio, and television from government control or censorship, began.

Ethiopia, in which freedom of expression is guaranteed as the basic right in the constitution, is among the leading countries in the world in suppression of the rights to freedom of expression and access to information. Many private media are banned, and many journalists fled their country and many others thrown to prison only because they criticized the state government. According to Human Rights Watch, Ethiopia is the second country next to Iran in the number of journalists inexile.

Journalism is a socially responsible profession, serving the needs and interest of the society by creating the necessary intelligence they need tolead better lives. However, in Ethiopia most, if not all, government journalists are the watchdogs of the government rather than the public and they are sanctioned by the government to be so. Journalists with strong position to balance their stories would be accused of having conspired with the opposition and are usually labeled as “terrorists” or “anti-government” and taken to prison. In fact, even those who work as watchdogs of the government lead their life in conflict between their professional identity and the situation.

Journalism in Ethiopia is not free of political influence. This can be indicated in the government’s dominance of the media ownership, the appointment of the media managers from the ruling party, and the imposition of restrictive media laws. The government’s clear aim is to ensure that media promote and never criticize government initiatives andpolicies.

As Human Rights Watch states the Ethiopian government has accused more than 38 journalists with various crimes under the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation since the 2010 election. Journalists who are known to write critical articles face regular and intense pressure from security officials. With the existing degree of censorship, it seems Ethiopia is in the 18th century as far as the development of journalism in the rest of the world isconsidered. Thus, it can be said that in Ethiopia where freedom of expression is highly suppressed and journalists are in trouble, journalism is fake.

JUSTICE: Ethiopian War Criminal Caught In HollandSource: Het Parool October 16, 2015:
A 61 year old man was arrested in Amstelveen on suspicion of committingwar crimes in Ethiopia in the late 70's as a representative of the former Derg regime. According to the Public Prosecutor, the man is accused of the imprisonment, torture and murder of opponents of the former regime.The man has been living in the Netherlands for some time and has received Dutch nationality.

In 1974 Ethiopian emperor Haile Selassie was deposed by a group of soldiers from the Derg. After an internal power struggle Colonel Mengistuseized power. Under the Mengistu regime Ethiopia suffered a period of repression and conflict that cost the lives of many thousands of people.
The reign of terror was accompanied by widespread arrests, torture and killings committed by the government. In the 90's international media reported about the possible involvement of this suspect in crimes againstEthiopians. In Ethiopia the man received sentences, in absentia, of life inprison and death for the murder of alleged opponents of the regime.

For the Dutch criminal investigation against this man, the police have questioned a number of witnesses, mostly Ethiopians now living abroad. According to the Prosecutor, these witnesses have made statements aboutcrimes this man allegedly committed in the Gojjam province as a representative of the military dictatorship. The Dutch investigative authorities also received part of the criminal file that led to the suspect's death sentence from the Ethiopian authorities. The investigation by the International Crimes Team is focusing on specific, individual cases of imprisonment, torture and murder in the prison camps of Debre Marcos and Metekel. According to the Prosecutor, dozens of prisoners were murdered and their bodies dumped in a mass grave in 1978 on the ordersof the suspect. The man was arrested on September 29th and has been incustody since then. During the search of his home the police found and confiscated, among other things, military and other identity documents, including two diplomatic passports. On Thursday the court in The Hague remanded the man into custody for 90 days.

It’s not often that one meets a woman who was a PHD candidate retreating to a remote monastery. But Emahoy Wolete Kidan Desta is thatkind of person. She has been living a solitary existence, much of it spent in silence and in prayer in Waldeba monastery. She has her bachelor degree from Denison University in International Relations, her second degree in World History from Kent State University in Ohio and begun herPHD in African Studies in Atlanta University.

Her life today is a far cry from her scholastic life in the US but it has givenher “inner calm and peace” she says. She gave up the world and her formidable academic credential to become an Orthodox Church nun. Emahoy Wolete Kidan leads a quiet life in Waldeba “simply to seek Godthrough prayer, the celebration of the church and community life.”

She spoke beautifully and simply about the choice she has made during the course of her life. Shining through her comments were her devotion toher belief, her reverence for the teaching of the word of God, and her convictions about the importance of commitment.

Emahoy Wolete Kidan spent the majority of her teenage years in Addis and attended in the former Menen boarding school during the Emperor’stime.

In her early 20’s, she briefly taught at her former school Menen before leaving to the US. She earned her first degree in International Relations from Denison University. After earning her bachelor’s degree, she considered going on to graduate school. But instead, she decided it was time to come back home and enter the work world. She started working atthe Ministry of Information and years later at the American Information Service, the US Embassy. She was responsible for the preparation of a magazine, Panorama.

She was also active in the theater, appearing in plays. She has also participated in the preparation of laureate Tsegaye Gebre Medhen's play "Tewdros". She played the part of Tewabech, the emperor's wife. She alsoplayed in Moliere's 'the Doctor in Spite of Himself' which was translated into Amharic as "ye fez doctor."

Even though she liked the job, Emahoy had to go back to the United States to do her master’s degree. She did her M.A at the Kent state University in Ohio and begun her PHD in the Atlanta University. She came back home to complete her fieldwork for her thesis. She never went backand didn’t finish her PHD.

But rather, she started teaching at the Harar Army Academy. There she also used to edit a monthly magazine, Weekly Flash. She fought passionately for the issues that she believed in, including peace. It was just after Derg took power and its heavy hand was felt everywhere in the country. She wrote an article in the magazine telling the military government to hand down power to a civilian administration. It was a daring thing to say that cost her job. She came back to Addis. But still shewas in the Derg’s black list who accused of her being an EPRP member.

It was pure speculation but she had to run away to Baher Dar where she took refuge in St. George church. Subsequently soldiers came to the church where they severely beaten her. She survived after taken to hospital. While this sad event has deeply affected her, it was not a direct factor in her decision to become a nun. She wanted to enter into ‘a deeperawareness of God’s presence in her life’. She started spending her time praying, going to daily mass as well and readings of psalms and scriptures.

She also started teaching and saw her rising excitement about becoming anun. She headed to Waldeba. It was a bizarrely improbable place for her. Most people who joined there are in their seventies and eighties and someof them more than ninety. It took four years for her request to be granted. In those years, she was forced to dwell in a cave near Waldeba. Some of her relatives were understandably angry with her for abandoninga prestigious and lucrative career in favor of monastery.

She herself admits it was at times a tough road but she kept plugging along because she enjoys “the serenity and peace that are unshakable”https://arefe.wordpress.com/…/11/16/a-phd-holder-at-waldeba/

ETHICS: Eskinder Nega Wins 2015 PEN Canada1 Humanity AwardPEN CanadaOctober 21, 2015

Ethiopian journalist Eskinder Nega will receive PEN Canada's One Humanity Award on the opening night of the 36th International Festival ofAuthors (IFOA 36). The award, valued at $5,000, is presented at PEN's annual gala to a writer whose work transcends the boundaries of nationaldivides and inspires connections across cultures.

Mr. Nega, an independent journalist, was arrested in September

2011 under the provisions of Ethiopia's Anti-Terrorism Proclamation for criticizing the detention of a prominent government critic, and disputing the government's assertion that detained journalists were terror suspects.At his trial the judge reportedly accused Nega of using "the guise of freedom" to "attempt to incite violence and overthrow the constitutional order" through a popular revolt similar to those of the Arab Spring.

Convicted on June 27, 2012, Nega was sentenced to 18 years in prison.In December 2012 the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention said the sentence violated free expression and due process rights under international law. The UN group called for his immediate release. On May 2, 2013, the Ethiopian Federal Supreme Court upheldboth the conviction and the sentence.

Nega is one of eight journalists and bloggers currently jailed in Ethiopia under the Anti-Terrorism Proclamation, according to PEN International's case list. Six others were released in July 2015 after being held for periodsranging from 16 months to four years under the same legislation.

Since its 2010 UN Universal Periodic Review (UPR), Ethiopia has repeatedly used its Anti-Terrorism Proclamation to arbitrarily arrest, prosecute, and imprison independent journalists and opposition activists. Ahead of Ethiopia's 2014 UPR, a shadow report by PEN International andthe Committee to Protect Journalists found the Proclamation overbroad and inconsistent with international law. The use of the Anti-Terror Proclamation to stifle the independent media has been condemned both by regional human rights bodies and the UN.

The Ethiopian government has arbitrarily imposed restrictions on thedistribution of broadcast and print licenses, the content and editorial position of news outlets, the freedom of movement of journalists, the accreditation of international journalists, and domestic access to international broadcasts and Internet content.

Since 1992, government pressure has forced at least 75 independent publications, overwhelmingly from the Amharic language press, to close. Although a large number of private publications continue to operate, less than a handful of publications cover politics with a critical perspective. A high number of journalists have fled the country as a result of governmentpersecution.

PEN Canada is a nonpartisan organization of writers that works with others to defend freedom of expression as a basic human right at home and abroad. PEN Canada promotes literature, fights censorship, helps freepersecuted writers from prison, and assists writers living in exile

October 23, 2015: AVITION NEWS: Ethiopian Airlines flight headedfor Washington DC declares emergency over the Atlantic Ocean.

Ethiopian Airlines Dreamliner declares emergency over the Atlantic after one of its engines ‘shuts down.’
A Dreamliner declared an emergency thismorning over the Atlantic after one of its engines shut down.

The Ethiopian Airlines flight had set out from Dublin Airport at 6am this morning bound for Washington

Dulles, when it encountered problems overthe Atlantic Ocean. The pilot was forced to turn the plane around and signal an emergency, and declare intention to return to Ireland.

Speaking to MailOnline Travel Ben Grossman-Cohen, who was on the flight, said: ‘We took off and they were serving food about an hour into the flight. Then the flight map showed that they had turned back east andthe updated arrival time was just an hour away.

‘Then they told us there was a minor technical issue and they were returning to Dublin to address it and they’d update us later. Maybe 10-15minutes later they said there was an issue with the left engine and we’d be landing in Dublin and they’d tell us more later.’ The Boeing 787-8 Dreamliner made a safe landing, with sources claiming the reason for theemergency was because one of the plane’s twin jet engines had ‘shut down.’ The passenger jet touched down at 8.35am. Source: The Daily Mail

Ethiopian Airlines targets Asia with new Chinese crewBy Karim Lebhour, AFP (October 25, 2015)
Addis Ababa (AFP News) - Africa's flourishing Ethiopian Airlines is clear --the future lies in Asia and it plans to hit that point home by putting Chinese crew members on all flights to China as of next month. "Asia andparticularly China is our focus. This is our biggest market," CEO Tewolde Gebremariam told AFP.

The Addis Ababa-based company already has flights to Beijing, Shanghai,Hong Kong and Guangzhou. Now the airline is training Chinese crews for its China-bound flights, because "90 percent of passengers flying to Chinadon't speak English". "They don't understand the safety instructions," Gebremariam said, adding that they needed teams that speak their language and "understand their culture". Some 30 young Chinese recruitsare completing their training at the Ethiopian Airlines aviation academy. "Ichose Ethiopian Airlines because I want an international experience," saidHe Xupeng, who left a Chinese company back home to join the African aircarrier.

China has invested heavily in major construction projects in Africa, one ofthe latest being sub-Saharan Africa's first modern tramway, a $475- million scheme largely funded by China's Exim bank that opened last month in the Ethiopian capital. Beijing sees Africa as a key source of natural resources and raw materials and even built the $200 million African Union headquarters in Addis Ababa in 2012 as a gift expressing "friendship to the African people". Because of China's ever-expanding investments across the continent, the Chinese community has grown steadily in Africa, as has the market for flights to and from Asia.

Junction of Africa and Asia
At the Ethiopian Airlines training centre, Africa's sole centre to boast a Boeing 787 simulator, there are pilots, technicians and flight crew of 49nationalities.

The country has come a long way from the global headlines generated byEthiopia's 1984 famine, experiencing near-double-digit economic growth and huge infrastructure investment that have made it one of Africa's top-performing economies and a magnet for foreign investment.

Ethiopian now boasts the largest fleet in Africa, with 77 aircraft. It has grown rapidly, acquiring 32 new planes since 2010. With six million passengers in 2014, it aims to surpass other major African airlines such asEgyptAir and South African Airways -- which count seven million passengers.

Gebremariam said he wants to make Ethiopian Airlines the primary carrierbetween Africa and Asia.

"We're the best point of entry for the continent,"

Gebremariam said. "Addis is situated at the junction point between theemerging economies of Africa and Asia."

In addition to its 91 international destinations, the company hopes to addJakarta and Ho Chi Minh City in the next year. It also wants Yaounde on its list of destinations in Africa. "Today, 80 percent of air traffic in Africa iscontrolled by non-African companies," Ethiopian's chief executive said. "The market is unbalanced. We want to change that."

Dialogue b/n Eritreans and Ethiopians:
An Idea Whose Time Has Come
PERSPECTIVE By Yacob Haile-Mariam (PhD) October 25, 2015 Congratulations are in order to the leaders of Vision Ethiopia who had the courage to broach the subject of reconciliation heretofore regarded as taboo for both the Ethiopian and Eritrean intellectuals, and yet is vital for peace and development not only for these two countries but also for the whole region. Similar effort was undertaken some time ago by courageousindividuals like Prof. Tesfatsion Medhanie and others who had launched the Ethio-Eritrean Solidarity Group on which we had pinned much hope forsome kind of dialogue and interactions between these two fraternal people. It is indeed a sensitive subject over which thousands have perished on both sides and therefore understandably, one has to tread on very carefully.

More than twenty years have passed since a fratricide took place the likesof which has rarely been seen anywhere in recent memory. In the opinionof this writer, who once lived in Eritrea for a brief period and enjoyed his stay tremendously, there are no other two people who are so irretrievablyintertwined as Ethiopians and Eritreans are. Their destinies are directly intertwined not to mention about their economic welfare. If there are any two people who should have not separated, Eritreans and Ethiopians perhaps provide the best example. The superfluous relations that Eritrea has forged recently with some neighboring countries cannot stand the testwhen the chips are down. Eritrea is just as in danger as Ethiopia is, because the geopolitics of the region is equally hostile to Eritrea as it is toEthiopia. We are after all "Habesh" historically speaking.

Eritrea and Ethiopia broke up not by the genuine and informed decision ofthe people, but because of the short shortsighted and politically myopic leaders who could not see beyond the tip of their noses. The Algiers Agreement and the decisions of the Border Commission, who other than their own geopolitical interests, had the least consideration for our welfarein fact exacerbated the already tenuous situation by putting our two countries in perpetual war footing. The relations between Ethiopia and Eritrea cannot be reconciled by judicial process because it is not a matter of right, rather it is a matter of self identity and therefore the Algiers Agreement was a flop from the very beginning, not to talk of the manner it was handled which was amateurish and short-sighted especially on theEthiopian side.

Some Ethiopians abroad took issue with those of us who advocated for an outlet to Sea for our country which has the unenviable distinction of beingthe most populated country in the world to be land-locked at the shortest distance from the sea anywhere – believe it or not a mere 60 kilometers. If the charge is that we were trying to save our country from asphyxiation, and the advocacy was to secure her rights in accordance with international law, then we plead guilty as charged. Our effort was firstly to restore the unity or the federation or still come up with some sortof a mutually agreed device which will tie the brotherly and sisterly peopleof Ethiopia and Eritrea together. Failing in that we forwarded argument based on international law that our country with close to a hundred millionpeople should not be land-locked while it is located within a walking distance to the sea.

Knowing the economic and security implications of being land-locked, we could not dismiss the issue as a commodity which we could purchase fromsomewhere, as once Meles Zenawi argued. Such a stand would be tantamount to abdicating our responsibility to our people who have given us so much when they have so little. To the dismay of the naysayers we will continue to peacefully advocate for access to the sea through our ownPort Assab to the extent allowed by international law. In the least we will seek some sort of modus operandi with our Eritrean brothers and sisters which will take into account the vital interests of our country inter alia access to the sea.

Our eagerness for an outlet to the sea is matched by our eagerness to avoid any kind of war in the future. Failing in this effort there is a very good chance of Assab being casus belli and that should be avoided at any cost whatsoever. There has already been far too much bloodletting amongthese brotherly and sisterly people. If these two countries were unified or created some other arrangements such as unity or federation, with Ethiopia's vast resources and population and Eritrea's strategic location controlling a vital water way with two ports, not only would they provide adequately for their people, they would in fact be a power to reckon with. The combined economic, diplomatic and political power these two people would muster, could in fact change the geo-politics of the Red Sea and beyond.

The Red Sea area is reformatting itself with uncertainty of the future for the countries around. We may not be immune from the fallout and therefore as Eritreans and Ethiopians we should close our ranks and help each other to preserve our identity as brothers and sisters through unity.The former generations of Ethiopians and Eritreans jointly crushed colonialists and created a unified state against many odds, which unfortunately later went awry largely due to the fault of leaders in their eagerness to forge unity with their kith and kin. If it would help at all, Ethiopians should be willing to beat their chest with mea culpa. The present leaders of both Eritrea and Ethiopia, consumed by hatred towards each other, cannot be counted upon to rise up to the challenge and overcome their petty ethnic loyalty and forge an Ethiopian-Eritrean nation conceived in liberty and democracy, aspiring for its full potential of being agreat nation. Such broad vision and foresight cannot be expected from leaders whose political anchor cannot transcend ethnicity, tribalism, powermongering and corruption.

Our hope hangs in the hands of young people who are in sync with twentyfist century values where blind ethnic loyalty is regarded as ignorance, backwardness and primitive. It is gratifying to see around the US and European colleges and universities that young Eritreans and Ethiopians look and interact with special sense of affinity towards each other. It is also encouraging to see increasing number of Eritreans in Ethiopia as students in universities and as refugees - a term that should not have applied to Eritreans because this is their home and one cannot be a refugee in his or her own country. One cannot erase this sentiment of common bondage as it was evident when EPRDF forced out Eritreans some years ago and their Ethiopian neighbors tried to hide them when they could or sent them with gifts and tears in their eyes when they couldnot. When EPLF kicked out thousands of Ethiopians from Eritrea it was notin consultation or upon the demand of the people. EPLF did this while the war was raging and the people could not be expected to do anything about it.

It is now incumbent upon us, the older generation, to encourage and support this interaction of young people and undertake projects and discussions of the like organized by Vision Ethiopia. The least we can do isto refrain from infecting these young people with hatred towards each other. Instead let us tell them of the good times we had in Eritrea and theEritreans had in Ethiopia. There is no reason why this scenario cannot be repeated by us, the people, leaving aside those shortsighted and myopic leaders on both sides of the border. Dr Yacob Haile-Mariam is a prominentEthiopian scholar who was a college professor in the U.S. before rising as a powerful voice in opposition politics in Ethiopia. His book, Assab Yemanat? (Whose is Assab?) is widely read and cherished among Ethiopians.

GENE SCIENCE: The Moringa Plant (Shiferaw; Aleko)The Science and the Hyperbole (October 30, 2015) By Fekadu Fullas, RPh, Ph.D.

The Tree of Life, the Never Die Tree, The Magic Tree, The Tree of Paradise, The Miracle Tree, Mothers' Best Friend. These are some of the laudatory appellations showered on the Moringa plant, M. oleifera and M.stenopetala in particular, to signify the plant's utility as a functional fooditem, medicinal tree and natural water purifier. Since 2013 or so, the “Miracle Leaf” frenzy that hit the social media and other outlets by storm has catapulted Moringa even into the stores of Addis Ababa, especially Mercato. We hear a 0.5 kg-plastic bag of Moringa, with clear nutritional labels, sells for 80 Birr. In the USA, Moringa is sold in stores that cater to immigrants from India, Sri Lanka, China and the Philippines. Are the attributes that are ascribed to Moringa justified? There is some evidence that is put out in the scientific literature to lend support to many, if not all,of the nutritional, medicinal and other claims for the plant. Of course, the level of evidence is open to further scrutiny. The current article attempts to provide a summary of the highlights of Moringa, against general background information. A special emphasis is laid on its status in Ethiopia. Some key references have been given at the end.

Moringa has been used by the Romans, Greeks, Egyptians, Indians and other communities since as far back as the year 150 A.D. Even earlier than that period, ancient kings and queens included the leaves and fruits of the plant in their diets. Maurian warriors of olden times are said to havebeen fed Moringa to relieve them of stress and pain, and to energize themas well, during warfare. In 1817, a petition was tabled in the Jamaican House of Assembly applauding the food value of Moringa. It was also argued that Moringa oil was as good as the best Florence oil as a light source in giving clear illumination without emitting smoke. The plant is known by 210 different names in over 80 countries. Moringa oleifera is known by the common names: Drumstick Tree; Horse-radish Tree; Kelor Tree; Oil of Ben Tree. In the Nile valley, it is known by the name Shagara Rauwaq, which literally means “tree for purifying.” In Africa, the Hausa call it zogallagandi, while the Igbo and the Yoruba call it okwe-beke and ewe igbale, respectively. The Indians claim M. oleifera is used for 300 types of ailments. There are 13 known Moringa species in the monogeneric (monotypic) Moringaceae plant family. The best known and most studied plant in the genus is Moringa oleifera. A native of the western and sub-Himalayan tracts, India, Pakistan, Asia Minor, Africa and Arabia, Moringa oleifera is now distributed in the Philippines, Cambodia, Central America and the Caribbean Islands. It is important to note that of the 13 species, six are known in Ethiopia: M. longituba, M. oleifera, M. peregrine, M. rivae, M. ruspoliana and M. stenopetala. The most widely spread and used species in Ethiopia appears to be M. stenopetala. This species has been accorded various local names (perhaps some of the names apply to M. oleifera, as well): Aleko, Aluko, Halaco (Gamo), Kalanke (Hamer), Shelaqta, Shelagda, Shelchada (Konso), Telahu (Tsemay), Shiferaw (Amarigna), Wuame, Mawe (Somali) and Wadessa. M. oleifera is an introduced species in Ethiopia, while the rest are indigenous. In Ethiopian traditional medicine, M. stenopetala is used for asthma, diabetes, hypertension, malaria and stomach problems. For these remedies, tea that is prepared by boiling the leaves, or the liquid in which chopped leaves are dipped, is taken. For example, for severe malaria, communities around Arba Minch make a decoction from the leaves and roots, and drink the liquid in the morning before breakfast.

stenopetala is a branched tree that grows to 6-10 m high, with leaves thatare 3.3-6.5 cm long, creamy-grayish seeds measuring 6-9 cm long, and sweet-scented flowers with petals up to 10 mm long. In comparison, M. oleifera can grow to 8 m high, with leaves that are 1-2 cm long, dark- brown or black seeds up to 5.5 cm long, and strongly scented flowers whose petals measure greater that 10 mm long. It is evident that M. stenopetala has larger leaves and bigger seeds. Nutritionally, both speciesare rich in carbohydrates, fats, proteins and minerals. These nutrients occur in about the same percentages in the leaves of both species. In fact,these levels of nutrients (carbohydrates, fats, proteins, mineral and fiber) are comparable to the levels that are found in Brasicca carinata (Ethiopiankale, aka ye'habesha gomen). The leaves are boiled and eaten like cabbage. For this reason, M. stenopetala is also known as "Cabbage Tree." It is also known as African moringa. It has a wide range of adaptation, ranging from arid to humid climates. It is a fast growing and drought-resistant plant. A perennial plant, M. stenopetala can survive up to 100 years without reduction in productivity. The most common pests are caterpillars, which can destroy leaves from Moringa trees in an entire village just in one week. The nutritional composition has been extensively studied and reported. It is rich in proteins and has a fair amount of essential amino acids. It is widely used as food by 12 ethnic communities in southern Ethiopia. It is the main component of the daily diet of the Konso, Gamo and Gofa people in southern Ethiopia. Moringa is a popular ingredient of "kurkufa," a special and favorite recipe of the Konso people.

Moringa oleifera

This species is often confused with the most commonly used species in Ethiopia, viz., Moringa stenopetala. Although the two species are closely related taxonomically and chemically, they are different species, and hence their properties and applications are not always the same. Just like M. stenopetala, M. oleifera is used as food and helps to curb malnutrition and hunger around the world. The leaves and young pods are used as vegetables. They are added to soups and salads to help digestion and to enhance appetite. Infusion of the root bark is traditionally used for venereal diseases and treatment of fevers. The seed oil is applied to the skin externally to treat infections. In Africa, the tree is planted on grave sites to ward off hyenas. The branches are used to make potions for charm against witches. The seeds are used in Africa to induce abortion, and they are also used to purify water. In India, it is used for a long list ofcomplaints: epilepsy, hysteria, to stimulate the heart and blood vessels, for various diseases of the liver, spleen, articular pains, scurvy, catarrh, flatulence, etc. Chemically, the leaves are rich in amino acids. The flowersand fruits also contain amino acids. The root-bark yields the amino acid derivatives moringinine and spirochine, as well as benzylamine and glucotropaeline. The seeds contain a large amount of fixed oil, commercially known as Beni or Moringa Oil, which is rich in various types of fatty acids. The roasted seeds contain acetonitrile derivatives.

Most of the pharmacological studies conducted on M. oleifera were in animal or in vitro models. These studies have demonstrated antibacterial,anti-tubercular, cytotoxic, cardiac stimulant and vasopressor activities of the plant. The juice from the leaves and stem-bark was shown to have antibacterial and anti-tubercular effects. The root bark extract has demonstrated antiviral, anti-inflammatory and analgesic properties. The ethanol extract of the whole plant exhibited cytotoxic property in human epidermoid carcinoma in tissue culture and in vivo activity against P388 leukemia cells in mice. The water extract has shown anti-fertility effect inrats. The aqueous extract reduced the turbidity of dirty water by 80- 90.5% and also lowered bacterial count significantly within 1-2 hrs post- treatment, with the bacteria being concentrated in the coagulated sediment. A constituent of M. oleifera, moringinine is an adrenalin-like substance and a cardiac stimulant that raises blood pressure.

Moringa stenopetala

This species is the one commonly found in Ethiopia. Legend has it that itderived the name Shiferaw from a person (his name), who happened toobserve that cattle grew very well when they were foraging on Moringa.

M. stenopetala shares some of the properties of M. oelifera. Nomadic people in the Omo Valley use the roots to clarify muddy water. The water purifying property has been shown not only to clarify muddy and turbid water, but also to decrease the suspended bacterial load. As mentioned earlier, nutritional studies have shown they have similar profiles of nutrients in fairly comparable percentages. Preliminary studies by Ethiopian scientists have demonstrated that extracts of the seeds possessed antimicrobial activity against Salmonella typhi, Vibrio cholerae and Escherichia coli. The roots have also shown activity against Staphylococcus aureus, Salmonella typhimurium, E. coli and Pseudomonasaeruginosa. The fatty acid constituents, a derivative of palmitic acid and oleic acid have been implicated in the antimicrobial effects. The leaf extract has exhibited activity against Trypanosoma brucei in guinea pigs and mouse models (trypanosomiasis = Gendi in Amh). The essential oils of the seeds are potent trypanocidal agents, with the activity attributable to the main constituent of the oil, benzyl isothiocyanate. In guinea pigs, M. stenopetala has shown hypotensive and saluretic (diuretic) effects. Thecrude water extract of the leaves caused a significant drop in systolic blood pressure (SBP), diastolic BP and mean arterial BP in normotensive (otherwise normal BP) in this model. A vasodilatation effect was observedwhen the guinea pigs were given Moringa after vasoconstriction was induced. In diabetes-induced mice, Moringa leaf extract has shown antihyperglyemic and antilipidemic properties. However, the active ingredients responsible for these effects are not known. M. stenopetala has been used for visceral leishmaniasis (kala-azar), caused by a Leishmania parasite (leishmaniasis = Qunchr or Shahgn in Amh). Intraperitoneal administration of a methanol extract of the leaves has indeed demonstrated antileishmanial activity in mice.

The Hypebole

stenopetala has been dubbed “super dish.” This designation may carry a notion that Moringa is an ultimate source of all required nutrients. While very nutritional, it does not contain all required nutrients for a healthy diet. However, it provides useful nutrients to people in the rural community, especially in times of food shortage. Even in normal times, itis an important source for nutrients, when people do not have other choices, anyway. M. stenopetala has also been called a “magic herb,” which may imply a cure for all ailments. This is far from true. While anecdotal evidence (even in rigorous science) provides useful clues, it doesn’t necessarily constitute a definitive proof for verbal/written claims,until unbiased and well-designed larger studies are conducted. It is important, however, to mention that there is a school of thought in the natural products scientific community that if local people in various countries use an herb for a certain ailment and claim that it works, chances are that there might be some merit to the claim. This claim is then firmed up when it is supported by preliminary studies in various models. Some of the pitfalls of data derived from in vitro/animal models are extrapolating results to humans. For example a plant material (an extract or pure compound thereof) may show activity in vitro, but this activity may be rendered inactive by enzymes when tested in vivo.

Conversely, a material that is inactive in vitro may be transformed enzymatically to an active product in vivo. Then, there is also this phenomenon of multiple constituents in a plant, activating or deactivating each other to active, inactive or even toxic products.

Conclusions

Moringa is an interesting and useful plant. Among the six Moringa species found in Ethiopia, it appears that M. stenopetala is the most widely used species. It is mainly used as a food source, water purifying product and asa natural medicinal remedy. It has been demonstrated that it is rich in carbohydrates, proteins, fats, minerals and fiber. Studies have also shownthat the plant is a reasonably good natural purifier of muddy and contaminated water. Local communities use it for diabetes, hypertension, asthma, leishmaniasis, malaria and unspecified stomach problems.

Preliminary studies, especially those that were conducted in Ethiopia, appear to support the traditional uses of M. stenopetala for diabetes, hypertension and leishmaniasis. Dosing and regulating the marketing/useof M. stenopetala appear to be yet-unaddressed hazy areas. As has been recently brought up at a workshop held in Ethiopia in 2014, maximizing the benefits of Moringa should be a central issue to all stakeholders.

Confirming other medical claims through rigorous scientific studies needsto be a priority for all active researchers in the field.

Here is a fact that the nationalists would undoubtedly have a hard time toswallow: the golden age of Asmara happens to be neither in the Italian era nor in the Independence era; those golden years happen to fall exactly on the reign of Haile Selassie, starting to build up in the 50s to reach its apex in the 60s, only to abruptly end in the early 70s when ghedli (ታጋዮች ለ ማላ ት ነ ጠ) showed up at the doorsteps of Asmara in full force.
What then explains this riddle, since it doesn't fit at all with the narrative that the nationalists have been telling the masses? This question has special relevance because the ghedli generation's concept of modernity was entirely shaped from the impressions that this colonial city had left onthem. In fact, it was with the saving of "Asmara civilization" in their mind that they went through hell for 50 years. Where from came thisperceived threat? Did Asmara have it so bad during the Haile Selassie era to warrant 50 years of insanity?

To begin with, why can't we say that Asmara's golden age was during the Italian colonial era, given that it was after all the Italians that built it? There are two major reasons: First and foremost, as pointed above, Asmara remained a small sleepy little town for much of the colonial era;it was only when Italy decided to invade Ethiopia that Asmara abruptly mushroomed five folds in the last six years. If there was no vibrant Asmara for much of the colonial era to begin with, one cannot talk of a "golden age" of a city that was never there. And, second, if we are to confine ourselves to the last six years, there were three things bedsidesits brief "age" that would make a mockery out of these perceived golden years. ዮሴፍ የ ሚለ ውን እ ን ደ ገ ና ል ብ ብ ለ ን እ ና ስ ተ ውለ ው! Opposition Politics In Ethiopia:

5 Ethiopian Opposition Groups Unite to Oust ‘Oppressive’ EPRDFGovernment (October 26, 2015)

A newly formed Ethiopian opposition group in exile, which accuses Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn’s administration and the leading party of being repressive, has vowed to ‘dismantle’ the incumbent government andcreate a new political order.

The new group – People’s Alliance for Freedom and Democracy (PAFD) –was created from a coalition of five Ethiopian opposition groups in exile;the Benishangul People’s Liberation Movement (BPLM), the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), the Gambella People’s Liberation Movement (GPLM), the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) and the Sidama National Liberation Front (SNLF).

A statement released by the Alliance after a meeting on Friday in Oslo, Norway, said it will work to oust the incumbent Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). “The (alliance) will create an opportunity for all people in Ethiopia to co-create a transitional political order that is based on the consent of all peoples, where the outmoded hegemonic culture of a single group dominating the rest is dismantled anda new just political order is established, where the respect of the right to self-determination is genuinely granted to all,” the statement said. “PAFD call upon all peoples in Ethiopia to join the alliance and support it in orderto end the suffering and dehumanization of all peoples in Ethiopia by the current government. PAFD call upon the regional and international communities, to play a positive role in diffusing this looming danger by supporting the peoples in Ethiopia rather than the illegitimate governmentbefore it is too late.”

The group said it “will conduct diplomatic, advocacy, information and other campaigns to change the current undemocratic political culture andoppressive system in Ethiopia.” The EPRDF, which was itself formed froma coalition of four Ethiopian political parties, mainly composed of the Tigrean People’s Liberation Front (TPLF), a brand that the TPLF uses to project a bogus image of a political coalition known as the Ethiopian Peoples Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) comprise of, the TigraiPeoples Liberation Front (TPLF), Amhara National Democratic Movement(ANDM) Oromo Peoples Democratic Organization (OPDO), Southern Peoples Democratic Movement (SPDM), came into power in May, 1991 after ousting the Duerg regime. Despite its economic achievements, theparty has been accused of several human rights violations.

The EPRDF recently came under heavy criticisms when it historically claimed 100 per-cent of the votes in a parliamentary election. In May, the party won 546 of the 547 available seats in parliament. Human rights groups have accused the government of jailing political opponents. The government has also been criticized for 'routinely using anti-terror laws tosilence its critics'. Several opposition groups have been classed as terroristorganizations by the EPRDF.

Besides Eritrea, Ethiopia is the second country where journalists are imprisoned the most. Bloggers, journalists and political opponents have been found guilty of terrorism charges and sentenced to years in prison orto death. Several opposition members are currently living in exile and many have been sentenced to death in absentia. Although international human rights groups have condemned these trials as lacking due process,the government claims the verdicts were pronounced according to the country's laws.

Ahead of President Obama's recent visit to East Africa, Desalegn defendedhis government's stand on jailing journalists saying that the country needs"ethical journalism" not those that work with "terrorist groups". The Alliance is not the first exiled Ethiopian opposition group that has mounteda campaign to oust the EPRDF. In July, the Ginbot 7 Movement for Unity and Democracy, which has been branded as a terrorist group by Ethiopianauthorities, decided to use armed resistance against the government.

The announcement came after the group's leader Berhanu Nega travelled from the US, where he has been in exile, to Eritrea in order to oversee thecampaign. "We are always open to possibilities of a peaceful resolution.
The group emerged from a peaceful movement but now we are forced to consider armed resistance. It is not our choice but there is no other feasible option to challenge the government in Addis Ababa," a spokesmanfor the group Dr. Tadesse Biru explained. The Ethiopian government has not released any statement regarding the newly formed 'Alliance' and the group's motives. (Text ends)

Opposition Politics In Ethiopia:

Berhanu Nega: The Quest for Change in Ethiopia By Laura Secorun Palet, Ozy (November 2, 2015)

It was the spring of 2001 and 43-year-old Berhanu Nega was optimistic. His homeland, Ethiopia, was recovering from decades of conflict, he had just given a speech to university students about academic freedom, and now he had landed at Charles de Gaulle Airport for a business conferencein Paris. Then he turned on his phone. The students he’d spoken to hoursearlier had staged a peaceful protest that the police answered with bruteforce and live ammunition, leaving 40 people dead. A week later, Nega was back in Ethiopia, behind bars.

So began a 14-year-long ordeal that has seen Nega, one of Ethiopia's leading activists, arrested and jailed twice — once for almost two years —exiled to the United States and finally, condemned to death, in absentia. These days, the would-be mayor of Addis Ababa (he was detained right after he won the election) is an associate professor of economics at Bucknell University. But Nega remains a prominent opposition leader: He is the co-founder of Ginbot 7, an outlawed political party that he leads from the sleepy Pennsylvania campus town of Lewisburg.

Of late, Ethiopia has been a darling of Western powers. The landlocked country is considered an island of stability in the otherwise turbulent Hornof Africa. Yes, its name was once synonymous with starving children and charity concerts, but today, Ethiopia posts GDP growth numbers in the double digits. In the past year, foreign investment has skyrocketed. The country is also a valuable partner against the threat of Islamist terrorism — here, in the incarnation of al-Shabab in Somalia, which killed148 students in April at a Kenyan university.

In Nega's view, that's why the the U.S. donated $340 million to a countrywith such a horrible human rights record. Under Meles Zenawi, who ruledfrom 1991 until his death in 2012, the government ostracized the opposition and imposed a system of ethnic-based federalism, which enhanced divisions and was useful for repressing certain ethnic groups. Zenawi's successor, Hailemariam Desalegn, has carried on his legacy of media muffling, extrajudicial executions and torturing dissidents.Nega says protecting a regime that most citizens resent will backfire in thelong run: "Ethiopia is ready to explode, it just needs a little match to light it up," he says. "The West is not going to give Africans democracy, Africans have to fight for it."

The U.S. State Department did not comment on Nega's criticisms of U.S.policy in the Horn of Africa. Via email, a representative described U.S relations with the Ethiopian government as "robust" and said it partners "with Ethiopia and its people, as we do with people and governments across Africa, to pursue shared goals of democracy, peace and prosperity."

I have completely given up on the possibility of a democratic change. Nega doesn't look as pugnacious as he sounds. He wears small glassesand, on the day we speak over Skype, a professorial gray cardigan. Surrounded by walls of thick books in his university office Nega, now 57,looks much like any other professor. He talks like one too, explaining concepts with patience and detail. "But that's his strength," says MessayKebede, an Ethiopian professor of social philosophy at the University of Dayton. Kebede says Nega's deportment makes him seem more charismatic educator than politician. "And the crueler the regime becomes, the more people listen to him."

The son of a prominent businessman, Nega first got involved in politics in school, in the '70s, during the final days of Emperor Haile Selassie. He then had to flee to Sudan, where he spent two years reading philosophy inKhartoum's public library, before making his way to the U.S. There he went straight back to the books, obtaining a Ph.D. in economics and becoming a teacher. In 1991, when the communist government was overthrown, Nega returned home only to find his country "hadn't learned its lessons yet." After his short stay in prison in 2001, he left his job as a lecturer and his fertilizer producing company for politics. It was a reluctantdecision, he says: "The reality became so terrible that we had to do something to try to change it."

His party, the Coalition for Unity and Democracy, rocked votes in the 2005elections — Nega won the mayoralty of Addis Ababa — but the joy gave way to a crackdown. Nega was in jail for 21 months; when he got out, he headed almost straight to the United States. Last year, his friend and Ginbot 7 colleague Andargachew Tsige was detained in Yemen and presumably handed over to the Ethiopian authorities. Nega says Tsige's disappearance and the detention of others has made the struggle personal. "We owe it to them to do everything we can," he says.

Leaders like Nega are gone and, in the eyes of some, discredited. Withoutfair elections or international pressure, Nega says only one option remains: force. "I have completely given up on the possibility of a democratic change," he says. So Ginbot is calling to dethrone Desalegn "by all means necessary." This is a dangerous route for a country with such recent conflict and so many ethnic feuds, and, opposition leaders inside Ethiopia argue, an easy call for a man at a university 7,000 miles from Addis Ababa. As Merera Gudina, founder of local opposition party Oromo People's Congress, says, "If there's a coup, people will die."

Nega says unnecessary violence would be avoided by educating those withweapons about democracy and the separation of powers; he regularly talks with members of armed groups and other dissidents about blueprintsfor the future. It will be based on strong institutions, an independent judiciary and economic policies that aim to serve Ethiopia's poor majority.

Still, despite his best efforts to teach and mobilize, what's to stop the country from falling into chaos after the last two changes in government?Nega is not sure. "History repeating itself," he says, "that is what keeps me up at night." (Text ends)

REFLECTIONS:on Prof. Mesfin's book "Adafne":Saving Ethiopians From Themselves?

Latest Amharic book, "Adafne: Fear and Failure", is at once a lamentation on the decline and decay of Ethiopian society from the corrosive effects ofbad governance, tyrannical rule and moral corruption and a call to action for redemption. Prof. Mesfin Wolde Mariam taught geography at the former Haile Selassie I University (now Addis Ababa University).

"Adafne" is a book written in the didactic tone of the professor, the angrytone of the patriot who is pained by the sight of his nation's descent into the morass of tribal politics led by a coalition of ignoramuses and in the loving paternal tone of the wise elder giving advice and counsel to the younger generation. Prof.

Mesfin has been speaking truth to power for more years than I care to remember. “Adafne” is his latest proclamation of truth to the powers that be and not be. In my view, Prof. Mesfin has been the foremost Ethiopian public intellectual for at least the past four decades.

Prof. Edward Said observed that in the 21st century, the intellectual hastaken the mission of advancing human freedom and knowledge by “speaking the truth to power, being a witness to persecution and suffering, and supplying a dissenting voice in conflicts with authority.”

Prof. Mesfin took upon the cross of speaking the truth to power in Ethiopiain the second half of the last century. He has been a witness to the persecution and suffering of the Ethiopian people. He has been a singular voice of dissent against tyranny perpetuated by an outdated monarchy and a bloodthirsty military junta called “Derg”. He is today a witness and avictim of thugs who cling to power through international panhandling.
Perhaps it is more accurate to say he has been the voice of reason for hisattempts to use his knowledge and expertise to help guide successive tyrannical regimes away from bad governance and commission of crimes against humanity. When his efforts failed, he became a voice of reasoneddissent to publicly counter-check the excesses of tyranny. Unfortunately,his dissent made him a target of persecution than a welcome agent of social and political change.

Today, he remains the sole fearless dissenting voice against the tyranny and corruption of the Thugtatorship of the Tigrean People’s Liberation Front (T-TPLF), an unholy alliance of murderous thugs and gangsters in designer suits play-acting “government” in Ethiopia. He has paid dearly forhis beliefs and convictions. For the past 24 years, Prof. Mesfin has been persecuted and prosecuted by the T-TPLF. The T-TPLF jailed him for his peaceful political and human rights activities. Even today he is a target of intense harassment and intimidation. The T-TPLF wants him to go into exile.

In April 2015, he wrote a defiant blog in Amharic to his T-TPLF persecutors: … Back when I was working with the Ethiopian Human RightsCouncil, they [T-TPLF] would directly and indirectly try to intimidate me with aim of forcing us to go into exile or commit a crime. Let me talk about myself. I am not sure why they want to intimidate me. I don’t knowif they are trying to intimidate me because they want my apartment. In my home, the only two things that may be of value to woyane minions aretwo paintings by Gebre Christos Desta. Otherwise, I only have books that are of no value to woyanes. Therefore, my persecution at the hands of woyane could only be intended to drive me into exile. They tried it in 1992. It did not work. Even though I cannot be sure of the exact reason for the concerted effort to persecute me, I am informed by a well-placed woyane I know that the campaign of persecution against me is fully underway.

I do not believe this country belongs to a single bully [thug]. This land was built by my father and mother, grand-parents and great grand- parents. No one can force me into exile. No one can intimidate me and take away my rights as an Ethiopian. I won’t let it happen. Let me make itcrystal clear [to the woyanes]: My life, the place I live and my death will occur right here [in Ethiopia]. Let me tell woyane and their minions one undeniable truth: If they commit illegal acts and crimes to victimize me, they should know that tomorrow they will face greater persecution and punishments. Those arrogant abusers of powers who believe they could be victorious by murdering should pause and think. One can gain victorythrough death. One can also triumph in death.

“Adafne” is a reflection of his own personal and professional experiences and his historical understanding and analysis of the factors that have contributed to the progressive decay and gradual downfall of a people anda nation with unparalleled history and civilization.

His mistreatment by the powers that be long predates his persecution by the T-TPLF. In the late 1970s and throughout the 1980s, he faced persecution by a military thugtatorship called “Derg”. When he refused to go along with the Derg’s crimes against humanity, they tried to scandalizehis name. The regime of H.I.M. Haile Selassie also harassed and threatened him throughout the 1960s. He was perceived as an intolerable irritant. But he kept on speaking his mind even when the powers that be (Emperor Haile Selassie and his ministers and courtiers) did not want to hear anything he had to say.

He kept on marching on the long walk to freedom stepping to the beat of a different drummer. Himself. I would venture to guess that he was a professional dissenter long before he was a university professor. I can imagine the acronym P.D. (professional dissenter) after his name, for he lived the hard, onerous and intellectually lonely life of the dissenter alwaysspeaking his truth to users, abusers and misusers of and losers in power.

The powers that be wagged their index fingers at him, clenched their fist in his face and pushed and shoved him in and out of jail. Like the indefatigable camel, he kept on walking. The dogs of state kept on barkingand baring their teeth at him. Prof. Mesfin kept on preaching, teaching, outreaching and impeaching. In “Adafne”, he continues that tradition. I have the highest respect for Prof. Mesfin as a scholar, a public intellectual,defender of Ethiopian history and a good and honest human being.

He does not play the popular games of duplicity, double-dealing and dirtytricks. He says what he means and means what he says. He does not speak with forked tongue. What you see is what you get with him. If youdon’t like what he has to say, you can go straight to that famous place where it never gets cold.

I guess truth-telling makes the truth-teller very unpopular among those who live to lie and lie to live. In my view, Prof. Mesfin is the single brightcandle that has flickered undimmably for decades in Ethiopia against an enveloping dark sky of intellectual cowardice, political expediency and servile opportunism.him as Ralph Waldo Emerson’s “Man Thinking”.

Emerson speaking of the American scholar at Harvard in August 1837 described the quintessential American scholar: There goes in the world anotion, that the scholar should be a recluse, a valetudinarian, — as unfit for any handiwork or public labor, as a penknife for an axe… As far as thisis true of the studious classes… action is with the scholar subordinate, but it is essential. Without it, he is not yet man. Without it, thought can neverripen into truth. Whilst the world hangs before the eye as a cloud of beauty, we cannot even see its beauty. Inaction is cowardice, but there can be no scholar without the heroic mind. The preamble of thought, the transition through which it passes from the unconscious to the conscious, is action. Only so much do I know, as I have lived. Instantly we know whose words are loaded with life, and whose not.

Prof. Mesfin is Ethiopia's "Man Thinking", the scholar with a heroic mind. He was never a "recluse" or a "valetudinarian". He has been a man of action for nearly one-half century. His thoughts and ideas spoken and written in truth have been his action. I should like to think of him as greater than Emerson's hero, "Man Thinking". I should like to think of himas Ethiopia's "Man Writing", "Man Speaking", "Man Listening," "Man Inspiring", "Man Agitating" and "Man Dissenting".

He fearlessly speaks his mind and the truth, his truth, not just to theusers, abusers and misusers of power but also to the powerless, the power-hungry, the power-drunk anyone who cared to listen.

In "Adafne", Prof. Mesfin, like Emerson's "world's eye", shows that he is and has been "Ethiopia's eye" preserving the greatness of Ethiopia's past and passionately communicating that greatness not just to his fellow intellectuals (many of whom would rather gossip to him in private than beseen standing with him in public) but also to a new generation of Ethiopians disconnected from and ignorant of the greatness of their ancestors.

In "Adafne", Prof. Mesfin reports what he has seen with his scanning "eye"on where Ethiopia and Ethiopians have been, where they are now and where they will or will not be in the future depending on what they chooseto do today.

It is a book about his personal thoughts of an Ethiopia with a glorious past, an Ethiopia in political, social and economic turmoil today and the rise over the horizon of an Ethiopia whose best days are yet to come. "Adafne" could be viewed as an amalgam of hardboiled historical and contemporary political analysis, a lamentation on the morass of moral depravity in which many Ethiopians find themselves and a cautionary taleof how to Ethiopians can save themselves from themselves.

The metaphorical title of the book has deep complexity with a multiplicityof senses and meaning. The word “adafne” could be understood to signifythe process of burying or covering up an object with earth or ashes. It could refer to the extinguishment of a fire and left over embers by dirt or water. It could refer to the sudden end of some activity in its beginningstages.

In Ethiopian military parlance, “adafne” is the name given to the portable recoilless antitank weapon commonly known as “Bazooka”. In general, the word “adafne” refers to an object or a process that suffocates, chokes,asphyxiates, smothers, stifles and strangulates. Prof. Mesfin uses the word “adafne” metaphorically to bludgeon, to accuse and to prosecute users, abusers and misusers of power in Ethiopia today and in the past with historical, political and philosophical truths.

He also uses the metaphor to challenge the powerless, the power hungryand the power-drunk to understand the enormous responsibilities that come with power and to strive and serve the people with integrity. I findthe hidden message of “Adafne” most compelling. (I am tempted to say he wrote “Adafne” as a memorandum to the younger generation today and coming generations.)

In “Adafne”, I hear Prof. Mesfin’s clarion call to Ethiopia’s youth warning them to beware and avoid the pitfalls of the present and past generations and redeem Ethiopia from the horrendous fate so many African countries have been condemned to live out by their ineluctable history, collective inaction and lack of visionary leadership. Ethiopia’s youth should beware the monster of “Adafne” and avoid repeating the mistakes of their parentsand ancestors or they will find themselves buried under a mountain of lies.

I sense he has a larger message to Ethiopia’s youth which could be statedin three simple propositions: Only you(th) can save Ethiopia from certainself-destruction. Only you(th) can save Ethiopia from the fires of tribalismand sectarianism. Only you(th) can save Ethiopia from Ethiopians of the past and present who have destroyed the social fabric, mangled the political structure and perverted the economic system and desecrated thespiritual well-being of the society.

“Adafne” is at once a “wholly African disease” most likely acquired during colonialism. It has infected the continent and made it barren, unable to produce great men and women of character, wisdom, integrity and virtue.“Adafne” has made the continent a basket of crabs. As one crab tries to climb out of the basket, the rest pull him down.

“Adafne” is also a disease of the mind. “Adafne” victims are inherently anti-freedom, anti-equality, anti-justice and anti-progress. Put differently,for “Adafne” victims, freedom is only their freedom and equality only theirequality. Justice is Just Us, and progress a bulging wad of cash in “Adafne”la-la-land.

“Adafne” is also tyranny personified. “Adafne” owns the land and mineralsand gems hidden within it. “Adafne” owns the lakes and rivers. “Adafne” has god-like powers. “Adafne’s” wish is everybody’s command. “Adafne” isEthiopians’ sickness of the soul. “Adafne has made Ethiopia the land of chatterboxes first by suppressing truth, second by suppressing education and knowledge, third by closing down all means by which truth is propagated, fourth by hiring silver-tongued spinners of lies and fifth by closing all avenues for the publication and dissemination of ideas and knowledge.”

The “Adafne” triplets including siblings Fear and Failure in Ethiopia are evilpersonified, institutionalized, spiritualized, moralized and intellectualized. Iunderstand the metaphorical meaning of “Adafne” to signify the ultimate “destroyer” of a country in the same sense Robert J. Oppenheimer thought of the atomic bomb as the ultimate destroyer of humanity.
Oppenheimer hearkening to the Hindu god Vishnu said, “Now, I ambecome Death, the destroyer of worlds.”

“Adafne” has become death, Ethiopia’s grim reaper. “Adafne” is slowly squeezing the social, political, economic and spiritual life out of Ethiopia and its people. “Adafne” is the destroyer of hope, of faith, of charity, of ambition, of promise, of honor, of dignity, of integrity, of virtue, of righteousness, of morality, of good will…. in Ethiopia. “Adafne” can be destroyed only by knowledge. “Knowledge and education are the nemesisof adafne, and adafne the mortal enemy of knowledge and education.”

The impact of “Adafne” is most severe on the youth. “They are forced to lament the suffering of their fathers and mothers instead of taking pride intheir ancestors’ achievements. Instead of engaging themselves with their Ethiopianity, the youth are encouraged to take pride in their narrow tribalism and sectarianism. The youth are disempowered and disabled from asserting their rights. They have lost their voice [and self- confidence].”

The “Adafne” triplets have caused a colossal systemic collapse and astructural debacle on a societal scale. It is that existential failure (mekshef) of Ethiopians as Ethiopians that Prof. Mesfin explores passionately in his book.

“Failure” in Prof. Mesfin’s analysis has a variety of manifestations. “Failure” could be the inability to complete or bring to fruition a societalproject is “failure”. “Failure” could be missing one’s goal and unable tomake progress. “Failure” could be the collective inability to pursue development and change.

Prof. Mesfin identifies three reasons for the “failure” (mekshef) of Ethiopiaand Ethiopians: 1) Failure brought about by the dominance of governancesystems unrestrained by the rule of law. The effect of that failure has been passive acceptance of tyrannical governments or voting with one’s feet and going into exile.
Second is the failure of Ethiopian intellectuals. The intellectuals and educated classes sold out to the powers that be, whomever they may be. With every regime, they behaved like the three monkeys named “Hear NoEvil”, “See No Evil” and “Speak No Evil”.

The intellectuals and educated classes have failed to guide the powers that be to do right; they have failed to record their crimes and misdeeds of the powers that be for future generations; and worst of all, they have propagated the mistakes of the past for the future generations as the right and proper thing to do compounding their own mistakes. The religious leaders have not fared much better as they have failed to providespiritual guidance.

What is even more disheartening is the fact that ignoramuses in power today aspire to intellectual respectability by purchasing academic credentials from internet diploma mills. “To embellish and burnish their power, the ignoramuses in power buy bogus papers with official-lookingseals and call themselves doctors, professors, government advisers andrepresentatives of international organizations.”

In my view, what the ignoramuses fail to understand that it is not a pieceof paper with acronyms that make a man or woman a great leader.
It is the vision, the mind and heart of the man or woman. Bill Gates is acollege drop out as are Steve Jobs and Mark Zukerberg. Walt Disney dropped out of high school. Abraham Lincoln finished only one year of formal schooling of any kind. I rest my case.

Third is the lack of role models for Ethiopians. Because there were not anysuccessful countries around Ethiopia, Ethiopians have not been able to learn much about better governance and society.

“Adafne” is framed within a broader historical and socio-political context ofEthiopia. The book appears to posit a backdrop of grand values that have sustained Ethiopians for centuries. “Adafne” and its siblings Fear and Failure (and their unspoken of cousin Fear O’ Failure) have spawned in Ethiopia a culture that has sapped the society of happiness, prosperity andcompassion, and individuals of self-confidence and self-dignity.

What is the root cause of adafne and its siblings in Ethiopia?I believe it is “FEAR” of a peculiar kind.
It is fear of the very idea of TRUTH.Fear of thinking the TRUTH.
Fear of speaking the TRUTH. Fear of hearing the TRUTH. Fear of seeing the TRUTH. Fear of living the TRUTH. Fear of preaching the TRUTH.
Fear of defending the “TRUTH.”
It is also fear and distrust of each other. Fear of our consciences. Fear ofdoing the right thing. Worst of all, it is fear of ourselves and what we cando individually and collectively for ourselves and our country.

The “TRUTH fear-factor” in “Adafne” is directly responsible for the causation of a “political power failure”, an “educational failure”, a “culturalfailure”, an “economic failure”, an “intellectual failure”, a “spiritual failure” and “moral failure” in Ethiopia. Prof. Mesfin’s chronicle of the impact of theAdafne triplets in Ethiopia evokes deep sadness. Together they have made*Ethiopians a people who never miss an opportunity to miss an opportunity.*

The story of the “adafne” triplets can only be told anecdotally until Ethiopian scholars and intellectuals take the task of solemnly and earnestly documenting it for future generations. Adafne was the banethat destroyed Ethiopian heroes like Ras Alula Engida (Aba Nega), theman feared by Europeans as “the Garibaldi of Abyssinia”.

Ras Alula wiped out entire Italian brigades at the Battle of Dogali in 1887.He defended Ethiopian sovereignty and dignity when the Europeans were scrambling for African colonies and slaves. Ras Alula was betrayed by Emperor Yohannes who allied with the Europeans rewarded Ras Alula by giving him a position well below his rank. That very act opened the door for Italy to make incursions into the heartland. Adafne! A colossal failure of leadership and governance.

Fortunately, Menelik II taught the Italians a lesson they will not forget in 1896 at the Battle of Adwa. Ethiopia is the only African country with its own alphabet, but it has been unable to use it to explore the frontiers of knowledge or to preserve the knowledge of our past in terms of agriculture, irrigation, architecture and transportation. Prof. Mesfin writeswith some bitterness, “Knowledge is a tool of change. Knowledge is a necessary precondition for justice, equality and good governance … In Ethiopia, knowledge was not wanted (valued) in the past. That has not changed today…” Adafne! Another colossal failure of society.

During the reign of Emperor Haile Selassie a modern government system was established. “But Emperor Haile Selassie became the sole holder of power. The armed forces, police and security forces came under his direct control." Haile Selassie became a tyrant and outlived his usefulness until he was overthrown by a military junta which became even more tyrannicaland vicious. Adafne! A colossal failure of leadership and governance.

Ethiopia's elite have long been divided between "heroes" (arbegnoch) whofought the foreign enemy and "collaborators" (bandas) who joined the foreign enemy to attack their own people.
Prof. Mesfin writes: "The children of 'bandas' in power today hide the shameful history of their treasonous parents. They are seen cringing and wincing by the mere mention of the shameful acts. They lack the confidence of true Ethiopian citizenship. They revise Ethiopian history to put themselves in the best light while distorting and mangling Ethiopia's true history. For instance, they say Ethiopia's history is no more than 100years old…" They blacken Ethiopia's true history to lighten up their own history fabricated in the workshop of their warped minds. In short, the history of the T-TPLF. Adafne! A colossal failure of history and historical analysis.

Little is written of the history of Ethiopia's true heroes, those who shed their blood in the battlefield to preserve Ethiopia's independence and sovereignty. The real heroes were treated like villains in peace time as thecollaborators were treated as heroes and rewarded with title, positions and wealth.

Prof. Mesfin writes, "Up to the present, the written history of true Ethiopian heroes is negligible. Little has been written of the patriotism andheroism of Dejazmach Geresu Duki, General Jagama Kelo, Shaleqa BeqeleWeya.

[I would emphatically add to the list the name of Dejazmach Kebede Bizunesh, a great Ethiopian patriot who not only whipped the Italians in battle time and again in the late 1930s a few miles west of Addis Ababa but also fought in his old age the Derg with valor and against all odds fornearly three years. So many unsung and forgotten heroes unknown to Ethiopians and known only to God. I am so proud and deeply grateful to all of them!].

It was necessary for the university to have a project to research, write and preserve for future generations the contributions of great Ethiopian patriots, to list them by name and identify the unknown patriots who fellin battle. But there are few who care about these patriots but preservingtheir history is not for their glory but the benefit of coming generations. Adafne! A colossal failure of Ethiopian scholars andintellectuals.

In "Adafne", Prof. Mesfin replies extensively to critics of his earlier works (pp. 165-238). A good many of the criticisms are directed at him personally. Few seriously challenge to his ideas or analysis. That is understandable because few have the breadth of knowledge or forensic skills to debate him on the merits on Ethiopian history, politics and society. They also criticize him for his forthrightness and iron-willed and uncompromising presentation and defense of his views. That does not bother me because I do not believe the uncompromising, headstrong andprincipled defense of freedom and human rights is a vice. But I am enlightened by the commentaries on Prof. Mesfin's previousworks and his cogent and well-reasoned responses.

I believe in the clash of ideas and vigorous debate. I hope there will be asmuch debate on "Adafne". I have written a reflection and not a book review in this commentary.

A book review is a form of literary criticism focused on the content, style and merit of a book. I prefer to do a reflection because it allows me greater latitude of expression and provides me an opportunity to express my appreciation of Prof. Mesfin's unique knowledge, understanding and interpretation of Ethiopian history, society and politics. In "Adafne", Prof. Mesfin reflects on his own childhood. When he was a child and asked whathe wanted to do when he grew up, he would answer, "I will get educated and help my country." I thought the same thing in my childhood.

I would declare with certainty, "I will get educated in America and help mycountry." I believe that was the unquestioned credo of all young people in Ethiopia during my childhood. I returned briefly to Ethiopia in 1975 to "help". When I looked around, it did not look to me that "they" wanted help from anyone. The managers of the creeping military coup were helping themselves just fine.

I saw tanks rolling in the streets. I saw uniformed soldiers steering jeeps glued to mounted .50 cal machine guns. I saw military trucks criss- crossing the city loaded with armed soldiers. I welcomed change; but soldiers replacing a monarchy? That was like jumping from the frying paninto the fire.

I promptly high-tailed it back to the U.S. of A. and straight into graduate school. For the first time, I met Prof. Mesfin in the spring of 1975 in AddisAbaba. I doubt that he will remember it. I went to meet him at a coffee shop close to the Ministry of Education with my uncle Prof. Aleme Eshete,the late noted Ethiopian historian and human rights advocate.

He asked me what I studied and my experiences in America. He wanted toknow my observations about Ethiopia after being away so long. I don't remember exactly what I told him. Both Prof. Mesfin and Prof. Aleme became involved in vigorous human rights advocacy in the years after theT-TPLF took power.

I believe Prof. Mesfin founded the Ethiopian Human Rights Council not long after the T-TPLF took power. Prof. Aleme established the EthiopianLeague for Human Rights possibly about the same time. My memory onthat is somewhat faded.

I am proud of the scholarly, political and human rights work Prof. Mesfinand Prof. Aleme have done. A future generation that has not failed will document their contributions as scholarly heroes of Ethiopia. Truth be told, in reflecting on "Adafne", I find myself to be one of those guys Prof.Mesfin talks about with deep sadness. When I left Ethiopia in 1975, I vowed never to return. I had my personal reasons.

I had a clear and simple choice in 1975: Live free in exile or suffer underthuggish military tyranny. I chose to live free. Is choosing freedom over the tyranny of ignorant and barbaric military and bush thugs a moral crime? Salman Rushdie said, "Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."

Free speech is also what distinguishes the living from the dead and dying.Where there is no free speech, where free speech is not alive, there are only dead souls.

Prof. Mesfin stayed and continued to exercise his right to free speech. As Ilike to say, I left Ethiopia but Ethiopia did not leave me. When the late Meles Zenawi ordered the massacres of unarmed protesters in the aftermath of the 2005 elections, I had to stand up and speak up for the hundreds of dead and wounded in that massacre.

I have spoken up on behalf of those martyrs of Ethiopian democracy everysingle Monday for the last nine years. But I was always inspired by Prof.
Mesfin's writings, blog postings and speeches.

I enjoyed watching Prof. Mesfin schooling that charlatan and intellectual poseur Meles Zenawi on the finer points of Ethiopian history and politics. Idelighted watching videos of T-TPLF minions shriveling under his witheringanalysis and logic. Truth be told, I sometimes felt sorry for the T-TPLF minions who dared to challenge Prof. Mesfin in public debate.

He just crushes those ignoramuses with his prodigious recall of historical facts; he slices them with his razor sharp and lightening-fast wit; and dices them with his stunning logic. What an awesome sight! I wish I couldsay I am familiar with much of his prodigious writings and analysis over the past decades.

I am not. That is my fault, which I hope to correct in the future. But I amfamiliar with Prof. Mesfin's research and studies on the geography and borders of Ethiopia. He led or was part of numerous scientific and field studies which will prove helpful in future challenges to the T-TPLF giveaway of Ethiopian lands to the Sudan and others.

The T-TPLF today rests comfortably in the knowledge that they have cutup and given away Ethiopian land to its neighbors for their own politicalends and to fatten their bank accounts. The T-TPLF has kept all border transactions secret as I have documented in previous commentaries.
But the time will come when in this generation or the next Ethiopia's children will lawfully restore Ethiopia's land back to Ethiopia. What land wewill get back will depend on the massive data and geographic evidence accumulated by Prof. Mesfin and his colleagues over the decades.

The T-TPLF can cut and sell our land all it wants but on judgment day, wewill get back every inch of our blessed land thanks to the research and analysis Prof. Mesfin has done. Let me note in passing that the sale, transfer, and so-called lease or whatever land deals the T-TPLF has madewith Ethiopia's land, I place that at the top of the greatest of Ethiopia's failures.

I am certain in my view that the T-TPLF too shall pass for in the verse ofWilliam Cowper: "God moves in a mysterious way/ His wonders to perform;/He plans His footsteps in the sea, and rides upon the storm…"

There is a mighty gathering storm. But the T-TPLF blinded by corruption and power cannot see it coming. The T-TPLF should heed an old prophesytold in the lyrics of a song of African slaves in America: "God gave Noah the Rainbow Sign: No more water. The fire next time!" In this reflection, Iwant to honor Prof. Mesfin.

I want to honor him as a true Ethiopian patriot-scholar. Nelson Mandelasaid, "I have always regarded myself, in the first place, as an African patriot."

I regard Mesfin Woldemariam first and foremost an Ethiopian patriot- scholar. I have great admiration and gratitude for his scholarly work andcontributions over so many decades. Emerson said, "The office of the scholar is to cheer, to raise, and to guide men by showing them facts amidst appearances. He plies the slow, unhonored, and unpaid task of observation." The life of the scholar is not easy. It requires "long periodsof preparation and study."

The scholar suffers from knowledge of evil and the lack of knowledge ofwhat to do about evil.

The true scholar stands in a “state of virtual hostility in which he seems tostand to society, and especially to educated society.” The scholar is often the object of scorn and accusations.

For all this loss and scorn, what offset [for the scholar]? He is to find consolation in exercising the highest functions of human nature. He is one,who raises himself from private considerations, and breathes and lives on public and illustrious thoughts. He is the world’s eye. He is the world’s heart. He is to resist the vulgar prosperity that retrogrades ever to barbarism, by preserving and communicating heroic sentiments, noble biographies, melodious verse, and the conclusions of history.
I believe that has been the scholarly and public life of Prof. Mesfin. He hasbeen persecuted, prosecuted and subjected to scorn and accusation. Whathas been his reward? Love, appreciation, the gratitude of his compatriots.Perhaps?

I believe his true consolation has been his freedom to exercise the highestfunctions of his human nature. His freedom to speak his mind is his true consolation. He has raised himself from private considerations and breathed illustrious thoughts on the Ethiopian public for decades.

He has become “Ethiopia’s eye”, “Ethiopia’s heart.” He has been a truechampion against the “vulgar prosperity that retrogrades ever to barbarism, by preserving and communicating heroic sentiments, noble traditions and lessons of history to his people.”

He has gone down into the secrets of his own mind fearlessly and in doingso descended into the secrets of the minds of tyrants, despots, dictators, thugs, con men and criminals garbed in the robes of power. He has mastered his private thoughts and to that extent of all tyrants and thugs in power and speaks to them in the only language he knows: TRUTH.

In “Adafne”, Prof. Mesfin recounted a question he asked nearly fivedecades ago, which I will now put to him. He wrote:

In the 1950s, there was a discussion at the university. At the end of the discussion, I asked one question: ‘Kenya has Jomo Kenyatta. Tanzania has Julius Nyrere… How come Ethiopia does not have a great man?’ One smart alec sheepishly answered, ‘We have Janhoy [H.I.M. Haile Selassie].”I got up and rebutted. ‘Janhoy was great by birth. What I am asking is an Ethiopian who has become great through his work and achievements. My answer today is the same. ‘We still don’t have a great man.’

I disagree wholeheartedly! We have one great man. His name is Mesfin Woldemariam, a teacher, a professional dissenter, a truth-teller, a protester, a nonconformist, a skeptic, an objector, an agitator, an intellectual rebel, a “Man Thinking”, a “Man Writing”, a “Man Speaking”, a“Man Inspiring”, a “Man Agitating” and a “Man Dissenting”.

George Orwell wrote, “In a time of universal deceit – telling the truth is arevolutionary act.” Well, I shall give Mesfin Woldemariam one last title: Atruth-telling revolutionary! As I reflect on the somber message of “Adafne”, I am comforted by Abe Lincoln’s words, a man who overcome far too many failures. “My great concern is not whether you have failed, but whether you are content with your failure.”

I know we have failed miserably as Ethiopians. We have bad governance.We have thugs for leaders. We cannot feed our people. We have becomethe international poster country for famine. We fear truth. We fear each other. We fear ourselves. A few of us have voluntarily exiled ourselves.Far too many of us have been forced into exile. Simply stated, we are ahot mess! We have become “Adafne”.

It pains me to say that I have lost confidence in my generation and the one before mine. So, I will not speak now but will not hold my peace fortoo long. It is to the younger generation of Ethiopians and to the cominggenerations that Prof. Mesfin records three simple questions: Are you content with the failures of your parent’s generation?

Are you content with the failures of your grand-parents and great grand- parents generation? Are you content with your own failures? Such are the questions found on each page of “Adafne” in one form or another. If thereis one quintessential lesson to be learned by all Ethiopians from “Adafne”, it is a lesson long foretold by Shakespeare: “It is not in the stars to hold our destiny but in ourselves.” Mesfin Woldemariam does not have to worryabout such questions for he has lived the life of a hero, like his forefathers. He has used his pen, pencil and paper and his prodigious mind to fight not only ignorant thugs in power but also their cunning and calculating imperial masters abroad. So I dedicate to Mesfin Woldemariam, Invictus verse from William Ernest Henley:

It matters not how strait the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll,I am the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul.
Thank you “Captain” Mesfin for all you have done, tried to do and hopedto do for the one and only love of your life, ETHIOPIA.

A Tale of Two Plants in Ethiopia:

Datura stramonium L. (Astenagir; Etse Faris) and Cannabis sativa L. (Etse Faris, Hashish)By: Fekadu Fullas (RPh, PhD) October 13, 2015

A while back, there were a couple of write-ups (http://ethiomedia.com/adroit/mariwana.pdf and http://ethiomedia.com/adroit/etse_faris.pdf) on what "mariwana" and "etse faris" represent and their uses in Ethiopia. In these write-ups, some ambiguities were evident.The current review will attempt to clarify issues associated with these plants. Verdcourt and Trump (1) include Datura stramonium and Cannabis sativa in their long list of common poisonous plants of East Africa. In addition to their traditional medicinal uses invarious countries, both plants are also known for their mind-altering effects. They grow in Ethiopia, and are used for therapeutic and mind-altering purposes, as well. This articlewill shed some light on the nomenclature, uses and other important aspects of these plants, with a focus on their status in Ethiopia.

Amharic/Ge'ez nomenclature:

Although C. sativa (family: Cannabaceae) and D. stramonium (family: Solanaceae) are two different plants found in unrelated botanical families,various Amarigna/Ge'ez names have been used interchangeably to refer to them, especially in the older literature. Strelcyn mentions the Ge'ez/Amarigna names ate faris, ate fari, etse farrs, absho and abusho under the botanical names Datura stramonium, D. fastuosa and D. metel var metel Yet, without adequate botanical differentiation, he seems to draw some distinctions between them (2). Gelahun Abate uses the Ge'ez name este faris for Cannabis sativa, and goes on to mention the same name for D. stramonium (astenagir). He alludes to three types of este Faris (3). On the other hand, Amare Getahun uses the most common and well-known name hashish for C. sativa and ate faris and astenagir for D. stramonium (4). Tournerie claims that among the clergy, D. stramonium is referred to as etse Fars (plant from Persia), and that the name was later corrupted to attefaris in Amarigna. She further notes that the name astenagir may refer to a different Datura species, or to the ripeness of theseed. The name "abisho" has been applied to both C. sativa and D. stramonium. More generically, it may also refer to a multi-component concoction. The name netch abisho has been applied to the unripe D. stramonium seeds. A mention of the plant names etse Fars and etse Faris in the literature without context does not convey either C. sativa (hashish,marijuana) or D. stramonium [astenagir] (5).

D. stramonium* (astenagir)

D. stramonium is known by various English common names: Angel Tulip, Apple of Peru, Devil's trumpet, Green thorn-apple, Jamestown weed, Jimson weed, Nightshade, etc. It is a cosmopolitan weed and grows wild inmost parts of Africa. It is found commonly around village homes and on abandoned farmlands. It is an herbaceous plant that can grow up to 1 meter high, with many branches and a dense appearance. It produces fruits that enclose black, flat and kidney-shaped seeds (6). The plant is a potent intoxicant. The seedlings have been accidentally mixed with vegetables and caused catastrophic poisoning. The plant has also been used deliberately for poisoning (1). In olden times, deliberate poisoning with plants was more common. For example, Aggripina is said to have poisoned her husband, the Roman Emperor Claudius, to death with poisonous mushrooms when she learned that he was about to name a different successor to the throne rather than her son, Nero

(7). The toxic principles that make D. stramonium so dangerous are the so-called tropane alkaloids hyosciamine, hyoscine (scopolamine) and atropine. The seeds are richer in these alkaloids than the other parts of the plant. Drying the plant doesn't reduce the levels, nor eliminate the toxicity of these chemicals (1). Lethal doses lead to death from asphyxiation (lack of oxygen). The early tell-tale symptoms of poisoning are: reddening of the skin, dryness of the mouth, pronounced dilation of the pupils in the eyes and erratic increase in heart rate (8). In traditional medicine, extracts of the leaves are incorporated into remedies for cough and chest problems. The leaves and seeds are also used for inflammation to reduce pain. The seeds have been used as an insecticide, while the leaves are crushed and smoked as cigarettes, or burned to smoke which isinhaled for asthma (6). In East Africa, the juice from fruit has been used for aching ear, while the leaves have been used as poultices for rheumatism and swellings (9). Drinking tea prepared from the seeds can lead to hallucination. It is of interest to note that the constituents of D. stramonium plant have a place in modern medicine. For example, atropineis used, among other indications, to increase heart rate, to dilate the pupils of the eyes, to decrease secretions in the mouth (saliva, mucus phlegm) and for irritable bowel syndrome. Likewise, hyosciamine is used for a number of conditions, such as slow heart rate, bilary colic and other disorders of the digestive tract. Scopolamine, another constituent of D. stramonium, is used in modern medicine as a patch worn on the back of the ear to prevent post-operative nausea and vomiting. It is also used to prevent motion sickness.

D. stramonium (ate Faris; astenagir) is reported to occur in most Ethiopian regions. It is also found in Eritrea, the Sudan, Somalia and throughout tropical Africa. Also known as abisho (vide supra) in Ethiopia, astenagir (ate-faris) is blended into porridge and eaten by the debtera andchurch school students to purportedly open their mind and make them receptive. Abstinence from alcohol is recommended to avoid adverse effects. The plant is grown in gardens of many monasteries. Astenagir, as the name implies, is also used as a "truth drug" during "afersata" hearingsheld by elders to solve criminal activities (10). Although there no evidencefor its effectiveness, it is interesting to note that scopolamine (a constituent of D. stramonium) is incorporated into what is dubbed "truth serum" which is allegedly used by law enforcement agents to elicit information. (6). In Ethiopia, it is used to treat crying eyes by applying the juice of the leaves. It is also used as an ingredient to concoct multi-herb remedies used for various complaints. It is mixed with Catha edulis (chat),

C. sativa (hashish) and other ingredients and smoked to treat mental illnesses and for exorcism (11). Known by the local names mazerb (in Kunama dialect) and mezerabaie (Tigrigna), D. stramonium is used for unspecified cheek disease in northern Ethiopia. For this purpose, the driedseeds are immersed in boiling water, and the vapor directed at the affected part (12). In the Bale region, the leaves are crushed and applied to treat abscess, for extraction of thorn, and to treat infected wounds (13). Ground leaves are mixed with butter and applied to the scalp to treat infections. The vapor from boiling seed pods is inhaled for pain and toothache (4).

If seeds are accidentally mixed with barely and ingested, it can cause intoxication, dry mouth and confusion (13). In 1984, a large outbreak of food-borne toxicity among workers of the Middle Awash Agricultural Enterprise was reported. The incident was traced back to ingestion of corncontaminated with D. stramonium seeds. As a result, 688 workers showedsigns of toxicity, with 33 patients requiring hospitalization. The patients had dryness of the mucous membranes, flushed and dry skin, blurred vision, and neurological disorders. In the most severe cases, patients experienced seizures, depression and coma. (14). C. sativa* (hashish, marijuana)
The plant is known by various common names: anascaha & kif, banji, bhang, hemp, cannabis, shesha, dimba, gegga, suma, vingory, machona, bhang, sausi, charas, ganja, hashish, erar, marijuana, marihuana, pot, gaga, grass, has, mariguana, sinsemilla and weed. The name accorded to each preparation depends on which plant parts are used and how they arecombined. C. sativa is an annual leafy herb. The soft-textured leaves are lance-shaped with saw blade-like indentation. The resin mixture is found in the leaflets of the floral bracts. The plant is rank-smelling and aromatic.It can grow to a height of six feet. At the sub-species level, there are two types of cannabis. C. sativa subsp. sativa (so-called low-THC hemp) is principally used as a source of fiber and seed oil, while C. sativa subsp. indica is the intoxicant variety. The cannabis plant perhaps originated in Asia, and is now cultivated in temperate zones (15). Its use dates back to 4,000 years. Although the Chinese were reported to have recognized the sedative effects of C. sativa long time ago, its widespread use as a psychoactive herb may have started only in the past century. It has been used for a variety of medical conditions, such as for the treatment of catarrh, leprosy, fever, dandruff, hemorrhoids, obesity, asthma, urinary tract infections, loss of appetite, inflammation and cough (16). Cannabis products are the most widely trafficked drug in the world, affecting all countries (17). It has a strong potential for abuse, and hence is classified as a Schedule I substance. Marijuana refers to the crude product obtainedfrom the dried leaves and flowers of C. sativa. It is typically consumed in hand-rolled cigarettes or a water pipe, inhaled through a vaporizer, ingested in food, or applied on the skin as a balm.

The effect of inhaled marijuana is relatively fast. It provides a feeling of pleasure, affects memory, thought, concentration and sensory and time perception (18). It adversely affects the heart, lungs, brain, endocrine system and the eyes. Distortion of time, distance, and visual and auditory hallucinations have been reported with the use of marijuana (16). Although illegal in the United States under federal law, several states have legalized the use of medical marijuana. These medical uses include debilitating conditions suchas nausea and vomiting resulting from cancer chemotherapy, weight loss due to HIV infection and cancer, spasticity due to multiple sclerosis, pain syndrome and glaucoma (18).

More than 420 compounds have been reported from C. sativa (16). Delta-9-tetrahydrcannabinonol (THC) is the hallucinogenic constituent of marijuana. All in all, additional 60 cannabinoids are found in C. sativa (8).It also contains alkaloids, steroidal saponins, flavonoids and a complex mixture of volatile oil compounds (8,15,17). The concentration of THC varies from 0.1% to over 0.4%. It is higher in the bracts and flowers thanin the stems, seeds and roots (16).

Although the Flora of Ethiopia (Volume 3) mentions that Cannabis sativa grows in Ethiopia, it doesn't elaborate on the specific distribution in Ethiopia (19). There is no clear evidence when the plant was introduced into Ethiopia. It has been speculated that it was used around Lake Tana (Begemdir) as far back as the 13th-14th centuries. Two ceramic pipe bowlsexcavated in Lalibela Cave were carbon dated to 1320 A.D, give or take 80 years. Analysis of the residue in the pipes indicated the presence of cannabinoids (20). The main areas of cultivation are in Alemaya (Eastern Harerghe), Shebedino (Sidamo), in the Oromia Region and Debre Berhan.Shashemene is reported to be a major area for cannabis production and export to neighboring countries. Overall, it is claimed that Ethiopia is not a major area cannabis production and export (17). The majority of cannabisproduced is consumed locally. According to Mesfin Kassay et al (21), C. sativa is also grown in Quara and Metema (Gondar) and Garamuleta (Harar). The main trafficking routes that were identified and reported in 1999 were: 1. Shashemene-Addis Ababa, 2. Shashemene-Dessie- Alamata-Mekele-Afar-Djibuti, 3. Dire Dawa-Djibuti (via train), 4. Qara, Metema-Sudan and 5. North Gondar-Humera-Sudan-Egypt. Although there is no current data on the extent of cannabis use in Ethiopia, reports in the past had indicated an upward trend. Historically, it was limited to monasteries, where priests and deacons used it during religious education and to keep them awake during prayers. It is speculated that the Jamaican community who settled in Shashemene may have introduced it to that area. Tourists and their guides may also have played a role in spreading cannabis plant into other parts of Ethiopia. According to police records (1993-1997), 545 of the 553 (98.6%) illicit drug arrests were related to cannabis use or trafficking. This relatively high number of caseshas been attributed to the fact that cannabis grows locally, and that it canbe bought at low price. According to a small survey of 47 health workers in Addis Ababa, 61.7 % of the respondents listed cannabis as a problem as compared to 10.6% for cocaine and 6.4% for opium.

C. sativa is used in Ethiopia as an intelligence booster. It is also a component of multi-herb preparations used to treat various illnesses (11).It is also used to treat epilepsy and other mental conditions (19). High and potentially toxic levels of lead and cadmium have been reported from C. sativa samples collected from Butajera, Mekelle, Metema andShashemene (17).

Conclusions

A nomenclatural confusion exists in the literature on the Ethiopian vernacular names for D. stramonium and C. sativa. Using the names astenagir for D. stramonium and hashish or etse fars for C. sativa consistently in future literature may avoid the confusion. In Ethiopian folkmedicine, both plants are used for medicinal and recreational purposes.

Consumers of these plants for medicinal/health purposes should notify their healthcare provider of such use. However, the use of both plants asrecreational herbs should be discouraged, due to the toxic, addictive andother adverse health effects as demonstrated in this review. (Text ends)

Document from the Ethiopian government's Intelligence Unit (document acquired by HRLHA) lists some 131 Oromo Nationals astargets, including Mr. Dabassa Guyo, who's listed at the #1 target)

PRESS RELEASE (October 27, 2015)

The Human Rights League of the Horn of Africa (HRLHA) would like to express its appreciation to the people of Kenya and to its government for their hospitality and kindness towards thousands of Oromo and other refugees and asylum-seekers who have fled their homes to escape government persecutions in Ethiopia, and who are now residing in different parts of the Republic of Kenya, including in the capital city, Nairobi. From the early 1990's, when the TPLF government came to power, to the present, hundreds of thousands of Oromo and other nationals have run away from arbitrary violent detentions, degrading tortures and killings in Ethiopia to save their lives by seeking refuge in theRepublic of Kenya and other neighboring countries.

However, the Human Rights League of the Horn of Africa (HRLHA) expresses its deep concern regarding the safety of all Oromo national refugees and asylum-seekers presently residing in the Republic of Kenya because of the document it recently received from its informants. The document was written by the Ethiopian government agency, the so-called"Anti-Terrorist Unit," and sent to the government of the Republic of Kenya. It addresses the bi-lateral agreement signed by both countries in 2012.

In this communiqué [see attachment herein], the Ethiopian government's"Anti-Terrorist Unit" reminds the government of the Republic of Kenya of the bi-lateral agreement made between the two countries in 2012, an agreement that expresses issues of common interest, such as terrorism, on which both countries should find a common solution. The communiquédiscloses the names of 131 Oromo Nationals, and their addresses and telephone numbers in Nairobi and in different township areas; the agencyclaimed the source of its information was the Ethiopian intelligence unit. In the names listed among the 131 Oromo Nationals in this communiqué is Mr. Dabassa Guyo, an Oromo cultural legend who recently disappeared in Nairobi. His name was at the top of the list (#1).

The full list of Oromo refugees and asylum-seekers in Kenya identified astargets by the Ethiopian government (document acquired by HRLHA):

Mr. Dabassa Guyo Safarro, age 80, a resident of Mololongo, Kenya, formore than thirty-five years disappeared on September 27, 2015, in Nairobi. The HRLHA is highly suspicious that the disappearance ofMr.
Dabassa Guyo Safarro is connected with the campaign of Ethiopian authorities labelling Oromo refugees in Nairobi as terrorists. HRLHA alsosuspects that Mr. Dabassa Guyo Safarro is being held in Nairobi, or might have been deported to Ethiopia. In either case, the Kenyan authorities have an international legal obligation to not hand over Ethiopian refugees and asylum-seekers residing in their territory to theEthiopian government, and need to disclose the whereabouts of Mr. Dabassa Guyo Safarro to his family and the public – and give the reasonfor his arrest.

In case Mr. Dabassa Guyo Safarrohas been handed over to Ethiopia, it should be noted that the Ethiopian government has a well-documented record of gross and flagrant violations of human rights, including the torturing of its own citizens who were involuntarily returned to the country. The government of Ethiopia routinely imprisons such persons andsentences them to life in prison, and often imposes the death penalty.
There have been credible reports of physical and psychological abuses committed against individuals in Ethiopian official prisons and other unofficial or secret detention centers. Under Article 33 (1) of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees (189 U.N.T.S. 150), to which Kenya is a party, "[n]o contracting state shall expel or forcibly return a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his … politicalopinion." This obligation, which is also a principle of customary international law, applies to both asylum-seekers and refugees, as affirmed by UNHCR's Executive Committee and the United Nations GeneralAssembly. By deporting refugees, the government of the Republic of Kenya will be breaching its obligations under international treaties as well as customary law.

1. Under the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (1465 U.N.T.S. 185), to which Kenyaagreed in 1997, Kenya has an obligation not to return a person to a place where they face torture or ill-treatment. Article 3 of the Convention Against Torture provides: No state party shall expel, return ("refouler") orextradite a person to another state where there are substantial grounds tobelieve that they would be in danger of being subjected to torture.

2. For the purpose of determining whether there are such grounds, the competent authorities shall take into account all relevant considerationsincluding, where applicable, the existence in the state concerned of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights.We strongly urge the government of Kenya to respect the international treaties and obligations it has signed and ratified.

Therefore, HRLHA would like to draw the attention of Western governments, the UN Human Rights Council, the EU Human Rights Commission, the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights as well as other regional and international human rights organizations andNGOs to these worrisome safety situations of Oromo refugees in the Republic of Kenya and take all necessary actions against:

- The Ethiopian government to refrain from labeling its citizensas*terrorists* who are resisting its dictatorial administration;

- The government of the Republic of Kenya should not collaborate with the Ethiopian dictatorial government to criminalize the Oromo and otherrefugees and asylum-seekers currently living in its territory.

Background Information:

The Kenyan government is well known for handing over refugees to the Ethiopian government by violating the above mentioned international obligations. It is very disheartening to recall that Engineer Tesfahun Chemeda, who was tortured to death on August 24, 2013, in Ethiopia's grand jail of Kaliti, was handed over to the Ethiopian government's security agents in 2007 by the Kenyan government. Tesfahun Chemeda was arrested by the Kenyan anti-terrorist forces, along with his close friendMesfin Abebe, in 2007 in Nairobi, Kenya, where both had lived asrefugees since 2005. Both were later deported to Ethiopia. The Ethiopiangovernment detained them in an underground jail in a military camp for over one year, during which time they were subjected to severe torture and other types of inhuman treatments until when they were taken to court and charged with terrorism offenses in December 2008. They were eventually sentenced to life imprisonment in March 2010. (Mesfin's deathsentence was later commuted.)

The Human Rights League of the Horn ofAfrica (HRLHA) is highly concerned for the safety and security of Mr.
Dabassa Guyo Safarro, who disappeared in Nairobi on September 27, 2015, whose name along with the above listed refugees was also labeled by the Ethiopian government as terrorists and those who are still living inKenya. It urges the government of Kenya to respect international treatiesand obligations, and to not cooperate with the Ethiopian unfounded allegations and disclose the whereabouts of Mr. Dabassa Guyo Safarro.The Kenyan government should also reject the unfounded allegations of Ethiopian government against Oromo national refugees and asylum- seekers residing in Kenya.

HRLHA requests the governments of the Western countries as well as international organizations to interfere in this matter so that the whereabouts of Mr. Dabassa Guyo are disclosed, and the safety and security of the refugees of those currently staying in Kenya are ensured.

RECOMMENDED ACTION:

1. Please send appeals to the President, the Kenyan Parliament, and theMinistry of Justice of the Republic of Kenya and its concerned officials asswiftly as possible, in English, or your own language;

2. Urge the authorities of Kenya to ensure that Mr. Dabassa Guyo Safarro is treated in accordance with regional and international standardson the treatment of prisoners;
3. Urge the authorities in Kenya to completely reject the unfounded allegations of the Ethiopian dictatorial government about Oromo refugeesliving in Kenya.

BREAKING NEWS: Document from Ethiopian Govt Lists Oromo Wisdom-Keeper Dabassa Guyo as #1 Target; List Contains Some 131 Oromo Nationals in Kenya as TargetsIncluding Oromo Artists

Italian Embassy In The Ethiopian Capital Continues to Double as Home of Former Derg Officials Even 24 Years After The Overthrowof Mengistu Regime.

News Report-Twenty-four years after the Derg regime was removed from the helm of the Ethiopian government, two top members of the Communist junta continue to hide in the Italian embassy in Addis Ababa –where they fled to at the height of the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front's (EPRDF) accent to power in 1991.

Italy has repeatedly refused to give up the men to the Ethiopian government citing human rights concerns and the possibility that they would be sentenced to death. Recently, an official at the Italian consulate reiterated the country's stance to VICE News, explaining that "This obligation [not to release the men because they could face the death penalty] is enshrined in our [Italian] legal system."

Originally, four Derg officials – the former acting prime minister, Hailu Yimenu; the former vice president, Tesfaye Gebre Kidan; former foreign minister, Berhanu Bayeh; and former chief of general staff, Addis Tedla –sought refuge at the Italian consulate as EPRDF fighters took over Addis Ababa on May 27, 1991.

However, two of them have since died. A few days after the men soughtrefuge in the Italian embassy, Yimenu reportedly committed suicide. OnJune 2004, Kidan was reportedly killed during a fight with Bayeh.
According to a BBC report, he died after being hit on the head with a bottle. Many critics have questioned the deaths of the two men and havedemanded more explanation from Italy.

In 2008, Birhanu Bayeh and Addis Tedla were sentenced to death by the Supreme Court. Three years later, the death sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. The condition of both men is unclear as the Italian consul has not granted the media any access to them since they went intohiding. Reports indicate that they are allowed family visits.

The fate of Bayeh and Tedla hangs in the balance without any solution insight. Their stay in the Italian embassy has been described as "self- imprisonment." Should they leave the Italian consulate, they could be arrested by Ethiopian authorities. Italy has admittedly never thought thatthey would have to host the men for so long. The situation has been described as a "diplomatic embarrassment." (Text ends)

The FM within the headquarters of the Voice of AmericaBy Alemayehu G Mariam November 9, 2015

What good could possibly (even conceptually) come out of a secret, nighttime weekend meeting between the top representatives of the “fourth worst censor of press freedom in the world” (and second worst in Africa) and any VOA reporters or employees at VOA headquarters?

Did the specific VoA AS and other reporters and staffers violate any federal laws and VoA’s professional and ethical standards by meeting insecret, under cover of darkness on a weekend with Adhanom and Birru?

Details of the Secret Night Meeting between Adhanom, Birru andselected VoA Amharic Service and other reporters and staff

The shocking and disturbing details of the secret 2-hour weekend night meeting between Adhanom, Birru and selected VoA AS and other reporters and staff was divulged by the young Ethiopian investigative journalists and human rights activist Abebe Gellaw on October 26, 2015.

According to Abebe’s investigative report:

On September 26, 2015, FM Tedros Adhanom and Girma Birru, the Ethiopian ambassador in the US managed “to sneak into the headquartersof the VoA located at 330 Independence Avenue, Washington D.C., undercover of darkness for an “unauthorized editorial meeting with some staff members.”

The secret meeting took place “in the editorial meeting room of the Hornof Africa section” and lasted two hours.

The meeting with Adhanom and Birru was reportedly “organized and facilitated by VoA Amharic broadcaster Solomon Abate, along with BetreSiltan from the Tigrigna service" and "a group of seven VOA staff members–including two technicians."

The purpose of the secret Saturday night meeting was "said to be dictatedby the need to build trust and cooperation between VOA journalists and [Adhanom's] regime".

During the meeting, Adhanom and Birru "exerted undue influence to alter the tone and content of VoA broadcasts to Ethiopia by making pleasand veiled threats."

Adhanom ordered that no "recording of the intimate discussion" be made.

Adhanom complained to the VoA reporters and staff "off the record that giving platform to critical voices and dissidents including Arbegnoch Ginbot 7 could be tantamount to destabilizing the government. He [also]criticized VoA for focusing on 'negative' stories."

Adhanom lectured the attending VoA AS and other reporters and staff present that they should "focus on promoting positive progress rather than airing 'negative' stories and views." Adhanom "hinted that the Ethiopian government constantly receives information about VoA's internalactivities." Adhanom admonished the VoA reporters and staff "to re- examine themselves and do soul searching."

Adhanom and Birru informed the VoA reporters and staff that they are prepared to "facilitate any support and assistance the [VoA] journalists may need to bring out positive stories and images" about the T-TPLF regime and its activities. Adhanom "invited the journalists to go [to Ethiopia] and see the reality for themselves." Adhanom and Birru told "the VoA employees that the doors of the Ethiopian Embassy were wideopen to them.

The VOA and I

I do not believe there are too many individuals who have fiercely andunapologetically defended the VoA against T-TPLF harassment, intimidation, defamation and interference over the past decade than myself.

I have written numerous commentaries defending the VoA from direct andindirect harassment, intimidation and interference by the late super- thugtator Meles Zenawi.

On July 4, 2015, I wrote a commentary defending a VoA AS reporter whowas attacked by certain individuals in a protest group of Ethiopians opposed to President Obama's visit to Ethiopia.

I castigated those individuals who threatened and harassed the VoA ASreporter for their ignorance of press freedom in America and for their criminal acts in interfering with that reporter's work.

I declared that no one has the right to interfere or unduly influence the journalistic work of VoA reporters regardless of one's perception of theirimpartiality, integrity or professionalism.

I urged Ethiopian Americans opposed to the T-TPLF regime to use established processes within the VoA to seek relief for any unfair or biasedreporting by reporters in the Amharic Service.

What is good for the goose is good for the gander.

If Adhanom and Birru have issues with VoA Amharic Service reports or reporters, they should channel their complaints through the appropriateoffices in the U.S. State Department.

They have absolutely no right to invade VoA headquarters on a weekendnight, meet secretly with selected VoA reporters and staff and dictate terms and conditions of reporting on their regime!

Let me make it perfectly clear: I have absolutely no problems if Adhanomand Birru went to VoA headquarters for a studio interview.

They have every right to speak to VoA reporters and express their views.

I wholeheartedly agree with Prof. Noam Chomsky observation that "If wedon't believe in freedom of expression for people we despise, we don't believe in it at all."

When it comes to free expression, I will just as soon defend the right of those I despise as I would those whose views and expressions I cherish. Imake no compromises when it comes to free expression.

My philosophy on free expression is very simple: Let the best idea win!

I demonstrated my commitment to this principle when I defended MelesZenawi's right to speak his mind without interference or interruption at Columbia University in September 2010.

Some people could not believe how I can justify defending the right of freeexpression of a man who had muzzled 90 million people.

If Adhanom and Birru want to go to the VoA headquarters for an interviewor official discussion, more power to them.

My problem is secret meetings, night meetings, meetings with selectedVoA reporters and employees, unrecorded meeting, unauthorized meetings, meetings without records, minutes or journals and meetings that end with secret handshakes, nods and winks.

I believe in the theory of the press as a watchdog, not a lap dog.

When I use the metaphor of the "watchdog" for the press, I mean a hounddog press that sniffs out and exposes government misconduct, corruption,scandal and abuse and misuse of power.

As a matter of fact, the VoA guarantees audiences "have the right to expect that [VoA] journalists will monitor power and give voice to the voiceless: The press should use its watchdog power to uncover things that are important and new and that change community thinking." (Italicsadded.)

I don't believe press watch (guard) dogs have any business lying in bed orsecretly meeting in the boardroom with press wolves.

Indeed, that is precisely what the VoA's "Audiences' Bill of JournalismRights" instructs under section 4.

VoA "journalists' first loyalty is to audiences" and audiences "shouldexpect journalists to maintain independence from those they cover."

The job of VoA journalists is to uncover those they cover, not liecomfortably under the bed cover with those they cover.

I believe it is a violation of federal law and VoA professional standards forAdhanom and Birru and the selected VoA AS and other reporters and staff to conduct secret official or unofficial business at VoA headquarters.

I see no difference between the harassment and physical manhandling ofthe VoA AS reporter by a few misguided protesters in July 2015 and the secret night meeting of Adhanom and Birru with VoA employees where Adhanom and Birru read selected VoA AS reporters and staff the riot act about their reporting on the T-TPLF regime.

What Adhanom and Birru did in the headquarters of the VOA and what themob did to the VoA reporter outside the White House in July are quintessentially thuggish acts intended to intimidate and force the VoAAS to broadcast views that are favorably to their side of the issues.

I take great pride in my fierce defense of the VOA over the years.
I defended the VoA not because they have a bias in favor of the opponents of the T-TPLF regime. I did not defend the VOA because theyare biased against the T-TPLF.

I defended the VoA every single time it came under attack because I believe the majority of VoA Amharic Service reporters and journalists dotheir jobs professionally and with integrity.

Truth be told, there are far too many reports on VoA Amharic Service thatI do not agree with.

I understand that the VoA AS reporters do not function according to myhighly partisan norms.

I have never criticized VoA AS for doing their jobs consistent with theirown professional standards.

Even though I am a highly partisan advocate and an uncompromising defender of my own cause, I respect journalists who do their jobs withintegrity.

The VoA Journalists' Code demands that VoA reporters "adhere to thehighest standards of journalistic professionalism and integrity" and "enhance the credibility and effectiveness of the Voice of America."

I have never criticized VoA AS reporters for doing their jobs according totheir own "Journalists' Code" of ethics and professionalism.

But I have defended the VoA AS when others criticized and harassed themfor performing their journalism according to their their own "Code".

That is precisely what I did in July 2011 when the VoA AS faced the wrathof the late Meles Zenawi, leader of the T-TPLF.

When Meles openly and contemptuously attempted to pressure the VoABoard of Governors to muzzle his critics on VoA AS broadcasts, I rose to defend the VoA.

I defended the VoA AS in 2010 when Meles Zenawi compared VoA to the infamous Radio Mille Collines of Rwanda, which incited the tragic genocidethat devastated the nation. Meles outrageously claimed,

We have been convinced for many years that in many respects, the VOAAmharic Service has copied the worst practices of radio stations such as Radio Mille Collines of Rwanda in its wanton disregard of minimum ethicsof journalism and engaging in destabilizing propaganda."

Meles promptly ordered the jamming of VoA broadcasts to Ethiopia.
I fiercely defended the VoA AS in September 2010 when Meles Zenawi justified his jamming of VOA broadcasts "by taking a page from U.S. policy." Meles said,

Now, I don't know if you know this but VoA [Voice of America] is not allowed to broadcast to the U.S. by law. It is not allowed to broadcast to the U.S. by law. It is allowed to broadcast to other countries, but not to the U.S. because it is supposed to reflect the policy of the government in power of the day. Now, VoA Amharic service happens to be dominated by people associated with the previous regime who tend to have a particularly jaundiced view of events in Ethiopia for understandable reasons. We took a page from the policy of the United States and said VoAis not welcome to Ethiopia either. (Italics added.)

VoA Response to the Abebe Gellaw's investigative report

The VoA has refused to respond to the facts alleged in Abebe Gellaw's report despite repeated requests. Abebe's investigative report raises somegrave issues of administrative and criminal nature. A proper response to Abebe's report by the VoA management is obligatory.

Investigative reporter Abebe stated that "despite repeated phone calls andfollow-up emails", the VoA has refused to respond to his requests for answers and clarifications concerning the Adhanom/Birru secret weekend night time meeting at VoA headquarters. The VoA cannot dismiss Abebe's report without comment.

Legality of the Adhanom/Birru secret night meeting with selectedVoA AS reporters

Did Adhanom and Birru violate federal law by secretly meeting at night with VoA reporters and staffers on September 26, 2015? Did the selectedVoA reporters and staffers violate federal law and the VoA "Code" by secretly meeting with Adhanom/Birru on a weekend night at VoA headquarters?

Specifically, did the secret night meeting held by VoA reporters and staffers with Adhanom and Birru violate 22 U.S.C. 6202 (c)? Did the secret night meeting held by VoA reporters and staffers with Adhanom and Birru violate VoA's Journalist Standards & Practices (11-023 and 11-024)?

Did the secret night meeting held by VoA reporters and staffers with Adhanom and Birru violate the "Standards of Ethical Conduct for Employees of the Executive Branch, Subpart E (Codified in 5 C.F.R. Part 2635 As amended at 76 FR 38547 (July 1, 2011)) and other federal laws?

VoA Charter and governing law

The operation and activities of the VoA are strictly governed by Public Law94-350, section 206 (codified at 22 USC 6202). 22 U.S.C. 6202

(c) identifies 10 guiding principles and directs: ... VoA reporters and broadcasters must strive for accuracy and objectivity in all their work. They do not speak for the U.S. government. They accept no treatment or assistance from U.S. government officials or agencies that is more favorable or less favorable than that granted to staff of private-sector news agencies. Furthermore, VoA professionals, careful to preserve the integrity of their organization, strive for excellence and avoid imbalance orbias in their broadcasts.

The Voice of America pursues its mission today in a world conflict-ridden and unstable in the post Cold War era. Broadcasting accurate, balanced and complete information to the people of the world, and particularly to those who are denied access to accurate news, serves the national interest and is a powerful source of inspiration and hope for all those whobelieve in freedom and democracy. The Standards of Ethical Conduct for Employees of the Executive Branch, Subpart E (Codified in 5 C.F.R. Part 2635 as amended at 76 FR 38547 (July 1, 2011)) provides specific rules for federal employees on the impartial performance of their duties. It also provides a basis for raising issues on "any matter in which a [federal] employee's impartiality is likelyto be questioned."

VoA's Journalistic Standards and Practices "The Journalistic Code"

The VoA Journalists Code imposes a variety of obligations on VoAreporters and employees.

The Code states:VoA is alert to, and rejects efforts by special interest groups – foreign or domestic – to use its broadcasts as a platform for theirown views. This applies to all programs and program segments, including opinion or press roundups, programs discussing letters, listener comments, or call-in shows…… VoA journalists and all those preparing news and feature programming avoid any action or statement that might convey the appearance of partisanship…… In addition to these journalistic standards and principles, VoA employees recognize that their conduct bothon and off the job can reflect on the work of the Voice of America community. They adhere to the highest standards of journalistic professionalism and integrity. They work to foster teamwork, goodwill andcivil discourse in the workplace and with their colleagues everywhere in the world, all to enhance the credibility and effectiveness of the Voice of America. (Italics added.)

The Foreign Missions Act (22 U.S.C. 4301-4316) regulates the activities offoreign missions in the United States "in a manner that will protect the foreign policy and national security interests of the United States." Did Adhanom and Birru violate any of the federal laws by conducting unauthorized secret night meeting with selected employees of the VoA?
Did the selected reporters and employees of the VoA violate any federal laws and VoA's "Code" by secretly meeting and discussing yet undisclosedmatters at night with Adhanom and Birru?

The 1978 Inspector General Act (OIG), the 1980 Foreign Service Act, andthe 1998 Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act charge the OIG with oversight responsibility for the Department of State and the Broadcasting Board of Governors.

22 U.SC. sec. 3929(b) authorizes the Inspector General of the Departmentof State and the Foreign Service to exercise jurisdiction over VoA's Broadcasting Board of Governors and the International Broadcasting Bureau and conduct "systematic review and evaluation of the administration of activities and operations of Foreign Service posts and bureaus and other operating units of the Department of State."

The Office of Investigations of the State Department's OIG office "conducts investigations of criminal, civil, and administrative misconduct related to Department and BBG programs and operations by investigatingspecific allegations, reports, or other information indicating possible violations of law or regulation." Is the Adhanom/Birru secret meeting within the purview of the State Department's OIG investigation?

Asleep at the switch at the VoA?

The VoA broadcasts in nearly four dozen languages. Since its establishment in 1942, the VoA has been criticized at home and abroad for doing or not doing something. The VoA has been vociferously criticized as an American propaganda tool by totalitarian regimes throughout its seven-decade history. The VoA and its reporters continue to be the targetsof unending threats and intimidation by African dictators and thugtators, including the T-TPLF.

Criticism of VoA reporting is nothing new to the VoA. What is new, ABSOLUTELY NEW AND UNPRECEDENTED, is the fact that African dictatorsand thugtators have mustered the audacity, gumption and contempt to invade the hallowed halls of the VoA and conduct meetings with VOA employees and dictate terms and conditions with absolute impunity.

What next?

Will African dictators and thugtators payoff VoA reporters and employeesat secret night meetings to report or not to report on an issue favored ordisfavored by African dictators and thugtators?

Is it that if you can't beat the VoA, identify selected VoA reporters and employees, have them "invite" you to come to VoA headquarters and usethe opportunity to dictate terms and conditions? Or is it, if you can't beatVoA reporters and employees from Addis, come and brow beat them in Washington, D.C. at their own headquarters?"

What Adhanom and Birru have done in meeting with selected VOA AS reporters and staffers at VoA headquarters on a weekend night in secret sets a very, very bad precedent. What the selected VoA AS reporters andstaffers did in meeting with Adhanom and Birru at VoA headquarters on aweekend night in secret sets a very, very bad precedent.

Federal law requires strict independence of VoA not only from influences by foreign governments but also the U.S. Government itself. That was the"principal reason cited by the Congress for preventing the [VoA] Board and its broadcasting entities from being merged into the State Department [and] provide a "firewall" between the State Department andthe BBG journalists to ensure the integrity of the journalism."

How did Adhanom and Birru manage to breach the the VoA "firewall" longestablished by Congress so flagrantly on September 26, 2015 when they secretly entered VoA headquarters under cover of night on the weekend and conducted an off- the record 2-hour meeting?

Unless Adhanom, Birru and the other VoA reporters and journalists are held accountable in this case, the floodgates may soon open for all typesof African dictators and thugtators to come to VoA headquarters in Washington, D.C. and intimidate VoA reporters and employees into submission.

That must NEVER, NEVER be allowed!

I am deeply offended by the secret meeting between Adhanom/Birru and the particular VoA AS and other reporters and employees. The very idea ofa secret meeting between VoA reporters and the highest representatives of a regime declared the “fourth worst censor press freedom in the world” makes me sick to the stomach.

Such a meeting makes a mockery of the very principles and ideas of pressfreedom enshrined in the law establishing the VoA over seven decades ago. I am not ashamed to say I care very much about the Voice of America. It is an organizations that is imperfect with a lot of flaws.

I disagree with some of the VoA AS’s programming priorities. For example, I believe VoA’s audience in Ethiopia would rather hear news, information and analysis about things happening in Ethiopia than sports events in America in the one-hour or so broadcast everyday.

But the law requires that the VoA provide adequate information on the diversity of cultural and other events in America. The VoA AS actually does a great job reporting on the diversity of U.S. culture and society toits Ethiopian audience.

I also believe the VoA AS does a good job of reporting and providing a diversity of news, opinions and analysis to their Ethiopian audience. I will continue to ferociously defend the VoA against intimidation, harassmentand corruption of the VoA by dictators and thugs wherever they may befor the same reasons I have defended the VoA over the past several years.

I do not want my readers to be outraged by the Adhanom/Birru affair andcondemn the Voice of America. That would be an unjustified overreaction.I believe in fair play even when dealing with my opponents.

I cannot imagine any valid reason why Adhanom and Birru would meet insecret, on a weekend, under cover of darkness for 2 hours off the record with a selected group of VoA reporters and staffers. Perhaps there is a reason that is incomprehensible to my highly partisan mind? If so, I wouldlike to know.

As I write this piece, I am of the absolute conviction that barbarians of press freedom, where ever they are, must forever be banished from eversetting foot in the headquarters of Voice of America, America’s “shrine tofree press to the rest of the world”, under cover of darkness, on a weekend, in secret and with help to cover up their finger- and footprints that they have ever been there.

Local Press:What’s up to Ethiopian Parliament?

Are the questions the Ethiopian Parliament Members ask provided tothem? So what is the point? And what would do you like to call them? They all are from EPRDF, the same talk, the same action. While theothers creating and separating eachother for the last 25 years. One thing is true for sure they talk similar and they will continue to be similar for sure.

ETHIOMEDIA VIEWS: EPRDF televises meeting on goodgovernance critics say it's yet another show

By Engidu Woldie November 13, 2015

The ruling Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Front, (EPRDF) has recently televised a high level meeting that deliberated on a study conducted on good governance in the country. Government experts who conducted thestudy say their findings show corruption and bad governance were the hallmark of the government at various sectors and levels of the bureaucracy.
