Ahram Online published a translated version of the "Declaration of Principles" signed by Egypt, Sudan and Ethiopia on Nile water sharing arrangements among Nile Basin countries. Ten principles are outlined inthe document signed by the three countries.

Introduction Valuing the increasing need of the Arab Republic of Egypt, the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia and the Republic of the Sudanfor their over-border water sources, and realizing the importance of the Nile River as a source of life and a vital source for the development of the people of Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan, the three countries have committed themselves to the following principles concerning the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam:

1. Principle of cooperation:

- Cooperation based on mutual understanding, common interest, goodintentions, benefits for all, and the principles of international law.
- Cooperation in understanding the water needs of upstream anddownstream countries across all their lands.

2. Principle of development, regional integration and sustainability:

- The purpose of the Renaissance Dam is to generate power, contribute toeconomic development, promote cooperation beyond borders, and regional integration throughgenerating clean sustainable energy that can be relied on.

3. Principle of not causing significant damage:

- The three countries will take all the necessary procedures to avoidcausing significant damage while using the Blue Nile (the Nile's main river).
- In spite of that, in case significant damage is caused to one of thesecountries, the country causing the damage [], in the absence of an agreement over that [damaging]action, [is to take] all the necessary procedures to alleviate this damage, and discuss compensationwhenever convenient.

4. Principle of fair and appropriate use:

- The three countries will use their common water sources in theirprovinces in a fair and appropriate manner.

- To ensure fair and appropriate use, the three countries will take intoconsideration all guiding elements mentioned below:

a. The geographic, the geographic aquatic, the aquatic, the climatical,environmental elements, and the rest of all natural elements.

b. Social and economic needs for the concerned Nile Basin countries.

c. The residents who depend on water sources in each of the Nile Basincountries.

d. The effects of using or the uses of water sources in one of the NileBasin countries on another Nile Basin country.

e. The current and possible uses of water sources.

f. Elements of preserving, protecting, [and] developing [water sources]and the economics of water sources, and the cost of the procedures taken in this regard.

g. The extent of the availability of alternatives with a comparable value fora planned or a specific use.

h. The extent of contribution from each of the Nile Basin countries in theNile River system.

i. The extent of the percentage of the Nile Basin's space within theterritories of each Nile Basin country.

4. The principle of the dam's storage reservoir first filling, and damoperation policies:

- To apply the recommendations of the international technical expertscommittee and the results of the final report of the Tripartite National Technical Committee duringdifferent stages of the dam project.
- The three countries should cooperate to use the final findings in thestudies recommended by the Tripartite National Technical Committee and international technicalexperts in order to reach:

a. An agreement on the guidelines for different scenarios of the first fillingof the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam reservoir in parallel with the construction of the dam.

b. An agreement on the guidelines and annual operation policies of theRenaissance Dam, which the owners can adjust from time to time.

c. To inform downstream countries, Egypt and Sudan, on any urgentcircumstances that would call for a change in the operations of the dam, in order to ensure coordinationwith downstream countries' water reservoirs.

- Accordingly the three countries are to establish a proper mechanismthrough their ministries o water and irrigation.

- The timeframe for such points mentioned above is 15 months from thestart of preparing two studies about the dam by the international technical committee.

6. The principle of building trust:

- Downstream countries will be given priority to purchase energygenerated by the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam.

7. The principle of exchange of information and data:

- Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan will provide the information and data requiredto conduct the studies of the national experts committees from the three countries in the propertime.

8. The principle of dam security:

- The three countries appreciate all efforts made by Ethiopia up until nowto implement the recommendations of the international experts committee regarding thesafety of the dam.
- Ethiopia will continue in good will to implement all recommendationsrelated to the dam's security in the reports of the international technical experts.

9. The principle of the sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of theState:

The three countries cooperate on the basis of equal sovereignty, unity andterritorial integrity of the state, mutual benefit and good will, in order to reach the better use and protection of the River Nile.

10. The principle of the peaceful settlement of disputes:

The three countries commit to settle any dispute resulting from the interpretation or application of the declaration of principles through talks or negotiations based on the good will principle. If the parties involved donot succeed in solving the dispute through talks or negotiations, they canask for mediation or refer the matter to their heads of states or prime ministers. (Text ends)

Egypt wants to Diverting the Congo River to the Nile river course'

World News Politics (March 25, 2014) During the ongoing crisis between Egypt and Ethiopia over the construction of the Grand Renaissance Dam,which threatens catastrophe for Egypt as we have discussed in previous articles in Al-Ahram Weekly, some have aired the idea of connecting the Congo River with the Nile. This, they say, will feed our river with 110 billion cubic metres of water a year through a canal and/or tunnel linkingone or more branches of the Congo with the White Nile or with one of itstributaries in South Sudan. From there, of course, these billions of cubic metres of water would head northward, join up with the waters coming from the Atbara and Blue Nile and continue northwards into Egypt.

As its advocates summarise the idea, it would require the construction ofdams or sluices on the Congo at a location some 600 kilometres from theWhite Nile. There the water level would have to be raised, by means of pumps, by a huge 250-300 metres in order to counter the opposing territorial incline. Then the water would be propelled towards South Sudanand the White Nile. Then, at some point in South Sudan, the water level would be raised again so as to channel it into a “new Nile”, some 2,500 kilometres long, to conduct the water through Sudan and on into Egypt’s Western or Eastern desert. Clearly a project of such a scale and complexity needs to be studied very closely by the relevant experts who will need to be extremely precise in their calculations and to take into consideration a range of other technical and non-technical factors.

In fact, the idea of an artificial Nile is not new. Colonel Muammar Al- Gaddafi had once proposed it beneath the banner of African development and the redistribution of the continent’s water resources among African Union members in the vicinity. He charged a team of experts with the taskof undertaking the necessary studies, but the idea was soon dismissed because of its infeasibility due to the technical, political and environmentalcomplications involved.

The group that is currently advocating the same idea also does so in the name of African development that, according to them, begins with a project to divert the Congo into the Nile. Such a project, they argue, will free Egypt forever from the spectre of water deficit, which has come to loom more perilously than ever in view of the Ethiopian hydraulic projects,particularly the Renaissance Dam. It is worth noting, here, that the head of this group is a businessman with projects in the Democratic Republic ofthe Congo (DRC) and a former irrigation engineer and geologist in the Egyptian Mineral Resources Authority.

More significantly, it is important to bear in mind that no written technical,scientific or feasibility studies for such a mega-project currently exist. Theonly material that is available and that has been submitted to some government authorities was compiled from photos taken off the Internet and that have no geotechnical or architectural value. When authorities at the Egyptian Mineral Resources Authority were asked whether they had studies for such a project, they responded that they did not, contrary to the claims of the advocating group. The same applied to the Faculty of Engineering at Cairo University. The faculty’s irrigation and drainage department said that they had never undertaken a scientific study for that project. Moreover, they also said that the group advocating the Congo River diversion project had asked them only for a design for a model village and for a design road parallel to the “new Nile” should the project be carried out. The latter request was curious since, as any engineer will tell you, roads cannot be designed on the basis of satellite imagery. Field surveys and measurements have to be conducted on the ground.

Apparently the group also asked for a study on the amount of energy thatwould be required to raise the water level to the necessary height.

According to the calculations of an advisory organisation, more than sevengigawatts would be needed, which is to say the equivalent to the amount of power that would be generated by the Renaissance Dam.

As for the concept of a 2,500 kilometre long new Nile stretching through Sudan and into Egypt, it is obvious that its proponents had little interest inthe topographical and geotechnical properties of the ground through which such an artificial river course would pass, let alone the environmentalimpact.

So, before indulging in this pipe dream further, let us consider thefollowing hard facts:

- Due to the relatively steep geological incline of the DRC, the flow of theCongo is very rapid. At a rate of up to 40,000 cubic metres a second, it is one of the fastest and mostturbulent rivers in the world, making it very difficult to control. Moreover, this does not even begin totake into consideration other geotechnical considerations such as the nature of the bedrock, rifts andfissures, and the like.
- Some 400,000 square kilometres of dense jungle surrounds the CongoRiver, adding yet another obstacle, on top of the geographical incline, to the choice of the site forconstructing a dam or series of sluices near the borders of South Sudan.
- The area identified for the proposed canal leading from the Congo to theWhite Nile consists of a range of steep mountains. With peaks up to 2,750 and 5,170 metres, thesemountains are formed of hard granite rock.
- The envisioned dam (or dams) will be larger than the Renaissance Dam(with a 74 billion cubic metre reservoir capacity) and even more technologically complicated to build.
- According to the group's figures, the reservoir behind the dam wouldhold 110 billion cubic metres of water. It remains a mystery how they came up with this figure, asalluring as it is, given that it is exactly twice as much as Egypt's current water quota from the Nile and morethan 1.5 times the amount of water to be retained behind in the Renaissance Dam.
- Designing the open canal or tunnels or pipelines, or whatever means areconceived to transport such enormous quantities of water, is in itself a herculean task.
- Southern Sudan, where the water from the Congo would be initiallydestined, is primarily marshland. What precautions, if any, have been envisioned to prevent that area frombeing submerged beneath the water that would be flooding in from the Congo?
- The branch of the White Nile, with which the Congo is meant to beconnected, does not have a large capacity. It cannot hold more than 12 billion cubic metres a year. The artificial river that would stretch 2,000 kilometres through South

Sudan and Sudan and then another 500 kilometres in Egypt would have tobe a multinational endeavour and as it would pass through rugged terrain and both inhabited and uninhabited areas the obstacles facing it would be virtually insurmountable. If we have not yet been able to resume work on the comparatively modest Jonglei canal project, imagine the fate of a mega-project such as the “new Nile” meant to carry twice the amount ofwater as the old Nile.

Proponents of that project have billed it being able to transport 110 billioncubic metres a year, generate 18 gigawatts of electricity and to reclaim 80million acres of land all at the cost of LE8 billion. They say, moreover, thatit could be completed in the space of 24 months or, if we add the additional six mentioned by a senior official, 30 months. Such “projections” only underscore how unscientific the proposal is.

The huge media fanfare surrounding this project is unwarranted and incomprehensible. But what is more suspicious are the claims voiced by members of the group promoting this project, that it has already obtainedthe approval of government authorities in spite of all the objections on thepart of specialists in geology and hydraulic engineering, experts in feasibility and technical studies, legal experts, especially those informed on matters regarding international river courses, and political analysts who are aware of the nature of the relations between the countries of the Congo and Nile River basins and of the fact that the DRC already is engaged in hydraulic projects with South Africa that will generate 40 gigawatts of power. All these people agree that geologically, architecturally, politically, mechanically and economically the project is totally unrealistic. If it were at all feasible, why would we object so strongly to the Renaissance Dam?

Analyst Says Ethiopia’s Dam Won’t Hurt Egypt’

Editor Business, Mining & Construction, Strategies & Solutions VENTURES AFRICA (March 28, 2014) – A water expert from the AUC

University in Cairo has confirmed that Ethiopia’s hydroelectric dam will nothurt Egypt’s share of the Nile waters. According to the Egypt-based water resource management specialist Richard Tutwiler, the Ethiopian dam will never stop the flow of water downstream to Egypt.

“It is unlikely that Ethiopia will severely choke or stop the flow of water. Ethiopia needs the electricity…and hydroelectric dams don’t work unless you let the water through” said Mr. Tutwiler. The Sudanese government has also supported the Ethiopian dam because “the dam would have minimal impact on its (sudan’s) water allotment…and the mega-project’sother benefits became clear. ”

Water experts have confirmed that the dam is expected to improve floodcontrol, expand downstream irrigation capacity and, crucially, allow Ethiopia to export surplus electricity to power-hungry Sudan via a cross-border link. Some studies indicate that properly managed hydroelectric dams in Ethiopia could mitigate damaging floods and increase Egypt’s overall water share. Storing water in the cooler climes of Ethiopia would ensure far less water is lost to evaporation than in the desert behind theAswan High Dam in Egypt.

Despite these assurances from the international community and water experts, some Egyptian warmongers and politicians have unnecessarily threatened Ethiopia and other upstream African countries. Some Egyptian generals have been seen undercover in southern Somalia and the Ogaden, arming rebels and agitating more anti-Ethiopia sentiment among the public. Analysts say that Egyptian military leaders want to distract the pro-democracy movement in Egypt from domestic problems by divertingtheir attention to a nonexistent external threat.

Some Egyptian politicians also claimed that Egypt deserves to eternally keep over 90 percent of the Nile even though it contributes less than 1 percent to the Nile. They cite outdated colonial agreements from 1959 signed between Egypt and Britain, which excluded eight out of ten Nile African countries. The Mubarek Cairo regime also took advantage of the civil war in Ethiopia to sign vague agreements in 1993. However, for thefirst time in history, the majority of Nile basin African countries signed in2010 the binding international treaty, the Cooperative Framework Agreement (CFA), for the fair and equitable utilization of the Nile River among all countries.

Egypt ignored the 11 years of negotiations that led toward the CFA treaty,which was adopted by all other Nile African countries. Despite threats from Egypt, Ethiopian government has continued the dam construction.

Analysts say that Ethiopia's growing population need to utilize the Nile river since it can not depend on erratic rains to produce energy or to feedits people who have already suffered numerous famines over the last fewdecades.

NILE: GERD an issue of no compromise – Egypt Foreign Ministry' News Release by State Information Service of Egypt (March 29, 2014)The issue of the Ethiopian Grand Renaissance Dam is linked to Egypt'swater security which is an integral part of Egypt's national security, Foreign Ministry Spokesman Badr Abdel Atti said in a press conference on Thursday. He asserted that the Ethiopian dam is an issue that cannot be compromised, waived or ignored at all. All Egyptian institutions are working at both regional and international levels to explain the truth aboutthe issue and warn against the drastic effects that will result from the establishment of the project, Abdel Atti added.

Turning to US and Western countries' condemnation to a death sentence for 529 members of the Muslim Brotherhood in Minya, Abdel Atti said it isnot acceptable from any internal or external entity to comment or interfere in decisions by Egypt's judiciary. In the meantime, Abdel Atti underlined the importance of implementing the Arab Summit's decisions especially the one on activating an Arab agreement on combating terrorism.

He said that the ministry would work on convening a joint meeting of Arabforeign and justice ministers as soon as possible to expedite the implementation of the Arab anti-terror agreement. Turning to the crisis with Qatar, Abdel Atti said that Egypt's Foreign Minister Nabil Fahmy was honest when he asserted that there is a deep wound and that Qatar's problem is not only with Egypt but with most of the Arab countries. As for the Egyptian-Sudanese relations regarding the Ethiopian dam, the spokesman said that there is a common agreement that the dam should not harm the interests of any party, highlighting the 1959 agreement between Egypt and Sudan in this regard.

March 31, 2014: Ethiopian GERD National Panel of Experts (NPoE) SternlyReplies to IRN'

In a statement entitled, "A Proxy Campaign against Ethiopia?", the "GERD national panel of experts" ("GERD experts") decries against the International Rivers Network (IRN). Apparently based on a "leaked" International Panel of Experts (IPoE) report, full of lies and distortions, entitled "GERD Panel of Experts Report: Big Questions Remain." Here is anextensive quote from that piece: according to GERD National Panel of Experts (NPoE) "The mega dam is being built on the Blue Nile in Ethiopia, near the Sudan border, and has created conflict with Egypt over its downstream impacts: the experts' study confirms Egypt's concerns that the project's impacts could be significant and are not well understood. Egypt has called for mediation if further studies are not allowed: at this writing, Ethiopia had refused, and was continuing with dam construction. It is also clear that there is precious little oversight on Africa's largest damproject to date. While the international panel has brought a type of oversight, it may be too little, too late – and with too little teeth: it seemsthe panel does not have a continuing role in ensuring best practices as construction proceeds. The panel's report is almost a year old at this writing, yet its members have been mostly silent since their report was completed (as far as we know, none of the panelists have made public statements about the project). The Egyptian and Ethiopian governments continue the war of words, while at the same time construction on the mega dam proceeds, and questions raised by the panel remain unanswered. Going forward, International Rivers recommends construction on the project be halted until all necessary studies recommended by the panel are completed, and a process is in place for ensuring public accountability on the project. Given the panel's findings, Egypt's call for mediation in the process is reasonable, and donor governments and international bodies should support such a process"

Editor's note: International Rivers Network (IRN), is an organization that has been leading the global struggle to protect rivers and the rights of indigenous communities that depend on them for nearly three decades.

International Rivers, headquartered in Berkeley, CA., is committed to promoting sustainable use of waters and rivers throughout the world. The organization has done extraordinary work in Africa, Asia and Latin Americato "prevent destructive dam development, promote effective flood management practices, reform the policies and practices of international financial institutions, and advocate water and energy solutions that are sensitive to human rights and environmental sustainability."

Ethiopia calls on Egypt to refrain from campaigning against GERD' (WIC) Addis Ababa, (April 1, 2014) Updates - The Ministry of ForeignAffairs of Ethiopia has called on Egypt to refrain from its ongoing campaign against the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD). Ministry Spokesperson Ambassador Dina Mufti told local journalists here today thatEgyptian officials should abandon the campaign against such a helpful dam not only for Ethiopia but also for the whole region. The dam will regulate the flow of the water and ensure a steady flow throughout the year, preventing the occurrence of floods downstream in Sudan or Egypt. However, Egyptian authorities are engaged in an extensive campaign against the construction of the dam. “Egypt’s campaign against the dam has no ground and it is an unhelpful approach,” he said. “Egypt has no other option except dialogue and negotiation to provide a win-win solutionover the dam,” Ambassador Dina told journalists. The Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam is under-construction in the Benishangul-Gumuz Regional State on the Blue Nile River in Ethiopia about 40 km east of the border with Sudan.

Work on the dam was proceeding on schedule and it is now 32 percent complete. At 6,000 MW, the dam will be the largest hydroelectric power plant in Africa when completed. The 3rd year anniversary of the commencement of the dam’s construction will be celebrated tomorrow in the presence of government officials. “The anniversary is a sign of Ethiopia’s success in the diplomatic sector,” Ambassador Dina said. The dam is the symbol of freedom and self-confidence for Ethiopians, he said.Ethiopians at home and abroad have been contributing their share to realize the dam, according to Ambassador Dina.

Anadolu Press ADDIS ABABA (April 2, 2014) - Alemayehu Tegenu, Ethiopian minister of water, irrigation and energy, has stated his country'sreadiness to open talks with Egypt over Ethiopia's multibillion-dollar hydroelectric dam project, which Cairo fears will threaten its traditional share of Nile water.

Alemayehu Tegenu, Ethiopian minister of water, irrigation and energy, hasstated his country's readiness to open talks with Egypt over Ethiopia's multibillion-dollar hydroelectric dam project, which Cairo fears will threaten its traditional share of Nile water. Speaking at a ceremony held to mark the passage of three years since construction on the mega-dam began, Tegenu said his government had "exerted utmost efforts to build trust among all riparian countries." "But Egypt has continued to engage innegative campaigning against the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam," Tegenu said.

He also criticized Egyptian demands to include additional international representatives on a panel of experts tasked with studying the dam's potential impact on downstream states. The committee currently containstwo members each from Ethiopia, Sudan and Egypt, along with four others representing the international community. Egypt, Tegenu said, was"determined to delay the tripartite engagement by withdrawing from the Ethiopia, Sudan and Egypt forum." He added: "We urge Egypt to re-join the engagement and work for the benefits of our countries."

Deputy Prime Minister Demeke Mekonnen, also speaking at the ceremony,said the expert panel's findings had confirmed that the dam's constructionmet international standards of efficiency and safety. Mekonnen added thatSudan had publicly declared its support for the dam, going on to describe the project as a "correction" of previous unjust water-sharing agreements."The rule of the game of unjust utilization of the waters of the Nile is over," he said. The dam, Mekonnen said, "symbolizes Ethiopia's determination and ability to get back to its ancient civilization and glory."The ceremony, held at the construction site 980km northwest of Addis Ababa and carried live on local television and radio, was attended by officials, diplomats, religious leaders and public figures.

Ethiopia is building the $6.4-billion dam on the Blue Nile, which representsEgypt's primary source of water. When finalized in 2017, it will have a 6000-megawatt production capacity, according to government sources.

Over 30 percent of construction work on the dam has already been completed, officials say. The project has raised alarm bells in Egypt, theArab world's most populous country, which fears a reduction of its historical share of Nile water.

Water distribution among Nile basin states has long been regulated by a colonial-era treaty giving Egypt and Sudan the lion's share of river water. Citing its need for development, Ethiopia says it must build a series of dams to generate electricity, both for local consumption and export. AddisAbaba insists the new dam will benefit downstream states Sudan and Egypt, both of which will be invited to purchase the electricity thus generated.

Egypt’s Potential Presidential Candidate Threatens to Use Force AgainstEthiopia’s Dam’

SUDAN TRIBUNE (April 9, 2014) An Egyptian potential presidential candidate hopeful announced today that he will order the use of military force against Ethiopia if the latter does not suspend the construction of the Grand Renaissance dam. In announcing his presidential bid at a press conference on Sunday, lawyer Mortada Mansour said that “water for Egyptis Egypt’s life”. “There are signed international conventions… .There are two agreements, one in 1929 and the other in 1959 to regulate water usage between Egypt and Sudan,” Mansour added.

The controversial figure, who was elected last week as head of Cairo’s Zamalek Club, accused Israel of standing behind the Ethiopian dam project and dismissed popular initiatives to resolve the dispute with AddisAbaba. “There are international organizations that failed [to mediate] andEthiopia stuck to its position. Just like they threatened to use their army, Egypt has an army. If Israel which is inciting Ethiopia learned a lesson from the Egyptian army in 1973 [war], you are threatening my life. I will not allow you to build your dam and block water from me and in the end famine occurs among the Egyptian people and we kill each other for a drop of water,” Mansour said.

“Just like they showed off and brought their generals around the dam and said if Egypt can come. No we also have generals and planes O’ Ethiopia that can reclaim Egypt’s rights because we will not allow a drop of water to be cut, to have drought in the country, in agriculture, people can’t find a drop of water. This is vital for us. I thought that for subsequent Egyptianadministrations that the issue of water is a life or death issue. This is not up for discussion” he added. Egypt fears that the $4.6 billion hydropower plant will diminish its share of the river’s water flows, arguing its historic water rights must be maintained.

Ethiopia is the source of about 85% of the Nile's water, mainly through rainfall in its highlands, with over 90% of Egyptians relying on water fromthe Nile's flows. In June 2012, a panel of international experts tasked withstudying the impacts of the Ethiopian dam on lower riparian countries, including Sudan and Egypt, found that the dam project will not cause significant harm to either country. Cairo remains unconvinced and has sought further studies and consultation with Khartoum and Addis Ababa.

If Mansour's candidacy is endorsed by the presidential commission he willface the former Egyptian defense minister Field Marshal Abdel-Fatah El- Sisi who is widely seen as almost certain to win. The leftist political figure Hamdeen Sabahi has also pledged to compete in the elections. Mansour has made a failed bid to run for president in the 2012 elections but was disqualified by the elections committee. According to a profile by the DailyNews Egypt, Mansour said in 2011 that he did not "have the right to run" for president because he is "ill-tempered".

In April 2011, Mansour was accused of being involved in Tahrir clashes commonly dubbed "the Battle of the Camel" on 2 February, which left 11 demonstrators dead and hundreds injured. He was later acquitted of all charges however. He ran in four parliamentary elections in 1990, 1995, 2000 and 2012, but only won in the 2000 elections. In 2012, he lost to anopponent from the Muslim Brotherhood. He is well known for his hot temper and was taken off air in TV phone interviews a number of times forusing obscene language. Mansour is also seen as someone who is obsessed with filing numerous police complaints and lawsuits against figures he has disputes with. Meantime, recently an Egyptian ex-Military general offers Ethiopia, solve the GERD dispute. The retired ex-Egyptian Military general offers Ethiopia three solutions to solve the Nile Dam dispute with Egypt based on his personal views. According to Egyptian Media News, the retired ex-Egyptian military officer talks with the current Egyptian coup d'état language: totally non sense.

European expert accuse Egypt of Hiding Report on Ethiopia Dam'

SIWI (April 17, 2014) - An Europe-based water institute official blamed Egypt for keeping an international report on Ethiopia's mega dam classified. Dr. Ana Cascao of the Stockholm International Water Institute (SIWI) said Cairo might have kept the final report of the Tripartite International Panel of Experts on Ethiopia's $4 billion dam a secret in order to "divert attention from political revolutions" in Egypt and to portray a national security crisis. The Tripartite International Panel of Experts included four Egyptian and Sudanese experts as well as four international experts. The committee addressed various concerns from allsides, and organized meetings and visits to the dam site before it submitted one final report with full consensus, signed by all members of the Panel.

The final report concluded that the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) satisfied all international design criteria and safety standards. Thereport also said the dam has no impact on water flow downstream towardEgypt. According to Dr. Cascao, various studies show that the GERD has benefits particularly for Sudan, as well as Egypt. She added that the Ethiopian dam “makes more water available for farm & irrigation in sudan,it reduces the problem of evaporation in Egyptian dams and it solves sediment and flood issues” that have reportedly cost millions for Sudan and Egypt.

Dr. Cascao is an author and the top independent expert on Nile Hydropolitics and Transboundary water resource management, on which subjects she did her PhD and researched on for half a decade. Dr. Cascao claimed she was not surprised that Sudan is supporting Ethiopia, but “Egypt has to start reviewing its historical position.” The London-based Guardian newspaper also said “the greatest long-term concern for Egypt”might be Sudan’s intentions of increasing irrigation projects after the Ethiopian dam becomes operational. Dr. Cascao added that considering the dam’s numerous benefits for Sudan and Egypt, the two countries should actually “pay Ethiopia for the construction and maintenance of thedam.”

However, Egyptian government and its state media are propagating the message “we are under threat” and keeping positive facts about the Dam“a secret from the people of Egypt.” According to her, both Ethiopian andEgyptian governments are using the mega Dam as a diversion tool from domestic political issues and as a tactic to unify their divided people against perceived external threat.

NILE - Egypt to ‘escalate’ Ethiopian dam dispute’

Aljazeera (April 21, 2014) In the three years since construction began on the 1.8km Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam across the Blue Nile River, Egypt and Ethiopia have been engaged in a war of words over its potentialimpacts. Ethiopia believes the massive dam will herald an era of prosperity, spurring growth and attracting foreign currency with the export of power to neighbouring countries. But Egypt has raised concerns about the downstream effects, as the Blue Nile supplies the Nile with about 85 percent of its water.

Both sides say they seek a negotiated solution, but they remain at loggerheads, with negotiations stalled. Ethiopia insists the dispute must beresolved through negotiations between the two parties, with Mahamoud Dirir, the ambassador to Egypt, noting in a statement last month that "there are only two… countries in the entire world which are well-placed tomediate between Egypt and Ethiopia." Egypt, meanwhile, is quietly lobbying the international community for support against what it says is a violation of international law, diplomatic sources confirmed to Al Jazeera. "Egypt plans to take actions to escalate the situation against Ethiopia," said a western diplomat in Cairo, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "But the exact implications of these actions [are] still unclear." Egypt's main concern is water security, as the country faces a future of increasing scarcity. Nearly all of Egypt's water comes from the Nile, and its population of 83 million is growing at nearly two percent annually.

Already, water shortages cause problems. The most common response isthe reuse of wastewater in agriculture, often untreated. The 2005 UNDP Human Development Report for Egypt stated that "poor water quality affects both health and land productivity with damage costs estimated tohave reached LE 5.35 billion [$7.7m] or 1.8 percent of GDP."

Doaa Ezzat Zaki al-Agha, a water management specialist conducting research in the Nile delta, said five members of her family died from liver disease, which she believes resulted from poor drinking water. "They haveno other choices, only the Nile water," she said. Mohamed Abdel Wahab, afarmer from a small village of 300 families near the delta city of Alexandria, an area that regularly experiences water shortages, believes the government should be "more strict with Egypt's sovereign right to water" – and his view reflects that of many Egyptians. Any threat to the country's water supply is treated as an existential threat. Accordingly, Egypt has long opposed upstream development projects on the Nile. In the past this prevented Ethiopia from receiving money from international organisations like the World Bank, which has a "no objection" rule for projects it funds. Now, Ethiopia is funding the $4.8bn project itself.

Tensions peaked in May 2013 when Ethiopia began diverting the Blue Nile.Former Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi told a national conference: "We will defend each drop of Nile water with our blood if necessary." Today, statements from the Egyptian Foreign Ministry are more conciliatory, with spokesperson Badr Abdelatty saying he hoped the situation could be resolved through "cooperation". A recent statement by Abdelatty on the State Information Service website, however, adds: "The Ethiopian dam is an issue that can bear no compromises."

The last negotiations in Addis Ababa in February stalled over whether international experts should be included in a technical committee being formed to implement the recommendations of a May 2013 report on the dam. Written by an international panel of experts (IPOE), the report proposed more extensive assessment of the dam's potential transboundary environmental and social impacts. "We must have an international member on the committee and the Ethiopians refused this," said Khaled Wasif, a spokesperson for the Egyptian Ministry of Irrigation and Water Resources. As construction of the dam progresses – it is already 30 percent complete – Ethiopia has less incentive to negotiate andEgypt has less leverage. With negotiations at an impasse, Egypt is petitioning other countries for support, sources say. By referring to supposed breaches of international law, Egypt hopes to pressure donor communities who have investments in or influence on Ethiopia, according to the western diplomat in Cairo.

Foreign Minister Nabil Fahmy has toured Africa and Europe in recent months and Nile water has been on the agenda. During a trip to Italy at the start of February, Fahmy asked the Italian company contracted to build the dam to halt construction. A Foreign Ministry letter to the Salini Construttori company, obtained by Al Jazeera, states: "The government ofEgypt calls upon the EU Commission, and the esteemed European governments, to give due consideration to the accountability of business enterprise of European nationality for their conduct in supporting Ethiopia's projects affecting the Nile river downstream states." It continues: "Egypt also calls upon the government of Italy, to invite Salini construttori to suspend construction works at the GERDP [Grand EthiopianRenaissance Dam Project] until the recommendations of the IPOE Report are implemented."

The Egyptian Foreign Ministry, the EU delegation in Cairo and the Italianembassy in Cairo declined to comment on the note. A spokesman for theItalian embassy said: "On this aspect we don't feel like replying on their behalf [of the Egyptian foreign ministry]. If they don't want to talk aboutit, it is fine for us as well." According to the diplomat in Cairo, Egypt hasalso lobbied the US, China, Saudi Arabia, the UAE and Japan, as well as international organisations such as the World Bank. Spokespeople for allof these governments and organisations declined to comment, with the exception of the Japanese embassy in Cairo, which denied being approached by Egypt on the issue.

Until recently, Egypt has relied on a "historic right" and colonial-era treaties to defend its water share. "This position is absolutely untenable," said Owen McIntyre, a professor of international water law at University College Cork, noting the colonial-era agreements "completely ignore upperriparian states".

Today, Egypt's position has evolved, with the governmentquoting "widely respected" principles of international law. "International watercourses are governed by a set of agreed legal rules and principles," Abdelatty said. "Among these widely respected rules and principles is that of the equitable and reasonable utilisation of the river, the ‘no harm' rule, and the prior notification rule."

However, Egypt's interpretation differs from that of its neighbour and much of the international community, McIntyre said, noting the principle isgenerally formulated in terms of "significant harm". The May 2013 IPOE report concluded that despite more studies being needed, long-term effects of the dam were unlikely to harm Egypt. In the short term, however, less water will reach Egypt as the reservoir fills. While Ethiopia says it is open to negotiating the period over which it fills the reservoir, Egypt insists it will be harmed regardless. A country's dependence on water is the primary factor by which harm is evaluated, McIntyre said, andEgypt insists it is a water-scarce country. "The problem is that when you look at Egypt's use of Nile water, it is actually rather wasteful," McIntyre said. The harm principle is just one factor to be considered alongside the obligation on states to cooperate in the reasonable and equitable utilisation of transboundary watercourses, he added. Egypt's history of cooperation is not strong. The Nile Basin Initiative, a partnership of Nile riparian states formed in 1999 and supported by the World Bank, aimed tocreate a cooperative framework agreement for the management of Nile water. But Egypt refused to sign any agreement that did not guarantee itscurrent share of Nile water.

In addition, Egypt previously objected to the very principles it now advocates. It did not support the UN Watercourses Convention 1997, which codified the principles of transboundary water management. "Egyptcannot get help through international water law as Egypt herself did not acknowledge these principles historically," said Muhammad Mizanur Rahaman, a professor of international water law at Asia Pacific University in Bangladesh. By acting unilaterally, "Ethiopia is now, ironically, followingthe same path as Egypt did before" when it constructed the Aswan High Dam in the 1960s, Rahaman noted. "Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan should allagree on the principles which they agree on before trying to take refuge or shelter from the principles of international water law."

NILE POLITICS: The Sudanese Position on Grand Ethiopian RenaissanceDam, Stop and Check'

For sure, the "Ethio-Sudanese relations" is a model for African and the third world countries but sometimes we need to stop and check: we need to look here and there to make sure that all odds have been brushed aside. One of the odd and weird statements that I have read in Sudanese media was said by Dr. Ahmed Almofti in an interview with Al-Intibaha Arabic daily, in which he said: Addis Ababa has some hidden purpose for setting up Renaissance Dam. In the interview, he also criticized the Ethiopian Ambassador Ato. Abadi Zemo in a way which is completely not representing Sudan and Sudanese people, it was really embarrassing for me to hear such false accusations against a person who is highly respected in Sudan not because he holds the title of Ambassador but because he is one of the best friends and brothers of Sudan and Sudanesepeople. Moreover, Abadi Zemo is one of the historical heroes of the liberation battles against Derg bloody regime in Ethiopia: Abadi is an icon of one of the greatest African revolutions.

According to Al-Intibaha, Ahmed Al-Mufti claimed that "The Ethiopian Ambassador also exercises strategic deception because he has no evidence to prove what he says. The Ethiopian Ambassador also fabricateslies About the Renaissance Dam". Really, I think that Dr. Al-Mufti must apologize and must make correction to his position. The Sudanese positionon the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam - GERD is very clear, actually it is based on scientific studies and the orientation of African regional cooperation.I have the honor to participate in "AU Zero Hunger Summit" in Addis Ababa in July 2013, and I made an interview with the Sudanese Agriculture and Irrigation Minister at that time, Dr. Abdelhalim Almutaafie. He said that Sudan supports the construction of the GERD: he also said that it is better to build dams in Ethiopia than in the Sudan or Egypt because of topographical reasons. "The level of evaporation in Sudan is higher than in Ethiopia for dam water reservoirs in Sudan and Egypt wouldbe exposed to higher temperature from the environment and the sun as they would be in flat lands while in Ethiopia reservoirs are built in deep gorges".

Most of Sudanese experts and academicians publicized their opinions which were typical for the official position. I can remember the first big gathering on this issue in a symposium titled "Impact of GERD on Sudan sand Egypt that was organized by the International University of Africa incollaboration with the Ethiopian Embassy in Khartoum. The Sudanese experts called for a tripartite supervision of the construction of the Dam and sharing the costs by the three states. From that time the tripartite dam technical committee established by Sudan, Ethiopia and Egypt started its work in a very positive atmosphere but now the disputes started to appear again. What we need, is to involve in more negotiationsbetween the three neighbors and to stop exchanging accusations becausefalse accusations will damage the atmosphere of the negotiations. (Text ends)

Professors Minga Negash, Seid Hassan and Mammo Muchie (April 29,2014)

The 1929 Nile water allocation agreement that was signed by Egypt and the United Kingdom (which excluded Ethiopia and nearly all other upper basin countries) allocated 48 billion (65%) cubic meters of water per year to Egypt and 4 billion to the Sudan. The 1959 agreement between Egypt and the Sudan raised the share to 55.5 (75%) billion and 18.5 billion cubic meters to Egypt and the Sudan, respectively. This agreement also excluded all the other upper Nile riparian nations. Egypt wants to keep thecolonial-era agreements and the 1959 accord. This unfairallocation of the Nile water enabled Egypt to construct the Aswan Dam and the two countries never cared to consult the upper riparian nations. As argued by Badr Abdelatty, a spokesman for Egypt's Foreign Ministry, Egypt wants to keep the status quo because it needs all the "assigned 55 billion cubic meters a year for vital use such as drinking, washing and sanitation needs" by 2020. This clearly indicates Egypt's desire to secure its own Nilewater-related benefits intact while at the same time denying other (Sub- Saharan) Nile riparian countries from using their own waters for alleviating poverty and enhancing sustainable development. Contrary to the Nile Basin Initiative (NBI) that was formalized in 1999.

That Egypt was a party to, it is now saying that any change to the colonialera agreement would be tantamount to affecting its strategic interests andrepeatedly threatens to use all means available if Ethiopia continues to build the Great Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD). Egypt continues to escalate the confrontation despite Ethiopia's claim that the dam would have no appreciable negative impact on Egypt. Ethiopia, along with the other upper Nile riparian countries object the privileges that Egypt gave itself and consider Egyptian monopoly over the Nile waters as a violation of their sovereignty. In accordance to the 2010 Entebbe Agreement by theupstream countries, which included Ethiopia, Kenya, Uganda, Rwanda andTanzania, and now effectively Sudan and South Sudan), Ethiopia, therefore, insists on adhering to its plan and is forging ahead on constructing the dam. In what follows, we use an amalgam of economics, history, law, security and environment factors to examine the Egyptian opposition to the construction of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD). We try to triangulate these factors hoping to contribute to the debate and gain insight into the current tension between Egypt and Ethiopia. We attempt to make a dispassionate analysis of the water sharing problem between upstream and downstream countries. Consistentwith theory and real life cases, we surmise that water has been and continues to be the cause for conflict in a number of regions in the world. And, unfortunately, water wars tend to be irrational, unsustainable and economically and socially destructive. Trans-boundary water sharing and pollution (environmental-ecological) problems are never resolved throughhegemonies, militarism and ultra-nationalism. Dissenting voices against mega projects such as GERD are not new.

The criticisms ranging from cost and scheduling overruns (as a recent study by Ansar, Flyvbjerg, Budzier and Lunn of Oxford University shows , to their impacts on population dislocation, corruption, transparency in awarding of contracts, the manner in which such projects are financed, social and environmental impacts in upstream and downstream countries and water security concerns. Hence, Ethiopians may legitimately ask questions and raise concerns about the manner in which the Government of Ethiopia is handling the project. In this article, however, we focus on transboundary environmental problems, the fair use of the Nile water andaddress Egyptian concerns. This is important because the construction of GERD has reignited the long standing explosive issue of the equitable useof Nile waters. We also believe the recent (counterproductive) Egyptian threats of war and various forms of diplomatic offensives require the attentions of scholars of substance and policy makers. Egyptian worries and aspirations over the Nile River system however is historical and goes back to the days before the formation of the Egyptian nation/state even though the issue began to dominate the country's political landscape withthe generation of militarism and ultra-nationalism (from Gamal Abdel Nasser to the late President Sadat's 1979 threat of war and to the currentleaders of Egypt vowing not to lose a "drop of water)." The recent politicalinstability in Egypt must have made the trans-boundary water sharing problem a point of political opportunism. Reports indicate that Egypt may indeed be laying the ground work to "destroy the dam before Ethiopia starts filling it with water or risk flooding Sudan's flat eastern territories upon its destruction."

A WikiLeaks report is also known to have revealed that Egypt, in collaboration with Sudan, had plans "to build an airstrip for bombing a dam in the Blue Nile River Gorge in Ethiopia." In its June 2013 analysis of Egypt's military options, Straighter, a global intelligence organization indicated that the country does have military options against Ethiopia's dam, but noted that distance will heavily constrain Egypt's ability to demolish the work. The options, however, may include air attack from bases in the Sudan, Djibouti and Eritrea. And/or sponsoring present day local "militants" to frustrate the construction of the dam. Obviously, Ethiopia is aware of the Egyptian options and its age-old aspiration to control the sources of the Nile River system. For example, on April 17, 2014, amid reports that Egypt was trying to woo South Sudan towards itsdispute over Nile waters

The Voice of America reported that the President of South Sudan assured the Ethiopian authorities that the recently signed military and economic cooperation between Egypt and South Sudan would not allow Egypt to attack Ethiopia or allow subversive activities. Egypt's policy towards upstream countries is primarily driven by its interest on the water which aims at thriving at the misery of downstream countries, apparently without any form of substantive reciprocity. In contrast to the present day relationship between Egypt and Ethiopia, their ancestors, despite their limited knowledge of geography and hydrology, had a better understanding of the economics of water sharing. As the renowned historian Richard Pankhurst documented, the Turkish Sultan who ruled Egypt before the British, had "paid the ruler of Ethiopia an annual tax of50,000 gold coins" lest the latter diverts the Nile.

Nowadays, and not surprisingly, even the Egyptian Minister of Antiquities is against the GERD. In fact, institutional memories and abundant documents of the last sixty years indicate not only just the inconsistency, but also an immense level of damage that Egyptian foreign policy has done to Ethiopia and the Sudan. Egyptian interference in the two countries' internal affairs has been largely driven by the Ethiopian and theSudanese Use of the Nile waters. For instance, Egypt objected the independence movement in South Sudan but promoted the separation of Eritrea and the creation of one of the most densely populated landlocked countries in the world. The international community is not unaware of these facts but Egypt's strategic location and its pivotal role in the politics of the Middle East did not allow the powers to be to call a spade a spade. As of late, intergovernmental organizations like the African Union which were once mute about the behaviors of successive military rulers of Egypt,who often controlled political and economic power under the cover of phony elections and revolutions, have started to recognize the problems of the Nile River system. Ethiopia's and the other upstream riparian countries' rights to equitably share the waters of Nile is now an African agenda though key members of the Arab League continue to support the position taken by Egypt.

Ethiopia's right to use the water that originates within itself would have included (and, in our view, should include), in addition to power- generating purposes, irrigation, water recreation and navigational services, flood control as well as water storage and supply. It is obvious, therefore, that dams provide valuable economic benefits. Just like any mega project, dams also involve several side-effects, which could be summarized as environmental and ecological, social (forced relocation of locals), economic and even political. Other concerns may include evaluating and managing the risks associated with dam construction as well as asking questions whether the product (GERD in our case) would provide the desired and needed benefits to stakeholders such as access toelectricity. A reasonable framework of concern about dam construction, therefore, would include a thorough benefit-cost analysis, not just one- sided focus on the costs. This is our major concern in regards to environmentalists and some of their Ethiopian supporters who campaign against the 6000 MW dam. The environmentalists refer to the GERD as a "white elephant,"

Despite the fact that the project's leaked document, alleged to be prepared by International Panel of Experts (IPE) showing favorable financial and social benefits to Ethiopia and the Sudan. Environmentalistssuch as the International Rivers Network (IRN) need to, therefore, quantify the magnitude of the side effects of the project and should not rely on “covert” and “secondary” data. More importantly, rather than being the butterflies of potential conflict in the Eastern Nile region, they need to: (i)acknowledge. Ethiopia’s sovereign rights to use its own resources in accordance with the international law and without hurting downstream countries: (ii) identify mitigation strategies so that genuine concerns are addressed before the construction is finalized: and (iii) propose how the mitigation strategies are going to be financed. In April 2014, the California based environmental pressure group which is againstany form of large dam that is proposed to be built in Africa and Asia leaked the 48 pages long confidential document that was prepared by International Panel of Experts (IPoE) on Ethiopian Grand Renaissance Dam. Now that the confidential report is in the public domain, it allows everyone to put to test the concerns of both the friends and foes of the GERD.

II

The key features of the IPoE’s report could be summarized as follows: (i)unlike the options of smaller dams which would have included potential irrigation projects, GERD is an energy production project and any fear of large and permanent reduction in theflow of freshwater to downstream countries is unfounded: (ii) the filling up of the dam is planned, to be done in stages by taking into account rainfall patterns and the catchment area: (iii) both the financial and social cost-benefit preliminary analysis of the project on upstream and downstream countriesare favorable and the expected damages on downstream countries are notinsurmountable: (iv) the preliminary findings about the project’s side effects on Egypt is not sufficient and hence there is an information (hydrological) void, and much of the current allegations and threats are based on unfounded Egyptian fears: (v) work has progressed to the extent that, at the time of writing this article, the project has reached a degree of completion rate of 31% and the water diversion has been successfully carried out: (vi) the expected loss of water due to evaporation for the new project is not worse than what Egypt is currentlylosing from its environmentally unfriendly projects and poor water management: 18 (vii) recent geological and hydrological studies have documented an abundant level of ground water in the Nile basin countries19 and hence downstream countries will not be thirsty if upstream countries build dams that generate electricity. It is clear, therefore, that Egypt’s no dam policy or stance against large energy producing dams in upstream countries is a misplaced opposition and therefore calls for a new thinking in Cairo.

As Professor Aaron Wolf of Oregon State University observes, there are about 261 transboundary rivers across the world and unless carefully handled a significant proportion of these rivers could be causes of conflict.Wolf documented that water has been the cause of political tensions between a number of countries, including but not limited to Arabs and Israelis: Indians and Bangladeshis: Americans and Mexicans, the Chinese and other downstream countries, Brazilians and Paraguayans and all the ten riparian states of the Nile River system. He observes that “war over water seems neither strategically rational, nor hydrographically effective nor economically viable.” 20 In other words, there is little reason for a “water war” between Egypt and Ethiopia. The two countries can also learn from inter-basin development projects that are successful, such as the Colorado River Basin allocation between the US riparian states and Mexico, the Columbia River Agreement between the US and Canada and the numerous European collaborative projects and integrated river basin managements of the River Rhine. In particular, Egypt and Ethiopia could learn a lot from South Africa paying21 Lesotho to quench its increasing thirst from the Lesotho Highlands Waters Project. The framework for exploiting the Niger River Basin, the Zambezi River basin and the Nile Basin Initiative22 itself could serve as useful points of departure for cooperation.

Notwithstanding the above, Egyptian politicians often argue about “historical rights” and connect the water issue with the civilizations of the antiquities on the Nile delta and forget about the history of the formation of nations and states. Evidently this stance is self-serving in that it ignores historical tensions between black people in the region (present day Sudan, South Sudan, Niger, Eritrea and Ethiopia, among others) and the race controversy in the African origin of humanity and thehistory of the Nile Valley (see for example Martin Bernal’s Black Antenna, 1987: Anta Diop23, among others). The politics of the Nile River system thus has an Africa-Arab dimension and hence sensitive to Pan Africanist and Pan Arabism agendas. Hence, if a conflict between Egypt and Ethiopiaerupts, it is more than likely to have spillover effects on the rest of Africa. Like most of the post colony states of Africa, modern and independent Egypt was created out of the ashes of colonialism (see for example AchilleMbembe and Samir Amin, among others). Britain’s colonial interest on theNile dam at Lake Tana (main source of Abay/Blue Nile) is the foundation of Egypt’s historical and legal claims to the water. Britain’s interest however was primarily driven by its desire to irrigate its large cotton plantations in the Anglo Egyptian colony of the Sudan and supply its factories which were located in the United Kingdom. Modern day cotton plantations in Egypt are entirely dependent on the soil that gets exported by the river primarily from Ethiopian highlands. In a series of short articles, Dr. Yosef Yacob24 documented the history of colonialism in the region and indicated how Emperor Menelik (1844-1913) and Emperor Haile Selassie (1892-1975) managed to escape Britain’s colonial ambitionsover the Ethiopian highlands. He also revealed how Emperor Haile Selassiewas visionary in that he successfully resisted Britain’s encroachments on Lake Tana by hiring an American engineering company to construct the dam and trying to finance the project through the issuance of debt securities in the United States. In other words, had the Emperor’s wishes were realized, the GERD would have been built a long time ago.
We have yet to see any reasonable criticism of Dr. Yosef Yacob's treatiseby those who oppose the construction of the dam. The next leg of the Egyptian opposition is international law. Here too the argument collapses before it faces the scrutiny of legal scholars. Egyptian officials often refer to the 1929 colonial era agreement and the 1959 agreement signed between Egypt and the Sudan (both former British colonies) that Ethiopia was not party to and had never consented to. First, it is important to note that colonial treaties have no direct relevance for resolving Africa's contemporary problems. The Nile basin countries have already rejected it. Thus, the dominant view is that trans-boundary assets belong to the post-colonial states and the new states have to agree how to share their jointlyowned assets. Second, Ethiopia was and is an independent state and it was not a party to the 1929 and 1959 agreements. Historical records also indicate that Britain, Egypt and the Sudan conspired and excluded Ethiopiafrom the negotiation. In this respect, Wuhibegezer Ferede and Sheferawu Abebe, writing on the Efficacy of Water Treaties in the Eastern Nile Basin, Africa Spectrum, 49, 1, 55-67 (2014) outline two approaches that evolve from the principles of international law.25 The authors show the fundamental differences between upstream and downstream countries in that upstream countries (Ethiopia, Uganda, Tanzania, Rwanda, Burundi, Kenya, Democratic Republic of Congo, Eritrea and South Sudan) appear tofavor clean slate policy while downstream countries (Sudan and Egypt) favor colonial treaties.26 Notwithstanding the preference of one or another form of legal principle, Egypt's insistence on colonial treaties collapses simply because Ethiopia was not a colony of Britain or indeed any other European power.

III

Now that we have seen Egypt's historical and legal arguments falling apart, the next step is to examine the third foundation of the Egyptian stance - the environmental aspects of the dam. Previous literature indicated that carbon emissions and contaminations of rivers that cross national boundaries are examples of trans-boundary environmental problems. Hence, policy formation requires enforceable global treaties, sound national policy and the examination of advances in a number of disciplines.27 Furthermore, investments in big national projects such as stadiums, mineral extraction, oil and gas, canals, big dams, highways, andbig architectural projects add behavioral and political dimensions to the science, technology and the economics of such undertakings. Most of the finest buildings and stadiums that host world cup games were and are being constructed in that national pride. And behavioral and emotional factors dominate financial arguments. In other words, national projects bytheir nature have behavioral dimensions and may not be captured by the paradigms of rationality and net present values. Time will tell whether the Ethiopian dam is different.

The mainstream literature on environmental economics focuses on welfaremeasurement, sustainability, technological change, externality and green accounting. Theworld commission onenvironment and development (aka the Bruntland Commission, 1987), for example, states that "sustainable development is meeting the needs of the present generation without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs". Consistent with this understanding, the Nile River system has both trans-boundary and non- trans-boundary features for the riparian states and hence Egypt, in theory, may have a cause for concern. This concern can nonetheless be resolved through international instruments and institutions and bilateral relations that are based on mutual respect and trust. The international convention on the protection and use of trans-boundary and international lakes which was signed by nearly 40 countries does not provide the base for resolving disputes, and worse, no country from Africa (including Egypt)has actually ratified it. It nonetheless can be another point of departure.

The United Nations Environmental program could also be a facilitator. Furthermore, as noted earlier, Africa has frameworks for inter-basin development. The Nile Basin Initiative (NBI) has been a major institutionaldevelopment which enables all riparian states to collaborate and act as equal members. Egypt's effort to undermine28 this agreement is a mistake.

Other features of the leaked report of the International Panel of Expertscovers the main factors of the project. Among other things, it confirms that: (i) GERD iseconomically feasible: (ii) the design meets international standards, subject to minor"corrections": (iii) the contractor is reliable and has extensive international expertise and reputation inbuilding large dams: (iv) the environmental impact study within Ethiopia is adequate and the trans- boundary effect on the Sudan is favorable and controls flood: and (v) the section on trans-boundary effect on Egypt requires additional study using complex models and actual data rather than reliance on desk work. In short, the authors of the 48 pages-long confidential report did not say thatthey expect a catastrophe and the vanishing of the Egyptian nation if the project gets completed. In short, Egypt is not in any imminent danger.

This conclusion has ramifications for the multilateral institutions that refused to finance the project. In summary, Egypt's opposition to GERD isindeed misplaced. Its return to the negotiation table and the African Unionand the ratification of the Nile River Basin Cooperative Framework and Convention on the Protection and Use of Trans-boundary Watercourses and International Lakes are avenues for resolving the sticky problems of water sharing.

NILE: Egyptian satellite to monitor construction of Ethiopia's disputeddam'

By Ahram Online (April 30, 2014) - A new Egyptian satellite will track the construction of an Ethiopian hydroelectric dam over which officials in Cairoand Addis Ababa have been locked in a standoff over fears that the project will hinder Egypt's access to the Nile's water.

Launched almost two weeks ago, Egysat will monitor Ethiopia's Grand Renaissance Dam by capturing high quality photos of the construction sitealong with other sources of the Nile, said Alaa El-din El-Nahry, vice president of Egypt's National Authority for Remote Sensing and Space Sciences.

The LE300 million satellite – which will come into operation in mid-June after a two-month test period – will track the dam's height, storage capacity and water discharge. It will also monitor the Kongo River basin toassess the effectiveness of a proposed project to link the Kongo and Nile rivers.

Egypt's government believes the satellite's findings will bolster its negotiations with Ethiopia and provide legal ground in case it must resort to international arbitration over any violations in the dam's stated purposeof electricity generation, El-Nahry said during a seminar in Cairo, according to Al-Ahram's daily Arabic newspaper.

Egypt has been particularly concerned that the dam, now more than 30 percent finished, will hugely impact its share of the Nile, the country's main source of potable water. Situated near the Sudanese border on theBlue Nile, a Nile tributary, the hydroelectric dam will be the biggest in Africa, capable of producing 6,000 megawatts of energy.

Last week, Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn urged Egypt toreturn to the tripartite discussions with Ethiopia and Sudan in an effort to settle the dispute. The three countries have been engaged in a series of dialogues since the launch of the project three years ago.

Last year, Ethiopia and five other Nile-basin countries – Rwanda, Tanzania, Uganda, Kenya and Burundi – endorsed an accord, the Co- operative Framework Agreement, which replaces a 1929 treaty granting Egypt veto power over any project on the Nile in upstream countries.

Sudan, Egypt's immediate downstream country, has backed Ethiopia'splans to build the dam.

NILE: Ethiopia ignores 'repeated' calls for dam negotiations: Egypt FM By Ahram Online (May 14, 2014)

Egypt has repeatedly called for negotiations with Ethiopia over the Grand Renaissance Dam but has not received a real response, Egyptian Foreign Minister Nabil Fahmy said.

Fahmy, in an interview with Al-Ahram newspaper published on Wednesday, said that Egypt would not forget the issue. The under- construction dam is situated near the Sudanese border on the Blue Nile, aNile tributary. It is set to be the biggest hydroelectric dam in Africa, producing as much as 6,000 megawatts of energy.

Egypt has repeatedly expressed its concern that the dam will affect its share of Nile water. Ethiopia insists this will not happen. We believe thatEgypt, Ethiopia and Sudan will benefits from reaching solutions through negotiations, Fahmy added. From this standpoint, Fahmy added, he hadmet with the Ethiopian foreign minister a month ago, where Fahmy presented some initial ideas, but is yet to receive a response from Ethiopia. Fahmy's comment contradicts Ethiopian statements that havepreviously called for dialogue after tripartite talks between the two countries and Sudan reached a stalemate.

In late April, Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn invited Egyptand Sudan for another round of tripartite talks, while in March the Ethiopian foreign minister said his country was adamant about holding talks with Egypt. Fahmy also said that previous negotiations were held in three stages but "unfortunately didn't show an indication for positive development."

Last year, Ethiopia and five other Nile Basin countries – Rwanda, Tanzania, Uganda, Kenya and Burundi – endorsed an accord, the Co- operative Framework Agreement, which replaces a 1929 treaty granting Egypt veto power over any project on the Nile in upstream countries.

Sudan, Egypt's immediate downstream country, has backed Ethiopia'splans to build the dam.

Nile Basin countries to negotiate Entebbe Agreement'

Foreign ministers of Nile Basin countries to discuss possibility ofamendments in Entebbe agreement.

Daily News Egypt (May 28, 2014) - Tanzanian Minister of Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation Bernard Member plans to meet with foreignministers of the Nile Basin countries in July to discuss amendments to theEntebbe Agreement over the allocation of Nile water, the minister announced in a Wednesday statement. He added that discussions would take into account the importance of the Nile water in meeting the economic needs of Egypt.

Egyptian foreign ministry spokesman Badr Abdelatty said in a press release that Egypt considers Tanzania's proposal an important step to protect the interests of all Nile Basin countries and enable them to achievethe maximum benefit of the Nile River. According to Abdelatty, the issue of the dam currently being built in Ethiopia will not be discussed "directly",but rather within the framework of the Entebbe Agreement. Abdelatty added that the Tanzanian initiative reflects the understanding of the Nile Basin countries.

NILE: Uganda, South Sudan oppose Tanzania's proposal to review the2010 Nile Deal'

Tanzanian Foreign Minister Bernard Kamillius Membe has called for areview of the agreement to consider Egypt's water needs.

World Bulletin/NewsDesk - Uganda and South Sudan have both expressedtheir opposition to a Tanzanian proposal to review a 2010 ComprehensiveFramework Agreement (CFA) signed by upstream Nile Basin countries, known as the Entebbe agreement, in order to consider Egypt's water needs. "Tanzania was the one pushing for the agreement: it would be a surprise to see them backtracking now," Callist Tindimugaya, Uganda's representative to the Nile Basin Initiative (NBI)'s technical advisory committee, told Anadolou Agency.

"International water law recognizes that once you have signed an agreement you cannot backtrack," Tindimugaya said. "What you can do is keep quiet: you may not say ‘I signed because I was under threat’.” Tanzanian Foreign Minister Bernard Kamillius Membe has called for a review of the CFA to consider Egypt’s water needs. “Tanzania feels that the chapter providing equal and fair share of the natural resources of the Nile to all states ought to be reviewed in favor of Egypt, considering that itis a desert country whose lifeline is the Nile,” Membe told parliament last week.

In 2010, upstream states Ethiopia, Kenya, Uganda, Rwanda and Tanzaniasigned the Entebbe Agreement in an effort to increase their traditional allotments of Nile water. The following year, Burundi signed on to the agreement. The deal aims to replace a colonial-era treaty that gives Egyptand Sudan the lion’s share of river water.

Both Egypt and Sudan, for their part, rejected the treaty, fearing it wouldaffect their historical share of water. Tindimugaya criticized plans by Tanzania to call for a meeting of all Nile Basin states to discuss the agreement. “Tanzania cannot invite us: they are not the current chair of the NBI,” he said. “Tanzania is a sovereign state and they can do as theyplease, but they do not have the capacity to do that.”

The NBI was launched in 1999 by the ten riparian states of the Nile as a temporary institution until CFA negotiations were concluded and a permanent institution created. According to its website, the NBI provides“the only all-inclusive regional platform for multi stakeholder dialogue, information sharing, as well as joint planning and management of water and related resources in the Nile Basin.”

Intact: South Sudan’s Foreign Ministry said the Entebbe agreement had tobe maintained, since it took into consideration the right of all riparian states to Nile water. “The agreement speaks of freedom to use the Nile water. Any country along the Nile has the freedom to use the water for their good,” ministry spokesperson Mawien Makol Arik told AA. He went onto criticize calls to review the water treaty. “South Sudan cannot accept this because – as a developing country – we rely a lot on the Nile,” said Arik. “We know it is a critical issue to Egypt, since they feel the initiative will reduce the water volume reaching them – but we also need to use thewater.”

“The Entebbe initiative came as a result of the domination of Egypt on theNile water based on an old colonial agreement. It [the new agreement] isto help the countries use the water and share it based on each country’s economic development,” he added. “We have to sit down as countries along the Nile and support each other on using the Nile. That is why we supported the Ethiopian [hydroelectric] dam initiative,” the ministry spokesperson said.

Relations between Ethiopia and Egypt have been strained due to a multibillion hydroelectric dam now being built by Addis Ababa on the Nile’supper reaches. Egypt is worried that the Ethiopian dam project will reduceits historical share of Nile water. Addis Ababa insists the new dam will benefit downstream states Sudan and Egypt, both of which will be invited to purchase the electricity thus generated.

Ambassador Arik, meanwhile, urged Egypt to forget the colonial-era agreement and work with other Nile basin countries to everyone’s benefit. “The agreement by the colonial powers cannot hold now and Egypt cannot hold on to it. They have to letgo and sit down to discuss how the Nile can benefit everybody,” he said.(Text ends)

Egypt: El-Sissi wins election by landslide’

By HAMZA HENDAWI and MAGGIE MICHAEL (May 29, 2014)

CAIRO (AP) — With nearly all ballots counted, Egypt's former military chiefhas won a crushing victory over his sole opponent in the country's presidential election, his campaign said Thursday. But the results were stained by questions about turnout despite a robust government effort to get out the vote. Retired field marshal Abdel-Fattah el-Sissi won more than 92 percent of the votes, compared with 2.9 percent percent for his sole opponent and 4 percent of invalid votes, according to a tally released by his campaign. His victory was never in doubt, but the career infantry officer had pushed for an overwhelming turnout as well to bestow legitimacy on his ouster last July of Egypt's first freely elected president, the Islamist Mohammed Morsi. Turnout was more than 46 percent after officials extended voting toa third day, according to interim President Adly Mansour. That figure was lower than the 52 percent turnout in the 2012 presidential election that vaulted Morsi to power. It also was lower than the bar el-Sissi himself set in his last campaign interview, when he said he wanted three-quarters of the country's 54 million registered voters to cast ballots so he could "showthe world" his support. Still, el-Sissi can genuinely claim he comes into office with an impressive vote tally of 23.38 million votes — significantly more than the 13 million won by Morsi two years ago. His sole opponent, leftist politician Hamdeen Sabahi, received 736,000 votes.

It was telling that Sabahi, who came in third in the previous election, garnered less than the 1.03 million spoiled ballots cast. Official election commission figures will likely be released next week but are not expected to change much due to the wide gap in results. Addressing a news conference on Thursday, Sabahi accepted defeat. But he said the turnout figure was not credible, adding, "It is an insult to the intelligence of Egyptians." Earlier, when voting was extended to a third day, he protestedthat it aimed to "distort" the people's will.

He said serious violations marred the balloting itself — though not enoughto significantly change the outcome. His campaign pulled its representatives from polling stations Wednesday to protest what it called intimidation and arrests of its staffers, one of whom was referred to a military tribunal. "I respect the choice of the people and acknowledge my defeat in this election," he said. "We have lost an election but we won our self-respect I hope that we won credibility with the aware and intelligent masses." Mario David, the head of the European Union observers' mission,said the election that ended Wednesday was carried out within the boundaries of the law, with only minor violations like campaigning near polling centers.

However, senior member of the EU mission, Robert Goebbels, pointed outthat the relatively high turnout should not be taken as evidence of democracy. Boycott, he said, is a form of freedom of expression and no one should speak for the "silent" voters. "High turnout is not necessarily proof of democratic elections," he said, adding that turnout in totalitarian states like North Korea in which there is only a single candidate has run ashigh as 99.9 percent. The unusual measures taken by the government to get voters to the polls also raised skepticism over the extent of support.

Widespread reports of empty polling stations in the first two days of voting also prompted the state to abruptly add a third day after declaring the second day to be public holiday to free voters to cast ballots had madelittle difference. Government officials also offered to bus-in voters to polling centers and threatened to invoke a rarely enforced law that would allow them to fine boycotters. Bus and trains were free to allow people to return to home districts and cast ballots. "Citizen enthusiasm was dampened by the widespread perception that this election was not meaningful and that its results were predetermined," the U.S.-based Democracy International said Thursday. The group largely ended its observer mission as scheduled after two days, though European Union monitors continued. Mansour insisted that legitimacy had been achieved.

Turnout, he said, showed "a broad consensus" for the political roadmaptransition set by the military after Morsi's ouster.

Islamists, once the country's most powerful political machine, had called aboycott of the vote, as had many secular "revolutionary" youth groups.

After polls closed, several thousand el-Sissi supporters celebrated in Cairo's Tahrir Square, birthplace of the 2011 uprising that toppled longtime autocrat Hosni Mubarak. They waved Egyptian flags, el-Sissi posters and danced. Similar celebrations took place in the Mediterranean city of Alexandria and a string of other cities north of the capital and in theoasis province of Fayoum to the southwest.

Critics said the lack of enthusiasm at the polls was in part due to apathy among even el-Sissi supporters, knowing that his victory was a foregone conclusion. Others said it showed discontent with el-Sissi, not just among his Islamist foes but also among a broader section of the public that believes he has no concrete plans for Egypt's woes and fears he will returnEgypt to the autocratic ways of Mubarak. The measures to increase voter numbers were also startling because el-Sissi was not expected to need any help. The government and media had been whipping up adulation for el-Sissi over the past 10 months, depicting him as a warrior against terrorism and the only person able to tackle Egypt's economic problems, high unemployment, inflation and instability. Egypt officials withdrew 4 million USD to bribe African presidents on to sway thier position against Ethiopia’s dam’ Earlier today we shared an article about “Egyptian government spent $4 million in bribes to three African presidents to sway positions on Renaissance Dam.” Here is another article form the Cairo post about how the money was withdrawn. Here details. Details surrounding investigations into an old corruption casethat dates back to March 2012 were revealed by Youm7 on Thursday, which regards a case that was labeled as “classified information/national security”. The case revolves around the illegal seizure of $4 million from public funds to be given to African leaders from Nile basin countries duringthe region’s water crisis. The corruption case involves former presidentHosni Mubarak and his chief of staff Zakareya Azmy, Youm7 reported Thursday. According to Azmy’s statements during the investigations, he was an intermediary between Mubarak and former Central Bank president Farouk Okda. Back in November 2009, Azmy was ordered to deliver $4 million to the president. The money was cashed on separate occasions without any release documents, official or unofficial.

Thus, the case was handled by the Public Funds Crimes Investigationsdepartment at the Ministry of NILE: Egypt should cooperate with Ethiopia as sign of apology for ignoredrelations during Mubarak’s era’ (Translated from Arabic to English using Google Translator)

ST (June 14, 2014) - Well known former member of Egypt Parliament AbulEzz Hariri leader of party People’s Alliance says the expected visit of President-elect Abdel Fattah al-Sisi to Addis Ababa in two weeks to resolvethe crisis Dam Renaissance is a good idea to restore the role of Egypt Regional area of the Nile Basin countries, especially Ethiopia. Hariri said ina statement to “veto,” that this visit would put solutions to the crisis of the dam, by initiating projects aimed at economic integration between thetwo parties.

The former former parliamentarian demanded that during the trip to Ethiopia Sisi should be accompanied by a number of experts and consultants. He also suggested specialists offer a number of cooperative projects between the two sides which are mutually beneficial for both Egypt and Ethiopia. This gestures are equivalent (tantamount) to an apology from Egypt to Ethiopia for what has happened during the era of former President Mubarak such as ignored in relations and cooperation. Prime Minister Ibrahim Mahlab, should quickly learn projects submitted tothem by some specialists on the crisis and try to solve the crisis. Among these projects one of them is made by Dr Ahmed Shenawi, an expert on water. Ethiopia can generate electricity from the Renaissance Dam and atthe same time maintain its share of the waters of Egypt, and reduce the risk of construction of the dam in addition to the cost of its operation doesnot exceed 20% of the cost of construction of the dam. Sudan Tribune (June 15, 2014) - ADDIS ABABA – Ethiopia on Thursday commended Egypt’s unprecedented and an official decision to peacefully resolve a long-standing dispute with Addis Ababa over a controversial power plant project known as the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD).

“Ethiopia strongly welcomes Egypt’s interest to re-launch talk over the GERD and solve the problem through dialogue,” spokesperson forEthiopia Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ambassador Dina Mufti told journalists.

“Egypt has no other option except dialogue and win-win negotiation to find a solution that is acceptable by both sides,” he added. Egypt’s newly elected president, Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, has recently pledged to resolve thewater dispute with Ethiopia through dialogue. Ethiopian officials said that al-Sisi is expected to pay an official visit to Ethiopia soon probably makingit his first trip to a foreign nation since he assumed office in June 8.

Ethiopian foreign minister Tedros Adhanom, who attended the new president's inaugural ceremony in Cairo, has held meeting with al-Sisi andother high ranking officials over the multi-billion dollar power plant project.

During their discussion Adhanom has reaffirmed Ethiopia's commitment for cooperation with Egypt based on mutual trust and confidence. Al-Sisiand Adhanom have also agreed to reactivate the tripartite technical dialogue between Sudan, Egypt and Ethiopia and harmonise existing differences by high-level political consultations. Addis Ababa insists the $

4.6 billion dam project won't adversely affect Egypt and Sudan instead thedownstream countries will be benefited from the cheap and renewable hydro power processed electricity it generates. Egypt considers the massive dam project, as a threat to its water security arguing it will eventually diminish its water share.

SUDAN REAFFIRMS SUPPORT : Meanwhile, Sudanese vice-president Bakri Hassan Saleh has reaffirmed his country's commitment to the dam projectwhich Ethiopia is building in Nile river near the Sudanese border. Saleh who was in Addis Ababa earlier this week to attend a regional summit of the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development (IGAD) made the remarks while holding talks Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn. "Sudan will derive multiple benefits from the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam project," Saleh said according to the state-run EthiopianRadio and Television Agency (ERTA).

SOUTH SUDAN CRISIS : Saleh and Desalegn have also consulted on the six-month-long conflict in South Sudan. While commending Ethiopia's roleto peacefully end the conflict in neighbouring South Sudan, Saleh called on Addis Ababa to continue exerting maximum efforts to bring lasting solution. Desalegn has also assured his country would remain committed to end the political crises in the youngest nation. "Ethiopia will continue toput pressure on the South Sudanese rivals through all channels available,"the Ethiopian premier said.

On Tuesday, rival leaders of the two SPLM rival factions, president Salva Kiir and rebel leader Riek Machar agreed to end fighting and form a unitygovernment within two months. At a news conference on Friday, spokesperson for the Ethiopian foreign ministry Dina Mufti said IGAD- member countries have been frustrated by the failure of previous deals. He however went on to saying that the regional bloc mediating the two warring factions won't hesitate to take action if the two sides once again violate the latest agreements. He added that a peacekeeping force drawnfrom Ethiopia, Uganda and Kenya will be deployed to end the conflict which has killed thousands since violence erupted in mid-December last year. (Text ends)

NILE POLITICS: Egypt to participate in NBI meeting, despite announcing ithas frozen membership'
Egypt Independent (June 19, 2014) - A delegation headed by Ahmed Bahaa Eddin, left Cairo heading to Khartoum, Wednesday, to participate in the 22nd meeting of the Council of Ministers of the Nile Basin countries, held under the framework of theBasin Countries Initiative. Egypt has dispatched the delegation despite announcing it has frozen its initiative membership.
A delegation member said before departure that although Egypt has frozen its membership in the Nile Basin Initiative due to differences with Basin countries over Entebbe agreement, Egypt is keen to participate in the meeting. Egypt believes that the Entebbe agreement is incomplete asother Nile headwaters countries have signed the agreement individually, the official added.
Ministers of water resources of Sudan, South Sudan, Ethiopia, Uganda, Rwanda, Burundi, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Kenya and Tanzaniawill take part in the meeting which aims to discuss means of coordinationand cooperation between the Nile Basin countries through development projects.
NILE POLITICS: Egypt and Ethiopia agree that tripartite dam committeewill resume its work'
Ahram Online (June 27, 2014) - Egypt President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi talks to Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn as they arrive to attendthe 23rd African Union Summit (AUS) in Malabo June 26, 2014. The Egyptian foreign minister along with his Ethiopian counterpart stressed that Ethiopia will understand the importance of the Nile River to Egypt andthat Egypt will understand the Ethiopian need for development. Egypt andEthiopia will form a joint committee in the upcoming three months to enhance bilateral relations between the two countries, the foreign ministers of both countries announced in a joint statement on Friday. The statement came after Egypt`s new president, Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi, met with the Ethiopian Prime Minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, after the AfricanUnion summit in Equatorial Guinea's capital Malabo.
According to the statement, the Ethiopian government is committed to avoid any potential damage that could result from the Grand Renaissance dam currently being built on the Blue Nile in Ethiopia. Sameh Shoukry, theEgyptian foreign minister, along with his Ethiopian counterpart Tedros Adhanom, stressed in the statement that Ethiopia will understand the importance of the Nile to Egypt: and that Egypt will understand the Ethiopian plans and need for development. The two ministers cited seven main points that El-Sisi and Desalegn discussed during the meeting, including respecting the dialogue and cooperation between the two countries, and the establishment of regional projects for the development of financial resources to meet the growing demand for water and to deal with water shortages. The Egyptian government is committed to constructive communication with Ethiopia.
The Ethiopian dam has been a source of concern for the Egyptian government since May last year, when images of the dam's construction stirred public anxiety about its possible effects on Egypt's share of the Nile's water. However, Ethiopian officials insisted the dam would not harmEgypt. Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan formed a tripartite technical committee to study the possible effects of the dam. But the committee’s discussions were halted last December when Sudanese President Omar Al-Bashir announced his support for the dam during a meeting with Ethiopian PrimeMinister Hailemariam Desalegn. Resuming the work of the tripartite technical committee and respecting international legal principles were alsoamong the points on which both sides had reached common ground.

Egypt has demanded that Ethiopia submit the dam's construction plans forassessment by international experts. Ethiopian Irrigation Minister AlamayoTegno said his country was already committed to the recommendations ofan international committee of experts.

NILE - Ethiopia's Nile dam project signals its intention to become anAfrican power'

Guardian Weekly (July 14, 2014) Grand Ethiopian Renaissance dam will provide energy for growing economy but add to Egypt's fears over water security. The 4×4 roars off, kicking up a cloud of dust. With one hand on the wheel, the other stifling a yawn, Semegnew Bekele could do this trip with his eyes shut. A construction engineer, he has driven down this track at every hour of the day or night over the past three years. "Ordinary people are building an extraordinary project," he says. He is referring to the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance dam (Gerd), in the north-west corner of the country close to the border with Sudan. Four hours away from the town of Assosa more than 8,500 workers and engineers are labouring on a massive project to harness the waters of the Blue Nile.

The site is closely guarded. Only officially authorised vehicles are allowed through the three checkpoints. As the kilometres flicker by, the din of the diggers becomes more audible. Then the gigantic site itself appears, with thousands of tonnes of aggregate piled up and smooth expanses of concrete lining the bottom of the Guba valley, ringed by arid hills. The hundreds of families belonging to the Gumuz indigenous people, who livedoff fishing, have been moved to a location several tens of kilometres away, making room for a hydroelectric power station that will be the largest in Africa when it comes online in 2017. At present only a third of ithas been built.

Bekele, who works for the Ethiopian Electric Power corporation, has already worked on two dam construction jobs, both on the river Omo in the south-west. He answers our questions with a flood of figures: the damwill be 1,780 metres long and 145 high, with a reservoir covering 1,874 sqkm expected to contain 70bn cubic metres of water. Output from the 16 turbines will total 6,000MW. It will be sufficient to meet growing demand in Ethiopia, now Africa's second most populous country, where gross domestic product is estimated to have grown by 10.5% annually over the past five years.

The countdown has already started for Bekele: he has three years left to complete this concrete colossus. "I don't feel like a special person," he says, "just an engineer leading the project." True enough, the driving force behind the dam is former prime minister Meles Zenawi, who ran thecountry for more than two decades. He was obsessed with the country's rebirth. The structure will be built, whatever the cost, he asserted, upon laying the first stone in April 2011. He died the following year.

International bodies such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch were extremely critical of his record on human rights, but he knewhow to rouse national fervour and mobilise the country for the five-year growth and transformation plan launched in 2010, which included Gerd.

The scheme is expected to cost $4.1bn. As the country has not received any international funding, the government has appealed to the population to buy treasury bonds. For civil servants it is mandatory. Companies have urged their personnel to give up a month's wages to support Gerd. In a country where information is under strict control, it is hard to say whetherthey have much choice. "We agreed, we want to contribute to development," bank clerk Birhanu Libsework, 25, tells us in a cafe in AddisAbaba. "We're prepared to make sacrifices for better living standards and more energy," says Genet Getachew, an Amharic teacher. A single mother, she helps her daughter with her homework by candle light during the frequent outages in the capital. "The government mustn't try to do a thousand things at once, but this one is necessary," says Yeshi Negash (name changed at her request), a sociology graduate.

The government has already raised more than $350m, a third of whichhas been contributed by Ethiopians abroad.

Ethiopia hopes to become an African lion. "We have finished with thesyndrome of dependence," says Zadig Abraha, deputy-head of Gerd coordination. "We want to recover our past glory," he adds.

Some neighbouring countries are less upbeat about the project. Citing twotreaties, dating from 1929 and 1959, Egypt claims a historic right over theNile. It fears that the dam will restrict the flow of water. The treaties, signed with the UK and Sudan, allocate two-thirds of the Nile's water resources to Egypt, with the right to veto any project affecting the world'slongest river.

"These treaties are now obsolete. We are entitled to build the dam," saysAlemayehu Tegenu, Ethiopia's minister of water, energy and irrigation. "For a long time we derived no benefit from our river."

Mohamed Ghoneim, the Egyptian representative to the African Union, disagrees. "It's impossible to undertake a project on this scale without environmental impact studies to assess the consequences for downstreamcountries," he counters, speculating on a range of potential disasters: saltmay accumulate in the soil: land downstream could turn to desert or the flow be interrupted: the dam might even break. "The Nile is a vital resource for 80 million Egyptians," he adds.

In 2012, a year after work started, Addis Ababa tasked an international panel of experts (from Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan among others) with a study of the project's human and economic impact. In May 2013 they reported that further studies were needed. The Ethiopians have refused,saying enough time has already been wasted. Egypt is demanding a second international panel. Negotiations between Ethiopia and Egypt aredeadlocked.

Night falls on the site. In the temporary lodgings, several thousand workers are falling asleep, while the next shift are playing football, soon toresume work. In a few years the Guba valley will be flooded. "The whole area will become a tourist attraction," Bekele suggests hopefully. But whatwill happen to the Gumuz community, we inquire. The engineer tells us toturn off the recorder. "We're all making sacrifices for our country," he says. "It seems only natural." (Text ends)

August 18, 2014 : Egypt says it has new 'vision' for Ethiopia's dam'

(By Ahram Online) August 18, 2014 Egypt's Irrigation Minister Hossam El-Moghazi told privately owned Mehwar channel that Egypt has a new "vision" regarding Ethiopia's planned Grand Renaissance Dam ahead of another round of talks in the Sudanese capital. In a phone interview, El- Moghazi said the Egyptian delegation will head to Khartoum on 24 Augustfor two days of discussions.

"Egypt has a new vision, that will not affect Egypt's water share, and weare expecting that the other party responds to it," said El-Moghazi.

Meanwhile, the minister said that Egyptian satellite images have revealedthat construction has not yet begun on the part of the dam which will reserve the Nile's water.

The project has been a source of concern for the Egyptian governmentsince May 2013, when images of the dam's construction stirred public anxiety about the possible effect on Egypt's potable water supply. Ethiopia maintains that Egypt's water share will not be negatively affectedby the successful completion of the project, set to be Africa's largest hydroelectric dam.

The upcoming tripartite talks between Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan were initially planned to take place in Cairo but were later moved to Khartoum.The talks are expected to develop seven main points that Egypt's President Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi and Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn previously discussed during a meeting in late June – among them fostering dialogue and cooperation between the two countries as well as regional projects to meet the growing demand for water. Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan agree on a new impact studies on Renaissancedam'

MENA, Ahram Online (August 26, 2014)

Egypt, Ethiopia, and Sudan's irrigation ministers signed an agreement to conduct two studies to gauge the effects of Ethiopia's Grand Renaissance Dam on its neighbouring countries, state-run news agency MENA reportedon Tuesday. Egypt, Ethiopia, Sudan agree on impact studies on Nile dam Studies will be carried out within the next six months to assess the impactof Ethiopia's hydroelectric dam on neighbouring countries The dam has been a source of concern for the Egyptian government since May 2013, when images of its construction stirred public anxiety about the possible impact on Egypt's potable water supply. A joint statement by the ministers after a two-day meeting in Khartoum revealed that the studies were suggested by the committee of international experts tasked to revisethe dam's impact. An international consulting company will conduct the two studies. A "national expert committee" will be formed to agree on the framework of conducting the studies. The committee, comprised of four experts from each of the three countries, has been given a six-month deadline starting from 1 September to formulate a timeframe to carry outthe reports. Ethiopia's irrigation minister also invited his Egyptian and Ethiopian counterparts to visit the construction site of the dam in the nearfuture. Egypt's Irrigation Minister Hossam El-Moghazi said that Ethiopia agreed to be bound by the findings of the consultancy company. When asked about the declarations of his Ethiopian counterpart that the dam's construction will go ahead as planned, El-Moghazi told reporters that Ethiopia will finish the first phase as scheduled by September 2015 and will then take into consideration the findings of the consultancy agency.

El-Moghazi also revealed that the meeting didn't touch on technical detailssuch as the dimensions or length of the dam needed to fill its reservoir as these items will be the responsibility of the committee.

HYDRO POLITICS: Persistent mistrust b/n Ethiopia & Egypt 'ANALYSIS By Robele Ababya (November 17, 2014)

Ethiopia and Egypt have indispensable role to play in stabilizing the current perilous political turmoil in the Horn of Africa and the Middle East because of their strategic location in the proximity of the latter, ancient civilization, and relatively large population. In that context healthy relationship between the two countries is essential. But unfortunately, thecenturies old deep-rooted and persistent mistrust between the two countries does not seem to die any time soon and this is bad for regional peace and stability.

It is reported on various media outlets including Tigrai on line that "The fifth Egyptian and Ethiopian Joint Ministerial Commission" meeting was concluded on 04 November 2014. This is a welcome development assuming that the outcome of the meeting was arrived at in good faith forsincere implementation by both sides.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Sameh Shoukry, Egyptian Foreign Minister, "led a huge delegation from many ministries to participate in the meetings." In my opinion, this should probably be the largest delegation for its size and variety experts from various ministries of Egypt unprecedented in the history of relations between Ethiopia and Egypt incessantly marred by mistrust and animosity for centuries owing to repeated aggression, intrigues, sabotage, and deceptions instigated by thelatter. It is well recorded in the annals of history that Egyptian aggressors suffered humiliating defeat at the hands of the militia fighters under the leadership of the epic patriot and true son of Ethiopia Alula Abanega who was known for his ingenuity in the art of war.

Ethiopia has invariably been a victim and Egypt the victimizer in matters relating to all vital national interests of the former including harboring dissidents bent on secession. This evil deed alone stands tallest among innumerable offences against Ethiopia perpetrated by Egypt during the long history of the two ancient countries. So one questions whether the huge delegation came to Addis Ababa to negotiate in good faith and arriveat a 'win-win' outcome reportedly involving education, trade, diplomatic, training and women's affairs.

Several pleasantries were exchanged after the signing ceremony of several agreements by the leaders of both delegations in the presence of EPRDF media. Some members of the Egyptian delegation were superfluous in the praise of the success of the meeting: I watched on the ETV one of the delegates quoting the Prime Minister Hailemariam Dessalegn for his 'wise words to treat their two countries as one country'. The importance of the Blue Nile River to Egypt took the center-stage during the press conference. The late tyrant Meles Zenawi was crowned with the accolade 'Great Leader', which accolade is offensive to democraticopposition entities and the overwhelming majority of the Ethiopian people.One would ask what Egypt is up to!

I have since the reign of the Imperial regime always and consistently advocated for the emergence of good multilateral relations among the three states – Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan for they are naturally bound by the Blue Nile River supplying 85% of the waters crossing Ethiopia's boundary to Sudan and then to Egypt.

I was one of those Ethiopians that were excited by the downfall of the former President Hosni Mubarak by popular uprising dubbed "Arab Spring". I even wrote an article in which I congratulated the victors believing that the time has come for democratic Egypt and democratic Ethiopia shall put the past relations of belligerence between them and work together for peace, democracy, and prosperity under the AU umbrella. This unfortunately did not happen. The setback for democracy under the deposed President Morsi in Egypt has considerably curbed my earlier hope that "Democratic Egypt and Ethiopia will play key roles in stabilizing the region and promoting development thus becoming formidable political forces to contend with: will be partners in the development of the Nile Basin – a key factor of regional policy to avoid war. My disappointment with the ruinous performance led me to write my article dated 09 November 2012 titled "Likely war with Egypt? I said: Quote The writing of this piece is prompted by the setback in democracy in Egypt and the intransigence of the TPLF controlled EPRDF government so weakened by internal wrangles rendering it unable to defend vital national interests in the face of simmering traditional claims of Egypt to control Blue Nile water. For example: in 1970, Egyptian President Anwar Sadat threatened war with Ethiopia over the proposed construction of a dam on LakeTana on the Blue Nile (El-Khodary, 1995: 1): Boutros-Ghali isreported also to have talked of war over the Nile waters (Butts, 1997: 1): in October 1991, the Defense Minister of Egypt "remarked in al Ahram that his country would not hesitate to use force to defend its control of theNile River, and predicted that future Middle East wars could result from water scarcity issues (Postel, 1992: 4) adding "I do not actually expect animpending control of the Nile River by a foreign country, but we consider ita possibility and are planning our military strategy accordingly" (Postel, 1992: 5) Unquote.

Therefore at all times and at this time of uncertainty in regional politics inparticular, I reiterate my stand that robust defense force and internal harmony are essential to preserve and protect national values: however the repressive EPRDF government in power must change its ethnic-basedpolicy and open the political space for very serious consultations with all political opposition parties, civic organizations, and above all the Ethiopianpeople as the ultimate and supreme source of power and owners of the country's resources. I would like to underline that it would be foolhardy toconstruct the so-called Millennium Dam at a location within artillery rangefrom Sudan – a situation that will require missile defense against in- coming Egyptian Air Force bombers. My hunch is however that Egypt will send a commando force at some critical stage to destroy the Dam, which action would engender political turmoil at home and hefty loss of capital expenditure incurred – a highly probable grave scenario indeed.

It would be irresponsible to weaken internal harmony and strength by pursuing the familiar irresponsible politics of divide-and-rule along religious and ethnic lines thereby playing into the hands of hawkish Egyptian leaders behind the scenes like the former Defense Minister FieldMarshal Tantawi seeking to exploit any weak point in our midst to destabilize us. The TPLF Foreign Minister (and probably Prime Minister in waiting) lacks diplomatic experience and the basic knowledge required tounderstand the intricacies of foreign policy, less so in the murky political environment of dangerous conflicts destabilizing the Middle East and the Horn of Africa where, in the latter case, Ethiopia is strategically located and ruled by a puppet regime serving foreign powers.

− have enormous potential for becoming a formidable force that will significantly contribute to the security and stability of the abovementionedregions and beyond on the African continent. So the peoples of Ethiopia and Egypt must work hard to engender democracy and prosperity in their respective countries through enhancing synergy, symbiotic cooperation, and collaboration in terms of human development economic growth, socialjustice in a secure region bound by the Blue Nile River.

The road ahead for democracy to take root in both countries is not easy. As the old adage goes, birds of the same feather flock together. Both the EPRDF and the Egyptian government have their plates full of tough and urgent issues to contend with. EPRDF should have relinquished power yesterday for having failed to play inclusive politics. It seems that Field Marshal El-Sissi will have time to usher in democracy backed by the powerful army, which has a tradition of 212 years and experience on taking side with the people in the January uprising that toppled the Mubarak regime. The TPLF regime with a vanishing air force, non-existentnavy, and demoralized ground forces in a divided country along ethnic lines is no match to Egypt.

So I repeat my mantra that we Ethiopians have only God and ourselves tosave Ethiopia from disaster. As always to eternity, God does His part leaving to us what we can do. Unleashing action in unison to regain our freedom and independence from the exclusive EPRDF regime is what we can do!

Finally, I wish in closing to reiterate my consistent conviction that there isnothing more serious than asserting Ethiopia's right to control the source of the Blue Nile, but this requires the unity of her citizens.

This is not to say that riparian states are not entitled to their fair share of the waters ofthe Nile as stipulated in international law. The EPRDF government should release all political prisoners, stop its virulent attack the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, and acquiesce to all constitutional demands of the Ethiopian Muslims so that Ethiopians can be united and strong to deter any external attack. Ethiopia-Egypt talks on Nile dam collapse'World Bulletin (December 15, 2014)

Consultations among experts of Ethiopia, Sudan and Egypt aimed at determining the impact of Ethiopia's $4.8 billion dam project on the Nile'supper reaches halted amid differences between Egypt and Ethiopia, an official said Sunday.

The Tripartite National Committee (TNC) – a 12-member experts' panel responsible of facilitating implementation of recommendations of the International Panel of Experts concerning Ethiopia's hydroelectric dam project – had so far held two working sessions in Addis Ababa and Cairo."The third session was supposed to be held in Khartoum on December 4-6, but could not be held due to disagreements," Bizuneh Tolcha, a seniorofficial with the Ethiopian Ministry of Water, Energy and Irrigation, told The Anadolu Agency.

The experts' panel recommended that two studies get conducted – one onthe hydrological simulation model and another on a trans-boundary environmental, economic and social impact assessment, which led to the creation of the TNC by the three countries to get those studies done.

During the last two meetings, the three countries, according to Tolcha, were able to produce a list of seven firms, out of which only one would beselected to conduct the studies.

"Each country was supposed to come up with its proposals that comprise technical evaluation of the firms, but during a preparatory conference in Cairo on November 4, a disagreement occurred as to the points to be included in the studies," Tolcha said, declining to give further details. "Thematter has since been referred to the relevant ministers of the three countries so that they resolve the matter," he said. "Though minor, that disagreement has come as a stumbling block against the progress of the tripartite talks."

Ethiopian says the dam project is meant to generate badly-need energy.But the project has strained Ethiopia's relations with downstream Egypt,which fears the project will reduce its water share.

Addis Ababa, for its part, insists the new dam will benefit downstreamstates Egypt and Sudan, both of which will be invited to purchase the electricity generated by the dam.

The two countries agreed to resume tripartite talks – which also included downstream country Sudan – after Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn and Egypt's President Abdel-Fattah al-Sisi met in Equatorial Guinea in June. According to the original schedule, the TNC should meet inAddis Ababa on December 16 to select the firm to conduct the two studies. (Text ends)

HYDRO POLITICS: Egypt, Ethiopia to settle dispute over Nile dam'

The study aims to assess social, economic and environmental impact ofthe $4.8 bn project

By MEE & Agencies (December 31, 2014)

An Ethiopian Water and Energy Ministry official revealed on Monday thathis country had resolved its differences with Egypt over a study commissioned to assess the likely impact of a multibillion-dollar hydroelectric dam now being built by Ethiopia on the Nile River.

Accordingly, a three-party committee on the dam – made up of Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan – will soon resume discussions, Bizuneh Tolcha, head ofpublic relations at the ministry, told The Anadolu Agency.

The project, dubbed the "Grand Renaissance Dam," has strained relations between Ethiopia and Egypt for several months.

Water-poor Egypt says the project - that is now 30 percent complete - willnegatively affect its share of water from the Nile – its only source of water − while Ethiopia says the project is indispensible to its own national development and the economic welfare of its growing population. Tolcha said that, now that the dispute between Ethiopia and Egypt over the project study had been resolved, Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan would select aconsultancy firm to conduct the survey.

The study will aim to assess the social, economic and environmental impact of the $4.8-bn project, a sizeable portion of which has alreadybeen completed. The committee, known as the Tripartite National Committee, consists of four experts from each of the three countries.

It should have convened for the third time in Sudanese capital Khartoumbetween 4 and 6 December, but the meeting was called off due to differences between Ethiopia and Egypt over the schedule of the studies.

Egypt says the studies should not take more than five or six months, butEthiopia – which is actively working on the project – says the studies could take as long as 18 months to complete. Tolcha declined to provide further details about the nature of the agreement reached between Egyptand Ethiopia on the timeframe of the dam studies.

The tripartite committee held a series of meetings in the Ethiopian capital between August and September. A meeting was also held in Cairo, duringwhich the three states agreed on a shortlist of seven international firms toconduct the studies.

Egypt and Ethiopia reportedly signed a deal in June regarding the controversial dam as part of an African Union summit in Malabo, capital ofEquatorial Guinea. The agreement saw both sides agree to “abide by the principles of international law”, according to the text published in al- Dostor al-Asly. (Text ends)

NILE POLITICS: Abadula Gemeda’s interview with Egyptian NILE TV PERSPECTIVE: Excerpted from Sokore Waqo's tip (January 5, 2015) Allow me to allude to a side issue to explain my last point by taking one recent example – the Interview. I am not talking about the film by Sony Pictures allegedly hacked by North Koreans. I am referring to the interview an Egyptian television station (Nile TV International) recently conducted with the Ethiopian Speaker of the Parliament. It is not my intention to go through all the content of the interview. My intention is to only raise two points that were striking to me and illustrative of the ineptness of TPLF government functionaries. One has to do with Speaker Aba Dula's choice of words to describe the relationship between Egypt andEthiopia since ancient times. He said, "the Fer'on pyramid was Aksumite kingdom". This assertion is "nonsense upon stilts" to borrow a famous phrase used by Jeremy Bentham (leading British philosopher and jurist of the early 19th century) in his critique of natural rights. If the Speaker meant the Egyptian pyramids were built by the Aksumite kingdom, this is not going to sink well with the Egyptians who are very proud of their ancient civilization. This is not going to be a "public diplomacy" envisaged by TPLF either, but an insult to the intelligence of the Egyptian people.

The second has to do with the apology issued by the Speaker to the Egyptian media for the coincidence of the Egyptian revolution and the initiation of the Grand Renaissance Dam on the Nile. If you claim the caseto be a happenstance by coincidence, there is no logic necessitating apology. But if the apology is one for starting the very construction of thedam, then the Speaker is explaining the latest position of the Ethiopian government (as a high ranking official) on the controversy over the construction of the dam. Otherwise, the Ethiopian government must take further measures showing the Speaker's comments do not represent the position of the government on the matter. Hence, one of the measures could be impeaching the Speaker for incompetence.

Inept officials are inimical to developmental state policy Imagine now howinept officials like the Speaker (I suspect the Speaker is not alone in the wilderness of inertness in TPLF's government) could be antithetical to the creeds of a developmental state – efficiency, effectiveness, technocracy, competitiveness, prudence and decisiveness. Filling the government with such inert people turns the claimed "developmental state" into anti- developmental primitive political entity. I believe TPLF is deliberately doing this for political reasons (to maintain its supremacy in the EPRDF) although assignment of officials based on loyalty rather than competence could hurt its professed economic policies of a "developmental state". Onemay ask whether this is a good trade off. This being as it may, Aba Dula's recent interview with an Egyptian media gave us an opportunity to see thecontradiction between wanting loyalty in the political sphere and desiring competence in the economic sphere. Now let's contrast the leadership qualities of Ras Gobena and Aba Dula vis-à-vis both of whom critique is often hurled for lack of agency, political vision, and by extension, incompetence.

Ras Gobena Dacci versus Aba Dula Gemeda:

Without denying the controversial legacy of Ras Gobena, it is fair to saythat he relatively excels Speaker Aba Dula in many aspects including courage, diplomatic skills and characters of a competent statesman. Nonetheless, it is not uncommon to hear a charge pressed against Ras Gobena for his decisions and actions during the early expansion and consolidation of the modern Ethiopian state: that he had no wisdom to have his own political ambition – of founding the modern Ethiopian state as a co-equal with Menelik – but a mere vassal of the latter. Despite such criticism marshalled against Gobena by some ethno-liberationists and their disciples, some historical records reveal that Gobena was the most capable war general of his generation. For instance, Gobena was able to subdue the resistance in Gurage region after Menelik lost at a battlefield with Chaha tribe of the Gurage in October 1876 (see Bahru Zewde, The Aymallal Gurage in the Nineteenth Century: A Political History in SOCIETY& STATE IN ETHIOPIAN HISTORY: SELECTED ESSAYS, (2012) p.67).

According to Bahru, Menelik "was defeated and a large number of Amharacaptives were sold to Wallayta by the victors. Only one-third of Menilek's men returned safely. Among those killed in the battle was Alaqa Zanab, author of the first chronicle of Emperor Tewodros"

In contrast, Gobena led a successful expedition against Qabena and Walane tribes of the Gurage region in July 1880 and quelled their rebellion. A noteworthy point here is that Menelik was advised by Gobena to pull back his forces after he had crossed the Awash River to confront the said Gurage tribes because Gobena didn't want his partner to lose another battle in the region and anticipated what another loss would meanfor their bigger political project at hand. Again, in the same Gurage region, Gobena defeated Hassan Enjamo, who was able to mobilize Gurages and other Muslims against the Shewan forces, in 1889 killing more than 3,000 of their men while losing his son (Merid) and 29 fighters.It can be safely said that Gobena's capacity at organizing and leading war campaigns as well as his diplomatic skills in negotiating peaceful settlement with regional powers to bring their territories under the suzerainty of the emerging modern Ethiopian state at the time was unparalleled. Hence, Gobena's hand in bringing the western territories from Wollega to Jimma and Beni Shangul to Gambella is reminiscent of a competent statesmanship.

However, the new Gobena of TPLF, the honorable Speaker of the EthiopianParliament, (if the criticism against Ras Gobena for vassalage holds) has shown no wherewithal of a statesman in his interview with the Egyptian media. He can only function as a statesman under the tutelage of TPLF in TPLF's political empire. Well, Aba Dula's pedigree also includes that of a war general like Ras Gobena, but TPLF has not been generous enough so far in publicizing his battlefield achievements. Until the shenanigan empireof TPLF discloses the former general's military achievements, we are entitled to believe that Gobena excels as a warrior based on available historical records. Surprisingly enough, as one can glean from his online biography, the educational credentials he earned from China, the United States and the United Kingdom were not adequate to lift his veil of ignorance. In my view, the two Gobenas are incomparable: the earlier Gobena – a true statesman who cofounded modern Ethiopia with Menelik: the new Gobena – a remarkably inept messenger of TPLF. It is my contention that TPLF might have encouraged the Speaker to do the interview in English, a language, they know, he doesn't have good command of, to expose his ineptness and to send a chilling message to hisOPDO colleagues that the top position in Arat Kilo is beyond their reach because one of their own failed to effectively represent the government in external relations when given the opportunity. Now, we can connect the dots and surmise why Juneidi Saddo, another TPLF protégé, was discharged dishonorably from the government in November 2012. At least, he could have given a decent interview in English to an internationalmedia or effectively represent the government on international platforms thereby raising the hopes of rank and file OPDO members to start thinkingone of their own could possibly take the chief executive position in the government or wreak havoc till their aspiration in this regard is given a serious consideration. Thus, it seems to me that TPLF got rid of him to nipin the bud any potent internal power struggle.

Having said all that about the ineptness of TPLF government officials and having discussed the reasons for which reliance on coercion or building a developmental state may no longer be effective power strategies for TPLF,I would like to wind my opinion of part I of this write-up by posing the following questions to be examined in detail in part II. What should be prioritized in our thoughts in the new year of 2015 to unshackle ourselvesfrom the yoke of TPLF's tyranny? Unless we are clear headed about what we want, what our priorities should be, how to bring together various groups with differing political interests to deal with the grave political and economic problems brought upon the Ethiopian people by the authoritarian rule of TPLF, the prospect of bringing real democracy and meaningful economic progress for all Ethiopians would be a daunting and far-fetched project. NILE: Ethiopian, Egyptian patriarchs share "God's gift to all"By Michel Adel, Al-Ahram (January 21, 2015)

On a visit to Cairo, the head of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church urgedcloser relations between the Egyptian and Ethiopian Churches, writesMichel Adel

It was his first visit to Cairo since he became head of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church in February 2013, and Ethiopian Patriarch Mathias I made sure that his week-long stay in Egypt included matters of both spiritual and diplomatic importance. He talked to his peers in the EgyptianCoptic Church about closer ties, conferred with the Egyptian prime minister and stressed that Egypt and Ethiopia must always remember howmuch they have in common.

The Ethiopian Church has been trying to ease tensions between Cairo andAddis Ababa over the Renaissance Dam, currently under construction on the Nile in Ethiopia. The church was an archdiocese of the Egyptian Church before it became independent in 1959. Patriarch Mathias was received by Coptic Pope Tawadros II at the Abbasiyya Cathedral in Cairo.The meeting was attended by Bishop Pimen, in charge of Egyptian- Ethiopian relations in the Egyptian Church, and senior clergymen.

In remarks to the Weekly, Mathias said that Church leaders should helpfind solutions to world problems, a role which they could assume due totheir frequent discussions with governments and politicians all over the world. Speaking about the bonds between the Egyptian and Ethiopian Churches, Mathias said, "We all have to confirm this relationship so thatfuture generations may not forget its importance."

He continued, “The River Nile links us, and the Renaissance Dam in Ethiopia is allowing us once more to discuss its benefits.” According to theEthiopian patriarch, “Experts have made it clear that the dam will not harm Egypt or Sudan.” He proposed meetings between all the Orthodox Churches in an institutional fashion to reinforce ties, and advised Christians to “accept modernity and progress in a way that doesn’t compromise their faith.”

Welcoming the visiting patriarch, Tawadros II noted “the depth of the historical relations between the two Churches.” At a sumptuous reception for Mathias at the Cathedral, the Coptic pope said, “The historical relationsbetween the two Churches go back to the time of Pope Athanasius when he ordained Bishop Salama of Ethiopia.” Tawadros pointed out that “the two Churches have a geographical bond, being linked by the River Nile.” Mathias toured the Hanging Church in Coptic Cairo, one of the country’s oldest, before meeting Prime Minister Ibrahim Mehleb and the ministers oftrade, industry and health. Mehleb asked the patriarch to tell the Ethiopianpeople that Cairo is looking forward to closer bilateral ties. Egypt supportsdevelopment efforts in Ethiopia as long as these do not interfere with its quota of the Nile water, the prime minister said.

Ethiopia has the right to generate electricity and Egypt has the right to maintain its quota of Nile water, Mehleb said. The Ethiopian patriarch met President Abdel-Fattah Al-Sisi and thanked him for attending the Christmas celebrations at the Coptic Cathedral in Cairo, a gesture that hadpleased many within the Ethiopian Church, he said. Mathias added that hehad been pleased to see Egypt regaining its security and stability.

“There was a time when our two Churches grew apart because of Communist rule in Ethiopia after 1974, but those times are gone forever,”the Ethiopian patriarch said. He urged the Orthodox Churches to meet regularly and “link our institutions to carry out our duties and promote ourmessage.” The Ethiopian patriarch also led mass at the Our Lady of Zeitoun Church in Cairo, which was well attended by members of the Ethiopian community in Egypt. Bishop Piman said the Church is not engaged in politics, but is eager to help smooth out differences over the Renaissance Dam and reassure the two nations that the Nile is “God’s gift to all.” (Text ends)

On Nile River and the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam’By Tecola Hagos (March 7, 2015)

“Ethiopia will never ask the consent of any country to undertake development projects. Ethiopia is an independent country and will never request the consent of any country. Ethiopia will undertake its development projects in a way that does not cause any significant harm toany country. Moreover, Ethiopia undertakes its development projects based on principles. It takes into consideration the benefits of the countries from the development projects as well as friendship and healthyrelations with the countries.”-Alemayehu Tegenu, Minister of Water, Energy and Irrigation, interview, 'Newstime Africa', March 2, 2015.

Introdution

We all have read the great news that Ethiopia, Egypt, and Sudan have agreed on certain principles to guide them as their basic understanding onsharing the bounty of the Blue Nile. We have no access to the fine prints, and we know the Devil is in the details. I never give up on anyone not even on the Devil. Do I give up on principled mission any less? It is alwaysmy hope that Egypt will see the light from its unreasonable claim to use almost 90% of the water of the Tkur Abaye (Blue Nile) based on "historic use" and two treaties, wherein the originating country, Ethiopia, of nearly 90% of the water is not a member or signatory to such a treaty or arrangement between Britain as a colonial power signing for both its protectorate, Egypt (1929) and Sudan (1959).

It is always a great occasion when nations decide to resolve their problems through peaceful means of magnanimity, honesty, fairness, justice, and mutual benefits. Such great agreements are born out of strong principled presentations of each sovereign nation pursuing its national self-interest. Because of unpolarized interactions, national leaderswill start to recognize the legitimacy of all well founded claims and concerns of each other as riparian States. When national leaders reach such critical mass they know how to compromise and work to accommodate the interest of each.

Going to war is the easiest thing to do, and it is the least preferred by anyof the States involved in this triad dance of diplomacy, occasionally punctuated by Egypt convulsing and throwing tantrum threatening militaryaction against Ethiopia. Ethiopia will never lose any battle to any Arab country in the region. Let us leave no room for such fear. However, the absence of war does not automatically translate into economic development. For some unbeknown reason, of all the officials of the Ethiopian Government, I trust Alemayehu Tegenu, when Ethiopia's interest is in jeopardy, he will not betray Ethiopia. I have never met the man: I only saw how he handles himself on TV and read his statements in reports.

Use Correct Lexicon

To begin with it is a total error to think of the waters of Tikur Abaye (BlueNile) as the water of the Nile. The very name designation of "the Nile" water polarizes the basic facts on the ground. The Blue Nile of Ethiopia provides over 85% of the water that empties from the highlands of Ethiopia into the lowlands of Sudan and ultimately traversing Egypt's parched desert land. Without the run-off water from Ethiopia's mountainous basin source of all major rivers, such as the Atbara and the Blue Nile, less than fifteen percent of the Nile water comes out of further South from the Lake Victoria region and the surrounding basin. In other words, the Blue Nile water is the water that both Egypt and Sudan are benefiting from. So let us drop the crap and pretentious claim of "Nile" water and call it by its proper designation—the water of Abaye (the Blue Nile).

I was checking the reports of several media outlets of all of the riparian states of the Nile, and only one has as its headline the correct lexicon: "Sudan, Egypt and Ethiopia ministers strike deal on basis of sharing Blue Nile water," DAILY NATION, March 6, 2015 (Kenyan media). The headline is correct because it stats a factual matter that it is not the Nile water thatis the subject of the controversy but that of the Tikur Abaye (Blue Nile).

There seems to be very little coverage in Ethiopia both in the official andprivate media about the March 6, 2015 news of agreement on principle about the use of the Water of the Blue Nile and the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD).

Secretive Negotiations: the Ills of Untrustworthy Leaders

Negotiating an international treaty deciding which principle would prevail either the "historic use" that Egypt stands by or the "equitable and reasonable utilization" that Ethiopia supports, along with the promoters of the Cooperative Framework Agreement (CFA), is not an easy matter. We all know that almost 90% of the waters of the Blue Nile and other rivers ofthe Ethiopian highlands drain into the Sudan and Egypt. The course of thefuture history of both Egypt and Ethiopia must not be handled in secret since that history is going to be written with Blue Nile water as ink. One cannot hide what is inevitable.

I do not understand why the Ethiopian government leaders do not learn from past mistakes. They had all the chances to educate and prepare the People of Ethiopia about the problems facing Ethiopia from Egypt and the Arab League concerted historic destructive stance. No foreign policy can be successfully pursued by Ethiopia if the Citizens of Ethiopia are not fully supporting such policy. One constitutionally required way of insuring such support is to follow the Constitution provisions that require the approval ofthe House of Representatives. The House is not to be used as rubberstamping institution but as a functioning body to debate and examine any such Agreement, Convention, and Treaty, even Policy duringthe negotiation, the ratification and signing stages. All international treaties, agreements, covenants et cetera must be published and must be distributed to the public. For mass production, the Government must allowprivate publishers to republish and distribute such legal documents for their own profits.

The GERD book of account, the names and true identity of sub- contractors, the names all material suppliers et cetera should be disclosedand bid awards should be treated as any public/government bids with stringent rules and procedures. In order to build trust between the Ethiopian people and the Ethiopian Government, there must be proper disclosure of the activities of the Government dealing with foreign governments. There should not be any secret deals where Ethiopian territory is ceded to foreign states. The Ethiopian Government must disclose all deals that Meles Zenawi might have made with Sudan in regard to border land.

Basic Rights and Principles

The Cooperative Framework Agreement (CFA) (2010) has introduced some creative principles taking advantage of the trend set by United Nations international conventions and treaty agreements of the modern era on international rivers. One important principle that overrides the old"historic use" principle is "the principle of equitable and reasonable utilization" (art 4, CFA) of the resources of the Nile and the Nile Basin. Actually, I am of the mind that principle is too intrusive and covers vastarea. Egypt and Sudan by not signing are not serving their interest, forthe other riparian States might amend the CFA and leave narrow watershed areas for cooperation.

I have outlined hereunder some basic principles and governmental positions that all Ethiopian leaders and the Ethiopian Government as awhole should heed:

No agreement should be signed that impedes, or creates limitations on the Sovereignty of Ethiopia. Such limitation might come hidden in provisions of bilateral or multilateral agreements creating the rights of consultation, a seat in Ethiopian national Committees, Creation of a bodyof Experts with a seat to foreign nationals et cetera.

Creation of Rights in rem (rights in things) must be avoided on any construction on Ethiopian territory, such as Dams, Power-stations, Distribution Centers, Grids, Power-lines. All rights in personam (obligatoryrights) must be of the corporate type of holding shares in corporations fully established in accordance with the laws of Ethiopia. Share holdings must be through a corporate structure, and no Sovereign direct ownershipof any share in an Ethiopian Corporation should be allowed.

Licensing must never create any rights in any corps of asset in Ethiopia.Ethiopia could license distributors of its power in different states throughformal bids and business based examinations of the principals.

Never guarantee a certain amount of water to Egypt and/or Sudan, for you have no control on the rate of the rainfall. Growing up in Dessie a lifetime ago, I remember that the heavy clouds always sail by from West to East, later I learned it is the Atlantic Ocean that feeds the water bearing cloud that finally dumps al that fresh water on Ethiopia. If that is not God's blessing, Never agree to a provision that requires Ethiopia to appoint foreign arbitration, such as the corrupt and disastrous Border Commission that was established pursuant to the Algiers Agreement, a disgustingly anti- Ethiopian interest agreement that resurrected long dead colonial period treaties to deny Ethiopia's historic right and territorial sovereignty on theAfar coastal territories all the way to the Islands and beyond. Never eversign any agreement that affects our national security and economic development.

All Consultants, Arbitration Members, Ad hoc Committee of Experts, et cetera hired from foreign countries can be corrupted by wealthy Arabs in promoting Egyptian interest. Or could be biased on their own against our interest and in favor of Egypt hoping to get great deals later from the Arabcountries. We do not have the resources to top such rewards. Our only equalizing force is to use violence against individuals who breached such professional code of conduct and hurt our economic and political interest. Thus, relay on Ethiopian Experts at all levels.

Never ever walk into a meeting fearing possible armed conflict even all-out war. Do not ever forget we are the people who stood free and sovereign in our destiny for thousands of years. We are in our Territoryand anyone coming to attack us would necessarily lose.

Make sure that Ethiopia receives some form of compensation for the waterthat is preserved for use for both Egypt and Sudan.

The cost of maximizing the availability of water for the basin through prevention of soil erosion by planting hundreds of millions of trees andshrubbery must be sustained through some form of compensation by Egypt and Sudan.

Always remind Egyptians that 90% of the water they use is from the Blue Nile that Egypt does not contribute a single drop of water to the Nile water. Both Sudan and Egypt must work to dissuade fully all Arab League States from all political and economic campaign against Ethiopia. And to treat Ethiopian migrant workers in such countries with respect and justice.Conclusion

I hear often people feeling sorry for Egypt for being very dependent on one river. The fact is that Egypt is floating on a huge underground water reservoir. Egypt can utilize such abundance of water for its population rather than picking fights with Ethiopia stifling the legitimate aspiration ofEthiopia for feeding its population. If you visit Cairo and the many resort areas you will find countless swimming pools. Look at this ridicules situation: Egyptians luxuriating in swing pools with our Blue Nile water object to our using our own Blue Nile water to feed and provide potable water for our own needs?

'Huge' water resource exists under Africa, By Matt McGrath Sciencereporter, BBC World Service

There is much Ethiopia can offer to the region not only precious fresh water, but also tremendous talent and determined people who know howto maintain a nation for thousands of years. Already much has been carried out in Ethiopia. There is tremendous need for reform in order to expand individual rights. Corruption is rampant and illegal syphoning of hard currency from Ethiopia has reached an alarming stage. This hemorrhage must be dammed up. The Leadership in the Parties do needsome rest from years of hard work. They should retire and younger individuals need be inducted into the system. Election to me is an educational process and the outcome of any election, including the one coming up in May, is just an exercise—for the result is already predetermined in the staging of this drama. Latest Nile agreement is another TPLF giveaway: SMNE

Secretive Agreement on the Nile — Is the TPLF giving away the store?Press Release NA Post (March 25th, 2015)

(March 26, 2015 Geneva, Switzerland) -- On March 23, 2015, a TripartiteSummit on the Nile was held in Khartoum, Sudan, hosted by Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir, and attended by Egyptian President Abdul Fattah Sisi, and Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn. As an outcome of that meeting, these three leaders will sign an agreement of Declaration of Principles on the Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, which will later be presented to the Ethiopian Parliament for final approval. This agreement will include an impact study on the effects of the Ethiopian Renaissance Dam—an electrical project located on the Blue Nile in Ethiopia—on countries downstream. The results of this study will further shape the outcome. Ethiopians have reason to worry, as the details are vague and open to interpretation. What will be signed away before reallyknowing the impact? What will be the potential affect on generations to come, not only of Ethiopians, but also South Sudanese, Sudanese, and Egyptians? Other people in riparian countries upstream from the north- flowing river could also end up being involved in some of the impacts.

Insist that Ethiopia's Dam must be used solely for electric power generation and never for irrigation
Negotiate so that the price of electricity sold to Egypt and Sudan would be at cost thereby nullifying the value added from the project and negating the market itself
Insist that filling the waters of the Dam's reservoir should be staggeredover 6 years to reduce disruption to Egypt's supply and Insist that the operation of the hydro plant should be coordinated with Egypt," therebyundermining Ethiopia's sovereignty and diminishing its power.

In particular, an international watercourse shall be used and developed by watercourse States with a view to attaining optimal and sustainable utilization thereof and benefits there from, takinginto account the interests of the watercourse States concerned, consistent with adequate protection of the watercourse."

Group of the Nile Basin (GNB) "composed of Professors from Engineering,Irrigation and Hydraulics" who took matters to the next level. Their ultimate objective was to "support the effort of the Egyptian Governmentand decision-makers" through scientific research, scenarios and policy options. Their studies showed that Ethiopia's four large dam projects including the Renaissance Dam posed threats to Egypt's security. They accused the Ethiopian government of failure "to conduct "sufficient structural and hydrologic studies and environmental assessments." Theseexperts agreed that the Egyptian government should try to adhere to Agreements of 1929 and 1959 in any negotiation. They concluded, "Reduction in the water share of Egypt will result in abandoning huge areas of agricultural lands and scattering millions of families. It would result in in increasing the pollution of the water streams and creating problems in the supply of water for drinking and industry." They offered the following recommendations to the Egyptian government thereby undermining Ethiopia's national interests in advance of the Agreement.

Insist that the maximum size of the Ethiopian Dam must not exceed 14 billion cubic meter compared to the 74 billion cubic meter” designed andunder construction by Ethiopia
Insist that Ethiopia commit officially not to use the water behind the GreatEthiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) for irrigated agriculture
Insist that Ethiopia commit to give advance notice of future projects it hasin mind
Insist that the design and modification of the GERD be reviewed byEgyptian and international experts
Insist that filling the waters of the Dam’s reservoir should be staggeredover 6 years to reduce disruption to Egypt’s supply and Insist that the operation of the hydro plant should be coordinated with Egypt,” thereby undermining Ethiopia’s sovereignty and diminishing its power.

(Text ends)Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan pick two firms for Nile dam study’
By Reuters (April 10, 2015)
ADDIS ABABA (Reuters) - Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan have picked twofirms to carry out studies on the potential impact of Ethiopia's Grand Renaissance Dam on the flow of the Nile, an Egyptian official said.
The leaders of the three countries signed a co-operation deal in Khartoumin March that paved the way for a joint approach to regional water supplies.
Cairo and Addis Ababa had previously been locked in a bitter war of wordsover Ethiopia's $4 billion project.
Egypt, which relies almost exclusively on the Nile for farming, industryand domestic water use, has sought assurances the dam will not significantly cut its flow to its rapidly growing population.
Ethiopia, the source of the Blue Nile which joins the White Nile in Khartoum and runs on to Egypt, says the dam will not disrupt flow. Ithopes the project will transform it into a power hub for the electricity-hungry region.
“We have reached a good conclusion in selecting two international firms,”Egyptian Irrigation Minister Hossam al-Moghazi told Reuters late on Thursday.
Another Egyptian diplomat attending the talks said French firm Artelia wasone of the consultants and a Dutch firm the other.

Al-Moghazi declined to name the firms, saying the three countries had agreed to announce them once they get a response from both companiesby May 4, but told Reuters they were French and Dutch.
One of the firms will be the main consultant and the other a sub- consultant to carry out water and environmental studies, he said. They will compile the study over an 11-month period before publishing their recommendations, he said.
The 6,000-MW Grand Renaissance Dam being built by Italy's biggest construction firm Salini Impregilo is the centrepiece of Ethiopia's bid tobecome Africa's biggest power exporter.
Officials say 50 percent of its construction has so far been completed. Addis Ababa plans to spend some $12 billion on harnessing its rivers forhydropower production in the next two decades.
Regarding the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam'
Perspectives on the Declaration of Principles By Professors, Minga Negash,Seid Hassan, Mammo Muchie and Abu Girma (Updated April 11, 2015) (Analysis on GERD) On March 23, 2015, Egypt, Ethiopia and the Sudan signed a declaration of principles on the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam
[2] (GERD). Since then, an intense debate has been going on regarding the modalities and core principles which were spelled out in the Declaration. Unfortunately, the principles contained in the Declaration have invited unhealthy rhetoric, particularly within Egypt, Ethiopia and among the Ethiopian diaspora. There are two fundamental reasons for the negative discourses. The first one involves the non-cooperative, zero-sum game strategic behavior that is inherent within the actions of the parties. Game theorists, political scientists and economists very well know that shared watercourses invite unilateral and self-interest maximizing actions-the well-known zero-sum positions being the dominant solution. Added to this is the emotive nature of the Nile River that was instigated and imposed upon the peoples of the region by colonialism. The second has to do with Egypt's long-held historical ambitions to control the sources of Nileand colonial era position that is still reflected in the Declaration. On closer examination, we find that several of the current stipulations of the Declaration include many of the key elements of the 1929 and 1959 "Nile Water Agreements" that Ethiopia was not a part to. Consequently, the Declaration is framed not in a positive-sum game- "win-win" manner. Cognizant of the fact that the construction of the Grand Renaissance Dam has become a game changer, with its strong potential to lead for cooperation, we attempted to show that Egypt's policy towards Ethiopia has been unsustainable. We did so in our April 30, 2014 commentary. Even though we did not have the full and official Declaration in hand at the time of writing, we also attempted to raise awareness as well as our concerns using a short commentary that we disseminated on March 23, 2015. In particular, we called for (i) the translation of the actual Agreement into various Ethiopian languages: (ii) the revision of certain clauses: and (iii) as Egypt's President was heading to address the Ethiopian Parliament and request for ratification, we called upon the Government of Ethiopia to defer this process to allow time and space for reflection. After the release of that commentary, Aiigaforum.com[3], a website that is close to the Government of Ethiopia, posted a document which purports to be the final and authentic version of the Agreement. Except for the location of the signing, and singular-plural uses of certain terms, see for example “resources” versus “resource” in the preamble andthe sequence of the numbering of Principles III and IV of the Agreement, when compared to other versions available in the internet, the document appears to be authentic. [4] Though speculations are rife that the final agreement is still a secret, because of the importance of the matter, for this commentary we have used the version that was made available by Aigaforum.com.

Many have opined and welcomed the recent Egyptian diplomatic overture towards Africa, and its acceptance of the construction of the GERD, in particular. Even though the current tripartite Agreement seemed to have temporarily eased the recent tension among the parties, and despite someof the positive aspects of the Egyptian diplomatic overtures and its intent to cooperate as spelled out in the Declaration, we observe that the Agreement is unsustainable in its current form. In fact, our examination ofthe Declaration of principles leads to the conclusion that the clauses are designed to re-assert the 1929 and 1959 water sharing agreements and the much criticized Framework for General Co-operation Between the ArabRepublic of Egypt and Ethiopia, July 1993, Cairo, Egypt [5] that was signed by the then Presidents of Egypt and Ethiopia. In this follow up commentary on GERD, we independently examine, in a non-technical manner, the elements of the tripartite Agreement which was signed in Khartoum on March 23, 2015. We do so by identifying omissions, sticky points and mistakes that need attention. Consistent with our April 30, 2014 commentary on this topic, we attempt to decouple political posturingwithin Ethiopia from the trans-boundary water issues that are facing the country. In doing so, we focus on the substantive issues so that the country avoids the repeat of the mistakes in the Algiers Agreement of 2000 between Eritrea and Ethiopia and the series of diplomatic maneuvering that created a landlocked country in 1993.[6] We decided toincorporate the clauses that are contained in the Declaration for the reader’s convenience.

Analysis of the Agreement

There are ten principles stated in the current Agreement. Below we provide comments for each element in the Agreement. For convenience,we juxtapose the Agreement (as published in www.aigaforum.com) in italics and our comments follow the article. Concluding remarks are provided in section III.

Principle of cooperation

To cooperate based on common understanding, mutual benefit, goodfaith, win-win, and principles of international law:

To cooperate in understanding upstream and downstream water needs inits various aspects.

Our Brief Assessments:

This article is not very different in spirit from the framework for cooperation that was signed between Egypt and Ethiopia in 1993. The intent of this principle appears to invoke clauses in the UN's Convention on the Law of the Non-Navigational Uses of International Watercourses that was adopted on 21, May, 1997[7] and the Declaration on Principles ofInternational Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, G.A. res. 2625, Annex, 25 UN GAOR, Supp. (No. 28), U.N. Doc. A/5217 at 121 (1970). It is however important to note that 17 years after its adoption, other than the United Kingdom no major power has signed the non- navigational use of international waters Convention. By the end of 2014, only 38 countries (out of about 194 Member States) have signed/acceptedand ratified it[8]. It is also interesting to note that 11 of the 38 countries are located in the African continent. None of the three countries (Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan) have signed, accepted or ratified this Convention.

The most controversial element of the 1997 UN Convention is Article 7 which deals with "not to cause significant harm" by upstream countries ondownstream countries. Concerned by the ramifications of this clause, many upstream countries that have important trans-boundary rivers are either shying away from ratifying the Convention or are openly objecting itas the Convention: (i) does not provide for compensation to upstream countries for lost opportunities, and (ii) exposes them to indeterminate and an uninsurable risk. As we shall see below, Article 7 features in both the recently signed tripartite Agreement (without recognition of opportunity costs and damage limitation clause) and in Article 5 of the 1993 agreement between Egypt and Ethiopia.

The Phrase "principles of international law" neither implicitly nor explicitly recognizes the existence of Nile Basin Cooperative Framework Agreement.Hence it fails to guide a comprehensive agreement pertinent to the region.[9]

The phrase "in its various aspects" suggests that downstream countries need additional waters or if they decide to develop new habitations, the upstream countries may have to give up their development opportunities.Research shows that downstream countries are usually densely populatedand industrialized, have flatter topographies and hence their water needsare higher than upstream countries. Furthermore, even though the Agreement is about the GERD (see the heading and the preamble of the Agreement), the Article is sweeping and covers the entire river system aswe shall see below.

Principle of Development, Regional Integration and Sustainability:

The purpose of GERD is for power generation, to contribute to economicdevelopment, promotion of trans-boundary cooperation and regional integration through generation of sustainable and reliable clean energy supply.

Our Brief Assessments:

The text states that the purpose of the project is to generate "sustainable and reliable clean energy supply". There are no auxiliary purposes and canbe interpreted to exclude, for example, the use of the waters for fishing, recreation, education and small scale industrial and irrigation projects around the dam. We do think that there are costs (risks) agreeing to this clause by the upstream country. There are no provisions for planting trees(timber, coffee, etc.), for example, to mitigate the erosion and evaporation, capture the carbon and/or put the soil into better use. This clause is, therefore, devoid of shared benefits and responsibilities.

Principle Equitable and Reasonable Utilization

The three countries shall utilize their shared water resources in theirrespective territories in an equitable and reasonable manner

In ensuring their equitable and reasonable utilization, the three countrieswill take into account all the relevant guiding factors listed below, but notlimited to the following outlined:

Geographic, hydrographic, hydrological, climatic, ecological and otherfactors of a natural character

The social and economic needs of the Basin States concerned

The population dependent on the water resources in each Basin State: The effects of the use or uses of the water resources in one Basin State onother Basin States:

Existing and potential uses of the water resources:

Conservation, protection, development and economy of use of the waterresources and the costs of measures taken to that effect:

The availability of alternatives, of comparable value, to a particularplanned or existing use:

Our Brief Assessments:

Even though this principle appears to be normal, it obligates Ethiopia tocontinue honoring Article 5 of the 1993 cooperation framework betweenEgypt and Ethiopia.

Sub article III (e), which deals with the existing and potential uses of thewater resources is a sticky point. It shall continue to be a source of tension as it is the focal point of the relationship between upstream and downstream countries. It needs to be examined in the light of the principles that are enshrined in the Nile basin framework.

Sub article III(f) does not sufficiently obligate downstream countries toinvest in water conservation and rationalization. The laxity in this sub article legitimizes the increased demand for water by downstream countries.

The scope of the Agreement does not include ground water resourcesavailable in downstream countries.

Principle of Not to Cause Significant Harm

The Three Countries shall take all appropriate measures to prevent thecausing of significant harm in utilizing the Blue/Main Nile.

Where significant harm nevertheless is caused to one of the countries, thestate whose use causes such harm shall, in the absence of agreement to such use, take all appropriate measures in consultations with the affectedstate to eliminate or mitigate such harm and, where appropriate, to discuss the question of compensation.

Our Brief Assessments:

As indicated above, this clause is taken from Article 7 of the 1997 UN Convention on the Law of the Non-navigational Uses of International Watercourses 1997- (effective as of April, 2014). The "obligation not tocause significant harm" is related to the age-old economic theory of externality which features in European trans-boundary waters and environmental agreements, in the form of the "polluter pays principle".The UN Convention states that:

"(a) Watercourse States shall, in utilizing an international watercourse intheir territories, take all appropriate measures to prevent the causing of significant harm to other watercourse States.

(b) Where significant harm nevertheless is caused to another watercourseState, the States whose use causes such harm shall, in the absence of agreement to such use, take all appropriate measures, having due regardfor the provisions of articles 5 and 6, in consultation with the affected State, to eliminate or mitigate such harm and, where appropriate, to discuss the question of compensation."

Article #2 of the 1997 Convention defines the term "watercourse" asfollows:

""Watercourse" means a system of surface waters and ground waters constituting by virtue of their physical relationship a unitary whole andnormally flowing into a common terminus"

It is interesting to note that the tripartite Agreement avoids the use of theterm "watercourse" and hence excludes the ground water resources in Egypt and Sudan that recent geoscience studies are indicating.[10] Furthermore, it is important to note that the "international law" is selectively used here to strengthen the position of the initiator-originator of the current text.

The opening paragraph of the tripartite Agreement starts with a rather misleading sentence. It states that "the three countries shall take all appropriate measures…." The article specifically deals with damages and not "causing significant harm in utilizing the Blue/Main Nile". The Blue/Main Nile originates from the highlands of Ethiopia and contributes approximately about 85% of the water to the Nile River system, and hence this clause is about Ethiopia. Downstream countries are not affectedby this clause as Ethiopia is. The clause is unambiguous in giving downstream countries right to "take appropriate measures to prevent significant damage" by the upstream country. The obvious issue that emerges here is sovereignty over the waters of the Blue/Main Nile, and the issue is more than likely to be a sticky point in that neither sovereign equality nor territorial integrity clauses (see Principle # IX below) are sufficient to protect Ethiopia. In fact there is concern that it can be construed as a voluntary ceding of sovereignty by Ethiopia. The phrase "significant harm is not defined" and there are no thresholds about water sharing, physical damages arising from faulty construction/management of the dam and Act of God. Hence it is subjectto various interpretations.

The clause refers to the Blue Nile/Main River. The Blue Nile/Main River hastributaries. In the absence of an exclusion clause for the tributaries, the clause maybe used to restrict Ethiopia from developing irrigation projectson any of the tributaries of Blue Nile.

Principle to Cooperate on the First Filling and Operation of the Dam

a) Agree on guidelines and rules on the first filling of GERD which shallcover all different scenarios, in parallel with the construction of GERD.

b) Agree on guidelines and rules for the annual operation of GERD, whichthe owner of the dam may adjust from time to time.

c) Inform the downstream countries of any unforeseen or urgentcircumstances requiring adjustments in the operation of GERD.

d) To sustain cooperation and coordination on the annual operation of GERD with downstream reservoirs, the three countries, through the lineministries responsible for water, shall set up an appropriate coordinationmechanism among them.

e) The time line for conducting the above mentioned process shall be 15months from the inception of the two studies recommended by the IPoE.To implement the recommendations of the International Panel of Experts(IPOE), respect the final outcomes of the Technical National Committee (TNC) Final Report on the joint studies recommended in the IPOE Final Report throughout the different phases of the project. The three countries, in the spirit of cooperation, will utilize the final outcomes of the joint studies, to be conducted as per the recommendations of the IPoE Report and agreed upon by the TNC, to:Our Brief Assessments:

Implicit in Article V is that the project is going ahead. Only the filling of the reservoir and operational/functional matters of the dam are to be negotiated. The presumption is that the pace of the filling should be slowenough to supply water to downstream countries but fast enough to satisfy Ethiopia’s needs as the NPR’s reporter has put it.

This article however crucially depends on a report that is yet to beproduced.

The leaked IPoE report vindicates Ethiopia on many fronts and as we indicated in our April 30 2014 commentary the deficiencies are not insurmountable. It remains to be seen whether the TNC report will be different from the one produced by IPoE. Notwithstanding this, the environmental aspect of the TNC report is expected to echo Egyptian concerns. It is important that the environmental impact assessment of theproject be comprehensive and linked to (i) current and potential ground water resources in downstream countries and (ii) the rather wasteful use of the resource in downstream countries and pollution around the delta.

Sub article V(b) refers to the “owner” of the dam, in the singular, and resolves the speculation about joint ownership, at least for the moment. As a result of the sensitivity of the project, we encourage the Governmentof Ethiopia not to allow either equity or linked participation at this time.

[11] IV. Principle of Confidence Building

Priority will be given to downstream countries to purchase powergenerated from GERD.

Our Brief Assessments:

Clean energy production and sale reduces the downstream countries' dependency on fossil fuel generated energy. Hence, this is not just a "confidence building" issue. It has direct and measurable economic consequences, and hence needs to be imputed in the pricing of electricityfor the proposed sale.

In many economies electricity falls within rate regulated industries. Hence,pricing for domestic use will be different from pricing for export.

International pricing will be a more complicated issue and may not be easily decoupled from the type of intergovernmental relationships thatemerge in the region.

The word "will" is equivocal since it has several meanings in the legallexicon as in thesaurus, and hence may serve as a point of future contention.

VII. Principle of Exchange of Information and Data Egypt, Ethiopia, andSudan shall provide data and information needed for the conduct of theTNC joint studies in good faith and in a timely manner.

Our Brief Assessments:

As indicated earlier, the IPoE had already stated that the social and environmental aspects of the project in downstream countries need anadditional study. The availability of such information should enable Ethiopia to complete the study. As indicated above, the study howeverneeds to be comprehensive, and does not have to be confined to the project.

Data accuracy, completeness and integrity can be sticky problems. Certain technical (engineering design, formulae, etc.) information mightbe proprietary and therefore confidential. The parties need to determine the minimum level of disclosure.

VIII. Principle of Dam Safety

The three countries appreciate the efforts undertaken thus far by Ethiopiain implementing the IPoE recommendations pertinent to the GERD safety.Ethiopia shall in good faith continue the full implementation of the Dam safety recommendations as per the IPoE report.

Our Brief Assessments:

Dam safety is as important for Ethiopia as it is for downstream countries.Notwithstanding this it is important to ensure that "best practice" is followed so that habitations and civilizations in downstream countries arenot threatened by faulty construction and substandard operations.

Downstream countries are formally acknowledging Ethiopia's complianceeffort, and it is good.

Principle of Sovereignty and Territorial Integrity

The three countries shall cooperate on the basis of sovereign equality,territorial integrity, mutual benefit and good faith in order to attain optimal utilization and adequate protection of the River.

Our Brief Assessments:

The concept of "sovereign equality" features in many international agreements, conventions and constitutive acts (example the AfricanUnion), and is defined in the UN 1990's Declaration on Principles.

[13] Each State enjoys the rights inherent infull sovereignty: (c) Each State has the duty to respect the personality

[14] of other States: (d) The territorial integrity and political independence of theState are inviolable: (e) Each State has the right freely to choose and develop its political, social, economic and cultural systems: (f) Each State has the duty to comply fully and in good faith with its international obligations and to live in peace with other States.

[15] This article is fairly standard and also features in the 1993 framework. However, it is unlikely to override the articles the dealt withdamages and rights that appear to have been voluntarily ceded to downstream countries in connection with the Blue/Main Nile and its tributaries.

Principle of Peaceful Settlement of Disputes

The Three countries will settle disputes, arising out of the interpretation orimplementation of this agreement, amicably through consultation or negotiation in accordance with the principle of good faith. If the Parties are unable to resolve the dispute through consultation or negotiation, theymay jointly request for conciliation, mediation or refer the matter for the consideration of the Heads of State.

Our Brief Assessments:

This article is also fairly standard. It evolves from the UN 1990 Conventionand that of the UN Charter. When this article is read together with Principle 1 of this tripartite Agreement, it brings back the 1997 Conventionand the mediation, arbitration and determination role of the International Court of Justice. Ethiopia's experience with arbitration has not been good and the Algiers Agreement and the ruling made by the Eritrea-Ethiopia Boundary Commission [14] are too fresh to be forgotten. Despite this fact,with lopsided clauses stacked against Ethiopia and in the absence of soundrules and principles governing the Nile water allocation and management, a "third party", particularly in context of the Nile Basin Cooperation Framework Agreement may lead to a better outcome.

In summary, when the recent tripartite Agreement on the GERD is compared with the 1993 bilateral agreement, though in many respects thespirits of the two agreements appear similar, there are also important differences.

III. Concluding Concluding Remarks

The current Agreement reaffirms Article 5 of the 1993 agreement which favored Egypt, includes terms about compensation for damages, restricts the scope of the dam project, recognizes "rights" to take action on the Blue/Main Nile, is sloppy on water utilization in downstream countries, andthe non-exclusion of the tributaries from the Agreement cumulatively put Ethiopia at a disadvantage.

The obvious and fundamental question that arises in the minds of many observers is whether a reasonable government representative of an independent upstream country, irrespective of his/her political credo, would sign without duress, the tripartite Agreement in its present form. Inlight of the above analysis and consistent with our initial reaction of March 24, 2015, we reiterate our statement that no free nation should besubjected to be a party to such a lopsided and risky Agreement.

We also think the shared Nile waters represent opportunities for all riparian counties. However, the good fortunes emanating from the Nile could only be leveraged if all riparian countries are able to overcome the seemingly self-interest maximizing but counter-productive zero-sum gameactions. The Nile Basin can facilitate the much needed African regional integration if all parties know how to share both the cost and benefit from this rich resource. Hence, the central point of departure for making bilateral, tripartite, quadripartite (as the case may be) agreements shouldbe the Nile Basin Cooperative Framework Agreement, which includes all the riparian states and centers around the equitable sharing of the trans-boundary watercourses. Egypt must not be allowed to divide and maintainits supremacy by undermining the regional cooperation framework that is already in motion.

Hence, in the interest of equitable, fair, sustainable, comprehensivesolution that guarantees shared benefits and responsibilities, we, therefore, call upon:

Policymakers and stakeholders of all riparian counties to understand thattrans- boundary water flows, by their nature, are susceptible to the tragedy of the commons- that attempts by individual nations acting independently or in a dominant manner could only damage the common resource, and recognize that only shared responsibilities could guaranteeshared benefits:

The parties to the current Declaration rectify the unfair, unequitable and unsustainable clauses that are damaging any party, Ethiopia, in particular:All political parties in the riparian states refrain from using the shared waters of the Nile for their self-preserving interests: The Declaration and future negotiations should evolve from the laudable

Nile Basin Cooperative Agreement:

Any signed treaties and declaration of principles be immediately translatedinto major Ethiopian and other riparian states languages so that the general public is aware of what is going on:

Hydrologists, economists, lawyers, ecologists, geoscientists, sociologists,water engineers and diplomats etc., in the region to make professional contributions so that the water sharing problem is resolved for the benefits of all in the region.

construction, during a media tour along the river Nile in BenishangulGumuz Region, in Guba Woreda. According to a government official, the dam has hit the 41 percent completion mark. due six months ago, but the parties involved have yet toagree on how consultants should even approach the studies. Persisting differences among Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan keep delaying the studies, which Egypt hopes will prove that the dam's construction will cause extensive problems for Egypt and Sudan. The differences revolve around details in the fine print of the offers submitted by the two consultant offices chosen to conduct the studies: the French BRL and the Dutch Deltares. The seventh round of negotiations ended July 22 in Khartoum without any signed contracts, however.

Alaa Yassin, spokesman for an Egyptian delegation of experts on the Renaissance Dam, said in an interview with Al-Monitor, "Our official position is that this dam is harmful to Egypt, and its storage capacity hasno technical or economic justification. The differences remain unresolved,and a great deal of time has been consumed. We were supposed to finishthe studies in no more than six months, but around a year has passed without signing the contract related to the consultants that will conduct the studies."

The Egyptian delegation, along with representatives of Sudan and Ethiopia, make up the international commission of experts on the dam. From September 2014 until March 2015, the three countries managed only to select the two consultant offices, but never signed any official contract with them. Members of the experts committee cannot agree on the proposals submitted. The resulting delay prompted political leaders in the three countries — Egyptian President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, Sudanese President Omar Bashir and Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn — to sign an agreement in March 2015 in which principles were defined inthe hope of resolving their differences.

The disagreements also revolve around the office's country of origin, as there was a Sudanese-Egyptian desire to exclude any consultancy from the United States. While Ethiopia proposed to select BRL, Egypt was leaning toward Deltares. Even after agreeing to hire both French and Dutch consultants, disputes over the division of tasks between the two intensified. While Ethiopia insisted that the French company be the main contractor and the Dutch the subcontractor, Egypt did not agree and insisted that the Dutch office take part in the process, with specific tasks. In light of these ongoing disputes that threaten the completion of joint studies, the Egyptian government announced it had conducted and submitted to both Ethiopia and Sudan at a July 22 Khartoum meeting two studies on the effects of the dam. One of the two studies underlines the effect of the dam on Egypt with respect to its water share as well as its production of hydroelectric power generated by the High Dam. The secondstudy addresses the flow of the lower water gates, which secure the waterneeds of downstream countries (Egypt and Sudan), especially when the Renaissance Dam's turbines stop.

Yassin told Al-Monitor, “Egypt handed over the two studies based on the Khartoum agreement to exchange national studies that would serve as areference to the consultant office, but the main reference [for the Renaissance Dam project] would be the studies that will be conducted bythe international consultant offices.”

He continued, “There are interests that prompt each party to cling to [its]position, but the Egyptian negotiator did not and will not pass any resolution that would harm Egyptians’ water rights, as the country is already suffering from water shortage.”

However, Sudanese Minister of Water Resources and Electricity Motaz Moussa pointed out in a press statement on the sidelines of the Khartoummeetings that the Egyptian studies are non-binding.

Moussa said that “the consultant office will submit the studies carried outby the three countries in this regard, but these studies would not be binding. What would be binding, though, is the outcome of the joint studies by the three countries.”

Egypt is concerned about the preliminary storage capacity of the Renaissance Dam, which Ethiopia decided to increase from 14 billion cubicmeters to 74 billion cubic meters. The beginning of the water storage process could potentially lead to a decrease in Egypt’s share of water at a rate ranging from 9 billion to 12 billion cubic meters per year. Egypt wouldlose about 3 million acres of agricultural land and 5 million to 6 million farmers would be displaced. Added to that is concern about the deficit in the energy production from the High Dam and the decrease in the Nasser Lake level to about 15 meters.

What is more, the project could lead to periods of drought, deterioration of the water quality and a possible dam collapse as a result of its construction on a downhill area that sees the strong flow of the Blue Nile waters at more than a half-billion cubic meters of water per day. These waters come from highlands that reach up to 2,000 meters, and this couldcause severe flooding that could wipe out some of villages and cities, particularly in Sudan.

Egyptian Minister of Water Resources and Irrigation Hossam Moghazi saidat a July 29 news conference attended by Al-Monitor in Cairo that differences concerning the scope of the work of the French and Dutch consultants have been resolved: The French firm will take care of 70% ofthe tasks, while the Dutch company will take care of 30%.

Moghazi added that “the offer submitted by the BRL will be reviewed onceamended at a meeting of the tripartite committee experts set to take place Aug. 12 in Addis Ababa. If the commission’s experts approve it, it will be presented to the water ministers of the three countries for signing at a meeting to be held in Ethiopia Aug. 20.”

However, if the committee’s experts find that substantial amendments were made and need to be further studied by the three countries, then thesigning will be postponed until a meeting to be held in Cairo in September.Egyptians are waiting for the Aug. 20 meeting, which will determine if the Egyptian-Ethiopian disputes might end, and whether contracts will be signed or negotiations will return to square one. EU diplomats reveal devastating impact of World Bank-funded Ethiopiadam project on remote tribes'

Lives of semi-nomadic tribespeople being irreversibly changed byrelocation into poorly planned settlements to make way for sugarplantation, says released report

A controversial World Bank-funded scheme to dam a major Ethiopian riverand import up to 500,000 people to work in what is planned to be one of the world's largest sugar plantations has led to tens of thousands of Africa's most remote and vulnerable people being insensitively resettled.

According to reports, released this week, by two teams of British, American and EU diplomats who visited the resettlement areas in the Lower Omo Valley in southern Ethiopia last year, the lives of 20,000 Mursi, Bodi and other semi-nomadic tribespeople are being "fundamentallyand irreversibly" changed by the mega-project.

The $5bn (£3.3bn) Gibe III dam, which towers 243 metres high and will generate 1,870 megawatts (MW) of electricity when completed later this year, will irrigate up to 175,000 hectares of land previously used by herders and small farmers. Constructed with money from the World Bankit has already been linked by human rights groups and anthropologists toconflict and widespread abuses by the Ethiopian government.

But the UK government, which is Ethiopia's largest donor, twice rejected freedom of information requests to release the findings of the diplomats' field visits to the resettlement areas on the grounds that publication couldjeopardise relations between the countries.

"Releasing the information requested could significantly damage the UK'sability to deliver government policy and to protect and promote UK interests," it argued.

However, two documents from the Donor Advisory Group released to Survival International by the European commission this week suggest thatthe Ethiopian government insisted that indigenous communities living downstream of the dam had no choice but to quit their ancestral lands to make way for the plantations.

In over 30 pages of reports of meetings held with communities and individuals last year, the diplomats say that the Ethiopian government didnot obtain the full prior consent of the tribes as recommended under international law. Many of the tribes had no idea that the dam would effect them, they said.

People from one un-named village were said to have been: "placed in a muddy and isolated site, in inferior huts. Their situation was deplorable: the absence of sanitation means [they] are suffering diseases such as bloody diarrhea and malaria. Services are unavailable, it takes a two-hourwalk to the nearest canal for bad quality drinking water while the nearest health post is eight hours on foot. Residents say the government does notallow this group to move out."

The diplomats reported that the remote Omo Valley has been totally transformed since the river Omo was blocked and irrigation canals built.They said they expected the influx of 500,000 workers, mainly from the Ethiopian Highlands, would lead to ethnic conflict and widespread socialdestabilisation.

A second group of British, EU and other diplomats who visited groups ofresettled Suri people heard evidence of corruption, financial mismanagement, land grabbing, inter-tribal raiding, and poorly planned settlements.
The diplomats, who were accompanied at all times by government officials, said they found no evidence of forced migration but stated thatthe government was not offering the semi-nomadic communities any alternative to permanent settlement and had not fully consulted groups before evicting them.
They also found that the giant sugar plantations would deny the tribespeople access to grazing and farming lands on which they dependfor survival. Around 200,000 people in the Omo Valley are likely to be affected by the dam in some way.
“It seems clear that local government and plantation have decided thatresettlement is necessary. Government is not offering communities anyalternative but to settle permanently,” said one report.
While some communities and individuals said they welcomed a more sedentary life with better access to health and education in the new villages, many others fiercely rejected the government scheme and have sought to remain independent.
The diplomats said they were not confident that they were getting a clear picture from communities whose testimonies were translated by government officials who appeared “anxious and distracted”. It was only when interviews were conducted without interpreters that they felt confident they were receiving an accurate impression of the situation. “Security is a major concern linked to an increase in the proportion of armed men and the use of alcohol. Traditional systems of conflict resolution are declining these cultural trends tend to increase the numberof killings,” one report said.
Britain’s Department for International Development (Dfid) has denied anyresponsibility for resettling people in the Lower Omo Valley but said it hadcontributed money for education, health, road projects and basic servicesacross Ethiopia, potentially including the valley.
The reports are embarrassing for the UK government because Britain was the largest of 21 international donors to a $4.9bn World Bank-organised funding program called Promoting Basic Services (PBS). This was designedto pay for health, road and water provision for people in resettlement areas across Ethiopia. Earlier this year it pulled out of the scheme having contributed an estimated £750m.
In a statement, Dfid said: “The UK has never funded Ethiopia’s resettlement programmes. Ethiopia remains one of the poorest countries in the world. UK aid to Ethiopia is improving the lives of millions of peopleby supporting health, water and education programmes, promoting job creation and improving people’s nutrition.
“Our previous support to the Promoting Basic Services programme paidfor health, education, water, roads and agricultural services provided by local governments. It did not support Ethiopia's resettlementprogrammes."

The two teams of diplomats made 37 recommendations to the Ethiopiangovernment. These ranged from ensuring that all resettlement programnmes are voluntary, to guaranteeing water and latrines in villages, consulting people before moving them, and offering people alternatives to becoming sedentary.

The diplomats' missions to the Omo Valley followed a damning report by Human Rights Watch and the World Bank's inspection panel. Although theWorld Bank rejected its panel's findings, World Bank president Jim Yong Kim admitted to serious flaws with its resettlement programmes.

Survival International accused Britain of trying to cover up abuses by theEthiopian government. "It took Dfid almost two years to investigate allegations of serious human rights violations. The two reports which it tried to prevent the public from reading show just how far it will go to cover up abuses by a regime which receives hundreds of millions of pounds of UK tax payers' money," said spokeswoman Elizabeth Hunter.

The Ethiopian government said in a statement: "Last year's Donor Advisory Group (DAG) report was generally positive, but where recommendations were made, or when the government itself noted that there was obviously a need for improvement, it has taken remedial actionand improvements have been made, and continue to be made on an on- going basis."

The downstream impact of the dam is also hotly contested. Some hydrologists have predicted that Ethiopia's expansion of water-intensive sugar and cotton plantations on the Omo river, which the Gibe III dam allows, could reduce flow to Lake Turkana by up to 70%. This would kill ecosystems and greatly reduce the water level of the lake, on which tensof thousands of herders and vulnerable communities depend.

This, says International Rivers, could make the difference between marginal livelihoods and famine for the tens of thousands of alreadyvulnerable people who depend on the lake for their livelihoods.

Exposed: Forced evictions in Ethiopia - what the UK government tried tocover up? By Survival International (September 3, 2015)

The UK government has tried to suppress evidence of gross human rightsviolations in Ethiopia's Lower Omo Valley, such as the forced resettlementof the Bodi and other tribes ©Nicola Bailey/ Survival, 2015

The U.K. government tried to suppress evidence of gross human rights abuses in Ethiopia to appease the government there, a new investigationby Survival International, the global movement for tribal peoples' rights,has revealed.

The key aid donors to Ethiopia, including the U.K.'s DFID,USAID and the European Union, sent two missions to theLower Omo Valley in the south ofthe country in August 2014, to investigate whether tribes there were being forced off their land to make way for commercial plantations.

The U.K. authorities refused to release the missions' reports under theFreedom of Information Act, saying their disclosure would significantly prejudice international relations. But Survival then appealed to theEuropean Commission, which has released them.

The reports reveal

- That the Ethiopian government has not obtained the consent of tribes ofthe Lower Omo to their resettlement:
- It has pressured and threatened them into leaving their lands – in somecases in fear for their lives:
- One tribal group told the donors, "before you come back next year, thegovernment will come to kill and finish us": The reports of two donors missions to the Lower Omo Valley reveal that land grabs deny the tribes access to the river banks they need for cultivation

- That land grabs associated with large scale plantations deny the tribes access to ancestral grazing and farming lands on which they depend forsurvival, and to the river banks they need for cultivation:
- On the conditions in one resettlement site the report states, "Their situation during our visit was deplorable: the absence of sanitation means the villagers are suffering from diseases such as bloody diarrhoea, malaria and unspecified headaches … Despite the dire circumstances in [name redacted], residents say the Government doesnot allow this impoverished and vulnerable group to move out":
- Donor guidelines designed to ensure that resettlement complies withinternational law have been routinely ignored.

Survival International has been urging the international donors to freezefurther aid to the Lower Omo Valley until the human rights abuses are stopped, but virtually no action has been taken. The U.K.'s 2014-15 aid budget to Ethiopia exceeds £360 million.

Survival's Africa campaigner Elizabeth Hunter said today, "It took DFIDalmost two years to investigate allegations of serious human rights violations in the Lower Omo. The reports it desperately tried to preventthe British public from reading show just how far it will go to cover up gross human rights abuses carried out by a regime which receives hundreds of millions of pounds of UK taxpayers' money. While entire tribes are subjected to violence, the destruction of their homes and livelihoods, and the theft of their land on a staggering scale, the UK government turns a blind eye in the name of political and economic expediency."

Background:

Around 200,000 tribal people live in the Lower Omo. Many have sufferedfrom brutal repression, forced relocation, and prejudice from a government that views them as "backward" and in need of "modernization."

One expert has warned that the loss of their land and resources will leadto a "humanitarian catastrophe," and one of the mission reports warns that the influx of more than 500,000 workers into the area is "likely to significantly increase the risk of conflict."

Survival has received reports that the Kwegu are starving following theconstruction of the Gibe III dam. The central findings of the donor missions were covered up in a letter to the Ethiopian government, published in February 2015. The letter sanitised the reports' conclusions to the extent that the Ethiopian press was able to claim that the donor missions had "found no evidence of people being forced to move for either resettlement for agricultural development projects in the areas they visited," and that it "found none ofthe problems claimed by Survival International or Human Rights Watch and others …"

In March 2015, Survival received disturbing reports that many of the small Kwegu tribe are starving as a result of the destruction of their forestand the death of their river following the construction of the Gibe III dam and associated irrigation schemes.

NILE DIPLOMACY: How to Share Water Along the Nile

By JOHN H. LIENHARD V and KENNETH M. STRZEPEKSEPT

CAMBRIDGE, Massachusets September 29, 2015

On the Blue Nile in Ethiopia, construction is underway on a public works project of gigantic physical proportions and exquisite political delicacy. TheGrand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, now about halfway finished, amounts to a test: With water becoming precious enough to be the stuff of war, cannations find ways to share it?

So far, so good. The project is moving toward completion, and a recent joint declaration of principles by the leaders of Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudanpledges cooperation and no "significant" downstream harm. That is critical, given that the dam will control nearly two-thirds of the water on which Egypt depends. But for the cooperation to be meaningful, these three countries will need serious technical analysis. Poor assessment of such matters as the variability of annual rainfall or minimum flows required to maintain downstream water quality could undermine a decentagreement, leading to conflict of unpredictable intensity.

That's because the flow of the Nile is climatic roulette. It experiences periods of plentiful water and periods of extended drought, and it always has: Remember the story (in both the Bible and the Quran) of seven yearsof plenty, and then seven lean years? But now the stakes are much higher: Egypt's population is 90 million, and growing. That country's Aswan High Dam, downstream from the Ethiopian dam, helps to moderatethese fluctuations, but a second large dam and its reservoir higher upriverare going to complicate things.

Egypt now receives virtually all its water from the Nile — about 60 billioncubic meters a year, slightly above the amount provided for in its treaty agreement with Sudan. That amounts to the withdrawal of 700 cubic meters per capita per year. Compare that with California, which annuallywithdraws about 1,400 cubic meters per capita from multiple sources, including 30 percent of the Colorado River's annual flow, and you understand just how scarce and precious the Nile's water is to Egypt's welfare.

California depends heavily on Lake Powell and Lake Mead, the reservoirs behind dams on the Colorado River, which together store slightly more than three years' worth of that river's total flow. The new dam in Ethiopia will have an even larger storage capacity than that of Powell and Mead combined, but still amounts to just 1.5 years of the flow of the Blue Nile alone. Adding in the very large reservoir behind Egypt's Aswan High Damgives a storage of about 1.75 years of the total flow of the Nile. It's not awide margin of safety for a long drought — as Californians will attest.

The monsoon rains in Ethiopia that will feed the new dam come mainly during just three months, so by storing that water, the new dam will moderate and smooth out the flow of the Blue Nile, the 900-mile-long headstream of the Nile itself. It will also generate huge amounts of electricity, the sale of which could finance much-needed development in Ethiopia — except that transmission lines to export the power are not yetbeing built.

Just as California has used stored water to become an agricultural powerhouse, Sudan will benefit by using the more stable flow of water from the new dam to raise its agricultural productivity. This will allow Sudan, which sits between Ethiopia and Egypt, to finally employ its full treaty allotment of river water, which in turn will reduce what is availableto Egypt.

It's clear that a cooperative agreement among Ethiopia, Sudan and Egyptis needed to avoid conflict and downstream harm. This includes agreement on what amounts to "significant" harm, given that, in the past, Egypt has been willing to go to war to protect its water.

All three countries stand to benefit if they work together. The dam's hugestorage capacity could help both Sudan and Egypt during drought years. And if Egypt were to agree to buy the power that the new dam will generate (and to build the transmission lines to connect to it, perhaps with international help), then Ethiopia will benefit economically from stored water that has to flow downstream eventually.

Here is where the technical issues will be critical. Last November, the Abdul Latif Jameel World Water and Food Security Lab at M.I.T. convened experts on Nile Basin water resources. They pointed out that managementof a river system with multiple dams required sophisticated joint management with a shared knowledge base and scientific modeling framework. The hard negotiations ahead to achieve detailed agreements on such things as reservoir operation policy, power trading, dam safety and irrigation practices will require that foreign policy and water experts from each of the three countries have a shared understanding of the technical issues and a willingness to compromise.

In May 2015, the three countries engaged technical consultants to assistwith these problems, but that arrangement has since collapsed over disagreements about project management. It behooves the internationalcommunity to help, through support of regional efforts like the Nile BasinInitiative, to build scientific and engineering coordination and knowledge among the three countries, provide impartial expertise, set up a management system and perhaps offer a process to resolve disputes.

The world needs to get good at sharing water, and right away. Thealternative is frequent regional conflicts of unknowable proportions.

THE REGIONAL NILE DIPLOMACY:Tension, disagreement persists in GrandEthiopia Renaissance Dam negotiations Menafn Daily Egypt News December 21, 2015

More tension and disagreement has emerged from the recent meetings inKhartoum between the ministers of water resources and foreign affairs ofEgypt, Sudan, and Ethiopia concerning the Grand Renaissance Ethiopian Dam project.

Sudan's Foreign Minister Ibrahim Ghandour described the tripartite meeting's results as having laid down a positive infrastructure that couldsoon be articulated in the form of an agreement that satisfies all sides during the meeting scheduled to be held in Khartoum later this month.

Ghandour blamed the media for failing to report on positive advancementsin the negotiations.

In an interview with Egypt's Middle East News Agency (MENA), Ghandourreasserted his commitment to the Declaration of Principles signed by thethree presidents last March in Khartoum that stated that no party shouldbe negatively ffected by the dam.

However, former minister of irrigation and water resources, Mohamed Nasr El-Din Allam told Daily News Egypt: "The negotiations of the previoustripartite meeting weren't positive or successful." Allam stated that the negotiations continue to be marked by relative intransigence with little agreement, dismissing Ghandour's characterisation of media bias as the principal issue, while also accusing the Sudanese government of intentionally prolonging the negotiations so as to commence construction on the dam before the conclusion of a technical study to be published on 1June 2016.

Allam added if the talks failed in the next meeting, Egypt should organisea presidential meeting to address its grievances internally before makingrecourse to the African Union's organisations and subsequently to the United Nations Security Council. (Text ends)

NILE REGIONAL DIPLOMACY:

The Dam-Nation of Ethiopia by the T-TPLF (COMMENTARIES By Almariam On January 3, 2016)

Last week, before the ink had dried on the “new agreement” on the so- called Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, Egyptian President General Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi told Egyptians during the inauguration of a national farmland project, “I totally understand the concern of Egyptians as wateris a matter of life or death. We already agree with our brothers [the Ethiopians] that they want to live as we want to live. I have not led you astray before and I will not lead you astray now.”

Is that military-speak for something?

“Water is a matter of life and death?” “They want to live as we want tolive?” “I will not lead you astray now?”

When generals (even in civilian suits) speak about “life and death” and “living” and not “leading astray”, I get really concerned. I may be biasedbut I think generals say they will not lead their people astray because they only know one path, the warpath. This kind of talk coming from generals really freaks me out. Am I being oversensitive?

Generals often speak with forked-tongue. They will not come out and say,“We are going to bomb this or that.” They will talk about an “air campaignon targets”. Generals won’t talk about “torture”. They will talk about “coercive interrogations”. They talk about “collateral damage” or “friendlyfire” but never about how “we killed our own soldiers or people by mistakeor negligence.” Generals don’t talk about a “blitzkrieg” (lightening war) but “shock and awe”.

El-Sisi does not seem to be mincing words here. To me he is sayingsomething very profound. But what exactly is he saying?

To be precise, what exactly is El-Sisi telling (assuring) the Egyptianpeople?

What exactly is he messaging the Thugtatorship of the Tigrean People’sLiberation Front (T-TPLF) when he says for Egyptians the Nile water is a“matter of life and death”?

What is El-Sisi telling his “Ethiopian brothers” when he says “they want tolive as we want to live”. If we don’t live, they don’t live?!

What is he telling the regional neighbors? What is he telling the Americanand European powers that be?

Is El-Sisi saying that he knows what he is doing now and in the future andthat the Egyptian people should not worry?

El-Sisi’s comments have prompted me to probe into his strategic intentions and capabilities and examine what appears to me to be brinksmanship military-speak. I hear El-Sisi saying the so-called Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam will be built when the Nile freezes and the devil goes ice skating.

In the interest of full disclosure, I need to make certain clarifications. First, I do not agree with President El-Sisi on a wide variety of human rights issues. I agree with Human Rights Watch’s assessment that underEl-Sisi Egypt “has overseen a reversal of the human rights gains that followed the 2011 uprising.”

On the other hand, El-Sisi has been “Ethiopia’s Friend in Need”. I mustgive credit when it is deserved.

When El-Sisi first heard of the beheading of 30 young Ethiopian migrants in Libya in April 2015 by the ruthless self-styled terrorist thugs known as “Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant” (ISIL) (also known as “Islamic State of Iraq and (Syria) al-Sham (ISIS)” because they were Christian, hecame out immediately and expressed his condolences on behalf of the Egyptian people who were “pained by the gruesome beheading of innocentEthiopians in Libya.”

El-Sisi was the man who sent Egyptian troops to Libya to rescue the remaining Ethiopians from certain beheadings and bring them back toEgypt safely on a chartered plane.

When the T-TPLF leaders heard of the Libya beheadings, they did not evenwant to acknowledge the occurrence of the inhuman acts.

Redwan Hussein, a T-TPLF spokesman said, “It’s being widely reported that ISIS purportedly shot, killed and beheaded Ethiopians. The Ethiopiangovernment is doing its level best to confirm whether the victims were Ethiopians.”

El-Sisi rose to the occasion as the T-TPLF sat on its duff on the sidelineslooking all bewildered, powerless and helpless, twiddling its thumbs andscratching its head.

El-Sisi stood at the head of a red carpet reception line at the Cairo Airportand greeted the rescued Ethiopians one by one, giving them encouraging words. Not one T-TPLF representative showed up at the receiving line.

Some may suggest that El-Sisi took advantage of a public relationsopportunity and maxed it out.

My answer is simple: “A man who is drowning does not care who tosseshim a rope!” A man facing certain beheading does not care who rescueshim or the reasons his life is saved!

The simple fact is that President El-Sisi ordered the rescue of the young Ethiopians because he wanted to: because he could: because he believedit is the right thing to do: because he believed in the brotherhood and sisterhood of the people of Egypt and Ethiopia: because he cared about Ethiopians Christians as Christians and as human beings who deserve to be treated with justice and dignity.

President El-Sisi, by acting courageously and swiftly to rescue the kidnapped Ethiopians in Libya, cemented the millennia old friendship andsisterhood between two of the world’s oldest civilizations.

I say the foregoing to say the following:

I do not believe El-Sisi wishes harm to the Ethiopian people. I do not believe he wants war with Ethiopia.

I believe El-Sisi will do his level best to find diplomatic and technical solutions to the myriad problems anticipated in the construction of the so-called Grand Renaissance Dam. Ibelieve El-Sisi will try to reason with the T-TPLF leaders to come up with afair resolution to the problems.

I also believe El-Sisi’s diplomatic efforts with the T-TPLF will fail totally and completely, not for lack of trying or good faith on El-Sisi’s part, butbecause of the ignorant arrogance of the T-TPLF leaders.

I believe that if push comes to shove and there is any depletion in Nile water flow to Egypt, El-Sisi will have no option but to resort to military means to ensure the so-called Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam will notharm or threaten to harm existing Egyptian farmlands, hydroelectric power production and reclamation of land for future farming purposes tofeed the rising Egyptian population.

My view is that what El-Sisi said after the “new agreement” must be examined in historical context and scrutinized for strategic intentions andcapabilities. Simply stated, going forward, I believe there are only two questions that need to be answered with clarity and certainty:

1) Has El-Sisi ruled out war or other military action to protect the 97 percent of all water Egypt gets from the Blue Nile and rely exclusively ondiplomatic means to resolve all outstanding issues?
2) Does El-Sisi now, or will he in the intermediate future have the militarycapability to make sure the status quo on water flow to Egypt continues? In my analysis, there is no question that El-Sisi and his military chiefs have come to the irreversible conclusion that the so-called Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam is a total and complete existential threat to Egypt and that the only solution to deal with the threat is a military one. This position is not something El-Sisi developed in a vacuum. The militaryoption has always been the core strategic option of successive Egyptian regimes who have regarded any dam construction on the Nile is an imminent existential threat to Egypt which must and will be resisted by any and all means necessary.
I believe all of the diplomatic dance and do-see-do that we see todayamounts to nothing more than delaying The Inevitable.
Since the onset of the Arab Spring in early 2011, the T-TPLF has sought tocapitalize on Egypt's political instability, fragility and regime change. The T-TPLF leaders thought they could take advantage of Egypt's internal problems to forge ahead with their construction and diversion of water from the Nile without much Egyptian pushback.
El-Sisi and his generals understood their own political vulnerabilities andplayed along with the diplomatic game for the last three years.
El-Sisi and his generals were biding their time with diplomacy. As Will Rogers said, "Diplomacy is the art of saying 'Nice doggie' until you canfind a rock."
My analysis of the situation is that El-Sisi is in a much stronger position than he was two years ago. The instability and turmoil that gripped Egypt between January 2011 and June 2013 is no longer a factor. There are no mass protests threatening to overthrow El-Sisi's government. El-Sisi has consolidated power and his military regime is internally unified. The crackdown on the Muslim Brotherhood, I suspect, has wide support amongthe elites, the military, the bureaucracy and other civil institutions. There even appears to be broad consensus among the elites that El-Sisi is likely their man to prevent Egypt's descent into civil strife and religious conflict. El-Sisi today is confident enough to tell Egyptians not to worry about the Dam. He will not lead them astray. He knows exactly the path he will be taking when push comes to shove. He is not going to let them down. The "Ethiopian brothers" are not dumb enough to present Egypt with an existential threat by damming the Nile because "they want to live as Egyptians want to live".
In other words, El-Sisi today has found his Rogerian rock. He does nothave to say 'Nice doggie' to the T-TPLF anymore. The only question iswhen El-Sisi will roll with his rock!
My analysis is that El-Sisi and his military planners have set on a multi-phasic and stepwise progression to the Inevitable.

I believe the strategic intention of the Egyptians is to go to war over the so-called Grand Renaissance Dam only as a last resort. They believe they have the military capability now or could easily obtain it in the future to neutralize any threat from the Dam. They see no need to take preemptiveuse of military force now.
I believe the Egyptian strategy will proceed along the following linesthough not in this order.
First, there is substantial evidence to show that the Egyptians have lobbied the international loaners and donors not to give money to the T- TPLF for the construction of the Dam. Egypt has launched such a campaign along two tracks: 1) by having "Egypt's ministers of water and foreign relations meet with their counterparts in countries with influence inthe Nile Basin" and 2) by having Egypt's ambassadors lobby against funding in these countries. This strategy has been successful as the T- TPLF has not been able to get loans or other financial support for the construction of the Dam.
Second, I believe El-Sisi will undertake efforts to delay construction of theDam by requiring the completion of an endless series of technical studies and analysis. The "agreement" last week to have further technical studieson the Dam's impact to start in February 2016 and take up to 15 months is just the latest example of such tactics. Undoubtedly, more studies will be requested in the future. I also believe findings from the technical studies will reveal evidence and conclusions (as various studies to date have shown) that the Dam will adversely impact Egypt in a variety of ways. I believe in the end El-Sisi and his generals will use these technicaland engineering studies as casus belli (cause justifying military action).
Third, through delays and other means, El-Sisi will aim to incur massivecost overruns in the construction of the Dam, eventually making it financially impractical to build and maintain.
Cost overruns in the construction of large dams are common in the ordinary course of events. In the largest and most comprehensive scientific study on the economic viability of large dams ever done, OxfordUniversity researchers Atif Ansar, Bent Flyvbjerg, Alexander Budzier and Daniel Lunn analyzed all large dams which were built between 1934 and 2007 for which reliable costs and schedule figures are available. That study concluded large dams suffered average cost overruns of 96% in constant local currency terms. Project implementation suffered an average delay of 44%.
Cost overruns in dam construction in Ethiopia are commonplace. For instance, the Tekeze hydroelectric dam on the Tekeze River, a Nile tributary, in northern Ethiopia was initially estimated to cost USD$224 million, but when it was completed seven years later in 2008, its cost skyrocketed to USD$360 million.
Structural problems caused by poor engineering and substandard materials in dam construction are also commonplace. Gilgel Gibe II Dam on the Omo River in February 2010 experienced "tunnel collapse[which] closed the largest hydropower plantoperating in Ethiopia, only 10 days after its inauguration."
Fourth, I believe El-Sisi will insist on the longest possible time to fill the reservoir if the Dam is ever completed and thereby delaying power production while increasing the operating cost for the T-TPLF.

According to a Norwegian engineering study, it will take seven years to fill the reservoirwith 67 billion cubic meters of water assuming all goes according to plan. Few things go according to plan. The super-secretive T-TPLF has not published its plans for the initial reservoir filling to meet its power production targets. Regardless, initial reservoir filling and evaporation after the reservoir is said to result in significant reduction of water flow to Egypt.

I am informed by experts that the reservoir filling process is a critical phase which must be handled with extreme care. Reservoir filling is affected by a whole host of factors including determination of filling rate, seasonal changes in water volume, means of controlling the rate of reservoir rise, remediation of problems that might develop during initial filling, placement of elaborate surveillance technology to detect problemsduring filling, planning for dam inspection and variable impact on downstream areas prior to and during filling, and so on. The reservoir filling period is likely to be a high-magnitude flash point between Ethiopiaand Egypt.

Fifth, if the Dam is ever completed, El-Sisi will undertake efforts to limit its financial viability by denying it a market. According to the T-TPLF, thepower from the "Grand Renaissance Dam" is to be sold to the Sudan, Egypt and the Arabian peninsula once construction is complete.

According to an October 2015 report, Azeb Asnake, "CEO" of "Ethiopian Electric Power" said "Ethiopian Electric Power spends nine US cents to generate one kwh of energy but sells it at a price of six US cents." "Ethiopian Electric Power" is currently selling power at a 33 percent loss.At that rate, the so-called Grand Renaissance Dam will be profitable onlyon Planet T-TPLF where they practice the voodoo economics of their latemaster Meles Zenawi.

Various studies have shown that electricity costs in Africa could be reduced substantially if there is regional integration and cross-regional collaboration in power production. The problem has been that such collaboration has been undermined by the absence of trust among Africancountries not only in cost sharing but also in the control and managementof dams for mutual long-term benefits.

The tragic irony is that in the current dispute between the T-TPLF and Egypt over the Dam, there is absolutely no trust. There is no evidence to support the view that the three neighboring countries will ever collaborateas development partners to build a reliable power sector. That is just a fact!

Sixth, if the Dam should be completed and become operational, it is highlylikely El-Sisi will take tactical short-term action to disable power grids, transmission and distribution lines, substations and the like. Such actions could result not only in prolonged and severe power outages and disruptions but also in the degradation of the Dam's infrastructure and performance capacity.

Seventh, I believe El-Sisi will exhaust every diplomatic and legal approachincluding mediation, arbitration, judicial proceedings and U.N. intervention to protect what he considers to be an existential threat to Egypt beforeresorting to military action.

Eighth, if the Dam should be completed and become operational, I do notbelieve El-Sisi will wait for any adverse economic effect to occur in Egypt before taking action. I believe he will go after the Dam with everything hehas got within days of the completion of the project in a lightning strike. Ihave no doubts about that!
Ninth, there is one undeniable fact all must accept: There is no question whatsoever that the so-called Grand Renaissance Dam will have a significant and adverse impact on the water flow to Egypt. Egypt today isfacing water shortages amid a growing population. It needs more water, not less. The Dam will result in significant loss of water flow to Egypt.
According to the United Nations, "Egypt is already below the United Nations' water poverty threshold, and by 2025 the UN predicts it will be approaching a state of "absolute water crisis". Simply stated, Egypt couldrun out of water by 2025! Any reduction in Nile water flow will be catastrophic on Egypt.
A Stratfor Global Intelligence report last week concluded that the "removalof volume from [Nile River] into the reservoir — which could take up to sixyears — could greatly reduce water supplies into Egypt. Eventually, the static water in the reservoir will also lead to a reduction in volume because of evaporation, which could deteriorate water quality."
According to a 2012 Norwegian study, during the seven year period it will take to fill the reservoir with 67 billion cubic meters of water, the Nile flowinto Egypt could be cut by 25%. Such a reduction in water flow will be catastrophic for Egypt. Once the reservoir is filled, there could be up to a 50 percent reduction in the flow of water to Egypt.
A 2014 report by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology concludedthat it was a pipedream for the parties to find a solution to the variousproblems created by the Dam:
Egypt, Ethiopia, and Sudan are currently hoping that a team of international consultants can quickly find technical solutions to these challenging problems to which they can agree. From our perspective, thisis likely wishful thinking. The hard negotiations ahead will require that foreign policy and water experts from each of the three countries have a shared understanding of the technical issues and a willingness to compromise while hammering out detailed agreements on reservoir operation policy, power trade agreements, dam safety, and salinization control.
I believe the die is cast.
Today's rumors of war on the Nile will prove to be water wars on the Niletomorrow. I believe that is foreordained and inevitable so long as the T- TPLF is determined to deprive Egypt significant water flow from the Nile despite protestations to the contrary.
The Egyptians have long said water is a matter of life and death for them.By 2025, it will literally be a matter of life and death for them!

In 1979, Egyptian president Anwar Sadat said, “The only matter thatcould take Egypt to war again is water.” Reduce Egypt’s water by 25percent and there will be war.
In 2010, President Hosni Mubarak presumably made a deal with the Sudanese leader Omar al-Bashir for the construction of a small air base tobe used as a staging point for a military assault on hydroelectric facilities.Reduce Egypt’s water by 25 percent and there will be a major airbase on Egypt’s southern border.
In June 2013, then-President Mohammad Morsi said, “Egypt’s water security cannot be violated in any way. As head of state, I confirm to youthat all options are open. We are not calling for war, but we will never permit our water security … to be threatened. If it loses one drop, our blood is the alternative.” Reduce Egypt’s water by 25 percent (or “one drop”) and there will be war.
In June 2014, Egyptian Major General Talaat Mosallam said, “Now the options are very few. Diplomacy is the first, but Egypt’s leverage is ‘at rock bottom,’ and if talks fail, Egyptian military commanders may decide that ‘it is better to die in battle than to die in thirst.’” Reduce Egypt’s water by 25 percent and Egyptian military commanders will decide that ‘itis better to die in battle than to die in thirst.
Some leading Egyptian political leaders have suggested various methodsof destroying the Dam, including support for anti-T-TPLF elements.
According to “credible” intelligence sources, Egypt has military plans todeal with any dam built on the Nile “after all diplomacy options fail”:
If it comes to a crisis, we will send a jet to bomb the dam and come backin one day, simple as that. Or we can send our special forces in to block/sabotage the dam. But we aren’t going for the military option now. This is just contingency planning. Look back to an operation Egypt did in the mid-late 1970s, I think 1976, when Ethiopia was trying to build a large dam. We blew up the equipment while it was traveling by sea to Ethiopia. A useful case study.
Reduce Egypt’s water by 25 percent and El –Sisi will send his jets to “bomb the dam” or “send his special forces in to block/sabotage the dam.”Tenth, in my view, the construction of the Dam for the Egyptians is, underno circumstances, a matter of negotiation, dialogue, mediation, arbitration, etc. for Egypt. Think about it. How can Egypt negotiate on a “matter of life and death”?
The late head honcho of the T-TPLF, Meles Zenawi said, “I am not worriedthat the Egyptians will suddenly invade Ethiopia. Nobody who has tried that has lived to tell the story.” (I believe this was one of the very few times Meles actually used the word “Ethiopia”. He almost always referred to Ethiopia as the “country”. I feel he was ashamed to say the word, “Ethiopia”. I have never heard Meles describe himself as an “Ethiopian”.
NEVER! I would like to stand corrected if anyone can produce adocumented instance in which Meles said in public that he is an“Ethiopian”.)
I am glad Meles takes great pride in Ethiopian military prowess. Of course,Meles is accurate in his historical observation. Ethiopia has maintained its independence and sovereignty for over three thousand years repelling allforms of invaders.

Emperor Menelik II vanquished the invading Italian Army at the Battle of Adwa in 1896, barely two years after the Conference of Berlin where Europeans carved up Africa to establish colonies. It is rather ironic that Meles should take pride in Menelik, the one Ethiopian leader he hated more than anyone. After Italy invaded Ethiopia in 1935, Italy was once again vanquished by Ethiopian patriotic resistance leaders from all parts ofthe country. That is why I believe ETHIOPIANS UNITED CAN NEVER BE DEFEATED BY A FOREIGN OR DOMESTIC ENEMY.
I am not sure Egypt, as Meles must have anticipated, has a land invasionplan for Ethiopia if the Dam is completed. I would venture to guess that El-Sisi would opt for surgical air strikes and covert commando operations.There are some analysts who suggest that an Egyptian military operationagainst the Dam could be difficult as Egypt may not have the military capability (e.g. in-flight refueling capability for its jets) to strike over a long distance. It would appear Egyptian military planners would factor forsuch contingencies.
It is definitely worth noting that in September 2015, El Sisi ordered the purchase of two French aircraft carriers and 24 “omnirole” Dassault Rafalefighters with a range of 1,850 km and a service ceiling of 50 thousand feet.
It worth considering how El-Sisi could exploit regional dynamics to hisadvantage in any strategic or tactical moves he may wish to make.
I have stated clearly my personal views on the Dam in my commentary,“The Dam Dammed by Cash Flow?”.
I am not against the construction of dams in principle. But I proudly wear the tag “Tree Hugger.” I wholeheartedly believe in environmental protection and conservation anywhere in the world. I believe smaller damsare better than large ones. My view is supported by a substantial body of scientific research.
I have a different view on the whole question of “power” in Africa, thepolitical and electrical one.
I believe it is important to first empower the people of Africa through improved governance and accountability before powering their homes andbusinesses. Dam construction in Africa, and particularly in Ethiopia, wheredams are built on non-competitive bid contracts, the only thing that is produced in the dams is corruption, corruption and more corruption.
I recently had opportunity to visit one of the most impressive dams on theColorado River. It was a great learning experience for me. I believe constructing and operating a large hydroelectric dam is an extraordinarily demanding task which carries substantial risks. I am not sure that those who are incapable of running Gilgel Gibe III could manage a dam that is going to be the largest in Africa.
As I stated in my April 2014 commentary, “Dam! White Elephants in Ethiopia?”, the “Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam” is a white elephant that does not make economic sense. Development Today, the independentjournal on aid, specializing in political, business and environmental issues related to Nordic and multilateral development assistance, called the Dama “highly politicized prestige project of the late Prime Minister”.

The “Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam”, formerly the “Millennium Dam”, was the brain child of Meles Zenawi who, like all of his predecessor African dictators, suffered from delusions of grandeur. The Aswan High Dam in Egypt stood as a monument to Gamal Abdel Nasser. Meles wantedto have a concrete memorial that could immortalize and glorify him as thelittle “Big Man” of Africa.

I believe the Dam will be a flashpoint for water wars between Ethiopia andEgypt.

Every time I write a commentary about the so-called Grand Renaissance Dam, the nattering lackeys and toadies of the T-TPLF kick into gear and call me “unpatriotic”, “hateful to the T-TPLF”, etc. They will say I will never miss an opportunity to talk negatively about the T-TPLF, its “accomplishments”, and what it wants to do for the country’s development. I don’t believe the T-TPLF lackeys and toadies can read andunderstand the analyses I offer in my Monday Commentaries. If they did,they would challenge me on the facts and my reasoning. But they never do!

To invoke the famous line, “Frankly, my dear, I don’t give a damn” whatthe nattering T-TPLF lackeys and toadies say. I tell the truth as I see it,as I think it, as I understand it and as I feel it.

But here is a challenge to anyone who wants to take it. Present an analysis of a scenario(s) in the construction of the “Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam” which will not provoke Egypt into resorting to militaryaction as an ultimate act in defense of what Egyptians believe is a “matter of life and death” to them!

I have made my case. Now, make yours!

Let’s debate the issues. Let’s examine the facts. Let the people be informed. Let them be forewarned of what could be the consequences ofthe Dam. Let the people know the truth about the Dam!

I would like to be proven wrong in my analysis here because I do not wishto see water wars or any other conflict in the region. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than seeing regional integration and cross-regional collaboration in power production between Ethiopia, the Sudan and Egypt.Such collaboration is likely to be found in the world of fantasy, not in Northeastern Africa.

Those who disagree with my analysis should consult the report issued byStratfor Global Intelligence last week:

… As long as the region remains divided on the dam, actual construction could be disrupted at any time. The dam is reported to be about 50 percent complete right now, and water is being diverted around the construction site. Still, even though construction is far along, Ethiopia has been unable to secure foreign investment for the project, and less than 30percent of the total $4.8 billion price tag to complete the dam has been secured. Unless Ethiopia manages to secure the required funding, completion of the dam could easily be delayed by several years. This is precisely why negotiations are so important: The better negotiations go,the better Ethiopia’s chances for obtaining funding.

What happens to the Dam is not in El-Sisi’s hands. It is in T-TPLF hands tomake the Blue Nile red. Damn! After all, it may all be much ado about nothing!No dam money, no damned dam!

NILE REGIONAL DIPLOMACY Updates:

Egypt and Ethiopia spar over the NileFebruary 6, 2014 by Hassen Hussein

On January 8, Ethiopia turned down Egypt's demand that it suspend construction of its mega-dam on the Nile, further escalating tensions between the two states. Fearing that Ethiopia's $4.2 billion project would reduce the river's flow, Egypt calls for a halt in construction until the dam's downstream impact is determined. Otherwise, it has vowed to protect its "historical rights" to the Nile at "any cost." While scoffing at Egyptian threats, Ethiopia has called for Cairo's collaboration in negotiations and claims that the dam will have no adverse effect on Egypt.It would, in fact, decrease evaporation and improve water flow. Ethiopia hopes that the ambitious hydroelectric project, slated to be completed in 2017, would catapult the country out of poverty. Frustrated by what it described as Ethiopia's stubborn stance, Cairo is threatening to take the issue to the United Nations Security Council. Is this just standard diplomatic brinkmanship before an inevitable compromise, or a harbinger of a looming water war? Regardless, the lack of progress on the diplomaticfront bodes ill for a quick end to a stalemate that has long gripped the region. Home to 600 million people, more than half of Africa's total population, the Nile Basin is already traumatized by endless internal political strife and mounting pressures to feed a population growing at Malthusian proportions. However, as ominous as it sounds, the collapse ofthe talks does not necessarily mean Egypt and Ethiopia will soon be locking horns. Despite suggestions to the contrary, this is simply the waning phase of a protracted diplomatic dance before an inevitable conciliation.

A dam for development

Although known as northeast Africa's water tower, Ethiopia until recently had not bothered to utilize its many rivers. The inability to make use of the Nile has been Ethiopia's age-old national lament. That changed in 2011, when the country announced plans for the construction of its so- called Great Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD), designed to generate a staggering 6,000 megawatts of electricity. By situating the project only 19miles from the Sudanese border on the vast Blue Nile gorge, where the land is unsuitable for agriculture, Ethiopia sought to reassure Egypt but ended up stoking its fears. The design and impacts of the GERD are shrouded in secrecy. Observers cast doubts on its timely completion. In aflawed bidding process, Ethiopia granted the project to a Milan-based engineering company, Salini Costruttori, circumventing its own contract procedures and international standards on procurement. The construction is reportedly lagging behind schedule and faces several unresolved technical problems, one of which is how long it takes to fill the dam.

Ethiopia claims the project is on course and dismisses facing any technicalhurdles. One of Africa's fastest-growing non-oil economies, Ethiopia has embarked on a state-led development fashioned after the economic miracles in South Korea and the rest of the so-called Asian tigers.

Ignoring warnings from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank that such a massive publicly funded infrastructure project would starve private investments, Ethiopia is forging ahead. To wit, when Egyptused its influence with international financiers to choke off funding, Ethiopia declared it would finance the project with domestic resources.

Gift of the Nile

The founding myths of many ancient civilizations center on famous rivers

— the Euphrates and the Tigris (Babylon), the Yangtze (China) and the Ganges (India), to name a few. However, not many are as inextricably dependent on a single river for their livelihood as Egypt is on the Nile. Egypt's history is defined as much by the flooding and drying beds of the Nile as by the pyramids. For a country described by Herodotus as "the giftof the Nile," control over the majestic river has been an existential Egyptian preoccupation since antiquity. The world's longest river is made up of a maze of tributaries. Nineteenth-century explorers went on a wild goose chase to locate the mysterious river's murky origin before tracing itto Lake Tana in Ethiopia and the Great Lakes in Central Africa. Two of the river's main tributaries are the Blue Nile and the White Nile. The Blue Nile,accounting for upwards of 80 percent of the Nile waters, originates in northern Ethiopia. It makes a steep descent from Ethiopian highlands — carrying brown silt — before it joins the White Nile in Khartoum, Sudan's capital, augmented by several large rivers from southwestern Ethiopia.

The White Nile originates in Burundi and flows northward from the GreatLakes region, crossing Tanzania, Uganda, and South Sudan.

Who owns the Nile?

The Nile's origin being outside its borders did not prevent Egypt from getting the lion's share of its waters. The claim for exclusive ownership ofthe Nile waters is premised on a 1929 treaty between Egypt and Britain'sEast African colonies, Burundi, Kenya, Rwanda, Tanzania and Uganda.

These colonies gained independence from Britain in the 1960s. The treaty awarded 57 percent of the waters to Egypt while also requiring other nations to clear with Cairo before launching any major water project on the river. Another treaty, signed in 1959 between Egypt and Sudan, raisedEgypt's share to 66 percent. The two signatories, divvying up virtually all of the Nile waters, did not even consult Ethiopia, the main source of the river. After the 1959 accord, both Egypt and Sudan built mega-dams to exploit the water for irrigation.

For years, upstream Nile Basin countries — Burundi, Ethiopia, Kenya, Rwanda, Tanzania and Uganda — nursed misgivings about the colonial-eraaccord, in which they had no say. However, they grudgingly acquiesced mainly because, unlike Egypt and Sudan, whose arid lands are watered bythe lone river, they are not wholly reliant on the Nile. But, finding the challenge of feeding their growing populations on rain-fed subsistence farming unbearable, upstream countries initiated negotiations in 1999 to find an equitable and reasonable way to share the Nile waters. The decade-long negotiations resulted in the 2010 Cooperative Framework Agreement, known as the Entebbe Agreement. The landmark accord, signed by the six upstream countries, was rejected outright by both Egyptand Sudan. Touted as “an African solution for an African problem,” the agreement calls for the creation of a commission to oversee development projects on the Nile. It needed ratification by the legislatures of each of the signatory countries. But its implementation is in limbo until another Nile Basin country — for example, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which is now sitting on the fence — signs it.

Ethiopia’s diplomatic coup

In a further blow to Egypt, its alliance with Sudan faltered in 2012 whenSudan, which gets 35 percent of the Nile water according to the 1959 treaty, rescinded its initial opposition to Ethiopia’s renaissance dam. Khartoum’s change of heart is attributed to a still-secret report by a panelof international experts that concluded the dam would neither significantlyaffect downstream countries nor fundamentally alter the flow of the river. But Sudan’s internal vulnerabilities presumably played a crucial role. In 2011, Sudan saw a huge chunk of its land mass secede to form Africa’s newest state, South Sudan. Ethiopia’s support for the former rebels of South Sudan (currently embroiled in a power struggle of their own) was instrumental in forcing Sudan — Egypt’s loyal ally — to accept the divorce.An international warrant for Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir in connection with the conflict in Darfur has made the country an international pariah. Sudan could not afford to alienate its increasingly assertive neighbor to the south and eventually threw its weight behind Ethiopia’s colossal undertaking. Although it has yet to sign the Entebbe Agreement, which loosens Egyptian and Sudanese dominion over use of the Nile waters, Sudan’s new stance hands Ethiopia a diplomatic coup. ‘Egypt’s ill designs’

The most recent Egyptian president to threaten war to protect Egypt’s “inviolable” rights over the Nile was the Muslim Brotherhood’s Mohamed Morsi. Last June, in a secret all-party discussion chaired by then-PresidentMorsi, which was “mistakenly” broadcast live on state TV, Egyptian lawmakers suggested arming Ethiopia’s political opponents to obstruct theconstruction. The tension subsided with the military takeover in Cairo.

However, after a brief interlude in which it appeared that diplomacy was to replace the menace of war, the military regime is now raising the ante. The high brass knows full well that a food shortage resulting from a significant reduction in water volumes means riots in Egyptian cities. The last time Egypt staked its claim militarily over the Nile and the Red Sea was in 1876, when it invaded Ethiopia. The two armies met at Gura, now an Eritrean territory. Egypt’s army was nearly wiped out by an ill-equippedand ragtag Ethiopian side that would, two decades later, go on to hand Italy a humiliating defeat at the battle of Adwa. Although it never ruled out direct military confrontation with Ethiopia, Egypt has since reverted to proxy wars. For centuries, Muslim Egypt supplied the head of Ethiopia’s Orthodox Church, a state religion until the 1974 revolution. The imperial regime of Haile Selassie found itself under political pressure to leave the centuries-old arrangement intact following the 1959 Nile accord that excluded Ethiopia. Despite this historical relationship, Ethiopia’s official historiography is replete with Egypt’s ill designs over it. In the 1970s, Ethiopia blamed Egypt for fanning the Republic of Somalia's irredentist claims over the Somali-inhabited Ogaden region of Ethiopia. The two countries went to war twice over the Ogaden. Egypt is also faulted for its role, with Sudan as its accomplice, in precipitating Ethiopia's loss of accessto the Red Sea with Eritrea's independence. Eritrea broke away from Ethiopia in 1993 after 30 years of civil war.

Official rhetoric notwithstanding, both Egypt and Ethiopia are represented by shaky regimes presiding over brittle states and divided societies. Giventheir internal vulnerabilities, neither country can afford to go to war — a war whose outcome is uncertain. While Ethiopia saw its economic fortunesrise over the last decade, its internal cohesion has not kept pace. Ethnic and religious cleavages as well as a border dispute with Eritrea (over which the two states fought a bloody war from 1998 to 2000) are constant reminders of its enduring fragility. Ethnic Tigreans, estimated at 6 percent of the population, have been in power since 1991. They dominate the country's politics, military, security and economy. This is resented by boththe Oromo, Ethiopia's majority population, and the Amhara, its traditional rulers. Over the last two years, the country's otherwise docile Muslim population, long marginalized despite accounting for a sizable portion of the population, has been increasingly restive. Ethiopia's single-party leadership has not fully recovered from the death in 2012 of its strongmanof two decades, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi. The new prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, a Protestant and from another minority group, does not hold as much clout as his predecessor and is seen as a temporary figure.

Khartoum's woes did not end with the secession of South Sudan, either.Its army is struggling to contain rebels in the Nuba Mountains. Muffled though they appear, Sudan's troubles in Darfur are far from over. Alienated by former allies, his capital rocked by Arab Spring–inspired unrest over the last two years, Bashir's three-decade hold on power is tenuous. He also has to dodge the arrest warrant from the InternationalCriminal Court in The Hague.

Egypt is facing far more serious calamities. It fired the imagination of the world's youth with its peaceful 2011 revolution. With the military wrestingthe reins of power back from its nemesis, the Muslim Brotherhood, and clamping down on dissent, the country has clearly slid backward. Pursuantto the overthrow of Morsi, its first democratically elected president, Muslim-Christian relations have soured. The elevation of a trigger-happy general to the presidency would heighten Egyptian vulnerabilities. In short, with Sudan now squarely in Ethiopia's camp, Egypt could not stage a ground attack on the dam. War by proxy has run its course. An airstrikeis still possible but fraught with risks.

The dam's long-term effect on the ecosystem upon which hundreds of millions depend for their livelihood is the greatest unknown. The tensions over the Nile, however, are not simply an old-fashioned competition for a scarce resource. They are rather symptomatic of deeper underlying schisms. The Nile marks the divide between black sub-Saharan Africa and the Arab Maghreb, and forms the fault line between Christian, Muslim, andindigenous Africa.

Moreover, the rhetoric of water wars over the Nile misses the crucial voiceof marginalized indigenous populations — whose lives are altered by thesestate-sponsored megaprojects. While the construction of the Aswan Dam in Egypt and a smaller one in Sudan have enabled the two countries to develop thriving agro-industries, they caused wanton destruction to the Nubian people's ancient way of life. As a result of the secrecy surroundingthe Nile discussions and the lack of tolerance for political dissent in all three countries, there is little discussion of the dam's impact on indigenous communities and the horrendous environmental consequences.The dam's long-term effect on the ecosystem upon which hundreds of millions depend for their livelihood is the greatest unknown. There is a widespread charge that studies of the dam's environmental impact are as faulty as they are insufficient. It is unclear whether the justifications for such megaprojects are even grounded in economic rationality, let alone environmental sensitivity. And why not multiple smaller dams with soundeconomic, technical and environmental rationales rather than one humongous project? Ethiopia has not yet answered.

The way forward

While the specter of a global water shortage is real, talk of the Nile Basin becoming the first battlefield in the coming water wars is a bit of a distraction. This does not mean that war over the Nile is to be ruled out. In fact, despite rampant vulnerability, indeed because of it, the countries may find it impossible to compromise on their maximum demands. To Egypt, water security equals national security. To Ethiopia, the dam has become a matter of national pride. As much as the Aswan High Dam stoodas a monument to Gamal Abdel Nasser's quest for grandeur, the GERD symbolizes Zenawi's shot for a place in the history books as well as a ployto spruce up the ruling party's patriotic credentials. By casting the project as Ethiopia's renaissance, Ethiopia risked that Egypt would see the projectas its relapse. Facing water shortages amid a growing population, Egypt has actually been asking to increase its share of the Nile waters to 95 percent. With positions so widely apart, the risk of conflagration is not entirely rhetorical.

However, one thing is clear: The greatest sources of danger staring down at each of Africa's oldest states — Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan — are internal rather than external. While realizing that the oldstatus quo that left it with a veto over the Nile's bounties is untenable, Egypt's future lies not in saber rattling but in returning to the aborted revolution's democratic path. Owing to the increasing volatility of the rains, Ethiopia would inevitably need to use its rivers to feed 94 million hungry souls. Devoid of democratization, Ethiopia's regime needs to realize that economic development alone won't resolve the country's woes. At the same time, antagonizing as important a player as Egypt is not in Ethiopia's long-term interest. An Egyptian airstrike can turn the clock back on the dam. Although Ethiopia lacks the means to respond to such an attack in kind, Egypt risks earning the international community's wrath and seeing its relationships with sub-Saharan Africa strained.

Compromise offers the only way out for both. Yet it is likely to be years before a durable peace built on a win-win formula replaces rancor over theNile. While the latest collapse of talks is a diplomatic circus, it should be noted that dueling regimes, lacking democratic mandates, may indeed overreact to external threats, real or imagined, to win domestic legitimacy. Since a conflagration in the Nile Basin bears global repercussions, the international community must not be oblivious to the inherent dangers. NILE REGIONAL DIPLOMACY:

Egypt Has a Water Problem

By Marwan Ezz Al Arab for Global Risk Insights

Since his inauguration just over a year ago, Egyptian President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi has attempted to reconcile and rebuild relations between Egypt and Ethiopia, focusing on reaching agreements with both Sudan andEthiopia concerning the effects of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam on the flow of the Nile River upstream.

However, recent negotiations have stalled due to disputes over the division of labor contracted to foreign consultants who will assist in providing a comprehensive study on the effects of the Dam on the flow of the Nile River.

Since work began on the Grand Renaissance Dam in April 2011, Egypt andSudan have continued to vehemently oppose its construction. As such, as the Ethiopians proceed in their pursuit to complete the Dam, preliminary agreements have yet to be reached by the three nations, who have been locked in diplomatic disputes since 2011.

Conflict of interest

Agreements signed in 1929 and 1959 granted Egypt approximately 55.5billion cubic meters annually, and Sudan 18.5 billion cubic meters, from an estimated total of 84 billion cubic meters. However, the question of water sharing between the Nile Basin states emerged again in 1999 withthe signing of the Nile Basin Initiative (NBI).

The Initiative, which was signed by all the Nile River riparian states excluding Eritrea, called for increased dialogue and information sharing aswell as joint planning and management of water and related resources in the Nile Basin. Over the next eleven years, Nile Basin states worked on a Cooperative Framework Agreement (CFA) intended to ratify an agreementconcerning the cooperative management of the Nile resources.

In 2010, the agreement was officially signed by Ethiopia, Rwanda, Tanzania, and Uganda, but Egypt and Sudan rejected it, claiming that it infringed on their current uses and rights of water resources from the NileRiver.

Several studies focusing on the effects of the Renaissance Dam already conducted by the Egyptian National Panel of Experts claims that the construction of the Dam will have catastrophic effects on Egypt, which could stand to lose up to 60% of its agricultural land. Indeed, Egypt's share of the water supply could decrease from anywhere between 9 billionto 12 billion cubic meters per year.

With Egypt's population currently at 84 million people, and with an annualpopulation growth rate of 2.6%, the Egyptian Government will have to tackle the issue of Nile water resources as quickly as possible in order to address a population that could increase by an additional 30 to 40 millionpeople within the next 15 years.

At the same time, Ethiopia's current population of 96 million people is in dire need of additional sources of energy, and also saw a population growth rate of 2.5% in 2014. This huge growth in population will mean that the Ethiopian government will be looking towards the Grand Renaissance Dam (which is set to become the largest hydroelectric powerplant in Africa) as a crucial source of water supplies, employment, and energy for its people.

Contingency plans

While Egypt should be exerting as much effort as possible in resolving thedispute, the Egyptian authorities should also simultaneously develop a contingency plan for a dramatic decrease in Egypt's water supplies. One option that is available to the Egyptian government is to begin fully utilizing the Nubian Sandstone Aquifer Systems (NSAS), found in its western desert and along its border with Sudan.

According to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the NSAS is one of the largest aquifer systems in the world. It extends over 2,000,000km2 and contains about 540,000 km3 of water. This underground goldmine of non-renewable water resources could be the vital lifeline that helps sustain parts of Egypt's agriculture, and could also assist in developing new habitable areas for Egyptians in the once uninhabitable western desert.

Another option for the Egyptian authorities is to pursue further development of water desalination plants. Egypt's current desalination plants operate on a small scale, and primarily service the tourism and industrial sectors. Due to its high costs, however, development of largeradditional desalination plants to cater to agricultural and human settlement needs has not yet been exploited.

These two opportunities provide Egypt with strong alternatives to the water crisis that the upstream Nile Basin states face in the long-term. Nevertheless, Egyptian authorities should prioritize reaching a fair and justagreement with relevant African countries.

What is clear is that both Egypt and Ethiopia are in need of resolving thiswater conflict sooner rather than later: any continued delays in negotiations will only lead to further degradation of relations between all the Nile Basin states. Regardless of any bilateral trade agreements and increased cooperation, all the states involved in this dispute should makeit a priority to resolve the conflict before regional or international actors become involved and further complicate the process.
With all three nations set to meet again on the 20th of August, PresidentSisi and his government should make reaching a preliminary agreement with Sudan and Ethiopia a top priority. (Text ends)

NILE REGIONAL DIPLOMACY:

Egypt declares 3 alternative options if Renaissance Dam negotiations fail

Al-Masry Al-Youm

For the 10th time, the six-party meeting of the Renaissance Dam negotiations, which was attended by foreign and water ministers in Khartoum on Saturday, failed to find solutions to outstanding problems between Egypt and Ethiopia, especially with regards to the French and Dutch consulting firms tasked with the project's technical studies.
Observers are still counting on the next round of negotiations, slated for December 27, to reach an understanding after nearly two years of negotiations. Others, howver, believe Ethiopia is stalling until the completion of the dam, of which 50 percent has already been constructed.But Egypt has the following three alternatives if the negotiations fail completely:

1- To cancel the Declaration of Principles that was signed on March 23 by Egyptian President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, Sudanese President Omar al- Bashir and Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn. The documentcontains 10 basic principles that preserve the Egyptian rights to the Nile water and that are consistent with the general rules of international law that regulate the use of common rivers. The principles include cooperation, development and economic integration, a pledge not to causesignificant harm to any country, the fair and equitable use of water, cooperation in the first filling of the reservoir and the annual operation of the dam, confidence-building, exchange of information, safety, respect of sovereignty and territorial integrity and peaceful resolutions of disputes.
The document also includes mechanisms for the settlement of disputes between Egypt and Ethiopia, including consultation, negotiation and mediation in accordance with international law and agrees not to prejudicethe historical conventions of the Nile water.

However, it does not address water shares or uses, mentioning instead the filling and operation of the dam. The agreement is to be followed by other agreements of principles. Nader Noureddine, professor of water resources at Cairo University's Faculty of Agriculture, says Ethiopia is misusing the Declaration of Principles and is stalling to gain time to complete the construction of the dam. He adds that Egypt has jumped thegun by signing this agreement, which explicitly states that Ethiopia has absolute sovereignty over all water resources and recognizes the legitimacy of the dam without reservation, while it does not tackle any guarantees for Egypt's historical share of the Nile water. "Parliament should cancel the Declaration of Principles. In this case, Egypt can withdraw its recognition of the dam in accordance with international lawand the Egyptian Constitution," says he.

2- To stop negotiations and resort to the United Nations and the Security Council. Noureddine says the basic rules of international law and the Nile Basin countries regarding the use of water do not allow any country to exploit its rights without the approval of the other countries. He says Ethiopia has committed numerous violations by building a high dam, as international law and United Nations agreements stipulate that upstream countries should build low dams so as not to harm downstream countries."Egypt should make it an international issue and demand the countries that finance the dam to stop funding it because it threatens its national security," he says.

3- To file a lawsuit with the International Court of Justice Noureddine alsosuggests that Egypt should file a lawsuit with the International Court of Justice in The Hague so as to pressure Ethiopia to sign an agreement thatensures Egypt's share of Nile water. "Egypt should consider this a hostile act on the part of Ethiopia because it did not notify it in advance of the construction of the dam," he says. Edited translation from Al-Masry Al- Youm

NILE REGIONAL DIPLOMACY: GERD IN CRISIS:
Agreement Reached Between Egypt, Ethiopia and the SudanEgyptian Streets December 29, 2015
Egypt, Ethiopia and Sudan have signed an agreement aimed at curbing Egypt's alarm at the speed of which the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam('the dam') is being constructed. The agreement is based on a preliminaryagreement that had been reached in March 2015 between the leaders of the three countries in Khartoum, Sudan.

According to Egyptian state media, it was agreed that a French consultingfirm would conduct research for a period between eight months and a year. Ethiopia has also agreed to not fill the dam with any water from theNile River until some sort of consensus has been reached between the three countries. The agreement also states that regular meetings will be held to solve other disagreements between the three countries and to respond to all Egyptian concerns regarding the filling of the dam with water. The agreement, which was signed after talks between foreign ministers of the three countries in Khartoum, is obligatory and shows thatthe three countries hope to solve the issue diplomatically in a way that results in stronger bilateral ties, said an Egyptian Foreign Ministry source to Egyptian Streets.

History of the Ethiopian Dam Crisis

During the ninth meeting of the three countries in Cairo on 8 and 9 November, Egypt denounced the speed of the construction of the dam andthe delay of studies into the impacts of the dam.

Egypt's main concern since the start of construction of the dam in 2011 is its high storage capacity, which reaches 74 billion cubic meters, over fearsof affecting its national water security. As per agreements signed in 1929 and 1959, downstream countries Egypt and Sudan together receive the majority of Nile Water. Egypt annually receives 55.5 billion cubic metres ofthe estimated total 84 billion cubic meters of Nile water produced each year, while Sudan receives 18.5 billion cubic meters.

Egypt initially condemned the dam's construction, stating that Ethiopia decided to build the dam without informing other countries that may be impacted. Currently, approximately 55 percent of the dam has been constructed despite no studies into the dam's impact. Egypt is not only concerned that the dam will impact Egypt's water supply, but would also have impacts on the environment and security (for example, in the case ofan earthquake or a terror attack). Moreover, Egypt has also expressed worry that the dam would impact the generation of electricity by the Aswan High Dam. How far Egypt would go to protect its rights in the Nile River remains unclear. However, analysts say international arbitration is far more likely than a military incursion in the case where all diplomatic paths have failed.

Side note: Pro-government Fana Broadcasting left out the most importantpart of the agreement: "Ethiopia cannot use any water from the Nile to fillthe dam until some sort of a consensus is reached". I think they are ashamed to mention the surrender of the Ethiopian authorities to Egyptiandemands. I have a feeling this is the beginning of a long drawn out disagreement between Egypt and Ethiopia. Egypt in the meantime can muster both its diplomatic influence which is much more than Ethiopia to influence any decision Ethiopia may make. It is a very disgraceful bowing that the Ethiopian authorities just did. Since filling the dam with water may take several years, agreeing to delay, which could further be delayedfor lack of consensus, could make Ethiopia loose opportunity costs that could come from the use of the dam in time. It appears that Egypt has gotten its way. But interestingly the TPLF media FBC, "forgot" to report the central and most important point in the agreement. Amazing piece of journalism. (Text ends)

Water Shortages At Tekeze Hydro-power generation

The 300-megawatt capacity Tekeze Hydropower Project in the drought-affected Tigray region is producing only 10 megawatts, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn was cited as saying in an interview with The Reporter, an Addis Ababa-based newspaper, published on Nov. 28.

Two months after the end of the main rainy season, there are severe water shortages at the country's oldest dam at Koka on the Awash River,which can generate 42 megawatts, and the 153-megawatt Melka Wakenaon the Wabe Shabelle in east Oromia, Hailemariam said.
ver 94 percent of Ethiopia's electricity was generated by hydropower inthe last quarter of the fiscal year that ended July 7, and production increased 3.5 percent to 2,300 gigawatt hours compared with the year before, according to central bank data. The first two turbines from the 1,870-megawatt Gibe III plant have started producing power, Bezuneh said, without giving details.

The construction of Africa's largest power station, the 6,000-megawatt Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, is scheduled for completion in mid- 2017 and it may annually produce as much as 15,860 gigawatt-hours ofelectricity.

Ethiopia to face power cuts as drought dries dams

By William Davison, BloombergDecember 2, 2015

Ethiopia may face further power shortages because of low water levels atdams after a poor rainy season, an official said, following two days of sporadic cuts caused by technical faults at hydropower plants.

Unspecified issues at a substation serving Oromia region's Gibe 1 and 2plants, which together can produce as much as 604 megawatts, and a shutdown at the 320-megawatt Tana Beles installation in Amhara state,caused the outages on Nov. 28-29, Ministry of Water, Irrigation and Energy spokesman Bezuneh Tolcha said Monday by phone.

The drought affecting the east of the country that's left 8.2 million Ethiopians in need of food aid wasn't related to the outages, though that may change in the coming months unless there's non-seasonal rainfall, hesaid. "There has been a shortage of rain all over country," he said from the capital, Addis Ababa. "The dams have not collected as much water as they can collect."

Growth in Ethiopia, Africa's second-most populous nation and largest coffee producer, was 8.7 percent last year and may be 8.1 percent this fiscal year, according to the International Monetary Fund. The drought threatens to crimp economic expansion in a country where 39 percent of output stems from agriculture, about 90 percent of which relies on rainfedagriculture.

http://www.landgovernance.org/system/files/Ethiopia_Rahmato_FSS_0.pdf. So far there are no established and commonly accepted rules, procedures or guidelines for transfer of land to investors. At present thereare two major channels through which land is provided to investors: the Regions, and the federal government, through MOARD. While the latter has drafted standard guidelines for land transfers, rent assessment and land use practices, these have not yet been adopted by the Regions and are not common procedure (see MOARD 2009c, d, e)

The new guidelines increase the rates substantially, though it may not be considered high by standards of other countries. The draft establishes a maximum of 2660or 2541Birr per hectare for irrigated or rain-fed land, respectively, located within a 100 km of Addis Ababa, and a minimum of 158 or 111 Birr for similar lands located more than 700 km away (MOARD2009d). ETHIOPIA ECONOMY

'Military Incorporated'? African armies are big players ineconomies - with Ethiopia, Egypt top of the list

M&G African Writer New Vision November 26, 2015

UGANDA’S army has announced a tie-up with a Chinese company to makeexplosives, which would then be sold both locally and to the East African country’s neighbours.

The state-owned New Vision newspaper, quoting top Defence officials, lastweek reported that a planned factory would produce explosives for use in industries including mining, road and railway construction.

The venture is between the China Wanbao Engineering Corp. and LuweroIndustries, which is owned by the Ugandan military and has been producing small ammunition for its own use, in addition to a clutch of other products from the army. But once the plant is operational, the dealwould feasibly swell its coffers given the construction boom in the region,making the army a bigger player in the country’s economy.

It will also place it the league of a select African militaries that directly engage in business, by extension making them more invested in politicsand partly explaining why some regional regimes survive, and others don’t.

Many are in industry— in aligned industries such as weapons production, and count countries such as Algeria, estimated to have the largest militarybudget on the continent.

But other militaries have branched out into the wider economy, accounting for significant holdings. Among them is the Metals & Engineering Corp (METEC), run by Ethiopia's military which ranks among the continent's top five by soldier ranks.

Set up in 2010 after 15 disparate businesses run by among others, the Defence ministry, were grouped together, it is essentially a conglomerate estimated to be running well over 50 factories and reporting directly to thecountry's top leadership.

METEC is involved in various projects from electricity generation to machinery manufacturing and vehicle assembly, many in partnership with Chinese firms. The corporation is a key government pillar for diversifyingone of Africa's fastest growing economies, which runs on a centrist development model but is extremely reliant on agriculture.

'National dam'
METEC has also been taking part in the construction of the Grand Renaissance Dam, a flaghip 6,000MW project that Ethiopia is building across a tributary of the Nile, having been contracted by state agency Ethiopian Electric Power Corporation. It is also set to finish work on at least three sugar factories this year, also with Chinese backing, and whichwould help turn the country's fortunes around the commodity.

"Not only will we stop importing sugar, but we will start exporting [it]," Sugar Corp. spokesman Zemedkun Tekle said in a November 9 interview with news wire Bloomberg. The Ethiopian government is currently the onlysugar producer in the country, and has set itself a target of becoming a top 10 global exporter by 2023.

But for overall economic value, Ethiopia's military businesses would struggle to beat the grip of the army in Egypt. In July the North African nation to much fanfare unveiled the "new Suez Canal"—a 72-kilometre section expected to reduce congestion on one of the world's busiest—andmost lucrative—shipping lanes.

The new route involved 37 kilometres of dry digging and a similar distanceof expansion and deepening the existing canal.

“By reducing the navigation time in the Suez Canal, your food, your medicine and your fuel will arrive faster. It will be Egypt’s gift to theworld,” Suez Canal Authority chief Mohab Mameesh said at the time.

The new section was considered a “national project” that will help right Egypt’s listing economy following the upheaval of the 2011 revolution. Butthe striking thing was that it was completed dead on time—a rarity for projects of such magnitude in the continent, having cost about $8 billion.

The difference is that while it was funded by domestic investors, it was built by the army, and completed in just a year, instead of the budgetedthree, reportedly on the orders of strongman Abdel Fatah al-Sisi, who hopes to gain politically from Egyptians hit hard by the economic downturn.

Happy soldiers

Despite apathy in recent elections, Sisi remains popular to many Egyptians tired of years of political turmoil. A former soldier in a suit, he will however also owe his longevity to keeping the military happy—a factorthat is believed to have contributed to Hosni Mubarak’s 2011 ouster following moves to squeeze the role of the army in the economy.

The earning capacity of the Suez is this a mouth-watering attraction a military that already owns industries that hold huge sway in the economy,despite much of their operations being opaque. Military brass are said to be dabbling in everything from bottled water to the major infrastructure projects, and are present in almost every decision-making structure in thecountry. Their business activities have been estimated to be worth anywhere from 1%-6% of what is the third largest economy in Africa.

The army has also been accused of elbowing out private-run businesses, including through undercutting them owing to low overhead costs and zero taxation, in addition to “insider” advantages on bids.Egyptian soldiersmarch along the banks of the Suez Canal after Islamic State militants threatened to disrupt the opening ceremony of the new waterway in Ismailiya, on August 6, 2015 (AFP)

The Egyptian model that to a less visible extent finds takers in countries like Angola and Zimbabwe, where liberation movements preside over a web of largely opaque companies that are direct players in the economy,with the former’s generals being particularly active in the reconstruction business following the civil war.

In August last year, President Robert Mugabe defended the involvement ofthe Zimbabwean military in business, saying their activities were contributing significantly to the country's struggling economy and its long-term growth.

Peacekeeping windfall

It is not always the big visible projects. For small countries like Burundi,the military has become a major player in the economy through an unexpected route: peacekeeping. The country, lately in the news over fears of a complete break down in its social order following a disputed presidential election, has been one of the foremost troop-contributing nations to the African Union's Somalia mission.

The monthly take home of a regular soldier is estimated at about $20: byserving in the mission this rose nearly 40 times. In one of the continent's tiniest and poorest economies, Burundi soldiers have been in recent yearsbeen catapulted into the decidedly modest middle class, and one reason offered for the failed military coup earlier this year was the threat to thissource of income following AU displeasure with the country's leadership. In other words cutting out Burundi from the 22-000 string mission wouldsever a key source of income for the military.

For some militaries, the underground economy is more attractive— Guinea-Bissau's status as a "narco-state" was on the back of its ever- present army, which was accused of aiding and benefiting from the illegaltrade.

Guinea-Bissau has been plagued by coups since independence from Portugal in 1974 and the instability has attracted South American drugcartels using the country as a transit point to Europe.

In 2013, the head of the country's armed forces, General Antonio Injai, was indicted by a US court on weapons and drug trafficking charges, twoweeks after his ally, a former head of the navy José Américo Bubo Na Tchuto was arrested by American undercover detectives.

Some of the reasons offered for the involvement by the military in the economy are that they are more efficient and disciplined, but it is also notlost that they prop up many regimes in the continent, and they have to bekept well fed and occupied. (Text ends)

BUSINESS REPORT

Ethiopia's foreign land leases fail to deliver food for exportBloomberg November 26, 2013

By William Davison Addis Ababa - Gleaming tractors and harvesters aresitting idle five years after Karuturi Global opened a farm in Ethiopia thatwas hailed as the poster child of the country's plan to triple food exportsby 2015.

About 80 percent of the Indian-based company's land in the southwesternGambella region is in a flood plain, meaning its 100 000 hectare concession is flooded for up to seven months of the year, according to managing director Ramakrishna Karuturi.

The company was unaware of the extent of the flooding when it leased theland, he said. "Karuturi, like many other large-scale investors, underestimated the complexity of opening land for large-scale commercialagriculture," Philipp Baumgartner, a researcher at the Centre for Development Research, said. "The land leased out wasn't properly assessed by either of the contracting parties," said Baumgartner, who has written a doctoral thesis on agriculture in Gambella. Karuturi, the biggest rose grower in the world, was one of the first to take advantage of a government plan to lease 3.3 million hectares of farmland to privateinvestors.

The Ethiopian programme got off to a poor start because of transport andelectricity problems, a lack of security, and a shortage of funds and farming expertise, said James Keeley, a consultant for the International Institute for Environment and Development.

The plots are located mainly in sparsely populated, heavily forested areassuch as the states of Benishangul-Gumuz and Gambella, which border South Sudan and Sudan. Leases in some regions were given out without checks on investors, environmental impact assessments or performance-monitoring plans, Keeley said.

In 2008 the government began leasing land for as little as $1 (R10) per hectare per year. At the time, it projected that within five years, commercial farmers would be producing food on about 900 000ha. As of last month, only about 10 000ha had been developed out of 400 000ha allocated, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn said on October 20.
Karuturi is not the only company struggling. Saudi Star Agricultural Development, owned by Ethiopian-born Saudi billionaire Mohamed al-Amoudi, grows rice on 350ha of a 10 000ha lease as it completes an irrigation canal that will allow it to ramp up cultivation.

Ruchi Agri, based in Mumbai, obtained 25 000ha in Gambella. After three years, it was growing soya beans on 1 000ha and had cleared another 2 000ha of scrub at a cost of $1 500 a hectare, technical manager Rameshsingh Pardesi said. If all went to plan, the operation might becomeprofitable by 2020, he said. Other major investors had had their leases cancelled, Keeley said. One was Hunan Dafengyuan from China, which took a lease to grow sugarcane on 25 000ha in Gambella.

In November 2010, Karuturi said it would have “developed” its 100 000haby June this year. In the final quarter of last year, Karuturi harvested its maiden maize crop from about 4 percent of the concession. Karuturi’s stock has slumped from a peak of 36.30 rupees (R5.80) on November 9, 2010, to 1.60 rupees on the stock exchange in Mumbai.

Most of Karuturi’s farm is still covered in a thick scrubland of bushes andtrees. A plaque to commemorate its opening now lies in land taken backby the government after confusion over exactly where the company’s lease was.

The company was given 300 000ha by the regional government beforeofficials in Addis Ababa reduced the plot size by two-thirds in 2010.

Karuturi said there was now a plan to rent out the idle tractors, harvestersand crop-spraying machines to other farmers.

RELIEF EFFORT

Ready or not - drought tests Ethiopia

By Colin Cosier, IRIN November 27, 2015

ADDIS ABABA, 27 November 2015 (IRIN) - Herding weary sheep up a dusty path, Hussein Boru knows he won't find green pastures. He's justlooking for the minimum to keep his flock fed in drought-hit eastern Ethiopia.

Boru, a pastoralist from the Karrayyu Oromo ethnic group, has been forced to move his 30-strong extended family 60 kilometres from their oldhome. The drought, he says, has made their land unlivable, but the countryside they're crossing is hardly any better.

In broken plastic sandals and with just a bolt-action rifle to ward off hyenas, Boru is resolute: "The only things I depend on are God and mylivestock," he told IRIN.

Ethiopia today, one of the world's fastest growing economies, has spent big on rural development and drought-resilience schemes, and says it hasthis year's situation under control.

The scale and severity of the drought has been compared to the notoriousfamine year of 1984, and soil moisture in some parts are at 30-year lows,according to satellite data, but nationwide the picture is mixed.

The spring Belg rains were largely a failure, and weak summer Kiremt rains exacerbated the situation in this farming nation. In the affected areas, crops barely grew, the stunted shoots only suitable for livestock.

The poor Kiremt rains have been linked to the Pacific Ocean warming phenomenon known as El Niño. For a country where agriculture accounts for more than 40 percent of GDP and ensures the livelihoods of more than80 percent of the population, the situation is serious.

More than eight million need aid

The UN says 8.2 million Ethiopians – out of a population of close to 100 million – are in need of food assistance, and projects that this number willballoon to 15 million next year. The government has bought a million metric tonnes of grain, but the supply is only expected to last the next fewmonths.

Ethiopia is expected to be hit hard by global warming, with big swings in rainfall variability from drought to flooding. The ability of farmers to adaptto a changing climate, and the government to identify a path to sustainable development, are key for the country's future.
On the outskirts of Welenchiti town, 120 kilometres from the capital AddisAbaba, along the country's Chinese-built (and only) expressway, Workitu Tegenu, 30, says her farm's teff and sorghum crops failed despite three planting attempts. Her family is relying on savings to feed their 10 children but she worries about the coming months. Workitu says she's requested government aid but has not yet received any.

A few kilometres away, Habebe Badada's farm lies in the shadow of thenearly completed Addis Ababa-Djibouti railway, close to the old, discontinued line.

Habebe's crops also failed entirely. He plans to make it through to next year's harvest with the minuscule wage he receives guarding, part-time,the old tracks that cut across his barren fields.

The 50-year-old can't remember a worse drought. "Even the 1984 droughtwas better," he said.

Fighting the famine image
The 1984 famine that prompted Bob Geldof's Live Aid appeal unfolded under the Marxist-Leninist military junta, the Derg. Civil war exacerbatedthe disaster, with the Derg battling secessionist rebellion in some of the drought-affected areas.

Ethiopians have been trying to shake off the famine image ever since,which helps explain the government's control of this crisis' narrative.

In fact, not one of the top independent aid officials IRIN spoke to would goon the record, agreeing to speak only on condition of anonymity. The politics of the drought are that sensitive.

While there was unanimous agreement among those interviewed that theauthorities are working hard to avert disaster, not all agree the crisis is "under control" as claimed by government spokesman and communications minister Getachew Reda at a recent press conference.

Paying the bills
One point of contention is how the severity of the crisis is being communicated. "There is no one that we know of that has lost their life asa result of the drought-induced crisis," said Getachew.

But a top foreign aid official says while no one is starving to death, about200,000 children die each year from preventable diseases linked to malnutrition, and the drought will make matters worse.

How the disaster response will be paid for is another cause for concern,warns the head of one international NGO.

“The country is running out of foreign reserves… if there’s no cash toimport grain what are they going to do?” he said.

In October, a figure of $596 million was set to cover the costs of thedrought response until the end of the year.

The government has contributed $192 million while the international community pledged $163 million, leaving a significant funding gap thegovernment insists it and donors will meet.

“No, we’re not shelving any project in this country to address this challenge because it’s still within our capacity to address this challenge,”said Getachew, while not ruling out future policy changes should the situation deteriorate.

Points for trying

The man spearheading the government’s drought response, State Ministerfor Agriculture Mitiku Kassa, said in a phone interview that it’s not the government’s financial position that worries him.

"You can build resilience, but when conditions are bad enough, so severe

− and we’re seeing the perfect storm – these resilience systems areoverawed"

“The international community is not in a position to respond to our crisis,”he said, citing crises like Syria for putting a heavy burden on global humanitarian coffers.

Another NGO head says that while the situation is bad now it will be worsenext year during the long wait until the next harvest.

“The best-case scenario will involve hundreds of thousands of metric tonnes more [grain] than what is in the pipeline… if not a gap of millionsfor what is needed,” he said.

Despite their concerns, all the aid officials IRIN spoke to gave thegovernment credit for trying to head off the disaster.

“I think the part of the government responsible, the DRMFSS [Disaster Risk Management and Food Security Sector] has been remarkably strongand effective," one said.

Another government initiative credited with strengthening the country's drought-resilience is the Productive Safety Net Project: "the largest safetynet programme in Africa," according to Minister Mitiku.

The PSNP provides cash or food to between six and eight million chronically food insecure Ethiopians for six months each year. In exchange, this army of workers has been deployed on a decade's worth of drought-resilience projects from improving ground water access and irrigation to forestation, soil and water conservation work, to building schools and health centres.

"That program has been enormously successful in making some of the poorest Ethiopians less vulnerable," said the head of a major internationalNGO.

What went wrong?
So with all this money and effort expended, why the crisis?

"You can build resilience, but when conditions are bad enough, so severe − and we're seeing the perfect storm – these resilience systems areoverawed.

"But it would be a lot worse if that work hadn't been done… there's noabsolute resilience," said the NGO head.

While projects like the PSNP have helped, a lack of land rights are holdingback poor farmers, according to another top aid official.

"[Ethiopia's] land policy is very strict. Land can't be bought, sold ortransferred. So no land can be consolidated," he said.

"What [the government] haven't dealt with are the most vulnerable of thepopulation. They're on tiny, fractured plots of land and can't make a go ofit.

"Unless they get consolidated, sustainable farms, they'll never be able to support themselves and prosper. There are still millions who can't supportthemselves in a good year and then they fall off a cliff in a bad year," he said.

History and science both tell of more bad years to come. Ethiopia's National Meteorology Agency warns climate change will only exacerbatefuture El Niño effects.

A fact not lost on Mitiku: “We know [El Niño] will come more and more incoming years… It shows we have to strengthen our economic development.”
He added: “The government has not left everything to the donors. It’s taken the lead and allocated the lion’s share of the budget to combat theadverse effects of El Niño.”

That said, the government admits it can’t face the problem alone. “Evenwhen you’re capable of addressing your problems you need friends,” noted Getachew. (Text ends)

BUSINESS: Ethiopia feeling pinch of illicit financial outflows State creates new intelligence unit after reports that $26 billion leftcountry in 10 years

By Tesfa Mogessie ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia
Alarmed by increasing illicit financial outflows, Ethiopia says it is taking new counter measures including installing advanced CCTV cameras at airports and establishing a special intelligence unit. A report released by Global Financial Intelligence last January revealed that $26 billion left thecountry unlawfully in many forms over between 2004 and 2013 with Ethiopia continuing to bleed an average of $2 billion every year.

However, according to the report, a staggering $19.7 billion of the total money loss left through misinvoicing, mainly by importers who reported undervalued sums while exporters overvalue their transactions. “The problem [illicit outflow] is there, and it is a huge challenge,” Ethiopian Customs and Revenue Authority Deputy Director General Alebachew Niguisse told Anadolu Agency. But Niguisse refuses to accept the report and is skeptical about its accuracy. He admitted that there would be a sum of money leaving out of sight but said there is a “limitation of information, a lack of experience and skill in parts of custom employees tounderstand the magnitude of the problem and the exact amount of money being taken out of the country”.

He said a major cause of capital flight — trade misinvoicing by importers and exporters dealing with their foreign partners — has been investigatedby a newly developed Ethiopian Custom Valuation System (ECVS), a system which calculates the local price for goods based on international market price. “When we know the international price tag of certain goods,we go down to the market and check the price against the actual price setby the importer or wholesaler and take corrective measures,” he said.

“Intelligence officers investigate transactions to track down on culprits of misinvoicing,” he added. “Thanks to improvised use of detecting technologies, close to $4 million outbound illicit money was intercepted atairport and customs checkpoints over the past six months.” He also said the government is further reinforcing a 2009 national bank proclamation that stipulates that an individual cannot leave or enter the country with more than $3,000 or equivalent value of other currency in his or her possession.

Abebe Shiferraw, a lecturer in commerce at Addis Ababa University said that illegal currency exchange corners in the capital are contributing to increasing illicit financial outflows and business people are always on thedemand side. If they got the currency so easily, ways for them to take itout would not be that difficult, he opined.

Nearly four decades ago the value of foreign currency against Ethiopian birr was fixed and set by national bank, he said, adding that these days the black market exchange rate is considerably higher than the rate of banks. One of the reasons why businesspeople are opting for the black market may be restricted access to foreign currency at the National Bank of Ethiopia, according to Shiferraw. To avert this problem, he said that thegovernment should take tightened measures on culprits be they importers, exporters or individuals. He added that the intent of importers to evade tax by under-invoicing caused greater capital flight. Currently revenue from tax contributes 13 percent to the country’s GDP.

Africa bleeding $50 billion annually

CEO of the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA) Dr. Carlos Lopes told Anadolu Agency last July that illicit outflow was the major detrimental factor that brought a funding gap to Africa’s 15-year Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs). According to him, the funding gap forces the continent to look for $52 billion in aid. A report launched inEthiopia in Jan. 2015 by an African Union Commission’s High-Level Panel on Illicit Financial Flows from Africa — chaired by former South African president Thabo Mbeki — shows Africa lost $50 billion annually between the years 2000 and 2008. This was in the form of illicit flow which exceeded African development assistance of $46.1 billion earned in the year 2012. It was announced on Friday by the UNECA that Mbeki is set tovisit the United States after African leaders requested the panel make theproblem an international concern. Mbeki will meet U.S. officials, membersof the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, plus diplomats.

Egypt asks Israel to help solve Ethiopia's Renaissance Dam crisis

By Middle East Monitor June 23, 2016

Egyptian President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi is reported to have asked the Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to intervene and help solve hiscountry’s dispute with Ethiopia over the Renaissance Dam crisis.

The Al-Araby Al-Jadeed newspaper reported Arab diplomatic sources assaying on Monday: “Sisi has recently asked Netanyahu to help Egypt resolve its dispute with Ethiopia over the Renaissance Dam, due to Ethiopia’s intransigence and refusal to respond to the Egyptian calls to coordinate efforts during the construction and storage stages.”

The sources added that al-Sisi’s move came after Ethiopia rejected all pressures exerted by Arab parties, including Saudi Arabia and the UAE,because Addis Ababa believes “the national project will help lift its deteriorating economy”.

The sources said that Egypt has finally resorted to asking Israel forassistance, a strategic ally of Ethiopia and a number of Nile Basin countries.

Speaking to the newspaper, an Egyptian diplomat warned against al-Sisi’smove, saying it could lead to the transfer of the Nile water to Israel, explaining that current and former Israeli leaders have been calling for this since the signing of the Camp David agreement.
Addis Ababa and Tel Aviv enjoy close ties on the economic side, with Israel having provided a range of grants to Ethiopia over the past years.

MIDDLE EAST EYE

Ethiopian mega-dam project leaves Egypt high and dry

Kieran Cooke Friday 29 July 2016 16:50 UTC

It’s like negotiating the rules of engagement long after the contest hasbeen held and the winner declared. Egypt is deeply worried about the impact on its water supply of a dam being built by Ethiopia far to the south, on the Blue Nile.

At a meeting with his Ethiopian and Sudanese counterparts last year, Egyptian President Abdul Fattah al-Sisi reiterated his country’s concerns while, at the same time, signing what was termed a “declaration of principles” about how the multi-billion dollar scheme – one of the world’sbiggest infrastructure projects - should be implemented.

Whatever principles have been agreed on – and these seem rather vague
− the project is going ahead. Work on what’s grandly named the Great Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, or GERD, is now more than 70 percent complete. The dam, which will eventually produce 6,000 megawatts of electricity according to its backers, is scheduled to start operations nextyear.

Ethiopia sees the dam as vital to lifting a large segment of its more than80 million people out of poverty. It also has ambitions to turn itself into "The powerhouse of Africa" by selling energy produced by the project.

Successive Egyptian administrations seem to have been caught by surprise by Ethiopia’s determination to implement the GERD. The fact thatthe project is progressing – and has won the support of many of Egypt’s neighbours to the south - is also seen as an indication of Cairo’s waning influence in Africa.

Any development which might interfere with the flow of the Nile waters isof great concern to Egypt. Most of its more than 80 million people live within a few kilometres of the river.

The river supplies the bulk of the country’s drinking water and irrigates the Nile Delta, one of the most fertile regions on the planet. Any drop in the level of the Nile as a result of developments upstream could seriouslyaffect water supplies, already under severe pressure.

The Nile also generates about half of Egypt’s electricity through the operation of the Aswan High Dam, built in the 1960s with the help of theSoviet Union.
There are worries that water levels in Lake Nasser - the more-than 5,000 square-kilometres man-made lake which feeds into the Aswan High Dam –could be lowered by the operation of the Ethiopian dam. This would result in less hydroelectric power being produced at Aswan. Many areas of Egyptare experiencing significant power shortages.

“The Renaissance Dam project represents a source of development for themillions of Ethiopia’s citizens through producing green and sustainable energy,” said Sisi last March.

“But for their brothers living on the banks of the Nile in Egypt, and who approximately equal them in numbers, it represents a source of concernand worry. This is because the Nile is their only source of water, in fact their source of life.”

Another Egyptian concern is that Ethiopia has not, from Cairo’s point of view, been open about how the GERD will be operated - how much watermight be extracted from the waters of the Blue Nile – one of the Nile’s main tributaries – and how much and by what means electric power fromthe dam will be transmitted to neighbouring countries.

Relations between Cairo and Addis Adaba over the GERD project sunk to alow in mid-2013 when a group of Egyptian politicians was heard on TV advocating military action over the Ethiopian dam.

Mohamed Morsi, then Egypt's president, struggled to calm the atmosphereby saying he did not want war – but added that “Egypt’s water security cannot be violated at all". Meanwhile, Ethiopia accused Egypt of trying to sabotage the GERD by seeking to dissuade international financial institutions from lending to the project.

In recent years, relations have improved though Ethiopia has repeatedly said there can be no question of halting or revising its mega dam project.

A team of French consultants has been appointed to look into some of theissues associated with the dam’s construction, but its final report is unlikely to be published until well after the scheme begins operating.

The management of the Nile, the world’s longest river, flowing through 10countries from its sources in the highlands of Ethiopia and central Africa, is a complex issue.

Under treaties dating back to the days of the old British administration in the region, only Sudan and Egypt have the right to the use of Nile waters,with Egypt receiving the major share.
Ethiopia – with its fast growing economy increasingly seen as a rival to Egyptian influence in the area – does not recognise these old agreementsand has gained support for a new framework governing the Nile. It also insists it can do as it pleases with the waters of the Blue Nile, which for the most part flow through its territory.

There are many in Egypt who are sceptical about Ethiopian claims that theGERD – being built by the Italian Salini impregilo company - will "not cause any harm to downstream countries".

They point out that Egypt’s own experience with the Aswan High Dam hasnot been encouraging. When it was constructed, Aswan was considered tobe a miracle of modern engineering.

While the dam has generated power and prevented large scale flooding inmany areas, it has in many ways created more problems than it has solved.

As a mechanism for managing the river, it is grossly inefficient. About 15percent of the water which gathers in Lake Nasser is lost to evaporation.Prior to the dam being built, silt from the Nile fertilised the delta. Now farmers use fertilisers on their crops and there are major chemical pollution problems.

Due to water being held back by the Aswan, fresh water never reaches some coastal regions and the absence of silt means the whole region is sinking. The Mediterranean is encroaching in many areas: increased saltlevels on land are a big problem.

Meanwhile, further south in Ethiopia, 9,000 workers are labouring roundthe clock in order to finish the GERD project on schedule. Despite all its concerns, Egypt is powerless to stop the construction of what will be Africa’s biggest dam.

Regional powers back studies on impact of Ethiopia's Nile dam

By Reuters September 21, 2016

Dam has become a bone of contention between Ethiopia and Egypt, downstream from the dam and relying almost exclusively on the Nile for agricultural, industrial anddomestic water use KHARTOUM, Sept 20 (Reuters) - Egypt, Sudan and Ethiopia commissioned studies into the environmental and economic impact of a $4 billion dam on the Nile that AddisAbaba aims to make the centrepiece of its bid to become Africa's biggest power exporter.

The 6,000-megawatt Grand Renaissance Dam, situated close to Ethiopia's border with Sudan and being built by Italy's largest construction firm Salini Impregilo SpA, isdue for completion next year.

It has become a bone of contention between Ethiopia and Egypt, downstream fromthe dam and relying almost exclusively on the Nile for agricultural, industrial and domestic water use.

Addis Ababa has complained Cairo has pressured international donors and lendersto withhold funding for the project, while Egypt has sought assurances the dam will not significantly cut the flow of water to its rapidly growing population.

Egyptian state news agency MENA said the two countries plus Sudan signed contracts on Tuesday tasking two French firms, BRL and Artelia, with conductingstudies into the dam's impact.

Gilles Rocquelain, BRL Director General, said the studies would start in late 2016 and take 11 months. The leaders of the three countries signed a co-operation deal inKhartoum last year to pave the way for a joint approach to regional water supplies.

In all, Ethiopia plans to spend some $12 billion on harnessing its rivers for hydropower production in the next two decades.

GERD Stakeholder Countries Sign Impact Study Deal

By Mihret Lemma - September 25, 2016

Meeting between Ethiopia, Sudan and Egypt is set to take place in Khartoum next week in a bid to sign a deal to carry out additional studies on Grand Renaissance Dam. The signing agreement deal is in addition to asigned declaration of principles which approved the construction.

Sharing water issue

However, the construction called for technical studies aimed at sharing thewater among the three countries. The sharing of the water issue and otherunder laid agendas has derailed the construction. The tripartite committee, composed of experts from the three countries, agreed on the conduction of further research on September 2014. The researched conducted encompassed the dam's economic, ecological and social impactof both Sudan and Egypt.

Artelia, BRL consulting firms

The team of experts agreed on Artelia and BRL groups, which are Frenchbased consultancy firms. Another U.K based company, Corbett & Co, waschosen to deal with legal matters affecting the team of experts.

According to Saif al-Din Hamad, the Sudanese team leader, the three countries didn't have differences on carrying out the studies. Hamad however said the signing to initiate the technical study was delayed to let all the ministers for water from the three countries to arrive.

Underlying issues solve

Ahmed Baha, the head of Egyptian technical team, added that the threemembers signed the contracting agreements after putting into considerations all the issues at hand. Another contract, which marks theend of the signing deals, will be done on Tuesday next week.

The Grand Ethiopian Dam is built along the Blue Nile with a capacity of 74mln cubic meters. The dam also has a capacity of producing over 6,000megawatts. Initially, Egypt reserved the construction arguing the dam would reduce its water. Ethiopia insisted the dam was basically built for production of electricity.

The NewArab News:

November 2, 2016

Egyptian President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi met with his Eritrean counterpartIsaias Afwerki in Cairo in a meeting that was a "deliberate move" againstEthiopia, political sources in Cairo told The New Arab.

The two leaders met on Tuesday to discuss enhancing bilateral relations across all levels and projects related to fishing and agriculture, local mediareported.

Ethiopia is building a hydropower dam on the Nile close to its source in theEthiopian highlands, raising fears in Egypt, which depends on controlling the flow of the Nile's waters for its survival.

"Approachment with Ethiopia's enemy and demonstrating the possibility ofcooperation could pressure Addis Ababa to be more flexible in dealing withthe Renaissance Dam or it could make the situation worse," the source said, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.
"The aim of this meeting is to send a message to Ethiopia. In the past there has been non-serious talk about Egypt striking Ethiopia, however, itcould possibly supply Eritrea with arms," he added.

Former Egyptian diplomat Maasoum Marzouq said that using Eritrea to intimidate Ethiopia was a tactic that must be used with "extreme caution".

In October, Ethiopia accused Egypt and neighbouring Eritrea of supportingoutlawed rebels and stoking an unprecedented wave of protests that has led the government to declare a six-month state of emergency. An Ethiopian minister said there was "ample evidence" that Egypt had provided training and financing to the Oromo Liberation Front, a group labelled a terrorist organisation by Ethiopia.

He added that "elements in the Egyptian political establishment" were fomenting rebellion, seeking to promote "historical rights" over access tothe River Nile.

Eritrea and Ethiopia fought a two-year border war between 1998 and 2000which left 80,000 dead, and tensions between the neighbours flared again earlier this year.

Ethiopia's government is facing the biggest challenge of its 25 years in power from protesters who have turned their anger against foreign-ownedcompanies, torching several farms and factories in the past week.

Rights organisations have already criticised authorities for a harsh securitycrackdown on nearly a year of protests that has killed hundreds.

Ethiopia: Economist says popular uprising crippling economy

ESAT News (December 8, 2016)

Investment, export and trade have shown a serious decline in the countrywhile cost of living has risen dramatically posing a serious challenge to thecountry’s overall economy, a U.S. based Ethiopian economist said on Thursday.

The year long protest in the country has paralysed economic activities andprices of food has skyrocketed resulting in diminishing consumption by the people, Dr. Zelalem Teklu told ESAT in an exclusive interview.

He said the regime is spending all its resources on stifling the popular uprising as this is a matter of life and death to the oligarchs. “The only thing increasing is the budget and expenses of the government,” Dr. Teklusaid adding that shortage of foreign currency is crippling the economy.
Despite regime’s claim that the Ethiopian economy is growing at the rate of 8%, the World Bank insists the rate is 6 percent. But Dr. Zelalem Teklubelieves the rate could be much less than World Bank’s estimates. “Economists and any layman know the Ethiopian regime puts out inflated and cooked figures. But the regime, unable to hide the cruel reality of theeconomy, has for the first time gave single digit estimates.”

The economist said remittances from Ethiopians abroad are the main source of the country’s foreign currency and any reduction on that would further cripple the economy. “I am not here to advice Ethiopians not to send money back home but it is a weapon in their hand if they want to punish the regime. A little reduction in what we send back home could have a serious impact on the economy. But that would hurt people on thereceiving end too,” Dr. Teklu said.

Data shows that Ethiopians abroad sent 3.7 billion dollars in 2015 in theform of remittances.

The World bank in its latest economic report on Ethiopia strongly advised for the devaluation of the birr against the dollar, a proposal the Ethiopian regime outrightly rejected. “Doing so will hasten the demise of the regimecause devaluation would mean that it would be difficult to import raw materials resulting in high prices of goods and services. This economic pressure coupled with the political pressure ignited by the popular uprisingwould speed up the demise of the regime.”

He said based on economic theories, the proposal for devaluation by the World Bank would be the right way to go for a long term solution to the economic crises. “But the regime is interested in resolving the immediate problems that is a threat to its survival – the popular uprising. It is puttingall its resources to reverse the wave of resistance that is coming from all directions.”

The economist said the regime is always focused on short term solutions,which worsens the economic crises in the long run.

New foreign investments to the country have ceased to come while theexisting ones are contemplating leaving the country due to a year longuprising against a corrupt and brutal regime in Ethiopia.

Meanwhile, the central statistics Agency of Ethiopia said inflation has risento 7 percent in November from 5.6 percent in October. The agency attributed the increase in inflation to the rise in food prices. Inflation in food items also rose to 6.1 percent in November from 3.4 the previous month.

Egypt-Gulf relations tested by Saudi visit to Ethiopia dam

MEE staff writer Tuesday 20 December 2016 11:00 UTC

A Saudi visit to Ethiopia and a tweet falsely attributed to a Qatari officialhave harmed relations between Cairo and Gulf monarchies.

Egyptian media lashed out at Saudi Arabia over a high-level Saudi delegation visit to the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) during a short trip to Ethiopia on Friday. Experts said the decision to visit the GERDwas an act of revenge against Egypt that could deepen tensions between the two countries.

Ahmed al-Khateeb, a senior adviser at the Saudi royal court and board chairman of the Saudi Fund for Development (SFD), visited the site and met Ethiopia's Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn and other officials todiscuss GERD’s construction project.

Khateeb’s trip came after the Saudi agriculture minister visited Ethiopia last week, making it the second visit by a Saudi official to Addis Ababa inless than a week.

On Saturday, Egyptian news commentator Mohamed Ali Khayr called onRiyadh to "review its policies before it can only blame itself for what ensues".

"Egypt is not obliged to continue to contain its reactions towards Saudi Arabia... any interference [by Saudi Arabia] in the GERD project implies adirect threat to Egypt’s national security," he said on Egyptian TV.

Khayr went as far as accusing Saudi policy makers of being "amateurs"that have caused bilateral relations between the two countries to completely break down as a result of this visit.

On Saturday, Ahmed Moussa, another journalist, threatened Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states that if they were to invest in Ethiopia, their investmentwould be lost in the Nile.

Moussa continued to condemn the visit over his talk show on Sada al-Balad, an Egyptian satellite TV channel.

"The GERD will not last forever, a volcano might erupt at any moment. Sofor those looking to invest billions [of dollars] in this project, your money might as well be going to waste," said Moussa.

'Egypt has many cards'

Egyptian media personalities were joined in their denunciation of the Saudi visit by several academics who voiced strong criticisms against theGulf state for its policy.

"You will soon hear that we [Egypt] have the capacity to intervene in the Gulf region's affairs and provide support for the royals who oppose currentSaudi policies," Tarek Fahmy, a lecturer at the American University in Cairo, told viewers of Sada al-Balad on Saturday.

Fahmy warned Saudi Arabia that Egypt’s patience is waning and that Cairowill no longer accept actions that threaten its national security.

"Egypt has many cards to pressure Saudi Arabia, which we have yet touse," Fahmy said.

However, he added that Cairo wanted to continue its friendly relationswith its "siblings in the Gulf".

Meanwhile, Egyptian political science professor Hassan Nafaa told Daily News Egypt on Sunday that the visit was an indirect message from SaudiArabia that it could align itself with anyone if Egypt does not comply withSaudi foreign policy.

Nafaa said the visit will likely increase tensions in Saudi-Egyptian relations, saying that Cairo would not be tolerating Saudi’s implicit supportfor the GERD.

The 6,000-megawatt GERD, which is not yet 70 percent complete, is situated close to Ethiopia’s border with Sudan. While Ethiopia hopes it willbe able to export energy generated by the dam, Egypt has long expressedconcerns that the dam might reduce the amount of Nile water it receives, thus affecting its main source of irrigation water.

Relations between Cairo and Riyadh have soured since Egypt voted in favour of a UN Security Council draft resolution by Russia regarding theSyrian civil war.

Egypt took an opposing position to Saudi Arabia by choosing to support the Syrian government and army against rebel fighters – Saudi's envoy tothe UN described Egypt’s vote as "painful".

Since the vote, the Saudi ministry of petroleum said that Aramco, theSaudi state-owned oil company, has suspended its oil aid to Egypt butthat the five-year agreement is still in effect.

Egyptian officials, including President Abdel Fattah el-Sisi and foreign minister Sameh Shoukry, have repeatedly denied any tension with SaudiArabia.
Qatari-Egyptian relations shaken
As Egypt’s alliance with Saudi Arabia continues to deteriorate, bilateralrelations with Qatar have also been tested in a new series of obstacles.

Tensions grew after a Qatari national wrote on Twitter that Qatar will nolonger be issuing work permits for Egyptians.

"Qatar has been extremely patient in regard to Egypt’s 'dirty' policies. It isnow time for payback," he added in the tweet.

After the tweet was mistakenly ascribed to deputy Qatari minister of tradeSultan bin Rashed al-Khater, news of Qatar’s "new policies" spread acrossEgyptian media platforms with Egyptian commentators condemning the alleged move as an official decision to deny Egyptians entry into the Gulf state.

Spokesperson for the Egyptian prime ministry, Ashraf Sultan, issued a statement denying that Egyptian labourers had been expelled from SaudiArabia and Qatar and confirming that the news was only a rumour.

In a television interview on Egyptian satellite TV channel Alassema 2, Sultan said: "We are completely transparent when it comes to informationwe receive. Any changes would be communicated directly to you all."

Sultan said citizens should verify information before circulating it to avoidthe spread of rumours such as this, it was reported by Elwehda news website.

At the same time, the minister of manpower, Mohamed Saafan, denied reports that Qatar had decided to reject applications by Egyptians for workpermits, adding that there were 150,000 Egyptians working in Qatar at the moment.

Saafan said he met with the Qatari minister of labour on Thursday to discuss the rights of Egyptian workers in Qatar, highlighting that Egyptian-Qatari relations continue to be fully respectful.

Meanwhile, Egyptian commentator Jaber al-Qarmouty condemned the Egyptian media for circulating the tweet and building false reports upon it.

"Circulating information without verifying it has resulted in disastrous ramifications, which in this case can only be considered a slap in the face of Egyptian media personalities," Elwehda news website quoted Qarmoutyas saying.

Relations between Qatar and Egypt have been shaken since Doha showed support for former Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi – who was ousted in a military coup led by then General Abdel Fattah el-Sisi. Qatar has alsovoiced support for Morsi's Muslim Brotherhood, which was outlawed by Cairo.

Egypt has accused Qatar of using state-funded Al Jazeera news network totint the image of Egypt’s military by publishing news and documentaries that show the army in a negative light.

ሐዋርያ - Hawarya Newspaper over ETHIOPIA

It is thought that the change of Ethiopia is the key to the central government's political wealth control.

It is the key to the national money control of the young countries that are under their government foundation like Ethiopia :: the government is the main employer and worker, abiy is the first actor of the education sector, the first actor of the education sector, the first actor of the education sector, the first actor of the education sector, the first actor of gojo industry. , in the agriculture sub economy, we are going to take care of the finance sector and national money transfer in quality and plan: this means the national politics and wealth of the national politics and wealth of the country and one of the other :: to put this control in hand One of the steps that are taken to improve is to change national financial notes, the money notes that have been held in Ethiopia will not pass away from being this attitude.

Change money notes other than the national bank of the national bank, and the government of the government will have a government that is going to have a government that is going to control the country. It can also create a great impact that we are imprisoned for the law of the law.

The issue that should be thought together with national people's change and next, the new money should not be able to get out of the national bank control and not wash false financial leadership and control.

Ethiopia opens massive Gibe 3 hydroelectric dam on Omo River

The Washington Post
By Elias Meseret | AP December 17, 2016

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia — Ethiopia on Saturday officially opened the Gibe3 hydroelectric dam, which is among the biggest in Africa, despite concerns by environmentalists about its impact downstream and upon neighboring countries.

Ethiopia aims to produce 15,000 megawatts of electricity through its damsin the coming five years, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn said at a ceremony launching the Gibe 3 dam.

Officials said Gibe 3 makes Ethiopia one of the biggest producers and consumers of renewable energy in Africa. They said the massive dam will help Ethiopia meet its own and neighboring countries' increasing demandsfor cheap, renewable electricity.

The Gibe 3 dam cost $1.7 billion to build, with 40 percent of that covered by the Ethiopian government while the remaining 60 percent was obtainedthrough a loan from the Chinese government, officials said.

Gibe 3 is part of the Ethiopian government's efforts to build a series ofdams on the Omo River, which runs into Lake Turkana in Kenya.
Environmentalists say the dams could lead to livelihood losses andincreased local conflicts.

Ethiopia has abundant rainfall in the parts of the country that supply thedams with water to produce hydroelectricity. It is also now building the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, which has the capacity to produce more than 6,000 megawatts of electricity and will be Africa's biggest hydroelectric plant.

Ethiopia's other infrastructure development projects are aimed at bringingin more foreign investment. This year Ethiopia launched a 756-kilometer (470-mile) electric railway from the capital, Addis Ababa to Djibouti's mainport.
A year ago, the country completed Africa's newest light railway transit system, which connects the four parts of Addis Ababa. Another railway system is being built across the country by a Turkish company as Ethiopiaaspires to connect to more of its neighbors by rail.

Ethiopia Inaugurates Dam to Double Energy Output

HOW AFRICA updates December 21, 2016

Ethiopia's Prime minister Hailemariam Desalegn has commissioned a newhydroelectric dam that aims to double the country's electricity output.
The Gilgel Gibe III hydroelectric dam which is the third largest dam in Africa and the biggest in a series built along the Omo River is 243 metres(800 feet) in height.

The dam that costed the East African nation 1.5 billion Euros and tookalmost a decade to construct has the capacity to produce 1,870 megawatts of power, enough to sell energy abroad including to neighbouring Kenya.

"This hydroelectricity plant, with other on-going projects, fulfils our domestic power needs and will be provided for foreign markets," Desalegnsaid in a speech during the inauguration.

Despite the expected positivity that is meant to arise from the construction of the dam, environmentalists have warned that the dam willdecrease water levels downstream all the way to Kenya's Lake Turkana, which derives 80% of its resources from the river and thus highly affect hundreds of people who make their living in the Omo River valley and on Turkana.

The biggest opposition however, came from UNESCO, as they had previously condemned the project. On the other hand, the Human RightsWatch has also accused the Ethiopian Government of uprooting people from the Omo Valley to free up land for state-run sugar cane plantations.However, it is a claim that project boosters have denied.

In a country where there is no natural gas or oil reserve of its own, renewable energy is being used to help foster energy independence andeconomic growth.

This will not be the first time for Ethiopia to attract opposition on its dam projects. The construction of the Grand Renaissance dam on the River Nilepoisoned Ethiopia's relations with Egypt as is it totally reliant on the Nile for agriculture and drinking water, and fears the dam will hit its supplies.

Ethiopia asks Egypt to respond to allegations over alleged supportof opposition groups

By DailyNewsEgypt December 26, 2016

The Ethiopian government is awaiting a response from Egypt to a request that Egyptian authorities take action against alleged Egyptian institutions supporting and funding Ethiopian opposition groups, said Ethiopian foreignaffairs minister Workneh Gebeyehu in an interview with Asharq Al-Awsar on Sunday.

Despite referring to such allegations, Ethiopia's foreign affairs ministerassured that the two countries remain cooperative and relations are stable.

Ethiopia has repeatedly asserted these allegations against Egypt, stating that there are institutions based in Egypt allegedly harbouring, supporting,and funding terrorist groups in Ethiopia. The Egyptian Foreign Affairs Ministry previously commented on the allegations saying that Egypt does not intervene in the internal affairs of other countries.

Daily News Egypt contacted on Monday the spokesperson of Egypt's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ahmed Abou Zaid, who declined to provideclarification about the issue, asserting that the ministry will release its response soon.

Last week, Ethiopian prime minister Hailemariam Desalegn said that thereare alleged Egyptian institutions harbouring, supporting, and funding "terrorist" groups in Ethiopia, during his interview on Al-Muqabla show aired on Al-Jazeera.

However, the statements made by both Ethiopian officials appeared tocontradict each other. The prime minister said that the institutions supporting the opposition in his country are Egyptian and are affiliated with the Oromo Liberation Front, while the Ethiopian foreign affairs minister said that the institutions are working from Egypt, without clarifying that they were Egyptian or of another nationality, to support Ethiopian opposition.

Ethiopia has not provided any names or details about the institutions theyaccuse of supporting the Ethiopian opposition. This was not the first time that Ethiopia has stated such claims against Egypt. In early October, a video depicted members from the outlawed Oromo Liberation Front sharing a stage with what Ethiopian media described as Egyptians.

Tarek El-Khouly, a member of the parliamentary Foreign Affairs Committee, said that no such institutions exist in Egypt, and these arejust allegations that Egypt has already previously denied.

The MP also said that Egypt and Ethiopia remain in good standing relations, referring to the visits of both countries' officials to the other.However, the MP questioned whether these allegations might be in response to Egypt's criticism that Ethiopia has been slow in initiating technical consultations over the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD).

However, the Ethiopian prime minister denied in his interview such claims,saying that the dam is not the cause and it will continue to be built without having any repercussions for Egypt or Sudan.

Ethiopian refugees from the Ethiopian community based in Cairo's Maadi neighbourhood spoke to Daily News Egypt on condition of anonymity, saying that "if these allegations are directed to the Ethiopian communitiesliving in Egypt, this is really illogical. As refugees, we are not able to evenfund our own livelihoods here, so how could we fund terrorist groups?"

The refugee assumed that Ethiopian government stance might be due to their continues rallies in front of the United Nations high commissioner forrefugees (UNHCR) office in Cairo to protest against the Ethiopian government's violations against opposition groups in their homeland.

The refugees assumed that the Ethiopian government's stance might be related to their protests staged in front of the UNHCR office in Cairo. The demonstrations have been held repeatedly to protest against the Ethiopiangovernment's violations against opposition groups.

He added that the Ethiopian government is trying to divert people's attention away from their violations against opposition in the country.

The Ethiopian prime minister previously said that his country doesn't needto refer to intelligence findings to obtain information regarding these institutions, since the information is already available on the internet and on Egyptian media outlets.

The opposition groups in Ethiopia consist of the two largest ethnic groups:the Oromo and Amhara peoples. Dozens of Ethiopians have fled their country after being labeled as terrorists due to their opposition against thecountry's policies.

A significant portion of these communities have fled Ethiopia due to the persecution and violent treatment carried out against them by the state. Around 1,000 individuals from both groups will soon face trial, due to theiralleged involvement in acts of vandalism acts, according to Ethiopia's foreign affairs minister.

Reflecting the prevalence of poverty in the region, data suggest that not more than 20 percent of adult Africans have a bank account, compared tobetween 30 percent and 50 percent in other developing regions. This can be attributed in part to high fees, low bank branch penetration and the extensive documentation requirements for opening an account.

World Health Organization Director-General works as TPLF Diplomat Ethiopia acuses Tedros Adhanom of soliciting, diplomatic and Military support for TPLF.

By Seleshi Tessema 17.11.2020: ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia

World Health Organization (WHO) Director-General Tedros Adhanom has been “fully engaged in soliciting diplomatic and military support” for the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) in many parts of the world, a top official said Monday.

Tedros, who has been serving in his position at the WHO since 2017, was a member of the TPLF’s powerful Executive Committee. He was also Ethiopia’s health minister from 2005 to 2012 and foreign affairs minister from 2012 to 2016.

The official, who was not allowed to publicly discuss the matter, told Anadolu Agency on the condition of anonymity that the Ethiopian government had been well aware of Tedros’s activities since the beginning of the National Defense Force’s law enforcement operation against the TPLF, which is entrenched in the northern Tigray region.

“Tedros had been lobbying the UN agencies to exert pressure on the Ethiopian government to unconditionally stop its military action against the TPLF,” he noted. “He was relentlessly demonizing us.”

The official added that Tedros had also been soliciting Egyptian military support for the TPLF.

“To ally with Egypt, which had been bent on destabilizing Ethiopia for decades and aborting construction of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD), is tantamount to treason,” he said.

According to the official, who attended many high-profile government briefings on the matter, Tedros was also active in eastern Africa.

“He repeatedly called top officials of many neighboring nations and pressured them to provide military and diplomatic support to the TPLF,” he noted, adding those countries informed the Ethiopian government.

“Those countries, which we cannot name, told us they declined Tedros’s requests, saying the conflict was an internal Ethiopian affair and they stand with us,” he said.

The official said from what they have gathered, Tedros was serving as a “full-time diplomat of the TPLF, breaching the duties of the director-general of the WHO.”

“We are readying a protest note to the WHO and other relevant bodies,” the official added.

Ethiopia has launched what it describes as a law enforcement operation in Tigray after forces of the TPLF attacked the northern command of the federal army stationed across the Tigray region, killing soldiers and looting military assets.

The TPLF dominated political life in Ethiopia for more than three decades before current Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed, who hails from the Oromo ethnic group, came to power in 2018.

The Oromo is the largest ethnic tribe in Ethiopia, representing around 34.9% of the country’s population of 114.9 million, while the Tigray account for only 7.3%.

Anadolu Agency website contains only a portion of the news stories offered to subscribers in the AA News Broadcasting System (HAS), and in summarized form.

The Ethiopian government's victory over the Tigray People's Liberation Front came at a high cost, and the humanitarian situation in northern Tigray remains grave. But only an Ethiopia at peace, with a government bound by humane norms of conduct, can play a constructive role across the region and beyond.

Operations undertaken by the Ethiopian federal government have freed the Tigrayan people from decades of misrule by the Tigray People’s Liberation Front (TPLF). This has ignited new hopes, but also anxieties, about Ethiopia’s future and its role in the Horn of Africa and beyond. The hopes stem from the removal – for good – of the corrupt and dictatorial TPLF. Ethiopians can now imagine a future based not on ethnic chauvinism, but on unity, equality, freedom, and democracy. Moreover, the source of ethnic division that had poisoned inter-state relations across the Horn of Africa has now been overcome.

Is Ethiopia coming together or falling apart?

But I cannot deny that the removal of the TPLF has fueled unease in the international community. Concerns about ethnic profiling in Tigray and obstacles to humanitarian relief abound. My government is determined to address and dispel these concerns.

Pressure grows on Abiy as Ethiopia admits rape widespread in north

So, to borrow from Thomas Jefferson, "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind" compels me to explain why my government acted to restore peace in Tigray, how we are alleviating suffering there, and why our efforts – supported, I hope, by the international community – will benefit all my country's people, including those in Tigray and throughout the Greater Horn. No government can tolerate its soldiers and innocent civilians being ambushed and killed in their dozens, as happened at the hands of the TPLF last autumn. My primary duty as prime minister and commander in chief of the national armed forces, after all, is to protect Ethiopia and its people from internal and external enemies.

Ethiopia at risk of another long-term war

Our operations in Tigray were designed to restore peace and order quickly. In this, we succeeded, but the suffering and deaths that occurred despite our best efforts have caused much distress for me personally as well as for all peace-loving people here and abroad.

Have Ethiopian Jews integrated successfully in Israeli society?

I love Israel Answered by

Beta Israel Jews (I always feel that's a more respectful term than "Ethiopian Jews"): The good, the bad and the ugly.

The good? Beta Israel are represented in leadership roles in every part of society. There are a lot of Beta Israel role models for young Israelis to look up to.

Sigd Holiday Law-Sigd is something everyone should know about. It's a holiday that Beta israel have kept for thousands of years. In Ethiopia, the community used to bring their sifrei Torah to a mountain and prostrate and pray to return to Zion. In Israel Sigd has become a national holiday and many non Beta Israel Jews join in the fast, introspection and subsequent celebration

Pnina Tamano-Shata- member of Knesset and minister of Aliyah and intergration. She escaped Ethiopia with her family at age three and grew up in Israel. Tamano-Shata has been instrumental in working to bring over the remaining Jews in Ethiopia

Eden Alene- She grew up in Jerusalem. After winning X factor Israel she was catapulted to stardom. Alene represented Israel in the 2020 Eurovision

Lt. Col. Dr. Avraham Yitzhak- Yitzchak started medical school in Ethiopia at age 19, but abandoned his program to pursue Zionism. Yitzchak attended Ben Gurion University's medical program in Israel and after graduating became an army surgeon. He served in elite paratrooper and Maglan units. Lt Col. Dr Yitzchak became the first ethiopian born colonial in the Israel army.

Yityish Ayenaw- She was orphaned of both parents at age 10 in Ethiopia and she and her brother made their way to Israel alone. After serving as a lieutenant in the Israel Defense Forces she won the Miss Israel 2013 beauty paegent. Aynaw used her platform to promote the cause of Beta Israel aliyah.

The Bad? Beta Israel Jews are statistically more likely to be unemployed, have lower paying jobs or less education than non Beta Israel Israelies.

Here are some statistics about areas of improvement for Beta Israel integration.

-On average Beta Israel households makes ₪ 12,294 a year. Compared to a countrywide average of ₪ 19,118

-In 2015–16, 60% of Israeli Jewish high school graduates met educational standards to enroll in university. Compared with 34% of graduates of Ethiopian descent

-young Ethiopian Israelies are more likely to be unemployed when compared with the national average

The Ugly? Racism exists everywhere. In all countries, society and settings

On the other hand, many Beta Israel assert that the racism in the United States is fundamentally different and more pervasive than the racism in Israel.

Ashager Araro, Israeli Activist, On Israel/Palestine: 'The Best Way For Us To Move Forward Is To Listen To Each Other'

Ashager Araro is living her family's dream as a first generation Israeli. Despite loving her country, she's also experienced fear and violence here because of Palestinians. Still, she hopes for a time where Israelis and Palestinians coexist — and through activism she works to make this a reality.

https://www.forbes.com/sites/allisonnorlian/2021/09/14/ashager-araro-israeli-activist-on-israelpalestine-the-best-way-for-us-to-move-forward-is-to-listen-to-each-other/?sh=50346d3a434b

"And my life here, the fact that I'm Israeli and I'm Jewish doesn't protect me from racism."
But she says when she sees people comparing the situation in Israel to America — it frustrates her, and she finds it disingenuous.

"If you look at it on a system level, Israel was established as a democratic country, with democratic values, with no laws that discriminate against one group of people. We're all equal — Israeli, Arab Israeli, Muslim, Christian, Jews— under the law from the establishment of this state," Araro said. "But when you look at the United States, you have a system that was born with the idea of racism in mind, and it was the idea that Blacks don't matter and are not as important as white people. Like the idea that in the U.S., police were established to catch a running slave. Or the fact that some jails are for-profit, as a business — that would never happen here.

"We have our own problems, don't get me wrong. I'm not dismissing racism in Israel. I don't want to come across like that in any way. But I think it's two different systems.

"Racism in America was built into the fabric of the society, and it's so hard to take it away. Here, you have bad people, bad government leaders, but we can fight it like with the law and other resources."

But it's always an area for improvement.

The Beta Israel in my community are integrated. They are in my apartment building and my children's classes. They are also very proud of their country and their contributions to it. In fact, they are some of the most Zionist people I've met.

Statistics show their earning power and employment is getting better/ In 2005 nearly 60% were unemployed and now the unemployment rates are only slightly worse than the overall Israeli demographics. And I hope those in my son's class will have equal, or better, than the average opportunities by the time they graduate.

Ethiopia resisted colonial subjugation and succeeded.
Why did the rest of Africa fail?

Dar Milli Philosopher Updated Aug 30

Ethiopia was colonized by Jews. For 705 years they were ruled by a dynasty that called itself Solomonic, after the alleged King Solomon of Judea (Israel).

The image pair with relationship id rId4 was not found in the file.

Middle Easterners have colonized parts of Africa for a long time than Westerners.

Arabs invaded and colonized North Africa, and the Eastern Coast from Djibouti all the way to a little bit of Cabo Delgado (North East coast of Mozambique).

The Omanis even moved their capital from Omani to Zanzibar, where they ruled the coastline of East Africa for about 132 years until their overthrow in 1964.

As a result you'll find real Africans (ie. people with roots only in Afrika) in the Green Africa (ie. South of Sahara). The other parts such as the horn and the north have many people with roots in the Middle East.

And countries in the East Coast (Kenya and Tanzania) where Arabs colonized the coastline for 132 have a little bit of mixed bloods between Arabs/Iranians with Africans.

Somalis don't even want to be called Africans. They are more proud of their Middle Eastern side.

Ethiopia has had a powerful central government ruled by a Christian monarch since before Islam originated

Even if we accept the proposition that Ethiopia's rulership is unbroken from Aksum (and that's not at all certain), that's not quite why it survived [as in "not the whole story," although it's certainly part of it]. The Nubian Christians to the west eventually converted; many Muslims lived within Ethiopia and still do, so it's not like it was a Christian island.

Christianity In Sudan.

In fact, Ethiopian Orthodoxy survived because the Solomonids built its mythology into their rule—not just divine right, but divinely sanctioned origins in the Old Testament. Effectively, the descent from Solomon was the entire basis for the rule, and early works like the Kebra Nagast highlighted this conflation. So as long as the kingdom/dynasty endured, so would the religion, even though it didn't have much cachet outside a few core areas and the upper (noble) classes until later. Islam remained a major religion of Ethiopia throughout, and the expectation that they would eventually overtake the court without much struggle was not unreasonable except for the fact that everyone in the dynasty was invested in the theological basis attached to the state. Even when the emperors were weak (as in the Age of Princes), that was a powerful unifying force against external threats.

How did Christianity spread in Ethiopia? Knowing that Ethiopia was mostly ignored by colonists, because they were essentially considered “White Blacks”, due to their Christianity, I’m curious as to how, exactly, Christianity has spread to Ethiopia.

Kevin Richardson
PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin

Here’s the rough outline of what we know as historians of Africa:

1. The spread of Christianity to the northern part of modern-day Ethiopia—really Tigray today—came via Aksum. The key convert is believed to be King Ezana (sorry about Wikipedia), whose stelae are still around, likely sometime in the 340s. The conversion of Ezana and his early linkage to the Arian Christians and the Copts is where Frumentius the Syrian, who was apparently his tutor, comes in. His conversion was very likely prompted by the connection to Egyptian Christian traders as well as the Roman Empire's embrace of the faith. It appears to have spread from the port at Adulis, but Ezana took it in for much the same reason that rulers of Swahili towns and empires in West Africa initially accepted an eclectic Islam—trade. The Queen of Sheba and King Solomon lived over a thousand years before Christianity existed. Regardless, I don't think they were as isolated from other Christians at this time as you may think. Nearby Egypt and neighboring Sudan (Nubia) were both quite Christian before the rise of Islam. (Ezana's focus on trade primacy is also shown by his destruction of the rump of Meroë around 350.) It is to this that Ethiopia traces its Christianity, although during centuries of isolation between Aksum and Ethiopia, they apparently did not consult Alexandria. At that time, the specific link between King Solomon and the court was not made.

2. Christianity remained, for a very long time, the faith of the elites; the "rediscovery" of Solomon and Sheba was part of a *political*consolidation in the 14th century. The faith's exclusivity was a problem because, as Jaxson Hudson points out, Islam was a likely contender. In fact, it did make inroads into parts of the kingdom, as a creed that spoke to "common" people in a feudal system. At various times, Ethiopian rulers acquired Muslim subjects or even Muslim subordinates; that problem never went away. Christianity remained the faith of the elites in part because the kingdom became insular after the rise of Islam and the loss by Aksum of Adulis around? 750. Eventually, the rise of the Solomonids in 1270 brought with it a re-orientation of biblical history in the form of the Kebre Negast within a century or so that fleshed out the "story" of Sheba after Solomon. The reality was that Aksum collapsed in the 8th century and we really don't know much about how it became Zagwe Ethiopia, or if it truly did; it's possible Ethiopia is an only loosely-related, new political formation that "wrote backwards" and claimed Aksum ex post facto, going so far as to enthrone its emperors (negusa negast, or king of kings) there. We do know that one Christian elite gave way to another, and the state shifted southward somewhat, changing its focus from trade to feudal mixed-pastoralism. In that space, a centralizing religious focus was very useful: to defy the Solomonids was to defy God on some level. Ethiopia also wasn't alone: Christian kingdoms with Islamic subjects also existed to the west in the Nile Valley (known as the "Nubian Kingdoms" collectively) as late as the 1400s. Those collapsed not via conquest, but because their populations became so overwhelmingly Islamic and dependent on trade with Muslims that the elites simply converted.

3. The Portuguese basically saved Ethiopia from the fate of Islamic conquest from Adal, once they "discovered" the true root of their Prester John mythology and the forgotten Christian kingdom in Ethiopia in 1520. The emperor at that time requested Portuguese help against Adal and its Ottoman ally (the latter fresh off its conquest of Egypt and the Holy Places of Islam in 1517), but aid didn't arrive until 1540. The conflict that culminated in the battle of Wayna Daga (1543) was won by an Ethio-Portuguese force over a Somali/Adal-Ottoman one, and the naval confrontations at the Portuguese harbor of Diu (several really) saved Ethiopia from being overrun.

Ethiopian and Portuguese Knights at The decisive Battle of Wayna Daga against Ottoman and Somali Forces during The Abyssinian–Adal wars in 1543. art by Garry Embleton [1320 x 954]

The Portuguese, however quickly wore out their welcome, and Jesuit missionaries came to see Ethiopian Christianity as almost heretical. They made no shortage of attempts to convert Ethiopian courtiers and the emperors themselves. Father Lobo's experience at this moment, when they were actually given to the Ottomans by their Ethiopian "hosts" on the expectation they would be killed, is recorded in A Voyage to Abyssinia and it makes for some delicious "wtf" reading. Yes, Father Lobo really thought the Portuguese and then the Papacy should organize a full-scale invasion of Ethiopia. I'm not even kidding. From the Ethiopian side, conversion to Catholicism would have been a devastating refutation of the basis of their political legitimacy internally, and it could not be allowed. Ethiopian Orthodox Christianity as a closely-held faith only later spread actively to the general population, much as was the case with Islam in the western Sahel and Sudan. I don't know the details of the way that appeal was made, though, or whether it was truly gradual; it was never really victorious, and Islam is still quite prominent today. My recollection is that the sources aren't very frank about it, but I'll have a look again when I'm back in my library.

4. That era's Ethiopia was really only the northern third or so of today's Ethiopia-Eritrea matrix. Only with the 1870-1890 conquests of Menelik II of Shoa did it take its current shape and extent. Yes, at that time, it incorporated a lot of additional non-Christians, many of whom converted later and some likely under duress.

5. "Colonists" weren't interested in Ethiopia is a confusing comment, though—do you mean that colonial powers weren't ever interested?

Tell that to General Baratieri, defeated at Adwa on March 1st, 1896. It was after that military victory by an African state over a European one that more people began rediscovering Ethiopia's "white past" and trying to justify the exception to the colonial tide.

See, for example, Harold Marcus, A History of Ethiopia upd. ed., (2002); Richard Pankhurst, The Ethiopians: A History, (2001); and a variety of histories of Christianity that treat it in chapters. General histories of Africa, including Robert Collins's and Kevin Shillington's, also spend time with Ethiopia and do so fairly well for overviews.

Ethiopia's Abiye wins Nobel Peace Prize for resolving conflict with Eritrea

By Gwladys Fouche and Terje Solsvik

OSLO (Reuters) - Ethiopian Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed won the 2019 Nobel Peace Prize on Friday for his peacemaking efforts which ended two decades of hostility with longtime enemy Eritrea.

Though Africa's youngest leader still faces big challenges, he has in under two years in power begun political and economic reforms that promise a better life for many in impoverished Ethiopia and restored ties with Eritrea that had been frozen since a 1998-2000 border war.

"I am so humble and thrilled ... It is a prize given to Africa, given to Ethiopia," Abiy Ahmed said in a recorded phone call with the secretary of the award committee that was posted online.

Abiy was meeting Sudanese Prime Minister Abdalla Hamdok when he was informed he had won the prize, Abiy's spokeswoman said.

The Nobel Committee said Abiy had won the prestigious prize for "efforts to achieve peace and international cooperation, and in particular for his decisive initiative to resolve the border conflict with neighboring Eritrea."

It said the prize was meant to recognize "all the stakeholders working for peace and reconciliation in Ethiopia and in the East and Northeast African regions."

News of the award trickled slowly down to the streets of the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa. Bisrat Hadte, a 45-year-old businessman, said he was glad but the government still had much to do to improve daily life in the country of about 100 million.

"The prime minister also has to work on to improve the economy and drive down the cost of living," he told Reuters.

The Nobel Committee's decision appeared designed to encourage the peace process, echoing the 1994 peace prize shared by Israeli and Palestinian leaders and the 1993 award for moves towards reconciliation in South Africa, said Dan Smith, head of the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute.

"It is a case of wanting a constructive intervention in the peace process ... to give leverage and encouragement," he told Reuters.

"The challenge now is internal for Abiy Ahmed, with Ethiopia needing to deal with the consequences of long-term violence, including three million displaced people and the need for continuing the political process."

Abiy had been bookmakers' second favorite to win, behind the teenage Swedish climate change campaigner Greta Thunberg.

"I have said often that winds of hope are blowing ever stronger across Africa. Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed is one of the main reasons why," said United Nations Secretary-General Antonio Guterres.

"His vision helped Ethiopia and Eritrea achieve a historic rapprochement."

CHALLENGES AHEAD FOR ABIY

Abiy, now 43, took office in April 2018 after the resignation of Hailemariam Desalegn following three years of violent anti-government protests. The ruling coalition had already begun making conciliatory measures, including releasing many political prisoners, but Abiy speeded up the reforms.

His government has promised to liberalize the bureaucratic, state-controlled economy, unbanned many political parties and dismissed or arrested many senior officials accused of corruption, torture or murder.

The changes are the most sweeping since the coalition took power in 1991, and the loosening of the state's iron grip has raised hopes in the country and abroad.

Abiy's landmark achievement to date is securing peace with neighboring Eritrea. What remains to be seen is whether Abiy - who joined the Ethiopian army in his teens and rose through the ruling EPRDF coalition over the past two decades - can control the political forces he has unleashed.

He faces challenges from elements within the ruling coalition who feel disempowered and from new, ethnically-based parties eager to flex their muscles in next year's elections.

The loosening of political freedoms means many regional powerbrokers are demanding more influence and resources, fueling ethnically-tinged conflicts around the country.

In June, a rogue state militia leader killed the state president of the Amhara region and other top level officials in what the government described as a regional coup attempt.

Desalegn Chane, president of the new National Movement of Amhara (NAMA) party said three of his party's leaders were still in jail, held without charge and suspected of being linked to the violence.

"As an Ethiopian, actually, I am very happy that the prime minister won the Nobel peace prize," he told Reuters by phone.

"However, we still have legitimate concerns and grievances that Abiy needs to address. The political repression our people the Amhara have been suffering from has continued under Abiy."

Abiy also faces high expectations from young Ethiopians who want jobs, development, and opportunities.

The Nobel Peace Prize will be presented in Oslo on Dec. 10, the anniversary of the death of Swedish industrialist Alfred Nobel, who founded the awards in his 1895 will. It is worth nine million Swedish crowns, or around $900,000.

This year's award is the 100th Nobel Peace Prize award since 1901, when Henry Dunant, a founder of the Red Cross, and the French parliamentarian and peace activist Frederic Passy shared the first one. No awards were made on 19 occasions, including during the two world wars.

Why do Ethiopians and Somalis look different than Nigerians and Bantu or even Moroccans and Tunisians? Is it because Arabs mixed with sub-Saharan Africans in the horn of Africa?

By Dawda Jobe

Ongoing M.A. in Geography (college major), University of OsnabrückUpdated Sun

I saw three Somalis yesterday. One had straight hair, the other one curly and the third coarse hair. The fact that Somalia lies on the easternmost corner of Africa surely had its impact on the population.

However, scientifically seen it cannot be said why Somalis look so different to Nigerians or Bantu people or Moroccans. There is simply no proof. It is probably just a phenotype that was more dominant in that region.

About the Arabs: the ancient tribes living across the Gulf of Aden often look like Somalis. There are variances but they tend to look similar.

Appearancewise it's a phenotype that was just most dominant in the region. It's not because Arabs arrived there; Somalis and ancient Arabs just looked like that; my humble opinion. And they are part of a greater “African" stock, so to say. Regarding genetics, Ethiopians and Somalis have a good portion of “non-African" DNA. But the major part still carries mostly African genes; by that I mean genetic information typically carried by Africans (haplogroup E and L for male and female heritage).

So why are they not like Nigerians? I don't know; are Nigerians or Bantus the prototype for Africans? If someone looks different, are they automatically less African? There is zero proof for that. Africa is gigantic. Why should all look the same? Why are we not posing these questions about the Nilotic people (who also carry a lot of non-African DNA) or San people?

Here are some simplified maps about genetic distribution of DNA in Africa.

Male DNA

Female DNA

Like I said, they are simplified. But the picture gets it clear. The majority of East Africans are for a large part of an African stock. We can't say that their hair or face is different because there were some light-skinned Arabs that intermarried with them. There were more ancient migrations into this area a few thousand years ago. But we can't tell what exactly they added to the phenotypic diversity of this region.

North Africans clearly have a different genetic admixture maternalwise. While many still carry male African DNA, mtdna is often DNA typically not assigned to Africa.

Will the completion of the River Nile dam result in an armed conflict between Egypt and Ethiopia?

By “River Nile” dam, it is assumed that the reference is made to Ethiopia's $5 billion Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, along the Blue Nile, one of the Nile’s two major tributaries, near the Ethiopia-Sudan border which is nearing completion at the Nile headwaters.

Dušan Garza August 29

The brief and candid answer is that, an open military conflict/war between Egypt & Sudan on one side against Ethiopia, is at the moment . . . in abeyance but NOT totally out of the question -mainly because none of the belligerents can possibly afford a full scale war with anybody !

The image (wet-tuffs-leadership-20-1641) was not found in this file.

In more detail, the situation is as follows :

The rapid filling of a giant dam at the headwaters of the Nile River — the world’s biggest waterway, supporting millions of people — could reduce water supplies to downstream Egypt by more than one-third.

A water deficit of that magnitude, if unmitigated, could potentially destabilize a politically volatile part of the world by reducing arable land in Egypt by up to 72%. The study projects that economic losses to agriculture would reach $51 billion. The gross domestic product loss would push unemployment to 24%, displacing people and disrupting economies.

So far, despite international negotiations, there’s been little progress in the decadelong dispute.

When completed, it will be the largest hydropower project in Africa and would create a reservoir containing 74 billion cubic meters of water — more than twice the operational capacity of Lake Mead on the Colorado River.

Some 280 million people in 11 countries in the basin depend on the waterway — a primary source of irrigation for more than 5,000 years. Egypt relies on the Nile for more than 90% of its water. The region’s population could increase by 25% in 30 years, increasing demand at a time when Egypt would expect less water from the Nile. Water rights along the Nile have been in dispute since 1959; today, the conflict threatens to escalate into a war.

The dispute is emblematic of wider disputes over water scarcity as climate change affects developing countries experiencing rapid growth. Disputes along the Mekong, Zambezi and Euphrates-Tigris rivers, among others, show the potential for political instability and conflict.

Following endless negotiations over the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) on the River Nile, tensions have risen once again after Addis Ababa suddenly announced that it had completed the second-stage filling of the dam on 19 July 2021. The move is seen as a further provocation for Egypt, which has warned that this was a red line and further filling of the dam may even warrant military action.

80% of Cairo's water supply comes from the Nile, and the city has relied on the river socially and economically since ancient times. Sudan, another upstream state, has also stated that the dam could deprive 20 million Sudanese civilians of water.

On the flip side, Ethiopia also says it needs the dam to generate electricity and improve the lives of its 115 million inhabitants, many of whom have had to live with power shortages for decades.

For the most part, the Arab League has backed Egypt.

Despite previous disagreements between Qatar and the Gulf States, Doha is now adopting the Arab League's position and favouring Cairo's rights to the Nile waters, with other Arab League states having also expressed support for Egypt and Sudan's rights, with Qatar's Foreign Minister describing this as a "united Arab position".

Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam . . when completed & fully operational.

While certain regional powers may have their own interests, the US and EU's inability to resolve the dispute may give Russia a green light to boost its clout with Ethiopia and support Addis Ababa's position on the Nile. Even though Moscow has maintained strong relations with Cairo since Sisi came to power in 2013, including bilateral military ties, it may see a greater opportunity to boost relations with Ethiopia, given that Egypt remains a closer ally to the West, which limits Moscow's ability to expand its foreign policy clout in Africa.

While Ethiopia's second-stage filling is a blow to negotiation efforts, it seems that cold tensions between Cairo and Addis Ababa will, for now, remain a point of contention rather than erupting into an open conflict. Yet if these tensions remain unresolved, further threats of military action could indeed become a future reality, especially if the stakes become more critical for Egypt.

Ethiopia says second filling of Renaissance Dam complete

Latest phase a milestone in controversial Blue Nile hydropower project long opposed by downriver countries Egypt and Sudan.

Ethiopia has completed the filling of a massive, controversial dam on the Blue Nile river for a second year, state media has said, a move that is likely to anger Egypt and Sudan who have long opposed the project. Addis Ababa has said the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD), a $4bn hydropower project, is crucial to its economic development and to provide power.

But the project has caused concern over water shortages and safety in Egy

Reporting from Addis Ababa, Al Jazeera's Catherine Soi said that many Ethiopians are anxiously awaiting the completion of a turbine that will be powered by the dam in a country where 65 million people are currently not connected to the power grid.

"This is indeed a milestone and Ethiopians are excited about this. This is a project of national pride," she said, adding that many Ethiopians had financially supported the dam through buying government bonds.

"But of course the downstream countries, Sudan and Egypt, are very concerned about what this could do to other water flows to their own countries along the Nile," she said. Egypt views the project as a grave threat to its Nile water supplies, on which it is almost entirely dependent. Sudan has also expressed concern about the dam's safety and the effect on its own dams and water stations.

Soi added that a build-up of Ethiopian troops around the dam, amid the training of forces in Sudan and Egypt, is "causing quite a lot of concern".

Al Jazeera's Hiba Morgan reporting from Khartoum, Sudan, said Sudanese officials have repeatedly expressed worries over the dam, especially its impact on farmers.

“There are also concerns about the farmers because Sudanese officials say 20 million people, most of them more farmers along the Nile will be affected by the filling of the dam,” she said.

In early July, the United Nations Security Council backed an African Union bid to mediate the dispute and called for all parties to resume talks.

The United States had previously warned that Ethiopia’s filling of the dam had the potential to raise tensions, while urging all parties to refrain from any unilateral actions.

Paul Okumu of Africa Water for Peace says that instead of focusing on issues such as time taken to fill the dam, the “bigger picture” was being missed.

“You got two downstream countries that are worried about safety until 10 years down the line. They are worried about predictability 10 years down the line,” he told Al Jazeera from Nairobi, Kenya.

“They are worried about the potential of water wars, and nobody’s giving them any assurance until today. And they are worried about the ramification of this [dam] in terms of setting precedents for other upstream development.” SOURCE: AL JAZEERA AND NEWS AGENCIES

Diplomatic war is secondary!

By Leoul Mekonen

Diplomatic work and raising awareness about Nile and GERD is crucial but in my opinion it is not as important as building high tech defense systems. Yesterday I was watching a documentary made a few years ago that predicted the coming wars. 10 major wars were predicted and analyzed by one media and the Ethio-Egypt war was predicted as inevitable.

They predicted Egypt would bomb the dam before completion. One thing we all should remember is Ethiopia has no real friends in the world when we are confronted by strong enemies like Egypt. I wish the diaspora mobilized to strengthen the Ethiopian defense force especially by supporting economically to acquire the latest high tech air defense system and high range missiles that can dismantle Egypt and any neighboring country used as spring ground to launch an attack on Ethiopia.

In my opinion the recent conflict with Sudan was well devised by Egypt, the Arab League and USA to create the atmosphere formidable to attack the dam. The narration that Egypt and Sudan never ally to fight Ethiopia is foolish because politics is unpredictable and when any war brings profit to certain groups deadly enemies can join hands miraculously to accomplish their interest.

Sometimes we must learn how to think about putting ourselves in the enemy's shoes. What would we do if we were Egypt? I would plan carefully how to bomb the dam using internal as well as external forces within and out of Ethiopia.

The effort of the government should be on acquiring sophisticated weapons including nuclear and hydrogen bombs. But caution must be made that highly sophisticated weapons don't go in the hands of OLF and TPLF sympathizer Oromo and Tigre generals. They can easily be bribed by CIA and foreign forces to use it on their own people or disable the weapon in collaboration with foreign forces.

More energy should be invested on building war machines and purely Ethiopian and anti-tribalist armies. Abiy should clear his government from tribalism.

What has Abiy Ahmed done?

After becoming prime minister in April 2018, Mr Abiy introduced massive liberalising reforms to Ethiopia, shaking up what was a tightly controlled nation.

He freed thousands of opposition activists from jail and allowed exiled dissidents to return home. Under him, several women have also been appointed to prominent positions.

Most importantly, he signed the peace deal with Eritrea.

- Abiy Ahmed: The man changing Ethiopia
- The women smashing Ethiopia's glass ceiling
- Bold reforms expose Ethiopia's ethnic divides

But his reforms also lifted the lid on Ethiopia's ethnic tensions, and the resulting violence forced some 2.5 million people from their homes.

Why did he win?

Mr Abiy, 43, was honoured for his "decisive initiative to resolve the border conflict with neighbouring Eritrea", the Norwegian Nobel Committee said.

"The prize is also meant to recognise all the stakeholders working for peace and reconciliation in Ethiopia and in the East and Northeast African regions," they said.

"Peace does not arise from the actions of one party alone. When Prime Minister Abiy reached out his hand, President Afwerki grasped it, and helped to formalise the peace process between the two countries. The Norwegian Nobel Committee hopes the peace agreement will help to bring about positive change for the entire populations of Ethiopia and Eritrea."

Since the Eritrea deal, Mr Abiy - the youngest head of government in Africa - has also been involved in peace processes in other African countries, the committee said. This has included helping to broker an agreement between Sudan's military leaders and civilian opposition after months of protests.

Mr Abiy's office said the award was testimony "to the ideals of unity, cooperation and mutual coexistence that the prime minister has been consistently championing".

Another triumph for Abiy Ahmed
Analysis by Emmanuel Igunza, BBC Africa

Since coming into office just over a year ago, Abiy Ahmed has made history and turned Ethiopian politics on its head.

Few had given him any chance of ascending to the prime minister's office and even less had anticipated the sweeping reforms he would bring to a country that for years had been led by the iron fist of the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front.

His most significant achievement was ending a bitter border dispute with Eritrea. He even went to the Eritrean capital, Asmara, receiving a rock star's welcome - a sign of his popularity with the population weary of the two decades of hostilities between the two countries.

But also significant is the role he has played in bringing peace to the Horn of Africa region, from Sudan to Somalia and Djibouti, all which at some time have had border disputes.

Throughout he's preached a message of Medemer - meaning togetherness or inclusiveness.

His Nobel win is yet another feather in the cap of this former intelligence chief.

What has the reaction been?
African leaders were among those to congratulate Mr Abiy following his win.

Somalia's President Mohamed Farmaajo described Mr Abiy as a "deserving winner" as he congratulated him on Twitter. "I have enjoyed working with him on strengthening regional co-operation," he wrote.

Liberia's President George Weah expressed his "warmest felicitations for this noble feat", while Ghana's President Nana Akufo-Addo said the award was "a reminder to us all that peace is one of the most critical ingredients needed to make Africa successful".

The head of the Norwegian Refugee Council, Jan Egeland, congratulated Mr Abiy but said he must now "make resolving ethnic tensions within Ethiopia a priority".

Human rights group Amnesty International welcomed Mr Abiy's reforms and efforts towards peace, but said his work was "far from done".

"He must urgently ensure that his government addresses the ongoing ethnic tensions that threaten instability and further human rights abuses," it added.

Bisrat Hadte, a 45-year-old businessman in Ethiopia's capital Addis Ababa, told Reuters news agency that Mr Abiy also needed to "improve the economy and drive down the cost of living".

What is his background?

Mr Abiy was born in Ethiopia in 1976 to a Muslim father and Christian mother.

He has several degrees, including a doctorate degree in peace and security issues and a master's degree in transformational leadership.

As a teenager, he joined the armed struggle against the former Derg regime - a Communist military junta that ruled Ethiopia from 1974 to 1987.

He later served as a UN peacekeeper in Rwanda.

If we peacefully unite Ethiopia, Eritrea, Somalia, and Djibouti by creating a Horn of Africa nation, what would this country look like?

Adey Gurshan 1 year

A unified Horn of Africa is not feasible for the next 50–100 years. All four nations have serious dilemmas to deal with individually and need to fix on their own before ever entertaining such thoughts.
Ethiopia is still debating if ethnic federalism is divisive or holding the country together by respecting people’s differences. Somalia has to deal with Islamic fundamentalist terrorists known as Al-Shabab who blow themselves up whenever any progress is made in the country, because of jihad (holy war) in a country that is 99% Muslim, go figure! If this isn't the very definition of mental illness I don't know what is.

Eritrean dictator Isaias Afwerki has been in power since 1991 and turned the country into the North Korea of Africa. 29 years of Socialism has left the youth jobless and on top of that there's mandatory conscription in a border war with Ethiopia that ended in 2018! Djibouti has had the same "president" Ismail Guelleh for 21 years.

I guess if the countries do you unite the one good thing is the fact that there's NO difference between Eritrea/Somalia/Djibouti in relation to Ethiopia. What I mean is that ALL the ethnic groups in those countries are found in Ethiopia.

That's why the Eritrean dictator's family is from Kola Tembien, Ethiopia. Ismail Guelleh of Djibouti is from Dire Dawa, Ethiopia. Somalia's prominent leaders are Ethiopian like Siad Barre who's from Shilabo, Ethiopia.

Ethiopia's states named after the biggest ethnic groups there, except for SNNPS which has like 70 different ethnic groups.

The main tribes of Somalia Hawiye-Issaq-Darood-Dir are all native to eastern Ethiopia.

Ethnic breakdown of Djibouti. The native Somali and Afar of Djibouti are also native to Ethiopia.

Only Tigre, Hedareb(Beja), and Rashida in Eritrea are not found in Ethiopia. Tigre speak a language that descended from Ge’ez like Ethiopian semitic speakers (Amharic, Gurage, Tigrinya, Harari, ect). Beja are a Cushitic people like Afar, Somali, Oromo, ect. The only outlier in Eritrea are the Rashida who are an Arab tribe from the Hejaz region of Saudi Arabia who moved to the Horn of Africa in the 1800s.

Personally I don’t think we need political integration as long as we have deep economic ties like in the EU, and military cooperation with something akin to NATO so that we are deterred from fighting with each other. I believe this is what our leaders are currently working on.

I’m a Tigrayan and I always consider myself Ethiopian despite the war. Does this mean I betrayed my origin? Should I support the separation?

Tseganeh Kuma Lives in Ethiopia Oct 16

Let me give you my honest answer. I think this “separation” thing is emotionally motivated by those people who lost their extremely luxurious lives in Addis Ababa three years ago. For example I befriended Getachew Reda at Hilton hotel while we used to drink glasses of beer and other drinks every morning; he was treated like a king during that time. He and his friends had money-to-burn but after the regim change they were shocked to lose this extravagant life.

They used to eat salmon every morning while the soldiers of “TDF” had nothing to eat.

Following these losers to deny citizenship is a failure.

I believe they are Ethiopians in the heart, so I advise you to continue being Ethiopian. As a Tigryan, you can feel bad by this war, but you can never wash out your being an Ethiopian. I sense your feelings. The war will end soon if the people of Tigray think clearly.

COMMENTARY

By Elias Teshome October 20

I'm from Medrebahri, originally from the Kingdom of Axum. I grew up in Eritrea, although I don't like the name “Eritrea” because Italians named Medrebahri Eritrea, a Greek word to oppress my history and the civilisation of Medrebahri and Axum.

Now, I'm writing because I'm older now well educated in Britain.

Firstly, we're Medrebahrawian/Eritreans and Ethiopians particularly Tigrayan are all Axumites. We later got split into the Abyssinian/Solomonic/Ethiopan and Medrebahri Kingdom in the 12th century.

You have a full right to determine your own destiny. We, Medrebahrawian, weren't not forgiving to Ethiopia due to the level of oppression suffered from ethnic cleansing “ cutting women breast “ , to use of famine as a war weapon under Haileselassie as well as Mengestu.

You shouldn't feel guilty. Be more confident and assertive and ensure whatever you choose to be part of that your rights are kept and voice is heard.

Why is Ethiopia considering downgrading relations with the US?

Interested in US politics since the Kennedy assassination July 7

I suspect it is because the US today is not the US that the leaders of Ethiopia started off with. Maybe China can be a better nation to work with today?

Ethiopia, I suspect, is going to slowly and very carefully swivel towards China as the US and the Western nation become paranoid about Chinas rise which will see the Western nations being eclipsed in the next 5 or 10 years.

The US today is NOT the US of even a few decades ago and as China rises the US and other Western nations get more and more toxic because China is starting to flex its muscles and refuses to do what the West demands they do.

What happened in Alaska when the Chinese delegation gave back more than the US gave which probably scared the crap out of America and the G7 and G7+1, etc., etc. for the first time. The gloves are off and China will not be nice guys any more until the West learns to be polite they will continue to trade with the world while the West fades.

The following is WHY China is being attacked by the West and even some Westernised nations.

US GDP Growth Rate - 2.1%

China GDP growth rate - 6.0%

Figures from just before Covid erupted but once it’s gone these values will return. America is the wealthiest nation in the Western world but even the US can’t keep up with China.

The US cannot remain the number 1 economy when Chinas GDP is growing close to three times faster.

The Ghosts of Adwa

By Safia Aidid

Ethiopia inscribed with anti-colonial meanings after its victory over European colonialism in 1896 was a colonizing state itself.

In 1 March 1896, the First Italo-Ethiopian War reached its dramatic climax at Adwa, a decisive battle that secured Ethiopia's independence and soundly defeated Italian colonial designs for an expansive East African empire. At the moment in which European powers scrambled for the Horn of Africa and France, Britain, and Italy each competed for and claimed their respective territories, Ethiopia — or Abyssinia, as it was typically known at the time — managed to evade European colonial rule.

It is a battle of legendary status in the collective memory of many Ethiopians, inscribed and re-inscribed through stories and commemorative acts of the state; it is also an episode that figures heavily in the imagination of the African diaspora. The heroics of Ethiopian emperor Menelik II and the imagery of an Ethiopian army overpowering an Italian invading one reverberated across the globe, while the successful defense of Ethiopia's external sovereignty enabled the emperor's control and consolidation of central state power at home, in what he saw as the restoration of the Solomonic dynasty's ancient glory. In Ethiopian art depicting the battle, Saint George hovers over their soldiers, offering divine assistance as the patron saint of Ethiopia, of God's chosen country.

For the black diaspora, Adwa seemed to confirm Biblical prophesy that "Ethiopia shall stretch forth her hands unto God" (Psalms 68:31), a verse that took on unique significance in black religious traditions forged in a context of enslavement, racial oppression, and disenfranchisement and emphasized black liberation and emancipation. Though in classical texts, Ethiopia stood in for Africa is a whole, Adwa fused this symbolic Ethiopia with the contemporary Ethiopian state in the minds and hearts of the African diaspora. It produced and proliferated a particular idea of Ethiopia in Pan-Africanist thought, one that saw Ethiopia as the vestige of black freedom in a world where black people – whether in the Americas, Europe, or Africa – were subject to racial domination and exploitation. Indeed, at the first Pan-African Conference in 1900 – where W.E.B. Du Bois uttered his famous statement that "the problem of the twentieth century is the problem of the color line," delegates declared the Ethiopian emperor a "Great Protector" of African peoples everywhere.

As Michel-Rolph Trouillot powerfully argued in Silencing the Past, historical narratives are structured by power, and the very process of historical production creates "a particular bundle of silences" for the historian to deconstruct or unearth. The idea of Ethiopia as a symbol of African independence and sovereignty that circulated in the Ethiopian nationalism and the Pan-Africanist imagination is a narrative structured by power, marshaled by the Ethiopian state following the Second World War and wielded against self-determination claims by the peoples who came under its rule. The fundamental paradox of Adwa is this: the very Ethiopia that inscribed with anti-colonial meanings after its victory over European colonialism was a colonizing state itself.

There is another way to tell the story of Adwa and its silences. This narrative could begin in the battlefield on that very day in 1896, when Menelik's army of 100,000 men stood in wait with modern rifles – accumulated through strategic dealings with the competing European powers in the Horn – as an unsuspecting Italian force of less than 20,000 made their way from Mount Eticho towards Adwa. It could begin years prior, when Menelik moved southward beyond his Shewa kingdom, and by 1886 created a capital for his new empire that his wife Taytu named Addis Ababa, carved out of the land the conquered Oromo called Finfinne. It could start with the east, with the defeat and flight of the last Emir from Harar in 1887 and the emperor's army poised to occupy the city and enter its ancient gates, the first opening to the rich, grazing lowlands of the Somali peninsula that Ethiopian armies would claim after Adwa in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. This is the narrative of the making of modern Ethiopia, a process by which the state expanded south and southeast beyond its traditional northern highlands, doubling Ethiopia in size by the turn of the 20th century and into its current shape.

Contemporary Ethiopian politics can be analyzed in terms of historical narrative. It can be understood through the historical claims and historical grievances of the many peoples of the former Ethiopian Empire, each with their own stories, each with wrongs not addressed or rectified in the transition to an imperfect ethnic federalism and nominal democracy after 1991. As I write this, Ethiopian prime minister Hailemariam Desalegn offered his resignation to the ruling party, in the midst of unprecedented state concessions in response to sustained protests mainly by the Oromo – the largest ethnic group in the country – that began in November 2015. The trigger then was the Addis Ababa Master Plan that would have seen the growing city expand its administrative and territorial limits into the surrounding Oromia region, but the protests swelled into a movement calling into question the very workings of Ethiopian statehood – a state in which federalism is said to govern, but power remains, as it has in its entire modern history, concentrated in the hands of a few.

At stake in this movement is not simply political reform, but the histories of disenfranchisement and systematic exclusion of the Oromo and many other historically dominated ethnic groups by successive Ethiopian regimes, a narrative that exists in the collective consciousness of protesters today. Though it is too early to know what transformations are yet to come, it seems as though we are in a moment in which the ghosts of Adwa may finally be put to rest.

Ethiopia for many years was a centralised, large, prosperous monarchy little different from Middle Eastern or European states. It was able to fight off European invaders. Yet today it's poor, corrupt, and wracked with ethnic tensions. What happened?

Kevin Richardson

PhD in History, The University of Texas at AustinMarch 20

I tend to disagree with your framing of the question.

It seems to me that Ethiopia for many years was a centralized, large, prosperous monarchy little different from Middle Eastern or European states. It was able to fight off European invaders.

First off, we need to clarify exactly what time period we are talking about? From your reference to “fighting off European invaders,” I assume you are talking about the period circa 1870-1935, the era surrounding the victory over Italy at the Battle of Adwa in 1896.

Yet, that was an era of the relative strength of the monarchy, and if we were to look to the era of Tewodros II in the 1860s, there was fierce rivalry between that emperor, Ras Kassa, and Ras Menelik of Shewa, which undercut Tewodros’ resistance to the British punitive expedition under Robert Napier in 1868. Ras Kassa cooperated with the invading British, who besieged Emperor Tewodros II’s capital and caused him to commit suicide. Kassa went on to become Emperor Yohannes IV and would rule for ~20 years, but would die in battle against the Mahdist sultanate in 1889.

Sudanese Mahdist Revolt

The final rival Ras Menelik would later become Emperor Menelik II in 1890 and victor at Adowa in 1896.

So, the period from 1870-1935, (i.e. the reigns of Yohannes IV, Menelik II, Empress Zewditu, and Haile Selassie’s first reign) was a time where there was a comparatively smooth transition of power between claimants to the throne, unlike the earlier tumultuous Zemene Mesafint (circa 1750-1850) where there was effectively no central authority, and power was contested by multiple sub-kings.

Still, I would not call the Ethiopian state from 1890-1935 as either prosperous or centralized. Yes, Menelik II was able to command enough authority to call out a well-armed force of 100,000 soldiers to resist invasion, and enough to secure diplomatic recognition of Ethiopian independence from powers like Russia, the UK, France, and the US.

However, Menelik II was still very reliant on the support and loyalty of powerful regional lords and the traditional landlord class. Of course, he and Haile Selassie made strong efforts to assert their own power, and to centralize power, but that was very much an unfinished process by 1935.

On the subject of prosperity, up until 1935, Ethiopia was overwhelmingly an agrarian country. Yes, there was splendor and finery around the monarchy, and funds were found to equip a credible army. However, those things obscure extremely low levels of industrialization and widespread rural poverty in the country.

Now, if instead, we are looking at the period from 1941-1974 (Haile Selassie's 2nd reign after the Italian occupation), then things look a lot different.

Starting in the 1940s, there is great emphasis on elite education, sending pupils overseas for technical education. These promising students were then incorporated into a growing bureaucracy which Haile Selassie used as a political counter-balance against the landed nobility. He also promulgated a new constitution in 1955 (his second constitution, after one in 1931). These actions all had the effect of further centralizing power around the Emperor.

Ditto, the 1950s to early 1970s saw efforts to appeal for foreign commercial investment in commercial agricultural schemes, petrochemical refining, and textile manufactures. Also, the regime happily accepted humanitarian and developmental assistance in the form of support for education, hospitals/health, and experimental agricultural schemes. So, you could say that Ethiopia was becoming more prosperous in this period. Although, I would note that industrial development, education, and health spending became tools for further reinforcing imperial authority and centralization of power. There were stark inequalities in terms of number of schools and doctors per 100,000 people in the different provinces, with areas like Addis Ababa, Shewa, Tigre, Eritrea having more schools and doctors, but areas like Hararge, Sidamo, or Wollega having only one or two hospitals and a handful of high schools for the whole province.

Yet today it's poor, corrupt, and wracked with ethnic tensions.

Are Ethiopians today poorer than Ethiopians in 1900? No. As I already said, up until 1935, the country was a heavily agrarian country with almost no industrialization. Today, Ethiopia is still not as industrialized or as wealthy as a country like China or Egypt, or Turkey. But, if we look at World Bank economic indicators, since 1980, per capita incomes, are up quite a lot. Poverty is down from 45% in 1995 to ~25% now. School enrollments are up, life expectancy is up. Now, World Bank data starts pretty recently (there wasn't even a World Bank before World War 2 to collect the data). GDP growth rate has been 8-13% per annum since 2004.

Ethiopia is still considered a low-income/developing country. But, I think people in the West have a big hangover from the images of the 1984 famine. Ethiopia in 2020 is a far richer country than in 1935.

The events and grievances that underlay these tensions go all the way back to 1870 or earlier. What is new now is that these tensions get more openly expressed in public among communities which have in the past been marginalized. And these tensions become visible and legible to outsiders in Europe and America through a handful of means. With video and the proliferation of instantaneous international news reporting, the public in North America or Europe can see protests happening right now in Ethiopia. Ditto, the proliferation of social media and internet connections means that people living in Ethiopia can keep in contact with relatives in the diaspora. And the diaspora can become a powerful pressure group lobbying the international community about government handling of tensions.

A secondary factor is that the increase in educational provision in Ethiopia, particularly higher-education, has meant that pupils from marginalized ethnic groups have gained access to higher education, and since the 1980s have produced a lively batch of revisionist scholarship which challenges the narratives produced during the regime of Menelik II and Haile Selassie.

This revisionist school highlights the Ethiopian state from 1855-1974 as promoting an Amharic court culture and working to assimilate and subordinate other communities like the Oromo, Somali, Sidama, Afar and others.

So, where traditional historiography will applaud Menelik II as the victor at Adowa and savior of Ethiopia, revisionist historians will note that Menelik launched the conquest of Oromo, Sidama, and Somali lands in the south of the Empire and established settlements of Tigray or Amhara neftegna (literally “gun men”) as local landlords and settlers in the newly conquered south. Here is an essay on that theme:

Other historians will focus on the period from 1941-1973 and examine the ethnic dimensions of Haile Selassie’s national developmental schemes. I mentioned above about the geographic inequality in hospitals, doctors, and schools in the 1960s and 1970s. It bears mentioning that areas with good provisions, like Shewa and Gondar, were considered Amhara areas, while Hararge, Sidamo, and Wollega were Somali and Oromo provinces.

So, revisionists (perhaps a bad term, their criticisms have become part of the academic mainstream in the last 2 decades) would argue that the modern ethnic tensions are the result of Ethiopian imperialism in the 19th and early 20th century. Or, to quote Lubie Birru's 1980 essay "Abyssinian Imperialism as the Genesis of the Crisis in the Horn

How did Ethiopia remain independent for so long and then gain support from other colonial powers?

Kevin Richardson PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin August 24
TL, DR: Ethiopia got support, got its house in order, and then was able to remain independent by a combination of diplomacy and military prowess via the persons of Menelik II and Taytu (the imperial couple).

Read Raymond Jonas, The Battle of Adwa* (2011) for a good retelling.
Statue of Emperor Menelik II in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

To begin: Ethiopia (specifically the Emperor Menelik II) gained support—domestically and overseas—and then remained independent. So you've got that kind of backward there.

The tragedy of Tewodros II and his poking of the British, including the incredibly stupid act of hostage-taking which ended with the Indian Army invading Ethiopia and ending his reign at Magdala in 1868 (and then leaving because they had no interest in the high cost of occupation), as well as the hubris and navel-gazing of Yohannes IV were important. Those two things were important by being instructive to King Menelik of Shewa, who used the time between his accession in Shewa and Yohannes's death to build constructive alliances and contacts outside the country and expand his own power base so he could successfully contend for the throne after Yohannes stupidly got himself shot in battle in 1889. This included close ties to the Italians on the coast in Eritrea, the treaty with whom (Wuchale) was so problematic because its Article XVII purportedly ceded Ethiopian sovereignty but only in Italian. But it also included a careful navigation of Anglo-French rivalries regarding north-south (British) and east-west (French) blueprints for African empire that ran through his country, not to mention a significant public-opinion campaign that he, and the Empress Taytu, ran brilliantly in Europe.

Still, Menelik waited to repudiate Wuchale and face the Italians until he was ready—after recovery from rinderpest, after he'd reconciled or crushed his domestic foes, and after harvests were in. He also managed to get more modern weapons via arms dealers, European (especially Swiss-like Alfred Ilg) advisors, and the French governor at Obok (today in Djibouti) who was a long-cultivated friend who feared Italo-British hegemony over Ethiopia. He also took advantage of the expectation of Italian victory in an age of empire to make his enemies overconfident. Menelik's army had artillery that could outrange its Italian opposition, and machineguns—things no other African state successfully obtained in meaningful numbers.

After the Battle of Adwa in 1896, where a much larger Ethiopian army defeated a smaller, equally equipped Italo-Eritrean one, he used that time to garner the legitimacy and the treaties that would guarantee Ethiopia's security—but that also neutralized it as a space that could play off the British and French (and Italians) against one another. The result was a slow closing of doors to Ethiopian overtures, and for their part, Ras Tafari Makonnen (a prince and the worldly son of Menelik's foreign advisor, who would become Haile Selassie I in 1930) sought support from powers that could not or would not provide it in an effort to counterbalance the Europeans (e.g., the US or Japan) and reluctantly had to accept it from Italy, France, and Britain. The Italian invasion of 1935 was the result of France and Britain deciding that Italian militarism in Europe could be salved by letting them do as they wished in Africa. But even then, Ethiopia fought hard, never surrendering the countryside, and outmaneuvered Europe in the end (1941) by openly declaring their equality with the "other" Allied Powers and virtually daring the British to try to treat them like an ex-Italian colony. Ethiopia ultimately took a small part in the European theater of war, which is itself a fascinating story, and in the end, they got control of ex-Italian Eritrea in the aftermath.

Menelik, Taytu, and Haile Selassie are exceptional characters in world history, and I'd encourage you to read Harold Marcus's (and others', including Prouty on Taytu) biographies of them to understand them better. The question of whether another emperor could have pulled off Menelik's feat is an open one, but he was incredibly aware of doings beyond Ethiopia, and dispatched envoys regularly in a way few other emperors had or likely would have. As a result, he had an appreciation of the way that colonial powers worked, knew what they'd probably try, and made sure he was ready to use that knowledge against them.

For the longer-winded coverage of all of this, one recent book, in particular, is worth your time. Raymond Jonas has done a very good job of explaining the Italo-Ethiopian relationship and Menelik II's rise to power in his The Battle of Adwa: African Victory in the Age of Empire (2011), which I actually reviewed for a journal. The major issue I had was that he overplays the relevance of their resistance by suggesting it was the main reason African decolonization in the 1950s/1960s even happened (!?!), but his narrative on the major developments and their short-term, localized meaning is very good and extremely engaging. He doesn't have any Amharic sources, but a lot was translated after the campaign of 1896, and he treats the Ethiopian court and countryside with respect on its own terms. I'd strongly recommend it.

Ethiopia: Two Turbines of GERD Will Generate Electricity in First Months of Ethiopian New Year

Ethiopian News Agency (Addis Ababa)
Addis Ababa — The necessary preparations are underway to enable the two turbines of the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) generate electricity in the first months of the coming Ethiopian New year, according to Minister of Water, Irrigation and Energy, Dr. Sileshi Bekele.

The Minister told ENA that Ethiopia has encountered various challenges in the negotiation process of GERD.

However, he stated that as the construction process of the dam has intensified amidst these challenges, the nation is now working to commence generation of electricity in the first months of Ethiopian New Year by using the two turbines of the dam.

Noting that Ethiopia has the full right to use its natural gifts, he said using natural resources for development is vital in order to defeat poverty in the country.

In this regard, GERD is a key instrument to tackle the development challenges in Ethiopia, the Minister added.

Ethiopia: Pagume - a Short Month With Many Feat

Ethiopia, unlike the other world, celebrates its new year on 11 September. Similarly, unlike the other world's calendar, Ethiopia has its unique calendar, with an additional month in its calendar, Pagume, the 13th month.

Pagume is a month with only five days, becoming six days in a four years period, which always is a transition month from the old year to New Year in Ethiopia's calendar. Pagume month is a month between the end of August and the beginning of September.

According to the Ethiopian Calendar, Ethiopian New Year is always celebrated during 01 Meskerem, which is September 11 in the Gregorian calendar. Ethiopia's calendar is also seven years back from the Gregorian calendar.

Ethiopia is accepting its 2014 New Year today, 01 Meskerem, 11 September 2021. The Ethiopian New Year is always celebrated after the short month, the Pagume month. Pagume is not a unique month only in terms of shortest month, but also it has its distinct features, unlike the other months.

Though Pagume in the Ethiopian calendar is considered as the 13th month, there is no salary payment for civil servants and other monthly paid services. In addition, during the 13th month, there is no payment for rented houses and other monthly agreed payments in Ethiopia.

During this month, all civil servants across the country as usual present in their offices and provide their day-to-day services, though there is no payment for the days they work. But, it is a common norm and every civil servant is happy to provide the five day free services during this month.

As I mentioned above, for this month, house rent for both commercial and resident purposes across the country. It is abnormal to ask for rent payment during this month, though every service is provided. These are formal and normal free and voluntary services every year a citizen in Ethiopia is providing for their citizens and their country.

Similarly, on the eve of the New Year, youths are engaged in mobilizing different resources for the needy to provide holiday gifts to support them to celebrate the New Year without any shortage of food or beverages.

Ethiopians are busy during the Pagume days since these days are preparation days to accept the New Year. To fulfil the necessary needs to celebrate the New Year holiday, every one according to his/her capacity is preparing for the day. The Pagume days are the preparation day for the holiday.

Parallel to the preparations to accept the New Year, during the Pagume month, voluntary services and generous activities increases.

Due to these and other reasons, Pagume month is considered as free service, voluntarism, generosity, kindness and contribution month. These voluntary services, nowadays, are also increasing from year to year.

Starting from recent years, Pagume month's days are celebrated every year by giving names for each day to promote different national and voluntary service activities by mobilizing the people.

This year's Pagume days were also celebrated with different names and slogans especially in the capital, Addis Ababa. The five days were named Ethiopia Day, Free service Day, Generosity and Voluntarism Day, Heroism Day and Promise Day respectively celebrated from Monday 06 September to Friday 10 September 2021.

During the first day of Pagume, Ethiopia Day was celebrated with different activities that promote Ethiopia's values. Early in the morning, a lot of Ethiopians were gathered in Mesqel Square and chanted the national anthem and raised the national flag.

The second Pagume Day was named as free service provision day to acknowledge and thank the free services provided during the Pagume month. In addition, the day promotes developing carrying and respecting customers during the service provision.

Meanwhile, the third day of Pagume was named as generosity day to promote kindness, generosity and acknowledging gifts to the needy and voluntary services. During this day, all Addis Ababa City public buses were providing a full day free transportation service to settlers of the city. Similarly, taxes and other transportation services joined the public buses in providing free services during the day. During the generosity day, the Addis Ababa City administration provides over 1,800 houses renewed during the direct voluntary services to the elderly.

The fourth day of Pagume, heroism day was celebrated on Thursday to recognize and respect Ethiopian heroes in all fields. The day was especially celebrated to give respect and love to the Ethiopian National Defense Force. While the fifth day of Pagume, the eve of Ethiopian News Year, was named Promise day.

The Pagume month tradition of providing free services and voluntary activities is no days capitalized to a higher level by recognizing the traditional activities. By capitalizing on the traditional norm of providing free services during the Pagume days, the government is providing additional and formal voluntary and nation bullying activities during this unique month.

The new campaigns are promoting citizens to accept the New Year with new spirit, love, passion and patriotism. The atmosphere and mood during these days is something new and special, hence, investing in national and other public issues during these days helps to put unforgettable memories on the minds of citizens.

Which was the first civilization in Africa, Egypt or Ethiopia?

Alexander Balogun African history Ph.D. August 5, 2018

None of the mentioned Kingdoms.

Rather the first recordable civilisation in Africa was dated around 9000 BC. The location was in the Nubian desert between South of Egypt and North of Sudan, extending to parts of Southeeast Libya.

During at the fall of the Ice age 14,000 years ago, the Sahara was a lush land with wildlife and several lake basins. The Nubian desert in south Egypt which is called Nabta Playa, Archaeologist where able to prove that around 9000 BC that they were evidence of prehistoric religion, with a number of sacrificed cattle buried in stone-roofed chambers lined with clay.

The first practice of astronomy in human existence was also traced to the Nubian desert (Nabta Playa)The stone circle dating back to over 9000 years is among the oldest archeoastronomical devices in human history, designed as a prehistoric calender to mark to mark 2 significant celestial phenomenon-which is associated with the onset of summer rains and the arrangement of stars in the night sky, which was used to guide themselves across the desert.

Archeological findings also proved that it was during the Mesolithic period and the people were from the Halfan culture. The Halfan people had developed an advanced urban community, domesticated animals, established an organized labour force, built structures and most importantly the first ever people recorded to practice astronomy….

Desiccation kicked in, due to Climatic change and the once lush region gradually became a desert forcing it's people to settle along the Nile River. Leaving behind megalithic structures, numerous grave sites and building structures.

Nabta Playa and the Ancient Astronomers of the Nubian Desert

Some archaeologists believe that the people of Nabta Playa were the precursor civilization for the first Nile cities that arose in that region thousands of years later.

The next civilisation after that was Ta-Seti. Which by 3800 BC was at it's zenith. They were the earliest to have a monarchy system in the Nile valley and they showed the first use of Hieroglyphics even before the founding of ancient Egypt.

Ancient Nubian Artifacts Yield Evidence of Earliest Monarchy

Around 3150 BC vassal kingdoms across the Nile united and Ta-Seti became the first administrative region of Upper Egypt.

Upper Egypt - Wikipedia

Around 3100 BC Upper Egypt marched North and conquered the Delta region, subjugating it culturally and politically. Unifying the South and the North as one political unit…. The Kingdom of Egypt is born.

A lot of scholars don't talk about all these because of reasons best known to them…. Moreso it hurts them to tell the world that the oldest civilisation was from Black Africans.

Ethiopia modernised its military in the late 19th century, and thus was the only African nation able to effectively resist European colonisation during the Scramble for Africa. Why is this? Did any other nations try to modernise their militaries?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam

I am the West African History Guy April 26

I am afraid that a focus on military victories misses the point entirely. The answer to one half of your question is that others tried too, to varying degrees of success, to modernise their armed forces.

That is how Egyptian troops looked in the 19th-century. It did not prevent their conquest.

Going back further, Morocco was one of the mediaeval-era Muslim Gunpowder Empires. And across North and West Africa, guns were in widespread use.

The reliance of the Europeans on local troops also meant a steady diffusion of European-style battle tactics across the continent.

Samori Toure departing into exile. Note the troops surrounding him and their armaments

I have written elsewhere that the victory of the Europeans was determined long beforehand by their strategic advantage. They controlled the seas. That meant—as the Boers, among others, learnt—that if push came to shove, they could starve out resistance.

Without the means to carry the war to Europe, the independence of any non-West European State—until the 20th-century and the arrival of Saints AK and MANPAD—relied on the sufferance of a Great Power. There were two exceptions. The first, Japan, was a substantial naval power. And after Midway, she lost that strategic advantage. The second was the USA. Although not a substantial naval power until the World Wars, Uncle Sam was united, hegemonic and self-sufficient.

The Ethiopians were lucky to have good relations with the French at French Somaliland. Most importantly, because of their competition over territories in North Africa—which the Italians saw as their natural empire because of the Roman connection— the French were hostile to Italy. That posture shifted when they needed them to contain the Germans.

Second, the British were aware of the origins of the Nile and loath to allow a power that could dam it to occupy Ethiopia. The Ethiopian Empire was also pragmatic enough not to resist granting British Egypt and Sudan advantageous water rights.

Third, Emperor Menelik II was pragmatic enough not to let a single victory get to his head. He did not push to evict the Italians from Eritrea, for example. He pocketed diplomatic recognition and the settlement of the frontiers with the Great Powers, even if that meant, as it often did, having to cede some territories.

The Ethiopians were not the only Africans to beat the Europeans in battle. Groups ranging from the Algerians to the Zulu have their share of scalps. Unlike the Ethiopians in the late 19th-century, they lacked both the advantageous international environment and the diplomatic apparatus and nous to consolidate their momentary battlefield advantage into a recognition as a ‘legitimate’ member of the International System.

The Ethiopians in the 20th-century would discover the folly of relying on arms alone. And how tenuous international ‘legitimacy’ can be for non-Great Powers.

All Historical Sources shows that their were 225 Emperors in Ethiopia since ancient times Menelik I being the first Solomonic Emperor of Ethiopia, is traditionally believed to be the son of King Solomon of ancient Israel and Makeda, ancient Queen of Sheba.

But a recent published book based on the 400 stolen books (even though a lot more are stolen) by the British empire after the Battle of Magdala and are written in the ancient Ethiopian Language "Ge'ez", this 400 books of ancient history, culture and language are recently located at Washington DC, USA. The book show that Haile Selassie I were actually Ethiopia's 300th and last emperor of Ethiopia. This 400 books also describe about religion, politics and the bloodline of the royal families that starts from ኦሪ (Ori) who was one of the son of Adam (yes that's right am talking about the 1st human being).

This New published book is beyond bizarre, intriguing, full of researched facts and borderlines fiction. The book also claims that it knows all the names, years of reign and how long they stayed in power of each emperor that have ever walked the land of Ethiopia. The book states that Menelik the 1st was not actually the 1st emperor and puts him on number 75 of its list of Emperor's. This new ground breaking book also mentions "Kibre Negest"(this was another book stolen by James Bruce, a Scottish explorer who also stole the book of Enoch from South Gondar, Ethiopia) and "Abyssinian History 1922" as other references.

The book also claims that ኦሪ (Ori) whom it calls the 1st Ethiopian leader (even though i don't think we can use the titles Emperor or King for that period of time) had 21 descendants upto Noah's flood who became kings after him.

The Book is Called "የ ግእዝ ጥና ት"(its an Amharic book) the literal translation being the "the study of Ge'ez".

Here are pictures from the book that describe what i mentioned above in more detail and the list of ALL the Ethiopian Emperor's, Enjoy!!!

Johan Louis De Jong Studied at University of Amsterdam October 7, 2019

There are two Invasions: one in the 19th Century, one in the 20th

The first one was unpopular. Against the Italian Invaders Ethiopia was supported by troops provided by the Russian Empire and diplomatically by France. But I suspect the Russian actions were based in the Crimean War when Sardinia-Piedmont fought against Russia. While the French acts were motivated by Tunesia which Italy had wanted and the Triple Alliance with Germany and Austria-Hungary..

The image pair with relationship id rId4 was not found in the file.

Another reason was that the Orthodox Russians kind of liked Orthodox -not really,for it is Coptic- Ethiopia and hated the Roman Catholic Church because of Poland.

The second one was deeply unpopular and was condemned by the League of Nations which provided sanctions against Italy no nation kept.

Emperor Haile Selassie with his Empress

But this time poor Ethiopia had no backers.. Nevertheless it is rumored Hitler sent Emperor Haile Selassie a box full of stenguns hoping the Italian adventure would fail.. Both Britain and France were upset about which last country was more leftish at the time.. The Prime Ministers of Britain and France even tried to rescue Ethiopia by giving parts of it to Italy but this was considered immoral.

United Kingdom - Baldwin and the abdication crisis

It must be said that during the short Occupation of Ethiopia Britain gave up on it while France was too busy with internal affairs and the Spanish Civil War.

Foreign Office Spokesperson Calls Embassies Closure "Right-sizing"

August 21 , 2021

By HAWI DADHI

Officials of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs have pursued Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed's pledge before parliament to close no less than 31 missions abroad, in a manner Dina Mufti, the spokesperson, described as "rightsizing" instead of downsizing. But the missions will be downsized in number and either merged with others in their vicinities or their heads designated to work as 'laptop ambassadors,' serving from the home office.

The decision is seen as a major departure from the past when the opening of the missions was taken as a policy to advance economic diplomacy in attracting foreign direct investments and boost the country's diplomatic presence. A few missions, including the consulate in Minnesota and the embassy in Asmera, have been opened since the Prime Minister's ascent to political power.

The latest move in closing the missions comes following an address the Prime Minister made to parliament a little over a month ago. Prime Minister Abiy has made his misgivings public about the running cost of diplomatic missions in the aftermath of his administration's feud with the west in the international diplomatic sphere. It is a measure that coincided with mounting pressure on the federal government and its allies over the worrying situation in Tigray Regional State, where 5.2 million people need urgent humanitarian assistance. “Instead of spending all the forex here and there on the embassies, at least 30 of them should be closed, and the ambassadors can work from here,” said the PM during the parliamentary session on July 5, 2021.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs operates with a budget of 3.7 billion Br this year, close to a billion Birr more than last year. Out of the total budget, 325 million Br was appropriated to economic and business diplomacy, 815 million Br for international relations, and 172.9 million Br for public diplomacy.

Late in July, all Ethiopian diplomats, barring ambassadors and heads of finance, were instructed to report to Addis Abeba by August 21, 2021, to attend a three-week session in reorientation. The schedule has been pushed to mid-September to allow the army of diplomats to settle before sitting for the sessions. "Members of foreign missions have been recalled and will go through re-training," said Dina Mufti, spokesperson of the foreign office, during a weekly briefing held last Thursday.
Some diplomats have chosen not to return, according to sources close to the matter. Letters notifying the 31 missions, which account for over half of the country's total, of the closures have already be sent out.
The decision to downsize came abruptly, with no formal study carried out, unlike during previous reforms when the Ministry would deploy professionals to determine the path to follow, a diplomat claimed.
"In the Ministry’s century-old history, there has never been a 'restructuring' of this magnitude," said another diplomat, adding that the sudden nature of the closures has been a challenge in terms of settling personal matter and official duties.
Dina dismisses such claims. The decision was made based on the findings of a study conducted by a committee. He also argued that the reform should not be termed a downsizing, choosing instead to employ the word "rightsizing."
Two missions in the United States – Los Angeles and Minnesota – will be redirected to the embassy in Washington DC, under Fitsum Arega. The consular office in Los Angeles has already shipped cars, laptops and other movable properties to the embassy in Washington DC, according to sources close to the matter.

The closures are expected to be finalised by October, while the consulate in New York remains active under Taye Astkesellasie. Embassies in Brasilia and Ottawa will be folded into Washington DC's portfolio.
Three consulates in China – Guangzhou, Shanghai and Chongqing – will be closed, while the embassy in Beijing and the consulate in Hong Kong remain open.
Embassies in Dublin, Accra, Seoul, Doha, Stockholm, Dakar, and Kigali, are among those which will continue providing services as 'laptop ambassadors.' The same is true for the embassy in Cairo, where Markos Tekle serves as an ambassador.
Such a practice is common in light of a change of government as ideologies and relationships with countries evolve; it should not be thought of as a catastrophic phenomenon, says a foreign policy expert who requested anonymity. "There were times the country had very few missions, and at times it was oversized," he said. "The critical issue is finding balance."

According to the expert, the closure of missions is not a black and white matter that should be classified as either right or wrong. He added that while some of the closures might indeed be a wise decision, others, such as the embassy closure in Cairo, could spell trouble in securing national interests. "It is natural that the closure of over half of the diplomatic missions in such an abrupt and unprecedented manner will have an impact on our diplomacy," said a diplomat.
Following the reorientation, there will be a redeployment of diplomats to missions, but a significant number of those recalled will be assigned to federal agencies, according to people familiar with the process.

Ethiopia was occupied by the Italians, but Ethiopia did avoid The Scramble for Africa. However, it was not world power at the time as can be seen by the British punitive expedition to Abyssinia

Ian Holloway Former Principal Lecturer (1997–1999) Updated Sun

British Expedition to Abyssinia - Wikipedia
The British sent a punitive expedition to Abyssinia which defeated the Abyssinians and captured their capital city.

The Abyssinian King Tewodros (aka Theodore), imprisoned several missionaries and two representatives of the British government in a spat with Britain. The British didn’t take kindly to this.

The punitive expedition led by General Robert Napier in response required the transportation of an army hundreds of miles across mountainous terrain lacking any road system. The British won every battle against the troops of Tewodros, captured the Ethiopian capital, and rescued all the hostages.

The body of King Tewodros was discovered by soldiers of the 33rd near to the gate. He had committed suicide by discharging a pistol in his mouth. Ironically, this pistol had been a present from Queen Victoria. The remainder of King Tewodros's forces were rounded up and the fortress was captured. A few days later, the engineers destroyed the gates of fortress, and the city was razed.

The expeditionary force then had to turn around and march the 400 miles back to the coast.

The expedition was widely hailed on its return for achieving all its objectives.

From this we see that the Ethiopians were not a world power at the time. They could not have:

- Sailed an army to Britain at all.
- Could not have defeated a British fleet if they had sailed.
- Could not have beaten a British army “at home” (if they couldn’t beat one “away”)
- Could not have taken any nice photos of their achievements

So it is clear that Britain and Abyssinia were in a different league in terms of power.

Note the Abyssinian Expedition lives on in terms of requests from Ethiopia to return war booty from the campaign.

The Dangerous Expansion of Ethiopia's Tigray War

Q&A / AFRICA 30 JULY 2021

A rapidly escalating conflict has pushed Africa's second most populous country to the edge. In this Q&A, Crisis Group expert William Davison explains why the main protagonists urgently need to strike a deal to avert a downward spiral toward state collapse.

Who is involved in the expanding fighting in Ethiopia?

Ethiopia's grinding nine-month war has entered a dangerous new phase. In late July, the federal government and allied regional leaders intensified attempts to mobilise people from across the country to join the war against forces from the country's northernmost region, Tigray. Those forces, having broken the back of a combined Ethiopian-Eritrean intervention in Tigray after compelling most federal troops to withdraw on 28 June, have made incursions into the neighbouring Afar and Amhara regions. In response, authorities in Addis Ababa enlisted paramilitaries from some of Ethiopia's nine other regions to buttress the flagging federal military. They then launched a mass recruitment drive, including in the capital and in the two most populous regions, Oromia and Amhara. A war that has already exacted an awful toll now seems set to expand significantly, likely leading to thousands more deaths and far greater instability countrywide.

For their part, Tigrayan forces have moved aggressively as Addis Ababa's recruitment campaign proceeds. Though federal authorities have, in effect, blockaded their region, Tigrayan fighters have been able to pursue federal and regional units into Afar, which lies east of Tigray, reportedly displacing tens of thousands of people who fled the violence. They may soon try to cut the key trade route from Addis Ababa through Afar to Djibouti, which functions as Ethiopia's main port. They have also advanced south and south west, with thousands of Tigrayan fighters pushing down main roads toward Woldiya and Gondar cities in the north of Amhara, taking control of several towns along the way.

Their objective appears to be to force Ethiopian leaders into accepting their terms for a ceasefire, which now include a demand for a “transitional arrangement” – in effect, Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed’s ouster – as well as the withdrawal of Eritrean and Amhara forces from Tigray. By heading toward Gondar, these fighters may well also be preparing to try pushing the Amhara regional government out of parts of western Tigray that it occupied when the ill-fated federal intervention began in early November 2020. If they succeed, Tigrayan forces would open a supply line to neighbouring Sudan. Food and other staples from Sudan would ease the humanitarian crisis inside Tigray, but exacerbate the political one, as Addis Ababa would see Khartoum as aiding a rebellion. Sudanese-Ethiopian ties are already frayed due to clashes over the fertile al-Fashaga borderlands. -William Davison Senior Analyst, Ethiopia wdavison10

Ethiopia warns against incitement over 'no-mandate' governente

Saturday, September 26, 2020

What you need to know:

The warning on Friday came days after authorities in the Tigray, which conducted regional elections in defiance to the central government, announced that it will not accept an order from Addis Ababa to redo the polls.

Alongside the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) which rules the Tigray region, some opposition groups have been protesting over the mandate of Ahmed's government come October.

Ethiopia's defence forces and federal police officials have warned against incitement amid the hardline position by some politicians that Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed's mandate will end on October 10.

The warning on Friday came days after authorities in the Tigray, which conducted regional elections in defiance to the central government, announced that it will not accept an order from Addis Ababa to redo the polls.

The Ethiopian government had postponed the elections initially scheduled for August to next year due to the Covid-19 pandemic.
Alongside the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) which rules the Tigray region, some opposition groups have been protesting over the mandate of Ahmed's government come October.

"We will be compelled to take action against any entity seeking to impose its will in a way that violates the Constitution, " General Berhanu Jula, the Deputy Chief of Staff and Head of Operation Affairs, told local media on Friday.

The official said those who say there will be no government after October 10 should refrain from any attempt to derail the Constitution, or face the consequences.
"Defence forces will take strong military actions against any group which attempts to violate the Constitution."

The official further stressed that the country's defense forces will collectively safeguard the Constitution irrespective of any force against it.

Police ready

Regarding celebrations of the Meskel Demera and Erecha festivals which will take place in Addis Ababa in the next few days, Federal Police Commissioner General Endeshaw Tassew said police have prepared to ensure peace.
He issued a statement saying the security forces will take action against those pushing for their own interests while insisting that the government's term will end in October.

Police are working closely with the community to maintain peace and security and will not tolerate any violence," he said, and called on the community to report incidents and cooperate with police in the bid to ensure peace.
According to the police commissioner, inspections are being carried out at the main entrances to the capital to ensure peaceful celebrations. "We have learned that there are forces planning to disrupt the festivals," he said.

The in Brief of Zena File of the Radio Ethiopia in the mid 1980s
Authored by Eshetu Geletu

Let me narrate briefly about one of the best broadcast news stories venues endowed with news making tradition in the history of Ethiopia as far as I know in close distance without forgetting some news media batches of Negash G/mariam, Ahadu Sabure, Asamenew G/weld, Ambassador Maeregu Bezabeh, Author Bealu Girma, Elleni Mekuria, Teklu Tabor, Paulos Gnogno, Gedamu Abreha, Yakob W/Mariam, Samuel Ferenj, Mengistu Gedamu and Lulseged Kumsa, Teffera Gizaw, Daniel Gad. It was veteran journalist Getachew H/Mariam who founded the target project along with Tadesse Muluneh, News File which has got a dedicated team of journalists with a news tradition inclination.

Zena File was one of the key sources of broadcast news for millions of Ethiopians from early 1970s up until Mid – 2005. News file of the Radio Ethiopia's National Service is formed in 1979 E.C. 'Ehud 'Tewat Mezenagna', 'Qedamie Keseat Mezenagna' and 'Zena File' were among the very popular Radio Ethiopia's news and programs of that day. Information gathering with bulky analogue Uther recorder, reel tape splicing based Studier manual editing and hard copy paper based content research without having any digitalization googling was the character of the day that made journalism a tough road with the presence of local secrecy culture in the country regarding access to information.

Despite all odds, one of the key strength of the 'News File' is the team spirit among the members, and the smooth professional relationship between reporters and editors without forgetting their devotion to satisfy the audience with quality information provision. Collaborative temperament at the same time competition for quality reporting among the journalists are additional best character of the team that adds values to dynamic professionalism.

Zena File where news production and news casting was considered as a key culture and agenda of an 18 hours engagement per day. Ethiopian News Agency was serving as the news pool for local news, and Reuters, AFP, BBC World Service, Associated Press, VOA, Deautsche Welle, Aljezeera, CNN, SABC, CCTV and France International were used as sources for international news coverage in the News File Department. Journalists and copy typists of those time News File can't forget so many tough exposures at the same time incidental funny experiences with the very early morning (4:45 am), and near mid night news casting schedule (9:00 – 11:00 am) exposures.

A bit about my professional model, Negash Mohammed. I could witness his best diction and very rich in vocabulary stock. He's a well versed news and news programs presenter. No one dare to evade the big name Getachew H/Mariam to narrate about the story of News File of the Ethiopian Radio. Radio Ethiopia previously named as 'Voice of Ethiopia'. The veteran journalist Getachew H/Mariam is model for many senior Ethiopian News producer and news caster like Negash Mohammed and Alemneh Wassie.

Negash mentioned Ato Getachew H/Mariam on EBS TV crediting him as founder of Zena File, and talked about the second generation of Zena file (news file) considering He as part of this category. As far as I'm concerned, It's difficult to put Negash Mohammed in the aforementioned specific category of News File generation. Instead good to put Negash as a linking person between the first and second generations category.

Among the first News File batch to mention some names:- Getachew H/mariam, Nigist Selfu, Dariwos Modi, Amare Melaku, Wagaye Bekele, Etsehiywot Demessie, Alemneh Wassie, Debebe Dufera, Getachew Alamerew, Tesfaye Mekbib, Bekalu Degefaw, Genet Asmare, Daniel W/michael, Tekalegn Bekele, Demesie Damte, Yemberberu Metekie, Girma Negash . . .

Among the second batch to mention some names:- Tilahun Belay, Birtukan H/wein, Teferi Aneley, Teferi Legesse, Desta Lorenso, Tadesse Zinaye, Amanuel Abdissa, Tewodros Neway, Eshetu Geletu, Eyader Addis, Yeneneh Kebede, Shibeshi Tsegaye, Zemedkun Tekle, Eshetu Abera, Biruk Negash, Eshetu Alemu, Abdulsemed Mohammed, Binyam Kebede, Belay Bekele, Addis Lemma,. . .

Among the third generation to mention some names :- Samuel Fikre, Solomon Gizaw, Sisay Zerihun, Daniel Amare, Mulat Alemayehu, Alemayehu Girma, Lemlem Bekele, Getahun Nigatu, Netsanet Feleke, Solomon Yohannes, Addisu Meshesha, Ashenafi Ligaba, Menalachaew Simachew, Seid Muhe, Tadele . . .

In addition to daily news hours routine duty; Alem Bezih Samenet (News of the Week in brief), Yeneway Zegeba (Business news program), Yeayer Huneta Tenetena (Metrology news program), Weqetawi Guday Zegeba (Current / public affairs program), and Yesport Tenetanie Zegeba (Sport news analysis program) are among the weekly or bi-weekly programs under the department of Zena ena Mewaele Zena. Gorfeneh Yimer, Demessie Damte, Yinberber Mitikie, Girma Negash, Daniel Gashaw, Dawit Negussie and Tadele were serving under this news programs section of the Radio Station. Belihu Terefe, Wendimu Kebede, Solomon Yohannes and Addisu Meshesha were key producing members of Yeweqetawi section of the News File.

Getachew H/Mariam, Dariwos Modi, Tilahun Belay, Negash Mohammed, Birtukan H/wein and Eshetu Geletu led such key News and Current Affairs Department of Radio Ethiopia at different times as coordinator and director.

What a lovely team memory of working with news copy typists like Konjit Wubalem, Yayesh Dersso, Tsige Demessie, Mulu Bekele, Senait, Tiruye, Bayush Ayalew, Atalelech, Tsega . . . , and again monitoring support group Gashaw, Mesfin, Aselef, Asnakech, Emebet, Tejie, . . .

Some of the names among I could remember from studio and transmission stations technical personnel are Ato Kebede Gobena, Ato Melake, Ato Kassa Milko, Engineer Zegeye, Ato Getiye, Ato Bekele, Desalegn Mekuria, Beyene Kiltu, Teka W/hawariat, Dagne Araya, Ato Kiros, Woldu Mulat, Seyum Teklu, Almaz, Birhanu Assefa, Mekdes Amare, Tirsit Wondimu, Beletshachew W/selasie, Mekdes Melake, Ato Gebeyehu Nuressa, Ato Debela Tuti, Dawit, Lewi Gessesse, Zerihun Zeleke, Geremew T/tsion, Sisay, Tesfaye, Mesfin, Berhanu Ejigu, Ato Sahelu, Alemayehu, G/egziyabeher, Yibeltal Temesgen, Firehiwot Taye, Genet, Berhanu Yitebarek, Yeayneabeba Tekle, Selamawit Girma, Bethel Tamrat, Hewan Emiru, Fikirte, Ato Belachew, Senait Abera, . . .

Now that the kind of the news production inclination should grow to the level of having reporters team with a news tradition passion dedicated to serve people, and aim to create analytical critical mass that could reach to each of their life's decision based on idea pluralism permitting free flow of balanced news reporting.

Who is involved in the expanding fighting in Ethiopia?

Ethiopia's grinding nine-month war has entered a dangerous new phase. In late July, the federal government and allied regional leaders intensified attempts to mobilise people from across the country to join the war against forces from the country's northernmost region, Tigray. Those forces, having broken the back of a combined Ethiopian-Eritrean intervention in Tigray after compelling most federal troops to withdraw on 28 June, have made incursions into the neighbouring Afar and Amhara regions. In response, authorities in Addis Ababa enlisted paramilitaries from some of Ethiopia's nine other regions to buttress the flagging federal military. They then launched a mass recruitment drive, including in the capital and in the two most populous regions, Oromia and Amhara. A war that has already exacted an awful toll now seems set to expand significantly, likely leading to thousands more deaths and far greater instability countrywide.

For their part, Tigrayan forces have moved aggressively as Addis Ababa's recruitment campaign proceeds. Though federal authorities have, in effect, blockaded their region, Tigrayan fighters have been able to pursue federal and regional units into Afar, which lies east of Tigray, reportedly displacing tens of thousands of people who fled the violence. They may soon try to cut the key trade route from Addis Ababa through Afar to Djibouti, which functions as landlocked Ethiopia's main port. They have also advanced south and south west, with thousands of Tigrayan fighters pushing down main roads toward Woldiya and Gondar cities in the north of Amhara, taking control of several towns along the way.

Their objective appears to be to force Ethiopian leaders into accepting their terms for a ceasefire, which now include a demand for a "transitional arrangement" – in effect, Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed's ouster – as well as the withdrawal of Eritrean and Amhara forces from Tigray. By heading toward Gondar, these fighters may well also be preparing to try pushing the Amhara regional government out of parts of western Tigray that it occupied when the ill-fated federal intervention began in early November 2020. If they succeed, Tigrayan forces would open a supply line to neighbouring Sudan. Food and other staples from Sudan would ease the humanitarian crisis inside Tigray, but exacerbate the political one, as Addis Ababa would see Khartoum as aiding a rebellion. Sudanese-Ethiopian ties are already frayed due to clashes over the fertile al-Fashaga borderlands.

Why did Tigray's commanders go on the offensive?
JULY 2021 / CB-G / CRISIS GROUP.

Authorities in Addis Ababa announced a "unilateral ceasefire" following the federal withdrawal from Tigray, which came after the region's fighters had dealt the Ethiopian armed forces a series of devastating blows in June. Addis Ababa said it had taken this step to address a humanitarian crisis in which at least 400,000 Tigrayans are experiencing famine conditions. Tigray's leaders rejected the ceasefire. Their key objection was the continued Amhara presence in western and southern Tigray and the federal blockade on the region, which Crisis Group detailed on 9 July.

This siege continues not just to keep vital aid out of Tigray but also to cut off critical services such as power and telecommunications. The head of the UN World Food Programme (WFP), David Beasley, has said its food supplies will run out in Tigray on 30 July. The agency's vehicles have been unable to get into the region for around two weeks. WFP officials told Crisis Group that local Afar militiamen attacked an aid convoy on 18 July, forcing 170 trucks back to the regional capital, Semera, where they remain.

Tigray's leaders ... cast their offensive as a battle for survival.

With the wind in their sails, Tigray's leaders indicate they plan to fight on until they have re-established supply lines and the region's pre-war administrative boundaries. They cast their offensive as a battle for survival. With famine imminent, they argue, they cannot allow Addis Ababa to asphyxiate the region, as the federal government attempted to do in the build-up to the conflict and in the war's first two months when Tigray's defences were overwhelmed.

Leaders in Mekelle, Tigray's regional capital, may well be making a further political calculation. If Tigrayan forces can compel the Amhara region to relinquish the areas it took in late 2020, which many Amhara believe Tigray's ruling party annexed in the early 1990s, that is likely to inspire considerable Amhara anger at regional and federal leaders, particularly Abiy. The ensuing heightened pressure on the premier might force him to the negotiating table on terms favourable to Tigray. Raising the stakes further, Mekelle is looking to capitalise on its gains without delay, both to alleviate the Tigrayan population's desperate plight and to back-foot the depleted federal military before it can acquire new weapons and train and absorb the new recruits.

Where could the renewed confrontation lead?

Both sides continue to pursue a military solution, imperilling not only thousands more Ethiopian lives but also the state itself. As Crisis Group warned three days before the Tigray war broke out, the fighting could tear the country apart. Each side has demonised the other, and each has a starkly contrasting narrative of why the conflict began and what is happening now. Addis Ababa casts the Tigrayans' current offensive as an attempt to fragment Ethiopia, using this pretext to call for more recruits. Tigrayan leaders, on the other hand, say they are battling not the Ethiopian state but what its spokesmen refer to as "Abiy's army" or the "PP army", in reference to the ruling Prosperity Party. For now, more bloodshed appears likely as Tigray's commanders forge ahead and Abiy sends fresh recruits to face them.

Tigrayan forces continuing their progress would lead to increasing domestic pressure on Abiy from some quarters over the failed and costly effort to bring Tigray's leaders to heel. As noted, an advance into Amhara-held areas would anger Amhara factions in particular. Tigrayan leaders now insist on Abiy's departure, saying he has prosecuted a “genocidal war” upon the region alongside their archenemy, Eritrean leader Isaias Afwerki.

Tigrayan forces are likely to encounter popular resistance as they advance.

In reality, there are still few obvious alternatives to Abiy as national leader. His Prosperity Party just won a landslide in an election (though some major opposition parties boycotted) and he still commands considerable popular support. Moreover, a Tigrayan advance would also galvanise some Ethiopians to double down on their support for him. Tigrayan leaders, whom many Ethiopians blame for decades of authoritarian rule after 1991, when they wielded a disproportionate share of federal power, are widely reviled in the rest of Ethiopia. Tigrayan forces are likely to encounter popular resistance as they advance. The country could descend into even greater chaos, replete with mob attacks on Tigrayan residents and intensified official persecution of Tigrayans. Similar turmoil could develop if Tigrayan forces are able to choke Addis Ababa, blocking imports such as fuel, food and medicine that are vital to the frail economy.

What steps need to be taken to pull Ethiopia back from the brink?

Key international actors such as the U.S. and European Union share a similar level of alarm about the situation. They urgently need to work in concert to prevent a further unravelling. International actors with direct access to Abiy – such as UN Secretary-General António Guterres, WFP director Beasley and United Arab Emirates ruler Mohamed Bin Zayed – should implore him not to throw more raw recruits at Tigrayan forces that have shown considerable military acumen thus far and are gaining strength as they capture hardware.

Abiy should seek some form of deal with Tigrayan leaders to avoid the country’s further disintegration.

Instead, Abiy should seek some form of deal with Tigrayan leaders to avoid the country’s further disintegration. Such an understanding would likely involve an Amhara withdrawal from western Tigray, perhaps in exchange for a Tigrayan pledge to have the territorial dispute addressed politically in the future, as Crisis Group recommended in June 2020, months before the war.

Tigrayan leaders, for their part, should stop their advances and soften the transitional government demand. Instead, they should give Abiy and Amhara leaders some time to withdraw forces from western Tigray. Alongside these measures, the federal government would restore basic services such as telecommunications, electricity and banking while granting humanitarian access to Tigray. For now, the parties need to shelve thorny disputes over power arrangements in Addis Ababa and Tigray’s future within the federation. The priority instead must be to prevent mass starvation and check the very real risk that the Horn of Africa’s pivotal state falls apart.

I think the OP is asking if there are African countries that invented their own writing systems. I also assume the person is talking about SubSahara Africa, but not sure. Most modern countries in Africa did not exist very far in the past:

After colonization most nations colonized that did not speak Arabic as a primarily language started to use some variation of Latin Script, from Europe.

However there were some areas of Africa that had their own writing systems before European or Arab Muslim contact or they were invented independent of European writing.

Those would be

Ancient Egyptian Hieroglyphs - from 3,000 BCE
Meroitic script found in modern Sudan (ancient Nubia) - from 300 BCE
THe Meroitic is untranslated.
GE'EZ - in modern Ethiopia (ancient Aksum) - this was an adaptation of an existing Southern Arabian script - Ge’ez - 5th century CE
TIFINAGH - Ancient Berber script from modern day Libya/Algeria (might be a variant of Phoenician) - from 2,000 BCE
VAI - Liberia and Sierra Leone
DITEMA TSA DINOKO - to express Zulu

Keep in mind, for example, no alphabet currently used in Europe today, originated in Europe with no input from the outside.

There are very few places on earth people invented writing systems from scratch. In fact it appears only the Middle East, China, Meso America…maybe Indus Valley (but many think this came from the Middle East as well, from the Eastern part in present day Iran (Elamite), but that is controversial).

There were so runic scripts in Europe for Germanic, Celtic, etc. languages, but those fell out of favor.[6]

Ethiopian journalist Dawit Kebede detained without charge since November 30,2020

Nairobi, December 18, 2020 – Ethiopian authorities must immediately and unconditionally release journalist Dawit Kebede and stop harassing members of the press, the Committee to Protect Journalists said today.
On November 30, federal police arrested Dawit, managing editor of the online news outlet Awramba Times, while he was dining with friends at a restaurant in Addis Ababa, the capital, according to Dawit's U.S-based brother Bisrat Bahta and the journalist's wife Tigest, both of whom spoke to CPJ via messaging app. On December 1, police officers searched Dawit's home, confiscating magazines, recording devices, books, cellphones, and CDs, they said.

He is being detained at the Addis Ababa Police Commission, also known as Sostegna, Tigest said. Police allege that Dawit disseminated false information, tarnished the image of the government in his work, and committed a variety of other offenses, but have not formally charged him with a crime, according to media reports and a person familiar with his case who spoke to CPJ on the condition of anonymity, citing safety concerns.

“Authorities should release Dawit Kebede unconditionally, as well as all other journalists in detention in connection to their work, and end an emerging pattern of legal harassment of the press,” said CPJ’s sub-Saharan Africa representative, Muthoki Mumo. “Ethiopian journalists should feel free to publish critical reports and commentary, and this cannot happen in an environment where police can arrest and hold them for weeks without charge, blatantly weaponizing the judicial system to intimidate the media.”

On December 2, Dawit appeared at the Federal First Instance Arada Branch Court, where police accused him of disseminating inaccurate information, inciting violence, and attempting to violate the constitution, according to reports by the state-affiliated Fana Broadcasting Corporation and the privately owned Addis Standard news website. The court granted police the ability to hold him for 13 days pending investigation, according to those reports.

On December 15, at the same court, police further accused Dawit of sending information that allegedly tarnished the image of the federal government to Tigray TV and Dimtsi Woyane, broadcasters affiliated with the Tigray Peoples’ Liberation Front, a group in conflict with the federal government, according to the person familiar with the case, who was in court at the time, and a report by the online broadcaster EthioTube.

Police also accused Dawit of creating a negative perception of the government through interviews with leaders of the Tigray Peoples’ Liberation Front; disseminating false information and inciting violence through his Twitter page; and sharing false information on the Awramba Times YouTube page, according to the person who spoke to CPJ. The court granted police 10 additional days to hold Dawit in custody, according to that person.

Dawit said he is only being detained for doing his job as a journalist, according to the EthioTube report and the person who spoke to CPJ.

In November, Awramba Times published news content on YouTube and Facebook, including commentary on the conflict between the Ethiopian federal government and forces in Tigray state, according to CPJ’s review of those pages. Awramba Times has about 41,000 followers on Facebook, and its YouTube videos regularly receive tens of thousands of views.

On November 28, Awramba Times republished a March 2020 interview with Debretsion Gebremichael, the leader of the Tigray Peoples’ Liberation Front. In that video, Debretsion spoke critically of Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed and his party.

On Twitter, where he has about 18,000 followers, Dawit's latest posts included allegations that the Ethiopian government was ethnically profiling people of Tigrayan identity; allegations that security personnel were barring refugees from fleeing Tigray to Sudan; and a suggestion that Abiy had mischaracterized the demographics of refugees fleeing from Tigray to Sudan.

The office of the federal attorney general did not respond to CPJ's emails requesting comment on Dawit's case.

In early December, Federal Police Spokesperson Jeylan Abdi said he did not know about Dawit's case and referred CPJ to the prime minister's office for comment. When CPJ called and messaged Jeylan again today the call did not go through and he did not respond to the messages.

CPJ emailed the prime minister's office for comment on Dawit's case but did not receive any response.

In 2010, Dawit received CPJ's International Press Freedom Award for his work amid government obstruction and repression.

Dawit is one of seven Ethiopian journalists who were imprisoned as at December 1, 2020, according to CPJ's most recent prison census. Two of those journalists, Medihane Ekubamichael of the Addis Standard and Udii Musaa who previously worked with the Oromia Media Network, have since been freed on bail, according to news reports and one of Udii's lawyers, Abduljebar Hussein, who spoke to CPJ via messaging app.

CPJ has also documented several incidents this year in which Ethiopian authorities have detained journalists, sometimes for months, without formally charging them and in defiance of court orders.

'We have nothing': Ethiopia's ethnic unrest leaves destruction in its wake Thursday, July 16, 2020

What you need to know:

Hachala Hundessa became a symbol of the Oromo struggle during years of anti-government protests that swept Abiy Ahmed, the Prime Minister of Ethiopia, to power in 2018.

Hachala Hundessa's shooting death last week sparked days of protests and ethnic violence that killed 239 people, according to police figures.

Ethiopia's attorney general said that two men had confessed to killing a popular singer from the Oromo ethnic group as part of a plot to Ahmed's government.

Shashamene Zuria

Girma had no choice but to watch from afar as a crowd chanting "This is our place!" set fire to the school he founded more than a decade ago.

Though he has lived his whole life in Shashamene, a fast-growing town in Ethiopia's Oromia region, Girma's parents are not members of the country's largest ethnic group, the Oromo, meaning he is often treated as an outsider.

Had he tried to intervene and save his school from the Oromo youths bent on destroying it, he thinks he may well have been killed.

"If you leave them to do whatever they want, they don't touch you. But if you try and save your place and property, they'll come to you," he said, asking to be identified only by his first name.

The unrest that left Girma's school a charred ruin was kicked off by the murder two weeks ago of Hachalu Hundessa, a pop star beloved by Oromos for giving voice to deep-rooted feelings of political and economic marginalisation.

In the days that followed, between 179 and 239 people -- officials have provided conflicting tallies -- were killed because of inter-ethnic violence or the use of lethal force by police and soldiers against demonstrators.

Yet those numbers fail to capture the full devastation in places like Shashamene, where hundreds of homes, schools, hotels and other businesses owned by non-Oromos were targeted for destruction by mobs.

Similar property damage has been reported in towns across Oromia, which surrounds the capital Addis Ababa.

"Our research so far suggests that the property damage has been worse than in previous bouts of unrest," said Laetitia Bader of Human Rights Watch.

To non-Oromo victims, the damage indicates they may no longer be welcome in places they have long called home.

"With the strategy that they're using, to burn the key places... I don't know if they intend for people to come back," said Almaz Morgan Chapman, who lost her hotel in Shashamene to the violence.

Shashamene is best known for its large community of Rastafarians, but the town is also one of the busiest trading hubs in Ethiopia's Rift Valley.

That means there was plenty of high-value property to attack.

On a main road into town, businesses have been looted and burnt black, their front windows shattered, their walkways covered in twisted scrap metal.
Sidewalks are lined with torched vehicles, including five soda delivery trucks surrounded by broken bottles.

On the side of a looted insurance company building, someone scrawled the words "OROMO LIVES MATTER".

Yet certain buildings -- a school here, a restaurant there -- remain unscathed, and residents told AFP most of these are owned by Oromos.

Chapman, a native of Trinidad and Tobago who founded her 28-room Lily of the Valley hotel 15 years ago, said a mob set it alight mere hours after Hachalu's death was reported, forcing her to flee the compound while still in her pyjamas.

She noted that a neighbouring hotel owned by an ethnic Amhara was also looted, but a third hotel on the same strip owned by an Oromo went untouched.
"These attacks on property owned by non-Oromos are sadly only the latest bout of intercommunal violence in Ethiopia where political polarisation is often along ethnic lines," said William Davison of International Crisis Group.
It is unclear how many people were killed and injured in Shashamene during the violence.

The government has not provided geographic breakdowns of fatality tallies, nor has it said how many deaths were caused by security forces or inter-ethnic violence.

Some Shashamene victims treated in nearby Hawassa were shot by security forces, while others were hurt with "sticks and stones", which are sometimes used in inter-ethnic attacks, said Dr Zinaw Serniso, CEO of Hawassa Referral Hospital.

Whatever the casualty count, relations between ethnic groups are clearly fraying.

At the height of the violence, young men in Shashamene dragged machetes along cobblestone roads, producing a grating sound intended to intimidate non-Oromos, said one resident, who insisted on anonymity for her safety.

With only native Afaan Oromo speakers feeling comfortable going outside, "it took three days before we started to hear Amharic in the street again," the resident said.

Witnesses stressed that many Oromos stood up for their non-Oromo neighbours, trying to prevent their homes and businesses from being destroyed.
One Oromo resident, who also insisted on anonymity, told AFP he took in an ethnic Gurage family who live next door, adding that he was "embarrassed by what happened" in Shashamene.

"It's very sad as an Ethiopian that I'm alive at this time, thinking about ethnicity when we should be focusing on the worst poverty ever," he said.

"We have nothing and we destroy what we have."

Such shows of solidarity aside, several non-Oromo business owners said they were considering leaving.

One owner said two of her staff from the Amhara region recently packed up and fled after six years in Shashamene.

The government should prioritise "credible prosecution and redress" to prevent such violence from happening again, HRW's Bader said.

Chapman, the hotel owner, said she would stay in the area to see if the government would compensate her for her losses, but she has no plans to reopen.
"I still love Ethiopia... But as far as doing business, I'm finished. Retired," she said. "The Oromo retired me."

The first known examples of the hairstyle date back to ancient Egypt, where dreadlocks appeared on Egyptian artifacts. Mummified remains of ancient Egyptians with dreadlocks have even been recovered from archaeological sites.
The Old Testament also recounts the tale of Samson and Delilah in which a man's potency is directly linked to 'the seven locks on his head' and according to Roman accounts, the Celts were described to have 'hair like snakes' Germanic tribes, Greeks and the Vikings are all said to have worn dreadlocks too.

Rastafarianism however is something entirely separate. It was born in the 1930s when Ras Tafari was crowned emperor of Ethiopia. When the emperor was forced into exile during an invasion, guerrilla warriors swore not to cut their hair until the emperor was reinstated. The religion resonated with the ideologies of the day, for example socialism, Marxism, nationalism and black power. It was therefore, seen as a threat to Christianity and came under attack by the authorities that tried to suppress the 'Rasta' movement and imprisoned those who possessed 'ganja'. Rastafarians smoked cannabis because they thought it prompted a clearer state of well - being. Their dreadlocks were thought to be disgusting and frightening, hence the term 'dread' which was later reclaimed by the 'Rasta' community.

The hairstyle was later brought into mainstream culture through the worldwide success of reggae artist Bob Marley. Sporting locks himself, he prompted an international interest in the style, and the anti establishment philosophy of Rastafarian culture.

Dreadlocks became increasingly popular and there are many reasons in various cultures for wearing them. They can be an expression of deep religious or spiritual convictions, a manifestation of ethnic pride. They can make a political statement, or simply be a fashion preference.

Is the African National Congress to blame for most of South Africa's problems?

Thulani Studied Psychology & World/ Global/ International Politics at University of Durban Westville (Graduated 1993) Updated May 1

Blame it for all South African problems, I mean all of them, and here is why. Sure we now have voting rights that we never had under apartheid. But voting rights aren’t enough if elected leadership treats the electorate like morons (as Zuma leadership did).

Sure 25 years isn’t enough to eradicate all the ills of apartheid. But stealing and plundering the very same resources that are meant for the poor impedes progress (as Ace Magashule did in the Free State)

Sure it’s all good and nice that we once had leadership of Nelson Mandela statue, but ensuring that his legacy lives on meant the ANC needed a proper succession plan. The hand over from Madiba to Mbeki went very smoothly, and thereafter we began our decent to the doldrums, thanks to Zuma leadership and the ANC. They have completely obliterated Mandela legacy.

The narrow victory of president Cyril Ramaphosa at Nasrec, was a breath of fresh air, as if South Africa was given yet another chance to shine. But Zuma acolytes are having non of that, they are sabotaging the president from every angle. He has mayors like Mzwandile Masina who directly contradict his programmes at every given chance. The ANC is at war with itself. One section will use all its might to stay out of jail, while the other tries to mend the Zuma mess.

Sure we have the finest constitution in the world, but having leadership violating the very same constitution doesn't make sense (as Zuma did).

The list is endless, current implosion of the Democratic Alliance (main opposition party) is not good for democracy. Celebrate now, but remember it’s opposition parties that brought an end to the Zuma administration. A weak opposition party simply translate into an even more arrogant ANC. That can’t be good for our democracy.

The tiny nation of Eritrea beat Ethiopia because of various reasons:

Ethiopia was an a state of emergency- after the began of the coup d Etat in 1974 the new dictatorship, known as derg was established.

Many Ethiopians were against the derg- it wasn't only the Eritreans who want independence- oromo, Somali, Ogaden want to overthrow the gouvernment.

Everyone from Eritrea was to a certain degree part of the national independence movement. 30% of the fighters were women. Many people supported the army though money, goods etc.

"How did Ethiopia lose the Eritrean War of Independence?"

The background to that was the collapse of the Derg, after the collapse of the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union had propped up the Ethiopian government (the Derg) from 1976 until 1991. Without Soviet Union support, and with clear antagonism from the United States and Western Europe, the Derg collapsed. Prior to that, Ethiopia supported the largest standing army in Africa, with 800,000 troops. With Soviet supplies, neither side was winning, with the Derg butchering thousands of Eritreans from 1974 until 1991.

Why did Eritreans want to secede from Ethiopia during the Cold War?

Eyob Fitwi Abraham works at Afrolingo

Because the then government of Haile Selassie didn't respect the terms of the union, in which they were to be a federation, and annexed them as a province.

Why was this special arrangement needed? Well, Eritrea hadn't been a part of Ethiopia ever since Emperor Menelik accepted it's colonial state under Italy, and this continued until after the end of World War II. That's over 60 years, two or three generations that didn't live under motherland Ethiopia. By this time they had developed their own national identity, but had enough memory to be still willing to unite with Ethiopia under certain circumstances. Or that was the compromise the rival Eritrean factions managed to agree on. While they lived under Ethiopian sovereignty, they ruled themselves with their own elected council (or assembly, I don't remember which), and things seemed to be going great. Until Emperor Haile Selassie 'thought better'.

By politically manipulating and forcibly dissolving the ruling body, he eliminated the conditions that Eritreans accepted for union. Then the Derg came and it's military hard-handedness made things far worse, so the fight for independence gained more resolve. The rest is history.

It's really unfortunate for both people. They have a lot in common and got along quite well (leaving nationalistic sentiments aside).

Of course, there were factions that never wanted a union, even a federation. Half the population, mostly Muslims, some urban dwellers, and intellectual elite wanted independence, and the other half constituting mostly rural residents and Christians wanted a union. A federation was proposed as a compromise. As for Haile Selassie's annexation, I seriously doubt he never had any plans to annex Eritrea as it didn't happen overnight and was preceded by a gradual erosion of Eritrean autonomy. He was a control freak and that's just not his style. There were a number of reasons he felt an annexation was pertinent, and one of them was that Eritrea's short-lived ruling body called the Assembly was considered democratic and cast a negative light on the monarchy's regime, and they wanted to be rid of this embarrassment. Rather it can be argued that Idris Awate's actions were an inevitable reaction.

Idris Awate, a warrior from "gerset", the western lowlands of Eritrea, started the armed struggle as the resistance for the Emperor's atrocities. Haileselassie was notoriously Islamophobic and he burned and massacre countless peasants in that region. Thus, it was a fight of the people. His annexation was imminent even without that, as the Ethiopian emperor already started degrading Eritrea autonomy and even banned Eritrean languages from school or official use!

What's the similarity between Ethiopia and Rwanda?

Both countries have very intelligent and bright leaders. President Paul Kagame and Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed.

PM Ahmed reminds me of PK, 20 years ago. They are both visionary leaders. There is no doubt that PM Ahmed is going to change Ethiopia for good.

There are some historical similarities between Rwandans and Ethiopians. Both countries have been through so many trials and tribulations, but they have managed to survive. Today, they are determined to make the countries great again.

Ethiopia

Both Rwanda and Ethiopia have a population growth problem. A small country like Rwanda has 12 million people. Ethiopia has about 100 million people.

DRC's is 90 times the size of Rwanda but their population is only 7 times that of Rwanda.

DRC is twice as big as the size of Ethiopia but her population is bigger than that of DRC.

Both Rwanda and Ethiopia have very ambitious plans to develop their manufacturing industries. Ethiopia processes 100% of their coffee and tea. The export market for both countries is dominated by coffee and tea.

Both countries have their own national airlines. Ethiopian Airlines for Ethiopia and RwandAir for Rwanda. Ethiopian Airlines is the largest airline carrier, based in Africa. RwandAir is an upcoming airline with potential to grow.

Beautiful capital cities. Addis-Ababa for Ethiopia and Kigali for Rwanda Kigali, Rwanda

In Africa, Ethiopia and Rwanda have the most beautiful women. The beauty is obviously in the eyes of the beholder. No need to argue too much. Take a look! Both countries have lots of history and their tourism industry is booming. Follow my blog Rwanda Today for Rwanda's travel and tourism.

Ethiopia introduces new bank notes in fight against corruption

Saturday, September 19, 2020

What you need to know:

PM Abiy Ahmed says Ethiopia is withdrawing the old notes to crack down “corruption, embezzlement and contraband”.

The new notes will circulate immediately while the old one will be phased out within three months.

A source from the Ethiopian National Bank said the designs and security features of the new notes will make production of counterfeits impossible.

Addis Ababa,

As Ethiopians welcome a new year, Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed has announced the release of new birr notes in efforts to fight financial crimes.

New notes of denominations 10, 50 and 100 were released Monday alongside the first-time introduction of the 200 Birr note.

According to the premier, Ethiopia is withdrawing the old notes to crack down on “corruption, embezzlement and contraband”, and thereby further stimulate the economy hard-hit by factors including the Covid-19 pandemic.

“Introducing the changes in our currency notes was deemed necessary to salvage the country’s fractured economy,” PM Abiy told the country's high profile political, financial and security officials in a meeting on Monday.

The new notes will circulate immediately while the old ones will be phased out within three months.

Ethiopians must therefore exchange the old notes with the new ones at all banks across the country.

Corruption cartels

A source from the National Bank of Ethiopia, who spoke on condition of anonymity, told the Nation that the designs and security features of the new notes will make production of counterfeits impossible.

The source added that the government’s move to demonetise the currency will enhance attempts to exchange large amounts of illegal notes held by former political leaders and businessmen.

The source said corrupt cartels are believed to have “illegally obtained over 110 billion om birr notes outside the banking system”.

Ethiopia earlier said any company or individual can keep only up to 1.5 million birr ($41,000) in cash and that withdrawals from banks should also not exceed 100,000 birr ($2,737).

PM Abiy, who assumed power in April 2018, said about 3.7 billion birr ($101.2 million) was used to print the new currency and that his government took several steps “to salvage the fractured economy”.

“We inherited a situation where the country had not enough money to make payments for civil servants,” he said.

Ethiopia reads mischief in Egypt plan for Somaliland military base

Tuesday, July 28, 2020

What you need to know:

Egypt and Somaliland discussed Cairo's proposal to set up a military facility in the State.

Its not yet known if Somaliland has accepted Egypt's proposal.

Addis Ababa's reaction comes days after an Egyptian delegation met Somaliland President Musa Bihi Abdi in Hargeisa.

Addis Ababa

Ethiopia on Monday warned Egypt to refrain from establishing any military base that would pose a security threat to the East African region.

The reaction comes days after an Egyptian delegation met Somaliland President Musa Bihi Abdi in Hargeisa where the two sides discussed Cairo's proposal to set up a military facility in the self-declared state.

"As a sovereign country, Egypt has a legitimate right to create relationships with any county in the region," Ethiopia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs spokesperson, Ambassador Dina Mufti, told the Nation.

However, he adds that Egypt's relationships should not be established at the expense of another country.

"If Egypt's intent to have a presence in the region would be a threat to a third country, that won't be appropriate," he said.

"In this case, we need to have concrete instances of what's happening...we hope it won't be at the expense of Ethiopia or any other neighbouring countries because if so, it will be unlawful, against humanity and international peace and security."

Ethiopia has a good relationship with most of its neighbours including Somaliland.

Its not yet known if Somaliland has accepted Egypt's proposal, but the two have reportedly reached an agreement “on exchange of high level representation offices in Hargeisa and Cairo.”

An Ethiopian delegation led by Finance minister Ahmed Shide went to Hargeisa days after the Egyptian delegation had paid visit.

But Amb Mufti rejects speculation that Ethiopia's visit was due to concerns over Egypt’s plan.

"These are routine schedules aimed to discuss bilateral relations between the countries and it has nothing to do with the Egyptian delegation's visit to Somaliland."

Meanwhile, tripartite talks between Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan failed to reach a final agreement over the Grand Renaissance Dam and its use of the Nile River for filling.

Some observers say Egypt's interest in gaining a foothold in Eastern Africa has piqued after Ethiopia said it will stick to its plan to fill the mega dam.

Earlier last month, South Sudan rubbished reports that it has agreed to Egypt's request to build a military base in Pagak, a town bordering Ethiopia.

Last week, Addis Ababa announced that the first phase of filling of the dam was complete, with the government hinting that it will start generating electricity in a few months.

Downstream countries, mainly Egypt, have repeatedly warned Ethiopia against filling the dam before a final deal is reached.

ETHIOPIA: Month-long internet shutdown cost Ethiopia over $100m: NetBlocks

What you need to know:
The internet and social media blackout in Ethiopia, which lasted 23 days (552 hours), ended on Thursday.

Ethiopia's latest communication disruption was the most serious internet cut in terms of severity and duration.

Ethiopia's traditional sectors have started to become reliant on digital services, so they are vulnerable.

Ethiopia suffered a loss of at least $100 million due to the internet shutdown the government imposed in July.
This is according to NetBlocks, a group which monitors internet freedom worldwide. It calculated the daily impact of the cut in terms of direct economic costs.

"Beyond the impact on fundamental rights, each day of an internet shutdown in Ethiopia runs up a bill in excess of $4.5 million, in terms of the economic impact to the GDP according to the Cost of Shutdown Tool (Cost)," it said.

The tool combines telecom industry and development indicators to assess the impact of internet disruptions on digital prosperity.

Economic impacts of blackouts are calculated using the Cost, which was developed by internet access advocacy groups, the Internet Society and Netblocks.

The tool combines telecom industry and development indicators to assess the impact of internet disruptions on digital prosperity.

HIGH IMPACT

The internet and social media blackout in Ethiopia, which lasted 23 days (552 hours), ended on Thursday.

"The 23-day shutdown had an estimated economic impact in excess of $100 million on the country's economy," Alp Toker, NetBlocks' Executive Director, told the Nation in an email exchange.
"The Cost, incorporating the Collaboration on International ICT Policy for East and Southern Africa (CIPESA's) economic model, indicates direct and indirect losses are divided evenly, with approximately $50 million in the net direct impact and the remainder representing indirect losses."

These figures primarily represent lost business but also factor informal trade and a degree of lost confidence.

"Given the extended duration of Ethiopia's shutdown and heightened reliance on digital communications during the Covid-19 pandemic, we believe the overall impact to be somewhat higher."

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

According to Mr Toker, the impact to foreign investment is inevitable, although consequences will be latent due to time it takes to update and re-evaluate risk assessments.
"Businesses which rely fully on cellular internet connectivity to yield returns or achieve social impact become inherently less attractive to investors," he said.
Ethiopia's traditional sectors have also started to become reliant on digital services, so they are vulnerable.Mr Toker said the shutdown presents particular challenges for international aid projects, which lose the ability to monitor implementation and enforce anti-corruption mechanisms, criteria requisite for the disbursement of public funds and foreign aid.

MOST SERIOUS

Ethiopia's latest communication disruption was the most serious internet cut in terms of severity and duration.
According to Netblocks, it surpassed previously documented incidents in the country including the information blackout imposed following last year's assassination of five high ranking officials, which the government alleged was a foiled coup attempt in the Amhara region.

"This is Ethiopia's second extended telecommunications blackout in two years and alarm bells will be ringing for investors as the viability of Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed's reforms are cast in doubt," Mr Toker told Nation.

According to a report the Human Rights Watch (HRW) released in March, Ethiopia shut down the internet eight times in 2019 alone. This was during public protests and in its bid to prevent cheating during national exams.

PM'S WARNING

The rights group further said communication blackouts without government justifications have become routine under PM Abiy's administration, during social and political unrest.

Abiy, a 2019 Nobel Peace Prize winner has previously warned of permanent shutdowns if people continue to incite deadly violence using online platforms.

He argued that the internet is not "water or air," that should be people's priority or right.

The UAE Joins The Tigray War: Emirati Wing Loong I UCAVs Deploy To Ethiopia
Oryx Wednesday, December 01, 2021 China , Emirati

By Stijn Mitzer and Joost Oliemans

The deployment of Emirati unmanned combat aerial vehicles (UCAVs) on the side of the Ethiopian government has been speculated on ever since the beginning of conflict with the rebellious Tigray Region in November 2020. Nonetheless, the oft-repeated claim that several Chinese-made Wing Loong UCAVs operated out of Assab air base in Eritrea to undertake combat missions over Tigray has never been supported by evidence that points towards such a deployment. However, new information received by the authors' from an aircraft mechanic working at Harar Media air base appears to finally disclose the presence of Emirati Wing Loong Is UCAVs over Ethiopia.

[1] Rather than operating out of neighbouring Eritrea, the United Arab Emirates appears to have deployed at least six Wing Loong I UCAVs to Harar Media air base located near the Ethiopian capital Addis Ababa. The deployment of Emirati armed drones to Ethiopia comes amidst an increasingly detoriating security situation throughout the country, with government forces all but capable of stemming the threat from Tigray forces. After the Ethiopian Army's disastrous offensive against Tigray forces in early October, these commenced a counteroffensive that at one point even threatened the security of the capital.

[2] Reports that the Ethiopian government could soon succumb to the threat posed by Tigray forces is sure to have alerted authorities in Abu Dhabi, and might have been the very reason for an immediate deployment of Wing Loong Is from the United Arab Emirates Air Force's (UAEAF) stocks to Ethiopia. The source reported on the recent arrival of at least six Wing Loong Is along with Emirati personnel to Harar Meda air base, although it's not yet clear whether the Emiratis will also operate the UCAVs over Ethiopia. Considering Ethiopian personnel would first need to undergo extensive training on the operations of Wing Loong Is, the initial use of Emirati operators does not seem implausible.

The source works for Dejen Aviation Engineering Industry (DAVI) at Harar Meda air base and had previously correctly informed the authors' on the arrival of three Wing Loong Is purchased by Ethiopia from China, which's story we broke in early October 2021. [3] The UAE already delivered a large VTOL type of UCAV armed with two heavy mortar rounds to the Ethiopian military in the summer of 2021, but the deployment of six of its own Wing Loong Is is nonetheless a huge increase in its support. [4] The United Arab Emirates is an active user of both Wing Loong I and Wing Loong II UCAVs, deploying them in combat over Yemen and Libya, where it lost at least twelve examples to crashes, Houthi surface-to-air missiles (SAMs) and Turkish air defence systems. [4] In January 2020, an Emirati Wing Loong I carried out a lethal drone strike that killed 26 unarmed cadets at a military academy in Tripoli, Libya. Also in 2020 Amnesty International urged the United States to stop drone sales to UAE over the use of armed drones by the UAE to "target civilian homes and health facilities, including field hospitals and ambulances". [5] [6] [7] The Wing Loong I is China's most commercially successful UCAV design, so far confirmed to have been exported to seven export clients worldwide, including Ethiopia. [8] The type features one hardpoint under under each wing for the total carriage of two air-to-ground missiles (AGMs) or guided bombs. What the Wing Loong I lacks in the number of hardpoints, it makes up for in the wide variety of armament it can carry. In early November, it became known that Ethiopia had purchased TL-2 AGMs for its Wing Loong Is, up to four of which can be carried on double pylons by each Wing Loong I. [9] The UAE is known to mainly use AR-1 AGMs with its Wing Loong UCAVs.

The deployment of Emirati UCAVs to Ethiopia is a substantial increase in quality and kalibre of the United Arab Emirates' support to the embattled regime of Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed, and could signal that the UAE is willing to guarantee the survival of the current government even at exorbitant political and financial costs. Since August 2021, more than 100 cargo flights from the United Arab Emirates to Ethiopia have been identified, most carrying various types of armament onboard, at some point evidently including these drones. [10] Tigray forces might be forced to take note if the UAE's deployment is to resemble anything of the determination and extensive involvement of its past interventions in Yemen and Libya.

[1] For obvious security reasons, the identity of the mechanic working will not be shared.

If Ethiopia is such a proud, independent country, why does it keep the Greek name forced on it from the stems Aethi (darkened, or burnt) + op (face)? Is their show of pride a false pretense?

Se Sa Eh (ᎾᏕ Ꮥ ᏭᏗ) Politics, History, Anthropology, Linguistics & Genetics Nov 23

The Greek name Αἰθιοπία (from Αἰθίοψ, Aithiops, "an Ethiopian") is a compound word, derived from the two Greek words, from αἴθω + ὤψ (aithō "I burn" + ōps "face"). According to the Liddell-Scott Jones Greek-English Lexicon, the designation properly translates as Burnt-face in noun form and *red-brown*in adjectival form.The historian Herodotus used the appellation to denote those parts of Africa South of the Sahara that were then known within the Ecumene (inhabitable world). Since the Greeks understood the term as "dark-faced," they divided the Ethiopians into two, those in Africa and those to the east from eastern Turkey to India.

Ethiopian highland woman versus South Indian, both were called as Ethiopians by the Greeks

However, the Greek formation may be a folk etymology for the Ancient Egyptian term athtiu-abu, which means 'robbers of hearts'. This Greek name was borrowed into Amharic as ኢትዮጵያ , ʾĪtyōṗṗyā.[1]
That is the term Ethiopia is actually derived from an ancient Egyptian name for the country, which was borrowed by the Greeks and provided a folk etymology of burnt face or dark people. Greeks used it for Ethiopians and South Indians, both are dark in complexion, then this term entered Amharic/Tigrinya as the exonym for the country that has become an endonym.

For the most part, it was easier to get along than to fight.

If you look at ancient sources you'll see "Aethiopia" but it's a much vaguer placename than the modern state of Ethiopia.In Greek and Roman texts "Aethiopia" sometimes meant the Kingdom of Kush — headquartered in Modern Sudan, from the first or second cataract the Nile down to the Sudd — but it sometimes meant "anyplace where dark skinned people lived," (in some contexts could refer to India or either coast of Africa). The Romans did fight one border war with "Aethiopia", but never had a conflict with the rulers of what is today Ethiopia.

The kingdom of Kush, immediately south of Roman Egypt, did fight one brief war with Rome. Right after Augustus Caesar conquered Egypt (starting in 30 BC), Kushite armies raided Upper Egypt; in return a Roman army raided as far south as Napata, near the fourth cataract. However it's quite hard to carry on a war through the bottleneck formed by the cataracts of the Nile, so both sides ended up back within their original borders and peace was negotiated by around 20 BC. As far as we can tell, this peace lasted as long as the Kushite kingdom did.

Tangible evidence of the Roman-Kushite war: this bronze head of emperor Augustus was found in Meroe. It was booty taken from Roman Egypt by the armies of the Kushite Queen Amaniremas during the border conflict around 25 BC and brought back to the Kushite capital. Photo: Udimu

The Kushite state began to fall apart in the 3rd century, and in the 4th it seems to have been mostly conquered by a new power from the south, the Axumite Empire which was ruled from Axum, in what is today northern Ethiopia. The Axumites had become powerful as part of the vibrant Indian Ocean trade, which connected Roman Egypt, India, and East Africa in a very lucrative commercial network. They controlled vital ports at the mouth of the Red Sea (often, on both sides: they frequently fought for control of the southern Arabian peninsula).This situation tended to make for friendly relations: Rome and Axum didn't share a border, and the Indian Ocean trade made both parties rich but required both to participate. As a result, the Axumites developed close economic and social ties with Roman Egypt and vice-versa. Egypt was ahead of the rest of the Roman empire in embracing Christianity in the late third and early fourth centuries — Axum did so at almost the same time. In fact it was the Axumite king Ezana who issued the first explicitly Christian coins in the world (around the year 325) when Roman coins were still depicting traditional Roman deities. The modern Ethiopian Orthodox Church derives ultimately from the close connections between Roman Egypt and Axum.

A tribute to the role of the Indian Ocean trade: these coins are copies of Axumite coins — but made in 5th century India, and featuring Greek lettering in the style of Roman Egypt. Image: Columbia University

From around the mid-fourth century to the time of the Arab conquests, Rome and Axum were generally on pretty good terms. In the early sixth century, Roman emperor Justinian tried to establish a closer alliance, but nothing concrete emerged. However in the later sixth century Roman and Axumite armies fought against the Sassanid Persians at the same time — though never on the same field battle. A good account of Roman-Axumite relations can be found in Glen Bouwersock's The Throne of Adulis.

Did Rome ever attempt to take over Axum?

Steve Theodore laudator temporis acti Updated 2y

No. The farthest south of Egypt the Romans got in force was Napata, in what was then (~ 22 BC) the kingdom of Meroe. That was part of an inconclusive war which ended in a peace treaty — for the next three centuries Meroe was generally a Roman ally and trading partner.

This map shows the relative relations, although not borders.

Trade and cultural interchange were pretty common* Over the next three centuries Meroe declined; it's not obvious (we have almost no written material — we don't even know what language family Meroitic belongs to) but it seems to be a combination of changing trade patterns, overfarming, and climate change.

Axum conquered Meroe in AD 330 or thereabouts, but by that point the once wealthy and vibrant kingdom was poorer and shrinking in population. Axum itself was part of the thriving Indian Ocean trade network, and as such had considerable cultural contact with the Mediterranean world. But by the time the two empires became neighbors in the 4th century, the Roman world was on the permanent strategic defensive — the Romans had bigger things to worry about than the source of the Nile.

By the late fourth century, Christian Axum was generally allied with Rome, although as Monophysites the relationship had ups and downs that followed the torturous course of Byzantine religious controversies. Still, as trading partners and more-or-less coreligionists who shared an interest in keeping the Indian Ocean a friendly route they seem to have been more cooperative than competitive. The one time this seems to have become really important was in the sixth century when Axumite armies fought the Persians and their allies in the Arabian peninsula in a complex proxy war over the Jewish-Arab kingdom of Himyar ; the (Byzantine) Romans were fighting the Persians in the Caucasus at the same time, though we don't know how much actual coordination was involved.

for example, in the Acts of the Apostles (8:27), written about a century after Augustus' war, Philip the evangelist converts a eunuch belonging to '[the] Candace, the queen of Ethiopia" who was returning from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. This isn't called out as particularly remarkable on religious, cultural or racial grounds.

Did Rome ever attempt to take over Axum?

Steve Theodore laudator temporis acti Updated 2y

No. The farthest south of Egypt the Romans got in force was Napata, in what was then (~ 22 BC) the kingdom of Meroe. That was part of an inconclusive war which ended in a peace treaty — for the next three centuries Meroe was generally a Roman ally and trading partner.

Trade and cultural interchange were pretty common* Over the next three centuries Meroe declined; it’s not obvious (we have almost no written material — we don’t even know what language family Meroitic belongs to) but it seems to be a combination of changing trade patterns, overfarming, and climate change.

Axum conquered Meroe in AD 330 or thereabouts, but by that point the once wealthy and vibrant kingdom was poorer and shrinking in population. Axum itself was part of the thriving Indian Ocean trade network, and as such had considerable cultural contact with the Mediterranean world. But by the time the two empires became neighbors in the 4th century, the Roman world was on the permanent strategic defensive — the Romans had bigger things to worry about than the source of the Nile.

By the late fourth century, Christian Axum was generally allied with Rome, although as Monophysites the relationship had ups and downs that followed the torturous course of Byzantine religious controversies. Still, as trading partners and more-or-less coreligionists who shared an interest in keeping the Indian Ocean a friendly route they seem to have been more cooperative than competitive. The one time this seems to have become really important was in the sixth century when Axumite armies fought the Persians and their allies in the Arabian peninsula in a complex proxy war over the Jewish-Arab kingdom of Himyar ; the (Byzantine) Romans were fighting the Persians in the Caucasus at the same time, though we don't know how much actual coordination was involved.

For example, in the Acts of the Apostles (8:27), written about a century after Augustus' war, Philip the evangelist converts a eunuch belonging to '[the] Candace, the queen of Ethiopia" who was returning from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. This isn't called out as particularly remarkable on religious, cultural or racial grounds.

Are there any ethnic groups that don't have a script to write their language? Soqotri language spoken on the island of Soqotra, Yemen by the Soqotri.

Lara Novakov (ლარა ნოვაკოვი) Speaks Serbian and English Updated 3y

Believe it or not, this language got its first alphabet in 2014. Even though people are still working on it since it's not complete, Soqotri is still a language without a script. And the first alphabet was made in Moscow, Russia by a Russian Arabist (Vitaly Naumkin) who studied the language and its morphology/phonology and overall characterics for a very long time before finally starting with his plan.

This is a very, very old and archaic South Arabian language (one of the few that are still "alive" today). It belongs to the Semitic family, but due to the very long isolation from the mainland, it developed sounds and traits that are not found in other languages (at least those who surround it).

There is no distinction between the Old South Arabian interdentals θ, ð, and θˁ and the stops t, d and ṭ:. The ejectives that Soqotri had became pharyngeal consonants (a feature that many Semitic languages have). Many call Soqotri a time machine since it is one of the oldest Semitic languages and can tell linguists more about the development of various Semitic languages in general. Soqotri has a sound called "parasite H" in nouns (it is a non-morphological sound) which reflects its uniqueness.

It also heavily relies on affrication/spirantization in many Soqotri dialects.

Example:

éfo >éBo, iGodiHen > iyodiHen, ¿eGík >¿eGíbÈk.
In the Qafiz dialect, there is (a variation) of the connective -d + pronoun.
In some dialects of Soqotri, the velar fricatives are merged with the pharyngeals (thus not pronounced) while in others they still exist. Such as this example: Qalansiya: xœmÊh (Qadhub : HÎmeh) 'five'; Qalansiya ġayğ (Hadibo ʕɛyğ). Overall, Soqotri is something rather unique and interesting to read about. It is probably not that well known among non-linguists, but it's a really unusual language.

The Horn Of Africa:
Why are Horn-Africans Ethiopians, Kenyans, Somalis, and Eritreans considered Caucasians by race?

Angelis Revocatus Ancient History Narrator (2019–present) 12h

How could they be Caucasians as they are not from the Caucasus mountains region! Isn't that what Caucasians or Caucus-Asians mean, as the natives of the Caucasus mountains region? So they are not Caucasians, and will never be one! Many of the inhabitants of the region you mentioned are Hamitic people, that is, the descendants of Ham.

The image pair with relationship ID rId10 was not found in the file.

Now, if we have Hamitic people anywhere around the world, it means we should also have Semitic people and Japhetic people or Indo-europeans.

In Africa, apart from the white South Africans, Africa doesn't have any more Japhetic people. This means those who are not Hamitic and Japhetic (in the maps above) are obviously Semitic. Like those so called Bantoid or Bantu — they are Semitic. Many of sub-Saharan Africans, majority of whom are Bantu people, are Semites. No rocket science!!

The image can with relationship to David was not found in the NK.

According to this Bible Dictionary below, the descendants oh Ham do not include Negroes/Bantus, which means they are included in the descendants of Shem.

And that makes sense, because the descendants of Shem were another dark-skinned descendants of Noah. The descendants of Japheth were the only fair-skinned.

So, the Horners are mostly Hamites, but there also could be Semitic Edomites. They are NOT Caucasians!

As an African historian, how does your field use the term "Tribe"? What meaning/definition does the term have in your specialty? If your specialty has moved away from the term, when & why did this come about? What words do you use in place of Tribe?

Kevin Richardson PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Thu

I will go ahead and offer an Africanist perspective.

Three young Zulu women friends, dressed in traditional beaded Zulu garments, pose happily for the camera.

The term Tribe was used among historians of Africa from at least the 19th century up until the late 1960s or early 1970s. Since the 1970s, Africanist historians and anthropologists have engaged in a good deal of discussion within their fields about the term. The resulting consensus has been that Tribe is not a useful term to use in an African context, for several reasons. For organization purposes, I will list a few reasons as headings, and provide a little more context under each heading.

The term was over-applied, so that 'tribe' has no clear meaning

Many, many different societies in Africa have been described as "Tribes". For instance, there was a discussion of the Yoruba tribe, the Zulu and Kikuyu tribes, and the "bushmen" (San) tribes.

The problem with applying one term to all of those societies is that the social organizations of these groups are completely different. For example, in the 1950s, momentarily after the article about the Yoruba "tribe" was written, a more significant proportion of Yoruba-speaking people were living in cities than the population of Canada. As well, historically, Yoruba modes of subsistence was based on agriculture (this changes in the 20th century), while the Kikuyu were a pastoral-agricultural people (ditto), and the San have been hunter-gatherer peoples.

Additionally, if we look at recent population figures, there are approximately 40 million Yoruba people in Nigeria and Benin, perhaps 12 million Zulus, 6 million-or-so Kikuyu, and 90,000 San. So somehow, the "tribe" is meant to describe a predominantly urban population larger than Canada, and also a hunter-gatherer population in the tens of thousands.

It promotes notions of timeless identity and social organization

This is connected to the problem of over-application. In the popular imagination, it seems that not only is every society in Africa a "tribe", but that tribes began with the dawn of man. See this recent biology article as a demonstration.

As a corollary, it is often thought that tribal identity can be traced back through the centuries. That is, someone who identifies as a BaLuba today had ancestors who identified as BaLuba in the year 1890, and ancestors further back who identified as BaLuba in 1700.

In the past few decades, historians and anthropologists have come round to the idea that identities are situational and overlapping.

So, to come back to our Baluba example, a person in rural Katanga province might identify much more with their village or family, or occupational identity. They might even identify as non-baluba ethnically. However, when they move to a city like Kinshasa with a diverse population, it might be that they identify to others as Baluba, and the other identifiers become less pronounced.

The term promotes the idea of primitivism.

The usage of the word Tribe to describe African societies is deeply tied to the era of European colonization of Africa. In the context of the 19th century, it was understood to draw a connection between Africans and ancient Germanic and Gallic tribes encountered by the Roman Empire. The assumption made was that societies develop along a path from bands -> tribes -> chiefdoms —>kingdoms -> empires, and that African societies had only progressed to the tribal stage of development.

More recently, when phrases like "tribal-based conflict" is used to describe political violence, it promotes the idea that such conflict is intractable and the "ancient hatreds" are incomprehensible to sensible, modern Westerners. Thus, talk about "tribal violence" becomes a convenient shorthand to avoid delving into political, economic, or philosophical causes of violence.

Conclusion*:

I think my answer is pretty straightforward. For Africanists, "tribe" carries the baggage of colonial-era designation systems that were reified and naturalized by a combination of governmental and individual selection. More than that, however, it carries the connotation of primitivism and atavism (as befits its ethnographic origins as a stage of sophistication) as well as a lack of "civilization," and so it is inherently prejudicial. People from Africa use tribe in English primarily because this is what they've been taught to use; the real terms in vernacular are closer to nation or community (e.g., isizwe in isiZulu). The reality was that affinities were multiple and overlapping, and patron-client relations (even relative to centralized states) were far more important as identifiers and might change over time.

It's not analytically a precise or useful term, when there are others that give much more detail (or at least not less) without the historiographical baggage. So among Africanists, it is definitely a term in eclipse. Where the term persists academically, it persists entirely because of colonial-era inertia and a lack of systematic challenge/broad education to change the perception. But then, that last bit is common to a lot of subjects connected to Africa.

The tiny nation of Eritrea beat Ethiopia because of various reasons:

Ethiopia was an a state of emergency- after the began of the coup d Etat in 1974 the new dictatorship, known as derg was established.

Many Ethiopians were against the derg- it wasn't only the Eritreans who want independence- oromo, Somali, Ogaden want to overthrow the gouvernment.

Everyone from Eritrea was to a certain degree part of the national independence movement. 30% of the fighters were women. Many people supported the army though money, goods etc.

"How did Ethiopia lose the Eritrean War of Independence?"

The background to that was the collapse of the Derg, after the collapse of the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union had propped up the Ethiopian government (the Derg) from 1976 until 1991. Without Soviet Union support, and with clear antagonism from the United States and Western Europe, the Derg collapsed. Prior to that, Ethiopia supported the largest standing army in Africa, with 800,000 troops. With Soviet supplies, neither side was winning, with the Derg butchering thousands of Eritreans from 1974 until 1991.

Why did Eritreans want to secede from Ethiopia during the Cold War?

Eyob Fitwi Abraham works at Afrolingo

Because the then government of Haile Selassie didn't respect the terms of the union, in which they were to be a federation, and annexed them as a province.

Why was this special arrangement needed? Well, Eritrea hadn't been a part of Ethiopia ever since Emperor Menelik accepted it's colonial state under Italy, and this continued until after the end of World War II. That's over 60 years, two or three generations that didn't live under motherland Ethiopia. By this time they had developed their own national identity, but had enough memory to be still willing to unite with Ethiopia under certain circumstances. Or that was the compromise the rival Eritrean factions managed to agree on. While they lived under Ethiopian sovereignty, they ruled themselves with their own elected council (or assembly, I don't remember which), and things seemed to be going great. Until Emperor Haile Selassie 'thought better'.

By politically manipulating and forcibly dissolving the ruling body, he eliminated the conditions that Eritreans accepted for union. Then the Derg came and it's military hard-handedness made things far worse, so the fight for independence gained more resolve. The rest is history.

It's really unfortunate for both people. They have a lot in common and got along quite well (leaving nationalistic sentiments aside).

Of course, there were factions that never wanted a union, even a federation. Half the population, mostly Muslims, some urban dwellers, and intellectual elite wanted independence, and the other half constituting mostly rural residents and Christians wanted a union. A federation was proposed as a compromise. As for Haile Selassie's annexation, I seriously doubt he never had any plans to annex Eritrea as it didn't happen overnight and was preceded by a gradual erosion of Eritrean autonomy. He was a control freak and that's just not his style. There were a number of reasons he felt an annexation was pertinent, and one of them was that Eritrea's short-lived ruling body called the Assembly was considered democratic and cast a negative light on the monarchy's regime, and they wanted to be rid of this embarrassment. Rather it can be argued that Idris Awate's actions were an inevitable reaction.

Benhur Mosazghi Comments on the same issue on December 26

Idris Awate, a warrior from "gerset", the western lowlands of Eritrea, started the armed struggle as the resistance for the Emperor's atrocities. Haileselassie was notoriously Islamophobic and he burned and massacre countless peasants in that region. Thus, it was a fight of the people. His annexation was imminent even without that, as the Ethiopian emperor already started degrading Eritrea autonomy and even banned Eritrean languages from school or official use!

What's the similarity between Ethiopia and Rwanda?

Both countries have very intelligent and bright leaders. President Paul Kagame and Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed.

PM Ahmed reminds me of PK, 20 years ago. They are both visionary leaders. There is no doubt that PM Ahmed is going to change Ethiopia for good.

There are some historical similarities between Rwandans and Ethiopians. Both countries have been through so many trials and tribulations, but they have managed to survive. Today, they are determined to make the countries great again.

Ethiopia

Both Rwanda and Ethiopia have a population growth problem. A small country like Rwanda has 12 million people. Ethiopia has about 100 million people.

DRC's is 90 times the size of Rwanda but their population is only 7 times that of Rwanda.

DRC is twice as big as the size of Ethiopia but her population is bigger than that of DRC.

Both Rwanda and Ethiopia have very ambitious plans to develop their manufacturing industries. Ethiopia processes 100% of their coffee and tea. The export market for both countries is dominated by coffee and tea.

Both countries have their own national airlines. Ethiopian Airlines for Ethiopia and RwandAir for Rwanda. Ethiopian Airlines is the largest airline carrier, based in Africa. RwandAir is an upcoming airline with potential to grow.

Beautiful capital cities. Addis-Ababa for Ethiopia and Kigali for Rwanda Kigali, Rwanda

In Africa, Ethiopia and Rwanda have the most beautiful women. The beauty is obviously in the eyes of the beholder. No need to argue too much. Take a look! Both countries have lots of history and their tourism industry is booming. Follow my blog Rwanda Today for Rwanda's travel and tourism.

Ethiopia introduces new bank notes in fight against corruption

Saturday, September 19, 2020

What you need to know:

PM Abiy Ahmed says Ethiopia is withdrawing the old notes to crack down “corruption, embezzlement and contraband”.

The new notes will circulate immediately while the old one will be phased out within three months.

A source from the Ethiopian National Bank said the designs and security features of the new notes will make production of counterfeits impossible.

Addis Ababa,

As Ethiopians welcome a new year, Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed has announced the release of new birr notes in efforts to fight financial crimes.

New notes of denominations 10, 50 and 100 were released Monday alongside the first-time introduction of the 200 Birr note.

According to the premier, Ethiopia is withdrawing the old notes to crack down on “corruption, embezzlement and contraband”, and thereby further stimulate the economy hard-hit by factors including the Covid-19 pandemic.

“Introducing the changes in our currency notes was deemed necessary to salvage the country’s fractured economy,” PM Abiy told the country's high profile political, financial and security officials in a meeting on Monday.

The new notes will circulate immediately while the old ones will be phased out within three months.

Ethiopians must therefore exchange the old notes with the new ones at all banks across the country.

Corruption cartels

A source from the National Bank of Ethiopia, who spoke on condition of anonymity, told the Nation that the designs and security features of the new notes will make production of counterfeits impossible.

The source added that the government’s move to demonetise the currency will enhance attempts to exchange large amounts of illegal notes held by former political leaders and businessmen.

The source said corrupt cartels are believed to have “illegally obtained over 110 billion om birr notes outside the banking system”.

Ethiopia earlier said any company or individual can keep only up to 1.5 million birr ($41,000) in cash and that withdrawals from banks should also not exceed 100,000 birr ($2,737).

PM Abiy, who assumed power in April 2018, said about 3.7 billion birr ($101.2 million) was used to print the new currency and that his government took several steps “to salvage the fractured economy”.

“We inherited a situation where the country had not enough money to make payments for civil servants,” he said.

Is Ethiopia reads mischief in Egypt's plan for Somaliland military base?

Tuesday, July 28, 2020

What you need to know:

Egypt and Somaliland discussed Cairo's proposal to set up a military facility in the State.

Its not yet known if Somaliland has accepted Egypt's proposal.

Addis Ababa's reaction comes days after an Egyptian delegation met Somaliland President Musa Bihi Abdi in Hargeisa.

Addis Ababa

Ethiopia on Monday warned Egypt to refrain from establishing any military base that would pose a security threat to the East African region. The reaction comes days after an Egyptian delegation met Somaliland President Musa Bihi Abdi in Hargeisa where the two sides discussed Cairo's proposal to set up a military facility in the self-declared state. "As a sovereign country, Egypt has a legitimate right to create relationships with any county in the region," Ethiopia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs spokesperson, Ambassador Dina Mufti, told the Nation.

However, he adds that Egypt's relationships should not be established at the expense of another country. "If Egypt's intent to have a presence in the region would be a threat to a third country, that won't be appropriate," he said. "In this case, we need to have concrete instances of what's happening...we hope it won't be at the expense of Ethiopia or any other neighbouring countries because if so, it will be unlawful, against humanity and international peace and security."

Ethiopia has a good relationship with most of its neighbours including Somaliland.

Its not yet known if Somaliland has accepted Egypt's proposal, but the two have reportedly reached an agreement "on exchange of high level representation offices in Hargeisa and Cairo."

An Ethiopian delegation led by Finance minister Ahmed Shide went to Hargeisa days after the Egyptian delegation had paid visit.

But Amb Mufti rejects speculation that Ethiopia's visit was due to concerns over Egypt's plan.

"These are routine schedules aimed to discuss bilateral relations between the countries and it has nothing to do with the Egyptian delegation's visit to Somaliland."

Meanwhile, tripartite talks between Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan failed to reach a final agreement over the Grand Renaissance Dam and its use of the Nile River for filling.

Some observers say Egypt's interest in gaining a foothold in Eastern Africa has piqued after Ethiopia said it will stick to its plan to fill the mega dam.

Earlier last month, South Sudan rubbished reports that it has agreed to Egypt's request to build a military base in Pagak, a town bordering Ethiopia.

Last week, Addis Ababa announced that the first phase of filling of the dam was complete, with the government hinting that it will start generating electricity in a few months.

Downstream countries, mainly Egypt, have repeatedly warned Ethiopia against filling the dam before a final deal is reached.

ETHIOPIA: Month-long internet shutdown cost Ethiopia over $100m: NetBlocks

What you need to know:
The internet and social media blackout in Ethiopia, which lasted 23 days (552 hours), ended on Thursday.

Ethiopia's latest communication disruption was the most serious internet cut in terms of severity and duration.

Ethiopia's traditional sectors have started to become reliant on digital services, so they are vulnerable.

Ethiopia suffered a loss of at least $100 million due to the internet shutdown the government imposed in July.
This is according to NetBlocks, a group which monitors internet freedom worldwide. It calculated the daily impact of the cut in terms of direct economic costs.

"Beyond the impact on fundamental rights, each day of an internet shutdown in Ethiopia runs up a bill in excess of $4.5 million, in terms of the economic impact to the GDP according to the Cost of Shutdown Tool (Cost),” it said.

The tool combines telecom industry and development indicators to assess the impact of internet disruptions on digital prosperity.

Why did Ethiopia not fight with Eritrea over coastal territory when giving them independence? They were bigger and could easily have done it when giving Eritreans their independence.

Kevin Richardson PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Wed

It sounds like you're referring to Eritrea's independence in 1991, and there's a lot of contexts that needs to be added to explain that.

Eritrea, in its current form, draws its origins to Italy's colony in the Red Sea. Granted, there are some ethnic similarities between the Tigrinya and Tigre peoples that form the bulk of Eritrea's population and the Tigrayans just across the border in Ethiopia that date back to the Kingdom of Aksum, the groups became more distinct over the centuries as they came under the dominance of different polities in the region. In recent history, the Italian occupation and administration led to a significant divide between it and the rest of Ethiopia — not necessarily due to any "Italianization" of the colony, but more due to the result of the post-WW2 disposition of Italy's colonies.

After WW2, Britain had been pushing for a reorganization of the Horn of Africa along more ethnic lines. Ethiopia was largely to be restored to its pre-1935 state, but the eastern Somali-dominated region of Ogaden would be broken off into a united Somali state and Eritrea would become an independent state. Haile Selassie, however, had imperialist ambitions that were backed up by US support. Selassie wanted all of the Italian colonies — both Eritrea and Somalia.

Ultimately, the UN would award Eritrea to Selassie in 1952 with Resolution 390 (A). This resolution placed Eritrea in a federation with Ethiopia for a period of ten years, during which Eritrea would be ruled separately from Ethiopia with several rights and privileges spelled out, such as the right to democratic elections. However, Selassie never seemed to have any intention of honoring this agreement. As the ten years went on, the rights defined by Resolution 390 (A) were slowly eroded until 1962, when Haile Selassie unilaterally incorporated Eritrea as a regular province of Ethiopia.
At that point, a rebel group had sprung up in the form of the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF).

The image part with relationship ID rId42 was not found in the file.

The image part with relationship ID rId43 was not found in the file.

The ELF failed to gain much ground during Selassie's years, and would eventually be overshadowed and sidelined by the Eritrean People's Liberation Front that splintered off from it in 1970. When the Ethiopian Revolution happened in 1975, it let the floodgates loose for dissent not just in Eritrea, but among the diverse population of Ethiopia as well. The worsening situation in Ethiopia due to the myriad rebel groups and Somali invasion in 1977 gave the EPLF some breathing space, and even after the Soviets and Cubans arrived to stabilize the Ethiopian regime, they proved unable to suppress the rebels across the country.

During this period, the Tigray People's Liberation Front would form just across the border in Ethiopia. Straddling the main lines of communication between Eritrea and Ethiopia proper, Tigray province proved crucial to the Ethiopian Regime's control of Eritrea, and thus it was clearly in the interests of the EPLF and TPLF to cooperate. This cooperation would allow for decisive victories by both rebel groups against government forces and provide a basis for cooperation that would prove crucial in peace talks.

Ultimately, the TPLF would be one of the leading members of the EPRDF coalition that would overthrow the Ethiopian regime in 1991, while the EPLF in Eritrea had largely drove out the Ethiopians around the same time. Peace talks were established by the US, which included provisions for Eritrea to vote on independence. Eritreans voted overwhelmingly in favor of independence, which was declared in 1993. Unfortunately, relations soured between Eritrea and Ethiopia in the years that followed, leading to the outbreak of war in 1998 and the occasional clashes ever since over minor border disputes.

Fortunately for Ethiopia, they've been able to rely on their past methods for dealing with being land-locked. Back in 1897, in the aftermath of the First Italo-Ethiopian War, they were in a similar situation — a hostile neighbor kept them landlocked practically within sight of the sea. But a friendly colonial power — France — controlled Djibouti, and they had every reason to want to keep Ethiopia out of Italy's hands. Thus, a railway was constructed by way of Dire Dawa to Djibouti, providing Ethiopia access to the sea. This has historically served as Ethiopia's main artery for seaborne trade. The railway fell into disrepair during the Ethiopian Civil War, but in recent years it has been refurbished. Though nominally independent, Djibouti remains willing to provide Ethiopia with access to the sea through this rail link.

The official language of Ethiopia is Amharic, a Semitic language in the same family as Arabic and Hebrew. It's spoken as a first language by a bit under 30% of the population. One of the coolest features of Amharic is its system of writing, which uses consonants with systematic deformations to indicate the vowels (sort of like, "Okay, take whatever's in the bottom right and put a kink in it… that's 'I'").

The other major language spoken in Ethiopia is Oromo, which belongs to the Cushitic branch of Afroasiatic languages. Oromo is spoken by a bit over 33% of the population. Somali and Tigrinya are spoken by between 5 and 10% of the population each.

Somali 4,609,274 or 6.25%;

Tigrinya 4,324,476 or 5.86%

Arabic, which also belongs to the Afroasiatic family, is likewise spoken in some areas of Ethiopia.

There are 81 languages spoken in Ethiopia, most of them very much alive. A few are endangered.

The official language is Amharic, which is a Semitic language. The most widely spoken, however, is Oromo, a Cushitic language. Also widely spoken is Tigrinya, which is Semitic.

There are many tribes in the South. They speak languages such as Ts’amai, Hamer and Mursi.

The Afar tribe, of the “Afar Triangle”, speak a Cushitic language that is related to Somali.

The city of Harar, in the Northeast, traditionally had its own language: Harari. Today, few people still speak it. It is Semitic.

The Northeast region of Ethiopia is largely ethnically Somali, so they speak Somali there.

The Argobba are indigenous to Ethiopia and genotypically related to the Amhara and the Afar who's haplogroup are E- M215 /E1b1b which is part of E Family Haplogroups specifically and originated in Eastern Africa.

Additionally, the Karrayyu Oromo are indigenous to Ethiopia as well and their haplogroup is E-M39 (Fmr E3/ E1b1c) descendant of E- V28 of E Family Haplogroups specifically and originated in Eastern Africa.

Ethiomedia: Abay Tsehaye loses temper, whips Oromia president Muktar Kedir on January 5, 2016:.

Ethiopia uses emergency law to ramp up arrests of journalists. -CPJ

Nairobi, December 16, 2021 – Ethiopian authorities must immediately and unconditionally release all journalists held in custody for their work and should refrain from using the country's state of emergency law to imprison members of the press, the Committee to Protect Journalists said today.

Ethiopian authorities have arrested at least 14 journalists since declaring a state of emergency on November 2 as part of the government's response to a year-long civil war against rebel forces allied with the Tigray Peoples' Liberation Front (TPLF).

Those detained include two former reporters at the Tigrigna-language radio service of the state- owned Ethiopia Broadcasting Corporation (EBC), the editor-in-chief of the YouTube channel Ubuntu TV, an editor at the Terara Network, the co-founder of Roha TV, a freelance video journalist accredited with The Associated Press, a cameraperson, and a journalist with the state-affiliated Fana Broadcasting Corporation. CPJ previously documented the arrests of six other journalists under the state of emergency,

"Ethiopia's state of emergency law gives security personnel extremely broad powers of arrest and suspends due process, effectively bans critical journalism, and sends an intimidating message to the press," said CPJ's sub-Saharan Africa representative, Muthoki Mumo. "The Ethiopian government should release all journalists detained for their work and stop using the state of emergency as a pretext to infringe on freedom of expression."

On November 4, police in Addis Ababa raided the homes of Teklehaimanot Girmai and Mekonnen Yibrah, who had both worked as reporters for the Tigrinya-language radio service of the state-owned Ethiopia Broadcasting Corporation (EBC) until their dismissal in August, according to a Mekonnen's friend and Teklehaimanot's relative, as well as two journalists familiar with their case, all of whom spoke to CPJ on condition of anonymity for safety reasons.

These sources said that police arrested Teklehaimanot on November 4 and Mekonnen on November 16.

Mekonen and Teklehaimanot were dismissed from the EBC following allegations of breaching the broadcaster's code of conduct, according to the relative. Documents reviewed by CPJ show that the station's management accused Mekonnen of issuing reports from February to May that lacked editorial approval and were supportive of the TPLF.

Teklehaimanot was suspended in connection to an August 10 report that allegedly suggested the government was shutting down businesses owned by people of Tigrayan ethnicity, which management said "implicitly" aided the TPLF, according to the documents. CPJ was not able to find a copy of that reporting to review.

When CPJ called the EBC on December 8 for comment, a representative requested questions be sent via email; when CPJ sent those questions, the emails returned with an error message. Follow-up messages sent to EBC via Twitter, Facebook, and a publicly available email address were also unanswered. On Wednesday evening, a representative of EBC asked CPJ to send queries to another email address, acknowledged receipt, and said that they would ask their boss to respond to the request for comment.

In a statement sent via messaging app, Mohamed Idris, the director-general of the Ethiopian Media Authority, a statutory industry regulator, said that as far as he was aware the EBC journalists were not detained for their professional work and that their detentions could be due to "prudent safety measures" by authorities as part of the state of emergency.

Mekonnen and Teklehaimanot were unemployed following their dismissals from the EBC and had appealed their suspensions to the Federal Civil Service Tribunal, a quasi-judicial body that adjudicates disputes between government employees; their cases were pending at the time of their arrests, according to those documents and Teklehaimanot's relative.

Teklehaimanot's relative and a friend who spoke to CPJ, also on condition of anonymity, said that they believed the journalists were arrested both because of their work at EBC, particularly the programming that led to their suspension and because they are ethnic Tigrayans.

Three other journalists were detained on November 28, according to The Associated Press (AP) and local state media reports, but their arrests were not made public until yesterday. The three were named as Amir Aman Kirayo, a freelance video journalist accredited with the AP, cameraperson Thomas Engida and Addisu Muluneh, a reporter with the state affiliated Fana Broadcasting Corporation. The AP said that Amir was arrested after a reporting trip; while CPJ continues to investigate the specific circumstances surrounding the arrests of Thomas and Addisu.

AP did not elaborate on the nature of Amir's trip, but said that all three are accused of breaching the country's state of emergency and anti-terrorism laws. State media reports alleged that the three were arrested after interviewing members of the Shene, a term used by officials to refer to the rebel Oromo Liberation Army group which was designated a terrorist organisation earlier this year and is allied with the TPLF.

AP executive editor Julie Pace said that allegations against Amir, who has covered Ethiopia's civil war extensively, were “baseless”. In an emailed statement to CPJ, a spokesperson for the AP said that Amir’s family had been allowed to visit him twice a week since his arrest.

In a telephone interview on Wednesday evening, Jeylan Abdi, a spokesperson for Ethiopia’s federal police told CPJ that contacting the OLA is a “crime” under the country’s anti-terror law and not an act of journalism. He said that the journalists intended on promoting the OLA within the international press and that police would produce the journalists in court, but did not specify when this would happen.

Separately, on December 7, police in Addis Ababa arrested Eyasped Tesfaye, co-founder and editor-in-chief of the YouTube channel Ubuntu TV, at his home in Addis Ababa, according to media reports, a family member who spoke to CPJ on condition of anonymity, citing safety concerns, and Ubuntu TV general manager and co-founder Moonira Abdulemanan, who spoke to CPJ via messaging app.

The officers did not provide any reason for Eyasped’s arrest and searched his home the same day, according to the family member. The following day, police raided Ubuntu TV office in Addis Ababa confiscating studio equipment and cameras, according to Moonira. Eyasped was then taken to Sostegna, according to multiple reports by the BBC.

Eyasped hosted “The DE²S³K’,” a weekly discussion program on Ubuntu TV about East African politics, and he participated in daily roundtable discussions on current affairs, according to Moonira and CPJ’s review of the YouTube channel.

Eyasped’s recent programming included an interview with an analyst regarding the ongoing war in Ethiopia, a discussion of the influence of global superpowers on the East and Horn of Africa region, and a discussion about politics in Sidama regional state.

Previously, Eyasped worked with the Oromia Media Network until the station’s closure in Addis Ababa June 2020, according to the colleague who spoke to CPJ. The OMN is often critical of the federal government and its journalists have previously been targeted for arrest.

Eyasped is also a former member of the opposition Blue Party, according to those BBC reports. He was previously arrested under the country’s 2016 state of emergency.

Three days after Eyasped’s arrest, on December 10, police also arrested Temerat Negara, a co-founder, editor, and presenter with the Terara Network, from his Addis Ababa home, saying that he was detained in connection to the state of emergency, according to his wife, Selam Belay, who spoke to CPJ via messaging app, media reports, and a statement posted on Facebook by his outlet.

Selam said that police searched their home and the Terara Network office in Addis Ababa’s Bethel neighborhood, and confiscated electronics including hard disks and audio recorders.

Temerat participated in daily political news discussions on the Terara Network, which publishes content on YouTube and Facebook; on a December 2 program Temerat criticized Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed’s handling of the war and in a December 6 program he and a co-host discussed the future of Ethiopia after the defeat of the TPLF.

Temerat previously worked as the editor-in-chief of Addis Neger newspaper, an Amharic-language weekly that closed in 2009 amid government pressure forcing its editors, including Temerat, to exile, according to media reports. Selam told CPJ that Temerat returned to Ethiopia in late 2018 and co-founded Terara in December 2020.

On December 11, security personnel in civilian clothes arrested Roha TV founder and reporter Meaza Mohammed from her parents' home in Addis Ababa, according to her husband Robel Gegeyehu and her sister, Agegehuwork Abebe, both of whom spoke to CPJ via messaging app.

Later that day, police accompanied Meaza to her home and office in the Kazanchis area of Addis Ababa, Robel said; they searched both premises and confiscated computer hard drives.

Robel told CPJ that police initially refused to say why they had detained Meaza, but then said that they were holding the journalist at Sostegna for doing media work without a license from the Ethiopia Media Authority.

Roha TV's YouTube channel features coverage of an opposition party press statement and reporting on the ongoing war. A December 9 documentary includes Meaza's interviews with victims of sexual violence in Amhara regional state, allegedly committed by rebel soldiers. Prior to founding Roha TV, Meaza worked as a reporter and editor with the privately owned online news channel Abbay Media, Robel said.

In his statement to CPJ, Mohamed, the media authority's director-general, said he could not comment on the detentions of Eyasped, Temerat, or Meaza because the authority did not "know [the journalists], legally, as professional journalists," and they were not licensed.

However, in a May 28 Facebook post, the media authority listed Terara as among recently licensed online media outlets. Moonira told CPJ that Ubuntu TV had applied for a license in September, but had not heard back from authorities since then, which would have resulted in the station automatically having legal recognition, as stipulated by Article 27 (2) of Ethiopia's media proclamation.

In a December 15 phone interview with CPJ, federal police spokesperson Jeylan said that the journalists were detained for violating the laws of the country, not for their professional work. Jeylan declined to provide specifics about which laws the journalists allegedly breached, and referred CPJ to the Ministry of Justice for comment.

CPJ emailed and sent Facebook messages to the Ministry of Justice, but did not receive any immediate replies. CPJ repeatedly called the ministry, but the calls rang unanswered or were busy.

These eight journalists were not listed in CPJ's 2021 prison census — which ranked Ethiopia as sub-Saharan Africa's second-worst jailer after documenting at least nine journalists in custody there as of December 1 — either because CPJ did not have details of their arrests or because they were arrested after that date. Sources told CPJ that none of the eight has appeared in court.

Makeda, The Queen of Sheba: A journey in search of knowledge.

Richard Joseph Strachan I love talking about history and unknown facts not told much Dec 9

Makeda, the Queen of Sheba.

A journey in search of knowledge.

The Queen of Sheba or Queen of the South, was in the Torah, the Old and New Testaments, the Koran, the history of Ethiopia and Yemen, a famous ruler of the ancient Kingdom of Sheba, the most powerful kingdom of Arabia Felix.

Although her origins are disputed, the Queen of Sheba is at the center of Ethiopian mythology. Her encounter with King Solomon three thousand years ago was legendary.

Its existence is documented in several texts, among them the Jewish Bible, the Koran, where the Queen is called Bilqis and an ancient Ethiopian document called "Kebre-Ngast where she is called Makeda and is even mentioned in the New Testament as the Queen of the South.

Her origin or where she came from remains largely unconsensual as Ethiopia and Yemen say she belongs to them.

But the meeting between the Queen and the King is reported in many traditional religious texts.

Where the legendary Queen went to meet Solomon with various gifts, including seven hundred and ninety-seven camels, spices, jewels and precious goods.

It really is a success story because it talks about love, union, friendship and thirst for knowledge.

The Queen's story continues to this day, as for many she is a symbol of beauty, love and peace and of someone who made an effort in search of knowledge.

As for Ethiopians, she is a real icon...

I believe that everyone who loves history is thirsty for knowledge.

What is the current scholarship position on Greco-Roman historians who stated that ancient Egypt was initially a colony of the 'Ethiopians'?

Steve Theodore Got lost on Ithaca once Sun

Originally answered*: "What is the current scholarship position on Greco-Roman historians who stated that ancient Egypt was initially a colony of the 'Ethiopians'?*"

The reference here is to Diodorus Siculus (= "Diodorus of Sicily") a Greek historian who was roughly contemporary with Julius Caesar. His Historical Library was written to be a "universal history", one that covered the events of the entire known world.
Quick note about terms:

When Diodorus says "Ethiopians" he generally refers to the Kingdom of Kush, which in his day was ruled from the city of Meroë near what is today Shendi, Sudan. This area is often known in modern sources as "Nubia," though the people referred to themselves as Qoš and their Egyptian neighbors usually called them K3š; you can mentally substitute "Nubian" if you prefer but I'll stick with Kushite for consistency with Diodorus' time.

Sometimes, like other Greek writers of his time, Diodorus uses "Ethiopian" to refer to any dark-skinned people living south of the Sahara and "Libyan" to refer to the inhabitants of coastal North Africa, the ancestors of today's Berbers. Modern Ethiopia traces its heritage to the Empire of Axum, centered about a thousand kilometers to the east and south of Meroe, speaking an unrelated language, and coming to power more or less by displacing the Kushites. I'll use his "Ethiopian" for consistency, but reader should be aware of the vagueness of the original terminology.
If you're looking for simple checkbox answer, it boils down to this: Diodorus was repeating information that was then current, even though that information was often contradictory. He was mostly repeating things he had read in earlier Greek accounts, though he made an effort to fact check them by speaking to Egyptian priests and visiting Ethiopians during a trip to Egypt. Those two groups gave him opposing points of view, and he repeated both without trying to reconcile them. I've appended the relevant bits to the end of this article for those who'd like to compare them first hand.

Overall Diodorus' method might seem like shoddy workmanship, but it's not — at least by the standards of his own time. Greek and Roman writers were very aware that the early history of their own people was extremely murky, full of conflicting stories, myths, and rival versions of the same events. They tended to err on the side of collecting stories about the semi-legendary past without being very definite about the truth of what they recorded, since they were well aware of how shaky the "facts" they had to work with could be. Diodorus affords the same treatment to ancient Egyptian and Ethiopian material that he does to the mythical origins of Greece. He also does the same for "Libya", our North Africa, and for — tellingly — "Atlantis". His primary addition to the stories he collects is a strong tendency towards assuming that most traditional gods were mortals who had received worship after their deaths, a common idea in his day known as "Euhemerism".

So: modern scholars will generally regard Diodorus as a fairly reliable reporter of what the discussion of deeper antiquity was like in the first century BC. However they don't take his assertions literally, since he himself clearly did not do so: to take a different example, he provides nine different birth places for the god Dionysus (Ethiopia, Egypt, India, four different named Greek cities, and two different cities called "Nysa", one in Libya and one in Arabia) and he also entertains the idea that there were three different Dionysuses — a Libyan one, an Egyptian one, and a Greek one — at different times. When dealing with ancient matters (to him, anything before about our sixth century BC) his method was to collect and pass on whatever his sources said without aggressively vetting their assertions.

Obviously, therefore, his information is treated with caution. Modern historians will often take his statements into account as they examine other sources — for example, Egyptian records which we can read but which Diodorus clearly could not. His text is suggestive of areas for research, but not treated as authoritative. In this particular example, the respective claims of the Egyptians and Ethiopians are not assumed to be any more factual than Aeneas's escape from the fall of Troy and founding what would eventually become Rome., a story he also relates.

We can trust Diodorus that someone told him the Ethiopians believed themselves to be the real ancestors of the Egyptians: he speaks of talking to Ethiopian ambassadors and Egyptian priests. It's an interesting fact in itself, indicative of how intercultural communication worked in his era — but not particularly solid evidence for events three thousand years prior.

As regards the specific claims Diodorus retails about Egypt being an Ethiopian colony, the most concrete claim happens to have a couple of errors which are visible in light of what we know from archaeology.

Diodorus appears endorse an Ethiopian claim that they were the originators of Hieroglyphic writing: he actually calls it "Ethiopian writing which is called hieroglyphic among the Egyptians." He quotes the Ethiopians as saying that among the Egyptians hieroglyphic literacy was secret knowledge passed down among the priests, but ordinary people didn't use the hieroglyphs — while in Ethiopia, he say, everyone is literate in hieroglyphic writing.

However we can be sure this is incorrect for two reasons.

First, the account he gives of how hieroglyphics work is plainly wrong: He says (book 3, chapter 4) their writing does not express the intended concept by means of syllables joined one to another, but by means of the significance of the objects which have been copied and by its figurative meaning which has been impressed upon the memory by practice.

In other words, the hieroglyphs are a purely symbolic script that records ideas, not spoken words. However are able to read hieroglyphic writing, and it's clearly a complete way of recording the Egyptian language phonetically. Ideograms make up only a fraction of any hieroglyphic text. The idea that hieroglyphs were a purely symbolic language was popular with Greek writers in his day and later — but anyone who actually used hieroglyphics would not describe them way Diodorus (or his Ethiopian informant) does.

Second, the claim that the Ethiopians used hieroglyphics exclusively is also demonstrably incorrect. There's no doubt that the Kushites were literate in hieroglyphics — they used them to write both Egyptian and their own language. However they had a script of their own invention as well — although it borrowed characters from Demotic Egyptian, it was a streamlined alphabetic script, much easier to use than either hieroglyphs or Demotic.

An inscription in the Meroitic script, from the second century BC, more than a century before Diodorus. Photo: Vincent Francigny/Sedeinga

When used formally Meroitic script could be written using hieroglyphic characters (used for their sound values) but more commonly it was written in a cursive, non-pictorial form. The cursive version was much more common than the hieroglyphic version and had been for over a century in Diodorus's time. It's worth mentioning that the oldest Meroitic language inscriptions date from around the second century BC: before that time, the Kushites used the Egyptian language for their records; if the "Ethiopians" really were the originators of hieroglyphic writing, it's a bit puzzling that they started using it to write Egyptian rather than Meroitic.

Does this story still have anything to tell us about the prehistory of written language in the Nile Valley?

The relative priority of hieroglyphic writing in Egypt and Kush has been a hot topic in academia for the last forty or fifty years. Given the enormous disparity in archaeological attention between well-explored Egypt and much less thoroughly documented Sudan, this argument might someday swing either way. For now, though, the balance of opinion still favors and Egyptian origin. In older works, written in the shadow of European imperialism, it was more common to see Kushite civilization as a colonial offshoot imposed by Egyptians. Higher quality surveys resulting from a UNESCO mission in the 1960's and subsequent investigations have revised that unbalanced view. A good example of the current scholarly opinion could be found in the late László Török's The Kingdom Of Kush: Handbook of the Napatan-Meroitic civilization (1997), which essentially sees the Kushite civilization as a peer of Egypt: formed around the same time under similar conditions, but neither an ancestor of nor a colonial offshoot of Egypt.

Above: the Qustul incense burner, from Qustul, Egypt which was in ancient times part of the Kushite/Nubian cultural area. It dates from 3200-3000 BC, before the unification of Egypt, and shows important stylistic similarities to very early hieroglyphs, leading some scholars to claim that it demonstrated a Kushite/Nubian origin for Egyptian royal symbolism. Below, the art on the burner showing recognizable motifs like the white crown of Egypt and the palace-door which would eventually become hieroglyphs. Images: Oriental Institute

The main scholarly sponsor of a Kushite-first scenario was Bruce Beyer Williams, whose 1980 Article "Lost Pharoahs of Nubia" made the case for a Kushite origin based on an artifact known as the Qustul incense burner. which he claimed showed a Kushite origin for symbols and rulership styles traditionally described as Egyptian. His view however is not widely accepted; an example of the counter-arguments is William Adams' 1985 "Doubts about the 'Lost Pharoahs'." Since then, more ancient early hieroglyphic finds and a chemical analysis of the Qustul censer make the Kushite-priority view seem much less plausible.

TLDR:

The modern archaeological consensus does not depict Egypt as a Kushite (or Nubian, or Ethiopian) "colony" in the sense that Diodorus reported. Historians who read Diodorus would generally not use his evidence to prove anything about the real origins of Egyptian or Kushite/Nubian civilization three thousand years before his own time, but they do think it throws an interesting sidelight on the way Kushite, Egyptian and Greek cultures interacted and jostled for prestige in the first century BC.

It you want to put the whole thing in context for yourself, here are the relevant bits of Diodorus, with emphases added for focus (the complete text is here) .

Regarding the Egyptian - Ethiopian issue he says this in Book 3, chapter 2 (full text here) :

Now the Ethiopians, as historians relate, were the first of all men and the proofs of this statement, they say, are manifest. For that they did not come into their land as immigrants from abroad but were natives of it and so justly bear the name of "autochthones" is, they maintain, conceded by practically all men; furthermore, that those who dwell beneath the noon-day sun were, in all likelihood, the first to be generated by the earth, is clear to all; since, inasmuch as it was the warmth of the sun which, at the generation of the universe, dried up the earth when it was still wet and impregnated it with life, it is reasonable to suppose that the region which was nearest the sun was the first to bring forth living creatures. And they say that they were the first to be taught to honour the gods and to hold sacrifices and processions and festivals and the other rites by which men honour the deity; and that in consequence their piety has been published abroad among all men, and it is generally held that the sacrifices practised among the Ethiopians are those which are the most pleasing to heaven. As witness to this they call upon the poet who is perhaps the oldest and certainly the most venerated among the Greeks; for in the Iliad he represents both Zeus and the rest of the gods with him as absent on a visit to Ethiopia to share in the sacrifices and the banquet which were given annually by the Ethiopians for all the gods together.
And in 3.3 (same link as above):

They [= the Ethiopians] say also that the Egyptians are colonists sent out by the Ethiopians, Osiris having been the leader of the colony. For, speaking generally, what is now Egypt, they maintain, was not land but sea when in the beginning the universe was being formed; afterwards, however, as the Nile during the times of its inundation carried down the mud from Ethiopia, land was gradually built up from the deposit. Also the statement that all the land of the Egyptians is alluvial silt deposited by the river receives the clearest proof, in their opinion, from what takes place at the outlets of the Nile; for as each year new mud is continually gathered together at the mouths of the river, the sea is observed being thrust back by the deposited silt and the land receiving the increase. And the larger part of the customs of the Egyptians are, they hold, Ethiopian, the colonists still preserving their ancient manners. For instance, the belief that their kings are gods, the very special attention which they pay to their burials, and many other matters of a similar nature are Ethiopian practices, while the shapes of their statues and the forms of their letters are Ethiopian; for of the two kinds of writing which the Egyptians have, that which is known as "popular" (demotic) is learned by everyone, while that which is called "sacred" is understood only by the priests of the Egyptians, who learn it from their fathers as one of the things which are not divulged, but among the Ethiopians everyone uses these forms of letters.

He goes on to list some other examples of Egyptian customs which the Ethiopians claim prove that Egypt was an Ethiopian colony, concluding "Many other things are also told by them concerning their own antiquity and the colony which they sent out that became the Egyptians, but about this there is no special need of our writing anything." Before considering the historicity of this from a modern perspective, it's worth pointing out that Diodorus is quoting what he says is contemporary Ethiopian opinion. This is completely in keeping with his general approach, which he lays out earlier in book 1, chapter 4 (full text here) with respect to the antiquity of the human race, not only do Greeks put forth their claims but many of the barbarians as well, all holding that it is they who were autochthonous and the first of all men to discover the things which are of use in life, and that it was the events in their own history which were the earliest to have been held worthy of record. So far as we are concerned, however, we shall not make the attempt to determine with precision the antiquity of each nation or what is the race whose nations are prior in point of time to the rest and by how many years, but we shall record summarily, keeping due proportion in our account, what each nation has to say concerning its antiquity and the early events in its history.

The first peoples which we shall discuss will be the barbarians, not that we consider them to be earlier than the Greeks, as Ephorus has said, but because we wish to set forth most of the facts about them at the outset, in order that we may not, by beginning with the various accounts given by the Greeks, have to interpolate in the different narrations of their early history any event connected with another people.

In other words, Diodorus says he's going to repeat a variety of conflicting accounts of "pre-history" — which for him means pretty much anything before the Trojan War, which he dated to our 1184 BC. He doesn't say he's going to resolve the differing accounts. In fact, he begins his catalogue of other people's origin stories with the Egyptians, book 1 chapter 10:

Now the Egyptians have an account like this: When in the beginning the universe came into being, men first came into existence in Egypt, both because of the favourable climate of the land and because of the nature of the Nile. For this stream, since it produces much life and provides a spontaneous supply of food, easily supports whatever living things have been engendered; for both the root of the reed and the lotus, as well as the Egyptian bean and corsaeon, as it is called, and many other similar plants, supply the race of men with nourishment all ready for use. As proof that animal life appeared first of all in their land they would offer the fact that even at the present day the soil of the Thebaid at certain times generates mice in such numbers and of such size as to astonish all who have witnessed the phenomenon; for some of them are fully formed as far as the breast and front feet and are able to move, while the rest of the body is unformed, the clod of earth still retaining its natural character. And from this fact it is manifest that, when the world was first taking shape, the land of Egypt could better than any other have been the place where mankind came into being because of the well-tempered nature of its soil; for even at the present time, while the soil of no other country generates any such things, in it alone certain living creatures may be seen coming into being in a marvellous fashion.

In other words: the Egyptians say Egypt — not Ethiopia — was the real origin of mankind. He goes on to list famous Greek deities and mortals who were really, on the Egyptian account, Egyptians, climaxing with a long list of Greek and other cities which were really Egyptian colonies:

Now the Egyptians say that also after these events† a great number of colonies were spread from Egypt over all the inhabited world. To Babylon, for instance, colonists were led by Belus, who was held to be the son of Poseidon and Libya; and after establishing himself on the Euphrates river he appointed priests, called Chaldaeans by the Babylonians, who were exempt from taxation and free from every kind of service to the state, as are the priests of Egypt; and they also make observations of the stars, following the example of the Egyptian priests, physicists, and astrologers. They say also that those who set forth with Danaus, likewise from Egypt, settled what is practically the oldest city in Greece, Argos, and that the nation of the Colchi in Pontus and that of the Jews, which lies between Arabia and Syria, were founded as colonies by certain emigrants from their country; and this is the reason why it is a long-established institution among these two peoples to circumcise their male children, the custom having been brought over from Egypt. Even the Athenians, they say, are colonists from Saïs in Egypt, and they undertake to offer proofs of such a relationship; for the Athenians are the only Greeks who call their city "Asty," a name brought over from the city Asty in Egypt.

Much of this “Egyptian” material is borrowed from other Greek writers. Here his Belus is the Semitic deity Ba’al, who he assumes to have been a real mortal king following Ctesias of Cnidus. The story about the Jews being Egyptian colonists is borrowed from an earlier Greek writer, Hecataeus of Miletus. The story of Danaus being an Egyptian colonist was a common version in Greek mythology. The story of the Colchians being Egyptian colonists is probably borrowed from Herodotus, who may have had it from an Egyptian source.

At this point however Diodorus does add a comment of his own, not exactly a ringing endorsement of the literal truth of what he has reported (1.29):

By many other statements like these, spoken more out of a love for glory than with regard for the truth, as I see the matter, they claim Athens as a colony of theirs because of the fame of that city.

In general, the Egyptians say that their ancestors sent forth numerous colonies to many parts of the inhabited world, the pre-eminence of their former kings and their excessive population; but since they offer no precise proof whatsoever for these statements, and since no historian worthy of credence testifies in their support, we have not thought that their accounts merited recording.

Would Ethiopia become the next China?

Kevin Sun Get a bachelor degree of economics in China, and lived there for 20 years. Updated 5y

Since the size of the two countries are totally different. It is almost impossible for Ethiopia to catch up with China both on economic scale and population. I assumed you are asking, “Would Ethiopia develop as fast as China did in the last 30 years on Economic field?” My answer is perhaps, but the possibility is not large.

I am not very familiar with Ethiopia, I will list the necessary elements thatcontribute to the high speed of Chinese Economy development.

The background. Chinese Economy miracle is not alone. It is a part of Eastern Asian Economy development. Beginning with Japanese Economy miracle, ended up with Chinese Economy development, in the past 50 years, a lot of Eastern Asia economies had been developing rapidly. Here are some common elements that why they developed so fast. If Ethiopia fulfills the most of them, then my answer to the question is yes.

Peacefulenvironment. There is a peaceful environment both inside and outside the country. More than 90% Chinese belongs to Han ethnic,which means the conflicts between different ethnics in China is not a serious, large-scale problem. For South Korea and Japan, more than 95% of their people are belong to one ethnic. I value diversity a lot, but in a developing country which does not have a complete institutional environment, the more ethnics it has,the higher possibility of civil conflicts between ethnics it might have to deal with.

Hard working culture. Chinese people usually work very hard. They work for their family,and they would give up a lot of leisure time for work. South Korea has the longest work time in OECD countries. Japan is also famous for long working time.

High Savings Rate. In macroeconomics, the Saving equals Investment. Eastern Asians are relatively like saving money, which helps to built up a large number of savings in banks. And those savings will gradually be the loans to corporations, which are used for building infrastructures and other investments.

A culture values education. The most of Chinese believe that knowledge and education changes people’s destiny, some Chinese parents even sold their houses for the college tuitions of their children. They would give up a lot for the education of their children. This future has been exists in Chinese culture for more than 1000 years.

A powerful government,which devoted itself on economy development. Chinese government makes economy development plan and goals annually and every 5-year,and they would change their economic policies for making their plans executed and goals achieved.

Is Ethiopia fulfilled the elements above?

If the answer is yes, than Ethiopia probably will develop as fast as China did in the past 3 decades with annual rate of 10 %. Follow Kevin Sun

When did Abyssinia become Ethiopia?

Ki Ku Updated 1y

First and foremost: DO NOT TRUST THE ANSWER FROM THE gentlemen BELOW! It is completely false, fueled with hate and extremely narrow minded.

Abyssinia: there was never and still is no country with the official name Abyssinia. As a matter of fact the term Abyssinia was first used to Ethiopia by Arabs & Europeans. During the Eurocentric Era when the world thought blacks were not sophisticated enough to build civilization they refused to recognize Ethiopia. Named Ethiopia as Abyssinia & made up a story on how our history & civilization was because whites "graced" us with knowledge.

Ethiopia: it was the Axumite empire which spanned all the way to modern day Yemen. One of the kings erected a steal after conquering kush and named him self emperor, king of Kings of Ethiopia (330ad about). But before Axum empire it was the dm't kingdom. the kings of that time never considered or called themselves Habesha or Abyssinians.

Habesha is correlated to people in Yemen area who were called Habashat. One of the Axum kings wrote in his story that his army travelled across the sea to conquer the Habashat kingdom. Afterwards he also claimed to be their King but never called him self Habesha.

this is important because after the fall of Axum people in Arab regions considered all of the Axum empire as Habesha and continued to use the term to describe our people. Somewhere in history the Portuguese came along and coined the name Abyssinia which came from Arabic word al Habesha or Habesha or habash…

the ottomans came to the Horn and during their conquest they referred to our region as Habesha hence "ottoman conquest of Habesha"

People of this region never considered or called themselves Abyssinians or Habesha until foreign powers came to play with their own naming.

the word Ethiopia which means land of the burnt face first emerged in history after the fall of Axum empire.

after the fall of Axum empire there were several other kingdoms in many different parts of modern ethiopia. Each with their own history language religion etc.. mostly Islam or Christian.

The axumites began to settle down south while building churches and monasteries which can be found today. The came in contact with others and continued to grow. Some stayed in the local areas during the travel and others continued to migrate. That's why there are several major historical sites.

at some point during the 12th century, an Amhara region was coined by the descendents of Axum empire. The “Amhara” prince named Yekuno Amlak later went to a vengeful war against the other kingdoms during that time..such as zagwe and after his conquest he went back north, traced his lineage to Dil’naod the last emperor of Axum and reestablished solomic dynasty.

history of our region is complicated and you have to look at many perspectives. However, whenever you read history that refers to the people as Abyssinians or Habehsa. Know that it’s a foreign perspective. Also the word Oromo wasn’t around until 18th century and found in a European textbook.

in regards to Oromo history, it’s important to learn about the orma people in Kenya. The assimilation and genocide of smaller ethnic groups of the southern area of ethiopia. Part of the reason there are many subgroups of Oromo clans today is because during the original migration..their victims were forcefully assimilated or slaughtered. Many lost their own language. Some maintained it while living under the Gadaa system. You can see this today because there are many subgroups with a variety of different linguistics and culture. Also, most subgroups are called “assimilated foreigners.” Example: Oromo extremists call the people of Sidama “Sidamo Oromo” while actual Sidama people consider themselves “Sidama/o people” with their own history and language. It’s also important to know that Sidama people were another group of people that put up a fierce fight against Orma migration and assimilation. Others lost their history, culture and language in the process of forced assimilation.

Regardless of history and the past it’s important to look at it without hate. Who we are today and how we behave shouldn’t be influenced by the past. We are all now mixed and have a shared history. It’s important we push for a country that respects all religions, peoples and allows us all to work and live with peace. This is a short and not perfect answer but I tried my best. Follow Ki Ku

Why was Ethiopia never colonized?

Calixto Estrada 3y

It was due to a kind of “gentlemen’s agreement” among the powers that be, that Ethiopia should never be colonized. During the Crusades, the Kingdom of Axum in Ethiopia sent warriors to fight along side the Crusaders, and this was never forgotten among the Europeans. in the 14th century, the King of Axum (then called the Zagwe dynasty) sent a delegation to Europe to meet with the Pope, and they traveled as far North as France. In the 16th century, Ethiopia was overrun by a muslim (most likely Oromo or Somali) called gragn mohammed (or mohammed the left-handed) who nearly destroyed all Christian churches and monasteries. The Ethiopian King sent a plea to the Pope, who called on the Portuguese (a growing power in the region) to come to the aid of the Ethiopians. The Portuguese had 2 centuries of influence in Ethiopia from that point on, but never conquered Ethiopia.

On the muslim side, there was the story of the first hijra, wherein mohammed and his companions were being persecuted by the Meccans, so they fled in various directions to avoid capture. One delegation went to the Kingdom of Axum in Ethiopia, where they met with King Armah to seek asylum. The muslims began by praising their love of Mary and Jesus (knowing the Christian view) and thus the King granted them asylum. In fact, one of the delegation was mohammed's brother-in-law,…and he actually converted to Christianity and remained behind when the other muslims left to rejoin mohammed (mohammed had his wife married off in revenge). Because of this act of kindness on the part of the Ethiopians, mohammed ordered that no muslim should ever conquer Ethiopia (as mentioned above, that gave them about 900 years of freedom from forced conversions until gragn mohammed came along).

So, both the Europeans and the muslim Arabs respected this agreement about leaving Ethiopia alone, which is why it was never colonized. In the 19th century, Italy had just become a unified country (they call it the reunification, which is a misnomer, since it was never a unified country before). The new Italian Kingdom made gains in Africa by conquering territories from the dwindling ottoman Empire (the ottomans had cowardly destroyed the coastal city of Ottranto and massacred its inhabitants, so Italy had every right to any ottoman territory). As Ethiopia had a long-standing relationship with the Italians, the Ethiopian Emperor Menelik II gave what is now Eritrea to the Italian Kingdom in exchange for technology, agricultural equipment/labor and coastal protection (Ethiopia had never been a sea power, so they preferred to delegate this). As the story goes, the agreement read differently in Amharic as it did in Italian; the former saying Ethiopia was an ally of Italy and the latter saying it was a vassal state. Thus, the Italians began to encroach further and further into Ethiopia, thinking it was their right, culminating in the battle of Adawa…which the Italians lost.

The ramifications of the Italian loss cannot be understated; the Italian people did not want a war with Ethiopia (they blocked and tore up train tracks at stations carrying Italian soldiers to war so they couldn't leave). When the news of the Italian defeat reached the people, the Republican government under the traitor, Francesco Crispi fell as a result, and Italy's aspirations as a colonial power in Africa were ended. Relations between Italy and Ethiopia were normalized again shortly afterwards, and in fact many of the major building projects in Addis Ababa, such as the Cathedral and Palace were architected by Italian prisoners who then remained in Ethiopia.

40 years later under the Fascist regime of Benito Mussolini, Ethiopia was once again invaded. The fascists took the opportunity to take revenge on Ethiopia for the previous defeat, and committed several war crimes, such as the use of mustard gas on civilian populations. The Emperor, Haile Selassie had fled and sought asylum in England during the invasion. And while the Fascists did undertake many building and road projects during their occupation, this is not seen as a "colonization", since it lasted less than 5 years and the government in exile always existed (those who argue it was a colonization, are simply racists, since no one argues that France was "colonized" by the Germans during their invasion). I'd like to think it's because they fought. Hard.

With swords and spears against then modern artillery.

Sure the Italians stayed for 5 years but after the ass whopping Mussolini received at the hands of the Allies and with the Ethiopians using their knowledge of the treacherous terrain to constantly sabotage aid to General Graziani’s (Rodolfo Graziani - Wikipedia) troops, it was evident that the Italians had truly overstayed their welcome.

“The Italians attributed most of the relative success achieved by the Ethiopians to foreigners or ferenghi.

Many of these individuals were military advisers, pilots, doctors, or just well-wishers of King HaileSelassie's cause. While they never numbered more than a hundred, the Italian propaganda machine magnified the number to thousands so that Rome could account for the virtual standstill of the Italian Royal Army after De Bono's first rapid advances.

According to Ethiopian historians, something had to explain the Ethiopians' ability to launch the "Christmas Offensive" of late 1935, and the Italians used the presence of the ferenghi as the explanation.”

The truth is, Ethiopia was colonized a long time ago and the descendants of these colonizers are still around. During the 1500 and 1600's, a nomadic people called the Oromo swept into Ethiopia from the south. Although we might just have called them all "black" they were extremely different from the native Ethiopians who were Coptic Christians for over a thousand years and who had established sedentary civilizations for even longer. Meanwhile the Oromo were a nomadic people who embraced a type of indigenous African religion known as Waaq.

The image pair with relationship ID rId10 was not found in the file.

The Oromo have the largest state within Ethiopia

This time is remembered as being a truly apocalyptic time as the massive Oromo hordes settled and colonized, if you will, Ethiopia. The ancient Ethiopian kingdom was brought to its knees while some of its neighbors such as the Adal Sultanate in Somalia were totally destroyed.

Ethiopia (Abyssinia) is the peach juice colored area while Adal is green blob to the right

However, the Oromo eventually Christianized and slowly integrated into Ethiopian society. Still, the cultural impact of their migration is very much visible and they are the largest ethnic group in Ethiopia today, making up a third of the population. For example, the famous emperor Haile Selassie was a quarter Oromo.

Because they beat the Italians at the battle of Adwa. They did so largely because they had modern rifles and machine guns, purchased (I believe) from Russia:

Blue Nile

Life can be very tough when one does not have financial means.. however this is seen through the world . Despite this , many live life with peace and very respectful to one another . Even the poorest wear shirts with our country name on it .

Traffic is horrendous.. however never witness any New York exchanges. Often exchange are just "Salam..Salam".

Federal police walk around with korskasoff machine guns and many buildings (especially malls) in Addis Ababa require pat down search and belongings pass through detectors . The fear of al shabab is present however they are mainly out in the countryside.

Life in Ethiopia is good .. for me Ethiopia is my mother

Was Egypt once a part of Ethiopia, or was Ethiopia once a part of Egypt?

Daniel Getachew 2y

This is a good question. Well what we do know for sure is that the Nile flows from Ethiopia to Egypt. The Blue nile starts in the Ethiopian highlands (4000m above sea level) and is then fed into Lake Tana (1800m above sea level). It goes through Sudan to reach South Egypt (around 200m above sea level). Practically speaking it would make sense that civilization came from higher elevation. Herodotus, a famous ancient greek historian that travelled the world, once said that ‘Egypt is a gift of the nile‘.

My theory is that Ancient Egypt was an offshoot of an Ancient Ethiopian empire that finally outmatched it. The astronomy, mathematics, engineering, etc.. that Ancient Egypt is known for would have first come from Ethiopia. I believe at the time the people were physically indistinguishable from one another. This would have been pre 10,500 BC. Then again who really knows what happened then.

I read over a dozen of books about the war in Ethiopia. Yea, you are right. We are in 2014 E.C now And COVID also here, it should be named as like COVID-12 or COVID-14. Because it's not "sexy" enough. Besides, they might get killed. The days of REAL war correspondents who eat, drink and live with the troops, writing about what they actually see because they've spent real time under fire are long over. Even the "embedded journalists" are rarely within earshot of gunfire, and even then, only by chance of misfortune. Most "war reporters" sit in some 5-star hotel, far from the action and "report" what local stringers tell them without trying to verify anything. Answer requested by Anthony Jennings

Why is Ethiopia the most respected country in Africa?

Jay Frank travel blogger 1y

That's an interesting question. But to be honest, Ethiopia is not the most respected country in Africa and there is no one country that is most respected in Africa if I'm being objective but there countries which are respected in Africa. Those countries are as follows Egypt, Algeria, Nigeria, South Africa, Ethiopia, and Tanzania.
Egypt has always maintained his ties with Sub-Saharan nations, financing various development projects in the continent. Also, Egypt is home to one of the earliest civilization of humankind it is part of the reason most African countries do respect Egypt.

Algeria though it is not as famous among young African people but it is pretty much famous among older generations this is mainly due to her positive role in various wars for independence in Africa. Algeria financed and trained a lot of wars of independence in Africa.

Nigeria is Africa's biggest economy and most populated African nation, Nigeria also dominates in Africa sports/entertainment industry.

South Africa, it is Africa's most developed country, After the fall of Libya under Muammar Gadaffi. South Africa has retaken back the position of an African country that has invested heavily in Africa. Also, South Africa holds the largest number of African migrants from all over the continent. Most African people look at South Africa with a high pedigree

Ethiopia due to the fact that it is only the country that successfully defeated the colonialists and escaped colonialism it has that respect in Africa. Also, Ethiopia holds a large part of the early civilization of Man is also one of the reasons. Last but not least The African Union was formed and has its headquarters in Addis Ababa in Ethiopia.

Tanzania, Tanzania is another country that has much respect in the continent. This is mainly due to her positive role in the independence struggle in Southern Africa nations the likes of Mozambique, South Africa, Zimbabwe, Namibia, Botswana, Angola, and the Comoros. Also, their first president Julius Nyerere is always praised for his success in creating a country with no tribal conflicts something which most leaders in Africa failed.

Honorable mentions; Libya (Was the most respected country especially during Muammar Gadaffi last years of leadership, Ghana mainly due to her Pan Africanist ideologies of their first president Kwame Nkrumah, Zimbabwe during Mugabe reign who was regarded as Africa's strong man, Kenya deserves a mention though it has always had a controversial history in her allegiances in African affairs, Ivory Coast also has her respect in the continent.

What was happening in the Ethiopia region of Africa during Ancient Egypt?

Mike Barriere General Manager, Auditor at Barrierenergy.com (2009–present) 1y

Ethiopia is the heart of humanity. King Solomon of Israel made a treaty with the King of Ethiopia. Under the terms the princess of Ethiopia, Be’er Sheba, came to Israel and received a Son by Solomon. She took the Davidian Dynasty back to Ethiopia and set up a Satellite Kingdom., which outlasted the main house. Egypt and Ethiopia are very close rivals at times, and others they are military partners. In 525 BC Bardiya and Cambyses II overthrew the Pharaoh Psamtiik III, and took over Egypt. This initiated a meeting between the Ethiopian King and the two Achaemenid Prince Brothers. The King brought a historic Longbow which only the most able man could bend and string. It was a contest to see if Cambyses was fit to be King of Egypt, and he failed to bend the Bow. His younger brother Smerdis aka Bardiya have it a quick try and string it in one motion. Bardiya was an experienced archer, having trained as Cavalry since infantry. Cambyses was more of a Melee Warrior Class fighter, essentially an Infantryman, and was skilled with the sword, but not the bow. This event caused Cambyses shame in front of a highly respected foreign King, known to be a powerful Wizard. In a drunken Cambyses takes the Golden Sword of Achaemenes and performs a ritual sacrifice of the Sacred APIs Bull of Egypt. This enrages the people who rise up in rebellion and burn the tent city of his armies. In a rush to pull back Vambyses drunkenly jumps up into his steed and Jams the Golden Sword into his belt, cutting his thigh deeply, with the dirty blade. He was dead from infection within three days.

The Golden Sword of Achaemenes in Iran

At many points throughout Ancient Egyptian History, Nubia, Sudan and Ethiopia, have come up. Since they were close neighbors, trade was frequent. Many ethnic Ethiopians are depicted in Egyptian Steele’s as workers and guards. The Davidian Dynasty Continued in Ethiopia until the modern Era. The last member of the Dynasty to Rule Ethiopia was Emperor Hallie Sellassi. The Emperor ruled from 1930 until 1974, with a brief hiatus during the Nazi Italian invasion of WW2.

The story of his struggles through WW2 are harrowing. Before evacuating to Israel, he fought the Germans with Ceremonial Guard regiments, Bendoins, peasants, Camel riding Arabs, and a very small group of Modern Soldiers. Despite facing Panzer Tanks and Lufttewaffen forces the Ethiopians inflicted surprisingly substantial casualties upon the German War machine. Hitler was desperate for oil and was grasping at straws. The British Consulate in Jerusalem flew him to London where he aired his grievances to the world on live broadcast. He personally led British and American troops to retake Ethiopia, in a daring frontline action that swept from Morocco through Libya and Egypt into Sudan and Ethiopia. Sellassi invested his personal fortune in the Coca Cola Company at this time, allowing them to build 6 factories to bottle Coke in North Africa. This supplied soldiers in Europe and North Africa.

You need to clarify your question. Are you talking about the geographical Aethiopia aforementioned in Hellenic mythology same as within Greek-Roman and early medieval European scholarly literature, or are you talking about the historical Abyssinia (present-day Ethiopia) ?? Because the answer would be that you need some clarifications about what is Aethiopia for the former, and of course not for the latter. In Greek mythology, Aethiopia or "land of the burnt-faced people" meant generically the remote regions of the known world (e.g. the world whom the ancient Greeks were most familiar or lest heard from the telling of local or foreign mariners & traditions afar as early-to-mid Ist millenium BCE) lying south of Egypt; in other words the geo-historical polity of the same name - best known as Nubia by late Roman and European scientific literature, Cush for the Hebrews, Kasi (Kush) and Ta-Seti ("Land of the Bow") most interchangeably for ancient Egypt, then what modern scientific literature acknowledge now as respectively the historical A-Group Culture or "Second Nubian Culture" (3900 or 3800–3100BCE) and its impoverished successor period the so-called "B-Group Culture" (prior 2500BCE) , the C-Group Culture (2400 – ca. 1550BCE) , the Kerma Culture or Kerma Kingdom or Kush Kingdom prior its military annexation by the New Kingdom of Egypt (2500 – ca. 1550BCE) , the Egyptian-occupied Napatan period (ca. 1550–1069BCE) , the more-Egyptianized secessioned Kingdom of Kush or Kuluš in Meroitic language (1069BCE- ca. 350CE) from which originate the Egypto-Kushite forefathers of the short-lasting yet powerful XXVth Dynasty of Egypt or Kushite Empire (744-671BCE) and subdivize itself into two periods, so to speak a contuinity of the Napatan period (1069 to ca. 700–270BCE) followed by the Meroitic period (270BCE- ca. IInd-IIIrd centuries CE to ca. 350CE) , latter followed by the succession of various foreign occupations alike Christenized then latter Moslemized smaller local polities within medieval Nubia (ca. 400–1500CE) and its X-Group Culture period (ca. 300–600CE) - as well as subsaharian Africa under its mote vague geographical coining (by distinction to respectively Egypt or the Nile up north from the First Cataract, Lybia westward Egypt or Asia eastward the latter region) .

Nubia as a geo-historical and political entity meant the same thing with Aethiopia under the same denominators.

Roman then latter Eutopean geographical literature merely interchanged between the two taxonyms because that region has been lately during its history populated by an massive afflux of Nilotic-speaking Nubas or Nobatae / Nobatians in Late Antiquity, who progressively drove away and/or assimilated the earlier Cushitic-speaking Kushites populating this area over several millenia. These ethnic Nubians, of Nilo-Sudanian stock (with some account of kinship to the mixed Berber-speaking Tehemu of Lower Nubia and Upper Lybia) and much darker complexion than their predecessors of mostly Cushitic stock, alike their mixed Nilo-Cushitic descendants, formed a major part of the latter Nilo-Saharian speaking and even a fewer Chadic speaking populations over subsaharian Africa (yet some interbreedings were due to latter subconsequent migrations of either these same populations alike the Abyssinians and other Cushitic speaking populations of the Horn in the tropical latitudes of interlacustrine Africa, Central Africa then the Eastern African seashore and their respective Cushitic, Pygmy/Khoisan, mixed Bantu-Cushitic or Bantu-Nilotic (or a mix of both) populations and vice versa, up from the Meroitic period to the course of the previous millenia.

Coming back to the subtopic of Greek mythos, Aethiopia meant the farthest extremities circumvoluting the known world as well: the westernmost edges of Lybia, the farthestmost regions of Scythia, the distant regions of Cimmeria and Hibernia, the Enchanted Isles of the Hesperides, Ogygia, the Hellespont and beyond, India, Chaldea, Elam, Assyria, the Levant, ancient Arabia, even *the Hades and its seven waterly affluents themselves were all never too far from Aethiopia from the perspective of the ancient Hellenes prior their intellectual expansion. Yet aside from the whole eschatological symbolism about the Aethiopians seen as a sometimes barely superhuman, sometimes even (because even race and color prejudices existed at those times) subhuman subrace of mighty Men and heroes dwelling at the cusp between the mortal realm and the invisible realms of the Olympian Gods (Poseidon and Hephaistos/Vulcan are often assumed to be the forefathers of the Aethiopians. The Lybians, a sister-kindred of the Aethiopians and Egyptians, have most oftentimes either a Giant bred from Gaea, Poseidon, Apollo, Artemis or Ares for forefather/s, whilst the Atlanteans or "people of Atlas" in Plato's Timaea, an another sister-kindred to the Aethiopians who possess a lot of commonality with respectively the Lybians, Egyptians and Pelasgians/Peoples of the Sea, don't even need to be specified about which one was their forefather. Most of the highest-frightening chtonic deities, monsters and sorceresses in the Greek world seems always to live in or nearby Aethiopia or being one way or another related or attuned to the people of those regions then most above all, about 2/3 of the Greek heroes and their respective bloodlines claims ancestry who hails back from eastward and/or southward the Mediterranean. Also, the Homerian Illiad mentions the Olympians like to take banquets amongst Aethiopians, even favouring these latter ones's appearances when it comes about cloaking their unearthly glory beneath the raiment of a still-glorious-yet-lesser human form… in other words when they are not invsting any random shape, identity or form for their own means or doesn't attempt to act like a bunch of jerkass meta-radioactive exhibitionists by revealing the fullest of their true form to these frail mortals like a well-known womanizer did one night to an overly curious Semele in some account, they pretty much look like the physical unearthly counterparts to Aethiopians) , it would also hint the Greeks long assumed that a major part of the Earth was predominantly populated by dark(er) complexioned populations going on from various tones of swarth(ier) to plainly jet-black skin colors… logical when it comes about the Mediterranean, the Near East and South Asia, not too far stretched about the Caucase and the Balkans and its sometimes dusky-complexioned populations at these times (matter-of-factly, the Colchidians of present-day Georgia claimed Egyptian and Aethiopian ancestry according Herodotus, whilst the vague matriarchal tribes in Minor Asia, the Danube and North Asia related to the Moschoi and the Sarmatians then assumed to be the legendary Amazons according the same Greek author, were assumed to be initially of Lybico-Egyptian ancestry as well) , could make sense about Bronze Age Western Europe and the Canary Islands, but Far Scythia?? Unless the ancient Greeks assumed the swarthy complexioned Euromongoloid and/or Paleo-Asian non-Iranic tribes who dwells in the toundra and Eurasian plains (or Hyperboreans for the connoiseurs) were "Burnt-faced" as well.

Historically speaking, a plethora of scientific evidence attests that Proto-Dynastic Egypt (4000 to 3400 - 3100BCE) , more especially the Princes of Abydos or "Dynasty 0" or Shemsu Hor "Followers of Horus" from which the founding ruler of Egypt Narmer/Menes hailed from, has been heavily influenced by the A-Group Culture as well as by the massive migrations of Saharian agropastoralists, the neighboring Berber-speaking populations west to the Nile and a migration of cattle-and-farm breeding Neolithic Afro-Asiatic speakers from the Near East (themselves descending back from earlier Proto-Afro-Asiatic speakers coming from Northeast Africa) . Studies led on the embalmed bodies of the A-Group culture natives were physically akin to the ancient Egyptians, who themselves and their modern descendants (the modern Fellahin, Saidis, Baladis and Copts) were (and still are) genetically akin to the Cushitic Proto-Somalis and of "Hamitic" (a taxonym to cautiously tackle) or "Ethiopid" stock (same as the Cushites, Berbers, Chadic-speaking populations, the ancient Canaanites/Phoenicians, the mixed Semitic/Canaanite - latter part Berber - Carthaginians, plausibly the earliest generations of Chaldeans then the Hymiarites/ancient Yemenis) , yet the Princes of Abydos alike the Dynastic then Old Kingdom period pharaohs were phenotypically closer to the Nilotic populations yet a mix of both Egyptian and Nilotic ancestry, genetically speaking. The B-Group and C-Group culture natives were from Cushitic stock (with minor Berber admixtures for the latter culture) while the X-Group natives were strongly admixtured with "Negroid" (an another taxonym to tackle cautiously) elements. Whom to the Proto-Dynastic Princes of Lower-Egypt, they were equally of Egyptian stock but strongly admixtured with Berber and Neolithic Asiatic (the famous cattle/farm breeding migrants) elements.

Still, regardless the age of Kush as a polity, both the Egyptians and Kushites long assumed that the formers were the descendants of colonists sent up north of the First Cataract by the latter ones and other akin ethnic Aethiopian ethnos from the very Sources of the Nile, claiming that ofall the ruler-gods of Nile nobility from being the descendants of a semi-mythical tribe native from the foothills of the Mountains of the Moon (Mounts Rwenzori, in Middle Africa) called the Anu, who might have migrated north of the ancestral homeland about 10,000+ years before our days. In any case, the Egyptians assumed their state was a successor state to some protohistorical polity or culture rooted back from the South. In one way, Kush was somehow older than the Egyptian state.

By cross-referencing their semi-fantastical kinglist to ancient kinglists dating from the Aksumite period, then by separating the folklore part from historical data, the "Solomonid" Abyssinian Empire or modern Kingdom of Ethiopia regardless what their theological propaganda (and some blindfully god-fearing Rastafari or "Hebrew Israelites" "history experts" on the World Wide Web would suggest) considers itself to be the successor state of respectively pharaonic Egypt, the Kingdom of Kush until early IInd century CE and the pre-Islamic South Arabian Kingdoms (Himyar, Sheba/Saba, Hadramaut, etc) with some affinity dating back to the Kingdom of Juda via the late implantations of minor branches of Egyptian and Mizrahi Jew Exilarchies alike of Diasporic Jews from the Mear Eastern and the Graecian-Roman world in the vicinities of the Tigray valley and the Tana Lake region. The Habesha ethnic groups has been first mentioned within the native populations of the Land of Punt in Egyptian texts dating back from ca. 2000BCE, has been Ethiosemiticized as early as Ist millenium BCE, then blah-blah-blah, the Aksum Kingdom has been founded ca. 400BCE, blah-blah-blah— I'm sorry but it's been six hours I'm writing off and I get impatient.

The fact is, the kingdom of Ethiopia is much younger than Egypt, Egypt is culturally younger than geographical Aethiopia but about the same age than Kush as a polity. The end.

Did Ethiopia have anything to do with ancient Egypt?

Deidra Ramsey McIntyre African-Centered Researcher and Writer 2y

Yes and no.The Greek “Ethiopia” is not the contemporary nation of “Ethiopia.” I think that confuses lots of people. When Greco-Roman writers such as Herodotus or Diodorus Siculus (writing nearly 400 years apart and including those other writers in between) stated that the Remetch (Ancient Egyptians) were colonists from “Ethiopia” the immediate civilization they were referencing was known as Nobatae/Noubatae/Nubia to the Greeks. Its location was contemporarily lower Sudan and Upper Kemet (Egypt in the south). At this time, the nation we currently know as “Ethiopia” had the kingdom of Axum that would Christianize and become Abyssinia. Axum would conquer Nubia/Nobatae (that had the city of Meroe in it) as it was on the verge of becoming a Christian kingdom under King Ezana who left a stone that chronicles his accounts on this and other matters.

However, the Greeks also used the term “Ethiopian” - “pan-Africanly” - to describe the physical features of black people who were not from “Nubia.” So you have them depicting black people in Turkey as “Ethiopian” describing Ancient Libyans as “Ethiopian,” even people from India were described as “Eastern Ethiopians” with different textured hair from “Ethiopians,” etc. So basically it became a term for primarily black people from where-ever and with dark skin toned Indians whom they perceived as culturally similar as well.

Dynastic Egyptians did not use the term “Ethiopian” or “Nubian” (well …relatively since Kemet had cities in Kemet named Nwb.t and the name has the same meaning) but used terms such as Kush, Yam, and …. Pwenet among many other names to refer to other African kingdoms from whence they state they migrated and with whom they traded, aligned, and even fought against.

Pwenet (believed to be the same reference as the Biblical Punt) was South of Kush (which had the same borders as the Greco-Roman writers’ Nubia). The Nswt (pharaoh) Hatshepsut chronicled a famed expedition to Pwenet from which she brought back baboons, incense trees, and even its queen and king. Hatshepsut also calls Pwenet as Ta-Netjer (Land of the Gods). Although scholars such as Budge have stated that Pwenet’s core was as far south as contemporary Uganda and expanded through the horn and beyond the Red Sea. What has been confirmed scientifically is that those baboons mummified in Kemet have a direct genetic connection to baboons in Eritrea and northern Ethiopia today. So, contemporary “Ethiopia” is too among the broader area of Africans south of Kemet being ancestral to the population of Kemet itself. So, you have the Greeks who essentially used “Ethiopian” in much the same ways we use “African” today but also with specificity to Nubia and the city of Meroe - er - much like sometimes people refer to all black or brown people in the Caribbean as being either “Jamaican” if they speak English, “Puerto Rican” if they speak Spanish, or “Haitian” if they speak French even though the entire Caribbean has other islands that speak English, French, Spanish as well as Dutch and Dutch Creole languages, and that goes beyond those three identities includes multiple ancestries from Africa, Asian, Indigenous Americans, and Europe.

So the confusing part would be to determine when the Greeks wrote of “Ethiopia” did they intend it as a direct reference to Nubians (Meroe formerly Kushites)? Did they mean it generically as any African people that directly populated Kemet? Did they mean it for any black person (or dark Indian person) they encountered in Western Asia? Did they mean it for any black person (or dark Indian person) they encountered in Europe? All of those more so than the current nation of Ethiopia which began using the name as a national identity the 1930s - which isn’t totally wrong given the kingdoms of D’mt, Axum, Abyssinia, etc. are part of that broader “Ethiopian” usage by the Greeks even if most times they were referencing Meroe/Nubia (Sudan-Southern Egypt).

So, “yes” contemporary Ethiopia (and Eritrea) had its own ancient civilizations including Pwenet with direct contact and influence on Kemet as indicated by Kemety historical account and by genetic testing of mummified baboons (mind you this isn’t the only civilization named by the Remetch as ancestral but it is one of them), and often times “no” as Greco-Roman writers frequently were speaking of “Nubia” (that contained the city of Meroe) as Ethiopia and that was geographically southern Egypt into northern Sudan at the same time as contemporary Ethiopia had Axum becoming Abyssinia who would conquer Nubia ultimately as the Romans couldn’t do it. … But that’s another story.

Quelle est la guerre la plus désastreuse toujours en cours en Afrique ?

Actuellement même (ndt : réponse datant du 1er janvier 2022) la guerre du Tigré, un autre des interminables conflits de la corne de l'Afrique depuis l'époque coloniale. La Corne de l'Afrique est une région présentant un important intérêt géostratégique — l'une des "grandes portes" entre l'Europe et l'Asie, entre l'Occident et l'Orient, par la mer rouge et le canal de Suez — où tout le monde veut se tailler une part de gâteau.

Cela provoque un constant cercle vicieux de violence ⇔ pauvreté ⇔ instabilité politique ⇔ États en déliquescence ou absents ⇔ ingérences étrangères plus ou moins discrètes ⇔ plus de violence ⇔ plus de pauvreté ⇔ etc. Juste de l'autre côté de la mer, la situation est la même au Yémen avec sa guerre civile ou "pas tellement civile".

Cette guerre du Tigré n'est à ce jour pas une "grande guerre", plutôt l'un de ces conflits sanglants évoluant en ralenti et occasionnant des victimes "à compte goutte" en plus des massacres périodiques. Cela s'accompagne d'une importante famine et de constants flux de réfugiés. On parle de quelque 25.000 à 100.000 morts entre novembre 2020 et maintenant, ou ce que vous pourriez apprendre.

Ce conflit coïncide dans la même zone avec la révolte oromo (depuis 1973) et l'intermittente guerre civile somalienne. À cela s'ajoute la piraterie dans le Golfe d'Aden. D'où le maintien de l'Opération Atalante de la force navale européenne, actuellement pilotée depuis la base navale hispano-américaine de Rota par le vice-amiral de l'armée espagnole José María Núñez Torrente.

Il est difficile de vivre dans des endroits que personne n'aime mais que tout le monde veut contrôler.

Should Ethiopia become part of China to boost their economy?

Would becoming part of China maker the Ethiopians as intelligent, educated, and hard working as the Chinese? I think China wants a sphere of influence, but I don't think it wants to expand its existing Empire. But who knows? I would certainly counsel the Ethiopians against becoming an African Tibet.

Is Ancient Ethiopia older than ancient Egypt and ancient Nubia?

ShalakumX Simba History nerd who took a few classes in college 2y

You need to clarify your question. Are you talking about the geographical Aethiopia aforementioned in Hellenic mythology same as within Greek-Roman and early medieval European scholarly literature, or are you talking about the historical Abyssinia (present-day Ethiopia) ??

Because the answer would be that you need some clarifications about what is Aethiopia for the former, and of course not for the latter.

In Greek mythology, Aethiopia or "land of the burnt-faced people" meant generically the remote regions of the known world (e.g. the world whom the ancient Greeks were most familiar or lest heard from the telling of local or foreign mariners & traditions afar as early-to-mid Ist millenium BCE) lying south of Egypt; in other words the geo-historical polity of the same name - best known as Nubia by late Roman and European scientific literature, Cush for the Hebrews, Kasi (Kush) and Ta-Seti ("Land of the Bow") most interchangeably for ancient Egypt, then what modern scientific literature acknowledge now as respectively the historical A-Group Culture or "Second Nubian Culture" (3900 or 3800–3100BCE) and its impoverished successor period the so-called "B-Group Culture" (prior 2500BCE) , the C-Group Culture (2400 – ca. 1550BCE) , the Kerma Culture or Kerma Kingdom or Kush Kingdom prior its military annexation by the New Kingdom of Egypt (2500 – ca. 1550BCE) , the Egyptian- occupied Napatan period (ca. 1550–1069BCE) , the more-Egyptianized secessioned Kingdom of Kush or Kuluš in Meroitic language (1069BCE- ca. 350CE) from which originate the Egypto-Kushite forefathers of the short-lasting yet powerful XXVth Dynasty of Egypt or Kushite Empire (744-671BCE) and subdivize itself into two periods, so to speak a contuinity of the Napatan period (1069 to ca. 700–270BCE) followed by the Meroitic period (270BCE- ca. IInd-IIIrd centuries CE to ca. 350CE) , latter followed by the succession of various foreign occupations alike Christenized then latter Moslemized smaller local polities within medieval Nubia (ca. 400–1500CE) and its X-Group Culture period (ca. 300–600CE) - as well as subsaharian Africa under its mote vague geographical coining (by distinction to respectively Egypt or the Nile up north from the First Cataract, Lybia westward Egypt or Asia eastward the latter region) .

Nubia as a geo-historical and political entity meant the same thing with Aethiopia under the same denominators. Roman then latter Eutopean geographical literature merely interchanged between the two taxonyms because that region has been lately during its history populated by an massive afflux of Nilotic-speaking Nubas or Nobatae / Nobatians in Late Antiquity, who progressively drove away and/or assimilated the earlier Cushitic-speaking Kushites populating this area over several millenia. These ethnic Nubians, of Nilo-Sudanian stock (with some account of kinship to the mixed Berber-speaking Tehemu of Lower Nubia and Upper Lybia) and much darker complexion than their predecessors of mostly Cushitic stock, alike their mixed Nilo-Cushitic descendants, formed a major part of the latter Nilo-Saharian speaking and even a fewer Chadic speaking populations over subsaharian Africa (yet some interbreedings were due to latter subconsequent migrations of either these same populations alike the Abyssinians and other Cushitic speaking populations of the Horn in the tropical latitudes of interlacustrine Africa, Central Africa then the Eastern African seashore and their respective Cushitic, Pygmy/Khoisan, mixed Bantu-Cushitic or Bantu-Nilotic (or a mix of both) populations and vice versa, up from the Meroitic period to the course of the previous millenia.

Coming back to the subtopic of Greek mythos, Aethiopia meant the farthest extremities circumvoluting the known world as well: the westernmost edges of Lybia, the farthestmost regions of Scythia, the distant regions of Cimmeria and Hibernia, the Enchanted Isles of the Hesperides, Ogygia, the Hellespont and beyond, India, Chaldea, Elam, Assyria, the Levant, ancient Arabia, even *the Hades and its seven waterly affluents themselves were all never too far from Aethiopia from the perspective of the ancient Hellenes prior their intellectual expansion. Yet aside from the whole eschatological symbolism about the Aethiopians seen as a sometimes barely superhuman, sometimes even (because even race and color prejudices existed at those times) subhuman subrace of mighty Men and heroes dwelling at the cusp between the mortal realm and the invisible realms of the Olympian Gods (Poseidon and Hephaistos/Vulcan are often assumed to be the forefathers of the Aethiopians. The Lybians, a sister-kindred of the Aethiopians and Egyptians, have most oftentimes either a Giant bred from Gaea, Poseidon, Apollo, Artemis or Ares for forefather/s, whilst the Atlanteans or "people of Atlas" in Plato's Timaea, an another sister-kindred to the Aethiopians who possess a lot of commonality with respectively the Lybians, Egyptians and Pelasgians/Peoples of the Sea, don't even need to be specified about which one was their forefather. Most of the highest-frightening chtonic deities, monsters and sorceresses in the Greek world seems always to live in or nearby Aethiopia or being one way or another related or attuned to the people of those regions then most above all, about 2/3 of the Greek heroes and their respective bloodlines claims ancestry who hails back from eastward and/or southward the Mediterranean. Also, the Homerian Illiad mentions the Olympians like to take banquets amongst Aethiopians, even favouring these latter ones's appearances when it comes about cloaking their unearthly glory beneath the raiment of a still-glorious-yet-lesser human form… in other words when they are not invsting any random shape, identity or form for their own means or doesn't attempt to act like a bunch of jerkass meta-radioactive exhibitionists by revealing the fullest of their true form to these frail mortals like a well-known womanizer did one night to an overly curious Semele in some account, they pretty much look like the physical unearthly counterparts to Aethiopians) , it would also hint the Greeks long assumed that a major part of the Earth was predominantly populated by dark(er) complexioned populations going on from various tones of swarth(ier) to plainly jet-black skin colors… logical when it comes about the Mediterranean, the Near East and South Asia, not too far stretched about the Caucase and the Balkans and its sometimes dusky-complexioned populations at these times (matter-of-factly, the Colchidians of present-day Georgia claimed Egyptian and Aethiopian ancestry according Herodotus, whilst the vague matriarchal tribes in Minor Asia, the Danube and North Asia related to the Moschoi and the Sarmatians then assumed to be the legendary Amazons according the same Greek author, were assumed to be initially of Lybico-Egyptian ancestry as well) , could make sense about Bronze Age Western Europe and the Canary Islands, but Far Scythia?? Unless the ancient Greeks assumed the swarthy complexioned Euromongoloid and/or Paleo-Asian non-Iranic tribes who dwells in the toundra and Eurasian plains (or Hyperboreans for the connoiseurs) were "Burnt-faced" as well.

Historically speaking, a plethora of scientific evidence attests that Proto-Dynastic Egypt (4000 to 3400 - 3100BCE) , more especially the Princes of Abydos or "Dynasty 0" or Shemsu Hor "Followers of Horus" from which the founding ruler of Egypt Narmer/Menes hailed from, has been heavily influenced by the A-Group Culture as well as by the massive migrations of Saharian agropastoralists, the neighboring Berber-speaking populations west to the Nile and a migration of cattle-and-farm breeding Neolithic Afro-Asiatic speakers from the Near East (themselves descending back from earlier Proto-Afro-Asiatic speakers coming from Northeast Africa) . Studies led on the embalmed bodies of the A-Group culture natives were physically akin to the ancient Egyptians, who themselves and their modern descendants (the modern Fellahin, Saidis, Baladis and Copts) were (and still are) genetically akin to the Cushitic Proto-Somalis and of "Hamitic" (a taxonym to cautiously tackle) or "Ethiopid" stock (same as the Cushites, Berbers, Chadic-speaking populations, the ancient Canaanites/Phoenicians, the mixed Semitic/Canaanite - latter part Berber - Carthaginians, plausibly the earliest generations of Chaldeans then the Hymiarites/ ancient Yemenis) , yet the Princes of Abydos alike the Dynastic then Old Kingdom period pharaohs were phenotypically closer to the Nilotic populations yet a mix of both Egyptian and Nilotic ancestry, genetically speaking. The B-Group and C-Group culture natives were from Cushitic stock (with minor Berber admixtures for the latter culture) while the X-Group natives were strongly admixtured with "Negroid" (an another taxonym to tackle cautiously) elements. Whom to the Proto-Dynastic Princes of Lower-Egypt, they were equally of Egyptian stock but strongly admixtured with Berber and Neolithic Asiatic (the famous cattle/farm breeding migrants) elements.

Still, regardless the age of Kush as a polity, both the Egyptians and Kushites long assumed that the formers were the descendants of colonists sent up north of the First Cataract by the latter ones and other akin ethnic Aethiopian ethnos from the very Sources of the Nile, claiming that ofall the ruler-gods of Nile nobility from being the descendants of a semi-mythical tribe native from the foothills of the Mountains of the Moon (Mounts Rwenzori, in Middle Africa) called the Anu, who might have migrated north of the ancestral homeland about 10,000+ years before our days. In any case, the Egyptians assumed their state was a successor state to some protohistorical polity or culture rooted back from the South. In one way, Kush was somehow older than the Egyptian state.

By cross-referencing their semi-fantastical kinglist to ancient kinglists dating from the Aksumite period, then by separating the folklore part from historical data, the "Solomonid" Abyssinian Empire or modern Kingdom of Ethiopia regardless what their theological propaganda (and some blindfully god-fearing Rastafari or "Hebrew Israelites" "history experts" on the World Wide Web would suggest) considers itself to be the successor state of respectively pharaonic Egypt, the Kingdom of Kush until early IInd century CE and the pre-Islamic South Arabian Kingdoms (Himyar, Sheba/Saba, Hadramaut, etc) with some affinity dating back to the Kingdom of Juda via the late implantations of minor branches of Egyptian and Mizrahi Jew Exilarchies alike of Diasporic Jews from the Mear Eastern and the Graecian-Roman world in the vicinities of the Tigray valley and the Tana Lake region. The Habesha ethnic groups has been first mentioned within the native populations of the Land of Punt in Egyptian texts dating back from ca. 2000BCE, has been Ethiosemiticized as early as Ist millenium BCE, then blah-blah-blah, the Aksum Kingdom has been founded ca. 400BCE, blah-blah-blah— I'm sorry but it's been six hours I'm writing off and I get impatient.

The fact is, the kingdom of Ethiopia is much younger than Egypt, Egypt is culturally younger than geographical Aethiopia but about the same age than Kush as a polity. The end.

The main issue is water. The growing populations of the 4 countries involved are about 350 million people. Also, the animals, and industry (and tourism) need water. A war between these 3 (or 4 countries) will not solved the problem.

The capacity of the NILE - can no longer cope with the increasing need for drinking and clean water. The new Ethiopian dam is only part of the problem - over- population is the basic problem.

So, instead of even thinking about a WAR - and this is a war that both Egypt and Ethiopia would lose…. and even if one side won the war -this still doesn't solve the water problem.

So, here is the solution:- With the help of the UN, or the USA as mediators - A deal & project is born:- 1/5 of the electricity generated by the new Renaissance Dam - in Ethiopia is sent 540 kms to the East to power 5 massive & new Desalination plants -on the Red Sea, that will supply clean water to about 50% of the populations of Ethiopia, Egypt, Sudan & South Sudan. All these countries will take out loans with the World Bank [or similar] to pay of the desal-plants, and the new railway(s) that will carry the clean water to each country. {A railway is cheaper that pumping the water over 2000 kms}, and this same railway complex will also serve industry, tourism and the locals.

Each country will have her own plant - and pay some rent to Ethiopia - but get the electricity for free… and this desalinated water will then supplement the falling NILE river and allow new towns, industry and tourism to flourish.

Security for the desal-plants, the trains and the electric pylons will be run by an international force of the four countries involved.

This project will avoid the next water-war - that is sure to come if Egypt is 'dried up' by Ethiopian politics.

Did Ethiopia have anything to do with ancient Egypt?

Deidra Ramsey McIntyre African-Centered Researcher and Writer 2y

Yes and no. The Greek "Ethiopia" is not the contemporary nation of "Ethiopia." I think that confuses lots of people. When Greco-Roman writers such as Herodotus or Diodorus Siculus (writing nearly 400 years apart and including those other writers in between) stated that the Remetch (Ancient Egyptians) were colonists from "Ethiopia" the immediate civilization they were referencing was known as Nobatae/Noubatae/Nubia to the Greeks. Its location was contemporarily lower Sudan and Upper Kemet (Egypt in the south). At this time, the nation we currently know as "Ethiopia" had the kingdom of Axum that would Christianize and become Abyssinia. Axum would conquer Nubia/Nobatae (that had the city of Meroe in it) as it was on the verge of becoming a Christian kingdom under King Ezana who left a stone that chronicles his accounts on this and other matters.

However, the Greeks also used the term “Ethiopian” - “pan-Africanly” - to describe the physical features of black people who were not from “Nubia.” So you have them depicting black people in Turkey as “Ethiopian” describing Ancient Libyans as “Ethiopian,” even people from India were described as “Eastern Ethiopians” with different textured hair from “Ethiopians,” etc. So basically it became a term for primarily black people from where-ever and with dark skin toned Indians whom they perceived as culturally similar as well.

Dynastic Egyptians did not use the term “Ethiopian” or “Nubian” (well …relatively since Kemet had cities in Kemet named Nwb.t and the name has the same meaning) but used terms such as Kush, Yam, and …. Pwenet among many other names to refer to other African kingdoms from whence they state they migrated and with whom they traded, aligned, and even fought against.

Pwenet (believed to be the same reference as the Biblical Punt) was South of Kush (which had the same borders as the Greco-Roman writers’ Nubia). The Nswt (pharaoh) Hatshepsut chronicled a famed expedition to Pwenet from which she brought back baboons, incense trees, and even its queen and king. Hatshepsut also calls Pwenet as Ta-Netjer (Land of the Gods). Although scholars such as Budge have stated that Pwenet’s core was as far south as contemporary Uganda and expanded through the horn and beyond the Red Sea. What has been confirmed scientifically is that those baboons mummified in Kemet have a direct genetic connection to baboons in Eritrea and northern Ethiopia today. So, contemporary “Ethiopia” is too among the broader area of Africans south of Kemet being ancestral to the population of Kemet itself. So, you have the Greeks who essentially used “Ethiopian” in much the same ways we use “African” today but also with specificity to Nubia and the city of Meroe - er - much like sometimes people refer to all black or brown people in the Caribbean as being either “Jamaican” if they speak English, “Puerto Rican” if they speak Spanish, or “Haitian” if they speak French even though the entire Caribbean has other islands that speak English, French, Spanish as well as Dutch and Dutch Creole languages, and that goes beyond those three identities includes multiple ancestries from Africa, Asian, Indigenous Americans, and Europe.

So the confusing part would be to determine when the Greeks wrote of “Ethiopia” did they intend it as a direct reference to Nubians (Meroe formerly Kushites)? Did they mean it generically as any African people that directly populated Kemet? Did they mean it for any black person (or dark Indian person) they encountered in Western Asia? Did they mean it for any black person (or dark Indian person) they encountered in Europe? All of those more so than the current nation of Ethiopia which began using the name as a national identity the 1930s - which isn’t totally wrong given the kingdoms of D’mt, Axum, Abyssinia, etc. are part of that broader “Ethiopian” usage by the Greeks even if most times they were referencing Meroe/Nubia (Sudan-Southern Egypt).

I think you need to do your homework. We acknowledge the fact that northern Africa was the birthplace but I don’t think it is as far as Ethiopia. Nubia perhaps. Of course there was inner marriage and colonization And people traveled all over the world just like they are now. Nobody stayed in their country all the time and there were many people born with wanderlust in their heart. These people traveled all over the world just as they do now. Egyptians have always been a mix. If you go towards Sudan, they are very dark and black, if you go toward the Mediterranean they are light skinned and they look more like Greek or Romans. Also, there was quite a bit of intermingling going on with the royal house since the kings married princesses from all over the world. One of the greatest pharaohs of ancient Egypt, Amenhotep lll Was actually partially black and also his mother was from ancient Syria which in those days was called Mitanni!

We also suspect that the beautiful queen Nefertiti could have been a princess from there which would explain her light olive skin. So stop trying to make Egypt 100% black Africian! Here is a DNA wheel for you to ponder. DNA does not lie! The Egyptian people are now what they were in ancient times, a mix. You can even see many scenes such as on one of the boxes of king Tutankhamen where he is fighting with what looks to be pure black African people and you can notice the complete difference in what he looks like. I am not saying that the Egyptians were Caucasians. But they were more olive skin with black hair.

This waterfall in the highland of Ethiopia gave life to a dry ancient Egypt.

This is a quote from an ancient Egyptian document called the Papyrus of Hunifer.. interpreted from the hieratic writing, "We came from the beginning of the Nile where God Hapi dwells, at the foothills of The Mountains of the Moon." "We," meaning the Egyptians, as stated, came from the beginning of the Nile. Where is "the beginning of the Nile? The farthest point of the beginning of the Nile is in Uganda; this is the White Nile." This a from Dr jochannan book: The Nile Valley Civilization... .

On Constantine de Volney trip to Africa, he commented on the Sphinx during the 1700's. "It is upon seeing that head [the sphinx of Giza] typically NEGRO in all it's features. I remember the remarkable passage of Herodotus; the Ancient Egyptians were true NEGROS of the same type as all native born Africans. Just to think that this race of BLACK men today, are enslaved & the object of scorn, the very race to which we owe the origins of our arts, sciences, mathematics & even the use of speech."

They say also that the Egyptians are colonists sent out by the Ethiopians, Osiris having been the leader of the colony. 2 For, speaking generally, what is now Egypt, they maintain, was not land but sea when in the beginning the universe was being formed; afterwards, however, as the Nile during the times of its inundation carried down the mud from Ethiopia, land was gradually built up from the deposit.

Let's Discuss Ancient and Medieval Africa
Were Coptic or Ethiopian Orthodox spread to South Sudan or Somalia in ancient/medival time?

Posted by Firew Afera Read books about Ethiopian history 2h

During the ancient times, the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo church was present in lands far away from its heartland in the Ethiopian Highlands.

It is well known that in the Pre-Islamic times some tribal Arabs were converted into Christianity by the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo church. Those Arabians are the ancestors of those who live in Najran (southern Saudi Arabia) and various parts of Yemen. It is believed that adherents of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church lived in the island of Socotra (in Yemen) as late as the fifteenth century.

The Ethiopian and Nubian Orthodox people of the Medieval period had a lot of interaction at the past, and the two people were historically fraternal people. This sense of brotherhood has not faded even though Sudan today is a predominantly Arab-Islamic country. The southernmost Nubian kingdom of Alodia used to write their language by combining characters from the Greek (Coptic) script the Ge'ez (Ethiopic) script. Since people who live the modern country of South Sudan are related to ancient Nubia, it could be said that cultural and religious influences from Ethiopia may have reached lands as far as there. By the way, religious differences and economic interests of foreigners were the principal reason why we have two kinds of Sudanese in the first place.

In the Anglophone world people frequently make mistakes when they use the term ‘Coptic christans' to denote Ethiopian Orthodox Christians. However the word ‘Copt', in Ethiopian Semetic languages, simply means a person from Egypt. Thus it is important to understand that the term is non-religious in nature.

However the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church is a sister church for all Orthodox churches that rejected the verdict of the council of Chalcedon (in modern day Turkey) in 451 A.D. Some of these churches are the Indian Orthodox Church, the Coptic Orthodox church, the Syriac Orthodox church and the Nubian Orthodox Church as well (which I do not believe exists anymore, sadly).

Modern day countries like Somalia are created because of Western imperialism and the borders they drew within Africa by the end of the 19th century. The fact is that Somalis are simply one of the Cushitic tribes that dwelled in Ethiopia since ancient times. Ethiopia has always been formed by Cushitic tribes who extensively interacted, fought each other and assimilated one another. Thus the medieval people of Argobba, Fatagar, Adal, Warji etc now are called Oromos, Afars, Bejas, Somalis and Amharas. Some of the Cushitic tribes, like Amhara and Tigray became Christian whereas the coastal Cushites like Afar and Somali, due to their exposed location and the plain terrain they live in, accepted Islam.

Thus, since Somalis are an Ethiopian tribe, there is no doubt that they have exposure to the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo Church in the past. After the ascendancy of Islam, Ethiopian Orthodox Christianity was pushed back from parts of Arabia, Nubia and the lowland areas of the Horn. However it managed to establish itself firmly among the Highland Cushitic tribes.

Faces of Africa:
Haile Selassie I, the pillar of a Modern Ethiopia

I'm glad this documentary was made. The king had done great things for the poor. He was just too slow to make land reforms. He helped start all things that put Ethiopia on the map, such as, the African union, Ethiopian airlines, modern education (Addis Ababa university) gave fellow Africans scholarships to get their education in Ethiopia, he helped start tourism (13 months of sunshine). He helped start theater. Established the first modern hospital in the capital (black Lion). Gave a chance to Large number of Ethiopians from different tribes to go abroad for western education and to help them be exposed to new ideas. To be frank, those who came after him tried their best, he still still ahead by a mile and half! CGTN Bini Zmelekot

Though he died almost four decades ago, Haile Selassie's legacy remains strong and valid. "Faces of Africa" sought to unearth the events and memories of the man who dared to confront the League of Nations, pleading for their support in conquering the Italians who were preparing to attack Ethiopia. #FacesofAfrica #HaileSelassie Subscribe to us on YouTube: https://goo.gl/lP12gA Download our APP on Apple Store (iOS): https://itunes.apple.com/us/app/cctvn... Many things stated in this documentary are not factual, for example; the narrator at one point says that His Majesty "disavowed" his lineage to King Solomon and Queen Makeda, however there are many DOCUMENTED instances including in his own autobiography when he solidly takes ownership of his lineage and 72 nations of the world accepted this fact when their representatives bowed before him physically when this lineage was declared at his coronation in 1930. I am very disappointed that "fake news" has made its way into this news channel and you all should be ashamed at distorting the facts of such a great man!!

I met Haile Selassie's son in the 1980's & we were friends. He told me who he was but he told me 2 read about it in history. I did & was intrigued as to why this nation turned around from prospering. He also believed instead education would help Ethiopia but he also said that they were exiled & would never be allowed 2 return cuz his father had been an Emperor. - Sharron Cummings

An airstrike in Ethiopia's Tigray region killed 56 people and injured 30, including children, in a camp for displaced people, two aid workers told Reuters on Saturday, citing local authorities and eyewitness accounts.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Sun

Military spokesman Colonel Getnet Adane and government spokesman Legesse Tulu did not immediately respond to requests for comment. The government has previously denied targeting civilians in the 14-month conflict with rebellious Tigrayan forces.

The strike in the town of Dedebit, in the northwest of the region near the border with Eritrea, occurred late on Friday night, said the aid workers, who asked not to be named as they are not authorized to speak to the media.

Earlier Friday, the government had freed several opposition leaders from prison and said it would begin dialogue with political opponents in order to foster reconciliation.

Both aid workers said the number of dead was confirmed by the local authorities. The aid workers sent Reuters pictures they said they had taken of the wounded in hospital, who included many children.

One of the aid workers, who visited Shire Suhul General Hospital where the injured were brought for treatment, said the camp hosts many old women and children.

"They told me the bombs came at midnight. It was completely dark, and they couldn't escape," the aid worker said.

One of the four greatest powers in the world. What beliefs did the Aksumite Empire have?

Alton Allen Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History: Jan 18

In their pre Christian Era they worshipped the god Mars

Aksum was the name of a city and a kingdom which is essentially modern-day northern Ethiopia (Tigray province) and Eritrea. Research shows that Aksum was a major naval and trading power from the 1st to the 7th centuries C.E. As a civilization it had a profound impact upon the people of Egypt, southern Arabia, Europe and Asia, all of whom were visitors to its shores, and in some cases were residents.

Aksum developed a civilization and empire whose influence, at its height in the 4th and 5th centuries C.E., extended throughout the regions lying south of the Roman Empire, from the fringes of the Sahara in the west, across the Red Sea to the inner Arabian desert in the east. The Aksumites developed Africa’s only indigenous written script, Ge’ez. They traded with Egypt, the eastern Mediterranean and Arabia.

Despite its power and reputation—it was described by a Persian writer as one of the four greatest powers in the world at the time—very little is known about Aksum. Written scripts existed, but no histories or descriptions have been found to make this African civilization come alive.

The kingdom of Aksum
One of the four greatest powers in the world

Aksum was the name of a city and a kingdom which is essentially modern-day northern Ethiopia (Tigray province) and Eritrea. Research shows that Aksum was a major naval and trading power from the 1st to the 7th centuries C.E. As a civilization it had a profound impact upon the people of Egypt, southern Arabia, Europe and Asia, all of whom were visitors to its shores, and in some cases were residents. A counterpoint to the Greek and Roman worlds

Aksum provides a counterpoint to the Greek and Roman worlds, and is an interesting example of a sub-Saharan civilization flourishing towards the end of the period of the great Mediterranean empires. It provides a link between the trading systems of the Mediterranean and the Asiatic world, and shows the extent of international commerce at that time. It holds the fascination of being a "lost" civilization, yet one that was African, Christian, with its own script and coinage, and with an international reputation. It was arguably as advanced as the Western European societies of the time.

The society was hierarchical with a king at the top, then nobles, and the general population below. This can be discerned by the buildings that have been found, and the wealth of the goods found in them. Although Aksum had writing, very little has been found out about society from inscriptions. It can be assumed that priests were important, and probably traders, too, because of the money they would have made. Most of the poor were probably craftsmen or farmers. In some descriptions, the ruler is described as "King of Kings" which might suggest that there were other, junior kings in outlying parts of the empire which the Aksumites gradually took over.There is evidence of at least 10–12 small towns in the kingdom, which suggests it was an urban society, but for descriptions of these there is only archaeological evidence. Little or nothing is known about such things as the role of women and family life.

Christianity

Aksum embraced the Orthodox tradition of Christianity in the 4th century (c. 340–356 C.E.) under the rule of King Ezana. The king had been converted by Frumentius, a former Syrian captive who was made Bishop of Aksum. On his return, Frumentius had promptly baptized King Ezana, who then declared Aksum a Christian state, followed by the king’s active converting of the Aksumites. By the 6th century, King Kaleb was recognized as a Christian by the emperor Justin I of Byzantium (ruled 518–527) when he sought Kaleb’s support in avenging atrocities suffered by fellow Christians in South Arabia. This invasion saw the inclusion of the region into the Aksumite kingdom for the next seven decades.

Judaism

Although Christianity had a profound effect upon Aksum, Judaism also had a substantial impact on the kingdom. A group of people from the region called the Beta Israel have been described as "Black Jews." Although their scriptures and prayers are in Ge’ez, rather than in Hebrew, they adhere to religious beliefs and practices set out in the Pentateuch (Torah), the religious texts of the Jewish religion. Although often regarded by scholars/academics as not technically ‘"Jewish" but instead a pre-Christian, Semitic people, their religion shares a common ancestry with modern Judaism. Between 1985 and 1991 almost the whole Beta Israel population of Ethiopia was moved to Israel.

King Solomon and Queen Sheeba

The Queen of Sheba and King Solomon are important figures in Ethiopian heritage. Traditional accounts describe their meeting when Sheba, Queen of Aksum, went to Jerusalem, and their son Menelik I formed the Solomonic dynasty from which the rulers of Ethiopia (up to the 1970s) are said to be descended. It has also been claimed that Aksum is the home of the Biblical Ark of the Covenant, in which lies the "Tablets of Law" upon which the Ten Commandments are inscribed. Menelik is believed to have taken it on a visit to Jerusalem to see his father. It is supposed to reside still in the Church of St Mary in Aksum, though no-one is allowed to set eyes on it. Replicas of the Ark, called Tabots, are housed in all of Ethiopia’s churches, and are carried in procession on special days.

Why do Eurocentrics claim Ethiopians have Eurasian DNA and not African DNA?

Ygor Coelho · Follow

This is or at least should be a scientific matter, not a matter of politics, ideology, identity movements, let alone personal preferences and values. Countless scientific studies, which happened to confirm archaeological and linguistic evidences, have simply demonstrated that most Ethiopians, chiefly those who speak Semitic and Cushitic languages, have a variable, but very substantial portion of genetic ancestry of Eurasian stock combined with another considerable, in most cases majority, portion of indigenous African ancestral components. This isn't a case of "either this, or that".
People from different locations intermarry and interbreed today, their genes combine freely without any impediments, and people in the past didn't just remain totally stuck in their homelands for thousands and thousands of years, either. That's totally normal, people, seriously.

In the case of the Horn of Africa, strong evidences based on uniparental markers (Y-DNA and Mt-DNA haplogroups) and, especially, on genetic data from the autosomes (genome-wide ancestry) do indicate a significant back-migration of some Eurasians to North Africa and parts of East Africa. Eurasia-specific lineages and population structures (by Eurasia-specific understand: emerged in decidedly post-Out-of-Africa Migration timeframes), especially maternal haplogroups and autosomal admixtures, attest that Ethiopians have — contrary to what the OP mentions — both Eurasian and African ancestry.

ABOVE: Map of a portion of Africa, showing circumferences around Ethiopia and Northeastern Africa (Egypt/North Sudan).

Additionally, ancient DNA samples from lands to the south of Ethiopia (Kenya, Tanzania and even northeasternmost Congo), traced back to as early as the Early Pastoral Neolithic era, also indicate the antiquity of the presence of partly Eurasian, i.e. Eurasian-admixed, African peoples in East Africa, apart from also pointing to an origin mainly in the expansion of Neolithic Pastoralists from Northeastern Africa (Egypt/Sudan), also reasonably close to Southwest Asia.

ABOVE: Two of the Horn of Africa's most prominent paternal lineages, measured by Y-DNA haplogroups, are T and J, decidedly Eurasian haplogroups derived from earlier haplogroups of Eurasian origin — CF > F > GHIJK > HIJK > IJK > K > LT > T / (...) IJK > IJ > J.

All scientific scholars, as opposed to ideological activists, have basically made up their minds about that years ago. The evidences are too many and too consistently and mutually reinforced to be neglected — and they are per se totally neutral: not "Eurocentric", nor "Afrocentric", nor anything else. I at least reckon that those who truly don't care about keeping racial labels and divisions shouldn't worry too much about those findings, instead of finding the increasingly complex population dynamics involved fascinating.

As you surely know, Eurasians and Africans are still members of the same species and aren't even that much distantly related to each other (the first Eurasians came 60,000–70,000 years ago from a particular branch of Africans that probably lived somewhere in North Africa or the Horn of Africa), and there is no insurmountable invisible barrier preventing any contact between Africa and Eurasia, especially in Northeast Africa and the Horn of Africa, which are very close to Asia.

Less than 30 km separate Djibouti from Yemen in the Gate of Tears (Bab al-Mandab strait), and Ethiopia's 2nd largest city, Merk'ele, is about 2,060 km away from Jerusalem and 880 km away from Mecca… while its distance to Lagos is about 4,020 km, to Nairobi, 1,670 km. No wonder Christianity and Islam, both spreading from the Near East, arrived first in the Horn of Africa and, of course, Mediterranean North Africa.

Those continental names are ultimately just geographic references, locations where different populations settled and then started to drift apart and mix with each other in a myriad of possible ways and proportions. There should be no surprise or shock in the fact that, in certain transition zones between Africa and Eurasia, intercontinental movements took place. That doesn't differ much from the similarly demonstrated genetic clines that exist, among others, between West Eurasia and East Eurasia. These are all lands within human reach: "continents" is just a concept humans created to categorize them.

What's so "Eurocentric" about it? Is the new "anti-Eurocentric" fad the exactly opposite of what it used to be, that is, promoting a fake notion of strictly separated races and of an eons-old segregation between "pure" Africans and "pure Eurasians, clearly coming from an underlying premise that mixing is detrimental and weakens "the race"?

Things are what they are, we just must adjust to the reality, and if you don't that probably tells a lot more about your own biases, prejudices and stubbornly held preconceptions.

For one, if someone is truly an anti-racist, the fact that a certain population originated in a confluence of several populations that migrated from distinct geographic zones shouldn't elicit much controversy nor outrage — especially if it's one that happens to live and be related to other populations just across the Red Sea coast of Southwest Asia.

Why should population movements from Eurasia to Africa cause so much controversy if the same people who complain about those numerous scientific findings that attest to the Eurasian + African mixture in modern Horn Africans are also the very same people who always remind us — correctly — that, in much more archaic times, it was people from Northeast Africa, maybe including the Horn of Africa, that moved into Southwest Asia to spread there and become the forebears of all non-Africans?

So people could move out of Africa 60,000–70,000 years ago, but definitely COULD not move into Africa many millennia later, when humans were much more numerous and more technologically advanced? That sounds incongruous.

By the way, why would Eurocentrics be interested in claiming an ancestral connection between ancient Southwest Asian peoples and Ethiopia? It's not like that would establish any direct tie between Europeans and Ethiopians. Not at all. I'm sure most die-hard Eurocentrics, let alone the much more radical white supremacists, would never even consider the likelihood that people pretty much similar to Arabians (Saudis, Yemenis, Emiratis, etc.) and Levantines (Palestinians, Jordanians, etc.) are their own brethren and members of the same race and ancestral stock.

In which way a very remote ancestral connection of Ethiopians with generally brown-skinned, Semitic-speaking Southwest Asians helps the agenda of real Eurocentrics, who would probably be the first to want to highlight that they are only very, very distantly related to that kind of Eurasians?

Sorry, but that just doesn't add up with the Eurocentric supremacists' highly restrictive and exclusive ideology and starts to sound more like a strawman argument to turn a scientific matter into a moral/ethical and political one with one single acceptable answer, regardless of what the data suggest.

That is, basically: "I don't care much about researching and releasing scientific analyses that debunk those that reveal Eurasian DNA in Ethiopians, but that doesn't matter: if you guys disagree with me and don't acknowledge, as an a priori self-evident truth, that Ethiopians are Africans, only descended from Africans, genetically pure, never admixed Africans with no Eurasian ancestry at all, then you're by default part of a racist, anti-African, black-hating Eurocentric conspiracy and should be cancelled for that."

Unfortunately, all sorts of extremes tend to have a big issue with even conceiving the possibility that people they claim as "theirs" are not "pure" and may have something to do with the "enemies/adversaries", which leads to outraged questions like this one, as if there would be a huge blow to the "Africaness" Ethiopians having Eurasian DNA that probably introgressed into their gene pool ancestral to modern Ethiopians several thousands of years before any civilization arose in what is now known as Ethiopia (clearly a modern misnomer, as the ancient use of that Greek - thus foreign - word never referred specifically to Ethiopia or even to the Horn of Africa alone, and indeed Ethiopia was known as Abyssinia — from the Habesha — as recently as the early 1900s).

The implied fear seems to be that, if Ethiopians have considerable Eurasian admixture, that would cause them to cease to be "real Africans" and to have their legitimacy to claim "Africanness" and "blackness" put in jeopardy. Of course, any people's skin color is not determined solely by their continent-wide ancestral roots (for instance, there are literally billions of dark-skinned Eurasians, too), and a people's historical link to their homeland won't be determined by where some of their ancestors lived 5,000 or 10,000 years ago.

Sadly some people claim to fight racism, but are themselves heavily influenced by racist premises of thought, including the unfortunate conflation of DNA/ancestry (even if it's traced to literally hundreds of generations before) with matters pertaining to cultural and sociopolitical formation.

The things that define the present-day ethnic groups and nations have just an indirect and secondary relationship with genetic ancestry: it's a people's cultural and historical dynamics that really shape their group identity and make it shift over time.

Finally, I think that maybe some people need to get reminded that human beings don't suddenly switch into something else altogether once they move from one side of the Sinai peninsula to the other or from the western Red Sea coast to the eastern one or vice-versa. Because of that, I'm pretty sure that, throughout history, no one asked "are all your ancestors from the same continent where my own ancestors were born?" before intermarrying someone else. Nor did people refuse to migrate on the belief that Africa and Eurasia, literally linked by land and short-distance sea routes, were fundamentally distinct, with inextricable, everlasting bond between a continent and the people dwelling in it.

Those are just modern (extreme) political/ideological beliefs being anachronistically projected onto the past and starting to interfere on history and other sciences that study the past.

What would be the damage if Ethiopia destroyed Egypt's Aswan Dam in retaliation for Egypt destroying Ethiopia's dam?

Mohamed Emara · Follow Alexandrian Updated Wed

First of all Egypt won't destroy Ethiopia's dam and there won't be a war over the Nile. And I don't think this is a genuine question, but I'm willing to give the OP the benefit of the doubt and answer the question.

Let's say Egypt destroyed the GERD using long range missiles or an airstrike. Can Ethiopia retaliate by targeting Aswan Dam? The answer is no.

Ethiopia simply doesn't have the potential to pull such a move. They don't have any kind of long-range surface to surface or ballistic missiles that can target Egypt.

Ok so no missiles. But what about aircraft? The answer is still no.

Ethiopia's air fleet is dwarfed by that of Egypt. Ethiopia has a grand total of 90 aircraft including only 23 fighter jets and 0 attack aircraft. On the other hand, Egypt's air force boasts the strength of more than a 1000 aircraft including 250 fighter jets and 93 attack aircraft.

The fighter jets operated by Ethiopia, MiG-23s and Su-27s, are of obsolete old tech dating back to the Cold War era. Egyptian F-16s and Rafales would destroy them from a distance of thousands of kilometres. They won't even see them coming.

And I didn't mention even mention Egypt's air defence capabilities.

This is why this scenario is unrealistic considering the facts mentioned. Thus, Aswan Dam is in no danger whatsoever of getting bombed.

Aswan Dam

In any case, bombing the GERD makes no sense strategically wise. If a war erupts, Egypt would take advantage of Ethiopia's aerial inferiority and decimate it's army using it's superior air force. Then Sudan's army will mount a ground invasion and seize the Dam as well as the surrounding areas. Sudan has a special relationship with Egypt and is going to be equally harmed by GERD unless all parties agree on a solution.

Now, I don't believe a "war" over the Nile water is going to happen and sincerely hope all three countries reach a peaceful resolution to the dispute guaranteeing the rights of everyone.

How dare Egypt warn Ethiopia of war since it benefited thousands of years from the river which starts from Ethiopia which suffers from lack of electricity?

Abdelrahman Bishr , studied Electrical Engineering at Faculty of Engineering, Ain Shams University (2020)
Answered Jul 9, 2020

The problem is that Ethiopians believe that Nile is their river , and that flowing water to downstream countries is a gift or grant from Ethiopians to downstream countries. This makes them think that they can withhold the water or control it at their will unilaterally. This is not accepted by any sane human outside Ethiopia or by any law. Nile is an international river , its water doesn't belong only to upstream countries so that they think they have the right to do whatever they do to it unilaterally. If Ethiopians get this point this will make a significant progress.

Understanding this , leads to the understanding that filling the dam , and operating it , doesn't affect only Ethiopia or is a solely Ethiopian matter . It affects the lives of millions in the downstream countries and hence they must be partners in the decisions that decides their lives.

Ethiopia , in negotiations , doesn't want an agreement with obligations. It just wants recommendations that it can unilaterally change. It also doesn't want to address the fact that during drought periods , the priority is to the downstream countries whose lives depend on the Nile.

Back to the question , Egypt hasn't threatened of military action , it has been negotiating for a decade to reach an agreement but Ethiopia is stubborn and rigid in negotiations. Ethiopia is just buying time to impose a status quo.

Bringing military to the table was only mentioned by Ethiopian officials. They are facing internal problems and they are escaping them by demonizing Egypt to unite Ethiopians against a common enemy. Also , Egypt is being used as a scapegoat for successive Ethiopian governments failure to provide for their people and to develop their country. Egypt didn't prevent Ethiopia from using wind power , non renewable power plants , hydropower , or anything. Egypt just demands a long enough period for filling the reservoir so that impact on water in Egypt is bearable .

Are Horn Africans (Djibouti, Ethiopia, Somalia) genetically closer to West Africans or to Europeans?

Liz Ali · Follow Tutor Mon

Horn of African people are not so much genetically related to West Africans. Horn of African countries are Ethiopia, Eritrea, and Somalia. These people are from the Cushitic race, which is a subgroup of the Semitic race. I can see why you would assume people Horn of African countries to be of part European descent, they do have somewhat of it. Ethiopians and its neighbor countries has people that look significantly different from West Africans.

Is it possible for Ethiopia to use their control over the Blue Nile as leverage over Egypt?

Mike Barriere General Manager, Auditor at Barrierenergy.com (2009–present) updated Jan 3

Absolutely. That water is the single most important political tool in Northern Africa. If Ethiopia wants to increase their own Authority, managing the water resources in the area is a great start. The fact is that too much fresh water goes out to sea, and not enough is utilized for agriculture. Just look at what Syria and Iraq have done with the Euphrates and Tigris Rivers.

They did adopt some marvelous canals already in place though. There is another thing that historians are stumbling into now. The Nile was not always the river it is now. At some point around 3750 BC, year zero on the Hebrew Calendar, the Nile changed course near the fifth cataract, and began to flow more heavily south.

Before this time the river continued west at the bend near Al Dongola, between Al Dabbah and Al Goled. To this day a small island in the Nile exists where the River historical split. Many old maps show this fork in the river and the greater patch leading into the Sudanese desert. The Lake. Had basin is the largest dry lake in the world. Over the last 6000 years this body of water has slowly shrunk to the size of a small saline lake.

This was obviously caused by the loss of fresh inflow from the Nile River. This change caused a domino effect, lowering precipitation in the area and staring the process of Desertification. Today we can change this and unblock the western flow of the Nile River. This would have a drastic effect on the climate and agriculture of North Africa as a whole. Now Sudan is responsible for that site, but Ethiopia can help. By damming up the blue Nile they can lower the flow temporarily to create a redivide upstream, while workers fix the river course farther south.

With the river level lower work crews could safely engineer a more robust flood control Loch system along this stretch of the river. This would help farmers downstream to avoid the periodic over flooding that can ruin crop lands. This is an effort that will involve all three governments working together toward a common goal of increased agricultural production. The burden is on Ethiopia to initialize this positive change. Honestly more countries would benefit from this change than Ethiopia, Sudan and Egypt. Chad, DRC, Rwanda, and CAR would all benefit from this arrangement with increased rainfall for their crops. Refilling the Lake Chad Bain would not be quick project, and could take up to 25 years to just complete the river project. Once water flows into Chad again though, the world itself will change for the better.

edit 1/22: I see some interesting comments in here bringing up some valid and provocative points. Also some I have deleted. My intention here was twofold: A to demonstrate the potential and B to document potential historical changes. This is not intended to be an inflammatory or provocative statement, merely an explanation of what is transpiring and a theoretical approach to addressing the issue from a historical perspective. Obviously we cannot refill the entire Basin, that would take too much time. As for Climate change, yes that is the entire point of this exercise, to drastically redistribute Rain throughout North Africa, effectively changing the climate by several degrees.

Unlike other continents, why hasn't there been any big and powerful civilization in sub-Saharan Africa?

Francis Korkor Geography/Archaeology M.A in Eastern Mediterranean Archaeology & Geography, KU Leuven (Graduated 1998) Updated 3y

The term sub-Saharan Africans was invented by Eurocentrists, who have a hidden agenda to proof that Africans are not ambitious, and only Europeans were ambitious to build civilizations and contributed to human development.

So knowing that North Africans (who are Africans) built the earliest civilizations and achieved great things, they employ these terms deliberately to strip North Africa from the rest of Africa, so that we are left with only sub-Saharan Africa, then they can argue falsely that sub-Saharan Africans or black Africans did not achieve anything in the past, forgetting that the whole Africa is one entity and Africans are linked and cannot be separated in that fashion.

These same people, when they talk about European civilizations during the Greek period, always mention Europe as a whole entity and include Ancient Greece. If they are stripping North Africa from the rest of Africa, why don't they do the same thing to Europe, by stripping ancient Greece from say Eastern Europe. Why are these hypocrites, not asking questions like: "why didn't Balkan Countries" build any civilizations?

Also when talking about the contribution of various regions of the world to world development, people erroneously choose recent contributors to world development over past contributors. That is so wrong. Good academics should be looking at the whole timeline from about 2.5 million years ago till now. If they do good analysis and not just pick and choose a timeline favourable to their argument, they will see the contribution of Africa as a whole, and sub-Sahara Africa in particular.

For most part of the time, while the rest of the world was remote and inaccessible, Africans were developing the world's oldest record of human technological achievement: the oldest stone tools in the world (the Oldowan tool industry) from 2.5 million years ago have been found in Eastern and Southern Africa. The Africans also learnt to control fire, without which no human species would have survived, and then went ahead to explore and populate the rest of Asia and Europe.

Later on around about 1.7 million years ago, the same Africans developed the Acheulean stone tool industry, specifically hand-axes, at a time when Europe, Asia and the Middle East was a jungle and had no technology at all. This tool industry spread to the Middle East and Europe around 800,000 to 600,000 years ago, curtesy of the Africans.

It must be noted that if the Africans were lazy, apathetic, and feeling uneasy to explore like many eurocentrists want to argue, the whole human race would have suffered and gone into extinction.

Now in terms of later empires and civilizations, the same Eurocentrists pretend that civilization started in Europe and western countries, where as in fact when Africa was teaming with great civilizations (Egypt 4500BCE-100AD, Kush 1000 BCE - 350CE, Axum. 500-1000CE, Kilwa. 800-1840CE, Benin. 1200-

1897CE, Ghana. 300-900C and Songhai 1400-1500s CE, most of Europe was a jungle, waiting to be populated.

From the map above, you can see that Africa was the continent with most civilizations/empires than any other continent.

Anyway, for those of you who want to learn, Africa was very dynamic economically before the arrival of Europeans. In fact during the period when Africa established trade networks, most parts of Europe were experiencing the dark age. The Europeans after the end of colonization, tried to rewrite history, and make it appear that when they arrived in Africa, they discovered a primitive continent with nothing much going on. It must be noted that Africa has the longest and oldest economic history. Humanity originated in Africa, and as soon as human societies existed so did economic activity. According to Wikipedia, from the 1st millennium AD, the Axumite Kingdom in Ethiopia and Eritrea had a powerful navy and trading links reaching as far as the Byzantine Empire and India. Between the 14th and 17th centuries, the Ajuran Sultanate centered in modern-day Somalia practiced hydraulic engineering and developed new systems for agriculture and taxation, which continued to be used in parts of the Horn of Africa as late as the 19th century. On the east coast of the continent Swahili traders linked the region into an Indian Ocean trading network, bringing imports of Chinese pottery and Indian fabrics in exchange for gold, ivory, and slaves. Swahili Kingdoms created a prosperous trade empire, which occupied the territory of modern-day Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda. Swahili cities were important trading ports for trade with the Middle East and Far East. In West Africa, many wealthy empires grew around coastal areas or large rivers that served as part of important trade routes. The kingdoms of Mali and Songhai Empire grew along the Niger River between 1200 and 1590. Berber traders from the Sahel—a region south of the Sahara Desert—traded dates, copper, horses, weapons and cloth that they brought from north Africa in Camel trains. Trade with the Berber people, and other groups, drove the growth of the Ghana empire, which traded its gold, kola nuts, and slaves. It has been documented that in 1324CE, Mansa Musa, the king of Mali, made a historically famous Hajj (pilgrimage) to Mecca. There was an enormous group organized to undertake the Hajj with the king. It included "60,000 men, including 1200 servants" and records show that Mansa Musa gave out so much gold in Egypt, that its economy became depressed

Next time you see an African, do not underestimate him/her. Africans are a walking bunch of survivors, adapters and explorers. Instead of constantly trying to minimize the intelligence and capabilities of Africans, people from other continents should pay respect and appreciation for the Africans who first explored the whole world and gave them technology to survive as humans.

Stephen Boyo, an Educator comments, answered Dec 9, 2020

Why are you separating Sub Saharan Africa from north Africa. There were great and powerful civilisations in Africa so just because your history books do not mention them does not mean they didn't exist. Human Life began in West Africa and all races are descended from black people as they are the only ones with the genomes to produce the different so called races we have today. So 96–98 percent genes of so called non black races are the same as that of black African who produced them in the first place. The rest are from Neanderthal and Denisoyeyevyeian species which caused recessiveness in skin, eye . So any civilisation that came up later was by Africans and their descendants.

What are the major stereotypes people have about Ethiopia and to what extent are they true?

Ruth Abebe Lived in Ethiopia (2006–2009) Jul 24

Ethiopian people can’t speak English

This isn’t particularly true. My parents both were born and raised in Ethiopia, and they learned English as children. English and Amharic are used interchangeably in modern schools. However, in more urban areas, they primarily use Amharic and only some of the schools teach English.

Another thing I’d like to mention is not all of us have an accent when we’re speaking English. When people find out I was born in Ethiopia, they normally think I’m lying because I don’t have an accent. I sound like every other American when I speak English. However, when I speak Amharic, I do have an accent. English is my first language, but I grew up listening to Amharic. Because of this, I’m pretty good at changing accents (not only with English and Amharic accents, but I have a pretty good Spanish, British, etc. accent).

Ethiopian people are all kind and caring

I’m happy to confirm this one. Most Ethiopians are very kind and caring. They are known for treating everyone like family. I have difficulties telling who is family and who is just a friend, as everyone is treated the same.

If you see an Ethiopian when you’re out in public, it’s common to greet them with a hug and/or to bow your head with respect (especially with the elderly).

There was a new nurse hired at the hospital my mom works at and she was Ethiopian. After a couple of weeks, their shifts overlapped, and they got to meet for the first time. When they greeted each other with a big hug and began speaking Amharic, my mom told me about how her friends were staring at them with their jaws dropped. They said, and I quote, “It’s almost as if they’re long-lost cousins.”

All of Ethiopia is rural, poor, and uneducated

Everyone, allow me to introduce you to Addis Ababa. The capital of Ethiopia. The above picture depicts the skyscraper center.

Despite having lots of rural parts, Ethiopia also has cities. Also, not all Ethiopians are “dirt poor.” Yes, there are lots of people who struggle, but there are families who are financially comfortable. However, the inflation rates are climbing.

Last point; education. Ethiopia is less than proficient, education-wise. In fact, the US is ranked “5 times more than Ethiopia”. There are some good schools, but it is understandably difficult for poor families to afford schooling.

All in all, Ethiopia is a beautiful, growing, country. I’m so proud to be Ethiopian and I love my culture.

Very Truly Yours,

Ruth Abebe

Makeda, the Queen of Sheeba.

A journey in search of knowledge.

The Queen of Sheba or Queen of the South, was in the Torah, the Old and New Testaments, the Koran, the history of Ethiopia and Yemen, a famous ruler of the ancient Kingdom of Sheba, the most powerful kingdom of Arabia Felix.

Although her origins are disputed, the Queen of Sheba is at the center of Ethiopian mythology. Her encounter with King Solomon three thousand years ago was legendary.

Its existence is documented in several texts, among them the Jewish Bible, the Koran, where the Queen is called Bilqis and an ancient Ethiopian document called "Kebre-Ngast where she is called Makeda and is even mentioned in the New Testament as the Queen of the South.

Her origin or where she came from remains largely unconsensual as Ethiopia and Yemen say she belongs to them.

But the meeting between the Queen and the King is reported in many traditional religious texts.

Where the legendary Queen went to meet Solomon with various gifts, including seven hundred and ninety-seven camels, spices, jewels and precious goods.

It really is a success story because it talks about love, union, friendship and thirst for knowledge.

The Queen's story continues to this day, as for many she is a symbol of beauty, love and peace and of someone who made an effort in search of knowledge.

As for Ethiopians, she is a real icon...

I believe that everyone who loves history is thirsty for knowledge.

How many enslaved Africans were taken to the lands that now make up the United States?

The researchers at the Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade Database, and other scholars have figured out that about 388,000 Africans were brought directly to what became the US between 1619 and 1808. That was when the international slave trade was outlawed. Only a few ships succeeded in smuggling in slaves after that. Scholars estimate that another 60,000 to 70,000 Africans were brought to the land area of United States after being brought to the Caribbean first. That makes a total of approximately 450,000 Africans who arrived in what became the United States over the course of the slave trade. 12.5 million Africans were shipped to the New World. About 10.7 million survived the Middle Passage. The largest group, 4.86 million, were taken to Brazil. The next largest group were taken to the Caribbean.

By 1810 there were 1.2 million slaves in the US. By 1820 there were 1.5 million. By 1830 there were 2 million slaves. By 1860 there were 3.9 million slaves.

What causes the Nile River to flow from South to North?

Fisheries Expertise, Aquaculturist, Technical Service Prompt Answered May 30, 2019

#The Nile River:

Rivers always flow downhill. It’s a common misconception that something about the earth forces most rivers to flow south. Plenty of rivers flow north, including the Nile, which gathers from high-elevation lakes in the African Rift Valley (Andrew Johnston, geographer, Center for Earth and Planetary Study, National Air and Space Museum).

The Nile flows north because north is downhill. Rivers flow "downhill" to sea level (generally speaking; some end in other bodies of water or join another rver). They flow with gravity from a higher elevation to a lower. The Nile rises on the western flank of the Great Rift Valley (many people consider Lake Victoria to be the source) and the Blue Nile joins the White Nile at Khartoum. The land falls away towards the north, thus the river flows north until it reaches the mediterranean Sea at the Nile Delta. Direction of flow of a river is determined by elevation of the drainage basin, not geographical (North, South etc). Nile - Wikipedia

Qui était Ménélik II ?/ Who was Menelik II?

Jerome Cohen Féru, mordu et l'eusses-tu-cruTraducteur · ven.
Danish Assistant Lecturer at New World College

Ménélik II, baptisé Sahle Maryam, a été empereur d'Éthiopie de 1889 à sa mort en 1913 et roi de Shewa de 1866 à 1889. Au sommet de son pouvoir interne et de son prestige externe, le processus d'expansion territoriale et de création de l'État-empire moderne est achevé en 1898.

Ménélik II (également écrit Menilek ; 1844-1913) devient empereur d'Éthiopie en 1889. Après la victoire de son armée sur les forces italiennes lors de la bataille d'Adwa (également appelée Adowa) en 1896, l'indépendance de l'Éthiopie a été reconnue par l'Italie et d'autres pays européens qui colonisaient l'Afrique.

L'idée principale de la biographie de Ménélik II est l'histoire de sa vie. La plupart des sources indiquent que, bien qu'aucun mariage n'ait eu lieu entre Haile Melekot et Woizero Ijigayehu, Sahle Selassie a ordonné la légitimation de son petit-fils.

En jouant d'abord l'Italie, la France et la Grande-Bretagne l'une contre l'autre (elles essayaient de s'emparer de l'Éthiopie), il a construit pendant ce temps un grand arsenal d'armes modernes. Lorsque l'Italie a avancé en Éthiopie, Ménélik II a déclaré la guerre et a réussi à vaincre les Italiens et à maintenir l'indépendance de l'Éthiopie.

If Ethiopia insists on constructing their huge dam on the Nile River, won't Egypt go to war with the Ethiopians because of being deprived of life-giving water?

Abdelrahman El-Ghawas

Egypt does not have a problem with building a dam in the Nile , the problem is how the dam will be filled Egypt wants it to be filled between 10–15 years however filling when there is flood and stop filling when there are dry times

Ethiopia keeps refusing because for many reasons

Like the Israeli-Qatar political pressure on Ethiopian Government about refusing the Egyptian terms of the how the filling Operation should be

Abi Ahmed wants to show off his skills that he is doing Maneuvers with Egypt and saying NO to the strongest country in Africa and Middle East to get votes in the next election , I don't blame him I blame who tells him don't worry the Egyptian will never strike the dam we got your back , you guessed them

However the people of Ethiopia have high hopes that once there is GERD on the Nile Ethiopia shall be rich like the USA , but no they have three dams on a river between them and Kenya and look at Kenya now , Agricultural lands Destroyed plus there was 1M Egyptian in Kenya the Egyptian government brought them back due to shortage in water in Kenya they want the same scenario to happen in Egypt , Well we are not Kenya , probably great israeli to hold Egypt from it's backbone , Even though Return to 2011 Egyptian Revolution suddenly they started working on the dam , which means everything was planned for and the equipment , workers and everything you need to build a dam was ready , we use this chaotic chance in Egypt and build our corrupted dam , however that doesn't work with us , The Egyptian sovereignty will not allow the infringement to it's Rights in the water accept the terms or no filling , Ethiopia fills the dam with no Egyptian Sudanese approval then they will face the consequences and we have the right to do so

End of Story

Will the Copts ever be accepted in Egypt?

Mohamed Emara · Follow Egyptian Sun

When Egyptians let go of this stupid notion that Islam in its core promotes Islamism, hence secularism is not against Islam!

Islam is a religion while Islamism is a political ideology that promotes Muslim chauvinism, and it dates back only to the 19th century. Early proponents of Islamism weren't extremists themselves. They wanted to use the common religious affiliations of Muslims as a means to mobilise the masses against European colonialism.

Ironically, this ideology which was supposed to safeguard the rights of the oppressed became a tool to opress minorities in the Muslim countries including Egypt.
Islamism doesn't necessarily mean the implementation of Sharia. Egypt was a secular country since it's independence in 1922 till 1971 when the government started pandering to radical Islamists to counter Nasserists and Leftists.

The image pair with relationship ID rId10 was not found in the file.

The Crescent and the Cross were often put together to symbolise the national unity during the popular uprising against British rule in 1919

During this period, religion was officially neutralized in the state; however, Muslims never abandoned Sharia nonetheless. While religion was separated from governing, the personal status laws were based on Islamic laws. This system worked perfectly fine until the 70's when the attitude of average Egyptian Muslims shifted and Islamism (Muslim chauvinism) became popular. That is when the sufferings of Copts started.

Nowadays, Islamism as an ideology has been discredited in the eyes of most Egyptians with the South being an exception. The status of minorities would significantly improve as soon as the rest of the country follows suit. How to accelerate this process? By educating the people on the importance of tolerance and accepting others.

Sherif Gamal ElDin , former ASIC Design Engineer at Qualcomm (2015-2016) Answered Jan 15, 2019

I am not sure what this question implies.

Copts are the descendants of Ancient Egyptians, they sometimes were mixed with Greeks & Romans during the Greco-Roman period but generally speaking, they have to a great extent preserved their ethnicity.

They are a subsect of Eastern Orthodox but are autonomois and do not follow the Russian Church, they have their own pope. The pope of Alexandria.

That being said, the Copts have lived 1400 years alongside Muslims ever since Islam entered Egypt, the Muslims helped them get rid of the Romans at the begining, then a lot of Copts converted over hundreds of years to Islam for variois reasons, they constitute about 10% of the population now and are a fundamental part of the Egyptian society despite being a minority.

Just like the Jews when they lived in Egypt, the Copts have certain professions which they are more prominant in, such as Jewlery, Trading, Banking etc. They are an integral part of the society and a very productive part too.

From the Muslim pov, they are Christians and usually Muslims avoid conflicts with Christians and/or Jews if possible, so they cooperate well together, in fact they live in the same neighborhoods except for certain areas. Of course there are fundamentals on both sides who stir trouble once in a while but generally speaking, most Muslims of Egypt are easy going. There are some incidents that occur which can irritate Copts but those are usually triggered by fundamentalist groups not by mainstream Egyptian Muslims.

Die to the fact that Copts are a minority, they are very sensitive to any small act of discrimination that may occur, but not as sensitive as Jews in Europe during Medieval eras.

I hope thay answers your question.

THUNDERSTORM LIEUTENANT GENERAL JAGAMA KELLO

also known as ‘the Thunderstorm’

Lieutenant General Jagama Kelo, also known by his nickname as ‘the Thunderstorm’ is an Ethiopian patriot, freedom fighter, and a war hero during the Italian aggression. Following Italian aggression on Ethiopia in 1935 GC, Jagama decided to join the resistance movement and fight for independence of his country.

He was only 15 years old at the time. He started his patriotism without a gun or a follower. However, his elder brother had a rifle to fight the Italians. The two brothers with just one weapon ambushed the Italian troops and gradually armed themselves. They were joined by other peasants in the struggle, and at the age of only 18, Jagama had more than 3000 fighters at his command. Jagama Kelo was born on January 29, 1920 in Ginichi, Oromia region. A son of a wealthy landlord, Jagama lost his mother when he was only one year old. His father also passed away a little after Jagama turned ten years old. An orphan at a very young age, Jagama was raised by his uncle and trustee, Aba Doyo Wami.

As a child Jagama was impressed by the heroic tales of his ancestors especially that of his great grandfather Godana Nemo. Godana was warrior, and legend has it that his presence only got his enemies trembled, and he killed everyone he fought with.

When Italians once again tried to colonize Ethiopia, at the age of only 15 years old at the time, Jagama did not hesitate to join the resistance movement and put his mark in Ethiopian struggle for independence. Jagama says he was inspired by his ancestors, their determination never to compromise their independence and freedom. On May 1936, The Italian forces, under the command of General Rudolf Graziani and Pietro Badogilo tried to control Addis Ababa. The resistance movement by the patriots (Arbegnoch) made the Italian’s five years stay agitated and troubled. The young patriot Jagama Kelo was one of those war heroes.

and then again as a leading collaborator during the Fascist occupation from 1936 to 1941.

In 1895 the Italians lured Lij Gugsa Darge, son of Ras Darge Sahle Selassie from his school in Switzerland into Italy. They persuaded him to betray his country and stand with Italy. The Italians promised Lij Gugsa that after they defeated his cousin Menelik II, they would place him on Menelik's throne and make him

Emperor. They were helped in convincing Gugsa that this would be a good idea by Afework Gebreyesus, then a student in Italy who was another person who would become famous for repeated betrayal of his country. When Menelik II marched north from Addis Ababa to confront the Italian invasion, he left his uncle Ras Darge Sahle Selassie as Regent in his abscence. The Italians hoped that they could turn Ras Darge against his nephew by revealing to him that his son was on their side and that they would place him on the Imperial throne. However the senior prince of the House of Shewa was not what the Italians thought he would be. Ras Darge not only remained loyal to his Emperor and his country, he also disowned his son and had his name blotted from the family genealogy. The Italians were crushed at Adwa and Lij Gugsa lost everything, his family, his country, and every shred of respect he could have once expected as a member of the Imperial dynasty. He is barely a footnote in most histories of the era. He died an exile, forgotten and unmourned.

Afe-Qesar Afework Gebreyesus in the picture below was another figure of betrayal. His betrayal was repeated. Sent to Italy in his youth for higher education he became deeply enamored with that land to the point that his loyalties to his homeland were compromised. While is is well known for his formidable contribution to Amharic literature, all that is stained by his repeated disloyalty. His first act as stated was helping to pursuade Lij Gugsa Darge to betray his country and his family and join the Italians in the hopes of gaining the throne. When Italy invaded Ethiopia and brought Gugsa with them, Afework accompanied him as his aide de camp. However, after the Ethiopian victory Afework abandoned Gugsa to his own devices and managed to squeeze his way back into favor by exploiting familial ties to Empress Taitu via her mother. Taitu however soon developed a distaste for him (she did not particularly respect Ethiopians who became overly westernized in their clothing and lifestyles) and his refusal to marry a bride she had suggested and instead marrying an Italian woman further alienated her from him. The final straw was when she entrusted him with a significant sum of money to purchase religious paintings in Italy for St. Mary’s Church at Entoto. When the paintings arrived they were far below the quality that the Empress expected and she was convinced that he had purchased cheap paintings in order to pocket the rest of her money. There was a terrible scene and Taitu is said to have cursed him saying she wished he would be crucified. He left Ethiopia vowing never to return while she lived. Ironically he wrote a poem extolling her virtues when she died in order to play up his blood ties to her in his efforts to be rehabilitated. He had already written praises of Lij Iyasu in that effort, and then when Lij Iyasu fell, he wrote even more fulsome praises of Empress Zewditu and the Regent Ras Tafari. He was rehabilitated by Ras Tafari (Emperor Haile Selassie) who was eager to use the few western educated Ethiopians in his modernization drive. However a leopard doesn’t change its spots. Afework Gebreyesus still loved Italy and eagerly latched onto the fascists when they invaded in 1935. He became a devoted collaborator and was even given the title of Afe-Qesar (the fascist equivalent to Afenegus as the King of Italy used Qesar or Caesar instead of Negus as his claimed title as Emperor of Ethiopia). Upon the liberation of Ethiopia from occupation Afework Gebreyesus was convicted of treason and sentenced to life imprisonment. He died under house arrest in Jimma a few years later.

Why is Egypt strongly opposed against the Ethiopian Great Renaissance Dam?

Mohamed Emara Follow Lives in Alexandria, Egypt Tue

Egypt doesn't oppose the GERD. Egypt fears the catastrophic consequences of unilaterally filling the dam in a short span of time before reaching a legally binding agreement that would safeguard the water rights of everyone.

The country is already suffering from a severe water scarcity and an annual water deficit of 7 billion cubic metres.[1]

Desert makes up to 96% of Egypt's total area with 95% of the population living in the Nile Valley and Delta, an area that forms a grand total of only 3.5% of the country's total land area.

The Nile is the life artery of Egypt. Without it, we fall into oblivion. All we ask for is the signing of an agreement.

Is that hard to comprehend? that would regulate the operation and management of the dam so that no one gets harmed

Cyrke Stuffl former Currently a Retired Boomer at Home at Hospitals (1979-2009) Answered Feb 20

Before such an intervention, cultivated states agree on the future operation, water sharing, and water quality. In doing so, the rights already acquired must also be taken into account.

It would be a good idea to negotiate this agreement and put the result into a contract, because there have been a lot of wars in history over the unilateral withdrawal of water!

Egypt and Sudan say they are filling the reservoir for the second time at the Ethiopian Dam (GERD), which is not only contrary to a 2015 agreement but a "existential threat" to 150 million people living in the lower reaches of Africa's largest river.

The draft decision proposed by Tunisia would call on Egypt, Sudan and Ethiopia to conclude within six months, under the auspices of the African Union, a legally binding agreement "guaranteeing Ethiopia's right to electricity from hydropower (...) while preventing significant damage to the water security of the states in the lower reaches ".

It is not known why the AU, as a conciliation forum, does not meet, why contact the Security Council immediately!

Ah yes it's that time of the year were we keep speaking about the DAM and Ethiopians all over the internet keeps picturing Egypt as an evil power who is against African Development meanwhile it only takes few minutes to search for Egyptian Development projects and aid in African Countries
Egypt isn't against an Ethiopian Development , Egypt wants Ethiopia to develop but not on our share

Egypt is against the solo actions by Ethiopia and violating Principles Agreement that they signed it in 2015 which indicates that all three countries must cooperate together without doing any solo actions

On the other hand Ethiopia doesn't respect international law or any treaties or agreements

Ethiopia thinks that the Nile is for them only and Egypt and Sudan should pay money to Ethiopia allow them to have share from the Nile

Ethiopia doesn't recognize the share of Egypt and Sudan in the Nile and they want to do a repartition for the Nile Shares

Ethiopia gives false information last year they said they will fill the dam About 13 billion cubic meters of water so Sudan took precautions and filled its dam to be ready for drought but Ethiopia gave false info and only filled 2 billion so Sudan released the amount of water that they holded causing floods in Sudan

Colonisation was done in a guest to prove that, Africans were not normal human beings, Africans that needed to be civilised by whites, Europeans sees us as animals,

Our corrupt leaders collaborates this thoughts, when your leaders in Africa treats you as animals , what do you inspect from foreigners??

But we are lucky because our children in diaspora are outsmarting their European peers, so the whole eugenic thoughts about us was erroneous,

When you give a blackman equal opportunity for human development, we thrive and get higher. Pan africanism is the answer.

The day 02–03–2022 is going to be a national holiday for Ethiopia as the nation commemorates the victory of Adwa. The battle of Adwa was fought in 1896 between the Italian and Ethiopian empires. The aim of Italy was to annex Ethiopia into the Italian empire. The victory of Adwa is the only African victory over Western powers that would result official global recognition of a native African state.

Few years ago, Ethiopian singer and songwriter Teddy Afro made a mini movie for the song he made about the battle. The mini movie was the most expensive in the history Ethiopian music. His goal was to remind the upcoming generations the price paid by our fathers to maintain the sovereignty of our country.

I believe Africans must continue the quest to develop their own entertainment industry so that they can use it to tell the world genuinely African stories. I get really upset when Black people are cast to represent characters from European history (like depicting Elizabeth II as a black woman, and others). Hollywood, the most dominant entertainment industry in the world, is not fully prepared yet to show genuinely African stories to the world. It also does not have to, as it is an American industry which aims to depict America positively to the global audience.

Therefore African nations must use entertainment to teach youth their history. If a poor nation like Ethiopia tried to do that there is no reason other African nations can not do the same. Artists in countries such as Sudan, Ghana, Kenya, Mali etc… can make music videos or films about the challenges their countries posed for Western colonialists.

This humiliation had to have been on the minds of Italians when they took with Mussolini in his rise to power. He was no doubt reared to some extent of this disgrace, and when in power, the opportunity would eventually present itself when Ethiopia and Haile Selassie came into the spotlight in the early 1930s.

The British Army was defeated by the Zulus, the Sudanese , the Mahdi in Somalia and others. The French and Italians also suffered major losses. The problem was the vengeance was terrible, brutal and disproportionate. The Italians killed over half the males in Eastern Libya under Mussolini and resorted to using banned chemical weapons a few decades after your post to finally defeat the Ethiopians.

Les hyènes peuvent-elles être domestiquées ? / Can hyenas be domesticated?

Gary Meaney , animal lover and carnivore zoologist Answered Mar 2, 2019

In the walled town of Harar, Ethiopia, the locals have a curious and starkly unique relationship with local spotted hyenas.

Dans la ville fortifiée de Harar, en Éthiopie, les habitants entretiennent une relation curieuse et singulièrement unique avec les hyènes tachetées locales.

Il existe actuellement deux points d'alimentation en hyènes que les touristes peuvent visiter, dans les sanctuaires d'Aw Sofi et d'Aw Aboker. (J'ai entendu dire que ce dernier est plus formel, plus touristique et, dans une certaine mesure, plus artificiel). À ces endroits, les «hommes à hyène» jettent des restes de viande à des hyènes sauvages qui s'y sont habituées et se rendent aux lieux de l'alimentation tous les soirs.

Sur les lieux de repas Aboker, les visiteurs peuvent même demander aux hyènes de leur tirer de la viande de la bouche.

Cette tradition, qui a débuté il y a une soixantaine d'années, n'est en aucun cas une attraction touristique. La nuit, de nombreux bouchers Harari jettent leurs restes dans les rues devant des hyènes en attente, sans touristes en vue. On dit que les hyènes de Harar sont spéciales (et c'est pourquoi elles se comportent si paisiblement), car elles sont devenues des vaisseaux à travers lesquels on peut communiquer avec des saints. On pense également qu'elles mangent les démons malveillants - des djinns - et lorsqu'une hyène attaque un humain, c'est parce que cette personne est possédée par lui.

Ensuite, il y a ce festival annuel appelé Ashura, qui se tient sur une colline en dehors de la ville. Trois monticules de porridge sont disposés sur une large pierre plate et les préposés attendent que les hyènes sortent et le mangent. C’est un peu comme la version Harari du jour de la marmotte - si les hyènes mangent la majeure partie de la bouillie mais en laisse un peu, l’année à venir sera prospère. Si elles mangent tout, il y aura la famine, et si elles mangent peu, la guerre.

Quoi qu'il en soit, pratiquement tous les habitants de Harar adorent les hyènes, à tel point que si une hyène tue un de leurs animaux, beaucoup s'en prennent à eux-mêmes en se disant qu'ils n'avaient pas suffisamment nourri les hyènes. Si seulement les éleveurs avaient cette attitude envers les loups.

De même, les hyènes se sont complètement habituées aux traditions locales et ont très peu peur des gens, en particulier des gens qu’elles connaissent bien. Les chiens ont probablement été domestiqués en commençant par manger des restes humains - ce qui est intéressant, comme ce qui se passe à Harar.

Si ce rituel devait se poursuivre pendant des siècles, je pourrais facilement voir des hyènes tachetées devenir un animal domestique. Les individus les plus habitués sont ceux qui ont le plus de chances de venir chercher de la nourriture et d’obtenir un avantage sélectif. Ainsi, avec le temps, elles se familiariseront de plus en plus avec les humains jusqu’à ce qu'elles deviennent pratiquement des chiens.

The answer is no.

The image part with relationship ID rId12 was not found in the file.

Despite their appearance as dogs, hyenas are not actually canines. They're more related to felines – in fact, they're the closest relatives of mongooses!

You read right: mongooses!

Fun fact: despite their looks as dogs as well as their dog-like behavior (supreme intelligence, incredible stamina, inability to climb trees, strong jaws and bite-force), hyenas have cat-like traits, such as the tongue – you see, hyena tongue (see above), much like cat tongue, is as rough as sandpaper, covered with small, hook-shaped growth called papillae, which point toward the back of the mouth, and resemble a rough surface filled with thousands of tiny teeth that have the touch of a hairbrush. They're sort of like hairs because they're made of keratin, the exact same protein our fingernails are made from.

I know this because a game-ranger named Kim Wolhuter (see below) once said on Nat Geo Wild that when a hyena licked him, it was not soft like a dog's tongue, but rather rough like a cat's.

To sum it all up, since hyenas of all kind are not canines, it would be totally impossible for a hyena to breed with our pooch.

How come lions don't eat hyenas after killing them?
Serge Elia , Animal lover Answered Feb 11, 2018

For a lion, a hyena won't actually be much of a well-earned meal or a snack craved for, even if the cat was starving at the height of the dry season – as a matter of fact, hyena flesh isn't really that nutritious; so if a lion did kill a hyena, it wouldn't gain much from eating it, for hyena flesh is indeed unlikely to provide the promise of food.

But still, lions – especially males – regularly kill hyenas without necessarily eating them, mainly because of dietary overlap. Sure enough, lions see hyenas, as well as other predators in the African savanna, as huge competitors for food, territory and life, and therefore seek to eliminate them whenever possible, since the cats, being Africa's top predators, have no tolerance for competition.

The Former Duerg Executive Council Member And EPLF Member Captain Michael Gebredengle Haile Visits Hoover Archives

By Issayas Tesfamariam Tuesday, March 13, 2018

On Friday, March 9, Hoover Archives hosted a visit by Captain Michael G. Haile, one of the former executive committee (standing Committee) members of the military junta known as the Derg which ruled Ethiopia from 1974 to 1987. The Derg, also known as the Coordinating Committee of the Armed Forces, Police and Territorial Army, overthrew Haile Selassie, the former Emperor of Ethiopia.

Haile served the Derg for seven months in 1974–75 and then left to join the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) in 1975. From 1975–1991 he served the EPLF in various capacities: as the Foreign Economic Affairs in Kuwait and Rome; the Foreign Relations Bureau in Brussels and London; and EPLF representative at the U.N. Commission for Human Rights in Geneva.

After Eritrea's independence in 1991 he became the Deputy Commissioner of the Eritrean Police Force. Currently, he is working for the Eritrean Ministry of Justice as coordinator and member of the Law Drafting Committee.

While in the Derg, Capt. Haile was the only person (out of 108 Derg members) who kept notes of everything that went on during his tenure, including the infamous meeting ("Vote of Death") whereby sixty people (Emperor Haile Selassie's Government officials, two Derg members and, the Chairman of the Derg, Lt. General Aman M. Andom) were condemned to death by voting.

As a police officer (trained in Israel in the 1960s), a criminologist (trained in West Germany in the 1960s–70s), and a lawyer, he was the only Derg member who vehemently objected in writing to the illegality, cruelty, and inhumanity of that infamous day's process. Lt. Col. Mengistu Hailemariam (who later became a leader of Ethiopia until he escaped in 1991 to Zimbabwe, where he still resides) who chaired the “infamous meeting” of the Derg read Captain Haile’s letter of objection during the “Vote of Death”; Captain Haile’s life was perhaps spared due only to the fact that Hailemariam did not reveal the name of the letter’s author.

Captain Haile has visited Hoover three times to view collections related to Africa; during his most recent visit he consulted the papers of Tom Killion, which contain a series of interviews Captain Haile conducted in 1985. Haile has just published a book entitled Downfall of an Emperor: Haile Selassie of Ethiopia and the Derg's Creeping Coup, a first-hand account of the inner workings of the first seven months of the Derg.

Lt. General Aman M. Andom was not a member of the Duerg but was appointed by Duerg members to be their symbolic chairman.

What happened in the Ethiopian-Somali war? Why did the Soviet Union stop helping Somalia?

Kevin Richardson · Follow PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Sat

It’d help if you could clarify exactly what you’re looking for — if you want specifics on the operational side of the war, I can elaborate, but for now, I’ll explain the circumstances of the war.

Ethiopia-Somalia relations were a problem from the end of WW2. Ethiopia’s eastern regions consist of the sparsely populated Somali-majority Ogaden region and are a legacy of the first Italo-Ethiopian war.

Although the Italians would restructure Ethiopia’s borders during the occupation period, including Ogaden in Italian Somalia, the decision was made post-WW2 to return Ethiopia to its pre-war borders and award Italian Eritrea to Ethiopia with some special stipulations on governing it.

In the period leading up to Somali independence, the British hoped to forge a workable national identity among the population of the now merged Italian and British Somalilands by fostering Somali nationalism. This somewhat worked in the short term (although the same clan-based conflicts that plague Somalia to this day would wrack the country in its early years), but it created a problematic situation, as large Somali populations existed in neighboring Ogaden, Djibouti, and Kenya. When Mohamed Siad Barre came to power in Somalia after a coup in 1969, he would leverage Somali nationalism and irredentist sentiment to secure his position. His nominally left-wing government turned to the Soviets for aid, and the Soviets were happy to oblige, providing a great amount of military aid in return for the creation of a naval base at the strategically important northern port of Berbera. Barre, in turn, used this military aid to further irredentist ends, sponsoring rebel groups in neighboring Kenya and Ethiopia.

This whole time, the regime of Haile Selassie in Ethiopia had been slowly losing its grip due to Selaissie’s advancing age and refusal to delegate powers to more competent subordinates. Despite the warning of a failed coup in 1961, Selassie continued on with a variety of policies that would lead to unrest in his highly diverse domain, culminating in a successful coup in 1974. Like Somalia, this coup was also performed by left-leaning officers who established their own military government known as the Derg. The collapse of the imperial regime and subsequent power struggle among left-wing and ethnically-based groups in Ethiopia would lead to a slew of human rights abuses that rapidly alienated the US government (who up to this point had sponsored Ethiopia), while the Soviets jumped at the chance to gain another left-wing ally in the strategically important Horn of Africa. Leveraging Cuban support, the Soviets and Cubans worked to reconcile Ethiopia and Somalia to create a Soviet-aligned federation.

Unfortunately for the Soviets, Cubans, and most of all, Ethiopians, Siad Barre had no intention of following through with any reconciliation. Barre watched the rapidly deteriorating situation in Ethiopia and gambled that the time was ripe to seize Ogaden before Soviet support had really taken hold in Ethiopia. Unfortunately for Barre, the gamble didn't pay off. Fidel Alejandro Castro Ruz was reportedly furious to hear about the invasion, as he had been working hard to convince Ethiopia and Somalia to form a federation, and the Soviets began to slow their aid to Somalia in hopes of convincing Barre to withdraw. The Soviet supplies slowed to a trickle and finally stopped just as Somali forces got bogged down on Ethiopian opposition short of their main strategic objectives, so Barre gambled once more.

In a desperate attempt to find a new source of supply for his war, Barre ejected the Soviets from the country. Around 2,000 Soviet naval personnel, their families and all Soviet citizens were given 48 hours to leave the country and their recently completed naval base at Berbera. The hope was that shutting down this controversial base would gain the support of the US and other anti-Soviet nations (Yugoslavia, Communist China, and some Arab states). Unfortunately, the US wasn't particularly keen on supporting a country waging an unprovoked war of aggression, and other countries with fewer qualms on the matter lacked the means to get the supplies to Somalia as fast as they needed it.

Unsurprisingly, the Soviets were less than enthused by this. They threw their full weight behind Ethiopia, launching their largest airlift and sealift effort since WW2. Planes were landing in Addis Ababa as fast as they could be pulled off the runways, weapons and aircraft were diverted from Yemen and other Eastern Bloc states to Ethiopia, and 50,000 Cubans were flown in to fight on the front.

Months of preparation followed, and the Ethiopian/Cuban force launched their counterattack — coincidentally, on the same day, the Somalis tried to renew their offensive. The now hopelessly outmatched Somalis were halted almost immediately and thrown back from their positions. The Ethiopians led the front, pushing the Somalis back to a rear base at Jijiga. From there, the Cubans airlifted men and armor around the rear of the Somali positions (marking the only airborne armored assault in history) and the Somalis were routed. From there, the remainder of the war was mopping-up actions to chase the remaining Somali forces out of their country.

If you're interested in learning more about the war and the Ethiopian Civil War as a whole, I'd recommend checking out The Ethiopian Revolution: War in the Horn of Africa by Gebru Tareke. It's largely centered on the Ethiopian perspective and takes a broader look at the Ethiopian Civil War, but it's by far the best resource I've found on the matter.

Gebru Tareke also has something published on the war, more specifically — The Ethiopia-Somalia War of 1977 Revisited — but I haven't read it myself, so I can't vouch for how it compares to the book about the revolution.

For the Islamic era, the region had three major centers of gravity: Aksum/Ethiopia, the Swahili settlement at Mogadishu, and the Sultanate of Adal and its precursors (later). Histories of Ethiopia are fairly easy to get at; for the others, you have some first-hand accounts (like Ibn Battuta's; boy he hated Zeila, the major seaport of Adal), but you also have essays in Levtzion and Pouwels, The History of Islam in Africa (2000), which gives you a tremendous amount of information from exceptionally well-regarded scholars on those areas. Paul Henze's 2004 Layers of Time may be the newest general history of Ethiopia in the first edition, but I'm happy to be wrong.

Fortunately, for all of those regions, we have some documentation; literate communities existed everywhere, and although original material in Ge'ez has huge gaps (for Aksum and Ethiopia), we can piece together a lot.

Would the people of the Afar tribe from East Africa have dressed the same 5,000 years ago as they do now?

Michael Gavi , B.A History, University of Oxford (2007) Answered Oct 12, 2019

Actually human beings degraded in technology over years. The ancient people who were there 5000 years ago were more advanced socially, politically and economically. The pyramids were built by that generation before the global flood. That generation were many times intellectually smarter than current generation, gained much knowledge from corrupt fallen angels. However, that generation was very violent against each other, they would rape and kill each other at will, the world was filled with violence. God actually regretted that he created human beings, a great flood was sent, the whole world was destroyed, it rained for 40 days and 40 nights. The rain came from below, from the portals of the earth, just like geysers, it also came from the above, the flood gates of Heaven were opened. The earth has never rained before from above, that is why that generation didn't believe Noah when he warned them about pending disaster, it took Noah up to 100 years to complete the ark. The water actually covered 6 foot above Mount Everest, it was a terrible incident, Noah and his wife, his three sons and their wives were spared because they were commanded to build an ark by Great God and they obeyed, they settled close to somewhere around Turkey after the deluge. It took almost a year for the earth to dry up. Human beings were judged at that point with short life by the Great God, 70 years - 80 max to live on Earth, before the flood, man used to live for 900 years or even more.

God started afresh with Noah and his children, Sham, Ham and Japhet, it was only one language spoken by then. They were commanded to spread out but refused, this was after many years food had passed, the had eventually populated the Earth. They decided to stay in a place called Shinah, formerly called Babylon now Iraq, they built a huge tower, I guess many miles upwards, taller than the World Trade Center, it was spiral, made of bricks and bitumen. That generation was in unity, very advanced technologically far much more than the current generation, under one King Nimrod, the descendant of Cush, however very rebellious to the Great God. God came down to see their building called the Tower of Babel, it was built solely for demon worship. Their language was confounded and were scattered to various parts of the world as judgement. Man lost their language, started speaking different languages and misunderstandings was there among man. The tower was never completed, man was scattered and according to Bible in the table of nations 70 languages were formed as a result. Children of Ham now Africans went Southwards in mostly Africa in Egypt, Sudan and along the Great Lakes. Children of Shem (Persians, Jews & some Arabs) stayed in the Middle East, Japhet (All Europeans, Gog and Magog) went upwards. Cannan last born of Ham refused to go downwards and stayed in Middle East, in Israel.

So to sum up your question,'man were much more advanced and civilized as I have explained above, Africa was more advanced than what you see now. It was after the Tower of Babel that a lot of technology was lost, some mathematics skills were lost, physics skills and ideas lost, geometry skills were lost. Human beings are still struggling to catch up with what was lost up to now.So most definitely the clothes they wear might have been different.

Title: Illuminated manuscript in Ge'ez on vellum. Publisher: Ethiopia, late 18th century.

The journal Northeast African Studies headed by Jonathan Miran now (author of Red Sea Citizens, which is a bit more modern than you want to be, I think) gets a lot of this material from scholars in the region too. So we know the major political formations, the shifting state entities, and sometimes even fairly fine detail about the spread of religion and syncretization of culture. For example, we know that Mogadishu used to be right at the joining point of transhumant pastoralist Afrasan Somali cultures and agropastoral Bantu-speaking ones, which was part of its strength; it was on a fertile plain with a good harbor, so everyone gained until changing conditions pushed the farmers south.

Further back (circa 1st century AD and before), our information is very sketchy and speculative.

The land of Punt is believed to have been located in this area (Eritrean/Djibouti coast), based on accounts of what Egyptians traded (Ivory, Hippo tusks, baboons, incense) as well as not-very-precise directions inscribed on a monument commemorating Queen Hatshepsut's commissioning an expedition to Punt.

From the 9th century to the 5th century, we have some few inscriptions in a proto-Ge'ez alphabet of land called "D'mt" or maybe Damot (early Ge'ez, like ancient Aramaic does not note vowel sounds, so linguists have to speculatively reconstruct words sometimes). The capitol of D'mt has been located in Tigray province of Eritrea, and the kingdom follows the Red Sea coast. Unfortunately, so far, there has been only little archaeological work for this region and time, so what we know is still quite limited.

The picture starts getting much clearer around the 1st century AD, when we see reference to the Kingdom of Aksum in the Roman geography work Periplus of the Erythrean sea. Then, in the 4th century, the Negus of Axum is converted to Christianity by the missionary Frumentius (Aba Salama). We also begin seeing coinage minted by Axum with greek inscriptions in this time period.

By the 6th century AD, Aksum exists as a quasi-ally of the Byzantine empire. Sassanid tolerance of Judaism and their influence in modern-day Oman makes the presence of the Jewish king Dhū Nuwās of the Himyarite kingdom (modern Yemen) unacceptable, and the Axumite forces invaded southern Arabia in the 520s, with armies marching all the way to Mecca in 560 (if traditional Arab sources are to be believed).

With the rise of Islam, the kingdom of Axum soon found itself at odds. There are references to early Axumite raids on Arabian ports in the lifetime of Muhammad, and a major raid on Jeddah in 702. In response, Arab forces began a settlement on the Dahlak islands off the coast of Adulis, Axum's largest port, and subsequently, Axum became much less involved in the Red Sea trade, becoming landlocked.

With the disruption of trade, Axumite wealth dwindled, and communities that had been previously incorporated into the Axum Empire began to revolt, most notably Agaw-speaking people of the north. Certain of these Agaw speaking families would be co-opted to fight against their more rebellious colleagues. Eventually, one of these families would seize the royal throne as the Zagwe ("of Agaw") dynasty. The Zagwe dynasty ruled from about 900-1270 AD. As I noted above, the rise of the Zagwe dynasty introduces a contentious debate about Axum-Ethiopian cultural continuity. From about 900 onward, we begin to speak of Ethiopia.

UNESCO covers this time period from 700-1100 AD for Ethiopia quite thoroughly in their General History of Africa vol III chapters 19 and 20.

Also, I am glad to see that Annales d'Ethiope has been opened to the public for free. Lots of information on what some recent digs in Ethiopia are turning up.

That turned out to be a bit longer than I intended, and I didn't even cover the Muslim states.

At the same time as the Zagwe dynasty was declining in Ethiopia, circa 1300, Muslim influence was spreading from the coast inland to what is now Somaliland, and the Sultanate of Ifat took shape. There is evidence of Muslim presence in Shewa (the province Addis Ababa is in) in the 9th century, and Ifat would absorb Shewa by 1300.

The Ifat Sultanate and Solomonic dynasty Ethiopia would fight for most of the Sultanate's short history, and the last Ifat sultan would die in battle in 1415.

Out of the ashes of the Ifat sultanate rose the Agaw Sultanate, of roughly the same region. The Adal had more tremendous success against Ethiopia in the Ethiopian-Adal War along with Ottoman aid.

Over on the coast of East Africa, as many others have stated, Muslim colonization led to the development of many trading cities on the Swahili Coast. In Somalia, the region was governed under the Sultanate of Mogadishu from the 900s until the late 1600s.

In the history of the Swahili coast, one major area of debate has been the degree to which cities like Mombasa, Mogadishu and Kilwa arise because of Arab and Persian immigration and architectural styles. This is part of the more extensive debate over the respective contributions of Arab vs. Bantu cultures infusing to make Swahili culture. The oldest scholarship (and the oral histories of elite Swahili families) tended to stress the role of Arab immigration. However, the trend in the academic community has been to recognize that there did exist trading villages built by Africans on the coast, that they were there when the first Arab and Persian migrants arrived. This is part of the larger trend in putting more emphasis on the Bantu-speakers' contributions (to language, social structure, customs, etc.).

The Mogadishu sultanate was also notable for having a conspicuous Sufi presence starting in the fifteenth century. As an aside, with the recent rise to power of the Al-Shabab militia and they're instituting their interpretation of Sharia, there were numerous instances of desecration of tombs of Sufi saints for being "un-Islamic".

The Mogadishu sultanate continued to be a trading center even after the arrival of the Portuguese in the Indian ocean, but Portuguese military efforts (mainly directed against Oman but also targeting Mogadishu) led to disruptions in the Indian Ocean Trade. At the same time, the Ajuuraan state was gaining in strength in the Jubba and Shebelle river valleys throughout the 1500s and would annex Mogadishu by the end of the 1600s.

The Ajuuraan Sultanate, arising in the context of Portuguese control of Indian Ocean Trade, and their military hostility, regarded itself as a successor to the Ifat an Agaw states of northern Somalia in being militant defenders of Islam in the Horn of Africa.

By the 1700s, Portuguese military pressure would cause the collapse of the Ajuuraan Sultanate into several more diminutive successor states. However, we are starting to hit up against the period of colonization, so I will stop here.

If Egypt were to destroy the GERD dam on the Blue Nile in Ethiopia with the intentions of guaranteeing water flow, which Ethiopia is building for essential electricity infrastructure, what is to stop Ethiopia from inexpensively simply rerouting it?

Ned Ford Former Volunteer Conservation Chair (1982–2019) 1y

I know next to nothing about the specifics. I'd suggest however, that if people are looking for peaceful solutions they explore the potential for using solar power to provide what the dam is expected (and more). A recent U.S. study found that solar prices are now so low that all the hydropower in the U.S. can be replaced with solar panels occupying only 13% of the land covered with water impoundments, and the cost of the power is lower too.

Egypt might find that some assistance to Ethiopia in purchasing or installing the solar or developing appropriate electricity storage might be cheaper than acts of war.

Here's an article summarizing the study. Solar power could replace all US hydro dams using 'just 13% of the space'

Here's the actual study. Solar-power replacement as a solution for hydropower foregone in US dam removals

I'm not able to confirm the results of the study independently, but from what I know of this sort of thing, the study is very well done (using actual local costs for each dam and actual local solar potential is a step many similar analyses often skip). Their results are not surprising to me as someone who knows a lot about electricity prices from different fuels. Hydropower has an image of being "free" but the sorts of locations which really capture good cheap production of hydropower are not common, and depend on a lot of fall with very small spaces needing to be dammed.

Wind power plus solar power is inevitably cheaper than solar power alone, if you have enough wind to be worth capturing. Since modern wind turbines have hub heights above 150 meters, it isn't possible to estimate wind potential without doing a real study. Lower levels may seem still when upper air is moving quite well.

According to a quick internet search Ethiopian electricity costs are nearly identical to U.S. averages, so this should be pretty relevant. The cost of wind and solar technology dropped about 40% in late 2017, making both resources cheaper than most other forms of generation just about everywhere in the world.

Who has the right over the Nile River? Is Egypt being selfish for not supporting the Dam Ethiopia building?

Mohamed Abdel-Maksoud , An Egyptian citizen for 3+ decades.

Let us first have the numbers do the talking:

Egypt's main source of freshwater is the Nile River. The river supplies 56.8 billion m³ of freshwater every year, which represents 97% of all renewable water resources in Egypt. (…) Egypt is classified as a water scarce country as it has less than 1000 m³ of fresh water per year per capita. Furthermore, it is forecasted that in 2025 the population will reach 95 million, which would mean a per capita share of only 600 m³ per year.

Water supply and sanitation in Egypt - Wikipedia

On the other hand:

Ethiopia has 12 river basins with an annual runoff volume of 122 billion m3 of water and an estimated 2.6 - 6.5 billion m3 of ground water potential. This corresponds to an average of 1,575 m3 of physically available water per person per year, a relatively large volume.

Water supply and sanitation in Ethiopia - Wikipedia

All Egypt has been asking is to pace the filling of the water store behind the The Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam such that its already-scarce share of water will not be affected. Needless to say that water is life. It is never selfish to defend one's life.

Responding to the argument I read a lot "Egypt should buy water from Ethiopia just like other countries buy petroleum from Arabs": What happens if you cannot buy oil? your industry slows down, you go through economic hardship. What happens if you cannot buy water? you die. So no, water is not the same as oil.

If Ethiopia insists on constructing their huge dam on the Nile River, won't Egypt go to war with the Ethiopians because of being deprived of life-giving water?

Mulualem Waju, lives in Ethiopia Updated May 29, 2020

A layman here: I am not an expert on the issue, but I don’t think one needs to be to understand that hydroelectric dams DO NOT consume water.

Once the Nile water hits turbines it flows downwards to Sudan and Egypt. The only time for a decrease in water is when the dam is filled.

Right now Ethiopia, Egypt and Sudan are negotiating on how many years the dam should be filled in; an international team of technical experts is looking over the issue.

So, the significance of the influence of the dam on downstream countries- including Egypt - depends on the length of time it takes to fill the dam; the shorter the time the more significant the impact.
Once the dam is filled to its capacity, the regular flow of the river will be restored without any impact on Egypt after that. In fact, the dam could be beneficial to down stream countries by ensuring a regular flow of water; no frequent floods. The point is, Egypt will not be “deprived” of the Nile water. Hence, waging a war against Ethiopia doesn’t make sense at all.

Egypt's 'Lost Dream' of Linking Congo, Nile Rivers

Linking the Nile to the Congo river has always been the lost dream of Egyptians to achieve water security and provide necessary water allocations for the development of projects, be they agricultural or industrial.

The idea was first seriously explored in 1980 during the administration of the late Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat. Sadat sent an expedition to the Congo to prepare a conceptualization of the project. However, the idea had first emerged in 1902, and was mentioned in a book written by Apata Basha, Egypt's former chief irrigation engineer in Sudan.

However, this idea died with the death of Apata, as did the conceptualization of the project with the 1981 demise of Sadat and the arrival of President Hosni Mubarak to power in Egypt. Moreover, successive governments have always found excuses to shun the implementation of the project.

This dream kept recurring from time to time in the minds of Egyptians. Yet, crises have intensified between Egypt and Ethiopia and the countries with the rest of equatorial headwaters of the Nile, either because of the redistribution of water allocations, or because of Ethiopia's set of dams to control the Blue Nile, which provides Egypt with 85% of its water.

Fact and fiction: Diverting water from the Congo to the Nile - Opinion

Fact and fiction: Diverting water from the Congo to the Nile

Talk of diverting water from the Congo River to Egypt is pure fantasy, shifting attention from less costly and more effective strategies for conserving Nile Basin water resources

Some suggest diverting 112 billion cubic metres of water from the River Congo to the Nile, which is utterly ridiculous. How can the course of the Nile, with a revenue of 84 billion cubic metres annually at Aswan, sustain another 112 billion cubic metres?

Others propose digging a new river parallel to the Nile to transfer water from the River Congo to Egypt, which means digging a river or channel that is nearly 35 times longer than the Suez Canal. Some politicians have revisited these ideas as a means to achieve Egypt's water security from a river that has great water capacity (the Congo), without competing with other Nile Basin countries over Nile water revenues that seem trivial in comparison.

In truth, since this idea was thrust into the arena about three years ago I could not glean any scientific or realistic merit to this argument. This theory is an escape from reality instead of facing a complicated situation in the Nile Basin using a comprehensive water strategy for Nile Basin countries.

Reality also requires detailed plans for applying this strategy and fairly and evenly distributing its burdens and benefits among Nile Basin countries by mutual consent. One that takes into consideration the interests of local communities in all the countries where projects will be installed, so that these communities are protective of these projects regardless of political and security conditions.

In order not to jump the gun in judging the idea of diverting water from the Congo to Egypt via the Nile — or through a new watercourse — it is important to look at the different aspects of the theory to make matters clear and judge according to scientific and realistic grounds.

Basic facts about the Congo River

The River Congo is truly an African water kingdom, known to locals as the Zaire River rooted in the word Nazari in local dialect, meaning river.

The river is 4,370 kilometres long, or two thirds the length of the Nile. Its annual water revenues are nearly 1,293 billion cubic metres or nearly 14 times the revenues of the Nile, according to UNESCO data. This makes it the second largest river (in terms of discharge) in the world after the Amazon, which is the emperor of all rivers at 5,600 billion cubic metres of fresh water annually, or 60 times the volume of the Nile annually.

The Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) receives the majority of Congo river water, some 900 billion cubic metres, while the Republic of the Congo and Angola benefit from the remainder. The DRC consumes 12.8 billion cubic metres only of the fresh water, or 1.4 per cent of all water revenues. This leaves 887.2 billion cubic metres to flow from the DRC alone to the Atlantic Ocean without being used.

The Congo has many tributaries, several emerging from Lake Kivu and its basin. Lake Kivu runs between the DRC and Rwanda and its waters were stained with blood during the terrible civil war in Rwanda that killed millions in ferocious fighting between the Hutu and Tutsi tribes.

It also witnessed deadly conflicts on its Congolese sides by tribes and domestic politics in the DRC. The lake covers an area of 2,370 square kilometres, has an average depth of 240 metres and holds 569 billion cubic metres of water despite its small basin.

There are also several tributaries from the western basin of Lake Tanganyika, the largest of the African lakes and the second largest natural freshwater lake in the world after Russia's Baikal River. Lake Tanganyika covers an area of 32,900 square kilometres with an average depth of 574 metres, with a capacity of 17,800 billion cubic metres or about 6.5 times the capacity of Lake Victoria, the primary water source for the Nile River at the Equatorial Lakes Plateau.

Lake Tanganyika separates DRC on one side and Burundi and Tanzania on the other, with the border running through the centre of the lake. The southern section of the lake is the border meeting point between Tanzania in the East and DRC in the west and Zambia in the south.

While Lake Victoria is known as the largest natural freshwater lake in the world in terms of size, at 68,500 square kilometres, its average depth is no more than 50 metres, which makes its capacity negligible compared to smaller but deeper lakes. It ranks seventh among world lakes in terms of water capacity, and third in Africa after lakes Tanganyika and Nyasa.

One of the River Congo's tributaries emerges from Lake Mweru that separates DRC and Zambia, and is a shallow lake — more like a swamp — with an average depth of seven metres, an area of 4,350 square kilometres and a capacity of 32 billion cubic metres. There are other tributaries that originate at the western slopes of the Muhavura mountain range where in the east emerges Kagera, the first tributary to the Nile River.

Other tributaries emerge at the western slopes of the Rwenzori Mountains which locals call the "Moon Mountains" because of their snowy summits despite their location on the Equator. From the eastern slopes of this mountain range emerge the tributaries of the River Semliki, which is a main tributary of the Nile River. There are other minor tributaries of the River Congo that originate in areas adjacent to the border between the DRC and the Republic of Central Africa.

Diverting water from the Congo to Egypt: Myths and reality

In all the northern and eastern sources of the River Congo the land gradient is at an angle, or a sharp angle, opposite to the land gradient of Nile water, which makes Nile water and its tributaries flow North towards Egypt and its mouth on the Mediterranean Sea. The gradient of the south and west tributaries of the Congo River, meanwhile, flow towards the Atlantic Ocean and the southern ones flow north and join the course of the Congo flowing west in the direction of the Atlantic Ocean.

Any attempt to divert water from Congo's basin would be at a water catchment on the main river or its northern tributaries that rapidly flow south and west. This is opposite the Nile's land gradient, as mentioned earlier.

Thus, diverting water from the basin of the Congo River to the Nile River or even to a parallel course requires lifting a large volume of water at a very high cost to transfer it from the Congolese watercourse to the Nile watercourse, or even a new parallel one. This cost alone would make the diversion absurd because of the price of energy and expected revenues from using diverted water, compared to the cost of transferring water.

Suggestions to divert water from the Congo to the Nile via the Bahr Al-Ghazal basin or directly to the White Nile are also unscientific and absurd, because of topography, direction of slopes of each river, and the capacity of the Nile especially at the White Nile.

The course of the White Nile is shallow and cannot hold any more water without raising the height of its banks. It has a slight sloping gradient and is awash with swamps. It is also quite shallow — about four metres deep in summer, which can increase to six metres in winter. During flood season, it becomes more of a lake when its course increases from 850 metres wide in the northern section to 4,300 metres.

As for projects to develop Nile water revenues by conserving wasted water in the swamps of Kyoga, Bahr Al-Jabal, Mashar and Bahr Al-Ghazal, they require a mega project to raise the banks of the White Nile so it can sustain any increase in Nile revenue. Transferring a large volume of water from the River Congo, even at an impossible impractical high cost, is technically impossible for the White Nile.

Diverting water from the Congo to Egypt through digging a new watercourse parallel to the Nile for a distance of more than 5,000 kilometres and lifting water from the Congo River to this new watercourse is an entertaining reverie that has nothing to do with reality. It is unviable in terms of the cost of digging the watercourse, the time it would take, the cost of lifting the water to it, guaranteeing flow and continuous lifting because of the uneven terrain.

Meanwhile, the fantasy project of diverting water from the Congo to Egypt requires approval from the DRC, the Republic of the Congo, Central Africa, Chad and Sudan, as well as guaranteed political and security stability in these countries so the project and companies working on it and equipment are not sabotaged, destroyed or stolen. That alone is enough reason to end all theories about such a project.

In South Sudan, the Jonglei Canal project was 70 percent complete after spending large funds, but was sabotaged, destroyed and terminated because of political and security turmoil in South Sudan during Sudan’s civil war since the mid-1980s.

This demonstrates that putting the fate of a mega project with multiple phases in several countries — each suffering political and security turmoil — is delusional and a premeditated waste of money. Also, environmental groups around the world will fight against any such project even if it were technically sound and economically feasible, because it is an assault on nature and is certain to result in climate changes in several countries.

It is likely that promoting this whimsical project is an attempt to distract Egypt from its water rights that are being violated by the Ethiopian Grand Renaissance Dam, instead of addressing the issue with various dynamic mechanisms and effective implementation of old agreements that support Egypt’s water rights to the Nile River and its tributaries. Egypt must also take advantage of its international and regional relations to block Ethiopia from unilateral actions that harm Egypt and its Nile water rights.

It also requires Egypt to use its water situation and how all life depends wholly on Nile water — human and non-human — to assert its historic right to defend every drop of Egypt’s Nile water quota.

Promoting this fantasy also attempts to distract Egypt from striving to ration water consumption, developing new water-saving irrigation methods, seeking to develop Nile water revenues through conservation projects of wasted water at the Kagera River basin. This water does not even enter the watercourse because of evaporation, seepage and absorption into the swamps of Kyoga in Uganda, the waters between lakes George and Edward, the swamps of Bahr El-Jabal and Nahr Naam, the swamps of Bahr Al-Ghazal in South Sudan, and swamps of Mashar on the border between South Sudan and Ethiopia.

These are more realistic and feasible projects, and their cost and water revenues would be divided fairly among participating Nile Basin countries. This would be part of a strategic water, agricultural, industrial and services partnership between Egypt and the countries of the Nile Basin, based on cooperation, equal mutual benefits under the umbrella of brotherhood in the Nile River.

If Ethiopia insists on constructing their huge dam on the Nile River, won't Egypt go to war with the Ethiopians because of being deprived of life-giving water?

Abdelrahman El-Ghawas Military Affairs and Geopolitics Researcher 1y

Egypt does not have a problem with building a dam in the Nile , the problem is how the dam will be filled Egypt wants it to be filled between 10–15 years however filling when there is flood and stop filling when there are dry times
Ethiopia keeps refusing because for many reasons

Like the Israeli-Qatar political pressure on Ethiopian Government about refusing the Egyptian terms of the how the filling Operation should be

Abi Ahmed wants to show off his skills that he is doing Maneuvers with Egypt and saying NO to the strongest country in Africa and Middle East to get votes in the next election , I don't blame him I blame who tells him don't worry the Egyptian will never strike the dam we got your back , you guessed them

However the people of Ethiopia have high hopes that once there is GERD on the Nile Ethiopia shall be rich like the USA , but no they have three dams on a river between them and Kenya and look at Kenya now , Agricultural lands Destroyed plus there was 1M Egyptian in Kenya the Egyptian government brought them back due to shortage in water in Kenya they want the same scenario to happen in Egypt , Well we are not Kenya , probably great israeli to hold Egypt from it's backbone , Even though Return to 2011 Egyptian Revolution suddenly they started working on the dam , which means everything was planned for and the equipment , workers and everything you need to build a dam was ready , we use this chaotic chance in Egypt and build our corrupted dam , however that doesn't work with us , The Egyptian sovereignty will not allow the infringement to it's Rights in the water accept the terms or no filling , Ethiopia fills the dam with no Egyptian Sudanese approval then they will face the consequences and we have the right to do so

What would be the point? The Red Sea is salt water!

The Egyptians and Ethiopians have done lots of negotiating about the building of the dam. The present situation with Lake Nasser is not sustainable. The lake has filled up with silt and the vast area in the sun evaporates enormous amounts of water. So a dam further upstream may make more water available overall. Fingers crossed.

Dams are massively political. There is an old Texas saying "Whiskey is for drinking, water for fighting over" . The fact that rivers run through many states. Even within the same country this can lead to massive problems. The present turmoil in India is a case in point. Release 6000 cusecs of water for 3 days to Tamil Nadu, Supreme Court tells Karnataka - Times of India?

For example if Botswana and Zambia decided to, they could divert the entire Zambezi south into the Kalahari where it flowed millenia ago. That would annihilate the desert ecosystem but generate huge amounts of farmland.

It would also clobber much of Zimbabwe's and Mozambique's habitat… so they wouldn't would they?

But fast forward 100 years with an African population of 4 billion plus, 10 - 100 million Chinese farmers (with a huge history in irrigation) in Angola and Zambia, crazy climate, food security issues and 625 million liters of fresh water escaping down the Zambezi every damn minute. Now think again….

Disclosure: I once did a project on the topography of northern Botswana and the Zambezi valley to see whether it is technically feasible. It is. Cheaper than the 3 gorges damn by a long shot.

What would be the damage if Ethiopia destroyed Egypt's Aswan Dam in retaliation for Egypt destroying Ethiopia’s dam?

Mohamed Emara Alexandrian Updated Feb 4

First of all Egypt won't destroy Ethiopia's dam and there won't be a war over the Nile.
And I don't think this is a genuine question, but I’m willing to give the OP the benefit of the doubt and answer the question.

Let's say Egypt destroyed the GERD using long range missiles or an airstrike. Can Ethiopia retaliate by targeting Aswan Dam? The answer is no.

Ethiopia simply doesn't have the potential to pull such a move. They don't have any kind of long-range surface to surface or ballistic missiles that can target Egypt.

Ok so no missiles. But what about aircraft? The answer is still no.

Ethiopia's air fleet is dwarfed by that of Egypt. Ethiopia has a grand total of 90 aircraft including only 23 fighter jets and 0 attack aircraft. On the other hand, Egypt's air force boasts the strength of more than a 1000 aircraft including 250 fighter jets and 93 attack aircraft.

The fighter jets operated by Ethiopia, MiG-23s and Su-27s, are of obsolete old tech dating back to the Cold War era. Egyptian F-16s and Rafales would destroy them from a distance of thousands of kilometres. They won't even see them coming.

And I didn't mention even mention Egypt's air defence capabilities.

This is why this scenario is unrealistic considering the facts mentioned. Thus, Aswan Dam is in no danger whatsoever of getting bombed.

The image just with Wednesday 30 AM2 was not found in the file.

Aswan Dam

In any case, bombing the GERD makes no sense strategically wise. If a war erupts, Egypt would take advantage of Ethiopia's aerial inferiority and decimate it's army using it's superior air force. Then Sudan's army will mount a ground invasion and seize the Dam as well as the surrounding areas. Sudan has a special relationship with Egypt and is going to be equally harmed by GERD unless all parties agree on a solution.

Now, I don't believe a "war" over the Nile water is going to happen and sincerely hope all three countries reach a peaceful resolution to the dispute guaranteeing the rights of everyone.

OK so I'm going to disable the comments because I'm tired of filtering comments typed by immature keyboard warriors whose behinds got burned badly by facts.

As Egyptian man, I do not want to see my government decides to bomb the Ethiopian Dam, The RD.

If it happens, our High Dam, south of Aswan, can receive same destiny.

The present day arms sale can enable every nation to acquire the type of weapons that suit its targets/goals. Missiles can be easily launched from afar.

Wisdom should prevail.

Looking back to the History:

1- The Ethiopians hosted the early Muslim immigrants who crossed the Red Sea from the Arabian Peninsula to escape the torture done by Mecca's unbelievers. We should not forget this kindness and generosity.

2- The Egyptian Coptic Orthodox Church used to send its clergy to serve in the Ethiopian churches, early Ethiopian clergy were trained in the Egyptian church. The Strong historical ties between the Two Churches should never be forgotten.

3- Both Egypt and Ethiopia are leading members of the African Union. Both should present a Model for a Smart Resolution away of any military entanglement.

Are the benefits of the Ethiopian dam worth risking relations with Egypt?

Tsehai Alemayehu Studied at Berea College1y

Let me answer this in the language of accounting. Speaking from Ethiopia's vantage point the credits (benefits) of the dam include:
Provide access to electric power to a large chunk of the dark continent so it can come into the light for the first time

Propel the people of Ethiopia a big way towards their long held aspiration to industrialize and escape poverty

Save this generation of Ethiopians from the ignominy of being the first generation of Ethiopians to succumb to the threat or succor of a foreign entity

Forcefully assert once and for all that it is in keeping with the laws of man and nature for Africans to claim first dib on Africa's resources.

On the other side, again speaking from the Ethiopian vantage point, here is what is at risk for souring Ethiopia's relations with Egypt:

Nothing will be at risk. Not a thing! Ethiopia and Egypt are neighbors who have thought of each other as an adversary. Egypt has always been fearful that Ethiopia my divert the Nile and for thousands of years, its approach to mitigating that fear has been to wage war or try to destabilize Ethiopia by sponsoring an endless series of Ethiopian factions. So Ethiopia has no relationship with Egypt to risk.

Ethiopia doesn't want war. At the same time Egypt knows or should know that Ethiopia does not fear going to war when it is threatened. Ethiopia can defend itself and has always defended itseld successfully.

That is why the notion that the course of Ethiopia's pursuit of the GERD could be altered through subterfuge, threats, bribes or ingratiating key figures in Ethiopia is preordained to fail. All of this has been the bedrock of Egyptian policy toward Ethiopia.

Egypt should for once try to find a negotiated solution. And by negotiation I don't mean for Egypt to mail a list of demands and wait for a yes answer. Negotiations become fruitful only when the parties are willing to look and evaluate where the other side is coming from. To repeatedly state “without the Nile Egypt will die" does not advance the agenda. Egypt knows well that Ethiopians have been dieing for lack of food and water and they can not be expected to choose Egyptian lives over theirs. That is the point Egypt is unable or unwilling to contemplate.

Is Egypt overreacting to the completion of the dam in Ethiopia?

Degemu Shertaga , former Banker, Consultant, Diplomat Answered Jul 30, 2020

Yes, Egypt is overreacting to the completion of the dam in Ethiopia. The dam is not to significantly hurt any downstream countries. The Ethiopian Renaissance Dam is being built for the purpose of electricity generation. With the completion of the Dam, it is expected that the 60% of the population who are currently without electricity will be benefiting and the extra power will be sold to neihbouring countries and also to Egypt as well. The offer is still open and with that the economic integration of the surrounding countries will be realized.

In view of the above, let Egypt cooperate with Ethiopia and other riparian countries to fairly share the Nile without its stereotype rthoric of historic right, no reduction of the water share it enjoyed for the last over 700 years. Ethiopia is calling upon downstream countries to collaborate instead of resorting to confrontation.

Will the completion of the River Nile dam result in an armed conflict between Egypt and Ethiopia?

Dušan Garza Answered Aug 29, 2021 Upvoted by Ionel Calin Micle , PhD Demographics & Geography, University of Montréal (2013)

By "River Nile" dam, it is assumed that the reference is made to Ethiopia's $5 billion Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam, along the Blue Nile, one of the Nile's two major tributaries, near the Ethiopia-Sudan border which is nearing completion at the Nile headwaters.

The brief and candid answer is that, an open military conflict/war between Egypt & Sudan on one side against Ethiopia, is at the moment . . . in abeyance but NOT totally out of the question -mainly because none of the belligerents can possibly afford a full scale war with anybody !

In more detail, the situation is as follows :

The rapid filling of a giant dam at the headwaters of the Nile River — the world's biggest waterway, supporting millions of people — could reduce water supplies to downstream Egypt by more than one-third.

A water deficit of that magnitude, if unmitigated, could potentially destabilize a politically volatile part of the world by reducing arable land in Egypt by up to 72%. The study projects that economic losses to agriculture would reach $51 billion. The gross domestic product loss would push unemployment to 24%, displacing people and disrupting economies.

So far, despite international negotiations, there's been little progress in the decadelong dispute.

When completed, it will be the largest hydropower project in Africa and would create a reservoir containing 74 billion cubic meters of water — more than twice the operational capacity of Lake Mead on the Colorado River.

Some 280 million people in 11 countries in the basin depend on the waterway — a primary source of irrigation for more than 5,000 years. Egypt relies on the Nile for more than 90% of its water. The region's population could increase by 25% in 30 years, increasing demand at a time when Egypt would expect less water from the Nile. Water rights along the Nile have been in dispute since 1959; today, the conflict threatens to escalate into a war.

The dispute is emblematic of wider disputes over water scarcity as climate change affects developing countries experiencing rapid growth. Disputes along the Mekong, Zambezi and Euphrates-Tigris rivers, among others, show the potential for political instability and conflict.

Following endless negotiations over the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam (GERD) on the River Nile, tensions have risen once again after Addis Ababa suddenly announced that it had completed the second-stage filling of the dam on 19 July 2021. The move is seen as a further provocation for Egypt, which has warned that this was a red line and further filling of the dam may even warrant military action.

80% of Cairo's water supply comes from the Nile, and the city has relied on the river socially and economically since ancient times. Sudan, another upstream state, has also stated that the dam could deprive 20 million Sudanese civilians of water.

On the flip side, Ethiopia also says it needs the dam to generate electricity and improve the lives of its 115 million inhabitants, many of whom have had to live with power shortages for decades.

For the most part, the Arab League has backed Egypt.

Despite previous disagreements between Qatar and the Gulf States, Doha is now adopting the Arab League's position and favouring Cairo's rights to the Nile waters, with other Arab League states having also expressed support for Egypt and Sudan's rights, with Qatar's Foreign Minister describing this as a "united Arab position".

Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam . . when completed & fully operational.

While certain regional powers may have their own interests, the US and EU's inability to resolve the dispute may give Russia a green light to boost its clout with Ethiopia and support Addis Ababa's position on the Nile. Even though Moscow has maintained strong relations with Cairo since Sisi came to power in 2013, including bilateral military ties, it may see a greater opportunity to boost relations with Ethiopia, given that Egypt remains a closer ally to the West, which limits Moscow's ability to expand its foreign policy clout in Africa.

While Ethiopia's second-stage filling is a blow to negotiation efforts, it seems that cold tensions between Cairo and Addis Ababa will, for now, remain a point of contention rather than erupting into an open conflict. Yet if these tensions remain unresolved, further threats of military action could indeed become a future reality, especially if the stakes become more critical for Egypt.

Take the Rio Grand River as an example:
This river has its source totally in USA, runs through two US States (Colorado&New Mexico) in 100 % US lands, then when it enters the State of Texas it has another country on its western bank; Mexico.

Still, Mexico considers itself having rights in using the Rio Grand water.

See what the Wikipedia tells:

Rio Grande Water Rights (1900-present)

Following the approval of the Rio Grande Project by federal lawmakers in 1905, the waters of the Rio Grande were to be divided between the states of New Mexico and Texas based on their respective amount of irrigable land. The project also accorded 60,000 acre-feet of water annually to Mexico in response with the countries demands. This was meant to put an end to the many years of disagreement concerning rights to the rivers flow and the construction of a dam and reservoir at various location on the river.

Look at a map of southern Egypt, and you'll see Lake Nasser, the reservoir for the Aswan dam.

It acts as a water storage for all water flowing towards Luxor, Cairo, Alexandria i.e. all the major urban cities of Egypt.

Any drop in water from the Nile would first be reflected in the water levels of Lake Nasser.

Instead during the rainy season, the Aswan dam releases water, 75% for irrigation of crops mainly rice - which requires a lot of water and which Egypt (a desert country) exports - the remaining 25% flows into the Mediterranean as waste. The image below shows the intensity of rice cultivation.

The Egyptians want the Ethiopians to fill their dam reservoir over 20 years, however Egypt filled the Lake Nasser reservoir in 5–6 years when it built the Aswan dam in 1976.

The filling of the Lake Nasser reservoir in 1976 did not cause any suffering or water shortage to downstream users in Alexandria, Cairo and Luxor even though it hardly rains in Egypt.

Ethiopia on the other hand with a lot of rainfall especially in its rainy season proposes to fill its dam reservoir in 7 years and only during the rainy season.

The GERD reservoir at 73 cubic km, is also smaller than Lake Nasser's 132 cubic km volume, which means its effects - in addition to discounting for rain, would be much less in the same filling time scale.

However, Egypt is saying, 'we don't care how much rain falls, the reservoir should be filled in 20 years!' This shows for Egypt it's not about the availability of water, but control of water flow. They resent the dam because it gives the Ethiopians through geography control over water flow!

Unlike Egypt and its Lake Nasser reservoir which releases 75% of its water for irrigation, Ethiopia is only using the dam for electricity and not for crop irrigation or for urban water use. This means Ethiopia is not going to be taking any water away from the Nile, just bypassing its flow through generators to create electricity.

Commentators may point out that in the current era the likelihood of such a large project exacerbating the effects of climate change are not worth the risks. However, perversely, the effects of global warming thus far on the region has been an increase in flooding, a calamity that the GERD dam would help ameliorate.

For instance, Sudan that lies between Ethiopia and Egypt is usually flooded during the rainy season - AS SEEN BELOW, and the Ethiopian dam would prevent such floods.

Meanwhile, Ethiopia has carried out two (of seven proposed) fillings of its reservoir, last year and this year and it did not result in water shortages in Egypt or any loss of production in Egypt's rice crop [growing rice in a desert is madness].

Egypt has not suffered any damage and the debate is about water sufficiency (and efficiency) for agriculture rather than for household and industrial water use, the latter two of which takes up only 25% of Lake Nasser's released water. So Egypt has quite a water reservoir buffer before its population becomes starved of water as it likes to claim; Yet it is threatening to attack Ethiopia.

Should Egypt even be exporting rice like tropical Thailand? Rice is not native to Egypt it was introduced and Egypt is not satisfied with producing for its own people but also exports for $money.

Lake Nasser irrigates the rice fields of Northern Egypt, and rice requires water logged fields which is why it's usually grown in subtropical countries with high rainfall like Thailand, Vietnam and S. China. Below are Egyptian farmers planting rice:

Egypt's water use is wasteful, even its reservoir Lake Nasser loses 20-30% of its stored water to evaporation from the desert heat, while the GERD reservoir in the highlands of Ethiopia would lose negligible amounts (<1%) of water to evaporation.

Of the released excess water from Lake Nasser, 25% is unused and flows wastefully into the Mediterranean. When added with the evaporation rates, up to 55% of the water released from Lake Nasser annually is lost. This from a desert country crying about water.

Nothing illustrates this even further than the effects of erosion in Egypt's Nile delta which is not caused by the lack of water but by the capillary action of excess flood water on the soil.

Lake Nasser is Egypt's sole water reservoir, any water shortfalls would be revealed by the water volumes in this reservoir. Satellite imagery would reveal any shrinkage. So far nothing suggests the two GERD fillings have impacted volume levels at the Lake; Ethiopia needs electricity, its people are poor and it would improve their productivity and prevent them from starving.

Will the completion of the River Nile dam result in an armed conflict between Egypt and Ethiopia?

For instance, Sudan that lies between Ethiopia and Egypt is usually flooded during the rainy season - AS SEEN BELOW, and the Ethiopian dam would prevent such floods.

Meanwhile, Ethiopia has carried out two (of seven proposed) fillings of its reservoir, last year and this year and it did not result in water shortages in Egypt or any loss of production in Egypt's rice crop [growing rice in a desert is madness].

Egypt has not suffered any damage and the debate is about water sufficiency (and efficiency) for agriculture rather than for household and industrial water use, the latter two of which takes up only 25% of Lake Nasser's released water. So Egypt has quite a water reservoir buffer before its population becomes starved of water as it likes to claim; Yet it is threatening to attack Ethiopia.

Should Egypt even be exporting rice like tropical Thailand? Rice is not native to Egypt it was introduced and Egypt is not satisfied with producing for its own people but also exports for $money.

Lake Nasser irrigates the rice fields of Northern Egypt, and rice requires water logged fields which is why it's usually grown in subtropical countries with high rainfall like Thailand, Vietnam and S. China. Below are Egyptian farmers planting rice:

Egypt's water use is wasteful, even its reservoir Lake Nasser loses 20-30% of its stored water to evaporation from the desert heat, while the GERD reservoir in the highlands of Ethiopia would lose negligible amounts (<1%) of water to evaporation.

Of the released excess water from Lake Nasser, 25% is unused and flows wastefully into the Mediterranean. When added with the evaporation rates, up to 55% of the water released from Lake Nasser annually is lost. This from a desert country crying about water.

Nothing illustrates this even further than the effects of erosion in Egypt's Nile delta which is not caused by the lack of water but by the capillary action of excess flood water on the soil.

Lake Nasser is Egypt's sole water reservoir, any water shortfalls would be revealed by the water volumes in this reservoir. Satellite imagery would reveal any shrinkage. So far nothing suggests the two GERD fillings have impacted volume levels at the Lake; Ethiopia needs electricity, its people are poor and it would improve their productivity and prevent them from starving.

All tributary countries of the Nile have the right over the Nile. There is some treaty or convention on trans-boundary rivers somewhere. It is true that the Dam is utilized for electric generation and not irrigation. The argument is whether the dam reduces the flow. There was no need in the first place to get into such geopolitical debate while Ethiopia could have easily built dams over smaller tributaries of the Nile. It is quite true that Ethiopia has much better volume of freshwater than Egypt. It isn’t a scientific debate either. While Ethiopia has some right as upper riparian country, it should respect the rights of millions of other people living downstream.

Why isn’t Western media covering the massacre that happened in Tigray, Ethiopia ,but covers Afghanistan?

Firew Afera

Lives in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia (1995–present) 10h

The fact that they dedicated a lot of their time to cover the war in Afghanistan should not surprise you. They sent their own soliders to fight there and failed to accomplish their objectives. Afghanistan is a place where Western powers were utterly humiliated. Though I hate radical Islamists, I hope that Westerners have learned that not everybody is willing to listen to what they say.

I remember that the article below was published by CNN right after the Taliban entered Kabul. You can see how butthurt they were when they tell you what their soliders were really doing there all this time:

Regarding the Tigray war, the major problem seen in Western media was not the time they dedicated to report it. I would be very happy if they decide not to talk about Ethiopia anymore. What angered me was the fact that the manner in which the conflict was covered was very biased and disrespectful. Giant Western media like the CNN attempted to spread completely false information and blatantly support a belligerent at times. The fact that they spoke things that an ordinary person on social media wouldn't shows you that they do not care about the accuracy of their reporting and simply promote an agenda. I imagine that they were saying this: 'Why does it matter if we report lies about a Black African country that nobody knows about. We are told to promote one of the sides.'

They also used the war to portray Black Africans as they usually do; backward, hungry and war-torn. At the same time they devoted very few minutes for such portrayals to show the world that the suffering of Black Africans is not worthy of attention. I remember that they many Western news outlets talked about the war, hunger and death in Ethiopia after they covered other 'important' issues.

This type of media coverage, coupled with the global reputation they had built, enables Westerners to convince the world and Black Africans themselves that they are inferior and backward. They want to psychologically impair us as they do not want Black Africans to break away from the vicious cycle of poverty.

I hope that Black Africa would manage to have its own media which connects Black Africans and predominantly focuses on Black African problems. Black Africans should be the only ones to tell the world about ourselves. We have a responsibility to make the world believe what we say about ourselves and disregard what Westerns say about us. Note that all big countries spend billions on their own news platforms. We should learn from how RT shows Russia to the world or how China benefits from CCTV.

If that does not happen, imperialists will continue to set demeaning narratives of Africans and continue to influence on how we perceive ourselves. However, I do not think this would be possible if Africans do not embrace Pan-Africanism and sense of cooperation. Having an independent , reliable and internationally acclaimed African media outlets is one aspect of Pan-Africanism.

However, you can see how dim Africa's future is when you see a Black African person trying to obtain information from CNN about a war happening in another Black African country. How can unity be achieved if a Black African person does not care about things happening in other parts of the continent.

How can a sane person consider CNN as a 'news outlet' in the first place. I remember how CNN journalist Christina Amanpour interviewed Uhuru Kenyatta (Kenyan president) about rights of sodomites in Kenya (three years ago). Though I am not a Kenyan, I was terribly ashamed for Kenyans to see the President of a country being warned by an ordinary journalist. Why did he allow himself to be interviewed in the first place?!!

“what started the war between Ethiopian central government and TPLF?".

Yonas Tewelde , B.A from Diredawa University (2010) Answered Nov 21, 2020

Your question must have been written like “what started the war between Ethiopian central government and TPLF".

Though the mis agreement b/n central Government and tplf has lasted nearly for 2 years after coming of Dr Abiy Ahmed to power, the main incident that escalated the disagreement is an election conducted by Tgrai regional government undermining a decision made by central government and house of federation to postpone it due to covid19. Tplf has confirmed as if won scoring 98%.

Since then, their relationship had worsened. Both parties had not accepted either legitimacy. The central government claims that the regional election made is without the election board involvement and it doesn't endorses the new regional federation. And the Tplf claims since the 5 year term has ended and the power of the current central government has expired.

In the mean time, tplf special forces attacked the Ethiopian military stationed in the northern part of the country. This incident drags the central government to use power to bring those tplf officials to justice. This is the short description of the scenario being impartial.

So if you asked what incident started the war, it's the attack Made on the Ethiopian military. Or if you ask who started the war , its tplf.But note that the war is not between Ethiopia and Tgray.

I hope it will help

How can Ethiopia's Tigray crisis be resolved?

Ekhama Treasure (Jane?) Answered Mar 3, 2021

Thanks for the A2A Gopalkrishna Vishwanath

A brief synopsis of the history pertinent to the ongoing Tigray crisis:

The Tigray is located at the Northernmost region of Ethiopia.

A revolutionary seizure of power in 1974 by the Derg led to the overthrow of the Ethiopian Emperor, Haile Selassie. The Derg regime eventually collapsed in 1991 as a victory was secured by a faction commanded by the Tigray People Liberation Front (TPLF), The Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). The EPRDF then established the prevailing ethno-federalist system, one that apportioned Ethiopia into several regions along ethno-linguistic lines in which each region gained its unique security force and government.

The autonomy here meant that if the central government were to collapse, a region could secede. But the empowerment of the major ethnic groups led to the suppression of the minorities at the local levels.

The EPRDF's rule was marked by extreme corruption. Citizens argued that the elites of the Tigray (TPLF) had disproportionate control over the other parties constituting the EPRDF. In 2018, the EPRDF chose Abiy Ahmed as their party leader and he eventually became prime minister. Abiy took swift actions to free the politically imprisoned, make peace with Eritrea (for which he won a nobel prize… not that that's even worth jack shit anymore) despite its long attempts to dismantle Ethiopia, dissolve the EPRDF; merging the individual parties into one Prosperity Party (PP) in a bid to unify the country, replacing the ethno-federalist and the formation of a unitary state.

Abi, being backed by the Amhara political elite, has centralising reforms aimed at marginalising the Tigray influence.

But the real kicker was when the Tigray disregarded central authority, going forward to hold a regional election in September of 2020.

It's really one big shit show.

Reports have it that there was (is?) a massacre of Amhara civilians in in western Tigray by the TPLF while in Addis Ababa and other towns there is a mass internment of Tigrayans. Aid has been hindered by the central government from reaching the Tigray. Now, the leaders have been ousted and an interim government been put in place by the central.

This is where part of the problem lies.

If the conflict is targeted at the general Tigrayan populace and not just the military, there is no possible immediate solution. Another problem is that this might trigger a secessionist movement elsewhere in the country. And outside the country, Egypt and Sudan might team up with the TPLF and disrupt the GERD (Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam - meant to grant Ethiopia control over the Nile) leading to more foreign involvement in the all-out crisis. My biggest concern is the looming destabilisation of the Horn.

The Horn of Africa.

A resolution?

Why, I'm just a Nigerian teenager, don't look at me!

But, and you might call this a very jejune view, I believe Abiy's government would have to do its utmost best in convincing the Tigrayans to work with the interim, including those ousted. International mediation is an equally effective option, the "international community" could intervene.

Eventually, Ethiopia has to completely eliminate ethnic-based politics.

Here is the insert; Eritrea and the TPLF-backed transitional government of Ethiopia agreed to set up a commission to look into any problems that arose between the two former wartime allies over the foreseen independence of Eritrea.[45] This commission was not successful, and during the following years relations between the governments of the two sovereign states deteriorated. It is still going on. The heavy involvement of external forces forced the Tigray defense forces (TDF) to withdraw from the outskirts of Finfine (aka Addis Ababa). There is active heavy involvement by Turkish operatives in addition to their drones, communications, military equipment, and other military technology support. There is also similar engagement by UAE. In light of this involvement, Tigray forces decides to withdrew.

After the withdrawal and Strategic (or tactical?) re arrangement by TDF, there seems to be heavy engagements in the Afar front and Gashena front with reported heavy causalities and dispersion of huge ENDF/Amhara forces.

This increased very heavy engagement by Turkey and UAE when TDF-OLA almost reached Finfine reminds me of how Bahir Al Asad was saved by the same level of foreign involvement when he was about to be toppled and was encircled in Damascus. If history is to repeat itself, this could mean that there will be a protracted war unless external involvement is halted.

Why is Ethiopia's military losing the Tigray War?

I am not a military expert, but from a layman's point of view and not knowing exactly what is happening, what we can infer is that the Ethiopian army was not actually ready to take on TPLF by firing all their Tigrayan officers and soldiers. Apparently 40% of the officers and 20% of the army was Tigrayan. That is those who were currently serving by Nov 2020. But if you include those who have retired during the last 30 years and if they are alive, TPLF had access to a well trained and experienced officer cadre that is beyond what Ethiopia can match now. Also TPLF has access to the best military mind Tigray has produced Gen. Tsadkan. [1] I think that's the difference, TPLF has the better trained, experienced and exceptionally gifted military leaders now.

Which foreign powers are backing Tigray against Ethiopia?

Chris Wenani , studied Civil Engineering & Structural Engineering at University of Eldoret - U.O.E (2018) Answered Nov 16, 2020

How do you know that there is a foreign power that is backing Tigray? It is hard to know and if there's, they are probably doing it in a way that you will never know.

One can only guess which side might be supporting Tigray. That's when the ideology of the enemy of my enemy is my friend comes in. So Any country that had issues with Ethiopia, if they are not supporting Tigray now, they might be prompted to do that pretty soon, if it will work in their favour.

Of course the obvious country that comes in mind is Egypt. But remember Egypt may choose from Three options. Option 1 is to stay out of this conflict, sit back and wait. They may wait for the conflict to weaken Ethiopia, then if they want to, they can get offensive on the Ethiopian side like how Trump wanted them to, then they will easily destroy the dam but this won't be a good option because Ethiopia, for a long time has signed some military pact with one or two or several African nations, who are just one call away. Or it will be at that moment, when Ethiopia is weakened and they choose to help a)Tigray or option b) Ethiopia, if they help Ethiopia in this moment, am sure Ethiopia will later on have to come on an understanding with Egypt.

Option 2 Egypt supports or is supporting Tigray. If they are doing this, they obviously know that there is no way Tigray is going to win this but supporting them will weaken the Ethiopian defensive mechanism. Because at the moment, the Ethiopian side is losing too and they are probably spending a lot of money on this, plus it is affecting the growth of the Ethiopian Economy. Also the way this is going, it will leave Ethiopia with a separatist movement(Tigray might always have a movement that want to be its own Country). This is almost how Eritrea got separated from Ethiopia.

Option 3 Egypt Supports Ethiopia. This is very unlikely to happen but it might happen, especially if Egypt was silently supporting Tigray and the word was about to get out and reach the Ethiopians. Egypt might decide to support Ethiopia so that rumours of Egypt supporting Tigray won't seem to be true. In this way Egypt might gain in their deal with Ethiopia concerning the dam.

Another party is USA , remember they talked of bombing Ethiopia just a few weeks ago. Plus the US is so good at destabilizing and overthrowing governments. They are so experienced in this. From Libya to many more other countries, I think except DRC, because it was Rwanda and Uganda who started destabilizing that great country. Anyways, if at all the US is behind Tigray, then this conflict is going to go on for a while. The US could even pay Al-shabaab terrorists to start attaching Ethiopia. That country is so Evil.

At the moment Sudan seems to be Neutral, but the conflict seems to have affected Eritrea too and at the moment we know Ethiopia and Eritrea are good friends. We just hope this conflict won't get out of hand and destabilize Ethiopia, the country that has been doing so good and developing fast.

Also on 16th, November 2020, The Ethiopian Deputy Prime Minister made a trip to both Uganda and Kenya. Ethiopia has a military pact with Kenya since the 1960s, but these pact was renewed in 2018. So was the deputy prime minister looking for possible support in the near future?

Ethiopia was from ancient Greek, meaning "land of the burnt-faced." It was used by the Greeks and Romans to refer to all lands inhabited by "dark-skinned" people. Abyssinia was the name for the northern Semitic kingdoms that were directly descended from Aksum.
I think the name was changed to Ethiopia to include the southern kingdoms (Kaffa, for example) who had been brought under control by the north. The name Abyssinia implied northern hegemony, so "Ethiopia" was chosen to counter that.

CPJ-welcomes release of Ethiopian journalists Amir Aman Kiyaro and Thomas Engida after 4 months in detention.

Nairobi, April 1, 2022 — In response to the release of Ethiopian freelance journalists Amir Aman Kiyaro and Thomas Engida from detention on Friday, the Committee to Protect Journalists issued the following statement welcoming their release:

"It is a great relief that Ethiopian journalists Amir Aman Kiyaro and Thomas Engida are home with their families, after four months of arbitrary detention during which they were not charged with any crime," said CPJ's sub-Saharan Africa representative, Muthoki Mumo. "The journalists should never have spent a single day behind bars, and authorities should bring this ordeal to a close by dropping any pending investigations into their work and guaranteeing that they can do their jobs freely and safely."

On November 28, 2021, authorities arrested Amir, a freelance video journalist who contributes to the Associated Press, and Thomas, a freelance camera operator, as CPJ documented at the time. Authorities accused them of breaching Ethiopia's state of emergency and anti-terrorism laws by interviewing members of an insurgent group.

The two journalists were granted bail on Tuesday; on Thursday, the country's Supreme Court rejected a police appeal to keep them in detention, and on Friday they were released, according to media reports and two people familiar with their case who spoke to CPJ on condition of anonymity, citing safety concerns.

Amir and Thomas were among a group of journalists detained in a crackdown that followed Ethiopia's declaration of a state of emergency in November last year, as CPJ reported. They were not listed in CPJ's 2021 prison census — which ranked Ethiopia as sub-Saharan Africa's second-worst jailer after documenting at least nine journalists in custody there as of December 1 — because CPJ did not have the full details of their arrests at the time.

Even though the state of emergency was lifted in February, at least three other journalists — Temerat Negara, cofounder of the online outlet Terara Network, Oromia News Network editor Dessu Dulla, and ONN reporter Bikila Amenu — remain behind bars in the Oromia regional state, according to media reports and a person familiar with the ONN case who spoke to CPJ on condition of anonymity, citing safety concerns.

What was Somalia like when it was a European colony?

Johan Louis De Jong, Studied at University of Amsterdam Updated Feb 14

You have to understand there never existed a Somalia before Britain, France and Italy arrived at the Somali coast

Somali language. present day

Mostly tribes, a few united under a prince of some standing,, Some nominal influence from the faraway Ottoman Caliphate..

At the coast the seafaring Omani Arabs from Oman and Zanzibar had some settlements. In the 19th century the Egyptian fleet of the Khedives sailed southwards and captured some settlements upon the Ottomans. It did not last.

So the Italians arrived from Eritrea and the British from Aden and split the areas between them and the mighty Empire of Ethiopia.. The Ethiopian property was and still is the Ogaden.

Colonization was not easy as the Dervishes under the Mad Mullah undertook a guerilla against the invaders Britain and the Ethiopian Empire. They even received assistance of the Ottoman Caliphate, especially during World War One. Only in 1920 resistance ended.

Horn of Africa, 1935

Although the Brits at the start ruled from Aden they slowly started to develop a steady structure of the country called Somaliland and the Arab influence diminished. It was a well organized colony. And the only interruption was in the Second World War when it was temporarily overran by Italy. British rule was distant but mostly fair. Virtually no settlers.

Italian Somaliland was different. The Italians undertook a much more intensive colonization of the country bringing in thousands of settlers. By 1930 2 % of the population was Italian settler.. They actually tried to reform Somalians into Italians.. But the fascist doctrine soon made them into third rates. And the Ethiopian Adventure fused Somalia with Ethiopia and Eritrea. The whole story came to an end when the Allies overan Italian Africa with mainly Commonwealth troops..

The image part with relationship ID rId44 was not found in the file.

What now. The reconstituted Empire of Ethiopia claimed both Italian Eritrea and Italian Somaliland. Around 1947 the Empire received Eritrea on which it had ancient claims. But in 1949 the fledling United Nations granted Italy a second lease on Somalia, temporarily. The Trust Territory of Somalia. The Italians were now on a vastly different track and tried to prepare Somalia for independence. Again they spent more time to and more energy into Somalia than the British ever could but the result was less.

In a Wikipedia article is stated that the Italians prepared their Somalia better than the British their Somaliland. I beg to differ. When the united Somalia morphed into dictatorship first and total chaos later and exploded the area formerly known as British Somaliland transformed itself into the quasi-independent state of Somaliland, a well structured heaven of rest compared to the horrifying state of remaining Somalia, bent on self-destruction.

Somaliland declared its independence from Somalia in 1991. I just found this; stamps of Somaliland printed in 1997 and issued in 1998. Seems to me a British fanclub still existed..

However, here are “normal”stamps..

The image (ref: rel0=relationship ID: rId42 was not found in file file.

PS. The Ogaden myth

At the end of the 19th century the Empire of Ethiopia conquered the Somalian speaking Ogaden. But there was scarcely an Ethiopian administration and the local Somali clan chiefs simply stayed in power. Till Italy invaded Ethiopia in 1935…

On this map the last Ethiopian conquests, the final in 1904..

Fascist Italy added the Ogaden to their Somalia Province as can seen on the Italian East Africa map.When the Commonwealth troops liberated the regio the Ogaden came under British administration. And when Ethiopia was restored as an independent monarchy the Brits kept the Ogaden. But in 1948/1953 an unlikely coalition of Ethiopia, the United States and the United Nations forced the British out…

So I really do not see why anyone should attack Britain for this. So send your letters of indignation to the UN.

Western Media is covering the Tigray vs Ethiopia crisis, see: As examples, these articles describe the war in Ethiopia as an internal civil war, with drastic affects on civilian population.

The solution isn't presenting itself. Tigray is clearly a state in Ethiopia but feels it has no representation in the Ethiopian government. The military in Tigray is stronger than the government forces, a sign of bad management.

The food crisis with the UN supplying food but lacking drivers and fuel shows how serious the Ethiopian government is about returning Tigray to province status.

The difference with Afghanistan is partially due to the importance to the US population of citizens returning home and seeing Afghanis return to peace.

How do you know that there is a foreign power that is backing Tigray? It is hard to know and if there's, they are probably doing it in a way that you will never know.

One can only guess which side might be supporting Tigray. That's when the ideology of the enemy of my enemy is my friend comes in. So Any country that had issues with Ethiopia, if they are not supporting Tigray now, they might be prompted to do that pretty soon, if it will work in their favour.

Of course the obvious country that comes in mind is Egypt. But remember Egypt may choose from Three options. Option 1 is to stay out of this conflict, sit back and wait. They may wait for the conflict to weaken Ethiopia, then if they want to, they can get offensive on the Ethiopian side like how Trump wanted them to, then they will easily destroy the dam but this won't be a good option because Ethiopia, for a long time has signed some military pact with one or two or several African nations, who are just one call away. Or it will be at that moment, when Ethiopia is weakened and they choose to help a)Tigray or option b) Ethiopia, if they help Ethiopia in this moment, am sure Ethiopia will later on have to come on an understanding with Egypt.

Option 2 Egypt supports or is supporting Tigray. If they are doing this, they obviously know that there is no way Tigray is going to win this but supporting them will weaken the Ethiopian defensive mechanism. Because at the moment, the Ethiopian side is losing too and they are probably spending a lot of money on this, plus it is affecting the growth of the Ethiopian Economy. Also the way this is going, it will leave Ethiopia with a separatist movement(Tigray might always have a movement that want to be its own Country). This is almost how Eritrea got separated from Ethiopia.

Option 3 Egypt Supports Ethiopia. This is very unlikely to happen but it might happen, especially if Egypt was silently supporting Tigray and the word was about to get out and reach the Ethiopians. Egypt might decide to support Ethiopia so that rumours of Egypt supporting Tigray won't seem to be true. In this way Egypt might gain in their deal with Ethiopia concerning the dam.

Another party is USA , remember they talked of bombing Ethiopia just a few weeks ago. Plus the US is so good at destabilizing and overthrowing governments. They are so experienced in this. From Libya to many more other countries, I think except DRC, because it was Rwanda and Uganda who started destabilizing that great country. Anyways, if at all the US is behind Tigray, then this conflict is going to go on for a while. The US could even pay Al-shabaab terrorists to start attaching Ethiopia. That country is so Evil.

At the moment Sudan seems to be Neutral, but the conflict seems to have affected Eritrea too and at the moment we know Ethiopia and Eritrea are good friends. We just hope this conflict won't get out of hand and destabilize Ethiopia, the country that has been doing so good and developing fast.

Also on 16th, November 2020, The Ethiopian Deputy Prime Minister made a trip to both Uganda and Kenya. Ethiopia has a military pact with Kenya since the 1960s, but these pact was renewed in 2018. So was the deputy prime minister looking for possible support in the near future? Meantime, as News Nigeria confirmed, Ethiopia's government has declared a "humanitarian truce", in its conflict with the Tigrayan forces, to allow aid into the war-ravaged northern province. The Tigrayan forces are yet to respond to the government's move.

Emperor Menelik II of Ethiopia□□ was the only African king who defeated white Imperialist Colonial Powers at the battle of Adwa in 1896

When Menelik II defeated the Italians in 1896, the European/US media and Newspaper showcased and prescribed him as a white man. So people around the world wouldn't know that the Italians were being defeated by Black Africans.

Colonisation was done in a guest to prove that, Africans were not normal human beings, Africans that needed to be civilised by whites, Europeans sees us as animals; these were and are their mischievous narratives to deodorize and cover the worst atrocities to humankind perpetrated in Africa and subjected Black people to for five century, and to perputate enslavement of the black people in the post-independence times.

The Europeans continue to deliberately kill and ignore creativities and potentials of the black race, only to steal some of them, and claim sole ownership. They seal the thefts with patent rights, copyrights, international laws, treaties, propaganda, intimidations and demonic sanctions.

Why isn't Western media covering the massacre that happened in Tigray, Ethiopia ,but covers Afghanistan?

Firew Afera Lives in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia (1995–present) 10h

The fact that they dedicated a lot of their time to cover the war in Afghanistan should not surprise you. They sent their own soliders to fight there and failed to accomplish their objectives. Afghanistan is a place where Western powers were utterly humiliated. Though I hate radical Islamists, I hope that Westerners have learned that not everybody is willing to listen to what they say.

I remember that the article below was published by CNN right after the Taliban entered Kabul. You can see how butthurt they were when they tell you what their soliders were really doing there all this time:

Regarding the Tigray war, the major problem seen in Western media was not the time they dedicated to report it. I would be very happy if they decide not to talk about Ethiopia anymore. What angered me was the fact that the manner in which the conflict was covered was very biased and disrespectful. Giant Western media like the CNN attempted to spread completely false information and blatantly support a belligerent at times. The fact that they spoke things that an ordinary person on social media wouldn't shows you that they do not care about the accuracy of their reporting and simply promote an agenda. I imagine that they were saying this: 'Why does it matter if we report lies about a Black African country that nobody knows about. We are told to promote one of the sides.’

They also used the war to portray Black Africans as they usually do; backward, hungry and war-torn. At the same time they devoted very few minutes for such portrayals to show the world that the suffering of Black Africans is not worthy of attention. I remember that they many Western news outlets talked about the war, hunger and death in Ethiopia after they covered other ‘important' issues.

This type of media coverage, coupled with the global reputation they had built, enables Westerners to convince the world and Black Africans themselves that they are inferior and backward. They want to psychologically impair us as they do not want Black Africans to break away from the vicious cycle of poverty.

I hope that Black Africa would manage to have its own media which connects Black Africans and predominantly focuses on Black African problems. Black Africans should be the only ones to tell the world about ourselves. We have a responsibility to make the world believe what we say about ourselves and disregard what Westerns say about us. Note that all big countries spend billions on their own news platforms. We should learn from how RT shows Russia to the world or how China benefits from CCTV.

If that does not happen, imperialists will continue to set demeaning narratives of Africans and continue to influence on how we perceive ourselves. However, I do not think this would be possible if Africans do not embrace Pan-Africanism and sense of cooperation. Having an independent , reliable and internationally acclaimed African media outlets is one aspect of Pan-Africanism.

However, you can see how dim Africa's future is when you see a Black African person trying to obtain information from CNN about a war happening in another Black African country. How can unity be achieved if a Black African person does not care about things happening in other parts of the continent.

How can a sane person consider CNN as a 'news outlet' in the first place. I remember how CNN journalist Christina Amanpour interviewed Uhuru Kenyatta (Kenyan president) about rights of sodomites in Kenya (three years ago). Though I am not a Kenyan, I was terribly ashamed for Kenyans to see the President of a country being warned by an ordinary journalist. Why did he allow himself to be interviewed in the first place?!!

What started the Ethiopia and Tigray War?

Yonas Tewelde , B.A from Diredawa University (2010) Answered Nov 21, 2020

Your question must have been written like “what started the war between Ethiopian central government and TPLF".

Though the mis agreement b/n central Government and tplf has lasted nearly for 2 years after coming of Dr Abiy Ahmed to power, the main incident that escalated the disagreement is an election conducted by Tgrai regional government undermining a decision made by central government and house of federation to postpone it due to covid19. Tplf has confirmed as if won scoring 98%.

Since then, their relationship had worsened. Both parties had not accepted either legitimacy. The central government claims that the regional election made is without the election board involvement and it doesn't endorses the new regional federation. And the Tplf claims since the 5 year term has ended and the power of the current central government has expired.

In the mean time, tplf special forces attacked the Ethiopian military stationed in the northern part of the country. This incident drags the central government to use power to bring those tplf officials to justice. This is the short description of the scenario being impartial.

So if you asked what incident started the war, it's the attack Made on the Ethiopian military. Or if you ask who started the war , its tplf.But note that the war is not between Ethiopia and Tgray.

I hope it will help

How can Ethiopia's Tigray crisis be resolved?

Ekhama Treasure (Jane?) Answered Mar 3, 2021

Thanks for the A2A Gopalkrishna Vishwanath
A brief synopsis of the history pertinent to the ongoing Tigray crisis:

The Tigray is located at the Northernmost region of Ethiopia.

A revolutionary seizure of power in 1974 by the Derg led to the overthrow of the Ethiopian Emperor, Haile Selassie. The Derg regime eventually collapsed in 1991 as a victory was secured by a faction commanded by the Tigray People Liberation Front (TPLF), The Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). The EPRDF then established the prevailing ethno-federalist system, one that apportioned Ethiopia into several regions along ethno-linguistic lines in which each region gained its unique security force and government.

The autonomy here meant that if the central government were to collapse, a region could secede. But the empowerment of the major ethnic groups led to the suppression of the minorities at the local levels.

The EPRDF's rule was marked by extreme corruption. Citizens argued that the elites of the Tigray (TPLF) had disproportionate control over the other parties constituting the EPRDF. In 2018, the EPRDF chose Abiy Ahmed as their party leader and he eventually became prime minister. Abiy took swift actions to free the politically imprisoned, make peace with Eritrea (for which he won a nobel prize… not that that's even worth jack shit anymore) despite its long attempts to dismantle Ethiopia, dissolve the EPRDF; merging the individual parties into one Prosperity Party (PP) in a bid to unify the country, replacing the ethno-federalist and the formation of a unitary state.

Abi, being backed by the Amhara political elite, has centralising reforms aimed at marginalising the Tigray influence.

But the real kicker was when the Tigray disregarded central authority, going forward to hold a regional election in September of 2020.

It's really one big shit show.

Reports have it that there was (is?) a massacre of Amhara civilians in in western Tigray by the TPLF while in Addis Ababa and other towns there is a mass internment of Tigrayans. Aid has been hindered by the central government from reaching the Tigray. Now, the leaders have been ousted and an interim government been put in place by the central.

This is where part of the problem lies.

If the conflict is targeted at the general Tigrayan populace and not just the military, there is no possible immediate solution. Another problem is that this might trigger a secessionist movement elsewhere in the country. And outside the country, Egypt and Sudan might team up with the TPLF and disrupt the GERD (Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam - meant to grant Ethiopia control over the Nile) leading to more foreign involvement in the all-out crisis. My biggest concern is the looming destabilisation of the Horn.

The Horn of Africa.

A resolution?

Why, I'm just a Nigerian teenager, don't look at me!

But, and you might call this a very jejune view, I believe Abiy's government would have to do its utmost best in convincing the Tigrayans to work with the interim, including those ousted. International mediation is an equally effective option, the "international community" could intervene.

Eventually, Ethiopia has to completely eliminate ethnic-based politics.

According to Wiki a 30 year war starting in 1961 between Eritea/Tigray vs Ethiopia. Here is the insert; Eritrea and the TPLF-backed transitional government of Ethiopia agreed to set up a commission to look into any problems that arose between the two former wartime allies over the foreseen independence of Eritrea.[45] This commission was not successful, and during the following years relations between the governments of the two sovereign states deteriorated. So from my take on this and other research, the borders are still in a state of constant change.

It is still going on. The heavy involvement of external forces forced the Tigray defense forces (TDF) to withdraw from the outskirts of Finfine (aka Addis Ababa). There is active heavy involvement by Turkish operatives in addition to their drones, communications, military equipment, and other military technology support. There is also similar engagement by UAE. In light of this involvement, Tigray forces decides to withdrew.

After the withdrawal and Strategic (or tactical?) re arrangement by TDF, there seems to be heavy engagements in the Afar front and Gashena front with reported heavy causalities and dispersion of huge ENDF/Amhara forces.

This increased very heavy engagement by Turkey and UAE when TDF-OLA almost reached Finfine reminds me of how Bahir Al Asad was saved by the same level of foreign involvement when he was about to be toppled and was encircled in Damascus. If history is to repeat itself, this could mean that there will be a protracted war unless external involvement is halted.

I am not a military expert, but from a layman's point of view and not knowing exactly what is happening, what we can infer is that the Ethiopian army was not actually ready to take on TPLF by firing all their Tigrayan officers and soldiers. Apparently 40% of the officers and 20% of the army was Tigrayan. That is those who were currently serving by Nov 2020. But if you include those who have retired during the last 30 years and if they are alive, TPLF had access to a well trained and experienced officer cadre that is beyond what Ethiopia can match now. Also TPLF has access to the best military mind Tigray has produced Gen. Tsadkan. [1] I think that's the difference, TPLF has the better trained, experienced and exceptionally gifted military leaders now.

Les parents aidaient leurs enfants à cacher leur identité juive pour éviter les attaques antisémites, en leur faisant des tatouages chrétiens.

La communauté juive éthiopienne les appelle Beta Israël. Mais leurs compatriotes avaient l'habitude de les appeler Falasha. Ce qui signifie étranger, outsider.

Beaucoup ont également été convertis de force au christianisme.

Malgré les difficultés, l'isolement et les attaques violentes, la communauté juive éthiopienne a conservé une identité forte pendant des centaines d'années.

How did Ethiopia avoid being colonized by European powers?

Tony Nunes

, Azorean Canadian Answered Dec 14, 2020
In part at least, it may very well be for a reason that also helped Thailand and Japan avoid European colonization: early contact and friendly relations with the Portuguese.

The Portuguese explorers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries were looking to trade with, not colonize, other lands. For example, when Portuguese explorers reached Thailand, and later Japan, in the early 1500's, amicable relationships were established with the ruling authorities in those countries. (These later turned negative in Japan and they were replaced by the Dutch as permitted European traders, but that was after decades of decent relations focused on trade and knowledge transfer.)

For these countries, the early contact and trade with the Portuguese introduced technologies such as firearms, which gave them military advantages locally, but also when dealing with other European powers that arrived in later decades and centuries. They also gained important knowledge about European civilization and technologies at a time when Europe was still not so far ahead technologically and so catch-up was not as difficult.

Based on early Portuguese trade and technology transfer, Japan developed a thriving firearms industry that became very important in its own internal affairs. As for Thailand, they even had a formal alliance with Portugal from 1511 whereby Portugal contributed soldiers to Thai King Rama Thibodi II's forces (no doubt armed with muskets). In that era, Thailand's language of diplomacy, its "lingua franca", to communicate with other Europeans who might show up was Portuguese.

Ethiopia had a similar experience, although with less trade involved due to its inland position. Besides looking to trade, the Portuguese were also looking for allies against the Islamic powers, and one they sought was the legendary king "Prester John", ruling a mysterious Christian kingdom somewhere in Asia or Africa. The Portuguese hoped to make contact and establish an alliance with this kingdom. Ethiopia was as good a candidate as any, and may in fact have been the origin of the legend, and so the Portuguese crown sent envoys there as early as 1487, and established continuous diplomatic relations in 1508.

As a kingdom allied with an important European naval power (Portugal was much more prominent at that time), this would surely have given Ethiopia a degree of protection from being targeted for colonization by other European powers. Additionally, Portugal also had a long-standing alliance with England, from 1385 (the oldest in the world still in effect today) and that may also have conferred some extra clout in the European sphere, by association.

And the desire for alliance was not just incoming from Europe, Ethiopia itself had already sought diplomatic relations with European powers from the early 15th century, even before the Portuguese arrived, and had even sent emissaries to the kingdom of Aragon in the early 1400's.

Given that Ethiopia had diplomatic relations with an important European power from such an early point in the era of European exploration, and that it was also seen in Europe as a potentially important ally against Muslim powers, this surely must have played a role in its never being colonized by European nations. Being Christian didn't hurt either, of course. In fact it may have been considered at least somewhat illegitimate to conquer it for that reason, as introducing Christianity was often part of the rational for conquering other nations.

Is it just a coincidence that Ethiopia, Thailand and Japan all had friendly diplomatic relations with Portugal in the early 1500's and were never subsequently colonized or controlled by European powers, instead being treated as favoured trading partners (Japan) or actual political allies of Portugal (Ethiopia and Thailand)? Likely it is not. It may have been the difference that allowed them to stay on a path that avoided colonization by other European powers as their military and economic strength grew in later centuries.

Well to start with they were lucky to have these men:

Emperor Theodore (twadios)

Yohanns Iv

And emperor menilik the second.

Why do I mention these three?: well to start with these leader are responsible for ensuring Ethiopia independence and modernizing it.

The image pair with relationship id rId4 was not found in the file.

Let start with emperor Theodore: during the 17th-18th century, Ethiopia was a feudal society , with powerful princes/warlords and regional chiefs fighting each other for supremacy, defending their lands or expanding their realm, while the emperor was a figure head who couldn't do much to stop them tearing the country apart, since he didn't have an army of his own: think of it like sengoku jidai in Japan but set in Africa(by the way this era was known as the age of princes), in addition, there was also the fear of foreign nations trying to take advantage of this chaos in Ethiopia and invade. example of such groups were:

1. The Galla (Somali raiders)
2. The Egyptians
3. European, especially the Italian who were late in the coloniasation game.

All this change when our boy Theodore, a powerful warlord from a province named Qwara, vyed for the imperial throne and succeeded. This time, the emperor was no longer a ceremonial title but an active political one, and Theodore went about consolidating his power by beating other princes and making them submit his rule. While he did this , he also made plans to develop Ethiopia to modern nation:

1. the first thing he did was to establish a highly centralized government in which all loyalty was to the emperor(or in Amharic, Negus Nagast which means King of kings)
2. he deprived the Nobility and local rulers of having their own armies, so as to create a national standing army who’s loyalty was to the state Ahem and him since he is the emperor.
3. he Hired European technicians, artisans (there some report that he also hired missionaries) to produce guns, cannons and ammunitions to equip his army.
4. he also set up diplomatic relationship with European nations like the UK and France to recognize his government and country
5. he also reform political system, dividing the areas of the country into small administrative units and appointing local rulers of these places into salaried official, or government appointed official.
6. then there was some land reform, such confiscating certain land from the Ethiopian church , giving it to peasant and stuff like that.

also apart from working on internal reforms, he also had grand ideas as well:

1. He saw himself as a Christian crusader king with the mission to wipe out Islam in Africa. and create a crusade/Christian empire
2. he wanted to conquer Egypt and Sudan
3. and he wanted to restore ancient glories of the Solomonic dynasty(even though he wasn't descendant) by capturing Jerusalem and sitting on the throne that King Solomon once sat on. yeah

unfortunately Theodore policies made a hell lot of enemies: first the nobles who didn't like to lose their privilege's , then the church same as the nobles, average jo on the street, because of the heavy taxes they had to pay for the empower projects. not to mention he also piss off a lot of his Muslim subject with his anti-muslim actions. However his downfall would come when he did a dick move by holding a British consuls and some missionaries hostages in order to bargain the British government for military equipment's and craftsman to continue this war. instead he got massive military expedition force led by a British Officer by the name of R.C Napier sent to invade the country. (the fall and the eventual suicided of Theodore) ok, so maybe our boy Theodore isn't exactly the best example of model leader and his ideas and polices led to lot of issues in the country. but despite his failures he is credited for establishing the foundation for a united Ethiopia, which later rulers built on at the same time making some adjustment.

after Theodore died the next leader to succeed him was Yohannes IV, a prince from Tigre who allied with the British against Theodore.

(dude looks like a 2pacs brother about to spit some bar)

now, there some people that would why didn't British not straight up conquer Ethiopia after the Napier Expedition? well this is a tricky question we will never know. but if you ask me here are the following reason:

1. the people of Ethiopia were not like the other African groups they encountered in a sense that all the tribes, despite their differences and customs were united both in culture and religion IE the Ethiopian Church. so if the British tried that, they would have been triggered national uprising, uniting all the rival factions, nobles, church and tribes all together. Which can be a very unpleasant experience.

2. many Ethiopian warlords had modern weapons like guns and artillery, especially they got from the brits and some they would have got from other European power, so the British are not gonna be facing any Zulu style army in this country.
3. Britain sent an army to Ethiopia only to get the British people held as hostage by the emperor back, they didn't sent their for conquest so as not as to lose support form their local allies and the public support at home. although they did do some looting like taking the imperial crown and other treasures lol.
4. the country was on the verge of anarchy after the emperor Theodore was defeated and the British army sent there wouldn't be enough to make a difference. it would have been like Afghanistan to them
5. Ethiopia was too landlock and would really served the need of the British interest, plus they were too busy in Sudan and Egypt to be invested in Ethiopia affairs . so the best alternative was to install a moderate candidate who would be accepted by the Ethiopian elites and people.

sorry about that tangent now let get on to Emperor 2pac- i mean Yohannes IV.

When he came into power as emperor he went about restoring central authority, however unlike his predecessor, he resorted to diplomacy and negotiation with nobility and the church. he operated a federal system of government in which the local princes enjoyed some degree of autonomy in their realm in return for recognizing him as Emperor and to aid him in battle when he calls on them to with their men.

he continued Theodore policy of establishing relation with European nations and received modern military weapons and equipment's which he used to equip his army. with this he was able to successfully protect Ethiopia from external threats:

1. in 1875–1876, Emperor Yohannes army defeated an Egyptian army that was occupying Ethiopian territory on north and red sea coast. this threat came to an end when Britain occupied Egypt in 1882.
2. in 1882, the Italians, a late comer in the African colonization's, decided to try their luck in making Ethiopia their colony, but our boy 2pac(Yohannes lol) was haven't none of that and crushed an Italian expeditionary force at Dogali
3. in 1888, Yohannes had to mobilize his force to stop an Islamic army from Sudan, known as Mahdists from invading his territory. he defeated them at the battle of Metmma but unfortunately killed by a chance bullet in march 1889. sad day for a lot of people but he went down as the greatest “what if” in Ethiopia history and a legend.

Now that Yohannes Iv out of the way, up next is My next Home boy Menelik II

now I'm sure your asking who was this old badass is?

He was the ruler of a principality called Shoa which was found in Angolalla Tera, Located at the eastern edge of the Ethiopian highlands. he started off as a warlord expanding his realm to the south conquering muslim provinces like Harar and some lands with Somali speaking people. he had a rivalry with Yohannes IV over the imperial crown, but when they realize that foreign powers were hoping to exploit their rivalry to cause chaos to Ethiopia and to conquer the land, they decided to put aside their rivalry and come to a compromise: Menelik would recognized Yohannas as emperor, in return he was granted greater autonomy as King of Shoa than other provincial leaders. when Yohannas died in battle Menelik succeeded him as emperor.

Meneilk II became emperor at the time when European colonialism was very strong and it was very difficult to be an intendent nation/kingdom in Africa. the British, French, Germans, Portuguese and Belgium a have all carved up chucks of territory in Africa for themselves

Italy, after its unifications was a late comer in the imperial game and was only able to scourge a few places like Libya, Eritrea and part of Somaliland. seeing that Ethiopia was the only African nation not under any European power, they set their goal to conquer it and make it a colony and roll with the big boys in Europe. Menelik wasn't blind to this, and made is mission to thwart European encroachment in his country. He did this in three ways:

1. first he consolidated his authority in country through alliances and conquest.

2. he set up diplomatic relation with Europeans nations, most notably he was instrumental in developing good relationship with Tsarist Russian empire who become Ethiopia the main ally.

3. with diplomatic relationship with European countries, Menelik was able to secure more modern arms and equipment for his national army. in addition, he received military advisors and volunteers from Russia to help train his army.

On 2 May 1889,Menelik concluded a treaty with Italy at Wuchale (Uccialli in Italian) in Wollo province. Under the Treaty, Abyssinia/ Ethiopia and Kingdom of Italy agreed to define the boundary between Eritrea and Ethiopia. For example, both Ethiopia and Italy agreed that Arafali, Halai, Segeneiti and Asmara are villages within the Italian border. Also, the Italians agreed not to harass Ethiopian traders and to allow safe passage for Ethiopian goods, particularly military weapons in addition to respecting Ethiopia sovereignty.

However, there were two versions of the treaty, one in Italian and another in Amharic. Unknown to Menelik the Italian version gave Italy more power than the two had agreed to. The Italians believed they had "tricked" Menelik into giving allegiance to Italy. To their surprise, upon learning about the alteration, Emperor Menelik II rejected the treaty. The Italians attempted to bribe him with two million rounds of ammunition but he refused. they wrote a letter to notify other European power that Ethiopia was under Italian control, But Menelik conter back by writing his own letter to the European nation saying he did not surrender his country sovereignty and he was backed by Russia, and to an extent britan . Then the Italians approached Ras Mengesha of Tigray, the son of the late Yohannes Iv who contender and rival for the Imperial throne with Menelik, in an attempt to create civil war, however, Ras Mengesha, despite his rivalry with Menelik , understood that Ethiopia's independence was at stake, and so refused to be a puppet for the Italians or to rebel against Menelik.

At this point, Italy, seeing that the Ethiopian Emperor was politically astute and cunning and wouldn't fall for the same trick other European used in other parts of Africa, decided to resort to a military invasion in 1895, hoping to use their militarty might to put Menelik in his place, just like what their European counterpart did to other African groups and leaders in the continent. But boy did they underestimate their enemy as Menelik was not only politically savy he was also skilled war leader.

On 17 September 1895, Menelik ordered all of the Ethiopian nobility to call out their banners and raise their feudal hosts, stating:

"An enemy has come across the sea. He has broken through our frontiers in order to destroy our fatherland and our faith. I allowed him to seize my possessions and I entered upon lengthy negotiations with him in hopes of obtaining justice without bloodshed. But the enemy refuses to listen. He undermines our territories and our people like a mole. Enough! With the help of God I will defend the inheritance of my forefathers and drive back the invader by force of arms. Let every man who has sufficient strength accompany me. And he who has not, let him pray for us".

Despite the dismissive Italian claim that Ethiopia was a "barbaric" African nation whose men were no match for white troops(classic eurocentrism), the Ethiopians forces were better armed, being equipped with thousands of modern French rifles and Hotchkiss artillery guns together with ammunition and shells which were superior to the Italian rifles and artillery(not to mention the weapons and arms the Italian supplied them with which came back to bite the Italian in the ass)
well it so turns out that it was the so called “barbaric African nation” that put the Italian in their place, which they did at the Battle of Adwa:

(fun fact Menelik wife, Taytu Betul, fought alongside him in battle of Adwa with 5,000 troops of her own.)

(Italian Pows After the battle)

The Italians suffered about 6,000 killed and 1,500 wounded in the battle and subsequent retreat back into Eritrea, with 3,000 taken prisoner. Brigadiers Dabormida and Arimondi were amongst the dead. Ethiopian losses have been estimated at around 4,000–5,000 killed and 8,000 wounded.

Menelik push the Italians all the way back to Eretria, but instead of advancing forward and taking the place. he decided to halt his men at the border. he knew that if he entered the Italian colony it would give the Italian government a reason to strongly intervene and back a second invasion. so, he instead sought to restore the peace that had been broken by the Italians and their treaty manipulation seven years before. the Treaty of Addis Ababa was reached between the two nations. Italy was forced to recognize the absolute independence of Ethiopia, as described in Article III of the treaty, and would foreign onlookers like the British and Russian watching, Italy lost any hope of colonizing Ethiopia.

after the war was over Menelik went to work modernizing Ethiopia. Following the rush by the major powers to establish diplomatic relations following the Ethiopian victory at Adwa, more and more westerners began to travel to Ethiopia looking for trade, farming, hunting, and mineral exploration concessions.

Menelik II founded the first modern bank in Ethiopia, the Bank of Abyssinia, introduced the first modern postal system, signed the agreement and initiated work that established the Addis Ababa –Djibouti railway with the French, introduced electricity to Addis Ababa, as well as the telephone, telegraph, the motor car, and modern plumbing.

Foundation of a Permeant Capital

For a period Ethiopia lacked a permanent capital; instead, the royal encampment served as a roving capital. For a time Menelik's camp was on Mount Entoto, but in 1886, while Menelik was on campaign in Harar, Empress Taytu Betul camped at a hot spring to the south of Mount Entoto. She decided to build a house there and from 1887 this was her permanent base, which she named Addis Ababa (new flower). Menelik's Generals were all allocated land nearby to build their own houses, and in 1889 work began in a new royal palace. The city grew rapidly, and by 1910 the city had around 70,000 permanent inhabitants, with up to 50,000 more on a temporary basis.

Only in 1917, after Menelik's death, was the city reached by the railway from Djibouti.

Now i would like to end it here before i go on and on. now to answer the question: How did Ethiopia avoid being colonized by European powers?, well to me it boils down to them having emperors that were aware of the dangers of European encroachment in Africa and to determined that their nations do not fall victims like other African groups they saw it as necessary to unite the Ethiopia and all the different tribes and faction as one people. they also used to diplomacy with different European nation in order secure modern weapons to equip their army so that they can have a fighting chance against any potential invaders. leaders like Yohannes and Menelik were pragmatic and Astute politicians who never fell for any tricks played by European powers to deceive them into surrendering their country sovereignty.

that is all and do forgive me for this long answer as I had to use my old school text books, wiki and encyclopedia to get information that I wrote down. I hope you enjoy the reading and peace out

Ethiopia is a Christian country and partaken in a level of Christian help from European countries, from the Portuguese to the English. Having a Christian ruler in control (the famous Prester John, conceivably) most certainly kept it out of pilgrim hands.

Ethiopia was generally inland and spent quite a while in disengagement from the 1600s to the 1800s. There was certifiably not a ton of valid justification to go the whol….

The best way to answer this question is to start with a little known episode in East African history: Russian Cossacks tried to establish a Russian colony at Sagallo in present day Djibouti. This man, Nikolay Ivanovitch Achinov, visited Ethiopia in order to establish ties between Russia and Ethiopia in 1883.

It's important to remember Russia and Ethiopia had spiritual links because they were both Orthodox Christian countries. There was another supposed link:

This is Abram Petrovich Gannibal, the son of an African prince who was abducted into slavery by Ottoman Turks and later ended up in Russia, becoming Peter The Great's godson, and the great-grand father of Alexander Pushkin the Russian poet. He went on to become a general in the Russian Imperial Army and Russia's first great engineer.

His son Ivan Gannibal was famous in his own right.

Both were and still are considered to be of Ethiopian heritage in Russia, and Abram is especially revered. Most historians today think Cameroon is more likely to be Gannibal's origin.

Back in Russia, Achinov arranged for a colonial expedition to set up a Russian port on the Red Sea coast. The Red Sea had become much more important for Europe since the opening up of the Suez Canal in 1869, and Egypt was no longer under Ottoman control.

The 165 Terek Cossacks were greeted by Ethiopian priests when they landed on December 10 1883. In January 14, they took over an abandoned Egyptian port at Sagallo. Achinov struggled to control his fellow Cossacks as they raided the Danakil Afars. Achinov had to pay compensation to the sultan for these acts. A few disgruntled Russians escaped and told the French of the location of the colony, and on February 5 a French cruiser and 3 gunships turned up, after a bombardment of the fort renamed as “ Little Moscow” in which 7 Cossacks were killed, the Cossacks were allowed to leave.

Alexander II of Russia, notionally an ally of France, quickly disowned Achinov and his failed colonial adventure probably fearing French and British reprisals a couple of decades on from the Crimean War. Also Russia was more interested in expansion in the east.

Zula was a port in Eritrea which from 1857 was granted to the French by Dejazmach of Tigray who was in revolt against Tewodros II. When a French cruiser arrived in 1859, the commander found the region to be a state of anarchy. So figuring it was more trouble than it was worth, the French abandoned plans of occupying Eritrea which later was occupied by the Italians, and handed over control of Zula to Anglo-Egypt in 1869.

Tewodros called himself the Negus or king, a title which has Semitic biblical roots, and considered himself to be descended from Solomon. From humble origins, he unified Ethiopia, created a standing army, and amassed a fair sized arsenal including a mortar cannon forged at Gafat called the Sevastapol, which ultimately didn't work when later used against the British. His arsenal included:

11,063 rifles, 875 pistols, 481 bayonets, 83,563 bullets, 15 cannons, 7 mortars, and 55 cannon shells. (Wiki)

Under Tewodros, Ethiopia was assailed from all sides by rebels, the Ottomans, Egypt, and Sudan. So Tewodros sent out letters to all of the colonial powers requesting assistance. Only the French replied.

The British were more concerned about keeping good relations with the Ottomans (acting as a buffer against Russian expansion), and Egypt, as they wanted to secure their trade route to India.

A perceived insult led to Tewodros kidnapping the British consul among others, and despite the Russians interceding on behalf of the hostages, Tewodros refused to budge.

This led to the British landing at Zula in 1867 under general Robert Napier, 1st Baron Napier of Magdala and the British Expedition to Abyssinia. The British won the decisive Battle of Magdala 1868 against a force of 9,000. They won the war, but lost the peace. Napier didn't want the fortress of Magdala falling into the hands of his Muslim allies the Obromo Queen of Wallo. So he destroyed the fortress. Napier did the usual looting of artefacts, many of which are on display in British museums.

Although the British retreated from Magdala full of the pomp of victory, the Ethiopians saw them as a weak retreating “here today gone tomorrow” army. However, a British soldier, John Kirkham (adventurer) remained to advise and modernise the new King's army, and was made a general and governor in return. Unfortunately, he was captured while crossing into Egypt, and kept in a lion’s cage. When he was discovered in the cage by British sailors, they wanted to free him, but they were wired by London to leave him there because of his associations with the king of Ethiopia.

The British, of course, were concerned about the threat of the Mahdi, Muhammad Ahmad in the Sudan after the Siege of Khartoum - Wikipedia in 1884–1885.

Ethiopia, a mostly Christian kingdom protected East Africa from invasion. Sudan and the Mahdists remained a problem for Anglo-Egyptian forces until 1898.

What's little known is the Italians were involved in the Sudan campaign. The Italians captured a city from the Mahdists in the Sudan, just across the border from Italian held Eritrea at the Battle of Kassala in 1894. The Italians handed over the city to Egypt in return for British recognition of Italian Eritrea.

Italian victories over the Mahdists began with the Battle of the Battle of Serobeti in 1890, and the First Battle of Agordat, and again in the Second Battle of Agordat in 1893.

The Italians suffered their first major African defeat at the Battle of Adwa in 1896 at the hands of an Ethiopian army modernised by John Kirkham, and supplied by Russia. It should be pointed out, Ethiopia had an army of 80,000 armed with rifles, and 20,000 with spears and swords. Italian, Askari army had only 15,000. The Eritrean Askaris were considered traitors, and had their right hands and left feet amputated.

This was the decisive Battle of the First Italo-Ethiopian War, which arose because of understandable Ethiopian dissatisfaction over the Treaty of Wuchale in 1889. The Italians allied with Menelik II of Shewa, a major contender for the Ethiopian throne, supported his cause and supplied him with rifles.

When Menelik became the Emperor he was amenable to signing the treaty which meant Ethiopia ceded territory to Italy, and the version of the treaty in Italian effectively made Ethiopia an Italian protectorate. The Amharic version of the treaty had a different interpretation.

All of the major European powers except France and Russia accepted the Italian version of the Treaty, and both nations supplied Ethiopia with arms in their struggle with Italy. Menelik II, who modernised Ethiopia and moved the capital to Addis Ababa, was shrewd enough to figure this out.

Also, support for the war in the newly unified Italy was minimal, especially among Southern Italians who were conscripted.

The Kuban Cossack army officer N. S. Leontiev led a small team of Russian advisers and volunteers who may have taken part in the battle (Adawa), though Leontiev denied this. Though he did bring a shipment of 30,000 rifles to Ethiopia in 1895.

Anglo-Ethiopian Treaty of 1897

The Great Game

The British colonial aim was to have a continuous “British" link from Cape Town to Cairo. The French colonial aim was to link Dakar with Djibouti. South Sudan on the border with Ethiopia was key to their ambitions leading to the Fashoda Incident in 1898.

A French force from Djibouti was led by Christian de Bonchamps was stopped by the Ethiopians as it tried to cross into Sudan to meet another French force from Libreville (Gabon) under Captain Jean-Baptiste Marchand who eventually reached Fashoda where he was met by Lord Kitchener's Anglo-Egyptian force. An uneasy stalemate emerged until the ensuing diplomatic row produced a diplomatic win for Britain against the background of the Dreyfus affair, and growing concerns about the point of African adventurism in France.

So to get back to the question. Could the European powers have militarily occupied Ethiopia despite the difficult and hostile terrain? Yes, British forces achieved this with the help of rebel forces in Ethiopia.

The issue was Ethiopia didn't have the gold, diamonds, ivory, rubber and tea plantations other African countries had, and slavery had been abolished by the European powers at this stage.

East Africa didn't truly open up beyond trading posts to European colonialism until the decline of the Ottoman Empire and the construction of the Suez Canal.

Nor did it occupy a strategic position along the Nile in the way the Sudan did, and Britain could bypass Ethiopia in its bid to link Cairo and Cape Town.

It wasn't a major threat in the way the Mahdists in Sudan were, but well trained rebels would be a constant thorn in any occupier's side, and would be no doubt well supplied by one of the other European powers. 100,000 soldiers is one hell of an army you have to beat.

Difficult to know how much the respect for Ethiopia's ancient Christian traditions played a part, if at all, but if anything it may have made the Italians more interested as they were trying relive the glories of Rome as a unifying force for a very divided young nation in the 1890's. Certainly, Islam was viewed in lower regard by the European powers and considered a threat.

If France had chosen to hold onto Zula in Eritrea in 1857, and occupy Ethiopia, things might have been different. This was before the age of railways really got going, and linking Libreville with Djibouti would be a huge engineering challenge. It certainly would have made the Fashoda Incident a different proposition.

Mostly though, it was a Game of Thrones situation both within Ethiopia, and among the colonial powers jockeying for position.

The Italian occupation of Ethiopia from 1935-1941 can only be seen as an occupation, and not a colonisation. Were the Channel Islands colonised by the Germans during WW2? Significantly, the same people were in adminstration before, during, and after WW2 in Jersey. The Italian occupation would never have outlived Mussolini, and there was continuous Ethiopian resistance.

How did Ethiopia avoid being colonized by European powers?

Tony Nunes , Azorean Canadian Answered Dec 14, 2020

In part at least, it may very well be for a reason that also helped Thailand and Japan avoid European colonization: early contact and friendly relations with the Portuguese.

The Portuguese explorers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries were looking to trade with, not colonize, other lands. For example, when Portuguese explorers reached Thailand, and later Japan, in the early 1500's, amicable relationships were established with the ruling authorities in those countries. (These later turned negative in Japan and they were replaced by the Dutch as permitted European traders, but that was after decades of decent relations focused on trade and knowledge transfer.)

For these countries, the early contact and trade with the Portuguese introduced technologies such as firearms, which gave them military advantages locally, but also when dealing with other European powers that arrived in later decades and centuries. They also gained important knowledge about European civilization and technologies at a time when Europe was still not so far ahead technologically and so catch-up was not as difficult.

Based on early Portuguese trade and technology transfer, Japan developed a thriving firearms industry that became very important in its own internal affairs. As for Thailand, they even had a formal alliance with Portugal from 1511 whereby Portugal contributed soldiers to Thai King Rama Thibodi II's forces (no doubt armed with muskets). In that era, Thailand's language of diplomacy, its "lingua franca", to communicate with other Europeans who might show up was Portuguese.

Ethiopia had a similar experience, although with less trade involved due to its inland position. Besides looking to trade, the Portuguese were also looking for allies against the Islamic powers, and one they sought was the legendary king "Prester John", ruling a mysterious Christian kingdom somewhere in Asia or Africa. The Portuguese hoped to make contact and establish an alliance with this kingdom. Ethiopia was as good a candidate as any, and may in fact have been the origin of the legend, and so the Portuguese crown sent envoys there as early as 1487, and established continuous diplomatic relations in 1508.

As a kingdom allied with an important European naval power (Portugal was much more prominent at that time), this would surely have given Ethiopia a degree of protection from being targeted for colonization by other European powers. Additionally, Portugal also had a long-standing alliance with England, from 1385 (the oldest in the world still in effect today) and that may also have conferred some extra clout in the European sphere, by association.

And the desire for alliance was not just incoming from Europe, Ethiopia itself had already sought diplomatic relations with European powers from the early 15th century, even before the Portuguese arrived, and had even sent emissaries to the kingdom of Aragon in the early 1400's.

Given that Ethiopia had diplomatic relations with an important European power from such an early point in the era of European exploration, and that it was also seen in Europe as a potentially important ally against Muslim powers, this surely must have played a role in its never being colonized by European nations. Being Christian didn't hurt either, of course. In fact it may have been considered at least somewhat illegitimate to conquer it for that reason, as introducing Christianity was often part of the rational for conquering other nations.

Is it just a coincidence that Ethiopia, Thailand and Japan all had friendly diplomatic relations with Portugal in the early 1500's and were never subsequently colonized or controlled by European powers, instead being treated as favoured trading partners (Japan) or actual political allies of Portugal (Ethiopia and Thailand)? Likely it is not. It may have been the difference that allowed them to stay on a path that avoided colonization by other European powers as their military and economic strength grew in later centuries.

Was Ethiopia the only country not colonized by European countries?

No, for two reasons.

1. Liberia was colonised by an American country, not a European country.
2. Ethiopia was colonised by Italy, in 1936.

(And for the record, the fact that a few Ethiopians continued to resist the Italian colonial government in remote mountain regions doesn't mean that Ethiopia wasn't colonised. Most colonised countries had unpacified regions, or ongoing insurgencies in the back country. There were probably millions of Africans in 1937 who'd never even seen one of the Europeans who supposedly ran their countries; that's how hands-off colonial rule was.)

Outside of Africa, there were many countries never colonised by Europeans. Iran, Thailand, China, Korea and Japan come to mind.

Well to start with they were lucky to have these men:

Emperor Theodore (twadios)

Yohanns Iv

And emperor menilik the second.

Why do I mention these three?: well to start with these leader are responsible for ensuring Ethiopia independence and modernizing it.

The image pair with relationship id rId4 was not found in the file.

Let start with emperor Theodore: during the 17th-18th century, Ethiopia was a feudal society , with powerful princes/warlords and regional chiefs fighting each other for supremacy, defending their lands or expanding their realm, while the emperor was a figure head who couldn't do much to stop them tearing the country apart, since he didn't have an army of his own: think of it like sengoku jidai in Japan but set in Africa(by the way this era was known as the age of princes), in addition, there was also the fear of foreign nations trying to take advantage of this chaos in Ethiopia and invade. example of such groups were:

The Galla (Somali raiders)
The Egyptians

European, especially the Italian who were late in the coloniasation game.
All this change when our boy Theodore, a powerful warlord from a province named Qwara, vyed for the imperial throne and succeeded. This time, the emperor was no longer a ceremonial title but an active political one, and Theodore went about consolidating his power by beating other princes and making them submit his rule. While he did this , he also made plans to develop Ethiopia to modern nation:

the first thing he did was to establish a highly centralized government in which all loyalty was to the emperor(or in Amharic, Negus Nagast which means King of kings)

he Hired European technicians, artisans (there some report that he also hired missionaries) to produce guns, cannons and ammunitions to equip his army.

he also set up diplomatic relationship with European nations like the UK and France to recognize his government and country he also reform political system, dividing the areas of the country into small administrative units and appointing local rulers of these places into salaried official, or government appointed official.

then there was some land reform, such confiscating certain land from the Ethiopian church , giving it to peasant and stuff like that.

also apart from working on internal reforms, he also had grand ideas as well:

He saw himself as a Christian crusader king with the mission to wipe out Islam in Africa. and create a crusade/Christian empire

he wanted to conquer Egypt and Sudan

and he wanted to restore ancient glories of the Solomonic dynasty(even though he wasn't descendant) by capturing Jerusalem and sitting on the throne that King Solomon once sat on. yeah

unfortunately Theodore policies made a hell lot of enemies: first the nobles who didn't like to lose their privilege's , then the church same as the nobles, average jo on the street, because of the heavy taxes they had to pay for the empower projects. not to mention he also piss off a lot of his Muslim subject with his anti-muslim actions. However his downfall would come when he did a dick move by holding a British consuls and some missionaries hostages in order to bargain the British government for military equipment's and craftsman to continue this war. instead he got massive military expedition force led by a British Officer by the name of R.C Napier sent to invade the country. 1. the people of Ethiopia were not like the other African groups they encountered in a sense that all the tribes, despite their differences and customs were united both in culture and religion IE the Ethiopian Church. so if the British tried that, they would have been triggered national uprising, uniting all the rival factions, nobles, church and tribes all together. Which can be a very unpleasant experience.

2. many Ethiopian warlords had modern weapons like guns and artillery, especially they got from the brits and some they would have got from other European power, so the British are not gonna be facing any Zulu style army in this country.

3. Britain sent an army to Ethiopia only to get the British people held as hostage by the emperor back, they didn't sent their for conquest so as not as to lose support form their local allies and the public support at home. although they did do some looting like taking the imperial crown and other treasures lol.

4. the country was on the verge of anarchy after the emperor Theodore was defeated and the British army sent there wouldn't be enough to make a difference. it would have been like Afghanistan to them.

5. Ethiopia was too landlock and would really served the need of the British interest, plus they were too busy in Sudan and Egypt to be invested in Ethiopia affairs . so the best alternative was to install a moderate candidate who would be accepted by the Ethiopian elites and people.

sorry about that tangent now let get on to Emperor 2pac- i mean Yohannes IV.

When he came into power as emperor he went about restoring central authority, however unlike his predecessor, he resorted to diplomacy and negotiation with nobility and the church. he operated a federal system of government in which the local princes enjoyed some degree of autonomy in their realm in return for recognizing him as Emperor and to aid him in battle when he calls on them to with their men.

he continued Theodore policy of establishing relation with European nations and received modern military weapons and equipment's which he used to equip his army. with this he was able to successfully protect Ethiopia from external threats:

1. in 1875–1876, Emperor Yohannes army defeated an Egyptian army that was occupying Ethiopian territory on north and red sea coast. this threat came to an end when Britain occupied Egypt in 1882.

2. in 1882, the Italians, a late comer in the African colonization's, decided to try their luck in making Ethiopia their colony, but our boy 2pac(Yohannes lol) was haven't none of that and crushed an Italian expeditionary force at Dogali.

3. in 1888, Yohannes had to mobilize his force to stop an Islamic army from Sudan, known as Mahdists from invading his territory. he defeated them at the battle of Metmma but unfortunately killed by a chance bullet in march 1889. sad day for a lot of people but he went down as the greatest “what if” in Ethiopia history and a legend.

Now that Yohannes IV out of the way, up next is my next Home boy Menelik II

now I'm sure your asking who was this old badass is?

He was the ruler of a principality called Shoa which was found in Angolalla Tera, Located at the eastern edge of the Ethiopian highlands. he started off as a warlord expanding his realm to the south conquering muslim provinces like Harar and some lands with Somali speaking people. he had a rivalry with Yohannes IV over the imperial crown, but when they realize that foreign powers were hoping to exploit their rivalry to cause chaos to Ethiopia and to conquer the land, they decided to put aside their rivalry and come to a compromise: Menelik would recognized Yohannas as emperor, in return he was granted greater autonomy as King of Shoa than other provincial leaders. when Yohannas died in battle Menelik succeeded him as emperor.

Meneilk II became emperor at the time when European colonialism was very strong and it was very difficult to be an intendent nation/kingdom in Africa. the British, French, Germans, Portuguese and Belgium a have all carved up chucks of territory in Africa for themselves

Italy, after its unifications was a late comer in the imperial game and was only able to scourge a few places like Libya, Eritrea and part of Somaliland. seeing that Ethiopia was the only African nation not under any European power, they set their goal to conquer it and make it a colony and roll with the big boys in Europe. Menelik wasn't blind to this, and made is mission to thwart European encroachment in his country. He did this in three ways:

1. first he consolidated his authority in country through alliances and conquest.

2. he set up diplomatic relation with Europeans nations, most notably he was instrumental in developing good relationship with Tsarist Russian empire who become Ethiopia the main ally.

3. with diplomatic relationship with European countries, Menelik was able to secure more modern arms and equipment for his national army. in addition, he received military advisors and volunteers from Russia to help train his army.

On 2 May 1889,Menelik concluded a treaty with Italy at Wuchale (Uccialli in Italian) in Wollo province. Under the Treaty, Abyssinia/ Ethiopia and Kingdom of Italy agreed to define the boundary between Eritrea and Ethiopia. For example, both Ethiopia and Italy agreed that Arafali, Halai, Segeneiti and Asmara are villages within the Italian border. Also, the Italians agreed not to harass Ethiopian traders and to allow safe passage for Ethiopian goods, particularly military weapons in addition to respecting Ethiopia sovereignty.

However, there were two versions of the treaty, one in Italian and another in Amharic. Unknown to Menelik the Italian version gave Italy more power than the two had agreed to. The Italians believed they had "tricked" Menelik into giving allegiance to Italy. To their surprise, upon learning about the alteration, Emperor Menelik II rejected the treaty. The Italians attempted to bribe him with two million rounds of ammunition but he refused. they wrote a letter to notify other European power that Ethiopia was under Italian control, But Menelik conter back by writing his own letter to the European nation saying he did not surrender his country sovereignty and he was backed by Russia, and to an extent britan . Then the Italians approached Ras Mengesha of Tigray, the son of the late Yohannes Iv who contender and rival for the Imperial throne with Menelik, in an attempt to create civil war, however, Ras Mengesha, despite his rivalry with Menelik , understood that Ethiopia's independence was at stake, and so refused to be a puppet for the Italians or to rebel against Menelik.

At this point, Italy, seeing that the Ethiopian Emperor was politically astute and cunning and wouldn't fall for the same trick other European used in other parts of Africa, decided to resort to a military invasion in 1895, hoping to use their militarty might to put Menelik in his place, just like what their European counterpart did to other African groups and leaders in the continent. But boy did they underestimate their enemy as Menelik was not only politically savy he was also skilled war leader.

On 17 September 1895, Menelik ordered all of the Ethiopian nobility to call out their banners and raise their feudal hosts, stating:

"An enemy has come across the sea. He has broken through our frontiers in order to destroy our fatherland and our faith. I allowed him to seize my possessions and I entered upon lengthy negotiations with him in hopes of obtaining justice without bloodshed. But the enemy refuses to listen. He undermines our territories and our people like a mole. Enough! With the help of God I will defend the inheritance of my forefathers and drive back the invader by force of arms. Let every man who has sufficient strength accompany me. And he who has not, let him pray for us".

Despite the dismissive Italian claim that Ethiopia was a "barbaric" African nation whose men were no match for white troops(classic eurocentrism), the Ethiopians forces were better armed, being equipped with thousands of modern French rifles and Hotchkiss artillery guns together with ammunition and shells which were superior to the Italian rifles and artillery(not to mention the weapons and arms the Italian supplied them with which came back to bite the Italian in the ass)

well it so turns out that it was the so called “barbaric African nation” that put the Italian in their place, which they did at the Battle of Adwa:

The Italians suffered about 6,000 killed and 1,500 wounded in the battle and subsequent retreat back into Eritrea, with 3,000 taken prisoner. Brigadiers Dabormida and Arimondi were amongst the dead. Ethiopian losses have been estimated at around 4,000–5,000 killed and 8,000 wounded.

Menelik push the Italians all the way back to Eretria, but instead of advancing forward and taking the place. he decided to halt his men at the border. he knew that if he entered the Italian colony it would give the Italian government a reason to strongly intervene and back a second invasion. so, he instead sought to restore the peace that had been broken by the Italians and their treaty manipulation seven years before. the Treaty of Addis Ababa was reached between the two nations. Italy was forced to recognize the absolute independence of Ethiopia, as described in Article III of the treaty, and would foreign onlookers like the British and Russian watching, Italy lost any hope of colonizing Ethiopia.

after the war was over Menelik went to work modernizing Ethiopia. Following the rush by the major powers to establish diplomatic relations following the Ethiopian victory at Adwa, more and more westerners began to travel to Ethiopia looking for trade, farming, hunting, and mineral exploration concessions.

Menelik II founded the first modern bank in Ethiopia, the Bank of Abyssinia, introduced the first modern postal system, signed the agreement and initiated work that established the Addis Ababa –Djibouti railway with the French, introduced electricity to Addis Ababa, as well as the telephone, telegraph, the motor car, and modern plumbing.

Foundation of a Permeant Capital

For a period Ethiopia lacked a permanent capital; instead, the royal encampment served as a roving capital. For a time Menelik's camp was on Mount Entoto, but in 1886, while Menelik was on campaign in Harar, Empress Taytu Betul camped at a hot spring to the south of Mount Entoto. She decided to build a house there and from 1887 this was her permanent base, which she named Addis Ababa (new flower). Menelik's Generals were all allocated land nearby to build their own houses, and in 1889 work began in a new royal palace. The city grew rapidly, and by 1910 the city had around 70,000 permanent inhabitants, with up to 50,000 more on a temporary basis.

Only in 1917, after Menelik's death, was the city reached by the railway from Djibouti.

now i would like to end it here before i go on and on. now to answer the question: How did Ethiopia avoid being colonized by European powers?, well to me it boils down to them having emperors that were aware of the dangers of European encroachment in Africa and to determined that their nations do not fall victims like other African groups they saw it as necessary to unite the Ethiopia and all the different tribes and faction as one people. they also used to diplomacy with different European nation in order secure modern weapons to equip their army so that they can have a fighting chance against any potential invaders. leaders like Yohannes and Menelik were pragmatic and Astute politicians who never fell for any tricks played by European powers to deceive them into surrendering their country sovereignty.

that is all and do forgive me for this long answer as I had to use my old school text books, wiki and encyclopedia to get information that I wrote down. I hope you enjoy the reading and peace out

Ethiopia is a Christian country and partaken in a level of Christian help from European countries, from the Portuguese to the English. Having a Christian ruler in control (the famous Prester John, conceivably) most certainly kept it out of pilgrim hands.

Ethiopia additionally wasn't on the coast. Remember that European infiltration into Africa was incredibly restricted until the initial not many years of the nineteenth century. Ethiopia was generally inland and spent quite a while in disengagement from the 1600s to the 1800s. There was certifiably not a ton of valid justification to go the whol

The best way to answer this question is to start with a little known episode in East African history: Russian Cossacks tried to establish a Russian colony at Sagallo in present day Djibouti. This man, Nikolay Ivanovitch Achinov, visited Ethiopia in order to establish ties between Russia and Ethiopia in 1883.

It's important to remember Russia and Ethiopia had spiritual links because they were both Orthodox Christian countries. There was another supposed link:

This is Abram Petrovich Gannibal, the son of an African prince who was abducted into slavery by Ottoman Turks and later ended up in Russia, becoming Peter The Great's godson, and the great-grand father of Alexander Pushkin the Russian poet. He went on to become a general in the Russian Imperial Army and Russia's first great engineer.

His son Ivan Gannibal was famous in his own right.

Both were and still are considered to be of Ethiopian heritage in Russia, and Abram is especially revered. Most historians today think Cameroon is more likely to be Gannibal's origin.

Back in Russia, Achinov arranged for a colonial expedition to set up a Russian port on the Red Sea coast. The Red Sea had become much more important for Europe since the opening up of the Suez Canal in 1869, and Egypt was no longer under Ottoman control.

The 165 Terek Cossacks were greeted by Ethiopian priests when they landed on December 10 1883. In January 14, they took over an abandoned Egyptian port at Sagallo. Achinov struggled to control his fellow Cossacks as they raided the Danakil Afars. Achinov had to pay compensation to the sultan for these acts. A few disgruntled Russians escaped and told the French of the location of the colony, and on February 5 a French cruiser and 3 gunships turned up, after a bombardment of the fort renamed as “ Little Moscow” in which 7 Cossacks were killed, the Cossacks were allowed to leave.

Alexander II of Russia, notionally an ally of France, quickly disowned Achinov and his failed colonial adventure probably fearing French and British reprisals a couple of decades on from the Crimean War. Also Russia was more interested in expansion in the east.

Zula was a port in Eritrea which from 1857 was granted to the French by Dejazmach of Tigray who was in revolt against Tewodros II. When a French cruiser arrived in 1859, the commander found the region to be a state of anarchy. So figuring it was more trouble than it was worth, the French abandoned plans of occupying Eritrea which later was occupied by the Italians, and handed over control of Zula to Anglo-Egypt in 1869.

Tewodros called himself the Negus or king, a title which has Semitic biblical roots, and considered himself to be descended from Solomon. From humble origins, he unified Ethiopia, created a standing army, and amassed a fair sized arsenal including a mortar cannon forged at Gafat called the Sevastapol, which ultimately didn't work when later used against the British. His arsenal included:

11,063 rifles, 875 pistols, 481 bayonets, 83,563 bullets, 15 cannons, 7 mortars, and 55 cannon shells. (Wiki)

Under Tewodros, Ethiopia was assailed from all sides by rebels, the Ottomans, Egypt, and Sudan. So Tewodros sent out letters to all of the colonial powers requesting assistance. Only the French replied.

The British were more concerned about keeping good relations with the Ottomans (acting as a buffer against Russian expansion), and Egypt, as they wanted to secure their trade route to India.

A perceived insult led to Tewodros kidnapping the British consul among others, and despite the Russians interceding on behalf of the hostages, Tewodros refused to budge.

This led to the British landing at Zula in 1867 under general Robert Napier, 1st Baron Napier of Magdala and the British Expedition to Abyssinia. The British won the decisive Battle of Magdala 1868 against a force of 9,000. They won the war, but lost the peace. Napier didn't want the fortress of Magdala falling into the hands of his Muslim allies the Obromo Queen of Wallo. So he destroyed the fortress. Napier did the usual looting of artefacts, many of which are on display in British museums.

Although the British retreated from Magdala full of the pomp of victory, the Ethiopians saw them as a weak retreating “here today gone tomorrow” army. However, a British soldier, John Kirkham (adventurer) remained to advise and modernise the new King's army, and was made a general and governor in return. Unfortunately, he was captured while crossing into Egypt, and kept in a lion’s cage. When he was discovered in the cage by British sailors, they wanted to free him, but they were wired by London to leave him there because of his associations with the king of Ethiopia.

The British, of course, were concerned about the threat of the Mahdi, Muhammad Ahmad in the Sudan after the Siege of Khartoum - Wikipedia in 1884–1885.

Ethiopia, a mostly Christian kingdom protected East Africa from invasion. Sudan and the Mahdists remained a problem for Anglo-Egyptian forces until 1898.

What's little known is the Italians were involved in the Sudan campaign. The Italians captured a city from the Mahdists in the Sudan, just across the border from Italian held Eritrea at the Battle of Kassala in 1894. The Italians handed over the city to Egypt in return for British recognition of Italian Eritrea.

Italian victories over the Mahdists began with the Battle of the Battle of Serobeti in 1890, and the First Battle of Agordat, and again in the Second Battle of Agordat in 1893.

The Italians suffered their first major African defeat at the Battle of Adwa in 1896 at the hands of an Ethiopian army modernised by John Kirkham, and supplied by Russia. It should be pointed out, Ethiopia had an army of 80,000 armed with rifles, and 20,000 with spears and swords. Italian, Askari army had only 15,000. The Eritrean Askaris were considered traitors, and had their right hands and left feet amputated.

This was the decisive Battle of the First Italo-Ethiopian War, which arose because of understandable Ethiopian dissatisfaction over the Treaty of Wuchale in 1889. The Italians allied with Menelik II of Shewa, a major contender for the Ethiopian throne, supported his cause and supplied him with rifles.

When Menelik became the Emperor he was amenable to signing the treaty which meant Ethiopia ceded territory to Italy, and the version of the treaty in Italian effectively made Ethiopia an Italian protectorate. The Amharic version of the treaty had a different interpretation.

All of the major European powers except France and Russia accepted the Italian version of the Treaty, and both nations supplied Ethiopia with arms in their struggle with Italy. Menelik II, who modernised Ethiopia and moved the capital to Addis Ababa, was shrewd enough to figure this out.

Also, support for the war in the newly unified Italy was minimal, especially among Southern Italians who were conscripted.

The Kuban Cossack army officer N. S. Leontiev led a small team of Russian advisers and volunteers who may have taken part in the battle (Adawa), though Leontiev denied this. Though he did bring a shipment of 30,000 rifles to Ethiopia in 1895.

Anglo-Ethiopian Treaty of 1897

The Great Game

The British colonial aim was to have a continuous “British" link from Cape Town to Cairo. The French colonial aim was to link Dakar with Djibouti. South Sudan on the border with Ethiopia was key to their ambitions leading to the Fashoda Incident in 1898.

A French force from Djibouti was led by Christian de Bonchamps was stopped by the Ethiopians as it tried to cross into Sudan to meet another French force from Libreville (Gabon) under Captain Jean-Baptiste Marchand who eventually reached Fashoda where he was met by Lord Kitchener's Anglo-Egyptian force.

An uneasy stalemate emerged until the ensuing diplomatic row produced a diplomatic win for Britain against the background of the Dreyfus affair, and growing concerns about the point of African adventurism in France.

So to get back to the question. Could the European powers have militarily occupied Ethiopia despite the difficult and hostile terrain? Yes, British forces achieved this with the help of rebel forces in Ethiopia.

The issue was Ethiopia didn't have the gold, diamonds, ivory, rubber and tea plantations other African countries had, and slavery had been abolished by the European powers at this stage.

East Africa didn't truly open up beyond trading posts to European colonialism until the decline of the Ottoman Empire and the construction of the Suez Canal.

Nor did it occupy a strategic position along the Nile in the way the Sudan did, and Britain could bypass Ethiopia in its bid to link Cairo and Cape Town.

It wasn't a major threat in the way the Mahdists in Sudan were, but well trained rebels would be a constant thorn in any occupier's side, and would be no doubt well supplied by one of the other European powers. 100,000 soldiers is one hell of an army you have to beat.

Difficult to know how much the respect for Ethiopia's ancient Christian traditions played a part, if at all, but if anything it may have made the Italians more interested as they were trying relive the glories of Rome as a unifying force for a very divided young nation in the 1890's. Certainly, Islam was viewed in lower regard by the European powers and considered a threat.

If France had chosen to hold onto Zula in Eritrea in 1857, and occupy Ethiopia, things might have been different. This was before the age of railways really got going, and linking Libreville with Djibouti would be a huge engineering challenge. It certainly would have made the Fashoda Incident a different proposition.

Mostly though, it was a Game of Thrones situation both within Ethiopia, and among the colonial powers jockeying for position.

The Italian occupation of Ethiopia from 1935-1941 can only be seen as an occupation, and not a colonisation. Were the Channel Islands colonised by the Germans during WW2? Significantly, the same people were in adminstration before, during, and after WW2 in Jersey. The Italian occupation would never have outlived Mussolini, and there was continuous Ethiopian resistance.

Ethiopia was never colonized for the following reasons.

Unity. By the time Italy came to colonize Ethiopia in mid 1890s, the Emperor then had just finished expanding, uniting & reigning over present day Ethiopia. Under his leadership & call he was able to mobilize an army of 100,000 people (from different parts of the country) at that time.

Unity continued. When the Italians (like other European colonialists)attempted to implement their rather common method of 'divide & conquer', the Ethiopian Kings refused to fight & instead renewed their loyalties to each other . The Italians had suggested in Occupation is a temporary military measure imposed after a war. The intention is to compel the defeated country to agree to a peace treaty; after which the occupier will withdraw its forces and restore independence and sovereignty to the defeated country.

The US policy in Iraq after 2003 can be called an 'occupation' because the United States never intended to retain control of Iraq permanently. Their objective was to defeat the Saddam regime and remove its sympathisers from power, supervise the creation of an independent government, then withdraw their troops and leave Iraq to its own devices.

It has a bit of natural protection. The desert terrain, lack of compelling natural resources, and location mostly off of major trade routes put it out of the way for most imperialist enterprises. It was too far north, for example, to be a stop along the way to India for ships going around southern Africa, controlled too little coastline to be a meaningful obstacle for shipping going through Egypt, and was too far east of the Nile for anyone concerned with a north-south route connecting British African colonies.

But there's an odd social and political component to it as well. Ethiopia converted

How vaccination works
Vaccination works like this: You take a small amount of a bacteria that has been modified so that it can not make a full scale invasion of the human body. You put the vaccine in a human body. The human immune system will react to the vaccine and develop the antibodies that can defeat the invading bacteria. When the real invasion comes, the immune system is ready and can fight the invasion off.

Was Ethiopia the only country not colonized by European countries?

Stephen Tempest , MA Modern History, University of Oxford (1985) Answered Dec 10, 2018

No, for two reasons.

Liberia was colonised by an American country, not a European country.
Ethiopia was colonised by Italy, in 1936.

(And for the record, the fact that a few Ethiopians continued to resist the Italian colonial government in remote mountain regions doesn't mean that Ethiopia wasn't colonised. Most colonised countries had unpacified regions, or ongoing insurgencies in the back country. There were probably millions of Africans in 1937 who'd never even seen one of the Europeans who supposedly ran their countries; that's how hands-off colonial rule was.)

Outside of Africa, there were many countries never colonised by Europeans. Iran, Thailand, China, Korea and Japan come to mind.

Why were Ethiopia and Liberia independent in 1914?

Nubnub Hubbub , works at American International School Chennai Answered Jul 25, 2015

Ethiopia is a mountainous nation that has existed for thousands of years, even existing as the kingdom of Axum in Roman times. It was a powerful empire at the time of the scramble for Africa, and, since it lacks natural resources, had a large military and good diplomatic relations with many nations, it was not a target for any of the major European powers. While Italy did twice attempt to conquer the nation, they won only due to their advanced European weaponry and occupied the nation for only a few years. The nation has had a strong sense of independence, and due to the skilled leaders Menelik II and Haile Selassie, Ethiopia remained a well known and powerful country and a member of the league of nations, which was supposed to guarantee its existence.

Liberia, while technically never colonized, was never taken over by Europeans because Americans got there first. It was supposed to be a refuge for freed slaves to return to "the homeland" and establish a new African nation, but it went horribly wrong and now the nation is a mess. Europeans have always feared a war with the U.S. and thus stay away from Liberia.

What I find particularly puzzling about such a question is that there are a lot of (sovereign and internationally recognized) countries that were similarly occupied for a few years by foreign powers during WW2 but nobody ever talks about them being "colonised" during this period (e.g. Poland). Ethiopia was a member of the League of Nations when it was invaded and briefly OCCUPIED by another country.

Réponse originale : Outre l'Égypte ancienne, quels autres royaumes / tribus / pays / civilisations / empires africains ont eu une histoire fascinante ?

L'Ethiopie.

Un royaume très ancien, essentiellement chrétien bien avant que la majorité de l'Europe ne le devienne. L'Ethiopie a vraisemblablement inspiré le mythe du royaume du prêtre Jean, royaume chrétien légendaire situé en Orient, qu'ont recherché de nombreux explorateurs européens.

L'Ethiopie a été dirigée de manière quasi continue de 1270 à 1974 par la dynastie salomonide, qui disait descendre du roi Salomon (roi d'Israël au 10ème siècle avant JC).

L'Éthiopie est l'un des deux seuls pays africains (avec le Liberia) à avoir préservé son indépendance lors du partage de l'Afrique. C'est aussi le seul royaume d'Afrique subsaharienne à avoir remporté une guerre contre les envahisseurs européens*, battant l'Italie lors de la bataille d'Adowa en 1896. L'Italie a toutefois remporté la deuxième manche dans les années 1930, en utilisant du gaz moutarde. Mais l'empereur Haïlé Sélassié a formé un gouvernement en exil et, lorsque l'Italie a rejoint la Deuxième Guerre mondiale contre les Alliés, le Royaume-Uni a rapidement libéré le pays. Anecdote : Haïlé Sélassié est l'un des rares chefs d'État modernes à être vénéré comme un dieu par les rastas.

* Un autre pays africain, la République du Transvaal, a infligé une défaite aux Européens en 1881 lors du partage de l'Afrique. Mais contrairement à l'Éthiopie, la République du Transvaal a finalement été dissoute, suite à la perte de la seconde guerre des Boers en 1902.

L'histoire récente de l'Ethiopie a été plutôt sombre. Après la chute de Haïlé Sélassié, l'Éthiopie est passée sous le régime communiste. De 1983 à 1985, le pays a connu une famine qui a entraîné la mort de centaines de milliers de personnes. Cela a été suivi en 1991 par la perte d'une longue guerre de sécession avec la province d'Érythrée, qui a obtenu son indépendance, coûtant à l'Éthiopie son seul accès à la mer. Plus de 86 000 Éthiopiens sont aujourd'hui des réfugiés, soit le 19ème plus haut total au niveau mondial.

In 1978, the battle of Ogaden ended.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 7h

The Ogaden War was a Somali □□ military offensive over the disputed Ethiopian region of Ogaden. The war began in 1977, when Somali troops invaded □□ Ethiopia. It was one of Africa's most significant international wars.

The Ogaden conflict held significance greater than most territorial disputes because Ethiopia was backed by the Soviet Union and Somalia by the □□ United States, thus bringing the Cold War to Eastern Africa.

When the conflict began in July 1977, Ethiopia controlled approximately 10% of the Ogaden region. With greater and more consistent Soviet aid, however, they drove back the Somali Army and its allies.

By March 1978, the Ethiopians had captured almost all of the Ogaden, prompting the defeated Somalis to give up their claim to the region.

Let's Discuss Ancient and Medieval Africa
Ancient Ethiopian time measurement.

Posted by Firew Afera 8h

The Ethiopian Orthodox church has been a custodian of an Ethiopian scholarly tradition spanning millennia.

As a person rises through the ranks of the Church, they would have access to knowledge from both spiritual and scholarly realms.

We know that time is measured in hours, minutes, seconds microseconds etc… A day is composed of 24 hours whereas a week contains seven days.

However, the Church measures time quite differently. The Ethiopian calender, which is still used in the country, is based upon this method of measuring time.

Both the calender and time measurement system are part of Abu Shahr (Bahre Hasab) method of denoting time.

Dividing the day:

One day is considered to be 60 Kekros.

1 kekros equals 60 Kalit.

1 Kalit equals 60 Salsit.

1 Salsit equals 60 Raabit.

1 Raabit equals 60 Hamsit.

1 Hamsit equals 60 Sadsit.

A time measured in this manner can easily be converted into the conventional time system we use. Since a day is composed of 24 hours, we know that 24 hours are the same as 60 Kekros. After converting hours to minutes, we see that 1 Kerkos amounts to about 24 minutes.

Ethiopian calender.

A day is considered to be a time at which the sun shines in the day, and a moon shines in the night.

Now, the moon shines for a shorter time compared to the Sun. It is believed that the sun shines for additional 52 Kalit and 31 Salsit.

Thus, We have a 52 Kalit and 31 Salsit extra for every day we spend.

In a year, 52 Kalit and 30 Salsit will accumulate to 5 days, 15 Kekros. For every year we spend, we have additional 5 days, 15 Kekros and 1 Salsit that we do not account for in the calender.

The ancient Ethiopians used to count this extra as a 31th day in certain months of the year (like the Gregorian calender).

However, Ethiopian scholars later decided to add an additional month called ``Pagume`` to the 12-month calender that we all know. This makes the Ethiopian calender a 13-month calender.

Pagume regularly consists of five days. However, Pagume will consist of six days once in a 4 year period. This is because the 15 Kekros extra (that accumulates every year, by the way) will amount to a day (60 Kekros) after 4 years.

In a similar manner, Pagume will constitute 7 days once every 600 years. This is because the 1 Salsit that we did not account for in a daily basis above (we only converted the 52 Kalit and 30 Salsit) will amount to a day after 600 years.

Are Ethiopians black?

Patrick Murciélago , IT Entrepreneur (2005-present) Updated Dec 6, 2020 · Upvoted by Edgar Bernal Sevilla , Assistant Curator at Imperial Valley Desert Museum

Don’t be fooled by the pictures of light-skinned girls that most people post to justify that Ethiopians are not Africans. It is like claiming that all the black people in USA are tall and fit like the NBA players.

Ethiopia should not be associated with one ethnic group, religion or language. It is a very diverse country both genetically and culturally.

Indeed, Ethiopia is a federal country of 10 regional states each hosting at least one distinct ethnic group with a different language and/or religion.

To understand the origins and culture of Ethiopians it is important to identify the 3 major genetic groups: 1. Cushitic tribes (Oromo, Somali, Afar). 2. The Nilo-Saharan & Omotic group (Gambela, Mursi, Gamo) and 3. Semitic or Habesha tribes (Amhara and Tigray).

The Afar people who live near the sea actually tend to be extremely dark like the Nilotic tribes of Kenya and South Sudan.

A young Afar man. Does he look black? Yes

A beautiful Afar woman. Does she look black?

Now on to the next.

The Oromos are estimated to be around 45 million and hence close to 40% of the entire population of Ethiopia. In fact, the majority of Oromo people are dark-skinned.

Haile Gebrselassie, the legendary Olympic athlete. Does he look black? Yes.

Oromo youth, the majority tribe in Ethiopia. Do they look black? Yes.

Now on to the people of SNNPR.

Mengistu Haile Mariam, former president of Ethiopia. Does he look black? Yes.

The people of Gambela and SNNPR regions of Ethiopia are mostly Nilo-Saharans or they speak Omotic languages. The Ethiopian Morsi look like the Nuer or Dinka of South Sudan.

"I'm not black, I'm Habesha (OJ)" Okay

The Habesha people are from the Northern part of Ethiopia, specifically, the regions of Tigray, Amhara and Beta Israel (The Jewish Ethiopians). The term Habesha is usually extended to include the Eritreans and most people from this region tend to think they are not black at all.

The image pair with relationship ID rId42 was not found in the file.

The Jews of Ethiopia or Beta Israel (meaning House of Israel). Are they black? Well, it took a while for them to figure it out.

The Jewish Ethiopians claim descent from Menelik I, the son of Queen Sheba (Makeda in Ethiopia) and King Solomon of Israel. When Ethiopia embraced Christianity in the 4th century, they refused to convert and preserved their Jewish traditions i.e. they prayed in synagogues, practiced circumcision and observed Sabbath and many other Jewish rituals.

In the 18th century, European explorers in search for the source of the Nile reported the existence the Beta Israel community in Ethiopia which ignited the myth of the lost tribe of Dan.

From 1980 to 1992, the Ethiopian Jews who were threatened by famine, political unrest and the hostility of the communist regime led by Col Mengistu were rescued on several operations in which around 100,000 Jewish Ethiopians were airlifted to Israel.

Black Lives Matter protests in Israel.

Unfortunately, the Jewish Ethiopians claim that they are treated like second-class citizens in Israel because they are BLACK. Indeed, Ethiopian Jews face discrimination, racism, suffer the highest poverty rate among the Jews in Israel and suffer much higher levels of police arrests and incarceration just like black people in America.

Regardless, there are positive changes happening in Israel.

This is Lt. Col. Dr. Avraham Yitzhak, Israel's first colonel to come from the Ethiopian community. Is he black? Yes.

Eskinder Nega is a famous Ethiopian activist and journalist. Does he look black? Yes

Most people think that all the Amhara and Tigray ladies are light-skinned with curly hair as evidenced by the answers you will find here but this is completely false.

A group of Amhara people. Do they look white?

A group of girls in Tigray region (Northern Ethiopia). Do they look black? Yes if you compare with the pic below of the Caucasian, Asian and Ethiopian ladies standing together.

The Amhara people to a small extent and Tigrayans in general have minor Berber, Arab or Persian genetic ad mixture due to years of trade and cultural exchange between the ancient Axum Kingdom and Arabia. There is a reason why both Yemen and Ethiopia claim to be the origin of Coffee or the birthplace of Queen Sheba.

Pres. Paul Kagame and PM Dr. Abiy of Ethiopia. Do they look different? No. Are they black? Yes. Shall we say that the Rwandans are not black? That would be dumb.

Where does the confusion come from? I think it is an inferiority complex. The Ethiopians like most Africans and Indians were brainwashed by the Western media to believe that everybody with a white or light skin is better than them. I dated a beautiful Ethiopian girl and she would put extensions on her hair and use exotic lotions to look “white”.

Here is a picture of rappers Drake and Abel Makkonen Tesfaye known professionally as The Weeknd who is a son of Ethiopian immigrants to Canada.

Drake’s mother is white just like former President Obama's mother. We all know Obama as the first BLACK president of the USA. The Weeknd is a proud successful black artist, but some people in Ethiopia still struggle with their identity and they would tell you a different story.

However, a recent sad anecdote can provide insights to your question; it is about the most famous Ethiopian in the world; who ironically is originally from the region most Ethiopians would consider highly mixed or Habesha (Tigray)… Dr. Tedros A. Ghebreyesus, the boss of WHO.

In the midst of the global pandemic of Covid-19, Dr. Tedros was subjected to racist comments and death threats. Dr Tedros responded: "I can tell you personal attacks that have been going on for months. Abuses, or racist comments, giving me names, black or Negro. I'm proud of being black, proud of being Negro."

The only Ethiopian who will tell you he/she is not black does not either have a passport or an education.

So, the Adal (a mix of peoples under the overall command of the Afar)-Abyssinian Wars (The main power in Somalia was Sultanate of Ajuran, who successfully drove off Portuguese conquest):

The Portuguese were major aid-however, let's not forget the death of Cristóvão da Gama at Wofla, as well as the critical link in their chain, Bahr Negus Yeshaq of the Medri Bahri. He was a skilled politician and general, and controlled the critical region of Debarwa

The War continued even after João de Castilho sniped off Imam Ahmad Gura (although the extent of Ahmad's wound was not clear, only that his head was later taken by Azmach Calite) . Massive famines weakened the Adal, but Nur ibn Mujahid not only rebuilt the army, but slew Emperor Galawdewos at Fatagar and became Sultan of Harar. Harar in turn broke in a series of coups and civil wars. When Sulṭān Maḥamed Nāssir invaded Ethiopia, he was slain by Negusa Nagast Sarsa Dengel.

The real winner of the wars were the Oromo. While both nations fended off the rising power of the Oromo, they were there to stay.

The Somalis weren't significantly involved in the Adal and Harar wars, and even if the Adal had gone further inland, they probably would have reached a natural limit with terrain and Ethiopian resistance.

Would Ethiopia have survived Somali aggression without the help of the Portuguese Empire?

Firew Afera , Read books about Ethiopian history Answered Mar 25

If you are asking about the Abyssinia-vs-Adal war of 1529–1543 (E.C.), you should know that it could not be described as an Ethiopian-versus-Somalian conflict. Many ethnic groups from the Horn of Africa participated in the war; Adals (who are now called Afars), Hadiyas, Hararis, Argobbas and many others. Somalis were just one of those ethnic groups. The leader of the Adal forces, Ahmed Gran, was a Beja from the Balaw tribe.

It is well known that people of the Christian Highland kingdom were involved in guerilla warfare against the Adalites long before the Portuguese arrived. It is believed that the mountainous terrain of Ethiopia proved to be very difficult for the Adalites to deal with. Ahmed Gran never managed to settle down throughout the 13-year occupation of the Christian highland kingdom. He failed to capture Lebne-Dingel (the deposed emperor of Ethiopia). The emperor died a natural death in 1540 E.C. Instead, he resorted to activities such as burning churches, monasteries and ancient books.

It is said that the custom of eating raw meat started during the occupation of Ahmed Gran. Ethiopian fighters, to hide themselves from the soliders of Ahmed Gran, learned to not use fire to cook their meals. This is another evidence that there were Ethiopians actively resisting the Adalite occupation during the 13-year period.

Whether the Portuguese arrived or not, it would have been very hard for Ahmed Gran to pacify the CHK and rebrand it as a Muslim dependency. Unlike other Muslim conquests, Gran did not aim to promote religious tolerance at least during the initial periods of his rule; he attacked the Orthodox faith of the people all the time. That would have resulted protracted resistance against his rule in a terrain suitable for hide-and-seek warfare tactics.

Why is Ethiopia's Somali region not part of Somalia? Is it due to Ethiopian imperialism or colonialism?

Gamadiid Buraale , lifelong student of history and societies Answered Oct 19, 2019

The misinformation regarding Somalia and Somali history is astounding.

The idea of a nation-state was born in Europe out of the Westphalia Treaty in 1648. The idea that all parts of the world must adhere to this ideology is inherently ethnocentric and reveals the extent to which Western ideas are pushed onto the non-Western world.

Somalis had monarchs. They were not chosen but rather born into their position just as European monarchs were. The Somali Peninsula consisted of different, sovereign regions that had their own system of rule. The mere fact that this differs from the European Westphalian system does not justify a violation of their sovereignty and it certainly does not justify either European or African colonialism. There are other morsels of misinformation that I can mention but that would derail from the main question.

Somalia's regions are divided directly because of colonialism. Throughout colonialism, Britain has divided Somali people's region in order to weaken them.

Map showing current-day Somalia in dark blue and the other regions of the Horn's Somali region in light blue.

Ethiopia was an empire and partner to Britain in colonizing its neighbours, with the united goal of spreading Christianity in the Horn. Ethiopia's Somali region was not a part of Abyssinia throughout its history. It has always been a sovereign, Somali nation ruled by Somali monarchs and rulers. Until the Brits began imperialism in the Somali Peninsula, which was met with resistance from the Somalis. Britain gave Abyssinia the Somali region of Ogaden in return for Ethiopia assisting Britain in colonizing their African neighbours and in fighting the French.

When Italy conquered Ethiopia in the 1930s, it returned Ogaden to Italian Somaliland and outlawed slavery in Ethiopia. Ethiopia campaigned in London to European allies in order to be granted Eritrea and Ogaden in the 1940s to no avail. But the Brits again gave Ethiopia the Somali region of Ogaden and Haud in the late 1940s-1954. For decades, Somalis of the Ogaden region have faced oppression and genocide at the hands of Ethiopia which seeks to provide from the rich oil reserves of Ogaden while cleansing the region of Somalis.

The British also gave a portion of Somalia (the North Frontier District or NFD) to Kenya. Kenya has systematically subjugated Somalis, expelling them from their own region of NFD to Somalia, placing Somalis in a concentration camp, forcing Somalis to carry ID cards whereas other ethnic groups are not forced to do so by the Kenyan government, and numerous others examples of ethnic discrimination. There have also been various genocides committed by the Kenyan government against Somalis such as the Garissa Genocide of 1980. Both Ogaden and the NFD are currently colonies of Ethiopia and Kenya, respectively,

The French, who colonized a portion of coastal north Somalia, held a rigged referendum in the late 1950s regarding whether the Somali region will remain a colony of France or return to Somalia. The French colonialists expelled many Somalis before the referendum from their own region and after that only 20% of the Somali population was allowed to register to vote, the French moved in thousands of Ethiopian Afars who were persuaded to vote "yes" to continued French colonialism, and moved in more Europeans in order to ensure that the "yes" vote will win. Hence, French Somaliland remained colonized until 1977 and became the country known as Djibouti.

Considering this history, to claim that Somalia's regions (Djibouti, Ogaden, Haud, Somalia, NFD) are divided today for any reason other than colonialism shows how African and especially Horn African history is little known outside of the Horn.

Somalis within these divided regions are the ones who have fought hardest for independence and have faced continued genocide and oppression. Sovereignty is their right, as it is any one else's right. One does not become deserving of freedom only if they imitate Western styles of governance. The push for these regions to either return to Somalia or to become separate is to ensure that they no longer face exploitation and human rights abuses at the hands of Ethiopian and Kenyan governments. After all, colonialism at the hands of Africans is no better than colonialism at the hands of Europeans.

If we peacefully unite Ethiopia, Eritrea, Somalia, and Djibouti by creating a Horn of Africa nation, what would this country look like?

Adey Gurshan Answered Sep 8, 2020 · Upvoted by Jawad Falak , MSC International Relations & Terrorism, National Defence University, Pakistan (2015)

A unified Horn of Africa is not feasible for the next 50–100 years. All four nations have serious dilemmas to deal with individually and need to fix on their own before ever entertaining such thoughts.

Ethiopia is still debating if ethnic federalism is divisive or holding the country together by respecting people's differences. Somalia has to deal with Islamic fundamentalist terrorists known as Al-Shabab who blow themselves up whenever any progress is made in the country, because of jihad (holy war) in a country that is 99% Muslim, go figure! If this isn't the very definition of mental illness I don't know what is.

Eritrean dictator Isaias Afwerki has been in power since 1991 and turned the country into the North Korea of Africa. 29 years of Socialism has left the youth jobless and on top of that there's mandatory conscription in a border war with Ethiopia that ended in 2018! Djibouti has had the same "president" Ismail Guelleh for 21 years.

I guess if the countries do you unite the one good thing is the fact that there's NO difference between Eritrea/Somalia/Djibouti in relation to Ethiopia. What I mean is that ALL the ethnic groups in those countries are found in Ethiopia.

That's why the Eritrean dictator's family is from Kola Tembien, Ethiopia. Ismail Guelleh of Djibouti is from Dire Dawa, Ethiopia. Somalia's prominent leaders are Ethiopian like Siad Barre who's from Shilabo, Ethiopia.

Ethiopia's states named after the biggest ethnic groups there, except for SNNPS which has like 70 different ethnic groups.

The main tribes of Somalia Hawiye-Issaq-Darood-Dir are all native to eastern Ethiopia.

Ethnic breakdown of Djibouti. The native Somali and Afar of Djibouti are also native to Ethiopia.

Only Tigre, Hedareb(Beja), and Rashida in Eritrea are not found in Ethiopia. Tigre speak a language that descended from Ge’ez like Ethiopian semitic speakers (Amharic, Gurage, Tigrinya, Harari, ect). Beja are a Cushitic people like Afar, Somali, Oromo, ect. The only outlier in Eritrea are the Rashida who are an Arab tribe from the Hejaz region of Saudi Arabia who moved to the Horn of Africa in the 1800s.

Personally I don’t think we need political integration as long as we have deep economic ties like in the EU, and military cooperation with something akin to NATO so that we are deterred from fighting with each other. I believe this is what our leaders are currently working on.

Only dumb would think they could conquer Ethiopia. One of the most ancient country in the world and Africa, their identity is long based on Christianity of Orthodoxy branch, and they are renowned military warriors, those who could not be conquered.

And combining with their terrains…

Ethiopia is a tough, real tough nut. Their terrains are pretty mountainous, uneasy to takeover and even when the invaders could reach in their soil, they would not be able to hold long.

Somali Sultanates and its Ottoman brethren attempted to takeover Ethiopia. Ethiopians kicked them very hard. The Sudanese Mahdis attempted to make Ethiopia a Sharia state, but were repelled by the Ethiopians and even Ethiopia (then known as Abyssinia) invaded back Sudan, its King died there too.

Italy even failed to conquer Ethiopia for once, they only got succeeded in the second, but short-lived.

In short, a strong-based military culture, ancient root and mountainous terrains became a total obstacle for each invaders wanna reach Ethiopia. Islamic forces underestimated the country and they were not able to conquer it.

Why won't Kenya and Ethiopia give back their ethnic Somali regions back to Somalia?

Noel Ellis, B.A., p.g diploma from University of Otago (1983) Answered Nov 29, 2020

The Somali flag has a star with five points for the five parts of Somalia. Two of these were Italian Somali and British Somaliland which united at independence in 1960. The others are the Ogaden region of Ethiopia, the Northeastern region of Kenya and Djibouti (French Somaliland).
One problem is that even the two parts that united have broken apart. Here was one country in Africa where they all spoke the same language, followed the same religi and were all the same ethnicity. Yet in the end in broke down on tribal (clan) divisions. They are all related but the civil war came down to who was your closest relation versus those more distant.

So with regard to the other territories it would have made no difference if they were included in Somalia or not. You call it giving them back, but that is aluding to some mythical time in the past when all Somalis were united under Mohamed Al Granye (the left handed).

One problem if all five parts of Somalia east of the Somali line were united, is there is no way you could keep them all living there. Somalis are traditionally nomadic and would just drive their taxis all over Africa. In fact quite a few have even found their way to New Zealand.

How was Ethiopia able to resist European colonization up until Italian annexation?

Marco Vittorio Pertoni · Follow sarcasm: in rhetoric, a form of irony; bitter ironySat

Italy, France and UK had their own ambitions on the country so the balance of different aims in contrast and the differences in power and priorities amongst them forced them to a policy of wait and see and open doors forbidding a conquest policy from anyone of them.
Ethiopia was also enough largely populated and had an ancient and acknowledged power structure to represent not an easy target also a lot of the territory was difficult to conquer for outsiders.

Italy the most aggressive of the external powers (after Egypt had retired from the competition to dominate Ethiopia) was really aggressive only during two administrations, under only two of her PM a Crispi and a Mussolini guys; all other italian PM - and there were many of them in charge during the period - hadn't any real aggressive intentions towards Ethiopia so there had not been any real menace from the outside to Ethiopia for most of that time, in general it was the european colonial powers who were anxious about possible aggressive moves from the feudal lords and bandits of Ethiopia.

Ethiopia in its present borders is the product of ethiopian, largely Shoan imperialism in the late 19th century.

Is Cush Ethiopia or Sudan? When I read in some websites it refers to ancient Ethiopia and another websites it referring to Sudan.

Firew Afera · Follow A student of Black Africa`s past 11m

Both of these modern countries were part of Cush. Cushites are simply the ones who populated the lands immediately to south of ancient Kemet. In addition to their dark skin, those people shared similar culture and languages. ``Cush`` is a Semitic term; the Greek term is ``Ethiopia``. Thus ``Ethiopia`` and ``Cush`` are essentially the same thing. Do not believe if somebody tells you that modern Ethiopia does not have anything to do with Cush.

To be specific, the land of Punt described in ancient Kemitic annals is found within the modern borders of Ethiopia. Ancient Punt is commonly described to be found within ancient Ethiopia as well. The ancient Egyptians described the people of Punt as ``hbstjw``, which was ancestral to the term that is now currently used by the Ethiopian people to refer to themselves: Habesha.

In contrast, the Nubian civilization, the Meriotic civilizations and the Medieval kingdoms of Nubia are all found within the modern borders of Sudan and Southern Egypt.

Thus, it is important to understand that ``Cush`` designated a certain geographic area rather than a specific civilization. Many civilizations flourished within the Cushitic realms since the beginnings of history, and Cush is the birthplace of ancient Kemet.

Kushites are Horners and Nubians. They are the Biblical Ethiopians, the Ethiopians of the Bible.

Whenever you say : Cush, you are referring to lands inhabited by a specific group of Africans: Horners and Nubians. Kushites are from Nubia (southern Egypt and northern Sudan) and the Horn of Africa. The Horn of Africa is their Hamitic Homeland. Kushites are a group of Hamitic people. The other Hamites are African Moors, ancient Berbers, and Nilean Kemites, ancient Egyptians.

Ancient Ethiopia was huge, really huge.

It was not confined to northeastern Africa and the Horn of Africa. Ancient Ethiopia also covered the "Middle East" first settled by Kushites and subjects of Kushite Kings.

There is documented evidence that prehistoric Dacia, present day Romania, was also called Ethiopia. Kushite Arabians, the Bessarabians, are the earliest inhahitants of Central Europe and Eastern Europe. The Black Hungarians, the Ungri Nigri, were Kushites.

The real Caucasians, people of the Caucasus, call themselves the Sons of Nimrod, the Immortal Kushite King, the first world emperor. Nimrod is celebrated in songs and dances among people of the Caucasus as their legendary ancestor and ruler.

Last but not least, Immortal Kushite King Nimrod co-ruled with his father Kush as far as India

Kush is a very common name in several regions of India.

Does Ethiopia have cheetahs?

Theiventhiran Kanthia, Avid reader of 20th Century History and Science Answered May 19, 2021

The Northeast African cheetah (Acinonyx jubatus soemmeringii) is a cheetah sub-speciess occurring in North East Africa. Contemporary records are known in South Sudan and Ethiopia, but population status in Eritrea, Djibouti, Somalia and Sudan is unknown.
It was first described under the scientific name Cynailurus soemmeringii by the Austrian zoologist Leopold Fitzinger in 1855 on the basis of a specimen from Sudan's Bayuda Desert brought Vienna. Hence its other name Sudan cheetah.

In the 1970s, the cheetah population in Ethiopia, Sudan and Somalia was roughly estimated at 1,150 to 4,500 individuals.[5] In 2007, it was estimated that 950 individuals live inside protected areas in this region; the number of individuals living outside protected areas is unknown.

This subspecies is more closely related to the Southern African Cheetah of Kalahari and Serengeti than to Saharan Cheetah populations. Results of a phylogeographic analysis indicate that the two subspecies diverged between 16,000 and 72,000 years ago.

Is it true that cheetahs do not attack or eat humans? If that is true, then why not?

Logan Forbes , Wildlife rehabilitator Updated Jan 28, 2018

A cheetah attack is not as likely as an attack from one of the other large cats, but they do happen. Cheetahs have a reputation for being docile, and that too is in comparison to other big cats.

For example, there are many instances of captive cheetahs turning on unsuspecting tourists who are allowed to enter their enclosures to pet them. A cornered cheetah or one with cubs is likely to advance on a human in self-defense.

They're highly susceptible to rabies in the wild and an infected cheetah will attack unexpectedly. For some reason, they appear to go for the feet and ankles first.

Don't be fooled by their reputation. They're wild animals, they’re unpredictable and as driven by self-preservation as any other.

Bill Fife, Minor in biology GSU with focus on Natural History of vertebrates Answered Jul 26, 2018

Like one other here I am not certain the exact reason for this if it is even true with 100% wild Cheetahs. Because in fact hand-reared African Lions and Asian Tigers can be just as "nice" when handled right. Though as recent high-profile events have shown this is never without some real risk.

But because most cats are ambush predators while Cheetahs are strictly runners /chasers this might shed light on why we (humans) are not automatically perceived as food while at close range but as with wolves are seen more as pack /family members. Because despite Cheetahs being solitary hunters they do live in small family groups for short times and so can relate in this way to us as well.

[Side note: I wonder how many were aware that Cheetahs actually evolved as a species in N. America and are the reason for the Pronghorn's very existence, a convergent-antelope "copy" that nothing else in its present range, at least for short spurts, can outrun? What happens to the old male lions who are thrown out from their pride by the young lions? How do they survive? Can old lions live in coalitions like the young ones sometimes do?

Jesse Nicolaas Dijk, BSc Animal Science, Wageningen University and Research Centre (2017)

Lone male lions, like the males of many group-based mammals, form bachelor groups comprising of different males who happened to come across each other. This is especially important for lions, as they usually hunt in groups, and find it very difficult to catch a large prey all alone.

Even older lions can find companions, and although life's not as easy when he's old, that doesn't necessarily mean an old lion is doomed to die a sad death.

Male lions who form “alliances” usually are related (ie: brothers, cousins, offspring), but it's not a must.

If two older lions find each other and decide to form an alliance, they can take out a young and strong alpha lion, simply because they've got twice the amount of jaws and claws. They'd have to share their new pride, but at least they now both have one!

Is Ethiopia the oldest country in Africa?

Jim Holloway Moderator UKBA Immigration Updates FB Group Dec 4

Ethiopia can trace its history back to Axum, around 2000 years ago, and mythologically back to King

Solomon, since it is believed there that the Queen if Sheba actually came from Ethiopia. The Arc of the Covenant is also supposedly kept in Ethiopia, and there is a Jewish community which is claimed to have been there since biblical times.

Egypt however probably has a better claim as having an unbroken history from ancient times.

Why was Ethiopia never colonized?

Teshager Amare (ተሻገር አሞሪ), B.A. Economics & History, Addis Ababa University (2016)
Updated Oct 27, 2017 · Upvoted by Bhavya Kundu, studied at Indian Institute of Management Indore (2022)

Ethiopia was never colonized for the following reasons.

1. Unity. By the time Italy came to colonize Ethiopia in mid 1890s, the Emperor then had just finished expanding, uniting & reigning over present day Ethiopia. Under his leadership & call he was able to mobilize an army of 100,000 people (from different parts of the country) at that time.

2. Unity continued. When the Italians (like other European colonialists)attempted to implement their rather common method of 'divide & conquer', the Ethiopian Kings refused to fight & instead renewed their loyalties to each other . The Italians had suggested in multiple in occasions for Menelik II (King of Shoa then) to start war with Yohannes IV (King of Kings of Ethiopia based in Tigray). The two made ever lasting peace.

3. Political Genius. In hope of Menelik being the gateway for Italian colonization in Ethiopia, the Italians had sold guns & ammunition to him (a lot of it). They always thought that he'd use their guns to kill/conquer Emperor Yohannes IV. Instead he used their guns to beat them.

   Military Genius. Most legendary stories of warfare & soldier were the ones from the battle of Adwa. The most qualified of generals were leading armies of anywhere between 1,000–30,000. Using the land & artistic methods of warfare to their advantage the chased the Italians out.

4. National sense of defiance. Most (if not all) Ethiopians cannot think of foreign dominion/occupation over them. It's a nation of a very proud people, humble if unprovoked.

Part II.

During the second attempt of Italian Occupation, We were initially defeated and occupied for 5 years because we failed to invest in military advancement. The nation was stable (for about 40 years) hence the leaders didn’t prioritize military advancement. Instead, Emperor Haileselassie was invested in expanding schools. He blames ‘uneducated-ness’ for the defeat. Nonetheless we beat the enemy due to the same reasons above, with different forms/stories.

To answer a question like that you'd have to have expert knowledge in the various different forms of African religion. I would say that one very holy city is Zion City in Limpopo, South Africa. It's not a city in the conventional sense that we think of when we think of a city, really a conglomerate of church buildings and residences of the hierarchy of the Zion Christian Church. But this is southern Africa's biggest religion by membership, being a Christian denomination that practices a lot of Jewish rituals and also maintains traditional African ancestor veneration as carried out by the so called 'witch doctors' and 'traditional healers.' The ZCC and other churches like it maintain that it's ok to practice the ancestor rituals just as the non Christian Africans do because within the church structure the ancestors work through and by agency of God's Holy Spirit. Zion City would have to be high on the list of Africa's holy cities because at times of pilgrimages you'd be amazed how many buses go there chock full of pilgrims in church garb.

It’s Harar, Axum and Alexandria.

Muslim, Ethiopian Christians and Egyptian Orthodox Christians respect one of those cities.

Are Ethiopians black?

Don't be fooled by the pictures of light-skinned girls that most people post to justify that Ethiopians are not Africans. It is like claiming that all the black people in USA are tall and fit like the NBA players.

Ethiopia should not be associated with one ethnic group, religion or language. It is a very diverse country both genetically and culturally.

Indeed, Ethiopia is a federal country of 10 regional states each hosting at least one distinct ethnic group with a different language and/or religion.

To understand the origins and culture of Ethiopians it is important to identify the 3 major genetic groups: 1. Cushitic tribes (Oromo, Somali, Afar). 2. The Nilo-Saharan & Omotic group (Gambela, Mursi, Gamo) and 3. Semitic or Habesha tribes (Amhara and Tigray).

The Afar people who live near the sea actually tend to be extremely dark like the Nilotic tribes of Kenya and South Sudan.

The people of Gambela and SNNPR regions of Ethiopia are mostly Nilo-Saharans or they speak Omotic languages. The Ethiopian Morsi look like the Nuer or Dinka of South Sudan.

"I'm not black, I'm Habesha (OJ)" Okay

The Habesha people are from the Northern part of Ethiopia, specifically, the regions of Tigray, Amhara and Beta Israel (The Jewish Ethiopians). The term Habesha is usually extended to include the Eritreans and most people from this region tend to think they are not black at all.

The Jews of Ethiopia or Beta Israel (meaning House of Israel). Are they black? Well, it took a while for them to figure it out.

The Jewish Ethiopians claim descent from Menelik I, the son of Queen Sheba (Makeda in Ethiopia) and King Solomon of Israel. When Ethiopia embraced Christianity in the 4th century, they refused to convert and preserved their Jewish traditions i.e. they prayed in synagogues, practiced circumcision and observed Sabbath and many other Jewish rituals.

In the 18th century, European explorers in search for the source of the Nile reported the existence the Beta Israel community in Ethiopia which ignited the myth of the lost tribe of Dan.

From 1980 to 1992, the Ethiopian Jews who were threatened by famine, political unrest and the hostility of the communist regime led by Col Mengistu were rescued on several operations in which around 100,000 Jewish Ethiopians were airlifted to Israel.

Black Lives Matter protests in Israel.

Unfortunately, the Jewish Ethiopians claim that they are treated like second-class citizens in Israel because they are BLACK. Indeed, Ethiopian Jews face discrimination, racism, suffer the highest poverty rate among the Jews in Israel and suffer much higher levels of police arrests and incarceration just like black people in America.

Regardless, there are positive changes happening in Israel.

The Amhara people to a small extent and Tigrayans in general have minor Berber, Arab or Persian genetic ad mixture due to years of trade and cultural exchange between the ancient Axum Kingdom and Arabia. There is a reason why both Yemen and Ethiopia claim to be the origin of Coffee or the birthplace of Queen Sheba.

Pres. Paul Kagame and PM Dr. Abiy of Ethiopia. Do they look different? No. Are they black? Yes. Shall we say that the Rwandans are not black? That would be dumb.

Where does the confusion come from? I think it is an inferiority complex. The Ethiopians like most Africans and Indians were brainwashed by the Western media to believe that everybody with a white or light skin is better than them. I dated a beautiful Ethiopian girl and she would put extensions on her hair and use exotic lotions to look “white”.

Here is a picture of rappers Drake and Abel Makkonen Tesfaye known professionally as The Weeknd who is a son of Ethiopian immigrants to Canada.

Drake’s mother is white just like former President Obama's mother. We all know Obama as the first BLACK president of the USA. The Weeknd is a proud successful black artist, but some people in Ethiopia still struggle with their identity and they would tell you a different story.

However, a recent sad anecdote can provide insights to your question; it is about the most famous Ethiopian in the world; who ironically is originally from the region most Ethiopians would consider highly mixed or Habesha (Tigray)… Dr. Tedros A. Ghebreyesus, the boss of WHO.

In the midst of the global pandemic of Covid-19, Dr. Tedros was subjected to racist comments and death threats. Dr Tedros responded: "I can tell you personal attacks that have been going on for months. Abuses, or racist comments, giving me names, black or Negro. I'm proud of being black, proud of being Negro."

The only Ethiopian who will tell you he/she is not black does not either have a passport or an education.

What do you think caused the crash of Ethiopian Airlines Flight ET302 - a nearly-new Boeing 737 MAX 8 aircraft?

Neil Pietersen , Rotary Wing Pilot Answered Mar 10, 2019 Upvoted by

Bruno Gilissen , Airbus pilot

Originally Answered: What do think caused the crash of Ethiopian Air Flight ET302 - a near New Boeing 737 MAX 8 aircraft?

As a pilot myself, right this second: MCAS

While I fly helicopters, the rules are the same. I have included actual telemetry from the Ethiopian airlines flight below to make my case.

I'm not some hysterical pessimist, let me explain:

The Boeing 737 MAX 7/8/9 is a derivative of an airframe first certified in the 1960's and subsequently revised. Nothing unusual here with one serious caveat. In order to satisfy a safety requirement at it's latest incarnation, to save costs Boeing developed a flight safety system called MCAS.

In simple terms, it's a feature that automatically lowers the nose of the aircraft in the event of a drop in speed. It's completely independent of the flight controls and I am aware it isn't something that pilots are even required to train on, in fact none of my pilot friends were even aware existed before the Lion Air crash last year.

This is a huge concern. There's a system on a new plane that ignores pilot inputs that the pilots aren't even aware of?!?Here's the trouble, since the Lion Air crash is still under investigation with the FDR (Flight data) still not released I believe there is only a bulletin out to inform pilots of how the MCAS works. In other words we don't really know yet. But if (as is suspected) there is a faulty ASI (air speed indicator) the MCAS will push down the nose of the plane and override pilot inputs, who will of course be desperately trying to pull back on the stick.

In perspective, ignoring any other external forces on the controls it would require both pilots to BOTH pull back with a force of over 40kg EACH to counter the MCAS.Right now imagine a pull force of 80kg that you need to overcome, to correct a safety system if it's getting dodgy info.

Next big issue: The MAX is a brand new aircraft and should not crash. Not once. Not at all. I say again not even once. The fact this is the 2nd in a matter of months with only 370-odd units in operation is frightening. My own assessment is that any aircraft in this family is now patently unsafe and I would advise anyone who is booked to fly on an airline that operates this type, to contact the airline and determine if your fight is on this type. And get another flight.

Now you'll probably call me hysterical. I'm aware of how many 737's there are in operation but this is false equivalence. It's a brand new aircraft using a system that ignores pilot inputs. It's unlike the others.

It makes these MCAS safety decisions using a single ASI probe with simply isn't redundant enough for me. This is believed to be the cause of the lion air crash.

Add to this that the flight profiles of both the Lion Air crash and this one are nearly identical, the aircraft should have been climbing at an initial rate of 2,000+ fpm, having looked at the preliminary logs this poor captain was wrestling with altitude and never got above 1,000ft, before the nose dropped. It rose again then dropped again, then once more then it plunged. All the while gaining speed.

At one point he had a dive of very nearly 2,000fpm!! At takeoff think of how high your nose is as the plane climbs. Now imagine it nose down. Now you tell me you're happy to climb into another one. You'd be a fool.

Here is the actual telemetry available on this morning's flight:

An aircraft that gains a speed of 383 kts should gain altitude and until Boeing can tell me why 2 of their brand new planes stopped climbing in perfect conditions while accelerating, I'm not setting foot in one of them.

Period.

CPJ welcomes release of Ethiopian journalist Temerat Negara after 4 months in prison

Nairobi, April 6, 2022 – The Committee to Protect Journalists welcomed the release of Ethiopian journalist Temerat Negara on bail on Wednesday, April 6, and called for any remaining investigation into his work to be dropped immediately.

"It is great news that Ethiopian journalist Temerat Negara is out of prison, but it is a grave injustice that he was held for four months behind bars without being charged with any crime," said CPJ's sub-Saharan Africa representative, Muthoki Mumo. "Officials who abused Ethiopia's judicial system to arbitrarily detain Temerat must be held to account, and authorities must drop any pending investigations into him and allow him to continue working freely."

Temerat, co-founder and editor of the Terara Network online news outlet, was granted bail of 50,000 birr (US$980) on Tuesday, and was released from a detention facility in Oromia regional state on Wednesday, according to news reports.

Authorities held Temerat without charge since arresting him on December 10, 2021, amid a nationwide state of emergency as part of the government's response to a civil war against rebel forces allied with the Tigray People's Liberation Front.

Temerat was first detained in the capital, Addis Ababa, and was transferred to Oromia, where authorities requested he be detained while they investigated allegations that he disseminated disinformation, smeared the name of Oromia regional state, and defamed senior government officials including Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed Ali, according to CPJ reporting and media reports.

Ethiopia arrests 4,000 in Amhara region crackdown - local state media

ADDIS ABABA (Reuters) -Ethiopian authorities have arrested more than 4,000 people in the northern Amhara region, local state media said on Monday, as part of a wider crackdown against militia fighters, critics and the press.

Gizachew Muluneh, spokesperson for the Amhara regional administration and federal government spokesperson Legesse Tulu did not immediately respond to requests for comment on the wave of arrests.

More than 200 of the suspects are accused of killings, Amhara state security official Desalegne Tasew told the Amhara Media Corporation, accusing them of conducting "illegal activities" in the name of the Fano paramilitary group. It was not clear why the rest were being detained.

Tasew did not provide any evidence to back up the accusations of killings. Reuters could not independently verify the claims.

Amhara is the second-most populous region in Ethiopia, and a key constituency for Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed.

Amhara forces and the Fano militia backed Abiy's federal troops against rebellious forces in northern Tigray when fighting erupted there in 2020, but relations between some top Amhara officials and central government have since soured.

Ethiopian authorities arrest 11 employees of 4 independent media outlets

New York, May 24, 2022 – Ethiopian authorities should immediately release all recently arrested journalists and media workers and ensure that authorities cease harassing members of the press, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Tuesday.

Authorities have arrested at least 11 journalists and media workers since May 19 in Amhara state and the capital Addis Ababa as part of a broader crackdown that the state government calls a "law enforcement operation" that has resulted in the arrest of over 4,500 people for allegedly illegal activity.

Those detained include five journalists and media workers of the privately owned YouTube channel Ashara Media, four journalists and media workers of the YouTube channel Nisir International Broadcasting Corporation, Meskerem Abera, the founder and editor of private broadcaster Ethio Nekat Media; and Solomon Shumeye, the founder and owner of private broadcaster Gebeyanu Media.

"With the latest arrests of at least 11 journalists and media workers, it's one step forward and three steps backward in Ethiopia and shows, yet again, that the government has no regard for press freedom and the right of citizens to information from a plurality of independent media sources," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator. "Authorities should immediately release all of them without charge and ensure that Ethiopian journalists can report without fear of arbitrary detention, repression, and censorship."

At about 5:30 p.m. on May 19, Amhara police raided the studio of Ashara Media in the Amhara state capital of Bahir Dar and arrested five employees, according to news reports, Elias Debasu, the director of Ashara Media, and Blen Techane, the wife of journalist Gashaye Negusse, who spoke to CPJ by phone. The arrested are:

- Gashaye Negusse, journalist
- Getenet Yalew, journalist
- Habtamu Melese, journalist
- Daniel Mesfin, a camera operator and video editor
- Kelemu Gelagay, a camera operator and video editor

During the raid, police did not show a warrant and confiscated office equipment, including laptops and external hard drives, Elias told CPJ. Blen, who was able to briefly visit the detained journalists, said they were transferred to a prison in the small northern town of Nefas Mewcha, about 185 kilometers (115 miles) from Bahir Dar, on the morning of May 20 and are now being detained without access to family or lawyers.

Ashara Media recently covered the government's crackdown on Fano, an armed militia in Amhara state, the detention of government critics, and a public demonstration about housing concerns, according to CPJ's review.

Separately, around 5:30 p.m. on May 19, Amhara police raided the office of Nisir International Broadcasting Corporation and detained three of its employees and another employee on May 20, according to news reports, an outlet statement, and a person familiar with the events who spoke to CPJ on the condition of anonymity, citing fear of reprisal. CPJ is not publishing the names of the four employees as the outlet fears it will compromise the journalists' and their families' safety.

During the raid, police seized equipment, such as computers, memory cards, and external hard drives, and detained two of the employees in Bahir Dar and the other two in Nefas Mewcha, according to a person familiar with the events. The outlet's statement indicates that the employees were editors, reporters, and other supporting staff.

CPJ's review of Nisir's content shows reports on the government's actions on the Fano militia, press statements from an opposition political party, and the recent revocation of accreditation and expulsion of The Economist's Ethiopia correspondent Tom Gardner.

On May 20, Addis Ababa police detained Gebeyanu Media's Solomon at the Addis Ababa Police Commission, according to news reports, which cited Solomon's lawyer and a family member. Solomon appeared in court on May 21 for allegedly making media statements that incited people to violence and creating discord between the federal and Amhara state governments, according to the VOA report.

CPJ's review of Solomon's recent work indicates he was critical of the government's fiscal policy, the impact of the war in northern Ethiopia, and the Ethiopian government's increasingly authoritarian approach to dealing with dissidents.

On May 21, Ethiopian security officers detained Ethio Nekat Media's Meskerem at Bole International Airport in Addis Ababa as she traveled from Bahir Dar, according to news reports, her lawyer Henok Aklilu, and her husband Fitsum Gebremichael, who spoke with CPJ by phone. Henok told CPJ that Meskerem was detained at Addis Ababa Police Commission and charged with crimes of incitement of public violence through her media appearances, adding that she appeared in court on May 23 and May 24. Her next appearance is scheduled for June 6.

Ethio Nekat Media's coverage features news about Amhara state, a message by Meskerem to an Ethiopian military general appealing to him to side with the Fano militia and the people amid what she described as a "looming crackdown," and a segment in which Meskerem defended the need for the Fano militia in the state.

In a May 20 press statement, the Federal Government Communication Service vowed to "continue to take decisive measures against those engaged in illegal activities, intentionally causing public alarm and turmoil, as well as those who are working to cause violence and disturbance among the public under the disguise of journalism and media work."

CPJ emailed Justice Minister Gedion Timothewos Hassebon, Federal Police spokesperson Jeylan Abdi, the Addis Ababa Police Commission, Amhara Police Commission, Amhara State Communications, and Amhara National Regional State Prison Commission but did not receive any replies.

Separately, Desu Dula and Bikila Amenu of the Oromia News Network appeared in court on May 24 and their case was adjourned to June 3, according to a news report. CPJ has documented their months-long detention and called for their immediate release.

Don’t be fooled by the pictures of light-skinned girls that most people post to justify that Ethiopians are not Africans. It is like claiming that all the black people in USA are tall and fit like the NBA players.

Ethiopia should not be associated with one ethnic group, religion or language. It is a very diverse country both genetically and culturally.

Indeed, Ethiopia is a federal country of 10 regional states each hosting at least one distinct ethnic group with a different language and/or religion.

To understand the origins and culture of Ethiopians it is important to identify the 3 major genetic groups: 1. Cushitic tribes (Oromo, Somali, Afar). 2. The Nilo-Saharan & Omotic group (Gambela, Mursi, Gamo) and 3. Semitic or Habesha tribes (Amhara and Tigray).

The Afar people who live near the sea actually tend to be extremely dark like the Nilotic tribes of Kenya and South Sudan.

A young Afar man. Does he look black? Yes

A beautiful Afar woman. Does she look black?

Now on to the next.

The Oromos are estimated to be around 45 million and hence close to 40% of the entire population of Ethiopia. In fact, the majority of Oromo people are dark-skinned.

The people of Gambela and SNNPR regions of Ethiopia are mostly Nilo-Saharans or they speak Omotic languages. The Ethiopian Morsi look like the Nuer or Dinka of South Sudan.

"I'm not black, I'm Habesha (OJ)" Okay

The Habesha people are from the Northern part of Ethiopia, specifically, the regions of Tigray, Amhara and Beta Israel (The Jewish Ethiopians). The term Habesha is usually extended to include the Eritreans and most people from this region tend to think they are not black at all.

The Jews of Ethiopia or Beta Israel (meaning House of Israel). Are they black? Well, it took a while for them to figure it out.

The Jewish Ethiopians claim descent from Menelik I, the son of Queen Sheba (Makeda in Ethiopia) and King Solomon of Israel. When Ethiopia embraced Christianity in the 4th century, they refused to convert and preserved their Jewish traditions i.e. they prayed in synagogues, practiced circumcision and observed Sabbath and many other Jewish rituals.

In the 18th century, European explorers in search for the source of the Nile reported the existence the Beta Israel community in Ethiopia which ignited the myth of the lost tribe of Dan.

From 1980 to 1992, the Ethiopian Jews who were threatened by famine, political unrest and the hostility of the communist regime led by Col Mengistu were rescued on several operations in which around 100,000 Jewish Ethiopians were airlifted to Israel.

Black Lives Matter protests in Israel.

Unfortunately, the Jewish Ethiopians claim that they are treated like second-class citizens in Israel because they are BLACK. Indeed, Ethiopian Jews face discrimination, racism, suffer the highest poverty rate among the Jews in Israel and suffer much higher levels of police arrests and incarceration just like black people in America.

Regardless, there are positive changes happening in Israel.

The Amhara people to a small extent and Tigrayans in general have minor Berber, Arab or Persian genetic ad mixture due to years of trade and cultural exchange between the ancient Axum Kingdom and Arabia. Pres. Paul Kagame and PM Dr. Abiy of Ethiopia. Do they look different? No. Are they black? Yes. Shall we say that the Rwandans are not black? That would be dumb.

Where does the confusion come from? I think it is an inferiority complex. The Ethiopians like most Africans and Indians were brainwashed by the Western media to believe that everybody with a white or light skin is better than them. I dated a beautiful Ethiopian girl and she would put extensions on her hair and use exotic lotions to look “white”.

Drake’s mother is white just like former President Obama's mother. We all know Obama as the first BLACK president of the USA. The Weeknd is a proud successful black artist, but some people in Ethiopia still struggle with their identity and they would tell you a different story.

However, a recent sad anecdote can provide insights to your question; it is about the most famous Ethiopian in the world; who ironically is originally from the region most Ethiopians would consider highly mixed or Habesha (Tigray)… Dr. Tedros A. Ghebreyesus, the boss of WHO.

In the midst of the global pandemic of Covid-19, Dr. Tedros was subjected to racist comments and death threats. Dr Tedros responded: "I can tell you personal attacks that have been going on for months. Abuses, or racist comments, giving me names, black or Negro. I'm proud of being black, proud of being Negro."

The only Ethiopian who will tell you he/she is not black does not either have a passport or an education.

As you said, Ethiopia is a poor and unstable country. One of the reasons for this is because the dominant powers of the world do not want strong countries that can exert their geopolitical influence on the strategic Red sea and Gulf of Aden waters.

If you have some know-how about the Horn of Africa, you understand that Ethiopia`s neighbour, Somalia, is a failed state (even though situations improved there in recent years). Across the Red sea, you see that Yemen faces many of the problems that Somalia and Ethiopia face; they have sectarian conflicts, violence and poverty. Breakaway states like Eritrea and Somaliland enjoy relative stability. However, there is no doubt that their welfare would have been even better if they remained part of the countries they seceded from. All this is not a random occurence; it largely happened by design.

Many people believe that the problems that these countries face is their own fault i.e. there are no Western hands involved. Wrong. Though it may not appear to us, the dominant powers of the world monitor every situation across the globe and make calculations about what outcome suits them the most. After that they try, mostly subtly but sometimes overtly, try to accomplish their objectives.

To answer your question more directly, Ethiopia, and the other African countries in the Horn and beyond, remained poor because of armed conflicts. If you have armed conflicts within a country, vast majority of the country`s output would be used to upgrade or maintain military capacity; an expenditure which won`t have much use for the economy. Lack of security also discourages investment and any form of productive activity. Ethiopia spent the latter part of the 20th century embroiled in wars. We fought with the Eritreans for 30 years before they secceded and became an independent country. Ethiopia also fought with Somalia two times within 10 years, and we also fought with Eritrea after their independence over a land dispute.

Many radical ethnic separationists within the country either still want to secede from Ethiopia, or are working to make Ethiopia a divided and weak country. The narrative that fuels their separationist ambitions are mostly imported from abroad. They mostly employ identity as a political tool; they cheat the populace that they are the best representatives to safeguard the interests of their ethnic or religious group of origin. What they do would ultimately make Ethiopia weak and riddled with poverty.

Why wasn't Sub Saharan Africa able to build advanced civilisations like many other parts of the world even despite humans living there longer than anywhere else?

Why did Africa fail to develop a sophisticated civilization that could compete with Asian and European civilizations?

I've read a bunch about sub saharan African kingdoms but there isn't much to read about. There are almost no details whatsoever and it seems like there are only big events included. Don't u think having written would have changed that?

Why is African history before the colonization era so little known?
Why was there no written language in sub-Saharan Africa?

Why did Sub-Saharan Africa, in its history, never give birth to an empire that explored far outside Africa?

Why did precolonial sub-Saharan African civilizations never become as advanced as Eurasian civilizations?

Did Africa have no history prior to European Imperialism?
Unlike other continents, why hasn't there been any big and powerful civilization in sub-Saharan Africa?
Why does there seem to be a lack of major African inventions?

Le 24 mai 1991, un Boeing 747 de la compagnie aérienne israélienne El Al a transporté 1088 passagers sur un trajet entre Addis-Abeda (Ethiopie) à Jérusalem (Israël). Un record absolu avec, pour l'anecdote, deux naissances à bord du vol.

Selon nos confrères d'Aeronews, si la version passagers du Boeing 747 peut transporter jusqu'à 452 personnes en configuration bi-classe standard, le gros-porteur en question était une version cargo.si - This website is for sale! - cargo Resources and Information. la version passagers du Boeing 747 peut transporter jusqu'à 452 personnes en configuration bi-classe standard, le gros-porteur en question était une version cargo. En effet, ce vol n'était en rien un vol commercial mais une opération d'évacuation menée par l'armée israélienne.

Au printemps 1991, le régime éthiopien est en passe d'être renversé par des rebelles. Préoccupé par le sort de la communauté juive éthiopienne, l'Etat d'Israël décide d'organiser une opération de grande envergure. Pendant 36 heures, 35 avions vont effectuer une quarantaine d'allers-retours depuis l'aéroport d'Addis-Abeba. Au total, plus de 14 000 Juifs d'Ethiopie seront évacués grâce à ce pont aérien reliant les deux villes distantes de 2 500 km.

Comment nomme-t-on des différentes parties d'un avion ?

Réponse originale : Comment nomme t'on des differentes parties d'un avion ?

Voici ci-dessous un document intéressant et assez détaillé qui pourra vous convenir .

Configuration générale d'un avion

- Un avion peut, d'une manière générale, être décomposé en un nombre limité de sous ensembles : cellule, groupe motopropulseur, commandes de vol, servitudes de bord, avionique, emports internes ou externes. Ces éléments, à quelques exceptions près, sont présents sur tous les appareils.

Composantes d'un avion.

Pour chaque type d'appareil on retrouve des positionnements relatifs de ces ensembles assez semblables, si on ne tient pas compte de la période des pionniers de l'aviation ou des prototypes restés sans suite.

Les points communs apparus depuis la naissance de l'aviation et qui resteront très probablement d'actualité au long du 20 ième siècle, pour une fonction ou une capacité opérationnelle donnée, sont le plus souvent liés à des contraintes de conception dont :

- la simplicité de réalisation ;
- la diminution de la masse grâce à l'emploi de matériaux plus légers et plus résistants ;
- la diminution de la traînée grâce aux progrès de l'aérodynamique ;
- l'augmentation des performances souvent liée aux deux points ci-dessus et à l'évolution de la motorisation ;
- l'amélioration de la fiabilité.

À ces points s'ajoutent, essentiellement pour les avions civils :

- les économies d'énergie ;
- la diminution des pollutions ;
- l'amélioration de la sécurité.

Oh, no.

(Enset)

Enset (False Banana) is a tropical crop endemic to the Southwestern region of Ethiopia. As the name indicates, it is a ``relative`` of the real banana plant and resembles it. However, the tree does not bear any banana. Instead, this food is made from it:

``Kocho`` is often served on ``Koba``, and Koba essentially means the leaf of the Enset tree. Kocho is not eaten alone; it accompanies main dishes like cheese, cabbage or meat.

Les hyènes peuvent-elles être domestiquées ?/ Can hyenas be domesticated?

Gary Meaney animal lover and carnivore zoologist

Dans la ville fortifiée de Harar, en Éthiopie, les habitants entretiennent une relation curieuse et singulièrement unique avec les hyènes tachetées locales.

Il existe actuellement deux points d'alimentation en hyènes que les touristes peuvent visiter, dans les sanctuaires d'Aw Sofi et d'Aw Aboker. (J'ai entendu dire que ce dernier est plus formel, plus touristique et, dans une certaine mesure, plus artificiel). À ces endroits, les «hommes à hyène» jettent des restes de viande à des hyènes sauvages qui s'y sont habituées et se rendent aux lieux de l'alimentation tous les soirs.

Sur les lieux de repas Aboker, les visiteurs peuvent même demander aux hyènes de leur tirer de la viande de la bouche.

Cette tradition, qui a débuté il y a une soixantaine d'années, n'est en aucun cas une attraction touristique. La nuit, de nombreux bouchers Harari jettent leurs restes dans les rues devant des hyènes en attente, sans touristes en vue. On dit que les hyènes de Harar sont spéciales (et c'est pourquoi elles se comportent si paisiblement), car elles sont devenues des vaisseaux à travers lesquels on peut communiquer avec des saints. On pense également qu'elles mangent les démons malveillants - des djinns - et lorsqu'une hyène attaque un humain, c'est parce que cette personne est possédée par lui.

Ensuite, il y a ce festival annuel appelé Ashura, qui se tient sur une colline en dehors de la ville. Trois monticules de porridge sont disposés sur une large pierre plate et les préposés attendent que les hyènes sortent et le mangent. C’est un peu comme la version Harari du jour de la marmotte - si les hyènes mangent la majeure partie de la bouillie mais en laisse un peu, l’année à venir sera prospère. Si elles mangent tout, il y aura la famine, et si elles mangent peu, la guerre.

Quoi qu'il en soit, pratiquement tous les habitants de Harar adorent les hyènes, à tel point que si une hyène tue un de leurs animaux, beaucoup s'en prennent à eux-mêmes en se disant qu'ils n'avaient pas suffisamment nourri les hyènes. Si seulement les éleveurs avaient cette attitude envers les loups.

De même, les hyènes se sont complètement habituées aux traditions locales et ont très peu peur des gens, en particulier des gens qu'elles connaissent bien. Les chiens ont probablement été domestiqués en commençant par manger des restes humains - ce qui est intéressant, comme ce qui se passe à Harar.

Si ce rituel devait se poursuivre pendant des siècles, je pourrais facilement voir des hyènes tachetées devenir un animal domestique. Les individus les plus habitués sont ceux qui ont le plus de chances de venir chercher de la nourriture et d'obtenir un avantage sélectif. Ainsi, avec le temps, elles se familiariseront de plus en plus avec les humains jusqu'à ce qu'elles deviennent pratiquement des chiens.

Why is Egypt claiming ownership of the Nile from Ethiopia?

Firew Afera · Follow Read about the origins of Ancient Egyptian civilization Thu

Here is the most misunderstood fact about the Nile river; the Nile river has nothing to do with modern Ethiopia.

As you can see from the map, the Nile river starts in Lake Victoria, which is found in the African Great lakes region. It flows through the two Sudans before ending up in Egypt.

However Ethiopia is the source of a major tributary river of the Nile labelled ``The Blue Nile`` by the Europeans. In Ethiopia it is called Abbay or Ghion, and that is the only appropriate name that should be used to refer to the river. Abbay river starts in Lake Tana in Ethiopia, and ends up in Khartoum in North Sudan. There it ends up joining with the Nile river.

Whatever the Egyptians or the rest of the world says, the river Abbay is an Ethiopian river. Ethiopia has the right to use the river for her own purposes; that is a right denied to no other country in the world. Every country has the right to utilize a river that flows predominantly flows within its territory.

Finally, there is an organized propaganda from the Egyptian side that wants to mislead people that Ethiopia is building the dam supported by Israel. Which is not actually surprising when you see that this comes from people who have said the planet is a huge football which the ``Zionists`` kick around. Anyways this dam has nothing to do with Israel, and Ethiopia`s relationship with Israel at present can be described as neutral. However we have some special connections with Israel that set us apart from other African countries. These including the history of a large number of Ethiopian Jews and the story of king Solomon and queen Makeda. Many people in Ethiopia are Christians, and some locations within Israel, like Bethelhem, have special status for these people. Names like Bethelhem and Eyerusalem are common girl names in Ethiopia.

Old generations of Turks and Greeks call Blacks, Arabs. There must be a reason. The Ottoman Empire ruled over Arabs for centuries. Ancient Greeks traded with ancient Arabians and they passed down traditions on the black Arabians. There is documented evidence that the earliest inhabitants of the Arabian Peninsula migrated from the Horn of Africa. Ancient Arabians were Kushites. They had elongated faces, sharp features, frizzy/curly hair but black skin. The oldest Arabian stock is still found in Yemen, Oman and Saudi Arabia.
Modern Arabs vs ancient Arabians? That is the question.

Modern Arabs are the descendants of the following people :

1. SemArabs (the Semitic Saracens), J hg people;
2. Arabized Turks;
3. EuroArabs (Arabized Slavs [in Algeria], Arabized Spaniards [in Morocco], Arabized Italians [in Tunisia], Arabized “Christian Renegades” white slaves who could not be ransomed back to Europe or the USA and converted to Islam, etc.);

4. Arabized Dutch or British pirates or privateers who joined the very lucrative Barbary slave. Algerine and Riff pirates had accomplices among Dutch and British pirates;
5. Frankish Crusaders who deserted,
6. Pale skinned Arabs and descendants of Circassian beauties. There was a time when Arabs prided themselves for being the sons and daughters of a Circassian beauty.
7. Arabized Nubians;
8. Arabized Swahili;
9. Arabized Amazigh (Berbers);
10. 10.Arabic speaking descendants of Franco-Egyptians.

The written word of ancient time is crystal clear about the earliest inhabitant of the "Middle East", including Arabia.

In modern geography the name Ethiopia is confined to the country known as Abyssinia, an extensive territory in East Africa. In ancient times Ethiopia extended over vast domains in both Africa and Asia. "It seems certain," declares Sir E. A. Wallis Budge, "that classical historians and geographers called the whole region from India to Egypt, both countries inclusive, by the name of Ethiopia, and in consequence they regarded all the dark-skinned and black peoples who inhabited it as Ethiopians. Mention is made of Eastern and Western Ethiopians and it is probable that the Easterners were Asiatics and the Westerners Africans." (History of Ethiopia, Vol. I., Preface, by Sir E. A. Wallis Budge.) In addition, Budge notes that, "Homer and Herodotus call all the peoples of the Sudan, Egypt, Arabia, Palestine and Western Asia and India Ethiopians.

(Herodotus, Vol. I., Book. I., Appendix, Essay XI., Section-5.)

Related: What percentage of Ethiopians have mixed ancestry?

Firew Afera African Updated Oct 21

Ethiopians normally do not have any form of mixed ancestry.
All Horn African groups are a their own group with distinct history, culture, language, genetics etc….

If you trample upon that and call Ethiopians mixed race, your question should be considered as an expression of the usual racism, deliberate ignorance about Africa and anti-Black phobia endemic to the West.

If you genuinely asked this, the answer to this question is there are people of mixed heritage in Ethiopia like everywhere else. During the 20th century, various foreign ethnic groups ventured into Ethiopia.

Some of these came as soldiers of Fascist Italy during the brief period of Fascist occupation (1936-1941). Some of these came before and after that period. These include Armenians (who had a large diaspora within Ethiopia), Greeks, Arabs (mainly from Yemen, Sudan and Saudi Arabia), and some Indians as well. Most of these immigrants set up shops in the capital city and some other large cities.

A small percentage of these foreigners married locals, and there were thus people of mixed heritage in Ethiopia. Some of these mixed-race people prominent in Ethiopian public life. They became journalists, authors, footballers etc…. Here are some of them:

Bealu Girma: He was a very influential author and journalist. It is said that his father was Indian.

Paulos Gnogno: Again a very influential author and journalist. He was self taught through reading. His father was Greek.

Luciano Vassalo: He was half Italian- half Eritrean. He was part of the Ethiopian football/soccer team which won the third African cup of nations. That was the only cup for Ethiopia in the history of the tournament. Later he became a football coach and helped his country football to progress.

(Ethiopia winning the third African cup if nations, 1962 G.C.)

After Ethiopia became a communist country in 1974, the government expelled all business-owning foreigners out of the country. Similar incidents happened in other parts of East Africa; Idi Amin of Uganda expelled the Indians in 1972, and I believe Tanzania under Julius Nyrerre did the same at one point. After this event, I believe mixed race marriages became much lower in number as there are very few foreigners living in Ethiopia today.

Since Ethiopia is a large country and most people live in the countryside, the number of mixed race people in the country is well below 1%. Ethiopians in the diaspora may register a higher percentage since they are living in a foreign country.

Possibly, long long ago (like 10,000 BCE). Proto-Semitic was almost certainly native to the Levant, but before that, proto Afroasiatic may have originated either in the Horn of Africa or in the Levant. It is currently unclear, but these two hypotheses are the dominant ones among scholars today and there is no consensus except within the two camps. Both have their pros and cons, but ultimately, we may never know which one is correct given the immense timescale.

Judicial Sector Reform in Ethiopia: The Five-Year (2014-2018) Strategic Plan (Part II)

Posted in Al Mariam's Commentaries By almariam On November 26, 2022

Author's Note: While this commentary stands on its own merits, the author strongly recommends reading Part I of the series to appreciate the enormous complexity and fierce urgency of judicial/justice sector reform in Ethiopia today.

Judicial/justice sector reform is an integral element of Ethiopia's Homegrown Reform Agenda

Ethiopia has been undergoing massive reform over the past five years. The reforms, which are guided by the principle "Ethiopian solutions to Ethiopia's problems," have focused on, among other things, creating accountable public institutions, democratization of the political process, institutionalization of the rule of law, and transformation of the economy from the so-called "developmental state"-led growth to private-sector led growth.

Ethiopia's Homegrown Economic Reform Agenda is transitioning Ethiopia from an Asian Tiger wannabe to a proud, self-sufficient, self-feeding and self-reliant African lion.

The equivalent homegrown political reform agenda has produced a democratically elected government certified by the African Union. Ethiopia's homegrown foreign policy agenda has transformed regional peace in the Horn of Africa. The no peace, no war two-decade status quo between Ethiopia and Eritrea has been transformed into peace, amity and comity between the two countries.

Ethiopia has been a fulcrum and driver of peace in the Sudan as well as in South Sudan.

Ethiopia has leveraged its unique role in the Horn to improve relations between Eritrea and Djibouti.

As part of a broader regional peace initiative and engagement, Ethiopia has played a key role in restoration of diplomatic relations between Somalia and Kenya.
Ethiopia's homegrown environmental and conservation agenda has resulted in a massive Green Legacy program and planting of billions of seedlings as of 2022.
Ethiopia's homegrown tourism and quality of life enhancement agenda has transformed the capital Addis Ababa to live the true meaning of its name (Addis Ababa means New Flower).

The Sheger Park Project aims to transform Addis Ababa in to a greener, cleaner and attractive tourist friendly city with open spaces, walkways and bikeways. Unity Park, Entoto Park, Friendship Park and Museum of Science and Technology are unique urban institutions and attractions that will not only revitalize Addis Ababa and enhance the general well-being of its residents but also attract tourists and potential investors.
Then there are the Gorgora, Wenchi and Koysha projects which will offer stunning eco-tourist destinations when completed in the foreseeable future.

Ethiopia's homegrown reform agenda is a blueprint to transform Ethiopia from a low-income agrarian country to a lower-middle-income industrializing country by 2030.

The judicial sector reform currently underway is a critical element of Ethiopia's Homegrown Reform Agenda.

The 2014-2018 Ethiopian Federal Judiciary Strategic Plan

In January 2022, the Ethiopian Federal Supreme Court issued its "Five-Year (2014-2018 [Ethiopian Calendar] Strategic Plan ['Plan']" To be sure, it is a Plan limited to the federal judiciary and does not include the country's justice sector which includes, among others, prosecutorial services, police and investigative services, the private bar, legal assistance providers and corrections. The 161-page Plan is presented in 4 major sections with an executive summary, introduction and appendices.

The executive summary provides a brief retrospective on achievements from 2008 to 2012 and an overview of the 2014-2018 plan, the methodology for preparation of the Plan, a discussion of mission, vision and values and identifies key focal areas of reform, strategies to be used in the reform and implementation and follow-up monitoring mechanisms.

The introduction provides justification for the necessity of federal court improvement reform strategy, lessons learned from the 2008-2012 and 2003-2007 strategic Plans, an overview of the issues, problems, challenges and achievements, engagement of the judicial leadership at different levels with input from professionals and technical support personnel.

Section 1 (pp. 7-47) provides a comprehensive discussion of the structure, organization and operation of the federal courts and explains the applicable constitutional and statutory (proclamations) basis for the operation and functioning of the federal courts. It offers an update and analysis of the current state of the judiciary including, among others, federal judicial administration, new legislation aimed at improving the operation and functions of the judiciary, independence of the judiciary, transparency and accountability, access to judicial services and public confidence in the judiciary, budgeting, judicial appointment, training and accountability, appellate process and case management.

Section 2 (pp. 48-62) deals with mission, vision, principles, objectives and outcomes. The section sets impressively detailed strategic objectives and performance metrics. It does a SWOT analysis (Strengths, Weaknesses, Opportunities and Threats) in Gantt chart-like format. The analysis focuses on metrics dealing with 1) freedom and independence of the judiciary, noninterference in its operations by external actors, transparency and accountability, 2) judicial efficiency and quality, and 3) user access to justice. The metrics and strategic actions to be taken with respect to the three elements are detailed on pp. 66-73.

Section 3 discusses implementation of the strategic Plan throughout the judiciary and methods of implementation as it "cascades" through the federal judicial hierarchy to the lower levels. It sets parameters for strengthening the structure of the judiciary and leadership capacity, gathering and effective use of resources, and publicizing the strategic plan to create broad public awareness.

Section 4 deals with follow-up, analysis and reporting on implementation of the strategic plan. It examines ways of creating systems and processes for data collection, undertaking periodic reviews and generating reports.

The extraordinary execution and implementation plan is detailed on pp, 81-125 in Gantt chart-like format tracking activities for 2014 to 2018, setting baselines, identifying outcomes/targets by year and designated monitoring entity. A second Gantt chart-like presentation provides details on monitoring and analysis plan strategy outcome indicators baseline target data source monitoring body presentation of report are provided at pp. 127-160.

Summary observation on the strategic plan

Generally, all strategic plans follow similar approaches. First, they set out vision/mission statements that profess high goals and aspirations. Second, they set out a list of detailed initiatives that the organization will undertake to achieve the goals. Third, it discusses the budgetary requirements to achieve the goals. Fourth, it identifies oversight, monitoring and outcome evaluation processes of the strategic plan.

In terms of the narrative of the Plan, it is done consistent with established practices in strategic planning.

Public satisfaction survey and findings about the performance of the judiciary

Of special interest in the appraisal of the Plan is a "Court Users' Satisfaction Survey Report" issued in March 2022.

The user survey was "commissioned" by Federal Supreme Court and conducted by the Feteh (Justice) Activity in Ethiopia which is "a USAID-funded project designed to assist the Government of Ethiopia in critical democratic reforms."

In the survey 17 federal court district bench locations are included, 15 in Addis Ababa and 2 in Dire Dawa.

The study aims to "gather court users' experiences and perceptions about the judiciary's efficiency, transparency, access to justice, ethics and progress made in implementing reforms."

The overall goal of the survey is to "provide the FSCE and other courts with actionable information to continue their reforms and further improve court services" and "serve as a baseline for future periodic assessments and a source of potential interventions."

Among the key finding of the survey are the following:

Accessibility and Transparency – An "overwhelming majority of court users" found physical access to courts easy and "felt safe". They expressed satisfaction in having an open and public hearing.

Ethical Behavior and Impartiality– An "overwhelming majority (91%) of users reported being treated equally" without regard to "ethnicity, religion, gender, economic status, and age had no effect on their cases." Judges were reported to be "courteous, respectful and fair."

Effectiveness, Efficiency and Predictability of Service Delivery – "The findings showed 78% of users reported that they had confidence in the courts' operations."
Performance during the Last Three Years– "Slim majorities of only one in two users reported that courts process cases more efficiently and provide better services nowadays than compared to three years ago."

"With respect to corruption, however, slightly less than half of users (only 46%) agreed that courts were less corrupt now than they were three years ago."

Accessibility and Transparency– Survey results showed 74 percent of users reported "facing no difficulty accessing information and getting related services such as legal aid and translation and interpreter services."

Ethical Behavior and Impartiality– Similarly, 74 percent of users reported "receiving services without any issue of sincerity, loyalty, and integrity."

Effectiveness, Efficiency and Predictability of Service Delivery – 71 percent of users reported the "courts performed effectively" by providing timely and efficient services and in helping with mediation and reconciliation.

Corruption: The elephant in the judicial living room - In her recent interview, Chief Justice Meaza Ashenafi explained the complexities and challenges of judicial sector reform: But reform of the judiciary is even more complicated. For several years, the judiciary did not get the attention it needed, in terms of resources, human capacity, and others. It has been functioning under so many constraints.

Judicial reform is very process oriented. The judiciary is also vulnerable because there are many interests involved. So there is a lot of criticism, and sometimes even attacks. These are some of the factors hindering the reform. But according to the public perception surveys we have conducted, the public recognizes the progress and achievements we have made in the last three years.

The key arteries for the court reform agenda are efficiency (speedy trials), effectiveness (quality trials), and accessibility (of courts to people using technology and other platforms). To achieve these three targets, we undertook several measures, including the introduction of new legislation and new legal frameworks, setting up systems in place, and training both judges and support staff.

PM Abiy Ahmed in his recent appearance before Parliament identified corruption as the critical and fundamental problem of the judiciary and underscored the fierce urgency of now to deal with it.

PM Abiy addressed the problem of corruption in the judiciary broadly: taking bribes, receiving gifts and personal favors, denial of due process, abuse of discretion, abuse of power and arbitrary treatment of criminal defendants, conspiring and bragging about bribes on social media, delaying cases to favor one side or another, special treatment for friends and relatives, lack of impartiality and diligence, not showing upon time, conflict of interest and ex parte communications, among others.

He stated in the strongest language possible that the culture of corruption in the judicial and justice sectors has undermined public confidence in those institutions. For all intents and purposes, it could be said that he called for a national war on corruption not only in justice institutions but also other institutions of government as well.

He declared: The time for justice sector reform is now. We have not been successful with our intervention until now [in controlling corruption]. If there's going to be judicial sector reform, the time is now. If reform is not done now, if the foundation is let to collapse, it will never be fixed. Two days after his appearance in Parliament, PM Abiy announced the establishment of a 7-person national anti-corruption committee which includes the Attorney General and the head of the Ethiopian National Intelligence and Security Service.

The Feteh Users' Survey concluded, "With respect to corruption, however, slightly less than half of users (only 46%) agreed that courts were less corrupt now than they were three years ago."

It is true the corruption undermines confidence in government, and the legitimacy of government institutions in the eyes of citizens.

In my August 2013 commentary, "Corruption in the Ethiopian JUST US Sector," I observed:

I have long caricatured the "justice sector" of the TPLF/EPRDF as a kangaroo justice system founded on a sham, corrupt and whimsical legal process. What passes off as a "justice system" in Ethiopia is little more than a marketplace where "justice" is bought and sold in a monopoly controlled by one man supported by a few nameless, faceless and clueless men who skulk in the shadows of power. It is a justice system in which universal principles of law and justice are disregarded, subverted, perverted and mocked. It is a system where the poor, the marginalized, the audacious journalists, dissidents, opposition and civic society leaders are legally lynched despite the criticism and bootless cries of the international community. It is a system in which regime leaders, their families, friends and cronies are above the law and spell justice 'JUST US'.

The Ethiopian judicial and justice sector has to deal with the legacy of 30 years of "JUST US" system driven by corruption and a legal system that has been politicized, compromised, merchandized and privatized.

Like it or not, the "elephant in the judicial living room" is CORRUPTION.
Corruption is a hot and controversial issue in Ethiopia today.

Everyone talks about corruption, and it has manifestly become a source of embarrassment and shame for many in the justice/judicial sector.

There is a great deal of public anger and frustration around corruption and anti-corruption policies not just among the elites but also ordinary Ethiopians.

There is skepticism and cynicism about corruption reform the general attitude appears to be, "We have seen all the big bang anti-corruption reforms and it has made no difference."

PM Abiy expressed frustration when he told Parliament, "The time for justice sector reform is now. We have not been successful with our intervention until now." Best practices suggest corruption in state institutions, particularly in the judiciary, is decisive.

Corruption in the judiciary is a denial of justice. The great African American slavery abolitionist Frederick Douglas said: Where justice is denied, where poverty is enforced, where ignorance prevails, and where any one class is made to feel that society is in an organized conspiracy to oppress, rob, and degrade them, neither persons nor property will be safe.

Over the past decade, there have been many popular anti-corruption protests and uprising in many countries in the world to pressure the government to take radical action. Professor Alan Dershowitz observed, "Judges are the weakest link in our system of justice, and they are also the most protected." Unless the issue of corruption in the judiciary is addressed effectively and in a timely manner, all other reforms will be stillborn. That is the driving force in the fierce urgency of now to deal with judicial corruption as the Prime Minister has exhorted.

So, the million dollar question is whether the 2014-2018 strategic plan which focuses on "efficiency (speedy trials), effectiveness (quality trials), and accessibility (of courts to people using technology and other platforms)" is capable of effectively addressing the issue of structural corruption in the judicial sector.

The cumulative empirical evidence over the past three decades reveals that structural reforms do not consistently improve corrupt conduct, and they do not have a lasting effect. At best, they may reduce the opportunities for corruption but do not prevent motivated actors from seeking unethical advantages. Does the 2014-2018 strategic plan pay enough attention to the issue of endemic corruption Prime Minister Abiy asserted as the core problem of the judiciary. As they say, the devil is in the details. There are elements in the strategic plan that are broadly aimed at dealing with corruption. The fact is that corruption is not one of the declared core missions of the Plan.

The Plan mentions strengthening of control and oversight mechanisms within the judiciary. The question is whether the judiciary by itself could effectively deal with corruption. Best practices indicate control and oversight mechanisms should be broadened to include civil society and even lay persons in judicial appointments and judicial monitoring bodies for greater accountability, transparency and scrutiny. Some countries have experimented with independent "Court Users Committees" to receive public complaints and provide feedback to the federal judicial administration on the effectiveness, efficiency and integrity of their work.

The Plan addresses issues of transparency and accountability in the judiciary. The question is whether that can adequately address the issue of corruption. Best practices emphasize transparency and accountability beginning with recruitment and appointments of judges and the standards used to select court officials based on merit in a transparent process. Use of political considerations in the appointment process, inadequate salaries and working conditions result in attracting the least qualified and more prone to corrupt practices. The strategic plan addresses the issue of improving the education and training of judges to promote high standards of professionalism. The question is whether it provides sufficient opportunities to deal with corruption. Best practices suggest specifically the need for training programs, peer-to-peer mentoring, etc. to handle ethical dilemmas which could result in corrupt practices.

The strategic plan addresses strengthening judicial accountability and discipline using internal disciplinary mechanisms to maximize and safeguard judicial integrity.

Best practices suggest, minimally, judges and other judicial officials should be required to 1) sign codes of conduct and conflict of interest policies, 2) complete asset/income declarations annually with a verification mechanism, 3) establish an independent body to investigate and report on allegations of judicial misconduct and 4) robust whistleblowing policies and effective complaints mechanisms should also be in place to ensure safe reporting of corruption and other misconduct.

The strategic plan aims to promoting transparency in the judiciary in a variety of ways including by requiring courts to improve access to information on how courts function as well as the progress of individual cases, using the courts need to have access to information on due process rights and the nature of their rights during and after court proceedings, easy access to court information.

The Court Users' Survey results indicated high levels of user satisfaction in terms of access to information and operation of the federal courts but the question is whether this directly aids in the control of corruption. Best practices indicate the media can play a critical role in enhancing judicial transparency by reporting freely and fairly on legal proceedings.

Legally trained journalists can play a critical role in investigating allegations of judicial corruption, uncovering corruption and focusing prosecutorial attention on corruption suspects in the judicial sector.

The strategic plan addresses budgeting processes within the judiciary. The Chief Justice noted the "judiciary did not get the attention it needed, in terms of resources, human capacity, and others. It has been functioning under so many constraints." PM Abiy has said the judiciary is well-resourced and the budget for the judiciary has been transferred to Parliament.

In his recent appearance before Parliament, he said: As you know, even in terms of budget, we have now taken the justice system out of the executive branch and transferred it to Parliament. It has received substantial support.

Best laid plans…The 201-2018 strategic Plan reviews lessons learned from 2003-07 and 2008-12 plans.

PM Abiy says corruption is so bad in the judicial sector and other public institutions that it threatens national security as much as inflation and war. It is an understatement to say the image of the federal judiciary, public perception and confidence is at an all-time low following PM Abiy's scorching criticism of judicial corruption.

The fact is despite the enormity and complexity of the problem, corruption in the Ethiopian judicial/justice sector can be dealt with effectively if it is addressed as a national security threat to the viability of the Ethiopian nation and survival of the Ethiopian people, and all elements of society join hands to strike a blow against it.

Robert Burns penned the stanza: "The best laid schemes of mice and men Go often awry, And leave us nothing but grief and pain, For promised joy!"

The best laid plans often go awry because they are too ambitious, complex and with too many moving parts.

The cliché success breeds success is true. It is best to build on small successes which will cumulatively result in big success. That is especially true of the struggle against corruption.

The success of the justice/judicial reform is at the heart of Ethiopia's homegrown reform agenda. Its success will pivot as much on internal structural reforms as it does on high public confidence as well as affirmation of the institutional integrity of the judicial branch by the coordinate executive and legislative branches.

When the Portuguese came into East Africa during the fifteenth century, the were looking for spices. Vasco Da Gama's journey across the Cape of good hope into the Indian Ocean opened up the possibility of maritime trade between Europe and the Indies.

Eventually, Portugal came to colonize parts of East Africa, and decided to set up plantations in countries like Mozambique. One of those commodities that grew out of the plight of colonialism were spices. One of such spices, which was a kind of Chilli was called "peri-peri" by the indigenous East Africans.

It is assumed by some historians that "peri-peri" made its way into the Horn of Africa during the 16th century. It is also assumed that it is the Portuguese who came to introduce the spice within the Amharic-speaking areas of the region due to their extensive involvement in the region's affairs at the time. Thus, it is said that the Amharic word for a spice called "Berbere" may have entered the Amharic vocabulary via Portuguese.

However, a more accepted theory states that "berbere" was "invented" by the Ethiopians themselves during the ancient Aksumite empire. It is said that the Aksumites used the monsoon winds to trade with India and China via the Red sea. Among the goods they returned with were Oriental spices like black pepper, cinnamon and ginger.

As these imported spices made their way into local markets, households in Aksum experimented and developed their mixes. It was such experimentation that was responsible for the creation of "Berbere". Berbere is often mixture of different other spices, and the composition often differs from household to household.

Considering the above, it is believed that the Amharic word "Berbere" is derived from the Ge'ez (Ancient Ethiopic) word for pepper- "Papare".

The Ethiopian government, despite facing various internal and external problems, is right now finishing the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance dam (GERD) without Egyptian or any outsider's interruption. Thus Ethiopia is almost finishing a project that gift it total control over the Ghion (Abbay river). Congratulations; at this point in time what you and me are asking for is almost becoming a reality.

However, the Egyptian nation, for thousands of years, has told and retold a narrative that states the Nile river in essence 'belongs' to Egypt. This has always been accepted and encouraged by the anti-African (anti-Black) global orthodox thought, and Ethiopia is neither in a position nor is interested to ‘wrestle away' the narrative dominance that Egypt has over the Nile river. That should be a task reserved for other Black African nations from which the river originates. For us, it suffices to say that the Ghion/Abbay river, which is a tributary to the Nile river, belongs to Ethiopia since the beginning of creation.

The picture above shows the Tis Abbay falls, a large fountain which is part of the Abbay river. The rainbow which provided Divine inspiration to the present-day Ethiopian flag, can be seen shining above the river. Therefore it is Divine power, and not just the construction of some dam that gifted the Ghion to Ethiopia. It has always been Ethiopia`s gift from God.

It was Axum at the time, not, strictly, Ethiopia, but it certainly did. Ethiopia sat on a significant trade route through the Red Sea and saw a lot of traffic involving merchants going back and forth between the Mediterranean on one hand and East Africa and India on the other as well as selling goods of its own, like versions of the aromatic resins so popular in the Roman empire and Persia. It's even been suggested that Ethiopia converted to Christianity as a way to solidify relations with an increasingly Christian empire, though that's largely speculative.

What did Romans and Greeks write about Ethiopia?

Ancient Aethiopia (Greek: Αἰθιοπία Aithiopia) first appears as a geographical term in classical documents in reference to the upper Nile region, as well as certain areas south of the Sahara desert. Its earliest mention is in the works of Homer: twice in the Iliad, and three times in the Odyssey. The Greek historian Herodotus specifically uses the appellation to refer to such parts of Africa as were then known within the inhabitable world.

In classical antiquity, Africa (or Ancient Libya) referred to what is now known as the Maghreb and south of the Libyan Desert and Western Sahara, including all the desert land west of the southern Nile river. Geographical knowledge of the continent gradually grew, with the first century AD Greek travelogue the Periplus of the Erythraean Sea describing areas along the Red Sea (Erythraean Sea). The Greek name Αἰθιοπία (from Αἰθίοψ, Aithiops, 'an Ethiopian') is a compound word, derived from the two Greek words, from αἴθω + ὤψ (aitho "I burn" + ops "face"). According to the Perseus Digital Library, the designation properly translates as Burnt-face in noun form and red-brown in adjectival form. It was used as a vague term for dark-skinned populations since the time of Homer. It was applied to such dark-skinned populations as came within the range of observation of the ancient geographers i.e. primarily in what was then Nubia, and with the expansion of geographical knowledge, successively extended to certain other areas below the Sahara.

Homer (c. 8th century BC) is the first to mention "Aethiopians" (Αἰθίοπες, Αἰθιοπῆες); he mentions that they are to be found at the east and west extremities of the world, divided by the sea into "eastern" (at the sunrise) and "western" (at the sunset). In Rhapsody A of the Iliad, Thetis visits Olympus to meet Zeus, but the meeting is postponed, as Zeus and other gods are absent, visiting the land of the Aethiopians. Hesiod (c. 8th century BC) speaks of Memnon as the "king of Aethiopia".

THE WORLD ACCORDING TO HOMER.

In 515 BC, Scylax of Caryanda, on orders from Darius I of the Achaemenid Empire, sailed along the Indus River, Indian Ocean and Red Sea, circumnavigating the Arabian Peninsula. He mentioned "Aethiopians", but his writings on them have not survived. Hecataeus of Miletus (c. 500 BC) is also said to have written a book about Aethiopia, but his writing is now known only through quotations from later authors. He stated that Aethiopia was located to the east of the Nile, as far as the Red Sea and Indian Ocean; he is also quoted as relating a myth that the Skiapods ("Shade feet") lived there, whose feet were supposedly large enough to serve as shade.

In his "Histories" (c. 440 BC) Herodotus presents some of the most ancient and detailed information about "Aethiopia". He relates that he personally traveled up the Nile to the border of Egypt as far as Elephantine (modern Aswan); in his view, "Aethiopia" is all of the inhabited land found to the south of Egypt, beginning at Elephantine. He describes a capital at Meroë, adding that the only deities worshipped there were Zeus (Amun) and Dionysus (Osiris). He relates that in the reign of Pharaoh Psamtik I (c. 650 BCE), many Egyptian soldiers deserted their country and settled amidst the Aethiopians.

Herodotus tells us that king Cambyses II (c. 570 BC) of the Achaemenid Empire sent spies to the Aethiopians "who dwelt in that part of Libya (Africa) which borders upon the southern sea." They found a strong and healthy people. Although Cambyses then campaigned toward their country, by not preparing enough provisions for the long march, his army completely failed and returned quickly.

In Book 3, Herodotus defines "Aethiopia" as the farthest region of "Libya" (i.e. Africa): "Where the south declines towards the setting sun lies the country called Aethiopia, the last inhabited land in that direction. There gold is obtained in great plenty, huge elephants abound, with wild trees of all sorts, and ebony; and the men are taller, handsomer, and longer lived than anywhere else."

The Egyptian priest Manetho (c. 300 BC) listed Kushite (25th) dynasty, calling it the "Aethiopian dynasty". Moreover, when the Hebrew Bible was translated into Greek (c. 200 BC), the Hebrew appellation "Kush, Kushite" became in Greek "Aethiopia, Aethiopians", appearing as "Ethiopia, Ethiopians" in the English King James Version.

Agatharchides provides a relatively detailed description of the gold mining system of Aethiopia. His text was copied almost verbatim by virtually all subsequent ancient writers on the area, including Diodorus Siculus and Photius.

With regard to the Ethiopians, Strabo indicates that they looked similar to Indians, remarking "those who are in Asia (South India), and those who are in Africa, do not differ from each other." Pliny in turn asserts that the place-name "Aethiopia" was derived from one "Aethiop, a son of Vulcan" [the smith-god Hephaestus. He also writes that the "Queen of the Ethiopians" bore the title Kandake, and avers that the Ethiopians had conquered ancient Syria and the Mediterranean. Following Strabo, the Greco-Roman historian Eusebius notes that the Ethiopians had emigrated into the Red Sea area from the Indus Valley and that there were no people in the region by that name prior to their arrival.

The first century AD Greek travelogue known as the Periplus of the Erythraean Sea first describes the Horn of Africa littoral, based on its author's intimate knowledge of the area. The Periplus does not mention any dark-skinned "Ethiopians" among the area's inhabitants. They only later appear in Ptolemy's Geographia, but in a region far south, around the "Bantu nucleus" of northern Mozambique.

According to John Donnelly Fage, these early Greek documents altogether suggest that the original inhabitants of Azania, the "Azanians", were of the same ancestral stock as the Afroasiatic-speaking populations to the north of them in the ancient Barbara region along the Red Sea. Subsequently, by the tenth century, these original "Azanians" had been replaced by early waves of Bantu settlers.

Several notable personalities in Greek and medieval literature were identified as Aethiopian, including several rulers, male and female: Memnon and his brother Emathion, King of Arabia. Cepheus and Cassiopeia, parents of Andromeda, were named as king and queen of Aethiopia. Homer in his description of the Trojan War mentions several other Aethiopians. In some cults of the youngest Olympian god, Dionysus, his maternal origins are believed to be Aethiopia.

Ptolemy the geographer and other ancient Greek commentators believed that the "Aethiopian Olympus" was where the gods lived when they were not in Greece.

Ethiopia is the second most populated country in Africa, with 114.96 million people strong. It is the 8th richest country in Africa with a GDP of $90.97 billion.

> The country doesn't produce oil, but they still have one of the fastest growing economies on the continent. It relies on agricultural, export coffee, cattle, gold, and leather products. It also does a great job of leveraging the county's 14 major rivers (including the famous Nile) to produce energy.
> An increase in private-sector involvement is huge for Ethiopia as it continues to move forward. The goal is to eventually be a manufacturing hub instead of relying so much on agriculture.

Why did Ethiopia abandon the name Abyssynia?

Firew Afera

A student of Black Africa`s pastJun 11

The name of the country has always been Ethiopia. The name was adopted during the Aksumite empire.

Many people often get confused about the term Ethiopia, and I have even encountered some who claimed that modern Ethiopians simply adopted the name. Some said that the term was used specifically to refer to modern Sudan, and some said that it was a racial term to denote people of Black African origin.

There are truths to both claims.

``Ethiopian`` as a Black person.

The claim that the Greeks used the term to indicate people who have a burnt (dark) face is entirely correct. However, we also should not forget that the parts of Black Africa which the Greeks had access to are limited to the northernmost areas of West and Central Africa, North Africa, the Horn of Africa and the Swahili coast. They could not have known that Black people lived in the forested areas of West/Central Africa and inland South Africa. This means that, though such statements are correct, the geographical areas from which the Blacks came from should also be considered.

As an Ethiopian person, I consider my country Ethiopia as a spiritual heartland for Black people worldwide. This link Ethiopia has with the rest of Black Africans gets emphasized during the era of slavery and colonization (the early modern period), and significantly influence the Pan-African movement. The ancient Ethiopian flag (green, yellow and red) would be adopted by many African nations as their national flag, and is a symbol for many Pan-African and Pan-Black movements (probably alongside what I believe is the Biafran flag).

``Ethiopian`` as a Nubian.

I think some people are new to the fact that the modern countries of Ethiopia and North Sudan (from where the civilizations centered in Nubia flourished) were a single nation in the past. Though the two embarked on separate historical journeys afterwards, people of both countries understand that they were one in the past, and still are similar in culture and way of life despite superficial differences in linguistic and religious identity. Simply put, Ethiopians and Sudanese are the same people.

The Ethiopian empire was founded when the Queen of Sheba, Makeda, conceived Menelik I from King Solomon in Israel. After the reign of Menelik I, the list of Ethiopian rulers and their reign are recorded in Ethiopian ancient books and manuscripts. After some point of time in Ethiopian history, all the rulers of Nubia would also be rulers of modern day Ethiopia, and this is clearly documented in ancient (Abyssinian) histories. For instance:

- Piankiyha the fourth ruled both Nubia and Abyssinia at 633–599 B.C. (Ethiopian calender)
- Basin ruled Ethiopia at 8 B.C. ruled Ethiopia until the birth of Jesus christ. (Ethiopian calender)
- Nicotris Kandake the 6th ruled Ethiopia between 24 and 14 BC. (Ethiopian calender)

This shows you that modern countries of Sudan and Ethiopia have the same rulers, and hence the history for many years.

However, after the rise of Aksum and the start of the Christian era, modern Abyssinia started to be ruled by Aksumite (Ethio-Semitic speaking) emperors. Some of these include Emperor Kaleb (who annexed the Himaryitic kingdom of Yemen into the Ethiopian empire) and Ezana (the Aksumite king who made Christianity the official religion of Ethiopia). Ezana also invaded the empire of Meroe in Sudan and spelled the end of the Meriotic empire.

Why Ethiopia is called Ethiopia

During the rise of Christianity and its subsequent expansion, there was one lingua franca that all the learned people of antiquity understood; Greek. Many ancient cultures that went to accept Christianity around the world received a healthy dose of Greek culture as well.

This would be well pronounced in Egypt and Nubia. The Copts of Egypt (who still exist as an Ethno-religious group) would adopt the Greek alphabet to write their language, and Egypt would also recieve a sizable Greek immigration. Similarly, the various Christian, Sudanic speaking people of Nubia would also adopt a variation of the Greek alphabet to write their languages:

(Old Nubian text)

The Aksumite empire, which started as a maritime empire in the Red sea coast, was significantly influenced by Greek culture from its start. The first Aksumite king was called Zoskales (a Greek name), and all archeological evidences indicate that all the people of Red sea coast spoke fluent Greek to facilitiate trading interactions.

When Christianity was introduced into Aksum in the fourth century, it was introduced as Christianity into Ethiopia since Aksum was situated in what the world considered as Ethiopia. Abba Frumentiaus, the first patriarichate of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo church, is considered the Patriarich of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahdo church, not an Abyssinian church.

In short, the name ``Ethiopia`` endured in the Abyssinian lands. It transcended all the ethnic differences that the Ethiopian people have, and was used as a catalyst for unification during the Solomonic dynasty (1270–1974). As I wrote earler, the adoption of the world Ethiopia was influenced by the natural ties the Aksumite empire has with Greek culture, and the adoption and expansion of Christianity in a Greek ``context``.

Abyssinia (Habesha)

The term Abyssinia was first mentioned in Kemitic inscriptions at the time of Queen Hatshepsut to describe the inhabitants of Punt, a maritime empire ancestral to the Aksumite empire. The inhabitants of the proto-Aksumite state of Damat, in their inscriptions made using Sabean language, clearly identified themselves as ``Habeshas``. This term was not changed; Ethiopians regularly refer to themselves as Habesha in both formal and informal settings. A Habesha person hails from either Eritrea or Ethiopia.

However, the word ``Habesha`` does not have anything to do with the Nubians or the Sudanese. This is because it was used to refer to a specific set of Ethiopians who set up maritime states in the Red sea coast, which was rich in incense, myrrh and ivory. Those polities would gradually expand inward and conquer other Ethiopian people and lay the framework of modern Ethiopia.

Thus, the word ``Abyssinia`` is simply a Latinized version of the ``Habesha``. The country is Ethiopia, and the inhabitants are us Habeshas.

The Bible most certainly does not say so.

Artists tend to go on what they know. White artists portray Adam as white, black as black and so on.

The reality is we don't know what colour the first man's skin was and, more importantly, we shouldn't care. Such details are trivia, and irrelevant. If a person is fixated on the colour of a Bible character's skin, be assured they have totally missed the message of the Bible.

For certain, God is not partial, and neither should we be. (Acts 10:34, 35)

How did Axum and Nubia culturally influence the Sahelian kingdoms of Africa?

Answered by

There are certain shared cultural features but it was very early and spreads right across from one end of the Sahara to the next, in terms of Tumulus burials , the donkey was used as transport and goods along with ideas was more than likely shared , however it was perhaps unidirectional, interestingly there are certain contacts present not in the Savannah countries , but in the forested nations to the south of possible Coptic influences.

note this is not to say they adopted Christianity but an alternate route not involving hostile Muslim competitors , I will share this Hutchins Lecture at Harvard with you , you need some down time because it's 1:57:55 long. You can cut the first 4 min of the intro if you want.

Deported Ethiopian migrants tell of suffering in Saudi Arabia detention ens of thousands of Ethiopian migrants are being deported from Saudi Arabia. They tell of being detained for months in miserable conditions. At home, they face an uncertain future.

Abdela Mohammed spent 13 "unbearable" months languishing in an overcrowded Saudi detention center before being repatriated back to Ethiopia in May.

He was locked in a single cell with about 200 others, he said. The detainees slept on the bare floor and were barely fed enough to survive.

"There wasn't enough food," Abdela said of his time in the Shmeisi Detention Center, east of Jeddah. "We only ate breakfast and the rice we were given wasn't even enough for a single mouthful."

The detainees were also denied medical care, the 31-year-old said.

"When we knocked on the doors to tell them someone was sick, they called us 'dogs' and told us to 'let them die'," Abdela recalled in an telephone interview from his hometown in Ethiopia's southern region, where he has been living with his family since his return.

Ignored by Ethiopia

He and other detainees called Ethiopia's embassy from prison, he recounted, but they "didn't help us."

"One day an embassy employee, who witnessed us being beaten up by the police [in detention], said to us: 'Let them beat you'."

No one visited us when we told them that someone was sick. When we informed them about the death of an old man, they refused to take his corpse and bury it."

Abdela despaired of making it out of the cell alive: "I thought I would never get out and be a human being again."

DW has tried to contact Ethiopia's embassy in Saudi Arabia for a comment but has so far been unsuccessful.

Popular destination for migrants

Solomon Belete spent even longer in detention. He doesn't want to talk about his 22 months locked up, other to say that it was "suffocating".

But the 33-year-old is happy to describe the dreams that sent him to Saudi Arabia in the first place: to build a family home for himself and his parents and save money to start a business back in Ethiopia.

A trained physical education teacher, he had spent several years looking for job at home after graduating from university.

© FAYEZ NURELDINE/AFPSaudi Arabia relies heavily on foreign workers, many of whom work in construction, farming and as domestics

So when a friend living in Saudi Arabia told him it would be easy to get a driving job in the Gulf state, Solomon jumped at the chance.

"He told me: 'You'll live in comfort driving rich people's car. You are well educated. It won't be difficult for you to get the driver's license'," Solomon recalls.

But Solomon was detained at the airport upon arrival and thrown straight into a deportation center.

Deportation agreement

Solomon and Abdela are two of at least 38,000 Ethiopians who have been deported from Saudi Arabia since March 30, 2022 when an agreement between the governments of the two countries came into effect.

More than 100,000 Ethiopian migrants currently detained in the oil-rich nation will be returned home under the agreement.

Saudi Arabia is a popular destination for Ethiopian migrants — with an estimated 750,000 of them residing in the Middle East country, according to the International Organization for Migration (IOM).

Of these, some 450,000 have probably migrated through "irregular means" and will need help to return home, the IOM said in a recent statement.

Languishing in detention

In the past few years, Saudi Arabia has carried out regular sweeps of undocumented workers, holding those arrested in large deportation centers.

Human rights organizations have been denouncing the conditions of these centers for years.

Perilous journey getting there

Before his last journey, Abdela Mohammed had twice worked in Saudi Arabia to earn money to support his family.

That's why he decided to make the trip for a third time in 2018 — paying smugglers 10,000 riyals (€2,500 or $2,700) to take him from the coastal town of Bosaso in Somalia across the Bab-el-Mandeb strait to Yemen and then on to Saudi Arabia.

But perhaps a portent of the tribulations to come, this third time proved to be a nightmare. Four people died on the boat to Yemen from the heat, Abdela said.

Then at the border to Saudi Arabia, the caravan of Ethiopian migrants came under fire from guards.

© Provided by Deutsche WelleProvided by Deutsche Welle

When he eventually made it over the border, he picked up odd jobs, working as a goat herder, a day laborer and a bulldozer operator.

But he said, to the Saudis he was just a drudge: "They called me a dog and a donkey. I was insulted while working."

Then he was arrested laboring on a mango and avocado farm.

Little of promise at home

Ethiopia's government has put out a donor call for $11 million to help provide those returning with food, temporary accommodation, medical assistance and counseling services.

After more than a year locked behind bars, Abdela landed in Ethiopia with just the clothes on his back.

He was given bus fare to pay his way home to Alaba, a small town in a rural area of southern Ethiopia.

He has no plans to return to Saudi Arabia again, except perhaps to pray, said Abdela, a Muslim.

As for returnee Solomon Belete, he is one of those who urgently needs help.

He has come back to Ethiopia a broken man with a chronic health problem that started during his long detention.

"My body is trembling. I can't keep my balance. I never sleep well," he said.

Detainees are "chained together in pairs, forced to use the floor of their cells as a toilet, and confined 24 hours a day in unbearably overcrowded cells," according to a 2020 Amnesty International investigation into the ill-treatment of Ethiopian detainees in the Middle East country.

"Pregnant women, babies and small children are held in these same appalling conditions," the investigation found.

In interviews conducted in 2020, detainees told Human Rights Watch that at a center in Riyadh, some 350 men shared two to five toilets and had no access to soap and showers.

Detainees also talked of being assaulted and beaten by guards, "especially when they asked for medical attention or complained about the conditions," the rights organization reported.

- Ethiopia is mentioned over 40 times in the Bible and it is one of the few countries mentioned in the Bible, the Torah, the Quran, Homer's Odyssey, and many other ancient books.

For example in Greek mythology, Andromeda is the daughter of the Ethiopian king Cepheus and his wife Cassiopeia. When Cassiopeia's hubris leads her to boast that Andromeda is more beautiful than the Nereids, Poseidon sends the sea monster Cetus to ravage Andromeda as divine punishment. Andromeda is stripped and chained naked to a rock as a sacrifice to sate the monster, but is saved from death by Perseus

- The Ethiopian calendar has 13 months and it is 7 or 8 years behind the Western calendar.
- In Ethiopia, time is counted differently. Six o'clock is said to be 12 o'clock, and 16:00 hours is 10 o'clock.
- Ethiopian new year known as Enkutatash, and Ri'se Awde Amet is celebrated on Meskerem 1 which is the same as September 11. Young girls donning new clothes, gather daisies and present friends with a bouquet, singing New Year songs. Modern Enkutatash is also the season for exchanging formal new year greetings and cards among the urban sophisticated – in lieu of the traditional bouquet of flowers.
- Ethiopia is the only country in Africa to not become colonized; successfully fighting off invaders like the Italians, the Ottomans, the Egyptians ect.
- Ethiopia was the first African nation to join the League of Nations, and Ethiopia became a charter member of the United Nations.

- Lucy, a human fossil believed to have existed over 3 million years ago, was found in the Great Rift Valley in Ethiopia in 1974. She was named after the Beatles' song Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds," which was playing on the radio at the time she was found. Even older remains were found in Hadar in 2001. Dated at more than 5 million years old, they are the earliest known ancestors of modern humans.
- Gebeta is an ancient Ethiopian game of strategy. It is played using seeds or pebbles and a board with rows of cups. It is also called wari et solo, mancala, or congkak in different cultures in the world.

For those who're unfamiliar with Lalibela, Lalibela is a famous town in Ethiopia that's home to 11 Rock carved churches. The 11 churches represent the 12 apostles/followers (minus Judas Iscariot) of Jesus Christ during his time on earth.

The town, formally known as Roha, was named after the Agwe King "Lalibela". The story goes that at his birth, a horde of bees stayed near him and never once stung him. His mother took this as a holy and important sign and named him "Lalibela" (bees who respect him)

King Lalibela was a religiously devout Orthodox Christian. He made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem and spent vast amounts of his time engaged in prayer, fasting, scripture reading & liturgy. After Jerusalem was captured by Salahudin in 1187, King Lalibela was distraught and decided to create a "New Jerusalem" in his kingdom.

He thus commissioned the rock hewn churches of Lalibela. The churches are laid out in a manner that replicates the layout of Jerusalem. Even more impressively, each church is carved from a single gigantic rock.

The conventional belief is that these churches were actually built over several decades or a century rather than entirely within Lalibela's reign. But local belief goes that angels divinely intervened and personally helped the artisans carry & chisel the stone. And a few theorists think they were built by aliens. You decide for yourself what you'll believe XD

Lalibela is an incredible sight, I'd highly recommend you see it in person if you ever get the chance. And speaking of Lalibela, King Lalibela is also a saint in the Ethiopian Orthodox Church. And today, the 19th, is his feast day. Salute to a holy man.

Ethiopia is an amazing nation on many levels and in many ways which I adore and hold very close to my heart. Given the opportunity I would move there in a heartbeat.

First and foremost I like the people of Ethiopia. Beautiful and proud, extremely hospitable, polite and kind. There is great cultural and ethnic diversity in Ethiopia with more than 80 languages spoken.

The Ethiopian Empire which came to an end some 40 years ago has a remarkable and rich history stretching back to ancient and prehistoric times. There are a multitude of fascinating historical and archeological sites particularly in the northern part of the country. The Medieval castles of Gondar, the complex of stunning rock hewn churches of Lalibela, and the staggering carved monoliths of Aksum are some of the most famous. Ethiopia has her own delightfully unique, ornate ancient writing system in widespread official use throughout the country–the only nation in contemporary Africa to boast such a claim.

Ethiopia also has a fabulously delicious and healthy cuisine sporting a broad variety of dishes flavored with robust, complex blends of spices some of which have more than twenty ingredients! All the flavors and aromas, as well as the heat (spicy) may be more than some Westerners enjoy, but I can't imagine anyone getting bored with the extensive variety of foods and flavors available in Ethiopia. Ethiopia is also the original home of coffee, which is the source of lovely traditional ceremonies involving fresh roasted, ground and brewed coffee and incense.

I also love the spectacular natural beauty of Ethiopia which is raw, ever-changing and full of wonders on a grandiose scale. There are numerous ecosystems, geological and geographical features throughout the land. The fertile highland plateau is torn apart by a massive, spreading gash on the earth–the Great Rift Valley, stretching from the Red Sea to the southern end of the continent. The Ethiopian Rift Valley is home to dozens of unique lakes rich with wildlife and natural splendor, as well as hundreds of volcanoes of all types ranging in size from as small as a house to colossal mountains and calderas; it even has one of earth's rare lava lakes which has been in constant eruption since discovered. Hot and mineral springs are also abundant.

Ethiopia's climate, particularly in the highlands is ideal and very comfortable year-round–a huge plus for me. Thanks to its location near the equator the night-day cycle varies little in comparison to the higher latitudes that suffer extreme changes weather and hours of daylight throughout the year.

I've tried to keep this as succinct as possible which is extremely challenging because there is so much to like about Ethiopia; but I hope my perspective provides what you're looking for.

Life can be very tough when one does not have financial means.. however this is seen through the world . Despite this , many live life with peace and very respectful to one another . Even the poorest wear shirts with our country name on it .

Traffic is horrendous.. however never witness any New York exchanges. Often exchange are just “Salam..Salam”.

Federal police walk around with korskasoff machine guns and many buildings (especially malls) in Addis Ababa require pat down search and belongings pass through detectors . The fear of al shabab is present however they are mainly out in the countryside.

Abyssinia to Ethiopia: from Obfuscation to Confusion - OPride.com

For more than a century, scholars have been wallowing in big confusion regarding the name Abyssinia which later on became Ethiopia. In recent years, the name Abyssinia seems to be enjoying a revival of one form or another. For example coming across with businesses or political organizations named after Abyssinia names like Abyssinia Bank, Abyssinia Radio, Abyssinia Church, Abyssinia Airlines, Abyssinia

Cement Factory, Abyssinia Band, Abyssinia/Habesha Restaurant, Habesha Supermarket, etc., has become very common.

Recently, I read an article dated October, 2009 on seemingly pro-EPRDF government website regarding a lawsuit over the alleged invention and use of the old name of 'Abyssinia' as trade mark. As explained below, practically the parties seem to be fighting on politically motivated discriminatory and racist name.

This clearly shows the renaissance of old name of Ethiopia that rekindles a new round of discussion and clarification of what is behind the nomenclature "Abyssinia." In my view, misunderstandings arising from the use of these two very "historical" names often lead to fundamentally wrong analysis and interpretation of political problems. It is this century old confusion that lie beneath the two names that forced me to deal with this sensitive issue.

Abyssinia in English, Habesha in Amharic and Habesh in Arabic- is a well-known "historical" country recognized by the neighboring countries, Arabs and Europeans. According to credible sources, the name Abyssinia is derived from the Arabic word 'Habesh', which means 'mongrel'. I'm not sure if it has pejorative meaning at present time but it was something common to hear the expression "Habesh-Rabesh, Habesh-Hanish" in Arabic which means "Habesh-Garbage, Habesh-Snake".

The newly created Federal arrangement in Ethiopia didn't explicitly recognize the name and state of Abyssinia though the name Abyssinia and Abyssinian nationalism is reviving under disguise after EPRDF government's administrative division of different ethnic groups of Abyssinia and non-Abyssinian Ethiopians under federal arrangement. Accordingly, the State of Abyssinia- includes ethnic Tigre and Amhara, State of Oromia-includes the 12 mega regions of the Oromo, State of Somali, State of Afar, State Southern Nations and Nationalities people's Region- SNNPR- I prefer to collectively call them Omonia named after people's living alongside river Omo, State of Gambella, State of Benishangul-Gumuz, and the very tiny city State Harar with a population of 9,000 powerful Harari's.

The "historical" Abyssinia country is located in present day North Ethiopia and Southern Eritrea-Hamasien, Akaleguzai & Sera'e. The highland Eritreans are typical Abyssinians though the used the Italian Latin phrase 'Mare Erythraeum' -Red See. Abyssinians are Semitic in origin and its major tribal regions comprise Tigre, Gondare and Gojjame, though there is some Cushitic's like Lasta of Agaw. They have very complicated myths, weird culture and their own version of Christianity that can be characterized by backward superstition and miracles of local tribal saints. They refer their country as "Abyssinia: A Christian Island surrounded by enemy Islam and pagans". It is Abyssinia that was a Christian Island. Ethiopia, however, never was a Christian Island. It is rather a country inhibited by large number of Muslims and traditional believers.

Abyssinia never had a unified government till late 19th century except one or more brigand like tribal chieftains in every tribes or king of Ambas or tribal regions. The people unfortunate exposure to continuous drought and famine due to shortage of rainfall, mountainous rocky landscape, endless war on tribal line and others, compels them to struggle for survival.
It is Kassa latter Tewodros of Gondare tribe who, for the first time in the history of Abyssinia, attempted to subjugate the other chiefs of Abyssinia -but never the present Ethiopia, under the banner of eliminating the neighboring Wello Islam Oromo from Christian Island, Abyssinia. He became 'brigand Chief of Chiefs or King of Kings' in 1855 assisted by British advisors and their modern weaponry. Up on his death, first the tribal chief of Tigre another Kassa- later Yohannes-(1875) in the name 'crusader Christianizing the whole Abyssinia' and then the isolated small tribal brigand chief of Shoa -Menelik (1889) became chief of chiefs of plunder under same banner of exterminating Oromo and Islam.

The following Famous Letter of Tewodros to Queen Victoria of England, if read between lines, ascertains what the name and politics of Abyssinia country looked like.

In the name of the father, of the son, and of the wholly ghost, one god in trinity, chosen by god, king of kings, Theodore of Abyssinia.

To her Majesty Victoria, Queen of England,

"I hope your majesty is in good health. By the power of god I am well. My fathers, the emperors, having forgotten the creator, he handed over their kingdom to the Gallas and the Turks*. But god created me, lifted me out of the dust, and restored this empire to my rule. He endowed me with power and enabled me to stand in the place of my fathers.* By this power I drove away the Gallas. As for the Turks I have told them to leave the land of my ancestors. They refuse. I am now going to wrestle with them.

"Mr. Plowden and my late Grand chamberlain, the Englishman bell, used to tell me that there is a great Christian Queen, who loves all Christians*. When they said to me this: "we are able to make you known to her and to establish friendship between you," then in those times I was very glad. I gave them my love, thinking that I had found your majesty's goodwill.*

"All men are subject to death, and my enemies, thinking to injure me, killed these friends. But by the power of god I have exterminated those enemies, not leaving one alive, though they were of my own family, that I may get, by the power of god, your friendship. I was prevented by Turks occupying the sea-coast from sending you an embassy when I was in difficulty. Consul Cameron arrived with a letter and presents of friendship. By the power of god I was very glad hearing of your welfare and being assured of you amity. I have received your presents and thank you much.

"I fear that if I send ambassadors with presents of amity by Consul Cameron, they may be arrested by the Turks. And now I wish that you may arrange for the safe passage of my ambassadors everywhere on the road. I wish to have an answer to this letter by Consul Cameron, and that he may conduct my embassy to England. See how Islam oppresses the Christian."

The history of Abyssinia started taking another shape following Menelik's devastating holocaust (conquest) of unrelated vast territories of Cushitic, Omotic and Nilotic people of the Horn region. By doing that, Menelik controlled fertile territories of, at least, five times larger than the size of Abyssinian proper. The massive booty gained, the unprecedented total enslavement and confiscation of the country relatively emboldened and somehow unified the Amhara Abyssinians, except the Tigrean. It is said that the already invented Abyssinian myths are consolidated during this time. After conquering what makes up at least 70 percent of the land mass of the present-day empire- areas primarily lying to the south of Abyssinia- Menelik signed boundary treaties with European colonial powers to form the present day Ethiopia and tried to adopt the name Ethiopia to give cohesion to the bogus history of the country.

Conquering Lion of the tribe of Judah, Menelik ??, elect of God, king of kings of Ethiopia

To our friend Her Majesty Queen Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Empress of India.

Greetings!

We ask most especially for news of your precious health.

I wrote a letter to your Majesty dated 25 Meskerem 1883; but I do not know if it reached you.

The great English power being up to this day the friend of the Ethiopian empire and in recognition of your goodwill to her, we express to you our gratitude.

Seeing that we wish to acquaint the friendly powers of Europe in writing with the boundaries of Ethiopia, we hereby write to your Majesty in the same sense, and we are hopeful that you may bestow your benevolent consideration upon what follows:

Boundaries of Ethiopia:

In pointing out the exact boundaries of my empire as they exist today I signify my intention, if god graciously grants me life and strength, to re-establish the ancient frontiers of Ethiopia as far as Khartoum and Lake Nyanza (Lake Victoria), with all the Galla territories.

I have not the least intention of remaining a disinterested onlooker if powers from a distance come with the notion of dividing Africa between themselves, Ethiopia having been, during the course of quite fourteen centuries, an island inhabited by Christians in a see of pagans.

Just as almighty god has protected Ethiopia up to the present time, so also I am confident that he be her guardian today and will also add to her territory in the future, and I have no reason to contemplate that he will divide up Ethiopia amongst other powers.

Formerly the boundary of Ethiopia was the see. Because of lack of strength on our own part and because of the failure of other Christians to come to our aid, our frontier on the seaward side fell into the hands of the Muslims. Today we make no pretence of seeking to recover our seaward frontier by force; but we hope that the Christian powers, guided by our lord Jesus Christ, may yield us our frontiers on the sea, or that at least they may give us some points on the coast.

Done at Addis Ababa 14 Miazia 1883 (April 1891)

The legacy of Menelik's military conquests, which took place a century ago, and the structure of the state built to incorporate the survivors of conquered peoples are the major underlying cause of many of Ethiopia's problems today, including famines. Abyssinians assert that Menelik is a unifier, though he is short of the dream territories mentioned in him letter. The boundaries created as a result of Abyssinian military victories were no less arbitrary divisive than those created by competing European colonial powers in the rest of Africa; in the west, Anuak, Nuer, Berta and Komo were split between Ethiopia and present day Sudan; in the south, Oromo were split between Ethiopia and present day Kenya; in the east and southeast, Somali were split between Ethiopia, Kenya and present day Somalia and Djibouti; and in the northeast, Afars were split between Ethiopia and present day Djibouti; A number of other smaller groups were divided in the north, west and south. Also in the north Abyssinia itself were to be divided between present day Ethiopia and Eritrea. It should be noted that Abyssinian kings rule over Ethiopia but without either acceptance or recognition by non-Abyssinians.

One of the most interesting but confusing tactics Abyssinian devised to obfuscate the atrocities committed while at the same time getting legitimacy over the newly confiscated country and people was fabricating history, presenting their myths as history, using diplomatic verbiage and changing their name of Semitic Abyssinia to Cushitic Ethiopia. With political developments in subsequent years they grossly denied the history, culture, language, identity etc of vast enslaved survivors of Menelik's Holocaust.

The most important myths Abyssinians used as ideological weapon to subjugate the overwhelmingly majority non-Abyssinians and confuse local as well as foreign historians are the following:

- That it is only 500 years since Oromo migrated and settled in the fertile Abyssinia/Ethiopia lands and that they are some how granted permanent residence status or citizenship. So people who don't have rich history of 3000 years like that of Abyssinian they can't claim equal right.
- Abyssinians are related to Jesus Christ by blood through Solomonic dynasty and that the blessing given to holly land Israel was transferred to Abyssinia-'Ethiopia' after the former crucified Jesus Christ. As a result, Abyssinian are 'chosen race' that they should be the master of conquered Oromo and other tribes of the present Ethiopia.
- The myth that the true Arc of Covenant is hidden in Abyssinia.
- Abay River is equivalent to Blue Nile: that even though Dhedhessa and other great rivers of the south are much bigger than Abay, they all should be considered as tributary Rivers as Tana (Gion) is wholly water.

Accordingly, the superficially convincing and yet more confusing name they wanted to adopt was the historical Christian Cushitic Nubian Ethiopia- present day Sudan- located from 1st cataract-South of Aswan to 6th cataract-Khartoum along side the Blue Nile River. Dubious enough, this name changes was harmonized with the corrupt Abyssinian version of Christianity. For e.g. they claimed as if one of the smaller tributaries of River Dedessa, River Abay, is same as the historical Blue Nile. In addition, the collapse of Nubian empire, the conversion of Christian Nubian Ethiopia to Islam and their eventual disclaim of both names of Nubian and Ethiopia in favor of The Sudan paved the way for smooth takeover by Abyssinia of the unrelated people's name with their history.

Based on the objective and tactics mentioned, subsequent Abyssinian governments, in collaboration with the highly politicized Abyssinian church, pushed to change the Abyssinia name to Biblical Ethiopia. It should be noted that the Hebrew bible call Nubian as Cush while the Greece bible refers Nubians as ethiope. The land of Cush—the son of Biblical Ham—is generally considered to be in the vicinity of the Ancient cities of Meroë and Napata, located in present-day Sudan. Back to pre-Christian era, the Biblical verse that Ethiopia will stretch its hands to God refers to today's Sudan territory of Cushitic Nubians, not Semites- Abyssinia. It is interesting if one Google and see the difference between Abyssinia Ethiopia and Nubian Ethiopia in Roman Catholic website www.newadvent.org.

After initially imposing Abyssinia name on non-Abyssinians, special diplomatic effort was made by Teferi Mekonen- later Emperor H. Sillasie- to abandon both Abyssinian and Southern country's names at all in favor of Ethiopia. Then minority Abyssinian rulers denied the existence of other dehumanized people including their history, culture, etc and promoted the policy of 'swallowing majority non-Abyssinians'. For e.g. the first paragraph the Official Property Decree promulgated by the so called Ethiopian brigand government of Naftagna-Melkegna dated October 24th, 1928 explicitly states that "the right of freedom from confiscation has existed in the Christian Abyssinian provinces of the North-namely the provinces of Tigre, Gondar, Gojjam and proper Shoa." The whole situation can be characterized as a 'dragon stuck while swallowing a buffalo!'

Most importantly, the following all inclusive Memorandum of Department of State regarding the official name of Ethiopia explains the whole situation of the historical genocide committed. Source: Documents on Ethiopian Politics, Volume 2- The consolidation of Power of Haile Selassie, 1920-1929, page 32-33.

Received OCT 27, 1926

A-C:

"The following information with reference to the names Abyssinia and Ethiopia is given in response to your telephone request last Saturday:

Ethiopia is the name which is preferred by the Government and people of the country. Mr. R. P. Skinner, in his Paris dispatch No. 766 of September 23, 1925 (123 SK3 /246) wrote as follows:

"In this connection, I respectfully suggest that it would be more strictly correct to abandon the use of the word Abyssinia in favor of Ethiopia. The government of the country considers Ethiopia to be its proper name. And it is under this name that our treaty appears in the official volume of Treaties, Conventions and International Acts. And in the body of the treaty Ethiopia alone is mentioned from time to time. I believe that it would be gratifying to the existing government of Ethiopia if the use of the word Abyssinia could be dropped."

The suggestion that the name Ethiopia be adopted for official use by the Government was approved by Mr. Dulles of the Division of Near Eastern Affairs and was adopted by the United States Geographic Board February 3, 1926.

Ethiopia is the term employed not only in the two Treaties of 1903 and 1914, between the United States and that country, but also in the treaties between great Britain and Ethiopia and it is so listed in the "Foreign Office List and Diplomatic and Consular Year Book, great Britain", 1924, page 48. it also appear as Ethiopia in the ratifications of the Universal Postal Convention signed at Madrid November 30, 1920 (British State Papers, 116, 1922, page 776) as also in the "Dictionaire des Bureau de poste, publi?e par le Bureau International de l?union postale universalle (1909)".

The name of the country in the language of the country, Amharic, is, translated Ityopya.

The objection of the people of the country to the term “Abyssinia” arises from the fact that the Arabic word “Habesha”, from which it is derived means “confusion”, and that it has come to connote, as the Arabs use it with reference to “Abyssinia”, “mongrel” (strange mixture).

Admittedly the term Abyssinia is much more widely used. It is used in Hertslet’s Commercial Treaties, volume 30, 1924. it is also used by the League of Nations in the documents referring to the admission of “Abyssinia” to the League of Nations, although the texts refers to “Queen of the kings of Ethiopia” and to the “Crown Prince of Ethiopia”.

“Abyssinia” (officially Ethiopia” appears in the Encyclopedia Britannica and Encyclopedia Americana.”

DP:SWB:EAB:SS

Despite the rigorous efforts exerted by Teferi, official quest to change the name of the newly formed country from Abyssinia to Ethiopia didn’t get international recognition up until the establishment of the United Nation in 1948. The League of Nations admitted the controversial Ethiopian membership to the League not as Ethiopia but as Abyssinia. The Italian abandoned both names during their five years occupation, let alone accepting the name change to Ethiopia instead of Abyssinia. They simply called it Italian East Africa.

Evidences and facts show that, by any means of imagination, the biblical name Cushitic Ethiopia has no relation with Semitic state of Abyssinia except being neighbors. Strictly speaking, Ethiopia belongs to the direct geographical descendent of ancient country Nubians or the Sudan both historically and Biblically, but not to Abyssinia or even the present day Ethiopia. The fact that the Sudan preferred the Arabic name Al-Sudan over Ethiopia, means the black people, for what ever reasons, resulted in the confusion of the two countries people with their history. This link provides additional clear picture regarding the cause and effect of the confusion.

The arguments presented here and other facts lead one to the following clear understanding regarding the confusion over the names of Abyssinia and Ethiopia:

- First of all, it is absolutely unacceptable, historically false, and politically malignant for the state of Abyssinia to abandon its name and insist on using the bogus-name of ‘Ethiopia’. Abyssinia is just one state of Ethiopia.
- It is also historical crime to present Abyssinia as synonymous old name of Ethiopia. No more use of obfuscation diplomatic verbiage. They should use the only to refer Abyssinian- Northern Ethiopia, but no whole Ethiopia.
- The Semitic Tigre and the Amharas of Gondar, Gojjam and Shoa of Ankobar are real Abyssinian by race and Ethiopian by Nationality. Highland Eritreans are also Abyssinian by race but Eritrean by Nationality.
- Unofficial use of such a controversial political name, in one way or other- as if it is interchangeable with Ethiopia- have negative connotation as it promotes hidden racism and discriminatory nationalism.
- Oromo, Somali, Afar, Kambata, Hadiya, Sidama, Walayta, Kaffa Anuak, Nuer, and others are Ethiopians but can’t be Abyssinians. Therefore, calling and these people as Abyssinia inheriting their history, culture, and the like is not only improper, but also implies exercising the double meaning of slave-master bullying tactics.
- The name Cushitic Ethiopia is more related to Cushitic Oromo, Somali, Afar, Kambata, Hadiya, Sidama, Agaw etc than to Semitic Abyssinians.

- If Abyssinians want to reclaim and revive the old name, it would be appropriate if used overtly.
- If one couldn't agree on such simple and yet basic framework issues, it would be practically impossible to negotiate on the major political problems of the country.

To sum it up, it is becoming clearer from time to time that the century old tactics of obfuscating the names Abyssinia and Ethiopia is not working. The days of superficially mentioning non-Abyssinians in the introductory pages of everything and systematically excluding them from the main body of history should come to an end without any negotiation or precondition. In other words, the old political tactic of promoting only Abyssinia under the disguise of bogus Ethiopia is no longer tolerable. Systematically changing the 'Christian Island Abyssinia' to 'Christian Island Ethiopia" simply transforms the issue from obfuscation to confusion.

How would you describe the Danakil plain in Ethiopia?

Firew Afera

Proud Ethiopian and Black AfricanJun 14

The Danakil plain in Ethiopia, Africa can be described as one of the most unique, yet terribly harsh and inhospitable places in the world. It is a land of salt and fire.

Why?

The Danakil plain is an extremely hot place. The Dallol depression, the lowest point in the Danakil plain, has the highest average temperature on the planet. Between 1960 and 1966, there were instances in which the Dallol averaged 50 degree celsius in a month. Remember, 50 degrees celsius is not the highest temperature there; it is a monthly average.

Characterized by bright, multi-coloured springs, fissures, and geysers, the Dallol depression (above) is one of the most visually compelling and geologically fascinating places on Earth.

Due to its unique geology within the African rift valley, the Danakil area is subject to tumultous volcanic and tectonic activity. There are many active volcanoes in the region. The Afar, who solely inhabit the Danakil plain, call the specific place within the Danakil where fire erupts unabated as ``Erta ale``; earth of fire.

The Danakil depression is from where all the salt traded in Ethiopia originate from. The Afar people, who inhabit the Danakil, engage in the hard labour of salt mining in the exact way their ancestors did it for thousands of years. Most Afar engage in this trade in places like the shores of lake Afrera, where enormous salt deposits are found in the shores.

Lake Karum and Lake Afrera are the two of the largest hypersaline lakes in the Danakil Depression. Lake Karum, which is shown in the picture above, looks more like an Arctic desert than a saline lake. The lake-bed is a jet white salt crust chequered in irregular contours that slowly becomes submerged in the clear water of Lake Karum.

Unlike lake Karum, lake Afrera remains liquid despite the Danakil's relentless heat. It also can be swimmed in, and its hypersaline nature leaves you floating weightlessly.

The Afar people, who solely inhabit the Danakil depression, themselves are among most unique people on the planet. Most live as nomadic pastoralists, who continously move around the Afar triangle (where the Danakil depression is found) with their camels and other animals. Some live in urbanized destinations, like Semera, Assaita and Assab.

What are some interesting facts about Ethiopia?

There are so many interesting facts about Ethiopia. I can go on forever, but here are some of my favorite facts.

- Ethiopia is mentioned over 40 times in the Bible and it is one of the few countries mentioned in the Bible, the Torah, the Quran, Homer's Odyssey, and many other ancient books.

For example in Greek mythology, Andromeda is the daughter of the Ethiopian king Cepheus and his wife Cassiopeia. When Cassiopeia's hubris leads her to boast that Andromeda is more beautiful than the Nereids, Poseidon sends the sea monster Cetus to ravage Andromeda as divine punishment. Andromeda is stripped and chained naked to a rock as a sacrifice to sate the monster, but is saved from death by Perseus.

- Ethiopian new year known as Enkutatash, and Ri'se Awde Amet is celebrated on Meskerem 1 which is the same as September 11. She was named after the Beatles' song Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds," which was playing on the radio at the time she was found. Even older remains were found in Hadar in 2001. Dated at more than 5 million years old, they are the earliest known ancestors of modern humans.

- Gebeta is an ancient Ethiopian game of strategy. It is played using seeds or pebbles and a board with rows of cups. It is also called wari et solo, mancala, or congkak in different cultures in the world.

- An ancient sport called Yegena Chewata equivalent to field hockey is played during Christmas, which is celebrated on the 7th January. The celebration of Ethiopian Christmas is marked by various activities such as horse racing, and authentic folk dancing. At Lalibela, Genna is celebrated in very attractive ways due to the birth date of Emperor Lalibela being on a similar day. The game is named after the festival and is called Yegena Chewata.

Ethiopia is the oldest independent country in Africa and one of the oldest countries in the world with historical resources.
Ethiopia is one of the arenas of the development of today's human race.

In the Ethiopian Highlands, the i. e. II. there have certainly been Semitic-speaking peoples living for millennia. The i. e. In the first millennium, there was already an advanced civilization here. After 315, the then unified country became a Christian. This Christian power temporarily extended its power to present-day Yemen in the 6th century, thus having to do with the history of the origins of the Islamic religion. When the Ethiopian highlands were surrounded by Islamic countries all around, Ethiopia became isolated, weakened internally, and central power was fragmented. In the 16th century, he managed to make contact with the Portuguese, with their help they repulsed a very significant enemy attack. The following period is connected with the heyday of the early-modern Ethiopian Empire, large-scale infrastructure investments were made and the royal palace complex, Fasil Ghebbi, was rebuilt. In 1632, however, the Jesuits and all other Western Christians were expelled from Ethiopia. Again, an era of isolation ensued, until 1858. The re-strengthening of imperial power in the second half of the 19th century extended the country's borders to the south, and it also had enough power to repel Italian colonial aspirations in the battle of the city of Adua in 1896.

At the outbreak of World War I, there were only two independent states in Africa: Ethiopia and Liberia. Ethiopia did not participate in World War II, although it was an ally of Turkey. Later, the Italian fascists again attempted to conquer Ethiopia during the Abyssinian War. Following their attack in 1935, they temporarily (until 1941) occupied Ethiopia and annexed it to the “Italian Empire”. They were beaten by the British, who in 1944 returned control to Emperor Haile Selassie.

Ethiopia is the only country on the continent that has successfully resisted colonization.

Hailé Selassie was celebrated as a hero all over the world, the rastafarians saw him as a god. But he was unable to govern well. Corruption and famines have plagued his country.

On September 12, 1974, about a dozen officers appeared at the 82-year-old ruler, and a letter was read to him that “the triumphant lion of the tribe of Judah, the elect of God, the king of the kings of Ethiopia,” was stripped of his throne and taken into custody.

Hailé Selassie showed no resistance, presumably no longer realizing what was happening to her. He was kept out of the world, and his death was announced on August 27, 1975. He was diagnosed with an illness, according to an official statement, but it is now certain that he was strangled with an ether-soaked pillow. His corpse was found in the latrine of the Imperial Palace in 1992 and was buried again in 2000 in a ceremonial setting. In the same year, in his homeland, he was elected the greatest Ethiopian figure of the 20th century, tied with two-time Olympic champion Hailé Gebreszelassi.

The regime led by Mengisto Hailé Mariam, with the support of the Soviet Union, hoped to break out of backwardness. Their policies have exacerbated the economic difficulties. The famines continued to recur and a national-based guerrilla warfare was faced in Eritrea and the province of Tigre.

In 1977, Somalia invaded Ethiopia. In the war in Ogaden, Ethiopian troops, with the participation of Cubans and significant Soviet military transports, won a quick victory, but were unable to overcome internal difficulties. With the collapse of the Soviet Union, the regime remained a supporter of the regime, so eventually its members had to flee the country from all-encompassing rebels.

Since then, Ethiopia has been a multi-party democracy. In a referendum in 1993, he recognized Eritrea's independence. He entered the border war with the new Eritrea in 1998, which claimed heavy casualties. This conflict was settled in 2000. Ethiopia is today an economically weak, underdeveloped country with a relatively strong army. Although a multi-party democracy, the purity of elections is regularly debated.

He recently intervened militarily in the conflict in Somalia, rescuing an internationally recognized government against Islamic insurgents.

In July 2018, he made peace with Eritrea.

Ethiopia did briefly fall under Italian occupation in 1936, but this is largely correct. What made Ethiopia different from the rest of Africa, then? There are a few factors I can think of.

One is terrain. A lot of Ethiopia is fairly unattractive desert, and while it does have access to the Red Sea, it's otherwise cut off from notable trade routes. It's simply not in an attractive place.

Another is religion. Ethiopia is a Christian nation. Indeed, it was probably the first formally Christian nation, going back to late classical antiquity. This became significant during Europe's Age of Exploration when colonial powers treated most non-Christian territories as fair game but constrained their relations with Christian powers.

But that's just laying groundwork. Despite those factors, it still became the target of Italian colonial efforts during the Scramble for Africa, which brings us to the third factor: modernization. Ethiopia actively worked to improve local agriculture, administration, and military. It was by the late 19th century a wealthier, better organized country than those around it, which is why when the Italians tried to take over in 1890, they were driven back. Ethiopia was better able to defend itself than other African nations of the time and was the only one which could mount a successful anti-colonial defense.

Will you ask why? Why should that poor and forgotten country near the Horn of Africa have the honor of being categorized as the most important in the history of mankind?

There are zillions of countries that under a first impression have achieved greater achievements: Spain connected America with Europe; Greece created the pillars of Western culture; Mesopotamia and Egypt were the first civilizations; United Kingdom and the Industrial Revolution, etc.

All these achievements pale in comparison to what happened in Ethiopia: in Ethiopia our species arose almost 200,000 years ago, homo sapiens . The oldest remains of Homo sapiens ever found come from that area. So checkmate, from now on I hope you keep a little more respect; without Ethiopia none of what has happened so far would have happened.

Ethiopian authorities re-arrest journalist Yayesew Shimelis 1 week after release on bail

Ethiopian journalist Yayesew Shimelis was recently re-arrested shortly after he was released on bail. (Screenshot: YouTube/Ethio Forum)

Nairobi, June 29, 2022 – In response to news reports that Ethiopian security personnel arrested journalist Yayesew Shimelis on Tuesday, June 28, and are holding him at an undisclosed location, the Committee to Protect Journalists issued the following statement calling for his immediate release:

"Yayesew Shimelis' detention is deeply concerning, given Ethiopian authorities' history of repeatedly arresting him and holding him for weeks without formal charges," said CPJ's sub-Saharan Africa representative, Muthoki Mumo. "Authorities should immediately disclose his whereabouts and state their case against him, or release him without charge. They should also stop using the judicial system as a tool to punish journalists whose reporting does not align with the government's narrative."

At about 7 a.m. on June 28, men in plainclothes who identified themselves as intelligence officers detained Yayesew, administrator of the YouTube news channel Ethio Forum, at his home in the capital, Addis Ababa, according to news reports and a person familiar with his case who spoke to CPJ on condition of anonymity, citing safety concerns. Yayesew's family did not know his whereabouts as of June 29, and could not find him at local police stations, according to that person and multiple reports by the privately owned broadcaster Asham TV.

Since 2020, Yayesew has been arrested at least three other times, including in mid-2021 when he was held for weeks at a military camp in Afar state, according to CPJ reporting. On May 26, 2022, Yayesew was detained along with several other journalists and media workers, for allegedly inciting the public against the government. He was released on June 20 without being formally charged, after a court granted him bail, according to reports.

This is a photo of my family. Everyone is Ethiopian. Ethiopian parentage going back many generations and as far as we know. Just one family and with skin tones from light-brown to black and you will find native Ethiopians who are both lighter and darker than this. However, the question as you posed it isn't one we would even ask and doesn't translate to life in Ethiopia. But if someone were rude enough to ask it in the USA the answer would be yes, and proudly black.

Don't be fooled by the pictures of light-skinned girls that most people post to justify that Ethiopians are not Africans. It is like claiming that all the black people in the USA are tall and fit like the NBA players.

Ethiopia should not be associated with one ethnic group, religion or language. It is a very diverse country both genetically and culturally.

Indeed, Ethiopia is a federal country of 10 regional states each hosting at least one distinct ethnic group with a different language and/or religion.

To understand the origins and culture of Ethiopians it is important to identify the 3 major genetic groups: 1. Cushitic tribes (Oromo, Somali, Afar). 2. The Nilo-Saharan & Omotic group (Gambela, Mursi, Gamo) and 3. Semitic or Habesha tribes (Amhara and Tigray).

The Afar people who live near the sea actually tend to be extremely dark like the Nilotic tribes of Kenya and South Sudan.

A young Afar man. Does he look black? Yes

A beautiful Afar woman. Does she look black?

Now on to the next.

The Oromos are estimated to be around 45 million and hence close to 40% of the entire population of Ethiopia. In fact, the majority of Oromo people are dark-skinned.

Haile Gebrselassie, the legendary Olympic athlete. Does he look black? Yes.

Oromo youth, the majority tribe in Ethiopia. Do they look black? Yes.

Now on to the people of SNNPR.

Mengistu Haile Mariam, former president of Ethiopia. Does he look black? Yes.

Ethiopian teenagers in Gambella region. Are they black?

A pretty young lady in Omo valley, Ethiopia.

The people of Gambela and SNNPR regions of Ethiopia are mostly Nilo-Saharans or they speak Omotic languages. The Ethiopian Morsi look like the Nuer or Dinka of South Sudan.

"I'm not black, I'm Habesha (OJ)" Okay

The Habesha people are from the Northern part of Ethiopia, specifically, the regions of Tigray, Amhara and Beta Israel (The Jewish Ethiopians). The term Habesha is usually extended to include the Eritreans and most people from this region tend to think they are not black at all.

The Jews of Ethiopia or Beta Israel (meaning House of Israel). Are they black? Well, it took a while for them to figure it out.

The Jewish Ethiopians claim descent from Menelik I, the son of Queen Sheba (Makeda in Ethiopia) and King Solomon of Israel. When Ethiopia embraced Christianity in the 4th century, they refused to convert and preserved their Jewish traditions i.e. they prayed in synagogues, practiced circumcision and observed Sabbath and many other Jewish rituals.

In the 18th century, European explorers in search for the source of the Nile reported the existence the Beta Israel community in Ethiopia which ignited the myth of the lost tribe of Dan.

From 1980 to 1992, the Ethiopian Jews who were threatened by famine, political unrest and the hostility of the communist regime led by Col Mengistu were rescued on several operations in which around 100,000 Jewish Ethiopians were airlifted to Israel.

Black Lives Matter protests in Israel.

Unfortunately, the Jewish Ethiopians claim that they are treated like second-class citizens in Israel because they are BLACK. Indeed, Ethiopian Jews face discrimination, racism, suffer the highest poverty rate among the Jews in Israel and suffer much higher levels of police arrests and incarceration just like black people in America.

Regardless, there are positive changes happening in Israel.

This is Lt. Col. Dr. Avraham Yitzhak, Israel's first colonel to come from the Ethiopian community. Is he black? Yes.

Eskinder Nega is a famous Ethiopian activist and journalist. Does he look black? Yes

Most people think that all the Amhara and Tigray ladies are light-skinned with curly hair as evidenced by the answers you will find here but this is completely false.

A group of Amhara people. Do they look white?

A group of girls in Tigray region (Northern Ethiopia). Do they look black? Yes if you compare with the pic below of the Caucasian, Asian and Ethiopian ladies standing together.

The Amhara people to a small extent and Tigrayans in general have minor Berber, Arab or Persian genetic ad mixture due to years of trade and cultural exchange between the ancient Axum Kingdom and Arabia. There is a reason why both Yemen and Ethiopia claim to be the origin of Coffee or the birthplace of Queen Sheba.

President Paul Kagame of Rwanda and PM Dr. Abiy of Ethiopia.

Pres. Paul Kagame and PM Dr. Abiy of Ethiopia. Do they look different? No. Are they black? Yes. Shall we say that the Rwandans are not black? That would be dumb.

Where does the confusion come from? I think it is an inferiority complex. The Ethiopians like most Africans and Indians were brainwashed by the Western media to believe that everybody with a white or light skin is better than them. I dated a beautiful Ethiopian girl and she would put extensions on her hair and use exotic lotions to look "white".

Here is a picture of rappers Drake and Abel Makkonen Tesfaye known professionally as The Weeknd who is a son of Ethiopian immigrants to Canada.

Drake's mother is white just like former President Obama's mother. We all know Obama as the first BLACK president of the USA. The Weeknd is a proud successful black artist, but some people in Ethiopia still struggle with their identity and they would tell you a different story.

However, a recent sad anecdote can provide insights to your question; it is about the most famous Ethiopian in the world; who ironically is originally from the region most Ethiopians would consider highly mixed or Habesha (Tigray)… Dr. Tedros A. Ghebreyesus, the boss of WHO.

In the midst of the global pandemic of Covid-19, Dr. Tedros was subjected to racist comments and death threats. Dr Tedros responded: "I can tell you personal attacks that have been going on for months. Abuses, or racist comments, giving me names, black or Negro. I'm proud of being black, proud of being Negro."

The only Ethiopian who will tell you he/she is not black does not either have a passport or an education.

Overview

France ruled what was to become Gabone from 1839. In 1849 slaves freed by the French founded the Gabonese capital Libreville French meaning for Free Town. In 1910 Gabone became one of the 4 territories of the Federation of French Equatorial Africa (AEF) along with Chad, Congo (Brazzaville), and the Central African Republic. Gabon achieved independence in 1960, with Leon Mba elected President in 1961. He was deposed in the only coup in Gabon's history in 1964, but was restored after French intervention. His Vice-President and hand-picked successor, Albert-Bernard Bongo, took over on his death in 1967 and declared Gabon a one-party state, which it remained until 1990. President Bernard Bongo converted to Islam in 1973, taking the name Al-Hadj Omar Bongo. Gabon enjoyed political stability throughout the 1970s, due largely to the rapid oil-driven economic growth that has given Gabon one of the largest per capita incomes in sub-Saharan Africa. But by the 1980s the oil boom was over and opposition grew. A government-in-exile was formed in Paris, and in response to a number of strikes, continued deterioration of the economy, and continued pressure for greater democracy, President Omar Bongo has convened a National Conference in March, 1990 to establish the principles for change. The country's long serving president, Omar Bongo Ondimba, died on 8 June 2009. Following Presidential elections, Omar Bongo's son, Ali Ben Bongo, was inaugurated as the new President of Gabone on 16 October, 2009.

Gabon achieved it's independence on 17th August, 1960. Mr. Gabriel Leon Mba was elected to serve as founder-president of Gabon, inaugurated during a celebration on the 12th February, 1961.

In the 17th February, 1964, the Gabonese president Gabriel Leon M'ba was toppled by a military coup and his arch-rival Jean-Hilaire Aubame and to the result of a revolutionary committee who briefly assumed the office of the president by way of a coup d'etat. However, the French paratroopers were flown overnight to crush the coup attempt, restored Mr. Leon Mba's government in next days, then he stayed in office until March, 1967, but he died of cancer in November of the same year under further treatment in Paris, France. Mr. Leon M'ba then succeeded by his recently appointed vice president, Mr. Albert Bernard Bongo Ondimba. Mr. Albert Bernard Bongo came up to the vacant post, and formed his sole political party. He is well known as Al-Hadji Umer Bongo Ondinba, after his conversion to Islam in 1973. Al-Hadji Omar Bongo Ondimba, was one of the longest serving heads of states in the sub-Sahara Africa, won, controlled several sham-elections as a sole candidate of the ruling party since the legalization of opposition parties led to new elections in early November of 1990.

President Al-Hadji Omar Bongo Ondinba died of cancer on the 8th of June, 2009 under further treatment in Barcelona, Spain. Gabone has been run as a political dynasty starting with President Omar Bongo and was succeeded by his son, ex-Defence Minister, Mr. Ali Ben Bongo.

Gabone considered one of the more prosperous and stable African countries. A small population, petroleum-Oil and mineral reserves have helped Gabone become one of Africa's wealthier countries.

The Pigmies were probably the original inhabitants of the area, they are sound and fine in the Gabonese rainforests when the Bantus also established Gabon's ethnic composition. The Fang tribes arrived in the late eighteenth century and were followed by the Portuguese and by the French in 1839, then took control of Gabone, it was administered 1843 to 1886 as part of French west Africa, then the colony of the French middle Congo was established to include both Gabone and Congo in 1888, in 1910 Gabone became a separate colony within French equatorial Africa, and an overseas territory of France in 1946, it became an Autonomous republic within the French Community in 1958, Mr. Gabriel Leon Mba appointed it's natve prime minister from 21st May, 1957 to 21st February, 1961, when independence proclaimed on the 17th of August, 1960, the founder, Mr. Gabriel Leon Mba was elected head of state of Gabone, but he inaugurated during a celebration on the 12th February, 1961. He died of cancer on the 8th of June, 2009 under further treatment in Barcelona, Spain. Country has been run as a political dynasty starting with President Omar Bongo and was succeeded by his son, the ex-Defence Minister, Mr. Ali Ben Bongo. A small population, petroleum-Oil and mineral reserves have helped Gabone become one of Africa's wealthier countries.

Gabon has remained relatively stable in a violent neighbourhood. It’s abundant oil revenues have contributed to political stability. One-third of the population are employed by the Government, an unusually high figure. Shows the high dependence on the government and its oil revenues.

Gabonese enjoy over four times the per-capita incomes of average Africans. This has allowed for a relatively high standard of living, however, the wealth is heavily skewed between an urban elite and a poor rural population. Over-reliance on oil revenues has left agriculture undeveloped. Majority of the population is concentrated in towns like Libreville and Port Gentil.

Domestic violence and single-mother families are a serious problem, which is sometimes abetted by law, which recognises only women's unfaithfulness in marriage as grounds for divorce

With a bar on nearly every corner and a taste for homemade beer and wine, Gabonese are copious drinkers.

Concerned about stability in Central Africa, Gabon has been directly involved with mediation efforts in Chad, the Central African Republic (CAR), Angola, Congo-Brazzaville, the DR Congo, and Burundi. In December 1999, through President Bernard Bongo's mediation, a peace accord was signed in Congo-Brazzaville between the government and leaders of an armed rebellion. The president was related by marriage to Congo-Brazzaville president Dennis Sassou-Nguesso.

November 13, 2013: Gabon - Ali Bongo's penchant for absolute power'

Since his election as president in 2009, Ali Bongo has steered Gabon resolutely single-handedly. Helped by his director of cabinet Maixent Accrombessi, the late Omar Bongo's son and successor has placed the army and has the intelligence services in his pocket, while his sister Pascaline Bongo, the former secretary-general of the president's office, and most other close and extended family members have been sidelined. Bongo has similarly excommunicated the politicians who used to be in his father's inner circle, such as Paul Toungui. Bongo's quest for absolute power has been served by the massive parliamentary majority his party PDG achieved at the polls in 2011. Gabon's opposition all but disintegrated following the death of political rival Pierre Mamboundou, the leader of the Union du Peuple Gabonais's party, in 2011, and Andre Mba Obame's withdrawal from political life due to ill health.

La France a-t-elle encore un pouvoir sur ses anciennes colonies ? Brian Gogarty Lieu : Ploemeur, Bretagne, France (1997–aujourd'hui) 1 an

La France exerce encore une certaine influence sur ses anciennes colonies, notamment en Afrique occidentale. Toutefois, cette influence est surestimée et elle diminue aujourd'hui.

Mais c'est un sujet brûlant, j'en ai bien conscience.

La Françafrique

Tout d'abord, parlons de l'influence de la France en Afrique francophone. Cette influence existe réellement et elle est souvent néfaste pour les pays africains qui la connaissent. En tant que français, je me dois de le reconnaître.

Pour comprendre le pouvoir de la France sur ses anciennes colonies, il faut remonter à l'époque de la décolonisation, vers 1960.

À l'époque, la colonisation n'était plus possible car c'était déjà une pratique révolue. La France de 1960 n'avait plus rien à voir avec la France colonialiste du temps de Jules Ferry. C'était une époque dépassée, tout comme la marine à voiles.

Mais tout le monde ne l'avait pas encore compris. En revanche, de Gaulle l'avait compris. C'est pour cela qu'il a accepté d'accorder l'indépendance aux colonies.

Charles de Gaulle, le décolonisateur.

Cependant, cette indépendance n'était pas complète. En effet, de Gaulle ne voulait pas pour autant renoncer aux richesses africaines (bois exotiques, minéraux, pétrole, etc). Lui et plusieurs de ses successeurs ont donc fait en sorte de garder des relations avec les anciennes colonies.

Ainsi, la France soutenait les gouvernements de ces pays, même des dictatures féroces, dans tous les domaines. Et en échange, ils restaient sous la tutelle de l'Élysée et favorisaient ses intérêts. La France pouvait donc continuer d'exploiter ses anciennes colonies.

Paris est même allé jusqu'à effectuer des coups d'État. Par exemple, Léon Mba, le président gabonais qui était lié à l'Élysée, fut renversé en 1964 à cause de sa dérive autoritaire. L'armée française est donc intervenue pour le remettre au pouvoir. Et ce n'est pas le seul exemple.

https://www.google.fr/url?sa=t&source=web&rct=j&url=https://fr.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/L%25C3%25A9on_Mba&ved=2ahUKEwiA6JfpltXqAhU78uAKHQ59DEEQFjALegQIAhAB&usg=AOvVaw3yW5r0H5wHvUT3nnDqGc8N

Les Africains, premiers responsables

Toutefois, les premiers responsables de cette situation sont les Africains eux-mêmes. Lorsque ces nouveaux pays ont accédé à l'indépendance, rien ne les obligeait à garder une influence française dans leurs affaires.

Vers 1960, comme je l'ai déjà dit, la colonisation n'était plus possible. Les Français étaient contraints de se retirer de leurs colonies, ils ne pouvaient donc pas obliger les gouvernements africains à garder des liens avec eux.

Si en 1960, les nouveaux dirigeants africains avaient refusé de garder une influence française, que se serait-il donc passé ? La France aurait refusé de se retirer de ces pays et aurait continué d'y imposer le régime colonial ? Ces pays seraient alors restés des colonies françaises, comme du temps de Jules Ferry, jusqu'à nos jours ? Ce n'est pas du tout réaliste !

Affiche de propagande coloniale des années 1890. Mais en 1960, ceci était totalement révolu. Qu'en serait-il aujourd'hui ?!

La France était donc obligée de partir de ces pays. Si leurs gouvernements ont accepté néanmoins de garder des liens avec elle, c'est parce qu'ils le voulaient, cela les arrangeait. Ce sont eux, les premiers responsables.

Les temps changent

Mais aujourd'hui, la situation a bien changé, la France a perdu beaucoup de son influence sur ses anciennes colonies. La Françafrique a disparu progressivement au fil des décennies. La situation n'est plus comparable aux années 60 ou 70. La France ne mène plus de coups d'État en Afrique depuis longtemps.

Certes, de nos jours, l'Élysée conserve encore des liens avec certains États africains, et des entreprises françaises continuent sans doute d'exploiter des ressources naturelles au détriment des populations locales.

Une mine d'or. Les ressources naturelles sont abondantes mais elles sont souvent exploitées par des entreprises étrangères et leurs profits ne reviennent pas au pays. Il y a donc bien exploitation.

Cependant, cette exploitation se réalise uniquement en profitant de la corruption des élites incompétentes et cupides. Autrement dit, ces entreprises françaises (et pas que françaises) peuvent agir ainsi parce que les autorités africaines corrompues décident de les laisser faire.

De plus, et c'est probablement l'élément le plus important, les Français ne sont plus que des profiteurs parmi d'autres en Afrique.

En effet, d'autres puissances étrangères sont entrées dans le jeu ces dernières décennies, notamment les puissances asiatiques comme la Chine, le Japon, l'Inde. Et ces pays sont maintenant beaucoup plus populaires que la France auprès des États africains.

https://www.google.fr/url?sa=t&source=web&rct=j&url=https://www.nofi.media/2019/04/afrique-francophone/64812&ved=2ahUKEwjv9rjJkNXqAhVqxYUKHaU1CE4QFjAEegQIDRAI&usg=AOvVaw3Ye9j64ZG1mOazcyaQkewR

https://www.google.fr/url?sa=t&source=web&rct=j&url=https://www.lemonde.fr/afrique/article/2020/02/06/la-france-en-afrique-un-partenaire-d-affaires-de-moins-en-moins particulier_6028642_3212.html&ved=2ahUKEwjj2tjKkdXqAhWrx4UKHaPHBtcQFjAKegQIChAB&usg=AOvVaw0TRfHro6aeDLLyJp7HN7JV

Cet élément est décisif parce que la France n'est maintenant plus la seule puissance étrangère à vouloir profiter des richesses de l'Afrique francophone. Et cela, les dirigeants africains le savent, ils en profitent donc pour jouer sur la concurrence.

Autrement dit, si la France ne les satisfait pas, ils menacent de se tourner vers la Chine, le Japon ou l'Allemagne. Ils en profitent alors pour s'opposer de plus en plus à la France. Évidemment, cette situation ne plaît pas à l'Élysée mais ils n'ont pas le choix.

Irresponsabilité

La France a donc perdu beaucoup d'influence sur ses anciennes colonies et elle continue d'en perdre. Elle s'est faîte largement détrônée par les puissances asiatiques.

Désormais, ce sont les Chinois qui exploitent le plus les richesses de l'Afrique francophone. Et encore une fois, ce sont les gouvernements africains corrompus qui les laissent faire, personne ne les force. Ce sont des irresponsables.

Il faut donc arrêter de dire que c'est la faute des autres. Les problèmes actuels de l'Afrique ne sont pas causés essentiellement par les pays étrangers comme la France ou la Chine. C'est aux Africains eux-mêmes de prendre leurs responsabilités. Suivre Brian Gogarty

Gabon : les enfants d'Omar Bongo mis en examen pour "biens mal acquis" · Suivre Publication par David-GDK jeu.

Grâce, Betty, Arthur puis Hermine : pour la première fois, quatre enfants du défunt président gabonais Omar Bongo Ondimba ont été mis en examen par la justice française dans le dossier vieux de 15 ans des "biens mal acquis" gabonais dans l'Hexagone.

Entre le 25 mars et le 5 avril, le juge financier Dominique Blanc a successivement mis en examen Grâce (58 ans), Betty (55), Arthur (51) puis Hermine Bongo (53), pour recel de détournement de fonds publics, de corruption active et passive et d'abus de biens sociaux, selon des éléments obtenus par l'AFP.

Après la mise en examen de la banque française BNP Paribas en mai 2021, c'est une nouvelle accélération dans cette enquête difficile et au long cours, déclenchée après une plainte en mars 2007. D'autres enfants, parmi les 54 de l'ex-allié historique de la France, pourraient suivre.

La justice française soupçonne en effet plusieurs membres de la famille Bongo, d'Omar, le défunt père, à Ali, le fils et actuel président, en passant par la fille Pascaline, d'avoir "sciemment" bénéficié d'un important patrimoine immobilier "frauduleusement" acquis par le patriarche et dont la valeur a récemment été évaluée par la justice "à au moins 85 millions d'euros".

Affaires judiciaires

Contacté par l'AFP, Jessye Ella Ekogha, porte-parole de la présidence gabonaise, n'a pas fait de commentaire. Devant le juge, les quatre enfants de celui qui fut président du Gabon de 1967 à sa mort en 2009 ont tous évoqué des biens reçus comme "cadeaux" de leur père, des appartements dans les XVe et XVIe arrondissements parisiens acquis entre 1995 et 2004.

Connaissaient-ils le circuit tortueux emprunté par l'argent pour financer ces acquisitions, décrit par un notaire français mis en cause comme servant à "camoufler" l'origine des fonds ? "Non", ont-ils tous répondu. "Je n'étais au courant de rien", répond ainsi Betty Bongo, ex-directrice générale adjointe de feu la compagnie aérienne Air Service Gabon.

Aux quatre enfants, le juge Dominique Blanc égrène la même litanie d'affaires judiciaires, de rapports officiels et d'enquêtes journalistiques ayant étayé les soupçons de corruption qui aurait enrichi Omar Bongo.

Ignorance

La "fortune immense" de sa famille, selon un arrêt de février de la cour d'appel de Paris, provient "de l'argent issu de détournements de fonds publics et des sommes considérables provenant du délit de corruption des sociétés pétrolières", notamment Elf Aquitaine, ce que "les investigations menées dans la présente procédure ont confirmé", selon le magistrat.

Les enfants Bongo opposent au juge leur ignorance ou absence de curiosité. "J'apprends beaucoup de choses aujourd'hui", répond laconiquement Grâce Bongo, tandis qu'Hermine Bongo, directrice générale de la compagnie aérienne Nouvelle Air Affaires Gabon, fait valoir son "éducation" : "Sois heureuse de ce que tu as et ne sois pas curieuse de ce qui ne te concerne pas".

Pour eux, quoi qu'il en soit, pas de fraude : Arthur Bongo, un temps pilote de l'avion présidentiel paternel, indique qu'il n'a "pas le sentiment d'avoir bénéficié d'une rente pétrolière". Grâce Bongo précise : "Si (Omar Bongo) a volé dans la caisse, je n'ai pas de preuves".

Me Elise Arfi, l'avocate de cette dernière, a dénoncé une mise en examen "scandaleuse" qui crée "de l'insécurité juridique". Elle précise : "Vingt-cinq ans après une vente légale et régulière, on vient chercher la propriétaire en disant que les faits qui ont servi à financer cet appartement n'auraient pas une origine licite". Les avocats des autres enfants n'ont pas répondu à l'AFP.Preuve de préjudice

Dans ce dossier des biens mal acquis, outre les enfants Bongo et la BNP Paribas, sont poursuivies 14 autres personnes physiques, dont des membres de la famille du président congolais Denis Sassou Nguesso et plusieurs Français parmi lesquels un avocat, un notaire, une gérante de société civile immobilière, etc.

"Le chapitre famille Bongo qui s'est ouvert va se poursuivre. La procédure enseigne maintenant à quel point les biens français n'ont pu être mal acquis que grâce au concours des ingénieurs du chiffre et du droit", a relevé Me William Bourdon, avocat de l'association Transparency International France, partie civile dans ce dossier.

Début février, le magistrat instructeur a retiré à l'État gabonais son statut de partie civile, estimant qu'il n'avait pas apporté depuis le début de l'enquête la preuve d'un préjudice. Les avocats de ce pays, qui a indiqué dans un courrier du 1er février que le Gabon "ne conteste pas (...) l'existence des délits objets de cette procédure", ont fait appel de cette décision.

En terme de sécurité au sens large je dirais que le Gabon s’en sort plutôt pas mal comparativement à d’autres pays de la sous région, le port d’arme est illégal et les Gabonais sont de nature pacifique.

Tant que vous évitez les zones à risque de la capitale la nuit, un peu comme dans n’importe quel pays d’ailleurs, vous ne courez pas un grand risque.

TheQuotes

Le Gabon est un pays riche en ressources naturelles mais marqué par une répartition inégale au sein de la population, si bien que le fossé entre les plus riches et les moins favorisés crée une sorte de tension sociale palpable au sein de la population, mais le fait qu'il y ait encore des devises qui affluent et que la situation économique soit relativement stable fait que l'on ait pas encore atteint le point de rupture critique.

Vous n'aurez pas de problème en tant qu'occidental à vous déplacer à l'intérieur de la capitale et dans les provinces tant que vous savez vous exprimer en français, la très grande majorité de la population est instruite et les individus que vous rencontrerez seront plutôt enclin à vous indiquer vôtre chemin ou vous donner une quelconque information.

Le Gabon est un pays multi culturel, il résulte d'un mélange entre différentes ethnies de la sous région, les groupes majoritaires étant les Fang, Tékés, Punu, Myènè et Nzebi. Malgré une population d'environ 2 millions d'habitants, une partie non négligeable provient également d'expatriés européens mais aussi d'autres communautés d'Afrique, de l'ouest majoritairement (Nigeria, Mali, Sénégal etc…) Tous ces individus cohabitent sans problème depuis des décennies dans les grands centres urbains du pays

Si vous souhaitez faire un safari ou explorer la faune et la flore, le pays dispose de 13 parcs nationaux

Si vous êtes un féru de stations balnéaires ne manquez pas de visiter la Baie des tortues Luth à la Pointe Deins, à 15min de la côte de Libreville

Pour ce qu’il en est de la vie à Libreville, si vous êtes de la classe moyenne ou supérieure, que vous avez un revenu décent, vous n’aurez pas tant à vous plaindre. C’est par contre un cauchemar pour les populations à faible revenu dû au coût élevé de la vie au Gabon, même pour des produits de première nécessité vu que la majorité des biens sont importés.

Le Gabon est ma terre, un pays avec ses défauts et inégalités mais un lieu qui regorge d’énormes ressources et de potentialités inexploitées. Si vous en avez l’occasion ne manquez pas de visiter, cela en vaut clairement le détour.

ANIMALS In The Wild: How much weight can the Gabon viper weigh?

How heavy is the Gaboon viper?

The Gaboon Viper, a very massive rattlesnake, is vying to be the heaviest living venomous snake. The problem is that very few adult Gaboon vipers have released their body mass.

The verified record for the heaviest venomous snake is held by an eastern diamondback rattlesnake which weighed 15.6 kg. The heaviest wild king cobra, the longest of the poisonous snakes, weighed about 12 kg. Usually pit vipers are more heavily built than cobras and a few other species, such as some other rattlesnakes and bushmasters, can potentially weigh up to at least 7 kg.

A Gaboon viper compared to a smaller cousin, the adder, apparently Africa's deadliest snake.

However, the Gaboon viper is the bulkiest of the bunch. Apparently, a specimen measuring 1.80 m weighed 8.5 kg. There are a few well-documented specimens said to weigh up to 10-11.3 kg. It is said that a specimen reaching almost 1.80 m can weigh 16 kg. Since even relatively smaller specimens are massive, there are unverified claims of Gaboon pit vipers weighing up to 20 kg. The Gaboon viper has the longest fangs of any venomous snake alive today, reaching 5 cm in length.

Biologists, zookeepers, and snake handlers are extremely cautious around Gaboon vipers.

Gabon's Petroleum industry, the third largest in Africa, is the main reason why the Oil-jetty in port-Gentil exists.

Development prospect: The Gabonese government is pressing private investors to back the country's economic diversification and initial support has come from Asia. The government targets developing new sectors – oil accounted for 48% of GDP in 2010 – and increasing the amount of processing done in-country. Singapore's Olam is beginning pilot projects on 200,000ha of palm oil plantations and building a fertiliser plant in Port Gentil. Indian companies have won contracts for road and housing projects, but they are waiting on financing. The country is expecting an economic boost from co-hosting the January 2012 African Cup of Nations football tournament, but preparations have been slow and many of Libreville's infrastructure projects are behind schedule. The government hired US engineering firm Bechtel and created the Agence Nationale des Grands Travaux in October, 2010 to remove some of the bottlenecks. It plans to spend $12.5bn over the next five years on road, housing and energy projects.

Two special economic zones - one outside Libreville, one outside Port Gentil - are progressing. The Nkok zone is to be dedicated to the forestry industry. There have been reforms to the sector that should see more local processing of timber.

The economy remains strongly reliant on oil exports and diversification into other natural resources has been delayed by contract renegotiations. The landmark $5bn Belinga iron ore, dam and railway project was originally due to be complete by 2012, but financing and equity negotiations have already delayed start-up by about three years.

The government is waiting to finalise the details of the creation of the Gabon Oil Company and a new oil code before beginning ad hoc negotiations with oil companies for new licences in the country's pre-salt acreage. With the Organisation Nationale des Employés du Pétrole threatening more strikes and pushing the government to impose a 10% cap on expatriate workers in the industry, foreign oil companies are worried the country lacks the qualified workforce or training facilities to make such a brusque transition.

In terms of security in the broad sense, I would say that Gabon is doing quite well compared to other countries in the sub-region, carrying weapons is illegal and Gabonese are peaceful in nature.

As long as you avoid the risky areas of the capital at night, much like in any country for that matter, you are not at great risk.

Gabon is a country rich in natural resources but marked by an unequal distribution within the population, so the gap between the richest and the less privileged creates a kind of palpable social tension within the population, but makes it that there are still currencies flowing in and that the economic situation is relatively stable means that we have not yet reached the critical breaking point.

As a Westerner, you will have no problem getting around within the capital and in the provinces as long as you know how to express yourself in French, the vast majority of the population is educated and the individuals you will meet will rather be inclined to show you your way or give you any information.

Gabon is a multicultural country, it results from a mixture between different ethnic groups of the sub-region, the majority groups being the Fang, Tékés, Punu, Myènè and Nzebi. Despite a population of approximately 2 million inhabitants, a significant part also comes from European expatriates but also from other communities in Africa, mainly from the west (Nigeria, Mali, Senegal, etc.) All these individuals live together trouble-free for decades in major urban centers across the country

If you want to go on a safari or explore the fauna and flora, the country has 13 national parks

If you are a fan of seaside resorts, be sure to visit Leatherback Turtle Bay at Pointe Deins, 15 minutes from the coast of Libreville

As for life in Libreville, if you are middle or upper class, have a decent income, you won't have so much to complain about. On the other hand, it is a nightmare for low-income populations due to the high cost of living in Gabon, even for basic necessities since the majority of goods are imported.

Gabon is my land, a country with its flaws and inequalities but a place full of enormous resources and untapped potential. If you have the opportunity do not miss to visit, it is clearly worth the detour.

Overview & Diary Refreshes

The Gambia shares historical roots with many other West African nations in the slave trade, which was key to the establishment of a colony on the Gambia River, first by the Portuguese and later by the British. The Gambia became a British protectorate in 1894 and a British Colony in 1902. It gained independence from Britain on 18 February 1965, with Dawda Jawara as Prime Minister. On 24 April 1970, The Gambia became a Republic following a referendum and Jawara was elected as President. Jawara and the People's Progressive Party dominated Gambian politics, until 1994 (See Below), although the country retained a multi-party system, and opposition parties were represented in the small parliament. A coup attempt in 1981 was only put down at the expense of hundreds of people being killed. In the 1980s and the early 1990s the government became increasingly unpopular, largely due to allegations of corruption. In July 1994 26-year old Captain Yahya Jammeh overturned the 30-year rule of Sir Dawda Jawara in a bloodless coup. Jammeh's Armed Forces Provisional Ruling Council (AFPRC) ran the country by decree and all political activity was banned until the second Republic was established in 1997. What appeared to be a counter coup in January 1995 was put down and its ringleaders, who were former close allies of Jammeh, were imprisoned. There was another alleged coup in March 2006 which was unsuccessful.

The culture in The Gambia is a blend of native Bantu, Arab and European.

Formerly a colony of the United Kingdom.

In 1959 he founded and led the protectorate Peoples Party, later known as Peoples Progressive Party (PPP), after the victory of the party in the 1962 he became elected PM, a post he retained after independence in 1965 with the adoption of a republican constitution in 1970.

The Gambia was granted it's first constitution in 1962. Mr. Dauda Karaiba Jawara served as Gambian Prime minister from 1962 to 1970, president from 1970 to 1994. A member of the Mandinkas, gradjuated in veterinary medicine from the University of Glasgow, Scotland in 1953.

The Gambia became independent since February 18, 1965 and independence within the "Commonwealth of nations" in February, 1965, when Sir Dauda Karaiba Jawara remained it's native prime minister.

Headship since independence; Head of native Government

Sir Dauda Kariba Jawara became founder president when the Gambia, became a "Republic within the Commonwealth of nations" the same year. Sir Dawda Karaiba Jawara was re-elected five times.

Sir Dauda Karaiba Jawara was overthrown by a coup made by the Armed Forces Provisional Ruling Council (AFPRC) led by an enlisted officer called Lt. Yayah Abdul-Aziz Jemus Junkung Diliu Jammeh, a 29 years old at the time of July, 1994 coup, led a group of young soldiers to overthrow the last veteran African president of his time.

Origins of name: Named after the River Gambia, which flows through the country.

A Republic in West Africa.

It's entirely surrounded by Senegal except for an outlet to the Atlantic ocean. At about the thirteenth century the Wolof, the Malinkes and the Fulanis settled in different parts of what is now the Gambia establishing villages and then kingdoms in the region. European exploration began when the portuguese sighted the Gambia River in 1455. Estimated that, sold to English merchants by the Portuguese in 1588, then it became a British Crown colony in 1843, and a protectorate in 1894. B/n 1901 & 1906, slavery was abolished and legislative councils were established, to encourage self-government. The Gambia was granted it's first constitution in 1962 and independence within the "Commonwealth of nations" in February, 1965, as Queen Elizabeth II head of state when Sir Dauda Karaiba Jawara remained it's native prime minister. He served as Gambian Prime minister from 1962 to 1970, president from 1970 to 1994. A member of the Mandinkas, gradjuated in veterinary medicine from the University of Glasgow, Scotland in 1953. In 1959 he founded and led the protectorate Peoples Party, later known as Peoples Progressive Party (PPP), after the victory of the party in the 1962 he became elected PM, a post he retained after independence in 1965 with the adoption of a republican constitution in 1970, he became founder president of the Gambia, declaring Gambia a "Republic within the Commonwealth of nations" the same year. Sir Dawda Karaiba Jawara was re-elected five times unopposed until he was overthrown by a coup made by the Armed Forces Provisional Ruling Council (AFPRC) led by an enlisted officer called Lt. Yayah Abdul-Aziz Jemus Junkung Diliu Jammeh, a 29 years old at the time of July, 1994 coup, led a group of young soldiers to overthrow the last veteran African president of his time.

The former president Sir Dawda Karaiba Jawara, 86, who has returned home from exile, in UK to live as an elder statesman at national expense. The Gambia formed a limited confederation with Senegal in 1982, that was to disolve in 1989. From independence untill 1994 he retained a democratic multi party system with freedom for opposition parties, although his own party won a majority of seats in every election, he gained an international reputation as a defender of human rights. In 1981, an attempted coup by the para military Police was defeated with assistance from Senegalese troops. Following that event, a Sene Gambia cconfederation was established but this was disolved in 1989. In July 1994, Mr. Dauda Jawara was overthrown by the Gambian army in a coup detat and went into political exile. Under his rule, the Gambia remained an isolated example of democracy and stability in the troubled west African region, but in the latter part of his rule corruption became a major problem in the Gambia. For a short time before his overthrow he was the very last of that generation of African leaders, who had led their countries to independence in the 1960s to remain on power since then.

Lt. Yayah Jammeh and his young colleagues, now grouped in what they called the Armed Forces Provisinal Ruling Council (AFRC), denounced Dawda Jawara's government, alleging mass corruption, nepotism, and mismanagement of public resources. The coup d'tat was popular among most Gambians who, truth be told, had had enough of Dawda Jawara's then inept government. As chairman of the AFRC, Lt. Yayah Jammeh and his government ruled by decree, they suspended the national constitution, banned all political parties, and promised to return the country to a nominal civilian rule after four years. But following a controversial consultation process, which led to the drafting of a new constitution, Gambians were given the choice to accept or reject the draft constitution in a referendum which recorded a turnout of 87%. As widely expected, a good 70% of the people voted for the adoption of the new constitution, that brought an end to Lt. Yayah Jammeh's military rule as he retired voluntarily from the army, and together with his Junta colleagues, formed a political party known as, the Alliance for Patriotic Re-orientation and Construction (APRC), with Lt. Yayah Jammeh as its presidential candidate, the APRC went on to win the presidential elections of September, 1996, garnering 57% of the votes. Lt. Yayah Jammeh has since then won two more elections and is likely to stand again for a fourth term in 2011. Lt. Yayah Jammeh was 29 at the time of the July, 1994 coup, of a man who appears not yet ready to give-up power, is now the only remaining member of the original coupists who brought ex-president's 32-years rule to an end. As traditional healer, the president Yayah Jammeh, inherently infuses paitients officially with healing and restorative powers during his sparetime.

The Gambia's president Yayah Jammeh has won a fourth term in office in the national elections, taking 72% of the vote. After casting his vote at his electorate, the Gambian president said, he was in no doubt that he would win. "In my 17-years on power, I have developed more development than the British were able to deliver in 400 years", he told the BBC.

Nine executed in Gambia (August 24, 2012), says Amnesty International'

Amnesty International says it has received "credible reports" that Gambia executed nine death row prisoners. "More persons are under threat of imminent executions in the coming days," Amnesty International said. President Yahya Jammeh had vowed to kill all 47 death row inmates by next month, in a national speech to mark the Muslim festival of Eid. The last official execution in Gambia took place in 1985. The African Union called on Mr Jammeh to renounce his plans after he made the announcement on Sunday. But according to Amnesty International, nine people, including one woman, were removed from their prison cells and executed on Thursday night. Three of those reportedly executed had been sentenced for treason, the group said in a statement. "The decision of the Gambian President Yahya Jammeh to execute nine prisoners after more than a quarter of a century without execution would be a giant leap backwards," said Paule Rigaud, Amnesty International's deputy director for the Africa region. She added that many of the death row inmates were political prisoners or have faced unfair trials. A Gambian security source told AFP news agency that all 47 death row prisoners had been "transferred to one place". Referring to President Jammeh, the source said: "The man is determined to execute the prisoners and he will do so." The death penalty was abolished when former President Dawda Jawara was in power but reinstated in 1995 shortly after Mr Jammeh seized power in a military coup. "By the middle of next month, all the death sentences would have been carried out to the letter; there is no way my government will allow 99% of the population to be held to ransom by criminals," President Jammeh said in an speech on Sunday, which was broadcast on national television the next day. In response, Benin's President Thomas Boni Yayi, who is the current chair of the African Union, sent his foreign minister to Gambia. "After having learned of the imminent execution of a number of prisoners sentenced to death, President Yayi, who is very concerned, wished that President Yahya Jammeh not carry out such a decision," Beninois Foreign Minister Nassirou Bako Arifari told BBC Afrique. Mr Jammeh's human rights record has often been criticised by international organisations, with particular concerns over press freedom. Last year, after winning a fourth term in office in widely criticised polls he told the BBC that his critics could "go to hell" because he feared "only Allah". President Yahya Jammeh has repeatedly been criticised for his human rights record. The Gambia has been politically and economically stable country in a region routinely be devilled by armed conflicts and the attendant economic instability, as attested by some of its neighbors. The tiny West African state is a popular tourist destination.

NATIONAL SECURITY: How a reviled African ruler survived a coup hatched in the United States. (Washington Post May 31, 2015) Gambian President Yahya Jammeh survived a coup attempt hatched by several plotters, MINNEAPOLIS — Every other Saturday evening, the coup-plotters excused themselves from their wives and kids to join a conference call. The half-dozen dissidents — all middle-aged men, most with military experience — dialed in from their suburban homes scattered across the South and Midwest.

There were operational details to discuss, logistical hurdles to overcome. How would they smuggle rifles and night-vision goggles to Gambia, the tiny West African country from which they were exiled? Was their $221,000 budget enough to topple the brutal strongman who had ruled Gambia for two decades?

In the predawn hours of Dec. 30, according to court documents and interviews with people involved in the operation, the U.S.-based conspirators teamed with other dissidents to assault the Gambian presidential palace. They expected to find it lightly guarded. Instead, they ran into an ambush. Four people were killed. Those who survived fled the country.

Afterward, the Justice Department charged four U.S. residents with taking part in or supporting the failed coup, saying they had violated the Neutrality Act of 1794, an obscure law that prohibits Americans from taking up arms against countries that enjoy peaceful relations with the United States.

What the U.S. government did not disclose, however, was that it had been monitoring the plotters and had secretly tipped off West African authorities to the travel of at least one of them. In doing so, U.S. officials may have at least indirectly helped to protect the president of Gambia, Yahya Jammeh, who has drawn international condemnation for his dismal human rights record, his violent rhetoric against gay people and bizarre beliefs such as his claim to have concocted an herbal cure for AIDS.

According to three U.S. law enforcement officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity because details of the case remain secret, the FBI interviewed the plotters' lead military planner, Lamin Sanneh, an exiled Gambian army officer, in early December at his home in Maryland. The FBI had been monitoring Sanneh, and agents wanted to know why he had purchased a plane ticket to West Africa, the officials said.

Around the same time, a second plotter who had arrived in Gambia to prepare for the coup confided to co-conspirators that he also had been contacted by a federal agent, according to a person involved in the operation. Soon after, other hints surfaced that Gambian officials had received a tip that a plot was afoot.

The exiles decided to proceed anyway after a Gambian informant assured them they had not been exposed. It was a fatal miscalculation.

According to two U.S. law enforcement officials, the FBI notified the State Department that agents had concerns about Sanneh and that he had left the United States. In turn, one of the U.S. officials said, the State Department alerted authorities in a West African country near Gambia that Sanneh was returning to the region — in hopes that local officials could intercept him and prevent any possible bloodshed. The official said Gambia was not alerted for fear that the country might round up innocent Americans.

Sanneh managed to slip through the net. Like the other conspirators, he flew into Senegal and traveled overland into neighboring Gambia.

Although it remains unclear how Gambian authorities learned of the scheme in advance, they laid a trap.

When the plotters tried to seize the presidential palace, “the Gambians are waiting for them,” a U.S. law enforcement official said. Sanneh was among those killed in the ensuing gunfight.

Rodney Ford, a spokesman for the State Department’s Bureau of African Affairs, declined to comment. FBI spokesman Kyle Loven also declined to comment.

West Africa has long been riddled by coups and countercoups. But the Gambian putsch was perhaps the first to be hatched on U.S. soil by immigrants who had carved out comfortable lives in their new land.

Most had arrived in the United States decades earlier and worked hard to become citizens and build successful careers. Three had served in the U.S. military; two were veterans of the wars in Iraq or Afghanistan.

The investigation into the botched coup has been centered on Minnesota, home of a thriving community of Gambian immigrants as well as the base for federal prosecutors and agents overseeing the case.

Three plotters have pleaded guilty to firearms charges and violating the Neutrality Act. A fourth defendant has pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial.

The prosecutions have stirred anger among many Gambian Americans who fled their country to escape repression under Jammeh. Some praised the coup organizers for risking their lives to bring freedom and democracy to Gambia, while sharply criticizing U.S. officials for siding with a ruler they described as a tyrant.

“Why in the world would they act on his behalf?” asked Pa Modou Ann, a former Gambian army officer who ran afoul of Jammeh in the 1990s and now lives in a Minneapolis suburb. “We have talked about it incessantly because it doesn’t make any sense.”

One plotter who has pleaded guilty likewise expressed astonishment. Papa Faal, a U.S. military veteran who served in Afghanistan, noted that the State Department has blasted the Gambian president’s human rights record for years.

“People need to know: Is this the kind of person who needs to be protected by the country that claims to be a beacon of hope?” said Faal from his home in Brooklyn Park, Minn. He declined further comment because his sentencing is pending.

Smiles with Obama

Dressed in white tribal robes, Jammeh was ushered into the White House on Aug. 5 for a handshake with a smiling President Obama. It was a diplomatic home run for Jammeh, whose government widely circulated a photograph of the encounter.

Jeffrey Smith, an advocacy officer for the Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights, said that, from Jammeh's perspective, the photograph's underlying message back home was invaluable: "He was saying, 'There's nothing you can do to oppose my rule. The strongest nation in the world and the strongest man in the world stand behind me.' "

Jammeh was invited to Washington to attend a U.S. summit with African leaders. But the special White House welcome puzzled Africa policy experts.

Over the years, Jammeh had irritated the U.S. government by cozying up to Iran, Venezuela and Cuba. He had no tolerance for dissent, at home or abroad. During his August visit to Washington, his bodyguards attacked a group of Gambian dissidents holding a protest outside the Hay-Adams hotel, sending some to the hospital.

Jammeh has earned special notoriety for his persecution of gays. Homosexuality is illegal in Gambia. In August, the government went a step further and declared that the crime of "aggravated homosexuality" would carry a life sentence.

Gambians living in the United States said they've long been perplexed at the U.S. government's unwillingness to take a harder line with Jammeh, whose impoverished country has just 1.9 million people and few natural resources.

"People are surprised and they're angry, because they find it to be hypocritical," said Pasamba Jow, a Gambian political activist from Maryland.

Around the time that Jammeh visited Washington, the coup-plotters intensified their planning, according to court records filed by prosecutors and the FBI. They purchased about 30 firearms, body armor, ammunition, night-vision goggles and military-style garb, stuffing the gear in 50-gallon drums and shipping it to Gambia, the records show.

In other ways, the plot came off as amateurish. The players referred to each other with code names such as "X," "Fox" and "Dave." One of them kept plans in a folder labeled "Top Secret" but left it at home, where it was later seized by the FBI.

At another defendant's house, agents found a book titled, "How to Stage a Military Coup: From Planning to Execution."

At another defendant’s house, agents found a book titled, “How to Stage a Military Coup: From Planning to Execution.”

‘Gambia Reborn’

According to the FBI, the group was led by Cherno Njie, 57, a real estate developer from Lakeway, Tex.. Njie, who holds dual U.S.-Gambian citizenship, financed the coup attempt and would have replaced Jammeh as president had the plot succeeded, according to the FBI affidavits.

The FBI said it found a document at Njie’s home titled, “Gambia Reborn: a Charter for Transition from Dictatorship to Democracy and Development,” as well as a spreadsheet breaking down the coup’s $221,000 budget. Njie is the only one of the four defendants to have pleaded not guilty. His attorney, Andrew Birrell, declined to comment fully on the allegations, saying: “It’s a legally and factually complex case.”

According to participants in the plot, the military mind behind the operation was Sanneh, the exiled Gambian officer who was killed while storming the presidential palace. Once a rising star in the Gambian military, Sanneh was awarded a coveted scholarship in 2012 at the National Defense University in Washington, which caters to U.S. military officers and diplomats, as well as foreign students in military exchange programs.

Shortly afterward, he was named head of Gambia’s presidential guard. Within a year, however, he was forced to flee the country after being targeted in one of Jammeh’s frequent political purges. He sought asylum in the United States and lived with his family near Baltimore.

While at National Defense University, Sanneh wrote his thesis on drug trafficking in West Africa and frequently discussed the challenges of fighting corruption with his faculty adviser, Jeffrey Meiser. Although the university emphasizes the importance of civilian rule and working within a democratic system, Meiser said the political situation in Gambia was so hopeless that he could understand why Sanneh felt compelled to lead an armed uprising. Sanneh, he said, was confronted with a hard choice: “Either I’m going to be corrupt and part of the system, or I’m going to do something about it.”

Recruiting U.S. veterans

Similar motivations prompted three U.S. military veterans to join the plot.

Njaga Jagne, a captain with the Kentucky Army National Guard, moved to the United States two decades ago from Gambia. He was deployed twice to Iraq and received his U.S. citizenship in 2006 — on Veterans Day — in a ceremony in Baghdad.

“He believed in the whole idea of going over there to bring the Iraqi people freedom,” said his sister, Sigga Jagne. “That’s who he was; he really believed in those ideas and tenets.”

Another member of the conspiracy was Alagie Barrow, a former officer with the Tennessee Army National Guard. Barrow, 41, has pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing. His attorney, Robert Richman, said his client had no reason to believe that fighting for freedom in his homeland was against U.S. law. “One can certainly sympathize with the decisions of the Gambian expatriate community to do something that would have helped their relatives and friends still in the Gambia, who are living under an abusive regime,” Richman said.

The last to join the group was Faal, who served for a decade with the U.S. military.

Even more than the other plotters, Faal had long seethed at Jammeh’s autocratic rule.

Faal’s great uncle, Dawda Jawara, is considered to be the founding father of Gambia. He served as Gambia’s first prime minister in 1962 and then president after the country won independence from Britain in 1965. He led the country until 1994, when he was ousted in a coup — by Jammeh, then a young army lieutenant.

In 2013, Faal self-published a book about a previous, failed attempt to oust his great uncle. In the book, titled “A Week of Hell,” Faal lamented the chronic coups d’etat that have destabilized West African countries for generations, but he gave no hint that he would soon help plan one.

“When a country’s democratic process fails or is usurped, in my view, it may be necessary for the citizenry to force change through civil disobedience and peaceful demonstration rather than . . . through the barrel of guns,” he wrote. Coups, he added, only plant “the seeds of a future conflict.”

Shifting plans

The exiles returned to Gambia separately and set up a safe house in Banjul, the capital. For weeks, they discreetly monitored the comings and goings at the presidential palace, known locally as the State House. Early on there were hints something was amiss. Barrow, the National Guardsman from Tennessee, told others in early December that he had received a call from a U.S. federal agent, asking where he was.

Later, Sanneh and another plotter met with a soldier in the presidential guard whom they hoped would support the coup. The informant reported that Gambian security forces had received a tip that a plot was in the works but weren’t taking it seriously. The rebels’ original plan was to intercept Jammeh’s convoy on a highway as he traveled from Banjul to his native village for an annual holiday visit. But Jammeh suddenly left the country instead.

Despite the unexpected developments, the conspirators decided to try to seize the State House anyway and oust Jammeh while he was abroad, according to FBI affidavits.

At 2 a.m. on Dec. 30, the plotters split into two groups – Alpha Team and Bravo Team – and attacked the State House from the front and rear, hoping that a few gunshots would scare off the guards. But the State House had been fortified with extra soldiers loyal to Jammeh. Sanneh, Jagne and two other rebels were killed. “The leak happened somewhere,” said one of the participants, speaking on the condition of anonymity to avoid self-incrimination. “Who did it, we don’t know.”

‘Unconscionable’ threats

Three of the accused plotters — Faal, Njie and Barrow — escaped and made their way back to the United States.

The FBI arrested Faal and Njie within days of their return. Barrow was charged in late January. A fourth defendant, Banka Manneh, a Gambian dissident from Jonesboro, Ga., never left the United States but was charged in March with supporting the conspiracy.

Omar Faye, the deputy Gambian ambassador to Washington, said his government was keeping close tabs on the U.S. prosecutions. He declined to comment on particulars of the plot, saying he did not want to interfere with the criminal proceedings.

“This is a very serious situation,” he said. “It is about trying to destabilize or remove a constitutional government that was elected overwhelmingly by the Gambian people.”

Meanwhile, Jammeh has kept up his controversial pronouncements. At a political rally in early May, he warned gays in Gambia that he would personally “slit your throat.”

“If you are a man and want to marry another man in this country and we catch you, no one will ever set eyes on you again, and no white person can do anything about it,” he said.

That prompted a stern response from the White House. In a May 16 statement, Susan E. Rice, the national security adviser, condemned Jammeh’s comments as“unconscionable.” She noted that his threats were part of “an alarming deterioration of the broader human rights situation” in Gambia, including reports of torture. “We are reviewing what additional actions are appropriate to respond to this worsening situation,” Rice added. TRENDING: Gambian president bans female genital mutilation
By This Is Africa on November 25, 2015
Gambian President Yahya Jammeh has banned female genital mutilation, branding the practice as outdated and not a requirement of Islam, the information ministry announced Tuesday

President, Yahya Jammeh, said last night that female genital mutilation (FGM) would be outlawed in the Gambia, reported The Guardian. He said the ban would come into effect immediately, though it was not clear when the ban would be drafted into legislation.

Communication minister Sherrif Bojang confirmed the ban in a Facebook post shortly after midnight on Monday, writing: “Female genital mutilation (FGM) has been banned with immediate effect.”

“The president said the decision to ban FGM is basically for the protection of the girl child,” Bojang told AFP.

According to the World Health Organization (WHO), more than 125 million women worldwide have undergone FGM, which involves cutting off the labia and clitoris, often when girls are young.

Jaha Dukureh, an anti-FGM activist, spent the past week meeting cabinet ministers in the Gambia and sent them articles from the newspaper to inform them about the issue. She expressed her elation to the Guardian: “I’m really amazed that the president did this. I didn’t expect this in a million years. I’m just really proud of my country and I’m really, really happy,” she said. “I think the president cared about the issue, it was just something that was never brought to his attention.” (Text ends)

GENDER ISSUES

Gambia and Tanzania outlaw child marriage

July 8, 2016: The Gambia and Tanzania have banned child marriage, with tough penalties for those who breach the rulings. Gambia's President Yayha Jammeh announced that anyone marrying a girl below 18 would be jailed for up to 20 years.

In Tanzania, the high court imposed a landmark ruling outlawing marriage under the age of 18 for boys and girls. Some 30% of underage girls are married in The Gambia, while in Tanzania the rate is 37%.

Before the Tanzania ruling, girls as young as 14 could marry with parental consent, while it was 18 for boys. The BBC's Tulanana Bohela in Dar es Salaam says this is a big win for child rights groups and activists, who will now have an easier time rescuing girls from child marriage. The case was brought by lobby group Msichana Initiative.

Gambia's President speaking at the Eid-ul-Fitr celebrations at the end of Ramadan, said parents and imams who perform the ceremonies would also face prison. "If you want to know whether what I am saying is true or not, try it tomorrow and see," he warned. Women's rights campaigners have welcomed the ban, however some say that it would be better to engage with local communities to try to change attitudes towards child marriage instead of threatening families with prison sentences, "I don't think locking parents up is the answer... it could lead to a major backlash and sabotage the ban," Isatou Jeng of the women's rights organisation Girls Agenda told the Thomson Reuters Foundation by phone from the Gambian capital, Banjul.

In December last year, Mr Jammeh also outlawed female genital mutilation (FGM), with a prison sentence of up to three years for those that ignored the ban. He said the practice had no place in Islam or in modern society. Three-quarters of women in the mostly Muslim country have had the procedure, according to Unicef. (text ends)

Meet Dr. Isatou Touray, Gambia's First Ever Female Presidential Candidate

By Bello Olusayo September 18, 2016

Dr. Isatou Touray, the first female Presidential candidate who has decided to contest against President Jammeh who has been in power since 1994.

As the build-up to the December 1, 2016 Gambia's Presidential election heats up Festus Iyorah in this analysis zooms in on female Presidential candidate, Isatou Touray, who will be contesting against ruthless incumbent, President Jammeh in December.

She is Dr Isatou Touray, the first female Presidential candidate who has decided to contest against President Jammeh who has been in power since 1994. She's a campaigner against female genital mutilation and a development expert who won the US State Department award for empowering Gambian communities in 2008.

In Gambia, President Jammeh has jailed scores of opposition members questioning his longevity but Touray is not afraid of him as she's poised to make a difference in the up-coming elections due to be held by December.

WHY IS SHE CONTESTING?

Touray in an interview with BBC Africa Today's podcast said she's out to salvage the Gambians from the current situation they are facing. She said the situation on ground is bad as there is no democracy; people are living in fear and there's no respect for fundamental human rights.

While announcing her candidacy in a press conference, she accused President Jammeh of sowing division between communities and living a gross lifestyle. "It's time for him to go," she quipped while declaring her intention to contest for president.

Furthermore, Touray who was arrested in 2010 over corruption allegations but was acquitted of all charges said she is poised to change the tide in Gambia if elected. As regards her plan for Gambians, she said there are programmes that will be implemented to create jobs and will also get the population developed and have confidence in themselves.

"YEARNING FOR CHANGE"

Touray said she has a feeling that she's going to win because the people of Gambia are 'yearning for change' which would birth a new dawn in the country, adding that she has confidence in the people of Gambia who she claims are ready to vote for her in December.

“I’ve a 100 percent feeling that I am going to win because the whole population is yearning for change. There’s no home in Gambia that has not been traumatized. These are the people who are ready to change the tide,” she said.

However, analysts are of the opinion that there may be a replay of what happened in 2011 when Gambians voted President Jammeh out of fear.

In the last election held in 2011, The Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), refused to endorse his victory, saying voters and the opposition had been “cowed by repression and intimidation.”

AFRAID OF PRESIDENT JAMMEH?

Officially referred to as his “His Excellency Sheikh, Professor, Alhaji, Doctor Yahya AJJ Jammeh,” President Jammeh is arguably one of the world’s most ruthless leaders. He came to power in 1994 as a 29-year-old army lieutenant in bloodless coup and has won four multi-party elections.

His government’s ideologies, brutal approach to issues and treatment of journalists and opposition have drawn criticism across the world.

The BBC reports that nine people were executed, including Alieu Bah, a former lieutenant in the army who was arrested and jailed in 1997 for plotting to oust President Jammeh.

However, Touray is not afraid of him; she told the BBC that she is not afraid of him because she’s a Gambian that has rights and the security agencies who may orchestrate her arrest are civilized people who know the rule of law to the letter.

After Spending 22 Years in Office, Gambian President Seeks Re-election

Controversial Gambian President, Yahya Jammeh

An African President who has ruled his people for 22 years after seizing power through coup has left many in shock as he contests for another election.

The sickness plaguing many African leaders has come to play again as Gambians go to the polling station on the 1st of December to elect another head of state. Sadly, a man who has clung to power for 22 years will be contesting to extend his rule on the people.

Gambian President Yahya Jammeh seized power in a 1994 coup and has maintained it ever since with a mixture of severity, mysticism and iron-clad self-belief, AFP reports. He has been campaigning vigorously for re-election. But, how one person can rule his people for over 22 years and still want to retain power has made many observers filled with disgust.

That is the sad reality of most African leaders who can do anything to die in power.

“No matter what people say about me, I am not moved… I don’t listen to anybody because I know what is important,” Jammeh said while depositing his candidacy for this week’s presidential election.

Governing, he said, “is between me and God Almighty.”

Jammeh is a deeply devout Muslim who grew up in the western village of Kanilai in 1965, the year that The Gambia.

He loves his retinue of titles that’s why he doesn’t play with it. He is known as Excellency Sheikh Professor Alhaji Doctor Yahya Abdul-Azziz Jemus Junkung Jammeh Naasiru Deen in his country. He joined the army in 1984 before he took power through a coup in 1994 and has since ruled his people.

Just like every other military coup, he had pledging to root out corruption and hold elections after seizing power from Dawda Jawara who ruled the country since independence.

Since he successfully removed the presidential term limits through a 2002 constitutional amendment, he has won in the elections he contested sweeping the votes in 1996, 2001, 2006 and 2011.

Now, he wants to extend it more by running for the fifth time and continue to dominate his people.

Jammeh is not without drama though, AFP reports that the 51-year-old has attracted worldwide attention for declaring The Gambia an Islamic nation, withdrawing the country from the International Criminal Court, and claiming he had concocted a herbal cure for HIV/AIDS.

The longtime ruler has woven a shroud of mysticism around himself using religion and rumours of secret powers.

More importantly, Jammeh is never seen without his Koran, sceptre and prayer beads. He has promised to bury critics “nine feet deep” and told the UN Secretary-General to “go to hell” after Ban Ki-moon called for an investigation into an activist’s death in custody.

AFP further reported that Rights groups allege that those who defy him end up in the country’s notorious Mile Two prison, where the UN in 2014 said it had obtained evidence of torture and executions by the country’s National Intelligence Agency, which reports directly to Jammeh.

Jammeh controls several businesses in the country and has in the past seized them without warning, discouraging foreign investment.

The state of the economy has pushed many young Gambians to take the "Back Way", or migrant route across the Sahara to Libya, where they board boats bound for Italy.

But others remain grateful for investment in education and the health system, which were severely neglected under his predecessor. "He has totally changed the life of the Gambian people," said Yankuba Colley, a key Jammeh campaign organiser. "The future of The Gambia lies in his hands."

Gambian President, Yahya Jammeh, Defeated In Polls After 22 Years

President Yahya Jammeh, who has ruled The Gambia for 22 years, has conceded defeat to opposition leader Adama Barrow, the chairman of the independent electoral commission said Friday. "It's really unique that someone who has been ruling this country for so long has accepted defeat," Alieu Momar Njie told reporters ahead of the release of the results of Thursday's presidential election.

Gambian state television told AFP that the 51-year-old head of state, who seized power in a coup in July 1994, would make a statement later in the day to congratulate Barrow. Jammeh was running for a fifth term with his Alliance for Patriotic Reorientation and Construction (APRC), while Barrow ran for eight political groups who united for the first time to field a single candidate.

Gambian President, Yahya Jammeh Calls President-elect To Concede Defeat
Gambian ruler Yahya Jammeh has conceded defeat to rival Adama Barrow after the presidential polls.

Gambia's electoral commission says opposition candidate Adama Barrow won an upset victory in the country's presidential poll, beating longtime ruler Jammeh after 22-year reign. Of conceding defeat, just as Nigeria's former President, Goodluck Jonathan did after the 2015 presidential elections:

From Being a Security Guard to President: Meet Gambian New President

Adama Barrow, a successful property developer who has never held public office, has defied the odds to score a shock victory in The Gambia's elections.

His victory in the small West African nation's presidential poll is arguably an even bigger shock than that of fellow property mogul in the US, Donald Trump. Mr Barrow's opponent Yahya Jammeh, had ruled the country for more than two decades, but said if God willed it, his presidency could go on for "a billion years".

Before the 51-year-old was chosen in September as the candidate to represent seven Gambian opposition parties at the election, he had spent 10 years working in property, having started his own estate agency in 2006.

In the early 2000s, he lived in the UK for several years, where he reportedly worked as a security guard at the Argos catalogue store in north London, while studying for his real estate qualifications.
British media have even reported that while guarding the shop on Holloway Road, he made a citizen's arrest on a shoplifter, which resulted in a six-month jail term.

It was also during that period that Mr Barrow is thought to have followed in the footsteps of millions of other African football fans, choosing to support Arsenal FC, at that time his local club.

Adama Barrow is popular with young Gambians

He was born in 1965, the same year his country gained independence from British colonial rule, in a small village near the market town of Basse in the east of the country.

Throughout his campaign, he pledged support for an independent judiciary, as well as increased freedom for the media and civil society.

Six things about Adama Barrow:

Property developer Adama Barrow (pictured right) has scored the unlikeliest of election victories

- Member of the Fula ethnic group, born in 1965, the year of Gambian independence
- Reportedly worked as a security guard at Argos in the early 2000s while studying in UK
- Returned home in 2006 to set up property business
- Supports English Premier League football team Arsenal
- Nominated as the candidate for coalition of seven opposition parties, promising greater respect for human rights
- A devout Muslim who is reportedly married with two wives and five children

He described his opponent as a “soulless dictator” and promised to undo some of Mr Jammeh’s more controversial moves.

“We will take the country back to the Commonwealth and the International Criminal Court (ICC),” he told the Anadolu Agency.
A devout Muslim, he also criticised the lack of a two-term limit on the presidency and condemned the jailing of political opposition figures.

Speaking to the BBC three days before the election, Mr Barrow said that Gambians “had been suffering for 22 years” and were ready for change.

He scorned the achievements of his opponent, who boasted of having brought The Gambia out of the stone age with his education and health programmes.

The hospitals President Jammeh had built had “no drugs… or quality doctors”, the schools “no teachers, no chairs… no good educational materials”, he said. They were “white elephant projects”.

Although he became treasurer of the main opposition United Democratic Party (UDP) party in 2013, Mr Barrow was not a household name in The Gambia, described as “little-known” even by one of the local media outlets supporting him.

Mr Barrow, who has two wives and five children – according to the Gambian newspaper The Point, was especially popular among young voters – who have been badly hit by the country's struggling economy.

Many thousands of Gambians have made the perilous journey to Europe in search of jobs. So The Gambia's new leader has great expectations on his shoulders – as he makes history in a country which has not had a smooth transfer of power in his lifetime. (text ends)

Here's How Gambia's President Jammeh Was Forced to Accept Election Result

How Africa By: Kingsley Okeke December 5, 2016

In what can be described as the "Miracle of Banjul," The incumbent president of Gambia, Yahya Jammeh, in a rather unusual display of statesmanship, conceded defeat to the opposition candidate, Mr. Adama Barrow, in the recently concluded presidential elections.

Mr. Jammeh, who had ruled the tiny West African Country for 22 years, was defeated by Mr. Barrow – a property developer, and product of a coalition of opposition political parties in The Gambia. The Coalition of 8 political parties in the country, was a first – akin to Nigeria's All Progressive Congress, APC, which similarly saw to the ouster of the then President Goodluck Jonathan and ended the sixteen years reign of the country's largest political party, the Peoples Democratic Party, PDP.

Jammeh's defeat had been long foretold. The 51 years old former army lieutenant, started off on a very good note and was loved by all who saw him as the messiah. Things took a dramatic turn when he gradually began to isolate himself from major world institutions who had started expressing concern over his growing dictatorial tendencies and were pushing for reforms in the country. In 2013, he withdrew the country's membership of the Commonwealth and only recently announced his intention to exit the International Criminal Court, a move many analysts have said would be reversed by the President-elect.

While the video of Mr. Jammeh's "concession call" have been trending and garnering staggering hits online, not many knew the backstage politics and intrigues that preceded the call.

An impeccable source, who prefers not to be named, told this reporter that, Mr. Jammeh had deliberately shut out the world because he never planned to concede defeat, even though it was clear before the elections, that he does not have the support of the masses.

“Like I told you before the election, Mr. Jammeh was in a fix, he became a prisoner of his own sins. He was very broke and you know election requires funds. the donors were no longer giving him money and worst of all, the masses saw through his lies and were no longer ready to keep him as president.”

Our source who served as a diplomat under Jammeh maintained that “it was clear from the outset that he would lose this particular election, but what was not certain, was if he would accept the result of the polls.”

“While a number of people might be speculating that his concession was as a result of the pressure from the international community, it is far from it, because, we know Jammeh, he would never buckle under pressure from international community.”

“I can tell you authoritatively that the president, was forced to make the call. The Chief of Defence Staff, Lieutenant General Ousman Bargie, had to persuade the president, a discussion which lasted for about two hours due to his initial resistance. The CDS told him in clear terms that he was alone and no member of the armed forces was willing to kill any Gambian on the account of his obsession with power. He also told him that the most honorable thing to do was to accept the result and put the call across.”

This is no doubt the end of an era. Mr. Jammeh Known for walking around with his trademark prayer beads, a sword, and a stick, comes from a lineage of traditional medicine practitioners. His father was reputed to be one of the foremost bone doctors in Gambia, known for his special gift of healing all manner of bone related fractures, using traditional medicine. Mr. Jammeh is said to be one of the world’s most eccentric and ruthless leaders.

Born in May 1965, he came to power in 1994 as a 29-year-old army lieutenant. He had on several occasions boasted of his ability to heal numerous diseases, including HIV/AIDS, a claim World Health Organization have debunked. In the country, his claim to possess the special gift of healing gained traction, until some of the celebrated cases of supposed healing began to die of the same ailments.

GAMBIA UPDATES

Gambia leader Yahya Jammeh rejects election result

BBC news updates 10 December 2016

Gambian leader Yahya Jammeh has rejected the result of the presidential election held earlier this month, a week after admitting defeat. Mr Jammeh cited "abnormalities" in the vote and called for fresh elections.

Mr Jammeh, who took power in a coup in 1994, was defeated by Adama Barrow, who won more than 43% of the vote.

Mr Barrow accused the incumbent of damaging democracy by refusing to accept the result. His transition team said the president-elect was safe.

International criticism of Mr Jammeh came swiftly. The US and The Gambia's neighbour, Senegal condemned his announcement, and the African Union called for a "peaceful and orderly transition of power".

The results were revised by the country's electoral commission on 5 December, when it emerged that the ballots for one area were added incorrectly, swelling Mr Barrow's vote.

The error, which also added votes to the other candidates, "has not changed the status quo" of the result, the commission said.

However, it narrowed Mr Barrow's margin of victory from 9% to 4%.

Mr Jammeh said that he now rejected the results of the election "in totality". "After a thorough investigation, I have decided to reject the outcome of the recent election," Mr Jammeh said.

"I lament serious and unacceptable abnormalities which have reportedly transpired during the electoral process. "I recommend fresh and transparent elections which will be officiated by a God-fearing and independent electoral commission."

Mr Barrow's spokesperson said the head of the army, General Ousman Badjie, supported the president-elect, having pledged his allegiance after the initial result.

The BBC's West Africa correspondent, Thomas Fessy, says the main question now is whether the Gambian leader has managed to split the army, retaining a faction ready to back his announcement.

Foreign criticism of Jammeh

The government in Senegal called for an emergency meeting of the UN Security Council. Foreign Minister Mankeur Ndiaye, speaking on national television, urged President Jammeh to respect the election result.

The US has "strongly condemned" Mr Jammeh's rejection of the result.

"This action is a reprehensible and unacceptable breach of faith with the people of The Gambia and an egregious attempt to undermine a credible election process and remain in power illegitimately," said state department spokesman Mark Toner.

A Human Rights Watch spokesman also said it was "deeply concerned". "The international community, notably [regional bloc] Ecowas and the African Union, should loudly protest any unlawful attempt to subvert the will of the Gambian people," said Babatunde Olugboji, deputy programme director.

The streets of the capital, Banjul, were reported to be calm on Friday night although soldiers were seen placing sandbags in strategic locations across the city, AFP news agency reports.

Only last week, Mr Jammeh was shown on state TV calling Mr Barrow to wish him well. "You are the elected president of The Gambia, and I wish you all the best. I have no ill will," he said at the time.

According to the electoral commission, the revised results of the vote on 1 December was:

•Mr Barrow won 222,708 votes (43.34%)
•President Jammeh took 208,487 (39.6%)
•A third-party candidate, Mama Kandeh, won 89,768 (17.1%)

Mr Barrow, a property developer, is due to take office in late January. The Gambia is the smallest country on mainland Africa, with a population of fewer than two million. In his 22 years in power, Mr Jammeh acquired a reputation as a ruthless leader. Ahead of the election, Human Rights Watch accused him of using violence to silence critics. The group said two activists had died in custody and dozens of people had been jailed and denied medical or legal help.

After The Reversal Of Jammeh, The Gambia In Uncertainty

December 11, 2016

Banjul, the capital of the Gambia, lives severe hours. In the aftermath of the outgoing President Yahya Jammeh's decision to no longer recognize his defeat in the presidential election earlier this month, the streets are controlled by the security forces. This creates a confusing situation which, according to the Constitution, only the Supreme Court can dispel since it is a dispute over electoral results. The only problem is that Yahya Jammeh has already officially recognized his defeat on the phone and in public by exchanging with Adama Barrow, considered from that moment as the elected president of The Gambia. In the meantime, it should be noted that any presidential candidate may appeal to the Supreme Court within ten days of the proclamation of the results.

Yahya Jammeh blurs the cards

The situation that prevails today in The Gambia has been written in several acts:

– Act 1: in power for 22 years in a country he led with an iron hand, Yahya Jammeh creates surprise by recognizing in public his defeat.This attitude surprised more than one and led the president of the Independent Electoral Commission to salute the “magnanimity” of Yahya Jammeh.

– Act 2: As African countries and the international community hail this extraordinarily positive scenario for democracy in Africa, Yahya Jammeh makes a spectacular turnabout in a television statement on Friday evening. “Just as I loyally accepted the results, believing that the Electoral Commission was independent, honest and reliable, I reject them in their entirety,” he said. And denouncing “unacceptable errors” on the part of the electoral authorities, he is demanding a new ballot.

– Act 3: once again positioning itself as the unavoidable president of the Gambians, Yahya Jammeh, in his statement on Friday, assured that “the intervention of foreign powers would not change anything”, warning that he would not tolerate any protest in the streets. Joining the act with words, he even prevented the plane bringing a mission of the ECOWAS to land in Banjul, according to the Senegalese Minister of Foreign Affairs Mankeur Ndiaye.

Adama Barrow urges calm

Immediate reaction in The Gambia first, with the statement of President-elect Adama Barrow. The latter, addressing Yahya Jammeh, asked him to accept his defeat in the December 1 presidential election before rejecting his request for a new vote. With regard to the population and its supporters, it called for calm and above all “to go about their affairs”. “I invite you to keep” discipline and maturity “, he said in substance.

As for Yahya Jammeh, Adama Barrow said that “he exhorts him to change his position and to accept in good faith the verdict of the people.” At the end of an opposition Was held at his home, adding that the incumbent president did not have the constitutional power to convene a new election.

Importantly, on Thursday, Adama Barrow availed himself of the support of the chief of the army, General Ousman Badjie. According to Adama Barrow, he said that “he was loyal to President Yahya Jammeh because he was elected president.” He said that now that I am elected by the Gambian people, he was going to support me, “said Adama Barrow. A fact that did not seem trivial in the mind of Jammeh who reacted by granting promotions Thursday and Friday To some 250 officers and superior officers, a way of seducing a part of the army in, no doubt, his plan to retain power.

The international community condemns Jammeh's attitude

Meanwhile, international pressures have manifested itself through several signals. Senegal and the United States promptly condemned Mr. Jammeh's move, demanding that he conduct a "peaceful transition" with Mr. Barrow and ensure his safety. In New York on Saturday night, the UN Security Council called on Jammeh to "respect the choice of the sovereign people of The Gambia and to transfer power to President-elect Adama Barrow without undue conditions or delay." Shortly before, the African Union (AU), the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) and the UN had already called on the government of Jammeh still in place in Banjul "to respect the verdict of the urns And to guarantee the safety of President-elect Adama Barrow and all Gambian citizens. "

Other reactions: those of the European Union and Amnesty International. The European Union (EU) said it was "unacceptable" to reject the results of the election, "urging President Jammeh to respect the rule of law and the will of the Gambians." Amnesty International, for its part, called on "the security forces to exercise restraint if the Gambians decide to exercise their right to protest peacefully."

A crisis that falls badly, because in the middle of the tourist season

In this unstable environment, Gambians fear for their incomes, who live mainly from tourism. "Yahya Jammeh should not say things that will scare tourists," he told AFP on condition of anonymity, a seller of fruit juice. "He must cede power peacefully for the good of Gambians," he added. He is not wrong because in the tourist area of Banjul, Western tourists were less visible than the previous days, said the correspondent of the AFP. A way to protect themselves from the outside agitation by staying in their hotel which does not escape the palpable tension in the country. Gambia: UN Security Council Orders President Jammeh to Handover to Adama Barrow

HOW AFRICA December 12, 2016

The UN Security Council has asked Gambian President Yahya Jammeh to carry out a peaceful and orderly transition of power to the President-elect, Adama Barrow.

In a press statement issued on Saturday, the 15-member Council "strongly condemned the outgoing Gambian President's rejection of the official election results proclaimed by the country's Independent Electoral Commission".

The Council asked Jammeh "to respect the choice of the sovereign people of Gambia, as he did on December 2, and to transfer, without condition and undue delay, power to the President-elect, Mr. Adama Barrow."

It also urged all parties to exercise maximum restraint, refrain from violence and remain calm, and requested that the security of Barrow and that of all Gambians be fully ensured.

The Council also called on the support by the UN Office for West Africa (UNOWAS) and international partners, especially the ECOWAS, to preserve stability in the Gambia and work towards the installation of a democratically elected government in the country.

The Council members also commended the Gambian people for the peaceful and transparent conduct of elections on Dec. 2, and expressed their commitment to continue to closely follow the evolution of the situation in the country.

The Security Council recalled the relevant provisions of Article 23 (4) of the AU Charter on Democracy, Elections and Governance.

It further called on Jammeh to respect the ECOWAS protocol on democracy and good governance and the African Charter on Democracy, Elections and Governance, notably the rejection of unconstitutional changes of Government.

Barrow had also called on Jammeh to accept the outcome of the election, saying that he had no constitutional right to reject the results and appealed to him "to facilitate a smooth transfer of executive power".

"I urge him to change his current position and accept the verdict of the people in good faith for the sake of the Gambia our homeland," Barow said.

Liberian President, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf to Lead UN, AU, ECOWAS Mission to Gambia

HOW AFRICA December 13, 2016

Liberia's President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf is expected on Tuesday to lead a high level delegation of African heads of state aiming to solve the political impasse in the Gambia, the country's president-elect Adama Barrow has said.

The Liberian leader's plane was denied access to Banjul airport on Saturday when she attempted to intervene in Jammeh's decision to leave power after losing December 1 polls to businessman Adama Barrow.

Sirleaf, who is also Chairperson of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), will lead a tripartite delegation representing the United Nations (UN), African Union (AU) and West African regional bloc ECOWAS.

In an interview with Reuters on Monday, Barrow said he wanted to see an "expedited transitional period" leading to a handover of power from outgoing President Yahya Jammeh. He also said he had no official security and was ''exposed''.

Meanwhile, a Gambian journalist who was present at a press conference held by Barrow on Monday tweeted the list of African leaders expected in the Gambia on Tuesday.

Among others:
President Muhammadu Buhari of Nigeria
President Alpha Conde of Guinea
President Ernest Bai Koroma of Sierra Leone
President John Dramani Mahama of Ghana

The African Union (AU) on Saturday described as 'null and void' the decision by outgoing president Yahya Jammeh to overturn results of the last presidential polls held on December 1.

The AU in a statement released hours after Jammeh's declaration of state TV that the elections will have to be rerun after his team cited irregularities said, ''The Chairperson of the Commission reaffirms the imperative for the concerned stakeholders to strictly comply with the rule of law and the respect of the will of their people as clearly expressed during the 1 December presidential elections.''

Earlier on Saturday, Sirleaf was denied access to Gambia's main airport, Senegal's foreign minister said on independent radio on Saturday.

The plane of Sirleaf who is Chairperson of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) was not allowed to land at the Banjul airport according to the minister.

Reuters reports that even though the reason for the denial was unclear, as was the intended timing of the plane landing, ECOWAS had been hoping to play a role in creating a smooth transition of power in the Gambia.

Gambia: Yahya Jammeh's Party Challenges Election Result in Court After AU Leaders' Visit

HOW AFRICA December 14, 2016

The party of Yahya Jammeh, president of Gambia, on Tuesday filed a petition at the supreme court to challenge his defeat in the December 1 election, as West African leaders failed to reach a deal that would see him accept the poll result and end a festering political crisis.

The result of the December 1 polls should be annulled, the Alliance for Patriotic Reorientation and Construction (APRC) said in a document handed to the registrar of the supreme court in the capital, Banjul.

The petition was filed after an African Union (AU) delegation met with Jammeh, hoping to persuade him to hand over power to President-elect Adama Barrow.

Earlier on Tuesday, security forces blocked the entrance to the electoral commission in Banjul, while the chief of defence staff vowed to remain loyal to Jammeh, indicating that the country's military would help him stay in power.

Last week, Jammeh announced his intention to challenge the election results, even though he had earlier conceded the election to Barrow.

The 51-year-old, who has ruled the West African country for 22 years, deployed heavily-armed military and police to the streets of the capital.

GAMBIA UPDATES

President Yahya Jammeh took another step in brinkmanship today by asking Gambian army seize the office of the country's electoral commission.

HOW AFRICA December 14, 2016

His plan was not so clear. But he had called for new polls last week after rejecting the result of the election of December 1.The latest action was taken on a day that four West African leaders arrived to persuade him to accept the verdict of the Gambian people.

The soldiers ordered the chairman of the commission, Alieu Momar Njie and other staff to leave.

They then barred all employees from entering.

"The military came to my office and said I am not to touch anything and told me to leave," he said. "I am worried for my safety," Njei added.

As the drama was going on, Jammeh received the African leaders at the CoCo Ocean Resort and Spa, in the capital of Banjul.

The delegation of West African leaders urged the former soldier who had spent 22 years in power to step aside following his poll defeat by real estate mogul, Adama Barrow.

Asked if Jammeh had been receptive, President Buhari told reporters: "Yes, very much so."

The West African leaders who attended the meeting included ECOWAS chairwoman, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf of Liberia, John Dramani Mahama of Ghana and President Ernest Koroma of Sierra Leone.

The international community is now urging Mr. Jammeh to peacefully transfer power

HOW AFRICA UPDATES December 15, 2016

The international community is now urging Mr. Jammeh to peacefully transfer power to Mr. Barrow, with the UN Special Representative to West Africa, Ibn Chambas, threatening sanctions against the Gambian despot if he refuses to step down by January 18.

Gambian President Yahya Jammeh could be "strongly sanctioned" if he refuses to step down when his tenure ends, the United Nations Special Representative for West Africa stated on Wednesday.

Mr. Jammeh, who has served as president of the Gambia since 1994, lost the December 1, 2016 presidential election to businessman Adama Barrow and conceded defeat the following day. But a week later, Mr. Jammeh reversed course, saying that he did not accept the results of the election and would challenge the outcome at the Supreme Court.

The international community is now urging Mr. Jammeh to peacefully transfer power to Mr. Barrow, with the UN Special Representative to West Africa, Ibn Chambas, threatening sanctions against the Gambian despot if he refuses to step down by January 18. "For Mr. Jammeh, the end is here, and under no circumstances can he continue to be president," Mr. Chambas disclosed to Reuters.

"The Supreme Court decision has nothing to do with the five-year mandate," he added.

Mr. Chambas' statement came a day after an Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) delegation, comprising of Nigerian President Muhammadu Buhari and Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf among others, visited the Gambian capital of Banjul to urge Mr. Jammeh to step down and hand over power to Mr. Barrow.

West African Leaders Fail to Reach Deal With Gambia's President Yahya Jammeh

HOW AFRICA UPDATES December 15, 2016

By Edward McAllister

Gambian President Yahya Jammeh's ruling party challenged his defeat in a Dec. 1 election at the Supreme Court on Tuesday as West African leaders failed to reach a deal that would see him accept the result and end a deepening political crisis.

Soldiers also seized the headquarters of the national elections commission and sealed it off just hours before the mediation delegation representing regional bloc ECOWAS touched down in the tiny riverside nation.

Jammeh, who has ruled Gambia since taking power in a 1994 coup and is accused of widespread rights abuses, initially conceded defeat to his main challenger, Adama Barrow. But in a dramatic about-face that drew international condemnation he then rejected the poll results last Friday.

The legal petition filed by the Alliance for Patriotic Reorientation and Construction now raises the prospect that Barrow's narrow victory, which was poised to end years of Jammeh's autocratic rule, may be overturned.

"The petition prays that it be determined that the said Adama Barrow was not duly elected or returned as president and that the said election was void," read the text of the document submitted to the court and seen by Reuters.

Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, a Nobel peace laureate, led the ECOWAS delegation that also included Nigeria's Muhammadu Buhari, Sierra Leone's Ernest Bai Koroma and Ghana's John Mahama, who lost an election last week and conceded defeat.

"It is not time for a deal. It is not something that can happen in one day. It is something that we have to work on," Johnson Sirleaf said as the presidents prepared to leave Gambia.

Regional leaders will discuss the crisis at an ECOWAS summit in Nigeria on Saturday, she said, adding Jammeh had given her assurances that peace and stability would be preserved.

But in an apparent sign that Jammeh was further entrenching his position, security forces seized control of the Independent Electoral Commission headquarters, which holds the original poll records.

"The military came to my office and said I am not to touch anything and told me to leave," said commission chairman Alieu Momarr Njai. "I am worried for my safety."

“STANDOFF”

Barrow, who received the unified backing of Gambia's opposition in the election, has vowed to reverse Jammeh's most capricious decisions, including a recently announced withdrawal from the International Criminal Court.

"I think everyone knows the issue here. There is a standoff between the government and our side," Barrow said after meeting the regional heads of state.

If negotiations fail, diplomats say, Gambia's neighbours might consider removing him by force. Marcel de Souza, head of the ECOWAS commission, told Radio France International on Monday that sending troops was "a conceivable solution".

Gambia's president officially has 60 days to hand over power, but his move to challenge the result at the Supreme Court – the legal channel for resolving poll disputes – could put the international community in a difficult position.

Rights groups say Jammeh exerts strong influence over the court, which has not held a session for a year and a half. Legal experts believe that at least four new judges would need to be hired to hear his petition.

With Gambian judges no longer willing to serve on the Supreme Court, foreign judges have increasingly been brought in to hear cases. The current chief justice is from Nigeria.

The role of Gambia's army will now be critical and the United States said on Monday some military officers had sided with Jammeh.

Army chief General Ousman Badjie had previously called Barrow to pledge his allegiance, the latter's spokeswoman said. But Badjie's support for the president-elect appeared far less certain on Tuesday.

"I support the commander in chief, whoever it may be. I support the commander in chief Jammeh," Badjie told Reuters.

Barrow, who has no official state security detail, said in an interview on Monday he was concerned for his own safety.

Gambia's President-elect, Adama Barrow Says Jammeh Must Step Down Immediately

Mr Jammeh initially accept the result but then reversed his decision and said he would annul the election. He questioned the validity of the count after the electoral commission changed some results, even though its head insists the outcome was not affected. The UN and the African Union have asked Mr Jammeh to accept defeat.

Gambian President Yahya Jammeh Declares He Will Not Step Down

HOW AFRICA December 21, 2016

Gambian President Yahya Jammeh said he would not step down and condemned mediation by West African regional bloc ECOWAS that aims to get him to leave power after he lost a Dec. 1 election to challenger Adama Barrow.

The comments on state television late Tuesday were a hardening of the veteran president’s position after days in which hopes mounted he could be persuaded to hand over power at the end of his mandate on Jan. 18, when Barrow is due to be inaugurated.

“I am not a coward. My right cannot be intimidated and violated. This is my position. Nobody can deprive me of that victory except the Almighty Allah,” Jammeh said.

“Already the ECOWAS meeting was a formality. Before they came, they had already said Jammeh must step down. I will not step down,” he said.

Jammeh initially accepted the results of an election whose outcome was seen across Africa as a moment of hope. He is accused by human rights groups of the detention, torture and killing of perceived opponents during his 22-year rule.

On Dec. 9, he reversed his position and said he would challenge in the country’s Supreme Court the results of an election he said was riddled with irregularities.

Gambia’s Election Commissioner Fled to Senegal After Threats from Jammeh

January 4, 2017

The head of Gambia’s electoral commission has fled to Senegal due to threats to his safety after declaring that President Yahya Jammeh lost last month’s election, a defeat the ruler has refused to accept. Alieu Momarr Njai left the country on Friday, family members said on Tuesday.

He had declared opposition leader Adama Barrow the winner of the Dec. 1 election, stunning many Gambians who were used to Jammeh who took power in a coup in 1994 and whose government gained a reputation for torturing and killing perceived opponents. Jammeh initially accepted defeat but a week later reversed that decision and said he would not relinquish power.

Njai maintained the validity of the election process but also said he was worried for his safety.

Gambian security forces seized control of the Independent Electoral Commission headquarters, which holds the original poll records, and told staff, including Njai, to leave. Jammeh’s decision to stay in power has been condemned internationally and started a countdown to potential crunch on Jan. 19, the day Barrow is due to be inaugurated.

West African forces from the ECOWAS regional bloc say they will attend the swearing-in. They have also put their forces on alert, raising the possibility of military intervention. Jammeh called that decision a “declaration of war”. Over the weekend, Gambian security agents closed three private radio stations, making it harder for the incoming government to communicate with its supporters.

Barrow’s victory was initially seen as an unexpected triumph for democracy in Gambia, which gained independence from Britain in 1965 but has since had only two presidents. (Reuters)

Gambia: Nigeria to Explore Peace Option, Army Chief Backs Jammeh

January 5, 2017

Nigeria would work towards a peaceful resolution of the political crisis in The Gambia, Foreign Affairs Minister, Geofrey Onyeama, has said. But the Army Chief, Gen Ousman Badjie, said Gambia Armed Forces have pledged loyalty to outgoing President Yahya Jammeh.

In a letter to the pro-government newspaper, Gen Ousman Badjie pledged the “unflinching loyalty and support of the Gambia Armed Forces” to Mr Jammeh. Gen Badjie’s intervention follows the threat of military action by the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) if Mr Jammeh refuses to leave office on 19 January.

President Jammeh has said any such intervention would constitute an act of war.

Onyeama told the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) in Abuja that Gambian President Yahya Jammeh would listen to the voice of his people to resolve the political impasse in his country. Gambian leader had accused West African regional body, ECOWAS, of declaring war against his country, when he was asked to step down for a democratically elected president Jammeh, who accused ECOWAS of putting forces on alert in case he refused to step down, has vowed to stay in power despite losing a Dec. 1, 2016 election to rival Adama Barrow.

He also promised to defend Gambia against any outside aggression, in a New Year speech broadcast on state TV.

The veteran leader initially conceded defeat in the vote, then changed his mind days later – raising fears that regional powers might have to intervene to oust him. Onyeama, in spite of The Gambian leader's stance, expressed the belief that Jammeh would honour the call of the ECOWAS leaders to bow out of office at the end of his mandate on Jan. 19. “We would like to believe that he would listen to the voice of his peers in the sub-region ECOWAS.

“And that he will also listen to the voice of his people, but above all he will follow the democratic path. So we will do everything possible to bring that about. “Essentially, we want a peaceful resolution to the issue’’ and explained that conflict could draw back development in country. “So we would do everything possible to help Gambia have a peaceful resolution to this political crisis,” the minister said.

President Muhammadu Buhari, who is heading a mediation committee on The Gambia political impasse, had led other West African leaders to meet with Jammeh and Barrow on the issue. Other leaders in the ECOWAS delegation were Presidents Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf of Liberia, Ernest Koroma of Sierra Leone, and John Mahama of Ghana.

The leaders appealed to Jammeh to leave office and also reportedly sought a ‘honourable exit’ for him. The exit would ensure that he is not tried for various human rights crimes he is alleged to have committed while in office. Despite the visit, Jammeh remained defiant.

Marcel de Souza, the ECOWAS Commission President, said last week that the body had put standby forces on alert.

In his speech on New Year Day, Jammeh decried “the resolution of ECOWAS on the current situation to implement the results of December 1, 2016 presidential election by whatever means possible.” “It is in effect a declaration of war and an insult to our constitution. “Let me make it very clear that we are ready to defend this country against any aggression,” he said. Leave Gambia Now, US Warns Citizens, Cites Jan. 10 Supreme Court Hearing as Flashpoint for Violence

January 8, 2017

The United States has waned its citizens against visiting the tourist destination of Gambia while urging those already in Gambia to leave. It told citizens to consider leaving the country, citing the risk of unrest as President Yahya Jammeh digs in despite losing an election.

“The US Department of State warns US citizens against travel to The Gambia because of the potential for civil unrest and violence in the near future,” the statement said. It said the supreme court hearing on Jan. 10 of Jammeh's challenge to the result that elected his rival Adama Barrow was a potential flashpoint for violence. "US citizens should consider departing on commercial flights and other transportation," the statement said. Recall that Jammeh who lost election in 2016 and conceded defeat made a swift U-turn to question the results of the election.

He had since refused to relinquish power inspite of international pressure from ECOWAS and other international bodies and countries. Jammeh insists that he will hold on to power and resist and international interference from ECOWAS which had put its forces on red alert for any evetuality.

In his speech, Jammeh decried "the resolution of ECOWAS on the current situation to implement the results of Dec 1, 2016 presidential election by whatever means possible". "It is in effect a declaration of war and an insult to our constitution.

"Let me make it very clear that we are ready to defend this country against any aggression. "My government will never opt for such confrontation but defending our sovereignty is a sacred duty for all patriotic Gambians," he said.

Meanwhile Gambia's Electoral Commission Chairman has fled the country because he received threats after declaring President Yahya Jammeh the loser of a Dec. 1 election. According a report, it is not known where Alieu Momar Njai might have fled to.

In another worrisome development, Gambia's Army Chief, General Ousman Badjie, has reaffirmed his loyalty to embattled President Yahya Jammeh, as the deadline given by the West African regional bloc, ECOWAS gets closer.

"May I please seize this opportunity to renew to your Excellency the assurance of the unflinching loyalty and support of the Gambia Armed Forces," General Badjie wrote in a letter to Jammeh published in a pro-government newspaper.

Gambia's defeated president finally agrees to step down

By Kevin Sieff January 21, 2017

NAIROBI — More than 22 years after taking power and a month after a shocking election defeat, Gambia's president agreed to step down Saturday morning.

Yahya Jammeh announced on state television in the tiny West African country he had ruled since taking power in a 1994 coup that he would "relinquish the mantle of this great nation."

The announcement did not come readily from one of the world's most tempestuous leaders, who was defeated last month by Adama Barrow, a little-known former real estate agent.

For weeks, Jammeh appeared unwilling to step down, even as several African leaders pleaded with him during visits to Gambia's capital, Banjul. Barrow fled to neighboring Senegal for his safety. He was inaugurated in a small ceremony there Thursday.

But as a bloc of West African nations massed 7,000 troops to the north and south of Gambia, threatening to enter and oust Jammeh by force if he did not leave willingly, the longtime leader finally announced his departure. As of Saturday evening, he remained in Banjul, but Barrow said Jammeh would be leaving shortly for Guinea.

It was a crucial moment for Gambia and the regional coalition that had succeeded in getting Jammeh to step down. While many African leaders have recently sought ways to extend their terms, often by amending their countries' constitutions, the Economic Community of West African States, known as ECOWAS, offered an example of how to enforce the electoral processes of its members.

But the decision to remove Jammeh was also a testament to his unpopularity in the region. He had long made bizarre declarations, touting his ability to cure AIDS with local herbs, and threatening to personally slit the throats of all gay men living in his country. He also did little to engage neighboring leaders diplomatically.

The "consensus on his removal stems from the fact that Jammeh's been a bad neighbor for a long time, and his fellow heads of state are more than happy to see him go," said Gregory Mann, a professor at Columbia University specializing in West African history.

Senegalese President Macky Sall has for years accused Jammeh of offering a haven to members of a small separatist movement fighting for the independence of northern Senegal's Casamance region.

As Barrow prepared to assume power, many Gambians wondered whether he would try to prosecute his predecessor, who has been accused of human rights abuses by international and local civil society organizations.

In a 2016 report, Human Rights Watch said Jammeh's government "frequently committed serious human rights violations including arbitrary detention, enforced disappearance, and torture against those who voiced opposition to the government."

Jammeh has previously denied such accusations. But during the negotiations that led to his stepping down, he asked for amnesty from any crimes he might have committed during his rule, according to Marcel Alain de Souza, chairman of ECOWAS. That request was rejected.

On Saturday, Barrow told the Associated Press that he could not rule out the possibility that Jammeh could face trial in the International Criminal Court.

"We aren't talking about prosecution here. We are talking about getting a truth and reconciliation commission," Barrow told the news agency. "Before you can act, you have to get the truth, to get the facts together."

Jammeh announced last year that Gambia would leave the international court, which his administration mocked as the "international Caucasian court." But that decision wouldn't take effect until later this year, and Barrow has said that he opposes the withdrawal.

Barrow will find himself under significant pressure to reorient Gambia's fledgling judicial system and a poorly performing economy that led many citizens to seek employment abroad. Last year, Gambia was the fifth-largest source of refugees in all of Africa, according to the International Organization for Migration, despite having one of the continent's smallest populations.

Barrow will also have an opportunity to repair relations with the West African nations that Jammeh had alienated in recent years.

"Most crucially, it ought to mean much better relations with Senegal," Mann said.

Gambia is entirely surrounded by Senegal, except for its Atlantic coastline. As they waited for Jammeh to depart the state house, Gambians were left to wonder about the details of the deal that led to his concession. Where would he go? Would he try to insulate himself from prosecution?

One of the negotiators offered a few details.

"The accord sees the departure of Jammeh from Gambia for an African country with guarantees for his family, those close to him and himself. He can come back to the country as he pleases," Mauritanian President Mohamed Ould Abdel Aziz told his country's state news agency.

Gambia's defeated leader Yahya Jammeh leaves country

By CARLEY PETESCH The Associated Press
January 21, 2017–

Gambia Updates: BANJUL, Gambia — Gambia's defeated leader Yahya Jammeh announced early today that he has decided to relinquish power, after hours of last-ditch talks with regional leaders and the threat by a regional military force to make him leave. "I think it is not necessary that a single drop of blood be shed," Jammeh said in a brief statement on state television.

He did not give details on any deal that was struck, and it was not immediately clear when Adama Barrow, who beat Jammeh in last month's election, would return from neighboring Senegal to take power.

Late Friday, Barrow declared that "the rule of fear" in the tiny West African nation had ended. Shortly before Jammeh's address, Mauritanian President Mohamed Ould Abdel Aziz said a deal had been reached and that Jammeh would leave the country. He and Guinean President Alpha Conde had handled the talks.

A government official close to the situation said Jammeh would leave within three days. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not permitted to speak about the situation to the media. Jammeh had refused to accept his loss to Barrow, who was inaugurated Thursday at the Gambian Embassy in Senegal because of concerns for his safety.

Jammeh, who first seized power in a 1994 coup, had been holed up in his official residence in Banjul, and had become increasingly isolated as his security forces abandoned him and he dissolved his Cabinet.

Defense forces chief Ousmane Badjie said Friday that Gambia's security services now support Barrow and would not oppose the regional force that was ready to move against Jammeh if he refused to step down. "You cannot push us to war for an issue we can solve politically," Badjie said. "We don't see any reason to fight."

The force, including tanks, rolled into Gambia without facing any resistance, said Marcel Alain de Souza, chairman of the Economic Community of West African States regional bloc. At least 20 military vehicles were seen Friday at the border town of Karang.

The force is made up of troops from Senegal, Ghana, Nigeria, Togo and Mali, and they moved in after Barrow's inauguration and a unanimous vote by the U.N. Security Council to support the regional efforts. Fearing violence, about 45,000 people have fled Gambia for Senegal, according to the U.N. refugee agency.

Jammeh earlier had agreed to step down but demanded amnesty for any crimes he may have committed during his 22 years in power and wanted to stay in Gambia, in his home village of Kanilai, de Souza said Friday. Those demands were not acceptable to the regional bloc, he added.

Some of Gambia's diplomatic missions began switching their allegiance, while some African nations announced they no longer recognized Jammeh. "We embrace and support the new president Adama Barrow," said Almamy Kassama, an official at the Gambian mission to the African Union in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, in an email.

Banjul was peaceful. Senegalese radio station RFM reported 30 Gambian soldiers had crossed into Senegal to stand alongside the regional forces. Soldiers at checkpoints in Banjul appeared relaxed Friday, with one telling visitors, "Welcome to the smiling coast."

Late Friday, Barrow addressed displaced Gambians and urged them to return home and rebuild their lives. "I wish to congratulate all of you and welcome you to the new Gambia," he said.

Gambia's defeated president finally gave up power — and took luxury cars and millions of dollars with him

By Kevin Sieff January 23, 2017

NAIROBI — As the plane carrying Gambia's disgraced former president prepared to depart the small west African country on Saturday, onlookers caught a last glimpse of Yahya Jammeh's face through the window. He had been forced from the country that he ruled for more than two decades. But, bizarrely, Jammeh was smiling.

According to Gambian officials, he had one big reason to be happy. Before leaving the country, he had managed to steal millions of dollars from the government's coffers. He had loaded a cargo plane full of luxury cars and sent it abroad.

At a news conference Sunday, Mai Ahmad Fatty, a special adviser to the new president, Adama Barrow, told journalists that in a two-week period Jammeh had stolen $11.4 million.

“The Gambia is in financial distress. The coffers are virtually empty. That is a state of fact,” Fatty said, according to the Associated Press. “It has been confirmed by technicians in the Ministry of Finance and the Central Bank of the Gambia."

Later in the day, a spokesman for Barrow, Halifa Sannah, said at a news conference that "everything is intact," regarding the central bank, according to a report from Reuters. It was unclear whether Sannah was contradicting the earlier claim by Barrow or only asserting that Jammeh's theft did not extend to the bank.

Jammeh was known for his expensive habits, even as the country he ruled for more than 22 years was mired in poverty, with thousands of people taking the perilous route across the Mediterranean to Europe each year. He owned a fleet of Rolls Royces with his name embroidered on the headrests. A trust linked to the former president purchased a $3.5 million house in Potomac, Md., in 2012. His daughter attends a Manhattan private school that costs more than $40,000 a year.

When he lost an election in December, Jammeh refused to step down. Finally, after thousands of west African troops threatened to oust him by force, he agreed to leave Saturday on a plane accompanied by the president of Guinea. Although he was offered asylum in Morocco and Nigeria, it remains unclear where Jammeh plans to live.

Before leaving, Jammeh tried to negotiate amnesty for any crimes he might have committed during his decades in office. There has not been a thorough investigation into how Jammeh managed to accumulate such massive wealth, but Barrow has suggested that he might launch a "truth and reconciliation" committee into possible crimes.

Scandals involving the enormous wealth and lavish lifestyles of African leaders ruling some of the world's poorest countries are far from uncommon. But recently there has been a slew of particularly high-profile cases.

Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mangue, the son of the president of Equatorial Guinea, is on trial in France for embezzlement and money-laundering. His assets included a $30 million mansion in Malibu and 11 sports cars, among them several Ferraris and Bugattis.

Last month, Bloomberg reported that Joseph Kabila, the president of the Democratic Republic of Congo, was linked along with his siblings to more than 70 companies operating in the country, including some earning tens of millions of dollars annually.

Also last month, a scandal erupted in Zimbabwe when Grace Mugabe, the wife of president Robert Mugabe, became embroiled in a dispute over a $1.35 million diamond ring that she had purchased.

Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Hua Liu dans Quora en anglais : C'est cet homme qui a déclaré pour la dernière fois qu'il s'attaquerait à la Chine.

En 2007, lors d'une rencontre entre le président gambien Yahya Jammeh et George W. Bush, en visite aux Etats-Unis, il a déclaré qu'une fois que la situation dans le détroit de Taïwan aura changé, la Gambie enverra des troupes en Chine pour attaquer la zone économique côtière chinoise, afin d'empêcher que la situation dans le détroit de Taïwan ne s'étende. Yahya Jammeh a affirmé que la Gambie n'a besoin d'envoyer qu'environ 1000 Marines pour contenir complètement l'action militaire de la Chine.

Et si je me souviens bien, la Chine ne l'a pas du tout ignorée.

Ensuite, il a dit que si les États-Unis ne lui donnaient pas d'aide, il attaquerait les États-Unis. Les États-Unis ont répondu "s'il vous plaît, ne soyez pas si naïfs".

Une commission vérité et réconciliation gambienne a déclaré dans un rapport publié vendredi que l'ancien président Yahya Jammeh était responsable d'une série de meurtres, de tortures et de viols au cours de ses 22 ans de règne . La Commission vérité, réconciliation et réparations (TRRC) indépendante a été créée lorsque Jammeh a quitté la Gambie pour s'exiler en Guinée équatoriale après avoir refusé d'accepter la défaite lors des élections de 2016.

Le rapport de la commission, qui fait suite à une vaste enquête de trois ans sur les abus de l'ère Jammeh basée sur les témoignages de centaines de témoins, a été remis au président Adama Barrow au début du mois mais n'a été rendu public que vendredi.

La commission a recommandé que les responsables des abus soient poursuivis. Ni Jammeh ni son porte-parole n'ont pu être joints pour commenter.

La commission a déclaré que Jammeh, qui est arrivé au pouvoir lors d'un coup d'État en 1994, et ses hommes de main, y compris une escouade personnelle connue sous le nom de Junglas, étaient responsables de 44 crimes spécifiques contre des journalistes, d'anciens soldats, des opposants politiques et des civils. Il s'agit notamment du meurtre du journaliste Deyda Hydara en 2004, de sept civils en 2000 et de 59 migrants ouest-africains en 2005. Il est également responsable du viol ou des abus sexuels de trois femmes, selon la commission. Dans son rapport, la commission a recommandé « de poursuivre Yahya Jammeh et ses co-auteurs dans un tribunal internationalisé dans un pays de la sous-région ouest-africaine ».

L'amnistie peut être accordée à ceux qui, au cours de l'enquête de la TRRC, ont avoué des actes répréhensibles et exprimé des remords. Une décision sur les demandes sera prise dans les six semaines.

Qui fabrique notre monnaie et pourquoi ?

Il y a quelques mois, une délégation gambienne en visite à la Banque centrale du Nigeria, a demandé si le dalasi gambien pouvait être imprimé chez son voisin ouest-africain. Le gouverneur de la banque centrale de Gambie, Buah Saidy, a déclaré que le pays était en manque de monnaie.

Le petit pays d'Afrique de l'Ouest a dû en effet, revoir sa monnaie après la défaite de l'ancien président, Yahya Jammeh, aux élections de 2016. Yaya Jammeh qui a régné pendant 22 ans, avait sa propre image sur les billets de banque gambiens.

Après sa chute, la Banque centrale gambienne a donc entrepris de détruire ces billets.

Aujourd'hui, les billets de banque dalasi représentent un pêcheur poussant sa pirogue vers la mer, un agriculteur s'occupant de sa rizière et quelques oiseaux indigènes colorés.

Un problème subsiste cependant : la Gambie n'imprime pas sa propre monnaie. Elle passe des commandes à des entreprises britanniques, ce qui entraîne souvent une pénurie d'argent liquide.

Une opération très sécurisée

Et la Gambie n'est pas le seul pays africain à faire imprimer sa monnaie à l’étranger.

Plus des deux tiers des 54 pays d'Afrique impriment leur monnaie ailleurs, principalement en Europe et en Amérique du Nord.

Parmi les principales entreprises sollicitées figurent le géant britannique de l'impression de billets de banque, De La Rue, la société suédoise Crane et l'entreprise allemande Giesecke+Devrient.

Il est peut-être surprenant que presque tous les pays africains importent leurs devises. Cette pratique pourrait même soulever des questions de souveraineté et de sécurité nationale.

La plupart des pays ne parlent pas de leur processus d'impression de la monnaie, probablement pour des raisons de sécurité. Les imprimeries sont encore moins transparentes.

Aucune des entreprises contactées par la DW n'a voulu répondre à nos questions.

L'Ethiopie, la Libye et l'Angola - ainsi que 14 autres pays - passent des commandes à De La Rue, estime Ilyes Zouari, président du Centre d'étude et de réflexion sur le monde francophone.

Six ou sept autres pays, dont le Soudan du sud, la Tanzanie et la Mauritanie, imprimeraient leurs monnaies en Allemagne, tandis que la plupart des pays africains francophones sont connus pour imprimer leur monnaie auprès de la banque centrale française et de l'imprimerie française Oberthur Fiduciaire.

On ne sait pas exactement combien coûte l'impression de monnaies africaines comme le dalasi. Par exemple, le dollar américain coûte entre 6 et 14 cents par billet pour être imprimé.

Il est donc probable que le coût d'impression pour plus de 40 monnaies africaines soit important.

En 2018, un responsable de la banque centrale du Ghana s'est plaint aux journalistes locaux que le pays dépense des sommes énormes pour ses commandes britanniques du cedi ghanéen.

Pourtant, les analystes affirment que le fait que les pays africains impriment une grande partie de leur monnaie à l'étranger n'est pas inhabituel.

De nombreux pays dans le monde le font. Par exemple, la Finlande et le Danemark, tout comme des centaines de banques centrales dans le monde, impriment leur monnaie à l'étranger car les entreprises ayant ce savoir-faire ne sont pas nombreuses.

Seule une poignée de pays, comme les Etats-Unis et l'Inde, produisent leur propre monnaie.

Mma Amara Ekeruche, de l'African Center for Economics Research, a expliqué à la DW que lorsque la monnaie d'un pays n'est pas très demandée - et n'est pas utilisée dans le monde entier comme le dollar américain ou la livre sterling - il est peu judicieux, d'un point de vue financier, de l'imprimer chez soi en raison du coût élevé que cela implique.

Les machines à imprimer la monnaie produisent généralement des millions de billets à la fois. Les pays à faible population, comme la Gambie ou le Somaliland, auraient plus d'argent que nécessaire s'ils imprimaient leurs propres billets.

"Si un pays imprime un billet de dix euros chez lui et voit qu'il peut l'imprimer pour environ huit euros à l'étranger, pourquoi engagerait-il des frais supplémentaires pour le faire ? Cela n'aurait aucun sens", explique l'économiste.

Certains pays, comme le Liberia, ne tentent pas d'imprimer leur propre monnaie parce qu'ils ne disposent même pas d'une presse à imprimer, dont l'installation est coûteuse et qui nécessite des capacités techniques particulières.

Seule une poignée de pays africains, comme le Nigeria, le Maroc et le Kenya, disposent de ressources suffisantes pour imprimer leur propre monnaie ou frapper leurs propres pièces, et même eux complètent parfois leur production par des importations.

Les risques d'une opération

Autre préoccupation, selon l'économiste Mma Amara Ekeruche, certains pays qui tentent de produire leurs propres monnaies pourraient être victimes de fonctionnaires corrompus ou de pirates informatiques qui pourraient tenter de les falsifier ou de les manipuler. Dans de nombreux cas, la production à l'étranger est plus sûre.

Mais avec l'importation, il peut y avoir aussi des défis sécuritaires. Des conteneurs de dollars libériens expédiés de Suède ont ainsi disparu en 2018 dans le port de Lagos.

Par ailleurs, l’entreprise britannique De La Rue, fondée en 1821, produit des billets pour les banques centrales du monde entier.

Elle dispose donc des outils et de l'expérience nécessaires pour se tenir au courant des innovations en matière de monnaie, comme l’usage de polymères qui est considéré comme plus propre, plus durable et plus sûr que le papier, le matériau plastique permettant d'inclure des caractéristiques plus sophistiquées pour se protéger des contrefaçons.

Mais l'impression à l'étranger n'est pas sans inconvénients. Certains pays pourraient se retrouver frappés par des sanctions économiques. En 2011, par exemple, le Royaume-Uni a retenu les commandes de dinars libyens de De La Rue, après que l'ONU a sanctionné le dirigeant défunt, Mouammar Kadhafi.

Manque de confiance

L'impression de billets de banque en Afrique augmenterait les bénéfices sur le continent et, du moins en théorie, les pays africains pourraient choisir ceux qui ont des capacités d'impression car il y a probablement des capacités inutilisées.

Mais ce n'est pas le cas dans la pratique. "Cela est dû à des problèmes de confiance entre les pays", estime Emmanuel Asie du-Mante, ancien directeur adjoint de la banque centrale du Ghana.

Et il y a le cas compliqué de l'Afrique francophone - les pays utilisant le franc CFA d'Afrique centrale et le franc CFA d'Afrique de l'Ouest. Ces monnaies sont étroitement liées à l'euro et sont produites en France.

Pourtant, il y a un espoir de changement à l'horizon. Avec la banque centrale de Gambie, les responsables proposent un éventuel partenariat avec le Nigeria, les pays pourraient commencer à se tourner vers l'intérieur pour leurs commandes de devises. Si cela se produit à grande échelle, cela pourrait réduire considérablement les coûts d'expédition.

The banking sector survives mainly by servicing government demand for domestic debt, which increased 26% year-on-year to stand at D9.7bn ($324m) in June 2011. In 2010, the government launched a programme to increase productivity in agriculture, which employs 70% of the population. Spending on the sector was doubled to 6% of the 2011 budget, but key questions over land ownership and security of tenure remains.

CPJ urges Gambia authorities to prioritize legal reforms, accou against the press

Gambian President Adama Barrow speaks to supporters after winning the presidential election in Banjul, Gambia, on December 5, 2021. Abuja, June 29, 2022 – Gambian authorities should adopt the reforms recommended by the country's Truth, Reconciliation, and Reparations Commission (TRRC)—including ensuring journalists are not prosecuted for sedition—work to swiftly hold former President Yahya Jammeh and members of his "Junglers" death squad to account for their crimes against journalists, and end the culture of impunity in the country, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Wednesday.

On May 25, Gambian authorities released a white paper on the findings and recommendations of the TRRC, which was established by the government of current President Adama Barrow in December 2017. The commission's main objectives were "to create an impartial record of violations and abuses of human rights" that occurred during Jammeh's 22-year administration, promote healing, and "address impunity" to "prevent the repetition of the violations."

After being voted out of office in 2017, Jammeh fled to Equatorial Guinea and claimed political asylum, and is protected by authorities there, according to Human Rights Watch.

Authorities accepted the TRRC's recommendations that Jammeh should be investigated and prosecuted for the murder of journalist Deyda Hydara, the disappearance of journalist Ebrima Manneh, the arson attacks on Radio 1 FM and The Independent newspaper, and the attacks on journalists working with the Freedom Newspaper news website.

Manneh, a reporter for the Gambia-based newspaper Daily Observer, went missing on July 7, 2006, after he was arrested by National Intelligence Agency officers wearing plain clothes, as CPJ documented. His body was found by police officers 11 years later.

Gambian authorities declined TRRC's recommendation to decriminalize sedition, writing that the law is a "necessary part of a nation's security" if it is not "misused or abused by governments to curtail media freedom," according to the paper, which added that the government would take steps to provide a "clearer definition" of sedition. In 2018, a ruling by the Court of Justice of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) directed Gambia to "repeal and /or amend" its law on sedition as well as other laws that it found violated the rights of journalists. CPJ and other rights groups submitted an amici curiae brief in that case and previously documented the prosecution of journalists under Gambia's sedition law.

"The decision by Gambian authorities to accept most of the recommendations from the Truth, Reconciliation and Reparations Commission is commendable but also requires immediate action to halt the decades of impunity for the killings of journalists Deyda Hydara and Ebrima Manneh, and other crimes against the press," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, from Johannesburg. "The administration of President Adama Barrow should recognize how Gambia's sedition law threatens freedom of the press and prioritize legal reforms that ensure journalism is not criminalized."

The Gambian government accepted TRRC's recommendations to reform the criminal code and other laws that criminalize the press, according to the paper and Fatau M. Jawo, a lawyer and human rights advocate who spoke to CPJ by phone. Most notably is the 2013 Information and Communications (Amendment) Act, which imposes a 15-year jail term and a 3 million Dalasis (US$56,000) fine on those convicted of spreading false news or derogatory statements against government officials, as CPJ has documented.

The paper also acknowledges the "great lengths" that Jammeh went to in order to attack the media and formally recognized several incidents, including the murder, "torture," and arbitrary arrests and detention of journalists, most of which CPJ has documented:

- The murder of Deyda Hydara, the managing editor and co-owner of the independent newspaper The Point and a correspondent for AFP and Reporters Without Borders.
- A potential role in the disappearance of Ebrima Manneh
- The closure of privately owned Citizen FM radio
- The closure of Senegalese private radio station Sud FM
- The closure of the independent Taranga FM radio station
- Disruption of internet access
- Deportation of at least seven foreign journalists and "making conditions for foreign journalists [so] untenable that many left the country"
- The arrest of seven journalists and press leaders: Pap Saine, Alieu Badara Sowe, Bruce Asemota, Emil Tourey, Sarata Jabbi, Pa Modou Faal, and Sam Sarr.

Bafou Jeng, a senior counsel at the Gambian ministry of justice, declined CPJ's request for comment and recommended that questions be directed to Kimbeng Tah, the ministry official responsible for handling TRRC activities. CPJ emailed Tah but did not receive a response.

A Deeper Look Into The Life Of Mansa Musa – The Richest Human Being Who Ever Lived

AFRICANGLOBE – When we think of the wealthiest people in the world, we most often think of the Waltons (of Wal-Mart fame), Warren Buffett, or Bill Gates. However, if you go a bit further back in history, you'll discover that the wealth of the kings, queens, and rulers of yesteryear trumps the bank accounts of most modern day millionaires and even billionaires by a mile.

In fact, during his time, one man controlled more wealth than Bill Gates, Warren Buffett, and the most wealthy member of the Walton family, Sam Walton, combined. That man was Mansa Musa I. With an adjusted net worth of approximately $400 billion, Musa is without a doubt the richest man to have ever lived. So who was he? And why haven't you heard more about him?

Emperor Mansa Musa I, also known as Musa of Mali (Mansa actually means "King of Kings"), was born in Mali, sometime in the 1280s. Mansa Musa came to be king in a rather roundabout way. His grandfather, Abu Bakr, was the brother of Sundiata Keita, the man who founded the Malian Empire. Neither Abu Bakr or his son, Faga Laye, ever took the throne, and Mansa Musa was appointed deputy ruler if the king ever went on an extended trip or pilgrimage to Mecca. He was appointed deputy under Abubakari II, who had visions of exploring the far reaches of the Atlantic Ocean.

Abubakari sent 200 boats out into the sea, ordering they not return from their voyage until they had reached the far side of the Atlantic, or until they ran out of food and water, whichever came first. Quite a long time later, one boat returned, with tales of a great whirlpool that had drowned everyone. Abubakari didn't believe the captain's story, so he took 2,000 boats, and appointing himself head of the expedition, set off to find the truth. As the King's deputy, Mansa Musa became ruler in his absence. Abubakari II never returned, and Mansa Musa eventually inherited the throne.

Much of Musa's wealth came from the production of mosques, madrsasas, and universities, many of which are still standing today. The University of Sankore was built during his time, and is still in existence. The quality of life in urban centers, such as Timbuktu, was vastly superior to other parts of the world at the time, largely due to the availability of work, and Musa's control of the gold and salt trades.

When traveling throughout his kingdom on the way to Mecca in 1324, his procession included 60,000 people. Along the way, 12,000 of his followers carried four-pound gold bars, which he gave away to the poor everywhere he went. Unfortunately, this devalued the gold, especially in Cairo, Medina, and Mecca, and Musa subsequently borrowed as much gold as he could from money lenders in Cairo, even though it was loaned at a high interest rate.

As a result, he now controlled the price of gold for all of the Mediterranean. He also controlled more than half of the world's salt supply. Between his gold and his salt, traders from as far away as Europe made annual trips to his kingdom from Venice, Granada, and Genoa, and this gave him the power to set prices as high he wanted.

In 1330, Mossi invaded Timbuktu, which Musa had annexed in 1325. He quickly recaptured the city, fortifying its boundary with a fort and a standing army. As a major seat for trade in the region, control of Timbuktu meant control of the flow of money. During his reign, Mali grew to have more than 400 bustling cities. Muslim scholars from abroad flocked to the University of Sankore to study, and Musa controlled everything from his massive palace in Timbuktu, which was constructed by architects imported from Andalusia in Spain. He also created one large system of government for most of the Western Sudan. Under his rule, the region was said to exist in "complete and general safety."

Records of how Musa died vary greatly, so it's unclear whether he died soon after returning from his pilgrimage to Mecca, or whether he continued to live for another ten years. His son, Mansa Maghan, became ruler in 1332, and his older brother, Mansa Suleyman, became ruler in 1336. Mansa Musa's period of rule is recorded as 25 years, but whether his reign ended in 1332 because of his death, or his resignation, remains unclear. What is clear, is that for over two decades, one man almost single-handedly controlled a massively wealthy empire with multiple major trading ports.

Today, there aren't any billionaires who could command 12,000 people to carry four-pound bricks of gold on an incredibly long walk. Or even billionaires who could affect the price of gold by simply being in charge. Mansa Musa was not only the wealthiest man to ever live, but arguably the most powerful. This may be a good part of the reason his story is skimmed over in most textbooks. That aside, Mansa Musa is a clear, and perhaps rare example, of a very wealthy individual who held at least an equal amount of power to go along with it. (By: Paula Wilson)

Profiles: Queen Mother Nana Yaa Asantewaa of West Africa's Ashanti Empire

By Editorial Staff - October 31, 2012

Nana Yaa Asantewaa (c.1840 – 17 October 1921) was appointed queen mother of Ejisu of the Ashanti Empire—now part of modern-day Ghana— by her brother Nana Akwasi Afrane Okpese, the Ejisuhene "ruler of Ejisu". In 1900 she led the Ashanti rebellion known as the War of the Golden Stool against British colonialism.

Prelude to Rebellion

During her brother's reign, Yaa Asantewaa saw the Asante Confederacy go through a series of events that threatened its future, including civil war from 1883 to 1888. When her brother died in 1894, Yaa Asantewaa used her right as Queen Mother to nominate her own grandson as Ejisuhene.

When the British exiled him in the Seychelles in 1896, along with the King of Asante Prempeh I and other members of the Asante government, Nana Yaa Asantewaa became regent of the Ejisu-Juaben District.
After the deportation of Prempeh I, the savage British governor-general of the Gold Coast, Frederick Hodgson, demanded the Golden Stool, the symbol of the Asante nation.

This request led to a secret meeting of the remaining members of the Asante government at Kumasi, to discuss how to secure the return of their king. There was a disagreement among those present on how to go about this. Yaa Asantewaa, who was present at this meeting, stood and addressed the members of the council with these now-famous words:

Now I see that some of you fear to go forward to fight for our king. If it was in the brave days of Osei Tutu, Okomfo Anokye, and Opoku Ware, chiefs would not sit down to see their king to be taken away without firing a shot.

No European could have dared speak to chiefs of Asante in the way the governor spoke to you this morning. Is it true that the bravery of Asante is no more? I cannot believe it. It cannot be! I must say this: if you, the men of Asante, will not go forward, then we will. We, the women, will. I shall call upon my fellow women. We will fight! We will fight till the last of us falls in the battlefields.

With this, she took on leadership of the Asante Uprising of 1900, gaining the support of some of the other Asante nobility.

Place in history and cultural legacy

Yaa Asantewaa remains a much-loved figure in Asante history and the history of Ghana as a whole for the courage she showed in confronting injustice during the colonialism of the British. She is immortalized in the song.

Koo koo hin koYaa Asantewaa ee!

Obaa basia

Ogyina apremo ano ee!

To highlight the importance of encouraging more female leaders in Ghanaian society, the Yaa Asantewaa Girls’ Secondary School was established at Kumasi in 1960 with funds from the Ghana Educational Trust.

In 2000, week-long centenary celebrations were held in Ghana to acknowledge Yaa Asantewaa’s accomplishments. As part of these celebrations, a museum was dedicated to her at Kwaso in the Ejisu-Juaben District on 3 August 2000.

Unfortunately, a fire there on 23 July 2004, destroyed several historical items, including her sandals and battle dress (batakarikese) seen in the photograph above. The current Queen-mother of Ejisu is Yaa Asantewaa II. A Yaa Asantewaa festival is also held annually in Ejisu.

A television documentary by Ivor Agyeman-Duah entitled Yaa Asantewaa – The Exile of King Prempeh and the Heroism of An African Queen was premiered in Ghana in 2001.

A stage show written by Margaret Busby, Yaa Asantewaa: Warrior Queen, featuring master drummer Kofi Ghanaba and with a pan-African cast, toured the UK and Ghana in 2001. A radio drama by the same author was also serialized in 2003.

Modern Ghana was created from the British Gold Coast Colony, established in 1874, and the UK-administered Trusteeship Territory of Togoland, incorporated in 1956 following a plebiscite.

Part of the Gold Coast Trans-Volta Togoland - had once been part of Togo which was then a German colony. But after the defeat of Germany in WW I, Togo was divided into two by the League of Nations (LoN), which that was later to be replaced by the United Nations Organisation (UNO). One part of Togo given to France to administer as a separate colony under a League of Nations (LoN) 'mandate', while the other part was given to Britain to administer under the same 'mandate' conditions.

In the mid-1950s Agitation for independence grew strongly after the Second World War.

From the early 1950s, self-government was introduced with elections in 1951, 1954 and 1956 to the legislative assembly. Kwame Nkrumah’a party, the CPP, won all 3 elections and led the country to independence, as Ghana, in March 1957. Ghana was the first sub-Saharan country in colonial Africa to gain its independence. Nkrumah was the first Prime Minister, and in 1960 became President with the change of Ghana’s status to a Republic within the Commonwealth. Kwame Nkrumah turned Ghana into a 1-party state under African Socialism. A celebrated pan-Africanist, he also developed close ties with the Soviet Bloc. He was overthrown in Ghana’s first military coup in 1966. For the next 26 years until 1992, Ghana had only short periods of civilian rule (1969-71,1979-81) interrupted by longer periods of military rule (1966-69,1972-79, 1981-1991). During the last period of military rule Flt Lt Jerry Rawlings brought in populist policies, and Cuban-style revolutionary institutions, including the CDRs, Committees for the Defence of the Revolution, and Peoples Defence Committees. However, under pressure internally and from the international community, in 1991 Rawlings conceded a return to constitutional rule and multi-party politics. A new constitution was approved in a referendum in April 1992.

Liberation struggle

When: 1949

Who: Led by Kwame Nkrumah and colleagues

Why: Colonial oppression

Outcome: Independence

Ghana is known to be the first UK colony in Africa to attain it's independence in 6th March, 1957.

Headship since independence; Head of instrumental self-administration and later founder president of Ghana.

Dr. Osagyefo Kwame N'krumah became founder-president for the "Republic of Ghana" led the first sub-Saharan African country to gain independence from colonialism in February 24, 1960. Nkrumaism sought to transform Ghana into a modern socialist state through state-driven industrialization. He built the Akosombo Hydro-power Dam on the Volta River, at the time considered the “largest single investment in the economic development plans of Ghana”. He promoted the cult of personality and was hailed as the “Messiah”, “Father of Ghana and Pan Africanism” and “Father of African nationalism”. He crushed the unions and the opposition, jailed the judges, created a one-man, one-party state and tried to make himself “President for life”. He left a bitter legacy of one-man, one-party rule which to this day serves as a model of dictatorship for all of Africa. Nkrumah died in Romania under medical treatment.

Kwame Nkrumah was deposed in a military coup led by Lt. General Joseph Ankrah, he who was Chairman of the National Liberation Council (NLC) that replaced the government of Dr. Kwame N'krumah in February, 1966.

Dr. Kwame N'krumah was overthrown in a CIA-inspired military coup in February, 1966. Dr. During his tenure embarked on programmes to accelerate Ghana's economic development through the provision of free and compulsory universal education, primary healthcare, infrastructure development, rapid industrialisation, among others.
On the 17th April, 1967 there had been an abortive counter-coup led by Lieutenant SB Arthur which was known as "the Guitar-Boy Coup". When Lt. Arthur appears into Burma military barrack, he promptly arrested by enlisted officers and put him in a guardroom, then later he was court-martialled and executed.

There were series of coups in Ghana until the entry of Flight Lt. Jerry Rawlings who was then able to stage a coup for a second time and overthrew the elected government of Dr. Hilla Limann in 1981.

A Republic in West Africa

Formerly known as the "Gold coast" meaning for "Land of Gold". There was a powerful Empire b/n 4th and the 13th century, it was a major source of Gold and manpower (slavery) for Europeans after 1471. Ghana was the first place in sub-Saharan Africa where Europeans arrived to trade - first in gold, later in slaves.

A British Crowncolony of the Gold coast established in 1874 and a British protectorate were established in 1901, then merged with British Togoland trust territory in 1957 as the independent state of Ghana.

It became "A republic within the commonwealth of nations", as Queen Elizabeth II, colonial head.

A British Crowncolony of the Gold coast established in 1874 and a British protectorate were established in 1901, Ghana was formed from a merger of former colony of Gold Coast and Togoland trust territory in 1957 as the independent state of Ghana.

The Gold Coast is known to become the first UK colony in Africa and was also the first black African nation in the region to achieve independence from a colonial power, in this instance Britain in 6th March, 1957.

Upon his return back to Ghana (Gold Coast then) in 1947, Dr. Kwame N'krumah first became secretary general of the United Gold Coast Convention party, established by Dr. J. B. Danquah, whom he saw as enemy when he was in power and threw him to prison. He was the leader of Ghana and it's predecessor state the Gold coast commencing from 1952 and was to become founder-president for the Republic of Ghana in February 24, 1960. Dr. Kwame N'krumah made the famous declaration that Ghana’s independence was meaningless unless the whole of Africa was liberated from colonial rule, then he went into action almost immediately. In followed years, he called the liberation movements to Ghana to discuss the common strategy for the liberation of the continent from colonialism in preparation for the African Peoples Conference (APC), which that conference lit the liberation torch throughout colonial Africa.
Dr. Kwame N’krumah was one of the most respected leaders in Africa, he has been an exemplary leader to both the old and the young, and also perhaps best known politically for his strong commitment, dedication, patriotism and promotion of Pan-Africanism, he read, lectured, wrote number of books & speeches. The idea of Pan-African was conceived by Dr. Kwame N'krumah and he, without doubt was the prime mover of the movement.

Nevertheless, contributions of his collaborators to make such dream come true were undeniables. Theories were formed, meetings were conducted in foreign lands and in situations that were very difficult to manage. When one speaks of African unity, obviously he or she cannot separate it from its origin in the Pan-Africanist Movement of the early 20th century, mostly associated with Dr. W.E.B. Du Bois. In Africa, Pan Africanism was given root by Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, the first President of Ghana, who in his student days in the United States and the United Kingdom was an active participant in the struggles and activist movements of those days. Kwame Nkrumah quoted as saying, “The forces that unite us are intrinsic and greater than the superimposed influences that keep us apart” to be optimistic that the slow pace for strong unity will pick up speed. Before that, however, he fully engaged himself in the anti-colonial struggle to help attain Ghana’s independence from Britain—more appropriately, home rule at the time. Nkrumah thought he would do better in realizing the goal of independence and his life long ambition of African unity, more appropriately, Pan Africanism, which he not only practiced as politics but also lived with as profound personal conviction. Therefore, in 1949 he established his own party, the Convention People’s Party (CPP). With that as a mass galvanizing force, he led a series of strikes and boycotts and eventually forced independence from the British in 1957.

Dr. Kwame N'krumah as the initiator of the pan-Africanist movement in Africa, he even endeavored to realize his dream of African Unity, making Ghana’s external policy an instrument toward that and by experimenting sort of loose union he had tried with Guinea in 1959 and Mali in 1960. But equally difficult was to bring Africa together that had been divided linguistically by the colonial masters after attaining independence and before the May, 1963 Summit. To his surprise and dismay, not long after Nkrumah realized that Africa was getting increasingly divided regionally and in other ideological groupings.

Dr. Kwame N'krumah writes in his classic work "Africa must unite" he states "the three basic aims of Ghana's foreign policy are, African independence, African Unity, and the maintenance of world peace through a policy of positive neutrality and non-allignment. The first two aims, according to him were inextricably bound together, since untill Africa was free from foreign domination, the continent could not be completely united. Yet, to him, united action was essential if the Africans were to achieve full independence. That was Nkrumah the visionary.

Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana had an exaggerated view of the communal system. He said, “Africa’s traditional communalism is the natural ancestor of modern socialism. The traditional face of Africa was a socialist-egalitarian view of man and society; there was no sectional interest but only the welfare of the people. Colonialism changed all this.” According to Nkrumah, “colonialism infected the African society with capitalist ideals through its economic, political and social activities." He believed that "the capitalist system is guided by the profit motive; and as a result, it is an exploitative system."

Nkrumah, failed to examine whether African communal values are compatible with modernization imperatives. For instance, emphasizing group interest, African communalism discourages individual initiative and wealth creation. Nkrumah viewed profit as a form of exploitation. But market economists outline profit just as a kind of income, earned by the capitalist for taking risk and investing in newer production techniques to increase society's total output.

In fact, the more he tried on unity the more it became nearly impossible for him to see light of his nirvana in African Unity on account of the fact that Africa the division was getting deeper. At the same time, with economic factors and the clash of ambitions and intrigues within Ghana itself worked against him; his popularity sank at home. Despite being rich in mineral resources, and endowed with a good education system and efficient civil service, Ghana fell victim to corruption and mismanagement soon after independence in 1957.

Mr. Kwame Nkrumah was the leader of Ghana and it's predecessor state the Gold coast commencing from 1952 to January, 1966, his sincere support for the establishment of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), who he was actively engaged in it's formation deposed while he was on a state visit to North Vietnam and China had founded the ruling-Convention Peoples Party (CPP) in early 1949 and it went on to dominate Ghana's politics until the end of his government. Ghana's first president and pan-African hero, Kwame Nkrumah, was deposed in a coup, heralding years of mostly-military rule: is one of the most respected leaders in Africa, he has been an exemplary leader to both the old and the young, and also perhaps best known politically for his strong commitment, dedication, patriotism and promotion of Pan-Africanism, he read, lectured, wrote number of books & speeches. He lived in exile as guest of President Ahmed Sekou-Toure in Conakry, Guinea, after the Ghana military overthrown him. He has made a remarkable achievements during his tenure as president, education was revolutionised and schools, colleges and vocational institutions shot-up, Ghana was only second in the world in per-capita expenditure on education. The infrastructure of economic development, transportation, communication facilities, hospitals, rural health centres, and the training of personnel in various fields, lifted Ghana to the heights. People had a unique sense of belonging and participation in the affairs of the country. Education expanded the empire of human reason and helped the Convention People's Party (CPP) to broaden political orientation, those were investments which will continue to yield positive dividends among Ghanaians.

The mono-crop (Cocoa) remained Ghana's life-blood, it provides over 70% Ghana's foreign exchange earnings. The result was that in 1965, the last year of N'krumah and the Convention People's Party (CPP) administration, the production of Cocoa reached at about 494, 000 tons, it's more than double that existing when the CPP government took over from the colonial administration. So that, with massive industralisation under Kwame N'krumah, and the Accra Tema-harbour as the gate-way of Ghana to further industralisation, the stage was set for an economic take-off. The whole criticism against his administration reduced to a figment of imagination in order to tarnish the reputation of Kwame N'krumah, but that hurt Ghana more, and the rehabilitation of his image which is taking place in present Ghana today is the only option. For Kwame N'krumah, Ghana was a vortex, and the African Unity was his diamond of hope, a means to defuse the abject poverty which has rendered Africa virtually impotent. To Kwame N'krumah, the answer of pan-Africanism a mission of hope, an aspect of his concept of unity was that pan-Africa would be a sort of mutual insurance, economically speaking, for the different regions of Africa, they would practically be guaranteed against total collapse, and that insurance would enable them to rationalise their agriculture.

The fight to bring about the unification of the continent, his firm stand on the Congo crisis, and on Rhodesia, and the cry for the establishment of an African High command, were a natural sequence of his African policy.
Among the unique institutional changes which he made were, the African affairs centre and the Bureau of African affairs, which gave guidance to almost all the leaders of the African freedom fighters, his battle cry was "Africa must unite" but that came under fire. Criticism of pan-Africanism was based on fears, imagined fantasised or fabricated, that the African unity would put unlimited power in the hands of one man, and the assumption was that such a person would be operating in some underground monastic cellar impenetrable by light.

African Liberation Day was founded in 1958 when Kwame Nkrumah convened the First Conference of Independent States. He gave one of the greatest speeches of his life on 24th May 1963 when 32 independent African countries met in Addis Ababa to find ways to unite the continent.

Quotes from Kwame Nkrumah

By Arthur Chatora on September 21, 2015

Today, 106 years ago, an African theoretitan was born. The first President and Prime Minister of Ghana, Kwame Nkrumah, who led Ghana to independence

A Pan-Africanism proponent, Nkrumah is undoubtedly one of Africa's foremost freedom fighters, nationalist, writer and thinker who was to influence a generation of Pan-African nationalists and freedom fighters. Also a founding member of the Organisation of African Unity.

We pay homage to him by remembering the words he left us with in his quest to see the liberation, unification and development of Africa.

1. "I am not African because I was born in Africa but because Africa was born in me".
2. "We face neither East nor West; We face forward". – Conference speech delivered in Accra, 1960
3. "Africa is a paradox which illustrates and highlights neo-colonialism. Her earth is rich, yet the products that come from above and below the soil continue to enrich, not Africans predominantly, but groups and individuals who operate to Africa's impoverishment". – Neo-Colonialism: the Last Stage of Imperialism, 1965.
4. "The forces that unite us are intrinsic and greater than the superimposed influences that keep us apart." – Africa Must Unite, 1963.

8. “Any meaningful humanism must begin from egalitarianism and must lead to objectively chosen policies for safeguarding and sustaining egalitarianism”. – African Socialism Revisited, 1962.

10. “The people of Africa are Crying For Unity, Africa is one continent, one people, and one nation”. – Class Struggle in Africa, 1970.

Dr. Kwame Nkrumah was focused mainly on building a socialist state, his sympathies lay with the East. The Vietnam war at the time, which deteriorated the relationship b/n the ex-USSR on the one hand and the US and it's allies on the other, a peace mission under the commonwealth of nations was announced in 1965 with premier Harold Wilson of Britain as chairman of the mission and Mr. Kwame N'Krumah as a member of mission. But then the north Vietnamese leader, the late Ho Chi Minh refused to accept the peace mission as a whole, but he separately invited Mr. Kwame N'krumah, as member of the announced commonwealth peace mission, contributed enormously to the north Vietnamese eventually agreeing to the Paris peace-talks which partially ended the Vietnam war in 1975. Then Menen Williams, then US assistant secretary of state for African affairs, visited Accra, and it became necessary for Kwame N'krumah to visit, ex-Peoples Republic of China and the ex-North Vietnam and that was the end of his government, it was well understood that the removal had been endorsed by the western nation at the time. During his tenure, he survived several assassination plots and coup-attempts unharmed. And the coup of January, 1966 which removed Dr. Kwame Nkrumah from office while he was under official visits to ex-Peoples Republic of China and the ex-North Vietnam was organized by the Ghanaian military had it the knowledge of US and British governments.

The coup was thought two years in the works since February 1964 and finally succeeded in 24th January 1966, The CPP was officially banned right after the coup, the ill-fated president, then never returned to Ghana, he had to self-exile in Conakry, Guinea, as the guest of president Ahmed Sekou-Toure, who honoured Nkrumah co-president of Guinea. In failing health, he flew for further medical treatment to Bucharest, Romania in August 1971, and he died of skin cancer in April 1972 at the age of 62. The coup organized by the Ghanaian under the regime of the National Lieration Council (NLC) was endorsed by western intelligence agencies, installed Lt. General Joseph Arthur Ankrah on the day of 24th February, 1966. He served as the first Commander in-chief of the Ghanaian Army and from 24th January, 1966 to 2nd April, 1969 as the second head of state of Ghana, he died in natural sickness on 25th November, 1992, aged
77. In 2nd April, 1969, Brigadier Akwasi Amankwaa Afrifa made a coup against the sitting head of state, he was chairman of the military presidential commission, and leader of the military government existed from 2nd April, 1969 to the 7th of August, 1970, but he was executed together with two other former Ghanaian heads of state in June, 1979. In 31st August, 1970 Mr. Edward Akuffo-Addo, a politician and a lawyer, believed he was one of the top-six veteran politicians in Ghana in the fight for Ghana's independence, became the chief of justice and later to become president of Ghana between the 31 August, 1970 to 13 January, 1972 that culminated Ghana to multi-party democracy resulted in free election to a civilian primeminister Dr. Kofi Abrefa Busia from 1st October, 1969 to 13th January, 1972.

On 13th January, 1972, Colonel Ignatious Kutu Acheampong led a coup d'etat to overthrow the democratically elected government of the Progress Party and it's leader, Dr. Kofi Abrefa Busia to head the military government as chairman of the military ruling-National Redemption Council (NRC), which it was later transformed into the Ghana Supreme Military Council on the 9th of October, 1975 with Colonel Ignatius Acheampong himself (promoted to General) as it's chairman. The official wife of the late ex-president Nkrumah Samia Rizk, an Egyptian origin who had left Ghana with her kids after the 1966 coup, back with her family again in 1975 at the invitation of the head of State Colonel Ignatius Kutu Acheampong. He was ruled Ghana for further, from 13th January, 1972 to 5th July, 1978, when he was deposed in a palace coup. He was later to be executed by a firing squad. On the 5th of July, 1978, Lt. General Frederick William Kwasi Akuffo, a former chief of the general defence staff of the Ghanaian Armed Forces became the head of state and chairman of the ruling-Supreme Military Council (SMC) in Ghana from 5th July, 1978 until 1979, he came to power by ousting his predecessor in a military coup, he was overthrown by a military coup led by Flt. Lieutenant Jerry Rawlings again, and three weeks later executed.

Ghana endured a long serious of coups before Flight Lt. Jerry Rawlings tookover power in 1981 ousting military dictator Colonel Ignatius Acheampong, banned all political parties, suspended the constitution. The election and a transfer of power to civilian rule was made that year was won by Dr. Hilla Limann of the Peoples National Party (PNP).

Flight Lieutenant Jerry Rawlings staged his second coup’

However, on 31st December, 1981 Flt. Lt. Jerry Rawlings overthrew Dr. hilla Limann's elected government once again, citing economic mis-management. Flight Lt. Jerry Rawlings then reinstalled the Provisional National Defence Council (PNDC) government with himself again as chairman. The country began to move towards economic stability and democracy.

In April 1992 a constitution allowing for a multi-party system was approved in a referendum, ushering in a period of democracy. Flight Lt. Jerry Rawlings won presidential elections of 1992 and 1996 but constitutionally prevented from running for third term in 2000. Mr. John Ageiekum Kufuor succeeded him as main opposition leader and was re-elected in 2004. A well-administered country by regional standards, Ghana is often seen as a model for political and economic reform in Africa.

In December, 2008, it was declared that, Mr. John Evans Atta Mills of the opposition, Ghana's next president since the country is one of the few in Africa to successfully transfer power twice from one legitimately elected leader to another, proof that Ghana's democracy has truely matured after an era of coups and dictatorships in the 1970's and 1980's. The Nkrumahist Convention Peoples Party which it was banned after the 1966 coup, resurfaced in another name, Peoples National Party (PNP) won that year's elections that put Dr. Hilla Liman as candidate. After he announced retirement from the Ghanaian Armed Forces, he formally launches the National Democratic Congress Party (NDCP).

The National Democratic Congress Party (NDCP), the up-coming election with Jerry Rawlings as it's candidate won 58.3 % of the vote in the 1992 national elections despite electoral complaints. In 1996, Jerry Rawlings won the general elections by 57 % of the vote, elections were judged largely free and fair. After two terms in office, he barred by the existing constitution from standing in any election, he then endorsed his vice president John Evans Atta Mills as NDC presidential candidate in 2000. The National Democratic Congress (NDC) with John Atta Mills as candidate, however, lost the elections to the National Peoples Party (NPP) candidate, John Agyekum Kufuor, once again, elections were judged to be free and fair. Fourty five years after his overthrow, somehow, Dr. Kwame N'krumah has been proved right in the Ghanaian political scene, his rehabilitation has gone full circle, he was voted one of the greatest Africans of the 20th century, and one of hundred greatest Africans of all time. Ghana's government under president John Agyekum Kufuor made a national reburial ceremony to reammend the late president's Mussoleum in Accra. President John Evans Atta Mills since coming to power, has radically put the late president to officially back him on the agenda, and of course to officially declare him as the "Founder of the Nation" and proclaiming his birthday 19th of September to become a national holiday, to be observed every year. In 2009, his centenary celebrations were adopted by the African Union Commission, as a continental event.

Ghana's economy is heavily reliant on agriculture (35% of the total GDP).

Gold and cocoa production, and individual remittances, are major sources of foreign exchange.

Sound macro-economic management along with high prices for gold and cocoa helped sustain GDP growth in 2008. Ghana heavily dependent on international financial and technical assistance.

Updates: For Ghana, 2011 believed should be a very good year, for one known reason, on the 15th of December, 2010, the country produced it's "first barrels" of cruide oil in commercial quantities from it's "Jubille Oil Field", about fourty miles off-shore. Ghana is now turned an oil-producing nation following Tullow Oil's discovery of the Jubilee Field in 2007. In the words of the operating company, the UK based Tullow Oil, the Jubilee Oil Field, is a world class Oil field with estimated recoverable resources of up to one billion barrels. The first phase of production has a target of 370 million barrels. Full production will fetch Ghana 120,000 barrels a day (bpd), but in the immidiate future, the field will be capable of producing up to 55,000 bpd. The important thing, though, is that the Oil from the Jubilee Field is known in the oil trade as "light sweet crude" with "an API of 37 degrees". It's of high quality and in great demand. Ghana will spend a lot of time in 2011 on what the revenue from the Oil should be spent on, and what steps should be taken to prevent the country from going the way of the other bad producers of Oil in Africa. The UK based Tullow Oil is optimistic, though, it says phase one can be the catalyst for developing Ghanaian capacity in Oil & Gas exploration and production attracting further foreign investment and thereby diversifying the economy: and also helping local businesses and suppliers to develop the in-country services that Oil companies and their partners will require. More than 85% of Tullow Ghana's employees are Ghanaians and the Company's target is to increase the number to 90% in the next four years. 2011 will see the intensification of these efforts, both on the part of the government and oil companies. The Government of Ghana has studied the records of both the good and the bad producers of Oil in the world, and it is hoped Ghana will emulate the best practices in the industry, such as the example offered by Norway. President John Atta Mills won recently an emphatic victory over Mrs. Nana Konadu Agyeman Rawlings 97% to a 3% beating in the presidential primaries of Ghana's ruling-National Democratic Congress (NDC). It was the first time in Ghanaian political history ever that a sitting president was being challenged by a member of his own political-party who intended to stop him from getting a second term in office. To betterly put, it was the first a Ghanaian president was being deliberately prevented from going for a second term by the wife of the founder of his own party. "Winning is not the end of the road, what we are in the politics for is to raise the living standard of the people", president John Evans Atta Mills quoted as saying, when he launches election campaign for a second term.

Updates: All charges have been dropped against Ghana's former first lady Nana Konadu Rawlings, her lawyer has told the BBC. She was charged in 2005 with theft, fraud and conspiracy to defraud the state during the 1990s when her husband Jerry Rawlings was president. Her attorney said the case had been dropped on the orders of John Kufuor, who stood down as president last week. He handed over to John Atta Mills, once Mr Rawlings' deputy, after his party's candidate lost the December elections. Leaders of the National Democratic Congress, now in power, had dubbed this case - and another against the former chief of Ghana's National Petroleum Company - as politically motivated "witch hunts". Tsatu Tsikata, who received a five-year prison term in 2008 for causing financial loss to the state, was also pardoned by Mr Kufuor last week. The BBC's David Amanor in the capital, Accra, says it is unclear why the cases have been dismissed. Mr Kufuor's supporters say it is a mark of his generous spirit; his detractors say that with his New Patriotic Party out of government, the former president is attempting to head off recriminations.

'Dragged through mud' Mr Tsikata has vowed to ignore the pardon and carry on fighting for acquittal in the courts. Mrs Rawlings' lawyer expressed dismay at the handling of the case which will be formally discontinued by Ghana's High Court on Thursday. "Her name has been dragged through the mud for three years," Tony Lithur told the BBC's Focus on Africa programme. "The case has damaged Mrs Rawlings' international reputation and had no basis in the first place," he said. Mrs Rawlings and four others were accused of misappropriating public funds and property during the late 1990s while organising the sale of a publicly owned canning factory in Ghana's Eastern region. The defendants had all pleaded not guilty. Mr Rawlings first came to power in a coup in 1979, and in 1981 again seized power from his democratically elected successor. He won democratic elections in 1992 and 1996 but stood down at the 2000 election, when his chosen successor, Mr Atta Mills, was defeated by Mr Kufuor. Source: BBC News Africa January 13, 2012

Updates: Booming construction, a burgeoning middle class, gleaming shopping malls' Ghana's oil driven economic expansion is transforming the country, but uneven development also means many are being outpaced and slipping further into poverty, says the UN. The economic boom, especially in Accra [the capital], is obvious, but inequalities are widening as all the prices have gone up', Eugenie Maiga of the African Centre for Economic Transformation, a policy think-tank, told the UN news agency IRIN. The economy grew by 14 per-cent in 2011, one of the fastest rates in Africa, and much of southern Ghana has prospered. 'The northern part of the country has clearly benefited less from the growing economy in the past 10 years than the central and southern parts,' Maiga noted. 'Even if rural poverty declined, the land in the north is not as fertile as in the south… the difference between the quality of houses in the north and the south of the country is obvious see.' Since 2000, the economy has recorded an average growth of 5 per cent per-annum, but it shot up in 2010 when oil production began. Per-capita income has more than tripled in from $400 in 2000 and is likely to reach $1,400 in 2012, said Samir Gadio, a West Africa analyst at Standard Chartered Bank. Boosted by oil, Cocoa and Gold revenues, Ghana has initiated economic reforms to spur growth and in 2011 became a middle income country, the ninth in Africa to attain this status. Significant off-shore oil reserves were discovered in 2007. The proportion of people living in driven poverty dropped from 51 per cent in 1992 to 30 per cent in 2006, according to the UN, which noted that Ghana was the first country in the region to meet the Millenium Development Goal (MDG) of halving poverty by 2015. However, a similar rate of growth has eluded the northern provinces, where there are fewer roads and less infrastructure, poorer housing and not nearly as many modern businesses as in the south. Inequality is also widening in Accra, where many people from the countryside come in search of jobs, but development in the capital has pushed up the cost of living and many fall further into poverty, said Maiga. Rental prices in the capital are becoming prohibitive. 'Most [landlords] are now asking tenants to pay their rent for one of even two years in advance,' said Maiga. Inflation has been climbing for 14 months, weakening the currency and eroding purchasing power, while increased demand for imports drives up the prices. The cost of food and rent has gone up across the country. 'This is negatively affecting access to food in the north, where the proportion of food-insecure people is the highest in the country', the UN Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO) said in a March 2012 report. Roads have improved in the capital but power cuts and a steady water supply are still a problem. Sanitation services in the capital and rural areas are equally poor.

Updates: January 28, 2012: Two significant yet related events were about to take place in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa. The Chinese Vice President, Xi Jinping handed over the keys to the new gleaming headquarters building of the African Union (AU). And an AU assembled presidents and dignitaries witnessed the unveiling of a new bronze statue of former Ghanaian president Dr. Kwame N'krumah at the new African Union headquarters in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

Despite the moment being heavy with significance, they were received in a simple, almost subdued manner by the current AU chairman, President Theodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo of Equatorial Guinea, and the chairperson of the African Union Commission, Dr. Jean Ping. The ceremony was barely over when the motely crowd of presidents with security details in tow. Amid drumming and dancing by cultural troops from Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia and Nigeria, Ghana's then president, professor John Atta Mills, assisted by Jean Ping and President Theodoro Obiang Nguema, in a hushed expectancy, unveiled a new bronze statue of Kwame N'krumah in the company of professor Francis N'krumah and Samia N'krumah (MP) both children of the late Dr. Kwame N'krumah as well as several heads of state and former president Jerry Rawlings, the bronze statue of Dr. N'krumah was revealed, standing tall, complete with his trade mark smock, walking-stick, hand raised and outstretched, in the same manner as he had, on 6th March, 1957, declaring the independence of Ghana meaningless unless it was linked up with the total liberation of Africa. Underneath, cast in golden letters on black marble, were the historic last words of N'krumah's famous speech given at the founding of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in Addis Ababa on 24th of May, 1963: "Ethiopia shall stretch forth her hands unto God, Africa must unite". The significance of such event suddenly dawned on all present. The very statue that had been angrily knocked down by Ghanaians themselves in blind fury after N'krumah's overthrow, had been restored, only this time round, on a much bigger continental stage - at the headquarters of the African Union.

Flight Leutenant Jerry Rawlings popularly known as J.J, is the former president of Ghana. A hands on, brave and astute leader mostly revered and known for revolutionizing the political and economic status of Ghana at a dire point in its history. His famous escape from execution in 1979 and the brave rescue by his military friends from a dictatorial government became his turning point, for presidency. Ghana's longest-serving leader, former flight Lt. Jerry John Rawlings, who died on 12 November 2020, had an enduring legacy as 'the man of the people'.

Official Documents:
How the US Overthrew Ghana's Kwame Nkrumah

The success of Ghanaian industrialisation would have further cemented the fact that African countries did not necessarily need White rule to be successful.

Kwame Nkrumah was a futurist, a born visionary. His plan as leader of Ghana was to make it an industrial hub within a generation. He dreamt of a united and successful African continent and the narrative he was creating for Africa was a foreign policy concern for the United States of America. In a Memorandum from the President's Acting Special Assistant for National Security Affairs (Komer) to President Johnson, the coup that led to Nkrumah's downfall was described as a fortuitous windfall because, "Nkrumah was doing more to undermine our interests than any other black African. In reaction to his strongly pro-Communist leanings, the new military regime is almost pathetically pro-Western." In other words, the military regime was a shadow of the West, a whole puppet show mistaken for governance.

Before the declassification of the official documents by the USA, a C.I.A operative, John Stockwell, shared his knowledge on how the United States had been involved in evoking anti-Nkrumah sentiment and in the end causing the coup. He said, "Howard Bane, who was the CIA station chief in Accra, engineered the overthrow of Kwame Nkrumah. Inside the CIA it was quite clear. Howard Bane got a double promotion, and was awarded the Intelligence Star for the overthrow of Kwame."

Nkrumah had ascended to power when Ghana gained its independence in 1957. Ghana adopted a flag with a Black Star in a nod to Marcus Garvey and his Black Star Line. Nkrumah was one of the leaders behind the Organisation of African Unity established on 25 May 1963. The visionary's end goal for Ghana had been to industrialise it within a generation. He had used an accelerated eduction programme and set up a Ghana Education Trust (GET) to build schools in a bid to empower the people of Ghana with the requisite expertise for industrial take-off. He also led a promising scientific research drive which in 1965 had expanded to no less than five different research institutes for food sciences and technology, aquatic biology, geology and geophysics, industrial standards and marine fisheries. In 1966, Nkrumah said, "Many more research institutes are in an advanced stage of physical development or of planning. These include the Institute of Glass and Ceramics, the Institute of Metallurgy, the Institute of Wild Life research, the Institute for Research Development and a Centre for the Production of Scientific Instruments." Education was only one of the chapters of the multi-faceted growth he envisioned for Ghana but it formed the very base. By the time of the coup, his country had 68 state owned factories. It is this futuristic industrial policy that was soon dropped by the military regimes that followed for reasons largely unreasonable in retrospect.

The danger of Nkrumah to the colonialists

Nkrumah's ideology was a threat to the imperialist cause and it still is 50 years after. Within 10 years of Ghana's independence, 31 other countries had gained their own independence. Ghana was a trailblazer in Africa and would rearrange the matrix of how the West related to Africa. The success of Ghanaian industrialisation would have further cemented the fact that African countries did not necessarily need White rule to be successful. Ghana was supposed to fit the narrative of a country which gained black majority rule and became a melting pot of tension and warfare. After deposing Nkrumah, that became the reality of the day with the country having 7 violent military transfers of power. Having undone Nkrumah, the United States started to control affairs with the IMF putting a stop to Nkrumah's industrialisation policy. The regime that followed was a USA puppet. In Komer's Memorandum to President Johnson, he said, "I am not arguing for lavish gifts to these regimes-indeed, giving them a little only whets their appetites, and enables us to use the prospect of more as leverage."

Even now, the USA will pursue such a policy of giving a little and gaining a lot in the manner of African allegiance and loyalty. African leaders who are a part of this ploy to undo Africa are nothing but sell-outs. They insult the legacy of Nkrumah and so many others who were victims of the imperialists' twisted scheming. Nkrumah's fall had been discussed a year before it happened by the Director of Central Intelligence, the Ambassador to Ghana and the Deputy Chief of the African Division in March 1965 as shown by their Memorandum of Conversation. Africa should know there are discussions about derailing continental development that are consistently being carried out and it is up to Africans to stand strong and united.

At a January 1961 Casablanca Conference, Nkrumah himself had called for political unity in Africa or else "we will be fighting and warring among ourselves with the imperialists and colonialists standing by behind the screen and pulling vicious wires, to make us cut each other's throats for the sake of their diabolical purposes in Africa." PEACEFUL TRANSITION

Ghanaian officials swore in a new president'

Hours after the death of the West African nation's leader. John Evans Atta Mills died suddenly at a military hospital Tuesday afternoon a few hours after becoming ill, Chief of Staff John Henry Martey Newman said in a statement. He was 68. In a ceremony broadcast on state television, John Dramani Mahama - formerly Ghana's vice president -- became the country's new president and ordered that flags be flown at half-staff for a week. "This is the saddest day in our nation's history. Tears have engulfed our nation and we're deeply saddened and distraught. I never imagined that one day I will address our nation in such difficult circumstances" ,Mahama said. "I'm personally devastated. I've lost a father, I've lost a friend, I've lost a mentor and a senior comrade." Officials did not specify what caused Mills' death. The president had denied rumors about his health for months. "Does my continued living pose a threat to some people?" he told reporters at a January event, according to the state-run Ghana News Agency. On June 25, he returned from a medical checkup in the United States, the news agency reported. Mills was a former law professor and a tax expert. He was Ghana's vice president from 1997 to 2000. Before his political career, he taught at the University of Ghana and also was a visiting lecturer at Temple University in Pennsylvania and Leiden University in the Netherlands. Mills ran for president unsuccessfully in 2000 and 2004 before narrowly winning a runoff in 2009. John Atta Mills' death came several days after he celebrated his 68th birthday. He had said he would run for re-election in December.In a statement read on his behalf by Ghana's information minister Monday, Mills said his government had focused on developing the nation's economy, according to the Ghana News Agency."We made a promise to expand our country's infrastructural base in support of our economy take-off," the statement said. "We also decided to invest in the people of our country so as to make them competitive both locally and abroad." Mahama said that Mills was a "prince of peace" who "brought a distinctive insight into Ghanaian politics." The opposition New Patriotic Party expressed condolences in a statement. "We join the nation in mourning this sad loss to Ghana," the statement said. U.S. President Barack Obama met with Mills when he visited Ghana in July 2009. Obama praised the country as a model for democracy and stability when Mills visited Washington this year. "Ghana has become a wonderful success story economically on the continent," Obama said. "In part because of the initiatives of President Mills, you've seen high growth rates over the last several years. Food productivity and food security is up. There's been strong foreign investment." In a statement, British Prime Minister David Cameron described Mills as "a tireless defender of democracy in West Africa and across the continent." Part of a former British colony, Ghana was among the first African countries to gain independence, in 1957. It endured a series of coups before a military dictator, Jerry Rawlings, took power in 1981. Rawlings led Ghana through a transition to democracy about 10 years later. Mahama, 53, is a former member of Ghana's parliament who has served as director of communication for the National Democratic Congress party. The new president called on Ghanaians to respect John Atta Mills' legacy. "Our finest tribute to him at this moment is to maintain the unity and stability of our nation," Mahama said. Obama hailed Ghana as 'model for democracy'. Meantime, Ghana gets a new VP' Ghana has chalked another milestone in its democratic dispensation, as new President John Mahama's nominee for vice president was vetted by law makers and after approval was sworn-in by the chief justice. Kwesi Bekoe Amissah-Arthur, governor of the central bank and an economist, was sworn-in as vice president late Monday evening in accordance with Article 60 (10) of the 1992 Constitution of Ghana. Law makers in parliament unanimously approved his nomination after posing questions ranging from macro-economic issues, such as the depreciation of the cedi, the country's single digit inflation against rising prices and his political clout. In a brief statement, the new vice president expressed appreciation to President Mahama for his nomination, adding, "I thank the house (parliament) for doing something unprecedented in the history of Ghana. The show of unanimity and unity by parliament as a result of the sad event that occurred is commendable". He later called on Ghanaians "and the many people across the countries, who have sent messages of goodwill" adding that, "I hope I would continue to receive your prayers". The swearing in of the vice president follows the death of President John Evans Atta Mills on last month and the ascension of Mahama, who was the deputy then. Amissah-Arthur is an economist and served in former President Jerry Rawlings' government as a Deputy Finance Minister. He served as governor of the central bank in the Mills administration, where the late president chose Amissah-Arthur because of his role in managing Ghana's structural adjustment programme, which turned the country's economic fortunes around in the 1980s. Mills' state funeral will take place in Accra, the capital, from Wednesday 8 to 10 August. Several world leaders including the United States Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Liberian President. Ellen Johnson Sirleaf are expected to attend the funeral. The 68-year old late president, the first Ghanaian leader to die in office, will be laid to rest at a special designated place near the seat of government. Mills had been the Presidential candidate for the ruling National Democratic Congress (NDC) in the next elections, slated for December, with political analysts predicting a tight contest. He would have contested against Nana Addo Dankwah Akufo-Addo, the candidate for largest opposition party, New Patriotic Party (NPP). Former Vice-President John Dramani Mahama, who has been sworn in as the president of Ghana following the death assumed on 7th January, 2009 , remaining in the post until Mr. Atta Mills' death is regarded as a champion of the underprivileged.

Updates: African Union (AU) current chairman, Dr. Yayi Boni of Benin described the death of Ghanaian President John Atta Mills as "a great, great, great loss" for Africa, ahead of a state funeral, that was underway in the capital Accra. Dr. Boni was speaking ahead of the late Mills' funeral in Accra. The AU president, who leads Benin, urged Ghanaians to keep alive the unity and vision that late Mills had bequeathed the country. He recalled his last visit to Mills six months ago to discuss the crisis in Mali, during which they also exchanged ideas on the future of Africa. Dr. Yayi Boni said he also found in John Atta Mills, the same vision as the first President of Ghana, Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, for the country. "It was a great, great loss for the country, for the continent and Benin". Other African leaders who also paid their last respects early morning are Guinean president, Alpha Conde, Sierra Leone's Ernest Bai Koroma, Senegal's Macky Sall, Faure Gnassingbe of Togo, Alassane Drammane Ouattara of Cote D' Ivoire. Other dignitaries are Dr. Mustapha Osman Secretary to the President of Sudan, Mr. Yamina Bengnigni, the French Minister for Francophonie, and Mr Themba Masuka, Swaziland Deputy Prime Minister.

Cardinal Peter Appiah Turkson, President of the Pontifical Commission for Justice and Peace representing Pope Benedict XVI was also there to pay respect. Also in the country are Hifikepunye Pohamba, President of Namibia, Mohamed Abdelaziz, President of the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR), President Jakaya Kikwete of Tanzania and President of Gabon, Ali Ben Bongo. The rest are Presidents Ellen Johnson Sirleaf of Liberia, Goodluck Jonathan of Nigeria and Mr. Kadre Quedraogo, President of the ECOWAS Commission. Late President John Atta Mills passed away on July 24th, 2012 after a sort illness in Accra. Mills will be laid to rest at a specially laid to rest at a specially designated place, which will later be developed into a Presidential Place of Rest.

Updates: Tens of thousands of people in the Ghanaian capital Accra have attended the state funeral for President John Atta Mills on 10th August, 2012 who died suddenly in July. Some 18 African heads of state and US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton witnessed the ceremony in Accra's Independence Square. Mills, who had long suffered from throat cancer, died only five months before he was set to seek re-election. A BBC reporter in Accra says his death has united Ghanaians in grief. She says his death was seen as a test for the country's young democracy. Mills, who started a four-year term in January 2009, was succeeded by Vice-President John Dramani Mahama. Ghana has won international plaudits for the swift manner in which it handled the transition in a nation known for its divisive politics.

Updates: Ghana’s President John Mahama seeks serious debates'

Against a backdrop of angry political rhetoric, President Mahama insists that the state must ensure election security, help to improve agricultural production and develop institutions with the authority to investigate corruption. Pedalling furiously and revelling in the thrill, a youthful John Mahama piloted a bicycle without brakes down a hill towards a busy traffic junction in Accra in the 1960s. It was only when his companions screamed "Dramani, slow down," Mahama recalls in his just published memoir, that he made the split-second decision to turn the bike at speed into a side street. He flew over the handlebars and landed in a hedge but escaped with a few cuts and bruises. Mahama laughed when I suggested that a political career could be likened to riding a bicycle downhill without brakes. Making split-second decisions does not trouble him, he assured me. Yet Mahama comes across as a considered politician with clear goals for the government of which he took charge on 24 July. Forty days later, in a speech at Accra's conference centre, he set out an ambitious programme. Although he speaks solemnly about building on the legacy of tolerance and social reform left by his predecessor John Atta Mills, Mahama has quickly established his own agenda. Conscious of criticism that his National Democratic Congress (NDC) is anti-business, Mahama insists that the private sector would lead Ghana's transition to a fully fledged middle-income country.Last year the World Bank said Ghana's recalibrated national income meant it had graduated from a least developed country (LDC) to lower middle-income status. Mahama will chair the newly launched Private Sector Advisory Council and has pledged it will respond speedily to complaints from business of bureaucratic obstacles. He has also set up a unit in the presidency to monitor public-service delivery. He has called on civil society groups to work with government to propose ways to improve services. "Make no mistake – the way we do business in government must change," Mahama told Ghanaians in his 4 September speech, which set out a busy schedule ahead of elections on 7 December. The campaign is intensifying with clear differences emerging between Mahama's platform and the policies of the New Patriotic Party (NPP) and its presidential candidate, Nana Akufo-Addo. Alongside his business initiatives, Mahama explains that he still wants a strong developmental role for the state. That is anathema to Akufo-Addo and the NPP. On the NPP's flagship policy calling for free secondary education for all, Mahama questions the party's figures and the practicality of its immediate implementation. Between Mahama's practised conciliatory posture and Akufo-Addo's skills as a seasoned courtroom advocate, the campaign offers Ghanaians a choice of political style as well as policy substance. Much will depend on the campaigns. The most reliable statistic to emerge from local opinion surveys is that about 25% of Ghanaians are yet to decide on which candidate to support in December.

The Africa Report: You have said your predecessor President John Atta Mills embodied qualities that Ghana's politics sadly lack – civility, humility, honesty and peace. Q, Do the voters agree with you? John Dramani Mahama: A, Those qualities were why President John Atta Mills was elected. Since he entered politics in 1997, he showed patience, tolerance and openly supported peace. Unfortunately, he was quite vilified in his period in office, but Ghanaians admired the tolerance of not responding to the personal insults thrown at him. Wasn't it crass hypocrisy for people to vilify President Mills and then say he's a great statesman after he died? No, I wouldn't accuse any Ghanaian of being hypocritical. We were united in our grief at the passing of President Mills. Even people who vilified him suddenly... Source: The Africa Report October 1, 2012

Updates: China to construct Ghana's second international airpot' China Airports Construction Corporation (CACC) is set to begin construction of Ghana's second international airport after Kotoka International Airport with the capacity for large aircraft, a government official in the West African country has revealed. CACC, owned by the Chinese government and the only enterprise offering a full range of services in the civil airport construction, signed a memorandum of understanding with Ghana to undertake a feasibility study for the design of the new facility. The airport will be constructed on a 16,000 acre land near Pampram in the Dangbe-East District of the Greater Accra region. Kotoka Airport is also in the same region but in the heart of the capital city. Transport minister Alhaji Collins Dauda said the new airport would address the capacity constraints and anticipated traffic growth at the Kotoka Airport. He did not provide any details on the costs for the project. Ghana is in the process of drafting a new Airport Bill for parliamentary approval that is set to improve the aviation industry. Meanwhile, the Ghana Airports Company Limited will continue its rehabilitation of the Kotoka International Airport under the phase III project. The development is meant to facilitate and enhance passenger movement and experience in the terminal as well as aircraft movement. Regional airports are also going through facelifts to support the growing domestic traffic. Dauda said the Ghana Civil Aviation Authority (GCAA) would collaborate with the World Bank for the review, drafting and development of economic regulations for the authority. He said government had taken initiatives to seek funding from the World Bank and other donor partners for the development of the infrastructure. Source: The Afriica Report 15 October, 2012

Updates: Ghana's Jerry Rawlings 'backs' wife's presidential bid' The wife of Ghana's ex-leader Jerry Rawlings has told the BBC he backs her campaign for December's presidential election. Nana Konadu Rawlings was chosen at the weekend as the presidential candidate of the National Democratic Party (NDP).

She defected from the ruling National Democratic Congress (NDC) party, although Mr Rawlings has not done so. She could split the vote of NDC candidate President John Dramani Mahama, correspondents say. The other main challenger in the election is expected to be former Foreign Minister Nana Akufo-Addo, the flagbearer of the New Patriotic Party (NPP). Mr Rawlings - who ruled Ghana for 18 years and launched the NDC in 1992 - attended the newly formed NDP's congress on Saturday. "If he didn't believe in what I was doing, he wouldn't have come... I'm not going in a different direction," Mrs Rawlings told the BBC's Focus on Africa programme. "The family is always in line with the former president's position on probity, accountability and social justice."

On October 4, Former President Mr Jerry Rawlings attended an NDC meeting where President Mahama unveiled the party's election manifesto. Mrs Rawlings said her husband had lost authority in the NDC and merely fulfilled his "constitutional responsibility" as founder of the party by attending its events. Some NDC members had used him to rally support during elections and then ditched him, she said. "The NDC was founded on certain values which they [party leaders] have thrown out of the window so the NDP is taking those values to make sure there is transparency in governance," Mrs Rawlings said. She said she was running for president because she was worried about worsening corruption and mismanagement, and wanted to be at the "centre" of government so that she could improve the lives of people. When Mr Rawlings addressed the NDP convention at the weekend, he said the party would "restore hope and the moral values that the country needs to move forward". At the same event, he also praised Mr Mahama, who became president earlier this year following the death of his predecessor, John Atta Mills. "Thank God John Mahama has taken over and agreed that he will restore hope in the NDC… Should he win re-election, then we can join hands again," he said. Our correspondent says NDC leaders are reportedly meeting to discuss Mr Rawlings' presence at the NDP's congress. There is concern that the NDC could be weakened by Mrs Rawlings' decision to fight the election under the new party's banner, he adds. Mrs Rawlings challenged Mr Mills last year in a bid to get the NDC's nomination, but gained only 3.1% of the vote. The BBC correspondent in the capital, Accra, says her comments came amid speculation that her candidature could divide the Rawlings home. Source: BBC News Africa 15 October 2012

October 19, 2012: Ghana's Nana Rawlings 'shocked' at election ban' The wife of Ghana's ex-leader Jerry Rawlings is shocked after being barred from contesting the December election, her spokesman has told the BBC. Nana Konadu Rawlings was chosen last weekend as the presidential candidate of the National Democratic Party (NDP). She defected from the ruling National Democratic Congress (NDC) party, although Mr Rawlings has not done so. The election commission said her nomination papers had not been completed before the deadline. The main challenger to President John Dramani Mahama is expected to be former Foreign Minister Nana

Akufo-Addo, from the New Patriotic Party (NPP). Mrs Rawlings' spokesperson Owusu Bempah told the BBC her disqualification was unfair. "We suspect someone deliberately wanted her out of the race," he said. She refused to speak to the media. Electoral commission spokeswoman Sylvia Annor told the AFP news agency that "there were major errors on their forms and they could not meet the deadline to rectify them hence the disqualification." "Portions of the nomination forms were not properly filled by the National Democratic Party," she said. Analysts had said that Mrs Rawlings' candidacy could split the NDC vote. Before his wife's disqualification, there was speculation about which party Mr Rawlings - who ruled Ghana for 18 years and launched the NDC in 1992 - would support. Mrs Rawlings said her husband would support her presidential bid. He had previously attended an NDC meeting where President Mahama unveiled the party's election manifesto. He praised Mr Mahama, who became president earlier this year following the death of his predecessor, John Atta Mills. Mrs Rawlings challenged the late Mr Atta Mills last year in a bid to get the NDC's nomination, but gained only 3.1% of the vote. BBC News Africa

HISTORICIZE

"We must unite now or perish" – President Kwame Nkrumah
NewAfrican Magazine 3 May 2013

Ghana's first president, Kwame Nkrumah's speech at the founding of the OAU has since become a classic, even iconic. In front of 31 other African heads of state who met in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, on 24 May 1963, Nkrumah appealed, cajoled, and did everything in perhaps his greatest speech ever to convince his colleagues to go the whole hog and create a strong continental union. Sadly, they decided otherwise. Below is an extract from that speech. I am happy to be here in Addis Ababa on this most historic occasion. I bring with me the hopes and fraternal greetings of the government and people of Ghana. Our objective is African union now. There is no time to waste. We must unite now or perish. I am confident that by our concerted effort and determination, we shall lay here the foundations for a continental Union of African States. A whole continent has imposed a mandate upon us to lay the foundation of our union at this conference. It is our responsibility to execute this mandate by creating here and now, the formula upon which the requisite superstructure may be created. On this continent, it has not taken us long to discover that the struggle against colonialism does not end with the attainment of national independence. Independence is only the prelude to a new and more involved struggle for the right to conduct our own economic and social affairs; to construct our society according to our aspirations, unhampered by crushing and humiliating neo-colonialist control and interference. From the start we have been threatened with frustration, where rapid change is imperative, and with instability, where sustained effort and ordered rule are indispensable. No sporadic act nor pious resolution can resolve our present problems. Nothing will be of avail, except the united act of a united Africa. We have already reached the stage where we must unite or sink into that condition which has made Latin America the unwilling and distressed prey of imperialism after one-and-a-half centuries of political independence. As a continent, we have emerged into independence in a different age, with imperialism grown stronger, more ruthless and experienced, and more dangerous in its international associations. Our economic advancement demands the end of colonialist and neo-colonialist domination of Africa. But just as we understood that the shaping of our national destinies required of each of us our political independence and bent all our strength to this attainment, so we must recognise that our economic independence resides in our African union and requires the same concentration upon the political achievement. The unity of our continent, no less than our separate independence, will be delayed, if indeed we do not lose it, by hobnobbing with colonialism. African unity is, above all, a political kingdom which can only be gained by political means. The social and economic development of Africa will come only within the political kingdom, not the other way round. Is it not unity alone that can weld us into an effective force, capable of creating our own progress and making our valuable contribution to world peace? Which independent African state, which of you here, will claim that its financial structure and banking institutions are fully harnessed to its national development? Which will claim that its material resources and human energies are available for its own national aspirations? Which will disclaim a substantial measure of disappointment and disillusionment in its agricultural and urban Instability and frustration In independent Africa, we are already reexperiencing the instability and frustration which existed under colonial rule. We are fast learning that political independence is not enough to rid us of the consequences of colonial rule. The movement of the masses of the people of Africa for freedom from that kind of rule was not only a revolt against the conditions which it imposed. Our people supported us in our fight for independence because they believed that African governments could cure the ills of the past in a way which could never be accomplished under colonial rule. If, therefore, now that we are independent we allow the same conditions to exist that existed in colonial days, all the resentment which overthrew colonialism will be mobilised against us. The resources are there. It is for us to marshal them in the active service of our people. Unless we do this by our concerted efforts, within the framework of our combined planning, we shall not progress at the tempo demanded by today’s events and the mood of our people. The symptoms of our troubles will grow, and the troubles themselves become chronic. It will then be too late for pan-African unity to secure for us stability and tranquillity in our labours for a continent of social justice and material well-being. Our continent certainly exceeds all the others in potential hydro-electric power, which some experts assess as 42% of the world's total. What need is there for us to remain hewers of wood and drawers of water for the industrialised areas of the world? It is said, of course, that we have no capital, no industrial skill, no communications, and no internal markets, and that we cannot even agree among ourselves how best to utilise our resources for our own social needs. Yet all stock exchanges in the world are preoccupied with Africa's gold, diamonds, uranium, platinum, copper and iron ore. Our capital flows out in streams to irrigate the whole system of Western economy. Fifty-two per cent of the gold in Fort Knox at this moment, where the USA stores its bullion, is believed to have originated from our shores. Africa provides more than 60% of the world's gold. A great deal of the uranium for nuclear power, of copper for electronics, of titanium for supersonic projectiles, of iron and steel for heavy industries, of other minerals and raw materials for lighter industries – the basic economic might of the foreign powers – comes from our continent. Experts have estimated that the Congo Basin alone can produce enough food crops to satisfy the requirements of nearly half the population of the whole world, and here we sit talking about gradualism, talking about step by step. Are you afraid to take the bull by the horns? For centuries, Africa has been the milch cow of the Western world. Was it not our continent that helped the Western world to build up its accumulated wealth? We have the resources. It was colonialism in the first place that prevented us from accumulating the effective capital; but we ourselves have failed to make full use of our power in independence to mobilise our resources for the most effective take-off into thorough-going economic and social development. We have been too busy nursing our separate states to understand fully the basic need of our union, rooted in common purpose, common planning and common endeavour. A union that ignores these fundamental necessities will be but a sham. It is only by uniting our productive capacity and the resultant production that we can amass capital. And once we start, the momentum will increase. With capital controlled by our own banks, harnessed to our own true industrial and agricultural development, we shall make our advance. We shall accumulate machinery and establish steel works, iron foundries and factories; we shall link the various states of our continent with communications by land, sea, and air. We shall cable from one place to another, phone from one place to the other and astound the world with our hydro-electric power; we shall drain marshes and swamps, clear infested areas, feed the under-nourished, and rid our people of parasites and disease.

Camels and donkeys no more It is within the possibility of science and technology to make even the Sahara bloom into a vast field with verdant vegetation for agricultural and industrial development. We shall harness the radio, television, giant printing presses to lift our people from the dark recesses of illiteracy. A decade ago, these would have been visionary words, the fantasies of an idle dreamer. But this is the age in which science has transcended the limits of the material world, and technology has invaded the silences of nature. Time and space have been reduced to unimportant abstractions. Giant machines make roads, clear forests, dig dams, lay out aerodromes; monster trucks and planes distribute goods; huge laboratories manufacture drugs; complicated geological surveys are made; mighty power stations are built; colossal factories erected – all at an incredible speed. The world is no longer moving through bush paths or on camels and donkeys. We cannot afford to pace our needs, our development, our security, to the gait of camels and donkeys. We cannot afford not to cut down the overgrown bush of outmoded attitudes that obstruct our path to the modern open road of the widest and earliest achievement of economic independence and the raising up of the lives of our people to the highest level. Even for other continents lacking the resources of Africa, this is the age that sees the end of human want. For us it is a simple matter of grasping with certainty our heritage by using the political might of unity. All we need to do is to develop with our united strength the enormous resources of our continent. What use to the farmer is education and mechanisation, what use is even capital for development, unless we can ensure for him a fair price and a ready market? What has the peasant, worker and farmer gained from political independence, unless we can ensure for him a fair return for his labour and a higher standard of living? Unless we can establish great industrial complexes in Africa, what have the urban worker, and those peasants on overcrowded land gained from political independence? If they are to remain unemployed or in unskilled occupation, what will avail them the better facilities for education, technical training, energy, and ambition which independence enables us to provide? There is hardly any African state without a frontier problem with its adjacent neighbours. It would be futile for me to enumerate them because they are already so familiar to us all. But let me suggest that this fatal relic of colonialism will drive us to war against one another as our unplanned and uncoordinated industrial development expands, just as happened in Europe. Unless we succeed in arresting the danger through mutual understanding on fundamental issues and through African unity, which will render existing boundaries obsolete and superfluous, we shall have fought in vain for independence. Only African unity can heal this festering sore of boundary disputes between our various states. The remedy for these ills is ready in our hands. It stares us in the face at every customs barrier, it shouts to us from every African heart. By creating a true political union of all the independent states of Africa, with executive powers for political direction, we can tackle hopefully every emergency and every complexity. This is because we have emerged in the age of science and technology in which poverty, ignorance, and disease are no longer the masters, but the retreating foes of mankind. Above all, we have emerged at a time when a continental land mass like Africa with its population approaching 300 million is necessary to the economic capitalisation and profitability of modern productive methods and techniques. Not one of us working singly and individually can successfully attain the fullest development. Certainly, it will not be possible to give adequate assistance to sister states trying, against the most difficult conditions, to improve their economic and social structures. Only a united Africa functioning under a union government can forcefully mobilise the material and moral resources of our separate countries and apply them efficiently and energetically to bring a rapid change in the conditions of our people.

Political union Unite we must. Without necessarily sacrificing our sovereignties, big or small, we can here and now forge a political union based on defence, foreign affairs and diplomacy, and a common citizenship, an African currency, an African monetary zone, and an African central bank. We must unite in order to achieve the full liberation of our continent. We need a common defence system with African high command to ensure the stability and security of Africa. We have been charged with this sacred task by our own people, and we cannot betray their trust by failing them. We will be mocking the hopes of our people if we show the slightest hesitation or delay in tackling realistically this question of African unity. We need unified economic planning for Africa. Until the economic power of Africa is in our hands, the masses can have no real concern and no real interest for safeguarding our security, for ensuring the stability of our regimes, and for bending their strength to the fulfilment of our ends. With our united resources, energies and talents we have the means, as soon as we show the will, to transform the economic structures of our individual states from poverty to that of wealth, from inequality to the satisfaction of popular needs. Only on a continental basis shall we be able to plan the proper utilization of all our resources for the full development of our continent. How else will we retain our own capital for own development? How else will we establish an internal market for our own industries? By belonging to different economic zones, how will we break down the currency and trading barriers between African states, and how will the economically stronger amongst us be able to assist the weaker and less developed states? It is important to remember that independent financing and independent development cannot take place without an independent currency. A currency system that is backed by the resources of a foreign state is ipso facto subject to the trade and financial arrangements of that foreign country. Because we have so many customs and currency barriers as a result of being subject to the different currency systems of foreign powers, this has served to widen the gap between us in Africa. How, for example, can related communities and families trade with, and support one another successfully, if they find themselves divided by national boundaries and currency restrictions? The only alternative open to them in these circumstances is to use smuggled currency and enrich national and international racketeers and crooks who prey upon our financial and economic difficulties.

Common citizenship No independent African state today by itself has a chance to follow an independent course of economic development, and many of us who have tried to do this have been almost ruined or have had to return to the fold of the former colonial rulers. This position will not change unless we have a unified policy working at the continental level. The first step towards our cohesive economy would be a unified monetary zone, with, initially, an agreed common parity for our currencies. To facilitate this arrangement, Ghana would change to a decimal system. When we find that the arrangement of a fixed common parity is working successfully, there would seem to be no reason for not instituting one common currency and a single bank of issue. With a common currency from one common bank of issue, we should be able to stand erect on our own feet because such an arrangement would be fully backed by the combined national products of the states composing the union. After all, the purchasing power of money depends on productivity and the productive exploitation of the natural, human and physical resources of the nation. While we are assuring our stability by a common defence system, and our economy is being orientated beyond foreign control by a common currency, monetary zone, and central bank of issue, we can investigate the resources of our continent. We can begin to ascertain whether in reality we are the richest, and not, as we have been taught to believe, the poorest among the continents. We can determine whether we possess the largest potential in hydro-electric power, and whether we can harness it and other sources of energy to our industries. We can proceed to plan our industrialisation on a continental scale, and to build up a common market for nearly 300 million people. Common continental planning for the industrial and agricultural development of Africa is a vital necessity! So many blessings flow from our unity; so many disasters must follow on our continued disunity. The hour of history which has brought us to this assembly is a revolutionary hour. It is the hour of decision. The masses of the people of Africa are crying for unity. The people of Africa call for the breaking down of the boundaries that keep them apart. They demand an end to the border disputes between sister African states – disputes that arise out of the artificial barriers raised by colonialism. It was colonialism's purpose that divided us. It was colonialism's purpose that left us with our border irredentism, that rejected our ethnic and cultural fusion. Our people call for unity so that they may not lose their patrimony in the perpetual service of neo-colonialism. In their fervent push for unity, they understand that only its realisation will give full meaning to their freedom and our African independence. It is this popular determination that must move us on to a union of independent African states. In delay lies danger to our well-being, to our very existence as free states. It has been suggested that our approach to unity should be gradual, that it should go piecemeal. This point of view conceives of Africa as a static entity with "frozen" problems which can be eliminated one by one and when all have been cleared then we can come together and say: "Now all is well, let us now unite." This view takes no account of the impact of external pressures. Nor does it take cognisance of the danger that delay can deepen our isolations and exclusiveness; that it can enlarge our differences and set us drifting further and further apart into the net of neo-colonialism, so that our union will become nothing but a fading hope, and the great design of Africa's full redemption will be lost, perhaps, forever.

The dangers of regionalism The view is also expressed that our difficulties can be resolved simply by a greater collaboration through cooperative association in our inter-territorial relationships. This way of looking at our problems denies a proper conception of their inter-relationship and mutuality. It denies faith in a future for African advancement in African independence. It betrays a sense of solution only in continued reliance upon external sources through bilateral agreements for economic and other forms of aid. The fact is that although we have been cooperating and associating with one another in various fields of common endeavour even before colonial times, this has not given us the continental identity and the political and economic force which would help us to deal effectively with the complicated problems confronting us in Africa today. As far as foreign aid is concerned, a United Africa should be in a more favourable position to attract assistance from foreign sources. There is the far more compelling advantage which this arrangement offers, in that aid will come from anywhere to a United Africa because our bargaining power would become infinitely greater. We shall no longer be dependent upon aid from restricted sources. We shall have the world to choose from. What are we looking for in Africa? Are we looking for Charters, conceived in the light of the United Nations' example? A type of United Nations Organisation whose decisions are framed on the basis of resolutions that in our experience have sometimes been ignored by member states? Where groupings are formed and pressures develop in accordance with the interest of the groups concerned? Or is it intended that Africa should be turned into a loose organisation of states on the model of the Organisation of American States, in which the weaker states within it can be at the mercy of the stronger or more powerful ones politically or economically and all at the mercy of some powerful outside nation or group of nations? Is this the kind of association we want for ourselves in the United Africa we all speak of with such feeling and emotion? We all want a united Africa, united not only in our concept of what unity connotes, but united in our common desire to move forward together in dealing with all the problems that can best be solved only on a continental basis.

We are African! We meet here today not as Ghanaians, Guineans, Egyptians, Algerians, Moroccans, Malians, Liberians, Congolese or Nigerians, but as Africans. Africans united in our resolve to remain here until we have agreed on the basic principles of a new compact of unity among ourselves which guarantees for us and our future a new arrangement of continental government. If we succeed in establishing a new set of principles as the basis of a new charter or statute for the establishment of a continental unity of Africa, and the creation of social and political progress for our people, then in my view, this conference should mark the end of our various groupings and regional blocs. But if we fail and let this grand and historic opportunity slip by, then we shall give way to greater dissension and division among us for which the people of Africa will never forgive us. And the popular and progressive forces and movements within Africa will condemn us. I am sure therefore that we shall not fail them. To this end, I propose for your consideration the following: As a first step, a declaration of principles uniting and binding us together and to which we must all faithfully and loyally adhere, and laying the foundations of unity, should be set down. As a second and urgent step for the realisation of the unification of Africa, an All-Africa Committee of Foreign Ministers should be set up now. The Committee should establish on behalf of the heads of our governments, a permanent body of officials and experts to work out a machinery for the union government of Africa. This body of officials and experts should be made up of two of the best brains from each independent African state. The various charters of existing groupings and other relevant documents could also be submitted to the officials and experts. We must also decide on a location where this body of officials and experts will work, to be the new headquarters or capital of our union government. Some central place in Africa might be the fairest suggestion, either in Bangui in the Central African Republic or Leopoldville [Kinshasa] in Congo. My colleagues may have other proposals. The Committee of Foreign Ministers, officials and experts, should be empowered to establish: (1) A commission to frame a constitution for a Union Government of African States. (2) A commission to work out a continent-wide plan for a unified or common economic and industrial programme for Africa; this should include proposals for setting up: (a) A common market for Africa. (b) An African currency. (c) An African monetary zone. (d) An African central bank. (e) A continental communication system. (f) A commission to draw up details for a common foreign policy and diplomacy. (g) A commission to produce plans for a common system of defence. (h) A commission to make proposals for a common African citizenship. Africa must unite! The day after Nkrumah's speech, the 32 independent African nations assembled in Addis Ababa failed to go the whole hog for a strong United States of Africa. Instead they settled for a loose and weak Organisation of African Unity (OAU), whose Charter was signed the same day (25 May 1963) by the following countries: Algeria, Burundi, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Congo (Brazzaville), Congo (Kinshasa), Dahomey, Ethiopia, Gabon, Ghana, Guinea, Côte d'Ivoire, Liberia, Libya, Malagasy, Mali, Mauritania, Morocco, Niger, Nigeria, Rwanda, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sudan, Tanganyika. Tshad [later Chad], Togo, Tunisia, Uganda, UAR [Egypt], and Upper Volta [later Burkina Faso]. (text ends)

May 21, 2013: Ghana: Oil advances undercut by politics'

Six months after his election, Ghana's new president, John Mahama Dramani, hasn't made the least headway on oil and gas issues. A challenge to his election before the Supreme Court by his leading rival, Nana Akufo-Addo, has held back any important decision, and created a logjam that weighs heavily on the industry.

May 30, 2013: Ghana: Tullow lands PoD accord for TEN'

Ghana's president, John Mahama Dramana, made brief mention during a meeting of the French employers association MEDEF on May 29 that his government had endorsed Tullow Oil's Program of Development (PoD) for the offshore TEN (Tweneboa, Enyenra, Ntome) oil and gas complex.

June 25, 2014: World Cup 2014: Ghana sends $3m cash to players in Brazil'

Ghana's government has sent more than $3m (£1.8m) in cash by plane to Brazil to pay the appearance fees owed to the national team at the World Cup. Deputy Sports Minister Joseph Yamin told Ghanaian radio station Citi FM the players "insisted" on cash payments. He added: "The government had to mobilise the money and a chartered flight to Brazil." Ghana must beat Portugal in their final Group G game on Thursday to have any chance of staying at the World Cup. And even a win would not be enough to put Ghana through to the knockout phase if United States and Germany were to draw their match.

Earlier this week, there were rumours the Black Stars could boycott training ahead of the game if their demand for payment was not met. As unrest grew in the Ghana camp, Ghana President John Dramani Mahama personally assured the players they would receive their money. A statement from the Ghana Football Association said: "The government is pre-financing the payment of the Black Stars appearance fees, which will be reimbursed when Fifa's prize money for Ghana's participation in the World Cup is paid."

NEWS UPDATES:

Ghana Flew $3 Million in Cash to Brazil to Pay Its World Cup Players'

(Polly Mosendz) - Ghana's World Cup team was growing quite frustrated since the tournament began, and not just because they haven't won a game yet. The players had not been paid their appearance fees since the World Cup started. Deputy Sports Minister, Joseph Yamin, said the payment delay occurred because players and officials could not settle on the form of payment, and there were difficulties transporting the payment. You see, the players wanted $3 million in cold, hard cash.

The players made it abundantly clear that they preferred cash to electronic wire payments, which is how the government generally sends them money. Yamin tried to reason with the team, explaining that sending $3 million dollars in cash is not only difficult, but also, well... not a very good idea, "but the players are still insisting that they wouldn't take anything but physical cash." As the players grew agitated, it sparked fears of what they might do if they went unpaid — possibly even refusing to play.

Today, Ghana President John Dramani Mahama personally saw to it that players would not walk away from the matches. President Mahama spoke with the players and assured them that the payment was en route. Complying with the demands of their star athletes, Ghana government officials pre-financed the payment in all cash, put it in a plane, and flew it over to Brazil. Just in time for tomorrow's do-or-die match against Portugal.

World Cup 2014: Boateng and Muntari expelled by Ghana'

ST News (June 26, 2014) Ghana threw Sulley Muntari and Kevin-Prince Boateng out of its World Cup squad for disciplinary reasons on Thursday, plunging the African team into further chaos ahead of its decisive group-stage match against Portugal. Just a day after seeming to resolve a possible player mutiny over World Cup bonus payments, the Ghana Football Association released two separate statements saying two of the country's stars had been "suspended … indefinitely from the Black Stars with immediate effect."

Muntari was suspended "in the wake of his unprovoked physical attack on an executive committee member of the GFA and a management member of the Black Stars, Mr. Moses Armah" on Tuesday, one statement read.
The other statement said Boateng was dropped from the squad because of "vulgar verbal insults targeted at coach Kwesi Appiah" during a training session this week. "Boateng has since showed no remorse for his actions which has resulted in the decision," the statement added. Both players have had their World Cup accreditation withdrawn.

Ghana, a quarter-finalist in 2010, must beat Portugal in Brasilia on Thursday to stand any chance of reaching the second round from Group G. Muntari was suspended for the match after collecting two yellow cards. Ghana's World Cup campaign was already in turmoil following a row over appearance-fee payments that squad members had been promised but had not yet received. The country's cash-strapped federation had been forced to ask FIFA for an advance on the $8 million US prize money it is guaranteed from playing at the World Cup to pay outstanding debts to players.

FIFA said Wednesday that Ghana's request was "under evaluation." Ghana's deputy sports minister earlier had said that as much as $3 million in cash was being flown into Brazil from the West African nation to finally pay the bonuses to the unhappy players, averting a possible player strike. World Cup prize money — which ranges in Brazil from $8 million for being knocked out in the group stage to $35 million for winning the title — is normally paid after the tournament. Ghana midfielder Christian Atsu dismissed fears the team would boycott its final group game in Brasilia over the bonus-payment row. "We are not going to say we are not going to play because of the money," Atsu said. "We love our nation and we are going to play for our nation." Appiah said Wednesday that he had been having "sleepless nights" this week, and also said he had patched up his differences with Boateng after a training-ground altercation.

NKRUMAHIST GRAND AFRICAN UNIONIST PROJECT:
The Truth about Muammar Gaddafi of Libya:
Gaddafi Was No Friend of Africans…He only Wanted to Rule Them

Many Africans consider felled Libyan dictator Muammar Gaddafi a hero. It's not uncommon to see people on social media people use his photo as their profile picture or even post comments about how his removal from power and murder robbed Africa of its best leader. That Gaddafi for some people shares the same exalted place in the pantheon of great African heroes as Nelson Mandela is a shame. Gaddafi only cared for Africans when he wanted something in return. Don't take our word for it, here is the truth about what Gaddafi thought of Africans in his won words and those of the people close to him.

Like in the story of the elephant and the six blind men, slain Libyan strongman Col Muammar Gaddafi, came off as a different person to different people. Most of his countrymen knew him as thin-skinned dictator who broached no dissent. To the West he was bloodthirsty narcissist who meant them harm. The late US President Ronald Reagan famously called Gaddafi "The mad dog of the Middle East".

Gaddafi the gift giver

But to many Africans, Gaddafi was a hero on a par with any the continent has ever produced. Many on the continent, till this day, mention him in the same breath as Kwame Nkrumah, Patrice Lumumba and, yes, even Nelson Mandela. Why is that? Part of the reason for it was Gaddafi was never afraid to stick it to the West. For obvious and legitimate reasons, there's a deep reservoir of anti-imperialist feeling in Africa and Gaddafi knew how to play to those feelings, whether at the United Nations (UN) or when he held court at African Union (AU) meetings. The other way in which Gaddafi earned the affection of many on his continent was his reputation for showering people with gifts. The documentary “Mad Dog: The Secret World of Gaddafi” features many tales of people receiving wards of cash after meeting “The Brother Leader” . His largesse wasn’t just in the form of valuable currency either. He also showed his esteem in other more spectacular and permanent ways. For example, he built Uganda and Tanzania the largest and second largest mosques in the region.

The Real Muammar Gaddafi

How Bad Was Muammar Gaddafi?

Though he banged endlessly on about Pan-Africanism, Gaddafi at his core was an unrepentant racist who considered Africans to be beneath him. It is not hard to find out the truth about how Gaddafi felt about Africans. It is all on the public record. For example, during an official trip to Rome in August, 2010 Gaddafi very openly warned the Europeans about letting “ignorant” Africans through their borders because the “barbarians” will destroy their “advanced” continent.

“We don’t know what will happen, what will be the reaction of the white and Christian Europeans faced with this influx of starving and ignorant Africans,” he said.

“We don’t know if Europe will remain an advanced and united continent or if it will be destroyed, as happened with the barbarian invasions,” he added.

According to the BBC, Gaddafi made all these repulsive comments while standing next to then Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi.

It is not hard to find out the truth about how Gaddafi felt about Africans. It is all on the public record.

“Bring me that black slave”

If you’re still not convinced that Gaddafi was a racist in his heart of hearts, here’s another account for you. This one is by Gaddafi’s former chief of Protocol Nuri Al Mismari. Mismari had this to say to the Editor in Chief of Al Hayat Ghassan Charbel about how Gaddafi used to speak about African leaders behind closed doors.

“Imagine Gaddafi used to say to me. Bring me that black slave in reference to the president of an African state who was preparing to visit him,” said Mismari.

“And when the president would leave, he would say: The slave is gone. Give him something.”

When Charbel asked the former Chief of Protocol if Gaddafi despised Africans he replied: “Yes he did”. “Even those whose compliments pleased him. He described them as idiots,” said Mismari of his former boss.

King of Africa

Gaddafi’s contempt for Africans was so total that the continent wasn’t even his first choice of where he wanted to reign as King. He first tried out the charm offensive he later used in Africa in the Middle East. His efforts went nowhere because many leaders in the region saw he was unhinged and dangerous. When Gaddafi failed in the Middle East, he turned to Africa. He wanted African leaders to bow before him as their self-appointed King. The romance was good for both sides at first but then Gaddafi bared his teeth and revealed his true self. African leaders soon learnt that Gaddafi was dangerous if he didn’t get his way. He unleashed the forces of hell in West Africa through surrogates like former Liberian leader Charles Taylor who was trained and funded by him. Jenday Frazer (born 1961), the former U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, has said that during her stint at the US State Department, several African leaders confided in her that Gaddafi tried to kill them. In the end, even African leaders turned their backs on him. But Gaddafi would not relent. He saw becoming the “King of Kings of Africa” as his heavenly ordained right.

He wanted African leaders to bow before him as their self-appointed King. The romance was good for both sides at first but then Gaddafi bared his teeth and revealed his true self. So he changed tact. Instead of African leaders, he paid off traditional leaders from across the continent to crown him king and they did. Months before he was overthrown and killed, he was crowned the “King of Kings of the United States of Africa. The ceremony was attended and officiated by a motley crew of traditional leaders from across Africa, some of dubious reputation. Kenya, for example, was represented by Kamlesh Pattni, a disgraced swindler turned preacher.

In the end, Gaddafi bought what he wanted but even he must have known his victory was hollow. Some myths are harder to kill than others. Don’t let this be one of them. Gaddafi was a racist. Praising him as an African hero is a sign his own desperate myth-making worked better than even he planned. (Source: This is Africa)

4 Things To Know About Ghana’s Presidential Elections

December 7, 2016

Millions of Ghanaians head to the polls today to vote in the country’s Presidential election after months of campaigns, rallies and promises.

Here are four things you should know about Wednesday's Presidential elections;

There are 17 Presidential candidates; John Dramani Mahama of the ruling National Democratic Congress (NDC), Nana Addo Dankwa Akufo-Addo of the New Patriotic Party (NPP), Dr. Papa Kwesi Nduom of the Progressive People's Party (PPP) and Dr. Edward Nasigri Mahama of the People's National Convention (PNC).

The rest are Nana Konadu Agyeman-Rawlings of the National Democratic Party (NDP), Ivor Kobina Greenstreet of the Convention People's Party (CPP) and Jacob Osei Yeboah, an Independent Candidate.

The frontrunners are Ghana's incumbent President, John Mahama and legal luminary, Nana Akufo Addo.

Ghana's former First Lady, Nana Konadu Agyeman-Rawlings is also one of the candidates in the election. Over fifteen million voters are registered.

Ghana Election:
Meet the 7 Presidential Candidates

HOW AFRICA December 7, 2016

Ghana's incumbent president, John Dramani Mahama is seeking reelection after winning the last elections in 2012. He will come up against six other candidates in the race to secure a second four-year term.

The 54-year-old Mahama is flagbearer of the National Democratic Congress (NDC). Among the six other contenders are Nana Addo Danquah of the main opposition New Patriotic Party (NPP), a former first lady, three others and an independent presidential aspirant.

As part of our coverage of the elections, Africanews presents a profile for each of the seven candidates aiming to win Ghana's seventh presidential poll since the coming into force of the fourth republic in 1992.

John Dramani Mahama – NDC

President Mahama, 54, leads the National Democratic Congress (NDC) which has won four out of Ghana's six previous polls.

As vice-president, he was 'promoted' to President following the death of the then president, John Evans Atta Mills in 2012 with barely months to the elections. The party unanimously fielded him and he eventually won the vote.

The last four years is his official first term and he is gunning for a second term – the law allows for only two terms. Mahama, a graduate of the University of Ghana, has served in different political capacities including as Member of Parliament (MP) for Bole, located in the country's north.

He has also served as deputy minister in the first NDC government and rose to substantive minister at some point. He is married to Mrs Lordina Mahama.

Nana Addo Danquah Akuffo Addo – NPP

The 72-year-old Akufo Addo, leader of the New Patriotic Party (NPP) is Mahama's main contender. He is hoping to be third time lucky. He participated in the last two elections, losing in 2008 to the Late John Mills and then to the incumbent in 2012.

The trained lawyer has been at the forefront of Ghana's return to democracy having participated in some of the famous protests and mass action against the military government of Jerry John Rawlings in the late eighties and early nineties.

He has also served in ministerial capacities – he was Attorney General and Minister of Foreign Affairs at some point in the NPP government led by John Agyekum Kuffuor from between 2000 – 2008

Dr Paa Kwesi Ndoum – PPP

Ndoum, 63, is a seasoned politician but also an astute business man known for his investments in the hospitality, the finance and sports circles. He is founder of the Patriotic People's Party (PPP).

Ndoum is also a former MP under the Convention Peoples Party (CPP) the party he left to form the PPP. He also served as a minister of state under the NPP government.

This is not his first shot at the presidency, he contested on the ticket of the CPP in 2008 and on the ticket of the PPP in 2012. Like Nana Akuffo Addo, this is his third attempt despite hardly garnering 2% in the last two elections.

Ivor Kobina Greenstreet – CPP

Ivor Kobina Greenstreet is candidate of Ghana's oldest existing party, the Convention Peoples Party (CPP). The CPP was founded by the first president of the land, Osagyefo Dr Kwame Nkrumah.

In an earlier Africanews story, we described him as a unique aspirant because the trained lawyer is with a disability but he doesn't allow it to hamper his political pursuits.

He worked his way up the political ladder within the CPP. He served as a spokesperson of the party at some point before being elected as the General Secretary, incidentally he beat Nkrumah's daughter to secure the bid to represent the party on the presidential ballot paper.

Nana Konadu Agyemang Rawlings – NDP

Nana Konadu, aged 68, is the only female in the current race, she leads the National Democratic Party (NDP) a break away faction from the ruling NDC. Before joining the NDP, she was a vice chairman in the ruling party.

She is also a former first lady of the country. Her husband, Jerry John Rawlings ruled Ghana for almost two decades, first as a military ruler with the Provisional National Defense Council (PNDC) before overseeing Ghana's transition to democracy in 1992.

Konadu over the period that her husband served as president (1992 – 2000) and even the period after has been a strong champion of women and children affairs. She is president of the 31st December Women's Movement. – 31st December was the day her husband staged his second successful coup leading to the establishment of the PNDC regime.

Dr Edward Nasigre Mahama – PNC

Dr Mahama, a trained physician, is a veteran presidential aspirant, this is his fifth attempt at securing the presidency on the ticket of one of Ghana's traditional parties, the People's National Convention (PNC).

With his presence on the ballot, he is on record to have contested against every president that Ghana has had. He stood against Jerry Rawlings in 1996. He came up against John Kuffuor in 2000 and 2004, he contested Mills in 2008 and is up against John Mahama this year.

His party's candidate, Dr Hilla Limann, was the last president in the third republic. Rawlings overthrew Limann. Mahama will be looking to rekindle the spirit of Limann to annex the topmost political seat in the west African country.

Jacob Osei Yeboah – Independent Candidate

Jacob Osei Yeboah 44 years old (28 October, 1968), is a trained engineer, he is also an entrepreneur and a philanthropist gunning for the top political seat in Ghana.

Jacob holds an MBA from Warwick University, UK with Masters in Global Supply Chain Management from Mannheim University, Germany. He is married to Hilda Osei Yeboah (Mrs.) in 1996, with four (4) children, Jacobel, Janice, Jeremy and Jeffrey. Source: Africanews

Prisoners in Ghana allowed to vote in Presidential poll

HOW AFRICA December 8, 2016

Prisoners in Ghana had their chance to vote in today's presidential elections, the second time the West African nation allowed inmates to do so.

According to local news website Citi FM, about 2,276 inmates were registered to vote in the poll. Ghana's Supreme Court ruled in 2010 that prisoners had the right to vote, giving them the chance to take part in the selection of the country's political leadership.

Analysts expect the elections to be a closely contested affair between incumbent President John Mahama and Nana Akufo-Addo, a veteran politician and former foreign minister. In total, there are some 15 million registered voters.

Polling started at 07:00 GMT and will close at 17:00 GMT across the West African country. Ghana is an exporter of gold and cocoa, and is one of Africa's most successful oil exporters.

GHANA ELECTION:

Anxious Ghanaians Waiting for Election Results

HOW AFRICA December 8, 2016

Ghanaians faced an anxious wait Thursday for the results of a nail-biting presidential election tainted by sporadic outbreaks of violence, with no clear favourite emerging from the early provisional results.

The high-stakes race between incumbent John Mahama and rival Nana Akufo-Addo is seen as a litmus test of stability for one of Africa's most secure democracies.

Results will trickle in over the day, with the final winner expected to be announced at the earliest late Thursday.

Initial provisional results released by Ghana’s election agency showed neither candidate gaining the upper hand.

Early Thursday, the Electoral Commission website was down but it tweeted the provisional results of six of the 275 constituencies, with Mahama scoring 62,930 votes and Akufo-Addo 62,220.

Election fever gripped Ghana's capital Accra, with people out in the streets late into the night as counting of the thumbprint votes got under way, many standing behind red police lines and closely observing the blue-shirted election officials.

Mohammed Kamil, a trainee teacher, told AFP he wanted the new government to "create jobs for the youth… that will bring us peace and harmony."

Sporadic reports of violence and technical problems marred the vote although the election was seen to have gone well overall.

Voting was delayed in the Jaman North constituency until Thursday "due to security concerns," the Electoral Commission tweeted.

The commission also reported that supporters of Akufo-Addo's New Patriotic Party (NPP) had beaten one of its officials.

In another hiccup "hackers" had caused its website and election results app to crash.

Despite the problems, accredited observer Christopher Fomunyoh, regional director for the US-based National Democratic Institute, said the vote had gone well.

"It's just impressive to see how the Ghanaian civil society have taken this on, to monitor and report on the process."

Akuffo-Addo had told his supporters that "vigilance is key" at the polls in an attempt to avoid a repeat of the 2012 vote — narrowly won by Mahama with 50.7 percent — that he contested unsuccessfully in the country's Supreme Court.

"We wish to state emphatically that the NPP will not allow any person, persons or entity to subvert the will of the Ghanaian people and that all necessary steps will be taken to protect the vote," party campaign chairman Peter Mac Manu said in a statement just after midnight.

Mac Manu said the NPP has an "ever increasing possibility of being declared the winner by the Electoral Commission with a strong parliamentary majority."

After voting yesterday, Mahama voiced confidence the election would “consolidate that democracy further”.

There are seven candidates battling for the top job — including former first lady Nana Konadu Agyeman-Rawlings — and if the smaller parties perform well and deny either frontrunner a majority, a run-off vote will be held later this month.

Charismatic Mahama, 58, is running for a second term. The leader of the ruling New Democratic Congress (NDC) party has urged voters to "stay the course", promising to deliver more infrastructure projects.

Akufo-Addo, 72, is making his third and likely last bid for highest office. He has blasted Ghana's poor economic growth estimated at 3.3 percent in 2016 — the slowest rate in two decades — and outlined how to get the economy back on track.

Ghana’s opposition leader Akufo-Addo wins presidential election

HOW AFRICA December 9, 2016

Ghana's main opposition leader Nana Akufo-Addo won Wednesday's national election, defeating President John Mahama, electoral commissioner Charlotte Osei said on Friday. "It is my duty and my privilege to declare Nana Akufo-Addo as the president elect of Ghana," she told a news conference in the capital.

Looks like the battle is over in Ghana's Presidential Elections and it is breathtaking. Nana Akufo-Addo of the New Patriotic Party (NPP) has won Ghana's presidential election with an absolute majority over incumbent President John Mahama, two influential private radio stations has announced today being Friday 9th, December 2016.

Ghana's main opposition leader, Nana Akufo-Addo, has won the West African country's presidential election with an absolute majority over President John Mahama, two influential private radio stations said on Friday. Ghana is a beacon of democracy in a region that has seen a series of civil wars and coups with a record of peaceful elections in which power has alternated between two main parties.

Joy FM's website showed Akufo-Addo winning 53.27 percent of the vote and Mahama on 44.93 percent, based on its count of 233 constituencies out of 275 in total. Citi FM gave Akufo-Addo 54.97 percent based on 231 constituencies.

If confirmed, the results would represent a bigger margin of victory than either party has achieved in recent elections and validate Akufo-Addo who lost by narrow margins in 2008 and 2012. Mahama appealed for calm and told his supporters he would respect the outcome of Wednesday's vote whether he won or lost, in comments aimed at defusing tension ahead of the release of official results expected Saturday.

In Mahama's words:

"I want to assure the nation that we will respect the outcome of the election, positive or negative, and so let us just be calm," he told supporters gathered outside his house".

His campaign chief said on Friday the party lost many parliamentary seats but hopes to win the presidency. The country is eagerly awaiting official results but Ghana Electoral Commissioner Charlotte Osei said they would be announced by Saturday once technical issues had been resolved.

Ghana's incumbent President, John Mahama has conceded defeat in Wednesday's national election to opposition leader Nana Akufo-Addo, several sources said on Friday. The concession quelled tensions at the end of a day in which independent voting tallies showing an Akufo-Addo victory in the presidential and parliamentary election had been broadly accepted but there were no official results.

Update:

"The call (from Mahama) came just a few minutes ago," Boakye Agyarko, a senior aide to Akufo-Addo, told Reuters.

Supporters of Akufo-Addo's New Patriotic Party (NPP) broke into cheers and dancing his residence in the capital Accra when news of the call broke on local media. Car horns blared and fireworks erupted across the city, witnesses said.

AMAZING NEWS
FAKE US EMBASSY BUSTED IN ACCRA

Ghana's Criminal Investigations Division, working with US State Department officials, has raided a fake US embassy in Accra. The "embassy" issued illegally obtained but authentic visas, the US State Department reported.

The "embassy" was a pink two storey building with an iron roof, flying the Stars and the Stripes flag outside the so called "embassy." Inside was a portrait of President Barack Obama. Authentic and counterfeit Indian, South African and Schengen zone visas, and 150 passports from 10 different countries, were seized along with a laptop and smartphones.

Unbelievably, it was said to have been operating for about 10 years. The fake embassy was open three mornings a week and did not accept walk-in appointments. Instead, applicants were given interview appointments over the phone. Clients were drawn from across West Africa and offered US visas for upwards of $6, 000 each. President-elect Donald Trump has yet to comment on the matter.

A Remarkable Speech Delivered By Nana Addo Dankwa Akufo-Addo, President-Elect Of The Republic Of Ghana

HOW AFRICA December 9, 2016

Ladies and gentlemen of the media, fellow Ghanaians,

“A few minutes ago, at 7:51pm precisely, the President of the Republic and the NDC presidential candidate, H.E. John Dramani Mahama, called me on the phone to congratulate me on my victory in the presidential election of 7th December 2016. He wished me the best of luck and God’s blessings, and assured me of his full co-operation in organizing the transition from his administration to mine. I thanked him for this graceful gesture, which is in the finest traditions of Ghanaian statesmanship and, on my part, assured him of my cooperation for a successful transition. I also thanked him for his service to our nation and said that I felt sure that his contribution to the welfare of our Republic was by no means over. I have also received words of congratulation from my other competitors, Mr. Ivor Greenstreet, our former 1st Lady, Nana Konadu Agyeman Rawlings, Dr. Papa Kwesi Nduom, Dr. Edward Mahama, and Mr. Jacob Osei Yeboah. I am grateful to them.

The Chairperson of the Electoral Commission, Charlotte Osei, who is the returning officer for presidential elections, in fulfilment of her constitutional obligations, has tonight, at 8:54pm, declared me the winner of the 2016 presidential election, with 5,716,026 votes, representing 53.85% of the valid votes cast. I am grateful to her for the announcement and her words of congratulation.

I thank Almighty God for His grace and favour in granting victory to the NPP and myself in this election. As His Word says in the Book of Holy Scripture in Ecclesiastes chapter 3 verse 11, “He has made everything beautiful in its time.”

There has never been a more humbling moment in my life, and I thank you, the good people of Ghana, for this massive show of support and the confidence you have reposed in me and my party. I make this solemn pledge to you today – I will not let you down and will do all in my power to live up to your hopes and expectations. You are to be commended for the mature, peaceful and orderly manner in which you, once again, exercised your democratic franchise. The democratic credentials of our nation have been further enhanced by your conduct.

The Electoral Commission, under its new leadership, with Charlotte Osei in the Chair, is to be congratulated for organising this credible election. She and the Commission have allayed the fears of many about their capacity to conduct a good election. This election has contributed to strengthening the principles of democratic accountability in our body politic and the Commission will take a considerable part of the credit for that welcome outcome. Our security services are to be commended for ensuring a generally peaceful conduct of the poll, and doing so in a professional manner. That is what the nation expects of them.

To members and sympathisers of the great Elephant family, to our illustrious former President of the Republic, His Excellency John Agyekum Kufuor, to our founding members, leading figures, members of Party organs, parliamentary candidates and Members of Parliament, current and past national officers, regional, constituency, electoral area and polling station executives, thousands and thousands of volunteers, polling station agents, Kufuor-era appointees, campaign officials and staff, so ably led by Campaign Manager Peter Mac Manu, and to my running mate, the next Vice President of the Republic, Alhaji Dr. Mahamudu Bawumia, and his dynamic wife, Samira, I say a big thank you to each and every one of you for your hardwork, commitment and encouragement, and for your belief in me and in my leadership of our party over the last 8 years. Whilst this occasion would understandably lead to widespread jubilation amongst party supporters, I entreat them to respect the peace and the property and lives of everybody, especially those of our political opponents. We are the party of the rule of law, and we should act accordingly with magnanimity in our moment of victory.

To the senior citizens of our country who have given me invaluable advice over the years, amongst them, the former President of the Republic, His Excellency Jerry John Rawlings, the former Secretary General of the United Nations, His Excellency Kofi Annan, Otumfuo Osei Tutu II, Asantehene, the former Chief of Defence Staff, Gen. J.B. Danquah, the Chairman of the NPP's National Council of Elders, the veteran statesman, C.K. They have assured us of the great importance the international community attaches to the growth of Ghanaian democracy.

And to my beautiful wife, my beloved Rebecca, who waged such a great campaign in her own right, my daughters, Gyankroma, Valerie, Dokua, my sister Marigold, my brother Edward, and my entire family, I, firstly, must apologise for taking you on this rollercoaster ride. I am, however, very grateful for the love and support you have given me, and for standing shoulder to shoulder with me through the years till now. Long may it so continue.

Let me pause to remember colleagues who fell in the course of our campaign – Adams Mahama, Otanka Obetsebi-Lamptey, J.B Danquah Adu, Peter Wiafe Peprah, Abubakar Saddique, Kwabena Boadu, and others. May their souls continue to rest in perfect peace in the bosom of the Almighty until the last day of the Resurrection when we shall all meet again. Amen.

Fellow Ghanaians, you have not elected me to serve one party, but to serve the entire nation. The President of Ghana is President for every single Ghanaian, without discrimination, malice or ill-will to any ethnic group or political or religious affiliation. Whether you supported me or not, whether you campaigned for me or not, whether you voted for me or not, I can promise you one thing. I will do my best to serve your interests, and put our country back on the path of progress and prosperity. God did not put us on this rich land, a land blessed with an abundance of human and natural resources, to be poor.

I am confident, and I have faith that, with God's guidance and your active help and hardwork, we will move our country forward. Together, we will change Ghana, and use all the blessings that the Almighty has bestowed on us to bring prosperity to our people and nation in our time. Together, we will fulfil the destiny of Ghana, the destiny of freedom, justice and prosperity that the ancestors and founders of our nation defined for us. God bless our homeland Ghana, and make our nation great and strong."

Is Ghana among the most peaceful countries in Africa? Why?

Ali Sarpin Former Writer Jul 13

There are various reasons why Ghana is amongst the top 10 most peaceful countries in Africa.

1 - Ghana is 50% Akan, descendants of ancient farming societies who generally were a peaceful bunch.

2 - Although the Akan are the majority, they do not abuse the other minority tribes.

3 - Ghana is predominantly a Christian country. In comparison to the Muslim countries that surround them, Ghana has managed to contain Islamic militants and nomadic groups that often try and disrupt the peace in West Africa.

4 - The Ghanaian government doesn't sponsor terrorism. On the other hand, the government of some other African countries have their hands deep in terrorism. For example, the Nigerian government (primarily run by Fulani Muslims) is tribalistic and actively engages in state-sponsored terrorism to kill various other ethnic groups (who are primarily farmers). Farmers are not safe in Nigeria. The government is importing various Fulani nomads from across Africa to take the land of our farmers. This has triggered food shortages and an insane amount of violence.

5 - The Muslim groups in Ghana are not as brainless as the ones in Nigeria. The Hausa people in Nigeria have for far too long, protected and sympathized with the Fulani nomadic groups (known for being terrorists who invaded West Africa from the north) because the Fulanis were also Muslim.

The Hausa in Ghana are not as weak. They don't tolerate the Fulani groups as easily as those in Nigeria. Generally speaking, Ghanaians don't tolerate violence and they certainly wont tolerate the violence carried out by nomadic groups that have destroyed Nigeria (and are trying to destroy the entire West African sub-region). Nigeria, Mali, Central African Republic and parts of Cameroon are currently being destroyed by these nomadic groups.

6 - Ghanaians are very observant of their country's happenings. When crimes are committed, they talk about it all over social media and rant. Unlike Nigerians, they don't turn a blind eye to crimes. Nigerians are more selfish. They only care when crimes directly affect them. They are also more tribalistic and don't care when crimes are committed against other tribes.

7 - Ghanaian military is less corrupt than other West African countries. A few years ago, a group of cattle nomads from outside Ghana tried to annihilate villagers in their farms. The Ghanaian army was swift to catch those criminals and killed them and their cows.

Innocent cows are getting killed because the only language their nomadic owners understand is brutality. It's 2021 and they don't want to set up ranches like most civilised nations. They want to roam around, destroy our farming lands, kill innocent people, and be pests to others.

Also, because many of these cattle nomads are black Muslims who are mixed with Berbers. They feel they are above black people and refuse to obey laws in lands ruled by black people.

They never ever try and invade lands in North Africa (where their Arab/Berber masters live). Their terrorist acts are always against the blacks.

Since the Ghanaian military took action against them, they haven't tried their nonsense in Ghana. But we know cattle nomads love revenge. We know they are secretly plotting revenge. Revenge killings are part of their DNA.

That's why West Africans must keep both eyes open for these enemies of our blessed fertile lands who are secretly plotting to destroy our peace.

Why is Ghana called Ghana when the Ghana Empire was in present day Mauritania and Benin called Benin when the Benin empire was in the present day Nigeria?

Mali was a Malinke Mande state, not a Soninke one like Wagadu/Ghana. The expansion of desert renders much of the latter quite different than it was even late in its existence (11th/12th c.) so there's no big huge "Ghana identity movement" in Mauritania, Mali, and in other western Mande lands.

That said, few African nations have a single primary historical group, so national names tended to look for something inclusive. For example, Ghana was chosen as a tribute to the empire, instead of using the colonial name (Gold Coast) or one that would alienate various powerful population groups like Asante or Fante. It was a deliberately pan-African statement by Kwame Nkrumah and his circle.

Kwame Nkrumah Memorial Park.

Benin is slightly different. It was renamed in 1975 from Dahomey, which was the original kingdom colonized by France. Its renaming had to do with an effort to also break away from a single-group kingdom past. It is called Benin because of the Bight of Benin, not the kingdom. However, I can't imagine the Obas of Benin (who still sit on the throne in western Nigeria) caring for it. Dahomey also had unsavory connections with the slave trades, another reason to jettison it once it was not a polity in operation.

Mauritania is a case I'll have to look up again, as I do not trust my recall.

Other names of polities with more continuity of popular identity or leadership are reflective: eSwatini, Botswana, and Lesotho come to mind immediately; one could argue Uganda is similar, as are Egypt, Morocco, and even Algeria. But quite often, the moment of decolonization was a moment for new educated elites to forge an identity bigger than tribalism, not tied to a single past beyond honoring it (for the pan-Africans) and looking to it as a way to move forward. Other times, they simply sought to do away with the baggage of older names to represent a new way of thinking.

Ultimately, not many had a great investment in preserving a particular name, and remaining “traditional leaders” still get regional names and titles (like Asante) except in the few cases where they do have political power or where a territorial name has come to mean more even though it represents only one region of the original territory (Kenya). Many non-elites within the states do not feel a particular dedication to the nation, which further lowers the stakes but is itself a problem in terms of the goals of state-building

The "War of the Golden Stool" was a war that took place in 1900 between England and the Ashanti Empire in Ghana, that was apparently triggered by an actual golden stool. What was so important about the stool?

Kevin Richardson
PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin August 18

You're talking about the Sika dwa, the golden stool of the Asantehene or King of Asante; the war in question, sometimes called Yaa Asantewaa's war, was actually a rebellion against the British occupation of the Asante state (Asanteman) triggered by a very specific disrespect of that stool. The basic situation was this: As pointed out elsewhere, the mythology of the Sika dwa does have it descending from the heavens to the first of the Asantehenes, Osei Tutu I, in 1698 or so when he was still Kumasehene or king of Kumase. In building the Asante Confederacy, Osei Tutu needed a symbol that would elevate Kumase above other Akan city-states, particularly Denkyira, that had proven difficult rivals.

The stool provided that, because Akan cultures carried a common belief that a family stool was a place of rest for the soul as well as the body. As the greatest of the family, the stool was most vital of the possible symbols of spiritual and temporal rulership, and meant this for the whole nation. It is a wood stool that is ornately decorated with precious materials and particularly gold.

The issue of the war turned on its symbol of rulership. In 1896, faced with a British military column, the Asantehene Agyeman Prempe I elected to capitulate and be deported rather than bring the Maxim guns down against his people. The "war" was rather contrived, and really designed to force the issue of British overlordship, and they got their wish. In 1900, the Governor of the Gold Coast (Sir Frederick Hodgson) decided to further establish British supremacy by taking the protectorate one step further when announcing formal annexation: he demanded the remaining Asante royals produce the Sika dwa so that he, the Governor, could sit upon it. Well, besides not being Asantehene, Hodgson didn't understand that nobody was ever actually permitted to sit on the stool—kings were lowered over it and raised back up, when installed—so his demand was an act of profound disrespect to the very spirit of Asante. While elders were deliberating what to do about this incredible outrage, the Queen Mother of Ejisu, Yaa Asantewaa, took the initiative to rally people to the banner of war to eject the British from Asanteman. If not for four Maxim guns and some defenders from northern Nigeria, the strongpoint in Kumase might well have been overrun. In the meantime, the Asante royals still in Kumase buried the Golden Stool in an unknown location. Although British relief columns put down the rising and completed the annexation of Asanteman to the Gold Coast colony, they did not find the stool.

The Sika dwa, however, still threatened to cause another rising two decades later. From its hiding place, it was unearthed by some non-Akan workers building a road in 1921, found the stool's burial site, and pried off some of the ornaments before someone else discovered their find and it became known to the remaining Asante family heads and leadership in the country. They demanded, unwaveringly, that the British must return the stool and hand over the looters for trial and punishment by Asante law. By this time, the British had seen so much difficulty in trying to impose themselves on Asanteman that conciliatory measures were far preferable and might actually begin to salvage feelings between the two groups. Note that the Asantehene Prempe I was still in exile in Seychelles at this point, as he'd been for 25 years (he wrote many appeals to the British for return based on history, which were published in book form some years ago), with many of his family. To wave off the Sika dwa again would be inviting a further rising, beyond simply being bad PR. So the British decided to let the Asante courts in Kumase try the road workers; the court sentenced them to death, which the British commuted to exile, in an agreed-upon solution. The British colonial government paid to have the stool restored and returned to Kumase the next year, which paved the way for the return of Prempe from exile in 1924 and his resumption of the throne. So the story of the Golden Stool in Asante-British relations does not end with the war in 1900! The stool is still in existence today, though it is rarely seen unless a new King is being installed. Although the function is now more ceremonial, it is still a fundamental part of Asante's identity and pride.

(For more on the war and Asante society, see Natasha Gray, "Yaa Asantewaa and the Asante-British War of 1900-1," International Journal of African Historical Studies 38, no. 2 (2005): 383-407.)

Is Ghana really a poor place in Africa?

Yes and No. It depends on how you define poverty.

Josalone Wordsworth

CEO at 12 pencils (2016–present) Updated October 9, 2019

Yes: because we still have slums like India, China. We have homeless people because they choose to migrate for a “better life" in the cities. However, I believe homeless Americans are more than ours, at least our homeless population have large parcels of land for farming and shelter in their hometowns.

In short, the majority of Ghanaians do have the means to live a decent life. We lack some of the niceties of life and surely do not enjoy a luxurious lifestyle as most Westerners do.

No: because in her song “Coat of Many Colors” Dolly Parton sang that “one is only poor only if they choose to be”.

We are one of the richest countries in the world. We have a good number of all major natural resources. Gold, bauxite, magnesium, cocoa, coffee, timber, beautiful beaches, great history and cultural heritage.

Our diverse culture and cohabitation is exeptional. We are arguably the only country in the world that have the most peaceful Christian and Muslim coexistence (visit Nima in Accra and you'll see churches close to mosques).

So why are we portrayed as a poor nation is because of bad media representation. We are just fine. Of course we can do better with better governance and less corruption. But so can any nation.

No study can significantly point out truthfully why Ghana can be considered a poor country. At least we have a peaceful democracy than most other nations.

We have more potential of growth and sustainability than many advanced countries. We need investors who are open-minded with good intentions to really make this world (including Ghana) a better place.

Ghana is not an advanced nation yet, however its one of the fastest growing economies.

What is it about countries like Ghana and Nigeria that helps them develop at a quicker rate than some other African countries?

Jeff September 27, 2018

There are many things I do love about Nigeria, having lived and gotten married there to a citizen, but it’s not the best choice, even in West Africa, to argue as a model for development.
I’d argue policies and leadership are what make or break a nation, and while tradition and a good political organization can help prevent certain blunders, ultimately it does come down to who is head of state, as we in America are painfully experiencing.

Resources can be helpful, but can also be a two edged sword: oil has caused more turmoil and corruption in Nigeria than aid in development. Mind you, with the right leadership Nigeria’s petroleum wealth could make it the powerhouse of the continent, but to date that remains a mirage.

Ghana has been quicker to focus on tourism and stability and has captured regional leadership of many foreign embassies, and is forging ahead in this new century. Nigeria’s greatest strength is surely its people, but this too is a double bladed weapon: the nation has more than it can easily educate, employ, or utilize effectively.

In the end it comes down to who is at the helm, and how well they steer the ship of state.

ANCIENT AFRICAN HISTORY:
Why had those that stole artifacts from Nigeria, never been called thieves?

Originally Answered: Why have those that stole artifacts from Nigeria never called tieves?

Well they are thieves.
The British museum is the den of thieves and if they return the loot, it would be empty. In fact, there is nothing British about in that Museum.

However the British government keeps claiming that they are storing the artifacts for humanity. As they will get lost in their original countries. This I find hilarious. The Egyptians been demanding their artifacts back especially Rosetta Stone Egypt has the world best Egyptology museums in the world.

The Greeks are been treated like some backward banana republic when they demand their artifacts back. Especially the Parthenon marble also called Elgin Marbles

So what are the chances of us getting ours back to Nigeria?

Can we talk about the most famous of the Nigerian artifacts? Benin ivory mask a mask of Queen Idia.

Created in the early 16th Century. So our ancestors had no problems safeguarding it for centuries. Yet once stolen, they are safeguarding it for us because we are no longer able to?

The British stole it during the 1897 invasion of Benin, along with thousands of others.

The Binis recorded their history in art form, there was no written language. So the British stole our historical records and not only just artworks. Benin Bronzes for example

Is the historical record of the first arrival of the Portuguese to the Bini Kingdom. Also been “protected" in the British museum.

So the Fastac mask as it became known, now lives in the “British” museum. It became most famous when it became the symbol of FESTAC 77 . Nigerian government asked for it back. British refused. Nigeria asked for it to be loaned back for the festival. A bill of millions were presented by the British.

So we the Edos made a new identical one for the festival.

One day I got a phone call while in the UK. It seems that someone is gathering people from historical Edo families in the UK for an class action against Sotheby's auctioneers.

Sotheby’s to sell rare Benin ivory mask in London

It turns out that some private owner has their hands on another mask of Queen Idia. The private owners turned out to be the family of the same commander that attacked Benin City in 1897. So not only did he steal in the name of the British Empire, but stole from the British too by keeping some for himself.

We got lawyers and Sotheby's pulled the artifact from its listing. We contacted the Oba's (Kings) palace in Benin City, but they were slow to make an official demand for its return.

So the mask again vanished from public view. Bet their children will try selling it in a few decades again. Our children will be waiting. And this time we will be ready.

Saying that. Other descendants of soldiers that looted Benin are coming forward by themselves and doing the right thing. Returning what their grandfathers stole.

This British pensioner flew to Nigeria to return what his grandfather took. He presented it back to the Bini People with an apology. What a star!!

Unfortunately the UK does not have those morals, and will continue holding on to the loot claiming they are just looking after it for us.

To answer your question.

Everyone even the British people call them stolen, so indirectly calling those that did it thieves.

But that will not get your stuff back. They are holding onto it with both hands and feet. Even protecting the private thieves as not to set a precedence that may force them to empty their Museum.

Many yes ago, I was on a guided tour of the British museum. When someone asked were the Russian and German halls were. The guide said they did not have sufficient artifacts from those areas to make a hall for them. Someone from the back said. “Just say you could not conquer them, and steal their stuff"

Why do most people believe that Ghana is more better than Nigeria?

Afam Orji Lives in Nigeria September 3, 2018 Originally Answered: Is Ghana better than Nigeria?

There’s no word i hate more than “Best” and “Better”. That’s because those are relative terms which depends on what exactly we’re talking about. There are areas where Ghana is better than Nigeria and vice-versa.

Ghana has a higher standard of living and is generally cleaner and has lower levels of crime and unrest. it also has relatively better educational institutions.

Nigeria on the other hand is more economically viable which means that more money can be made in Nigeria and businesses do better in terms of volume. Nigeria also is better for enterainment.

So, really, it depends on what you are referring to.

They each had their own trajectories. Part of the reason that we see them as individual great empires rising and falling is that we historically have a minimal understanding of this region. It is helpful to instead think of this region as having continuity in terms of shared culture — sometimes called “Mande core rules” — and the transitions (in some ways) like some of those that happened in the eastern Mediterranean between successive kingdoms often having very similar cultural norms.

Ghana wasn’t an Empire, but rather an urban center with tight connections to numerous but probably semi-independent resource-producing specialist areas. In the 13th century, these connections ended as some of the resource-producing regions became centers themselves and as Ghana experienced serious warfare over control of trans-Saharan trade with the Almoravids based in the Maghreb.

This period of fragmentation ended with the rise of Malinke Mande-speakers based in Niani (related to the Soninke of Ghana, but it’s more complex than that). Again, Mali was arguably more of a confederation than an “empire.” The Keita family held it together by constantly reaffirming ties with other important Mande extended families (like the Conde) and by supporting their expansion to the edges of the Mande zone and beyond (as far as the Atlantic). Some urban areas, like Timbuktu, were semi-autonomous with locally-appointed officials ruling alongside governors appointed from the center, or so most interpretations seem to suggest. Mali is usually depicted as collapsing in the late 15th century, but this isn’t quite right. Instead, it lost its regional hegemony (and indeed its control over Niani) to the rising power of Songhai, but it still remained independent and sovereign as a single state until, in the 17th century, it fragmented due to conflict among rival “royal princes” who represented different branches of the royal family.

I don’t know a lot about Songhai, to be truthful, but in the late 15th century, its rulers benefited from a good position in shifting regional trade routes and dissatisfaction at Keita hegemony.

Sundiata Keita was the founder of the Mali Empire and is popularly referred to as the Lion King Striking eastward (away from the Mali empire), they built up a large rival state and then turned their attention to controlling the key trans-Saharan trading towns of Djenne and Timbuktu. This gave them the wealth to build a centralized regional power. However, succession led to internal conflict that fractured the state in the 16th century, provoking an invasion from Morocco.

As you can see, succession problems were a big problem in this matrilineal society that did not have clear crowned successors but rather allowed key male members of the ruling matrilineage to “apply” or “compete” for thrones. So too was the recurrent threat of invasion from Morocco.

There’s probably a lot more to say, and undoubtedly much of this is in dispute. However, it’s what I’ve gathered over many years of trying to teach this period and place (despite really being a historian of the 19th century).

Why do Africans not welcome African Americans and vice versa?

Anthony M Anderson Loves Africa 9h

This question is much misleading
We africans do welcome african americans because they're our brothers and sisters abroad who went to the new world from africa during the slave trade era.

Ghana is one of the african countries which welcomes african americans and they celebrated the year of return in 2019 to welcome them and the rest of the diaspora

Most africans what they don't like about african americans is that they're influenced by western culture especially that from Hollywood. Western culture is currently seen as a threat to the existence of African cultural identity.

I do have a positive view on black Americans as an African and I gave you an answer!!

At the peak of slavery in the continental United States, what percentage of the population would have owned one or more slaves?

Kevin Richardson PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Nov 9

The answer to this question somewhat depends on what you mean by 'owned'. In the strict legal sense of the word, the 1860 census reported just shy of 395,000 slave owners living in the antebellum Southern United States, which represents approximately 3.2% of the population of the South in that period, or just 1.2% of the population of the total United States. Superficially, that seems like a very small figure that makes slave-holding a rare and marginal practice in White society — this is a contention often made by Confederate apologists and White supremacists. The reality is that figure dramatically understates the significance of slaveholding in the United States in 1860.

First and foremost, the count of 395,000 is a count of individual slave owners — people, usually men, who are recorded as owning in law one or more slaves. That count does not consider how many individuals had direct access to, and benefited from, slave labour. On average, throughout the South, 27% of free family units had at least one slave owner in them. Across the Lower South where the plantation economy was at its strongest, slave owners belonged to well over one-third of the proportion of families; in South Carolina and Mississippi, very nearly half of all free families owned at least one enslaved African American person, meaning that more than half of the White population directly benefited from slave labour. Although the vast majority of these slave owners were not plantation owners — most were small farmers - most slaves did live and work on plantations. If the head of a household owns a slave, it stands to reason their spouse, children, close friends and other close relatives all stand to directly benefit from slave labor.

This is to say nothing of people who benefited from slave labour despite not being in a slave owning family themselves. It was a widespread practice in the southern United States for slave owners to hire out the services of their forced labourers for a wage or fixed price (payable to the master not the slave), and in cities and towns, enslaved people were employed in all manner of trades and public services that non-slaves benefited from. Although from the perspective of African American people, plantation life and work were the normal condition of slavery, White slave owners and beneficiaries employed slave labour in every aspect of Southern life imaginable — in agriculture, in industry, in commercial enterprises, in artisan trades, in rubbish collection, in domestic service and so on. We must likewise consider those who were intimately involved in slave exploitation in the plantation or urban economy without necessarily being part of owning families: overseers, satellite farmers, slave traders and patrollers, doctors and preachers, etc etc.

Something else that must be emphasized is the extent to which slave ownership was a financially and economically privileged institution. The cost of purchasing even a single enslaved person was enormous; in the 1850s, you're looking at well over $1,000 to acquire a single male fieldhand. In terms of its purchasing power, $1,000 in 1855 is about $21,000 today; its true value, accounting for differences in quantity and distribution of wealth, is closer to $390,000 (in other words having $1,000 in 1855 will buy you as much as $21,000 today, but having $1,000 in 1855 makes you about as wealthy relatively speaking as having $390,000 today does). Consider this account of a slave auction in Alabama in early 1854:

Woman and small child, $1050; man aged 19, $950; man and wife aged 18 and 17, $2000; boy aged 14, $640; girl aged 10, $525: man aged 24, $860; boy aged 11, white, $585; boy aged 11, white, $625; woman aged 25, $900; man and little boy, aged 50, $1020; woman age 46, $395; man, with the gravel , aged 19, $700; man, perfect aged 40, $1600; woman 40, girl 8, $600; man aged 27, $1410; boy aged 12, $725; girl aged 4, $300; girl good looking, aged 14, $855; girl, a little blacker, aged 15, $845.

[from The Liberator, "From the Car Leader", April 21, 1854]
N.B.: this is from a radical abolitionist newspaper; two boys are referred to as 'White' because they are lighter in skin, but they are still African American. It's a rhetorical tactic, drawing attention to the hypocrisy of Southern White racial ideology and to sexual abuse in slavery.

Even a little girl of just four years old costs $300 — almost $9,000 in terms of modern purchasing power, and much more in terms of relative wealth. The best possible workers, from whom an exploiter could gain immediate economic benefit, cost well in excess of $1,000, with prices consistently rising right up to the Civil War. This was not an institution that it was easy to just walk into even as a member of the White middle class; although it could be and usually was enormously profitable to invest in slavery, the upfront costs were not insignificant if you did not inherit slave labour. It is not remarkable that so few individual White Southerners owned slaves — it is perhaps remarkable that so many families did given the financial barriers. Slavery was an institution that brought with it not just the potential for enormous profit and the mitigation of one's own work load but also the prestige and social privilege of visible wealth.

For many non-slave holding White people, especially White men, one day being a slave owner was something to aspire to — owning slaves was a symbol that you'd "made it" in life. You had wealth, you had independence, you had security, you had prestige. Even lower-income White families who did not stand any realistic prospect at ever entering the slave owning classes still benefited from the privilege contemporary racial ideology bestowed on them, which automatically elevated White people above Black people. Racial prejudice largely transcended boundaries of class, religion and gender, especially in the 19th century South.

By 1860, almost 4million of the South's 12 million people were enslaved African Americans. In half a dozen states, the enslaved population made up well more than 40% of the total. This was an institution that was thoroughly entrenched in Southern society — it was not just a society with slaves, it was a slave society. Whilst comparatively few individuals owned slaves, a sizeable and substantial plurality of White families did; many, many more people benefited from access to slave labour without being slave holders, and many of those aspired themselves to one day be slave holders. So even though ownership in the legal sense was comparatively uncommon, family ownership was exceptionally prevalent and slavery itself was thoroughly embedded in Southern society and culture. Nor were those benefits reserved just for the South, either — there were many in the North who had benefited economically and socially from the fruits of slave labour, and Northern society remained deeply racially prejudiced in its own ways.

Hi, thanks for your comments and questions.
My principal academic research focuses on colonial and post-colonial Zimbabwe, so I have had a difficult time over the years reconciling differences between what academic scholarship has to say on racial discrimination. The biggest problem I have found (especially with questions such as the original one I first responded to) is a generalization. In talking about racial discrimination in Southern Rhodesia, I have to put a hundred years of history into a few thousand words. Obviously, laws, policies and social attitudes were constantly changing throughout that period, and especially during the escalation of the liberation struggle from the mid-1960s, so you will always be able to find exceptions to the broader picture.

That being said, I would like to address your questions and comments theme by theme, if that's okay.

i) Laws regarding Africans in certain areas

The specific legislation this relates to is both municipal and state. On a state level, the Town Location Regulations and the subsequent Native Urban Location Ordinance (no.4 of 1906) both made it a criminal offense for an African to be outside of a native location (i.e. in any European area) unless on his employer's property or with a signed and dated pass from his employer. [for reference see C.Palley, The Constitutional History and Law of Southern Rhodesia, 1888-1965 (Oxford, 1966), pp.122 and 144]

Salisbury and Bulawayo municipal by-laws reaffirmed such laws and stated that Africans outside of native locations before 7 am and after 9 pm would be detained if found without a signed pass from their employer, a municipal authority, or the security forces. [see Native Registration and Pass Laws, n.d. (1945), The National Archives/28685]

These policies were again expanded in October 1960 by the Vagrancy Act which empowered to police to arrest without warrant any person in a non-native area who could not show that he was employed or had adequate means of support. This included citizens and migrant laborers (referred to as aliens) and did not take into account the length of time spent in Rhodesia, only the country of birth.

Referring as well to laws regarding social mixing, the most pertinent law was the Immorality and Indecency Suppression Act which made it an offense for miscegenation, particularly between a Black man and White woman. In 1957 amendments were suggested to include African women and European men, and the motion was passed in the House but never ratified.

There is an article here which goes into greater detail about this topic. This, however, brings me on to your second point.

ii) Distinction between the law and the enforcement

With everything that I talk about here and talked about in my original answer, there is a fundamental distinction between what was codified and what was subsequently enforced. Laws on social mixing or on African access to European liquor, for example, were both routinely flouted — for example, at the UCRN. Similarly, the number of convictions under the Immorality Act was relatively low (see the article sourced above). Yet these laws were inherently discriminatory on the basis of race and that they may not have been consistently enforced across the nation does not detract from the fact that these laws existed and could be enforced if required. Individual experiences and particularly those of whites, who by the colour of their skin, legally existed in a different class to the African majority, can impact upon how such enforcement was perceived. Again, here, it is crucial to talk about the differences in enforcement during the Federal Period and the RF period, as an escalation in convictions did occur. Peter Godwin and Ian Hancock's Rhodesians Never Die (an in-depth account of White society, politics and policies), for example, states that between 1964 and 1973, the number of arrests for breaches of either the Immorality Act or the Native Urban Location Ordinance jumped by almost 1300 percent (p.11).

Furthermore, despite the success of campaigns by various organizations like the CACBA mentioned earlier, racial segregation largely continued unabashed, particularly in rural areas where the majority of the African population resided. Small victories (the desegregation of public swimming pools and state restaurants, such as on the railway dining cars) were largely overshadowed by the large-scale policies of the Land Tenure Act, the Land Apportionment Act, and the Land Husbandry Act which were all rigorously enforced up until the mid-1960s. The only genuine challenges to these all-encompassing acts emerged once military action against the state had begun and White control over the TTLs and African Purchase Areas became fragile and increasingly reactionary. The Land Apportionment Act's racial segregation was savagely indicted by the Constitutional Council in 1964 as a breach of human rights in the territory. The Council stated that the Act is the embodiment of racial discrimination and [...] in express terms and with penal sanctions, enforces it [...] The reasons which were originally advanced for the passing of the Act whether or not they were valid at the time, are no longer valid today [...] The implementation of the Act has been responsible for not only intangible prejudice but actual material prejudice in the financial sense, to all races in Southern Rhodesia [...] discrimination and prejudice in the essence of the Act [...] Every principle in the Act has been condemned by an exception made to it either by the Act itself or by a court decision or by Federal intervention [...] One wonders at what stage the Act ceases to be the Magna Carta of the European and becomes a farce.

Such condemnation by a Rhodesian organization not only highlights that White society was not homogenous (something which has been repeatedly researched and proven), but also demonstrates that such condemnation meant little to the RF state at this point (i.e. when it had military superiority both in terms of anti-insurgency and over public disorder). Despite the huge discrepancies in size between the African and White population — by 1971, the White population was outnumbered 20-to-1, and each year more African babies were being born than existed Whites in the entire colony — and yet land remained divided almost equally between both groups.

You mention also the concept of emergency measures due to the war — yet the majority of the emergency measures had been introduced long before the nationalist forces had organized anything like enough to trouble the state. The Declaration of Emergency of 1958 which gave Whitehead an excuse to arrest a huge number of nationalist leaders, also gave rise to the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act (a horrific piece of legislation which dramatically circumscribed the liberties of Africans and ensured the police and security forces had legal backing to repress any anti-colonial activities with force. The Unlawful Organisations Act, the Preventative Detention Act, and so on were all introduced in the 1960s, long before the first White civilian was killed by guerrillas. The fear of a majority rule ('black peril') or of what was happening in the Congo, where Africans were enacting their revenge on a very small proportion of the White population, was a factor long before any war in Rhodesia. The Land Husbandry Act was particularly brutal as it saw excess cattle killed to meet quotas, regardless of local circumstances, and affected poorer and smaller African livestock farmers more significantly than their White counterparts. (if the Native Commissioner was told to kill 1/10 of the cattle and an African farmer has only 5 cows, he instantly suffers more than one of the White farms with a hundred.)

To read further on the issue of racially segregatory policies and how they were supported in practice, I would recommend Ngwabi Bhebe and Terence Ranger's Society in Zimbabwe's Liberation War, and perhaps most significantly an article by Claire Palley 'Law and the Unequal Society: Discriminatory Legislation under the Rhodesia Front from 1963-1969', Race, Vol.XII, No.1 (1970).

For more intimate accounts and personalized accounts, David Caute's Under the Skin highlights both African and White perspectives on racial segregation in practice.

To be honest, though, there is a significant amount of literature that discusses such policies from a multitude of perspectives. Ngwabi Bhebe's chapter in Canaan Banana's Turmoil and Tenacity, titled 'The Nationalist Struggle, 1957-63', makes a very strong case for why African opposition to such policies developed rapidly between 1957 and 1963 and became public mass movements. A march of 3000 people in July 1960, for example, resulted in the worst riots seen thus far in Salisbury, and saw police shoot dead 12 people and arrest over 700 for a variety of crimes, and led to calls within the Internal Security Weekly Reports for a much harsher response to even non-violent breaches of the law, including social mixing.

iii) Enfranchisement

Moving on now to issues related to the vote. Of course, as you pointed out, many Whites also did not have the vote. Yet such a fact does not negate the truth that the enfranchisement qualifications were inherently and deliberately racialist, and the proportion of Whites who could not vote, versus the number of Africans who could not should emphasize this point.

The White population numbered about 100 000 in 1933 versus an African population of about 3.4 million — yet out of an electorate of 28 515, only 58 were African. In 1958 the White population was about 158 000, the African population was 4.3 million, and the electorate was 55 802 — yet only 560 were African. That 33% of the White population had the vote, versus 0.00013% of the African, in a country where the White population was a tiny minority should indicate the racialist intent of such qualifying criteria. (All figures from National Archives of Zimbabwe documents, including census records — analyzed in Josiah Brownell's The Collapse of Rhodesia).

The idea of a non-racial voters roll was espoused by the governments of Todd, Whitehead, and Welensky right up until the RF's electoral success in 1963 but such concepts were naturally flawed — the qualifications were deliberately high, there was no specific deadline or plan to balance White and African votes, and the number of MPs in parliament remained racially divided - a European could fill an African members seat, but not vice versa - and out of the total 56 seats made available in the 1961 constitution, only 14 were for African MPs. Even if Africans could out-vote the whites, they couldn't get an African majority in Parliament.

iv) Labour Migration

Labor migration into Rhodesia from neighboring countries was not unique - many Malawians and Zambians went to Southern Africa or Rhodesia simply because there was a greater level of industrial development (i.e., mining) and thus it was possible to earn more in such countries than it was in the largely subsistence agriculture or cash crop economies of Malawi of Zambia.

View of the Kariba Dam, located on the Zambezi River between Zambia and Zimbabwe, seen here around the time of its completion. In the foreground are two young men of the indigenous Tonga population. Photograph by Ilo Battigelli. Gwembe Valley (Middle Zambezi Valley), Zimbabwe. 1959–1960.

The copper belt along the Kariba provided a good source of income for workers from both sides of the river (and White and African Zimbabweans could be found in Zambia as frequently as the other way round). Zoe Groves has written about just this thing in two articles (‘Urban Migrants and Religious Networks’ and ‘Transnational Networks and Regional Solidarity’) and the points she makes regarding the waged labor available to such migrants in Rhodesia, is buttressed by the point that a much larger proportion of migrants went to South Africa for work despite its apartheid. The simple reason was that despite the relative differences between White and African wages within South Africa or Rhodesia, waged labor on the mines paid significantly more than comparable agricultural-based labor in Malawi, at least until the 1970s. In fact, many migrants were just temporary — as this paper shows, Malawian migrant labor returned en masse to Malawi following independence and with the development of Banda's economic policies.

There was also a fundamental labor shortage in Zimbabwe. Despite the vast proportion of African males, Zimbabwe still drew heavily from the labor reserves of Zambia and Malawi. Since labor in Rhodesia was designed to prevent African advancement and specifically competition between African and European skilled and unskilled laborers for the same jobs, the desire for a cheap labor policy would naturally incline the management of businesses to employ cheaper Africans, or at least that was the fear. The railway system was one key example — Rhodesia Railways set out in 1974 to integrate grades and salary scales, and introduce Africans to the lower levels of skilled jobs (Learner Diesel Drivers or Junior Enginemen, for example). The White trade unions protested, stating that more Africans would apply for these jobs forcing the young Whites without a trade or good O-levels to emigrate, thus causing a fundamental change in the racial composition of the labor force. (See Godwin and Hancock, Rhodesians Never Die, p.128) As a result, the company kept Whites and Africans on separate pay scales.

Your point about conditions is fair though — conditions on the copper belt, or the Rand, or in Zimbabwe's mines were fairly equal, regardless of whether their government was Black or White. Giovanni Arrighi has explained why this was the case — a desire for stabilization of the workforce to prevent the retardation of specialization that a migrant labor force entailed. (see page 55 of this article. The benefits of trying to keep their labor forces outweighed the marginal costs of improved working conditions, and ironically it was the massive input of funds from the Federation (between 1953 and 1963) that generated almost £260 million after-tax for Southern Rhodesian industries (largely consisting of mining royalties and dividends taken from Northern Rhodesia's Copperbelt and thus hampering Northern Rhodesia's post-independence development for at least a decade) that permitted Southern Rhodesia's mines and manufacturing industries to improve more than their counterparts to the north, even after the Federation ended.

v) Tax

Tax is an awkward issue but can be simplified — even tax paid by Europeans was largely paid with money earned through the exploitation of cheap African labor. Also, only a tiny percentage of state expenditure on Africans came from European taxes. African taxes funded African areas and vice versa. To give a specific example, let's consider Bulawayo.

The Africans who worked in the factories around Bulawayo and lived in the Black townships paid their rates (council tax), as did the factories they worked in, to the City Treasury. Of that amount, the township where the African workers lived received $R0 for general municipal services. Similarly, of the money earned from the White ratepayers of Bulawayo, $R0 was given to the African township. Instead, the White Superintendent of the township relied upon beer revenues of about $R8 million a year collected from the Africans themselves to be able to provide basic rights to the African population (water, electricity, roads, buses, and other general public services). All taxes and local rates were spent on White services and White areas, including the majority of the rent and rates that came from African employees and their White employers. (Taken from Caute, Under the Skin) It should be remembered also that by the mid-1970s, the White war effort cost about $1 million a day, and had to be subsidized by the South African government for almost 50 percent. Rhodesia also suffered four years of economic stagnation between 1973 and 1977, and a shrinking tax base due to emigration and a refusal to pay taxes by rural Africans, further compounded the issue of state expenditure. Further facts and data can be found in Philip Daniel's Africanisation, Nationalisation, and Inequality (1979) and W.H. Morris-Jones From Rhodesia to Zimbabwe, especially pp.115-116). Also see Marcia Burdette's 'Industrial Development in Zambia, Zimbabwe and Malawi' in Studies in the Economic History of Southern Africa.

vii) Ordinary rural Africans

There has been a significant body of work done on the opinions and attitudes of rural Africans to all of this. Terence Ranger's Peasant Consciousness and Guerrilla War in Zimbabwe: A Comparative Study (London, 1985) was the first and perhaps most comprehensive text, but other studies by Norma Kriger (Zimbabwe's Guerrilla War: Peasant Voices) and Heike Schmidt ('The Social and Economic Impact of Political Violence in Zimbabwe, 1890-1990: a case study of the Honde Valley', Ph.D., University of Oxford, 1996) have also brought forward the rural experiences and opinions of the majority of Africans.

I know I haven't answered everything you asked, and feel free to ask anything else, but I hope this has helped. I'm an academic, yes, but I'm also a Zimbabwean Africanist. For the 5 million Africans in Southern Rhodesia, racial segregation was prevalent, and affected them socially, politically and economically. Comparisons with South Africa are naturally made and the fundamental difference between them was simply that the Whites had been in South Africa 300 years longer than they had in Zimbabwe, so apartheid there was naturally going to be more advanced and the size of the White population would also play a part.

Africa is left behind because of African's attitude towards goods made at home and the ones made abroad.

Both those in government and those not government, the elites and the masses all have a bad attitude towards goods made at home and good attitude towards goods made abroad.

They make local goods seem inferior and foreign goods seem superior.

Her Majesty The Queen is currently monarch of 16 independent nations - the Commonwealth Realms. This will go down to 15 on 21st November 2021, when Barbados becomes a republic.

Here's the list (as at 4th November 2021):

- Antigua and Barbuda
- Australia
- Bahamas

- Barbados
- Belize
- Canada
- Grenada
- Jamaica
- New Zealand
- Papua New Guinea
- Saint Kitts and Nevis
- Saint Lucia
- Saint Vincent and the Grenadines

Why did some Americans believe that Martin Luther King Jr. was a communist?

Brent Cooper Trial and appellate counsel for Cooper & Scully (1993–present)
Nov 25

Primarily because of his association with others who were members of the Communist party.

In the first part of 1962, Attorney General Robert Kennedy approved a request from FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover to install wiretaps on the home and office of a New York City-based lawyer named Stanley David Levison. According to FBI informants, Levison had been an influential member of the Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA) as late as 1956. They believed he was now wielding influence in a different way—as a top adviser to the nation's most prominent civil rights leader, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

As King's fame and stature grew over the next several years, the FBI intensified its surveillance of him under its domestic counterintelligence program, COINTELPRO, arguing it was a matter of national security. The bureau's relentless scrutiny of King failed to reveal any communist leanings. However, it did turn up evidence of King's extramarital affairs. Hoover and his agents then tried to leverage that information not only to discredit and weaken King as a leader of the civil rights movement, but to blackmail him into taking his own life.

King preached actively against communism from the early 1950s onward, arguing that it was fundamentally incompatible with Christianity Despite this, he was forced to defend himself against allegations that he was a communist throughout his career.

James Earl Ray on April 4th 1968 in Memphis. If you want to remember the day try listening to U2's in the name of Love.

James Earl Ray was an escaped convict who was a devout white supremacist, he actually wanted to leave the US and go to Rhodesia which at the time had an equivalent to an apartheid government.

He originally plead guilty in an obvious effort to avoid the death penalty in Tennessee , if you plead guilty the death penalty while it technically could have been used was nearly reserved for jury conviction. As soon as his conviction was entered he withdrew the guilty plea and spouted off some nonsense (in my opinion) regarding a conspiracy.

While a civil jury found for the family of MLK on conspiracy its not likely that occurred. The Justice Department looked into it repeatedly, including by Janet Reno at the personal request of Coretta Scott King. I have sympathy for the family but the conspiracy desire is really the same thing I've seen in many conspiracy theory proponents which is a desire to avoid the randomness and to make a death mean something. Ray was something of an escape artist having broken out of jail on 6 different occasions and was actually serving a de facto life sentence when he escaped (he was serving more than 100 years). His hatred of Dr. King was also oft mentioned by fellow inmates. He bought a rifle in small store in Birmingham Alabama claiming he was going hunting with his brother and using a fake ID.

Dr. King's life has great meaning, it's a testament to that equality in the US while still far from perfect, is far superior to the country he found. He made the world and country a better place , not by armed conflict but because he specifically refused to arm and defend himself at times. No greater shift in this countries' leanings came than perhaps images of Alabama Sheriff Bull Connor turning fire hoses and dogs free on school children. It galvanized many people across the country to “do something” and to demand change take place in southern states.

What do we know of the first ship to slaves out of Africa? What about the last ship to legally carry and sell humans in the Americas? Do we’ve copies of its manifests? What led them to traffic people? What was their mindset toward their captives?

Josue Dennis Chance

It seems that slaves were first transported across the Atlantic sometime in the early 16th Century, but in very small numbers; in the early years of European (primarily Portuguese and Spanish) colonization of the Americas, experiments in using local, Native American slaves were made. These first African slaves were likely domestic slaves of merchants, nobles and the like. At most, groups of maybe 20 slaves may have been transported, but not as part of any 'trade' in the sense we understand today.

In 1517 a license was granted to Jorge de Portugal to import 400 Black slaves in the Caribbean, but it seems the license was never executed. Then, in 1518, the Spanish on Hispaniola (modern-day Haiti/Dominican Republic) requested Black slaves to replace the indigenous population they'd already managed to work to death. As a result, a license for 4,000 was granted.

It therefore seems — and the records are either lost or very limited — that the 'first Transatlantic slave ship' began its voyage in late 1518 or early 1519. By the early 1520s, ships were regularly transporting around 200 slaves at a time; this figure ultimately reach as high as 1,000 in the 18th Century.

The last slaver is much harder to establish, as the trade continued well after abolition began to roll out across the world. For example, the Royal Navy's West Africa Squadron ('The Preventative Squadron'), which existed from 1808-1867, seized some 1,600 slave ships during its existence, but when one considers that Brazil did not abolish slavery until 1888, a trade almost certainly continued until around that time.

However, the last legal British slaver was Kitty's Amelia, which was cleared to sail on 27th April 1807. Abolition came into effect on 1st May of that year. One could argue that as the Royal Navy would effectively claim international jurisdiction to eradicate the slave trade, Kitty's Amelia was the last legal slave ship.

The last known US ship to bring slaves to America was the Clotilda, in the summer of 1860. The subsequent Civil War put an end to any further voyages.

"As the Founding Fathers said, [slavery] was the necessary evil upon which the union was built." - US Sen. Tom Cotton. How accurate is this statement?

Kevin Richardson

PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Updated Oct 1

There is a lot packed into this, so I'm going to try to get a quick overview down and then we can deal with more details in follow-ups if necessary.

It's possible someone did, but I'm not aware of any founder using the phrase. The general concept is often attributed to them, usually through Jefferson's metaphor of enslaving being like having the wolf by the ear: you can't let go or you get bit but also holding on is a good way to get bit and also to make the wolf want to bite you.

Calling enslaving a necessarily evil is usually done in the context that it is unfortunate in some ways, and the speaker regrets them. That may even be true, though American founders get graded on so generous a curve that even the most useless and vague condemnations of enslaving are treated as spectacular moral victories. Actually arguing to keep people enslaved is often insufficient to disqualify a founder from being deemed antislavery, a situation so absurd that to state the argument is to refute it.

Yet here we are. So what's it mean to say that slavery is a necessary evil?

First off, it means one is in favor of slavery. Whether we're talking specifically about Jefferson's metaphor or a more generalized appeal to worse consequences, the necessary evil argument is that enslaving people may be unfortunate in some abstract sense, but not enslaving them is worse. To all of this, we must add that it is far worse for the enslavers. They, not the enslaved, would risk loss of property, wealth, and lifestyle that they stole from the bodies of the people they enslaved. As people who closely equate their property and lifestyles with their actual persons and worth as human beings, this is a horror almost beyond comprehending for most American enslavers. The kicker, of course, was that these were tremendously important to them and also still less important—or so one hopes—than the safety and lives of themselves and their loved ones.

Enslavers knew better than anyone except the enslaved themselves, just what went into keeping people enslaved. That goes double when the enslaved outnumber the Whites in the area by a large proportion — a common situation in the cotton states, which include Cotton's Arkansas—and call it triple for the common case in such places that they also outnumber the Whites present in the household. Slavery is violence, torture, and rape used as a system of labor and social organization. Enslavers know that and also know what they would do if such a thing were done to them and theirs. If the enslaved were freed, then must it not mean that they would turn the tables at once? A genocidal race war must then prevail. Preventing that imagined cataclysm, on top of the other stuff, makes slavery necessary so far as the necessary evil argument goes.

Where does that leave us?

The enslaved are always subjected to treatment which White Americans understand that they should feel free to answer with violence should it be done unto them. Emancipation will always involve a loss of wealth and property because enslaved lives are both, and also the engines by which more of each can be acquired. They must, therefore, remain enslaved forever. At no time does the imagined necessity vanish — it cannot while slavery exists — and therefore, enslaving must go on until the end of time. If there is no circumstance under which one will countenance a plan of emancipation, one cannot even in the most minimal sense be construed as anything more than a staunch defender of enslaving people.

So yes, Thomas Jefferson and company are proslavery theorists. They are committed, first and foremost, to the preservation of slavery and were often enough prepared to scuttle the Union itself should enslaving be materially threatened. -No one took them up on the bet, but it was credible enough to get substantial concessions at Philadelphia. These, in turn, act to preserve slavery, not slowly strange it.- Their counterparts outside the major enslaving states can do much, much better, but few of them go around calling enslaving in any respect necessary. It's, to them, just an evil and one which some of them devoted considerable energy to removing nearer to home. It's still not an evil for which they're prepared to sunder the Union and so they are still prepared to countenance unspeakable horrors to preserve their national project, which cannot be forgotten or minimized...but they do a damned sight better than a few Virginian blowhards for all that the bar is low enough to be buried in the center of the earth.

To stop here we must of course exclude the founders from lesser enslaving states, which had successful — if often quite slow and still controversial to Whites- emancipation projects. We must also exclude the great many White Americans, founder and otherwise, who enslaved Black Americans happily. The spectrum of thought, even just confined to White elites, does not run from "slavery is terrible and end it immediately" to "slavery is awful but what can you do except keep it forever?". The latter include most of the people who get talked about in this context, which says a great deal about traditional American discourse about slavery and none of it is remotely good. We must go deeper, as humans are habitual innovators in goods and evils.

South of Virginia, and even north of it and below Pennsylvania, save for a brief wave of emancipations after the Revolution, which still constitutes only a tiny minority of enslavers, finely-calibrated frowns about enslaving people drop off a cliff. The spectrum of White thought does not stop at people who make those choreographed frettings with whip in hand. We must also consider the enthusiasts, who believe enslaving people is right, moral, and good on its own sake. These people believe, as many of the necessary evil types also do, that an enslaving society is better than one based on free labor. Enslaving is helpful, even necessary, to cultivate proper civic virtues and demonstrate one's manhood. To be a person in good moral standing, to them, virtually requires being an enslaver. This reaches its formal heights in South Carolina's constitutional requirement that members of the legislature enslave a certain number of people to qualify for office, but goes far beyond that.

One may argue from a very selective and out of context reading of the documents, and the relevant histories, that these people somehow put slavery on a path to ultimate extinction. Lincoln and his Republicans made that argument. It was a useful one to make, politically, and I expect many of them believed it to be so. They were wrong. It is true that some founders, some of the time, think slavery will go away on its own. It is also true that many have no interest in that ending and would fight to halt its progression. They will scream bloody murder at even the thought of slavery's spread being limited in anywhere they expect it can realistically go. But if we take a hard look at the actions of the founders, evidence for such a conviction is, at best, insubstantial.

The founding generation can imagine a world without enslaving; they need only look to the north. They can imagine peaceful transitions to freedom and then enact them. They can also reject the same and insist not only that slavery must remain forever where it already exists but must be permitted to expand to new places where it will also remain forever, preserved against all hazards. To argue that "the founders" agreed on anything except, maybe, the wisdom of rebellion in 1776, is a tremendous reach. To argue they were of one mind about enslaving is to write fiction. Many don't care at all. Many are keen to step up enslaving. Those two groups effectively controlled the nation's government and directed its policy without significant challenge until the 1850s and without effective challenge until the states most committed to enslaving people, like Cotton's Arkansas, have withdrawn their representation in Congress by means of treason in defense of slavery.

All of this goes to say that historians ought to commend the Senator on the accuracy of his pronoun use. Should this quest for knowledge imperil his notion that the United States is and was, as he says in the article "an imperfect and flawed land, but the greatest and noblest country in the history of mankind," that does not make it bad history. If patriotic myth cannot withstand historical investigation, then it is not the historian's task to preserve the myth.

Ça me rappelle l'histoire du major Mahama, un militaire ghanéen qui faisait partie d'un peloton déployé dans une communauté rurale afin de combattre les mines illégales.

Le major Maxwell Mahama

Un bon matin, alors qu'il joggait dans le village, il s'est approché d'une marchande pour acheter de ses produits. Cette dernière, remarquant son arme, s'est mise à crier à l'aide, croyant qu'il s'agissait d'un voleur.

Malgré tous les efforts du major Mahama pour la convaincre que ce n'était pas le cas, il a rapidement été encerclé par une foule.

Il a dégainé son pistolet pour tirer des coups de semonce en l'air, mais ce ne fut pas suffisant pour repousser la foule. Il a été tabassé, dénudé et immolé par des gens qu'il avait pourtant juré de protéger.

Ses meurtriers n'ont toujours pas été traduits en justice plus de deux ans après ces actes terribles.

Alors à mon avis, si vous êtes entouré par une foule hostile, tirez un coup de semonce. Si ça n'envoie pas un message assez clair, faites ce qu'il faut pour avoir la vie sauve.

What is the true origin of the Ga tribe in current Accra Ghana, West Africa?

Angelis Revocatus Ancient History Narrator (2019–present) 17h
Ancestry DNA shows they are descendants of the Ga tribe from Accra Ghana.

The Guan people of Ghana are believed to have migrated to their present-day land around 1000 years ago.

Throughout the culture and history of the Ga-Dangmes of Ghana, is a very strong conclusive evidence that they are direct descendants of the Hebrew Israelites that migrated to West Africa by way of Egypt, Ethiopia, Sudan, Lake Chad, Ile-Ife, Dahome, Togo and to the Gold Coast (modern Ghana). Their cultural practices, laws and customs and even, some of their names are so identical to those described in the Holy Bible. Thus, the only logical conclusion to make is that they are, as they claim descendants of Biblical Hebrew Israelites.

Considering the Holy Bible, we find names of GaDangmes, their customs and tradtions, such as the Homowo Festival (see, Exodus 11:4-7; Exodus 12:1-50; Exodus 13:1-9; Numbers 9:1-5), names of some of their towns and villages (such as Tema (Job 6:19, Isaiah 21:14), Ada, Hebron, La, Osu, etc); GaDangme proverbs and laws (similar to the Ten Commandments, Exodus 20: 1-17) etc., are so identical to those in the Bible, and along with their oral history, the only logical conclusion one may make is that the GaDangmes are, as they claim descendants of Biblical Hebrews Israelites.

Oral history had it that Ga-Dangmes people migrated from Israel about 6th Century B.C through Egypt, then to Ethiopia, having been expelled or exiled by the Assyrians ..

In Ethiopia, they settled in the Gonder Province in northern Ethiopia, where the Blue Nile originates. That is where the name NAI WULOMO, meaning, HIGH PRIEST OF THE NILE comes from. In 640 B.C, the Assyrians attacked the Ga-Dangmes again while they were in Ethiopia. From Ethiopia, they travelled through Southern Sudan and settled for a period of time at Sameh in Niger and then to Life in Nigeria. They migrated again in 1100 A.D and settled at Dahome and later, travelled to Huatsi in Togo where they stayed briefly.

Though the birth of the full name “Ga-adangbe”, occurred shortly before the British colonization of the present Ghana, the individual sub-nations of the Ga-adagbe nation existed before the British nation and Europe in general.

I'm not sure if people in Africa and around the world still don't know or are not aware (due to ancestral brainwash we have suffered for ages) that many African tribes, especially those carrying Y-DNA Haplogroup E1b1a, such as the Bantu tribes and some Niger-Congo A tribes, of which I believe Ga, Igbo, etc., are among them, are the true Israelites!

The difference between the tribes like Ga, Igbo, Lemba, Beta Israel vs other Israelite tribes is the fact that those four tribes woke up out of their slumber early, and came out to let the world know that they are the true Israelites. They decided not to exist, any more, in the "brainwashed minds" scenario that were well crafted by the colonists to make people forget their true history!

The Bible and Bible apocrypha, as detailed below, specifically tell us that the 12 tribes of Israel (first 10 then followed by the other 2) fled to Africa or what was also known as Arsareth (and some to Europe [Lydia] and to South Sea Islands or the Pacific Rim).

Isaiah 66:19 DRB

Just the same as these book excerpts below say, but in historical point of view…

The primitive Negroid race of men developed in Asia wandered eastward as well as westward. They entered on the one hand Burmah and the South Sea Islands, and on the other hand they came through Mesopotamia and gave curly hair and a Negroid type to Jew, Syrian, and Assyrian. Ancient statues of Indian divinities show the Negro type with black face and close-curled hair, and early Babylonian culture was Negroid. In Arabia the Negroes may have divided, and one stream perhaps wandered into Europe by way of Syria. Traces of these Negroes are manifest not only in skeletons, but in the brunette type of all South Europe. The other branch proceeded to Egypt and tropical Africa. Another, but perhaps less probable, theory is that ancient Negroes may have entered Africa from Europe, since the most ancient skulls of Algeria are Negroid.

all the Asiatic or Australasian peoples. Asiatic negroes also seem to have entered Australia from New Guinea and to have passed down the eastern part of that continent till they reached the then peninsula of Tasmania, not, of course, without mingling with the Australoids. There is a negroid (Melanesian) element in Fiji, and as far west as the Hawaii Archipelago and among the Maoris of New Zealand; in a much less degree also, in Burma, Annam, Hainan, Formosa, the Riu-Kiu Islands, and Southern Japan.

The Elamites of Mesopotamia appear to have been a negroid people with kinky hair, and to have transmitted this racial type to the Jews and Syrians.[1] There is a curliness of the hair, together with a negro eye and full lips, in the portraiture of Assyria which conveys the idea of an evident negro element in Babylonia. Quite probably the very ancient negro invasion of Mediterranean Europe (of which the skeletons of the Alpes Maritimes are vestiges) came from Syria and Asia Minor on its way to Central and Western Europe.

It is possible that in or on the verge of Arabia the ancient basal stock of the generalised negro parted, divided into two great streams of divergent emigration; one to proceed to Europe via Syria, and the other to pass through Arabia[2] to Egypt and tropical Africa. In Arabia or in Egypt (it may be) arose the difference between the long-headed African negro and the rounder, shorter-headed Bushman, the last-named becoming more habituated than his congeners to a life in arid deserts or scrubby, open country.

The African Negro was again differentiated (probably in East Africa) into three main varieties: (1) the prognathous "Strandlooper" type, of whom vestiges living and

DE, D and E descend from CT-M168

This is an indisputable fact.

Haplogroup CT is therefore the common ancestral male lineage of most men alive today, including all non-Africans and E derived 'black' Africans.

"This E lineage back-migrated to Africa through the Levant as hypothesized by Hammer et al. (1997)).

"The hypothesis of a back migration from Asia to Africa is strongly supported by the current phylogeography of the Y-chromosome variation, because haplogroup K2 and paragroup R1b*, both belonging to the otherwise Asiatic macro haplogroup K, have only been observed at high frequencies in Africa.

"Thus the major sub-sets of Y lineages that arose from the M168 lineage do not trace to an African origin."
YAP insertion signature in South Asia 2007

"We discovered more than 65,000 variants, including SNVs, MNVs, indels, STRs, and CNVs. ...

"Consistent with previous proposals, a parsimonious interpretation of the phylogeny is that the predominant African haplogroup, E, arose outside the continent.

"This model of geographic segregation within the CT clade requires just one continental haplogroup exchange (E to Africa), rather than three (D, C, and F out of Africa).

Haplogroup E and its parent clade DE originated with CT Eurasians.

So how did haplogroup E come to be acquired by 'black' Africans such as the Bantu?

"Regions near but external to northeast Africa, like the Levant or the southern Arabian Peninsula could have served as an incubator for the early diversification of non-African uniparental haplogroup varieties like Y chromosome DE-YAP*, CF-P143* and mtDNA M and N molecular ancestors. These would have spread globally and diversified over time and space. This model would imply that both CF-P143 and the DE-YAP evolved nearby but outside Africa. One DE-YAP* ancestor would have spread to Asia and evolved to haplogroup D while another DE-YAP* returned to northeast Africa and evolved into hg E."
Saudi Arabian Y-Chromosome diversity and its relationship with nearby regions 2009

Although on the west coast of Madagascar a Bantu dialect is spoken, it is fairly certain that the tribes which speak it were originally either immigrants from Africa or, what I think more likely, were placed there against their will by the earlier Dravidian inhabitants.*

We have to look outside of Africa for the origin of the Bantu race. In trying to solve the problem we are necessarily thrown back upon the resources of Comparative Philology and,

* I do not consider myself qualified to pass an opinion upon the Lemurian theory, though I believe that there exists a good deal of zoological and botanical evidence in favour of it. But if Lemuria ever did exist, I am convinced that it became submerged before the human race entered upon its Western migrations.

man, which agrees with the Bantu well-known fact.

On these grounds I feel inclined to believe that the first invasion of Bantu in Africa came from some country near the mouth of the Indus, or a little to the west of it, and this would agree with the account given by Rawlinson. These probably landed in the present Somali-land (the ancient Punt) and driving the old Hottentot population before them, made their way to the neighbourhood of Lake Victoria Nyanza, where a portion of them settled, while another portion straightway worked their way to the west, where they became the ancestors of the Dualla, Mpongwe and other Bantu tribes of West Africa.

[redacted]

Of the second invasion of Bantu in ~~South~~ Southern Africa we have, however, more historical and trustworthy data. I have already shown that on account of the ancient Babylonian and Sumerian elements in some of the Bantu dialects, this invasion must have come from the mouths of the Tigris and Euphrates.

At the mouths of these rivers many of the old Sumerians had taken refuge, and their number had undoubtedly been strengthened by many Semites, who for some reason or other had considered it advisable to leave their original habitations. Nominally subject, these "Men of the Sea Coasts" were in reality independent of Babylonia, though there never seemed to be any trouble between them and the authorities. Matters changed, however, when, about the year 900 B.C., Babylonia became a dependency of Assyria, and the so-called King of Babylonia was really an Assyrian vassal. Many Babylonians, dissatisfied with the new regime, must have gone to the Coast, and strengthened the independent community which gradually was formed there. This community at last became so strong, that it became an eminent source of danger to the Assyrian Empire, and it would seem that the Kings of Assyria began taking steps to stop the continual increase of power of the "Men of the Sea Coast." The latter, thereupon, rose in open rebellion about 720 B.C. and found a capable and daring leader in Merodach-Baladan, the same person mentioned in II. Kings, 20. For some time the rebels had it all their own way, because the attention of the Assyrian King was drawn to other, more important, matters. They conquered Babylon and seemed to have penetrated to the very borders of Assyria itself. Then, however, Assyria determined to subdue the foe. For a considerable time a keen struggle went on between Merodach-Baladan and his sons on the one side, and the Kings of Assyria on the other. But though the Men of the Sea Coasts were assisted by the Elamites and the tribes west of the mouth of the Tigris, the power of Assyria at length prevailed. The rebels were completely vanquished; a huge slaughter took place, and those who did not fall by the sword left the country and sought refuge in the islands of the Persian Gulf. But Esarhaddon, the King of Assyria, equipped a large fleet and, attacking the rebels in the islands, succeeded in driving them even out of this refuge.

It is more than likely that the men who were thus driven out of their country, were aware that in or near Somaliland, on the neighbouring coast of Africa, there were living races who were nearly related to them. The Men of the Sea Coast were great mariners and traders, and if we remember that the great centre of trade in those days was the island of Socotra, it certainly is not surmising too much, if we believe that the Sumerians knew who lived in the country opposite Socotra. For that reason I believe that these fugitives, of whom nothing more is heard in Assyrian history, found a haven in Somaliland, and proceeded to join the Bantu tribes near the lakes. Assyrian chronicles place the flight of the Men of the Sea Coast in 680 B.C., so that this may also be considered the date when this second Bantu invasion of Africa took place.

It would seem that in the majority of cases the two elements passed into a perfectly black complexion; although improved in form and stature, and notwithstanding that they reside...

A remarkable fact in the history of Loango, in the empire of Congo, is, that the country, according to a statement which was fully credited by Oldendorp, himself a writer of most correct judgment and of unimpeachable veracity, contains many Jews settled in it, who retain their religious rites and the distinct habits which keep them isolated from other nations. Though thus separate from the African population, they are black, and resemble the other Negroes in every respect as to physical character.-It is probably in allusion to this case that Pennington (1827), in his "Text Book," says, "the descendants of a colony of Jews, originally from Judea, settled on the coast of Africa, are black."

As Dalby (1970 : 147) noted: "Sub-Saharan Africa is linguistically one of the most complex and fragmented areas in the world, and the detailed recording of all its languages, approaching one thousand, still represents a major task for descriptive linguists." Nevertheless, as the result of serious research developed in the beginning of this century, the Negro languages came to be grouped under two broad headings: the Sudanic and the Bantu. The coinage of names for this broad distinction reflects some of the history behind the efforts to categorize Negro languages.

This broad linguistic distinction had at one time unfortunate repercussions, for it led to the belief that the Negroes of Africa consisted of two distinct races; and, moreover, it led to the belief among some that the Negro came to Africa from Asia. Thus Goodwin (1951, 1 (i) 18) claimed that the Negro entered Africa from Asia between 7000 and 5000 B.C. and in two main linguistic groups. The first group, he held, was the Sudanic which arrived north of the equator and migrated south of the Sahara to the Atlantic, and the second, the Bantu, which arrived south of the equator and spread over southern Africa. Smith (1930 : 143) had likewise claimed that "The Negro peoples of Africa are divided into two main groups — one, the Sudanese Negroes, stretching across Equatorial Africa from the head-waters of the Nile to Nigeria and the Gold Coast : the other, known as the Bantu Negroes, occupying the region from the Great Lakes southward".

This division of the Negroes which was at first held to be a somatic one, is in

Man Buried With Machete, Bullet, Eggs And Pepper In Ghana

The funeral of the late Osei Tawiah, who was allegedly brutalised to death at Krofrom, a suburb of Kumasi, Ghana by some personnel of the Ghana Police Service, was held today. According to Adom Online:

"Relatives of the deceased who have suspected a foul play in his death despite an autopsy report by pathologists at the Komfo Anokye Teaching Hospital (KATH) claiming he died of natural causes, rained all forms of curses on suspected killers of the young man.

The relatives after reigning the curses, armed the corpse with offensive weapons including a machete and a bullet. Eggs, sponge, a pair of shoes, a cap, pepper and other items were also placed in the coffin of the late Osei Tawiah.

The items, according to the relatives of the deceased are meant to aid Yaw Tawiah in the spirit world to avenge his death. Continue reading visit link.

What armor did the Ghana Empire and the Sosso infantry wear?

Alton Allen Small Business Owner. (1990–present) Aug 22

This was not exactly what you asked for, I tried searching for museums that may housed specific Wagadu aka Ghana Empire armor and that of the Sosso, but to no avail, all I could find was a general theme of what folks in the Savannah civilizations, wore, at different times.

In Bornu, judging from the pictures that have been published, they used horse armor that looks much like the Japanese. They also used cuirasses, well designed and well made, fig. 90. They are built of strips of steel riveted together.

The above is from the Bornu empire, again not exactly what you asked for.

This is from Kano state Nigeria chainmail.

But what must be the most remarkable find in this area was a complete piece of frontal body armour (pl. XIV, 3). Made of thick ox-hide, moulded and tooled into a complex pattern of raised bosses and ribbed surfaces with half holes for the arms, it extends from the level of the eyes to the knees of the wearer. The piece was attached to the body by means of strings, of which some pieces remain in position. Fragments of a hide breastplate were found by Professor Emery at Ballana, but the latest find at Ibrîm must be accounted the finest example of protective military equipment yet discovered in Nubia. The circumstances of its finding indicate that it is X-Group. Possibly it is a development of the large oblong shields of raw ox-hide, which according to Strabo were carried by the Meroïtes who fought against the Romans under Petronius. In essence the Ibrîm armour is a large shield but attached to the body rather than worn on the left arm. The finding of the armour in this area may indicate that the rooms excavated once formed part of a guardhouse inside the East Gate in Meroïtic and X-Group times. However, no other weaponry was found in this area.

In my search I stumbled on this great pcs, it is a Merotic aka late Nubian or Kushite armor, I just add it because it's so damned fascinating.

In any case, African armies, used armor ,sometimes by defused influence from Eurasian neighbors, sometimes 100% of local invention.

Benin leather armor British Museum.

Keep in Mind inner Africans kept their lands from hostile take over, for X thousands of yrs, and all was not just due to climate, geography and viruses, but massive well equipped armies that did go toe to toe with the Persians, Romans, Umayyad and Rashidun invaders of opposite sides of the continent.

Today in History:
African of the millennium, Kwame Nkrumah

Voted as African of the millennium in 1999, little more can be added to the Nkrumah story that has not been said already.

He is more than just an icon to the Pan-African movement. He is a goal to be pursued, all the values he stood for and his vision for the African continent are a pressing need that should guide state leaders of the continent.

As we celebrate the anniversary of his birth, the man's warning to leaders on the continent should they fail to unite are what fill my reflections.

The balkanisation Nkrumah warned of in his book Africa Must Unite is here with us and sadly, only mere cosmetic approaches are being applied to solve the problem for political reasons. Ghana and Nigeria are still at a standoff as to how they are going to resolve the trade row; a visit from the leadership of the Nigeria House of Representatives to the Ghanaian Parliamentary leadership has done little to bring an end to the incessant attacks on Nigerian traders in Ghana.

Nigeria's land border to Benin remain closed to goods inflow and outflow, one of the greatest sufferers of the policy, Ghanaian traders.

The blatant neo-colonialism spreading throughout the land is more disheartening. Takeover of mining sites, oil fields and even state institutions by China, France, the USA and other big powers is just a drop in the ocean, far more disastrous than direct colonialism, as the Osagyefo prediction

All these besides, the inherent greed and lust for power that has engulfed the most incompetent of leaders on the continent is just annoying, simply put.

The likes of Alpha Conde and Faure Gnassingbe who all arbitrarily amended their respective countries' constitutions to perpetuate their stay in power jetting to Ghana on the call of Nana Akufo-Addo, newly elected Chairman of a discredited ECOWAS to force Mali coup-makers who ousted an incompetent president who lost his popularity to hand over power in a day is laughable at best.

The desire to appease foreign powers outside the continent is evident.

Nkrumah never dies, his followers say. His belief that Africa Must Unite in a bid to protect itself from balkanisation and neo-colonialism while pursuing a common goal still lives on.

The new scramble for Africa reaffirms Nkrumah's call for an African identity. The mindset of the African must be retuned to look for solutions within; if greed is set aside, it would be possible.

It is a dream bigger than the man himself, for "The forces that unite us are intrinsic and greater than the superimposed influences that keep us apart" – Africa Must Unite. Happy Birthday, Osagyefo Kwame Nkrumah

"Africa's Man of the Century"

Ekow Nelson January 2001

It is rather curious that readers of The Voice have voted Nelson Mandela "Africa's Man of the Century" with no equivalent award for Kwame Nkrumah, another of Africa's great leaders this century.

Mandela's successful opposition to apartheid makes him one of Africa's greatest political leaders of all time. He is quite rightly, to be admired for his commitment to his people, his determination to free them from the evils of Apartheid and for what he symbolises to many who are oppressed in many parts of the world. His subsequent willingness to forgive his enemies even after his 27-year incarceration by the Apartheid government of South Africa is an example in magnanimity from which the rest of the world can learn.

I do not wish to challenge, or indeed question, the judgement of your readers. However, whilst I dislike comparing great African leaders, I find it curious that a great man who spent most of his life, quite justifiably, fighting against the evil regime of apartheid South Africa, should be chosen over Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, who committed his entire life to the cause of liberating the whole of the African continent.

In many ways, however, this vote is a reflection of a tendency in the West to equate South Africa with Africa and an inclination to speak of the world's second largest continent as though it were a small country comparable, at least in size and diversity, to say France or Britain.

On the eve of Ghana's independence, Nkrumah did not only declare that "the independence of Ghana is meaningless unless it is linked up with the total liberation of the African continent", he backed his rhetoric with practical financial and political support for liberation movements in countries across the length and breadth of the continent including, Congo, Kenya, Rhodesia and South Africa amongst others. To Mali and Guinea, who were asset-stripped by the French colonial authorities at independence, he offered substantial financial and economic assistance.

Kwame Nkrumah's Vision of Africa

Last December, BBC listeners in Africa voted Kwame Nkrumah, the first head of an independent Ghana their "Man of the Millennium". But although Nkrumah triumphantly led Ghana to independence in 1957, by February 1966 he had been overthrown in a coup and spent the remaining six years of his life languishing in exile.

Omnibus explores what lay behind the coup and Nkrumah's untimely death.

Hero of Independence

Nkrumah became an international symbol of freedom as the leader of the first black African country to shake off the chains of colonial rule.

As midnight struck on March 5, 1957 and the Gold Coast became Ghana, Nkrumah declared:

'We are going to see that we create our own African personality and identity. We again rededicate ourselves in the struggle to emancipate other countries in Africa; for our independence is meaningless unless it is linked up with the total liberation of the African continent.'

But over the next few years he was increasingly regarded as an authoritarian and remote leader. In 1964 he declared himself president for life and banned opposition parties. Justifying his actions he wrote:

'Even a system based on a democratic constitution may need backing up in the period following independence by emergency measures of a totalitarian kind.'

Many Ghanaians celebrated when their former hero was overthrown by the police and military while he was on a visit to China in 1966. There was little response to Nkrumah's broadcasts calling for the nation to rise against the coup leaders. He died in exile in Romania in 1972.

An End to Colonialism

Nkrumah was born Kwame Francis Nwia Kofie in the south-west of the Gold Coast in 1909. In 1939 he left to study economics and sociology in America. There and in London he was active in the Pan African movement which was demanding freedom and independence for the colonies.

Nkrumah returned to his homeland in 1947 and became Secretary General of the United Gold Coast Convention which was campaigning to end British rule. However, in 1948 he was expelled from the organisation for leading a campaign of civil disobedience. He responded by founding the Convention People's Party in 1949, the first mass political party in black Africa.

“Our Independence is meaningless unless it’s linked up with the total liberation of the African Continent”

Imprisoned by the British in 1950, he was released the next year after the CPP’s landslide election victory. In 1952 Nkrumah became the country’s first prime minister. After independence in 1957 Ghana became a republic in 1960. But while Nkrumah worked to improve living standards at home his ambitions extended beyond national boundaries to the creation of a federal union of African states.

All For One And One For All

Explaining his vision in his 1961 book, I Speak of Freedom, Nkrumah wrote:

'Divided we are weak; united, Africa could become one of the greatest forces for good in the world. I believe strongly and sincerely that with the deep-rooted wisdom and dignity, the innate respect for human lives, the intense humanity that is our heritage, the African race, united under one federal government, will emerge not as just another world bloc to flaunt its wealth and strength, but as a Great Power whose greatness is indestructible because it is built not on fear, envy and suspicion, nor won at the expense of others, but founded on hope, trust, friendship and directed to the good of all mankind.'

However, few of the newly independent African countries were persuaded of the need to give up some of the power they had recently won, to a central parliament for the continent. Ghana was one of 30 nations that founded the Organisation of African Unity in 1963. But Nkrumah regarded it as inadequate as it was not the United States of Africa he longed for.

Arbitrary country borders drawn by colonial powers are often blamed for Africa's low level of development. What would have been the ideal alternative considering there is a multitude of different tribes?

Ben Ling · Follow By no means a geopolitical expert, but I like the subject Jan 11

Problem is, there's really no ideal way to divide African nations.
Religion? Oh but it's a bit too complicated.

Nope, still a bit unfeasible. (Also some of the other maps of ethnic groups were even more complicated.)

Languages? (Kind of goes hand in hand with the previous map actually)

Christianity
Islam
Hinduism
Folk Religions

Nope, still a bit unfeasible. (Also some of the other maps of ethnic groups were even more complicated.)

Languages? (Kind of goes hand in hand with the previous map actually)

There are countless other variabilities and diversities I just can't be bothered going into, which shows that creating ideal borders for Africa is pretty damn hard. Also, if all the borders were suddenly shuffled today, the amount of chaos and violence that would inevitably ensue would probably be on an unprecedented level. A continent-wide battle royal essentially.

Okay let's get serious…

Ghana or Gold Coast if you prefer was made up of many tribes. Like Fantis, Ga, Dagombas, Nzemas what have you. Now the Ashanti's don't make even half of Ghana's population at the time and now. The Akans who are made of Ashanti's, Fantis, Akyems, Gomoas etc makes up more than 50% of Ghana's population but wouldn't even have made a good name since that will be tribalistic.

I think it was considered fair to go in for a name that all tribes can relate to and be proud of.

Historically it is believed The people of present day Ghana migrants from the present Senegal/Mali/Mauritania which was the location of the Ghana Empire. Also known as Awkar empire became the most richest during the 3rd Century A.D.

Taking into account the wealth of Gold Coast and how prosperous the Ghana Empire grew the Big Six decided to Go for Ghana.

Ghana or Gold Coast if you prefer was made up of many tribes. Like Fantis, Ga, Dagombas, Nzemas what have you. Now the Ashanti's don't make even half of Ghana's population at the time and now. Was Ghana the first major Sahelian empire, or was it merely the first for which we have written sources for? Is there any archaeological evidence for Sahelian states in the First Millenium BC or earlier?

Kevin Richardson · Follow PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Sun

Probably chapter 57 in The Oxford Handbook of African Archaeology, where Kevin C. MacDonald talks about Pre-Tichitt, Classic Tichitt and Djenné-Djenno phases of town/urban archaeology.

Djenne reclining male figure, Mali (terracotta).

Another great book on the topic is Ancient Middle Niger: Urbanism and the Self-Organizing Landscape by Roderick James McIntosh.

The earliest Arabic sources mention Ghana and other Sahelian states like Gao and Takrur.

Take, for example, this description from the Taʾrīḫ Ibn Waḍīḥ by al-Yaʿqūbī in the 9th century.[1]

There is the kingdom of the Kawkaw, which is the greatest of the realms of the Sūdān, the most important and most powerful. All the kingdoms obey its king. Al-Kawkaw is the name of the town. Besides this there are a number of kingdoms of which the rulers pay allegiance to him and acknowledge his sovereignty, although they are kings in their own lands.

Incidentally, for a time, Takrur captured the imagination in the Medieval Arab World on account of the Sultan of Takrur's reputation as a zealous convert to Islam.[2]

The reason why Ghana eclipses the contemporary states in popular memory appears to be a human obsession with gold. The Ghanaian Empire and its ruler came to be associated with the extreme wealth of gold in the writings of Medieval Arab geographers. At the same time, other states did not relish this reputation.

Susan Keech McIntosh provided a meticulous reassessment of the processes that could have resulted in the development of these states in the mid-first Millenium in her article Reconceptualizing Early Ghana. It's well worth a read.

It can be quite challenging to conclude the political organization of people from archaeological evidence.

What I can say is that in the First Millenium BC, there is ample evidence for urban societies in the Middle Niger region. In the middle of the first millennium B.C., there was also a distinctive urban tradition on the shores of Lake Chad in what is called the Gajiganna Complex. The excavations at Zilum in northern Nigeria (approximately 25 kilometers northeast of Maiduguri) describe a fortified settlement that had an estimated population of 1,700 to 2,400 people in the 5th century BC.[3]

It is fair to say that archaeologists of the western Sudan are looking at the Nok Civilization, the Gajiganna Complex, and the urban sites of the middle Niger as precursors to the development of Ghana, Gao, and the other Sudanic states of the middle of the 1st millennium AD. These earlier cultures and civilizations all show both the adoption of agricultural cultivation as well as (after the 5th century BC) the usage of iron tools; which are two markers that have been tied to the development of organized states in Sudan.

Ghana court jails journalist Oheneba Boamah Bennie for contempt of court

New York, February 9, 2022 — In response to news reports that a Ghana court on Tuesday convicted and sentenced Oheneba Boamah Bennie, a host and commentator with privately owned Power FM, to two weeks in prison and fined him 3,000 Ghana cedis (US$468) for contempt of court, the Committee to Protect Journalists issued the following statement condemning the verdict:

"It is alarming that journalist Oheneba Boamah Bennie has been jailed in Ghana, especially considering reports that he is in poor health," said Angela Quintal, CPJ Africa program coordinator. "Journalists should not be jailed in connection with their reporting or commentary about public figures, whom one would hope would have a thicker skin when it comes to criticism."

Bennie was charged with contempt of court in connection with a video posted on his personal Facebook page in late 2020 in which the journalist alleged that Ghanaian President Nana Akufo-Ado had conspired with judges to influence the 2020 presidential elections. Bennie was detained for two days in December 2020 and placed under investigation over the same video, as CPJ documented at the time.

Bennie asked if his prison term could be substituted for an additional fine because he was in poor health, but the judge declined, Eric Ahianyo, deputy chief executive officer in charge of XYZ Broadcasting, which owns Power FM, told CPJ by phone.

Why did Ghana get its independence so early compared to other sub-Saharan countries?

Adam Kennedy Palfrey , Paediatric Surgeon, lived in Canada, US + E Africa
Answered 38m ago

Britain attempted to stagger the independence dates for its colonies and dependencies, so that some administrative and governance support might be offered during the transition period. The Crown staggered these big administrative tasks, with the largest and longest lasting colonies gaining independence first.

Thus, the first independent Commonwealth nations were Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Newfoundland, and South Africa, plus Egypt, and Ireland. Just after the Second World War, Israel, Burma, Jordan, India, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka became independent. The next tranche, in the 50s, brought independence to Ghana, Malaysia, Oman, Singapore, and Sudan. So, Ghana was not the first of Britain's African possessions to gain independence. Indeed, within ten years of the Union Flag being lowered in Ghana, the same had happened in: Botswana, Cameroon, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Cyprus, the Gambia, Kenya, Lesotho, Somaliland, Tanzania, Malawi, Uganda, and Zambia in Africa, plus Yemen, Trinidad, Malta, Maldives, Kuwait, Guyana, Jamaica, and Barbados. This left just 22 colonies and dependencies to gain independence after 1967, and the 16 still existing British dependencies today.

Arbitrary country borders drawn by colonial powers are often blamed for Africa's low level of development. What would have been the ideal alternative considering there is a multitude of different tribes?

Problem is, there’s really no ideal way to divide African nations.
Religion? Oh but it’s a bit too complicated.

Ethnic groups?

Nope, still a bit unfeasible. (Also some of the other maps of ethnic groups were even more complicated.)

Languages? (Kind of goes hand in hand with the previous map actually)

There are countless other variabilities and diversities I just can't be bothered going into, which shows that creating ideal borders for Africa is pretty damn hard. Also, if all the borders were suddenly shuffled today, the amount of chaos and violence that would inevitably ensue would probably be on an unprecedented level. A continent-wide battle royale essentially.

What armor did the Ghana Empire and the Sosso infantry wear?

Alton Allen Small Business Owner. (1990–present) Aug 22

This was not exactly what you asked for, I tried searching for museums that may housed specific Wagadu aka Ghana Empire armor and that of the Sosso, but to no avail, all I could find was a general theme of what folks in the Savannah civilizations, wore, at different times.

In Bornu, judging from the pictures that have been published, they used horse armor that looks much like the Japanese. They also used cuirasses, well designed and well made, fig. 90. They are built of strips of steel riveted together.

The above is from the Bornu empire, again not exactly what you asked for.

This is from Kano state Nigeria chainmail.

But what must be the most remarkable find in this area was a complete piece of frontal body armour (pl. XIV, 3). Made of thick ox-hide, moulded and tooled into a complex pattern of raised bosses and ribbed surfaces with half holes for the arms, it extends from the level of the eyes to the knees of the wearer. The piece was attached to the body by means of strings, of which some pieces remain in position. Fragments of a hide breastplate were found by Professor Emery at Ballana, but the latest find at Ibrîm must be accounted the finest example of protective military equipment yet discovered in Nubia. The circumstances of its finding indicate that it is X-Group. Possibly it is a development of the large oblong shields of raw ox-hide, which according to Strabo were carried by the Meroïtes who fought against the Romans under Petronius. In essence the Ibrîm armour is a large shield but attached to the body rather than worn on the left arm. The finding of the armour in this area may indicate that the rooms excavated once formed part of a guardhouse inside the East Gate in Meroïtic and X-Group times. However, no other weaponry was found in this area.

In my search I stumbled on this great pcs, it is a Merotic aka late Nubian or Kushite armor, I just add it because it's so damned fascinating.

In any case, African armies, used armor ,sometimes by defused influence from Eurasian neighbors, sometimes 100% of local invention.

Benin leather armor British Museum.

Keep in Mind inner Africans kept their lands from hostile take over, for X thousands of yrs, and all was not just due to climate, geography and viruses, but massive well equipped armies that did go toe to toe with the Persians, Romans, Umayyad and Rashidun invaders of opposite sides of the continent.

Armed men attack Ghana broadcaster Radio Ada FM Over coverage of a mining deal.

Abuja, January 31, 2022 — Ghanaian authorities should swiftly identify and hold to account the people behind the recent attack on the Radio Ada FM broadcaster, and ensure that journalists can work safely, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Monday.

At about 11:30 a.m. on January 13, ten masked men forced open a studio door at the privately owned broadcaster's office in the Ada district of the greater Accra region, and attacked and threatened its staff, according to multiple news reports and Radio Ada presenter Korle Adjaotor Sorngortse, who spoke by phone with CPJ.

The attackers, one of whom carried a pistol, hit and kicked Sorngortse all over his body for more than 10 minutes, shoved receptionist Ruby Ate and held her in her chair, and forced producer and anchor Gideon Amanor Dzeagu to kneel while they ransacked the office, according to those sources and Dzeagu, who spoke to CPJ in a phone interview.

After about 15 minutes, the men left the scene and threatened to return and shoot people if Radio Ada FM continued reporting on a mining contract recently granted to the Electrochem company, according to those sources.

Julius said his office reported the attack to police, who have opened an investigation.

"Authorities in Ghana must swiftly identify those who planned and perpetrated the recent attack on Radio Ada FM, and hold them accountable," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in New York. "These physical attacks on members of the press and attempts at intimidation are far too common in Ghana, and should not be tolerated."

The attackers monitored the broadcaster from a nearby bar for over three hours before entering the office, according to those reports and Dzeagu, who said he saw the men at the bar.

Dzeagu and Odoi Julius, a producer and officer in charge of external communications at Radio Ada FM, told CPJ by phone that the outlet's reporting showed that the Electrochem contract would require some people to be relocated, and that a protest had been planned against the deal.

That protest was scheduled for the same day the broadcaster was attacked, they said. Two protest organizers were at the station during the raid, and one of the attackers hit one of the organizers, Sorngortse and Dzeagu told CPJ. They added that the protest was later cancelled after organizers were unable to acquire police protection.

The attackers repeatedly asked to see Noah Dameh, who led the "Manor Munyu" news program that covered the Electrochem case, but left the studio after being told he was not there, according to Dzeagu and those news reports.

The attackers destroyed two computers used for recording, a sound mixer, and three sets of headphones, Dzeagu, Sorngortse, and Julius told CPJ.

Sorngortse told CPJ that he continues to experience severe pain in his head and neck from the beating, and his left eye remains swollen.

When CPJ called Ada district Police Commander Kojo Mifetu for comment, he said authorities had not yet identified the attackers.

CPJ called and texted Electrochem, and its parent company the McDan Group, for comment, but did not receive any replies.

CPJ has for years documented Ghanaian journalists' concerns that those responsible for violence against reporters are not identified or held accountable.

Why is Ghana called Ghana when the Ghana Empire was in present day Mauritania and Benin called Benin when the Benin empire was in the present day Nigeria?

Kevin Richardson Oct 26

Mali was a Malinke Mande state, not a Soninke one like Wagadu/Ghana. The expansion of desert renders much of the latter quite different than it was even late in its existence (11th/12th c.) so there's no big huge "Ghana identity movement" in Mauritania, Mali, and in other western Mande lands.

That said, few African nations have a single primary historical group, so national names tended to look for something inclusive. For example, Ghana was chosen as a tribute to the empire, instead of using the colonial name (Gold Coast) or one that would alienate various powerful population groups like Asante or Fante. It was a deliberately pan-African statement by Kwame Nkrumah and his circle.

Kwame Nkrumah Memorial Park.

Benin is slightly different. It was renamed in 1975 from Dahomey, which was the original kingdom colonized by France. Its renaming had to do with an effort to also break away from a single-group kingdom past. It is called Benin because of the Bight of Benin, not the kingdom. However, I can't imagine the Obas of Benin (who still sit on the throne in western Nigeria) caring for it. Dahomey also had unsavory connections with the slave trades, another reason to jettison it once it was not a polity in operation.

Mauritania is a case I'll have to look up again, as I do not trust my recall.

Other names of polities with more continuity of popular identity or leadership are reflective: eSwatini, Botswana, and Lesotho come to mind immediately; one could argue Uganda is similar, as are Egypt, Morocco, and even Algeria. But quite often, the moment of decolonization was a moment for new educated elites to forge an identity bigger than tribalism, not tied to a single past beyond honoring it (for the pan-Africans) and looking to it as a way to move forward. Other times, they simply sought to do away with the baggage of older names to represent a new way of thinking. Ultimately, not many had a great investment in preserving a particular name, and remaining “traditional leaders” still get regional names and titles (like Asante) except in the few cases where they do have political power or where a territorial name has come to mean more even though it represents only one region of the original territory (Kenya). Many non-elites within the states do not feel a particular dedication to the nation, which further lowers the stakes but is itself a problem in terms of the goals of state-building.

What do other African countries think of Ghana?

Weru Inje, lives in Africa Answered Feb 15, 2018

I do not know what other African countries think about Ghana or anyone else , but I can tell you what I think of Ghana. I assume you are a Ghanaian.

I live in Kenya and have travelled to Ghana on several occasions and have read a lot about Ghana too starting from primary school where we learnt that it was once called The gold coast by the colonialists. What can we say about Ghana without mentioning Kwame Nkrumah who is renown as a pan African liberation hero? in high school , we learnt about the Volta dam and of course about cocoa and gold production.

Today your average East African associates Ghana with your superb national soccer them, the Black stars. Your averagely well read African will also have heard about Ghana being one of the Africa economic growth stories and Ghana being a middle African economy. The most well read African will know that Ghana has not been doing very well on the economic front - with rising debt levels, corruption and electricity shortages. The Ghanaian Cedi also lost value considerably from the first time i visited . We see Ghana as an oasis of peace and political stability with successful elections and power handovers between various regimes.

On a personal note, when I went to Ghana for the very first time, I was left with a positive impression , that first visit was limited to Accra. I saw good roads- well organized with overpasses and the city was not heavily congested with traffic and It is also more orderly than other African cities that I have visited.

The people I met were wonderful, polite and very helpful. I loved your food which I also found very similar to that of Nigerian cuisine.

All in all, I would say Ghana is viewed positively in my part of the world . At a personal level I only have positive experiences about Ghana and it is perhaps the other African country I would chose to live in.

Is it possible for the later Roman Empire in its last stages to have known about the Ghana Empire in its earliest stages?

Answered by Firew Afera Feb 22

I do not see how.

The last years of the Roman empire were very turbulent and Romans were struggling to maintain the core areas of their empire like Italy and Gaul.

The empire of Ghana was the first of the great Sahelian empires of Africa like Kanem Bornu, Mali, Songhai etc. Though it maintained trade relations with North Africa, I do not think they interacted with the Romans at state level.

Why is Ghana called the gateway to Africa?

Michael Banga Studied at Regional Maritime University (Graduated 2020) 3y

There are numerous reasons why Ghana is the gate to Africa. Below are few reasons;

The willingness to bring Africa together by the father of Ghana, Dr Kwame Nkrumah the first president of Ghana. This decision and willingness by Nkrumah made the western other part of the world to figure out Ghana as the main route to Africa because the decision stormed many western governments and other organizations have drawn their attention to Ghana in Africa because I believe if the decision had hold and Africa was United, I can predict that Ghana would have being the capital and she would have been the 'GATE WAY to United Africa.

Ghana is democratic and practice the the rule of law. Many countries in africa are safe and healthy to live in by non Africa who would come and reside in Africa but the lack of democracy in many African countries has poured much praise on Ghana. I don't think non Africans will like to pass through the gate of any country in Africa to reside or invest and wouldn't be able to protest against when their human right is infringe upon but the rule of law practiced in Ghana will help these them to say hi to the law when abused on them. This makes everything comprehensive be it business, political, diplomatic, name them.

The natural resources in Ghana. The mineral resources, oil and other natural resources as cocoa, timber, rubber and many has advertised Ghana globally. Ghana among many countries is noted for her resources though it is not sge alone with such resources but her peace state and stable governance attracted the world and this has opened many gates for many people around the world to come into Africa as compared to nations.

Tourist site . Ghana has so many tourists site which calls many people around to come to Africa precisely Ghana. Examples are Cape Castle where slaves were centered before their departure to the western, national parks, nice gardens, so many. This makes Ghana paving ways for many people to come to Africa through her.

Hospitality and friendly. Ghana and Ghanaians are very hospital and friendly to people around them. Ghanaians like any in Africa has time for people and are ready to do anything for them. They are concern about your safety, Health, and your life is paramount to them which many African States don't really believe in.

Culture. Due to ethnicity in Ghana, there are many sweet and nice norms, customs, traditions that make up the Ghanaian culture. There are many varieties of food, languages, dresses, music and dance etc that are admired by the world. A friend of mine from the University Cork College in Ireland told me 6years during their to my school then, that he wish to stay in Ghana entirely with the reason being that he loves Ghana. Meanwhile they only stayed two weeks which was too limited for him to have just noticed that Ghana is soo beautiful to stay on but because our culture enriched his mind and he could nt hide it.

Her membership to international organizations. Ghana is a member of many organizations in africa and across the globe. She is a member of UN, AU, ECOWAS, COMMONWEALTH, WHO, etc. Her consistent contributions to UN Mission in africa and in Southern Lebanon has grace Ghana to be an icon in africa though it's not her alone but the professionalism and discipline exhibited by her troops in these mission areas are very incomparable to other African contributive nations. Her son Kofi Annan who also headed the UN and under his supervision the marking of blueline in southern lebanon in 2006 between lebanon and North Israel border is a remarkable effort by the Ghanaian nationality in the UN Charter and this has given confidence in the world that Africa is not as they thought of but really a natural place where you can live and enjoy amazing things especially talk of Ghana hence making her a gateway to Africa through her border. She has welcomed refugees from many nations in Africa as many nations did not do.

Independence. Ghana among few nations in Africa gained independence earlier before many countries in africa gained self rule. The Ghanaian independence influenced many countries to gained self rule like south Africa, Nigeria, and many. All these colonies colonizing African States then got it right that those states fought for self governance by the influence of Ghana because after Ghana took independence, Kwame Nkrumah said and quote ‘the Independence of Ghana means nothing unless it is linked to the total liberation of Africa’ and truly after Ghana’s independence, many African countries took a move for independence ie Angola, Nigeria,Burkina Faso etc.

Ghana is a blessed land in africa and has proof to Africa in her little strength that is is the gateway to Africa. A former US president, His Excellency Bill Clinton visited Ghana and proclaimed “Ghana is a gateway to Africa.

As many Africans will say Ghana is not rich, has no strong military, lack many facilities, depend on foreign aid, etc and this will not make Ghana the gateway to Africa, I say to you that is the gateway to Africa as she has helped many nations gain freedom nothing more vital than that. Am very proud to be a Ghanaian.

Emmanuel Asante Krobea Answered Jan 25, 2018, Owner

Ghana at the moment is really expensive due to the collapse in the economy which most people blame on the previous government. Since the economy went down unemployment has gone up.
Let's put the politics aside.

Ghana hasn't changed for the bad when it comes to having fun since old ages. Same old Ghana if you have been there before.

Ghanaians are really friendly and welcoming to foreigners which makes it tourist friendly.

Since your question wasn't specific I couldn't say more. Sorry.

Osagyefo Dr. Kwame Nkrumah was the prime minister and later president of Ghana, the first African country to gain freedom from European colonial oppression. An influential 20th-century advocate of Pan-Africanism, Nkrumah was Africa's foremost spokesman and was a founding member of the Organization of African Unity. He was the winner of the Lenin Peace Prize in 1963.

Over his lifetime, Nkrumah was awarded honorary doctorates by Lincoln University, Moscow State University; Cairo University in Cairo, Egypt; Jagiellonian University in Kraków, Poland; Humboldt University in East Berlin; and many other universities.

In 2000, he was voted Africa's "Man of the Millennium" by listeners to the BBC World Service, being described by the BBC as a "Hero of Independence," and an "International symbol of freedom as the leader of the first African country to shake off the chains of colonial rule."

In September 2009, President John Atta Mills declared 21 September (the 100th anniversary of Kwame Nkrumah's birth) to be Founder's Day, a statutory holiday in Ghana to celebrate the legacy of Kwame Nkrumah.

QUOTATIONS of Kwame Nkrumah

Action without thought is empty. Thought without action is blind. -Kwame Nkrumah

It is clear that we must find an African solution to our problems, and that this can only be found in African unity. Divided we are weak; united, Africa could become one of the greatest forces for good in the world. -Kwame Nkrumah

Those who would judge us merely by the heights we have achieved would do well to remember the depths from which we started. -Kwame Nkrumah

I am not African because I was born in Africa but because Africa was born in me. -Kwame Nkrumah

Countrymen, the task ahead is great indeed, and heavy is the responsibility; and yet it is a noble and glorious challenge - a challenge which calls for the courage to dream, the courage to believe, the courage to dare, the courage to do, the courage to envision, the courage to fight, the courage to work, the courage to achieve - to achieve the highest excellencies and the fullest greatness of man. Dare we ask for more in life? -Kwame Nkrumah

It is far better to be free to govern or misgovern yourself than to be governed by anybody else. -Kwame Nkrumah

The forces that unite us are intrinsic and greater than the superimposed influences that keep us apart. -Kwame Nkrumah

Africa is one continent, one people, and one nation. The notion that in order to have a nation it is necessary for there to be a common language, a common territory and common culture has failed to stand the test of time or the scrutiny of scientific definition of objective reality... The community of economic life is the major feature within a nation, and it is the economy which holds together the people living in a territory. It is on this basis that the new Africans recognise themselves as potentially one nation, whose dominion is the entire African continent. -Kwame Nkrumah

Capitalism is a development by refinement from feudalism, just as feudalism is development by refinement from slavery . Capitalism is but the gentlemen's method of slavery. -Kwame Nkrumah

We have awakened. We will not sleep anymore. Today, from now on, there is a new African in the world! -Kwame Nkrumah

Africa is a paradox which illustrates and highlights neo-colonialism . Her earth is rich, yet the products that come from above and below the soil continue to enrich, not Africans predominantly, but groups and individuals who operate to Africa’s impoverishment. -Kwame Nkrumah

All people of African descent, whether they live in North or South America, the Caribbean, or in any part of the world are Africans and belong to the African nation. -Kwame Nkrumah

The independence of Ghana is meaningless unless it is linked-up with the total liberation of the African Continent. -Kwame Nkrumah

We face neither East nor West: we face forward. -Kwame Nkrumah

Freedom is not something that one people can bestow on another as a gift. Thy claim it as their own and none can keep it from them. -Kwame Nkrumah

Revolutions are brought about by men, by men who think as men of action and act as men of thought. -Kwame Nkrumah

I believe strongly and sincerely that with the deep-rooted wisdom and dignity, the innate respect for human lives, the intense humanity that is our heritage, the African race, united under one federal government, will emerge not as just another world bloc to flaunt its wealth and strength, but as a Great Power whose greatness is indestructible because it is built not on fear, envy and suspicion, nor won at the expense of others, but founded on hope, trust, friendship and directed to the good of all mankind. -Kwame Nkrumah.

For centuries, Europeans dominated the African continent. The white man arrogated to himself the right to rule and to be obeyed by the non-white; his mission, he claimed, was to "civilize" Africa. Under this cloak, the Europeans robbed the continent of vast riches and inflicted unimaginable suffering on the African people. -Kwame Nkrumah

The result of neo-colonialism is that foreign capital is used for the exploitation rather than for the development of the less developed parts of the world. Investment under neo-colonialism increases rather than decreases the gap between the rich and poor countries of the world. -Kwame Nkrumah

No people without a government of their own can expect to be treated on the same level as people of independent sovereign states. It is far better to be free to govern or misgovern yourself than to be governed by anybody else . . . -Kwame Nkrumah

We all want a United Africa, United not only in our concept of what unity connotes, but united in our common desire to move forward together in dealing with all the problems that can best be solved only on a continental basis. -Kwame Nkrumah

But I think that of all the literature that I studied, the book that did more than any other to fire my enthusiasm was The Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey published by his wife. -Kwame Nkrumah

At long last, the battle has ended! And thus, Ghana, your beloved country is free forever! -Kwame Nkrumah

It is far easier for the proverbial camel to pass through the needle's eye, hump and all, than for an erstwhile colonial administration to give sound and honest counsel of a political nature to its liberated territory. -Kwame Nkrumah

Kwame Nkrumah was the only president and head-of-state of Ghana who was educated in America and the only one who knew America well, and yet he preferred Socialism and strong ties to the Soviet Union, China and Yugoslavia. Don't you find it strange?

Ernest W. Adams

Lived in The United States of America (1966–1999) Sep 3

Most former colonies turned their backs on the West once they got their independence. The exceptions were those that were full of European settlers (USA, Australia, Canada, New Zealand). The Soviet Union said to all of them, “We're not imperialists. We'll help you economically and won't ravage your country.” This sounded good to the African and Southeast Asian nations—especially those in which a small number of rich people controlled most of the land.

It sounded great in principle, but it didn't work out too well in practice. Egypt and India tried to be somewhat Socialist. But the promised bounty from the Soviet Union didn't emerge. Not that many Russians traveled to Egypt, and when they did, they didn't spend much money. Eventually both Egypt and India opened their doors to Western trade.

I understand why Kwame Nkrumah made the decision. After years of abuse by the West, he was looking for a new approach. So did lots of other leaders.

Pétrole : Le Ghana a-t-il réellement découvert d'un gisement de pétrole ?

Jean Verpeaux , Toujours etonne par le politiquement correct Mis à jour le 20 janv. 2019

Le gisement de JUBILEE a été trouvé en deep offshore au Ghana en 2007 par Kosmos Energy sur une nouvelle thématique pétrolière dite de marges abruptes, qui a depuis été explorée à divers endroits dans le monde dont par Exxon qui a récemment fait de grandes découvertes en Guyana.

Il a été développé par son partenaire Tullow et est en production depuis 2010 suite à une développement accéléré (première phase avec un potentiel de 120.000 baril/jour). Après ce développement rapide et limité dont le but était de récupérer très vite les investissements d'exploration en attendant des projets plus ambitieux, l'opérateur a connu quelques vicissitudes qui ont conduit à une nette sous-réalisation des objectifs de production après 2012 ; l'évolution du cours de bourse de Tullow reflète d'ailleurs ces mésaventures. Le turret qui permet la rotation du FPSO (bateau de production) selon le courant et le vent a en particulier connu des problèmes, qui ont nécessité des travaux supplémentaires pour mettre en place un système d'ancrage fixe.

Il semblerait que la production de cette phase soit actuellement stabilisée au x environs de 80.000 baril/jour d'après le site de Tullow, ce qui paraît peu par rapport à la taille du gisement, annoncée initialement à plusieurs milliards de barils. Mais des phases additionnelles de développement sont à l'étude, toujours d'après Tullow qui parle de 180.000 baril/jour à brève échéance.

Un second gisement est en cours de développement par le même opérateur (Tullow) sur la licence de TEN (Tweneboa-Enyenra-Ntomme), et a commencé à produire en 2016 avec un second FPSO d'une capacité de 80.000 baril/jour, niveau maintenant atteint. Ce gisement est limitrophe de la Côte d'Ivoire et des développements additionnels sont sans doute possibles mais nécessitent un accord entre les deux pays ; les discussions semblent avoir bien avancé sur ce plan. Pourquoi la Chine envoie-t-elle des forces anti-émeute aux îles Salomon ?

Mathis Flt · Suivre

Pour ce type de raisons : -pacte commercial entre la Chine et les îles,celles ci étant très pauvres elles cherchent le maximum d'aides financières.

-petite communauté Chinoises présente dans l'archipel, et donc sous le giron de Pekin. Ce sont des ouvriers qualifiés.

-puisque pacte économique il y a , Pekin achete la majorité des resources de l'île (métaux rares très convoités, ressources halieutiques).

-l'influence en Océanie de la Chine est également une des raisons pour lesquelles Pekin a envoyé des forces anti-émeutes, histoire de dire aux australiens qu'ils ne sont plus les seuls influents de la région.

en outre la Chine a investi dans ces îles pour la richesse de ses sous sols (investissement = machines , ouvriers qualifiés , logistiques et donc terminaux commerciaux / nouvelles liaisons aériennes).

l'instabilité politique des Salomon menace ces investissements et pourrait remettre en question les traités signés avec la Chine puisque l'opposition critique les méthodes d'extraction pratiquée qui détruisent la beauté de l'archipel. C'est pourquoi Pekin a utilisée la force, afin de protéger ses intérêts aussi bien stratégiquement que commerciaux.

j'espère avoir répondu au mieux à la question. Suivre Mathis Flt

An African Legend that built all, but did not build even a House for Himself!

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 14h

Kwame Nkrumah ruled Ghana for 9 years: from 1957 to 1966, under this period he built at least an industry in every region of Ghana,

He built several newly Industrial cities across Ghana including the Famous Tema and Akosombo industrial cities. These industrial cities housed several industries and production centres which produced nearly all commodity needs of the economy while employing the citizens.

He built roads which are still alive today after 60 years. In fact, Tema Motorway is still the best stretch of road in Ghana as we speak and it was built by Nkrumah.

The Colonial administration that ruled and exploited Ghana intentionally deprived the people of Northern parts of Ghana an access to education or any kind of development in order to force the people living in this areas to move to the Middle and Southern belts of Ghana for free labour. This was a strategy to divide the country so to create enmity among the locals in order that they cannot see themselves as one people or people of equals in order not to unite to fight the colonial exploitation. Knowing this, Kwame Nkrumah open up free eduction to those of us in the Northern belt of Ghana who have suffered such a grave discrimination and exploitation to help us recover when he assumed office as a president.

Again, Kwame Nkrumah built a gigantic African Line Hostel and dedicated this building to serve as a free housing for all African Freedom fighters who seek safety in Ghana. Today, this building has been converted and it is being used as the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Regional Integration of Ghana.

Kwame Nkrumah did all these and so many others for Ghana and Africa at large without building a single structure of house or home for himself. In fact, Kwame Nkrumah has no house built by himself either in Ghana or Abroad. His only house is the 6 feet land on which he was buried on and the monument which was built in his honor. Yet, he built so much for many generations which we are still enjoying.

The Today's politicians run the state and make losses, they leave huge debt for today and future generations while at the same time profitably running their private business and declaring gains for their families.

Kwame Nkrumah is gone but his spirit and good intentions live on.

Rest In Power, Nkrumah never dies.

How is life in Ghana compared to Nigeria?

Ludwig Botchway Answered Jun 21, 2019

Well, I'm a veterinary student from KNUST , and for my first time I'm having my internship and field practice in Nigeria that is University of Ibadan, Oyo state. And I have been here for just three weeks , of which I have noticed a lot huge difference between the two countries

Nigerians love to profile people based on their looks and dressing , example is when u go to the market to by something, your dressing and appearance will determine the price of the product u wanna buy. I was in my work attire and in my glasses … a soap was sold to me at 100N , the next three days at the same place I was in a normal shirt and a tarted shorts with slippers and that same soap cost 60N . It happened several times on different items and sellers .

Nigerians will always wanna make money from you the moment they get to know you are a foreigner . They will demand money for every favor they do

It's quiet cheap to live in Nigeria as compared to Ghana

The public transportation in Nigeria is terrible… a taxi in Ghana takes 4 people, whereas in the city of Ibadan , it takes 6 , 2 at the front and 4 behind. This I found rare and appalling.

Nigerian bike riders are incredible ❤□, most ride really well and are able to maneuver in traffic

Talking of traffic, it is terrible oooo, my flight took me to Lagos and I was in traffic for hours , drenched in sweat

The people of Nigeria hardly help people they don't know, you may be in a company with someone and the persons sees u every morning but so far as he or she doesn't know you personally , you won't get a lift

The streets of Nigeria is a crazy place , no law abiding drivers , traffic rules constantly being flaunted. Drivers don't car , bikers don't care … as a Ghanaian here crossing a road is difficult because no driver will stop for u to cross, u just have to aim and run across .

Some nigerians are very lovely, they care a lot and are nice , but most of them are abusive with words . You are easily insulted at the least mistake you do .
yoruba food is terrible , and there are a whole lots of funny combinations of food you can hardly imagine… I wouldn't recommend to any Ghanaian to settle in Yoruba land .

Sincerely Nigeria is a very wild place to live, basically survival of the fittes

Oluwaseun Adeleye Answered Aug 3, 2018

I lived in Accra since 2013. Though I'm back home now in Nigeria but it was a great experience I had in Ghana to meet, sleep and dine with foreigners.

Ghanaians are very friendly people, mostly there females are much more friendly than males. But take note, there males which use to be your good friend before, could start to hate a Nigerian male once the Nigerian start earning some good money from there country. You can get along well with Ghanaian females, once you got some change to flex, or even just sweet mouth.

In Ghana, you find western foreigners using the local transportation system called Trotro with locals but in Nigeria it's very very rare to see a white person in Danfo or even okada. You might see white people use there own private car or escorted by military securities vehicles in Nigeria but not the case in Ghana. Everyone works freely even at midnight.

As a Nigerian, don't come here looking for jobs cause the Cedes is more than the Naira. You'll be disappointed, big time. I've seen some big hotels even pay as little as 100 Ghana cedes to there staff and they are more than happy with the money cause that's a lot for a Ghanaian but not a lot for a Nigerian, that's just about 8000 Naira per month. What will that do for a Nigerian? Ans -Nothing. A Nigerian can make more than that in a single day in the same Ghana doing business. So try starting up a small business and don't go looking for jobs cause even if you're given 300 Ghana cedes that's just about 25000 naira a month which is still small. My fellow Nigerians will say “Na 25k a month you come make for Ghana?”

Housing is expensive, the landlords will charge a Nigerian to pay at least 2 years or more upfront, where as charge other foreigners even to pay monthly or every 6 months. I still don't know why? A Ghanaian told me its because all Nigerians are rich people, that's the way they portray Nigerians in Ghana.

Ghanaian local foods are very very cheap but I'm a Yoruba, Nigerian I can't cope with there local food so I eat expensively twice every day. Eastern and northern Nigerians living in Ghana could cope with there local diet cause most of there foods are similar to there Nigerian diets. But I don't joke with there kwakye and shito cos is Rice and beans.

In Ghana education system is different than Nigeria, what's considered apprenticeship in Nigeria is considered school in Ghana. For instance, a Ghanaian learning a fashion design trade will tell you she's in school too... Will wear uniform and graduate like normal secondary school student.

In Ghana you can do your Junior Secondary school first and then come back after some years “lets say after 3 years” to start your Senior Secondary School. Whereas in Nigeria that's very rare, you finish Junior School and then start Senior school immediately, you finish your 6 years once and for all.

Ghanaians don't like to be bothered, don't try it, they might get angry at you. Once a Ghanaian says “No" then it means NO. Don't try to bother him or her, or else you might have a quarrel.

I once went to a grocery shop on my street to buy some food items and it was just around 5 pm, then the attendant told me he was closed even though I was looking at what I wanted to buy but I couldn't have it even with me holding my money he kept repeating I've closed chale, I've closed for the day, as a Nigerian that was strange to me, close at 5pm? In Nigeria you don't close shop until customer traffic ends. You close when there is no more customers. Some people close at even 11pm once people are still buying, even some have classes when you get there, if you call the number or something, they'll come and open the shop again for you to buy what you want but this man said he was closed at 5pm though shop was still open and he didn't leave the shop until night, customers came and he will not sell to them still telling them he was closed for the day. Not only him does this until I learnt from someone, Ghanaians don't like to be bothered, they do things at there own will, you can not force them.

Much more but that's all I can remember for now

Une situation difficile à accepter par les supporters nigérians qui, déçus et violents, ont envahi la pelouse et ont battu et piétiné le Dr Joseph Kabungo, un membre officiel de la Confédération africaine de football.

Mardi 29 mars 2022, au coup de sifflet final au stade Moshood Abiola d'Abuja, des supporters nigérians en colère après l'élimination des Super Eagles par les Black Stars du Ghana, envahi le terrain et attaqué des joueurs ghanéens. Le Dr Joseph Kabungo, médecin de la FIFA qui était de service lors de ce match de qualification pour la finale retour entre le Nigeria et le Ghana à Abuja, a été battu et piétiné par ces supporters nigérians déçus et violents. Il était l'agent antidopage désigné par la CAF pour le match entre le Ghana et le Nigeria.

La suite de ces évènements malheureux a donné place à une scène violente dans laquelle ce membre officiel de la Confédération africaine de football, le Dr Joseph Kabungo, est décédé. Le médecin zambien aurait perdu connaissance après avoir été battu et piétiné alors que les supporters tentaient de se frayer un chemin hors du stade en raison de la bousculade.

« Sa mort est une perte énorme »

« C'est une grande et triste perte pour la zone COSAFA. Le Dr Kabungo a toujours donné de son temps et de son expertise. C'était un être humain de qualité et il manquera cruellement à tous les habitants de notre région », a déclaré Sue Destombes, secrétaire générale de la COSAFA, The Council of Southern Africa Football Associations. « Nous déplorons le décès de notre médecin de la CAF/FIFA, le Dr Joseph Kabungo, et nous présentons nos sincères condoléances à la famille du Dr Kabungo et à la famille du football dans son ensemble », a déclaré le président de la Football Association of Zambia, Andrew Kamanga.

« Il était un membre dévoué et très apprécié de notre communauté de football et son impact était vaste, puisqu'il faisait également partie de l'équipe victorieuse de la Coupe d'Afrique [des Nations] 2012. Sa mort est une perte énorme car le Dr Kabungo était l'ami et le confident de plusieurs générations de joueurs et de leurs familles. Il était l'une des personnalités les plus marquantes du football zambien, qui a porté le drapeau zambien lors d'événements footballistiques internationaux. Nous devons tous apprendre de son exemple d'excellence et célébrer son héritage en formant des administrateurs zambiens qui travaillent dur » a déclaré Andrew Kamanga.

TILLING FOR THE 'GOLD' IN THE GOLD COAST

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong

Image: the takeover of Ashanti Kingdom in the 19th century CE.

After the fall of Benin city, the capital city of Benin empire, British set out to takeover the whole of West Africa for itself, with the French contending for coastal regions. Ashanti Kingdom was one of the strongest kingdom at the coastal region of West Africa; a kingdom rich in gold, in such much quantity that 'the natives dug out gold nuggets in their backyards'. And as much as it sounds too good to be true, this was actually a fact around the lands of tribal groups like the Fante, Ahanta, Nzeemaa, Ashanti, ewe, Frafra and so on that occupied what we know today as republic of Ghana. This modern country differ, geographically, with the medieval kingdom of Ghanah (the word itself meaning gold in several West African languages), which was located in the lands of the Soninke people of what is today Mauritania, including Gambia and part of Senegal and western Sahara.

The Ashanti Kingdom had a strong alliance with the Benin empire which was centred around what is today southern parts of Nigeria toward the delta and the bight of Biafra toward the southern parts of (modern day) Cameroon to the east, down to what is Gabon today. The geographical area controlled by the Benin empire went through different changes from the 12th century CE to the 16th century CE, when the empire had, at this time, stretched to what became modern day Togo toward the west of the capital city of the empire. It was at this time that Benin empire had the strongest ties with The Ashanti Kingdom. But by the 18th century CE, Dhahomey kingdom was carved out and became a go-between region with Benin empire on one hand and Ashanti Kingdom on the other.

Ashanti Kingdom also had strong inter-communal relations with groups in the southern borders of the Songhai empire(and formerly, the Mali empire) which had collapsed in the 1590s after Morocco hired mercenaries from Europe to loot and plunder Songhai empire. The relationship between these entities made their cities great contributing units to the trans-Saharan trade, along with city states like Kano; where all the hides and skin products that could be found anywhere along the trans-Saharan trade routes came from. The relationship between these entities was so strong that at some point, what became Ghana and Mali in the 20th century CE almost became one nation through peaceful negotiations that unexpectedly, fell along the way.

The British and the French had wanted these West African regions; its rich resources, land and trade, and they did everything to make sure these entities stopped trading and cooperating with each other, but that they should instead, be trading separately with Europe and not among themselves. In this regards, it worked out for the British to this day. Although it was the Portuguese that had made the initial moves, the French(the descendants of the Barbarian tribe of Europe, known in history as the Franks) eventually got Mali, What became Burkina Faso (land of the Mossi), Ivory Coast(land of the Guro Guro) and Niger (lands of the Wadaaobe, Bororo, Tebu and so on), while Britain (descendants of the Europa's barbarian tribe known as the Anglo Saxons from the 5th century CE) got what became Ghana (that the British named Gold Coast) and Nigeria.

This had only happened through bloodshed, slavery, manipulation, deception through religion and the 'divide and conquer' approach that was employed by the British.

This was possible because the 'inner circles' of these African societies fall apart, and the centre could no longer hold. The first of these group to breakaway from the "inner circles' in the region was the Mossi, next was the Dogon people, then the Akan and the northern regions of the Hausa speaking tribal groups who had began to mix ties with the Fulani(Fulbe) people from Fouta Djallon highlands in Guinea. The Fulani were the first group in Africa to embrace Islam from the Arabian caravan traders and who took Islam as their culture and tradition, instead of just as a belief system and statecraft.

The 'scramble for Africa' in the 19th century CE was a period when European countries were almost on the brinks of war as "they struggled among themselves on which European tribal nationality should own what in Africa" -John Henrik Clarke. During the all European Berlin conference of 1884/85, the European countries were able to settle among themselves like "thieves sharing the spoils of robbery," the whole of Africa, except Ethiopia (the former polity of Abyssinia which Italians couldn't afford to take, even though they tried and persisted to their defeat).

Western Europeans were able to divide Africa among themselves.

Samuel Johnson, a British poet described such a struggle between the French and the British as being like "two robbers fighting each other over a passenger's bag..." Over the spoils of plunder.

Tomas Sankara who had observed this from history, had broken all ties with western countries in the 1980s, pulled out of the IMF and began, internally, developing his country, and he did well for Burkina Faso. He was assassinated in 1987. In 1993, a presidential aspirant in Nigeria, Bashirun MKO Abiola, promised in his Manifesto that he would free Nigeria from the crutches of what had held her bound for centuries, and make America and Europe pay for over 300 years of plunder, by first declaring all presumed debts owned to Europe or America by Nigeria as 'Null and void.' Two months later, the election (known then in that West African country as the famous June-12 election, which was subsequently declared the fairest in the history of the country) was declared 'null and void' by the Nigerian military president then, Ibrahim Babangida. MKO Abiola was, belatedly, concluded to be the presumed winner of the election. He died while still under house arrest, right before Kofi Annan, the then UN Secretary general, during a meeting to discuss his freedom and annulled election.

Jerry Rawlings of Ghana, observing the awful events that history had brought to his people, had enforced reforms that made Ghana a peaceful and prospering west African nation. Recently, a military regime in Mali had began similar efforts by cutting all ties with France and sending all French forces out of Mali, beside effecting a change in currency.

Takrur aka Fulani Islamic reformist made up a significant portion of the Almoravid movement, and actually sponsored their efforts providing leadership and military support .

They damaged Ghana for certain, however They were not snuffed out and actually recovered nor were they the only aggressors, this includes the Suzu and the rise of Mali as a power.

Ouadane | Wikiwand

Ouadane or Wādān is a small town in the desert region of central Mauritania, situated on the southern edge of the Adrar Plateau, 93 km northeast of Chinguetti. The town was a staging post in the trans-Saharan trade and for caravans transporting slabs of salt from the mines at Idjil.

https://www.wikiwand.com/en/Ouadane

[Ghana's continuing development is next best illustrated by al-Sharīshī, writing from al-Andalus some fifty years after al-Idrisī and stating that "Islam has spread among its inhabitants and there are schools there. Many merchants from the Maghrib are to be found there . . . They buy there slaves for concubinage and stay with the emir, who receives them most hospitably."This suggests a maturation of Islam in Ghana, with the merchant community making]

With al-'Umarī (d. 749/1349) there is a definitive shift in focus from Takrur and Ghana to Mali. Possibly due to Takrur's resilience from the fifth/eleventh through the seventh/thirteenth centuries, as well as its pilgrims traveling to the central Islamic lands, Mali becomes known as Takrur in Egypt and the Ḥijāz by al-'Umarī's time, although Takrur and Ghana are provinces within the Malian empire by then.

Incorporated into Mali's imperial structure but honored as an ancient and storied polity, Ghana has yet to experience a definitive end by the time Ibn Khaldūn (d.

808/1406) writes his Muqaddima, having garnered information from one Shaykh ‘Uthmān, “the faqīh of the people of Ghāna” who visited Cairo in 796/1394.

Ibn Khaldūn presents both Ghana and Takrur as ongoing concerns, though both are subject to Mali.He then says: Later the authority of the people of Ghāna waned and their prestige declined as that of the veiled people, their neighbours on the north next to the land of the Berbers grew . . . These extended their domination over the Sūdān, and pillaged, imposed tribute (itāwāt) and poll-tax (jizya) and converted many of them to Islam. Then the authority of the rulers of Ghāna dwindled away and they were overcome by the Sūsū, a neighbouring people of the Sūdān, who subjugated and absorbed them

Ibn Khaldūn’s narrative of decline does not represent a single event, but rather collapses Ghana’s initial “waning” in relation to Almoravid-related developments in the latter quarter of the fifth/eleventh century, which was then followed by a subsequent “dwindling” at the hands of the Susu in the early seventh/thirteenth century.

Ta’rīkh al-fattāsh also attempts to memorialize Ghana’s final chapter, speaking of the “dying out of the rule of Kayama’a,” and how “God destroyed their power, and the most vile took authority over the greatest of their people.”

SUSU TRIBE

The Susu people are a Mande ethnic group living primarily in Guinea and Northwestern Sierra Leone, particularly in Kambia District…

https://medium.com/@abebaebrima/susu-tribe-780e1f6cfdd9

Though the text may have Ghana's ancien regime in mind, reference to the "most vile" refers to the Susu, not Muslim reformers. The ta'rīkh compresses centuries of Ghana's continuation under Mali, but as an eleventh/seventeenth-century document it has the advantage of describing a process that had finally run its course.

Even so, the best indication of Ghana's endpoint may be the archaeological record concerning Kumbi Saleh's central mosque, abandoned at some point in the ninth/fifteenth century.

The Wagadu Empire

https://historyofyesterday.com/wagadu-empire-4c2dce46ccc0

Early Ghana experienced a long existence and efflorescence, both as an independent kingdom from 300 CE to the end of the fifth/eleventh century, and as a reform Muslim state until the first third of the seventh/thirteenth, after which it lingered on in tributary form for another two hundred years.

That is more than a millennium. There was no single regime in early Ghana, but rather three (including life under Mali), and it was toward the end of its run as a non-Muslim, independent state that it became contested terrain for the claims of a militant, reformist version of Islam that spread through the whole of the Senegal valley and beyond.

Where gold was found, it was found easily, sitting, glinting, in streams.

It could then be beaten with a rock into shapes and even into sheets; it required no metallurgy, or kiln.

And to top it all, it never corrodes and so keeps its lustre forever.

Because gold is easy. It’s easy to mine, since you can easily extract it from gold-bearing rivers with pans or other simple tools, and the yellow gleam is easy to spot.

It’s easy to refine, since gold mostly occurs in native (nearly pure, metallic) form and only needs melting into bars. It’s easy to melt, as the melting point at standard pressure is a mere 1,064 °C, slightly less than that of copper.

It’s easy to work, being soft enough to shape with stone tools. It’s easy to maintain, since it doesn’t react with atmospheric oxygen.

In a way, it's the perfect decorative metal. Absolutely awful for tools, armour and weapons*, of course, since it's both soft and really dense, but min-maxed for dinner plates. Gold is really easy.

*though a case can be made for making blunt weapons like maces of a better tool metal like iron or steel and adding gold to increase the weight. It's much denser than lead, and using steel will help reinforce it so it doesn't go limp.

Did Queen Elizabeth really dance with Ghana's leader?

Jade Welch British Royalty Fan. Updated 1y

Yes, HM Queen Elizabeth II danced with Kwame Nkrumah, the President of Ghana in 1961. She looked very happy, seemingly unaware that their dance was a symbolic moment in the history of the Commonwealth.
According to a story I just read, it says:

"Elizabeth II is pictured beaming on the dancefloor with President Nkrumah, who the West had feared was getting too close to the Soviet Union, at a farewell ball in Accra. Despite bombings in the capital, the Queen had insisted on this tour, to make sure the unstable African republic did not leave the Commonwealth."

Here are some photos of that evening:

The use of light pulses to transmit data through cables from one place to another is known as fiber optic communication. Compared to many other forms of data transmission, fiber optics has exceptionally low data loss, a lack of power issues when traveling long distances and carries a much higher amount of data. Telecommunications and the Internet have been greatly influenced by fiber optics technologies which have allowed to hose industries to mature with more robust products and services.

What do you think was the main problem in the match between Ghana and Nigeria that made Nigeria unable to beat Ghana?

Richmond Apore, Ehh I watch an unhealthy amount of football Answered Mar 30

Hubris and lazy tactics from the coach. Actually, both go hand-in-hand and resulted in Nigeria losing its berth at the World Cup to a very poor Ghana team.

Let's start with hubris. If one was to just listen to Nigerians online on Facebook and Twitter- you would've been left the impression that the Ghanaian team shouldn't even have bothered lacing up their boots to play the first leg in Kumasi as the match was going to be an overwhelming goal-fest for the Super Eagles.

Have a listen to what Yakubu said before the first leg in Kumasi:

How about the boss of Nigerian Football, Amaju Pinnick? For him, by default Nigeria was going to win, so when the first leg ended with a draw, to him it meant it was Ghana who fought to earn a draw, not Nigeria:

Do you get the picture? Of course, Nigeria had the more superior squad of not only both teams but arguably the top 3 in Africa alongside Senegal and Algeria. But the attitude of Nigeria simply dismissing the Black Stars as an inferior and weak opponent because of the Black Stars' shambolic showing at this year's AFCON, even infamously losing to MIGHTY Comoros surely didn't help.

But that is where you always have to be careful with underestimating your opponents. Yes, Ghana isn't the Ghana of old as we have struggled these past few years to replace stalwarts of our formidable 2008–2015 side. But the Ghana team at the AFCON was not even an accurate picture of the true strength of the Ghana squad, even granted it was still not very strong. Ghana was without several key players such as midfield talisman Mohammed Kudus and several other players who deserved call-ups but the favoritism of the GFA left them out of the squad. Even the coach of the team, Milovan Rajevac was past his expiry date as a manager but was still brought in due to past glories (led Ghana to the quarter-finals of the 2010 World Cup). Needless to say the disaster in Cameroon during the AFCON was just waiting to happen. Even with all of that Ghana could've still progressed out of the group stages if it wasn't for some series of bad luck.

Against Morrocco, we played a very good match against the tough Moroccans only to be left undone in the 86th minute by a defensive lapse of concentration, so we lost that game. Against Gabon, the team showed greater determination and was on course to win that match until again in the last few minutes a Ghanaian player was on the ground injured, and instead of the Gabonese players reciprocating the Ghanaian players paused play, they took advantage and scored a late equalizer. So going into the last game against Comoros, Ghana needed to win to progress to the knock-out stages. Comoros took an early goal and then things got worse for Ghana once captain Andre Ayew was sent off in the 25th minute, and even got much worse when Comoros scored their second in the 63rd minute. But somehow, 10 man Ghana roared back and tied the game before the 80th-minute mark, 2–2. But as you probably guessed it, yes, another late goal for the opponent as Comoros scored in the dying minutes to secure that famous 3–2 victory.

Now take a look at the sequence of events across Ghana's three-game at the AFCON, do they paint a picture of a team as bad as most people, especially Nigerians made out to be? Ghana's disastrous AFCON campaign was very misleading until after further inspection. Meaning, for all its misery, Ghana was not going to be that easy opponent the Super Eagles thought they were going to face in Kumasi and Abuja.

Even with all that, and let's say the Super Eagles respected Ghana as a good opponent. Nigeria still should've easily won the game on account of how skilled their attacking line is. Between "Senior man Kelz", Osimhen, Ighalo, Umar Sadiq, Emmanuel Dennis, Moses Simon, Ademola Lookman…seriously Nigeria shouldn't have had no problem dispatching Ghana in at least one of the two games. So what went wrong? Well, as a Ghanaian from what I saw on the pitch, Augustine Eguavoen seriously did a very lazy job with his tactics for both games, especially at home in Abuja. He struggled on how to adequately utilize his attacking threats and wasn't even sure which ones to trust. As he went with a completely different attacking line in Abuja vs when in Kumasi. Moreover, as some Nigerians pointed out on Facebook, with time dying in Abuja and Nigeria needing a goal to progress, Eguavoen rather wisely brought in additional attacking threats with Moses Simon, Ighalo, and Sadiq entering the game but guess who creates scoring opportunities for a striker? Creative midfielders, something Eguavoen failed to realize and bring into the match. It was as if he simply expected that by overloading the Ghanaian defense with extra firepower they would buckle and break down under pressure. Such simplistic thinking. So simple that his Ghanaian opposite number, Otto Addo at half-time predicted that Eguavoen was going to make that move and brought in an extra defender to now set up his Ghanaian team with 5 in the back, and swapped his wing-backs in case Eguavoen was to bring in fresh legs on the wings (which Eguavoen did with Moses Simon coming in the 2nd half on the left side). Simply, Otto Addo just outcoached Eguavoen with more adaptive tactics. He was always trying to assess the state of the match and make the appropriate changes. One example is in the last 20 minutes after Eguavoen poured in all his attacking arsenal on the Ghanaian defense, Addo instead of "parking the bus", knew that since he already had 3 center backs in the game to negate the Nigerian attacking threat, if Nigeria happened to score another goal, he wouldn't be able to equalize with Nigerian having most of the possession and with him down an extra attacking player, so instead brought in attacking creative midfielder Daniel Kyereh to try to play possession ball so to frustrate the Nigerians and kill off time and relieve pressure on his defense. It worked to perfection, Kyereh even managed to get two shots on goal in the process while killing off precious time.

Just to sum up, Nigeria was very overly-confident ahead of the game (they had a much superior team) but that hubris let them see the Ghanaians as weaker than they are. And even caused the Ghanaian team to prepare especially well for this tie. Our coach was out here bringing in 33-year-old former Belgian international (Dennis Odoi) because he feared he didn't have any experienced left-backs to deal with Nigeria's attacking wingers etc. Being the underdogs helped Addo be restless in his coaching. Remember how extremely sweaty he was after the first leg in Kumasi? But on the Nigerian side, I have to blame the coach, Augustin Eguavoen. The man didn't have any discernable philosophy on the field showing his game-plan to beat Ghana. It was almost as if he believed just putting all his attacking pieces on the field would bring victory. It didn't work. The team required, well, a tactician to find a way when the game-plan wasn't going to plan and make the necessary changes- something Eguavoen didn't do.

Unfortunately, Osimhen wouldn't be at the World Cup. The guy is a stud and baller. Nigeria needs a coach, and Ghana needs better players. Good luck to both teams!

Why do people compare Ghana with Nigeria?

Richmond Apore , I have a crazy obsession with History, primarily African history Answered Oct 5, 2021

Most of it is mainly geographic. Both countries are in West Africa. Even with that, both countries are two of very few countries in West Africa colonized by the British hence are English speaking. This last part tends to be the reason why Ghana and Nigeria are mostly associated and compared. You look at Ghana, it's encircled by three French speaking countries (Burkina Faso, Togo and Ivory Coast), likewise for Nigeria, surrounded by three French speaking countries (Benin, Niger and Cameroon). What country is the closest English speaking for Nigeria? Ghana. Which country is the closest English speaking for Ghana? Nigeria. So geographically those comparisons/association make sense.

But I personally, as a Ghanaian think the comparisons is mostly due to how much both countries interact (again, not a surprise due to geography) in a lot of things, the arts, sports and entertainment. For instance looking at music, both nations even developed a musical genre together, Afrobeat, inspired from Ghanaian high life and Nigerian folk music. Some elements of Afrobeat transformed into the modern musical phenomenon- Afrobeats (with the s), as pioneered and popularized by Nigerian artists.

Then you have sports where despite Ghana's small size and population compared to Nigeria, we consistently punch above our weights. Which makes football matches with Nigeria more competitive than say Nigeria football matches with other English speaking West African nations like Liberia or Sierra Leone. Or even other English speaking countries in East Africa such as Kenya or Tanzania.

Nevertheless, at the crux of it, the main reason why people compare both nations is because of hubris and national pride. We Ghanaians see Nigeria as that big brother who's so talented but for some reason disappoints everyone and isn't where he is supposed to be. As such, some Ghanaians are convinced Ghana is better than Nigeria. Yet forgetting how large Nigeria is, coupled with the very intense tribal and religious dynamics rife everywhere in Africa but also more pronounced in such a bigger population. How I like to see it is Nigeria is basically like Ghana except that every petty corruption, tribal politics or other issue is amplified by a factor of almost 10 as Nigeria is almost 10 times the population of Ghana. Likewise, some Nigerians don't take us Ghanaians seriously because of our small population compared to Nigeria (Ghana pop is 31 million, Nigeria is 206 million). And thus any achievement we have is automatically negated by that. Forgetting that the peaceful elections in Ghana, reliable electricity etc…regardless of population size is still a rarity in most of Africa. Going back to that apology I used, If we Ghanaians see Nigerians as that unserious talented older brother, then Nigerians see us as that focused younger brother trying so hard to upstage them.

It's all love. I have a great deal of respect and admiration for Nigeria and Nigerians. Some of the most determined people I've met are Nigerians. As a Ghanaian, a stronger, more focused and powerful Nigeria is an asset to all of Africa.

Who will win in a war between Nigeria and Ghana in this present Nigerian economic recession?

Kwesi Hughes 5y

We will not war with one another. Nigeria is a somnolent economic giant that is slowly waking to its own strength, whilst Ghana is its smaller, more chilled brother who doesn't always harness his gifts. Working together, trading more together, and crucially learning from and leaning upon one another, they potentially could form a powerhouse that would act focally for the region, and improve the lives of millions. War has destroyed much richer and better-developed nations than ours, and we have too much self-interest in co-operation ever to go down that hellish route. Just look around the world.

Which is the most English-speaking country, Ghana or Nigeria?

Farook Ajose Nigeria's future politician. Updated 4y

This question has two answers depending on how you interprete it.
The first one is, “Which is the most English-speaking country (relative to it's population), Ghana or Nigeria?”. The answer to this is Ghana.

Ghana has an adult literacy rate of 76.6% while Nigeria has an adult literacy rate of 59.6%.[1] Hence, relative to the population, more Ghanaians speak English than Nigerians.

That's all, right? Wrong. Naija no dey carry last!

Ghana has a population of 28,210,000 of which 77.2% are adults(15 years and older).[2]With an adult literacy rate of 76.6%, the number of literate Ghanaian adults is 16,882,039. Including English-speakers who aren't literate, the number rises to 18,000,000.

Nigeria on the other hand, has a population of 186,000,000, 58.17% of which are adults (15years and older).[3]And with an adult literacy rate of 59.6%, the number of literate Nigerian adults is 64,484,935. Including English-speakers who aren't literate, it becomes 79,000,000.

So, to the second question which is; "Which is the most English-speaking country (by population of English Speakers), Ghana or Nigeria?". The answer is Nigeria.

How is life in Ghana compared to Nigeria?

Oluwaseun Adeleye

I lived in Accra since 2013. Though I'm back home now in Nigeria but it was a great experience I had in Ghana to meet, sleep and dine with foreigners.

Ghanaians are very friendly people, mostly there females are much more friendly than males. But take note, there males which use to be your good friend before, could start to hate a Nigerian male once the Nigerian start earning some good money from there country. You can get along well with Ghanaian females, once you got some change to flex, or even just sweet mouth.

In Ghana, you find western foreigners using the local transportation system called Trotro with locals but in Nigeria it's very very rare to see a white person in Danfo or even okada. You might see white people use there own private car or escorted by military securities vehicles in Nigeria but not the case in Ghana. Everyone works freely even at midnight.

As a Nigerian, don't come here looking for jobs cause the Cedes is more than the Naira. You'll be disappointed, big time. I've seen some big hotels even pay as little as 100 Ghana cedes to there staff and they are more than happy with the money cause that's a lot for a Ghanaian but not a lot for a Nigerian, that's just about 8000 Naira per month. What will that do for a Nigerian? Ans -Nothing. A Nigerian can make more than that in a single day in the same Ghana doing business. So try starting up a small business and don't go looking for jobs cause even if you're given 300 Ghana cedes that's just about 25000 naira a month which is still small. My fellow Nigerians will say “Na 25k a month you come make for Ghana?”

Housing is expensive, the landlords will charge a Nigerian to pay at least 2 years or more upfront, where as charge other foreigners even to pay monthly or every 6 months. I still don't know why? A Ghanaian told me its because all Nigerians are rich people, that's the way they portray Nigerians in Ghana.

Ghanaian local foods are very very cheap but I'm a Yoruba, Nigerian I can't cope with there local food so I eat expensively twice every day. Eastern and northern Nigerians living in Ghana could cope with there local diet cause most of there foods are similar to there Nigerian diets. But I don't joke with there kwakye and shito cos is Rice and beans.

In Ghana education system is different than Nigeria, what's considered apprenticeship in Nigeria is considered school in Ghana. For instance, a Ghanaian learning a fashion design trade will tell you she's in school too... Will wear uniform and graduate like normal secondary school student.

In Ghana you can do your Junior Secondary school first and then come back after some years “lets say after 3 years” to start your Senior Secondary School. Whereas in Nigeria that's very rare, you finish Junior School and then start Senior school immediately, you finish your 6 years once and for all.

Ghanaians don't like to be bothered, don't try it, they might get angry at you. Once a Ghanaian says “No" then it means NO. Don't try to bother him or her, or else you might have a quarrel.

I once went to a grocery shop on my street to buy some food items and it was just around 5 pm, then the attendant told me he was closed even though I was looking at what I wanted to buy but I couldn't have it even with me holding my money he kept repeating I've closed chale, I've closed for the day, as a Nigerian that was strange to me, close at 5pm? In Nigeria you don't close shop until customer traffic ends. You close when there is no more customers. Some people close at even 11pm once people are still buying, even some have classes when you get there, if you call the number or something, they'll come and open the shop again for you to buy what you want but this man said he was closed at 5pm though shop was still open and he didn't leave the shop until night, customers came and he will not sell to them still telling them he was closed for the day. Not only him does this until I learnt from someone, Ghanaians don't like to be bothered, they do things at there own will, you can not force them.

Much more but that's all I can remember for now.

Who will win a war between Nigeria and Ghana?

Okley Lives in Accra, Ghana 3y

Which kind of war are you talking about. Either country has their own strength and weakness. I choose to ignore the idea of war where there are guns and bombs and politics involved because no one would wish to have this upon themselves and for that matter there is no need to predict and analyze where blood would spill from but Ghana and Nigeria already are at war in some different sectors; the Jolloff war and the Entertainment Industry war.

Both countries have been pressing each other's button on the matter of the Jolloff meal; I'm not sure how the “war” started but clearly this has been on for a long time now on social media platforms comparing the meals from each country, claiming from each side that their Jolloff taste better than the other. I think Ghana wins that battle anyway. (I'm a full 100% bloody Ghanaian). However, in some way, these people have managed to relate the jolloff meal with the appearances of people on social media. For instance they will compare two persons; one from either country and tag them as Ghana Jolloff and Nigeria Jolloff

In the entertainment industry, both countries have been exchanging blows there too especially in the music department. It is not as if they are dising themselves through music but there a little bit of competition there anyway and Both countries have great singers. They even go on to have concert annually named Ghana meets Niga (last one happend somewhere within this month) which has some of the biggest musicians in both countries on stage. Personally, I think Nigeria wins at the aspect of entertainment, hands down.

Which university is better, the ones in Ghana or Nigeria?

Eben Sanny Lives in Ghana (1993–present) 1y

Ghanaian universities obviously offer high class academic disciplines than Nigeria's. Successfully completing your education in Ghana practically is comparable to an athlete who has covered a tedious/ competitive run amongst other equally good athletes.

I had a friend who completed his bachelor's in Nigeria and his experience corroborates exactly the dubious acts we often hear about Nigerian universities.

However, I believe they as well offer high class educational expertise but relatively, Ghana is ahead.

 # 8. BOTI FALLS

There are actually two falls at Boti: The upper falls and the lower falls. These are the main features of the Boti Falls (what has widely been talked about is the lower falls). The locals describe it as male and female (this description is for the lower falls only). When the volume of water is high especially during the rainy season, the two meet in what the local describe as 'a mating ceremony'. This ceremony is 'graced' by the rainbow that is formed by the splashing water.

Boti Falls is located just 17km North-east of Koforidua, the eastern regional capital. For those interested in how soon it takes to get there, it is just over 30 minutes drive from Koforidua and over 90 minutes from Accra depending on your means of transportation.

River Pawnpawn which forms the falls takes it source from Ahenkwa-Amalakpo before falling over an igneous rock outcrop at the Boti Langmase that is how the falls get its name. The fall was hidden in the forest until it was discovered by a white catholic priest. It is recounted by locals that the priest used the base of the falls as an entertainment ground for his friends and himself.

The land on which the falls is located is not without any controversy though. The Akyems of Tafo who were the original owners of the forest/land wanted it back. But it was realized later that the Tafohene had sold that piece of land to one Tetteh Nguo, a Krobo. It took a court settlement to bring the dispute to a closure.

If the dispute brought Boti Falls into the public domain then a visit of the president of Ghana at the time (Dr. Kwame Nkrumah) propelled it into its status as the most attractive and talked about falls in the eastern region of Ghana. The president visited the falls in 1961 and was amazed at the splendor and grandeur of the falls. He therefore tasked the regional commissioner to construct a rest house at the falls.

The Larabanga Mosque is the oldest in Ghana and is located in Larabanga in the Northern Region of Ghana (Savannah Region). It was built in 1421 and is usually referred to as "the Mecca of West Africa".

Due to the Mosque's rich history, it currently features on the World Monuments Fund's "Watch List of 100 Most Endangered Sites". The Mosque was inspired by the Sudanese architectural style and made with mud and sticks. Because of its rich history, it is one of the most popular tourist spots in Ghana.

The history behind the Mosque and its construction is still a mystery. A story is told that a Muslim named Ayuba built the Mosque. He was travelling through the area and needed to rest.

When he fell asleep, he dreamt about building a mosque, and after waking up, the foundation had been set, so he completed it from that point. This is the place to be if you are a religious person and want to see one of the most important sacred sites in Ghana.
